Under the integrated housing plan the intention was that the houses in the first instance should be sold to veterans and at ten per cent below the market price. The builder gets a priority to enable him to get his construction materials, and he is protected by the government in case his house does not sell. I have a clipping here from the last issue of the Financial Post a day or so ago, to the effect that already the integrated housing plan is not working out in the interests of the veterans. I am told that in the city of Toronto a builder is required to advertise the house only once in a newspaper, and then if it is not bought by a veteran within ten days, the builder is allowed to sell it to a civilian. The Financial Post says:

> The official Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in recent days has lifted its "veterans' preference" restriction from larger houses (in a few centres of declining demand) under the government's "integrated" construction programme. Under this plan, builders are selling to veterans at 10 to 15 per cent below the general market, in return for supply priorities and a sale guarantee.
> This, the first official recognition of a break in the market for veterans housing, is considered by many in the building industry as forerunner of possible complete withdrawal of the "veterans' preference" stipulation from "integrated" contracts by next fall.

I presume that that means that this integrated housing plan was first and foremost for the veteran. But apparently the veteran is not taking advantage of the plan and is not in sympathy with it, as it does not meet his ideas in acquiring a house for himself. So the veterans are dropping away from the integrated housing plan, and the government is now telling the builder under that plan that he does not have to sell to the veteran, that he can sell to the civilian. The answer which I received in respect to this particular housing group was to the effect that it was to help the veterans first and foremost, and it seems to me that the department must now consider whether this integrated housing plan is going to succeed in the interests of the veteran, or whether it should be dropped. As I have said, in the Toronto area only nine builders are building under the integrated housing plan, as compared with 450 builders who are building under other plans.

Housing Enterprises Limited is an organization which is being carried forward by the loan companies of Canada. I know from having sat in at some of the earlier meetings some years ago that the loan companies did not go into this plan just because they wanted to. They got a considerable amount of prodding to go into it, and it was good business on the part of the government to see that the loan companies bore their share of the responsibility in respect to constructing housing units in Canada. The price and the rentals of these houses are subject to the control of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. But Housing Enterprises has caught up with the same conditions facing all other housing groups, that cost prices and rents are getting too high to suit the pocketbook of the veteran.

I am satisfied that in the city of Toronto, and more particularly in Montreal, rentals of housing units in this group are going to be beyond the reach of the veteran, and under these circumstances I see no reason why Housing Enterprises should have a priority over the ordinary builder, who as a matter of fact is building most of the houses being built in Canada today. According to a recent departmental statement, some 48,000 houses were built by ordinary private owners in Canada last year.

Furthermore, Housing Enterprises Limited is entitled to a ninety per cent loan, so the company has only ten per cent of an investment in the project. That is a very attractive proposition for a building corporation. In addition they are guaranteed some 2½ per cent interest on the capital they put into the venture. That makes it an attractive proposition for a building corporation, and I am sure that if the same opportunities were offered to the veteran who wishes to have a house built by a private builder the veteran would get a better deal all around.

I come now to emergency housing. I said a few moments ago that the emergency shelters built in 1946 numbered 1,643. So far as emergency housing is concerned I am satisfied that the government is doing all it can, and is entitled to do all it can, to help out this emergency situation throughout Canada. As a matter of fact emergency housing is a stop-gap; it is only a beginning of things; it is only a hold-over in the meantime until we get better housing. Therefore when 1,643 emergency housing units were constructed in Canada in 1946 it added nothing to the over-all picture; it was a temporary expedient.

We all know that building material is in desperately short supply in Canada. Lumber yards are working from hand to mouth to turn out the material. I have been in lumber yards and have seen the president of the company working at a lathe turning out the small bits of material which the builder had to take away to finish up small parts of his houses while the builder waited right there. They are desperately short of material, particularly trim, doors, sash, and all the material that goes into the woodwork of a house. In addition there is a great shortage of nails. Today I intend to refer to the question of nails, because I think we are in for a bad time and I should like the minister to help the people of Canada to solve this problem, which will stifle building in Canada during the next two or three months if we do not do something about it. Gyproc lath, window sash, doors, trim, bathtubs, hardwood flooring and sewer pipe are all in short supply. But the greatest cost of building is the loss of time. It matters not how high the cost of the material or the cost of labour may be; that is not the big factor in the cost of housing at all today. The big factor is the loss of time. A house which used to take four months to build now takes eight months to a year. The loss of time all the way through the picture is what runs up the cost of building in Canada.

From time to time during the session the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has told us something about nails. In answer to a question of the hon. member for Vancouver South on March 4, 1947, the minister said, as reported at page 994 of Hansard:

I have not heard of a shortage of nails in any part of Canada during the past two months.

On March 6, having received letters from people in my own constituency, I asked this question, as reported at page 1061 of Hansard:

Is the minister not aware that in the Toronto area the shortage is so acute that the builders cannot complete the houses started in 1946, and will he make a statement in regard to the matter?

As a matter of fact the minister did not make a statement. I was not permitted to have the question answered. Following the asking of the question I did receive from builders in Toronto a large number of telegrams and letters which I offered to show to the minister. I wish to place on Hansard a record of the desperate position in which builders in Toronto find themselves in respect of nails. Having heard the hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Vancouver South say something about the matter, I am perfectly satisfied that the situation is general throughout Canada and has to be faced. The first telegram I received reads as follows:

Cannot start spring housing programme. Need nails to finish last year's work. Desperate dilemma. Please do something.

I happen to know that builder. He is building in the Etobicoke district. He has land on which to build some thirty houses. He is a progressive builder and is erecting a small type of house. He is stifled in respect of his building in 1947. In fact he has not yet finshed his 1946 houses.

I received a telegram from another builder in the Toronto district which reads:

I am roofing balance of twelve houses started last April with very slow progress owing to shortage of all materials. I intended starting fifteen more last fall but have been unable to do so. Very discouraging. Am I to quit or continue? Approximately 75 per cent of my business has been with veterans.

Mr. HOWE: What was your reply?

Mr. TIMMINS: I asked the minister for his reply. I offered to show him the telegrams.

Mr. HOWE: He wired to the hon. member; I reply to mine.

Mr. TIMMINS: I have not replied to them. I am expecting that the minister has the matter under control because I have it on good authority that his department has made a survey of the whole situation. They must know what the answer is. I am expecting the minister to give me the answer this afternoon.

Mr. FRASER: Nail the minister down.

Mr. TIMMINS: The next telegram is from the superintendent of a large building enterprise which is being carried on in Toronto by no other than Connie Smythe, manager of the Maple Leaf hockey team. It is a big enterprise. The telegram reads:

Fifteen houses, six carpenters, one keg of nails; no sign of more.

Here is another telegram from a builder who says:

Have been to five hardware stores; could only secure five pounds of nails of any description.

Here is another one from a man who builds up in North York. He is a man who in ordinary times would build anywhere from ten to twenty houses. Last year he probably built ten. His telegram reads:

Have been to seven hardware stores today; cannot buy one keg of nails. Job held up.

Another telegram reads:

Jobs absolutely held up for nails. Brought three kegs home from Chicago while attending builders convention; otherwise will have to stop building.

I am not going to go through all these telegrams. They are almost all from men who are building small houses. They are almost all from builders who have been in the business for a number of years and most of whom are building 75 per cent for veterans. They are building small homes which the veterans can buy, but they are not able to make delivery. Here is another:

Have eight houses under construction. Have no nails or plumbing. The situation is serious.

Here is what another builder, a returned man, has to say:

I wanted to start ten in February. All staked ready to go. Cannot buy nails. Project abandoned until situation clarified. Nine out of last thirteen houses built for veterans. Shall we build houses or close up shop?

I have given enough of the telegrams to indicate to the committee that the shortage of nails is desperate. I wish to have you understand, Mr. Chairman, that I am not holding any brief for the private builder in this matter. I do not act for any of these people, though I happen to know a number of them. I am speaking in terms of houses for Canada. Here is a letter I have received from a man who is really heart and soul in the house-building business. He is building a large number of houses in the Toronto area, and he says:

We have found it impossible to obtain nails throughout Ontario. We normally employ upwards of one hundred men, and because of the nail shortage, we have found it necessary to stop jobs and lay off valuable men.

Here is another from a man and his sons who build a number of houses in the east end of the city:

. . . situation in nails is terrible. It is no worse than other items such as plumbing, heating, lumber and doors. Frankly, building is not worth the headache that you get these days, but we are sticking to our guns in the hope that some day, someone, will do something about it. We seem to be powerless.

I will not read more of these, but I shall be glad to let the minister or his department have the file to look through, if he wishes to satisfy himself that the people are telling a story which is true and which would indicate that building throughout Canada will be stifled if something is not done about nails.

What worries me is the fact that the minister seems to think that if you are not a builder under any one of the five government groups you are not doing essential building. In my view these independent dealers are doing much the better job in building houses in Canada; but the answer which the minister gave to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) on March 18 last would indicate that if you are not in one of these groups you are not doing essential building. Let me quote what the hon. member for Peterborough West said, together with the minister's reply, at page 1471 of Hansard. The hon. member said that hardware stores, contractors and carpenters in his riding had not been able to get nails, and he said he would like to ask the minister where they could get a few kegs of nails because there were none in the Peterborough district. The minister replied:

The production of nails is high as compared with any previous year. Hon. members are well aware that during the steel strike stocks of nails became exhausted, and, at present all pipe lines have not been filled up. I realize that Peterborough may be pretty well out on the pipe line; nevertheless I can assure my hon. friend that there is no real reason why any builder, for priority construction particularly, should have any trouble in getting nails. If my hon. friend refers to so-called non-essential building which hon. members opposite say should be stopped, then I am not particularly worried about whether nails can be had or not. But for any priority work, or for any essential purpose, nails are now available.

I say to the minister that the ordinary building of houses is essential work, and that there are no nails to be had for these men. Apparently, however, the minister is not too much concerned about whether these people who are outside the priority groups get nails or not.

So far as nails are concerned—I have said this before—if we are going to continue this order in council, which regulates building materials in Canada, and if we found it necessary, in respect of soil pipe, to give an incentive bonus in order to keep the industry going—because after all soil pipe is only a small though necessary part of building—then in the same way some incentive should be given the nail manufacturers so that they can produce a larger quantity of nails, in order that building may be kept going for the year 1947.

The minister was good enough to answer a question of mine with respect to the production of nails. I have given these figures before, but I will give them again. He indicated that there were seven firms who produced nails in Canada, and in 1946 production by the ton was 58,843, while in 1947 the estimate was 70,170 tons. Apparently we are coming to a bottleneck, and I suggest to the minister—I hope he has already done it; perhaps he has—that some incentive should be given to the manufacturers in this industry to see that the production of nails is stepped up. It may be the same in the steel industry as it was in the soil pipe industry, that being unable to produce and make enough money out of nails, the manufacturers have turned to other lines in which more money could be made.

I do not think an increase of 20 per cent in production of nails in 1947 is sufficient to take care of the needs of the country, and I know, from clippings I have from newspapers and from the minister's utterances on the subject, that he too is seized of the necessity for stepping up the production of nails in 1947.

One of the things that I find bothersome in these regulations is the fact that industrial building seems to have stepped away ahead of house building, in 1946, and is still going ahead. If we are to have regulations controlling construction materials in Canada, and if one of the most desperate needs at the present time in Canada is housing, then we should be doing something about the fact that industrial construction is outstripping the building of dwellings.

I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of January 24, 1947, which reads:

MacLean building reports, which are accepted as authoritative by the construction industry in Canada, indicate that whereas the dollar-volume of residential building in Canada increased in 1946 by only 8·8 per cent over the 1945 figure, business construction soared by 116 per cent, this despite the fact that countless thousands of Canadians, including those who have money to build reasonably-priced homes, are without accommodation. Under these circumstances, whose is the responsibility for controlling non-residential building?

I have another clipping from the Globe and Mail in which the minister is quoted as follows:

Resistance in some cities to low-cost housing was cited by reconstruction minister Howe today as one of many handicaps under which the department had been working in its housing programme.

And later on:

Mr. Howe declared the government could not afford not to capitalize on the present enthusiasm in industry for expansion. The objective at the moment was to keep both industrial and housing construction going at the same time.

I agree that it is necessary to keep industrial and house-building construction going at the same time, but I say that the ratio of 8·8 per cent increase in 1946 for residential housing as against an increase of 116 per cent for business construction is away out of line. If we are to have these regulations continued then it is time that the department which has control of the situation through the priorities officer did something about it.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the director of Central Mortgage and Housing is seized of the situation, because he said on March 20 last:

Non-housing construction may be a "restraining influence" on residential building this year, D. B. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, declared in his 1946 report, tabled in the Commons today by reconstruction minister Howe.

That brings us back to the crux of the situation, that as a matter of fact the department does realize that industrial construction is out-stripping home building in Canada. The minister speaks of 80,000 houses for 1947. I do not see how Canada will reach 80,000 or anything like that number because, if the government touched only 11,000 housing units in 1946 under the circumstances that obtained, it shall certainly not touch more than 11,000 in 1947.

Now all this business of priorities is governed and controlled by the priorities officer. He has been in the job since June, 1942, and so he should know his job. The fact is, I suggest, that the priorities officer has too many jobs. He is timber controller, steel controller and priorities officer. I am not criticizing him, but I am not so sure that he has a grip of the situation, and I say that for this reason. At a meeting of the National House Builders' Association, held some time ago, one of the officers of the priorities branch had the temerity to tell the National Builders' Association that they need not be worried in the year 1947 about the amount of priorities they would get; as a matter of fact, he said, if they were building under the integrated group they would get their priorities off the top shelf. And he said, "In order to show you just how we are able to give you priorities off the top shelf I want to tell you that in one month this year"—that was in 1946—"we were able to pass on to integrated housing builders 91 per cent of the total material available of a scarce article". That is hardly playing the game, with 91 per cent of all the material available in Canada going to one small group of builders. This national association of house builders is a small group spread across Canada in various centres. As I said, in Toronto there are probably nine who belong to the association; there are a number of them in Hamilton, and so on across the country. They are building under this integrated housing plan, or a good number of them are, but apparently they are not satisfied because here is what they have to say in an extract from the minutes of a meeting of the National House Builders' Association held in Winnipeg last December:

The priorities officer, Mr. Uren, announced that there probably would be 30,000 priorities for housing in Canada for 1947, and Mr. Mansur stated that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would do its utmost to develop housing under the integrated housing plan.

Present indications are that construction proposed under the integrated housing plan will fall far short of meeting the country's needs. Many builders were so dissatisfied with the priories last year that they hesitated to attempt any more houses than that built last year and many are very sceptical about the priorities system as a whole.

These are the people who are building under the integrated housing plan; these are the people who are saying that they are skeptical of the ability of the priorities system to keep them going in the year 1947. As a matter of fact I asked a question of the department some little time ago with respect to priorities. It occurred to me, having had something to do with the building industry for a matter of twenty-five years, that if there was a priorities system working in Canada, I might ask the department how these priorities were working out, and how much material was passing under them, and might be able to get some information that would be useful to the house and to the construction industry generally. So on March 6 I asked this question:

How much building material was moved under priorities in 1946, in respect to the following groups: Wartime Housing Limited, integrated housing, Veterans' Land Act, and Housing Enterprises Limited, of: lumber, nails, building hardware, roofing, soil pipe, tile, plumbing material—

I need not give the whole group of materials, but this was the answer:

The information desired is not in the possession of the dominion government. Priorities for building materials are issued for government sponsored projects designed to provide primarily homes for veterans and their families. Priorities for building materials are issued to contractors and home owners for selected building material items essential for the completion of government approved projects. In order to assemble the information it would be necessary to survey several thousands of contractors who have made use of 25,788 priorities issued during 1946. Although the survey would take several months its results would be uncertain because of the incompleteness of the records kept by some contractors.

So in the first place apparently the priorities system is unscientific, since proper records are not kept. As I understand it, these priorities certificates are for the minimum requirements of those building particular groups of houses and I suggest to the government that as a matter of fact some of these groups who are getting materials, though of course they have to pay for them, are getting more than their share. There has been a bootleg market in existence. I have heard of many cases of nails being bought on the black market in various districts surrounding the city of Toronto. We all know that nails disappear from warehouses, where, as I suggest, too many nails have been stored for the specific projects. It seems there is a great deal of hoarding going on. I know this because six or seven months ago I had in my office an official of Wartime Housing who told me they were stockpiling then. He said they were not going to get caught in 1947 as they did in 1946, and I do not think that is the proper way to carry on. I see no reason why all other building should be stifled until some of these groups have built up their stocks. This priorities system is unscientific; it does not give us a picture of what is going on in Canada, and apparently that picture is not in the hands of the government.

Then, quoting further from the minutes of the meeting of this association in Winnipeg last December, I find this:

Mr. Mansur said that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not only willing but anxious to do anything to help build more houses on an orderly basis. He also said that he was making a survey of occupancy in Canada and that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a fairly good knowledge of the housing needs of Canada. When the survey is finally completed they will have some information along these lines.

That was in December of 1946. Probably that survey has been completed long before this, so now the government should know the needs of this nation for 1947. They must know the great bulk of the building is going to be done by the private builders, but at the moment I am sure I do not know how those private builders are going to get the material with which to carry on. Some little time ago, as many hon. members know, a group of fruit growers came down here from British Columbia. Some of them were in to see me. I said to one of them, "You people package all your fruit out there, and you must need nails for that packaging. How do you get on for nails?" He replied, "Oh, we have that all arranged. We can get all the nails we want. We get a commitment in respect of nails." I don't know where they get their commitment; perhaps the minister can enlighten me. There is nothing in this order in council with respect to nails for fruit growers. It is a regulation in respect of construction material only. If the return that has been brought down showing the production of nails in 1946, has to do with nails for the furniture industry, for the fruit growers and for many other industries, then of course this picture does not help us very much in respect to nails for the building industry, because it indicates quite clearly that the amounts shown are not at all sufficient to meet the needs of Canadian builders and the Canadian people.

The minister has suggested to me, not only in the house but also in a letter, that builders should be using aluminum nails, which are available in certain quantities. I followed up that suggestion to the best of my ability. I found there were some aluminum nails in Toronto, but they were expensive and the builders felt they were beyond their reach in respect of building. Further than that, however, they found that as the wet lumber began to dry out and shrink, these aluminum nails popped right out. Apparently they do not have the bond or bind they should have, in wet wood. The result is that, having put up a panel of wood with aluminum nails, it was not very long before they were springing out, and of course for this reason they were unsatisfactory. Having regard to the fact that industrial building far outstripped residential housing in 1946, and is going to outstrip it in 1947, if the government intends to continue these construction regulations, something will have to be done to give more direction to the building industry.

I have been reading reports respecting building in Canada, and without making a survey in other cities I have looked into the situation in Toronto. According to the Daily Commercial News of April 22, tenders are being called for a skating and hockey arena in North Toronto, at a cost of $300,000. I do not know that that work is to be undertaken immediately, but whether it be this year or next, I see no reason why permission should be given to build hockey arenas in these days when our people need houses.

As I walk through my own district, out through Sunnyside, I see an expensive and ornamental refreshment booth which has been built recently. A large amount of lumber was required for the building of that place, I suggest that this building was not necessary, having regard to the great demand for houses. There should be some sort of permit system as previously, so that only essential building would be permitted. A directive could be sent out by the minister under his authority, because if he has authority under emergency legislation to pass these construction regulations he has authority to direct the provinces and the municipalities as to the kinds of buildings which shall be constructed. A directive that such and such construction is essential and such and such are non-essential would fit the picture. Commissioners of building in cities and towns, with such a directive before them, could chart their way fairly well in 1947.

While I cannot say which building would be essential and which non-essential, I am sure that if a group of builders across Canada were to meet for two or three days they could frame such a directive. I know perfectly well that a skating rink or hockey arena is not essential. And I do not see any reason why the Toronto Transportation Commission should begin their $800,000 project in 1947—until we have more houses for our people. These are factors which occur to me and which, I am sure, must also occur to the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member that his time has more than expired.

Mr. TIMMINS: I should like a minute more. The epitome of what I have said appears in Maclean's Magazine of March 15, 1947. I am sure the minister has read the article. It says that "the real problem of housing in this country has not yet been faced, and there is nothing to indicate the government has any intention of facing it".

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that when considering other orders in council we have considered at the same time those which have been related. We are now discussing the orders in council which come under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and it occurred to me that orders in council 1609, 9439, 7502, 245 and 1997 are directly related to the building industry.

Mr. LENNARD: The steel regulations would not be.

Mr. GREEN: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The steel regulations could be related in connection with nails. I believe they would come directly under the steel regulations. The work of the committee would be facilitated if all these regulations could be considered at one time.

Mr. GREEN: I agree that orders in council 9439 and 7502, both of which deal with emergency shelter regulations, could well be considered together. But I suggest it would be impossible to consider properly orders in council dealing with construction materials with those dealing with steel. We should go through these orders in council one at a time, with the exception of the two dealing with emergency shelter. They might be considered together.

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to discuss them separately. For instance nails, which come under the steel control regulations, are distributed under priority regulations. My suggestion is that the chairman might allow considerable latitude in the general discussion, provided that the subject being discussed is covered by one of the several orders in council. Then we can pass them separately, if that is agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN: I wanted to mention the fact that there was some relationship, so that I would not have to abide too strictly by the rules and call hon. members to order. It is the understanding, then, that an hon. member will be allowed to speak to any of the regulations, but that they will be passed separately.

Mr. GREEN: Which ones are to be included?

The CHAIRMAN: When the regulations are called for approval, I shall call them individually. If, for instance, when considering regulation 1609 an hon. member discussed nails, I would not call him to order and tell him that he should reserve his remarks until we reached order in council 245.

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that so far as order is concerned these are not well arranged. The two relating to emergency shelter are preceded by one relating to controls and regulations respecting construction materials, and are followed by two or three others having to do with construction materials. I believe they could be placed in two classifications. The two dealing with emergency shelter could be discussed together, as could the four others dealing with materials. I do not know that any formality is required, other than a ruling from the chair to the effect that any of the four orders in council dealing with materials can be discussed without infringement upon the rules.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins), who has just taken his seat. All hon. members welcome the addition to our assembly of a member who is vitally concerned with this problem of housing. It is my opinion that housing is still the number one domestic problem confronting the federal government.

I think it must be agreed that wartime conditions have seriously aggravated housing conditions in most of our metropolitan areas. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is very largely responsible for the dissatisfaction existing in Canada in respect of Canada's housing performance. It was under the minister's direction during the war that Canada established so many new records in the field of shipbuilding and in the construction of tanks, planes and all forms of armament. The leadership given by the minister in Canada's production performance at that time created the impression that when the war was over and materials became available, along with a sufficient supply of man-power, we would have similar leadership in the field of house construction.

The hon. member for Parkdale accurately described the situation which exists in all parts of Canada. People who fought to save their homes are finding that houses are not available. Any man who served in the air force knows that machines such as Catalinas were provided by the Department of Munitions and Supply. These machines cost $250,000, but if one was lost or destroyed and the young man escaped with his life, another was available. Some of the bombs used cost up to $10,000. Young Canadian airmen are now finding it difficult to understand how it was possible to use Canadian money and man-power to produce a bomb costing $10,000, ship it by boat and then drop it on Hamburg or Cologne, when in 1946 and 1947 we are unable to use the same Canadian labour and materials to drop $10,000 houses in Hull or Halifax or Sturgis.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not forget Regina.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I suppose Regina requires some too.

An hon. MEMBER: Not bombs.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We do not need bombs, but we do need houses. If the minister of reconstruction would use the same technique and the same imagination in peace time that he used in war time, we would have an entirely different picture.

The hon. member for Parkdale made reference to the small percentage of our man-power and materials which were going into residential construction. I should like to quote some statistics from Maclean's building reports for October, 1945, and October, 1946. Residential construction in October, 1946, increased 42 per cent as compared with October, 1945. In the same period business construction increased 180 per cent; industrial construction, 266 per cent, and engineering, 391 per cent. In the first nine months of last year only $32.50 out of every $100 spent on construction went into housing.

Everywhere you go in Canada you find that materials and man-power are being made available for the building of theatres, billiard halls, bowling alleys and such buildings. I am not criticizing the proprietors of these enterprises for wanting to use some of their cash to build a money-making structure, but I am concerned about the minister of reconstruction allowing such a large percentage of our tight materials to be used in non-essential construction. If the minister of reconstruction would face the housing problem of Canada and guarantee a housing programme for the building of 100,000 new houses every year for the next ten years, he would capture the imagination of the Canadian people and would assure a market for our lumber manufacturers, our cement producers and those who are turning out the hardware and other things necessary for such buildings. If he took the trade union people into his confidence in connection with such a programme there would be no question at all about the outcome. There is sufficient additional personnel in Canada to undertake such a programme. An analysis was made some time ago to find out whether we had the labour and material available to carry out a programme of 100,000 houses per year, and it was found that we could carry out such a programme and still have left over some 73,000,000 bricks, some 2,000,000 barrels of cement, some two billion feet of lumber, a great deal of glass, and plenty of nails.

I think people in all parts of Canada will agree that the building of 100,000 houses would be a much more useful programme for the minister of reconstruction to promote than the building of new theatres in Ottawa, Vancouver or any place else that you go. I know the minister has given the local authorities the responsibility of deciding what is essential and what is non-essential, but I want to tell him that when a law-abiding citizen asks for a permit to build a store, the local authorities find it very difficult to refuse, because a new store is going to produce tax revenue. They have nothing against the man, and although some members of the council may be in a similar business, they do not like to take a stand that would prevent someone else from going into it. I submit that since the minister gave the local authorities the responsibility of making that decision, the results have convinced most people that the local authorities cannot decide how tight materials are to be used.

In the part of Ottawa in which I have been living, two new hardware stores have been built. There were two hardware stores serving that particular community and now we have four where a year ago there were only two. I understand that two returned men are running one of them, and I know that most people in the community would like to see the returned men get a break. But, if we have a depression, as most people think we soon will, these young men will probably lose all they have. They will probably be unable to survive the crash.

Mr. McILRAITH: What would you have the young men do?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think we have to provide something for the young people in addition to letting them go into fields which are already overcrowded.

Mr. McILRAITH: Is the hardware business in Ottawa overcrowded?

Mr. NICHOLSON: You cannot get nails anywhere.

Mr. McILRAITH: Just keep to the point: is the hardware business overcrowded?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should think so, judging by the amount of stock these particular hardware stores are offering. It would appear that you have more hardware stores in Ottawa than you require.

Mr. McILRAITH: Just check up on the number of hardware stores in Ottawa since 1940. I do not think the hon. member is fully familiar with the hardware situation in Ottawa.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sufficiently familiar with it to know that two new hardware stores have been built and they have not been able to get supplies of hardware and building materials. No doubt they are able to make a living now when prices are high and people have more money, but when the depression comes those who have not the right type of connection or have not been able to accumulate enough to see them through may lose all their money. Ex-service people who put all their worldly possessions into stores and other new businesses may be the first victims.

I think the minister of reconstruction and his assistants should have the responsibility of deciding what type of construction will be considered as essential, and they should retain this responsibility until greater progress has been made in solving our housing problem. When I was discussing the question of housing a year ago I made a number of suggestions which unfortunately were not taken very seriously by the administration. I suggested that the federal government should formulate an over-all housing plan for Canada, that they should take into their confidence the provincial and municipal authorities and work out such a programme around the table. This has not been done, and the trade recession is coming much closer. You cannot work out a housing formula in six days or six weeks or six months. You require enabling legislation to be passed by the provincial legislatures. You must enlist public opinion at all levels of government. The federal government is open to severe censure for having failed up to April 25, 1947 to call a conference of all authorities on housing in this dominion. Until the federal government gives that lead it is not going to be possible for the city fathers in a city like Toronto to make plans for the future development of the metropolitan area. They have no indication as to how much assistance, if any, they may get from the federal authorities.

The other day I mentioned one of the new booklets put out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation entitled "Sixty-seven homes for Canadians." I was particularly interested in the results of the competition recently sponsored by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I think anyone reading this will feel that it has been a most disappointing performance, and there is a perfectly good explanation. The architect has no incentive to take up the planning of houses for people in the lower income brackets. Until some authority makes the necessary gestures, the architect who might do some planning for people in the lower income brackets will be able to sell his wares elsewhere. In the meantime he is only wasting his time. The government's own statistics indicate that in 1942 twenty per cent of the married men in Canada, exclusive of those in the armed services and in agriculture, had incomes of less than $1,000 a year. Taking into account the fact that the people in this income bracket have to have food and clothing, it will be seen that they cannot afford to pay more than $12 or $16 a month in rent

Mr. HOWE: They are getting a bit more income now.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, but not twice as much, and even if they were getting twice as much they could not go into the market now and rent a very attractive place for $24 or $32 a month. The only people to whom the federal government is giving assistance in housing are those in the top income brackets who can make provision for their own housing. For two-thirds of the people in Canada the present housing legislation is of practically no help. Nothing is being done in the way of slum clearance or to provide subsidized housing so that people who are getting only $1,000 a year and can afford to pay only around $12 a month for rent can have decent living accommodation with running water and electric light.

Mr. HOWE: Can my hon. friend answer a question that I have asked before? What is the nature of a man's employment who earns only $1,000 a year?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think I have the Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures—

Mr. HOWE: Never mind the bureau of statistics. Just mention one trade.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A great many people in the textile industry are getting less than $1,000 a year, and caretakers in our city schools, and carpenters—

An hon. MEMBER: That is part time work, caretaking.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Carpentry is a full time job, but seasonal; you cannot get employment the year round. I checked only the other night the last report of the Department of Labour after the minister had raised this question, and I found that in the textile industry many people are getting less than $1,000 a year. One of our troubles is that our housing programme has been formulated by people who have never had to live on $1,000 a year but are more accustomed to thinking in terms of living on $1,000 a month. A great many people in the towns and villages in my constituency never receive $1,000 a year in cash, such as those clerking in stores or working in restaurants, or carpenters, plumbers, and tinsmiths.

Mr. HOWE: Is that so in the province of Saskatchewan, with its minimum wage law?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minimum wage law does not provide employment twelve months in the year.

Mr. HOWE: I am astonished that you have that situation in Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Many are engaged in seasonal work.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is not as bad in Saskatchewan as it is in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The fact remains that two-thirds of our Canadian wage earners are getting less than enough to pay for a house under the Central Mortgage programme, and they cannot afford to pay the rents set out in this new booklet.

Mr. HOWE: The rents of the wartime housing units run from $21 to a maximum of $32 a month.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The lowest one given on page 5 of this booklet is $25 a month, which of course includes taxes, insurance, water, maintenance and repairs. That $25 will buy a house on a fifteen-year mortgage with a building value of $2,150, and the maximum loan is $2,020. The minister is experienced in the construction business, and he would be performing a great service for the Canadian people if he would have one of his companies embark on the building of $2,500 houses in Canada in 1947. You cannot build such a house today and comply with the specifications of the National Housing Act, because the costs of plumbing and materials are too high. I have no quarrel with that, but with materials in short supply and building costs what they are you simply cannot build the type of house that is listed here under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The minister will agree that he is not getting houses built this year that will be available for $25 a month.

Mr. HOWE: I am offering for sale thousands of houses, the wartime houses—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Built for sale?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and they can be purchased on the basis of payments of from $21 to $25 per month. My hon. friend knows the rental scale of wartime houses, of which we have built 27,000 and are building 6,000 or 7,000 more. The rental runs from $21 to about $32 a month.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have argued with the minister before on the whole wartime housing programme. In the first place I argued that he was constructing potential slums.

Mr. HOWE: I know you did.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At that time the minister promised that these houses would be demolished within six months after the end of the war. I predicted then that these houses would never be demolished so long as people were living in less desirable houses. I am not saying that these are slum houses now, but they are potential slums and never should have been built as part of a long-term government housing programme. I am not saying that they should be torn down—not at all; but they were not the type of permanent house that the dominion authority should build—houses like peas in a pod, crowded together.

Mr. HOWE: There is no wartime house now being built on a lot with less than a fifty-foot frontage. Is that considered crowding in your city of Regina?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I admit that wartime houses are a good deal better than those occupied by a good many Canadian citizens.

Mr. HOWE: How wide should they be spaced so as not to be crowded?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If any hon. member will visit communities where there are wartime houses I think he will agree that you have there a potential slum area.

Mr. HOWE: I will agree with nothing of the sort.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The houses are all of the same colour, and built on the same plan, with their chimneys all in line.

Mr. HOWE: That is not a description of wartime housing. Has my hon. friend never seen wartime housing?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have.

Mr. HOWE: Where did he find the chimneys all in line and the colours all the same?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have seen a number.

Mr. HOWE: Tell us one.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is one at Wrightville which I visited when it was under construction.

Mr. HOWE: We do not build them with the chimneys all in line.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They are a pretty poor looking lot compared with what the minister was able to produce in the way of planes and munitions plants during the war. Apparently wartime housing is a permanent housing programme, and a great many of these houses will be here as long as the minister lives.

Mr. HOWE: I was told only about two months ago by the top officers of the Legion that the only satisfactory housing being built for the veterans in Canada was wartime housing, and that the hope of the veterans depended on wartime housing. That is the other side of the picture. You might as well have both sides.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If wartime houses are the best that Canada can build for the veterans of world war II, they are pretty cheap looking compared with the planes and munitions plants which the minister constructed during the war, when he built in an imaginative way.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to have a view of my hon. friend's own town when he says that these houses are cheap looking. Compared with what are they cheap looking?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I hope the people of Canada are not always going to live in wartime housing. I was born in a log house and I do not apologize for it. But as soon as my father could afford it he wanted a better house for his children. A great many of my people lived in log houses. A great many of the ex-servicemen came from log houses, but they do not want to go back to them if they can avoid doing so. The housing programme of 1947 must be better than that which the minister has visualized in his wartime housing programme.

I am not going to enter into a discussion regarding the merits of wartime houses versus the veterans housing programme. The veterans are being compelled to pay outrageous prices for the property they will have, but it is a matter of getting a house and they have to pay what is demanded. The fact is that at the present time the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is failing to give leadership which will result in a housing programme being worked out to make use of the raw materials we have in this country and which will ensure employment for the workers in the building industry over the next five or ten years. It is true that more houses were built last year than were built ten years ago, but the houses that are being built do not take into account the needs of the people or the population. I find that in the Toronto area, for example, around Forest Hill 116 permits were issued last year for houses having a total value of $2 million, or an average of $18,035 each. There are not many veterans who can take advantage of a house costing $18,000. One of my quarrels with this type of housing in this period when we are so short of many materials is that there are two or three bathtubs going into these luxury houses. If the minister had acted on the advice I gave last year he would have continued the responsibility he had of deciding what was essential housing.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me what is essential housing. He complains about wartime housing being too cheap and of substandard construction. He quarrels about the $18,000 house being too good. What does he require as a reasonable house?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is a fair question. I think somewhere in between the two would be a reasonable one. Before one house has four bathrooms every house should have one.

Mr. HOWE: An $18,000 house does not usually have four bathrooms.

Mr. NICHOLSON: According to my information, quite a few of them have. I saw some houses built in Regina last year and I understand that they were not able to get bathtubs for many of them.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you want four?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I do not. If we are to grant half a million dollar production subsidy to Crane's, then the taxpayers of Canada have some interest in knowing where these bathtubs are to go.

Mr. FULTON: In bathrooms.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Some should go to Regina. They should not go to Forest Hill and Toronto, because the people there are able to pay, on the average, $18,000 for their houses. I suggested last year that the minister should formulate an over-all plan. He should convene a conference of people who are interested in the problem of housing on the provincial and municipal level as well as on the federal level. That conference should be called immediately. It is the minister's responsibility to make sure that subsidies are provided for all those municipalities or provinces which will go along with him in providing housing for the people in the lower income groups. No private builder, no life insurance company, no group of philanthropic people is likely to go into the construction of housing in Canada with a view to providing houses for a third of the people who are living in the lower income groups or even the middle groups. The only housing that we are likely to get under our present programme is for the people in the upper third, who have a good deal of financial security and who, in all probability, would be able to build their own houses regardless of any help from the federal authority.

Before the order in council passes, the minister should make some commitment as to whether or not in the near future he will take the responsibility for calling together a conference to try to get an agreement and work started with a view to providing housing for the people in the lower income brackets.

Mr. McIVOR: I like to speak about what I am sure of, and I am sure of certain things about the wartime houses in Fort William. The committee will expect me to know something about them. Several hundred houses have been built. I visited many of them. When they were built the criticism was that, while we had these houses in the first year after the war, two years after we would be asking ourselves what was to be done with them. Many of the people who were living in these houses at the time they were doing war work now want to buy them. That is the finest argument in favour of the judgment of the minister of reconstruction in building these houses. Some of these people want to buy them and put a foundation under them. I visited over a hundred of these houses and I found only one individual who was not satisfied. He moved from a shed away out in the country. He had a large family. He said: "This house should be bigger." I said, "Yes, in the same way that your family should be bigger." But when he came to find out what his rent was as compared with rents in other places he was grateful.

I should like to say another word about the wartime houses in Fort William, and especially about the work which the contractors have done. There has not been one word of criticism. Instead of pulling to pieces the work which has been done by this department, we should at least say one or two kind words.

Mr. SINNOTT: Courtesy is a splendid thing. If a little courtesy had been shown by the minister this afternoon I would not be on my feet at the moment. I asked him a friendly question about nails and what he was going to do about them, and he said: "Go away; do not bother me about nails." I said that I was going to bother him on the floor of the house this afternoon.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale. He covered the situation pretty thoroughly. The hon. member for Mackenzie has had a good deal to say on the situation and in many instances he was correct. I myself have visited a great many of these houses. In most cases the ones built by the minister are all right. There is a block of houses in Windsor which were built on wood blocks which do not meet with my approval at all. I also saw many houses in Vancouver and I saw quite a few houses which were built just west of the Red river. In most of these places the average returned man finds the cost of the houses too high.

The hon. member for Mackenzie was alert when he was asked a question by the minister about the cost of the houses, when he said that somewhere in between was the happy medium.

That is right. In order to purchase one of these houses, a man has to show that he has practically steady employment so that he can keep up his payments. I do not know how long the employment will continue but the payments run over a long period of time. Unless the veteran is assured of employment over the period that the payments run, he is not in a secure position.

At the moment the whole problem is nails. For two months we have heard the hon. member for Peterborough West asking about nails, and he is right. In my town I do not think you could get twenty-five cents worth of nails. How is it possible to build eighty thousand houses if we have not the nails? The Minister of Reconstruction and Suppiy is still our guiding hand and we are still under war measures. Therefore I say that he has the right to instruct the companies which are making nails to increase their production and do nothing but make nails. If that were done the problem would be solved in a short time.

So far as people in the low income brackets are concerned, there are a number of people in Ottawa and in every other city in Canada who are in that position. I have been through the city of Ottawa and it is a disgrace to see where many of these people are living. We do not need to go any farther than across Wellington street to see it. These men in the low income tax brackets are working only part time, and they are certainly not going to be able to purchase homes such as many of those that are being built at the present time, and at their present cost. I would urge the minister to use his authority at once to see that the nail supply in Canada is increased one hundredfold, I would say, because if we do not have an increased supply of nails within the next month or six weeks there is no possibility of building 80,000 homes this summer.

Mr. JOHNSTON: A year ago when I brought up the question of housing we had a rather rough time, as I recall, just before the session ended; but, despite that fact we got some results, and since that time almost everything that I said on that occasion has been verified by other members who have looked more thoroughly into the question. I remember that, when speaking on this question last year, I drew to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply some of the facts in connection with wartime housing. If I remember rightly—and I am speaking from memory now—I told the minister then that, while I had not seen any of the houses under construction, I did, a day or two before coming to Ottawa prior to the last session, visit the building plant where the Shoquist Construction Company was building parts of houses which would be transferred from there to the location, wherever it might be, where they would be required. I said that in my opinion, judging from the way the houses were being constructed, the sides and so on, they would not stand up very well under the conditions to which they would be subjected.

Today I wish to discuss some of these houses. Some time ago I put some questions on the order paper in regard to these houses and I wish to quote from the questions and answers. This was in reference to the Shoquist Construction Company of Calgary:

1. How many houses has the Shoquist Construction Company contracted to build and/or has built for the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and/or Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation?

The answer was:

Three hundred houses for Wartime Housing Limited.

The next question was:

Where are these houses located?

The answer was, in Calgary. The third question was:

How many types of houses are there being built and/or have been built by this company?

The answer was:

Three types.

4. What is the total amount of money paid to this company to date?

The answer was:

At February 10, 1947, $398,073.31.

Then under the (b) part of the questions:

What is the total amount of money yet payable under the contract?

The answer to that question was:

At date, $334,377.21.

That makes about three-quarters of a million dollars and that is a lot of money, but that is the answer. The next question was:

5. What is the contract price for each type of house?

I am not sure about this and I would ask the minister to explain it. The answer is:

Four-room house (asbestos shingle siding), $1,900.41.

Am I to take it that the complete house with asbestos shingle siding would be $1,900.41? Then there appears in brackets "wood siding, $1,942.41". There must be something wrong there, or I am misinterpreting it.

Mr. HOWE: Certain materials were being supplied. The answer is correct. That was not the cost of the house. The hon. member asked for the amount of money we paid the contractor.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The question was: "What is the contract price for each type of house?"

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I take it that is the labour, the contractor's labour.

Mr. HOWE: It is the contract price, but there was a certain free issue there that would not be in the contract price.

Mr. BENTLEY: A certain what?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member asked his question and we answered exactly in the terms in which he asked it. You cannot ask for more.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have learned that unless one is very careful in asking questions he sometimes does not get the information he is after. I do not blame the department in that regard. They read the question carefully and they answered it, I would not say exactly to suit themselves.

Mr. HOWE: The practice of the department is to answer exactly what is asked and that is what they did in your case. You could criticize us if we adopted any other policy.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I accept that.

Mr. HOWE: Why cast aspersions, then?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am not finding fault with the minister; he does not need to get excited about the matter. I asked for information to clarify the question.

Then I find that a six-roomed house, asbestos shingle siding, is $2,443.56, and wood siding, $2,491.56; and a five-roomed house, asbestos shingle siding, is $2,307.13, and wood siding $2,355.13. This information is given in this connection:

The above contract calls for sheet rock, masonite, asphalt shingles, asbestos shingles, rough lumber, hardwood flooring, mineral wool insulation and paper and felts being supplied by Wartime Housing Limited.

6. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages to employees?
7. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages to subcontractors' employees?
8. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages in the case of piece work by (a) contractor; (b) subcontractor?

The answer to these three questions reads:

6, 7 and 8. In all cases, the main contract specifies that wages and working conditions shall conform to the requirements of provincial legislation and to current practice for the trades in the area. Subcontractors are bound by the labour requirements of the main contracts.

[Mr. Howe.]

The next question:

9. Does the contract specify that outside painting be done by brush or by spray gun or both?

The answer:

9. Contract specified first coat—brush; other two may be sprayed.

I have not personally visited these houses that have been constructed but I have had some communications and personal interviews in the matter. One of the first complaints I had was in regard to the agreement of sale, and I wish to read a letter that I received in this connection, with a view to soliciting some information from the minister. Later on, I shall speak of other things that I know more about because of the evidence I have. I quote from this letter:

The enclosed is a cutting of an editorial in the Journal of yesterday's date. It speaks for itself and the subject matter is one it is thought should be brought up in the House of Commons. It is certainly a one-sided agreement and the price of the houses suggests the government is emulating the tactics of Scrooge—

He has not been very careful in his wording.

Fancy a five-roomed house—a none to elaborate one at that—costs the purchaser $9,370.

When you compare that with the price I quoted a moment ago, there is a discrepancy.

Mr. HOWE: The government never sold a single unit, so far as Central Mortgage or Munitions and Supply are concerned, for $9,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I will go on and read it.

Mr. HOWE: Why read a thing as wild as that?

Mr. JOHNSTON: This is from a man who apparently knows what he is talking about, or should.

Mr. HOWE: What is his name?

Mr. JOHNSTON: He says:

If the purchaser lives in the house for a full five years at first there is a reduction of $1,000.

Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON: He goes on:

If the tenant does not buy he may be in immediate danger of being turned out on a mere technicality in order to sell the house to some other—

He has the words "poor sucker" here.

As a war veteran and tenant of one of these houses, the action of the government is most condemnatory.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has read the letter; now will he lay it on the table?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, certainly I will, and along with it I will send the clipping which is enclosed. I should like to read that clipping so that it will appear in Hansard, because to some extent it verifies the letter I have just read:

Tenants of wartime houses would be well advised to have a lawyer approve the agreement of sale before they decide to purchase. After reading one of these documents, which set forth the terms under which the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation will transfer one of the wartime housing dwellings to tenants, the impression is left that the crown company is taking no chances.

One clause, for instance, stipulates that, if any of the terms of the agreement are not carried out, the purchaser will give up possession "without any notice to quit and without the vendor bringing any action for ejectment,"—

I think that is true in regard to the contract. I do not have the agreement of sale before me. but I have it upstairs, and as I recall it that is one of the clauses of that agreement.

—and that the purchaser is to be "without any recourse whatever . . . either at law or in equity" against the vendor, for the recovery of any moneys paid. Further, it says that in the event of any breach of the agreement all payments already made "shall be retained by the vendor as and for liquidated damages and not as a penalty."

That, too, I think is one of the clauses in the agreement of sale, as I remember it. I read this, subject to the minister's correction, but I looked up the agreement of sale when I read this article, and that is as I recollect it.

Another clause announces that in the event of any breach "the purchaser shall forthwith become a mere trespasser upon every part of the said lands, and may be forcibly ejected therefrom by the vendor or his agents without any of them being in any way responsible for damages."

These clauses appear to the layman to be harsh and arbitrary. In excluding any appeal to the courts of the land, they violate one of the fundamental rights of a Canadian citizen. Although the vendor is a crown company, it cannot be allowed to set itself above the law.

To represent such a document as "between His Majesty the King in the right of Canada" is to libel the crown itself. It has been charged that the bureaucratic mind is prone to arrogate to itself supreme power and authority. This agreement of sale certainly appears to be a manifestation of such a tendency.

I believe these references to the agreement of sale are correct, because I checked them when I received the article?

Mr. HOWE: May I just get this clear? This was built as a wartime house; is that true?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Now being sold by the crown?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, that is what they are referring to.

Mr. HOWE: Sold at $9,000?

Mr. JOHNSTON: That was the amount stated in the letter.

Mr. HOWE: Is this two houses the hon. member is talking about, semi-detached?

Mr. JOHNSTON: The letter says:

Fancy a five-roomed house, a none too elaborate one at that, costs the purchaser $9,370 over a period of twenty years.

That would be the total amount paid over a period of twenty years in monthly instalments, and would include the interest.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, this is a social credit transaction?

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, these are the proposals of the minister of reconstruction to the veterans.

Mr. HOWE: I didn't know what the hon. member was talking about. Now I understand.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am very glad the minister brought that point in, because he has referred many times to social credit as being a kind of screwy thing, but now he acknowledges that this is a screwy contract. Had I said that, the minister would have been a little irritated, but I am glad he has placed that interpretation upon it. I do not think the minister will deny that the clauses referred to as being in the agreement of sale are there, and it seems to me quite unfair that if a veteran has put money into a house; if he has paid for a certain period of time and then, for some reason or another, misses a payment, which violates a clause in the agreement, he should be liable to be ejected without any recompense in regard to the money paid in. It seems to me that, with the economic conditions under which we are living, it would be only fair for the agreement of sale to be modified to give the veteran a little leeway, in case he should lose his position, until such time as he might become reinstated in employment and be able to carry on. The minister may say, well, the company might agree to that, that no man would be kicked out just because he happened to fail to make one monthly payment. But that is not in the terms of the contract, and, after all, when one is dealing with matters of this kind one must confine himself to the wording of the contract. That is the thing we should complain about now.

For a few moments I should like to speak about the construction of the houses. Referring to this matter a moment ago, I mentioned that I had visited the place down by the railway tracks in Calgary where the Shoquist Construction Company were putting together the sides of the houses, and so on. Young fellows were working there who, in my view, did not have any practical experience. I am not saying it takes men with practical experience to nail two by fours together; I do not think that is necessary, provided that they are under proper supervision. When I was speaking of wartime houses last year the Minister of Veterans Affairs said one of the reasons those houses were so poorly constructed was that they did not have first-class workmen. That was all so much tommyrot, because you do not require every man to be a first-class workman in order to build a house properly, provided that you have proper supervision. I think the minister will agree with that.

But I want to come to this clause I read a moment ago in regard to fair wages. This was brought to my attention about a day before I came to Ottawa. One of the labour unions in Calgary telephoned and asked me to come to their office to discuss this matter of labour relations with wartime housing. At that time I pointed out to them, as I want to state to the minister now, that I had not actually visited one of these houses; and, believe me, I do not go around looking for trouble, but when trouble is brought to me I have never run away from it. That was true in connection with these veterans' houses. I never went around snooping to see what I could find out. These people came to me and asked me to see these conditions, and I went. I visited this labour organization and talked to some of the men working on these houses. I have before me an affidavit to support what I am saying. I said to these men, "This is a swell time to bring this question to me. I have not even time to go down and visit the houses, to see whether what you are saying is the truth." Then I said, "I won't do anything in this matter unless you fellows will give me an affidavit that what you are telling me is true." They did so, and I have that affidavit here in my hand.

I put the question on the order paper in regard to fair wages, because I wanted to find out whether in the contracts with these companies there was a stipulation that the men working on these buildings should receive fair and decent wages. According to the answer received from the department, that is so; under the contract they are supposed to pay decent and proper wages. What I am going to say is in relation to the Shoquist Construction Company; as far as I could find out the Bird Construction Company, which I believe is building wartime houses in Calgary—

Mr. HOWE: I don't know.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I believe they are. I have spoken to the men working on those houses, and they tell me the houses are being put up properly, so that I want to give credit where credit is due. But in regard to these other houses which I mentioned first, the condition is that when the contract is let the contractor does not necessarily do all the work himself. He sublets the contract, and in some instances it is sublet two or three times.

In this particular instance to which I would direct the minister's attention, I come to the place where a contract for hardwood flooring was being sublet. I am not sure whether it was sublet once or twice; but in the final analysis the men who were working on the job were getting three cents a square foot for laying hardwood flooring. My contention is that a man cannot earn decent wages, if he does a decent job, if he is paid only three cents a square foot. I do not believe it can be done.

Mr. HOWE: Did the hon. member ever look into that?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have laid quite a little of it.

Mr. HOWE: I can tell him that probably fifty per cent of all the hardwood flooring laid is laid under contract and, as I remember prices, three cents a square foot is the prevailing price.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That might have been so a few years ago. Is the minister referring to recent times?

Mr. HOWE: I have not had the figures for some time, probably ten or twelve years.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I agree that wages ten or twelve years ago were different from what they are today. And the cost of living was a lot different ten or fifteen years ago from what it is now.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend maintains that three cents a square foot is a substandard price, does he?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, I think it is.

Mr. HOWE: Are you sure of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON: It depends upon your—

Mr. HOWE: You are entering a complaint in the House of Commons of Canada. I assume it is a serious complaint.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am saying this, that I do not think a man who lays hardwood flooring properly, if he nails it properly, and puts paper in between, can make decent wages at three cents a square foot.

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter of your opinion.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is a matter of my opinion, yes, against the minister's opinion. He said he thought it could have been done for that, and I think he said it was ten or twelve years ago. I say that under present-day conditions I do not think a man can lay flooring, and do it properly, at that price, because it is a different matter to lay hardwood flooring from laying softwood. I do not think he can do it at three cents a foot.

I have evidence to prove this. I was talking to men who were working for another company in Calgary at the same type of work, and who were getting five cents. These men explained to me that they could make fairly good wages at five cents. But three cents is little more than half of that, and it makes a considerable difference.

Mr. HOWE: I do not understand why the men would take a contract, if it were not profitable. Why did they not work at $1.20 an hour with the carpenters on the job?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Because the contractor would not let the work out on an hourly basis. He let it out on a sub-contract basis, and therefore they could either take it or leave it. If the minister is sure that hardwood flooring can be laid at three cents a square foot, then what was the price in the original contract? What does the government allow for laying hardwood flooring, to the original contractor? I may be wrong—and I admit it—but my estimate is about nine cents a square foot.

Mr. HOWE: I made no statement. My hon. friend said it used to be the price. I do not know what the price is. But I would not think a price of three cents a square foot is prima facie evidence that it is unreasonably low; because it seems to me, prima facie, that if the men are anxious to take the work on that basis it must be more profitable than working on an hourly basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The point is this; when the subcontractor is able to put that out at three cents a square foot, what did the original contractor get?

My suggestion is this—and it it merely an assumption—that I believe the original contract must have called for something around eight or nine cents a square foot. If that is so, then there is too great a spread between the price for laying the hardwood flooring, in the original instance, and in the sublet price. You have to see how it works out.

Mr. HOWE: You are putting up a straw man and knocking him down. You say the price was nine cents?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I know that every time a contract is sublet there is a profit made on it by the original contractor. That was proven all the way through veterans housing. In this particular instance, where I have evidence to support what I am telling the minister, in these houses in Calgary the flooring was being laid at three cents a square foot. Let me read part of it:

> We the undersigned have made verbal statements to Mr. Charles E. Johnston as to quality of work being done on wartime housing by the Shoquist Construction Company Limited, Calgary, and we now make these statements under oath, and do declare that subfloors are improperly nailed, having in many cases boards with only one nail and many places none, where two nails are required. In laying hardwood floors many places have up to three boards laid without nails in them, and some floors (hardwood) are laid without paper between.

That just means this, that when you are going to chisel on labour—and I do not mean the government in this instance; I mean the contractor—where they come to the point where they are chiseling on labour and are paying unfair wages, then you will get inefficient work.

I do not make any mistake about it; these men who are qualified carpenters are going to see to it that they do make a fair day's wages. It was pointed out to me that in some instances they would leave the job at night, and that there would be two or three rolls of paper left on the job. Then they would come back in the morning, ready to go to work—and, mind you, they were getting three cents a square foot. They said: "What would you do if, when you went back to work in the morning, there was no paper. Would you stand around a half a day, waiting for paper?" I said, "No, I would not." They said, "Neither did we. We laid the floor, because we had to earn our money."

But the point is that the original contractor should now be responsible for this job. If this is true, and if these floors are being nailed so that three or four boards contain only one nail, where there should be three or four nails, then I say the original contractor should be compelled to take up that flooring. If the specifications call for paper between the floors, and that has not been supplied, then the original contractor should be compelled to lift the flooring and put the paper there, without any additional cost.

Mind you, it cost us $1,500,000 under veterans housing to recondition these houses, just because of such mistakes as are taking place in the contracts to which I have referred. Anyone who has had any experience in building must know that these floors will last for six months or probably a year and a half.

Mr. FRASER: Unless dampness gets in.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But when dampness creeps in and the boards begin to dry out, then will come the squeaks and cracks in the floor, and the boards will pull up. That is when the veterans will have a complaint.

We have a logical complaint. I am pointing it out to the minister at this time, without any desire to be injurious to him, or to impede the work he is endeavouring to do. That was not my intention last year, either, when I brought this matter up before the veterans affairs committee in connection with veterans housing.

I am just pointing it out in this regard because, as was indicated in the letter, the returned men are being forced to pay high prices for these places; if so, they should be getting value for their money. And if these houses are being constructed in the manner in which I have indicated—and I do not think these men would take an oath to a false statement—then I think an investigation should be made.

If these suggestions are found to be true, then the proper place for the government to claim would be against the original contractor. I would object. and object most strenuously, if next year this House of Commons were asked to pay another million and a half dollars to replace the improper work that these contractors have done.

As I said in the beginning, I have not visited the houses personally. I made that clear to the minister. But I will also say that I am going to visit them this summer, because I want to see what they are like.

Then, in regard to paint, I have had information given me in regard to it, that the paint was being put on completely by spray guns.

Mr. HOWE: In other words, my hon. friend now says that he is addressing this House of Commons in connection with houses which he has not seen; that he does not know whether these statements are true or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not say that I did not know whether they were true or not.

Mr. HOWE: How can you know they are true?

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: Because I have affidavits to support them.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend want to make a charge in connection with this? If so, we will certainly go in and take the paint off.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is the same kind of argument the Minister of Veterans Affairs gave me last year. I am not trying to find fault with the minister as the minister of reconstruction, I simply thought he would appreciate it if these things were pointed out to him. I assume, or I will make it as strong as to say that I do assume that the minister of reconstruction is endeavouring to build the best kind of houses he can under the circumstances. I would have thought he would appreciate having these matters brought to his attention.

Last year, when I brought this question before the Minister of Veterans Affairs he found, on investigation, that the things I had referred to were true. This year I could have brought statements and photographs of some of the veterans houses in Calgary to which I was referring and which were in worse condition than they were last year when I was talking. However I could see no use in doing that, because some repairs had already been made. Since I had been given no further complaints I let the matter drop. But I have the evidence in my office now in regard to those veterans houses.

I am pointing out these things to the minister so that he can take some precaution. He may say that there has been proper supervision, but may I say that I think the greatest defect in connection with veterans housing was the lack of proper inspection. I am inclined to think we are going to run into the same trouble in connection with wartime housing. I do not blame the minister personally for these floors being laid in the manner in which I have indicated, because I know he cannot run around and personally inspect all these buildings. He must have competent inspectors to do this job, and I think that is where the fault lies. If the work is not done properly the one who suffers is the returned man. I am sure the minister does not want that condition to exist, and neither do I. I hope the minister will look into the matter and see that proper adjustments are made.

Mr. MURPHY: I am going to make some brief remarks regarding the subject under consideration and, in doing so, I should like to refer to Veterans Affairs of January 15, 1947. This is a magazine published at Ottawa by authority of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This particular article is headed, "Priorities aid Edmonton vets build homes." It reads:

> Edmonton veterans building their own homes have obtained through the priorities committee of the national house builders' association the following materials, as reported on November 5 of last year:
> Number of applications received, 636.
> Number of applications being attended to immediately: first group, 356; second group, started on November 6, 252.
> Amount of material received to date: two carloads of brick; one carload of flue lining; two carloads of sewer tile;

I do not intend to refer to all the items, but the list continues:

> One carload of wood lath; three carloads of wallboard and plaster lath.

Then comes the item to which I wish to direct specific attention:

> Material en route: Two carloads nails (4,000 kegs).

My criticism of the priorities system is linked up with the enumeration of the different materials in the former paragraphs. For instance, we have some materials that might be sufficient to take care of ten, twenty or one hundred homes as the case may be. I know this is only part of the materials; yet, with the project under way for these veterans, I would assume from that, that there may be fifty or one hundred homes under construction. I may be wrong in that, but my complaint is that the priorities system is wrong when it permits the tying up of so much material of one kind and very little of another. It is evident to me that other builders might be able to use any surplus which this group might have. So much material should not be tied up.

As I said, some of this material would be required to erect eight, ten, fifteen or twenty houses. We have heard a great deal about the shortage of nails. If there is any veracity in the statement made in this magazine the point I would make is this: Here we have an allotment of 4,000 kegs of nails for an apparently small project. If they were to use 4,000 kegs of nails to complete this project it would mean there would be in the neighbourhood of 1,300 to 1,400 homes of the type which I assume these veterans are building. I would assume that this particular project would not need more than 200, 300 or 400 kegs of nails. We all know it does not require more than two and a half or three kegs of nails for the ordinary small home.

My argument is that somewhere along the line a defect, so to speak, has developed in the priorities system, whereby there has been permitted an accumulation of items which should be more equitably distributed. In this particular case it would look as though 4,000 kegs of nails will be tied up for probably one or two years. Even if a total of 500 homes were under construction there would still be a surplus of about 2,500 kegs of nails.

I should like to refer briefly to a return tabled recently in answer to a question which I had put on the order paper. This return was tabled April 16, 1947, as sessional paper 1351. The first question I asked was:

> What is the total cost of each home constructed under the Veterans' Land Act in (a) Sarnia township, Lambton county; (b) Roseland and Oliver farm areas, Essex county?

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, how does my hon. friend associate the Veterans' Land Act with the orders in council under discussion?

Mr. MURPHY: I am glad the minister raised that point and I think I can answer it. The priorities system we are now considering was set up under P.C. 1609, which covers construction materials regulations. This is listed under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. My contention is this, that under this priority system which has been in vogue for some time, it would appear, as was explained this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale, that those who are engaged in building projects such as those under the Veterans' Land Act or under other government supervised schemes are able to get priorities and no doubt are able to build at a lower price because of their being able to get the materials more easily than can the ordinary contractor competing in the same field. Because of this material being more easily available to them, I want to enlarge upon the argument made by the previous speaker that they should have been able to build these homes at least at a fair price.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I humbly submit that these orders have nothing to do with building houses and certainly nothing to do with the building of houses by another department of government. The order under consideration has to do with the furnishing of materials under priority. But if my hon. friend proposes to discuss the subject of houses built under the Veterans' Land Act I must take exception, because I know nothing about that subject and have no reason to know anything about it.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, thus far the hon. member has been discussing priorities.

He is citing instances where priorities have resulted in tying up material unnecessarily. I think the minister is being a little too hasty in asking that the member be ruled out of order. I submit that his remarks are in line with the very order in council we are considering, which deals primarily with priorities.

Mr. HOWE: If that were all he was discussing, the tying up of material unnecessarily, I would agree, but I understood he was going into a dissertation which we have heard him give several times before on the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister had better wait until the hon. member does go into a dissertation and then raise his point of order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member would be in order if he deals directly with the question of materials, but he would not be in order in going into details of building under the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. MURPHY: I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to deal with all features of the homes constructed under the Veterans' Land Act. I dealt with that subject on February 4, but I dealt with the defects and not with the prices. In this instance I purpose confining myself to prices upon various government projects while we have this priorities system in effect. In my opinion, because of that system the prices are excessive. When I spoke in the house on February 4, I mentioned the cost of the small homes, at page 107 of Hansard, and said that in Sarnia township eight homes were built, of four different types, two of each type. One was 18 feet, 9 inches, by 32 feet, one and a half storey with basement; the second was 24 feet by 30 feet, one storey; and the third one was 25 feet by 31 feet, 8 inches, one storey. These are all small homes. They are not in the class with the $18,000 homes mentioned this afternoon as being suitable for veterans. These particular homes, according to the answer I received in a return, cost two at $7,759.36 each; two at $7,928.57 each; two at $7,081.95 each, and two at $8,200.54. The figures which I have just quoted from the return are the cost of house construction only. They do not include the land or public services such as roads, hydro, water mains and so on.

My other point with respect to building under these conditions is that those who did get this contract were building under a handicap. Question No. 6—and this is very important—which I asked was:

What was the cost per unit of project overhead and how was the same made up?

[Mr. Green.]

The answer brought down in the return was:

Average per unit at Sarnia $1,736.22.

That is an amazing figure. I am sorry I did not have these figures when I spoke in the house on February 4 and demanded a royal commission.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask what controller under this bill is responsible for that? In other words, how does that relate to the item under discussion?

Mr. MURPHY: I am very glad that the minister asked that question, because the answer is, I think, found in this return. I want to be perfectly fair about this. I do not think any of us wants any more controls than are necessary, but here I think is the answer to the minister's question. It is given in the return:

Average per unit at Sarnia $1,736.22.
Project overhead includes the following items: temporary buildings, salaries of staff located on the project including superintendents, accountants, bookkeepers, stenographers, timekeepers, material checkers, first aid attendant, watchmen, and water boys. Miscellaneous expenses incurred at job office in direct relation to the project include travelling expenses, telegrams, and telephone calls.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member would be in order in discussing the items he has just mentioned on the item now before the committee, but if he confined his remarks to the cost of material I think he would be in order.

Mr. MURPHY: I appreciate your ruling, Mr. Chairman. My only argument has been that the cost of these homes has been increased because of the controls dealt with in these various orders in council which we are now considering. With respect to that type of home built under these restrictions, and with priorities as they were, the costs are, I would say, a great deal higher than they would have been if the material were more easily available and had contractors not had to contend with various controls and restrictions.

I had referred only to the cost of the houses in the Sarnia area. The ones in the Windsor area are in the neighbourhood of $7,000 to $7,891.96. The cost there enters into this particular picture. If we are to assume that the answer given to question No. 6 and the unit overhead at Windsor is the same as at Sarnia, then the cost of building these veterans homes in the Sarnia area would be around $9,900, and in the Windsor area, $9,500, on the house only. When the house is completed the veterans holdings would be in the neighbourhood of $12,000 each.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not believe the hon. member is in order in discussing the cost of veterans houses except in so far as it relates to material which is in the order before us. I should like to remind the hon. member that he will have full opportunity to go into the matter when the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs are before the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: May I remind you, sir, of one or two things in this connection? Before the committee left the consideration of the general order of the wartime prices and trade board on Monday last, a question was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard specifically with reference to the timber regulations which we are discussing in part along with this order. He asked if he might have the assurance of the Minister of Justice at that time that if the wartime prices and trade board general order were allowed to pass it might be on the understanding that questions of price would be open for discussion when we came to these later orders, particularly with reference to timber control. The Minister of Justice, who unfortunately is not in the committee at the moment, gave the explicit assurance that price controls might be discussed along with these other forms of control when we came to these orders. In the light of that, and with great respect, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is perfectly proper for the hon. member to discuss the question of prices in relation to control. As a matter of fact, with great respect, I do not see how you can extricate one from the other; the two things are tied so closely together. If we are to try to hew a line and separate references to control of priorities from control in reference to prices under this order and on the timber control order or some other we shall be hopelessly bogged down. I think you should permit the discussion to proceed in keeping with the understanding assented to by the Minister of Justice on Monday last.

Mr. HOWE: May I suggest to my hon. friend that there is no price control on houses. Certainly I have no knowledge of veterans houses. We are not discussing housing; we are discussing priorities orders. This discussion might reasonably be in order on the bill to amend the Housing Act that I hope will succeed this discussion. Certainly the present order deals with nothing but priorities on materials.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The point the hon. member for Eglinton should keep in mind is that the hon. member for Lambton cited the costs involved in many things other than materials. What we are dealing with specifically is the cost of materials. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is not in his place at the moment. His department has to do with veterans houses. I appeal to the hon. member to try to keep in line with the item before us.

Mr. MURPHY: I see the fairness of your ruling, sir, and I for one am not going to try to prolong this debate or try to debate something which should be discussed at some other time. While the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not in his place, there is no reason why we cannot discuss building which may come under his department or under the department of any other minister. In view of the fact that there will be opportunities later to discuss some other phases which I did not intend to bring up at this time, I shall not continue along that line.

In closing, I do think I have been fair in bringing consideration of these veterans houses to the attention of the committee, because the cost of these houses was increased considerably by reason of the controls and priorities.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to confine my remarks to two paragraphs of P.C. 1609 which have to do with priorities, namely, sections (a) and (b) of paragraph 2 of the office consolidation, which read as follows:

> The priorities officer shall have power,
> (a) to prohibit, control and regulate the making of or dealing in construction materials;
> (b) to order or require any person owning or having power to dispose of or being in possession of or making or dealing in construction materials or having facilities for making or dealing in construction materials to make or deal in such construction materials in such manner as may be specified.

Through the medium of this order in council the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has a wide and ample allotment of powers for his purpose. I think even he will admit that the construction of houses is a most desirable and necessary thing in Canada at the present time. I think too that it would be rather a bold person who, checking back over the minister's record as Minister of Munitions and Supply during the war, would say that the minister had been inefficient or was likely to prove inefficient in the administration of the construction of housing in Canada. It would be just as serious a charge to say that he was insincere or did not wish to go ahead with this most necessary construction. The minister's war record is an admirable one. I believe he is a respected engineer and administrator, but I wish to tell the committee that the minister is definitely on the spot now because of the fiasco that he has made of the powers which have been allotted to him and to the officials under him in giving housing to the Canadian people. That is not a personal opinion; it is not an opinion confined to this group. I would say that it is the opinion across Canada, and I am sure that the minister himself would be the first to admit that there is some basis for that opinion.

The two sections which I read from P.C. 1609 describe all the powers that the minister needs to get on with the job. He has the details right there and it is up to him to proceed. From time to time in this house he has given us statistics which, I presume, are prepared by the admirable economic research group in the department of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to whom I wish to pay a tribute, because they do prepare statistics in a form that I, as a layman and not a technical expert, as the minister is, can follow and understand. Unfortunately, however, one does not get all the information that one wants from the answers that are given to questions asked; for instance, the answer given by the minister to the questions asked by the hon. member for Bow River with regard to the cost of housing under certain conditions, and to the questions that I myself have asked with regard to certain items on which I wanted information. I do not blame the minister for sticking to the point of the question that is asked, but many of us are not lawyers and cannot see the implications of a question when we ask it, and we have received answers that do not give us the information we seek, though answers may be technically in accordance with the terms in which the questions are drawn up. I suggest, however, that the minister errs in not assisting us to get the information that we want.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How can he know if you do not ask the question properly?

Mr. PROBE: I will give an example of the sort of thing I have in mind.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You say you got a proper answer.

Mr. PROBE: I got an answer technically in accordance with the wording of the question. I asked this question:

How much lumber of various kinds or grades was bought by or for any federal housing agency during each of the months of 1946 in each of the federal constituencies of Pontiac and Nipissing?

The answer is:

No lumber was purchased by or for Wartime Housing Limited during 1946 from any supplier in these two constituencies.

[Mr. Murphy.]

I am sure that question is answered in accordance with the way in which it was framed, but the intent of the question—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You have to smarten up. That is your trouble.

Mr. PROBE: I am just as smart as the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: North.

Mr. PROBE: Vancouver North.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I take it you are not as smart as the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. PROBE: At the moment I will defer to seniority in stature or age over here, but that does not apply to the hon. member. I wanted information in all sincerity and it could have been furnished by a telephone call from the minister's department. They could have said, "Tell us exactly what you want and we will get it for you". I did not get that information, however, and the result is that the intent of the question remains unanswered. But that is the general situation in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

I do not think the minister is a lawyer; I understand he is an engineer; but he has under him people who are far more clever than a lot of the lawyers I hear carrying on dissertations in this house, especially when we are pressing for necessary information which we ought to have. From time to time, both in the house and outside, the minister has made statements about the building boom in Canada, and housing progress. We are told that the rate of building exceeds anything we have ever known in the history of Canada. But in his press releases there are suggestions that are not strictly in keeping with the statements that he should make as head of his department. Here is an example. In the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation there are some excellent tables, and the minister could have quoted from that booklet the statement that under part I of the housing act, for example, only 6,927 loans were made in 1947, or that there were loans made for the purpose of rental housing, by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in 1946, for only 4,836 houses. These represent the two major classes of housing sponsored by his department on the lending basis. I am ignoring for the moment Wartime Housing Corporation. I have not the same criticisms to offer of Wartime Housing Corporation that have been expressed by some other members.

I was glad that the minister said we could now buy these houses in Regina. I fear the policy is a new one declared within the last day or two, because it was not in effect when I was home at Easter. The minister also spoke about the fifty-foot lots. If he is referring to fifty-foot frontage, that is not true of every house we have in Regina. However, on the whole I am happy that these buildings are there, and the veterans living in them are for the most part satisfied. To that extent, therefore, I wish to make my acknowledgments to the minister as head of the department.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 73, respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company—Mr. Cleaver—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Trust indenture confirmed.

Mr. CHURCH: Perhaps the sponsor of the bill would give us an explanation. This is largely a matter of a trust deed given by the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company in favour of the Royal Trust Company for $2,000,000 worth of notes of the railway company, which notes were issued under the deed. There seemed to be some doubt as to whether the railway company and the trust company had power to make the agreement, but the committee passed this bill the other day; they found this money was required for betterments, so that I have no personal objection to the bill.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. CHURCH: At the meeting of the railway committee the other day I asked for an explanation of this bill, and I am far from satisfied that this parliament has power to pass it. In the first place, this is largely a power proposition. They do propose to construct a railway, as set out in the bill; and, mind you, I believe the gentlemen who are the proposed incorporators deserve a great deal of credit for what they have done in New Ontario. I have only a few observations to make about this bill.

The other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that in the near future a conference would be held between representatives of this country and Newfoundland in regard to that country becoming part of Canada. In view of that fact, I think it is against public policy for us to liquidate any of our assets in that part of the country. While I appreciate what these gentlemen have done in other parts of Canada in connection with the development of our resources, still we as individuals have a public duty to perform.

The names of the incorporators are set out in the preamble. They propose to construct a railway to be known as the Quebec North Shore and Labrador railway, only part of which is to be in Canada. As you know, Mr. Chairman, a large part of the huge debt of this country was incurred in days gone by in connection with our railways. We have had overcapitalization, duplication and waste; branch lines were built all over Canada paralleling other branch lines, and private ownership made such a mess of the whole thing that a royal commission had to be appointed to recommend certain principles to be followed in future in connection with new railway construction. That was in 1917; and it was recommended that the board of railway commissioners, now know as the board of transport commissioners, should be consulted and should make recommendations before any more branch lines were constructed.

When our railways were built the companies came to the dominion government and were paid so much a mile to construct the lines. Then they were given rights of way, land, mineral rights and all that sort of thing right across Canada. Not satisfied with that, some of them went to the provinces and obtained further grants. For that reason, and in view of the conference to be held with Newfoundland, I believe that we should mark time until the cabinet has had a chance to look into the situation; then this bill might be brought in a little later in the session. This company proposes to construct a railway from the St. Lawrence river in a northerly direction to the southern boundary of Labrador, thence in a northerly direction to a point on the northern boundary of Labrador in the vicinity of Ruth lake, and even on the Ungava bay, Hudson strait and so on. The company is making provision to go through another country, because Labrador does not belong to Canada. Labrador was given to Newfoundland, and during the war the provisional government appointed by the British government for Newfoundland automatically looked after Labrador.

In view of the coming conference, I fail to see why we should give the terms asked in this bill. True it is that this company did apply to the Newfoundland government, and simply got permission to go on with the railway. We note the words, "provided that authority be obtained from Newfoundland." What power have the incorporators of a railway company to go to a country which is not part of Canada and negotiate, over the heads of parliament, for the building of a railway?

In addition to the railway, they are to have permission to issue securities, and other things besides. They are to have power facilities to develop. They are to be placed in control of aeronautics, something which is under the control of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), as he pointed out when the aeronautics bill was passed.

Then, they are to have power over certain amalgamations, and they are given power to generate, acquire, use, transmit and distribute electric and other power or energy, arising from the water power up there. That is a pretty wide departure fom the Railway Act. If it is to be a power corporation, and not a railway, why do they come under the Railway Act? Further, it is not for the general advantage of Canada, because no doubt when they come to parliament they will want a grant of so much a mile for the construction of the railway, despite the fact that it is through a first-class mining district.

Then, they will have to erect telephone and telegraph poles, and they will require wharves for purposes of navigation on the ocean and on inland lakes and rivers. They will have the right to build docks and warehouses, and act as wharfingers. Many other things enter into this contract. They may construct, acquire, charter and navigate steam and other vessels for the conveyance of passengers, goods and merchandise; and may construct, acquire and dispose of wharves, docks, elevators, and so on.

It is an omnibus bill; they are given everything. Further, they are allowed to construct hotels and parks, and all that kind of thing. They are given jurisdiction over motor buses and motor cars for collecting, carrying, transporting and delivering freight, goods and passengers, and may collect rates and charges therefor; but no rate or charge shall be demanded or taken until it has been approved of by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

Another power they are given—and I have never seen this placed in a railway bill before—is that of building a pipeline for oil, so that they may transmit via pipeline right through a country which does not belong to Canada. Why, we might as well pass a bill here to do these things in the state of New York or the state of Maine.

We do not own Labrador; we have nothing to do with it. Yet, here, over the head of the cabinet and the government, there is a proposal to go through all this, to go through an outside country, with the authority of Newfoundland. While Newfoundland is in the empire, it is still another part of it, and is now placed under British trusteeship. I should think that would be the proper way to describe it, for Great Britain has the responsibility.

I shall point out one further fact, and then I shall have concluded, because, having said this, I have done my duty as a member of parliament. I have attempted to look into the situation to see that we are not guilty of giving certain things in a haphazard fashion. It will be noted this bill was initiated in the other end of this building. There were no reporters at the meeting, and what was said was not put on the record. As I said in committee, "You have money to spend, to take down divorce proceedings; but you have not money to spend to report the proceedings of the railway committee, when you are giving away a franchise, and all that kind of thing." I objected to it. We should have had a record of it, so that we would know what they are asking. But somehow or another, everyone ignored it.

We might as well be handing over the whole of Labrador, a place we do not own, to a lot of private people. Do not forget the mistake that was made in New Ontario. I would suggest that we look at "Moody's Public Utilities"—"Huston's" used to be the national financial book—and see who owns the natural resources of Canada. Look over the natural resources of this country, the gold, silver, copper, nickel and other minerals, from the Ottawa river to the Nipigon, and you will find who owns it—Americans and other foreign capitalists. You will see who they are; they do not live in this country at all. And they are not Canadian citizens. I object to that.

I am one who has always supported private capital, because we owe a great deal to capitalists from all over the world who helped develop this country. But if you pass this bill to enable them to obtain this franchise, they will have the power to spend money. I do not object to these men personally; they are fine citizens of Canada, and have done a great deal for Canada and themselves. They have a good record in other places. But I believe that in the public interest it would be unwise for us in this haphazard fashion under this omnibus bill, to part with natural resources we do not own in another part of the empire.

We have squandered the natural resources of this country at a great pace and Canada is going to be a poor country with its debt. To a large extent we have given away our natural resources to mostly a lot of outsiders, and some insiders. The result is that rates for power are away up to a point three times what they should be. That is about all I have to say about the matter. These are good people; but I fail to see that this bill should pass, allowing them to receive this handout for largely nothing.

Another point I wish to make is that we are committed to a 99-year lease on bases, from Newfoundland to British Guiana, between Britain and the United States. That lease was given with the consent of Canada. We have given to the United States leases on all the bases in the Atlantic ocean, including some on the shores of Newfoundland and Labrador. The bases are not all out in the ocean, because some are on Greenland, Iceland and other places in the north country, including Newfoundland and Labrador, the territory under the joint defence board and the atomic board.

This proposed agreement is ultra vires of the dominion. At the end of the bill it is brought under the Railway Act by saying that it is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. Let me say that it is for the general advantage of the promoters; that is what it is, and not for the general advantage of Canada by any stretch of the imagination. That is so, because of the decisions in the law courts. All these properties are not even in Canada. In this bill they are being handed everything from the heaven above, the earth beneath and the waters under the earth, in Canada, Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador. They are being handed all this by parliament in a haphazard manner, and we have no power to do it.

That lease which was given for ninety-nine years is practically a freehold. In Washington, in congress and the senate, they are urging that Newfoundland and Labrador be given to America, although the lease for ninety-nine years was to protect United States shores in the battle of the Atlantic, and that it should be cancelled and charged up to lease-lend, because that is what it was for, to defend America's shores from invasion. When the enemy was threatening Newfoundland and Iceland, Labrador and all the Atlantic seaboard, and when they were right up the St. Lawrence we met in secret session, and the case was stated by a former able minister, who is now the premier of Nova Scotia.

For these reasons I believe the government should lay down a policy in connection with this bill. What is the government's policy regarding handing out this property? We have no power to do it, because if we go to the law courts it will be found that this is outside altogether, and not for the general advantage of Canada. We might as well put railways in Spain or Greenland, or any other part of the world, under our Railway Act, as to say that this property belongs to Canada, and it is for the general advantage of Canada. Take a look at this book, Who's Who, "Moody's Financial List of Mines and Natural Resources of the World". My hon. friends to my left used to look it up, years ago. Who owns the natural resources of this country? We had a big fight about that in Ontario from 1905 to 1914 when Sir James Whitney came into office. Our friends on the other side of the house gave the water power in the Niagara River to private owners, with the result that the rates were top heavy. The greatest mistake Sir James Whitney made was when he did not electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway in 1909 or 1910, so that they could have had cheap light and power in that part of new country. Gold production, silver production—the production of all the great minerals—could have been carried on with cheap hydro power. If Ontario men had electrified the T. and N.O. railway and brought the joy of cheap light and power to the great mines of all New Ontario and cheapened prospector and development costs as Sir Adam Beck wanted to do then, it would have been then $9 or $10 a horse-power instead of having to go up as high as $35 or $60 a horse-power at Cochrane and other mining centres under private ownership.

That is something we should consider when dealing with a bill like this. As far as I am concerned, it means nothing to me and I do not care a snap of the finger further if you want to pass such a handout under this bill as I might as well rather go home, if you do.

While I appreciate that these are great Canadians, that they have done a great deal for the country as well as for themselves, still I believe it is not the time for us to part with natural resources thus. I say this because of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that a meeting is to be held to consider a new province, Newfoundland. Newfoundland is badly enough off now with her debts because of the money that was squandered there and because of the way the natural resources were handed out. If Canada is going to pull them out of debt she will have to pay a lot of money out of her own pocket, especially with regard to Labrador. I am a member of the railway committee, and I consider it my duty as a member of the House of Commons to make that statement in the public interest and object to the bill, and having said this, that is all the objection I have to the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall be brief because I do not want any remarks of mine to hold up the passage of the bill through committee. Some eight years ago I tried to persuade the commission government of Newfoundland to provide guides for myself and three engineers of the Hanna company of Iron River, Michigan, to permit us to go up what was then called Sawyer lake in Labrador. At that time the engineering journals were filled with glowing accounts of the iron content of the iron ore in that area and of the magnitude of the deposits. I have some good pictures of that area.

This bill does not call it Sawyer lake, it refers to it as Ruth lake. The maps of that time showed it to be some considerable distance inside Labrador whereas this bill says it is about on the boundary between Labrador and Quebec. However, that is neither here nor there. If this company goes on to develop the iron ore in this area I wish it every success. We can certainly do with a lot more iron ore in Canada and in the United States. We all know that the great Mesabi ore beds west of Duluth in the United States are being rapidly depleted, so much so that the United States government is setting aside I have read certain iron ore areas for future defence purposes. I hope there is a large bed of iron ore in Labrador and northern Quebec. We are in the iron age, and if the ore in this area is of good quality and in a sufficient quantity it will be a grand thing for Canada. I have always been one who has advocated the opening up of the resources of this country.

The description in the bill is not clear as to whether the iron ore beds are near Grand falls on the Hamilton river.

Mr. HOWE: About 300 miles away.

Mr. MacNICOL: The map shows Grand falls to be about 150 miles from the location of the ore beds. I would hope that power could be developed at Grand falls in order that this ore could be smelted down to pigiron. They do that in Sweden and I do not see why it could not be done in Canada. That would obviate the necessity of taking large tonnages of coal into the country. There is alleged to be a vast power potential at Grand falls. The river is said to be only about 200 feet wide right at the falls, but the water drops 316 feet and there is a very large volume. All the reports I have read state that there is a potential of four or five million horse-power. Whether that is so, I do not know, but if the falls are no more than 150 or 200 miles from the ore deposit I would hope that power can be developed and used to smelt iron there. That would be a grand thing for Canada.

I do not know of anything that would tend to develop Canada more rapidly than the smelting of large tonnages of iron ore in this country. I have not any comment to make on the various sections of the bill. I just wish to say again that if this bill goes through I wish the company every success. As the hon. member for Broadview has said, the promoters are all well known and successful miners and if anyone can develop this area they ought to be able to do so.

Mr. McIVOR: This bill comes from the upper house and it was well examined by the people who are there to act as a check on hasty legislation. When this bill was before the committee there was no effort made to drive it through. Questions were asked from all sides and the hon. member for Outremont was not in any hurry. The dominion government is not running any risk, because the company is just asking for permission to spend money to develop these resources. This would provide a good deal of work.

Mr. COCKERAM: I rise tonight to support this bill. In 1929 and 1930 I was connected with a company that sent prospectors into this area where the original discoveries of iron ore were made. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Broadview refer to this as a branch line. This line will open up a completely new area in Canada, an area that has great promise. Section 20 of the bill provides:

The works and undertakings of the company are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

I believe this bill is worthy of the support of every hon. member in this house. It will certainly open up a vast new mining area in Canada and provide employment in a part of the country which is devoid of opportunities for employment at the present time.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any dominion legislation which provides for the payment of a subsidy to a company that constructs a railroad declared to be for the general advantage of Canada?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know of no such subsidy paid under conditions set out by my hon. friend. At one time assistance was given for the construction of branch lines, but that was many years ago. That certainly is not the policy of the government today.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any legislation on our statute books about it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: None that I am aware of.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Line of railway described.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is either the minister, the hon. member who introduced the bill or the minister of reconstruction in a position to say whether it is the Marguerite, the Moisie or the Wacouno—

Mr. RINFRET: The Moisie and the Wacouno.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a tributary of the other river?

Mr. RINFRET: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is the Marguerite mentioned, because it is ten miles west?

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This section gives authority to the company to construct and operate a line of railway running into Labrador, which is not a part of Canada. I would ask the minister what is the meaning of these words:

provided that authority be obtained from Newfoundland for the construction and operation of this section of the railway—

Note this:

—thence northwesterly to a suitable port on Ungava bay.

There is no port there at the present time. Will this interfere with the negotiations between Canada and Newfoundland as to the latter joining Canada, announced in the house the other day by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? And where is the port on Ungava bay? Do the words I have quoted mean that this company can negotiate with another government over the head of the government of Canada? Can a private company and private people do this? I should like to know from the Minister of Transport whether the Canadian National Railways has abandoned this territory on the St. Lawrence and in Labrador.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will try to answer some of the questions involved in the request made by the hon. member. What is being done here has two aspects. One is the incorporation of a company which thereby gets the right to act as a person; the second is the grant to that company of the right to build a railway in Canadian territory. Under our system no one, neither a company nor an individual, can build a railway without a charter from the government of Canada if it is to be interprovincial or if it is to connect Canada with another country, or from a province if the railway is to be entirely within the province. This parliament can grant no rights to build a railway outside its territory, but it can give a company the capacity to receive such rights from the appropriate authority. That matter came before the privy council several years ago. One was a case concerning the John Deere Plow Company, and the other was a case concerning the Bonanza Creek Mining Company. The capacity to receive powers can be granted by this parliament in creating a corporation, and that is all that this parliament can do with respect to any portion of the railway that would be outside Canadian territory. It can have the capacity to receive a franchise from the sovereign of the territory outside Canada where it may operate. I do not think that would be dealing with a foreign government over the head of the Canadian government any more than it would in the case of a United States company that gets a charter here for the operation of a subsidiary in Canada. There does not appear to be any international conflict here. All states assert the right to give companies the capacity to receive powers from whosoever may be willing to grant powers to them.

With respect to the port on Ungava bay I have no information whatsoever. I do not know whether there is a port there or whether one can be developed there. But reading the bill I gather that the intention is to have a railway that would go out of Canada, through Labrador, then come back into Canada and proceed through Canadian territory to Ungava bay. But the company will not be able, under this charter, to do anything outside Canada without getting a franchise from the sovereign of the territory outside Canada where it may desire to operate.

Mr. CHURCH: We are a party to Great Britain's granting of a ninety-nine year lease, binding Canada with America, which is practically a freehold of all the Newfoundland bases, and that includes Labrador inland as well as on the ocean. In view of that agreement, have we the power as a parliament to go into Newfoundland and give away, not only the bases, but the land and the bay where they are trying to develop a port? Ungava bay is a big bay and they have no port there yet, and the bill is in the dark on it. Have we the power to do this in view of the ninety-nine year lease made by the British government with the United States for the use of all these bases in Newfoundland and right down to British Guiana, which is the size of Great Britain? You know, Mr. Chairman, that in the last war German boats came right up the St. Lawrence and we had a secret meeting of parliament in connection with that. I contend that Canada is bound by that ninety-nine year lease and that we have no power to part with this property.

These people told the railway committee that they had dealt with a former Newfoundland government before the war. I would ask the Minister of Transport, what was the nature of the arrangement, if any, the said company made with the old provisional government of Newfoundland? What form did it take? Was it just an act of the provisional government? If it was, no wonder Newfoundland went bankrupt. I think the committee is entitled to this information. Does not the agreement with the United States for a ninety-nine year lease of bases include not only the bases on the ocean but the bases on the land and in Newfoundland and all of Labrador, and all the inlets on the coast? In the last war German boats were up near Iceland and Greenland, off Newfoundland, and in the St. Lawrence and Hudson strait, and we had to send ships up there. It cost a lot of money and lives.

The House of Commons is passing this bill blindly, and we shall regret it in the days to come if we hand over all this territory to private ownership forever. It is not a work for the general advantage of Canada. It is not even within Canada. So how can it be for the general advantage of Canada when the territory and inlets are not in Canada at all? We might just as well claim that inlets and coves in China are works for the general advantage of Canada. I should like to know if the legal department of the crown has been consulted about this bill. I do not like to worry the Minister of Justice. I shall not ask him for his legal opinion, but I think he should have been consulted as to whether this bill is worth the paper it is written on. It goes over the heads of the Canadian and British governments and over the head of the provisional government of Newfoundland. Great Britain had a temporary trusteeship over the whole country of Newfoundland while the war was on. I should like to know who drafted and recommended this bill. I think all that information should be on the table. So far as I am concerned I do not think it makes any difference. I feel that I have done my duty as a member of parliament in calling the attention of the committee to what is involved in this omnibus bill.

Most of the people are fine people. They are not being criticized personally at all. I do not blame them for coming to parliament and asking for this legislation, because this is a pretty easy institution which we have assembled here. Nobody would give away that property in this way if they owned it themselves. What we are dealing with here is the mining industry.

Mr. McKAY: On first view this bill appears to me to be a virtual monopoly. If that is so I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether it will prohibit the operation of any other railway company in that particular area. If it does not I cannot see that there should be any real objection to the bill. On the surface it does appear to me, though, that it would prohibit all other railways from going into that district.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is any difficulty in answering the hon. member's question. This bill, no more than any other bill which is approved by a committee of the house, creates a monopoly. Any other corporation or company which seeks similar rights can apply to parliament in the same way as did this company, and its application will be dealt with by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. While I do not know what the answer would be, I am sure that the committee would want to give such corporation similar rights to these. The answer is, therefore, that this bill does not preclude another company from making application.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think the minister's interpretation is correct. This bill gives the company a lease on the whole area. It precludes any other company from going in there.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was not the question of the hon. gentleman. He shakes his head now and agrees with me.

Mr. GILLIS: The question as I understood it was, does not this bill preclude the possibility of any other company going in there and getting concessions similar to these?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is, no.

Mr. GILLIS: It definitely does, because the whole area is being leased to this company and precludes any other company from going in there. But worse than that—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? He says that the whole area is leased to this company. This parliament and the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines are not concerned with that. Parliament has the right only to grant certain privileges so far as the railway, docks and wharves are concerned. It has granted this company the right to build docks, wharves and a railway line extending from the north shore of the river to Quebec and Labrador. With reference to the resources, the deposits of iron ore, water power and the like, that is a matter which does not concern this parliament.

Mr. GILLIS: Nevertheless, as I was saying when the minister interrupted me, this bill not only gives the company control over bus lines, transportation and all the rest of it which is included in the bill—if it is a provincial matter it should not be in the bill—but it definitely delegates these rights to the company. The worse feature of it, as I see it, is that the company is not obligated to begin operation of the road for five years, which can serve the purpose of keeping someone out if they want to go in and develop that territory in that time. If at the end of ten years the job is not completed, then. under the bill, the government has the right to rescind it. So far as the development of the resources and the railway line in there are concerned, it is definitely gone, because the company can do what they like with it for the next ten years. They are not obliged to do anything about it. The bill precludes anyone else from going in there and developing the area. This bill looks too much like the merger of Dosco in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCULLOCH (Pictou): Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: There the authority was delegated innocently. So far as I am concerned, the powers contained in this bill are too sweeping to be passed by this House of Commons without a more thorough explanation of what it means to the Canadian people in the future in the development of the resources in that territory. Not only does the bill do that, but it wipes out the Railway Act in two or three places. Two or three sections of the Railway Act are set aside to make provision for the rights and privileges which are being extended to the proposed company. Whoever is sponsoring this bill—the Minister of Transport has only a slight interest in it because of the functions of his department—should give a more thorough explanation of it than has been done up to the present time. The bill itself is, in my opinion, an iniquitous piece of literature, to say the least.

Mr. RINFRET: The hon. gentleman who preceded me got mixed up in the various companies that are interested in this project. It is true there is a company which has obtained a concession from the provincial government to make explorations, but it has no mining rights over the territory in the northern part of Quebec. There is another company which has obtained certain exploration rights from Labrador or Newfoundland, but has yet no mining rights. It is making explorations at the present time. These two companies have nothing in common with the company that is applying to build a railway from Seven islands to this territory. This company is asking only for the incorporation of a company which will have the right to build a railway from Seven islands, following the Moisie river and Wacouno river, and from there going to Labrador and coming back to the province of Quebec. By this bill we are not giving to a new company any natural resources which are ours. Whatever has been done so far as concession leases are concerned has been given away or leased by another government than ours. We are not here to discuss whether that was a good thing or not. We are now faced with one problem, namely, to give a company the right to build a railway.

Section 7 which we are discussing says:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway.

That is a permissive section only. It does not say, as it should have done, if my hon. friend is right, that the company will have exclusive right to build. It says, "the company may." That is a permission which is given to the company. Any other company can ask for a similar bill to build another railway line one mile or two miles to the east or to the west.

Mr. GILLIS: Running parallel to this one.

Mr. RINFRET: Yes.

Mr. McKAY: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a further question. Is there any likelihood of the Canadian National being given rights to tap this area?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are losing enough money now.

Mr. McKAY: The Canadian National needs operating revenue. From the information at hand we are told that the company which is developing the area is not prepared to go ahead with the project until it has laid out 300,000,000 tons of iron ore. That is a large quantity of ore, and it would seem to me that the railway should pay if it transports that ore to the St. Lawrence basin. In view of that fact, has consideration been given to the Canadian National Railways tapping that area?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Consideration has been given the suggestion that the hon. member makes. The Canadian National Railways is not interested in the territory. When the Canadian National seeks to build a line—and I presume the same applies to other railways—it looks, not only at the natural resources which exist in the territory, but also at the population. In this particular instance there is no population in that territory. However the Canadian National Railways might be interested in connecting its line from Murray Bay down along the north shore to make a line of junction with this line which will be built northerly into the province of Quebec. But there would be no purpose in the Canadian National Railways spending tremendous sums of money such as this, because I am informed that it will cost in the neighbourhood of $100 million, not only to build the line, but to set up the plant and equipment, the terminal docks and boats required for this huge undertaking.

May I say a word with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South? The Department of Transport is not interested in this bill, except to say whether it has any objections to it, and it has already indicated, through its solicitor before the committee, that it has no objection to the bill. The departmental officials study applications such as this and when there are objections they raise them. In this instance they found that there were no objections, except as regards section 16, which was amended at the suggestion of the board of transport commissioners.

Speaking, not as the Minister of Transport, but generally, it would strike me that this undertaking is of such considerable importance to the development of the country that all hon. gentlemen should be in favour of it, not because of this particular corporation, but because of the development that will be consequent upon the undertaking.

Mr. CHURCH: I have not received an answer to the question I asked.

Mr. BENTLEY: The words of the Minister of Transport now put a somewhat different construction on the policy of the Canadian National Railways today as he announces it, in comparison with what it was a good many years ago when it was the Canadian Northern railway together with a jumbled-up aggregation of others. He said that the Canadian National was not interested in going into places where there was no population. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I added something more. I said that the Canadian National Railways, when they decide to build a branch line or a main line into new territory, make a survey and determine whether or not the natural resources are such, the population is such, and the revenue which may be derived from traffic is such that it will make the line a revenue producing line. I have repeated that many times and I attempted to paraphrase it quickly this evening. I may not have put it in the same words as before; to summarize the situation briefly, that is the position.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is a sound way of doing it. I am not arguing against what the minister said. Nevertheless, until the resources of the country are known and surveyed, it is hardly likely that population will be a factor. I remember well working at the time of the construction of the Canadian National Railways. I scowed on the old Fraser river from Tete Jaune Cache to what is now Prince George, and there was no population except the workers engaged in construction and the odd settlers in the Moose river area, and so on. It was the natural resources at that time that captured the attention of the Canadian National, as well as the potential earning power of the railway. This one may have an equal potentiality, and if it has, then the development of these resources will build up the population. If a private company such as this feels that its survey indicates the possibility of the undertaking being profitable, then it seems to me that it is a proper thing for the Canadian National Railways and its owner, the Canadian people, to give careful consideration to the question whether it should not go into this development as a public enterprise, rather than leave it to private enterprise.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Cheaper for you to take them over when you are the government.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is a possibility; we will keep that in mind. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has given us an idea there, and we will write it down in our little black book and in a few years' time look into the question.

Mr. CASE: Don't put it in the red book.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is one of the things we should not like to do, to take over a $60 million or $100 million concern that is worth only $5 million in intrinsic value.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South made a good point when he suggested that the bill should not go through but be given further study. I attended one of the meetings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. One of the witnesses was there—I have forgotten his name—but no record was kept of the meeting, and I asked the chairman if we could not have a written brief from the promoters so that we could examine the position. We were not given that brief. Whether we shall get it I do not know, but certainly there was nothing at that meeting to suggest that we would get it, and I have heard no more about it. I think it would be a good thing to supply the members of the house with a brief from the company so that we can understand the situation exactly and know what the known resources and possibilities are. If that were done we could give the matter more intelligent consideration and come to a better decision. I believe that would be the right thing to do.

Mr. CHURCH: The joint defence board and the atomic bomb board have been in this territory and I think we ought to know what the policy is. They have been roaming all over the territory, all over Labrador, Newfoundland, Ungava bay and Hudson bay, but we have no report from them. There is another board there, the atomic board, from which we have received no reports. Since it is nine o'clock now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that further consideration of the question be held over until the next occasion when the bill comes up. This is not the first time I have come to the relief of public ownership, to protect our natural resources, and it may not be the last.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CHURCH: Nine o'clock.

Progress reported.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Before the house rose at six o'clock we were dealing with P.C. 1609 on page 6 of the schedule to Bill No. 104.

Mr. PROBE: As I indicated before the dinner recess, the order in council that we are discussing at the moment gives the minister of reconstruction wide powers, permitting him to look after the urgent needs of the Canadian people for housing. As I intimated this afternoon, I think it is the general feeling of the Canadian people that the minister, whose record as Minister of Munitions and Supply was so brilliant, has failed dismally in doing the job that we as Canadians expect of him, and in taking such steps as would render that job easier in the exercise of those powers that parliament has delegated, as contained in this order in council with respect to the construction of large-scale housing to satisfy Canadian requirements.

I just wish to indicate again that in 1946 the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with all the fanfare that has accompanied the various bills and amendments, with the National Housing Act, which has been on the statute books for so many years, provided less than 12,000 housing units for ownership by the occupants or for rental. That figure was made up of 6,927 houses for ownership, on which the corporation gave loans, and 4,836 rental houses for which the corporation lent money. I am prepared to admit, of course, that there are other agencies working in this country to provide some measure of housing; but in view of the wide powers granted the minister under P.C. 1609 I think it is fair to say he is not only a super-optimist in his statements about housing but he is optimistic beyond all reason.

The two sections I read before the dinner recess indicate the power given the minister with respect to prices of building materials, and I would ask the minister for an accounting of his stewardship in regard to the price situation. I have listed a few ordinary building materials mentioned in the Canada Gazette as being under price control and either this evening or the next day I should like the minister to place on record the trend of retail prices for these five commodities, covering 1939, when there was no Department of Reconstruction and Supply, perhaps 1944 as another year, and 1947. He might give the retail prices in my own city of Regina, which he will be able to obtain, for B.C. fir, rough or surfaced, No. 2, and will take a specific stick; 2 inches by 4 inches by 16 feet long. Then he might give the same information for spruce and jackpine, rough, No. 2, 2 x 4 x 16 feet; dressed white pine, No. 2, 2 x 4 x 16 feet; birch flooring, mill run, 13/16 inch thick; oak flooring, mill run, 13/16 inch thick. If the minister will be good enough to put those figures on record I am sure he will prove to the satisfaction of the Canadian people that the priorities officer mentioned in the order in council, who controls the building commodities mentioned, has not taken his duties at all seriously.

Further than that, last year the minister indicated that he was going to delegate to the municipalities the power to issue permits for building construction. Undoubtedly that system has failed because, as has been pointed out a number of times, roughly one-third of the building in Canada in 1946 was housing, while two-thirds was industrial. Let us compare that with other governments that are in the business of building on a state-wide basis, with no more powers than the minister has. In the excellent report put out by his department, "Housing Progress Abroad" for February, 1947, I find, for instance, that last year New Zealand constructed housing to the value of £12,500,000, New Zealand currency, while other construction combined amounted to £4,600,000, or a little more than one-third the amount allotted to housing. In Sweden, last year housing construction amounted to $354,000,000. That is a country which already has its population housed on a standard that would put Canada to shame; and its industrial construction for 1946 amounted to $161,000,000. The minister painted a glowing account of the progress Canada was making in housing in comparison with other countries; yet, as I have said, the figure in Sweden for 1946 was $354,000,000, while in Canada, according to the minister's own figures, housing contracts let totalled $213,000,000.

[Mr. Probe.]

I also notice that there has been some talk with respect to the shortage of building craftsmen in this country. It is interesting to note that in the January bulletin of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation called "Housing in Canada", the figures of unfilled vacancies and unplaced applicants in construction occupations in Canada are given for the years from 1944 to 1946; and during four months of 1945 there were actually more unplaced applicants than unfilled vacancies in the various branches of construction, such as bricklayers, carpenters, plasterers, plumbers, pipefitters and other skilled, semi-skilled and unskilled workmen.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask my hon. friend which months those were?

Mr. PROBE: Yes. I know what the minister is driving at. They were the winter months; December of 1944, and January, February and March of 1945.

Mr. HOWE: How is bricklaying in Regina in January?

Mr. PROBE: That is not an unusual situation in itself, but what was the situation in 1946? Since housing needs have not diminished, one would expect the picture to be a little different in that year. However I do not believe the minister has changed the balance between the number of houses needed and the number under construction by one solitary housing unit since he took office; I am quite convinced of that. In 1946, instead of four months during which there were more unplaced applicants than there were unfilled vacancies, the period was seven months: January, February, March, April, May, November and December. From this it would not seem that the minister has gone about his job in connection with housing with the vim and vigour with which he is credited with having undertaken Canada's war effort.

The cost of building material has gone up, as I have said, not only in connection with the kind of lumber for which I asked the minister to provide figures, but in connection with most of the other articles that go into the construction of houses. In that regard one would imagine the minister would use some incentive, other than the kind he gave Crane's recently, to increase the production of building materials, since there is going to be a demand for them for a considerable length of time.

I notice in the report to which I referred a minute ago, "Housing in Canada", we find at page 44 that the production of cement for 1946 is over that of any of the years from 1939 to 1945. The same applies to the production of bricks, warm air furnaces, asphalt shingles and gypsum wallboard. But with respect to sawn lumber last year, despite all its requirements, there was less sawn lumber produced in Canada than in either of the years 1941 or 1942. Then, in respect of glass, which is an imported article, but which, nevertheless, I have no doubt the minister has sufficient power to do something about, in 1946 we secured less glass than we did in 1939, 1942 or 1944.

In connection with castiron soil pipe and fittings we dropped below the high record of 1941. Then, referring to steel pipe tubes and fittings, we were beaten last year by all six years from 1940 to 1945 inclusive. In wire nails and spikes, about which we have heard so much, we had the lowest record last year of any year from 1939 to 1945. Last year we produced 58·9 thousand tons, and the lowest previous year, during the war, was 1944, when we produced 64·9 thousand tons.

I should like to conclude by putting on record the approach to the housing problem in terms of a country which, I believe, does lead the world. Canada does not, despite what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply have said. I should like to set out here the Swedish housing budget for the fiscal year 1946-47.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the Swedish programme has anything to do with the item before the committee.

Mr. PROBE: I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that the object of this debate is to give the minister power—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PROBE: May I not speak to the point of order?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The object of the debate is to deal with this item, and speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to it. I am sure the hon. member will not argue that the Swedish programme has anythink to do with this item.

Mr. PROBE: Right. We are conferring on the minister wide and sweeping powers to go ahead with the job of building his houses. We are extending those powers for another year.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The plea the hon. member is now making is not one which deals with this specific item. The programme of housing is another thing. We will deal with this specific item, please.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that, however right you were when you referred to the Swedish figures, when you last stopped the hon. member he was dealing with the powers conferred upon the minister by this order. Since that is the purpose of the order, I submit that what the hon. member was saying is strictly in order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Vancouver East was following carefully he would have seen that the hon. member for Regina City was dealing with the housing programme. We are dealing with construction regulations under this item.

Mr. PROBE: I am quite prepared to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I think you are always fair, and I just want one more minute to tell the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that we are conferring on him powers he has possessed for some time to provide us with construction material, and all that goes into the job of housebuilding. I now ask him, through you, Mr. Chairman, will he please take off the gloves and get on with the job?

Mrs. STRUM: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to talk about veterans houses, nor am I going to talk about wartime housing. I wish merely to present the case of the small town. I think the private builder who wishes to build his own house, not for sale or rent but rather for his own occupancy, is the forgotten man in the housing programme. I have been trying to find out just where he fits in. I have been reading the minister's speech of February 7, in which he spoke about the new ruling in connection with housing. He points out rightly that we have not been able to construct as many rental units as we had hoped, and points out, further, that during 1946 seventy-five per cent of the completed residential units were built for sale. I think all will admit that most of those were built for speculative purposes.

I believe the minister is right in trying to promote the building of units for rental purposes. But in the small towns there does not seem to be any place for the priority of the man building his own house. If there is a large-scale building programme under way, and a contractor is building a group of houses for veterans or wartime housing, or on any other kind of project, there seems to be a way of getting materials. If you are building 100 houses you can get bathtubs, plumbing, flooring and finishing materials; but if you are only an individual in a small town you will find it difficult to secure materials.

I made a survey of the requirements in my constituency, and I shall set out some of the replies I received to the questionnaire. The first one is from the town of Moosomin. The board of trade of that town states, through its secretary:

> The housing situation in town is very difficult. I believe that there is need of from 30 to 50 new houses at least. If material were easily available, I am sure that there would be that many homes started almost immediately.

And so on, right through the list, from all the towns in my constituency. Broadview is a divisional point on the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway. Many hon. members will remember it. The board of trade in that town tell me that not only are they short of construction materials for the building of houses, but they lack finishing materials, plaster board, Donnaconna board, masonite, ten-test and wall boards of all kinds, casings, baseboards and flooring. One further thing of which they are in short supply is nails. However I shall not touch upon that, because someone else has already done so.

Then, at Rocanville they have no community centre, except an old hall, which is in very bad condition. They have tried to raise money for a memorial hall. I submit that this is much more important than a new cocktail bar or a new bowling alley, because they have no other place in which to hold a community gathering of any kind. But they have been held up for over a year through lack of cement and lumber.

Then, the Grenfell board of trade, through its secretary, tell me that they have not been able to honour permits to veterans to build, because they have not been able to get the lumber to fill the permits.

And right through the whole catalogue of towns in my constituency we find the same story. Some need more than others. At Indian Head, for instance, the town in my constituency where the experimental farm is located, the situation is so bad that building of any kind has practically come to a standstill. The lumber dealer at this point was able to obtain only three cars of lumber during all of 1946, and only two cars so far this year. It goes on to say:

> Those connected with the building trade in the town state that at least eight cars of lumber, including two cars of flooring and finishing lumber could be immediately disposed of to private parties wishing to build their own homes.

This is one of the few towns with running water and it is only because of their hook-up with the experimental farm that they have running water. They say that plumbing supplies and sheet metal are also in very short supply and difficult to obtain and that this shortage will have to be overcome before normal building can take place. I am not suggesting to the minister how he is going to do this, but I understand that the priorities officer has jurisdiction. I again plead with the minister to give consideration to these people who are not carrying on large construction projects which might have a claim on the basis of great volume. I am sure, when he thinks about the matter, he will realize the handicap these people face in presenting their case in connection with supplies.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sure the committee recognized in the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale a valuable contribution to the knowledge of this committee in deliberating on P.C. 1609. I should like to offer my congratulations to my colleague upon an outstanding and valuable contribution to this debate.

The order before the committee confers wide powers upon the minister, which, by a later order, were transferred to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Powers were conferred not only with respect to the distribution of construction materials but also with respect to their manufacture.

We have had reports from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply from time to time concerning the manufacture of construction materials. It is perhaps only natural that, in view of the unsatisfactory situation which exists, the attention of the committee should be directed principally to the aspect of the distribution of these materials rather than to the subject of their manufacture. Actually some improvement has been shown in the past year in the rate of manufacture of building materials, although the steel strike of last summer created a disastrous set-back to the manufacture of certain building products. Whatever may be said about the improvement—it is not a great or general improvement—in the picture with respect to the manufacture of construction materials, the picture represented with reference to the distribution of construction materials is not a bright or happy one.

It is just over a year ago that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply came into the house and sought to wash his hands of his responsibility for the channeling of construction materials into home building. On April 1, 1946, the minister announced that order in council P.C. 1184 had been passed on March 27, 1946. In the acompanying statement he referred to the fact that on December 5, 1945, construction control was abolished, but that subsequently a special committee from the Canadian construction association, as well as a large number of municipal and other organizations, including veterans' organizations, had recommended that all types of construction other than housing be prohibited or controlled. In the face of that, the minister proceeded to announce an order in council, the effect of which was to divest himself and the federal authority of all power of directing the use of construction materials by simply handing responsibility over to the municipal authorities.

Whatever might be said about the situation in normal times, what was done by the minister of reconstruction on that occasion was to part with the effective means of ensuring that the available supply of construction materials in Canada should be devoted to home construction. That kind of passing the buck offends the conscience of the Canadian people. Here we were with a limited and quite inadequate supply of construction materials, and the power rested in the hands of the minister to channel that supply, inadequate as it was, into home construction. But he publicly washed his hands of the problem and simply threw it over into the hands of the municipal authorities.

Mr. HOWE: Is this the same hon. gentleman who, no later than last autumn, demanded that all controls be abolished?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not know to whom the minister of reconstruction refers when he says, "the hon. gentleman who, no later than last autumn, demanded that all controls be abolished". I do not know to whom he refers; he certainly does not refer to me.

Mr. HOWE: I heard him state vehemently over the radio during the course of the Parkdale by-election that all controls should be abolished.

Mr. FLEMING: I am afraid the minister is basing that statement on erroneous information, as is too often the case as far as he is concerned.

Mr. HOWE: I think I heard something like that said at that time.

Mr. FLEMING: I expect that the minister has obtained his information from a source he should not rely on.

Mr. HOWE: I like the versatility of my hon. friend, who can denounce controls one day and ask that more onerous controls be put on, the next.

Mr. FLEMING: I have not any hope of emulating the ability of the minister of reconstruction to say one thing one day and then reverse himself the next.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend is so anxious to get controls, let us pass this bill and get on with something else.

Mr. FLEMING: If I may now proceed with my remarks, the minister had in his hands the power to channel construction materials into home construction.

Mr. HOWE: He still has that power.

Mr. FLEMING: And he divested himself of that power. I am sure the committee would be interested if the minister were to announce now that he is going to revive the permit system. That is the one effective means of channeling construction materials into home construction. It is the one means that would work whereas the priorities system has broken down.

Mr. HOWE: What method is my hon. friend advocating? Will he please explain?

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister would be content to let me make my speech I think he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. HOWE: Get on with your speech.

Mr. FLEMING: I will get on with my speech as soon as the minister ceases to interrupt. I do not mind his asking questions and I am quite prepared to answer them.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer them then.

Mr. FLEMING: The answer will come; make no mistake about that. There was a means at hand.

Mr. HOWE: Where?

Mr. FLEMING: The permit system; that was an effective means.

Mr. HOWE: Permit for what?

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister is going to ask a question I hope he will ask it loud enough for me to hear.

Mr. HOWE: For what does my hon. friend want to issue permits?

Mr. FLEMING: A permit plan would have helped greatly in seeing that construction materials were channeled into home construction, and that power was available to the minister at the time. The power was available at the time to see that construction materials were denied to projects which were postponable or not essential, in order that all available supplies might be used in home construction. The minister did not do that and the priorities system which he set up has since proven itself quite inadequate. A permit system would have provided a means which would have been effective for this purpose, but the minister passed the buck to the municipalities. As everyone knows, a municipal body is not equipped, nor is it a proper body to deal with this problem. As everyone knows, municipalities are competing with one another to attract industries. They are not going to refuse permits to concerns which wish to come in and build. The result has been that there is no effective control by the municipal permit system. Municipal councils have not been applying any selective method to channel construction materials into the building of houses. What has been the result of this washing of the hands on the part of the minister of reconstruction and divesting himself of his responsibility in the situation? Let us look at the number of permits granted in 1945 and 1946.

In 1945 the permit system was in effect for the first eleven months of the year, and here are the figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics and to be found in Hansard of February 17 of this year. Let us just see how the proportion of permits for home construction bulks in the total of permits issued. In 1945 permits for house construction totalled, in round figures, $117,000,000 out of a total of $197,000,000 of building permits. In other words, about sixty per cent of the permits in terms of value were for home construction.

What happened in 1946 when we did not have the permit system? Permits for home construction totalled $200,000,000 out of a total of $383,000,000. In other words, the percentage of construction materials going into non-residential construction is growing, and that is bound to be so. Every member of this house has seen for himself the effect of allowing industrial construction and all forms of postponable construction, non-essential construction, to compete with housing construction for the limited supply of building materials. Let me remind the committee of what Brigadier Storms, general manager of Housing Enterprises Limited, had to say about this matter. He was dealing with this very situation and with the excuses sometimes offered on behalf of the minister that industrial construction and other forms of construction do not take the same kind of materials as residential construction and do not absorb labour of the same kind. Here is the answer to that kind of talk. This is what Brigadier Storms is quoted in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 10 last as having said on this subject:

> Bricks, cement, plumbing, electrical fixtures and other materials which should be going into housing are being used for millions of dollars' worth of non-essential building. Douglas H. Storms, general manager of Housing Enterprises of Canada Limited, asserted yesterday in an interview.

> "This country has gone berserk on building of the wrong kind," he said. "Everywhere you see plant extensions, theatres, garages, stores, summer cottages, dance halls and hot-dog stands under construction. You can't tell me those buildings don't take material away from housing because they do. What is more, they are absorbing thousands of workmen who should be building houses.
> "At the same time, people are living in the worst distress for lack of houses. On one street of small houses in New Toronto, we found that each house was occupied on the average by 19 people. All this non-essential building goes on and we cannot get houses built for homeless people."

He added with reference to the subject of control by the municipalities:

> "If you can show me a municipality in Ontario which is exercising the slightest selective control over building I'll buy you a new hat," Mr. Storms exclaimed.
> During the war and the ensuing control period building was restricted, he said. Once the restrictions came off business corporations and individuals, all with money to spend, had rushed in to build. Firms were now building big plant extensions which, he said, would stand empty a few years hence "when the honeymoon is over."

The honeymoon is not yet over. It is going on full blast today. On every hand you can see people proceeding with construction that might well have waited until the imperative needs of home construction have first been met. It is a sad commentary on the record of the present government that it has to some extent been participating in the honeymoon. In the city of Ottawa we had the remodeling of the Ottawa theatre of the national film board, a government agency, and this was done at a time when people are living under conditions such as Brigadier Storms described—nineteen people to a house, veterans living in hovels, garrets and cellars, whole families housed in a room or two. Yet the government of Canada feels free to participate in this honeymoon of building.

These are not the only unhappy, deplorable results of the way in which the government has been mishandling the control of construction materials. A black market is flourishing today. Distribution has been disarranged; the normal channels have all been upset; stock-piling has been going on, as was related this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale, on projects which have enjoyed favour under the present priorities system, and the private builder, who is still expected by the government to carry the brunt of the load, must scramble for what is left.

Last year we were told by the minister of reconstruction that there were built in Canada, through original construction or reconversion, 60,000 housing units. We have been told, in a return filed recently in the house, that a total of 10,009 of these housing units were built under various forms of government housing, most of them under Wartime Housing, some under the Veterans' Land Act, some under integrated housing, and a very few by Housing Enterprises Limited. The number completed in 1946 by Housing Enterprises Limited was, according to a recent return, only twenty-eight housing units. Housing Enterprises Limited started off in 1946 with an objective of 6,000 housing units. In the middle of the summer that objective was dropped to 3,600, and at the end of 1946 only twenty-eight had been completed. Subtract 10,009 from 60,000 and you will find that 50,000, or five-sixths of all the houses that were built last year in Canada were built by private enterprise builders. The government is still counting on them to carry the load. It would be difficult, after a year has gone by since the government passed this buck to the municipalities, to resume the permit system. But the present priority system has proven quite inadequate and quite unsatisfactory. The government divested itself a year ago of the means it had at its disposal of ensuring that the available quantity of building materials was channeled into home construction.

Mr. HOWE: I think I should say just a word in reply to the speeches we have heard this evening. The speech of the hon. member for Eglinton indicates the state of utter confusion in which the official opposition finds itself on the matter of controls. It spent six or seven weeks of this session demanding that all controls be removed, and now we have the hon. member for Eglinton insisting that new controls be put on, especially the one control which, throughout the war years, was found to be unworkable and exceptionally unfair under any administration we could operate. Hon. members suggest that, while cities insist on competing for new industries, they would be quite content to have the government decide that one should be built and the other should not. It seems to hon. members quite simple for anyone to sit in Ottawa and decide what is essential. I perhaps might give an example. To my mind, the building of a plant in Saskatchewan to process horse meat would not be an urgent project, and yet I got not only a demand to grant a permit but a demand for priority assistance in doing so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You thought it was, did you not?

Mr. HOWE: We granted the permit, but we did not give priority assistance. You can take as many projects as you like. What is one man's meat is another man's poison.

A great deal has been said about the scandalous waste in building bowling alleys. Yet we have had the most pathetic requests, during the period of controls, for permission to build bowling alleys in towns in northern Ontario, and elsewhere in Canada, where bowling is the one recreation of a considerable body of people in a small community.

We have looked into building control thoroughly and found that it was difficult of administration. We found that violations of the control were not punished in the area, because people in the area would say, "Nonsense; this is essential building. They can say it is not essential in Ottawa, but we know it is essential and we are not going to punish this man for violating the order." That is one of the reasons why building control was one of the first controls to be abolished. Nothing can be built in a city unless some civic body decides that it should be built in the interests of the city. Any city has the right to refuse to have anything built, and I may say that some cities have refused. For instance, the city of Kitchener have been most punctilious in choosing the type of construction that can be built in that town. The city of Regina has also cooperated in that regard. I could name other cities which have done their part to see that the material supplied to that area was channeled into housing construction.

Mr. FRASER: Did Ottawa ask for permission for the Capital brewery to put up their new building?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. My department does not issue building permits.

Mr. FRASER: They required permission to put it up. Did they have sanction for it?

Mr. HOWE: The city?

Mr. FRASER: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure I cannot say.

Mr. FRASER: They have nails, lumber and everything else.

Mr. HOWE: That may be so. The control of priorities has been gradually relaxed, as have all controls. Starting two years ago, we had much more insistent demands than today to abolish controls and to get back to the normal law of supply and demand. It would appear that by the time we are ready to let go controls the opposition will be full out for a completely new system of controls. That is the only conclusion I can reach after listening to their performance this evening. However we are maintaining controls on two basic commodities, lumber and steel, and we do maintain a system of priorities for limited classes of house building; that is, buildings under government sponsorship, which includes wartime housing, integrated housing, veterans housing and Housing Enterprises Limited, the insurance company project which is supported by government finance. Furthermore we issue priorities to houses being built for individual veterans after the house is fifty per cent completed. The reason for the fifty per cent rule is to prevent the requirement for a priority for material which may be diverted into less essential types of construction. We feel that there is no great difficulty about getting the material which goes into the first fifty per cent of the building; that the need for priority really exists only in the second stage of building.

Reference has been made to the small number of houses built last year by integrated housing. The reason for that is that the plan was started only last year. A great many houses under the integrated plan were not completed at the end of the year and therefore did not appear in the 1946 figures. It is estimated that there will be at least 10,000 houses built under the integrated plan in 1947 and probably about seven or eight thousand houses under the wartime housing programme, which is about the same size as the programme of last year.

Reference has been made to the individual project in the small town. It is very difficult indeed to devise a priority system for that type of building. The builder buys at retail from the local hardware store. Of course, when material is supplied to that hardware store there is no way that we know of, of guaranteeing that it will go to housing rather than to the building of farm properties or less essential building. However we do try to see that each small town gets its fair quota of building materials. Constant study is being made to create efficient means for encouraging house building in the small town. I may say that government housing projects are available to small towns as they are available to larger towns and to cities and that no request for housing under government plan from the small town is being turned down.

The supply of building materials has been improved this year as against last year. Reference has been made to nails. The production of nails this year is the largest in recent years. They are being produced at the rate of 1,400,000 kegs, which is larger than any year since 1938.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Per month, or—

Mr. HOWE: That is for the year. Priority requirements for these nails are about 180,000 kegs, or approximately fifteen per cent. Eighty-five per cent of the nail production goes into non-priority construction; that is, outside of government priorities. The demand and supply are not far apart, really. Everyone gets nails after a little delay. Really I think production is ahead of consumption at the present time and the shortage is only a temporary one.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the minister say what quantity of nails we export?

Mr. HOWE: We export no nails and have not done so for some months.

We have been asked why we cannot make more nails. The reason we cannot make more nails is that we are using all the wire that the Canadian mills can produce in a way that seems to be the wisest way to use it. When discussing one problem people are apt to forget all other problems. If we use all the wire that Canada produces in this country to make nails, there will be no wire to make agricultural implements; there will be no wire for baling purposes on the farms and no wire for a number of essential uses for wire. We have cut the supplies to these other uses down to the finest point that we believe possible and are using the remainder of the wire to make nails.

Mr. BROOKS: Do we export any wire?

Mr. HOWE: None at all.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said no nails were exported in the last eighteen months. According to the bureau of statistics, last year we exported $300,000 worth.

Mr. HOWE: To where? To Newfoundland, perhaps.

Mr. FRASER: They got a few, yes.

Mr. HOWE: We have been taking care of Newfoundland.

Mr. FRASER: There are other places also, according to the bureau of statistics.

Mr. HOWE: I expect some to historic markets; but none are being exported at the moment. I do not know that I have any further points that should be mentioned. However we are trying to limit the extent of the controls as gradually as possible. We assume that hon. gentlemen do not want us to start expanding controls again. We are gradually working out of controls in an orderly way, and whenever a supply situation becomes satisfactory the control is dropped. There are controls of two basic commodities we believe to be essential to permit industry to develop at a maximum rate, and the purpose is to continue to control steel and steel products, and to control timber until we can make the supply situation adequate in both these fields.

I said before that, through a tight control of steel, we are producing about twenty per cent more steel products in this country than would be possible without the control. We are taking excess raw products away from steel plants that have capacity for producing a greater supply of raw products than finished steel, and turning them over to other steel plants that have finishing capacity in excess of capacity to produce raw materials. We are bringing slabs and billets from Algoma into the Hamilton area; we are moving pigiron from Algoma into all foundries in Ontario and Quebec; we are moving billets from Nova Scotia into Montreal and Hamilton; we are moving pigiron from Dosco back into central Canada, a movement that was unheard of until the past year. We are using all the productive capacity of the steel mills and, by using all that capacity, we are keeping the finishing capacity of the steel mills and foundries going at full capacity, and have brought about a balance. That requires rigid control and a careful juggling of the raw materials.

As far as lumber is concerned, we find that the use of this commodity is exceeding the requirements of the last year, and we are taking orderly steps to decrease the proportion of exports of lumber and to divert greater supplies of Canadian production to the Canadian market. Further announcements will be made of progress in that direction within the next week or ten days.

It is difficult to administer controls at the present time, far more difficult than during the war years. In the first place, we have not the personnel available in peace time that was attracted to the government service during the war. We also find that people were much more amenable to instructions from government in war time than in peace time, which is quite understandable. However, such controls as we have left are reasonably effective and we believe they are amply justified by the results being obtained from them.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said earlier with regard to the desirability of channeling a little more of the material available toward the small towns and rural areas to encourage building there. The minister will find that type of building will give him fewer headaches than almost any other type of building in Canada. We have a large number of veterans returning to towns in the rural areas and they are desirous of building homes for themselves. They cannot afford to build a five or six thousand dollar home but can afford to spend a couple of thousand dollars on a home, and to do that they must do a lot of construction work themselves. You will find that type of people in every small town across Canada.

I know of no better way that material can be used than to encourage these people to build and own their own homes, and they can do that only when material is made available to the small towns. The minister should give serious consideration to channeling a larger proportion of that material in that direction at the present time. I know there is a large demand in the areas in my constituency and through the northern parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and many parts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and there is one particular regulation which people have resented in these years. That is the regulation which was put into force eighteen months or two years ago, preventing the individual from going direct to the small mills to secure his building and other material. That had been customary through large areas, in the maritimes, the northern areas of the prairies and certain parts of British Columbia. The people in the rural areas and in the small towns have gone direct to the small mills to secure a large proportion of their building material direct from these mills, thus saving the retail commission on such materials. It is a real saving to many of these people.

Mr. HOWE: There is no regulation against it.

Mr. WRIGHT: When was it withdrawn?

Mr. HOWE: We never had a regulation.

Mr. WRIGHT: It was there until a short time ago. You could not go direct to a sawmill in Canada and purchase building material. All sawmill material had to be channeled through wholesale outlets to the retailer. If that is no longer so, I am glad to hear it, because that was one thing which caused a lot of dissatisfaction in certain areas in our part of the country.

With regard to the other matter of channeling as much as possible, or at least a fair proportion of material to the smaller towns, the minister should give it his consideration. In fact I know he is giving it consideration.

Mr. FULTON: I did not intend to get into the question of the merits of any of these controls, because I felt that would be more adequately handled by those who have been following these particular controls more closely than I have, but I cannot help making one or two comments on the minister's last statement when he dealt with the question of handing over to the municipalities the issuing of permits with regard to these building materials upon which priorities still exist.

Mr. HOWE: May I set my hon. friend right. He is about the tenth man who has said that we handed over to the municipalities the right to issue building permits. The municipalities always had the right to issue building permits; they have had it since confederation. The only thing we handed to them was the right legally to refuse building permits, and we did that as a result of a case in Toronto where the city refused a building permit. The man to whom the permit was refused took legal action and the court ordered the city to grant the permit. But to say that we handed over the granting of building permits to municipalities is ridiculous.

Mr. FULTON: If the minister wants to split hairs and enter into a fine argument we can go on with that for the next hour. But in effect what he did was this. Having taken to the federal government the authority to say that this or that building should be built and this or that building should not be built, he then gives back to the municipalities, if he prefers to use those words, the right of issuance. But he did not at the same time part with his priority system of controls with regard to building materials. The only point I am making here is that it is not proper; it is putting an unfair burden on the municipalities, and particularly the small municipalities, to do the one without doing the other. If the minister maintains, as he appears to, that priorities on building materials cannot yet be abandoned; if he is going to retain that measure of control, he should retain the other measure of control in order to make the whole scheme effective.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to understand my hon. friend. Is he advocating that all priority controls be dropped? Is that what he is advocating?

Mr. FULTON: No.

Mr. HOWE: Then what is he talking about?

Mr. FULTON: I suppose, having listened to the argument all day, consciously or unconsciously the minister may be arriving at the point where he may not wish to follow it farther, but the point I am making is that if you are going to maintain control over building materials by means of priorities, as the minister is doing, then it would be logical and fair particularly to the small communities if you would retain control over building permits. I know that in the case of a municipality such as the one I come from, where a small industry wishes to become established it can bring tremendous pressure to bear on that municipal council. They come along and say, "We wish to get a permit to construct this building". The municipal council wish to give priority to housing, and they reply, "We are sorry, but we are giving priority to houses. We are giving all our permits to those who wish to build houses and for the moment are denying them to those who wish to build garages, recreational centres and other types of buildings". Then the industry comes along and says, "We are sorry, too; we imagine we shall have to go down the valley and put up our plant somewhere else". So that the municipality is in an almost hopeless position. If it denies that permit it may lose an opportunity to provide employment for its residents, while if it grants the permit it means that materials which otherwise might be used for the construction of houses will be denied, for the time being, to those who wish to build homes. So I say it is placing an unfair burden on the municipalities to put them in that position. As long as it is necessary to maintain priorities in regard to building materials—and at the moment I am not entering into the merits of that case—it would have been fairer to retain control over the granting or denying of building permits, because half a measure is worse than no measure at all.

When I rose this evening I said I had not intended to enter into that part of the discussion until the minister made the remarks he did in reply to the hon. member for Eglinton. My purpose in rising this evening was to draw attention to those provisions of this group of orders in council which are similar to the provisions in the wartime prices and trade board order, which the Minister of Justice indicated he would be prepared to amend in the same way that the other order was amended.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I have an amendment for that.

Mr. FULTON: If I may summarize those provisions, they are paragraph 6 in P.C. 1609, paragraph 9 in P.C. 9439, and paragraph 7 of P.C. 245, to be found at page 149 of the consolidation. Then I would refer to P.C. 3, at page 139 of the consolidation, and I wonder if the minister would consider an amendment to paragraph 15 of that order, which provides in subsection 6 that a person may be prosecuted for an offence at any place in Canada where he may be found. Carried to its extreme application, this would mean that a person who carried on business in Vancouver, let us say, and who was on a visit to Toronto, could be arrested and held in custody and prosecuted in Toronto, where he could not obtain his documents, his books and so on. This might have been necessary in war time, but it seems to me that it is an extreme power which is not necessary nowadays. So I wonder if the minister would consent to strike out the last words of subsection 6: "or is found or apprehended or in custody". If those words could be struck out it would go a long way toward meeting the views of those who think these powers are too wide.

Mr. HOWE: There is no objection to the three amendments first mentioned by the hon. member, and we have those amendments prepared. I think the purpose of subsection 6 of paragraph 15 of P.C. 3 was simply to be able to bring the offender before a magistrate quickly. Usually speed in prosecution is effective in stopping an offence. I do not quite understand my hon. friend's objection to that clause.

Mr. FULTON: As I say, carried to its extreme limit it would mean that a person carrying on business in one part of Canada, let us say in Vancouver, whom the board suspected of having committed an offence, while taking a holiday and visiting Toronto—and I should say that would be the only reason I could imagine a person from Vancouver going to Toronto—could be arrested there, and this provision gives them power to hold him in custody and prosecute him in Toronto, which would be putting him at an unfair disadvantage, inasmuch as all his books and records would be in Vancouver.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He would be at an unfair advantage anyway if he were in Toronto.

Mr. FULTON: I quite agree with my hon. friend, but this would be an additional disadvantage.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman had raised this question before, I could have given it some consideration. This same provision is in the other orders, and we shall get out of line with those other orders if we make this change. I am advised that there has never been any complaint of any hardship under this provision, so that I do not think I could accept the amendment on the spur of the moment in this way.

Mr. FULTON: I hesitate to disagree with the minister, but I have not noticed it in any of the preceding orders. I may have overlooked it.

Mr. ILSLEY: You did. It is on page 26.

Mr. FULTON: Had I noticed it, I would certainly have drawn it to his attention. Where is it?

Mr. HOWE: It is on page 26; paragraph 11(2).

Mr. FULTON: Yes, I see it now. I have to confess that it was an oversight on my part. What great disadvantage in the enforcement of these regulations would be involved if this were dropped at this stage?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I would have to send for the enforcement officers and find out. Probably there is some good reason for its being there. The hon. gentleman does not point out any case where it has worked any hardship, and unless he does I think he is making a case against it that is purely theoretical. What I do not like to do is, on the spur of the moment, accept an amendment at this time without making some inquiry as to the usefulness of the provision.

Mr. FULTON: The minister has said that I had not brought a case to his attention, and that he does not know of any instance of hardship. That is a fairly good argument upon which we could conclude that the section has never been used. If it has never been used, then presumably it is not necessary. And if it is not necessary, then I suggest that it might be dropped without doing any harm. The mere fact that it is a theoretical case is not sufficient ground to say that it should be kept; because, since it is there, it permits abuse of power by placing a person at an unfair disadvantage. Even though it might never be used, it is one of those excessive powers which I think should be got rid of at this time without actually imperilling the enforcement of the whole order. Perhaps this section might be allowed to stand.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was on his feet he overlooked commenting on the suggestion I made this afternoon that he should take the initiative in calling a conference of representatives from the different levels of government. In some of the publications from his department I gather that he is depending a good deal upon housing to provide employment during the next few years. I think he will admit that housing which is available at $70 a month is not going to meet the need. I suggest that it is important there should be some consultation between the federal government and provincial and municipal governments. Could the minister indicate what consideration he has given to that, and what plans there are to confer with the different governments I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: The department is conferring with cities every day. I think not a week goes by when some officer of the department is not conferring with almost every city in Canada. Some cities are more cooperative than others, but all have worked with the government to a greater or lesser extent in providing housing.

The attitude of the provinces is definite. They say, "The dominion has accepted the problem, and it is the dominion's problem. Just carry on. We are not interested." I might point out that the dominion is in the housing field simply as a result of the maladjustment of population which occurred as a result of the war. It is quite out of its jurisdictional depth, and it has no business in housing. Housing is in the field of the provinces and the municipalities.

However we have entered the field, first by making ample money available for privately built housing; and, further, we have sponsored certain government plans for housing, which are being helpful. But we should like very much to see the provinces show a little more enthusiasm. And if we can confer any more with the cities to advantage we would be very glad to do so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But I wonder if some agreement cannot be reached some day. The minister has said that housing is not a federal responsibility. I believe that the provinces in turn will say it is not a provincial responsibility. The municipalities stated, during the thirties, that they could not cope with the problem. I think, within the framework of the British North America Act, or by some device, we can manage to bring those three governmental authorities together and place the responsibility somewhere. We are going to go into another depression, and judging from the minister's comments no governmental authority will take any responsibility.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of building houses is to get houses; there is no other purpose at the present time. My hon. friend thinks, if we got a great many people at a meeting, it might build houses; but it does not work that way. If we knew of any way of meeting people which would produce more houses, we would meet those people, and meet them very quickly. I believe, if my hon. friend stops to consider, he will agree with me that the dominion government is doing more toward creating houses in this country than any other governmental authority. We would like others to enter the field. If we can help them, as they have helped us, we would be glad to do so.

Mr. MILLER: I should like to ask the minister of reconstruction, or possibly the Minister of Justice, a question, and possibly make a suggestion. However I would be more apt to be governed in the matter by what the Minister of Justice might say.

In most of the orders in council which are being considered here, the priorities officer or the controller, as the case may be, is given power to delegate his power. This is done, for instance, in section 5 of P.C. 1609. It seems to me that the wide powers these controllers are given should not be passed around like, for instance, hot cross buns, or something like that. These are important powers; they are extensive, and extend over the freedom of the people. There should be some limitation in the delegation of such wide powers.

Would the Minister of Justice say that it is essential for the proper carrying out of the duties of the officers in question that they should have the power to delegate the extensive powers they have. If this delegation of power is necessary, then I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the people to whom the powers can be given should be limited.

Another point I would raise, while I am on my feet, is one which arises under section 12 (2) of P.C. 3, at page 141. Perhaps it is because we do not like to see the ordinary freedoms which have been set up for years affected or infringed upon, but it does seem to me that a controller should not have the power he is given in that subsection. Where a controller believes that any person has failed to produce books and records, under this subsection he can authorize in writing a police officer, police constable or other person to go in and make seizure of the books. Such officer may enter by force, if necessary, and carry those books, not to a court, or to a place where they would be in the custody of the law, but he shall carry them before such controller.

It seems to me that, in the first place, the controller should have no licence whatsoever to give a warrant or order under his hand to authorize a police officer to enter the premises of a person. In the second place, if that power is necessary, and is given to such controller, any records seized should be placed in the custody of the law, and not retained in the archives or under the control of some controller; because any lawyer knows that anything taken in that fashion, which might be used in evidence, should be kept in the custody of the law, if it is to be produced in a court of law against any person in any subsequent charge.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to these amendments, I find that there are precedents in other legislation for the type of section objected to by the hon. member for Kamloops. In the first place, section 57 of the Foreign Exchange Control Board Act is as follows—

Mr. FULTON: Passed last session.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: We objected to that sort of provision then.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That does not make it bad.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the hon. gentleman objected to this section, nor do I think it was objected to in this house, in the other house or before the banking and commerce committee. The section, which is identical with the one in question, reads:

> For the purpose of the prosecution of a person for an offence under this act, the offence shall be deemed to have been committed either at the place where it was actually committed or at any place in Canada in which the offender resides, or is found, or is apprehended, or is in custody.

The Customs Act, which is an old act, provides for certain classes of offences by section 263, which reads:

> If the amount of any such penalty or forfeiture does not exceed two hundred dollars, the same may also be prosecuted, sued for and recovered in any court having jurisdiction to that amount in the place where the cause of prosecution arises, or where the defendant is served with process.

Mr. BROOKS: That was in connection with the smuggling of goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is in the Customs Act. I should not like to agree to that in the absence of evidence of abuse. With regard to the other matter raised by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, we had in mind proposing an amendment to the section giving the controllers the right to authorize police officers to enter and search. The words which we proposed to insert were these:

> . . . with the approval of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of a superior or county court, which approval such judge is hereby empowered to give upon the ex parte application of the controller . . .

Perhaps we had better get the amendment before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: We have not passed the first order in council as yet.

Mr. HOWE: Let us pass it.

The CHAIRMAN: We should consider all the orders in council relating to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and then an amendment could be moved to any one at this time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood that they were being discussed together and that it was competent for any hon. member to move an amendment to any order.

The CHAIRMAN: It is agreed that we are discussing all the orders relating to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. GREEN: They are to be passed individually later.

The CHAIRMAN: If they are to be passed individually later I do not see how an amendment can be moved now.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that we pass P.C. 1609, and then we can pass on to the next.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will defer that amendment until we reach the order.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have something to say on this matter of priorities and the control of building material. I come from the constituency which was mentioned three times this afternoon, by the hon. member for Parkdale, by the hon. member for Eglinton and by another hon. member, as being perhaps the most congested area in the entire Dominion of Canada. There is probably more industrial and housing construction going on in that district at the present time than in any other in the country. There is a desperate need for houses in that district at the present time.

Private builders who are doing eighty per cent of the construction of small houses, small apartments, veterans houses, houses being built for the low income group of citizens, complain about one thing, that they cannot get building materials. Tile, nails, shingles, brick—the whole group of building materials comes into the picture. I do not wish to go into the reasons for this shortage or to reargue the case that was presented so ably this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale, but I want to give the committee some information because I have some first-hand knowledge of the matter. A year ago tomorrow I had the misfortune of having my own home burned to the ground. I am now in the position of trying to obtain building material. The contractors come to me and say, "We can get you building materials but we must charge you the imported price." They do not use the word "black market price"; they say the imported price.

I should like to give the committee two or three of the prices that were quoted to me over the week-end. I understand that the ceiling price in Canada for gyproc lath is $30 per 1,000 feet; it was offered to me at $47.75 per 1,000 feet. I understand that the Canadian ceiling on metal lath is forty cents a yard; it was offered to me at fifty-four cents a yard. I was offered cement at $1.25 a bag and nails at $20 to $25 a keg. I was informed that the supply was abundant and that I could get materials at those prices.

Mr. HOWE: May I suggest to my hon. friend that he try dealing with somebody on the other side of politics and he might get the right prices.

Mr. GREEN: That is pretty cheap.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am dealing with two contractors, but unfortunately I have not inquired into their politics. All I wanted to know was whether they could build a house. Here we have an apparent abundant supply of building materials, abundant at what they call the imported price. It is reported to me that these building materials have been imported from the United States, but I do not know whether that is so because I have not examined into it personally. I am simply taking the word of my contractor, who is a large contractor and knows what he is doing.

This is the story I get not only from my own people but from other contractors throughout the district; they can get the material but they have to pay these extra prices. The building industry tells me that these extra prices are the result of the priorities system imposed on the building trades by the government. In other words, they say that if the Canadian building material industry were allowed to ration or sell on a completely open market without having to meet certain government priority commitments, the prices the average man is now asked to pay would not be charged because there would be a greater supply of building materials. There are many hundreds of houses being built. Not only do they take four or five months longer to build than they should under normal circumstances, but some take even a year longer, and I am told by the same builders quoted by the member for Parkdale this afternoon that that is entirely because they cannot get building materials since they are held up by the priority system imposed by the present government.

I do not want to quote my own case and I do so merely because I happen to have specific information. I know, because I am interested in the building business, exactly what people are up against in the city of Toronto today. Material is simply not available unless the builder or the owner is prepared to pay extortionate prices. Perhaps these prices that have been quoted to me are the proper prices to pay. But then why go through the fantasy that control and a priority system do exist? Why not free the whole thing and let the building industry do its own rationing of materials? Here we have hundreds of houses in a semi-finished state, over sixty per cent finished. They may or may not be finished this summer because of the inability to get materials. When you have a house under construction the time element is infinitely more important in many ways from the point of view of cost than any other. When you have a gang working and they are held up for two or three days waiting for materials the cost of labour soon goes up.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If you have to wait for materials it is because you are building so many factories in your riding.

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not think that is the reason at all. It is true that industrial development has been great, as it has been throughout Canada. As was stated this afternoon, the industrial development is several times the domestic house development in dollar value. If, as the government says, the main problem is the building of dwelling houses, why does it allow industrial construction to exceed domestic construction by several times? That was one of the problems which was discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale.

But my point is not the question of industrial development versus domestic housing. My point is this. How is it that material can be obtained at these excessive prices or above the ceiling prices and cannot be obtained at the ordinary prices? Either the government by its policy has thrown a monkey wrench into the production of building materials, or something in the economic system is very wrong, and I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to the government that serious consideration and study be given to this business of producing building material. Either the building material industry in Canada cannot produce the building materials required, or the government by its action is stultifying the production and distribution of building materials. Building materials are simply not available for private building.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has just mentioned lath and sheeting. I have a memo here from the Department of National Revenue regarding export permits. I notice that export control was imposed on gypsum wall board, lath and sheeting on April 3. How much of it was shipped out before that date?

Mr. HOWE: I could not say.

Mr. FRASER: After export control comes in, the permits issued before that date still run for another six months. Is the minister allowing these permits on building material to run for an extra six months? On nails, export control was imposed on February 2, 1946, but the permits which had been issued before that date were allowed to run for a further six months. The minister suggested that the hon. member try to deal with other people besides those of his own party. On March 31 the hon. member for Middlesex East asked a question regarding nails and I said a couple of words on the subject. I was out in the hall here a few minutes after and was offered ten kegs of nails at $14 a keg, and I refused. The man who offered me them was not of our party.

An hon. MEMBER: That happened in this building?

Mr. FRASER: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: I have the figures here on nails for 1946. They show that we exported 25,410 hundredweight, practically all to Newfoundland and the British West Indies. We imported in the same period 13,605 hundredweight, chiefly from the United States. I would say that that is a very tight control, having in mind our historic obligation to look after the West Indies.

Mr. FRASER: That was wire nails. You also exported iron nails to the amount of about $500,000.

Mr. McKAY: After listening to the minister and others taking part in this debate, I am more convinced than ever that if we are to provide homes for the Canadian people controls of building construction must be not only maintained but extended. I note, under "Powers of Priorities Officer", that he has power to order any person in possession of or dealing in construction materials or having facilities for making or dealing in construction materials to make or deal in such materials in such manner as may be specified. I would suggest that in this respect, "in such manner as may be specified", more restriction should be applied. I think most members of the house and most right-thinking Canadian citizens will agree that the production of homes for Canadians is an urgent matter, and particularly so because so many young veterans are looking for homes. We do not have to go very far afield to find them. I think it is much more important to provide for the construction of homes than for the construction of theatres, despite what the minister said tonight. It is much more important to provide houses for our people than to provide theatres, bowling alleys, hot-dog stands, breweries and luxury hotels such as are being built in Montreal at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they being built?

Mr. McKAY: You do not have to go very far. I was there the other night and I saw it. There is a lot of building material in that one hotel which, if spread around, would provide houses for hundreds of veterans.

Mr. HOWE: That is housing also.

Mr. McKAY: If there is insufficient building material to meet the demands for house construction it is quite unfair to permit the building of structures such as I have named. Furthermore it is a bit unfair to place the onus upon the municipalities to decide what type of construction should be permitted. The reason is that there may be areas in Canada where the housing situation may not be as serious as in others. In such cases the municipal authorities may feel quite justified in authorizing the construction of buildings which would use up the available supplies of materials. That is why the federal authorities are the ones best able to assess the situation throughout the country and the only authorities able to channel the material into the type of construction that is most needed. It is the governing body which should exercise that control. Restriction should definitely be placed at this time on non-essential building if we are to provide the houses that are so badly needed.

Mr. GILLIS: A few moments ago the hon. member for York West made a serious statement, particularly with the Minister of Justice listening. The hon. member for York West said quite definitely that there is a black market in building materials operating in Ontario. He also said that the contractor with whom he is dealing in the purchase of lumber knows where to secure lumber on the black market. If that is true it should be investigated by the government. I am not sure whether it is true. I have another opinion on it. I know there is a shortage of materials across Canada. The minister will remember that I wired him last November about eight veterans houses which were tied up for some months because of lack of certain materials. The contractor was a veteran. He could not get materials. These houses were standing for months. Across the street from him another contractor who was building luxury houses had all kinds of material. There was no difficulty, but the veteran contractor told me that the reason for that was that those who were building the luxury houses were paying black market prices. At that time I tried to find out who operated the black market, where the material came from and so forth. I did not succeed in running it down. If the hon. member for York West knows who is operating that market in Ontario, or his contractor knows, it should be checked up.

Perhaps something else is happening. We may find out that all our weeping about material shortages may be caused by a hold-up. There may be a hold-up by manufacturers and lumber dealers in Canada to make building materials unavailable, for the purpose of breaking price ceilings. If there is lumber available for a black market that lumber is in Canada and should be on the market. That lumber can come only from legitimate dealers in this country and they know where it is. If it is held up for a squeeze in order to break price ceilings so that they may get whatever price they want for the lumber, the chances are, if the ceilings are taken off, you will not be able to buy that material, the cost would be so high.

As regards this fellow that we are crying about, the veteran and the chap who wants to build low-priced houses and the contractors who want to build low-priced houses for rental, which today they may be able to build under the ceilings for $3,000 or $4,000, similar houses will cost $10,000 with the ceilings off. If that takes place the fellow who is making lumber available on the black market will be able to charge whatever price he wishes. On the other hand, if you remove controls altogether the chances are there will be no lumber in Canada at all if they will pay higher prices for it in the United States, in South Africa or in some other countries.

Mr. FULTON: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he know of any place today where you can build a house for three or four thousand dollars? I have been trying to find one.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I know of a number of places. The first determining factor is the kind of house you want.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He wants a luxury house.

Mr. FULTON: In Kamloops?

Mr. GILLIS: I can take the hon. member to a section of the country that is quite a distance away from here and show him many cooperative housing projects that were set up under a provincial government act where you can get a seven-roomed house with a good basement, complete radiation, all modern conveniences for $1,800.

Mr. FULTON: When?

Mr. GILLIS: In 1938 and 1939.

Mr. FULTON: I mean today.

Mr. GILLIS: Today that same house could be built for about $2,500.

Mr. FULTON: Is it being built?

Mr. GILLIS: A contractor would not build it. A private enterprise contractor would charge about $6,000 for the same house.

Mr. FULTON: Can you build them for that today?

Mr. GILLIS: That is the thing we are trying to avoid.

Mr. FULTON: The question I asked the hon. member was, can you get them built today for three or four thousand dollars?

Mr. GILLIS: I said that under the same scheme, the cooperative housing groups, you can build them for about $2,500.

Mr. FULTON: Today?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly you can, but, as I said, you would be eliminating free enterprise. That would be the people working for themselves. Under these circumstances I do not think the hon. member would ever get a home.

An hon. MEMBER: Or a carpenter.

Mr. GILLIS: What I am trying to find out, Mr. Chairman, is whether the accusation made by the hon. member for York West is correct or not. If it is not correct I am suggesting that perhaps the minister should probe the field of where lumber is available at certain inflated prices and find out whether the private enterpriser and lumber dealers in this country are putting on the squeeze in the building of houses. I feel sorry for the minister in this matter of housing. It is pretty bad in the end of the country from which I come. Perhaps lumber is in shorter supply in that part of the country than in any other part of Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: You are lucky if you can get them built for three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. GILLIS: I said, under certain circumstances. A moment ago I said that lumber is short there. I realize that in the maritime provinces, if it were not for the control of lumber, there would be no lumber in that part of the country. At least we are getting some kind of quota, because there are some regulations on it. I suggest that in this matter of controlling lumber and maintaining ceilings in this country the government should carefully consider the proposition from our free enterprise friends. They all have good houses. They are not worrying. This crying on your shoulder about veterans not having homes and all that sort of thing is so much bunkum.

Mr. GREEN: We are just as much interested in the veterans as you are.

Mr. HARKNESS: We are not so much interested in veterans' politics as the hon. member is.

Mr. GILLIS: They have not fooled me for one minute. I have seen these salty tears and I have seen section 98 passed and all that kind of thing the minute they got in power.

Mr. GREEN: We have done much more for veterans than you have.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the committee that it is almost eleven o'clock. There is an order in council before the committee for consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Could I wind up some amendments tonight?

Mr. GILLIS: I am about through, but I intend to follow this up, because an investigation is due on the part of the government into the accusations made tonight by the hon. member for West York. If there is a black market and he knows where it is operating it is up to the government to find out, and if a black market is not functioning, then it is a disgrace to break the price ceilings. Where is this lumber coming from which is available for a black market? It is produced by the legitimate industry of the country and it must be coming from there. If it is coming from there, then there is a squeeze to smash the price ceiling and get back to free enterprise.

Mr. HOWE: The department takes great interest in low-cost housing for people of small means.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When the people of Canada agreed to price controls with regard to building materials they were under the impression that the government itself would carry out a housing programme to provide houses at the lowest possible figure. In my particular section of the country, if I may be permitted a personal reference, Wartime Housing started operating in the city of Yorkton and in September, 1945, there was a contract for the construction of ninety houses, but after eighteen months there are still about twenty-five of these houses to be finished. The people are told that it is a matter of supplies of materials. During the winter there was a small fire in which the contractor lost some material. At any rate, these are not low-cost houses; because some six-roomed houses cost up to $5,000, and they are built without basements. After eighteen months there are still many houses not ready, and veterans in my constituency have been living in trailers all winter. Some people told me that one had to go to a contractor on the other side of politics. That is a rotten state of affairs. The people of Canada expected that government controls would provide houses, but we still find that there are those who cannot get houses, though materials are available for building hotels and similar structures. Hotels in the city of Montreal have been mentioned. That sort of building does not go down very well with people who cannot get homes. They are looking to the government for action, because it is the government's responsibility, and when the people do not get action they feel peeved about it, particularly when they find that contractors can get materials for building theatres and the other kind of buildings that are being put up. What does the government intend to do? Does it intend to tighten up, or is it going to throw the whole thing over the wall?

Mr. HOWE: How long has that contract been going? It sounds as if there should be a change of contractor.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The contracts were signed in September, 1945.

Mr. HOWE: For 125 houses?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No; ninety.

Mr. HOWE: And how many have been built?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They have moved into sixty-five now, I believe. That was the situation at Easter when I was at home. The rest are not yet occupied.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did the Saskatchewan government not build them instead of making boxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 1609 of 23 April, 1946, as amended:
"Section 6 is revoked."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the order in council carry?

Mr. MILLER: What about section 5 in the same order in council, with reference to delegation of powers? I think the minister should consider an amendment to that.

Mr. HOWE: We cannot consider an amendment to that.

Mr. MILLER: Will the government give a reason? I cannot see why the great powers given to the controller should be delegated without even designating to whom they are delegated.

Mr. HOWE: One man cannot give decisions from coast to coast. He must delegate power to outside officers. That has been necessary over a period of several years, and we could not operate without it for the rest of the time the order operates. The office would be meaningless if we did.

Mr. MILLER: Could not the minister at least limit the people to whom these powers may be delegated? Could they not be limited to responsible senior officers, instead of being made applicable to "any person or persons"?

Mr. ILSLEY: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments"—

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Portage la Prairie asked a question and he should receive an answer.

Mr. HOWE: We cannot operate without the power to delegate. That is self-evident. It does not require an elaborate debate at this stage of the evening. It has always been in the act. The power to regulate involves the power to delegate.

Mr. GREEN: May I point out that this is a very wide power.

Mr. HOWE: It is a power we have always had.

Mr. GREEN: It says that the priorities officer shall have power to delegate from time to time, to any person or persons, any power vested in the priorities officer under these regulations, including any power involving the exercise of a discretion, and any order made in the exercise by any such person of a power so delegated shall be final and binding unless and until it has been varied or vacated by the priorities officer. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie has asked if it would not be possible to restrict to senior officers the group of people to whom the power might be delegated. The way it is worded, the power could be delegated to any employee at all, and that is going much too far.

An hon. MEMBER: Even for a Tory.

Mr. HOWE: What officer would my hon. friend suggest? Would he want to select them?

Mr. GREEN: The minister has mentioned that there will have to be officers in different parts of the country. I can see the need for delegating powers to the man in charge in Vancouver or in Halifax. Why not say that? Why is it necessary to take power and delegate it to the newest clerk? The minister does not contend that a wide power of that sort is necessary.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend realizes that the controller has responsibility as well as authority, and he must exercise both. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite would attempt to lay down rules for the exercise of his responsibility.

Mr. GREEN: This is power of a sort that should not be put in any legislation passed in this house or in any other house in the British empire. We have no objection to having the order in council go through tonight, but I would ask that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the Minister of Justice over the week-end see if there cannot be some more definite description of the officers to whom that power is to be given.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that care is exercised by all concerned before power is delegated to any officer; we make sure the officer is capable of administering that power. That statement is supported by the fact that since 1941, when many of these powers came into existence, committees of this House of Commons have examined the work of these controllers, and they have never brought to light any misconduct on the part of anyone to whom power has been delegated.

Mr. MILLER: Some of the officers under these different boards, administering these controls in Winnipeg and other cities, have a great idea of power. I do not think some of them ever had any power before, and that is the type of people to whom I do not believe such power should be delegated. If that is the type to which it is going to continue to be delegated, then I shall not cease to object every time I possibly can rise in my place. When you delegate these powers to people who have never had responsible jobs before, they certainly exercise them. I do not consider it fair that the rights and almost the freedom of the people of this country should be dealt with in such loose fashion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can we get these amendments through, or shall we stop now? I thought I would try to have the technical amendments cleaned up tonight.

Mr. GREEN: There is no objection, if the order in council is not being carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 9439 of 19th December, 1944, as amended:

"Section 9(1) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

9(1) No member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting under the authority of the board shall be liable for any act or omission in the exercise or performance or purported exercise or performance, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, of any power, discretion, authority or duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations."

Mr. KNOWLES: This applies to P.C. 9439?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 9439 of 19 December, 1944, as amended:

"Section 9(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

9(2) No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, shall be instituted against any member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting under the authority of the board for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or otherwise heretofore conferred or imposed by the governor in council."

Mr. FULTON: Were not the words "in good faith and on reasonable grounds" to be inserted there?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not in this one. This follows the others exactly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 3 of 4th January, 1944, as amended:

"Section 7(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

7(2) No controller, deputy controller, deputy priorities officer or other person acting on behalf of or under the authority of a controller, deputy controller or deputy priorities officer shall be liable for any act or omission in the exercise or purported exercise, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, of any power or authority conferred by the governor in council or any order."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 3 of 4th January, 1944, as amended:

"Section 12(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

12(2) Where a controller believes that any person has failed to produce books, records or documents, or to give full and complete information as required by such controller under the authority of any regulation, he may, with the approval of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of a superior or a county court, which approval such judge is hereby empowered to give upon the ex parte application of the controller, authorize in writing under his hand a police officer, police constable or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, together with any other person named therein, to enter and search, if necessary by force, any building, receptacle or place, for books, records or documents which may contain information required by such controller, and to seize the same and carry them before such controller or such other person as such controller may direct, to be held at the discretion of such controller for such uses as he is authorized by any regulation to make."

Mr. GREEN: I would suggest that the minister let this stand. It is not like the other amendments and does not go as far as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie requested, in that it does not require that the books and other documents seized must be taken to the court. We would like to have further time to consider the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very well.

The CHAIRMAN: Amendment stands.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 245 of 23rd January, 1946, as amended:

"Section 7 is revoked."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The last amendment is:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 1997 of 21st March, 1944:
"Section 6 is revoked."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee prepared to carry the orders in council as amended?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall call the first one. Does order in council 1609 as amended carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried. Does order in council 9439 and order in council 7502—

Mr. FLEMING: I have just a question to ask.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could we not call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. FLEMING: I just want to give the minister notice so that he might bring before the committee a statement of the areas declared to be congested areas and the dates on which they were so declared.

Mr. HOWE: Very well.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. COCKERAM: I rise to a question of privilege. There is a gentleman in the official gallery of this house, I presume an official of the department whose affairs we have been discussing this evening, who has been acting in a manner which I do not think is becoming to anyone sitting in the official gallery. I merely want to draw this to your attention, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I have noted what the hon. gentleman has said, but I did not notice anything out of place myself, and it was not brought to my attention previously.

Mr. COCKERAM: When the hon. member for West York was speaking, this gentleman in the front row of the gallery was performing great antics and certainly was not observing the decorum that should be observed in the galleries of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: All I can say is that the hon. gentleman should have brought that fact to my attention at the time. However I have noted his remarks.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

Monday, April 28, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ORGANIZATION AND ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT POSITIONS ON STAFF

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to lay before the house a list showing the organization and establishment of the permanent positions on the staff of the House of Commons.

THE PRIME MINISTER

RETURN TO THE HOUSE AFTER ABSENCE THROUGH ILLNESS—ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I rise to speak on behalf of my associates; indeed, on this occasion I trust I speak for the whole house when I express to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a warm welcome upon his return. I am sure we are all pleased to see him looking so well, and we trust that he is as well as he looks. If either now or in the future he should require any further rest, I am sure also that it will be readily given by every section of the house. Judging from his appearance, I gather he does not need one. His ruddy complexion would indicate that the sunshine of Virginia has done him more good than the storms in the House of Commons have done the rest of us.

I am happy to be able to assure him that in his absence the house was most competently led by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). Sometimes he and his associates were right in their attitude toward the public questions which came before us; always, when they were right they had the support of those of us on this side of the house. But sometimes both he and his associates were wrong, and on those occasions we did our best to get them back on the right trail.

I am sure I speak for all hon. members when I say we are glad to see the Prime Minister back, and we trust his condition is such that he may carry on his duties here without any danger of further impairment of his health.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise not because the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) is not speaking in this matter for this group as well as for his own, but to add my expression of personal pleasure at seeing the Prime Minister back in his place, and to express the hope that he may long be spared to fill that position, or, if not, some other position in the house.

I would also associate myself with the leader of the opposition in his reference to the acting leader of the house during the Prime Minister's absence. I think I am not speaking too strongly when I say that during that time he has endeared himself to hon. members in all parts of the house.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we share the sentiments expressed by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). We are happy to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) back in his place.

During his absence I believe we did a pretty good job; the amount of business transacted was, I should think, quite satisfactory. Of course we are not hoping that the Prime Minister may have to go again soon, so that we can do more; but I am suggesting that we took his advice and carried on quite well in his absence. We hope his health will continue to be good, so that he may not be forced to go away again.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I thank most warmly my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and the hon. gentlemen who have spoken for other parties on the opposite side of the house and the members of their parties, for the kind welcome they have extended to me; and may I also extend to all my fellow members on this side of the house my warmest thanks also for the manner in which they received the words of hon. members opposite.

I need not say how delighted I am to be back in the House of Commons. My little trip to the south has done me a lot of good. I felt considerably in need of a rest before going away; but I have come back feeling greatly benefited by it, and I hope from now on in the proceedings of the house I shall be able to pull my full weight in the boat.

While the weather in the south was a bit inclement, I gather it was not quite as bad as it was here. However that is all more than compensated for by what hon. gentlemen opposite have been saying about the progress that has been made in the business of the house in the last few weeks.

May I join with those who have spoken of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in expressing to him my warmest thanks for the manner in which he has led the house during my absence and for the example which he has set to all its members, including myself.

I should like also to express a word of warm appreciation to the members of the press gallery and other friends who greeted me so cordially on my arrival back in the city on Saturday afternoon, and a word of very sincere appreciation of the many courtesies extended to me while I was in the United States, particularly by the government of the United States.

I am happy to be able to inform the house that the President, Mr. Truman, has definitely accepted the invitation of the Governor General and the government to visit our capital, probably in June, and that Mrs. Truman will also accompany him. The President expressed to me the hope and expectation that he and Mrs. Truman would be accompanied by their daughter. I gave to the President the assurance, which was unnecessary, that he and the members of his family would receive a very warm welcome from the citizens of Canada.

CHEESE

RECORD OF HASTINGS COUNTY, ONTARIO, IN 1946

Mr. G. H. STOKES (Hastings South): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention and that of hon. members of this house to a report recently issued by the Ontario department of agriculture to the effect that in 1946 the county of Hastings produced 8,148,821 pounds of cheese, which surpasses the record of any other county in the province of Ontario.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE

Mr. BRYCE:

1. What were the total premium receipts under the Civil Service Insurance Act for the 25 years ending December 31, 1946?
2. What were the total losses in the same period?
3. What amount of insurance was in force under this act on December 31, 1946?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. The total premium receipts under the Civil Service Insurance Act for the 25 years ending March 31, 1946, were $10,687,110.74.

2. The total losses (death claims paid) in the 25 years ending March 31, 1946, were $4,785,024.41.

3. The total amount of insurance in force under this act on March 31, 1946, was $30,691,755.32.

The above figures are given with respect to March 31, 1946, as all of the records regarding the operation of the act have been kept by fiscal years. No figures are available with respect to calendar years.

MARINE INSURANCE BROKERAGE—COMMODITY PRICES STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What broker holds the marine insurance on Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited?
2. When was this insurance placed through him?
3. What brokers previously held this insurance, and on what terms?
4. Why was it placed through the present broker, and on what terms?
5. What other insurance, if any, does such broker hold for other crown companies and government departments and government boards, and what premiums have been paid for such insurance?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Messrs. Dale and Co. Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.
2. March, 1942.
3. None.
4. Because they were a reputable firm in the business with excellent connections in the United Kingdom, United States and Canada, and could give the essential security required. By its very nature bulk purchasing requires that marine insurance should be concentrated under one open cover policy. The corporation's risk on any one steamer was very considerable at times and to assure insurance "lost or not lost" an open cover was essential. Furthermore, the single open cover policy assured that the corporation received the lowest rates with the broadest terms and the maximum security.

5. No information.

SUGAR STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. On what date was the Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited formed by the government?
2. For what purpose was this corporation formed?
3. Who are the directors and officers of this corporation?
4. Which of these was appointed by or through the civil service commission?
5. Which of these was not appointed by or through the civil service commission?
6. In each of these latter cases, why not?
7. What background and experience in the case of each director or officer justified his appointment?
8. At how much is the yearly cost of administration of this corporation estimated for (a) salaries, fees; (b) rent; (c) travelling expenses; (d) postage, telegraph and telephone; (e) office supplies; (f) publicity and advertising; (g) all other expenses not elsewhere provided for?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. By supplementary letters patent dated March 14, 1947, the name of Wartime Food Corporation Limited was changed to Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited and its corporate powers were changed to purchase or otherwise acquire, export, import, exchange, charge, sell or otherwise dispose of, distribute, store, transport, process and generally deal in sugar, sugar syrups, liquid sugar, molasses and other sugar products.

2. To perform certain of the functions of the sugar administrator under the regulations respecting sugar established by P.C. 3223 of October 21, 1939.

3. (a) Directors: T. A. Climo, D. Crowley, S. R. Noble, K. W. Taylor, W. T. Wilson.

(b) Officers: S. R. Noble, President; T. A. Climo, Vice-President; D. Crowley, Secretary-Treasurer.

4. None (see answer to question 6.)

5. All five (see answer to question 6.)

6. These men were already officials of the wartime prices and trade board and were designated by the Minister of Finance, under authority P.C. 328 of January 28, 1947, to act in this additional capacity.

7. S. R. Noble.—Mr. Noble was appointed sugar administrator of the wartime prices and trade board in October, 1939, and has remained in that capacity since that date. He therefore has acquired an extensive knowledge of the industry in all its phases throughout the whole dominion. He was previously assistant general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada. Mr. Noble serves both the wartime prices and trade board and the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited without remuneration.

Since February, 1946, Mr. Crowley has served as executive assistant to the sugar administrator and latterly as director of raw sugar.

K. W. Taylor.—Mr. Taylor, previously professor of economics at McMaster university, is chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, with which he has been associated since September 1939 as secretary, foods coordinator and deputy chairman prior to his present appointment as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. Mr. Taylor serves the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited without additional remuneration.

W. T. Wilson.—Mr. Wilson is deputy chairman and comptroller of the wartime prices and trade board and a vice-president and director of Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. He has had extensive experience in government accounting, administration and finance. Mr. Wilson serves the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited without additional remuneration.

JAPANESE CANADIANS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Do Japanese Canadians still require permits to travel in Canada?
2. If so, do such regulations apply to Japanese Canadian war veterans?
3. What purpose is served by the continuance of such regulations?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Permits are still required by persons of Japanese origin for movement or change of residence within British Columbia, or for movement into that province.

2. Japanese who served in the Canadian armed forces in world war I or II, and their dependents, do not require such permits except to enter or reside in the British Columbia coastal area.

3. These travel and residence restrictions are retained to facilitate the government's dispersal and reestablishment programme for persons of Japanese origin who were evacuated from the Pacific coastal area in 1942.

HOUSING—INSPECTION OF PREMISES

Mr. CHURCH:

Has any action been taken to turn over to the provinces or municipalities under the housing orders in council as amended the authority to inspect the premises dealt with under the orders in council and to investigate complaints as to undesirable tenants, or for a national system of inspection on these matters through municipal authorities?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, in so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned.

VOCATIONAL SCHOOLS ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS

Mr. PROBE:

1. What total sums of money have been allotted by the federal government by provinces for capital expenditures under the vocational schools assistance agreements, authorized by the terms of P.C. 1648 of March 8, 1945?

2. What sums were spent by provinces as federal grants under the terms of these agreements in each of the fiscal years 1945-46 and 1946-47?

3. Have representations been made that expenditures during the final year of the agreements be deferred until the building emergency for family housing has been met or become less acute? If so, from what provinces?

4. What action has the Minister of Labour taken or alternatively what action does he propose to take to meet the requests for deferment of capital expenditures under this agreement without loss of federal assistance?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Under the provisions of order in council P.C. 1648 of March 8, 1945, agreements were entered into by the dominion with all provinces for financial assistance by the dominion for vocational training at secondary school level, including provisions for a grant towards capital expenditures made by the provinces between April 1, 1945, and March 31, 1948, for buildings and equipment, equal in amount to that subscribed by the provinces, up to a maximum of $10,000,000.

2. Total amounts contributed by the dominion to the provinces pursuant to the agreements entered into under P.C. 1648 by years covering operational costs and capital expenditures are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 50,300 00	$ 45,000 06
Nova Scotia	32,324 71	28,024 37
New Brunswick	81,598 35	71,035 99

British Columbia	80,356 85	10,000 00

3. Representations have been made that the period for dominion contribution towards special capital expenditures should be extended beyond the present date of March 31, 1948, by British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Quebec and New Brunswick.

4. No action has been taken on such requests. The matters involved in the requests are matters of future government policy on which no decision has yet been made.

INTEREST ON OVERDUE TAXES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What rate of interest is being charged on overdue (a) excess profit tax; (b) personal income tax, for each of the years 1940 to 1945?

2. Is interest compounded? If so, at what intervals?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The following interest rates apply both to excess profits tax and personal income tax for the years 1940 to 1945.

Five per cent interest on (a) balance of tax estimated by the taxpayer from the due dates to the date of payment; (b) additional tax assessed from date of filing the return to date of payment.

Three per cent additional interest on (a) instalments in default from due dates to date of payment; (d) additional tax assessed remaining unpaid one month after issuance of the notice of assessment to date of payment.

Note: The 3 per cent additional interest on instalments in default does not apply to personal income tax or personal excess profits tax in 1942 and 1943, and to corporations in 1943.

Four per cent interest on (a) balance of tax estimated by the taxpayer from the due dates to the date of payment; (b) additional tax assessed from date of filing the return to date of payment.

Three per cent additional interest on tax unpaid one month after issuance of notice of assessment to date of payment.

Note: No interest is payable upon unpaid taxes for a period beginning twenty months after the date of filing a return and ending one month from the date of issuing the notice of assessment with respect to taxes of the year 1945.

2. Interest is not compounded.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PERSONNEL

Mr. DORION:

1. What are the names and the addresses of the following personnel of the wartime prices and trade board (a) chairman; (b) deputy chairman; (c) members of the board; (d) administrators of the board; (e) deputy administrators of the board; (f) coordinators of the board; (g) deputy coordinators of the board; (h) persons to whom the board has delegated some powers?

2. In what capacity are they acting?

Mr. DORION:

1. How many persons are employed in the wartime prices and trade board?

2. How many of such employees are of (a) Canadian; (b) British; (c) German; (d) French; (e) Russian; (f) American, origin?

Mr. MAYHEW: Mr. Speaker, I have discussed these questions with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and in view of the difficulty and cost and time involved in answering these questions he has agreed to drop them on the understanding that he will place a further question on the order paper which will give him the information required.

Questions dropped.

FLOODS AND STORMS IN GREAT BRITAIN—FOOD PARCELS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What aid, if any, has been given towards alleviating the food shortage and famine in Great Britain caused by recent floods and storms, and to the economic strain brought about by the recent war?

2. As large numbers of municipalities and private community organizations are sending parcels of food as well as provincial and municipal governments, could not these parcels be forwarded by the government free of charge for delivery there, and the sum total charged up to lend lease?

3. What is the rate charged per ton delivery for food parcels if based on average cost of pound parcel charges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. The need for special help from overseas to alleviate shortages caused by the recent floods and storms in the British isles, is a matter which the United Kingdom government will wish to consider itself. Up to the present time the Canadian government has no information which would indicate that the United Kingdom is contemplating any request for such help. For the purpose of alleviating economic strain brought about by the recent war, the Canadian government in 1946 extended a credit of one and one-quarter billion dollars to the United Kingdom. In addition, the long term contracts entered into by the United Kingdom and Canadian governments will do much to facilitate the import of foodstuffs into the United Kingdom.

2. The advisability of charging the cost of privately dispatched relief parcels against the Canadian dollar credit is a matter for the United Kingdom government itself to decide.

3. The postage charges on parcels to the United Kingdom are made up of three separate arrangements: (a) Charges for conveyance in Canada which are paid at so much per pound; (b) Charges of the shipping companies for conveyance at sea, which are paid on the basis of cubic space occupied; (c) Charges of the general post office in the United Kingdom, which are paid at so much per pound.

Parcel post shipments are not calculated on a bulk basis, and no comparison is possible.

JOHN GRIERSON

Mr. FULTON:

1. Has Mr. John Grierson asked the government, or any member or department thereof, for help in obtaining a visa to enter the United States?

2. Has any decision been made with regard to such request? If so, what was the decision?

3. Was Mr. Grierson's appointment as adviser to the director-general of UNESCO recommended by or on behalf of the Canadian government, or by or on behalf of any member, department or official thereof?

4. Was his appointment subsequently approved by or on behalf of the Canadian government, or by or on behalf of any member, department or official thereof?

5. Did the United States delegation in UNESCO make any representations against this appointment either before or after it was officially approved by UNESCO?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4. No.

5. No information is available.

IMMIGRATION—POLISH SOLDIERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the British government provide shipping space as well as fares for another batch of Polish soldiers for whom a team has already gone over?

2. Did any of these soldiers fight against Britain in the last war and where?

3. What branch of the Polish army did they belong to, and did any of them fight with Germany in the last war on the western or Italian front?

4. What check is there by Canada of these soldiers and what is the nature of the agreement with Britain to accept them, and to what number, and on what terms, and to what provinces will this contingent be assigned and for what work?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. Some of them were conscripted into the German army and fought on the Italian front and in north west Europe.

3. They belonged to those formations of the Polish army serving under British command. The question whether any of them fought with Germany on the western or Italian front is answered by Nos. 2 and 4.

4. Selection is made by a team of Canadian government officials composed of representatives of the Departments of Agriculture and Labour and the R.C.M.P.

The Canadian overseas medical immigration service provides the necessary doctors to carry out the medical examinations. Only those are accepted who are medically fit, took part in active hostilities against the axis powers and also qualify under the terms of the agreement with the United Kingdom. Those who participated voluntarily in hostilities on the side of the axis, or who have criminal records, are rejected.

The agreement with the United Kingdom provides that Canada will permit entry into this country of 4,000 Polish veterans who served with the allied forces engaged in hostilities against the axis powers, who are single and who are qualified for and willing to undertake agricultural employment in Canada. The United Kingdom has agreed that the Canadian government will make the selection of those who have applied and an undertaking will be signed by the successful applicant by which he agrees to accept farm labour at current wage rates and in accordance with living and working conditions prevailing in the locality of his employment, and will continue in agricultural employment for a period of two years. There is provision in the agreements for the return to the United Kingdom within two years of any individual who might be found to be unsuitable.

Further details are contained in the statement made to the house on this topic by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on July 25, 1946, and reported in Hansard pages 3836 and 3838 and in order in council P.C. 3112 of July 23, 1946, which was tabled at the same time.

[Mr. Church.]

The second contingent of approximately 1,124 Polish veterans has tentatively been assigned as follows: Maritime provinces, 50; Quebec, 100; Ontario, 374; Manitoba, 200; Saskatchewan, 100; Alberta, 300.

IMMIGRATION—DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. WINKLER:

Is consideration being given by the government to cases where entire families are desirous of migrating to Canada, and where due to war injury one member of the family is not physically fit to qualify for admission to Canada and to make provisions that when guarantees or bonds are furnished in Canada that such disabled person will never become a public charge, then such disabled person may proceed to Canada with other members of his family?

Mr. GLEN: Cases as described are dealt with in accordance with provisions of the Immigration Act. Section 3 thereof provides as follows:

3. No immigrant, passenger, or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to enter or land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein who belongs to any of the following classes, hereinafter called "prohibited classes":—

(c) Immigrants who are dumb, blind, or otherwise physically defective, unless in the opinion of a Board of Inquiry or officer acting as such they have sufficient money, or have such profession, occupation, trade, employment or other legitimate mode of earning a living that they are not liable to become a public charge or unless they belong to a family accompanying them or already in Canada and which gives security satisfactory to the minister against such immigrants becoming a public charge.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—ASSISTANCE TO LOW-RENTAL HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Since the National Housing Act was passed in 1944 have any requests been made by municipalities for assistance with low-rental housing projects by (a) legislation to provide loans directly to municipal housing authorities; (b) legislation to provide rent-reduction subsidies to such authorities; (c) legislation or regulation to provide loans to local, non-profit housing corporations; (d) legislation or regulation to provide rent-reduction funds to local, non-profit housing corporations?

2. If so, by what municipalities?

3. What arrangements, if any, arising out of such requests, have been made to enable the carrying on of low-rental housing projects within such municipalities?

Mr. McILRAITH: The answer to this question in its present form would disclose no information, but there is some information relating generally to the subject and I have arranged for this to be made available to the hon. member, who may be agreeable to dropping the question on that understanding.

Question dropped.

BRANDON MILITARY HOSPITAL—CARE OF TUBERCULAR INDIANS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I wish to supplement a reply that I made to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) in reply to a question which he asked me on Friday last and which I did not fully answer. He asked as to the transfer of the Brandon military hospital to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Since last Wednesday one of our investigators has been sent out to Brandon to investigate the cause and the nature of the damage resulting from the fire in that hospital a short time ago. A special investigator is now in western Canada and has been instructed to look into this matter and submit a report on what repairs or alterations are necessary. It is understood that the fire was confined to the administration wing. It is presumed that the administration work can be carried out in another wing of the building without rebuilding and with only a relatively small reduction in the future bed capacity of the hospital.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NORTHERN WEATHER STATIONS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of agreements between United States and Canada relating to the establishment of far northern weather stations in Canadian territory.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I communicated with the hon. member this morning and informed him that following a cabinet decision to establish a number of weather stations in the Arctic, which was communicated to the United States authorities on February 13, a joint meeting of officials of the two countries was held in Ottawa at the end of February to work out detailed arrangements for the weather station programme. It is expected that these detailed arrangements will shortly be embodied in an exchange of notes between the two governments. As soon as the exchange of notes has been completed, copies will be tabled in the house in the usual way. The Arctic weather station programme was the subject of a statement in the house by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) on March 4. Pending the time when I can table the exchange of notes it is my understanding with the hon. member that this motion might be dropped.

Motion dropped.

IMMIGRATION—ARTHUR MOEN

Mrs. STRUM:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the government, dated since January 1, 1944, with reference to the case of Mr. Arthur Moen and his application to emigrate to this country.

UNITED FARMERS OF CANADA, SASKATCHEWAN SECTION—NON-DELIVERY STRIKE

Mr. ARGUE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any department or officer thereof and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, from August 15, 1946, to March 31, 1947, regarding those demands of the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, as set forth at the time of the non-delivery strike and negotiations resulting therefrom.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INCREASES IN AMOUNTS AND INCOME ALLOWABLE MODIFICATION OF ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Old Age Pensions Act which will enlarge the scope of the act by providing increases in the pension payable and the income allowable to pensioners and by modifying certain of the eligibility requirements for pension.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF DEPUTY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue based on a report appearing in various sections of Saturday's press to the effect that the deputy revenue minister and income tax commissioner, Mr. Frank H. Brown, has tendered his resignation. I have spoken to the minister with respect to this question and he intimated to me that it was a matter on which he did not have undivided jurisdiction. However, I think the question is so worded that he can answer it. Is this report true, and if so, is there any basis for the further report that the department is many years behind in its work?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the resignation of Mr. Brown is one which would come before the Prime Minister. Mr. Brown has intimated that for reasons of health he might not be able to continue in his present position. As a matter of fact when he accepted the position on the first of December he intimated then that he would have to consult his physicians to see whether or not he should continue.

With reference to the second part of the question, the further report that the department is many years behind in its work, that is not so. There have been great inroads made within the last few months in catching up with back assessments. The work of the department has very greatly increased. In one office alone, the office at Toronto, in the fiscal year 1946-47 there were 100,000 more returns than in the fiscal year 1945-46. During the past four months there have been more than 850,000 individual assessments made. Therefore inroads are being made on the backlog of work which accumulated. During the war years there was an enormous increase in the amount of work which had to be done in the department. We were short staffed. A lot of our actuaries, assessors and the like went into private business. That condition is being remedied and throughout the country efforts are being made successfully to catch up with the backlog of work.

Mr. LOCKHART: They are behind, then.

Mr. McCANN: Certainly they are.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF PRICES SUPPORT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, notice of which was sent to him this morning. Has the government given consideration to the joint request made by the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, and the Alberta Farmers Union, dated April 10, in which they urge the extension of the Agricultural Prices Support Act? If so, what action is contemplated?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The two organizations referred to asked the government to bring the act in for amendment this session. It has been stated to them that it was not the intention of the government to bring the act before the house this session.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF CAMPAIGN LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct to the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question which is prompted by my great personal admiration and friendship for the leader of the opposition, together with the fact that I have his picture on a matchbox. Is the minister aware that the young women's Progressive Conservative association, in the course of visiting patients at the veterans pavilion, Ottawa, has been distributing campaign literature in the form of match boxes bearing the portrait of the leader of the opposition?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I had not heard of this matter until a few minutes ago. It seemed to me to be a harmless and ingenious method of public propaganda and campaigning. I think it is a matter of good taste. Veterans in the hospitals themselves will be the best judges of that. As usual we shall out-match them and out-box them.

COUNT ALFRED de MARIGNY

QUESTION AS TO DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. It has to do with Count Alfred de Marigny, formerly of the Bahama islands, who has been resident in Canada for some time. Is he about to be deported? If so, what are the reasons for that decision?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member spoke to me before I came into the house regarding this matter. This man came to Canada's shores some time ago—I have not the date, and I had no opportunity of looking at the file. He came as a seaman or second officer on board ship, landed in Canada, and said that he was here for the purpose of reshipping, which he did not do. After some time he made application for permanent landing in Canada. His case was heard and refused. He appealed to me and I again refused, because he is not admissible under the regulations. He has been in Canada for some time. The reason he has not been deported is simply that we have not been able to get transportation which would take him to the country of his origin.

SUPPLY

INCOME TAX—SUGGESTED INCREASE OF EXEMPTIONS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into supply.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have a few words to say before the house resolves itself into committee of supply. The government is asking the house to vote supply of funds. In accordance with established British custom, I rise to voice a grievance, to make a request for redress, and later perhaps to offer an alternative. My grievance is that the income tax in my riding of Lethbridge and throughout the other 243 ridings of Canada is an irksome and injurious burden. A tax on all income between $660 and $3,000 is destroying the incentive of Canadian youth to acquire additional education, to marry and make homes and to have babies urgently needed in Canada. It is destroying incentive to be loyal and stable citizens devoted to Canadian democracy, and confident in Canada's future.

Income taxes are destroying the incentive of all Canadian producers to produce both goods and services. Income taxes are impairing both incentive and ability of Canadian consumers to consume both goods and services. Furthermore income taxes, by decreas-ing purchasing power just exactly where purchasing power should be increased, are greasing the skids and preparing for a headlong plunge of the Canadian economy down the ways into the gloomy seas of depression.

The redress I request is that in his forthcoming budget the Minister of Finance exempt from income tax for single people all incomes of $1,500 and under; for married people all incomes of $3,000 a year and under.

The last speech I delivered in the house was on old age pensions. In that speech I requested that $50 a month be given to people sixty-five years of age and over with no means test, with free hospitalization, medical and dental services. I can conceive that the Minister of Finance may say: Where is the money coming from? How, he will say, can the hon. member claim to be consistent when he makes speeches of this kind so close together?

May I repeat what the people of Canada and this house must learn, that our ability to produce goods and to provide services determines our ability to pay old age pensions or to do anything else we choose to do. Our ability to have money ought to depend on our productive capacity as to goods and services. During the war it was commonly said and generally accepted in government circles that Canada's performance in the war would depend entirely upon her resources, human and material. The same thing should be true in time of peace. Our ability to perform should depend on our ability to produce goods and services.

I suggest to the minister that he should begin to consider an alternative to the financial methods which he is using which are doing so much damage to the Canadian people. I suggest that the minister so change the financial system of Canada as to enable that financial system to render financially possible for Canadians, that level of living standards which Canada's resources, human and material, make physically possible. Such a change can be discovered, Mr. Speaker. It can be made by the government of the day. Such a change ought to be made forthwith before serious deterioration, threatening us at the present time in Canada, sets in in real earnest. Such a change must be made if Canadians are to avoid disasters in the near future.

I have no need to draw hon. members' attention to the rapid development of communism in this country. I have no need to point out how restless labouring people are becoming, considering the dangerous rise in prices. I have no need to hint at disruptive disorders which might follow. We might have far worse than all of these unless something is done, and done soon.

The change, if efficacious, must go far deeper than any possible expansion of Canada's foreign trade policy. It must go far deeper than any modification or combination of modifications of heretofore accepted principles of trade, either external or internal, or both together.

How it has come about that the peoples of the Anglo-Saxon world have become so much obsessed with the idea that the only thing they can do to increase their prosperity is to trade more is something which it is beyond my ability to understand. Take the United States for example, consisting of forty-eight states. In effect they are forty-eight nations. Now, if trade could solve their problems they could trade among themselves and solve those problems. But they do not find themselves able to do so. That fact ought to be sufficient to warn all hon. members that the mere expansion of trade will not provide the remedy we must have for the economic ills that beset us.

The change which is necessary in our system must be widely different from any kind or degree of governmental or social ownership of the means of production such as our socialistically inclined friends seem to be enamoured of. The change must comprise a fundamental change in technique in our financial system.

I suggest to the minister that he earnestly study "Economic Tribulation" by Vincent C. Vickers, published in 1941, and printed by Stephen Austin and Sons Limited in Hertford, England. So that all those who are interested may realize that there are men not such crackpots as social crediters are supposed to be—that there are really men of affairs who have achieved a standing who are confident that something can be done with the financial system, may I quote from this book. Vickers, in his foreword, at page 1, has this to say:

> Ever since that day in 1926 when, not in arrogance but with humility, I felt it my duty to explain to the governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Montagu Norman, that "henceforth I was going to fight him and the gold standard and the Bank of England policy until I die"—(and well I remember the words of his reply!)—I have been an ardent money reformer. Some few years afterwards I resigned my long directorship of Vickers Limited; since when I have spent much time and money in advocating the necessity for a reform of the monetary system.

Further on in the foreword he says:

> I bear no ill-feeling towards my own class or any other class. I seek neither notoriety nor kudos. If someone can change my convictions I shall be only too ready to alter them. But in fifteen years nothing whatever has occurred to make me alter my views. I still believe that the existing system is actively harmful to the state, creates poverty and unemployment, and is the root cause of war. This personal confession is merely to demonstrate that I have seen both sides of the picture. My opinions are based upon my own experience and knowledge. I am today in the unique position of being absolutely and entirely devoid of animosity and wholly disinterested. I feel myself no longer under any restrictions whatsoever, except to guard against doing harm to my country or giving offence to anyone.

May I say a word or two regarding this man. Here is a man who had been a director of the Bank of England, who had been high in the directorate of Vickers, a great industrial organization. Here is a man who certainly ought not to be disregarded when he speaks so learnedly and so earnestly concerning a matter of such vital importance.

I will not detain the house longer except to read two or three statements which Vincent Vickers makes in the concluding chapter of his book, at page 74, in the chapter headed "The Direction of Future Policy". In recommendation No. 1 he advocates:

State control and state issue of currency and credit through a central organization managed and controlled by the state.

I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), the former minister of finance, in his place. I think the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would be well advised to read that book and to avoid thinking all the things that the present Minister of Justice has said about inflation resulting from debt-free money created by the state. Here in Mr. Vickers is a man of high orthodox authority who solemnly advocates debt free money. I will not read all his recommendations because I wish to save the time of the house. Recommendation No. 4, however, reads:

Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state; so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence.

Whereby, of course, anyone can see that this man advocates what social crediters have advocated these many years, namely, debt-free money:

5. The fluctuating quantity of gold lying in the vaults of the banking system should never be permitted to govern the volume of credit and currency needed by the country.

6. The elimination of slumps and booms; and more direct procedure for eliminating unnecessary poverty.

7. The abolition of the debt system where all credit is created by banks and hired out at interest to the country.

May I now revert for a time to the question of income tax? To show how widespread is the anxiety about income tax, and the demand for the reduction of it, may I refer to certain evidences which have appeared in Canada during the last two or three months? I turn to an article appearing in Saturday Night, the issue of March 8, 1947, under the title "Taxing the Wrong Thing". I quote:

It is beginning to be realized that the heavy taxation of income has the effect of destroying a great deal of the incentive to produce goods and services, and that, in the world's present situation, that incentive needs to be left as effective as possible, because we certainly need all the goods and services which are currently being turned out, and a lot more.

Further down, under the heading "Killing Incentive", this passage appears:

It is production rather than consumptive demand that needs stimulating; and production is certainly not stimulated by a tax system which begins whittling away at the incentive to produce as soon as the annual income has reached $660, and reduces it practically to zero long before that income has become really substantial. For the incentive to produce is simply the income which actually comes into the control of the producer as a reward of his efforts. Money taken from the producer by the government has no incentive value; even if it is paid back to him by that government in welfare expenditures it is still no incentive, for he gets the benefit of those welfare expenditures, whether he produces or not.

I think I am safe in assuming that this organ speaks more or less for business, for what we might call capitalism.

Now may I turn to a periodical representing labour. I refer to the Canadian Unionist of April, 1947. Everyone in the house will recognize this paper as having a moderate, scientific and realistic approach to all matters of public concern. On page 76, column 2, I find an article entitled "Income Tax is Too High". I will not read the whole article; I merely direct the attention of those interested to the beginning of paragraph 2 in which these words appear:

In its recent memorandum to the government, the congress called for a reduction of income taxes in order to provide exemptions for single persons earning $1,500 per year or less, and married persons earning $2,000 per year or less. Such an amendment is highly desirable because the income tax bears with a special severity upon workers with comparatively low incomes.

I think that is sufficient to represent labour. Much more could be referred to but I have no desire to use an undue amount of time.

And now I wish to refer to periodicals representing agriculture in Canada. Having done so I shall have cited expressions of opinion of the three main divisions of Canada's economy. In a periodical entitled "U.F.C. Information," of January 1947, I find an account of resolutions passed by the forty-sixth central convention of the United Farmers of Canada. On page 5 we read the following resolution:

Whereas the present income tax exemption on single and married persons respectively is inadequate for a decent standard of living,

Therefore be it resolved that this convention demand that the income tax exemption be raised to $1,500 and $3,000 for single and married persons respectively, and

Furthermore be it resolved that the first $800 the farmer derives from the production of livestock and poultry be also exempt and the taxable income be spread over a five year period.

There is little doubt about the attitude of the people who passed that resolution. I turn now to page 11, where we have the minutes of district 4 convention, another group of farmers. At the bottom of the page I read as follows:

That this convention go on record as favouring an amendment to the Income Tax Act to allow for exemption of $1,500 for single status and $3,000 for married status.

I turn now to page 12 of the February 1947 issue and read the following statement at the close of an article called "Excerpts from a Farm Survey":

Another feature that was brought to our attention in answer to our question as to why they had changed to grain farming from mixed farming, was, "Why should I work my head off raising cattle and feeding hogs and pay the greater part of the earnings in income tax?"

I think those are enough quotations and references to show clearly that my remarks about income tax are, in a broad way, representative of the people of Canada.

In closing I urge upon the minister that he forthwith bring in such modifications of the income tax regulations as will exempt all incomes of single persons of $1,500 and under and all incomes of married people of $3,000 and under.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT—RECOMMENDATIONS FOR AMENDMENT

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): There is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the house and through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. While this act has brought great benefits to the western provinces, I feel that it should now be submitted to a committee of the house with a view to having brought to the attention of the house certain recommendations for amendment of it. Members receive more correspondence on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act than on any other subject; and that can be understood when a short resume of the statistics is placed before the house.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been in effect since 1939. Considerable areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta have been in receipt of payments under this act in seven out of the eight years during which it has been in effect. Recently a return was brought down in the house, sessional paper No. 7B of March 14, 1947, in answer to certain questions which I placed on the order paper. The questions asked were:

1. What is the number of full townships in each of the prairie provinces which have received prairie farm assistance payments the following number of times: (a) 7; (b) 6; (c) 5; (d) 4; (e) 3; (f) 2; (g) 1?

2. What was the total sum of payments received by each individual township and what was the total number of individual farmer payments in 1 (a)?

3. What was the total acreage of cultivated land in 1946 on the farm which received prairie farm assistance in 1 (a)?

The answers to these questions, which show the extent to which drought has affected crop conditions in the prairier provinces, are as follows:

	Number of Townships
Years	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
(a) 7	Nil	34	48
(b) 6	Nil	173	223
(c) 5	3	478	368
(d) 4	4	910	469
(e) 3	17	1,469	619
(f) 2	87	2,028	838
(g) 1	283	2,618	1,239

For the townships which have received payments of prairie farm assistance for seven years, the number of farmers paid during that period in Saskatchewan was 4,260, and the total amount paid to them was $1,031,170.24. Those statistics indicate the extent to which drought has affected large areas, not for one year but over a period of years, and the extent to which this act has been beneficial.

The act originally was passed in 1939 and there were amendments in 1940, chapter 38; in 1941, chapter 24; and in 1942, chapter 5. It was to be expected that in the operation of the act difficulties and anomalies would arise. In any event they are revealed only as a result of experience. The general objections which are raised to the act as it is at present constituted are as follows—and I suggest that these objections be placed before a committee representative of the western farmers, to the end that the act may be amended in accordance with the results of its operation.

First, it is contended that payment should be on the basis of the individual farmer. Whether or not that be so, I think there should be some change so that at least a portion of a township, even though not contiguous to another township, might come within the terms of the act.

Second, the act should be broadened so as to include some payment for hail damage, on an individual basis. The minister in his reply may say that insurance can be had against that risk.

Mr. GARDINER: They pay on hail now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that it operates, in part, under the act as it is being administered.

Mr. GARDINER: It operates on all townships once the act is declared.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. The point I make is that so far as hail is concerned it should be applicable on an individual basis. The objection ordinarily raised to placing the whole act on an individual basis certainly does not apply to hail damage. If all payments were placed upon an individual basis, the argument might be advanced that a premium was being placed upon indifferent farming, or farming on submarginal lands. That argument is not applicable so far as hail damage is concerned.

The third point is that present payments are insufficient. They are beneficial so far as they go. They could not be expected to go as far as a system of crop insurance. But the general feeling expressed by farmers in western Canada is that, if the act were revamped and certain changes made, they would have no objection to an increase in the amount now deducted from their production.

The next objection is that the act discriminates against larger farmers. While I realize that a certain unit must be established, nevertheless I feel that the maximum amount payable should be increased, and that that maximum should be fixed at least at the sum of $1,000.

There is considerable criticism of the regulation which provides that an applicant, to be entitled under the act, is required to live on his land, or at least to devote himself solely to agriculture. Numbers of farmers over the years have paid the one per cent deduction compulsorily, yet from year to year they have been denied any return, irrespective of whether or not they have suffered drought damage. Some change should be made in the act whereby a man who operates his business in conjunction with another business should not be denied payment under the act.

I shall now refer specifically to two cases, although the four or five points to which I have directed attention are discussed generally by farmers throughout the west. I wish to bring to the attention of the house two examples in support of my argument that a change in the act is necessary.

One has to do with the rural municipality of Dufferin, in Saskatchewan. Year by year a portion of that municipality, by reason of a valley which runs alongside of it, must suffer continuing drought; yet because it is not contiguous to a municipality declared eligible under the act, the farmers there resident are denied any consideration. From year to year contributions are made; from year to year the contributors are denied any return. While I am familiar with the difficulty of changing the act in order to meet individual cases, only a small amendment will be necessary to bring this and a number of similar cases within the provisions. After all, the purpose of the act is to ensure that a farmer shall not be denied some return from a crop which he had expected but which was destroyed by drought or some other climatic condition.

I should like to refer to another case in support of my argument that the act should be amended so as to provide for the inclusion of a portion of a township, if the individual basis already suggested be not accepted. This has to do with the rural municipality of Craik, but one of many. Here certain farmers in an area not contiguous to a township eligible under the act, find themselves denied any payment. The suggestion comes from the council of the municipality, and states that the farmers generally would favour the necessity of providing for the placing of townships, if necessary, within the system. It states:

> At present the provisions are too rigid to do other than make for great unfairness in practically all partial township considerations.

And then the secretary treasurer of this municipality says:

> It is an absolute miscarriage of the basic underlying principle of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act if they in great need, do not get the bonus when their neighbours immediately south do get same because their area extends two miles further east to the boundary of the township.

The general attitude of rural municipal officials throughout western Canada is summed up in this letter, a copy of which I understand was sent to the minister, and which states:

> In whole the act needs a spring-cleaning and the human equation, which is the equation aimed to be aided, given consideration instead of the present equation of townships and blocks being the factor in main consideration to the detriment of many human beings—

—who should be qualified.

I am suggesting the minister should give consideration to changing the act. Hon. members representing constituencies from the three western provinces have all had experience with its operation, and would all be in a position to make suggestions to the government. In order to cover situations such as I have mentioned, which cause an injustice and certainly develop a feeling of resentment on the part of those who are disqualified because of the rigidity of the act as it now stands, the act should be amended. I am asking the minister if he will give hon. members an opportunity to place before the committee on agriculture the changes which they believe to be necessary. I understand of course that the adoption of those recommendations would remain a matter of government policy, but I think an opportunity should be given hon. members to express their views and to place before the government the picture of conditions prevailing under the act. I believe their recommendations would be beneficial not only to the government but to the country as a whole.

IMMIGRATION—DISPLACED PERSONS AND REFUGEES—DOMESTIC AND OTHER WORKERS

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. What he has advocated today is substantially the same as my colleagues from Saskatchewan and I urged last year in the discussion on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Perhaps I will be pardoned if I now leave that subject in order to bring to the attention of the house and the country a matter which seems to me to be one of urgency and of considerable public interest and concern. I refer to the question of immigration. From time to time we have had debates in this house referring in part to immigration. We have had several statements from the government side on various phases of immigration, but I do not think it would be overdrawing it to say that there is a great deal of confusion and bewilderment in the minds of the people as to the exact policy of the government on immigration.

The particular phase of immigration which I want to emphasize today is not the general or long-term policy, which I understand is still in the making, but the immediate and urgent question of what is to be done so far as we in Canada are concerned about the displaced persons and refugees now in Europe. This question is not new in the house, and unfortunately it is not new in Europe. The matter is becoming more urgent every hour.

The action we have had in the past has been, to say the least, disappointing to the public mind. On August 13, 1946, a committee of the senate which was dealing with immigration and labour presented its report, and I should like to quote from page 311, as follows:

> Immigrants who come to Canada on the responsibility of relatives or friends already here enjoy a real advantage over those who arrive as complete strangers. The right to bring relatives and friends here is a privilege which our government may well extend to Canadian citizens.

Then further down reference is made to order in council 2071 passed on May 28, 1946, as follows:

> The order in council has meant nothing to date, for practically no immigrants are being admitted, whether relatives or otherwise, nor are any steps being taken with a view to future admission.

That was August 13, 1946, and we are now well into 1947. That last statement seems to be substantially true today. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) has stated in this house on several occasions that the regulations dealing with the admissible classes of prospective immigrants are being widened and relaxed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to item 5 on the order paper which reads:

> Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Mines and Resources for the second reading of Bill No. 10, an act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

I do not think the hon. member should take advantage of this opportunity to debate a matter which will come before the house when item No. 5 is called.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker, if I may refer to what you have just said, I have Bill 10 before me, and it deals only with two phases of immigration, the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act and the entry of service men's dependents into Canada, neither of which matters am I referring to today. Your Honour may recall that when Bill 10 was being discussed in a previous debate and some hon. members attempted to deal with the matter with which I am now dealing, they were prevented from doing so. The ruling was that the bill did not deal with the matter I am now discussing. I think the Minister of Mines and Resources was one of those who advised that under the bill to which I have referred the matter I am now discussing could not be discussed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon member knows that on the motion to go into supply hon. members have an opportunity to discuss matters which could not be discussed otherwise because they are not before the house. As I have just stated, we have on the order paper an item dealing with Bill 10, and when that bill is being discussed the hon. member will have an opportunity to make submissions to the minister or to the government on the immigration policy. I do not think he should take this opportunity to discuss what he will be able to discuss when that item is called.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I draw to your attention, sir, the fact that earlier today the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) discussed the matter of income tax. This is a matter which will come definitely before the house tomorrow night when the budget is introduced, and it will be before the house for a considerable time thereafter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not there yet.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my opinion if there was any question which should have been ruled out of order it was that one. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) introduced a matter which I think will come definitely before the house when the estimates are being dealt with. Those questions were no more closely associated with anything now before the house than is the matter referred to by the hon. member for Dauphin. I submit to you that the matter he is referring to would not come before the house under Bill 10, or under any other measure that is now before parliament or that we know is to be before parliament.

Mr. GLEN: I think the argument advanced by the hon. member for Dauphin is sound. The bill now before the house deals only with two items, that of dependents and wives who are still overseas and the Chinese Immigration Act. So far as I have heard the hon. member's remarks, he is dealing now with displaced persons in Europe, which would not be a subject to be discussed under that bill. I submit that the hon. gentleman is entitled to speak on the matter to which he refers.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was about to say that the action taken so far in connection with bringing into Canada relatives and friends of those already resident in Canada has been disappointing, and that the lack of action which was indicated in August, 1946, seems to continue. A delegation interviewed the government on February 7 of this year, and in order to indicate that there was a lack of action in connection with this particular phase of immigration I should like to quote from a pamphlet entitled "The Refugee" which reports the visit of this delegation. One of the things mentioned in their brief was this:

> The plight of at least 800,000 refugees, displaced persons and orphans is so desperate that quick action is necessary if any considerable numbers are to obtain a haven of refuge in Canada. So we respectfully plead for immediate action on our request.

I am not attempting to go into all the ramifications of the government policy; I simply am trying to urge upon the government that the time has come when something substantial will have to be done about this question of refugees and displaced persons. I should like to point out that the delegation to which I have just referred represented a large number of people. For example, the following organizations were represented:

> Ukrainian Canadian committee.
> Ukrainian Canadian veterans association.
> Canadians citizens of Polish origin.
> Mennonite board of colonization.
> Lutheran world relief.
> Committee for the relief of democratic refugees.
> Monsignor Basil Markle, representing Most Reverend P. J. Monahan in the name of the Catholic bishops of the prairie provinces, and Catholic immigration aid society.

Those organizations represent hundreds of thousands of people in Canada. All they were asking the government to do was to take action as quickly as possible in permitting persons for whom applications had already been made, or were being made, to enter this country at the earliest opportunity.

We were disturbed to find that recently the government has been following a new sort of immigration line in allowing certain industries to bring in workers under contract as cheap labour. I hope that is not the type of policy that is to be followed as an alternative to bringing into Canada the relatives and friends of persons resident here. The senate committee definitely recommended in favour of the policy of giving priority to persons who would be received here by friends and relatives and be given a start in the Canadian way of life in preference to the bringing in of cheap labour.

When I speak of displaced persons or refugees I want to make myself clear so that there will be no misunderstanding of what I mean. I shall quote from the constitution of the International Refugee Organization the definition of a displaced person and the conditions under which such persons should be given refuge in other countries. In this same booklet from which I have been quoting refugees are described as persons who objected to returning to their former countries of residence because of—

,(i) persecution, or fear, based on reasonable grounds or persecution because of race, religion, nationality or political opinions, provided these opinions are not in conflict with the principles of the united nations, as laid down in the preamble of the charter of the united nations . . .

In other words, persons who find themselves in displaced persons camps in Europe for one reason or another and who have no criminal record or anything which would disqualify them from becoming good and respectable citizens. I believe that the majority of the members of this house would agree that such people would make desirable citizens for Canada.

What is to be the policy of the government? We have heard on several occasions from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) of one type of immigration policy. For example on April 25, on Friday last, he was referring to the bringing into Canada of labour for the sugar beet farms and for a textile mill in Quebec. I quote from Hansard:

Mr. Mitchell: If I can say this to my hon. friend—

He was interrupted and then he went on:

Mr. Mitchell: —just a minute now; we have had speeches on both sides of the house advocating immigration, and as soon as we set the policy in motion, you understand, there is a slight reservation on the part of some hon. gentlemen.

What intrigued me was his remark "as soon as we set the policy in motion." To what policy was he referring? If the government has already decided on a policy it is something the members of the house do not know about, because the house has not yet been taken into the confidence of the government and told what its immigration policy is.

We also had the experience of reading in the press that the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt) who was then a candidate in the by-election, had announced the government's immigration policy in the course of that by-election. That announcement was later denied by the minister responsible for immigration. All these different announcements and denials and different steps being taken have created a feeling of confusion and bewilderment in the minds of the people, who are hoping for quick action in connection with their applications for the admission of relatives and friends.

May I add this for the benefit of the minister of immigration, that even if there is not transportation available for those persons on whose behalf application has already been made for their admission to Canada, I feel that the government should take steps to issue visas to those who are within the admissible classes and who would make desirable citizens, so that they will have something tangible to show that they are to be given an opportunity eventually to come to this country. The worst feature of the whole situation in Europe is that these persons who have been in displaced persons camps some for two years, and some for much longer, are deteriorating in morale—I do not think that is too strong a statement—because they do not know what is going to happen to them. They cannot say for certain that they will be allowed to come to Canada or to one of the other western democracies, and they do not know that they will not be forced to return to their country of origin or what will happen to them. Every day that we procrastinate and delay, their morale and their usefulness further decreases, and they will make that much less desirable citizens for Canada. The government might well consider the issuing of visas in advance to persons in these displaced persons camps who are found to be in the admissible classes, so that they will have something to live for, some ray of hope that at some future day when transportation is available they can come to Canada.

I want to refer to a recommendation made by the delegation which interviewed the government on February 7 in connection with the regulations governing "relatives". Under the regulations the term "relatives" is very restricted in its meaning. The delegation recommended that a change be made in P.C. 2071 and P.C. 371/47, to include all the immediate relatives of any persons legally admitted and resident in Canada who are in a position to receive and care for such relatives. By immediate relatives they mean "up to and including first cousins and their children".

I would also refer to a meeting held in Toronto earlier this year at which the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) and I were present at which fifteen hundred people passed a resolution dealing with this same question, advocating the widening of the regulations to include all immediate relatives rather than just some restricted classes. There is a good reason for that, because often it is found that if the present regulations were to be followed strictly there would have to be a division of families. In some cases the father might be allowed in to the country but other members of his family might be barred. This works a hardship and an injustice on people who have already suffered more than their share of hardship and injustice.

I hope that the minister will find it possible to announce to the house today the specific things which the government has in mind in connection with admitting displaced persons and refugees say within the next six months. We have been told again and again that transportation is not available and other things are not as they should be. That is possibly quite true. But if we look at it from the point of view of humanity and realize that we are not dealing with a cargo of dry goods which can stand waiting on the European shore for the next three or four years, we shall realize that our immigration policy is a question of real urgency. Surely transportation and shipping can be made available if this country desires that it should be made available at this time.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Before the house resolves itself into committee of supply, I wish to complain about the great scarcity of ships for bringing people out from the old country. I have been in touch with some of the shipping companies and have been told that shipping is practically sold out for the next year, with the result, as the hon. member said a moment ago, very little can be done about securing shipping.

I object to the government bringing out Polish soldiers. As was said in the British House of Commons, they were not all conscripted; most of them were volunteers. They were told that if they enlisted on the side of Germany they would have food and clothing and might not have to fight. They obtained better conditions than if they had stayed at home and done their duty as good citizens of a great Polish country. I object inasmuch as the British government is paying the fares of these people to bring them out. As was announced in the house last week, a team from this country has gone over there to prepare the way for these people to come to Canada. We were not told what parts of this country they were to come to. At the same time we find that it is difficult for citizens of the old country to get to Canada because there is no shipping space.

I object to the government bringing out these people because in Italy they were fighting against the British forces and against our own forces. That was shown in the British House of Commons. Shipping space can be found for these people, but for the British, who bore the heat and burden of the day during the war, no shipping space can be found.

I have had a lot of correspondence with one shipping company which has ships on the seven seas, and they tell me that shipping space has been sold out for almost a year. There will not be anything available until the fall and there may not be anything then. Charity should begin at home. We should think of these people, our own kith and kin, who protected our shores against invasion during the difficult days of the war.

I was surprised at the reply which has been given us here by the government regarding these Polish soldiers and others, because the real facts are set out in a return which has been tabled in parliament in the old country. Objection has been taken to that policy here. A large number of these men fought against us in Italy and in other parts of Europe. They were not all conscripted; a large majority of them were volunteers. They gave up their Polish citizenship, and when the Germans came through their country they welcomed the Germans with open arms and tried to get into the German army.

Perhaps we should not do everything that the British government asks. They pay the fares of these men. God help this country if we have to depend on everything that the present Labour government is doing at the present time in the old country. They are stifling private initiative and private enterprise. They have made a mess of their internal situation with regard to coal, floods, food and electric power, and their foreign affairs. They are giving away and scattering parts of the empire for a song. We hope that there will not be such a state of affairs in Canada.

I object to the policy of the government regarding shipping and its immigration policy. It is well known that hardly anybody from the old country can come to this country; they cannot get shipping, or comply with the immigration regulations. Conditions are not what they should be. The result is that most of these British people are going to New Zealand and Australia, particularly the soldiers who fought for the country. They did something for the dominions and for the old country. Instead of sending a large delegation to Lake Success—it should be called Lake Failure or Lake Farce—to look into the Palestine problem which will be nothing but tower of babel; we should give some consideration to immigration from the old country. The same thing applies to the united nations. It is nothing but a tower of babel. What useful purpose will be served by inquiring into conditions in Palestine when we know as has been charged in the British House of Commons, that wealthy Jews of New York city and other parts of the United States are the people who are supplying the money to bring these bandit, illegal, underground gangsters into Palestine. This charge has been made by the opposition in the old country. Wealthy people of the United States belonging to one race are financing what is going on in Palestine. These terrorists are murdering in cold blood officers of the Eighth army and others. In the face of that we are sending delegates to Lake Success to inquire into the Palestine situation, with which we have no connection whatever. We should release shipping to bring immigrants from Great Britain. A large number of ships were leased to us by the United States government during the war. I hope the head of the government, who has charge of this, will take up these matters to see if some shipping cannot be provided during the next two or three months for our kith and kin in the old country, and not leave it until it is too late.

From the information I have received from shipping companies, it is clear that shipping space has been all sold for the next year. The practical result is that people who want to come out here with their families or brothers or sisters, fathers and mothers are not able to do so. Some want to go to the prairies, and some want to go to other parts of the country to be with their kith and kin. I do hope that the government will take the matter up and that we shall have some reply, because I do not want to see all the people in the mother country who served in our forces have to go to New Zealand and Australia. That is where they are going. The minister did some good work. He opened some shipping immigration agencies in Belfast and Liverpool. We had one in London and in Glasgow one was opened. Tens of thousands of people want to come to this country but they cannot get the shipping space. Surely the government must have some ships. Then there are the private companies, the merchant marine and other ships which could be utilized by lease or charter parties to give us space for the next six months, so that people of the mother country could migrate here instead of having to go to New Zealand and Australia.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): I wish to raise the question of the treatment of women workers being admitted to Canada to work in the textile mills and in domestic employment. We are all alarmed at the trend that government policy has taken. We have been told for the last two or three years, and during the three sessions since I have been a member, that the government had a policy and that under that policy certain people could be admitted; but we found that it was a restricted policy. It applied only to the immediate relatives of persons who were already in Canada. When we tried to get in cousins, uncles or inlaws, we were denied the right to bring them in. Now we find that the industrialists of this country are being given permission to set our immigration policy, because in effect that is how it is working out. If someone wants so many workers, by order in council he is given the right to go and bring in so many hundred people. I for one object to having any section of our economy set the immigration policy of this government. I think I voice the sentiments of every hon. member in that regard. If we are to bring people in by the hundreds and allow others to add to that number we should consider the field of immigration as a whole.

We should remember that the whole question of retaining population in Canada itself is an important one. In the thirty years preceding the war, between 1901 and 1931, our record was not very good in that respect. We find that in those thirty years the natural increase was three and a half million. In the same thirty years we brought in 5,100,000 people. So that our total population should have grown by eight and a half million people. But at the end of thirty years our population was not up to the extent of eight and a half million people. The real increase was only five million people. Therefore we had lost three and a half million people during the time we were bringing in 5,100,000 immigrants. When you break down that figure you find that, of the 3,500,000 people who left Canada, 1,000,000 were Canadian born and 2,500,000 went somewhere else, or asked to be sent back to their own country. This included many British people who applied for repatriation during the depression. This total meant that half of our immigrants moved on and a million of our own people who moved out.

I submit that this is a serious condition. We find that not only do our own people move out, but the people who are most expensive to train leave us. Our scientists, teachers and medical men move out. I have here the review of Canadian Health Needs and Health Insurance Proposals, which tells us that while no precise figures are available, a national health survey estimated that the loss in immigration is the equivalent of not less than ten per cent of our medical school output. In other words, ten per cent of our young doctors move out, so that we are losing the most highly trained and valuable people at the top, while we are recruiting people to come in on the lowest occupational level.

Let me assure the house that I am not against bringing in either immigrants or refugees, but we must separate the two, because we have a definite responsibility, which we have shirked, in regard to the need of displaced persons to find refuge in sanctuary. We have been very selfish, for many people must have died because we refused to take seriously our responsibility in this regard. The question of displaced persons and refugees must not, however, be confused with the problem of immigration, and our industrialists must not be permitted to determine our immigration policy through an operational move out the back door. That is what I object to.

In connection with refusals, I suggest that there are many worthy cases that are being denied all the time. I have here a letter with reference to a Norwegian who escaped from Norway and joined the merchant marine of the resistance forces. He was in the British command and shipped in and out of Canadian ports all through the war. He came to Little Norway and became engaged to a Canadian girl. This man is young and healthy, earning his own living, and is engaged to a Canadian, having been in the Canadian merchant marine, but he is now told that he cannot come to Canada. Just last week I saw a letter from the Immigration branch telling him that he could not come here, but an industrialist can get permission to bring in 100 or 500 textile workers from somewhere else.

That is what we must object to as members of parliament, the denial of our responsibility to persons who have already proved themselves worthy of admittance, while we grant a permit to someone to go and drag in so many hundred people to fill a textile mill.

In regard to this particular question, I wish to talk about the status of those women who will be brought to work in the province of Quebec. So far as the move to bring in workers is concerned, I think it is unfortunate that the order in council dealing with textile workers, which I have before me, and which permits their entry under the auspices of the Dionne Spinning Mill Company, is framed in the way in which it is. There is an application for admittance from Europe of 100 women for training and employment as textile workers, and they are to be paid at wages as required by the law of Quebec regulating salaries and conditions of work in the textile industry of that province.

As members we must bear in mind that the textile industry is one of the most poorly paid in Canada. I have that on the authority of the year book for 1946 which gives the wages paid in every industry and the average wages for each province. I find that the maritimes and Quebec are the worst employers and have the worst wages; and of all the industries, the textile is one of the very worst in the matter of wages. It is therefore unfortunate that we should bring these women in and put them in the worst industry in the worst province. If we are to do that we should give them at least as much protection as we give the Polish veterans. The Polish veterans who are being brought in under the national employment office contract will have exactly the same treatment wherever they go in Canada—the same wages, the same contract. The Polish veteran will not be the victim of any one province or the victim of any low-paid industry. The government is to be complimented on working out a national agreement with the Polish veterans, but I would ask it to do the same for the women workers who come in to take employment in Canada. If we are to bring in men and women we must give them equal protection under the laws of the country.

I wish to discuss now the question of the domestic worker, which is of interest to everyone, because, according to the James report on reconstruction, the home is a valuable institution. I do not think any of us have any quarrel with that. We all agree that help for the mother in the home is necessary. Here is a paragraph that all hon. members should be interested in. I think it is relevant:

> In any measure of social policy in which regard is had to fact, the great majority of married women must be regarded as occupied in work which is vital though unpaid, without which their husbands could not do the paid work and without which the nation could not continue.

If we are to bring in people to work in our homes we must have regard for the homes in which they will serve. I think it is regrettable, but it has been accepted that the stupid people who could not get work in anything else could always do housework and could look after children, and we have paid them accordingly. That stigma which we have put upon housework has made it almost impossible to get girls to work in homes now that there is work to be had in other industries.

I have here a table from the 1941 census which shows how poorly paid the domestic worker has been, although the domestic worker has had an important part to play in the question as to the number of women who work in domestic employment in comparison with the number of teachers, office workers and others. Office workers are only five per cent of the women workers, teachers only eleven per cent, whereas the women who did housework in 1941 constituted 24 per cent of all women workers. So that from the point of view of numbers they are important, because they are more than twice as numerous as the teachers and five times as numerous as the office workers. But here are the wages they were paid in cash, and many of them did not get board and lodging. Charwomen, cleaners and cooks did not get board and lodging in many cases. Cleaners and charwomen get an average of $358 a year; cooks get an average of $447 a year; housekeepers and matrons range from $235 to $364 a year; and in the domestic and allied trades the wages were from $285 to $366, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, 1941 census.

Mr. PARENT: They are wrong. We pay more than that.

Mrs. STRUM: Maybe, but they are your own.

Mr. PARENT: You do not get a maid at $300 a year today. You pay $75 a month with board.

Mrs. STRUM: That was 1941.

Mr. PARENT: You pay $75 a month with board.

Mrs. STRUM: If we are to bring women in we should inquire whether or not there are openings in this field. Last Tuesday I attended, in the railway committee room in this building, a meeting which was called by the Department of Labour and attended by the mayor of this city and representatives of all the national women's organizations. We were told that there were 2,700 women looking for work and that there were between 400 and 500 positions open to them. So that does not indicate to me that in Ottawa at least there is any great shortage of domestic help. But the conditions of employment and the social status that goes with domestic employment have, I think, made women and girls reluctant to enter this field.

The government has a responsibility to the homes of this country, to the mothers and to the women who would do that kind of work if it were put on the basis of a profession and were paid decently. The recommendations of this commission are useful as a guide to the government in undertaking that sort of thing. This report recommends that training schools for domestic workers be set up. If the government is to admit girls from Europe, this is especially important, although it is also important from the point of view of our untrained workers here or the people who should be doing domestic work. This suggestion of a training programme is a sensible and useful one. The recommendation is that the training be part time and that, while the girl is training, she work part time. That is, the girl would go to school perhaps in the morning and would work in the afternoon. She would also earn at the same time as she was training, and there would be less of a load as far as the expense of conducting these schools is concerned; she would gain self-respect and she would immediately begin to realize that her work would be useful, necessary and worth while.

The government should consider carefully this suggestion made by women who are representative of women's organizations, and I think there are national women's organizations which would be only too happy to assist the Department of Labour in setting up these schools. I am sure that the Young Women's Christian Association and the National Council of Women would help. These women were at the meeting last week; they are to have a meeting tomorrow in the same place, and they are anxious that we raise the standards not only of the workers, but of the women who employ them, because the women who employ them have been guilty of a faulty attitude in regard to their employees. I see no reason why these girls should not have hostels. Many of them are not going to be able to live in. The modern house is small. The modern apartment is cramped and there is not room to house the worker. In addition to that, the worker herself would much rather have living accommodation outside the home of her employer. As I mentioned last week at the meeting where we discussed this matter, I think the day is past when the maid should be relegated to the attic and be given the use of all the cast-off furniture. If this is to be a respectable and respected occupation, the girl has a right to a nice room in an attractive hostel and should be paid enough so that she could pay for her room on a reasonable basis. This was the approach which the people in New Zealand were using when I was there a few years ago. They were experiencing an industrial boom, and they found that their girls were very happy to flock out of the homes and into the factories, although many of them would have preferred to do housework. Therefore the people of that country were establishing minimum wages and hours legislation and were building hostels, so that the girls could have a social life of their own among people who were in a like occupation. That was a great improvement on the original status of the household employee.

I am going to ask the government that, if we are to bring in women, we do two things. I ask that the industrial worker coming from Europe be given the same protection as the Polish veteran, under a national labour code and contract; and that household workers, if we bring in household workers, be given the advantage of training and the advantage of protection by law. I urge that, because we still have many people in Canada who believe that to be different is to be inferior and who will treat these people as inferior persons because they speak a different language, have a different kind of dress, and are not accustomed to eat the same kind of food. It is a common fallacy, one into which all of us easily drop, to look on people who are different as not being as good as we are, and to treat them accordingly. We must not permit that to happen. I am going to ask the government to see to it that we give this protection to our women immigrants.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is not my desire to curtail discussion unduly or to say that there should not be wide latitude, in view of what has already been stated, afternoon. I feel, however, that I should bring to the attention of the house the rule under which we are proceeding, and I refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, reference 467, where it is stated that when a motion is made for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole, then on the question—

. . . it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance . . .

—it goes on to say:

. . . provided that the discussion . . . shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, . . . nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

The discussion for at least a portion of the afternoon has been with regard to immigration. I find on the order paper today, No. 5 is:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Mines and Resources for the second reading of Bill No. 10, an act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

Therefore most of the discussion today could have taken place on that order. It also occurred to me that all the discussion today could take place in the debate on the budget which will be before the house very shortly. As I said when I opened my remarks, it is not my desire in any way to curtail discussion, but I did feel that I should bring the rule to the attention of the house and it occurs to me that future speakers should be guided by the rule unless the house from day to day decides otherwise.

Mr. STIRLING: When Mr. Speaker was in the chair, the question of immigration was raised, and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) drew attention to the fact that, although Bill No. 10 is on the order paper, it deals with three matters in connection with immigration, definitely stating them. In consequence of that, these matters of immigration which hon. members have been talking about this afternoon could not possibly have been discussed under Bill No. 10. I suggest to Your Honour that no restriction was placed upon the number of matters which might be brought up. True, whoever might be occupying the chair would of necessity curb such discussion as dealt with matters already on the order paper. But when the hon. member who was leading the house suggested that on Mondays we should be permitted to discuss matters on the motion for supply, no restriction was offered as to the number of matters which could be raised.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order: When Bill No. 10 was under discussion on February 11 some hon. members were going a little outside the provisions of the bill. At that time the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) took the position that the discussion on that bill should be confined to its provisions. I find that Your Honour, as Deputy Speaker, was in the chair on that occasion, and that you said this, as reported at page 314 of Hansard:

The bill does allow considerable latitude, but I hope the house so far as possible will limit discussion to the provisions of the bill, and leave a general discussion of immigration to a later date.

I suggest that if these wider matters in respect of immigration could not be discussed under Bill 10, they should be in order now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I recall the debate to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred, and my recollection is that a number of hon. members did not see fit to accept my advice and limit their remarks. I have not that bill before me, but I believe one section in it deals with the arrival of immigrants in Canada, and their travel across the country. It is my recollection I expressed the opinion that under that section immigration from almost any country could be discussed. And when I say that, I do not want to encourage hon. members to discuss immigration too widely when that bill comes before the house again. If I said I hoped hon. members would reserve their remarks for some future occasion, I did not think it would be one such as this, when grievances were brought before the house, but rather at a time when the minister's estimates were under consideration.

I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). The house is the master of its procedure; but, as he has said, I shall be bound by the rules unless the house decides otherwise.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should say a word or two about immigration, seeing that you have permitted a few members to speak previously this afternoon on that matter. A number of my constituents have written to me about immigration and they are concerned about the government's policy. I want to say that I and those who support me are in favour of admitting to this country as many as possible of those people who fought for us or were on our side or who have our ideals. I think we have to do the best we can for refugees in Europe and other countries.

I want, in a few words, to express opposition to certain things. The first matter I should like to mention is the bringing into this country of former members of the second Polish corps. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has said that this was one of the finest immigration schemes that had ever been evolved in Canada, but when there are so many people in dire need wishing to come to this country I do not think there is any necessity of bringing in any more of these soldiers under the present terms. I have here a paper called The Commonwealth of April 25, 1947. This is a leading Catholic weekly, and I should like to quote as follows:

> Cardinal Sapieha has recently appealed to Poles abroad to return to Poland, assuring them that all who have not lost their citizenship can return without fear. . . .

I am sure that, in view of a statement like that being made by such high authority, large numbers of these men will want to leave England and other points for Poland. I have no doubt that among the former Polish soldiers who were admitted there are many splendid men, many democrats, but in my opinion there are others who are not. I understand that we have brought in something in the neighbourhood of 150 who formerly served in the German army. I want to express my opposition to that. There are so many hundreds of thousands of people who are unquestionably suitable immigrants and, when that is so, I do not think we should bring to this country anyone who has rendered service in the German armed forces during the last war.

I wish to speak briefly with reference to the Ukrainians. I know there are thousands of democratic Ukrainians who wish to come to this country, and I would be one who would welcome all who are thoroughly democratic in their outlook. But we must not forget that there were four divisions of Ukrainians who fought as volunteers in the German army, and we must be very careful that we do not let any of those birds into this country. When it comes to a question of selection I am sure that when our officers come to examine these people they will find that they all claim they are democrats.

In addition, I want to express my opposition, as did the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), to the bringing in of contract labour under the circumstances under which they are apparently being brought in to work in the textile mills. I have had a number of letters in that connection and I am quite sure that will be a most unpopular procedure with Canadian labour throughout Canada.

I know it is very easy to talk on this subject. Immigration is a difficult question and I admit the difficulties. I am of opinion that if this government is to work out an immigration policy which will find general acceptance in this country it can do so only on the basis of having discussions with leaders of the veterans organizations, labour organizations and farm organizations. If the government is willing to do that and get their varying points of view I believe it will find that there is a measure of common agreement among them and that an immigration policy can be worked out which would be satisfactory to and supported by a large majority of the Canadian people, one which would at the same time assist great numbers of these refugees and other worthy people who wish to come to this country from Europe.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say is along the line taken by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). People generally across Canada are much concerned over the difficulty in having relatives admitted to this country. They write to the department and to their member of parliament and are told that there are certain regulations governing the matter. My personal experiences during the past year have been most revealing. They reveal, first of all, that there is apparently no fixed policy on immigration and that the government is no nearer to formulating one than it was a year ago. Canada is probably the greatest country of all potentially for receiving immigrants. Great Britain has a population of 500 to the square mile; the United States, 44 to the square mile, and Canada, only 3½ people to the square mile. Yet Britain has taken in 200,000 refugees in the past year.

There are 800,000 refugees degenerating on the continent of Europe today, located either in camps or in controlled areas, and thousands of them are begging to be granted admission to this country. People in this country with relatives in Europe are urging that their relatives be admitted to Canada. Delegations have waited on the government urging the government to do something, and committees have been set up for the same purpose. I want to quote from the proceedings of the senate committee on immigration and labour which sat last year and presented some fine recommendations to the government. The people of Canada are asking what is wrong with our national economy when at a time like this we are not attempting to fulfil our obligations to the world and particularly to those persons in Europe displaced by the war, and why at the same time we have people in this country who cannot find employment. They believe that something must be radically wrong. I quote from the senate committee on immigration and labour, at page 300 of their proceedings:

> As to the possible increase in domestic demand through improved dietary standards, Dr. W. C. Hopper, of the economics division, Dominion Department of Agriculture, finds out that to raise the diet of every Canadian to the standard established by the Canadian Council on Nutrition would require an increase of about 2,000,000 acres to provide feed for dairy cattle and the necessary additional fruits and vegetables. This is about equivalent to the acreage that would be freed if our annual exports of pork and bacon to Great Britain were reduced by two hundred and seventy-five million pounds. It is equivalent in amount to approximately 8 per cent of our estimated available unused agricultural lands. Clearly, any major impetus to agricultural settlement in the dominion, if it is to come from improved nutritional standards, must come through increased export demand arising from improving dietary standards in other countries.

We have the fact that immigration is desirable and also available. Then where is the wisdom in Canada withholding from the crowded peoples of Europe access to her broad acres?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must again call attention of hon. members to order No. 5 on today's order paper:

> Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Mines and Resources for the second reading of Bill No. 10, an act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

It is the duty of the Speaker to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that they should not debate the subject matter of a bill which is not before the house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that twice already this afternoon this matter has been threshed out, and it was pointed out that the Immigration Act does not permit of a discussion on the general policy of immigration because it is confined to Chinese immigration and to the admission of dependents of veterans.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will admit that he is discussing immigration and that he will have an opportunity a few days from now to discuss that matter. I have no alternative to asking hon. members to abide by the rules.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it was ruled when Bill No. 10 was before the house that we could discuss on the bill only such matters as were specifically covered by it, and attempts at that time to discuss general matters of immigration were ruled out. It was ruled that we must stick to Chinese immigration and to the admission of dependents of members of the armed forces.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows it is the practice and the rule on the second reading of the bill to discuss the principle of the bill and, in committee, to discuss the details. What is the title of Bill No. 10? It is:

> An act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

That is the subject which is being covered by the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are we to understand, Mr. Speaker, that when Bill No. 10 comes before the house for second reading we shall be permitted to discuss immigration generally?

Mr. SPEAKER: When this bill comes before the house the rules will be applied to it the same as to any other bill.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the greater part of the past two hours has been devoted to discussing immigration and it is now approximately half-past five o'clock I would suggest that for the rest of the afternoon we be permitted to continue to discuss immigration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to refer to that portion of the proceedings of the senate committee on immigration and labour which deals with refugees and displaced persons in Europe. The Canadian national committee on refugees has made certain requests of the government:

> 1. That Canada should state her policy on displaced persons immediately without waiting for decisions of the united nations. Australia has already made known her intention to take 70,000 immigrants annually.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to abide by the rules, or I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, I am referring now to the displaced persons in Europe problem as it affects the Canadian people. Am I not permitted to discuss that? to come to this country.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to endorse what has been said this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) with respect to priorities for people seeking admission to this country. The hon. member for Broadview, in answer to a question today, was told that many Poles now being admitted to this country had served with Italy under German command against our own forces. I have had a great deal of correspondence lately with regard to passages for British people who want to come to this country,

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize that I cannot take one attitude toward him and a different one toward other hon. members. Therefore I would ask him to abide by the rules of the house. If he desires to discuss immigration he should wait until the immigration bill is before the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I refer to the matter of transportation for a moment or two? This afternoon several hon. members have discussed at length the matter of immigration and I should like to deal with transportation for a moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: If several hon. members have spoken on that subject time should not be taken up on the question now. I would ask hon. members to abide by the rules and discuss their grievances, and not subject matters which are covered by other motions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On the matter of transportation, I have been informed that passages from certain parts of the old country are booked up solid for a year. Many people of good British stock in this country are much concerned about that matter. I was surprised to hear an order in council referred to today which certainly looked to me as if special privileges were being granted by the government when they passed an order in council making special arrangements for some one hundred people of a certain nationality to be transported to this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat. If it is the wish of the house to give unanimous consent to permit this matter to be discussed I would have to call on the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): There is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It has to do with what the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) mentioned this afternoon. In Europe there are some 800,000 displaced people, many of them wondering what the future has in store for them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be kind enough to abide by the rules. Hon. members know the rules perfectly well. They know I could not ask an hon. member for such and such a constituency not to talk about immigration or refugees coming into this country and have another hon. member who is clever enough to use certain words to continue to discuss the matter. It would be unfair to those who have tried to debate the question and were called to order by the Speaker. I would ask the hon. member not to discuss the question of immigration.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I had no intention of discussing the subject of immigration. I do not know how you came to that conclusion on the basis of the few remarks which I made, sir. What I wanted to say was that a suggestion was offered by the hon. member for Dauphin to the minister and I think it is one which should be taken into consideration. All that these people have over there is hope. What will give them more hope than anything else is this government granting to those who are eligible to come to Canada, a visa, a document or a letter which will ultimately permit them to come.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the house ready for the question?

MARINE INSURANCE BROKERAGE—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the matter I should like to discuss for a moment is one which has many of the characteristics of a question of privilege. To the third question appearing on today's order paper I was furnished with some answers, but not all of them. These questions relate to marine insurance carried by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, and I believe the answers were tabled by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mayhew).

The first four questions relate to the brokers who hold the present insurance, when it was placed, and the reasons it was placed through those brokers. Those questions are answered with more or less sufficiency.

To the fifth question, which asks—

What other insurance, if any, does such broker hold for other crown companies and government departments and government boards, and what premiums have been paid for such insurance?

—the answer given is, "No information."

I submit that is not an answer, and that the question has simply been ignored. The matter of where insurance is placed is one of government record, as is the information respecting the names of the brokers and the premiums paid for such insurance. It is within the knowledge of any government department as to what particular insurance is placed for it through a broker; in this instance it is Dale and Company of Montreal. I am entitled to be told what premiums have been paid for insurance through that brokerage firm.

The question has definitely not been answered, and no reason has been given for its not being answered. I would ask that the question be restored to the order paper with an order that it be answered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH ESTIMATES—HOURS OF SITTINGS

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I sometimes marvel that your eyesight is so good as to see me rise away back here, especially when so many of my hon. friends in front of me are so much taller and broader than I am. When I rise I usually find myself hidden behind someone.

The matter I should like to bring before the house is one which could not very well appear on the order paper, nor could I ask a question concerning it when the orders of the day are called, because it involves some explanation. Then, I cannot put a question on the order paper in respect of it because it is a matter dealing with the house itself. I have been at a loss, therefore, to know when to bring it up, and I appreciate the opportunity afforded this afternoon.

The matter I have in mind is in respect of a revision of parliamentary procedure, something which I suggest is long overdue. We have come to a stage in our governmental and parliamentary history when we have become something more than legislators, and when governments, through the very nature of our nation's business, find that parliamentary sessions are lasting longer and longer. It is in this connection I have one or two suggestions to make.

In the last two years special committees have been appointed to make some few recommendations in respect of house procedure. I was a member of the committee last year, and we sat just once. For some unknown reason—at least unknown to me—we did not meet again. There seems to be some sort of influence radiating from some place or another which defeats our progress in the matter of revising our rules of procedure. This year no committee has been set up.

I am not going to take up the time of the house this afternoon to go into all the ramifications and regulations as to what procedure could be revised, but I have a suggestion to make, one which has been made before, but about which nothing has been done. We make it again; and if we have to make it again we will keep on making it, until something is done. The suggestion is that much time could be saved in the house if, through common consent, hon. members would permit the estimates to go before the various parliamentary committees, there to be discussed and from there to be brought back to the house for final vote.

Mr. KNOWLES: To be discussed all over again.

Mr. HANSELL: No; I think that would cut down our discussion in the house. We could try it, anyway; there is no reason why we should not. Some may say that it would not cut down the time of the session at all. Well, let us try it, and see; that is the way we shall find out. The very nature of the country, with its diversified industries, makes it such that members of parliament have to be here when certain things which may be of no particular interest to their respective constituencies are under discussion.

For instance, there is the Department of Fisheries. There are very few things in that department which might interest my constituents, but there is an afternoon's discussion on lobster traps. My goodness, I have not any lobsters in my constituency; I am not interested in that, and yet I have to be here. If those estimates could be given to a committee and perhaps notice of the vote numbers that are to be taken up published in Votes and Proceedings, then if there is a particular item in which I am interested I would know it would be brought up on a certain day and I could go before the committee and get off my chest what I have to say and not take up the time of parliament.

I figured out the other day how much it costs per minute to run parliament. My figures may be subject to a good deal of interpretation, but it costs just $100 a minute to listen to a man's speech. When a man takes forty minutes to make a speech it costs this country $4,000. I do not think my speeches are worth quite $4,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Bow River says that is a matter of opinion. I think they come pretty close to being worth $4,000, but not quite that. I say with all sincerity that the time of our sessions could be cut tremendously, and at the same time each and every hon. member would have all the time he needs at the proper time to discuss, as adequately as he requires, any item coming before parliament.

There is one other matter I should like to deal with, a matter which I think is being considered favourably by a good many members. I refer to the hours of our sittings. I do not know whether hon. members find what I do; but, as the months go by, I find it rather a grind to get to my office at ten o'clock in the morning and stay here until eleven o'clock at night. That is a pretty good sized day. By the time I get to my sleeping quarters, which is not my home, and do the one or two things I have to do before retiring, such as brushing my teeth, I find that it is about one o'clock before I can turn in. I am quite confident that hon. members would find their work much more pleasant if the hours of sitting were rearranged.

I suppose a dozen different suggestions could be made respecting change in hours, but I am going to suggest that we do not sit on Monday nights, on Wednesday nights or on Friday nights and that the hours in the afternoon be from two o'clock until six o'clock. That works out to just one hour less per week than what we are putting in now. It would mean that the only nights we would sit would be on Tuesdays and Thursdays. I do not see how the cabinet ministers stand the grind of attending to their departmental work, being responsible for their own legislation and seeing to the administration of their departments. When their estimates are up they have to sit here until eleven o'clock at night and they have as much responsibility for being here as any other hon. member. I do not know how the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stands the grind. Perhaps he goes home in the evening and I am quite willing that he should because he has a tremendous responsibility, but there are some others who would like to go home in the evening as well. I am suggesting that, for this session at least, the estimates be referred to a committee and that the hours of sitting be revised. Let us try it to see how it works, and I am sure we all would be much happier.

ALLOWANCES TO WIDOWS OF NON-PENSIONED VETERANS

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is an entirely different matter that I should like to speak on for a few minutes. I address my remarks in particular to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). On April 23 I directed a question to the minister as to whether consideration was being given by the government to amending the War Veterans Allowance Act to provide an increase in the amount of the allowance both for veterans and for the widows of non-pensioned veterans. The minister made a forthright reply, and I appreciate the fact that he gave a clear-cut answer to my question. He said, as reported at page 2332 of Hansard:

> It is not the intention of the government to introduce at the present session of parliament any amendments to the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

The grievance that I raise is to protest against that decision and to make an appeal to the minister and to the government to reconsider the matter at an early date. I do so in particular on behalf of non-pensioned veterans' widows.

As hon. members know, the dominion council of the organization representing these widows was in Ottawa last week. Most members are familiar—the matter is fresh in our minds at the present time and that is why I raise it now—with the situation in which these women find themselves. It is true that in recent years the government has taken certain steps in favour of these widows by establishing a special allowance for them. But—particularly with rising prices, the effect of which is being recognized in that the old age pension is to be raised—these widows feel that the time has come for the government to give consideration to their request for an increase in the amount. They now receive a maximum of $30.41 a month. The amount they are asking for is the modest sum of $40 a month. There are a number of other requests but I shall name just two of them. The second request is the matter of providing for hospitalization for these widows when they require it. The third matter is that of making this allowance available to widows of all non-pensioned veterans of the South African war and the first world war rather than to the restricted group which is now the case because of the definition of an actual theatre of war. That is all one needs to say on the point at this moment, for surely it is not necessary to emphasize the plight of these women in view of the meagre amount that they now receive.

As I say, the minister has made a definite statement as to the intention of the government this year, but I do make a plea to him to reconsider the matter and see if the government cannot, before the session is over, either in the estimates or in some other way, improve the position of these deserving widows of Canada's non-pensioned veterans.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Although the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) did say on April 23 that the government had no intention of increasing the allowance to non-pensioned widows, this year, I think he deserves credit for the legislation now on the statute book with regard to these widows.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants all the credit. You were the real author of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is about ten years ago that the matter was first brought into the house, and I have had the pleasure on many occasions of saying that the present Minister of Veterans Affairs deserves credit for what these people are getting. I have been hoping, however, since the statement he made on April 23 that there would be no increase, that perhaps before the end of the session, in his generosity of heart, he would be able to convince his colleagues in the cabinet of the desirability of increasing the allowance to non-pensioned widows. The cost of living to these widows has gone up, just as it has to everyone else. They are now advanced in years, compared with the time the allowance was first made, and they need all the money they can get now. I know a number of these ladies residing in my constituency and they often come to see me about the matter, just as a number of ladies came last week to call on different members.

I wish to thank the minister for what he has done. It would never have been done but for him and I wish to give him that credit. However I will ask him to reconsider the matter with a view to allowing these widows something more. At their time of life they are often in need of medicine, and $30.41 is not much to clothe them and enable them to live properly. On their behalf I appeal to the minister's generosity, and would ask him again to reconsider the status of non-pensioned widows.

ALLOWANCES TO DISABLED VETERANS ATTENDING UNIVERSITY

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is one matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). When a veteran goes to the university, if he is single he gets an allowance of $60 a month. If a veteran goes to Osgoode Hall he is allowed to make $40 as well, which brings his amount up to $100. If a veteran receives a pension of $50 a month, all that he receives in the form of an allowance is $10. I have in mind a veteran who is a disability case, and all that he is getting from the government in the way of an allowance is $10. Of course he has his pension, but he is not in as good a position as the other chap at Osgoode Hall who is able to make $40 in addition to his allowance of $60. The chap to whom I refer also goes to Osgoode Hall, but because he has lost a leg he is not able to make $40 a month. It seems to me a great pity that a man who has a disability should suffer the loss of part of his allowance. This allowance should be given to him as of right and he should have his pension free. It is much more difficult for the chap who is pensioned to get along and make a few dollars than for the other fellow. It does not seem right that the allowance which he gets for his education should be deducted if he receives a pension.

I have received several letters along the same lines from these chaps, and I think something should be done about the matter, because there is a grave injustice if this is the case. It is particularly hard on a lad who is going to university when he is suffering from a disability of any kind, because he cannot get around in the same way as the others. It is a pity that he should be penalized and his pension taken from him when that pension is for a definite purpose. If a man goes out and makes $60 or $100 a month you do not cut out his pension because he is earning money. Suppose he makes only $50; you do not deduct the pension from the amount of money he makes. Why should you deduct the amount of his pension from his allowance? I suggest that his pension is something that should be considered apart from any allowance he receives. I wish the minister would look into this matter.

I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in regard to the widows. Some of these women are older now and they need all the money they can get. It seems to me that $30 a month is a pretty small allowance for them.

DAYLIGHT SAVING AND RURAL COMMUNITIES

Mr. R. J. HENDERSON (Lambton-Kent): I wish to register a mild protest against daylight saving, which came into effect this morning. I wondered what was wrong when the maid rapped at my door at the unusual hour she did. I had to alter the clock and get up an hour earlier. I make this complaint not for myself, because I have enjoyed daylight saving. When I was younger it was harder for me to get up an hour earlier; but I find, as age is creeping up on me, it is no bother for me to get up at any time in the morning. I am speaking for the rural people, the farmers particularly. They are definitely opposed to the adoption of daylight saving piecemeal as we have it at present. When the war was at its height and daylight saving was standardized throughout Canada we got used to it; we worked by it and it was all right. Now that the decision has been left to the individual municipality, the situation is different. In the town in which I live they have adopted daylight saving to the detriment of the rural people, upon whom they depend for their prosperity. I was at a municipal gathering not so long ago where the officials of every municipality in the county were gathered and they definitely passed a resolution opposing daylight saving.

I do not know whether this matter comes under dominion jurisdiction, but I suggest that if we are to have the new time it should be in effect throughout Canada. We ought to have some heart for the rural people. Here it is, almost the first of May. The weather is cold; the farmer has seeding to do; he will be working his head off—I had almost said his fool head, because that is pretty nearly what it will mean—in order to raise crops to feed a hungry world, and we are making it harder for him by adopting daylight saving time.

The farmer has to get casual labour from the urban municipality and quitting time comes at five or six o'clock, so that his hired help leaves him at the very time when, as those of us who have been brought up on farms know, the farmer is most in need of assistance. When the afternoon sun is shining, and toward evening, then the farmer needs all the help he can get. Once more I protest on behalf of Lambton-Kent, where I live, against the adoption of daylight saving. I protest on behalf of the rural people.

EAST MALARTIC MINE DISASTER

Mr. REAL CAOUETTE (Pontiac): All Canada was shocked to learn of the tragedy that struck my constituency of Pontiac in the accident at the Malartic mine. We had all hoped that the eleven men trapped in the mine would be rescued, but the latest news has dashed our hopes. It now appears that eleven families are bereaved. I wish at this time to express my sorrow at the accident and my sympathy with these stricken families. At the same time I would call the attention of the Canadian people to the necessity for greater vigilance and a more rigid enforcement of safety regulations in the mines of Canada, so that tragedies of the kind at Malartic may be of less frequent occurrence in the future.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Every hon. member will undoubtedly agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Pontiac and join him in the expression of sympathy to the bereaved.

I wish to associate myself, Mr. Speaker, with what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has said and I hope the minister will give serious consideration in the reasonable request that has been made by the women's delegation. I should like to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I agree with his sentiments in behalf of the women.

TAXATION OF COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): The matter I wish to raise is really a grievance of some urgency at this time, because the prospect or the possibility of discussing it under a specific order will likely be some days or maybe weeks away; I do not know when the opportunity will come. It is in the matter of a ruling of the Department of National Revenue in its application to the taxation of cooperative associations. The recent ruling has been that cooperative associations, when making up their accounts and the allocation of dividends for the year, must differentiate between those which are paid for provident purposes and those which are paid for productive purposes.

The patron of a cooperative association who receives a dividend on consumer or household goods that he has bought, does not have that apply to his income for taxation. But a dividend on what he buys for productive purposes —that is in the field of gasoline or those things for power work and so on—becomes part of his income and is taxable. Whether there is much quarrel with that particular division is a matter of opinion, but I should like to draw to the attention of the minister concerned that it is practically impossible for the cooperative associations to carry out that ruling. For instance, suppose a farmer comes in to buy some lumber from a cooperative that handles lumber. He takes away his truckload of lumber. Some of the lumber may be for building a granary or for repairs on the barn. Another part might be used for some little repairs or patchwork on the steps leading into the house, the porch, or something of that kind. The same thing applies with regard to gasoline. Much of the gasoline may go into the tractor, or it may go into the car when the car is being used for the operation of the farm. Then, in the same car, the gasoline may be used when the car is operating for domestic purposes, purely for pleasure, or for household use. The same thing applies in the field of groceries. It is difficult to separate that part which is used to feed the farmer's family from that part which is used to feed the hired men who are used for productive purposes.

I have given only a few instances here, but I think I have given enough to indicate to the minister that this kind of accounting is going to put the cooperative associations in a bad position. They will try to be honest; yet they will have to be the judges as to what particular purpose or use their patron has put the particular goods he has bought in that store or on that association's premises in the past year. That is a difficult job for any cooperative manager to undertake.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed a great variety of grievances this afternoon. I wonder if we could get into supply before six o'clock, and call just two items?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion (Mr. Abbott) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As announced by my colleague the other evening, two new departments will be called, not for discussion, but just to get them into supply. The first is the Department of Justice, vote 95, administration.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

95. Departmental administration, $224,092.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

108. Departmental administration, $701,576.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May the item stand?

Item stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again.

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. KNOWLES: Report progress, you mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, report the resolutions, when discussing items in supply. My hon. friend might learn something more about procedure.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did we pass these resolutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We only called them.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, April 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose on Friday night it had passed order in council P.C. 1609 as amended, and certain amendments had been carried with respect to other orders in council under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. It is my recollection that the committee was considering orders numbers P.C. 9439 and P.C. 7502 as amended. Do the two last-mentioned orders in council carry?

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Eglinton asked the following question as reported at page 2458 of Hansard:

> Mr. Fleming: I just want to give the minister notice so that he might bring before the committee a statement of the areas declared to be congested areas and the dates on which they were so declared.
> Mr. Howe: Very well.

Is the parliamentary assistant able to give that information this evening?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have those dates available. In the early stages this operation was done by municipal areas, which were declared to be congested areas as follows: Ottawa, by order 474 of January 13, 1945; Hull, by order 480 of February 19, 1945; Toronto, by order 481 of February 16, 1945; Hamilton, by order 482 of February 21, 1945; Vancouver-New Westminster, by order 484 of February 10, 1945; Victoria, by order 483 of February 10, 1945, and Winnipeg, by order 529 of July 5, 1945.

In September practically the whole of the dominion was included within the terms of the section as follows: On September 1, 1945, all of British Columbia, except the Peace River block; the province of Manitoba and the province of Ontario; on September 6, 1945, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace River block; on September 13, 1945, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Quebec.

Mr. GREEN: The whole country is in now, then?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Within the last few days I have had a letter from the Vancouver zone council of the Canadian Legion. No doubt the same letter has reached the minister. In it they ask if something can be done to make available for emergency shelter some of the barracks buildings at Jericho, Kitsilano, Little Mountain and the Seaforth armouries in Vancouver. There are quite a few buildings there which are not in use. Evidently they were inspected by the Minister of National Defence when he was visiting the Pacific coast in April. The understanding was that upon his return here he would look into the question of making some of these buildings available for emergency shelter.

The letter suggests that the hutments which are not in use could be converted by Wartime Housing into emergency shelters for veterans and their families. As the parliamentary assistant knows, the situation in Vancouver with respect to housing for veterans is serious. Some 1,200 veterans and their families are in the old Vancouver hotel. I think altogether about 4,700 veterans are looking for homes. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether there is any possibility of having some action of the type suggested taken at this time?

Mr. MacINNIS: I suppose all hon. members from Vancouver received a letter similar to the one to which the hon. member for Vancouver South has referred. From the letter it would seem that a considerable number of emergency shelters could be provided through the reconversion of these hutments. The barracks of Jericho alone, as the letter states, would provide for approximately thirty families. Then there are the others the hon. member has mentioned. If at all possible these hutments should be made available and work started on them at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. McILRAITH: The practice is that the emergency shelter programme is worked out in connection with the municipal authorities. Perhaps I could deal with these different areas separately. At Jericho the medical and dental buildings are, I understand, owned by the province, not by the dominion government. The other buildings there are not declared surplus and I am of the opinion that it is the intention of the department to retain them. At Kitsilano there are no surplus buildings. There are surplus buildings at Little Mountain and a programme is being worked out to make them available. It is intended to use them for university students.

Mr. GREEN: How many will be accommodated?

Mr. McILRAITH: There are six buildings at Seaforth, but they have been found to be unsuitable and I believe the city shares that view. Little Mountain should provide fifty family units.

Mr. GREEN: Jericho was the headquarters of the Pacific command for the navy, army and air force. As the Minister of Veterans Affairs knows, there are quite extensive barracks there, some of the buildings being three stories high. Under the present defence arrangements there is only an area command in British Columbia for the army and a small command for the air force, while the navy headquarters have been moved to Esquimalt. Surely the Department of National Defence will not require all these buildings. Would it not be possible for the department of reconstruction to take up with the Department of National Defence the possibility of getting at least some of these buildings for emergency shelter? Has the question been discussed with the Department of National Defence?

Mr. McILRAITH: The question has been discussed at some length with the Department of National Defence and the last information I have is that they will not be declared surplus by those departments. The hon. member will realize that the declaration of surplus is not a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the department. I can have the matter looked into to see if there is any possibility of having any part of these buildings declared surplus.

Mr. GREEN: When all the barracks are on land held by the dominion is it necessary to have any huts that could be used for emergency shelter declared surplus and sold? Is there no procedure by which the dominion government can use the huts for emergency shelter for a time and then, when the emergency is over, let them be used again by the Department of National Defence? I can quite understand why the army would not want to sell the huts because they are on army property; they are really permanent buildings but not required by the Department of National Defence under present conditions. Is there not some method by which buildings not required at the moment could be used for emergency shelter?

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I should have explained the use of the words "declared surplus." I was referring to buildings being declared surplus by the department now having them. That does not mean that the buildings are declared surplus or disposed of by the crown. I used the term merely to indicate that the department now having custody of the buildings would be the one to declare them surplus under the Surplus Crown Assets Act. Once they are declared surplus by the department now using them, the emergency shelter authorities or the crown may retain the ownership, and does.

Mr. GREEN: It so happens that my home is right across the street from this Jericho property. It is an old golf course that was taken over and buildings were put up by the government. Many of the buildings are empty and there would seem to be no reason why they should not be made available for emergency shelter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not speak with immediate authority, but I notice that the Vancouver press state that Jericho will actually be used for the purpose my hon. friend has mentioned. I may say that, as far as any influence of mine is concerned, all available property there will be used for emergency housing. I know every inch of Jericho, and so does my hon. friend. The only building being held for defence purposes is the large air force building immediately after you cross the bridge. I understand that they will want that for three or four years. That is now part of the negotiations taking place in regard to the disposal of Kitsilano. There is, in my opinion, no reason in the world why the other barracks that are vacant should not be made available immediately for emergency housing purposes in greater Vancouver, and I shall lend all my support to that purpose.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to inquire from the parliamentary assistant whether the same policy is being followed on the east coast as the hon. member for Vancouver South has suggested should be followed on the west coast? I ask that question because of negotiations which have been carried on by the city of Halifax through His Worship J. E. Ahearn. Apparently the mayor of Halifax is a little more aggressive than even that well known personage who represents the city of Vancouver at the present time.

Mr. McILRAITH: Exactly the same policy is being followed on the east coast. I think it is fair to say that, as far as emergency shelter is concerned, the position is a little more happy in Halifax, because at the moment there is no demand on the part of the municipal authorities for additional emergency shelter. I believe they have what will reasonably meet their requirements at the moment.

Mr. ISNOR: Do I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that there was no need or no demand for emergency shelter in Halifax?

Mr. McILRAITH: No; I did not put it quite in that way.

Mr. GREEN: That is what it sounded like over here.

Mr. McILRAITH: I pointed out that emergency shelter had been provided to meet their immediate, urgent needs as indicated by the municipal authorities. A considerable amount has been made available in that area.

Mr. McMASTER: The matter of emergency shelter is one to which I have given considerable attention for some years, and I have often wondered whether the government remembers that there is such an act in force. According to figures received from Toronto, the number of persons per unit in that city in January this year is only slightly greater than the number in 1940, and undoubtedly is considerably less than the number during the depression. Some people wonder why that is, but the fact is that in Toronto there are many large homes with only a limited number of people living in them.

I never could understand why a fairly well-to-do man with a family of only one or two could occupy a large house and the government neglect or fail to take possession of that house and do something with it, or at least with part of it, in order to provide accommodation. At the same time the government will keep a small home of six rooms away from an owner—generally speaking it is small homes that are involved—when that home is being rented for $20 or $25 a month. The next house is rented for perhaps $35 a month simply because it did not come under the provisions of the ceiling imposed on October 11, 1941.

There is something wrong. I know of seven-roomed houses in which one person is living. I know of some nine-roomed houses with two people living in them. A year or so ago a great furore was raised because a large house in a good part of the city was to be taken over by the city or the government and re-rented. That was not done, but the owner of the house thought it was a terrible thing for the government to suggest putting a hand upon his property. The government is constantly putting its hand upon the homes of the small people, houses with six rooms or less; and people cannot get possession of their own homes.

I should like the hon. gentleman to say what has been done in the city of Toronto in order to ascertain the amount of space available in the larger houses. While I am on my feet, I should like to say something I had not expected an opportunity to say. On the lake front just east of Yonge street there were many large buildings owned by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Some person has said they were not in condition to be used as living quarters, but I am told that was not so, that they had all the necessary plumbing and other fixtures; that they were well heated, and, in fact, provided everything people who were without homes might require. Yet those buildings were torn down and sold about a year ago. Now as I pass on the train I see a large excavation there, as though some commercial or industrial plant is to be erected. I do not see why these buildings could not have been made available to the people of Toronto, and I should like to know what attempt the government has made to ascertain the possibility of obtaining space in some of the larger homes in the city of Toronto.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Casa Loma.

Mr. McMASTER: I was not speaking of Casa Loma.

Mr. McILRAITH: Two main points were raised by the hon. member for High Park. In the first place, I understood him to urge that the government should start a policy of compulsorily billeting persons in homes.

Mr. McMASTER: Oh, no.

Mr. McILRAITH: That has not been done so far, and I should think hon. members on all sides would hesitate before embarking on a policy of that sort. It is drastic treatment to commence at this stage, to begin forcing additional persons into the premises of home owners or home occupiers. I am, quite frankly, a little amazed at this suggestion coming from a member of a party which seems to favour the removal of controls as rapidly as may reasonably be possible.

The second point raised by the hon. member, as I understand it, has to do with the R.C.A.F. equipment depot in Toronto. That question was explored, and the city health authorities would not permit that property to be used for housing purposes. I understand that it did not have the proper type of flooring or plumbing accommodation. Therefore it was not suitable, and was dismantled.

Mr. McMASTER: If the hon. member will give me the report from the civic health authorities to that effect I can take up the matter in the proper place. As far as forcing people into private homes is concerned, I do not see much difference between putting people in part of someone else's home, and refusing to let a man get possession of his own home. I do not speak about rehabilitating these houses; I suppose the parliamentary assistant has heard about shared apartments before this.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have been wondering to what extent the emergency shelter authorities have cooperated with the municipalities and provinces in providing shelter in the sort of buildings about which the hon. member for High Park had been speaking. In the city of North Battleford, Saskatchewan, the provincial government was able to purchase the airport buildings from War Assets Corporation, and they provided some eighty suites, which meant that every veteran in that city was given an opportunity to have a suite of rooms last winter. Perhaps North Battleford is the only city in Canada in that position. I believe a great deal more of that could be done if we had the right kind of cooperation between the housing administration and the provincial and municipal authorities. Those airport buildings were located just a mile outside North Battleford, and they were turned into nice, comfortable suites renting at a reasonable figure. They have provided playgrounds for the children, a recreation hall for the people living there, a store of their own, and all the rest of it; they have a bus line into the city, and they are really enjoying life. It seems to me that more of that sort of thing could be done with some of these airport buildings in other parts of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I was home over the week-end I drove quite a few miles around the city of Toronto taking a look at buildings under construction. I know the appalling housing situation in Toronto, particularly in my own part of the city where so many thousands of the working people live. I know how they are crowded, with two or three or four families in a small six-roomed house. I asked myself if the government had a tabulation made of the millions of bricks being used in the construction of theatres, churches and all sorts of other buildings in Toronto. I am not finding any fault with the fact that these other buildings are being constructed, because permits must have been obtained for that construction. But I thought not only of the millions of bricks being used in those buildings but of the thousands of kegs of nails and the millions of feet of lumber; and as I drove around I asked myself which was the most pressing demand on the government: to permit the construction of theatres and churches, which of course are necessary, and many other buildings of that kind which require vast quantities of building materials and the services of many expert bricklayers, carpenters and so forth, or the demand for the construction of houses. I just asked myself whether the government could be conversant with the appalling housing situation in our large cities and, if so, why they permitted these other buildings to be constructed. I am not opposed to their construction. but surely housing comes first in the situation under which the people are struggling to live at the present time.

Mr. McILRAITH: To deal, first, with the points raised by the hon. member for North Battleford, some nine different municipalities in Saskatchewan now have emergency shelter units. The number of projects is larger than that, but nine municipalities are involved. The whole programme is worked out in conjunction with the provincial and municipal authorities, and I should be very much surprised if any of those municipalities said they had received any other than excellent cooperation from the emergency shelter authorities. I believe they have.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am willing to give them credit for that.

Mr. McILRAITH: I thank the hon. member for that. Cooperation is a two-way proposition. It varies with one municipality and another. It is fair to say that, in general, cooperation with municipalities has been very good.

With respect to the points raised by the hon. member for Davenport, it is really a matter of building materials covered under the order in council which is already passed. I would point out to him that in the production of colourless window glass it would appear that the supply in 1947 will be adequate. I have the figures available with respect to brick but perhaps there is no point in giving them.

To go back to the question which was debated before, namely, construction permit control and the other controls, the matter of construction permits rests with the municipal authorities. I do not know that there is much need to elaborate on that at this time since the order is already passed. If permits were granted for these buildings they were granted by the municipal authorities. I assume the municipal authorities gave the matter complete and proper attention before they granted them.

Mr. MacNICOL: I really cannot understand it, if the municipal authorities, particularly the city of Toronto, are harassed to death for accommodation, and they are. The eviction court in Toronto is a sad place to enter. I go there frequently and listen to the arguments put forward by those who want eviction and those who do not want eviction to take place. It seems to me strange that the municipal authorities would not try first to house their people. To provide homes for the multitudes who are now packed almost like sardines—that is all we can say about it—in unhealthy and dangerous conditions of every description, should be the important thing. I do not want to think the city council and the city authorities in Toronto would give preference to I do not know how many theatres—I passed by a number of them—which have men working on them and piles of lumber and building materials of every description around them. I am not finding fault with their being built, but I am trying to say that housing should have No. 1 priority over everything else to give the people a chance to live under decent conditions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before we leave this order in council, there is a question I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant. When the members for Vancouver were in that city during the Easter holidays they met the city council and, among other things, discussed with them the project of buying certain houses in Bremerton in the state of Washington. Some 1,600 houses were to be floated on barges to Vancouver. Has that deal gone through?

Mr. McILRAITH: I have some information on that point. There are two or three things about it. First of all, the municipal authorities in the city of Vancouver will not make a contribution to that project. I understand that they are unwilling to do so. They want it done, if it is done, by the dominion government alone. I might add one other thing. There is no evidence whatever that the United States authorities would permit these houses to be taken out of the United States and into Canada. That is another difficulty.

Mr. GREEN: Have inquiries been made about the matter?

Mr. McILRAITH: There is one other difficulty. The municipalities will not administer the project. These are the difficulties in the way at the moment. I think I am justified in saying it looks as if they will not be having Bremerton houses.

Mr. MacINNIS: Surely there must be something wrong here. I had a copy of a letter which was sent by the corporation council of Vancouver to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, I think. From that letter my understanding was that the city was asking for financial assistance from the government. I understand that to a certain amount that financial assistance was offered; whether it was sufficient or not I do not know. I am greatly surprised to hear that the city wanted the government to pay all of it. I am almost sure that is not the case.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am sorry I have not the letter and the reply here. The letter was received and replied to in considerable detail by the minister. As I understand it, the city takes the position that it has no authority to expend money on that project. I understand further that the dominion government made the city an offer under which the dominion government would pay $500 per unit of these houses. I am sorry I have not the letter. If I had I would have more detail.

Mr. GREEN: Have inquiries been made of the United States authorities by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply since Easter?

Mr. McILRAITH: No such inquiries have been made since Easter. The position is that there is no point in making such inquiry until someone assumes the responsibility by bringing these houses in and financing them.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant said he believed the United States authorities would not release the houses.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, I did not express it in that way.

Mr. GREEN: How did the parliamentary assistant express it? What did he mean to convey?

Mr. McILRAITH: I said there was no evidence that the United States authorities would permit them to be exported to Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Why does the department not find out whether or not they can be obtained from the United States?

Mr. McILRAITH: The reason is—

Mr. GREEN: Are the city authorities and members of parliament just wasting their time trying to have this deal put through? The government should at least find out from the United States government whether or not these buildings can be made available.

Mr. McILRAITH: The United States government have a prohibition against the export of building material. The reason they have not been approached since Easter to change that and to make a special exception or do whatever is required under their law to vary it is that no one here is in a position to take the houses. It is still a hypothetical question because no authority here will assume responsibility for taking the houses and putting them in the city of Vancouver and operating them. That question has to be settled first.

Mr. GREEN: Was an approach made to the United States government before Easter? If so, what was the answer given?

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I can restate it with a little more detail. The situation at the moment with respect to these Bremerton houses is simply this: the Canadian government or the department is not in a position to make such an approach to the government of another country until it has a bona fide application to import these houses. Such is not yet the case. There is no bona fide application to import these houses.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the lead should come from Ottawa. The people on the Pacific coast have found that these houses are available. They have inspected them and are satisfied with them. They cannot go farther until they know whether or not the houses can be obtained. If they cannot be obtained there is no use in wasting more time on the project.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I could state it in another way. There is no use in determining a hypothetical question about an import permit from a foreign government until there is some evidence that someone will import houses. So far, in this talk about Bremerton houses, there is no evidence that they are available, and we have been unable to get any real cooperation in the way of working out an arrangement with the municipal authorities to provide for paying for and operating the houses. That is the situation and the difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to speak as the member for Vancouver Centre and not as a minister. I happened to go into the matter thoroughly when I was at home during the Easter recess, though unfortunately I was detained from attendance at the meeting at which my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East and others were present, with the city council, to discuss the situation; but the evidence I received was definitely to the effect that the houses were available, provided that the government of Canada gave assurances to the government of the United States that the houses were required and that they would give their blessing to the enterprise, as these houses could be transported to Vancouver, British Columbia. I happen to know Canada fairly well and there is no place in Canada that requires housing to the extent that Vancouver, British Columbia, does. The conditions there are truly and definitely emergent, and I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver East and two of my colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver North and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, were at a conference the other day. My understanding from dispatches which I saw was that one of two officials of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply was to be sent immediately to Vancouver to confer with the Vancouver city council in regard to this condition.

I wish to impress upon the committee the fact that this condition is a truly serious one in Greater Vancouver and that the negotiations, as far as I know, were proceeding most satisfactorily. I am therefore nonplussed, I must say, by the evidence I have heard tonight, because the Vancouver press has continually carried dispatches, and one or other of these two officials is on his way to Vancouver now to discuss these negotiations with the city council of Greater Vancouver in regard to terms for transporting these houses from Bremerton to Vancouver.

As far as I am concerned, I want to have some further explanation, which I shall ask for in the usual constitutional manner, in regard to the lack of progress with reference to these negotiations, which I had hoped would be successful for the sake of people who today need housing, most of them being ex-servicemen, with their dependents, in Greater Vancouver. Our understanding was, after investigation that these houses could be obtained at prices which were from one-third to two-thirds of the prices for which one can build houses today in Canada, including cost of transportation.

I must agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South—I am afraid I am doing it too frequently nowadays—in his representations in regard to this matter, because after all we represent a great city, a great centre, and in this case a great cause, and anything I can do to assist in this way I shall be most happy to do.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not want to pursue this matter further; but, as I have indicated, I am in the same position as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. My understanding was that these houses were for sale by the government authorities. They are war surplus, I understand, or something of that kind, and no question of the authority for selling them was involved. There are sixteen hundred of them. According to the figures I saw, the price, set down on a serviced lot in Vancouver, was $2,160, which it was said would enable good accommodation to be provided for ten years. I am very much surprised at the information or lack of information which the parliamentary assistant has given us tonight.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I should come back to one point in this discussion. First of all, as to the price, I am not in a position to argue that one way or the other. It is wholly unproven figure and is certainly very much below the cost of moving some houses from Dawson Creek to Edmonton. I am not, however, in a position to argue that in detail one way or the other. The whole crux of the matter is very simple. It comes to this, that the municipal authorities in the city of Vancouver took the position that they have no authority to expend municipal funds for the purpose of providing this type of emergency shelter. Whether they have or have not is a question of law, but certainly it is one that they themselves must assume the responsibility for deciding. We here cannot decide it. That is their position. They take the position that the dominion government should pay all the cost. The dominion government has not paid all the cost of these projects with other municipalities, and just what is the position if the dominion government now goes to British Columbia and pays all the cost in Vancouver, after having worked out satisfactory and reasonably workable arrangements with a great number of other municipalities across the dominion where the municipal and dominion authorities cooperated and contributed their portions of the cost and had the buildings made available, and so on?

That is the crux of the whole situation. As for the urgency in Vancouver, no one at all familiar with the situation will fail to agree at once that there is great need for emergency shelter in that city. That is not in issue at all and is not the point. I think the departmental officials are as well aware of that as anyone, and I can do nothing other than wholly agree with the remarks made by hon. members here about the need for shelter in Vancouver. But we must, I think, come to the real difficulty and deal with it. We must face up to it, and it turns simply on the inability to get cooperation from the municipal authorities either to pay for any part of these buildings made available for emergency shelter or to contribute to their cost.

Mr. GREEN: That is another case of passing the buck from the government to the municipality. The municipality will pass it back again, and in the meantime the veterans have no place to live in. The parliamentary assistant has said that the city will not underwrite the scheme—

Mr. McILRAITH: I went farther than "underwrite"; I said, "will not contribute."

Mr. GREEN: Is the department prepared to make an agreement with a private firm or a private individual if they will underwrite the project?

Mr. McILRAITH: The policy of the emergency shelter authorities has always been to deal with municipal authorities only. When you get to a matter of local administration, and so on, most people will agree that it is absolutely necessary to have the municipal authorities in it. That cooperation has been forthcoming from practically all the municipalities in the country. It has never been the policy to deal with a private individual in making emergency shelter available on the unit basis.

Mr. GREEN: The press report of the interview that was held here with the minister of reconstruction last week by three of the Vancouver members—unfortunately I was unable to return to Ottawa in time for the interview —was as follows, and I am quoting from the Vancouver Province of April 19:

> Previously, the Ottawa government had offered to put up $500 per Bremerton house, if Vancouver would underwrite the proposition. Today, Vancouver M.P.'s drew from Mr. Howe the undertaking that the dominion would put up the same amount even if the project were not handled by the city but through a non-profit corporation, with the accent on non-profit.

Is that statement correct, or is it not, because this evening the parliamentary assistant has said that his department will deal only with the municipality?

Mr. McILRAITH: All I can say about that is that the policy has been quite clear in the past. There has always been municipal management of these emergency shelter projects. This is the first I have ever heard of any suggestion that there would be other than municipal management of the project. That, if it were true, would, of course, involve a complete change of policy and would be something which the minister would have to deal with. I could not authoritatively bind the minister on a matter of policy like that. But it certainly is the first suggestion I have ever heard that we have other than municipal administration of this emergency shelter.

Mr. GREEN: The university of British Columbia is administering some emergency shelter.

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, that is quite true for special university projects; the provincial university is doing that.

Mr. PEARKES: Is not the Canadian Legion doing that?

Mr. McILRAITH: In Victoria there is a project where the legion takes part in it. They do not administer it themselves. They take part in it with the municipal authorities. There is one other project of a similar nature.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to ask my hon. friend a question. He has made a statement —and no doubt he has made it quite sincerely and honestly—that the municipal authorities of Vancouver rejected this cooperative enterprise. I should like to know how that communication was received and by whom it was signed. Was it signed by the mayor of Vancouver or by any of the civic aldermen of Vancouver? I am entitled to know, I think, as a representative from Vancouver.

Mr. GREEN: And is it since Easter or before?

Mr. McILRAITH: I can perhaps help to clarify that. I believe there was an amendment proposed to the city charter which was brought up before the Vancouver city council, a suggested amendment that they were to put forward to the provincial authorities giving them the authority to spend money for purposes like this and the city council rejected it. I think that would be a matter of record in the city council.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask who that communication came from? Was it the city clerk of Vancouver who made that communication to my hon. friend?

Mr. McILRAITH: I cannot say who it was that communicated that to the department. I think it will be found that the amendment was beaten by a very close vote of thirteen to twelve, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have you the date?

Mr. McILRAITH: I am not sure of the date, but I think it was about the middle of April.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): As one of the three members who attended the meetings with the Vancouver city council and with the minister, I must confess that I am a little surprised at hearing the difference in the parliamentary assistant's version of this and what the minister told us. It is apparently in the press, so in speaking I am not breaking any confidence. This Bremerton deal is a most unusual one, because I am quite sure there is no other place on the North American continent where there is a surplus of 40,000 houses, which is the surplus of wartime houses that there is in the state of Washington and Oregon, which were put up for the shipbuilders. They are two and three-bedroom houses. The houses are available at Bremerton in the state of Washington for $400; that is, the house itself, in its present situation, complete with stove, refrigerator and heating equipment. The joker in it is that the houses are not pre-fabs. They cannot be knocked down except for salvage. There is little sale for them because it is not allowed to move such houses along the highways of either the state of Washington or the state of Oregon. The only way whereby these houses can be moved is by sea on a scow. Quite a number of United States communities on Puget sound have obtained those houses at $400, floated them to their new location, brought them ashore and established them there. Here is the situation in Vancouver. A group of veterans did go down to examine these houses, did get a commitment that 1,600 can be made available if an official approach were made to the United States housing authorities by the proper authorities. None of the prefabricated houses could be bought because obviously the Americans wanted them themselves, but 1,600 of these other houses could be bought for $400 each. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver East were to the effect that a total of $2,160 would remove these houses from their sites in these wartime industries at Bremerton, float them up the sound to the Fraser river to the city of Vancouver and put them on these lots provided by the city at $100 apiece. Far from these figures not being certified, the city engineer and the city building inspector of Vancouver have checked these figures and agreed that that is a fair estimate. It is all very well to say that the government has not done this in the past. This is certainly an unusual situation, surplus houses available for the one place in Canada where the housing situation is more extreme than it is in any other. We met the Vancouver housing association, that excellent group of citizens who have so well managed the hotel Vancouver where 1,227 veterans' families are now finding shelter.

Mr. MERRITT: That is the citizens' rehabilitation council.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Yes, which has done such fine work. It is quite true, that unlike Wartime Housing, these Bremerton houses when set up will not be the type of housing that could be sold to the tenants as can Wartime Housing. I have gone over these matters carefully with the alderman who is most concerned, Alderman Cornett, and these young veterans, and I think this project should be publicly underwritten. If the city cannot do it, then it should be done by the federal government.

As far as the statement made by the parliamentary assistant is concerned, that the Vancouver city council rejected the scheme, that is not quite true. Six out of eight councillors were extremely anxious that the city should take advantage of this unusual offer. Two of the councillors, however, when this matter was brought up before the council, insisted on the regular two-weeks' notice before a charter amendment could be proposed. By that time the provincial legislature had prorogued, so that there was no opportunity. It is interesting to note that the mayor of Vancouver who is such an authority on spending other people's money did not raise his voice to try to help the six aldermen get this housing authority through. In fairness to the Vancouver aldermen, six of these aldermen did try very hard to get the city to purchase these houses. I suggest, like the other Vancouver members, that this is a most unusual situation where these good houses are available at such a low price, and that certainly no buck-passing between the federal government and the city council or any other group should be allowed to stand in the way.

As far as the statement of the parliamentary assistant is concerned, I was present at the meeting when the minister of reconstruction did say that he had made an offer of a grant of $500 per unit if these Bremerton houses were brought in by the city so that there must have been some pretty definite plan submitted to him before he would make such an offer. On the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and myself, as to whether that offer would be extended to a non-profit group, he did not quite commit himself. He said he was inclined to recommend it if it were a responsible non-profit organization, but that he would have to consult his colleagues before committing the government. I think at that time he suggested the Vancouver housing association or the rehabilitation league, who have done such excellent work. Far from saying no, I think it is a fair statement to say that he was inclined to approve if some responsible group would take over the importation of these houses.

This does not immediately concern me, because I am not a Vancouver member, although my constituency is called Vancouver North. It does, however, concern every member from British Columbia to see an offer like this of 1,600 houses, with stove, heater and refrigerator, available at $400, with an estimate of a total cost of importation and erection of between $2,000 and $2,500, slide by, because of some jurisdictional quarrel over who should pay for emergency shelter.

Mr. MERRITT: I have listened to this discussion in silence, but with a great deal of interest. Here we have a case where, as I understand it, the city council is afraid of getting into subsidized low-rental housing all alone, without any help from the province or the dominion. We have heard from the parliamentary assistant and from the other hon. members for about half an hour, that the dominion and the city council cannot find a basis for agreement. I believe that is what worries private members from Vancouver—the fact that agreement cannot be reached.

There is no question in the world that we must have a large number of houses built this year in Vancouver by Wartime Housing, and probably we should have the Bremerton houses, too. I do not care what agreement is come to, but I wish to say to the parliamentary assistant that very soon now these houses must be made available. This very same dispute between the dominion and the city had held up the opening of the old Vancouver hotel as a veterans hostel for some six months. The need was most acute. Many hon. members—and I was one of them—were active in trying to get it open. Late in January it was opened, but because certain veterans took forcible possession of the hotel. When that was done all the difficulties were resolved, satisfactory arrangements were made and the hotel was opened. While I am not sure of my dates, I believe it was six or eight months later the Little Mountain camp was declared surplus and evacuated. It, like the old hotel Vancouver, remained vacant for a considerable period of time, while this same dispute was going on. The inevitable happened there, too.

I could liken the inevitable to air rushing into a vacuum. There were empty houses on the one hand, and veterans' families in sore need on the other. The veterans simply moved in to Little Mountain. Had it not been for the university authorities, and had not the university branch of the legion come to the rescue very smartly and taken over that project on a management basis, at the same time straightening out the difficulties caused by the "squatting", if I may use a term which has been widely used, there would have been trouble at that point. The people of Vancouver have not liked the experience in these two instances.

I have risen at this time, at the end of this long and indeterminate discussion, to express my view that the government cannot let that happen again. I do not care what the arrangement is. I do not care even if the management is provided, without a detailed agreement with the city having been reached, such agreement being left to be decided after.

I should like to impress upon the government that this contract for the old hotel comes to an end early in 1948. There are at least 2,500 veterans' families urgently requiring housing at once. We cannot let any more emergency shelter become vacant without having management ready to take it over on the very day it becomes vacant. And we cannot let these 1,600 Bremerton houses go by, unless we are prepared next April to have a sufficient number of houses on the ground so that no one will miss the 1,600 we might have got from Bremerton.

I know Wartime Housing is working much faster now, as it acquires what is called the know-how of building. I am much concerned about the 2,000 houses mentioned in the newspaper report. The first contract was for 1,200 houses, and that was signed in the summer of 1945. I believe the last few houses are either just now coming into occupation, or have just come into occupation since the beginning of the year. I do not believe we have a period of even one or two months to play with before some actual work must be done to get wartime housing or Bremerton houses into Vancouver.

My suggestion to the parliamentary assistant is this: You have reached an impasse with the city council. They are on ground on which they consider they are entitled to stand. You are on ground on which you consider you are entitled to stand. We shall never get anywhere that way. You will both have to give way to some extent, in the interests of the people who need those houses, no matter what it may do to your other arrangements, and no matter what it may do to the city's responsibility for housing in the future. Both sides will have to come together, prepared to give way, so as to get those houses started.

Mr. McILRAITH: One or two things I think should be said about this point, although some of it may be repetitious. First of all, I think I made it clear in answer to the Minister of Veterans Affairs that there is no doubt at all about the need for emergency shelter in Vancouver. It was said tonight that the need in that city was the most extreme in Canada. That is not quite accurate. In any event it is extreme, and there is no doubt about the urgency.

The term buck-passing was used in reference to the negotiations in an effort to get emergency shelter in there. I think the kindest remark I can make about that term is that it is most unhelpful.

Mr. GREEN: It is most true, too.

Mr. McILRAITH: It is most untrue, as well as being unhelpful, notwithstanding the hon. member for Vancouver South. When a dominion authority, which has a responsibility to all the people of Canada in all the municipalities, finds an arrangement that is satisfactory to all the municipalities in Canada, with possibly one exception in addition to Vancouver, an arrangement into which almost all municipalities have seen fit to enter, and about which they have been satisfied—and have so expressed themselves in many instances—surely it is not buck-passing to ask the municipality of Vancouver to enter into a similar type of arrangement, and to start off the suggestion by offering them a cash contribution, right off, in the first letter, for each housing unit. Surely it is not buck-passing to suggest that the municipality look after the local administration of an emergency housing project? If all other municipalities have seen fit to enter into this arrangement, how can we now be accused of non-cooperation when we are asking the city to enter into the same type of arrangement. It just is not logical or reasonable.

Something was said about the private feelings of the city councillors. I am sorry, but I am not in position to tell hon. members what are the feelings of the city councillors because I do not know their private feelings. I merely know the position they have taken publicly in the course of their duties; I merely know the position they have seen fit to maintain, rightly or wrongly, as city councillors. I have not even suggested that they were wrong; I have merely stated the position they took, and that is their affair. They have their responsibilities; they have their own jurisdiction, and I have not been critical of it at all. I have merely pointed out what it was.

It will be seen from the discussion tonight that, notwithstanding the speeches of hon. members, notwithstanding their intense interest in having emergency shelter provided for needy cases, we come back to the same point, that not one of them has dealt with the key problem, whether or not it is possible to do anything without the cooperation of the municipal authorities.

Mr. MERRITT: I most certainly have done so.

Mr. McILRAITH: I do not want to enter into a detailed discussion. I should like to ask hon. members who controls such things as water connections, the distribution of water and the disposal of sewage in the corporation limits?

Mr. MERRITT: The city is not raising any trouble about servicing.

Mr. McILRAITH: They will not give the services that all other municipalities give in connection with wartime housing. By the way, there are a great many of these units going into Vancouver. Their proposition at the moment is that the city be paid $400 for each lot upon which wartime houses have been built.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is what Wartime Housing promised to do and now you are reneging on it.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, I am not reneging on anything; I am merely stating the fact. That was in addition to requesting that full taxes be paid on all these lots.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Why not?

Mr. McILRAITH: That is the difficulty there. The emergency shelter authorities are fully aware of the difficulty in Vancouver and are most anxious and willing to cooperate. However the government has a duty to other persons residing outside the city of Vancouver, and it has to defend what it does in one municipality when it is different from what is done in other municipalities.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): As a member on this side of the house and also as a member who is not representing a Vancouver seat, perhaps I can be expected to make a little more impartial reply. One of the points raised by the parliamentary assistant explains why the Vancouver city council feels so dubious about going on. Wartime Housing made an agreement with Vancouver by which they got these lots very cheaply and for low taxes. The signed agreement was that if any house was sold to tenants within five years the city would get $400 as tax sale price of the lot. Now when the houses are beginning to be sold Wartime Housing is attempting to renegotiate the contract, which the city accepted in good faith, to give only $100.

When three of the Vancouver members met the minister we said that one of the first things that should be done to establish the right atmosphere for negotiation between council and government was for Wartime Housing to live up to their present agreement and pay the $400 they had agreed to pay.

The second point in connection with these negotiations came out in the words of the parliamentary assistant when he said that there were a very great number of wartime houses in Vancouver. That is quite true. In my own riding of Vancouver North we have a great number of them which were built on lots that were obtained for $1 a lot. Twenty-five dollars was paid in lieu of taxes, which means that the citizens of Vancouver North, who were paying $75 or $80 more taxes on a similar type of house on lots in the immediate vicinity, were making up the difference.

The three Vancouver members made it quite clear to the minister that they did not believe in going on giving special subsidies to veterans in wartime houses by continuing to pay $25 in lieu of taxes. We felt that the veteran who bought a house privately should receive some protection. Why should he pay full taxes on his house and then share the cost of the reduction in taxes to veterans in wartime houses? The three of us, despite our different political outlooks, agreed that the Vancouver city council was right. I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant, as we suggested to the minister of reconstruction, that one of the first things Wartime Housing had better do in Vancouver is to live up to the deal that they have made.

Mr. McILRAITH: As far as the contract between Wartime Housing and Vancouver is concerned, Wartime Housing is perfectly willing and ready and anxious to live up to its contract in detail. If the hon member want to pursue the point any farther he will find that there has never been the slightest suggestion that they do other than live up to the contract.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Apparently the parliamentary assistant is right and the mayor and the council are wrong, or Wartime Housing is doing something of which the parliamentary assistant has no knowledge. The first point brought up by the Vancouver members—there were four of us at that meeting—was the fact that Wartime Housing were trying to renegotiate that stipulation, and I ask my colleagues to substantiate that statement.

Mr. MERRITT: That is true.

Mr. McILRAITH: I think I can clear that up very quickly. If the city wants full taxes on these houses it must renegotiate the contract with Wartime Housing, because the contract provides, among other things, for a much smaller fixed payment in lieu of taxes. If the city wants its full taxes it must, of course, renegotiate the agreement. It cannot have both sides of the same coin face uppermost at the same time.

Mr. MERRITT: All this discussion just goes to show that there is need for people to reach an understanding. I must say that I would rather not thresh over this old straw: I would much rather hear from the parliamentary assistant that he realizes that these houses must go into Vancouver this year and that he is prepared, through Wartime Housing, to see that they do go there and that an agreement is reached by such negotiation as is necessary. If the city proves intractable, as the parliamentary assistant seems to suggest, then the suggestion the Vancouver members have already made should be adopted, that is, that the rents be set slightly higher to take the difference into consideration. There is no good in trying to allot the blame, and it would not be necessary if we could be satisfied that the government was intent on getting these houses started. If that were the case we would not have to discuss this matter at all.

Mr. GREEN: Two subjects have become mixed up in the discussion. One is the ordinary wartime houses and the other is this Bremerton project. I have my notes covering Wartime Housing which I took at the meeting with the city council, and we were certainly told by the city council that the original arrangement was that if the houses were sold within five years the city would get $400 a house.

Mr. McILRAITH: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: We saw them during the Easter recess and they told us that the government was then taking the stand that, instead of paying $400, only $100 would be paid.

I also took some notes with regard to the Bremerton project. The parliamentary assistant has said the city would not give any help at all. The councillors told us the city would open up the district in which the Bremerton houses would be placed, at the expense of the city, which I presume meant roads and water, at least; and they also said they would either give or rent the lots to the Central Mortgage Corporation, whichever the corporation wished. So that there is no question about the council being willing to cooperate. It is just a matter of the two authorities getting together.

I would ask the parliamentary assistant whether his department will now find out from the United States government whether these houses are available for sale to Canada. That has not been done as yet, and I suggest that it should be done just as quickly as possible. Perhaps it will have to be done through the Department of External Affairs. The minister of that department is here this evening, and he can tell us whether that step will be necessary. Is the government willing to find out at once whether or not these houses are available? And is the Department of Reconstruction willing to have the houses, when they are brought in, operated by an organization such as the citizens' rehabilitation council or some other non-profit organization? If those two points were cleared up, first, whether or not the houses can be obtained at all from the United States, and whether, if they are brought in, they could be operated by a body such as the rehabilitation council, we would be getting somewhere.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard raised some questions about the speed with which these problems are handled. I believe the emergency shelter authorities and the department are fully equipped to deal very quickly with these matters; the difficulty does not lie in that direction at all.

Mr. MERRITT: May I ask the parliamentary assistant when you would have to commence in order to have 2,000 wartime houses completed by next April?

Mr. McILRAITH: I cannot answer that question accurately; too many factors are involved, so that any answer I might give would not be worked out carefully enough.

Mr. MERRITT: That rather destroys the value of what the parliamentary assistant just said.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, it does not destroy it at all; it just shows the need of cooperation on the part of all parties concerned. The situation is still the same on this point as I previously stated it to be. The question has been raised of the application to the United States authorities. I will bring the matter before the minister, but for myself, with what little influence I have, I certainly would not suggest that an application be made to a foreign government to import houses on a hypothetical question like this, when no one is ready to import them and the authority is not clarified.

Mr. GREEN: You would not even ask whether the United States would consent?

Mr. McILRAITH: Surely we must have some evidence of a bona fide application to import before a foreign government can be approached on a matter like this. However, as I said, I will bring forward the point in any event. The question was narrowed down by the hon. member for Vancouver South in his concluding remarks in regard to the management of these houses, assuming the other difficulties were worked out in conjunction with the city. He asked whether the citizens' rehabilitation council could administer them, or whether that might be done by some other authority. In the first place, "some other authority" is perhaps pretty vague, and I think we can just leave that aside for the moment. As far as the citizens' rehabilitation council is concerned, I should think possibly some satisfactory arrangement could be worked out for the management of this project by them, if all the other difficulties could be satisfactorily solved in cooperation with the city. I do not think there is any use in beating over the other point of where the city councillors stand or do not stand. The fact remains that they claim they have no authority to spend any money on getting these houses in, and the further fact remains that they have declined to apply for that authority. As I said before, I have been careful not to state whether they are right or wrong in that; I merely give it as the fact.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The members from the Vancouver area have I think, done a very good job. I was in Vancouver at the time the discussions took place between the Vancouver members and the city council, and the statement by the parliamentary assistant tonight comes as quite a surprise to me. In reading the Vancouver newspapers, one got the impression that the city fathers were prepared to cooperate fully in carrying out a project of this kind. I believe Vancouver deserves special consideration. My information is that a larger percentage of ex-service personnel have settled in Vancouver than in any other city in the country. I think it is well established that building materials are going to be very short for the next couple of years, and with the situation described by the hon. member for Vancouver North, where 1,600 houses can be placed on lots in Vancouver with very little trouble, I believe, while this government has this emergency power, it should go out of its way to see that something is done. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South made a reasonable request when he suggested that the minister of reconstruction should consult with the United States authorities to find out whether or not these houses can be made available. If the Vancouver newspapers were reporting the conferences at all accurately I am sure public opinion in Vancouver will force the city fathers to go along with the federal authorities in reaching some agreement. The whole discussion thus far this evening emphasizes the point I made on Friday, that we do need to have consultation at all levels of government; and I think the parliamentary assistant should give some assurance that machinery will be set up to enable us to deal with this sort of problem.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was in Quebec last September making a survey in regard to the question of a free port, and on the docks there I saw a number of prefabricated houses. On inquiry I was advised that they were being shipped to France, and I was very glad to learn that France was getting some assistance from us. I understood that we were sending a thousand or more prefabricated houses, each having about four rooms. They were neat little houses; as a Canadian I was very proud of them and was glad to think our allies were getting some assistance. At the same time I wondered if we had so many houses in Canada that we could afford to ship a thousand or so abroad in that way.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Mackenzie raised a point as to cooperation. Perhaps the best answer to that is that we have approximately 120 of these emergency shelter projects, and we get very good cooperation in connection with at least 117 of them. I think that emphasizes the degree of cooperation the authorities are prepared to give in this matter. There is no doubt at all that the utmost cooperation is required on the part of all the authorities, whether dominion or municipal.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Can the parliamentary assistant say anything about prefabricated houses being shipped from Vancouver to England?

Mr. McILRAITH: To deal with the second point raised by the hon. member for Davenport about prefabricated houses, it is quite true that prefabricated houses were being exported, but they were only shells with the lumber in them. They had none of the finishing materials in them.

Mr. MacNICOL: No stoves; no plumbing.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, nothing of that kind at all; no wiring or anything of that sort; just the lumber shells, and the lumber in them is actually taken out of the lumber export quota. It is part of the export quota of lumber.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Something has been said about the question of houses in the city of Toronto. So far as emergency shelter and shared accommodation are concerned, many people in Toronto would be glad to take people in.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They generally do.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I know, but you are easy to take in. People in Toronto are willing to take persons in and give them shelter. A great deal of that is being done at the present time, especially in connection with university students. But you have to be careful who they are. They have to be compatible. That is to say, they have to be people who can get on together. There are two reasons why the people would like to do it. We realize the appalling situation we have in Toronto. If hon. members were there they would realize it too. It is easy enough to get these people into your houses. They will come; there is no doubt about that. All you have to do is to ask them to come and they will come in; but they will stay there, and it is quite a problem to get them out, particularly when you think of the regulations in connection with evictions and all the long processes which have to be gone through. The average person who has a house is going to be just a little bit careful before he takes anybody in. My suggestion is, make some change in the law in connection with eviction. Make it easier for a person to get rid of these people if they are not liked. Change it so that they can be evicted for cause. At the present time it is difficult to get rid of them for cause. I know of home owners who have been trying to get rid of these people for cause and they have not been able to get them out.

I suggest that if we have some sort of written agreement between a person who owns a house and the person who wishes to come in, which would be binding and which could not be overriden by the present order in council with regard to agreements, it will be found that a great many people in Toronto will be glad to give accommodation to those who need emergency shelter. That is an important factor. People will not take persons into their homes and give them shelter today because it is so difficult to get them out. Unless they are almost crooks you can hardly get them out of your house. That is the suggestion I have to make. I do not like the idea of blaming Toronto for lack of shelter or the citizens for not giving shelter to these people because it is not the fault of the citizens. It is the fault of the regulations governing evictions.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the fault of the government.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is the fault of the government, yes. The hon. member did not think I was speaking on behalf of the government. Perhaps I have not expressed myself clearly but I think I have made my point. My suggestion to the parliamentary assistant is to do something about these regulations and he will find that a great many homes will be opened up.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In games it is often wise to get an out-of-town referee who is unprejudiced toward these aristocrats from British Columbia. They assume that position with the rest of Canada all the time. In the private quarrel which has been going on between them and the parliamentary assistant to the minister I am trying to analyse the facts. I accept it on all sides that in Bremerton, which is not far away, there are 1,600 houses available, which could be brought to Vancouver and set up—they contain a refrigerator and a stove—for approximately $2,000. That seems to be the basic fact. If that can be done it is the cheapest housing in the world for Canada, infinitely less than we are paying under any other government scheme. What is the reason for this debate and what is the position of the parliamentary assistant? Merely one of frustration, saying we cannot do it because of some people—I was going to use the word "stupid"—perhaps stubborn people on the Vancouver city council. Here we sit in this House of Commons which is assumed to be a responsible and deliberative body. That last word is certainly true. Here we sit with a thing at our doorstep which should be done, and we find the parliamentary assistant—all the committee wants it done—saying we cannot do it because of a technical—and it is a technical—difficulty with the Vancouver city council. That being so, it is not good enough for the parliamentary assistant to tell us that our hands are tied for that reason, without giving us some constructive suggestion as to how this difficulty can be solved.

Then I turn to the second question which was asked by all the Vancouver members as to the present status of these houses. By "status" I mean whether or not these houses can still be purchased. The parliamentary assistant takes the position—where he gets the authority or the precedent for it I do not know—that he will not ask the government of the United States—I assume from that remark that the houses are governmental owned—whether they are available until he has had the detail of purchase and movement worked out. If business were conducted in that way we would never get anywhere. Surely there is no object in fiddling with the city council of Vancouver. There is no object in blaming them for being stubborn if these houses are not available. All we have to do is ask a very simple question. I understand from the hon. member from Vancouver North that the only reason we can get them is that you have to float them. They are not prefabricated, and Vancouver is one of the places to which they can be floated. With the greatest respect to the parliamentary assistant, his every answer, his whole speech tonight, was simply that of frustration, saying, "blame it on the other fellow," without a single constructive suggestion as to how we can get the 1,600 houses which are so badly needed by men returned from this war. In other words, the answer is not good enough.

Mr. PEARKES: Most of the debate this evening has centred around houses to be built in the cities. I have on previous occasions pointed out the desirability of erecting houses where there is work for men to do—in the country. As far as British Columbia is concerned, we need to erect houses near the logging camps and sawmills. I understood last year that the regulations were made more elastic, so that logging, mining and fishing companies might be able to get assistance in the construction of houses in those areas away from the city. I was concerned with the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant this evening, as far as I could hear him, and his voice at that time did not carry very well to these back benches here. Did he say that only the municipalities could administer houses built under these schemes?

Mr. McILRAITH: Under the emergency shelter.

Mr. PEARKES: I was under the impression that, according to the regulations amended last year, logging, lumbering, fishing and mining companies would be able to erect and administer houses, assisted in the financing by this federal government.

Mr. McILRAITH: I was speaking about emergency shelter.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant how many such projects have been started since these regulations were passed last session.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Nanaimo has been, I am afraid, inadvertently confusing what is before the committee at the moment. We are now dealing with the emergency shelter regulations and my remarks were confined to them. The point he now raises has to do with the National Housing Act and administration of Wartime Housing Limited. There is on the order paper a resolution concerning the National Housing Act and I hope we shall reach it soon, when the information he asks for can be given to him. The question he asks does not pertain to the emergency shelter regulations.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the two orders in council referring to emergency shelter carry?

P.C. 9439 and P.C. 7502 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to order in council No. 3, an amendment has been offered but not accepted. There have however been amendments offered and accepted to No. 245 and No. 1997. Will these two orders in council as amended carry?

Mr. FULTON: This afternoon the parliamentary assistant was kind enough to promise me that he would make inquiries into a situation which has already considerably vexed the house and, I understand, the minister, and that is the matter of nails. Since the matter was last discussed in the house, I have had telegrams from farmers and ranchers in my own constituency saying that they require to do their spring work on their flumes for irrigation purposes. Unless they get nails to repair these flumes the water will not reach the land, and in that dry country it is essential that irrigation be started now. It is absolutely impossible to obtain nails. There is, we are advised, no priority for such purposes as repairing flumes; the only priority that exists is with respect to the building of houses, but I am told that, even after this priority is satisfied, there are nails left over. Although we are advised of all these factors, I had a second telegram today informing me that no nails are available except on the black market, and on calling this matter to the attention of the department I am given to understand that there exists an unexplainable situation in British Columbia with regard to the disappearance of nails from legitimate markets. Has the parliamentary assistant had those inquiries made which he promised, and is he in a position to tell me how I can assist these farmers in getting nails which they require for the repair of their flumes?

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Kamloops did speak to me about this matter this afternoon. I gave what information I had and I was to speak to him further before six o'clock. I told him I would see him this evening but I have not had an opportunity of doing so, as hon. members will appreciate.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate that.

Mr. McILRAITH: The situation is this. The priorities given for nails are limited to the low-cost houses under the Veterans' Land Act, Wartime Housing, integrated housing, and veterans housing of that sort, and it leaves between eighty and eighty-five per cent of the gross nail production in the country available for distribution through the normal channels of trade. Apparently there has been a severe difficulty in some parts of British Columbia in getting nails through the local hardware stores. I do not think there is any doubt about that difficulty and the acuteness of it. There is no control of the distribution down through the retail outlets. There is simply control over all production and the nails required for priority projects. The steel controller is at present in western Canada. Perhaps all I can usefully say on the point is that the difficulty spoken of by the hon. member for Kamloops will be looked into.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate the position the department is in and also the spirit of the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant, but I think he on his part will appreciate my difficulty. These people want twenty-five kegs of nails in Ashcroft. They need them urgently for this work, because if they do not get the water in that country in the spring, and get it on the land, they will not have any crops at all. All the flumes are knocked to pieces every winter by the snow and ice; they are only wooden structures which have to be made watertight every year. The people on whose behalf I am speaking want twenty-five kegs of nails, and the sympathetic and courteous remarks of the parliamentary assistant, while I sincerely appreciate them, will not help me to tell them how to get nails. Surely the department can bring some pressure to bear upon those who are in charge of the wholesale distribution of nails in that province. I am not one to do any capitalist-baiting or business-baiting, because business as a whole is, I believe, respectable, and has been pushed around too much; but there are two firms—McLennan, McFeely and Prior and Marshall-Wells—who largely control or influence the wholesale distribution of hardware in that province, and I am quite sure they would be anxious to adjust the situation which is portrayed by the parliamentary assistant, who says that only fifteen per cent of the nails are allocated on a priority basis, which means that eighty-five per cent are available for normal trade. If these firms had it brought home to them that nails are going astray I am sure they would make twenty-five kegs available to those in Ashcroft who need them. As a matter of fact, I have no doubt that if it were brought to their attention that people all through the interior of the province, the retail hardware stores, cannot get nails except on the black market, these responsible firms would look into the matter and make sure that hardware stores in the interior of the province get their fair share of nails direct from their warehouse. Will the parliamentary assistant say whether the department can use their influence—I hate asking them to use it, but the nails are needed—and send a telegram to Marshall-Wells and McLennan, McFeely and Prior, asking them to make twenty-five kegs of nails of the specified size available to the Ashcroft Ranchers' Association?

Mr. McILRAITH: I intended to do something more than express myself sympathetically to the hon. member for Kamloops. I do not feel myself in a position to send a telegram to the wholesaler. I did indicate that the steel controller, who is also the priorities officer, is in the west now, and we also have a regional officer in Vancouver. I meant to imply that we would certainly look further into the difficulty raised by my hon. friend. I refrained from saying that any priority order will be issued, because it will not be issued. What we can do is to make an inquiry to see where we are likely to get the nails, to find out where they have been trying to get the nails and get all the other relevant information. We simply have not all that available here at the moment. The best I can do for the hon. member is simply to indicate that the matter will be looked into further by the appropriate officer, with a view to helping him and indicating where the nails should be available.

Mr. FULTON: Can the action be initiated by telegraph now, so that the investigation will start first thing tomorrow morning?

Mr. McILRAITH: I may be overcautious, Mr. Chairman, but I do not care to tie myself down as to the method or the time. I do not know whether certain officials in the department will be talking by telephone with the steel controller tomorrow or not, or how it will be done.

Mr. FULTON: Have his secretary dictate a telegram.

Mr. McILRAITH: I suggest to the hon. member that he leave the matter just with the statement I made, that we would have it looked into. That means precisely what it said. If he would just leave it that way, perhaps he would get done by me what he is hoping to get done. I can only say that I can direct the inquiry to the proper officials who can get the facts, find out what the situation is and try to be as helpful as they can.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, this atmosphere of frustration is spreading.

Mr. REID: I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that he go a little farther because, when I was back home at Easter time, it was drawn to my attention that farmers who were living close to the boundary and who were unable to get nails, were able to buy across the line all the Canadian nails they required at more than double the price. This is an aspect which has never before been brought to the attention of the committee, and I am doing it now. These farmers living within about ten or twelve miles from the border, who were unable to find nails in Canada, went across the border in their cars and, lo and behold, in the hardware stores in the cities and towns close to the border there were kegs of Canadian nails. It is well known that the United States authorities have withdrawn about thirty-four customs officers. I know the department cannot stop the taking of nails across the line, but this is what is worrying us: How did these bootleggers get the nails in the first instance? How were they able to get kegs of nails which are now in the United States and being sold at two and a half times the price?

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they Canadian nails?

Mr. REID: Canadian nails. They went across the border under cover, but how were they obtained? What wholesaler supplied these black market men with Canadian nails so that they were able to do this nefarious business? It is galling now for Canadians, when they cannot get nails in their own country, to go across to the United States and find Canadian-made nails right in the shops in the United States.

I had another case of a young veteran who could not get nails, where a contractor said to him, "I can get you some;" and the contractor sent to the province of Saskatchewan and got him two kegs of nails. How have they a surplus in Saskatchewan? He told me that on good authority. He said, "It is true that I paid double the price for them, but I wanted those nails and I got them." When the parliamentary assistant is having the matter looked into I suggest that he find out, or have instructions given to find out, first, how these nails are slipping across the line and, second, who is responsible for handing out nails to these men who are carrying on this nefarious business.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were the Saskatchewan nails black market nails?

Mr. REID: No. So far as I know, the Saskatchewan nails were not; but the Canadian nails across the line were black market nails.

Mr. FERGUSON: I have heard some hon. members say that they realize the government's difficulty. I can say that I understand the government's muffing. We hear about nails for veterans' homes, but we hear nothing very much about the shortage of steel for ships, of which this country is badly in need. When we cannot build ships we have unemployment, particularly in Collingwood, Kingston or any other city in Canada where ships are being constructed. This entire situation has been laid at the feet of the government and blamed on them. Possibly we should extend the numbers who are granted O.B.E.'s and a few other honours, to make this government wake up and do the job which they did during the war when shortages occurred. There seems to be a lack of incentive to get down to earth and get busy.

An hon. MEMBER: More controls.

Mr. FERGUSON: We do not need controls. I have had hundreds of men working for me, and I always found that if you talked to them as men, on a commonsense basis, they would increase their working hours and produce the goods; and it was not C.C.F. controls that did that. There must be a solution. I have found this to be true of union officials, union men, labouring men and women all over this country: if appealed to properly and if the shortage was actually demonstrated to them conclusively, they would get down to work and produce the goods. I believe that is applicable to any plant in Canada producing any commodity.

We continually harp from day to day on the shortage of nails—bootleg nails made in Canada, bought in the United States and used in Canada. You skip over the shortage of steel for all purposes, and that is due to the government's negligence prior to the cessation of hostilities. Eighteen months before this war was over, when the Germans were retreating in France, the minister of reconstruction knew that the war would be over very shortly; and if he can point his finger to any preparation that he, his department or this government made to meet the exigencies which exist today in any commodities, I should like him to do so. The people of Canada are being hoodwinked about the shortage of nails. But in every single commodity there has been no preparation made to alleviate these shortages. We are spending days here trying to extend the powers, for what? Powers to procrastinate. That is what we are doing. Let us get down to earth. We have spent an hour tonight listening to members from Vancouver who could not get a concrete statement out of the parliamentary assistant about what he was actually going to do or what this government was going to do, so that there could be a concrete and definite comeback from the officials of Vancouver city. Talk about buck-passing! It is all buck-passing. Possibly we should offer more O.B.E.'s, and then we might get somewhere with the production of all the shortages which exist today.

Mr. WINTERS: I should like to say a very few words about the position of Nova Scotia in respect of timber control. That will get us off steel for a few minutes.

Mr. FULTON: Let the parliamentary assistant go out and send my telegram first.

Mr. GREEN: On a point of order, may I ask what we are discussing.

The CHAIRMAN: I called the orders in council with regard to both the steel and timber regulations, because the amendment with respect to both regulations had been approved. However, if the committee would prefer to dispose of the steel regulation first, we can do so.

Mr. GREEN: You have not yet disposed of order in council P.C. 3.

The CHAIRMAN: That order in council stands until we dispose of 245 and 1997, because amendments in respect of those two orders in council have been passed. I thought the committee should come back to pass the amendment to P.C. 3.

Mr. GREEN: It was my understanding that we would pass these one after another, and P.C. 3 would follow the emergency shelter orders in council.

The CHAIRMAN: It is immaterial, so far as the chair is concerned. I shall read the amendment. It is moved by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 3 of 4th January, 1944, as amended:

"Section 12(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

12(2) Where a controller believes that any person has failed to produce books, records or documents, or to give full and complete information as required by such controller under the authority of any regulation, he may, with the approval of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of a superior or a county court, which approval such judge is hereby empowered to give upon the ex parte application of the controller, authorize in writing under his hand a police officer, police constable or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, together with any other person named therein, to enter and search, if necessary by force, any building, receptacle or place, for books, records or documents which may contain information required by such controller, and to seize the same and carry them before such controller or such other person as such controller may direct, to be held at the discretion of such controller for such uses as he is authorized by any regulation to make."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall P.C. 3 as amended carry?

Mr. FULTON: I asked the Minister of Justice if he would accept an amendment to section 15 (6) of P.C. 3. The minister pointed out at that time that there were certain objections to the amendment, one being that the same provision occurred in an earlier order in council, and that the amendment had been omitted when that order was discussed.

Mr. McILRAITH: Would the hon. member for Kamloops let us have the section of P.C. 3 to which he is referring?

Mr. FULTON: It is 15 (6). The amendment which I should like to move is as follows:

That the schedule to the bill be amended by inserting in the column headed "Amendments" the following:

"Order in council P.C. 3 dated January 4, 1944, as amended, is further amended by deleting from section 15 (6) the words "or is found or apprehended or in custody" where they occur in the last line thereof."

The purpose, as I said the other night, was to provide that a person must be sued or proceeded against in the place where he carries on business or where he resides. That ensures that there will be no abuse of the power of prosecution in taking action which might result, as the section is at present worded, in a man's being apprehended in one part of the country, although he carries on business in another part, and being held and proceeded against at some point thousands of miles away from his place of business without his books and records available.

[The Chairman.]

The Minister of Justice pointed out that a similar provision existed in the Foreign Exchange Control Board Act which passed the house last year. He said we had not taken specific objection to that section, and upon investigation I find that is true. However I do not think the fact it is in that act makes it necessarily good. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that it does not make it necessarily bad, but I think he will agree it does not make it necessarily good. It also exists in the Customs Act. But there it is clearly confined to cases where the penalty will not exceed $200. The penalty here may be as high as $5,000.

The government says it is making an effort to do away with controls as rapidly as possible. In many instances it has consented to restrictions on wide and possibly excessive powers within the framework of the main control measures. It is on this ground I would ask that the amendment be accepted.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am afraid I am in a position of not being able to accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Kamloops. These words have been contained in the section for some years. We are now dealing with an extension for a limited period of time. So far there has been no complaint about this section. If the words are taken out we are faced with the possible administrative difficulty of having to go to the expense of transporting an accused person back to the place where the offence was committed, or where he carries on business, even though the accused might be prepared to plead guilty.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The same provision is in the order which was passed with regard to the wartime prices and trade board. If the hon. member will look at page 26 of the office consolidation and refer particularly to section 11(2) of that order, which was passed by the committee the other day, he will find exactly the same language.

Mr. FULTON: I admit that, but I pointed out that it was an oversight. Had we noticed it, we would have moved a similar amendment when that order in council was before the house. As to the matter of expense, if an accused is prepared to plead guilty, surely it would not cost any more to commence the action in the court where the accused resides or carries on business. If he is going to plead guilty, presumably he would not object to that being done. It would not cost any more, or present any administrative difficulty.

Mr. McILRAITH: Earlier this evening hon. members raised questions about breaches of these orders. By deleting these words the hon. member is making it more difficult administratively to determine where offences take place, and permitting the raising of jurisdictional defences to prosecutions in what is already a difficult administrative position. I can only reiterate that this is an inopportune time to make that administrative change.

We have precedents of this sort in the permanent legislation, and I do not see why we should be expected to make the exception in this temporary short-term order in council, when we have it in permanent legislation. There has never been any suggestion that it has been in any way abused, in the number of years when there were a great many control orders outstanding.

Mr. MILLER: I do not think it can be said that the principle of British justice was ever based on the theory that the government or the crown would be fair to an accused person. I realize that in modern legislation, particularly in the regulations being made from time to time, the old theory of protecting the accused is being sacrificed to the principle of making it convenient for the crown, not necessarily to convict but to prosecute. It seems to me that, if the crown authorities desire, under the provisions of subsection 6 they could try a man, perhaps 600 or 700 miles from where he lives, from where his witnesses might be or from where his records might be. It may be said that that is fantastic, that no government would be so unfair, but I repeat that British criminal jurisdiction has not been built on the foundation of trusting the crown authorities; it has been based on the rights of an accused person, on the principle that his rights will never be infringed. Those battles for liberty of the person and the right to make a full and free defence were fought long ago, and the onus or a heavy part of the burden has always rested on the crown. It should not be made easy for the crown to proceed at the expense of an accused person. I suggest that we should get back to the theory of protecting the accused, and therefore the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops should be accepted by the government or carried by this committee.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived.

P.C. 3 as amended agreed to.

On P.C. 245.

Mr. CASE: I think it would be a mistake to let this opportunity pass without driving one more nail into the coffin.

Mr. FULTON: Where will you get it from?

Mr. CASE: I have been told where I can get one to finish the job if I can just hit the nail on the head. There are two schools of thought in connection with this scarcity of nails. One is that the fault lies with the manufacturers, and the other is that there is a bottleneck at the wholesale level. I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops that it is impossible for the retail trade to secure nails.

It should be emphasized that not only is it difficult to secure nails for construction purposes but, as has been indicated from my riding, it is difficult to obtain them for other purposes. A fish-box manufacturer at Penetang has had his factory closed down for six months because of a lack of nails, with the result that 150 to 175 men have been out of work. They have made a strong appeal for nails, and they say they are willing to use any kind if they can get them to put into motion an industry which affects our entire food supply. I have had communications from the retail hardware dealers' association complaining that they are unable to obtain nails. They contend that there is a bottleneck at the wholesale level, that nails are being passed out to large users.

I consider this matter of sufficient consequence and importance that the department or the steel controller should take notice of it. The excuse is made that if more nails are manufactured there will be no wire fencing, that it is a question of deciding which is the most important. It seems to me that there has been a lack of planning. When nails were first mentioned in this house we never thought for one moment our national economy would depend on this ordinary article.

The ratepayers of the town of Meaford voted to build a new public school to cost $160,000, but they were unable to obtain the nails required to start this public building. Building, particularly in the smaller communities, will be at a standstill, while people who are building huge skyscrapers and constructing places of amusement will be able to obtain all the nails they need. I do not think it is a matter of more controls. I am one of those who believe that the controls should have been removed long ago, particularly on industries of this kind. There would then have been a greater incentive to produce. It is all right to argue about price, but if you are unable to obtain an article at any price it creates a graver situation than if you can obtain it at some price.

It is interesting to note that those who are willing to patronize the black market are able to secure these items that should be sold through the regular trade channels. It must be accepted that it is the controls which drive legitimate dealers to carry on through the black market. This evidence was well supported by the minister of reconstruction when he stated, in effect, in this house that they had discovered there were more used cars being sold through the black market than through any other source and that for that reason controls were being removed.

I think we shall have to grapple with this problem in some realistic manner in order to meet the demands of those engaged in the construction industry and the production of goods and services so necessary to the general economic welfare of the country. I wanted to put these remarks on the record even though nails have been spoken of so often. However I think this is the first time I have mentioned them in the house. I do hope that the steel controller and those charged with responsibility will give immediate consideration to one of the greatest problems we have to contend with at the present time.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to get a little information, and perhaps I might even get that causeway built across the strait of Canso before I am finished. I am sorry the minister of reconstruction is not in his place at the moment, but I shall leave a few thoughts with his parliamentary assistant. During the last war the federal government rehabilitated a plate mill at Sydney, Nova Scotia. That mill had been built by the Canadian government at the time of the first war at a cost of $11,000,000 to the taxpayers of Canada. It did not go into production because the war was finished before it was ready. My information is that the company sued the government for breach of contract because the mill did not produce and they secured some more money.

During the period between the two wars all the machinery from that mill was moved by the then existing corporation to Ojibway in Ontario. When the last war broke out, all that was left was the shell of that mill which had been erected at a cost of $11,000,000 to the taxpayers of Canada. I raised the matter on several occasions in 1940, and finally the present minister of reconstruction made a statement to the house that the government intended to rehabilitate the mill. This meant that for the second time the taxpayers of Canada would equip the mill at Sydney and put it into production.

During a part of this war that mill employed some 600 men and produced steel plate for shipbuilding purposes. As soon as the war ended, the mill went out of production and it stands idle today in Sydney, Nova Scotia. The federal government has been requested by the city council and other bodies in Nova Scotia to do something about putting that mill back into production. I wrote the minister asking whether it could not be used for the production of steel plate; and only a few days ago, on April 11 to be exact, he informed me quite definitely by letter that the mill was not going back into production. The general manager of the Sydney steel plant, Mr. C. M. Anson, replied to the inquiry of the city council as to whether this mill might be put back into production, and this is what he said:

> . . . in his reply to the council advised that the plate mill was obsolete and too costly to operate in comparison with the modernly equipped mills in Upper Canada.

I would draw to the attention of the committee the fact that in 1941 this mill was reequipped by the Canadian government, and I would ask the minister or his parliamentary assistant to inform the committee whether the work done at that time and the equipment put into the mill were supervised by representatives of the government, and what kind of equipment was put in that became obsolete and out of date within four years, as far as the production of steel plate is concerned. Or did the government merely provide the money and allow the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation to put old, obsolete equipment in that mill, with the government paying first-class prices? My reason for asking the question is that the taxpayers of Canada have an investment of approximately 16,000,000 in that mill. At the present time we are importing most of our steel plate from the United States. There is a serious unemployment problem in that end of Canada. Is it the intention of the government to try to use that mill and put it back into production? If not, since the Canadian government and the taxpayers of Canada own that mill, will the government consider selling the mill to people I have in mind, who might put it into production?

Mr. McILRAITH: I am sorry I am not in a position to give the hon. member full information on the subject. On one point, however, I can do so; that is, we will consider an offer to sell very quickly and thoroughly. As to the other part, I believe it worked out in this way; that it was the rehabilitation of an old plant which was not equipped. That was done by the company, but they obtained a loan for the purpose from the dominion government. Part of the loan was repaid; a settlement was then made, and the plant was turned over to the crown in settlement of certain balances outstanding. I believe that is the way in which the transaction was carried out. With my lack of information I do not think it would be useful for me to extend my remarks on the subject.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I was perhaps the first in this house to inquire about nails something over a year ago. I am still inquiring about nails, and it seems to me that the answer given tonight was no better than the answer given a year ago in regard to the nail situation. I do not believe the answer which has been given is good enough, and I think the government should do something immediately to see that nails are made available to the people of Canada, not only for building purposes but for urgent repairs on the farm. If only fifteen per cent of the nails produced are being held on priority for housing purposes, where are the rest of the nails going? I believe the people of Canada should be given an answer to that question. Especially do I think something should be done for the farmers. Here is a quotation from a letter from a hardware dealer, showing what happens when farmers come in and ask for nails:

> As a parting shot the farmer customer will venture the assertion that "had the farmers been as completely indifferent to the appeals of the government during wartime, as the government now is to the needs of the farmer, a totally different production picture would have resulted." He will further state that in his humble opinion the primary industry of the nation should at least have some consideration.

The farmer today is still being asked to produce the things we need so badly. During the war he had to let his buildings and his equipment go. Now, when he may have a chance to repair them, he cannot get a nail in the hardware store. I believe it is time nails were made available, somehow or another, to hardware stores, so that the farmers and the people of Canada generally who need nails so badly may procure them.

Mr. SINNOTT: This nail subject has been going on now ever since I hit the nail on the head in the Citizen on Friday, and I believe enough pressure has been brought to bear on the government. At least we have been told by the parliamentary assistant that the steel controller is looking over the situation in western Canada. I am as anxious as anyone else to pass the rest of the orders in council so that we may hear the budget tomorrow night. It does not matter whether we talk on this subject for another two days; enough light has been thrown on it now, and I believe the minister is taking steps to remedy the situation at once.

Mr. CAMPBELL: We have heard about nails tonight, and we heard about nails last week. I remember that in answering some members on this side the minister made the statement that today nails are under the control of private enterprise. It has been suggested several times this evening that there is a black market in nails. I do not know whether or not that is true, but if it is there is only one source nails can come from; that is, from the people who make them. We have just passed P.C. 3, which gives the minister all kinds of power to examine books, sales and so on. I would suggest that the government examine the books of the firms making nails to find out whether or not there is a black market, and if there is, that it should take the necessary action to see that this practice ceases.

Mr. LENNARD: I am not going to talk about nails, but I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question. What are the regulations in regard to the export of steel?

An hon. MEMBER: Including nails?

Mr. LENNARD: No; leave the nails out of this. What are the regulations controlling the export of raw steel?

Mr. McILRAITH: Dealing with the export of steel, there is no export of nails at all.

Mr. LENNARD: I was not talking about nails.

Mr. McILRAITH: I should like an opportunity to answer the hon. member's question. I reiterate what I said; there is no export of nails at all and has not been since February of last year. As to steel generally, manufactured products requiring steel are exported. That is controlled under export permit. Steel in any semi-finished form is not exported at all. None of it is exported at this moment.

Mr. FERGUSON: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether, speaking as a representative of the people of Canada, he will say that from the point of view of the government this steel mill in Nova Scotia can turn out steel for shipbuilding purposes on a basis that would be profitable or otherwise. Have the government determined that that mill should remain idle when steel for shipbuilding purposes is so essential? If they believe they can work that mill on a basis where they will not lose money have they the power to take it over and start it in operation?

Mr. McILRAITH: The difficulty there is that you cannot go back of what can be supplied by your blast furnace. You have to keep your production balanced all the way through; you have to relate one to the other. At the moment I know of no way of increasing that over-all production. I have the figures of production of all the various types of steel products, which information was tabled a few days ago in the House of Commons, and perhaps there is no need to repeat them. I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. member fuller information on the subject he inquired about.

On the question he raised earlier this evening about production generally I should like to give him the figures for steel ingots in millions of ingot tons. For the year 1947 the projected production is 3·1 million. That is larger than any wartime production and more than twice as large as any production in the years 1938 and 1939.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I remind the parliamentary assistant that I am not interested in what we are doing today or in 1939. I am interested only in the fact that what we are doing is not enough.

Mr. McILRAITH: In his earlier remarks I understood the hon. member's whole criticism to be on what we were doing over 1939 and that it was not enough.

Mr. FERGUSON: What the government are doing today to meet the demand is still not enough.

Mr. McILRAITH: The point is simply this. If you relate all the different types of steel products together we are making all we have capacity to make. You can get into an argument about the allocation of one type of steel product and another, and you can argue about it at great length. I am afraid I am not an expert on the different types of basic material which go into the various end products. You can argue about whether that productive capacity should be put into one type of product or into another. The plan has been to arrange production to get the maximum possible production for the over-all needs, and that is what has been done.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The other day I listened to the C.C.F. and the Conservatives congratulate the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and say nothing but praise him. They told him he was a great industrialist and that he won the war single-handed. Tonight I want to do a little praising on my own. I wish to tell the parliamentary assistant that we won the battle of British Columbia tonight and also to tell him that he has done a magnificent job as parliamentary assistant, but when do we get some nails in Fraser Valley?

P.C. 245 agreed to.

On P.C. 1997.

Mr. WINTERS: I have forgotten, Mr. Chairman, whether I was at a comma or a semicolon when being ruled out of order a few minutes ago; therefore I had better start over. Under this order in council I wish to say a few words with respect to the situation regarding supplies of lumber in Nova Scotia. My point in this regard was raised as a result of the statement made on April 22, 1947, by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In that statement he said that the retail price of lumber in internal British Columbia and in the prairie provinces was to be raised to encourage the production of lumber. I believe that regulation does not apply east of Manitoba.

The Nova Scotian situation with respect to the supply of lumber is somewhat unique as is Nova Scotia's situation with respect to the supply and availability of a good many products. With regard to lumber we have what one might call a three-cornered situation. There is practically no demand in central or western Canada for Nova Scotian lumber. There is a great foreign demand, but in this direction the amount of export is limited by the amount of lumber put on the domestic market. In the local domestic field we are also limited in the amount of lumber we can put on the market, because of the retail prices. Our retail dealers, who form a substantial part of our economy in lumber, are forced, if they adhere to the ceiling, to put lumber on the local domestic market at a loss. With the export market limited and in some cases unavailable to retailers, there is a definite limit as to how far these retailers can or will go in serving the public at a loss.

From the discussion in the committee one would gather that there is a substantial market in Canada for lumber produced in Nova Scotia. In fact, when the hon. member for Davenport earlier this evening mentioned the manufacture of prefabricated houses in Quebec I could have said that in Nova Scotia also we have manufactured a substantial number of prefabricated houses of the same type. It is true they were for emergency shelter. They did not contain any of the normal conveniences except wiring. Wiring was supplied in the form of a kit. However they were quite good houses; they were made for the export market and I understand that they served the purpose well. In Nova Scotia we have tried our best to interest the Canadian government in purchasing these houses, particularly after seeing in papers all over Canada that there was an urgent demand for emergency shelter. But we have never been successful in having any of these prefabricated houses used elsewhere in Canada. Therefore, because there is no demand for our lumber products elsewhere in Canada, we look to the local domestic market and here we are restricted by the selling price. We are limited on the export market, where there is a great demand, by the quota system. We feel that we are squeezed from all sides.

There is a further aspect with respect to British Columbia fir, which is almost totally unavailable for private enterprise. Recently, through the good offices of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the timber controller, we have been able to get a fair allocation for all government projects, but for private projects Douglas fir is simply not available, and that in itself is quite a restraint on production and construction. It has happened, as it has happened elsewhere in Canada, that the ceiling price on lumber has not been too carefully adhered to in many instances, with the result that lumber is not as easy to get as it might be because of black market dealings; but I believe that the availability is increasing. The Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island lumber dealers' association met last week, and in a press report the following appeared:

> A committee, appointed by the association, to study the supply and distribution of certain commodities, reported they were highly satisfied with the results achieved thus far and a very cooperative spirit had been displayed by the manufacturers.

On the other hand, in the same report of the association's proceedings it was stated:

> Most members reported that lumber stocks were down to a minimum and it continued difficult to build up an inventory, particularly in spruce. Doors and hardwood flooring were also in short supply as well as cedar shingles, wood lath and other building materials.

I have heard from lumber dealers that the situation is easing and that the distribution is good. My own limited experience is to the effect that the situation internally is easing. So that in the light of the minister's announcement with respect to western Canada and our own particular situation in Nova Scotia and, I believe, in Prince Edward Island—I think I am safe in saying that, having regard to the fact that the meeting I referred to was a joint meeting of the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island lumber dealers' association—we are now at the point where one of three things should be done, probably jointly in some instances. First of all, if there is an over-all shortage in Canada there should be a greater opportunity for putting our lumber and lumber products at a profit on Canadian markets other than the maritimes. Second, the time, I believe, is arriving, if it has not already arrived, when the domestic ceiling price should be raised. Third, I believe the time is at hand when full consideration should be given to increasing export quotas, and I should be pleased to hear the parliamentary assistant make some statement in that regard.

Mr. BROOKS: I want to second what has been said by the hon. member (Mr. Winters) with reference to maritime lumber. He spoke particularly about Nova Scotia, but what he said would apply, I believe, with even greater force to New Brunswick. The lumber dealers and people generally in New Brunswick are greatly interested in the lumber industry, because it supplies work for nearly one-third of our people. The people there were greatly concerned at the report of the minister a few days ago that the price of domestic lumber from British Columbia and in the prairie provinces was to be increased from fifteen to twenty per cent. Our people in my own province and, I am satisfied, in other maritime provinces, are at a loss to understand why there should be an increase in domestic lumber from fifteen to twenty per cent from British Columbia and the west and not from the maritime provinces as well. I sometimes wonder whether British Columbia has more pull with this government than we from the maritime provinces have. As I listened tonight and heard the minister from British Columbia, and all the members from that province, join forces in the matter of housing in the city of Vancouver, the thought occurred to me that where there is unity there is strength; and possibly it is in this unity which we find among the members from British Columbia that their strength lies. I would suggest to my colleagues from the maritimes—and I do so in all sincerity—that we from the maritimes should take a lesson from British Columbia members, and in matters of this kind, when they affect our provinces, we should all stand together, irrespective of whether we are opposition or government members and try to see that whatever government is in power, whether Liberal or Conservative, shall do justice to our section of the country. We have not done that in the past. I sometimes think we play too much politics in the maritimes. If we played politics less and united more, probably we would not be in the position in which we find ourselves today in many matters.

An hon. MEMBER: They are mostly Liberals from the maritimes.

Mr. BROOKS: There are mostly Liberals from the maritimes—

An hon. MEMBER: Good.

Mr. BROOKS: —and possibly that is the reason we are not getting the results.

Mr. WINTERS: Don't play politics.

Mr. BROOKS: I am quite sincere. This is a serious matter to my own province and to show how serious it is, I have here a newspaper item in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of Saturday of this week, the heading being "Timber controls threaten our lumber industry." In other words, the timber controls threaten the industry in the province of New Brunswick.

I am sorry the minister himself is not here tonight, because I should like him to tell me just why there is this discrimination, and it is rank and unfair discrimination, that we are getting in New Brunswick and other maritime provinces today in respect of lumber. The minister is a very busy man and I am not reflecting on his not being here, because he is here on all occasions when it is possible for him to attend, and if he is away tonight I am satisfied it is for a good reason. However I wish he were here tonight to answer that question why there is this discrimination.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg pointed out just why the lumber industry and why the controls have a great effect on our maritime industry. He said we mostly export our lumber, and that is a fact. Some years ago, I believe it was under the empire trade agreements, we exported our lumber for the most part to Great Britain. We developed a splendid market there, and anyone who has been in the port of Halifax or Saint John or in any of the other ports in the maritime provinces and seen in the past ten or twelve years ships loading for the British market will realize what a splendid industry it is. But what are these controls doing as far as our industry is concerned?

It was pointed out that we have a small quota, and today we see the hand, not of the British Columbia politician, but at least of the lumber industry of that province. The quota for export lumber is controlled mostly by British Columbia and we in the maritime provinces have a very small quota. We are allowed to ship lumber to the United States, but for every carload of lumber that is shipped across the border in to the United States we must sell two carloads in Canada. There is a price ceiling on our lumber, and I am told on good authority—other members from the maritime provinces can correct me if I am wrong—that the price ceiling on lumber produced in the maritimes is $8 less than cost of production. When, therefore, a lumber exporter sends his one car of lumber to the United States or his quota to Great Britain he has to make enough on that exported lumber to pay his loss on lumber sold on the domestic market.

What is the effect of this? Well, the effect is this. We are asking high prices from countries to which we export and we are asking a high price in the British market. We are taking advantage today of the people in Great Britain in their great famine for lumber. We are taking advantage of them in making them pay for the loss we sustain in this country in selling lumber below cost of production. There is no question about that, and we in New Brunswick and in the other maritime provinces feel that this will have a detrimental effect on future trade, this great business which has been worked up over a long period of years. What are the people of Great Britain going to say in years to come when they can get lumber in other parts of the world instead of from Canada and the maritime provinces? They will say, "In the time of our greatest need, when you should have sold us lumber cheaper than you did, you took advantage of our stress and sold it at prices much higher than you were selling in your own country". The result will be, I am sure, that when Russia gets back on her feet, when great exporting countries get back, when Finland is exporting to Great Britain and when Sweden is again shipping lumber, we shall lose that splendid market in Great Britain in consequence of what they regard as the unfair treatment which we gave them in the time of their greatest need.

You speak about black markets. I am satisfied that there is a black market in lumber in the maritime provinces. As I said, the price of lumber is $8 below the cost of production. The natural result of that is that the producer is going to hold the lumber and sell it at the highest price, if it is at all possible. It is being done, and it is being done in a widespread manner. You talk about a black market in nails. There is a black market in lumber, I think, not only in the maritime provinces but here in Ontario. The reason is that we are selling lumber in this country today at below cost of production. In discussing this lumber situation, and particularly our loss of foreign markets and foreign customers, the Telegraph-Journal had this to say on April 26:

> This is unfair to our foreign customers.
> It is doubly unfair to our producers. On one hand, they are strong-armed into selling in Canada at a loss—a thing which is almost incomprehensible and is certainly not in accord with sound business practice or sound government administration. On the other hand, they see their foreign markets being shattered by a short-sighted and ruthless policy.
> They know how stiff competition is under ordinary conditions. Here in New Brunswick, for instance, they have seen lack of markets knock the bottom out of prices, throw thousands of workers out of jobs, and drive wages in the woods and mills down to a shocking and pitiful level.

That statement, Mr. Chairman, is correct; and I am sure it is a well-considered statement. I should also like to quote from the Telegraph-Journal of February 15, and that is some months ago. This was not only the feeling a few days ago when this regulation was changed, but for many months the people in the maritime provinces have felt that these controls and regulations were most unfair to our lumber industry, which is the most important one we have in our province. On February 15 of this year, the Telegraph-Journal had this to say:

> Our timber trade with Great Britain is traditional. More than that, it is essential to our prosperity. Our position, if we lost it, would be utterly hopeless. Yet today men who are ignorant of the timber trade are in the driver's seat and . . . are whipping this vital industry toward destruction. This we can't afford to tolerate.

The same article goes on to refer to other commodities that we are selling to Great Britain. Take wheat, for instance. We are not selling wheat to Great Britain at a much higher price than we are selling it in this country. We realized that the people of Great Britain needed wheat and needed it badly. The policy we adopted was this, that we sell wheat to Great Britain as cheaply as we possibly can in order to help those people who so much need our help. Why do we have one policy for lumber, as to which there is also a famine in Great Britain, and another policy for wheat?

There were many other things that I had intended to say, Mr. Chairman, but I see that it is nearly eleven o'clock and I shall take only a few more minutes of the committee's time. I thought possibly the hon. member for Lunenburg might have mentioned the situation with regard to birch woods in the maritime provinces. We have in the maritime provinces almost a billion feet of birch wood lumber which today we are not able to cut and export. Why? Because our quota will not allow us to do that. What is happening to this birch wood lumber? There is a disease known as dieback disease, which is gradually wiping out all these birch wood forests. In five years' time, we are told, all this splendid birch wood will be ruined and will not be fit to export unless a special quota is given to the maritime provinces and we are allowed to cut and export this birch wood. Because of controls and the quota, what is happening? We are not allowed to cut it. It is going to waste. Yet it is worth millions of dollars to us. It gives employment to thousands of our men. In spite of the fact that Mr. MacQuarrie, minister of lands and mines of Nova Scotia, has made special representations to this government, no extra quota has been given, and this great loss has been inflicted on the people of Nova Scotia and the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. Chairman, I will take no more of the time of the committee, but I hope that the minister will reconsider the treatment which he has given to the maritime provinces and will endeavour to correct what we consider to be very great wrongs.

Progress reported.

ELDORADO MINES

SETTLEMENT OF CIVIL ACTION IN NEW YORK STATE

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On March 13, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referring to the Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, I advised the house that a civil action was proceeding in the state of New York. I would now advise the house that on the recommendation of Mr. J. H. Tully, New York counsel, a settlement has been made of the civil action. I should like to table the letter received from Mr. Tully in this connection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister object to a question arising out of the settlement in connection with the Eldorado matter and the terms set forth in the papers just tabled? Will the minister say what the terms were, and whether any proceedings were instituted against certain Canadians against whom a prosecution was taken and subsequently withdrawn?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry, but I have tabled the letter from Mr. Tully which sets out the over-all settlement. It was a payment of about $2,000,000 to Eldorado, partly in cash and money's worth and partly in the return of metals. The exact terms of the settlement cannot be given, for the reasons I stated before; they involve the purchase by other governments of fissionable material. I think my hon. friend will get the information he wants from Mr. Tully's letter.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Criminal charges were made against civilians in connection with Eldorado. Will the minister state whether Marcel Pochon was completely exonerated or not?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know just how a man is exonerated. If a criminal charge is withdrawn it is a clear indication that the state has no charges against him. I do not think you prove a man not guilty.

Mr. STEPHENSON: In view of the fact that charges were laid against him and have been dropped, it puts him in an unfortunate position—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the purpose of a question is to elicit information and not to give it. The hon. member has put his question and the minister has replied.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have before me the letter which the minister has tabled, and I should like to ask this question. The letter sets forth that a settlement was made with the following defendants: Boris Pregel, Carl B. French, Canadian Radium and Uranium Corporation, and International Rare Metals Refinery, Inc. The letter says that there were two other defendants—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that it is against the rules to read telegrams, letters or newspapers as the basis for a question. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, I would ask him to do so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, may I put it this way. What action is to be taken against Radium Luminous Industries Limited and Marcel Pochon for any balances allegedly due to Eldorado, or are these actions completed as well?

Mr. HOWE: Civil settlement was made with all parties to the dispute, and the matter is closed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the reason I asked these questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what the letter does not say. The letter says—

Mr. HOWE: It was a letter to me, not to the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The letter reads:

Radium Luminous Industries Limited and Marcel Pochon were not named as defendants in the above suit because of our inability to obtain service of process upon them in this jurisdiction.

Will any proceedings be taken in Canada against these two defendants following the settlement made against other defendants, even though they were not parties to the action?

Mr. HOWE: All parties mentioned in the letter took part in the settlement of the civil action.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. HOWE: I am telling the hon. member that they did.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The letter does not say so.

Mr. HOWE: That is all I can say; all actions are terminated.

AIR SERVICES

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND PORTUGAL

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government of Canada and the government of Portugal have concluded an agreement for air services between their respective territories. This agreement, in the main, follows the form of previous bilateral civil aviation agreements which Canada has already concluded. It makes provision for an air line designated by each government to operate a return service originating in its own territory and terminating in, or passing through, the territory of the other country, and includes an exchange of the first four freedoms.

The route to be operated by the designated air line of Canada is specified as Montreal via such intermediate stopping places as may be mutually agreed to the Azores and/or Lisbon, and thence to the United Kingdom and countries beyond in both directions. The route laid down for the designated Portuguese air line is from the Azores and/or Lisbon via such intermediate stopping places as may be mutually agreed to Montreal and countries beyond in both directions.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—MISSING PLANE EN ROUTE VANCOUVER

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Has the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply any information to give the public with regard to the missing TCA plane en route from Lethbridge to Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: I received the following message this morning:

Station manager W. Wells advises flight 3 TCA No. 53 CF-TDF due Vancouver 2300 PST not heard from since cleared to Vancouver tower at 23.17 PST. Crew captain Pike and first officer Stewart and twelve passengers. Air sea rescue all marine craft and police department and company have organized search. Will keep you advised.

I have inquired for any later information and I find there is none.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Was it an eastbound or a westbound flight?

Mr. HOWE: It was a westbound flight going into Vancouver.

WHEAT

PRESS REPORTS ON INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the proposed international wheat agreement. It arises out of a report emanating from London that "hopes for a world wheat pact were publicly blown sky high this week", and a further reference to the Canadian High Commissioner in London, Mr. Norman Robertson, who is reported as suggesting "that the meeting might be continued". The article concludes that it was finally decided to hand the corpse over to the international council in Washington for disposal. My question is this: Is it correct that the plans for an international wheat agreement have broken down? Also will the minister communicate to the house the substance of any report he may have received on the matter?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be only a fair statement to say that the quotation read by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) is a gross exaggeration, and I might add that that remark applies to much that has been appearing in editorials and in leading articles on editorial pages in recent months.

The actual facts are that conversations have been continuing for some time in London among officials and those conversations went as far as it was possible for the officials to carry them. It was decided to have the question further dealt with by the different governments concerned, and prior to that the international wheat council was asked to have further conversations. The representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Doctor Wilson, has just flown back from England and is meeting with the wheat committee of the cabinet some time today to make an oral report. I am not sure how soon it will be possible for me to make a definite report to the house.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted a comment, I am glad to hear the minister say that these reports are exaggerated. I would suggest that in view of the importance of the matter the actual facts ought to be made available to the house and the public as soon as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WAGE INCREASES FOR WOMEN CLEANERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? On February 10 he informed the house that a survey was being made to ascertain whether consideration could be given to wage increase for women cleaners in federal public buildings. Can the minister say whether this survey has been completed, and what progress is being made in connection with this matter?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Since the beginning of the year the Department of Labour, on the request of the departments concerned, has made recommendations with respect to wage rates for this class of service at the following points: Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, London, Winnipeg, Montreal, Kingston, Brantford, Kitchener, Vancouver, Sudbury, Wallaceburg and Saint John, New Brunswick. The survey to which my hon. friend refers, and which I mentioned on February 10, is not yet completed.

The house resumed from Monday, April 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering order in council P.C. 1997 having to do with timber regulations as amended.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I wish to join with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, who was supported by the hon. member for Royal in his remarks on the lumber situation in the maritime provinces. Coming as I do from Nova Scotia I am perhaps more familiar with the situation there—

Mr. HOMUTH: Is the hon. member speaking for both members for Halifax?

Mr. ISNOR: On this occasion I am happy to associate myself with the hon. member for Nova Scotia sitting on the government side and with the hon. member for Royal sitting on the side which is also occupied by my hon. friend.

I think I can safely say that in the over-all picture so far as controls affect the maritime lumber industry we have no great fault to find with them except from the standpoint of the export buisness. I can confidently state that the lumber industry in the maritimes is in a prosperous condition at the present time. I would not want the rest of Canada to think that we were not taking full advantage of the markets which have been provided for us. Both the export and the domestic markets have been good. The entire cut of the maritime provinces could not be permitted to be shipped overseas to our natural market, the United Kingdom, because of the need of lumber for construction purposes in our own country. That is generally understood, but at the same time I support the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg in his contention that there should be a larger quota for the export business.

A careful check of the lumber production figures for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will show that the total sawn lumber for Nova Scotia in 1939 was 270 million feet, and for New Brunswick 150 million feet, or a total maritime production in 1939 of 420 million feet. In 1945 Nova Scotia showed a cut of 338 million feet and New Brunswick 295 million feet, or a total of 633 million feet for the two provinces. The year 1946 showed about the same figure, a total of 632 million feet. Therefore you will see, Mr. Chairman, that we have had an increase from 1939 to 1945 in our sawn lumber production of something like 50 per cent. Of the 632 million feet sawn in 1946, 270 million feet were permitted to be exported free of the quota, leaving in Canada the remainder, 362 million feet. With 362 million feet we believe that a further export permit should be granted, because our normal needs in the maritimes in pre-war days did not come up to anything like this requirement. I suggest that the minister should give very careful thought to a further quota so far as the maritimes are concerned. We in the maritimes are not like Quebec and Ontario, blessed with a large number of industries. We depend to a great extent on farming, mining, lumbering and fishing, and it is because of our export business that we need this increased quota on lumber. Last year we were very fortunate, although somewhat handicapped owing to lack of ships to carry lumber overseas. In fact, generally speaking, transportation difficulties tied up our operations to a very marked extent. This was unavoidable because of the weather conditions in Ontario and elsewhere throughout Canada, which kept back from the maritimes a large number of cars that would otherwise have been used for carrying lumber to the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Representations have been made by the maritime lumber export commission or association to the minister or to the controller on more than one occasion. A study of 1946 production and distribution figures reveals that 258 million feet was retained for use in the maritimes, and in seven pre-war years an average of approximately 90 million feet per year was required. That leaves a very wide gap, and without taking away from our domestic requirements there is a large quantity that could be added to our export quota, thus adding to the prosperity of the maritime provinces.

I need not point out that basically our lumber industry has been export. The United Kingdom has been a great market for many years and, as was brought out by the hon. member for Royal, we want to maintain that pre-war market. We are sending large shipments there and are supplying our lumber at a reasonable price. I would point out to the hon. member for Royal that his statement is not entirely correct as regards the price of maritime lumber. Our price to the United Kingdom is something like $15 to $20 per thousand cheaper than the lumber which is supplied to that market by Russia, Denmark and Finland, which are the only other countries selling to the United Kingdom. The controller and the minister would be well advised to take this matter into consideration when dealing with the question raised by the member for Queens-Lunenburg, when he asked for a larger quota.

We could very well increase our quota without hardship to our domestic market. I want to support the contention of one hon. member with regard to birchwood. Our birchwood today is in such a condition that unless we cut and sell it we shall not be able to supply any market, either domestic or export, in the course of a few years. I note, in the provincial report recently tabled, the forty-sixth report of the Department of Lands and Forests of Nova Scotia, that the minister directing that department states:

The unsatisfactory ceiling price of hardwood will affect hardwood production adversely. This is particularly regrettable in view of the almost certain loss of all our merchantable birch within five years.

That is the birch to which I refer. I wish to emphasize that and to bring it to the attention of the minister because of the need of taking care of this particular growth. It will be a total loss unless opportunity is given Nova Scotia and the maritime interests generally to sell that wood on the export market.

It is interesting to note that last year we had an increased production in Nova Scotia of 8·35 per cent. Softwood long lumber was up 25 million feet board measure, while hardwood showed a slight decline. Throughout the year all wood products were in great demand, and there is every indication that a similar condition will exist throughout 1947. That is from the report of the department of lands and forests of Nova Scotia.

This matter was so thoroughly covered by hon. members who have already taken part in the debate that I do not think it is necessary to dwell on the importance of the minister giving consideration to the lumber industry from the standpoint of the maritimes. It is estimated that about 78 per cent of New Brunswick and 68 per cent of Nova Scotia is still forested. The newsprint mills in four New Brunswick towns and in Liverpool, Nova Scotia, the Mersey mill—produce eight per cent of the total Canadian capacity. Most of that hardwood lumber is used locally, because the high cost of transportation to central Canada and the tariff that keeps it out of New England have to be reckoned with. It is because of these two factors, high transportation cost to central Canada and the more or less high tariff into New England, that I urge the minister to give every opportunity to the promotion of the export trade.

The present position on distribution is that United Kingdom quota has been filled. The forty million free quota has been distributed and the lumber placed by the shippers. There is a definite weakening in the eastern United States market and local demand has not increased. It is surprising to me that the local market has not increased, in view of the large amount of construction work going on in our province. I remember hearing recently something said by a gentleman who had been motoring from New York to Halifax. He said that as he drove through Massachusetts and the state of Maine he noticed very little construction work going on. When he came into New Brunswick there were signs of increasing construction of houses, but when he struck the Nova Scotia border there was an almost continuous line of houses being constructed for veterans and others. I thought that was a very good tribute to the manner in which those interested in Nova Scotia were carrying on construction, and notwithstanding the picture of blue ruin which has been painted by many members opposite in regard to construction work in other parts of Canada, we in Nova Scotia are carrying on in an aggressive manner. Nevertheless there is still a sufficient amount of lumber to permit increasing the quota for export business.

May I say a word about price. The hon. member for Royal raised this question, and he had reference to retail price. He was justified in bringing the matter to the attention of the committee. While the export business is sufficiently large—two to one—to take care of losses that may be sustained by those engaged in selling lumber on the domestic market, I do not think it is sound business that one should have to carry the other, and I suggest again that this question of retail prices, so far as the maritimes are concerned, be reviewed, as suggested by the member for Royal, to bring about a higher price so as to kill the black market if one exists. I do not think the black market is as large, as prosperous or as thriving as some would like to make it appear.

Mr. BROOKS: It is extensive.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Royal says it is extensive. If that is so in New Brunswick, I doubt very much if it exists to the same extent in Nova Scotia, but I am not going to argue the point. I will agree with him in regard to the raising of retail prices in order to make it possible to carry on in such a way that retailers will not have to operate at a loss.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg should be complimented for bringing this question up at this time. I trust that the minister will give to the points raised his serious attention and not only perhaps allow those in the maritimes to export a larger quantity, but also give consideration to the retail price.

Mr. CHURCH: As I come from a district which has a very large industry in timber and lumbering, I wish to say a few words, but I shall not detain the committee for more than four or five minutes. I remember the olden days in the city of Toronto, when almost everybody owned his own home, the lumbering industry, wholesale and retail, was one of the most important ones we had at the time, when the forests in northern Ontario and many other parts were cleared. Wood was also extensively used in stoves before the production of coal became a commercial industry. I am not here to criticize anybody about the timber regulations or about what was done in peace or war, but I believe the government would be well advised to come to the help of this great industry.

I should like to see the priorities system abolished. I think it would aid housing if everybody had a chance, according to the law of supply and demand, to get the lumber of all kinds which they need to build houses. Now you find that houses are not being built but there are certain priorities which exist for certain corporations, many of which are controlled by the crown—there are priorities of all kinds—and even they are hard up sometimes for labour and materials. Rents of crown houses are reaching the point where they are too high for the ordinary workingman.

This industry has been one of the most important means of providing employment in Ontario. I should like to see the regulations eased very materially and the priorities eliminated as soon as the government can see fit to do that. In the first place, the housing situation is one of the most serious we have in our cities. Last night reference was made to it by the hon. member for High Park. There was a return made in response to a motion of mine about a certain number of buildings and sheds for the R.C.A.F. on the Toronto waterfront east of Yonge street, on the harbour land, which were erected during the war mainly for storage and other air equipment purposes. There was a return presented on July 4 last, sessional paper 187A. It shows that the cost of erecting sheds for the use of Royal Canadian Air Force on the Toronto waterfront was $1,355,028.86. The second question was:

2. What department of government had charge of the construction?

The answer was:

Plans and specifications were provided by the R.C.A.F. Contract was awarded by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Workmen were then brought in—carpenters, bricklayers and others—and they came from all over Canada. We are going to have a serious situation in Ontario if they keep making it the headquarters for everybody who is out of work, except the ambassadors who are on the seven seas. These people were brought in from all over Canada to build these sheds when there was very serious unemployment in our city. What became of the sheds? They could have been used for housing. I have been in some of these sheds. Some of those occupied by the officers were luxurious; I have never seen anything like them. Big sheds were erected on a large part of the grounds from Yonge street down to Sherbourne street. The lands on which the sheds were erected were drained, and had storm sewers. They are right on Toronto's waterfront, on land donated by the city, east of where the boats come in and out on Toronto bay. They could have been used for housing purposes, but that was not done. It was not the fault of the city of Toronto.

I shall read the next questions:

4. Have any been torn down or sold? If so, how many, to whom and at what price?

5. Was any application received for use of these buildings to relieve the housing shortage? If so, from whom?

6. What use has been made of these buildings (a) during the war; (b) afterwards?

The reply is that some of these sheds were sold to crown assets allocations committee and transferred to War Assets Corporation for disposal. I know that when a war is on, a war of greater magnitude than any other in history, mistakes will doubtless be made. We may expect that. We have them in peace, and we may expect them in war. The reply states that twenty-one of these buildings out of the sixty-five declared surplus to the War Assets Corporation have been demolished, and it is planned to tear down another twenty-eight. Of the remaining sixteen, nine have been sold as follows, and negotiations for the sale of the other seven are being proceeded with: two buildings sold to G. M. Graton and Company for $650 each, for removal. The lumber in them is worth more than that. It could have been used to build small houses. All kinds of doors, sash and windows were in them, which were made of some of the finest dressed lumber. Two buildings were sold to Toronto Home Missions Council for $650 each, for removal. One building was sold to Centre Island Association, Toronto for $650, for removal. One building was sold to Mimico Rotary Club for $535, for removal. There were three buildings sold to the Toronto Star for $5,160. I had better be careful because there is a libel suit on. I do not know whether that is a "5" or a "3", but it looks like a "5". I have no qualified privilege, or any privileges at all, because, according to one morning newspaper columnist the members of parliament do not do anything at all. We might as well all go home, according to one of the columnists. I am not here to criticize them, because you can never answer newspapers. They always have the last word. I found that out years ago as the humble head of the city. We all make mistakes as well as the newspapers.

I find here that three buildings were sold to the Toronto Star for $5,160. The note here is that "in the first four above sales the prices took into consideration the fact that purchasers had to remove the buildings from the site and restore the land to its original condition at their own expense". My first point is that the lumber could have been used for small housing; my second point is that the buildings could have been used where they were for emergency housing. There was water, light and overflow sewers. These buildings could have been used and could have been occupied by a very large number of people for emergency and trailer housing. I would point to the buildings down by the Toronto baseball park at the foot of Bathurst street, Little Norway. Those buildings are not as well constructed; they did not have light or many other conveniences.

That is all I have to say about it. I do not know whether mistakes were made, but I believe that the lumber could have been used. We could have used the property to relieve the emergency housing situation among those who cannot enter their own houses. I am not saying that as criticism of anybody, but just making reference to it.

I would like to see something done. Who are getting this timber and this lumber? How is it the large banks are able to build skyscrapers, two of which are going up on King street in Toronto? They can get steel, lumber and everything they need. According to the Bank Act, banks may build only according to the size of the business they carry on, and they are not allowed to go into real estate; but today some of them are building 30- or 35- storey buildings. One bank building is being torn down, at the corner of King and Bay while another is going up. Where are they getting all the materials, when these buildings are not needed at all and while houses are so urgently required? I do not think the banks belong to any benevolent society, as some people would like us to believe. They are not going to take in the soldiers and rent them living space on the top floors of their buildings. Far from it; they are going to rent that office space commercially and charge high prices for it, as they do with most of their properties.

Theatres are being built all over the city, as the hon. member for Davenport mentioned last evening. These people must have considerable influence down here at Ottawa. The members of this house are just ciphers, we were told in one of the newspapers the other day, but the people who own these theatres must be more than ciphers. They are the people behind the scenes, as someone used to call them—stuff-shirted nobodies. They come around this building and seem to have a great deal of influence no matter what government is in power. I do not see why these buildings are being constructed. In addition, different conventions come along and use up a lot of lumber and other building material. Our schools are crying out for new buildings. Some of the temporary or portable buildings being used for educational purposes have seen their day, though they are still being used by nearly every school board in Canada. Something should be done in this regard. In addition to that new hotels are being built, and apartment houses erected, some of them no doubt under the priority system, and I am sure very heavy rents will be charged.

I have seen a good deal of this housing problem. I remember that after the first war we had the same trouble, as we seem to have it after every war—a huge shortage of all materials and labour. On the whole I believe a great deal of good work has been done in this world shortage of construction materials, and I am not here to blame or criticize anyone, but I should like to see this priority system discontinued particularly in regard to lumber, which has to do with one of our key industries. As the lumbering industry goes, so will go trade and commerce; so will go housing and many other matters. I hope the minister will use the regulations during the next three months in such a way that housing will be assisted, and the construction of hospitals, schools and similar public buildings may go on. These regulations were on the whole a good thing in wartime, not only for the industry itself but for labour as well; but now they should be dropped. To eliminate controls will help wholesale lumber dealers as well as the retail dealers, who have done very little business in the last few years. A great many of them I know do not make their office expenses. I remember in the district west of Bathurst street and north of Queen street when a great deal of house building was carried on; when Manning avenue, Euclid avenue, and all the other streets were built up as far as College, and all by private builders. They put up rows of houses all over the city, and I must commend the government on what they did to assist construction of this kind a few years ago. In 1935 we had a committee on reconstruction and housing whose report was later adopted in another form by the present government. At that time I advocated that money for house building should be lent through the banks at a very low rate of interest, about 3 per cent. Later the government spent about $90,000,000 in small housing, a very large part of it in and near the city of Toronto. Many houses were built in East York, North York, West York, and the city district north of St. Clair avenue. In all that expenditure I believe the government lost only about $16,000. If they could embark on a scheme like that and lend money to private individuals and private contractors and give them labour and materials, I think it would be far better than setting up these costly crown corporations, which have to be administered from Ottawa, which get priorities on many materials and labour which small private builders cannot get, and then charge large sums in rental.

Mr. HANSELL: I have been sitting in the chamber now for quite some time, listening to this debate in general and to the discussion of this particular matter of housing. I have not taken part thus far because I live in a rural constituency where housing is not the same problem that it is in the larger urban centres. But throughout the discussion it has struck me that we may have missed some of the fundamental points in this whole matter. I refer now to the reason for the shortage of materials for housing. I have heard of the shortage of nails. I have heard of the shortage of lumber. I have heard of the shortage of this, that and the other thing. If such shortages were caused by physical forces over which we had no control, then I do not believe we could blame the minister. If these shortages had resulted from the war I would not attach a great deal of blame to the government. But it does seem to me that governments must take the responsibility of doing things for this country when it is physically possible to do them, and that seems to be the crux of this whole situation. Do I not speak the truth when I say that adequate housing has been held up because the government has permitted enormous amounts of housing materials to go out of the country? I do not think I am far wrong when I say that seems to be the reason.

I know there is a problem to be met. I have in mind, for instance, a family in which there were six boys, all of whom lived at home with their father and mother. When war broke out they enlisted. Before the war was over they got married and came back home, some of them with children. They wanted six homes of their own. I know that sort of thing creates quite a problem, and I am not saying the government is not faced with a problem. I am not one who would harshly criticize if a government were doing its best; but fundamentally is it not a matter of government policy? They have been so insistent on capturing foreign markets that they have permitted Canada to be divested of materials we ourselves need. If this parliament should conclude that such a policy is the right one, then let us not blame the government. If it is a wrong policy, then the government must shoulder the blame for what is happening in the country today. That seems to me to be the reason. Since we are in committee I should like the minister to answer that question. Is there any physical reason why we should not, with the war over as long as it has been, have a real housing programme on the way? If he says it cannot be done because of shortages, that is not enough. If there are shortages, let him tell the committee how they came about and what has prevented him from restoring these materials to free supply.

I am a great believer in the adage which we in this corner of the house so often quote, that that which is physically possible must be made financially possible. I am not going to talk about the financial possibilities but there should be no reason, apart from physical impossibilities, why the people of Canada cannot have what they want. Physical impossibilities arise only by reason of something over which we have no control. We have no control over winds, earthquakes, floods, and so forth; those are known as acts of God, things for which we would not blame the government. But if a thing is physically possible, why is it that the people of Canada cannot have it? That is the thing the government has to answer. I have not had an answer to that question, and I believe the government owes it to the people of Canada to give an answer. If we have that answered we will be satisfied.

Mr. HODGSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSELL: Evidently the minister is not disposed to answer.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister answers may I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that we are considering P.C. 1997, which deals with timber regulations. During the last few days we had a wide discussion on housing, and most of yesterday was spent in considering the emergency shelter regulations. It seems to me that the committee should now direct its attention only to the regulations respecting timber control. Although a wide discussion has been allowed up to now I feel we should stay strictly within the rule and consider only the regulations with respect to timber.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that I shall be very brief. First I wish to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the hon. member for Royal and the hon. member for Halifax. The subject under discussion is one with which I am not particularly familiar, but I realize it is of great importance to New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces.

I have listened most attentively to this debate and must admit that the attitude taken by some hon. members is difficult to understand, particularly those who in one breath say that veterans' houses are costing too much, and bitterly condemn the government because they feel they are responsible for this condition; and then in the next breath they suggest that the retail ceiling price of lumber for domestic purposes is far too low and should be increased. The two statements do not dovetail. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. If we are to have higher retail prices for lumber, there will certainly be an increased cost to the veteran for his house.

My own personal opinion is that it is inconceivable that any producer should be obliged to sell his product at below the cost of production. Such a condition does not create a satisfactory atmosphere and no doubt in some cases would be responsible for black market trading. I am confident that this is not so in my own county, because no violations of this kind have been brought to my attention at any time.

I have a letter from a reliable citizen of Charlotte county which I believe will explain much better than I could the conditions in the maritime provinces with respect to the wholesale and retail lumber trade. The company with which this gentleman is associated, and which bears his name, has been doing business with the general public in Charlotte county and across the border in Maine for a great many years. I might add that this gentleman is a classmate of the Minister of Justice. This letter from the Haley Lumber Company Limited of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, is dated January 28, 1947, and reads:

I want to write you about the predicament we and the other retail lumber dealers of the maritimes are in due to the timber controls. You have probably read in the press that one of the woodworking factories had to lay off ten men because they couldn't get lumber.

The price paid by lumber brokers purchasing lumber to be exported to Great Britain has always controlled the domestic wholesale price in the maritimes. The present export price averages at least $52 per M. feet. One broker is offering a producer from whom we used to buy lumber $56 per M. for 2x4 and 2x6, $57 for 2x7 and 2x8, and $64.50 for 2x9 and up f.o.b. St. Stephen in the rough. The present wholesale ceiling price averages $45 per M. feet, so you can see the impossibility of the retailers buying lumber at the wholesale ceiling price which is all they are permitted to pay.

A complicated system of earning export quotas was set up over a year ago for the purpose of encouraging lumber brokers or manufacturers to sell to the retailers and, in so doing, earn export quotas. The exporters and manufacturers haven't found it to their advantage to do this to any great extent. Sufficient free quota has been available to take care of the stock to be exported.

Over 90 per cent of the retailers in the maritimes have less than 40 per cent of the amount of soft wood lumber on hand to meet the demand for house building requirements. Emery Smith of Murray and Gregory told me he had only 500 M. feet of softwood lumber on hand and most of this was refuse. He should have between two and three million.

The spread between the present domestic ceiling and the retail ceiling does not permit the retailer to purchase lumber at the market price, namely, $52 per M. feet, and sell within the retail ceiling and make a profit. The price paid for lumber to be exported has increased at least $5 per M. in the last year without any corresponding increase in the domestic wholesale ceiling and the retail ceiling.

There seem to be three alternatives if the retail lumber dealers are to stay in business, satisfy their customers' requirements and carry on business without breaking any laws.

(1) Decontrol of the lumber industry and retain export control.

(2) Increase retail ceiling prices by at least $5 per M. and cut out the wholesale ceiling; or

(3) Increase the wholesale ceiling and allow sufficient margin between the wholesale ceiling and the retail ceiling to permit the retailer to make a profit.

Now, I hope you will do what you can to help out the retail lumber dealers who are in this terrible predicament due to price control.

Yours sincerely,

Harold R. Haley.

Mr. HODGSON: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with the timber regulations. First, I should like to congratulate hon. members from the maritimes on both sides of the house on the way in which they are cooperating. They are proceeding in about the same way as the British Columbia members did in connection with the Japanese question. If Ontario and Quebec can get a little cooperation from hon. members on that side of the house and on this side we may be able to get somewhere in this matter.

Answering the hon. member for Eglinton, the minister said on Friday, April 25, as reported on page 2445 of Hansard:

The speech of the hon. member for Eglinton indicates the state of utter confusion in which the official opposition finds itself on the matter of controls.

I want to say to the minister that I am not confused, that I am of the same opinion now as I was when the omnibus bill was first presented. On March 10, as reported on page 1235 of Hansard, the minister gave the house to understand that controls would be kept on lumber. It is up to the government to make those controls just as feasible as possible for the benefit of the trade in general. As far as I am concerned, I will give them every cooperation possible.

The government itself seems to be more confused than any other party in the house because since the introduction of the omnibus bill there has been more decontrol than at any other time since the cessation of hostilities. The regulations respecting timber under P.C. 1997, appearing at page 150 of the consolidation, cannot be understood by the ordinary layman. I think they could be written in much simpler terms so that the ordinary man could understand them. I would ask to have P.C. 1997 appear in Hansard to save the time it would take me to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it agreed that P.C. 1997 shall appear in Hansard as part of the hon. member's speech?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that should be done.

Mr. HOWE: The order in council is printed in another government document. Why have it appear in two documents?

Mr. GRAYDON: In what other parliamentary paper does it appear?

Mr. HOWE: I may have misunderstood. I am told that it has not been printed, and if that is so I have no objection to its appearing in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: Is that agreed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HODGSON: The order in council reads as follows:

P.C. 1997

At the Government House at Ottawa
Tuesday, the 21st day of March, 1944.
Present:

His Excellency The Governor General in Council:

Whereas the Minister of Munitions and Supply represents that regulations respecting wood fuel were established by order in council P.C. 4362 of May 28, 1943, and were amended by order in council P.C. 5492 of July 9, 1943, and by order in council P.C. 215 of January 13, 1944; and by the said order in council P.C. 4362, James S. Whalley was appointed wood fuel controller, and by order in council P.C. 1792 of March 5, 1943, Gustave C. Piche was appointed a deputy wood fuel controller;

That regulations respecting timber were established by order in council P.C. 2716 of June 24, 1940, and were amended by orders in council P.C. 7120 of December 4, 1940; P.C. 4389 of June 17, 1941; P.C. 6037 of August 8, 1941; and P.C. 7360 of September 20, 1941; and by order in council P.C. 9994 of November 3, 1942, Alan H. Williamson was appointed timber controller; and

That it is desirable to abolish the office of wood fuel controller and to confer on the timber controller the powers, duties and functions with respect to wood fuel now being exercised by the wood fuel controller, and for these purposes to revoke certain of the orders in council above mentioned and re-enact regulations respecting timber as hereinafter set out;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, is pleased to revoke and doth hereby revoke the following orders in council:—

P.C. 4362 of May 28, 1943; P.C. 1792 of March 5, 1943; P.C. 5492 of July 9, 1943; and P.C. 215 of January 13, 1944.

P.C. 2716 of June 24, 1940; P.C. 7120 of December 4, 1940; P.C. 4389 of June 17, 1941; P.C. 6037 of August 8, 1941, and P.C. 7360 of September 20, 1941.

The controller shall have power by order to prohibit and restrain any person from producing and/or dealing in timber and/or equipment or from dealing in any timber and/or equipment at any place or in any area or zone specified by the controller, and to this end the controller may order such acts or things to be done or omitted as he may deem necessary to prevent or preclude the use of any particular timber or equipment or any plant, building or place in breach of such order. The controller may exercise the said power to prevent or preclude any breach or further breach or apprehended breach of any order (whether general or specific) of the controller or any person acting under his authority.

5. Breach of contract pursuant to order

8. Wartime industries control board regulations preserved

Nothing in these regulations shall restrict or vary the provisions of the wartime industries control board regulations established by order in council P.C. 3 of January 4, 1944 and the timber controller shall have the powers and immunities and be subject to the limitations granted and imposed by the said wartime industries control board regulations, which shall be read and construed as one with these regulations.

A. D. P. HEENEY,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I would ask the minister to clarify his release No. 102 of April 22, because as I read it, it refers only to British Columbia and the western provinces, although the press has stated that the price of lumber is up 15 to 20 per cent all across Canada. I understood the situation, but evidently the press did not, and it was unfortunate that in several papers, including small papers in my own riding, the report went out to the country that lumber had increased in price 15 to 20 per cent.

Again in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec stumpage costs have been increased.

I would also like the minister to explain why an export quota of 65 per cent has been allowed to British Columbia as against 33⅓ per cent for central Canada and the maritimes. Is the minister still consulting, as he did six years ago, the Canadian Lumbermen's Association which takes in all the lumbermen in Canada, or is he taking the advice of only one or two of the largest lumber operators?

I was in a retail office yesterday morning which had received a circular stating that an announcement would be made on lumber prices on the return of Malcolm McNicol. Wholesale and retail merchants are holding up sales in consequence until the announcement is made. Why could not this announcement have been made at the same time as it was made for British Columbia and western Canada? If the timber control is efficient, and they have been working on controls for six years now and talking and thinking about prices and regulations, especially during the last six weeks, I would like the minister or his parliamentary assistant to explain why an announcement could not have been made to cover the whole of Canada at the same time. Why the hesitation and this discrimination against Ontario and Quebec?

I stated in the house in 1946 that the price of hemlock was then too low and it is still too low because it cannot be produced at the present ceiling prices. There have been increases in the cost of living and in wages and in everything which pertains to the production of lumber. At the same time we have lumber being imported from the United States to Canada to take the place of hemlock for crating at $77 to $82 per thousand feet.

I have a letter here which states that the Ford Motor Company:

> . . . found it impossible to obtain sufficient crating lumber in Canada for their requirements and have been forced to buy substantial quantities of southern yellow pine, initial shipments of which are now arriving. This to take the place of Canadian spruce and jack pine which they have used heretofore.

At page 1234 of Hansard of March 10, 1947, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply stated that to increase the price of lumber would increase the cost of a house $200 or $300. Somebody had said that it takes approximately 6,000 or 7,000 feet of lumber to build a house 28 x 28 or 28 x 30. If the price of lumber were increased $10 the cost of a house this size would be increased $60 or $70, which would be approximately one per cent of the price of a house such as government agencies are building today for sale to the veterans. But would it not be worth it if they could get the lumber when they needed it?

The delivery of lumber could be speeded up and a lot of bottlenecks done away with. At the present time when you sell lumber you must send four copies of a document to the timber control, and on their approval and return you can start to ship the lumber. If something could be done to speed up that process it would help considerably. I do not know just what suggestion to make, but something should be done to speed up shipments.

I want to say a word on the export of lumber to Great Britain. The exports have been at exorbitant prices, ranging from $80 to $275 per thousand f.o.b. mill, with $3.25 added per thousand for rail shipments. We have been lending money to Britain without interest and selling our farm products to Britain at far below the world market prices, at the expense of the Canadian farmer. The government have told us that this will hold the British market for years to come. Is the case any different with lumber going to the British market? It does not seem to me good business to sell our farm products at a low price to Britain and then charge exorbitant prices for lumber shipped to Britain if we want her trade in the future. If the export prices on lumber going to Britain were reduced it would help to balance the low farm prices received on British contracts. At the present time we have to have an export market for our lumber. You could raise the domestic price on certain grades of lumber, especially hemlock, so that we could sell our lumber to Britain more cheaply and cinch that market. Russia, Sweden, Norway and Finland are going to compete against us in that market unless there is good mutual feeling between the lumber dealers of Britain and Canada.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Chairman, I have been amazed this afternoon, as I was last evening, at the large number of pleas made by members on both sides of the house that the government increase today's retail prices of lumber. Many of us are not familiar with all the ramifications of the timber industry, but we are conversant with the fact that retail lumber prices have gone up sixty to seventy-five per cent at least, and perhaps more. That the hon. member for Halifax should be pleading for increased lumber exports, as he did a few moments ago, at a time when we cannot find the materials for house building is a fantastic situation. We are not beginning to get to grips with the problem at all. The only reason the hon. member is asking for increases in the export quota for his own area is that the producers of timber in that part of the country may capitalize on this squeeze which is going on in the foreign markets. There is no justification for allowing the export prices to continue, for the reason mentioned in part by the hon. member who just resumed his seat. We are actually killing the goose that lays the golden egg by extracting every nickel that we can from the foreign market now, but when the emergency is over we shall be going cap in hand asking these people if they would be good enough to buy our product.

Mr. HODGSON: I mentioned the British market.

Mr. PROBE: Yes. That applies, of course, to all our customers, but I am glad to be corrected with respect to the British market. That is what the hon. member said.

The argument of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the hon. member for Charlotte, and as I recall it, the hon. member for Royal, was that we again increase the lumber price ceiling here in Canada. The hon. member for Royal yesterday made the statement that the retail lumber firms were losing approximately $8 a thousand on their lumber sales. If that is so it is not because of the price at which they are selling the product, but because retailers are not getting sufficient wares from the wholesalers unless they are part of the wholesale connection. As I understand it, the trend in modern lumber retailing is for the timber operator to control the distribution from the cutting to the final selling of the lumber. There is some evidence of that in my own city, where certain yards apparently have larger supplies of lumber than others. It may be due to their wholesale and saw mill connections.

Under this order in council the minister has sufficient power to analyse the costs of all of the steps of the marketing of the finished product. To hear figures like $80 to $200 odd a thousand quoted for export lumber, or $70 a thousand on own retail market when I can recall that just before the war the retail market was able to sell lumber at $40 a thousand, shows that there is something incongruous in these figures.

The other evening I asked the minister to give me specific retail prices for five different lumber items based on the prices in 1939, 1944 and 1947. I have not forgotten that request, if the minister has, and I am again asking him to put these figures on the record. Today I am asking that he do something more. We have been conveniently vague in the committee on the question of various spreads in the prices from log to wholesaler, to retailer, to the ultimate market. I should like to have the minister give the representative prices today—I do not care what kind of timber he takes—so that we can get the relative spread of a log delivered at the mill compared with that log in the form of sawn lumber at saw mill prices. Then I should like the wholesale price to the retailer and the retail price to the consumer of the same article on a basis of price per thousand feet. These are figures which any laymen can understand.

In discussing the duties of the timber controller it is not enough to outline his extensive powers, unless he does something about them.

The other evening I put on the record—and it has been done by other hon. members—the increased net profits of one corporation, the Canadian Western Lumber Company, on the west coast, which had tripled its dollar profits between 1945 and 1946, and yet its whole record from 1939 down to the end of 1945, as contained in the manual of investments that I have before me, is one of diminishing production. The capacity of the Canadian Western Lumber Company saw mills on the west coast is 200 million feet per annum. In only one year in the last eight years did it hit that figure. That was in 1939, when it produced a little over 200 million feet. In successive years from 1939 to 1945, the last figures which are given in this book, production dropped until in 1945 it was only 60 per cent of what it was in 1939, and yet the balance sheet is exceedingly—

Mr. MERRITT: Why did production drop?

Mr. PROBE: That is one of the enigmas the meaning of which perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply may be able to give. Certainly there is nothing wrong with the timber limits which this company possesses. Everything that it owns is exceedingly accessible. This volume says that its limits are all accessible to salt water. The description of its property may be found at page 1816 of the Moody manual of investments. It is not a matter of getting the logs to the mill. It is simply a matter of this corporation—I am singling it out because its figures are so significant—

Mr. MERRITT: Does the hon. member know where its limits are?

Mr. PROBE: Yes. It is all in this record of Moody's at page 1816. I do not wish to read it to the hon. member; he may read it himself if he likes. The point I am trying to make is that while the annual production has continued to decline from 100 per cent capacity to 60 per cent of capacity, the net profits have been increasing. In large measure this is due in my opinion to the fact that the company is scalping on the market as it now exists, and that the timber controller has not examined adequately the profit sheet of this and other corporations which are in the lumber business.

I should like the minister to put on the record now, or as soon as convenient, the figures which I asked for the other evening. This afternoon I will ask for the relative prices of five staple commodities used in house building as between 1939 and 1947. The other figure I asked for was the price of any type of log in terms of thousands of feet, and carry the price of the article through the various distributing channels until it finally gets to the consumer. I think we shall find the answer to the problem of high cost of housing in there somewhere.

Mr. HOWE: All I can say to my hon. friend is that I shall be glad to look up these prices and give them at the next sitting.

Mr. MERRITT: I think the committee is entitled to a full explanation from the minister as to why he feels it desirable to continue this timber control, and, since so apparently he does think it desirable, what he is going to do to make the timber control a bearable thing for the timber industry from coast to coast. I know it is a very difficult problem for him. All his timber controllers in the past year have found it necessary to resign; their tenure of office is becoming shorter and shorter, and I feel I must say to him that he must do better than this in the operation of the timber control if he is to justify its retention at all. We saw in the house last night, and again this afternoon, members getting up from every part of Canada, and in every case the complaint is the one I hear so much from people in the lumber business in British Columbia. In the opinion of those people who are in the business it is not possible for any central organization to control so varied a product as lumber and get the best production and have a smooth-running industry.

Mr. PROBE: May I make a correction in the hon. member's statement? That is not the opinion of the members in the C.C.F. group in this house. We feel that the timber controller can do a good job, but we are mighty certain that thus far he has not made a good start in doing a good job. There is a big difference.

Mr. MERRITT: As a matter of fact I am not at all surprised at the hon. member's intervention, because it never really crossed my mind that they would support what the timber industry feels is in its best interest.

Mr. PROBE: We will not support profits like the Canadian Western Lumber Company's; it is scalping the market.

Mr. GILLIS: Restrict production and force prices up.

Mr. MERRITT: I can say a word about that. I am not saying now that the timber control should be taken off. I have not the information that the minister has available; I have available to me only the results of his policy. It might appear to me, as it appears to many people, that we would be better off if the control were removed, but that is a responsibility of the government. I am not here telling them what to do—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What are you telling them?

Mr. MERRITT: —but I am here to tell the minister what is going wrong and what ought to be fixed. That is what I conceive to be my task this afternoon. What the matter is, as the minister knows, is not really the question of profit at all, certainly not so far as the mills in British Columbia are concerned. They are all making a profit, and everyone knows where it comes from. It comes from the export trade, where the price is necessarily kept very high in order to subsidize a domestic ceiling which is actually below cost of production of lumber in Canada. That is perfectly clear, and it is admitted, I think, by the minister. That is why I was surprised when the member for Regina City raised this question of the profits of a certain company, which, he suggested, was scalping on the market,—whatever that is,—and that annual production had declined although its profits had gone up. The hon. member need not worry about profits made by that company. I hope he was not trying to leave the impression with hon. members that these profits were made out of the Canadian people, that the domestic market was being scalped. The Canadian people are getting British Columbia lumber at about a $10 subsidy, the cost of production being about $10 per thousand above the domestic price. If the annual production of lumber from this company has dropped each year since 1939, we have had a war on. I imagine that in the first couple of years there was a shipping shortage and perhaps not so much was cut for the export market; and after that we had timber control. It is open to serious doubts, from some of the speeches made here, whether the control exercised by the minister is maintaining production in the way that production could be maintained either without the control or perhaps with a different type of control or a different handling of control.

The truth of the matter is that the policy followed by the government in this timber control has demoralized the timber industry in every province in Canada. I have in my hand press clippings of Vancouver papers, of April 23 and 24, and although we have not got further papers I presume there will be more items of this kind on the way. At the moment the minister's timber controller is out in British Columbia attempting to negotiate some new kind of agreement with the people in the business there, apparently so as to increase the amount of lumber which is delivered to the domestic market and reduce the amount shipped for export.

The minister knows that it would not be necessary in the case of many a mill for the timber controller to go to Vancouver at all, if there were a change in the policy followed by the government. I can mention one example within my personal experience where an operator in Vancouver wanted to sell a larger percentage of his cut domestically in order that he might maintain his pre-war markets and sell to veterans and not disappoint other old friends in Vancouver. He found he was unable to do what he wanted and he was unable to do what good business practice dictated, because if he did, he would be losing money over all. He found he must sell export right up to the quota in order to make a profit on his total annual sale.

That is one little example of the way in which this industry is being distorted. Here is a clipping from the April 24 issue of the Vancouver Province:

> Various lumbermen here reported today their stand that they do not wish to deprive the Canadian market of lumber and would willingly sell more at home if a profit could be made.

Then in a report in the Vancouver Sun of April 24, the concluding words are:

> Vancouver lumber spokesmen said the government and its officers should get out of the business of allocating and imposing priorities for lumber orders. They would like to see controls in the industry completely abolished, but they have little hope of this.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you in favour of that?

Mr. MERRITT: In favour of what?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Abolishing controls.

Mr. MERRITT: I have just gone to some trouble to explain that that would appear to me to be a very wise thing, but I am anxious to hear what the minister has to say on it. The minister is now before this house asking for the continuation of his timber control. I do not think the house should pass this item without some explanation by the minister as to the difficulties which arise under his control, and what he can do in the future to set them right and see that the industry is not demoralized, as it appears to be. Does that make my position perfectly clear to the hon. member for Fraser Valley?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have interrupted without asking for permission. May I say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that I agree with him that far, but I still do not know where he stands on controls.

An hon. MEMBER: You will find out.

Mr. MERRITT: It appears also from this report that at one stage in these negotiations there was an arbitrary attempt to order certain mills in Vancouver to change the destination of their shipments without giving them any compensation for that order. This report says:

> Mr. Uren today swung a haymaker at the lumber manufacturers with an order to several mills to cease loading shipments to overseas ports, reprocess, and turn the lumber over to him for Canadian use.
> Mills receiving this order indicated they may defy the federal officer's dictum. It places them in conflict with signed and sealed contractual obligations, they counter.

In the report of the following day, April 24, it appears that more progress has been made and that the plan is something like this. First, the controller proposes that the domestic allocations should be increased from 35 to 40 per cent and probably to 45 per cent; second, that by way of compensation for that increase in the domestic quota, price increases be granted; the suggested amount is a ten to fifteen per cent increase, and in another newspaper report I have seen it suggested that the price might be advanced $7 to $13; third, that a system of "approvals" be set up. This apparently is a new system of priorities—

> . . . to assure definite quantities to veterans' housing, railways, mines, shipyards and municipal, provincial and federal projects. Under this scheme mills would take orders from such "priority" accounts, and then get them approved by timber control here. Each mill would have to supply a certain portion of its total cut to these "approval" buyers.

It appears from that report that we are to have three things: first, an increase in the domestic quota, which is something I should be very glad to see; second, an increase in the price, and apparently a fairly substantial increase, according to the newspaper reports; and third, a completely new system of priorities, called approvals, which I think the minister should explain to the committee if there is any truth in the report; because it seems that of the forty to forty-five per cent now to be retained in Canada, half is to be directed, under this approval scheme, to projects which the government approves; and the sawmill is to be able to supply only twenty per cent of its cut to its normal customers in its usual business way. At first sight it would appear to me that that is going to complicate and demoralize the industry even further than has the practice up to the present time.

Just before I sit down I wish to place on the record some of the things which have been done to this industry as a result of this control, particularly as they relate to British Columbia. In the first place, before the war and before the era of controls we had in British Columbia two major markets. One was the United Kingdom market and the other was the domestic market. Under the stimulus of low freight rates through the Panama canal during the depression, and under the further and most important stimulus of the Ottawa agreements and the imperial preference, British Columbia built up for her lumber a large market in the United Kingdom. At the same time the whole industry geared itself to those two markets. A certain number of the mills are export mills. They are on tidewater and have facilities for loading into deep-sea ships. As I understand it, they used to sell, say, ninety per cent of their cut export and ten per cent domestic. On the other hand there was the other set of mills—the small mills this time, and many more in number—which all over the province had rail outlets for their lumber. They naturally served the domestic market and shipped export only to convenience buyers or to get rid of some surplus that they had not been able to sell domestically. Naturally, their proportion of sales was just about in reverse, ninety per cent domestic and ten per cent export, or something of that kind. Also, we had on the Pacific coast, in addition to the best timber in the world, a system of grading and checking of our lumber which is unparalleled anywhere. In the Pacific lumber inspection bureau we had a body of inspectors whose certificates were accepted right around the world as proof that the lumber shipped was up to specification.

I might also say to the committee that you cannot control and set prices on lumber in the same way that you can control and set prices on wheat, because lumber is not a single commodity. There is all the difference in the world between the various grades.

Mr. PROBE: Grain is produced by the small fellows and lumber is produced by the big shots.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MERRITT: That is not the distinction, of course.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is the C.C.F. mentality.

Mr. MERRITT: The distinction is simply this. I believe you have grade No. 1, grade No. 2 and grade No. 3 in wheat. But to compare a big timber, twelve by twelve, with a two by four, for instance, is like comparing a motor car with a railway engine. They are two different commodities.

Mr. PROBE: I am trying to compare lumber with wheat; but go ahead.

An hon. MEMBER: You stick to wheat.

Mr. MERRITT: As I say, that is a difficulty in which the minister finds himself in trying to control this multifarious commodity. We have also heard from other hon. members—and I will not dwell on the fact—that if you subsidize your domestic market by high external prices, particularly in the United Kingdom market, you are very likely to kill the goose that laid the golden egg.

The second last timber controller had this to say at about the time of his resignation. In a press report from Ottawa, dated August 9, Mr. David Rosenberry is quoted as saying:

> "I disagree with the contention that we should make our export prices carry our Canadian losses," said the timber controller. "We cannot go on doing this and survive." "Domestic prices," he added, "were dollars below" the cost of production . . . If Canadian lumbermen were forced to protect their interests by a steady rise in export prices, he maintained, then the day could come when Russia might go after the British lumber market and undersell Canada.

The government must bear that in mind in dealing with this question.

Now I go on, I hope briefly, to show the various ways in which the clear-cut business procedure of the lumbermen in British Columbia which I have outlined has been distorted and broken down by what happended under control during the war. I have explained their domestic mills and their export mills. An export mill must sell forty per cent of its output in the domestic market, which it is not designed to do, and a domestic mill must sell sixty per cent of its product in the export market, which in turn it is not designed to do. That causes damage to the good will of the various operators, and damage to their future business. You have man after man in the timber business complaining that he is unable to fill orders, sometimes from old customers, and worried lest that may damage his good will in future. Then you have a most extraordinary development, in that all over British Columbia you find new little re-saw mills springing up, and people building dry kilns in conjunction with them, which never would have occurred in normal times. This has happened because some of the established mills have closed down their kilns because they could not operate them without increasing their losses. At the same time you have a deterioration in the quality of lumber produced and in the grading. You get random lengths instead of the lengths desired by the customer. You get all sorts of technical compliance with the regulations but what really amounts to evasion. For instance, you have lumber sold as rough lumber, which is taken by the purchaser to one of these small mills where it is re-sawn, dried and sorted by the purchaser, with the additional cost added to the ceiling price. Then you have other cases of custom cutting, where the owner of the logs will make a special contract to cut those logs at a price which, because it is a special contract, is not within the regulations. Time after time one hears of lumber delivered in Vancouver, and perfectly within the law, at $60 or $70 a thousand where the ceiling price may be $30 or $40.

In all those ways timber control, while it has not cost the people on the Pacific coast any money, while they are not complaining that they do not get an adequate profit, has broken down their proper business methods, so they are complaining that their industry has been demoralized. These are the matters which, in my view, the minister should be turning his attention to now and correcting. If he feels that he must maintain the control let him at the same time make it possible for this industry to get along under business practices which will permit the operators to keep their self-respect and retain their future markets. It should be made possible for them to do the good job that they did before the war, and that they want to do in future. I hope the minister will tell us whether, in his view, it may be possible to get away from all these malpractices which I have outlined and which come under his control.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say a few words; I shall be very brief, because I want to hear the budget tonight. I have in my riding the largest logging camp in the British empire, as well as the largest cedar mill in the British empire.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): So what?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member has all the profits from the pulp mills and so on in his riding. Let him take care of Comox-Alberni and I will take care of my constituency. I disagree with the argument of the previous speaker, as I understood it. Apparently, according to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, certain mills only are to be allowed in the export market. That was his argument, as I understood it.

Mr. MERRITT: No; that is not what I said at all.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It certainly took the hon. member half an hour to try and convince me of something else, then. I should like the hon. member to tell me of one mill—and I am speaking now of any well-known mill—on the lower mainland which, prior to the war, did not sell on the market that paid best, whether it was domestic or export. He cannot name a solitary mill that did not do business in that way.

Mr. MERRITT: Of course, and that was my point; they cannot do that now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And I understood the hon. member to be advocating that only a very few mills should be in that export market.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right; I hope to be able to say in ten minutes more than the hon. member said in thirty-five minutes, so leave me alone.

Mr. GREEN: You are not as bright as usual.

Mr. BROOKS: Not as bright as he thinks he is.

Mr. MERRITT: Don't misquote me, and I will leave you alone.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Maybe I am not as bright as I think I am, but let me tell the hon. member that more lumber is produced in my riding than in the whole province of New Brunswick, so maybe I know more about lumbering than he does.

Mr. BROOKS: You don't produce it; you just talk about it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have probably produced more lumber than you have.

Mr. BROOKS: Did you ever go out with an axe?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Probably if I got an axe I would be able to cut more than the hon. member for Royal, though I must admit I could not cut our timber in British Columbia with an axe. We have timber in our country, not the little match-sticks you have in New Brunswick. The argument of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Royal, if I understood it, seemed to me to be the argument advocated about a year ago by the hon. member for Vancouver North, that our domestic prices should be increased. The hon. gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong, but that is my impression. At that time we were in favour of the domestic price being increased, with the proviso that the lumber so sold should be made available to the people of Canada through the various retail outlets. So I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has missed the boat. We in British Columbia who represent lumber districts—and I hope the minister is taking this in—claim that in that province we are not getting distribution of our fair allotment of the lumber we produce. We believe the ceiling price for lumber could be increased by a reasonable amount on domestic sales provided that, as I said a moment ago, it is distributed through the various retail outlets.

It is customary in British Columbia—and I understand that this applies also to the prairie provinces—for lumber to be distributed through retail outlets rather than direct from the mills. What has happened is that the large mills are distributing direct, and the result is that local retailers throughout the province are unable to get any supply. Large lumbering operations are carried on in my riding, so it is not a case of just talking about it like some of the hon. members from New Brunswick. A farmer wanting to buy supplies for his farm may have to send his truck on a trip of one or two days to get 200 or 1,000 feet of lumber. If the retailers were getting their fair quotas of lumber the farmers or users of lumber could afford to pay an increase of from $8 to $10 per 1,000 feet rather than having to go long distances to get their supplies.

If I am not mistaken, this is the argument which was advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver North in his intelligent speech of a year ago. He knows something about lumbering because lumbering operations are carried on in his riding. Personally I am opposed to the export market being granted to three or four large producers of lumber. A financier from Ontario came out to my riding and paid millions of dollars for one mill. If I am not mistaken he paid $14,000,000 for another outlet, although I may be wrong in my figures. However it ran up into the millions. Why did he do this? He did it in order to get the vast majority of that export market. This is one of the parties who said that they could not pay an increase of fifteen cents an hour to the loggers. I shall have something more to say about that later on.

I just wanted to impress upon the minister that, in so far as the people of my riding are concerned, they are prepared to pay an increased price on the domestic market, provided that the quotas are raised to permit the retailers, who are the normal outlet for supplies, obtaining the necessary supplies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I just want to say that there is something wrong with the timber control at the present time. I have received letters from lumber dealers in my riding, and in a few minutes I shall quote part of one of these letters. I have received a letter from a man who uses a lot of lumber in his business, and he wants the controls taken off lumber altogether because he feels that there will then be better quality lumber available even at a better price.

One of the main things I rose to speak about was to mention a company which is operating in Algonquin park in Ontario. This man came from the United States and invested his money. He got some rather large limits from the Ontario government, he has put in fourteen miles of road and is prepared to put up modern bunk houses to carry on his operations. At present he has a small mill operating to cut up the lumber to be used in building his own buildings. He proposes to expend from $100,000 to $150,000 on a mill, but under conditions which exist at the present time he is not going to go ahead. The situation is so precarious that these people do not know where they stand. A mill costing from $100,000 to $150,000 would be quite an asset for the province of Ontario but, as I say, these people are not going to go ahead because of the uncertain conditions that exist right now.

These people find that it is more profitable to cut and sell logs than it is to saw lumber. That is one aspect of this question of control which should be considered. I have a letter here from a lumber dealer in Toronto who wants the controls taken off altogether. He says that the timber controller did a marvellous job during the war, and I think he did. During those times people were patriotic and they were not operating in the black market as they are today. As a matter of fact the dealers in Toronto are all in the same boat. During the war they made practically no money; they might as well have folded up and gone out of business, but they did not. One paragraph in this letter reads:

> With the controls on today, what do we find? While up at Haliburton this year I saw, at five o'clock in the morning truck load and truck load filled to their full capacity with green lumber going from the saw mills to builders in Toronto and we know there could not have possibly been permits issued for same as they were paying $55 at the mill and all the wholesalers could pay was $42 to $45 for the same class of stock. Now the builder here in Toronto getting this stock from the black market had to take what he got. If there was 200 or 400 feet short in measurement, he could do nothing about it. If there was 25 to 30 per cent culls he could do nothing about that either, but if he did not buy in this black market he could not get any lumber at all so he had to take what he could get and like it.

To my mind a situation such as that requires a remedy. He then goes on to say:

> Since the control has come off in the United States, I personally have offered several of my customers lumber that, last year, would have jumped at the offers, but this year their replies have been, "We are not interested at any price." In other words, the American mills are getting into production and the American market that was quite a gold mine for Canadian shippers, prices will have receded back to the normal price, and I feel satisfied, except for a few items in Canada, the same thing would apply if controls were taken off after open trading for about two months.

I wanted to bring those two things to the attention of the committee because I think there is something very wrong with the way in which timber is controlled.

Mr. PEARKES: I feel I must accept the challenge of the hon. member for Fraser Valley when he referred to the size of the mills and the logging operations in his riding and compared them with the size of the mills and logging operations elsewhere. I feel that he has put his finger on the crux of the whole problem, namely, the neglect to channel domestic lumber through the retail merchants. I know that on Vancouver island the lumber yards have been short of lumber, with the result that the farmers and agriculturists who wanted to erect barns or some other type of domestic building have been unable to secure the small amounts of lumber which are absolutely essential to them.

Mr. HENDERSON: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say now will probably not fit in too well with the wonderful discussion with regard to lumber to which we have been listening. I do not live in a lumbering district and I have not the same interest in lumbering as some of those who have spoken. But I do know that in my district lumber is in more or less short supply; it is very hard to get and it is very much in demand.

I wanted to say a few words on firewood. I live in southern Ontario where we have not a great lumber region any more but where firewood and wood for fuel purposes generally is very much in demand.

Mr. HOWE: If I might interrupt my hon. friend, the control of fuel wood was dropped at the urgent request of the opposition.

Mr. HENDERSON: Many people are deeply concerned about the cost of firewood, which is in real and urgent demand by a great many of our older residents. They love the odour of wood smoke and believe no other heat is as radiant or cheering as that from the open wood grate or kitchen range. They also dread the danger of coal gas and its deadly fumes and cling to the use of wood fuel for both its cheering comforts and safety. During the war years we had a fuel controller who divided our country into regions or zones and regulated the movement and prices of wood fuel according to its several standards. But price control has been removed from wood fuel. The title of P.C. 1997 which we are now debating is:

Order in council abolishing the office of wood fuel controller, transferring his duties to the timber controller and reenacting the regulations respecting timber.

And paragraph (h) of the interpretation clause of the regulations respecting timber issued under that order in council reads:

"Timber" shall include any trees, standing or cut and any lumber in any form, and any wood, processed or unprocessed, and any wood product, and any by-product of wood, including but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, pulp wood, pulp wood chips, cordwood, millwaste, sawdust, hogged fuel and charcoal.

From this I conclude that, although controls have been removed from fuel wood, the order in council grants to the timber controller power and authority again to enforce price ceilings and other controls of fuel wood if he deems it in the public interest. Since the Minister of Justice has stated that numerous articles which have been removed from price control are decontrolled only so far as prices remain reasonable and just, and since coal strikes in the future are pending and there is uncertainty as to future fuel supplies, would the minister inform us if P.C. 1997 would give the timber controller authority again to enforce price ceilings on wood fuel if it advanced to such prices as, in his opinion, would not be reasonable and just?

At present flood control and soil reconversion are being given close and immediate study in the many recent flood areas and since forests play a large part in the scheme of flood control, there is danger, if timber prices advance too sharply, of finding an undue destruction of our fast vanishing southern forests. This is a matter of immediate concern and one that requires both federal and provincial study.

[Mr. Henderson.]

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I think the way in which we handle this great natural resource of timber is the acid test of our democracy. We have in this country a timber cut of around four billion feet. During the last few days the question of controls has been under debate and we are now discussing particularly the utilization of our timber cut. My Tory friends to the right with their usual arguments have, in my opinion, been side-stepping the main issue. Their arguments represent a mental tango.

Mr. MERRITT: What is the main issue?

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The issue is this. We want to build houses for our people. I heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard ask a question of the hon. member for Regina City in regard to the profits being made by lumber companies. He asked: Does the hon. member realize that the Canadian people are not paying for the profits of the large lumber companies in this country. Was not that my hon. friend's question?

Mr. MERRITT: Yes.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The truth is that the people of this country are paying for those profits. In a previous debate in this house I mentioned the profits of the H. R. MacMillan Company, a large lumber operator on the coast, which made a profit of $1,300,000 in 1946 over 1945, and at that time the hon. member for Kamloops asked me if I realized what taxes this company had paid. I am not concerned with the taxes these lumber companies have paid. They are making tremendous profits. I would remind the government that before the election they promised that the veterans coming back would not be any worse off than the people who had stayed at home, and they promised the veterans homes and jobs. This is the acid test of democracy. Here is one of our great natural resources which the members of this group believe must be so handled and planned as to enable homes to be built for our people. But what have we today? A new timber policy has been announced by the press. The press reports that the cost of lumber is going up twenty-five to thirty per cent. If this is true the veterans will have to pay through the nose to get the lumber they need for their houses, and when you remember the small gratuities they receive you will realize that they will not be able to build houses if lumber increases in price. I have travelled across this country and have seen veterans living in basements in Vancouver. I know people in Ottawa who are living under conditions which, if investigated, would be reported as not fit for habitation. My information is that on the Toronto waterfront O'Keefe's, a large brewing company, are building a plant costing $2,000,000, which will use timber and other building materials, and that another is planned for Waterloo, and others elsewhere across this country. I think, therefore, it is high time that there should be planning of this great natural resource of timber so that it can be made available to the people of this country as the members of this group have consistently argued.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I should answer a few questions that have been asked. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent asked if it would be possible to reinstate the control of wood fuel under the present order in council. I am advised that it would be possible. We would have to call the control by another name perhaps, but it would be possible to reinstate wood fuel control under the order. I sincerely hope that will not be necessary.

The work of the timber control has been criticized. It is not surprising that there should be criticism when we hear the diverse views that have been expressed by the committee. We have had speeches advocating a higher percentage of exports, speeches advocating more lumber for domestic use, speeches demanding lower prices for housing and a great number of speeches demanding higher domestic prices so that we would not ask the poor lumberman to sell below cost. However we have struggled on for a good many years in administering timber control. It may not have been convenient for everyone.

May I tell the committee an experience that surprised me? I went all the way to Edmonton about two weeks ago to attend a meeting of the representatives of all the lumber interests of interior British Columbia and the prairie provinces. We were wanting a larger proportion of the cut in that area and some changes in distribution which would help out areas that were not getting an adequate supply of lumber. I introduced the subject by making a speech setting out our objectives, and I said that if this could be obtained it would probably speed the end of lumber control. Someone said, "No one in this room wants lumber control removed," and no one challenged that statement. One of the men drove me home afterwards, and I said, "Is that the feeling of the gathering in the room, that they do not want lumber control removed". He said, "Certainly".

Mr. MERRITT: What reason did he give?

Mr. HOWE: He believes it is for the good of the industry. I believe that is the real opinion of the industry so far as producers are concerned. I am quite free to admit that the retailers do not take that view; but I think the important part of the lumber industry, so far as the present situation is concerned, is the producers rather than the retailers.

Mr. MERRITT: That means control for how long; an indeterminate period?

Mr. HOWE: I did not ask him that. I shall perhaps go back, call them together again and ask that question.

Mr. WYLIE: They were all Conservatives at that meeting?

Mr. KNOWLES: Was that the speech in which you told Alberta to send down Tories if they could not send Liberals?

Mr. HOWE: There is a reason for timber control which I have mentioned before. We need only compare domestic prices and export prices to realize that it is having an effect on the Canadian economy. For example, common fir and hemlock, surfaced four sizes, is selling at the mill in Vancouver at $26 a thousand. It is selling at the mill for export at $70 a thousand; flooring, 1 x 4, is selling in Vancouver at $55 a thousand for domestic use and for export, at $150 to $170 a thousand; drop siding, 1 x 6, at $43.25 a thousand for domestic use and $106 for export. I could give these spreads in greater detail to indicate the type of market we would be competing against without control. I could quote from the Cross weekly letter, dated Portland, Oregon, January 31, 1947, which says:

> The market on finished uppers belittles description. Prices seem never to get so high that they never go higher, and a price unreasonably out of line today looks good tomorrow. Fir flooring has been sold this week at $190, mill, and drop siding and other items of corresponding size and grade have found buyers at $150, and in a few instances even more.

Mr. PROBE: Why does not the timber controller take over the complete export market and handle both ends of it?

Mr. HOWE: There is a reason for that. The export market has been in existence for a good many years. We had traditional markets and we believe that the trade should look after their traditional markets. The business has been conducted between the private buyer and the private seller.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is a competitive business.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Throughout the war years and throughout the reconstruction years we have tried to interfere as little as we could with the competitive situation. We have tried as little as possible to interfere with the proportion of export markets that were maintained before the war. For example, in British Columbia the cut has always been distributed about two-thirds export and one-third domestic. The same proportion holds pretty well in the maritime provinces. Therefore we have been permitting about sixty per cent of the timber of British Columbia to go export; we have been permitting about sixty per cent of the timber cut in the maritime provinces to be exported.

Mr. GREEN: How is the minister controlling exports now; under the export and import powers or under the timber control powers?

Mr. HOWE: Under both. We have the export regulations and we also have the timber control regulations. One operates on instructions of the other. There is a timber control advice to import and export control of the earned quotas and permits are granted accordingly. The overriding control is the import and export control.

Mr. GREEN: Under trade and commerce?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It has been represented to us certainly in the house and from a great portion of the eastern trade that an increase in domestic prices would improve the distribution and the supply situation. Personally I have my doubts, but in any event, so far as western Canada is concerned, we found it necessary to retain a greater proportion of the cut to serve Canadian markets. The demand for west coast lumber has increased greatly this year, due to large domestic car orders and due to demands of provinces, municipalities and other public bodies for effecting repairs to essential structures. Therefore we have negotiated with the central British Columbia and prairie operators to reduce the proportion of their exports, and we have allowed them to increase domestic prices which will give about the same return to the mill as they were able to obtain under the former system of distribution. We have been negotiating with the west coast mills to the same end. I am advised that agreement has been reached or will be reached shortly. The domestic quota of west coast lumber will be increased and there will be a corresponding adjustment in prices, and an adjustment in the whole range of prices to effect a better supply of the top grades of lumber in the Canadian market.

Mr. BROOKS: Will there be an increase in the export quota of lumber from eastern Canada in proportion to what has been reduced in western Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No, certainly not; we need more lumber in western Canada. The export of lumber from the maritime provinces is the highest of any part of Canada. I understood from the hon. member's speech that he did not know that, but that is the fact. So far as the maritime provinces are concerned the export is about sixty per cent of the cut.

Mr. BROOKS: We export one car for every two cars that we use in the domestic market.

Mr. HOWE: That is so far as the earned quota is concerned, but there is a free quota to the United Kingdom, of which every cutter in the maritime provinces has a share, so that the net result is almost the opposite. Two cars are exported in the maritime provinces for one retained in this country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will an increase be given to the retail dealers?

Mr. HOWE: The increase in the wholesale prices of the mill will, of course, be extended and will cause a readjustment of domestic prices. That is being worked out at the present time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What I mean is, will a definite amount be detailed to the retailer? Will there be quotas on it?

Mr. HOWE: All lumber is sold through retail licences.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They cannot get any.

Mr. HOWE: We hope this extra quota held in Canada will provide a better supply.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any extension of licences issued to mills? I understand that a great many of the mills are allowed to sell retail which were not allowed so to sell before, and one result of the change has been to make it much more difficult for the retail dealer to get supplies.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. The wartime prices and trade board has the issuing of retail permits, and I think the test is as to whether the applicant has retail facilities. If he has a yard that is capable of serving the retail customers I presume he gets a retail licence, but that is a matter which the timber controller has not had under his supervision. I do not know whether I have answered all questions.

Mr. BROOKS: Last night in the minister's absence I asked a question with regard to birchwood in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are about a billion feet of it, I understand, and it is being affected by a disease called dieback. I understood that the minister of lands and mines of Nova Scotia had made representations to the department here, asking that the quota be increased to allow them to cut this lumber, which would otherwise be a total loss in a few years.

Mr. HOWE: That is true. We were asked to set a free quota for infested birch. The difficulty is that the lumber from infested birch is exactly like the lumber from good birch, and the result would have been that all the hardwood cut in the maritime provinces would have been infested birch by the time it came on the market.

Mr. BROOKS: You do not know the people of the maritimes or you would not say that.

Mr. HOWE: What I did suggest was that, after the quotas of last year had been filled, the timber controller would permit seventy-five per cent of the surplus cut to be exported, which seemed to us a very liberal proposal in that regard. It has not been accepted and I notice the cut in the maritime provinces is about the same this year as last year, so far as hardwood is concerned. But if an extra effort were made to cut more infested birch, at least 75 per cent of it could be exported.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I have sat here and listened to the discussion that has been going on, and I resent some of the typically cheap C.C.F. insinuations against prominent industrialists in British Columbia. I certainly do not think they need to have me come to their defence, but what annoys me is the suggestion that we hear from across the way. Anyone not on direct relief, they seem to think, is an enemy of the state.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who are the biggest recipients of direct relief?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): With regard to Mr. H. R. MacMillan, may I say to my good friends the hon. members for Skeena and Assiniboia, that his record in British Columbia will stand close examination and will bear comparison with any of the records of members opposite in the C.C.F. party. He is a large employer of labour in my own riding, and—I may say this for the information of my hon. friends—he told me not long ago that he was definitely opposed to the removal of the domestic price controls on lumber. He said he felt that the present controls were protecting the small man in the country who was trying to obtain a home for himself, and I thought he was acting in the manner of a good Canadian citizen. I want to put that on the record to his credit. The sawmill in my riding which Mr. MacMillan operates cuts a quarter of a million feet a day, and that mill has never turned down anyone in the riding when he required lumber for the construction of a home. They have seen that lumber was available to all the residents of the constituency. I might also say—

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I might also say to my hon. friend, when he is examining the facts with regard to lumber production and insinuating that some of the large lumber operators are reducing production in order to create larger profits because of scarcity, that the lumber cut last year in British Columbia was the largest in history, and that we anticipate that it will be larger in 1947.

An hon. MEMBER: How much was exported?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): When you refer to profits of that lumber company you would not be fair enough to inform the committee that there has been a vast expansion in that organization in the past year, involving millions of dollars of capitalization. There has been a large profit on the shipping business which that company carries on, something which has nothing to do with the domestic market at all. The lumber companies in British Columbia are considered the best employers of labour there. They have the highest scale of wages of any industry in the whole dominion.

I would say to the minister, however, that the British Columbia timber industry is highly competitive on the world market and our competitors have always been the United States mills on the Pacific coast. Because there is no price ceiling in the United States, and consequently they receive a high price for all their lumber, within the last three months there has been definite evidence that the Americans have been stealing some of our traditional markets from us, owing to the fact that they are able to undersell us on the world market. That is one feature of price control which must be considered in any adjustment of the situation, but I am sure the minister will give these matters his close attention.

Mr. PROBE: May I deal briefly with one statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and that is the one about cheap C.C.F. insinuations with respect to the lumber barons, with whom my hon. friend is associated. There is nothing cheap about insinuations when they are supported with the figures of the tremendous profits that these people are hauling in.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They are taxed.

Mr. PROBE: Assuming that they are taxed; why should they not be taxed? You get your taxes where there is money. And whose lumber was it in the first place? Did the Canadian Western Lumber Company grow that timber? Certainly not; it is part of the domain of the people of Canada. Let me give instances of net profits, after taxes, in the case of the Canadian Western Lumber Company—and the source, by the way, is the Financial Post; there is nothing cheap about that. The Financial Post of March 8, 1947, quotes the Canadian Western Lumber Company as having received net profits, after taxes, in 1945 of $459,000 odd and in 1946 net profits, after taxes, of $1,019,000, or an increase of 121 per cent of actual profits. Let me say one thing more to my hon. friend. As to the rate of profit in 1946 on its capital of $3,073,000, how much of that is watered stock I do not know, but that is the capital—

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The original shareholders lost all their money, may I say for the hon. member's information.

Mr. PROBE: The rate of profit was thirty-four per cent. Well, that is not a very cheap insinuation. That is extremely high-priced stuff I am talking about. I know the effect on the producer, and you as a member of parliament and as a citizen of the country should know that our people are still suffering from lack of homes. That is the criterion by which we should be considering this matter in this house, and not only whether some lumber baron is paying proper wages to labour. I did not interject that.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni saw fit to get up and attack some of the statements I made, and I saw some of my hon. friends across the way and some to the right get up and support these tremendous profits. I do not think we have indulged in cheap propaganda or debate or anything of that kind in this house. I have never in this house at any time reduced my arguments to personalities and I did not attack H. R. MacMillan for any personal reasons at all. I say this: When we have such a crying need in this country for homes and for building materials, for any government or any hon. member to stand up and support profits which I have already indicated—because my hon. friends are always talking about taxes—is something I cannot understand. Again I state that H. R. MacMillan and Company last year, in 1944, made a net profit of $1,213,790. There is the proposition. Hon. members can get up and support that sort of thing if they so desire.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I just wish to say a word or two, because I represent a district that produces annually some 125 million or 130 million feet of lumber. Fortunately, we have not any of these wicked people in my riding. The lumber industry in my district is largely owned by hardworking people, small people. I represent a riding which has many small mills in it. I have lived for some forty odd years with these people and I must say that they are splendid people to represent. There are some reasons for increasing costs as far as our district is concerned. I have found that our operators were on the whole very considerate of the local market and pleased with the profits they could make in the export market. These reasons are apparent when you consider the fact that just when the war opened—and I am giving this as an illustration—the stumpage on white pine on most government lumber was $1 per thousand and at the present time it runs from $5 to $7.50 to $8 a thousand; the royalty has increased from fifty cents a thousand to $2.50 to $3 a thousand; operating costs have increased generally; wages have been considerably increased during the last three or four years.

I have some knowledge of the lumber industry and the problems of the operators; and they are all small operators. We have not a single large mill in my constituency. They are nearly all workingmen, working together in small operations or in individual operations. On the whole, I think it is quite safe to say that there has been no profit in the domestic market. They have been supplying the local market, and I think in most cases, with very few exceptions, they have been very fair about it. But they have obtained most all their profit in the export market. I am not sure what lumber prices are, but I can illustrate the point by giving one instance. Late last fall we supplied cedar fence posts to the prairie market for which we were receiving fifteen cents apiece. The Americans were coming from the south of the line and offering us thirty-six to forty cents for that identical fence post. That shows where the profit lies. Consequently, everyone is human and tries to sell as many as possible to the export market.

I am pleased to know that the government is going to divert a greater proportion of the lumber to the domestic market where it is required. I do want to emphasize the fact that, so far as the domestic market is concerned, I think the majority of the operators I represent have been very reasonable and fair and in some cases, have put themselves out in order to try to assist people who wanted to build. Ours is a decentralized type of lumber industry, because it is not possible to operate in a large way on mountain slopes and in mountain valleys. I think the results are a good argument for decentralization. The workingman there is involved in the operation of the lumber industry.

Before I sit down, I should like to ask the minister two questions. If a mill is selling retail from the mill direct rather than through a retail yard—we do not have such things; there are very few retail yards in the interior —is that mill allowed to sell at the price established for sale from the retail yard or not? And what is the price now established for the interior industry, for three or four grades of lumber retail?

Mr. HOWE: A mill can sell retail if it holds a licence to sell retail. In other words, if the wartime prices and trade board have decided that it is entitled to it, that it can give retail service, a licence is issued to the mill and it is allowed to charge retail prices. Otherwise it can sell only at mill prices. I did not catch the second question.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Can the minister give the retail prices now of three or four ordinary grades of lumber?

Mr. HOWE: These are the retail prices for the western prairies:

Size	per thousand
2x2, 8′ to 14′	$69
2x2, 8′ to 16′	72
2x4, 8′ to 20′	74
2x6, 8′ to 14′	65
2x8, 8′ to 14′	67
2x10, 8′ to 14′	67 50
6x6, 8′ to 16′	70 50
8x8, 8′ to 16′	70 50

Is that sufficient?

Mr. HERRIDGE: I just wish to ask the minister one more question. Would this price apply, for instance, in my own district if lumber was being sold by the mill retail to local customers?

Mr. HOWE: No. This is the mill price, plus the freight, plus the mark-up for the retailer.

Mr. JOHNSTON: To the prairie provinces.

Mr. HOWE: To the prairie provinces, yes. This would apply perhaps in Calgary, or between Calgary and Medicine Hat. Prices farther east are higher; for the central portion they are about $2 a thousand higher, and in the eastern portion about $2 a thousand higher again.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister explain this new system of approvals whereby apparently fifty per cent of the domestic quota is now allocated by the government? What is proposed by the government to be the quota?

Mr. HOWE: The allocations system has been in effect since controls were established. During the war practically all domestic lumber was allocated to war uses. After the war ended, we attempted to get away altogether from allocations, but we never were completely successful. There were essential uses for which allocations were maintained, such as federal government uses and certain provincial government allocations. It has been found necessary recently to enlarge the sytem of allocations. I cannot believe that it will be fifty per cent of the domestic quota in any section of the country. For instance, we have a domestic car-building programme which requires special grades of timber. They are difficult for the mills to fill, and in order to get the lumber it has been necessary to allocate certain parts of the order to various mills. That is true of certain provincial requirements. The allocations system is fair in that; if it is an awkward bill of lumber to fill, each mill is required to take a portion of it. In other words, certain mills cannot take all the good and other mills take all the bad.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I just wish to say a word or two about this knotty problem of lumber. I do not know whether or not I can throw any light on the shortages that appear; but a week ago Saturday in London, in western Ontario, the Liberal association held their meeting. It was evident there also that a shortage existed of good lumber for political platforms. Some of it was shaky; some of it was knotty. So I would say that not only the lumber dealers and the farmers require lumber; political parties seem to be having trouble finding good material for their platforms.

Mr. HODGSON: Would the minister agree that with the high export quotas on the east and west coasts the operators in central Canada are in a tough spot?

Mr. HOWE: No. The operators in the central provinces are close to their markets; their prices are higher than on either coast, and in my opinion, for the size of their operation, they are just as well off as are operators on the west or east coasts. People assume that the well being of an operator depends entirely on the proportion of his exports. It depends, of course, on the combination of the price at which he sells in the domestic market and the price at which he sells in the export market; and I have not heard anyone suggest that the operators in the central provinces are not doing as well as any other timber operators.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Has any consideration been given to increasing the quota to retailers, in view of the new prices?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes. All lumber sold domestically is sold by retail, and if we increase the domestic quota we increase the supplies to the retailers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sorry; I do not think the minister got exactly what I mean. In British Columbia we have a large number of retail dealers; I am not speaking of the mills with retail licences. Has consideration been given to increasing the quotas to the retail dealers?

Mr. HOWE: I assume that will follow automatically when large quantities are put on the domestic market.

Mr. PROBE: The minister promised that before this item went through he would give me a reply to questions I asked with respect to typical prices. He gave that information in part when he gave the prices for certain sizes of boards in the prairie region, but to make the record complete I asked that he give prices for 1939, 1944 and 1947 for five types of material to which I referred on Friday, and this afternoon I asked that he add the prices of logs delivered to the mill. I do not care what type of logs they may be—fir logs, if you like, so that we may follow the one transaction through. Take a fir log at the mill, after it is milled, the wholesale price and the retail price per thousand feet.

[Mr. H. O. White.]

Mr. HOWE: The answer to that question will require a good deal of research. No one could have the prices at hand, in a complicated schedule like the lumber schedule, and be able to give an answer to that question in a few minutes. I shall be very glad to have the answers worked out and table them later. My hon. friend would not suggest that we hold up this item until he gets that information, but I will table it as soon as I can.

Mr. PROBE: I asked for it on Friday, and I still have not obtained it.

Mr. HOWE: I am told they are still working on it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I would like to say a word before this item carries, though I do not intend to hold up the committee. There has been a great deal of discussion in regard to the prices of retail lumber. I am not in a position to say whether the milling companies are making exorbitant profits; I think the minister and the control officials should have that matter well in hand. But if it is true, as has been stated, that all the profits of these mills are being made in the export trade, then I have wondered just what would be the position of the man operating a small mill, and I think perhaps some investigation should be made in that regard.

Mr. HOWE: The small man gets his export quota the same as the big man.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But it would not benefit him to the same extent; his turnover would not be so great. That was not the matter I particularly wanted to mention, however. I am concerned about the price increase on domestic lumber sold through retail channels. I cannot bring myself to believe that the retail yards have been suffering so very much. I agree with the minister when he says, as I interpret his words, that probably more attention should be given the wholesale or producing end of it than the retail end; generally speaking I believe that is true. In the last little while retail prices have been steadily climbing. Not only is that true, but the retail lumber companies have been making profits in another way which is detrimental to the consumer, the man who wants to build a house. I am not for a moment suggesting that the retail yards have been violating price controls or anything like that, but one matter has been brought to my attention by more than one contractor in the prairie provinces. The point is that the retail lumber yards are selling grade 2 and grade 3 lumber at grade 1 prices. I had a fellow come to my house while I was home at Easter, who wanted this question brought up. I said, "Why don't you give me a statement to that effect? Put it in a letter to me, so that I will have it in black and white." Their position, however, which I can quite understand, is that if they did anything like that they would not be able to get lumber at all from the retail yards.

Mr. HOWE: Is this the same man who lays his flooring for three cents a square foot?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not want to get back on that argument, but if the minister says a man can lay flooring at 3 cents a foot or less and make a decent day's wages, I say he cannot do it.

Mr. HOWE: It is now one minute to six; we have been talking about lumber all afternoon. Can we not let this go through so that we may hear the budget quietly tonight, and go on with something else later?

Mr. JOHNSTON: As far as I am concerned—

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I suggest also that as a matter of procedure the committee must rise before six o'clock, so the Speaker will be in the chair at eight o'clock. Perhaps my hon. friend would be kind enough to allow this item to go through now, and then we shall sit later in the evening, after the budget speech has been delivered.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You mean on this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, on this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Let it stand and report progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then with the consent of my colleague I move that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again this day. I understand this item has been carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is not what you said a moment ago; you said we should report progress.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the motion is put, does the item on timber regulations carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my good fortune today to introduce a budget, the first for which I am responsible, under circumstances much more favourable than those of the recent past. Behind us are the huge and difficult budgets of the war years—highwater marks of achievement set by a Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) whose name will long be remembered and honoured by his fellow Canadians—budgets which are evidence of what the Canadian people can do under the stimulus of war.

Today we have just ended a year in which our accounts show a surplus—a surplus larger than the accumulated total of all the previous surpluses in our history. Today we see a Canada enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory. We look forward to a year of high production and incomes. Indeed, we would appear to have ample excuse for self-satisfaction and easy optimism, if we took account only of our own immediate situation here at home. Our own position is favourable and encouraging, but beyond the Atlantic and the Pacific half the world works slowly and painfully to rebuild its ruins, and until much more progress has been made in both economic and political aspects of international affairs, we cannot afford to be complacent.

I do not propose to take the time to review in detail our present economic situation. Its main features are clear. Our available manpower is almost fully employed, with some surpluses in special areas and trades and equally real shortages in others. Demand continues to outrun supply in many lines of business. Our exports remain at high levels, limited in most cases only by our own ability to supply. Imports are pouring into the country from the south in large volume, without appearing to divert much demand from our own production. Private business is proceeding to expand, repair and improve its capital on a scale so large that its plans will be severely limited by scarcity of materials, equipment and labour.

Some increases in inventories are occurring but apparently not on a large scale, presumably because the pressure of demand in most cases is so excessive that neither producers nor dealers can keep ahead of it. Consumer purchasing continues to expand and there is as yet little sign in Canada of any widespread unwillingness or inability on the part of consumers to buy what is being offered to them. The demand for housing remains so great that the most strenuous efforts to meet it still leave a gap that can be filled only over a period of several years. Provincial governments and municipal authorities are making substantial expenditures to meet deferred maintenance and new public projects that were postponed during the war. In short, we are in a period of intense post-war activity, supported and fed from many quarters.

The results of this are reflected in our national statistics. The most comprehensive of these are the figures for national income, gross national production, and national expenditures, which are prepared and published by the dominion bureau of statistics. I have arranged to have included in the printed appendix to the budget a number of tables of these interesting and useful statistics as well as several tables of other representative figures that bear upon the budget and the general state of our economy. The national income, production and expenditure totals for 1946, it will be noted, are only moderately below the record levels of the peak years of the war, which years of course reflected the temporary and abnormal intensity of effort to which the war gave rise.

In spite of all the problems of transition and reconstruction during the past year, despite the huge shifts in man-power and the widespread shortages and labour unrest, our production, income and expenditures remained at very high levels. The figure for gross national production exceeded the $11 billion mentioned in last year's budget as a target which we might fail to reach because of interruptions to production. Examination of the table of national expenditures will show that there was a sharp decline during the year in government expenditures on goods and services but this was very largely offset by increased expenditures on plant, equipment and inventories on the part of private business, and by a very substantial increase in consumer expenditures. On the income side, there was a slight reduction in income from the peak level attained in 1945, but an increase in wages and salaries and in the income of individual businesses, reflecting chiefly a substantial increase in the net income of farmers which reached last year levels higher than even those of the war years.

In this present period of prosperity, inflationary pressures continue at work, though on a scale reduced from previous years. We no longer have the huge war requirements of our own and other governments exerting a constant and almost irresistible force on prices and supplies. The upward pressure of costs is also less strong, and in many cases adjustments have already been made to higher cost levels during the past year. The first rush of returned servicemen and other consumers to buy whatever was available is now subsiding and one can expect buyers to be more selective. On the other hand, of course, we must recognize that export demands for many products remain strong despite exchange difficulties of some of our customers. The huge expenditures of business on new plant, equipment, buildings and stock in trade now constitute in themselves a very potent inflationary pressure. Price levels in other countries, particularly the United States and Britain, are substantially higher than our own, and through both exports and imports they exert a strong upward thrust upon our prices which has only been partially offset by the readjustment last year of our exchange rate.

On balance, while there are still some inflationary forces to contend with, they are less powerful than in the past and not such as to interfere with the orderly decontrol of prices and supplies. I will not trespass here upon a subject already debated at length in this house this session, but I can and should say that in budgeting we must take into account the process and results of progressive decontrol.

In appraising our current situation we must also recognize the special and temporary character of much of the expenditure that is the stimulus to our present high level of income and production. Our war expenditures are largely finished, but there are many substantial expenditures such as those for veterans' benefits, which will diminish as time goes on. Much of the large expenditure of business on plant and equipment represents accumulated or postponed requirements and does not give us any reliable guidance as to what we may expect on a continuing basis, even under relatively prosperous conditions. Consumers, too, are probably still making purchases to meet accumulated needs that arose directly or indirectly out of the war, or are using extra wartime savings for special purposes, and consequently they are probably spending more and saving less than they normally would with incomes at present levels. So with our export sales as well; some of our largest customers are buying more from Canada, because of their abnormal needs at present and because other normal sources of supply are not available, than we can reasonably expect them to buy on a continuing basis. We must be prepared for reductions in some or all of these abnormal expenditures of various types in the not distant future, and we must be prepared for the changes and adjustments in our production necessary to fit it into a more permanent pattern.

Notwithstanding the temporary and special nature of some of these forces, it is encouraging to find that our present prosperity is largely based upon consumer and business expenditure as well as a high level of exports and can be expected to continue without any special expenditure made by the government for the purpose of sustaining it, whether by incurring deficits or otherwise. The demands for our production this year are so strong that I think we may legitimately make our budget plans in the expectation that our gross national product for this year, 1947, will exceed the estimated total of $11·1 billion for 1946 and may amount to something close to $12 billion, calculated at prices somewhat above those prevailing last year. Any such forecast in these uncertain and abnormal times is subject to a wide margin of possible error and to many qualifications. In particular, we must expect that the figure will be less than that I have mentioned, if a substantial recession should occur in the United States later this year.

One of the main supports of our current high level of production and income which is the result of special government action is, of course, our large volume of exports, financed in part by the loan to Britain and by export credits to France, Belgium, Holland and some other countries. These loans have been made to enable those who have been our customers in the past, and will be our customers in the future, to buy Canada's export products during this critical period when the world has been reconverting from war to peacetime production. These countries could not have bought from us on anything like this scale without such loans. It is very much in our interest that they should be able to buy during this period, not only as a means of getting our production and trade reestablished immediately, but also in order to assist these good customers and friendly countries to reestablish their own economic life on a satisfactory basis.

This export credit programme and the loan to Britain are, of course, essentially transitional measures. None of us contemplates a continuing, large-scale programme of government lending to finance our exports. We in Canada must count on the returns from our exports to pay for our imports and to pay our other bills abroad, including the service of our external debt. We have consequently had to limit the credits that we have granted and to request those countries borrowing from us to pay for part of their requirements in foreign exchange that we can use to buy our own imports. We have also recognized that those to whom we are lending must have such help as we can give them in reestablishing and expanding their own export trade, so that they may continue to buy from us later and repay what we are now lending. Creditor countries must be prepared ultimately to accept repayment in goods and services. In the case of Canada, we are now a creditor of some countries and at the same time a debtor to the United States, and we must act and plan with both these facts in mind.

During the past year the high level of Canadian production and income has led to a very high level of imports, as supplies became available in other countries, particularly in the United States. This large volume of imports has made possible a more rapid rise in our living standards, a speedier reconversion of our industry, and a more adequate supply of essential materials for our production than would otherwise have been achieved. Since supplies from many countries were not available, most of our imports have had to come from the United States and have had to be paid for in United States dollars at a time when our receipts of United States dollars from abroad were greatly reduced by the fact that many of our customers had to obtain credit for a substantial proportion of their purchases from us. The result, of course, has been that we have found it necessary to draw substantially upon large exchange reserves built up in the last years of the war and the first year after V-E day. We fully expected that it would be necessary to draw heavily upon those reserves, and this was made quite clear last summer when our exchange control legislation was before parliament. At that time highly tentative and conservative estimates were given of the possible drain on our reserves that might be expected, but these, I am afraid, were regarded in some quarters as exaggerated—they were treated in some quarters as a rather laboured attempt to justify exchange control, the necessity for which some were inclined to deny. Since that time, as the extent of our trade deficit with the United States has become apparent through the published trade statistics, there has developed a tendency to go to the other extreme, and many unfounded rumours have been put into circulation. In these circumstances I felt it was desirable to table yesterday, somewhat in advance of the time when I normally would have done so, the report of the foreign exchange control board for the year 1946, which gives a great many facts concerning our trade and international financial position for that year.

I need hardly say that hon. members will find that report worthy of careful study. It shows that our official holdings of gold and United States dollars declined during 1946 by $263 million but that we still had a total of $1,245 million at December 31 last. While we had a net favourable balance on current account of $458 million with the world as a whole and one of $954 million with all countries other than the United States, our current account balance with the latter country was adverse to the extent of $603 million. This large current deficit with the United States was due in part to certain temporary factors, including the abnormal Canadian demands for United States goods and travel which we had largely done without for years, the filling up of empty shelves and warehouses, the high level of United States prices, the shortage of goods from alternative sources of supply and certain payments by the Canadian government for the purchase of military assets and equipment . But it would be a mistake to place too much emphasis on such special influences. The fact is that in any period in which we are enjoying high levels of production and high consumer incomes, Canada imports a great deal from the United States. In other words, our large adverse balance last year—and the continuing high level of imports—is to a very considerable extent the product of Canadian prosperity.

This point has a real bearing on the validity of the suggestion which is made in some quarters that it would have been better not to have restored the Canadian dollar to parity last July, and that the way to stop the drain on our United States dollar reserves is to reverse that action. This argument is based largely on pre-war conditions of unused capacity and limited demand that do not exist today. It seems to assume that exchange depreciation would restrict the flow of imports or increase the flow of exports. A large proportion of our imports from the United States, including for instance, such necessary products as coal, petroleum and raw cotton, would clearly not be affected at all, and under present conditions of shortages on the supply side and urgent and unsatisfied demands on the other, the effect on our volume of imports of, say, a 10 per cent change in the cost of most other import items would be very slight indeed. After all, the rise in prices in the United States which has occurred since last July has had no apparent effect in discouraging imports to this country. On the export side, too, the change in the exchange rate has had relatively little, if any, effect in reducing the amount of our exports, except possibly to some extent in the case of gold and, indeed, the change may have actually increased our receipts of foreign exchange in some cases as a result of adjustments in the prices obtained by our exporters. Our judgment on this matter has, I think, been confirmed by the action of many other governments. The exchange rates which they have selected and maintained indicate fairly clearly their view that under prevailing conditions of widespread shortages, limited supplies and urgent needs, the possibility of a country improving its exchange position by currency depreciation is extremely limited. Our return to parity last July was designed to relieve the pressure on our price ceilings and reduce the strong tendency to inflation in both prices and costs of production. Evidence of the contribution it has made in this direction is to be found in a comparison of the movements of prices in Canada and in the United States since last July, which can be seen in table VI in the appendix to this budget.

Another important point to which the foreign exchange control board's report calls attention is the extent to which the deficit in our accounts with the United States is offset by dollars or their equivalent received from other sources, including those countries to which we have granted credits. Last year we received $237 million of gold and United States dollars as a result of transactions with countries other than the United States—chiefly the United Kingdom, France and other countries to which we had extended credits. This year we expect to receive substantially larger payments in convertible exchange from the United Kingdom and from a number of other countries. Since last January the United Kingdom has been paying us for a portion of its current Canadian requirements in sterling, which we can and do convert into United States dollars or other currencies we require.

Moreover, we have now reached the time when Canada may expect to benefit from the new international machinery which has been established during recent years to aid in international monetary and financial affairs. The recent commencement of operations of the international monetary fund may soon result in overseas countries providing us through the fund with cash or a source of cash. The international bank will very shortly be making its first loans. The additional United States dollars which these loans will provide should assist certain countries now borrowing from us to pay for a portion of their purchases here in United States funds.

Finally, as the house is no doubt aware, eighteen of the leading trading nations of the world are now engaged in Geneva in vitally important trade and tariff negotiations. These discussions are intended to lead to substantial tariff reductions in the United States and elsewhere and to the establishment of an agreed code of behaviour between nations in the field of commercial policy and related matters. The ultimate objective of these negotiations is to make possible the restoration of multilateral trade on a large scale, which is the best possible basis for Canadian prosperity and stability.

I have referred to certain elements in our exchange situation and prospects which have helped, or will help, to meet the problem caused by our large, adverse balance with the United States. I have done so in order to give the house a balanced picture. No one would deny that, even after allowing for these favourable elements (of which I may say there has been no general knowledge or appreciation), Canada in common with practically all countries in the world, other than the United States, has a United States dollar problem. This is no new problem with us. In the course of the war, to go no further back than that, we had a United States dollar problem which in some ways was more difficult than what we have to-day. Indeed, we reached a point in the early stages of the war when our reserves were almost completely exhausted. But we quietly took constructive measures to deal with the situation and thus owing in part to our own efforts and in part to the cooperation of the United States we were able to master the problem. Not only did we meet all our requirements but we entered the current period with exchange reserves several times as large as at any previous period in our history.

In considering the present situation, it behooves us to maintain a reasonably balanced perspective. In terms of basic economic fundamentals Canada's international position is stronger today than at any previous time in our history. We emerged from the war with our productive apparatus not only completely unimpaired but enormously enlarged and strengthened. Our working force is larger, more highly skilled, and more fully employed than ever before. Our competitive position in world trade has been greatly improved as a result of our increased efficiency and the degree of control we have been able to exercise over inflationary rises in prices. Since the beginning of the war we have reduced our net international indebtedness by about thirty-five per cent, and this in spite of supplying huge quantities of goods to our allies on a gift or mutual aid basis. In 1946 we had a favourable balance in our current transactions with the world as a whole greater than that achieved in any previous year.

In this field of international trade and exchange, there are unquestionably problems which we must face and changing situations to which we must adjust ourselves. It will continue to be our policy to seek for constructive solutions to these problems in a straightforward, common-sense manner in collaboration with other nations.

I believe the house is in general familiar with the main aspects of our negotiations with provincial governments during the past year, but perhaps I should not let this occasion pass without a few comments about this important problem of dominion-provincial relations.

The offer made by the dominion in the budget of last June was promptly accepted as a basis for negotiation by three provinces and later by several others. In the course of discussions with these provinces, which extended over several months, the original terms were subject to a number of modifications and the details of agreements embodying the necessary provisions to safeguard the interest of all parties were hammered out and agreed upon.

The modified formulae for determining the amount of the annual payments to be made to the various provinces were the product of a most intensive study of the whole problem and represent, I believe, the most successful attempt yet made to achieve equitable treatment of all provinces. They maintain intact the existing pattern of statutory subsidies which are the product of a long historical evolution and in the additional payments they represent a fair compromise between the two alternative methods of allocation, namely, fiscal need and taxability or tax potential—a fair compromise between the school of thought which believes in equal per capita payments and that which would base payments on the relative ability of the various provinces to raise revenues from the tax sources in question.

The stability of revenues assured by the guaranteed minimum payments represents one of the chief advantages of the plan to the adhering provinces. Their revenues will rise as their population and the gross national product rise but the assurance that regardless of fluctuations in the national income, regardless of whether the next few years bring a recession, provincial revenues will be supported by these large irreducible minimum payments is of particular value to them. Far from weakening their autonomy or sacrificing any of their constitutional rights, they have merely found a method of utilizing one of these rights —the method of renting instead of cultivating a tax field—whereby they can assure this revenue at generous levels guaranteed against the risks of economic adversity and participating also in the profits of growth and prosperity. With this assurance of stable and rising revenues, they are for the first time in a position to plan with courage and confidence and a sense of real independence, programmes for the efficient discharge of their constitutional responsibilities.

The government of Canada looks forward to the day when the agreement of all or substantially all the provinces will make possible the achievement of the great national purposes which impelled the dominion to make its comprehensive proposals of August 1945. These include not only the elimination all across Canada of the evils of duplication and conflict in the fields of direct progressive taxation which have such important economic effects, but also the development of an efficient and flexible tax system designed to promote the expansion of employment and incomes, as well as a comprehensive programme for the co-operation of dominion and provincial governments in the field of public investment and social security.

Nevertheless, we do not ask any province to accept a tax agreement unless it believes such agreement to be in its own interest as well as that of the country as a whole. We did our best to shape the offer of last June in such a way as to make it possible and satisfactory for any province to remain out of the agreement if it wished to do so, and we would far prefer to have a province remain out indefinitely than to endeavour to persuade it to come in against its own judgment of where its true interests lie.

Detailed information about our revenue, expenditure and debt is provided for the house and the public in the white paper which will be printed as an appendix to the budget, and therefore I shall only draw attention here to the main points of interest. As the accounts will not be completed for some weeks, the present figures are estimates which are still subject to change.

The grand total of expenditures for the year amounted to approximately $2,632 million, which was just over half, 51 per cent to be exact, of the expenditures for the preceding year. Total revenue of all kinds, including refunds of previous years' expenditures and other special receipts and credits, amounted to $2,984 million, only $29 million less than the total of the previous year. There was consequently a surplus of about $352 million, constituting a reduction in our net debt. This is, of course, a surplus of quite unprecedented size and, in fact, compares with a total of $319 million for all previous surpluses in Canada's account since confederation. Such a surplus is, of course, very gratifying. We can take legitimate pride in the fact that in the first fiscal year beginning after V-J day we have been able to better than balance our public accounts by a wide margin. This large surplus is a tribute primarily to the health and strength of Canada's economy but the government of the day and particularly my predecessor, the present Minister of Justice, are, I believe, entitled to take credit for the prudent management of the country's financial affairs to which this result bears witness.

We should not, however, be led into false optimism, nor should we jump to the conclusion that our present tax structure is much more than adequate to meet all our future requirements. There are abnormal aspects of both the revenue and the expenditure sides of our accounts which need to be considered before we can obtain anything like a true picture of probable future budgets.

On the revenue side, for instance, there are special receipts of $372 million, representing the proceeds of sale of surplus war assets, refunds of previous years' expenditures and other credits of a temporary character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but there are also excessive expenditures on the other side.

In addition our tax revenues include a substantial amount of payments by taxpayers in respect of income received in earlier years or arising out of the non-recurrent taxation of accumulated surpluses of private companies. Moreover, our revenues are based on very high levels of production, incomes and imports which we probably cannot expect as normal levels in future years. I have said enough to demonstrate that it would be a mistake for us to assume that, if we were to retain our present tax structure, we could expect to obtain total revenue of a magnitude approaching that of the year just closed.

But while I emphasize that, I also wish to stress the fact that our expenditures for the past year included substantial sums for items of a temporary, abnormal or non-recurring character. National defence, for instance, spent some $376 million during the year, which is $136 million more than is being estimated for the current year. The Department of Reconstruction and Supply spent $70 million on liquidation and termination of contracts alone. Veterans Affairs paid out almost $320 million for war service gratuities and re-establishment credits, $100 million for discharge benefits and $50 million for treatment services. The continuing cost of subsidies introduced during the war accounted for about $208 million. There were many other items included in the 1946-47 expenditures which will either be entirely eliminated or greatly reduced in future years. The grand total of expenditures incurred last year must therefore be considered in the light of these abnormal or non-recurring factors. On the other hand, there is another type of allowance which will have to be made, if and to the extent that this parliament approves the undertaking of new services or the provision of new benefits. Here, in this parliament is where the real control of expenditure must rest. We may talk all we like about the necessity of reducing expenditures but if, at the same time, or, perhaps on the following day, we press for this or that new service or benefit, this or that new project, or an increase in this or that benefit, we are thereby making it impossible to maintain that more reasonable level of public expenditures which the cessation of war and demobilization expenditures should bring.

What I am getting at is this: Our surplus is a real one and one from which we can find encouragement, but it has been obtained at high levels of revenue and expenditure which do not necessarily give an accurate indication of the shape of things to come.

Total revenues for the year exceeded by $509 million the forecast made in the budget of last year. The largest increase over the forecast was in the item for special receipts, which the then Minister of Finance stated could only be an arbitrary estimate, and in respect of which we received in fact $372 million rather than $200 million. He stated that the estimates in respect of other items were believed to be conservative, and I think the prevailing view was that he was not being conservative enough. Caution was the only attitude which a responsible Minister of Finance could take, particularly in the light of the prevailing shortages, uncertainties and industrial unrest which prevailed when the budget was brought down.

In any case, our production, trade and income, on which our revenues were based, turned out to be surprisingly well maintained last year, despite the early difficulties and uncertainties. Consequently customs duties and personal income taxes, both highly sensitive to economic change, substantially exceeded our forecasts. We probably underestimated the effect on our income tax revenues of the return of veterans now getting taxable wages and salaries instead of tax-free service pay and allowances, as well as the effect of the large retroactive increases in wage rates. Corporation profits also turned out to be considerably higher than it had been felt safe to count upon, with the result that revenue from corporation income tax and excess profits tax amounted in all to about $688 million, which was 27 per cent above the forecast. Sales tax as well reflected the much greater supply of consumers' goods available for the market. Its yield at about $300 million was 20 per cent above the figure included in the last budget. Other excise taxes on consumers' goods showed a much smaller increase over the figures budgeted, and the yield of excise duties on liquor and tobacco turned out to be quite close to the anticipated figures. Succession duties, taxes on interest and dividends going abroad, and miscellaneous taxes produced revenues close to the estimated figures, while non-tax revenues were slightly less than anticipated.

On the expenditure side, the figures for the last year were well below the amount estimated. The total as estimated at present, is $2,632 million, which is $137 million, or 5 per cent, below the total of the main estimates for the year, which in the budget was taken as a safe limit to set on probable total expenditures.

Expenditure on national defence amounted to $376 million, which was $113 million less than that authorized by the estimates, and was, of course, only a small fraction of such expenditure in the previous year. Expenditure by reconstruction and supply, mainly on contract termination, emergency housing and coal production, amounted to about $137 million, compared with total estimates of $231 million, the main reduction by comparison with the estimates coming in connection with termination of war contracts. Expenditures of all kinds by the Department of Veterans Affairs amounted to about $607 million compared with aggregate estimates of $667 million. As I have said, the total cost during the past year of subsidies of all kinds, introduced during the war, paid by various departments and agencies amounted to approximately $208 million.

Following the practice of the last six years I have provided for an addition of $25 million to the reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets. Under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act it is the duty of my department to present in the public accounts, to quote from the act, such "accounts and matters as are required to show what the liabilities and assets of Canada really are," at the date of such statement. I believe this obligation is to present what is considered to be a true picture of such assets and liabilities. The government of Canada has loans, advances, investments and other assets amounting in the aggregate to over $4,746 million which it carries in its books as active assets. It is obvious that while these assets on the whole are believed to be good assets, there is bound to be a certain percentage of loss on their ultimate realization. No one can forecast the future with sufficient accuracy to know precisely how large this loss may be. We can only use reasonable judgment and each year since 1941 it has been decided that the reasonable thing to do was to set aside $25 million as a reserve to take care of such losses. At March 31 last, the total amount in this reserve was $155 million after certain write-offs had been made against it. I would not go so far as to say that this sum, which represents 3.2 per cent of the total book value of our active assets, is a highly conservative estimate of the amount necessary to bring the book value of our active assets to a wholly realistic basis but I do believe that it is not an unreasonable provision for the purpose. No doubt ministers of finance reviewing the situation in future years may wish to build up the reserve to a somewhat larger amount over a period of time.

I have already referred to the impossibility of predicting with accuracy the probable total amount of ultimate loss in respect of all our active assets. It is even more difficult to assign this loss to individual assets or types of assets, although losses are more likely in certain cases than in others. In any case I am convinced that it would be unwise from the point of view of public policy to break up this reserve and earmark it against particular items in our active assets. No business man would reveal in his published statements the amount of his bad debt reserve carried against the account of each individual debtor; if he did, he would place himself in a very weak position in the collection of his accounts. Similarly, I believe that it would not represent prudent or efficient administration of Canada's financial affairs to show in the public accounts specific reserves to meet possible losses in connection with specific assets. The general reserve offers a better method of assuring a true presentation of Canada's assets without any disadvantage.

I should point out that while it is believed no specific parliamentary authority, other than that to which I have referred, is necessary to set up and add to this reserve, it is of course clear that no asset can be written off in whole or in part and the write-off charged to this reserve, unless there is parliamentary authority, general or specific. During the past year, write-offs amounting to $19·6 million were made and charged to this account. These involved various investments made during the war in government owned plant and equipment carried in our books as active assets, and the authority for the write-offs was the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

In addition to our budgetary expenditures the government made substantial outlays during the year in the form of loans or advances or the purchase of investments, in regard to which detailed information will be found in the white paper. The largest of such investments was that of $640 million in advances to the United Kingdom under the financial agreement approved by parliament last year. The United Kingdom drew rapidly on this credit during the past fiscal year, but we do not expect drawings this year to be so rapid, as a considerable part of British requirements in Canada are now being met by payments in convertible foreign exchange derived from other sources. Drawings under export credits to other countries amounted in all to about $267 million. All these were offset to a large degree by repayments of earlier loans and advances to various governments, so that our net investment in credits to other governments last year amounted to $648 million.

Owing to our surplus of revenue over expenditures, and repayments of various loans and advances, including some of those made to the foreign exchange control board, it was possible to meet all our requirements for cash, apart from debt redemption, without net new borrowing during the year. The only sale of new securities to the general public was the issue of Canada savings bonds, which commenced in November. The amount of this issue outstanding at the end of the fiscal year was $488 million. The proceeds of this issue, together with other available funds, made possible the redemption of $779 million of matured or called securities, apart from those renewed or converted, which resulted in a net reduction during the year of $283 million in our funded debt.

The estimated gross liabilities of the dominion at the end of the fiscal year amounted to approximately $17,660 million, against which active assets of approximately $4,590 million were held, leaving an estimated net debt of $13,069 million as of March 31. This, of course, is $352 million less than a year ago, as a result of the surplus on the year's operations. I should repeat that these figures are preliminary estimates subject to adjustments before the final accounts are struck.

In assessing the budget requirements for the new fiscal year, we should first recall that the total expenditures provided for in the main estimates are approximately $1,996 million. To this must be added $6 million of supplementary estimates already introduced, making the total $2,002 million. There will as always be supplementary and further supplementary estimates which must be taken into account and, on the other side of the ledger, we may expect the departments to make certain savings in the funds made available to them. It is the net result of these factors which will determine the total expenditures for the year.

At this time it is not possible to forecast with great accuracy the amount of additional funds which parliament will be asked to provide before the end of the year. However we can already see some of the purposes for which more funds will be required. One of the most important of these is to carry out our obligations under the new taxation agreements with certain provinces. Funds for this purpose could not be included in the main estimates, as the authority to enter into such agreements had not yet been granted by parliament, but in making our budget plans we must, of course, allow for them. At the present time the governments of six provinces have obtained or are now in the process of obtaining from their legislatures authority to enter into agreements. Our latest calculations of the gross annual payments to be made to these provinces in respect of the fiscal year 1947-48, using preliminary estimates of population and of gross national product, give a total of approxmately $78,400,000. From this amount must be deducted the statutory subsidies payable to these provinces. Only three-quarters of the net remaining payments to the provinces, or approximately $52,150,000, will be payable during the current fiscal year because of the timing of the quarterly payments involved.

From these payments one would normally deduct a credit for the special corporation income tax to be levied by the provinces in accordance with the agreements. It has been estimated that this adjustment for the six provinces under consideration would be in the neighbourhood of 15 to 20 million dollars for a full year, but no deduction in respect of this item will be made until after the end of this fiscal year.

To the net total I have already mentioned, we must add the subsidies to be paid to the maritime provinces under the Duncan and White commission awards, namely $2,475,000, and the special payments to be made to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in respect of the "gap" between the termination of their war-time tax agreements and the date from which the new agreements will commence, April 1, 1947. These payments, for which authority will be sought in the new legislation dealing with the tax agreements, will amount to slightly more than $3 million. The total, therefore, which we must add to the estimates to cover additional payments to provinces, is approximately $58 million. Of course, if more than six provinces enter into the agreements during the year, the total may exceed this figure.

While these further payments to provinces will be the most important addition to the expenditures contemplated by the main estimates, there will be others, some of which cannot now be foreseen but a number of which are already in prospect, as for instance, the increases in old age pensions to be provided for by legislation already announced. While we expect that, as usual, departments will not spend all of the funds provided for in every one of their votes, I do not think it is safe this year to count on savings as large as usual, in view of the pressure that has been put on all departments to cut their estimates to the bone. After making due allowance for all the considerations that appear pertinent and endeavouring to avoid either excessive caution or undue optimism, I have come to the conclusion that the best estimate that can be made at the present time of our total expenditures for the current fiscal year is $2,000 million.

Turning to the revenue side, we estimate that our present taxes under the laws now in force and applied under the conditions of the current fiscal year as we now foresee them would yield total revenues of approximately $2,450 million. This includes tax revenues estimated at $2,200 million, non-tax revenues (mainly return on investments and post office receipts) estimated at $160 million, and special receipts and credits estimated at $90 million. These tax and revenue figures include an estimated yield of $40 million for gasoline taxes, the repeal of which as from April 1 has already been announced and which is included with the tax changes in this budget. With the consent of the house, I shall place on Hansard a table showing the details of this estimate in comparison with the actual revenues of 1946-47, as now estimated.

—	Forecast Fiscal Year 1947-48	Actual Fiscal Year 1946-47

Non-Tax Revenue	160	160
Total Ordinary Revenue	2,360	2,612
TOTAL REVENUE	2,450	2,984

It will be noted that total estimated revenue on this basis would be $534 million less than in the year just closed. One of the principal reductions expected, namely $282 million, is in special receipts and credits, where we can no longer count upon large refunds of previous years' war expenditures or upon such large sales by War Assets Corporation as during the past year. We also anticipate a large reduction in the revenue from excess profits tax as a consequence of the changes introduced last year and which are only now taking full effect upon our revenue; this decrease will be offset in part by a corresponding increase in revenue from the corporation income tax, which has replaced a portion of the flat rate of the former excess profits tax. Personal income tax revenues are also shown at a lower figure as a consequence of the changes which went into effect on January first this year. Apart from these changes and certain minor ones that I shall not attempt to mention here, the table shows that we are anticipating a buoyant effect on revenues resulting from a national income and expenditure likely to be somewhat higher this year than last.

[Mr. Abbott.]

It will be apparent from the estimate of expenditure and revenue which I have just made, that if no tax changes were made we would anticipate a surplus of approximately $350 million during the fiscal year which has just begun. In view of the inevitable uncertainties, both in regard to several major items of expenditure and in regard to the level of corporate profits and other constituents of national income, we cannot take this forecast as a firm figure but it is the best estimate which we can make at the present time and indicates the general nature of the budget situation confronting us.

The house is of course aware that in addition to our budgetary expenditures, the government is also called upon to provide cash during each fiscal year for the making of certain loans, advances and investments which increase the active assets of the dominion and therefore do not affect the surplus or deficit or the net debt. Apart from the usual capital advances to the Canadian National Railways and the national harbours board and loans for housing or to veterans, the principal items of this nature to be expected during the coming year are the continuing advances to Britain and other governments under existing agreements. As at April 1, the sums still remaining unused in these credits aggregated $870 million. There is likely to be some offset to this type of demand upon our cash resources in the shape of further repayments of various loans and advances previously made. However, any proper estimate at this time of the net result of these advances and repayments would be almost impossible to make. I shall therefore not venture to make any forecast as to our net cash requirements over and above our budgetary expenditures. We should, however, always bear in mind that a prospective budget surplus in our accounts does not necessarily mean a surplus of cash receipts over cash requirements.

We must also bear in mind that before the end of this fiscal year we must repay refundable taxes amounting to $89 million, $58 million being in respect of personal income taxes and $31 million for excess profits tax.

TAX POLICY

From what I have already said it will be clear that we can afford tax reductions without thereby creating a deficit in our accounts. Reductions in taxes leading to modest reductions in our revenues will result not in an increase in our net debt but rather in a smaller prospective reduction in that debt.

From some points of view it can be strongly argued that under the prevailing favourable economic conditions we should concentrate upon the maximum reduction of the national debt which of necessity had to be built up to such huge proportions during the war. It is a sensible and far-sighted policy to reduce the national debt in good times and permit it to increase in times of economic adversity. We must expect, I believe, that at times when our employment, production and incomes are below satisfactory levels, our revenues will fall short of our expenditures. Indeed, at such times it will probably be necessary to incur expenditures of various kinds to assist in restoring better levels of employment and income. It is a necessary corollary of this that we should aim at a surplus in times of prosperity and very high levels of income and employment, such as we have at the present time. Only by efforts to maintain our revenues under such conditions can we hope to avoid indefinite and undesirable accumulation of debt over the long run.

Economic considerations alone would hardly justify immediate tax reductions. As I have already stated, there are still substantial inflationary pressures pushing our prices and costs up. Reductions in taxes may add to these pressures in some measure, though they should reduce some of the demand for higher wage rates.

We must, however, look beyond these immediate circumstances and take other factors into account. The rapid rate at which taxes had to be increased in Canada during the war, experienced against our North American background of a long history of low taxes and relative freedom in economic affairs, has given rise to an acute tax consciousness.

Had our taxes been raised gradually and under normal conditions to their present levels, had they been increased for the productive, peacetime purposes of national development and social security rather than for the unproductive purposes of war, then the present levels might perhaps have been acceptable and tolerable as continuing levels. Instead, however, they represent a position to which we have returned after a sudden and unpleasant excursion into painful wartime levels of income tax, and people are still smarting so much from their wartime experience that even after the substantial reductions made in the last two budgets, the present levels of personal income taxes are regarded as excessive by a large proportion of the public. Therefore, whatever may be argued from the point of view of immediate economic effects or long-term debt policy, one must reach the conclusion that those who must bear them are not ready to support income taxes on the present scale. In fact, I am sure that were our present levels of personal income tax to be continued, they would constitute a serious impediment to a full working effort and a brake upon the drive and initiative of men and women in all groups and classes.

There is another important point. We in Canada must always remember the effect upon us and our policies of our proximity to the United States. So close and insubstantial is that common boundary line to most Canadians, so many-sided are the business and social relationships between our two peoples, so important is the influence exerted by the larger economy upon the smaller one, that we cannot for long follow widely divergent tax policies without causing serious strains. It would appear that if Canadians are asked to carry tax burdens which, after making due allowance for lower cost of living or lower cost of doing business or other offsetting factors, are significantly heavier than those imposed by the United States, there is a risk of a serious drain of Canadian personnel to the south for this reason alone.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX

I am consequently proposing to make a substantial reduction in taxation in this budget. Moreover, I am proposing to concentrate this reduction almost entirely in the field of personal income tax. This is the tax that at present levels is proving so unpopular and is causing difficulty. To overcome the situation which I have described a substantial reduction is necessary, and I do not feel that we can afford the reduction required in this field and also substantial reductions in other forms of taxation in the face of the responsibilities which Canada finds upon her shoulders in this post-war period.

In reducing the rates of income tax I have, of course, endeavoured to graduate them as fairly as possible, giving the greatest proportionate relief to those in the lowest brackets, but granting some relief to all. I have also had in mind keeping the rates of tax on additional income that a person may earn down to sufficiently reasonable proportions that the tax on such additional income does not offer a serious barrier to extra effort or initiative, including overtime work, for example.

I am, therefore, proposing a new and substantially lower schedule of rates of income tax to come into effect on July 1. Under this new schedule, the average amount of tax will be reduced by about 29 per cent, as compared with the present rates, and our revenue will be reduced accordingly. Nine out of ten taxpayers will find their taxes reduced by 29 per cent or more from existing rates. The reduction as compared with present rates is as much as 54 per cent in the bottom bracket, but is limited to about 6 per cent or 7 per cent in the top brackets. The new schedule has an initial or starting rate of 10 per cent instead of 22 per cent, as at present. The rate then steps up gradually over relatively short brackets and becomes 20 per cent over a considerable range of income in the lower middle brackets. As nearly as we can estimate, 95 per cent of all the taxpayers will find that under this new schedule the marginal rate of tax, that is to say, the rate on each additional dollar that they earn, will not exceed 20 per cent. The new schedule reaches a rate of 50 per cent on additional income at the level where income exceeds exemptions by $17,000, in place of $13,000 under the present schedule. The tax reaches a maximum of 80 per cent at the top on incomes in excess of $250,000 a year.

It is proposed to retain the same general structure of exemptions and allowances that was established last year. This structure, as the house is aware, has been considerably simplified as compared with the elaborate and complicated structure which prevailed during the war years, and we have achieved, I believe, the simplest practicable method of taking family allowance payments into account.

The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada. Consequently it can be said that any person who pays income tax now has more than an average income, taking his or her marital and dependent status into account. Moreover, taxpayers with income only a little in excess of the exemptions will pay only a very small tax under the new rates, a good deal less than in the United States under either the existing or the proposed new schedule which has been approved by the house of representatives but not yet by the senate or the President. If we raised exemptions above the levels established last year, we should in fact be sparing so many from income tax that it would be unfair to the large number of the people who are below the present exemption levels, because we would inevitably be forced to rely for necessary revenues upon indirect taxes which would bear more heavily upon the low income groups.

It must be remembered, too, that raising the exemptions results in a very substantial loss of revenue because it affects all taxpayers, including those in the highest brackets, and the saving for each taxpayer is his highest rate of tax applied to the increased amount of his exemption. Already our exemptions are considerably higher than those in the United States and in the United Kingdom, the countries to which we would most naturally look for comparison. If, as some have suggested, we restored the pre-war levels of exemptions, we should have to sacrifice more revenue than the whole of that sacrificed by the rate reductions I am now proposing, and we would be doing practically nothing by such action to reduce the rate of tax on additional earnings for those who remain subject to income tax. It is the high marginal rate of tax on additional earnings that discourages additional work, enterprise and initiative, and consequently we must aim in our reductions at cutting down these marginal rates of tax.

I am proposing that the new schedule of rates go into operation as of July 1, which is the earliest date by which it will be possible to prepare the new tables and get them into the hands of employers. As from that date deductions from wages and salaries will be adjusted to the levels appropriate to these new rates. The new tax rates themselves will apply fully, in the absence of modification by later budgets, to the income for 1948 and subsequent years. For the current year, 1947, total tax liability will be calculated by applying the existing rates, which went into effect on January 1, to half of the taxpayer's income for the year and the new rates to the other half. In other words, the effective tax rate for the year as a whole will be the average of the two sets of rates.

A few examples will probably illustrate more clearly than any description the effect of the proposed changes. A married man without children and with an income of $150 a month now is subject to a monthly deduction in respect of tax of $5.35 and must pay a total for the year of about $68 at the rates now in effect. Under the new rates his monthly deduction will be only $2.85 and his liability for a whole year will be $36. For the year 1947 his total tax will amount to $52 collected at the present rate of deduction for the first half-year and at the new rates for the last half of the year. In the United States, his total tax for a full year would be $118 under existing rates and $82 under the new proposal to which I have referred.

In Canada, a single person without dependents and with an income of $100 a month will under our present proposals find his deductions each month being reduced from $8.30 at present to $4.80 after July 1, and his tax liability for a whole year, instead of being $105 will be $61; for the year 1947 it will be the average of these two, namely $83.

Married persons with two children and a monthly income of $250 will find their deductions reduced from the present figure of $25.85 per month to about $18.30, while their annual tax bill will be reduced from $327 to $230; the average applicable to this year will be $278.

Further up the scale the more fortunate individual, married, with no dependents and with an earned income of, say, $10,000 a year will find his annual tax bill cut from $2,723 to $1,990, while his bill this year will be $2,356.

It will be agreed, I believe, that income tax reductions, averaging over 29 per cent for all taxpayers and running up to 54 per cent for those in the lowest taxable brackets, are very drastic reductions. They are particularly significant when we remember that they follow the substantial reductions made in each of the last two budgets. I have had a calculation made to show just how much the total reduction has been from the war-time peak of income tax rates, the rates imposed by the budget of 1942. I am advised that the best way of getting the answer to my question is to apply to the estimated volume and distribution of personal incomes in a recent year the tax rates that were applicable under the 1942 budget and those in the new schedule which is to be found in the first resolution that will be tabled at the end of this budget. Such a calculation has been made. It shows an over-all reduction in the total personal income tax burden on the Canadian people of 51 per cent, taking into account only the fixed tax in 1942 and not the compulsory savings portion. If this portion were included in such calculation, the percentage reduction would, of course, be substantially higher.

I believe that the verdict of all responsible persons will be that we have gone as far as we can possibly afford to go under the present circumstances. The new rates reduce taxes very materially in the lower brackets and bring them quite substantially below tax rates in effect and proposed in the United States and of course very much below comparable rates in the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. Higher up the scale, in the middle brackets, our proposed rates are also generally lower than those now applicable in the United States, but are somewhat higher, in dollar amount only slightly higher, than the new rates proposed in the United States, to which I have already referred but which of course may not be the rates finally adopted there.

These middle brackets represent a category of incomes to which we gave the most careful consideration. They include the salaried classes which according to much prevailing opinion have shared less than other classes in the economic gains made since 1939. The group also includes the young professional or scientific men and the young business executives for whom the attractions in the United States of more specialized opportunities and the possibility of ultimately higher rewards exercise the strongest appeal. Since early in the war our rates have been more progressive than the United States rates. However, after a great deal of study we have been able to deal with these middle ranges of income in such a way, I believe, as to achieve the maximum of fairness and the minimum of practical difficulties.

For the convenience of hon. members, I would like to place on Hansard at this point several tables illustrating our new rates of tax for single persons, married persons with no dependents, and married persons with two dependents, as compared with existing rates, and also a table comparing our taxes with those now in effect in the United States and with those proposed in the bill passed by the house of representatives.

The above figures show the actual income tax liability of a taxpayer with family allowance children' but in order to arrive at his true net position the amount of family allowance received for his children must be offset against his tax liability. For example, assuming he receives the average family allowance payment of $72.00 a child, a taxpayer with an income of $2,500 and two children would find that under present rates his income tax exceeded his family allowance by $49.00, while under the proposed rates his family allowance payments will exceed his income tax liability by $14.00.

NOTE.—In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total.

It is estimated that these proposed reductions in income tax rates will reduce our revenue from this tax by an amount of approximately $175 million for a full year. It is estimated that the effect upon the revenues of the current fiscal year will be about $110 million, as a part of our collections this year will be based on the previous tax rates before change.

I am endeavouring to make this a relatively simple budget and I am not, therefore, proposing any other substantial changes at this time in the income tax, although I shall later mention some minor amendments. We have been busy during the past year upon the rewriting of our basic income tax law in an effort to improve its arrangement, to make it clearer and simpler, and to remove ambiguities and anomalies. Hon. members will, I think, be particularly pleased with the extent to which it will be less dependent upon the exercise of ministerial discretions. Senior officials of the Departments of Justice, National Revenue and Finance have spent many months on a very detailed revision. I have taken a considerable personal interest in their work in this field. I hope to be able later in the session to introduce a bill embodying this general revision of income tax law with the intention of making it effective with respect to incomes of 1948. In all probability it will not be expedient or reasonable to ask the house to enact this new bill in the current session, but I believe it would be useful to bring it in this session in order to give members full opportunity to study it and mull it over, so that the country may get the full benefit of their consideration of all its details. We do not consider that this measure, when enacted as law, will constitute the final word, but we believe it will provide a framework within which further improvements can be made over the course of future years.

In addition to this new income tax act, we also will have ready for action in this session a complete revision of the Special War Revenue Act and which we propose to rename "The Excise Tax Act". When parliament has had an opportunity to deal with these two revisions, we shall have made a great advance

(a) The U.S.A. taxes shown are Federal taxes only; most States have income taxes in addition to the Federal tax. In Canada no personal income tax is levied now by any province. Under the United States income tax law every taxpayer is allowed a deduction of 10 per cent of income up to a maximum of $500 in lieu of deductions for medical expenses, charitable donations, etc., and this is taken into account in calculating the taxes for United States; Canadian taxpayers who can claim such deductions would pay less tax than shown by this table, since no allowance has been made for such deductions in calculating the Canadian tax.

NOTE.—In calculating the above Canadian taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No distinction is made between investment and earned income under the United States tax.

in the complete overhauling of our tax legislation, which the government regards as one of its major, immediate post-war objectives.

CORPORATION AND EXCESS PROFITS TAXES

I turn now to corporation income and excess profits taxes. Effective at the beginning of 1947, these have been reduced to a straight corporation income tax of thirty per cent on profits, plus a tax of fifteen per cent on excess corporation profits. As my predecessor stated last year, the excess profits tax has distinct weaknesses and limitations in normal times and is not, therefore, to be accepted as a permanent part of our tax structure. As he said, the government decided last year that it would be retained for this year, 1947, unless provision is made for its earlier repeal at this session of parliament.

[Mr. Abbott.]

We have given careful consideration to the question of whether or not this tax should be repealed before the end of the year, and have taken into account the views and arguments advanced from many sides. If business conditions had now returned to normal and we could rely upon the forces of competition and bargaining to keep profits at normal levels, we would be justified in repealing this tax with effect before the year end. If business needed larger profits to encourage and enable it to provide additional employment by greater expenditures, we should repeal the tax forthwith. Neither of these conditions exists at present. While competition is returning and supply is catching up on demand, profits before tax still are running at abnormally high levels, due to the after-effects of the war, including continuing demobilization and export credit expenditures. Business confidence and available funds are so high that a good many business men are competing more in their efforts to expand their investment quickly than in getting down their costs and keeping down the prices at which they sell their products. In all these circumstances, the government has decided that this tax should not be terminated until the end of the year.

A short time ago in this house I urged Canadian business men to reduce their prices as their volume and efficiency of business expand. I stated that it is neither proper nor even good business to charge all the traffic will bear. I want to emphasize that view again now. We in the government, and the vast majority in this house and in this country, believe in what is now called "free enterprise". We believe in it not as a windy doctrine or a mystic ideology, but as a sensible way of getting things done. It must prove itself and justify itself by its results. With the orderly removal of controls, with increasing supplies of material, with efficient and cooperative labour, and with ample markets, Canadian business enterprise is in a most favourable situation. We all expect it to show its mettle, both in production and in marketing. We expect it to show its ability to keep down costs and prices. In its own long-run interest, as well as in the national interest, business must keep its prices down and its profits within reason.

While most of the minor amendments in our tax laws will be dealt with in the revised act, about which I have already spoken, there are a few changes applying particularly to corporations and other businesses which I wish to propose at the present time.

In the first place, I am proposing that we levy a 5 per cent withholding tax on dividends paid by wholly-owned Canadian subsidiaries to their parent companies abroad. We have no tax of this kind on such companies at present, but such a tax is permitted by our tax convention with the United States which levies such a tax, and we feel that it is not unreasonable for Canada to have one as well. This new measure is to come into effect immediately, and I estimate that in a full year it will yield three or four million dollars.

It is also proposed to extend for 1948 the allowances that have been made in recent years for expenditures on exploration for oil, gas and other minerals. We believe that these allowances have been important in facilitating and encouraging mineral exploration and development, and that we should continue them at least for another year. We propose to change the form of these allowances from the present form of a tax credit to the more normal form of a deduction from income. In the case of the special allowance provided for expenditures on deep test wells, we will make a further special provision to preserve the equivalent value of the tax credit now granted.

In accordance with the announcement made several months ago, I am also proposing to introduce a special provision in the income tax law to ensure that the income content of funding or refunding security issues received by taxpayers after January 1, 1947, will be taxed as income in the year in which the new issue is received. As I explained in the announcement, we feel that it is necessary to take this precaution to safeguard our revenue and to preserve equity.

Other proposed amendments relating to the income tax act will remove the residence requirements for dependent wives and children, now possible after the war conditions are ended, and lengthen the period within which refunds of over-deductions may be claimed; make provision for tax credits to Canadian companies in respect of corporation income tax paid to a foreign government on income of a foreign corporation in which the Canadian company owns more than 50 per cent of the voting stock; amend the part of the act dealing with the undistributed income of private companies in several minor respects; and also amend one or two provisions of the act which must be revised to carry out the terms of the agreements with the provinces. I shall give explanations and details of these minor amendments when we are dealing with the resolutions. There are some other detailed provisions in the amending bill itself which can best be explained and discussed when we have it before us.

COMMODITY TAXES

In the field of taxes on commodities, the only major change which I am proposing is to give effect to my earlier announcement that the gasoline tax of 3 cents a gallon will be repealed as from April 1. It is estimated that this tax would have yielded us close to $40 million in the current fiscal year, and I must, therefore, take account of this loss in our estimate of total revenue. It is, of course, well known that our purpose in withdrawing from this field of taxation at this time is to leave the provincial governments, which have traditionally occupied the field, full scope to carry out whatever policy they think best within it. As a result, the reduction in our tax may not result in any reduction in taxes paid by the consumers of gasoline, but that, of course, is a matter for each provincial government to decide in its own case. Pending action by parliament, I requested the Department of National Revenue to suspend collection of the tax from April 1.

We are also proposing to make certain minor amendments in the tax on passenger transportation, to conform with recent changes in the corresponding tax in the United States. It is desirable in this field to preserve as much similarity as possible between the taxes in the two countries, as that simplifies greatly the position of our common carriers. We are also proposing to iron out certain minor anomalies in the structure of the sugar tax and to make certain technical changes in the Act to improve its effectiveness.

TARIFFS

I have already referred to the tariff negotiations now taking place in Geneva. These are of the greatest importance to Canada. We hope and expect that out of them will come sufficient reductions in tariffs to make it practicable to establish an international trade organization and to agree upon a code of international behaviour in regard to import restrictions, export subsidies and other commercial policies. Canada is, of course, prepared to make tariff reductions and reductions in preferences in exchange for tariff reductions by the United States and by other countries. We do not expect one-sided bargains. We are ready to do our full share.

I feel it is important, however, to stress two aspects of the situation from the Canadian viewpoint. In the first place, the tariff policy of the United States is the key to the success both of the tariff negotiations themselves and of the proposed charter. All of us who buy from the United States on a large scale and who owe large sums to the United States on capital account must have a greater opportunity to sell our goods in her markets than we have had up to now. Unless large scale American imports provide the world with an adequate supply of United States dollars, the rest of the world cannot hope to follow the liberal, multilateral and non-discriminatory trade policy which the United States has been urging upon it with our support and that of others. A positive lead in real tariff reductions by the United States is, therefore, needed if success is to be achieved at Geneva.

Secondly, there are in the proposed trade charter a good many qualifications and escape clauses applying particularly to the vitally important parts of the agreement that relate to quantitative restrictions on trade. Good arguments can be made, and are made, for each of these. But we must guard against the danger that if too many of them are included in the charter, the sum and substance of them all, taken together, may undermine many of the positive benefits which the charter is intended to give to each of the agreeing countries.

These are two points that deserve our keenest attention in regard to the negotiations and charter discussions at Geneva.

In view of the negotiations now in progress, I do not propose to recommend any tariff changes in this budget, nor to make any detailed statement of tariff policy. I should, however, remind the house at this point that during the past year a number of special wartime tariff arrangements have ended with the end of the special wartime circumstances that gave rise to them.

Various orders in council which had provided for temporary reductions or suspensions of duties on individual items to make it possible to hold price ceilings, were revoked from time to time as ceilings were removed or as domestic supplies improved. This process was virtually completed on March 31. Moreover, as I announced last January, provision has been made for the issue of a proclamation on June 30, 1947, terminating the reductions of duty under the War Exchange Conservation Act. This will restore the regular British preferential rates of duty on imports from the United Kingdom. Our future trade relations with the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries will be determined in the light of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment.

CONCLUSION

Before taking into account tax changes, I have forecast revenues of $2,450 million, and expenditures of $2,100 million for the current year, leaving a prospective surplus of $350 million. The reduction in taxes now proposed, including the repeal of the gasoline tax, will, it is estimated, reduce our revenues by a total amount of $265 million when they are in effect for a full year under economic conditions similar to those at present. Consequently these proposed tax changes will effect a continuing reduction in the general level of our revenues equal to approximately three-quarters of the amount of the surplus now in prospect. This, I believe, is as great a reduction in our tax structure as we should make at the present time. It is too early yet to hazard any forecast as to the probable level of expenditure and revenue in the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1948, but I believe it would be most unwise to carry our tax reductions at the present time beyond those which I now propose.

The effect of the proposed tax reductions upon revenues in the current year is estimated to be approximately $160 million, reducing them, therefore, to a total of $2,290 million. After allowing for our prospective expenditures of $2,100 million, this leaves us with a prospective surplus of $190 million and a corresponding prospective reduction of that amount in our net debt during this fiscal year. I should point out that on the basis of the foregoing estimates, were the tax reductions in effect for the whole of the current year, this apparent surplus would be reduced to $85 million.

In appraising this prospective surplus, however, one must keep several factors in mind. In the first place we must be prepared to make financial provision for agreements with any of the three remaining provinces which have not yet signified their desire to do so but who may wish to enter into such agreements. Should all three provinces entertain agreements effective this year, our expenditures will be increased by an addition $110 million or thereabouts. If they do not, then we can reduce our net debt correspondingly. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that our revenues now are very sensitive to any change in general business conditions. In forecasting them in this budget, we have assumed that our national income, production and trade will be at high levels. We believe that this is the most probable course of events. On the other hand, it must be conceded that some recession in the United States this year is by no means impossible. A substantial recession in that country would be bound to have some effects on our own situation, and this in turn would adversely affect our revenues. We must, therefore, leave some margin of safety in the form of a surplus, which we will apply to debt reduction, if conditions remain favourable.

I hope that it will be a cause for gratification and confidence to members of this house and to all Canadians that we are able to drop the tax on gasoline, make a very substantial reduction in our personal income taxes, and still show a prospective surplus in our accounts. This is convincing evidence of the inherent strength of our financial position. I would be less than candid, however, and derelict in my duty, if I did not point out that this favourable situation is due in a very large part to the generally favourable economic circumstances upon which our revenues so greatly depend. If and when we face greater economic difficulties we must anticipate lower revenues. We may also, I hope, anticipate somewhat lower expenditures within a year or two, as certain of the abnormal post-war expenditures disappear, particularly those on subsidies and veterans' benefits. On the other hand, the reduction in these expenditures may be offset in some years by other expenditures deliberately undertaken for the purpose of improving employment and incomes. Consequently our favourable position this year cannot in itself be taken as evidence that we shall be able to avoid deficits in future years when economic conditions are less favourable than now.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to present a balanced view of the financial affairs of this country. I have explained the extent to which our current prosperity and our governmental accounts have been influenced by factors of a special, abnormal or temporary nature. I have dealt with several of the major problems which still confront us and which we must solve if we are to retain a healthy and prosperous economy. But in spite of all I have said to discourage undue optimism or complacency, the story I have had to tell is one, I repeat, which should justify pride and inspire confidence in every Canadian. We can take just pride in the size of the surplus I have reported, pride in the fact that it has been achieved so promptly after the end of the war, pride in the fact that after a 51 per cent cut in personal income taxes and other drastic reductions from the peak of wartime taxation, we are able to forecast better than a balanced budget for the new fiscal year. All this bears eloquent witness to the speed and smoothness with which we have made the transition from war to peace. It reflects the health and the underlying strength of Canada. It inspires faith and confidence in the future of a country which is responsible for such great achievements following the close of a war to which it devoted its resources without stint on a scale matched by few others.

Two months hence we shall have occasion to celebrate the eightieth anniversary of the founding of this confederation. It was seventy-nine years ago yesterday that the first formal budget speech was presented to this house by the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. John Rose (later Sir John Rose). On April 28, 1868, in a speech lasting nearly four hours, he presented his estimates of revenue and expenditure for the first fiscal year of the new Dominion and outlined his financial proposals for the following year.

There was no Hansard in those days, but, according to the Ottawa Times of the following day, there were loud cheers when he expressed the view that "unless something very extraordinary or unforeseen should arise", the year would show a surplus on ordinary account, excluding capital expenditures, of $374,140, estimated receipts of about $14,700,000 exceeding estimated ordinary expenditures of $14,300,000. No doubt with a praiseworthy effort to improve the lot of succeeding finance ministers, he attempted to refute the charge that the country was "groaning under a heavy load of debt and taxation" but in any case it is interesting to note that eighty years ago it was also the custom to claim that the country was going to the dogs because of high taxes and high debt. The whole spirit of the speech can be summed up in a phrase which the minister had used on a previous occasion—"the sums we have to deal with are considerable but the resources and energy of the country are ample to meet them".

These men of 1867 had faith in the future of the united Canada which they were then striving to build. But probably none of them ever dreamed that in eighty short years, total revenues of the dominion could expand nearly two hundred times. We have indeed travelled a long way from the small beginnings of those days. But the same qualities which have brought us thus far can carry us to still greater heights. We are entering a most exciting period. Never before have there been such great material opportunties open to any generation. Never before have we been so conscious of the challenge presented to our economic and political abilities. Never before has our country been called to occupy a position of such high responsibility in world affairs as she does today. If we continue to show the courage, the unity and the spirit of cooperation which inspired the fathers of confederation, and which inspired our peope during these last war years, our achievements in the peace-time years ahead will, I am confident, be equally striking.

$164,390 upon the income of $250,000; and 80 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250,000.

2. That for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years the graduated rates of tax applicable to income of individuals be the rates set out in paragraph one.

3. That for the 1947 taxation year the graduated rates of tax applicable to income of individuals be the average of the present rates and of the rates set out in paragraph one.

4. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the deductions from income of an individual allowed in respect of persons supported by or dependent on him be allowed without regard to the country of residence of such persons.

5. That the provisions allowing deductions from tax to taxpayers engaged in

(a) exploring and drilling for natural gas or oil,

(b) the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products, or

(c) mining or exploring for minerals,

the effect of which is equivalent to a deduction from income of the whole of certain expenses in respect of 1947 operations, be amended to provide that such expenses in respect of 1948 operations may be deducted from income and that, in the case of such expenses in respect of 1948 operations in respect of deep test oil wells an additional deduction from tax be allowed of an amount that, together with the deductions from income, will correspond to the deduction from tax allowed in respect of 1947 operations and that the amended provisions relating to expenditures on deep test oil wells apply in respect of the 1947 and 1948 taxation years to expenditures on groups of wells drilled to locate stratigraphic traps.

6. That there be imposed an income tax of 5 per cent on a non-resident corporation in respect of dividends received by it on or after April 30, 1947, from a resident corporation where all the issued shares of the resident corporation having full voting rights under all circumstances, other than directors' qualifying shares, are beneficially owned by the non-resident corporation.

7. That, where a resident corporation owns over 50 per cent of the issued shares having full voting rights under all circumstances of a non-resident corporation and receives dividends (other than dividends that are not liable to taxation) from the non-resident corporation, the resident corporation may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by it for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years an amount in respect of income tax and excess profits tax paid to a government of a country other than Canada on the income out of which the dividends are deemed to have been paid.

8. That the period during which refunds may be made in respect of amounts deducted for tax at source from salaries or wages be extended and that where the period for refunds in respect of deductions heretofore made has expired, such refunds be permitted for a further prescribed period.

9. That funding securities received in respect of an accrued right to interest, dividends or other payments of an income nature or in respect of the extinguishment of a shareholder's preference to the declaration of dividends for past periods be taxable as income.

10. That the provisions respecting the taxation of private companies in respect of undistributed income be extended to include companies having not more than 75 shareholders excluding shareholders employed or formerly employed by the company, as at present.

11. That the provisions making applicable in respect of income of the 1946 and subsequent taxation years the liability of a private company to pay tax upon undistributed income to which a personal corporation, estate or trust would have been entitled if the income were distributed, be amended to provide that the liability is to be deemed to have been imposed on and after December 18, 1945.

12. That there be deducted from the undistributed income of a private company on hand at the end of the 1939 fiscal period, the amount of dividends paid by the company before December 31, 1942, that were not subject to tax in the hands of the shareholders by reason of the company having been a family corporation.

13. That a tax be imposed on an individual who holds shares of a private company that paid tax on undistributed income in accordance with section 96 of the Act, which shares were held on December 31, 1944, by a corporation or other shareholder who would not have been liable to tax in respect of dividends on the shares so that the private company was not required to pay tax on the respective portion of undistributed income, such tax to be payable in respect of dividends paid to the individual out of the said respective portion of undistributed income, at the following rates:

(a) where the shares were acquired by the individual in the years 1945 and 1946—at a rate of 15 per cent; and

(b) where the shares were acquired by the individual on or after January 1, 1947—at the rate that the private company would have paid tax on the respective portion of the undistributed income if an individual had held the shares on December 31, 1944

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide:—

1. That a tax shall not be imposed under the said act on profits earned after December 31, 1947.

2. That no taxpayer shall be entitled to make application for determination of his standard profits on or after August 1, 1947.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:—

1. That the tax in respect of transportation tickets or rights of transportation

(a) be removed in respect of transportation by vessel or aircraft extending outside of the northern part of the western hemisphere, except in respect of any part of such transportation that is between any port or station in Canada or the United States and any other port or station in Canada or the United States; and

(b) be extended to apply in respect of all transportation by vessel wholly within the northern part of the western hemisphere; and that the second proviso to subsection (1) of section 32, under which section the tax is imposed, be repealed.

A. REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1946-47

Comparative Summary Statement of Revenues and Expenditures

1. Although Canada's fiscal year ends on March 31, the government's books for each fiscal year remain open for some time thereafter, in order to record expenditures made to April 30 as provided by section 32 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and to provide for adjustments which affect revenue and expenditure accounts as well as asset and liability accounts. Final figures for the fiscal year 1946-47 are not yet available, and accordingly the statements which follow, in so far as they relate to 1946-47 revenue, expenditure, investment and balance sheet items, must be regarded as preliminary.

2. The following tables show, by main categories and in detail, revenues, expenditures and the surplus (or decrease in net debt) for the fiscal year 1946-47 together with comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

3. Although the accounts are not yet closed, it is estimated that grand total revenues for the fiscal year 1946-47 will reach $2,984,271,000. While this indicates a decline of $28,914,000 from the previous year's grand total, it should be borne in mind that the grand total for each year contains a large amount of special receipts and credits from bookkeeping transactions arising out of the war and the sale of surplus war assets. Such items, which have been abnormally high in the last three fiscal years, are largely non-recurring. Because of such items a comparison of grand total revenues is not as significant as a comparison of ordinary revenues which in 1946-47 exceeded the total for the previous year by $249,028,000 and was indeed the highest in Canada's history.

4. Throughout 1946-47 tax revenues have been remarkably buoyant and despite tax reductions the total revenue from taxes was higher than in the previous year. Total direct taxes on personal and corporate incomes yielded $1,405,600,000 or 47·1 per cent of total revenues. Excise taxes and duties also held a very important position contributing $775,000,000 or 26·0 per cent of the total. Customs import duties provided $237,400,000 or 8·0 per cent. Non-tax revenues aggregated $160,880,000, and there were special receipts and credits amounting to $372,071,000.

5. The amount of $7,200,000 was set aside as a reserve for the refundable portion of excess profits taxes and this has been deducted in arriving at the revenue total given above. The distribution of these reserves is set out in the section relating to excess profits tax.

ORDINARY REVENUES

6. The personal income tax which yielded $695,000,000 was again the largest single source of revenue. Despite the substantial reductions in tax rates which were in effect the receipts were slightly higher than in 1945-46, reflecting the very high level of employment and increased incomes during the year. A further influence was the considerable number of servicemen who began to receive taxable incomes as they returned to civilian employment.

7. Corporation income tax and excess profits tax which are both levied on business profits yielded a combined total of $687,700,000 which was $24,330,000 less than the previous year's combined total. The corporation income tax yield of $239,000,000 was $21,166,000 more than in the previous year while the excess profits tax yield of $448,700,000 showed a decline of $45,496,000. The lower return from the excess profits tax reflects the changes announced in the 1945 budget which became effective on January 1, 1946. An important factor causing the yield of the corporation income tax to increase was the receipt of substantial amounts in 1946-47 from private companies paying the tax on accumulated undistributed income as provided by Part XVIII of the Income War Tax Act.

8. The liability of corporations to pay refundable excess profits tax was lifted after January 1, 1946, but those which had fiscal year ending after that date were required to pay, during 1946, this tax on a part of their profits proportionate to that portion of their fiscal year which fell in the calendar year 1945: The amount of refundable excess profits tax and personal income tax reserve classified by the taxation years to which it relates, is shown in the table below. The amount of reserve established in the fiscal year under review was $7,200,000 and this was entirely on account of the excess profits tax. These figures represent estimates which are subject to revision before the books of the year are closed.

9. Revenues under the headings "Taxes on Dividends and Interest" and "Taxes on Rents and Royalties" are derived from special taxes, largely on income going to non-residents of Canada, under authority of Section 9 B of the Income War Tax Act. In 1946-47, revenue under these two headings amounted to a total of $20,100,000, an increase of $1,790,000 over the previous year.

10. Succession duties, which have been levied by the Dominion Government only since 1941 have shown a gradual increase from year to year. This upward trend was continued in 1946-47, total receipts of $23,600,000 being $2,153,000 higher than during the previous year.

Taxation Year	Refundable Personal Income Tax	Refundable Excess Profits Tax

11. Net revenue from customs import duties reached the unprecedentedly high total of $237,400,000 and exceeded the previous year's yield by $108,523,000. Industrial reconversion, high consumer purchasing power and insistent demand for goods long in short supply have tended to increase imports and this increased volume of imports, together with the higher money value upon which customs duties were levied have brought substantially increased revenue from this source.

12. Excise duties which are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products brought in a total revenue of $196,000,000, an increase of $9,274,000 over the previous year. Most of this increase was contributed by alcoholic beverages. The smoker's contribution to the Federal Treasury continued to be large with the over-all revenue from tobacco products (including the yield of the additional taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act on tobacco, cigarettes, cigarette papers and tubes, pipes and smokers' accessories) amounting to $184,161,000, which is 7·5 per cent of total revenue from taxes.

13. The heading "Excise Taxes" includes the wide variety of commodity taxes levied under the Special War Revenue Act, of which the sales tax and the taxes on tobacco products were the largest sources of revenue in 1946-47. Gross collections were $2,037,000 lower than in the previous year, but because refunds of excise taxes have declined from $114,878,000 in 1945-46 to the more normal peacetime figure of $29,878,000 for 1946-47, the net revenue from excise taxes was $82,090,000 higher in 1946-47 than in the previous year. When it is considered that the war exchange tax which yielded $41,198,000 in 1945-46 was not in effect in 1946-47, this increase in total net revenue from excise taxes is all the more notable, reflecting greater supplies of goods, a somewhat higher price level and a continuing high volume of purchasing power in the hands of the public.

With a few minor exceptions, all excise taxes showed an increase in 1946-47. The tax on furs which was changed in October, 1945, from 25 per cent at point of dressing with no sales tax, to 10 per cent and sales tax, showed a decline. The war exchange tax and the tax on electric and gas appliances which were not in effect during the year yielded only insignificant clean-up amounts. The gross revenue from sales tax increased slightly, but as a greater part of the refunds of excise taxes are in connection with the sales tax the net yield from this source showed a considerable increase. The net yield from the sales tax continues at a very high level despite the changes in 1945 which excluded equipment and apparatus used in production as well as building materials from this tax.

Some of the sources from which a considerable increase in excise tax revenue was derived and the amounts of the increase in each case are as follows:

Automobiles, tires and tubes	$9,639,000
Beverages	1,977,000
Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco	6,089,000
Cigarette papers and tubes	2,298,000
Gasoline	6,384,000
Phonographs, radios and tubes	1,880,000
Special excise on importations	398,000
Sugar	1,365,000
Amusements	1,165,000

14. Small amounts of tax revenue are derived from the tax on the note circulation of the chartered banks which decreases from year to year with the decline in circulation of such notes as provided by statute; from the taxes on the net premium income of insurance companies; from a tax on the export of electrical energy from Canada; and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. Revenues from all of these taxes in 1946-47 amounted to $9,720,000.

15. Non-tax revenues for 1946-47 are estimated at $160,880,000, an increase of $76,000 from the previous year. Receipts from the Post Office again showed an increase with the total of $75,000,000, exceeding 1945-46 by $6,387,000. These receipts exceeded the cost of operating the Post Office by about $9,012,000, without taking into account any credit for service rendered other departments free of charge and without adding into the cost of operations such items as rentals and other costs of premises occupied by the Post Office. Return on Investments realized $68,780,000, a decline from the previous year of $2,135,000. The larger items making up the total of return on investments are: interest on advances to Canadian National Railways, $21,500,000; dividends paid and profits transferred by the Bank of Canada, $21,236,000; interest on loans to Foreign Exchange Control Board, and on bonds held in Securities Investment Account, $16,540,000; interest on loans to National Harbours Board, $3,450,000; interest on loans to Provinces, $2,859,000; interest on loans to Canadian Farm Loan Board, $666,000; and interest on Soldier Land Settlement and Veterans' Land Act Loans, $738,000.

SPECIAL RECEIPTS AND CREDITS

16. The estimated total of Special Receipts and Credits for the fiscal year 1946-47 is $372,071,000, as compared with $650,023,000 for the previous year. Of this total the sum of $367,578,000 represents receipts arising from war and demobilization expenditures and consists of Refunds of Previous Years' War Expenditures, $134,977,000; Sale of Surplus War Assets, $182,400,000; and Miscellaneous War, Demobilization and Reconversion Revenues, $50,201,000.

A breakdown of Refunds of Previous Years' War Expenditures with details of the larger items, follows:

Canadian Mutual Aid Board	$ 4,300,000
National Defence—
Army	6,700,000
Navy	1,061,000

The amount of $182,400,000 which it is estimated will be realized during the year through the disposal of surplus war assets, does not include residual cash balances or value of accounts receivable carried by War Assets Corporation as at March 31, 1947.

Included in the amount of $50,201,000 for Miscellaneous War, Demobilization and Reconversion Revenues is the sum of $30,000,000 derived from the operation of Park Steamships Limited.

17. The table which follows gives a summary of the forecast made at the time of the last budget of the probable receipts from the various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1946-47, and a comparison of these forecasts with receipts for the fiscal year.

ANALYSIS OF EXPENDITURES, 1946-47

18. Expenditures are dealt with under the classifications of Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Government Owned Enterprises, and Other Charges.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

19. Ordinary expenditures are estimated for the fiscal year 1946-47 at $1,233,952,000 compared with $1,061,902,000 in the previous fiscal year, an increase of $172,050,000. The largest increase, $72,593,000 was in the payment of family allowances which totalled $245,225,000 for the full year compared with $172,632,000 for the nine-month period of the previous fiscal year during which this programme was in operation. Other estimated increases of significant amounts were as follows:

Increase in interest and public debt charges	$35,984,000
Increase in Department of National Revenue expenditures	5,265,000
Increase in Post Office expenditures	8,258,000
Increase in Department of Public Works expenditures	10,894,000
Increase in cost of treatment and after-care of returned soldiers	16,361,000
Increase in cost of administering Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts	4,012,000

Other increases as well as the decreases effected during the year are shown in the five-year table.

It is of importance to note that of the total estimated ordinary expenditures of $1,233,952,000, the larger contractual and uncontrollable items accounted for $998,942,000 or 80·9 per cent. These items are interest and other charges on the public debt, subsidies and payments to provinces under the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreements, family allowances, premium, discount and exchange, unemployment insurance, post office, pensions and superannuation.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

20. Estimated capital expenditures totalled $13,205,000 in the fiscal year 1946-47, compared with $4,508,000 in the previous fiscal year. The main items are costs of dredging the St. Lawrence Ship Channel, improvements in connection with civil airways and airports, the construction of the new Prince Edward Island car ferry and flight equipment for the Trans-Atlantic Air Service.

[Mr. Abbott.]

DEMOBILIZATION AND RECONVERSION EXPENDITURES

21. Demobilization and Reconversion expenditures are estimated at $1,313,188,000. This is 49·9 per cent of the total expenditures for the year under review.

The Department of Veterans Affairs expended $512,576,000 of which war service gratuities and re-establishment credits amounted to $319,500,000, post-discharge rehabilitation benefits $100,000,000, and treatment of defence forces and pensions, World War II, $83,800,000.

Expenditures by the Department of Finance under this category totalled $149,607,000. Of this amount expenditures by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and the Canadian Wool Board Limited, together with costs of administration of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, accounted for $113,791,000 while advances to the Canadian Wheat Board for payment of drawback claims to millers and other manufacturers of wheat products amounted to $26,000,000. The office of the Comptroller of the Treasury expended $6,333,000 and the sum of $2,365,000 was disbursed in connection with the Halifax Area explosion and V-E Day damage claims.

The Department of Reconstruction and Supply expended $134,900,000, of which the larger items were: liquidation and termination of contracts, $69,500,000; housing developments, $31,500,000; expenses and subsidies paid by the Emergency Coal Production Board, $10,500,000; and the administration, reconversion and operation of crown companies and crown plants, $8,500,000.

Another department which expended a considerable amount under the Demobilization and Reconversion appropriation was the Department of Agriculture which disbursed $73,404,000. The larger items were: subsidies on milk for butter, for fluid milk, for cheese and for concentration purposes, $37,950,000; freight assistance on western feed grains, $19,000,000; subsidy on wheat used as feed for live stock, $7,000,000; and premiums on hog carcasses, $4,600,000.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

22. Special expenditures are estimated at $31,829,000, an increase of $14,471,000 over 1945-46. The principal changes in this category were due to a reduction of $5,552,000 in advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund and to the payment of $20,562,000 to the Canadian Wheat Board for which there was no counterpart in the previous fiscal year. This latter item represented the payment to the Board of a sum equal to the total amount of the established deficits in certain accounts operated by the Board. Details of these deficits are given in the Further Supplementary Estimates for 1946-47.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

23. The classification of expenditures entitled Government Owned Enterprises comprises the losses of and non-active advances to government owned enterprises which had been established before the war and are operated as separate corporations. The total amount charged to expenditure in this category amounted to $9,966,000, an increase of $9,192,000 over the previous fiscal year. This increase was mainly due to the 1946 deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the first since 1940.

Canadian National Railways

24. The operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1946 totalled $400,586,000, a decrease of 7·7 per cent from those of 1945. Operating expenses of the Railway totalled $357,237,000 compared with $355,294,000 in 1945.

The net operating revenue of the Railway was $43,349,000 and after deducting $11,790,000 for taxes, and for equipment and joint facility rentals, there remained a net railway operating income of $31,559,000. Other income, less deductions, totalled $4,161,000, resulting in $35,720,000 being available for interest. After payment of $23,359,000 in interest on debt held by the public and $21,323,000 in interest to the Government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes, there was a net cash deficit of $8,962,000. This amount was paid to the Railway by the Government and charged to expenditure.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals for 1946 was $889,000 compared with $686,000 in 1945.

Canadian National Steamships

25. The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, had an operating surplus of $1,710,000 in the calendar year 1946 and earnings on the Company's Replacement Fund totalled $197,000. From the total income of $1,907,000, there was paid for bond interest and exchange $478,000, and for interest on Government advances $126,000. The resulting income surplus was therefore $1,302,000. Of this income surplus the sum of $197,000 was retained in the Replacement Fund and the remainder, namely, $1,105,000 was paid to the Government in reduction of advances made in prior years for deficits.

National Harbours Board

26. The operating income of the National Harbours Board for the calendar year 1946, after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation, reserve for replacements and interest on Government advances, was $4,143,036, compared with $5,596,000 in the previous year. Interest paid to the Government in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947, totalled $3,450,000.

Financial assistance provided by the Government to the National Harbours Board and charged to expenditure under the category of Government Owned Enterprises, totalled $819,000, divided as follows: $101,000 for the operating deficit of Churchill Harbour and $14,000 for the operating deficit of Quebec Harbour; $424,000 for non-active advances to meet the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal; $242,000 for retirement of debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission; and $25,000, $2,000, $7,000 and $4,000 for capital expenditures at the harbours at Saint John, Three Rivers, Halifax and Churchill respectively.

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during the year and $110,000 was paid to the Government.

OTHER CHARGES

27. Total expenditures in this final category are estimated at $29,283,000, compared with $48,177,000 in 1945-46.

28. The amount of $25,000,000 has again been credited to the reserve to meet possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets. Against this reserve was charged the sum of $19,600,000 reflecting write-offs in connection with various loans and advances made during the war by the Department of Munitions and Supply to Crown Companies and in connection with Crown plants privately managed. Details of these write-offs will be found in the section dealing with changes in Loans, Advances and Investments. As a result of these credit and debit transactions this general reserve stood at $155,400,000 at the close of the year.

29. The other items in this category which affect the net debt are as follows: the provision for reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act and the annual write-off of Soldier and General Land Settlement and Veterans' Land Act Loans and Canadian Farm Loan Board Capital Stock. aggregating $2,915,000.

30. The loss of $60,000 on seed grain and relief accounts administered by the Department of Mines and Resources does not increase the net debt as the write-off is from an amount already set aside in the non-active accounts to provide for revaluations and losses.

31. In 1945-46, the Dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways as reflected in the Canadian National Railway Securities Trust Stock increased by $22,631,000, representing the surplus earnings of the system, namely $24,756,000, less capital loss on abandonments and retirements of $2,125,000. During the fiscal year just closed, as the Railway had no surplus earnings in the calendar year 1946, the only change in the Securities Trust Stock was a decrease of $1,308,000, representing the retirement of rolling stock. A deficit does not reduce the Dominion's equity as the amount of the deficit is paid to the Railway by the Government and charged as Government expenditure under the category of Government Owned Enterprises.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

32. The estimated grand total of expenditure for the fiscal year 1946-47 under the various categories enumerated, namely Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Losses of and Non-active advances to Government Owned Enterprises, and Other Charges, was $2,632,127,000.

33. The table which follows shows the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures for a number of important items. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources, after deducting the $7,200,000 of excess profits taxes estimated as refundable after the war, are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. expenditure or groups of such items are expenditures or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The purpose of this table is to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury.

OVER-ALL SURPLUS

34. As total estimated revenues for the fiscal year 1946-47 were $2,984,271,000 and estimated expenditures aggregated $2,632,127,000, the over-all surplus or decrease in net debt for the year was $352,144,000.

LOANS, ADVANCES AND INVESTMENTS

35. In addition to the expenditures already detailed, the Government makes disbursements for the acquisition of investments which are treated as "active assets" and are deducted from total gross liabilities in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in loans, advances and investments for 1946-47 was $983,660,000. Details of these increases together with those for the four previous fiscal years will be found in the table on page 2584.

Railway and Steamship Companies

36. There was a net decrease in loans and advances in this category during the fiscal year 1946-47 amounting to $20,520,000. This was the result of transactions with the Canadian National Railways exclusively. The details of these transactions reflecting repayment by the Railway on account of previous loans and the making of new advances to the Raliway are as follows:

United Kingdom and Other Governments—

37. Net advances under this heading increased by $647,689,000. The largest single change in this category during 1946-47 was the advances under the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, aggregating $640,000,000, out of a total $1,250,000,000 authorized by this Act. The Canadian dollar obligation of the Government of the United Kingdom under the authority of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, was reduced by $95,800,000, leaving a balance outstanding at the fiscal year end of $442,764,000.

Advances made during the fiscal year to foreign governments and their agencies pursuant to agreements made under the Export Credits Insurance Act totalled $267,371,000, made up as follows: Belgium, $26,000,000; China, $19,496,000; Czechoslovakia, $1,669,000; France, $156,400,000 (of which $86,985,000 was used to repay advances obtained under Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act); The Netherlands, $51,153,000; Netherlands Indies, $3,900,000; Norway, $8,661,000; and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, $91,000.

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics repaid during the fiscal year 1946-47, $5,000,000 of a loan obtained under the authority of the War Appropriation Act in the amount of $10,000,000.

Advances to the United Kingdom and other governments under the authority of Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act decreased during the fiscal year 1946-47, by $158,880,000 (including repayment by the Government of France noted in the preceding paragraph). These advances represented mainly trading accounts operated by the Departments of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce for acquisition of food and other essential supplies for these governments.

Sundry Government Agencies—

38. Under the authority of the Appropriation Act, 1946, an advance of $2,000,000 was made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the construction of capital facilities.

39. The net change in advances to the National Harbours Board during the year was an increase of $114,000. An advance of $186,000 was made for capital purposes at the port of Montreal, while a capital refund of $72,000 was received from the Vancouver Harbour.

40. The net increase in the fiscal year in advances for Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act purposes amounted to $54,268,000. This increase was occasioned by net advances of $56,398,000 under the Veterans' Land Act, less net repayments by settlers of $1,816,000 and less the sum of $314,000 which was written off and charged to Consolidated Deficit Account.

41. Net advances to Sundry Crown Companies decreased during the fiscal year by $11,104,000. Advances were made to the Canadian Commercial Corporation totalling $2,500,000 and the total of the outstanding balance against the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation increased by $946,000. Loans and advances to Eldorado Mining & Refining (1944) Limited outstanding at the beginning of the fiscal year in the amount of $2,943,000 were transferred to Investments. Advances of $6,457,000 to the Canadian Wool Board and of $326,000 to the Wartime Food Corporation were repaid. The Melbourne Merchandising Limited ceased to carry on business in February, 1947. Advances to the company outstanding at the beginning of the fiscal year in the amount of $4,823,000 were liquidated by repayments of $3,215,000, by a charge to reserve for contingent liabilities of $949,000 and by a charge of $659,000 to the general reserve for possible losses upon the ultimate realization of active assets. This latter charge was made under the authority of The Surplus Crown Assets Act, 1944.

42. Investments in connection with Crown Plants privately managed which totalled $41,100,000 at the beginning of the fiscal year, were completely liquidated by March 31, 1947. The plants involved and the amount in each case had been as follows: Alberta Nitrogen Company Limited, $10,370,000; Canada Strip Mill Limited, $9,563,000 and Welland Chemical Works Limited, $21,167,000. The liquidation of these investments was by repayments and credits of $12,272,000, by charges of $9,918,000 to reserve for contingent liabilities—Crown Plants, and by charges of $18,910,000 to the general reserve for possible losses upon the ultimate realization of active assets.

These plants were sold by War Assets Corporation and it was necessary to clear from the Dominion's books by a charge to the general reserve the amounts in the asset accounts remaining after having applied the proceeds of the sales and the amounts charged to the reserve for contingent liabilities—Crown Companies. These charges were made under the authority of The Surplus Crown Assets Act, 1944.

Investments

43. The Government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board decreased during the year by $600,000. The Board purchased out of surplus funds $3,750,000 of its 3½ per cent bonds due January 2, 1960, and approximately $1,000 of the Board's capital stock was written off to Consolidated Deficit Account. On the other hand, the Dominion purchased from the Board $3,150,000 of 3 per cent bonds due January 2, 1970. At the end of the fiscal year the Government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board totalled $21,023,000.

44. In the fiscal year 1946-47, Canada paid $48,750,000 on its subscription to the capital of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Of this amount $41,665,000 was paid in the form of non-interest bearing notes. These notes are payable on demand and are carried on the Dominion's balance sheet under the heading of Floating Debt. A further call of $16,250,000 has been made on the capital stock of the Bank payable in May, 1947. The remaining amount of Canada's subscription to the capital stock of the Bank, namely, $260,000,000, can only be called to meet obligations of the Bank on securities of or guaranteed by the Bank.

45. Canada completed its subscription to the International Monetary Fund by payments totalling $299,970,000 during the fiscal year 1946-47. Of this total, Canada paid $74,973,000 in gold, $30,997,000 in Canadian dollars and $194,000,000 in non-interst bearing demand notes. These latter are carried on the Dominion's Balance sheet under the heading of Floating Debt.

46. Other investments increased during the fiscal year 1946-47 by $8,940,000, reflecting mainly transfers from loans and advances to Crown Companies and Crown plants—privately managed.

47. The following table gives the details of the changes in loans, advances and investments during the fiscal year 1946-47 as now estimated, as well as the corresponding details for the four previous fiscal years.

LOAN FLOTATIONS

48. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947, the Dominion issued securities in the domestic market in an estimated amount of $2,427,293,471. This amount does not include the recurring issues of Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates issued to refund similar securities maturing during the year.

During the year $2,717,872,364 of Dominion obligations matured or were called for redemption. Of this amount $1,939,293,471 was renewed or converted into new issues, the remainder, namely, $778,578,893 was provided as follows: $488,000,000 from the proceeds of the sale of Canada Savings Bonds and $290,578,893 from cash balances.

49. In addition to renewals of Deposit Certificates, one issue of bonds for refunding purposes was sold direct to the chartered banks. This issue, in the amount of $162,050,000, consisted of four year 1¾ per cent Bonds dated November 1, 1946. It was sold to the banks at 100·75 to yield 1·56 per cent.

50. The table which follows gives the details of the various issues sold during the year (excluding the renewal for another year of $33,293,471 one year 4 per cent School Lands Debentures, held by the Governments of the Prairie Provinces in respect of school lands). In the table the issues are classified on the basis of whether they were sold at time of issue to the Bank of Canada or to the chartered banks or to the general public.

51. During the fiscal year, sale of securities to the general public was confined to Canada Savings Bonds, a new type of security which was introduced in November, 1946. Net sales of Canada Savings Bonds to March 31, 1947, are estimated at $488,000,000.

52. The table below gives the details of Dominion of Canada bond redemptions during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947.

53. The fortnightly issue of three months Treasury Bills was continued during the year. The amount outstanding, namely, $450,000,000, was unchanged throughout the fiscal year. The last issue in the fiscal year was sold at an average yield of ·404 per cent.

54. The average rate of interest on the Dominion's direct funded debt (including Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates) outstanding at March 21, 1947, was 2·65 per cent. This figure compares with 2·59 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the previous year, the increase being accounted for by the issue of Canada Savings Bonds which were specially designed to promote thrift on the part of persons of small or moderate incomes and which accordingly bear interest at 2¾ per cent per annum.

REQUIREMENTS FOR AND SOURCES OF CASH

55. In analysing the requirements for and sources of cash, it is necessary to follow the policy approved by Parliament when the Foreign Exchange Control Act was passed, namely, that the amount of the advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board outstanding at the end of the preceding calendar year should not be disclosed until within thirty days after March 31. Therefore, in keeping with this policy it is not possible at this time to give the amount of the advances to the Board outstanding at the end of the Government's fiscal year. On the other hand, it is desirable to show as much detail as possible of the state of the loans, advances and other investments made by the Government, particularly those made to other Governments. Therefore for purposes of the balance sheet as at March 31, 1947, there has been included with the ordinary cash balances held by the Government, the total amount of advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board which are equivalent in substance to cash balances either in Canada or abroad, and also holdings of securities in the Securities Investment Account which represent the Government's temporary investment of surplus cash in its own marketable securities which are available at any time, if required, to meet needs for cash. Detailed information on these items will, of course, be published later in the year in the Public Accounts.

(5) Deposit Certificates maturing April 2, 9, 16 and 23 bore interest at the rate of ¼%.

(6) Total from previous table $1,906,000,000, and School Lands Debentures, viz. $33,293,471.

In the table of requirements for Canadian cash shown below, therefore, the term "cash" is used in the broad sense indicated above. On this basis, apart from cash used for the redemption of securities, the total amount of cash required was approximately, $3,291,800,000. The sources from which these cash requirements were met are shown in the lower part of the table below. It will be noted that it was possible to meet all requirements for cash during the year other than debt redemption without new borrowing, and that, indeed, there was sufficient cash available to enable a reduction of about $252,700,000 to be made in the total of outstanding funded debt payable in Canadian currency. This result was achieved, of course, by a reduction in the total of cash balances as defined above.

NATIONAL DEBT

56. It is estimated that the gross unmatured funded debt (including Deposit Certificates, Treasury Bills and the estimated refundable portion of personal income tax and excess profits tax) of the Government of Canada outstanding at the close of the fiscal year 1946-47 will amount to $16,524,164,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of Deposit and Trust Accounts, Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts are estimated at $1,135,463,000. The gross liabilities of the Dominion on March 31, 1947, therefore, are estimated at $17,659,627,000. On the other side of the balance sheet there are active assets estimated at a total of $4,745,766,000, consisting of cash, loans, advances and investments, less a reserve of $155,400,000 for possible losses on their ultimate realization. If the amount of net active assets is deducted from the amount of gross liabilities, there results a figure of $13,069,261,000 representing the estimated net debt of the Dominion as at March 31, 1947.

57. The decrease in the net debt for the year is estimated at $352,144,000. This of course is the amount already reported as the over-all estimated surplus for the fiscal year 1946-47.

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

59. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the Dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public, totalled $566,954,000 at March 31, 1947, an increase of $25,972,000 over the amount outstanding at the close of the previous fiscal year. This increase is occasioned mainly by the issue and sale to the public of $50,000,000 Canadian National Railway Company 2¾ per cent Bonds dated January 2, 1947 and maturing January 2, 1967 and the redemption of $23,752,000 Canadian Northern Railway Company 6½ per cent Bonds on July 1, 1946. The new issue was sold to a syndicate of Canadian banks and bond dealers at a price of 99·68 per cent to the Company. Of the proceeds of the issue the sum of $41,932,257 was used to pay off loans from the Government and the remainder for capital purposes of the Railway.

60. Pursuant to the terms of an Order in Council dated April 16, 1946, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to guarantee certain advances and interest thereon obtained by any person from a bank in order to purchase coal, coke or briquettes in the summer of 1946. The liability of the Corporation is limited to ten per cent of the aggregate advances made by each bank, but the maximum amount of guarantee is $500,000. The estimated contingent liability of the Corporation at March 31, 1947 was $26,000.

61. Under the provisions of The Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, the Government guarantees loans made by chartered banks to farmers for authorized purposes. The amount of the guarantee is limited to 10 per cent of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed farm loans made by each bank. At February 28, 1947, 18,945 loans had been made by the chartered banks in the amount of $14,496,864 and the contingent liability of the Government at that date was $1,449,686.

62. Under the provisions of The Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act proclaimed on January 15, 1947, the Government guarantees loans made by the chartered banks to veterans domiciled in Canada for authorized purposes. These purposes include the purchase of a business, the purchase or repair of machinery, tools, instruments or other business equipment and the construction, repair or alteration of or the making of additions to any building or structure used in the veteran's business. The amount of such loans is limited to $25,000,000. The amount of the Government's guarantee is limited to 25 per cent of the loans made by a bank, if the total loans by that bank do not exceed $1,000,000. The guarantee is reduced to 15 per cent on the amount of loans made by each bank over $1,000,000. Records of loans made at March 31, 1947, are not yet available.

63. Under the terms of The Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, 1937, 125,720 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this Act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans on December 31, 1946, was $59,335, the contingent liability of the Government is limited to this amount. Up to December 31, 1946, 1,277 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $463,996 had been paid. The ratio of total losses to total volume of loans, therefore, is only 0·93 of one per cent.

64. Under the provisions of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, the Home Extension Plan was started. It provided for loans, not exceeding in the aggregate $2,000,000, by banks under regulations similar to those of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, for the purpose of financing the creation of additional self-contained housing units by alterations or additions to a building used solely or partially as a dwelling at the time of application for the loan. To March 31, 1946, fifty-nine loans for a total amount of $109,238 had been made. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans amounted to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by the banks of $16,386. There have been no claims for loss made by the banks. Since March 31, 1946, no new loans have been made under this authority but under the authority of Part IV of the National Housing At, 1944.

65. Part IV of the National Housing Act, 1944, authorizes loans to be made by chartered banks to home owners for improvement of their homes and for conversion of existing homes into multiple housing units, which loans may be guaranteed by the Government up to a maximum of $100,000,000. The contingent liability of the Government with respect to these loans is limited to 5 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by each lending institution.

The home improvement loan section of the Act has not yet been proclaimed and therefore no loans have been granted thereunder. By Order in Council dated April 13, 1946, the home extension section of the Act was proclaimed. At March 31, 1947, twenty-eight loans had been approved in a total amount of $86,065 to provide for fifty-eight housing units. There have been no claims for losses. The contingent liability of the Government at March 31, 1947, was $4,303.

66. Under the provisions of Part II, Section 11 (3A) of the National Housing Act, 1944, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may guarantee the principal of debentures of an institutional holding company and interest thereon at a rate of not more than two and one-half per cent per annum. At March 31, 1947, debentures had been issued by Housing Enterprises of Canada Limited bearing the guarantee of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the amount of $3,735,000.

67. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, the National Housing Act, 1938, and the National Housing Act, 1944, the Dominion has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities. On January 1, 1946, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, 1945, was proclaimed and since that date the Corporation has been acting as the agent of His Majesty in connection with loans under these Acts.

The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be shared by the Dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The original principle under the Dominion Housing Act and the National Housing Act, 1938, was that the Dominion bears two-thirds of the loss, if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amount due, is equal to or less than the amount advanced by the Dominion and one-third of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the Dominion. In the case of small loans (that is, loans not in excess of $4,000 in the case of single family dwellings or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of multiple family dwellings), the share of the loss to be borne by the Dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. Under the National Housing Act, 1938, a new provision was added to encourage the making of small loans in small or remote communities and in districts or other communities designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the Dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made by each such lending institution. Under the National Housing Act, 1944, the Dominion bears the first one-quarter of the loss and agrees to pay losses sustained by any lending institution up to an amount set out in the contract. This amount, by statute, cannot exceed 15 per cent of the aggregate of the lending institution's share of the joint loans made by the lending institution and His Majesty under the contract.

Loans to the number of 33,765 covering 43,460 dwelling units have been approved as at February 28, 1947, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, the National Housing Act, 1938, and the National Housing Act, 1944, the total amount of such loans being $165,225,310. Losses recorded and paid to March 31, 1947, amounted to $2,645 covering the Dominion's proportion of the loss on seven loans. This amount represents total losses to that date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part I of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $498 realized by the sale of eleven properties. The net loss to March 31, 1947, is therefore only $2,147. There have been no losses under the National Housing Act, 1944.

68. Under authority of P.C. 4690 dated November 12, 1946, the Minister of Finance was authorized on behalf of the Government of Canada to guarantee under the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act the guarantee of the Republic of China of the payment by Ming Sung Industrial Company Ltd. of the cost of Canadian-produced goods and Canadian services to a maximum amount of $12,750,000 to be advanced by Imperial Bank of Canada, The Bank of Toronto and The Dominion Bank, subject to an agreement dated October 30, 1946, between the Company and the said Banks, and to guarantee the securities given by the Ming Sung Industrial Company Ltd. for repayment of amounts drawn against credits established by the Banks in accordance with the agreement.

This guarantee was made at the request of the Government of China, which itself has guaranteed the payments to be made by the Company and the securities to be given by the Company and has undertaken to indemnify the Government of Canada against loss in connection with the guarantee so requested.

As of March 31, 1947, the Banks, under the agreement with the Ming Sung Industrial Co. Ltd. dated October 30, 1946, had issued letters of credit in the amount of $8,917,320 and opened a special account in favour of the Ming Sung Industrial Company Ltd. in the amount of $820,000. No payments had been made on drafts against the letters of credit. Advances against the special account amounted to $796,056.30. Outstanding commitments under this guarantee as of March 31, 1947, therefore amounted to $796,056.30.

69. The following is a statement of bonds, debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the Dominion estimated to be outstanding as at March 31, 1947.

B. TABLES OF ECONOMIC STATISTICS

The following Tables of economic statistics, which were originally published elsewhere, are included in this Appendix to the Budget for convenience of reference in connection with consideration of the Budget accounts and proposals. Apart from monetary statistics which were taken from Bank of Canada publications, the statistics were all supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics unless otherwise noted. In certain cases index numbers have been adjusted to a uniform base period.

Tables I, II, and III on National Income and related figures are based upon the publication of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics entitled "National Accounts, Income and Expenditure, 1938-1946." The nature and sources of these statistics are described in the booklet published in April, 1946, and entitled "National Accounts, Income and Expenditure 1938-1945". The figures given below have been rounded off to the nearest hundred million, and minor adjustments in the original figures have been made to eliminate residual items representing errors and omissions.

ESTIMATED CANADIAN LABOUR FORCE AND EMPLOYMENT, 1941-47

NOTE: The figures for the years 1941-45 show the estimated wartime distribution of manpower in the categories used in the Quarterly Labour Force Surveys of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, from which the estimates for 1946-47 were obtained. For the purpose of these surveys, employed persons are those who either worked or had jobs in a specific week while the unemployed are those who were looking for work but were not working. About 170,000 persons living in remote areas and Indian Reservations are not included at all in these surveys.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it would be a very ungenerous, churlish and indeed very foolish man, I think, who would seek to begin the speech that I am beginning in any other way than by congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on his first budget speech. Happily, under our system of government, we can do this with sincerity. I remember not long ago when, I think it was in the state of New York, the defeated candidate for the governorship congratulated the winner a friend of mine said, "I wonder what the Russians would think of that?" and his answer was, "I suppose they would regard it as deep-dyed hypocrisy". Mr. Speaker, I do congratulate the minister. I also understand the enthusiasm with which his budget has been received and I think, in large measure, we can all share his enthusiasm. Certainly I say, just as he has said, that it does justify pride and inspires confidence in this country. I do not for a minute hesitate to say that for, as he has very properly said, it is our budget. It is not his budget; it is the budget of everyone of us throughout the country. His reference to Sir John Rose and the length of his speech prompted me to do a quick calculation, although it is not an accurate one. I have guessed that if the length of the minister's speech as compared with Rose's speech had been in proportion to the amounts involved, the minister's speech would have gone on for weeks; and, of course, if it had been in proportion to the surplus, about which I shall have something to say in a moment, perhaps the minister's speech would have gone on to infinity.

Having said these words, and with great sincerity, I wish to make some comments on the speech. Of course I intend to follow the practice on these occasions and speak for only a very few minutes. First, I wish to comment on this word "surplus." It strikes me as an unusual word. The minister spoke about it in the beginning; he spoke about it again at the end, and apparently with strong self-congratulation; but he pointed out honestly that this $352,000,000 was not equal to the amount of the capital represented in the receipts, the special receipts of $372,000,000, which have nothing to do with income. I just want to point out to the minister that, as he is thoroughly aware, this is a strange habit we have in dealing with public accounts which, if it were practised in connection with private accounts, would result not only in the company going broke but probably in somebody having to go to jail. I would also suggest to the minister—and I know he will not mind this—that years ago when he and I were both in private life and the company with which I was associated wished to seek—and gladly seek—advice from the firm with which he was associated, we never would have wanted approximate accuracy such as we have here. We never would have wanted anything just ninety per cent right, or eighty-five per cent right. I am sure he will agree that when we went to the very good firm with which he was associated we expected 100 per cent accuracy, and nothing less. I should like to point out that it ought to be easier for the government to gauge its expenditures than for the private corporation, because the government has control over so many of the elements entering into the matter.

I want to add just this one word. The minister should not ask us to be so grateful because he has taken several hundred million dollars of our money more than he needed to take, because, after all, that is what it amounts to. I would refer him to a speech made not so many years ago by a gentleman who will be received as a great authority by those immediately to my left, the Right Hon. Philip Snowden, who said that any chancellor of the exchequer who had even a half crown of surplus ought to be charged with getting money under false pretences.

I want to make just this final comment in that connection. We have drifted—and I see it again and again—into a state of affairs where governments really seem to have thought themselves into a state of mind whereby, when they come and announce a surplus, it is just as though they had presented to us a gift out of their own pockets. So often they seem to forget that this is our own money that has done these wonderful things. So I should just like to say that to me this does not seem like good budgeting but very bad budgeting. The government ought to be very much ashamed to come to us and tell us they are five or six hundred million dollars wrong. I really think the minister should have apologized to us for that tonight; and I believe there is an uncritical attitude abroad when people will thump their desks over that sort of thing. I am sure they will feel quite differently in the morning. Many people in this country will say to themselves, "Did they really get all this money they did not need? I could have done with that extra money of mine that they took away."

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A new kind of critic.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister is always apt, even when I do not hear him. In the few minutes which is all

I can allow myself I am not going to take time to comment on the way in which these reductions have been applied, but I should like to say two things. I listened to learn whether anything had been done for the unfortunate children who are still to be asked to pay for their chocolate bar and their pop an amount which apparently is beyond their resources. The minister's heart must have been wrung, I am sure, by a cartoon I and probably he read today, and I cannot understand why a man with such an open heart could have overlooked that point.

I wish to make one other comment of a much more serious nature, though that is serious enough. As far as I could judge on first hearing, it seemed to me there was no beginning to deal with the situation in regard to the gold industry which is so vital in that all important aspect of our business relations, namely, exchange with the United States.

I might deal with other matters, but I should like to say one word in regard to the excess profits tax. It seems to me a pity that it has to be continued on the present utterly unintelligible basis as to the basic period and standard rate.

There is one further comment I wish to make, and here I speak, I hope, with a sense of responsibility and a sense of moderation. In the minister's speech, which I noticed lasted for only two hours, not four hours like some other speeches—

Mr. ABBOTT: An hour and three-quarters.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister corrects me; he is more accurate than on some other occasions. During all that speech lasting an hour and three-quarters, according to the minister, only about five minutes were devoted to dominion-provincial relations. Indeed, his phraseology suggested that he might have left it out altogether. He began by saying, "Perhaps I should not let this occasion pass without a few comments about this important problem." I think we should be grateful that he did not let it pass altogether, but the comments he made were really proportionate in their importance to the length of time he took to make them. They were brief, and just related to us things we already knew. I wish to make a comment or two on that, because it seems to me that when we are invited to congratulate ourselves—as we may well do on the many favourable features we have seen—it is well to remind ourselves that here is a matter in which not only have we met failure but which, as a friend of mine put it to me the other day, is becoming a scandal; that responsible, sensible statesmen, speaking the same language, thinking the same thoughts, with the same background, are not able to get together and sit sensibly around a table to discuss matters which are of great importance. We are inclined to criticize the failures that have been experienced at Moscow and elsewhere, but there they have had many difficulties we do not face. What has happened in the last year? On the money side we have had a kind of topsy-turvy, upside-down auction. The federal government has been the auctioneer, but it has been a strange kind of auction. They have bid up the various provinces, and the dominion, the auctioneer, has not received money, but has paid it. The dominion has paid money to everybody at the highest rate reached by anybody. So we have this perfectly topsy-turvy arrangement, which, as I say, has been brought about by this individual method of auction in reverse. Even then we should remember that nobody understands what we have done, because there is an area of uncertainty on the fringe of the whole business. Nobody knows just what has been decided; nobody knows what is to be left to the provinces and what to the dominion. The minister himself was very frank about the matter when speaking in Toronto some weeks ago.

I should like to make this final comment. It seems to me that this is a matter which goes to the very root of our national life. All these pleasant things we have been hearing tonight—and many of them are pleasant—can turn sour and have little effect if we are not able to get together as men of good will and talk these things out. As I was considering what the minister said tonight I pictured to myself the table in the senate chamber. Actually a year ago today, I believe, they were seated there, the Prime Minister at the head, as was fitting, with the premiers of the different provinces. I was thinking that if that meeting took place now there would be three absentees. Why would there be three absentees? Who are these men who apparently are not considered proper to be dealt with? These are men in high standing in their own provinces, one of them formerly a minister here, all of them returned to power more than once in their own provinces. Why is it that we cannot have this? Why is it that we stand as we do now? Is it because of the old maxim which I presume the Prime Minister learned at the university as many of us did—divide and conquer? Can it be that? Is that the reason, or can it be that there is some other reason? Whatever the reason may be, I, who am a newcomer here, make this suggestion, with respect, to the Prime Minister: Our ancestors had old-fashioned ways of talking about it and they might have said, "Will not the Prime Minister as a thank-offering for the return of his health —which we all so greatly rejoice over—now that he is back—say that this thing will be changed, that we shall now try to get together and reconfederate this country which is in such great need of reconfederation and reintroduce the spirit which existed in this country eighty years ago?"—as the Minister of Finance so well expressed it tonight. I put that forward with deference but with earnestness, and I move that this debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Chairman, I wish to continue what I was saying when the committee rose at six o'clock. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply interrupted me as I was about to conclude my remarks. I had just referred to the laying of hardwood flooring at the rate of three cents per square foot.

I want to tell the minister that between the time the committee rose at six o'clock and the house met at eight o'clock I telephoned no fewer than nine different flooring firms in Ottawa, and on no occasion did I get a bid anywhere near three cents. Not one of them would accept floor laying at the rate of three cents per square foot. I wanted to put this on the record to show that I was not very far out when I made the statement the other day that fair wages could be made at five cents per square foot. I think a man could make fair wages at that rate, but certainly not at three cents.

The thing I was more concerned about was the increase in the prices of retail lumber. It would be a very bad thing for this country and especially for the building industry and those people with small incomes who are endeavouring to get better homes, our returned men particularly. It will be a great impediment to them if prices of retail lumber are allowed to go up. I pointed out before the dinner recess, and I think it is worth mentioning again, that the minister should take some precautions in this regard.

It was brought to my attention during the Easter recess that a great many retail lumber yards are selling grades Nos. 2 and 3 for No. 1 prices. That is something which the minister should talk over with his different controllers and have investigated. It is not reasonable and it will not lead to good construction.

More consideration should be given to increasing production, and I am glad to hear the minister say that a greater percentage of our cut is to be kept at home rather than exported. When we were speaking on this matter during last session I mentioned that there was far too much of our lumber, particularly the better grades, being exported instead of being kept at home to meet the needs of the people of Canada.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I would not have spoken except that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni made some disparaging remarks about this group. He insinuated that we believe that anybody who was not on relief was an enemy of the state. I think the significance to be attached to his remarks lies in the fact that they received intense applause also from the Tory representatives on the right. The true alliance with regard to such matters is certainly evident when so many members applaud the manner in which big business exercises complete control over the life of the people of this country.

I think the reference he was making to our group had probably to do with our reference to the greatest lumber king in the world today. I am not attacking this man personally, but I just want to give the details of the kind of thing that we object to through the abuse of great powers by such persons. This man has operated under a system which he has exploited to the full. It is to such exploitation of our natural resources that we object. I spent some time looking up "Who's Who in Canada", a book in the library which gave me an outline of the kind of thing that this man was able to do.

He started off in 1911 as assistant director of the forestry branch of the old Department of the Interior, Ottawa. He discovered where Canada's forest resources lay. In 1912 he got himself appointed, through some political pull, I suppose, chief forester of the province of British Columbia, which is noted for its vast forest wealth.

Mr. MERRITT: Perhaps through his ability.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Perhaps through his ability, yes. In that position he made a survey of the timber resources of that province. He came back to Ottawa in 1915 as special timber trade commissioner and he made a trip around the world and visited practically every continent. This was a most important trip for him in view of the fact that later on he went into business for himself and through large shipping firms exported lumber to those very countries.

In 1916 and 1917 he was sales manager for the Victoria Lumber Manufacturing Company. From 1917 to 1919 he came back as assistant director of the imperial munitions board. Then a most significant thing happened after the war. He went back to British Columbia and he framed the timber royalty act of that province. Remember you are dealing with natural resources which belong to all the people. We believe that these resources are the birthright of the Canadian people and that they should be developed for their use and not be given away so that one individual can make tremendous profits for himself. We believe that if the Canadian people need lumber with which to build houses they should be able to get that lumber to build houses and that no individual should be given power over these resources to export them to the markets of the world and make himself a multi-millionaire. I understand that this firm paid $400 million for timber rights on Vancouver Island, the leases of which had been formerly held by John D. Rockefeller, Junior. He started to expand from then on until his ships sailed the seven seas to every continent of the world. He became head of his own export company, president of British Columbia Packers, president of Alberni Plywoods, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, a director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, a director of the Dominion Power and Chemical Company, a director of Forest Investment Company and of International Nickel, president of London and Western Trusts, president of British Columbia Plywoods, president of the Canadian Transport Company, president of the Canadian White Pine Company, president of the Alberni Pacific Transport Company and a member of the Canadian advisory board of the Sun Life Assurance Company.

With his knowledge of lumber he performed valuable service to this government as timber controller in 1940, and later as chairman of the wartime requirements board. After apparently some misunderstanding with the minister, he was later made president of wartime merchant shipping and, I believe, gave valuable service to Canada in his capacity as a manager in building ships for Canada.

We in this group do not consider, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni insinuated, that just because a man has amassed wealth he is therefore an enemy of the state. But we do believe that the resources of this country should not be available to any person to develop to make himself a multi-millionaire and deny in the development of those resources the very things that are essential to the Canadian people in building houses. Housing is more than a roof over one's head. It has sociological values. Bad housing is a cause of crime. But these people have taken the natural resources which belong to the Canadian people and exploited them to their own advantage. They were not thinking of the Canadian people.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): How is the standard of living in British Columbia? Pretty good, is it not?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Pretty fair. I am thinking of the power and control which this man has over the timber industry and of what is being done to restore those resources to the Canadian people. In other words—

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): You do not know a thing about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then there are two who do not know a thing about it, so you are square.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If hon. members wish to ask questions they must address the Chair.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would ask the minister how priorities are arranged and what quotas timber producers in British Columbia are allowed to export. How do you arrive at the portion of their cut which they are permitted to export? Is it on a quota basis? Is it given to those people who have the facilities for export and have contacts in other countries? What is done about the little fellow who is doing a small timber cutting job on the side of a mountain where perhaps there is not a vast forest?

Mr. HOWE: The answer is very simple. The little man has exactly the same chance to export as the big man. He is entitled to export sixty per cent of his total cut, provided that he places the other forty per cent on the market. I think practically all timber men big and small, take advantage of their export cut. The figures would seem to indicate that.

I should like to say a few words about the speech made tonight by the hon. member for Yorkton, because it was indicative of the attitude of the group to which my hon. friend belongs. He sees nothing in the career of H. R. MacMillan except that he has made money for himself. But that was purely incidental. Two of the greatest builders that this country ever saw died bankrupt, but they left a great trail in this country. I refer to Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann. Trace the careers of these two men across the country and you will see the great contribution they made to the wealth of the country today. You will see the same in H. R. MacMillan. There was no great timber industry in British Columbia when he started his operations there. He has contributed greatly to the wealth of British Columbia and to the well-being of its people, and he has contributed to the wealth of Canada by creating markets abroad for its natural resources. When my hon. friend says that Mr. MacMillan has done nothing to replace those forests, he is totally ignorant on that point. Anyone who speaks on the subject should take the opportunity to inform himself to some extent. I sincerely hope that a man of his age will take a little broader view of this dominion of ours and of what makes it grow, and give some credit to men who have shown the energy and the resourcefulness of the man to whom he referred and speak of them with some respect.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The reference I made was to the fact that the Canadian people are short of lumber and that if this lumber is used it should be used for the benefit of the Canadian people more than for the benefit of one particular individual who has apparently worked his way up under the system under which we live. But apparently the Canadian people believe in that system and he has exploited it to the full. That is the only thing in which we differ.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is not often that I rise in this house to answer statements made by a member in any section of it, but the hon. member who has just sat down made some references to this man without mentioning his name and suggested that by some political connivance he had got a job with the British Columbia government some thirty or thirty-five years ago. I should like to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to withdraw that imputation before I make further comment. If any young man trained in forestry ever deserved the job that was given to him as chief forester of British Columbia it was this man to whom the hon. member for Yorkton has made such disparaging reference tonight. There was absolutely no political connivance in it at all. He was a young man who got through college largely on his own initiative, and for two years thereafter he had to fight for his life against serious illness. It was because of his capacity that he got that position. He knew no one in and had no influence with the British Columbia government or with anyone else in British Columbia at that time. I think the hon. member should withdraw his references to this man's appointment as chief forester a third of a century ago, because I know they are without foundation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was stating the record of the man. He was, first of all, an employee here in Ottawa. I said I did not know how he got the appointment in British Columbia. I said that I was not attacking the man personally but was citing him as an example of the type of thing that can happen under the system we have.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Thank heaven.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You must keep quiet until I get through. You are the fellow who started this with the remarks you made. I said that I was not attacking this man but that he was a man who had exploited to the full the system under which we live.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member suggested that, by some political connivance, he got this job in British Columbia.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: That was the impression left with the committee.

Mr. GREEN: It is not very often that I get up to agree with the minister of reconstruction. As a member from British Columbia who has been here for quite a few years I should like to say that I agree with his remarks with regard to the statements made this evening about Mr. H. R. MacMillan. The hon. member for Yorkton has made statements which were without foundation and which were most unfair to any Canadian, poor or rich. I suggest to hon. members of the committee that it does very little credit to parliament to have statements of that kind made on the floor of the house.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to know the statements I made to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member knows what they were.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I took them exactly from "Who's Who", and the hon. member can read them himself. What were the statements I made that were not correct?

Mr. BRACKEN: I pointed out one.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I withdrew that. In my speech I said I did not know whether he had got the appointment through political influence. He did get the position and I admitted it may have been through his ability.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the only point to which I referred. I am glad to see that the hon. member has withdrawn any imputation such as that left with the committee in the early part of his remarks.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Seeing that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni brought me into the debate this afternoon, I should like to say a few words on this matter. The sweet reasonableness of the logging companies has been apparent only in the last few years of high prices. Prior to the war, there were such institutions as Black's logging agency and Black's black list.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The hon member would be on it.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes, I would be on it.

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist that all remarks must be directed to the Chairman and not to hon. members. Hon. members must not interrupt without the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply talked about the fact that reforestation was taking place on a reasonable basis alongside the cut in British Columbia. Seemingly the British Columbia government did not think so, because at the last session of the legislature they put through a bill conserving the timber resources and developing certain laws for reforestation. Therefore, in making the statement the minister must have been basing it on what has taken place in the last three or four months, because, prior to that time, the cut had been going on at a far greater rate than reforestation had been filling in the gap; otherwise I am quite certain that the provincial government would not have been driven to the necessity of enacting laws to see that reforestation would take place.

Mr. TIMMINS: I understand that control has been lifted from wooden containers and wooden boxes. How does that fit in with the picture of control? Is it the intention of the timber controller or of the department to decontrol certain features of the industry from time to time?

Mr. HOWE: I thought we had been trying to explain in the last eight weeks that we were in the process of orderly decontrol. Boxes are an end product of the lumber industry. The purposes of control is to control the end products first and the basic product last. I think it is quite logical to start the decontrol of lumber by beginning with boxes.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not think it is fair for hon. members to make personal remarks across the floor. Some of the argument that took place here this afternoon may have been unfortunate. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made a slighting remark to the hon. member for Yorkton. I believe the remark was that, had the hon. member for Yorkton as much ambition as somebody else who was taking part in the discussion at that time, he might have been a better man. I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that I have known the hon. member for Yorkton for a great many years. In his capacity as principal of a school and, before that, as a teacher, no man has given more of his time and energy to the young people of our province than he. He has studied and worked in the interest of his fellow teachers and citizens. He may not have been as financially successful as the hon. gentleman who took part in the discussion.

Another thing that is sometimes unfortunately bandied back and forth is the intimation that nobody over here has any knowledge of the lumber industry. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman from British Columbia, or to hon. gentlemen from any part of the house that, while they may know some things about the logging industry that I do not, the sum total of my knowledge of that industry is as great as that of anybody else in this committee. It may be that I know some things that they do not.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Oh, oh.

Mr. BENTLEY: If the hon. member does not believe me let me tell him that, as old as I am, I shall follow him anywhere on loose timber in white water right now.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): There is no white water in British Columbia.

Mr. BENTLEY: I doubt whether the hon. member has ever worked under the tough conditions that I have worked. Statements of the kind which are made here should not be made. Since the hon. member for Yorkton has withdrawn any slight imputation he may have made regarding the person that so many people here want to defend, I consider it only fair that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni should indicate that he agrees the hon. member for Yorkton is at least as ambitious and as good a man as any other man in the house.

P.C. 1997 agreed to.

Mr. FLEMING: May I say a word about these next two orders P.C. 1665 and P.C. 469? Actually they were passed in the committee on Thursday last. I have drawn to the attention of the minister a clause in these two orders which does not fit the facts, and I would ask leave of the committee to reopen these two orders for the purpose of introducing correcting amendments which the minister has in hand.

May I just in a word mention the point involved in the two orders? These are orders dealing with the administration of property of persons of the Japanese race by the custodian of enemy property. Section 3 of the first order, P.C. 1665, reads as follows:

For the purposes of the control and management of such property by the custodian, the consolidated regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1939), shall apply mutatis mutandis to the same extent as if the property belonged to an enemy within the meaning of the said consolidated regulations (as amended by P.C. 2483, March 27, 1942).

A similar provision appears in order P.C. 469:

. . . and for the purpose of such liquidation, sale or other disposition the consolidated regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1939) shall apply mutatis mutandis as if the property belonged to an enemy within the meaning of the said consolidated regulations.

Actually these consolidated regulations of 1939 were superseded completely by new regulations in 1943, many of which were revoked in January of this year. It will be necessary to make changes in the wording to take account of the changes made in the consolidated regulations. I have discussed this matter with the minister, Mr. Chairman, and I believe he has an amendment prepared along these lines.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the unanimous consent of the committee, we shall return to these items. I should like to move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 1665 of 4th March, 1942, as amended:

"Section 12 (3) is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

'12(3) For the purposes of the control and management of such property by the custodian the revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1943) or any act or regulation which may be substituted therefor, shall apply mutatis mutandis to the same extent as if the property belonged to an enemy within the meaning of the said revised regulations, act or regulation'."

Amendment agreed to.

P.C. 1665 as amended agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "Amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 469 of 19th January, 1943, as amended:

[Mr. Fleming.]

"All the words after the semicolon in the final paragraph of P.C. 469 are deleted and the following substituted therefor:
'and for the purpose of such liquidation, sale or other disposition, the revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1943) or any act or regulation which may be substituted therefor, shall apply mutatis mutandis as if the property belonged to an enemy within the meaning of the said revised regulations, act or regulation'."

Amendment agreed to.

P.C. 469 as amended agreed to.

On P.C. 133/510.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to say a few words on this order in council. There are two orders in council, P.C. 133/510 and P.C. 3396, dealing with merchant seamen, and I take it that we can discuss them both at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the committee agree? The committee agrees to discuss both orders in council at the same time.

Mr. BROOKS: At this late hour it would perhaps not be right to make any extensive remarks, but we all recognize the great importance of the merchant seamen and the magnificent service they gave during the war. They were called, I believe, the fourth branch of the service, and rightly so. It is pretty hard to estimate just what the people of the country owe to these men, but we get some idea when we realize that there were over 1,200 casualties among the merchant seamen during the war—over 600 fatal casualties. As a matter of fact, it has been estimated that the casualties were heavier among the merchant seamen than they were in any other branch of the services for the numbers engaged in that work. Of 185,000 men engaged in the merchant marine of Great Britain, there were 38,000 fatal casualties. I say this in order to give some idea of the great risk, and the great sacrifice which was made by these men.

Enlistments in the merchant marine were, as we know, of young men and old men. Many of them were young men who had been turned down for service in the other branches, and the others were older men who were too old to serve in those branches. In our veterans affairs committee last year the services of these men were partly recognized, in that they were included in the Pension Act for disabilities during their service. However we understood then—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, and I would be the last to attempt to stop him from discussing benefits or establishments of any kind to which merchant seamen are entitled. But I understand, from the ruling of the Chairman, already given, that the discussion should be centred around one or the other of these orders in council. The first one has to do with compensation for merchant seamen, for the loss of their effects; the other has reference to out-of-work benefits, and I presume my hon. friend wants to discuss benefits other than those to which merchant seamen might be entitled. My suggestion is that that is not in order.

Mr. BROOKS: I was discussing out-of-work benefits. There is one thing we have recognized, I believe, through all these orders in council, namely, that we have not been confined to the absolute wording of the order in council. There has been considerable leeway, and I contend that in discussing benefits in connection with the merchant seamen, and out-of-work allowances, we can give expression to what we consider are benefits that should have been extended to these men.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is clearly out of order. My hon. friend must realize that he is talking about a different kind of benefit entirely. He is apparently going to advocate gratuities or something like that, which would come under veterans legislation or civil service legislation, whereas we are talking about compensation to seamen, war damage to their effects, and that does not open the door to a broad discussion of the problems of merchant seamen. If we do not get down to business some time this session we shall never get anywhere.

Mr. BROOKS: We spent most of the evening in discussing H. R. MacMillan, and I consider a discussion of this kind with reference to merchant seamen is more important than the discussion of an individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may have been so, and perhaps we should have taken exception then, but I am appealing to the sense of responsibility on the part of members and for a little bit of respect for the rules. This is so far afield that it is not at all arguable that it is in order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And there will be several opportunities again to discuss it.

Mr. GREEN: On the point of order raised by the two ministers, these two orders in council dealing with pension allowances to merchant seamen—

Mr. CHEVRIER: They do not deal with that at all. Read them.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not deal with that.

Mr. GREEN: In effect, it is war payments to merchant seamen. These men do not come under veterans legislation, unfortunately. I wish they did, and they certainly should have done, but I submit to Your Honour that we are entirely in order in going over the allowances paid to the merchant seamen. Certainly that is covered under P.C. 3396, and I am surprised that the Minister of Transport should try to curtail discussion on this subject at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: I think there has been too much latitude during the last few days in connection with the orders that were being considered, and it has been done only with the unanimous consent of the committee. We have not unanimous consent any longer. The committee feels that we should discuss the orders in council according to the rules. I have not the rule before me, but my recollection of the wording is that all discussion in committee must be directly relevant to the item under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Veterans Affairs reminds me that the rule is 58, subsection 2, and in view of the fact that there is not unanimous consent to a wider discussion under the provisions of the order in council before the committee, I must ask hon. members to make their remarks directly relevant to the order under consideration.

Mr. BROOKS: Under P.C. 133/510 this is for compensation to fishermen and personnel of the Canadian merchant navy for loss of effects during enemy action or counter action. Section 8 at page 159 of the office consolidation of the orders in council states that until the appropriate department otherwise directs, no compensation shall be payable under these regulations in respect of any claim which has not been made within one year after a war damage has been incurred. The date of this first regulation was in 1944, and there were many merchant seamen who had suffered damage and who lost their effects before that year. I should like to know from the minister just what if anything has been done to compensate these men for the loss of their equipment before that date, and why it says a year from the date of loss. I know that when we were discussing this matter in the veterans affairs committee it was considered that these men might perhaps be away from home for long periods and that it would be impossible for them to enter their claim. In view of the fact that this order in council was passed in 1944. would any provision be made for these many thousands of men who lost their equipment and personal effects through enemy action prior to that date?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will try to get the information for the hon. gentleman in a moment, but I can give him the number of claims that have been made under the order in council, which has been extended, as he knows, and which it is hoped to bring to a conclusion by the end of July of this year.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to contribute a few remarks to the discussion of these orders in council, especially P.C. 4306 dealing with the shortage of trained personnel in the merchant marine, and therefore the sending out of ships under circumstances where their trained personnel are not as qualified as they normally would be; and also with P.C. 3396, which deals with unemployment benefits to seamen, which are benefits, of course, mainly to non-technical personnel. The lack of a proper Canadian merchant marine in the past causes the shortage of trained personnel at the present time. The out-of-work and unemployment benefits are a direct result of large numbers entering the merchant marine during the war, of course through necessity; and now, because of the policy of the government of disbanding that merchant marine which we built up during the war we find that we have large numbers of sailors on the beach. I have had communications from the marine council of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and also from the seafarers international union of North America complaining of this fact. For example, the trend at the present time is to sell the whole of what was formerly the Canadian merchant marine to foreign interests; whether it be to British interests or others, it does not matter. In fact, they could be sold to Canadian interests. But what is happening is that the ships are being put under Panamanian registry, a country which has no maritime laws. Therefore crews can be hired under any conditions whatsoever and our Canadian seamen can be left on the beach. That is what is happening at the present time. What the seamen are interested in at the moment is this: Is the government going to bring down amendments to the Canada Shipping Act at the present time, and is the government going to stop the importation of foreign crews to man boats going out of Vancouver?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is the hon. member directing his remarks to the first order in council, P.C. 133/510? The Chairman has made a ruling that the discussion is on that order in council. If my hon. friend wants to go all over the field of the merchant marine, I shall be prepared to discuss that when the time comes; but I do not think this is the place to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understood that at the opening of the discussion on the orders in council under the heading "Department of Transport", it was agreed that the four orders would be considered at the same time and passed at the same time. If that is so, the hon. member for Skeena would be in order in discussing P.C. 4306 and P.C. 3396, which I understand he is now doing.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The fact that these orders in council are put through shows that there is a shortage of trained technical personnel. If there was a decent merchant marine policy, you would not have these orders in council. Granted you would have the unemployment benefits, but they would not be needed with the heavy amount of shipping that is going out of our ports at the present time if we had a Canadian merchant marine. Are we to be faced once again with a crisis where we have to call in experts of foreign nations to take over the job of officering our ships in another crisis? That is what will happen owing to the lack of foresight of the government at the present time unless something is done. I should be pleased now to hear if the government is considering bringing down amendments to the Canada Shipping Act at the present time, to protect seamen from this policy.

Let me give an illustration of what is happening. A ship will be taken out of the port of Seattle and towed up to the port of Vancouver to be overhauled. It will be manned with a United States crew to bring it up to Vancouver. Then a Chinese crew will be imported to put on board that ship in the port of Vancouver, because that cannot be done in Seattle. Canadian seamen are thinking of picketing these ships. You are going to have labour trouble about this. Can we expect any help from the government in protecting our Canadian seamen on jobs which should be their own?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I fail to see how the question which my hon. friend asks has anything to do with any of the orders in council which are under discussion. However, in case he may think that I do not want to answer the questions which he asks, I may tell him that amendments to the Canada Shipping Act are matters which cannot be disposed of in a short time. There are some eight hundred sections to the Canada Shipping Act. In my estimation not only one but many amendments are required. I have asked a group of officers of my department to look into the question of amending the act. So far as I can see at the moment, I do not think it will be possible to bring down amendments to the Canada Shipping Act at this session. However I hope that at the next session of parliament it will be possible to make amendments to the act which will perhaps not meet the situation which my hon. friend speaks of but which will have in mind a number of complaints which have been made against the operation of that act, and to make a number of amendments which I think are justified.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to thank the minister for his answer, because any improvement in the present situation will be beneficial. I recognize that it takes time to overhaul this act. In fact, when it was put through in 1934 the present Minister of Veterans Affairs and the present Minister of Labour objected to the speedy way in which this was done. I am glad that the department is taking plenty of time to go over it. I hope that it will bear with the representations made by labour and put in many of the points which labour is asking for at the present time, and which are incorporated in the laws of many of the modern seagoing nations.

On P.C. 9781.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was asked for some information about this, by the hon. member for Calgary East. He asked that the matter stand. The specific question asked is whether heater treaters are covered by the provision for free entry. I have made inquiry and I find that they are not, because they are regarded as machinery connected with the processing or refining of the oil rather than the mining of it. The hon. gentleman said that if they were not covered he thought he should move an amendment. This is a revenue matter. It is a tariff item; I submit that it is not competent for a private member to move an amendment, and I would submit that this is not the place to move an amendment putting an item on the free list of the customs tariff.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is the minister himself prepared to insert those words in this particular clause?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It cannot be done unless it is preceded by a resolution approved by His Excellency the Governor General. I would not be prepared to do it anyway, because of the object of the item. The item was to encourage mining rather than refining or processing; it is to encourage the drilling rather than the refining or the processing after the oil is brought up. This process here, I am told, is not directly connected with drilling.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to point out to the minister that this is not a refining process. This particular piece of apparatus might really be considered as an extension to the piece of pipe which brings the oil up from the ground. The apparatus simply separates from that oil the sand and water found in it, enabling the oil to be shipped, particularly in the winter time. As I understand it, if this oil is put in tanks to be shipped during cold weather there is a freezing of the water contained in the oil, and consequently there is great difficulty in getting the oil out of the railway tank cars or other containers, with the likelihood of damage. As a result, the oil cannot be made use of in the winter time particularly, unless it is treated in this manner. So I do not think this should be looked upon as a refining process.

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably I should not have said "refining"; I used the wrong word. The correspondence with the Department of National Revenue contains statements like this:

> This apparatus has nothing at all to do with the well but is apparatus for taking the water out of the oil after it leaves the well.

That had not been the original purpose of the item at all. In any event, I do not think this is the place to make an amendment to the item. As I say, it would have to be preceded by a resolution, and dealt with in a different way.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I be allowed to answer a question asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Royal, for which I did not have the information available at the time. He wanted to know what provision was being made in connection with claims made prior to 1944 for compensation for the effects of seamen lost at sea. The order in council covers all claims prior to 1944, and, as far as the department knows, no seaman has suffered any loss because he incurred it prior to 1944.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to ask the minister one question; I intended to make some remarks on the subject, but somebody called "carried" and I allowed it to go. The minister will recall that last year my late colleague brought to his attention the question of a certain number of pilots who lost their lives off Halifax harbour. As I recall it, there were some eight in number, and I was wondering whether their claims had been settled. I believe this comes directly under this order in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that it was a marine risk and not a risk covered by any enemy action as set out in the order in council.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is now considering P.C. 9781. Does this order in council carry?

Mr. HARKNESS: No, Mr. Chairman. I am quite prepared to accept the statement by the minister that this is not the proper place to have this particular piece of apparatus dealt with under this provision. However I should appreciate it very much if the minister would indicate when the matter might properly be considered, so that I may take it up at the poper time and see whether some more liberal, broader interpretation cannot be made as far as this order in council is concerned or, otherwise, to have this apparatus included in the regular tariff item.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood from the budget speech tonight that tariff changes were not to be proposed this year. That being the case, it may be difficult to find an opportunity for the hon. gentleman to bring up the matter, other than to advocate it in a speech on the budget or something of that kind. Certainly it is a budget matter. It is just a matter of trying to persuade the Minister of Finance, I suppose, that he should take the duty off this particular piece of apparatus.

Mr. GREEN: How does one do that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not taking any position on the matter, one way or the other; I am saying that, from the point of view of those who framed the order, they did not have anything like this in mind. The item was designed to assist in the production of petroleum, and the basis was an item relating to the production of petroleum. It does not cover apparatus which deals with the petroleum after it is removed from the ground.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the Minister of Finance was able to get the information for which the hon. member for Kindersley asked when this item was up previously. Unfortunately the hon. member is away, or perhaps I should say fortunately; he is on the trip to Lake Success.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have reams of it here, which will take quite a long time to read. A number of questions were asked which were very difficult to answer. Is it necessary that I put it on Hansard? Can I not send it to the hon. gentleman? Did he have any purpose in mind in wanting a record made of it?

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Kindersley was interested in a little history in connection with this matter. He was also interested in learning whether something could be done to restore the order in council to the way in which it read in the first part, so that it would not discriminate against material used in water wells. My colleague comes from a part of the country where they are interested in that kind of material.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know, but I just have to make the same answer I gave the hon. member for Calgary East. We cannot just spread out from this item in every direction and put on the free list everything we think it would be nice to have on the free list. This was an item to encourage the production of petroleum; it was recommended by a production advisory committee in Alberta, who never had water wells or water equipment in mind at all. It got in there by accident or mistake, somehow or another, and then was taken out; it never had any place there. It is just another tariff matter, as to whether we want to put equipment for producing water on the free list. It is not something to be brought in collaterally in this way.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then may I ask just two questions. First, was consideration given since April 18 to the point raised by the hon. member for Kindersley, namely restoring the order in council to its former status; and second, is the information the minister has in his hand such that he could furnish it to the hon. member for Kindersley?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I can furnish it all to the hon. member for Kindersley. There is one question we cannot answer. It is:

By whom were the importations made, and is the material imported duty free available in Canada from Canadian manufacturers?

The answer is:

It is not customary to disclose the names of individual importers and, furthermore, to do so would involve a long search through the files of customs entries. Since the imports under this item were not limited to "class or kind not made in Canada," it is probable that some of the imported material would be available in Canada from Canadian manufacturers.

I will send the whole thing to the hon. member for Kindersley.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, if he wishes to raise the matter later on he may do so?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

P.C. 9781 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. FLEMING: There is one matter I should like to speak to, and I can do so in the space of two minutes if I may proceed now. It is in relation to the schedule generally. We have just completed a review of a schedule which embodies 163 pages of fine print; yet if the bill is enacted in its present form, or with the schedule in its present form, it will appear as a bill about four pages in length. I submit that the schedule to the bill should contain the text in full of the orders as amended which are now to receive statutory effect. All that we have in the present schedule is a reference to these orders by number, date and name. I submit that the text of the orders ought to appear in the schedule to the bill itself.

My reasons are briefly these: First of all, there must be an official text of these orders which now receive the force and effect of statute. At present that is not to be found in the statute itself; one must refer to the original orders which are on file in the privy council office. I submit that that is not the proper form in which this parliament should legislate.

In the second place, there is a distinct gap in the statute books. People who wish to know the statute law of this country are entitled to find it in the statute books, and they will not be able to do so if this schedule is passed in its present form. Here is a whole volume which will be missing from the statute books if the schedule does not contain the full text of the orders. It may be that power is reserved to revoke certain orders, but I submit that when these orders become the statute law of the land they should appear in full in the schedule. Therefore, without further elaboration of the point, which I suggest is self-evident, I move:

That the schedule to Bill No. 104 as amended be further amended by printing therein the text in full of the orders in council numbered in the first column, as amended by those numbered in the fourth column in the said schedule.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry; I cannot accept that amendment.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 30, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Pinard be substituted for that of Mr. Blanchette on the special committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

That the name of Mr. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval) be substituted for that of Mr. LaCroix on the special committee on railways and shipping.

Motion agreed to.

DAIRY PRODUCTS AND EGGS

DISCONTINUANCE OF BUTTER AND MILK SUBSIDIES—ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PRICES

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I stated to the house some days ago that I would be prepared to make an announcement with regard to the return on dairy products to go into effect immediately.

In view of the fact that subsidies on butterfat used in the manufacture of creamery butter and on milk used in the manufacture of cheddar cheese will be discontinued as of tonight and that certain production costs, notably of feeds, have increased, I wish to announce at this time certain arrangements that have been made that will affect returns to producers with respect to butter, cheese, evaporated milk, and eggs.

Butter.—With the concurrence of the Minister of Finance I am authorized to state that the wartime prices and trade board have increased the ceiling price on butter by ten cents per pound effective May 1st, 1947.

From January 1st, 1944, to date, the subsidy paid by the dominion government to producers of milk for the manufacture of creamery butter has been on the basis of ten cents per pound butterfat, equivalent to 8½ cents per pound of butter. The new ceiling therefore not only compensates for discontinuance of this subsidy but also provides an extra 1½ cents per pound of butter.

Another factor influencing returns to many producers of milk for butter production is an agreement recently negotiated with the British Ministry of Food for the sale of at least eight million pounds of roller skim milk powder, at a price of 13½ cents per pound.

It was announced some time ago that in the event of an increase in the ceiling price of butter action would be taken to capture the increased inventory value of stocks of butter held at the time the ceiling was changed. This action is being taken by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited.

Cheese.—The cheese agreement with the Ministry of Food covering the production year beginning April 1st, 1947, has been amended to incorporate the following prices for export cheese delivered F.O.B. factory shipping point or grading station shipping point: First grade, 25 cents per pound; Second grade, 24½ cents per pound; Third grade, 24 cents per pound.

This new price of 25 cents per pound for first grade cheese compares with 23·3 cents per pound which the Ministry of Food had previously agreed to pay.

The returns from the 25-cent price provided under this amended 1947-48 contract represent an increase of 1·7 cents per pound of cheese above those available in the 1946-47 contract year from the 20 cents per pound price for cheese plus the subsidy of thirty cents per hundred pounds of milk used in the manufacture of cheddar cheese.

Evaporated Milk.—It will be recalled that the subsidy paid by the dominion government on milk used in the manufacture of evaporated milk was discontinued as of September 30, 1946. Effective October 1, the wartime prices and trade board authorized an increase in the ceiling price of evaporated milk sold in Canada so that returns to producers would not be disturbed as a result of the discontinuance of the subsidy. The pack of milk (600,000 cases) for the Ministry of Food under the 1946-47 contract had already been completed by that date.

With respect to the 1947-48 contract, the Ministry of Food has already agreed to purchase 600,000 cases of evaporated milk in the production year beginning April 1, 1947, at a price of $5.25 per case, basis f.o.b. ocean steamers Montreal, Vancouver or New Westminster or, in the event of shipment through some other port, f.o.r. the ports mentioned. This would give producers the same returns for milk as they received in the 1946-47 contract year, when the dominion government paid a subsidy on milk used for this purpose.

In view of the higher returns that have now been provided for cheese and other dairy products, negotiations are now being carried on with a view to amending the 1947-48 contract for evaporated milk at a price to be mutually agreed upon which will keep returns to producers of milk for this purpose in proper relationship with returns for other dairy products.

Eggs.—Prices for eggs under the British contract are to be advanced by 1½ cents per dozen effective with eggs purchased or contracted for by the special products board on and after May 5, 1947. An additional increase of 1½ cents per dozen will be effective on fresh eggs purchased under the British contract for export in the shell during the months of September, 1947, to January, 1948, inclusive.

These adjustments have been concurred in by the Ministry of Food in order that egg production, and supplies to Britain, will not be curtailed as a result of recent advances in poultry feed costs or of further advances in feed prices which may occur when subsidies on grains are removed.

Whether or not these adjustments will compensate in full for increases in feed prices which have taken place or may take place in the future, the British have made it clear that this is the limit to which they can go under the present contract, which expires on January 31, 1949. It is our opinion that if producers desire stabilization of prices based on contracts with the United Kingdom they should not expect variations in contract prices following every change in costs.

Prior to the latest adjustments, egg prices under the present contract were 1½ cents per dozen higher than in 1946 for the period of February to August, inclusive, and 2½ cents per dozen higher than in 1946 for fresh eggs exported during the period September to January, inclusive. With the present increases, prices from May 5 to the end of August will be 3 cents per dozen higher than in 1946, and fresh export eggs in the September to January period will be 5½ cents above 1946.

The immediate increase of 1½ cents per dozen will, as already stated, be effective with purchases of eggs from suppliers by the special products board as from May 5. The Ministry of Food have stressed their expectation that the full amount of this increase will be reflected immediately to producers for all eggs delivered at registered egg grading stations for carlot shipment to the special products board.

Mr. ISNOR: Why were not the two eastern Canadian ports, Halifax and Saint John, included in this agreement as shipping points?

Mr. GARDINER: These two products are mostly delivered to the British government at the points mentioned. The points mentioned are the basis of the agreement. Some of the products are shipped from Saint John and Halifax. The terms given here dealing with these products apply at the maritime ports.

Mr. HACKETT: Is not the difference between the cost of transportation to seaboard added if the goods go to Halifax? I refer particularly to the long train haul.

Mr. GARDINER: It depends on where the product originates. Some originate in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I express my appreciation to the minister for the statement he has made? At last the Fraser valley has partly come into its own.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

REFERENCE OF CONSTITUTION AND RELATED DOCUMENTS TO EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to table contents of the constitution of the international refugee organization and related documents, among others the agreement on interim measures. This constitution and agreement are the result of lengthy discussion in the united nations concerning the international problem of refugees and displaced persons. Canada, represented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) signed both the constitution of the I.R.O. and the agreement on interim measures on December 15, 1946, immediately following the adoption of the resolution by the general assembly. As a matter of fact Canada was the first state to sign both these documents. The constitution and the agreement on interim measures have now been signed by thirteen states, only two of which, the United Kingdom and New Zealand, have signed without reservations as to subsequent legislative acceptance. The constitution will come into force when it is signed and ratified by at least fifteen states, whose combined total contributions would equal 75 per cent of the proposed budget.

The agreement on interim measures, which establishes a preparatory commission of the I.R.O., came into force when it was signed by eight states who had also signed the constitution. Unlike the constitution, it does not require parliamentary ratification in addition to signature. The preparatory commission, which has already met once in Geneva, will meet again in Lausanne on May 1, and the Canadian representative will be Mr. Jean Désy, Canadian ambassador, Brazil.

In view of the urgent necessity of establishing the I.R.O. as soon as possible, I shall shortly introduce a resolution in this house proposing ratification of the constitution by parliament. At that time, when hon. members have had an opportunity of studying these documents, I hope to make a more extensive and detailed statement concerning the international refugee organization.

With the unanimous consent of the house I move that this constitution and interim agreement be referred to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether Russia is one of the nations subscribing to this constitution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry to have to say that the answer is a negative one.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON CONSTITUENCY TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I present to the house a petition of Canadian and British subjects residing in the district of Mackenzie in the Northwest Territories of Canada. It is additional to the petition I presented on the twenty-fifth day of this month. The petition prays that the district of Mackenzie be not included with the electoral district of Yukon, and it sets out what seem to me to be very convincing reasons. They say among other things:

That your petitioners prefer to have the representation of Mackenzie district to parliament postponed and to remain for the present without such representation rather than to have the district included with the electoral district of Yukon.

They go on to ask that the words "including the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories" in section 2 of Bill No. 18 be struck out.

BRETTON WOODS

ANNUAL MEETING OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS—BY-LAWS AND REGULATIONS

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report on the operation of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, 1945, statutes of Canada, 1945, chapter 11, section 7, including:

1. First annual meeting of the board of governors, held at Washington, D.C., September 27-October 3, 1946, of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—proceedings and related documents;

2. First annual meeting of the board of governors of the international monetary fund, held at Washington, D.C., November, 1946—report of the executive directors and summary proceedings, September 27-October 3, 1946;

3. By-laws, rules and regulations of the international monetary fund as amended to March 1, 1947.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I wish to move that the second report of the standing committee on public accounts, presented on April 28, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. CAOUETTE

WRONG DATE INDICATED IN THE "PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE"

Mr. REAL CAOUETTE (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to state that, according to the English version of the "Parliamentary Guide" for the current year, I hold in this house a unique record, because it would appear that I was born on September 26, 1937, and that I was married when four days old, that is on September 30, 1937.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is referring to a book which is not considered as a document of this house. Therefore, he cannot avail himself of his privileges as a member to request that a correction be made in that book.

Mr. CAOUETTE: May I at least be permitted to point out that I was born in 1917?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry. I have called the hon. member to order because he cannot avail himself of his rights as a member to make a correction in a book which is not recognized as an official document.

7. What are the locations for 6 (a) and 6 (b)?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to table answers to parts 1, 2 and 3 of this question. As regards parts 4, 5, 6 and 7, the hon. member has been given the information and has agreed to drop them.

1. (a) 3 Command Headquarters and 4 Group Headquarters; (b) None.

2. (a) Central Air Command, Trenton, Ontario; North West Air Command, Edmonton, Alberta; Maintenance Command, Ottawa, Ontario; 9 Transport Group, Rockcliffe, Ontario; 10 Group, Halifax, Nova Scotia; 11 Group, Winnipeg, Manitoba; 12 Group, Vancouver, British Columbia.

Strength (1st March, 1947).		Establishment (1st April, 1947).
460	Central Air Command	227
275	North West Air Command	261
352	Maintenance Command	407
69	9 Transport Group	37
254	10 Group	57
544	11 Group	38

NOTE: The strength at 1st March, 1947 was greater than the establishment because (I) These headquarters were being used as collection points for personnel for the formation of units: (II) Three of the above group headquarters, Halifax, Winnipeg, and Vancouver, were command headquarters on March 1 with, therefore, correspondingly greater strengths than they will have as group headquarters.

4, 5, 6, and 7. I have given the hon. member answers to these questions and he has agreed to drop them as it is not considered to be in the public interest to give detailed information of this kind.

CIVIL SERVICE—HEALTH EXAMINATIONS

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East):

1. What steps have been taken by the civil service health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare for medical examination of civil servants?

2. What civil servants are eligible for such health protection?

3. Are new government employees given a medical examination and what is the nature of such examination?

4. When was this work begun and how is the division organized to do it?

5. Has a survey ever been made on amount of time lost by civil servants due to illness.

6. If so, what were the results of such a survey?

7. How many civil servants have been given chest X-rays and in what cities?

8. What other medical tests have been given civil servants?

9. What has been done by the public health engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare to improve physical working conditions of civil servants?

10. What health clinics for civil servants have been opened and how many more are being planned?

11. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare any programme for providing periodic health examinations for the protection of civil servants?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The nucleus of a clinical centre is now operating in Ottawa. This clinical centre is prepared to do complete examinations of civil servants in this area.

Arrangements are now in effect to (a) Review medical certificates covering loss of time due to illness; (b) Rule on eligibility of casual leave claimed to be due to illness after eight days such leave has been exhausted; (c) Review and approve or reject applications for retirement due to ill health; (d) Conduct medical examinations of civil servants before permanent status is granted, when requested; (e) Conduct medical examinations of temporary civil servants at the time of appointment, on request of the employing department or of the civil service commission; (f) Conduct medical examinations of employees of crown companies and corporations on request of the employing agency.

Wherever the Department of National Health and Welfare has a full time medical staff, such as immigration and quarantine medical service in the port cities, examinations of civil servants are carried out by these medical officers. In other centres examinations are done under arrangements completed with the Department of Veterans Affairs who have country-wide medical facilities.

2. Arrangements under 1 above extend to all civil servants.

3. See 1 (d), (e) and (f) above. These examinations are complete medical examinations.

4. This work has been carried on increasingly since the department of health was first established in 1919. The medical investigation division was established in April, 1939. This division was absorbed in the present civil service health division in March, 1947. The present civil service health division proposes as staff, quarters and funds are available to carry on the activities outlined above in addition to instal "health units" where civil service population warrants and to arrange for periodic health examinations.

5. Yes, from 1935-36 to 1938-39.

6. The 1938-39 survey covered 35,215 employees and disclosed:

Number of persons absent on medical certificate, 9,826 (27·9 per cent).

Total illnesses on medical certificate, 13,397.

Total days lost, 268,357.

Average time lost per employee on medical certificate (more than 3 days), 5·9 days.

Average time lost—casual leave (3 days or less), 1·7 days.

Total average time lost, 7·6 days.

7. From 1944 to 1946 approximately 60,000 civil servants were X-rayed in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. These examinations were arranged by the medical investigation division.

8. A voluntary blood test for syphilis and estimate of haemoglobin has been provided in Ottawa. About 9,500 government employees have availed themselves of this test to date.

9. On request, the public health engineering division makes inspections and reports on government buildings covering population, heating, ventilation, lighting and sanitary facilities and conditions. In its report it recommends measures for improvement where possible.

10. A clinical centre has been opened in Ottawa. Branch clinics are planned for all large centres of civil service population. About ten such branch clinics are anticipated. In Ottawa nine health units have been opened or are in the process of organization. Others will be opened periodically as space requirements and arrangements with government departments permit. It is estimated that about 30 such units will be required adequately to cover the Ottawa area.

11. See 4 above.

RADIO BROADCASTING—CKVI, VERDUN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Who is the holder of the licence to operate CKVI, Verdun, Quebec?

2. Who owns and operates the said station?

3. When was the application by such owner or operator to operate said station granted?

4. Have there been applications since 1944 to operate radio stations in Verdun, other than the one granted? If so, who were such applicants and what reasons were given for refusing each of such applicants a licence?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. J. Tietolman.

2. The licensee.

3. Issue of the licence was authorized by order in council, P.C. 491 of February 15, 1946, and the licence was issued on May 13, 1946.

4. Yes. Messrs. Albert Rolland, Rene Hebert and Rodolphe E. Mackay, jointly. The board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recommended rejection of the application on the grounds that,— "The Board has already recommended that a licence be granted to Mr. J. Tietolman, for a day-time station in Verdun and it is the opinion of the board that two stations could not operate successfully in this area as service is also given by all Montreal stations".

[Mr. Martin.]

RADIO BROADCASTING—"RADIO WORLD"

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Was the Radio World broadcast from Toronto, on April 18, at which Premier Drew, Mr. Dunton and others spoke a commercial broadcast? If so, how much was paid therefor and by whom?

2. Have there been previous broadcasts sponsored by Radio World over the C.B.C.? If so, when, and how much was paid for each?

3. Have the private stations, whose facilities were used been paid in respect of such broadcasts?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes. The total charge to the sponsor, Radio World magazine was $1,378.20.

2. Yes. Since December, 1945, programmes sponsored by Radio World have been broadcast on C.B.C. stations regularly each Monday until April 1, 1946, and since then on alternate Mondays. These have been charged for at the regular published card rates of the stations.

3. No facilities of private stations have been used in connection with broadcasts referred to in (2). In connection with the broadcast referred to in (1) private stations are paid at usual rates.

CONTRACT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF S.S. "PRINCE RUPERT"

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Were tenders called or bids asked for within the last two years for the construction of a ship to be called the Prince Rupert, or other name, stating tonnage?

2. What firms from (a) eastern Canada; (b) western Canada were asked to tender and submitted bids, stating the amounts and date of delivery?

3. To whom was contract let, stating price and date of delivery?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This question has to do with tenders or bids asked for by the Canadian National Railways for the purchase of a steamer on the west coast. Part of the question asks for the amount of these bids. While there can be no objection to other parts of the question, there is to quoting prices. The Canadian National Railways have always followed the practice of not giving the amount of the bid, and with that reservation I answer the question.

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Tenders were called on May 16, 1946, for the construction of a new passenger and freight vessel for the Canadian National Pacific coast services. The proposed ship will replace the S.S. Prince George which was destroyed by fire and will be of approximately 5,700 gross tons.

2. The following firms were asked to tender:
Eastern Canada

Canadian Vickers Limited, Montreal, Quebec; Davie Shipbuilding & Repairing Co., Lauzon, Quebec; Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec; St. John Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Co., Saint John, N.B.; Halifax Shipyards Limited, Halifax, N.S.
British Columbia

Burrard Dry Dock Co., Limited, North Vancouver, B.C.; Pacific Dry Dock Co., Limited, North Vancouver, B.C.; West Coast Shipbuilders Limited, Vancouver, B.C.; Victoria Machinery Depot Company Ltd., Victoria, B.C.; Yarrows Limited, Victoria, B.C.

Great Britain

Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd., Birkenhead; Swan, Hunter & Wigham Richardson, Wallsend-on-Tyne; Harland & Wolff Limited. Belfast.

Quotations were received from the following with delivery dates as indicated—Halifax Shipyards Limited, probably September-December, 1948; Yarrows Limited, January 31, 1948; Victoria Machinery Depot Co., Ltd., probably June, 1948; Davie Shipbuilding & Repairing Co., Ltd., August 1, 1948; Cammell Laird & Co. Ltd., probably August, 1948.

3. Contract was awarded in September 1946 to Yarrows Limited with a delivery date of January 31, 1948. It is not the practice of the Canadian National Railways to release information on prices quoted in competitive tenders.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think we should have the entire answer to the question. There is complaint in the maritime provinces that they were not given the contract although the prices were several hundred thousand dollars below the price at which the contract was let. The house should have the answer.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that is not correct. The contract went to the lowest tenderer, which in this case happened to be Yarrows Limited.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister has given only partial information and I think we are entitled to full information. If the contract was let at the lower price we should have the price.

WESTERN CENSUS—CONSTITUENCY OF WINNIPEG NORTH

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. What was the name of the census commissioner in the federal constituency in Winnipeg North responsible for the 1946 quinquennial census?

2. What pay or emolument and expenses did he receive?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Peter Taraska, 325 Mountain Avenue, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

2. Special allowance, $375; expenses, $7.04; emoluments, $1,019; total, $1,401.04.

FOOD COMMODITIES—PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

Mr. McCUAIG:

IGOR GOUZENKO

Mr. McCUAIG:

Did the government receive any information from the government of the U.S.S.R. charging Mr. Igor Gouzenko with embezzlement of embassy funds, before August 31, 1945?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE—WESTERN POINTS

Mr. IRVINE:

By what route and by what railways is mail carried to (a) Calgary, Alberta; (b) Winnipeg, Manitoba, from (i) Prince Rupert; (ii) Prince George, British Columbia?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

(a) Calgary, Alberta:

Canadian National Railways from (i) Prince Rupert, B.C., and (ii) Prince George, B.C., to Edmonton, Alberta.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Canadian Pacific Railway from Edmonton to Calgary, Alberta.

(b) Winnipeg, Manitoba:

Canadian National Railways from (i) Prince Rupert, B.C., and (ii) Prince George, B.C., to Winnipeg, Manitoba.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ARMED FORCES—AWARDS

Mr. PEARKES:

1. How many foreign awards have been granted to personnel of the Canadian armed forces since September, 1939?

2. By what countries have these awards been made?

3. How many British awards were granted to personnel of allied forces upon the recommendation of the Canadian government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may tell the hon. member that the minister intends, when his estimates come before the house, to lay on the table the list of all awards to complete those that have already been tabled, and also a summary of all awards since 1939. If the hon. member wishes to have that information earlier, this question can be made an order for return, but the information will be given when the estimates are brought down.

Mr. PEARKES: May I have it answered?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not understand whether the hon. member agrees to drop it or whether he wants to have it made an order for return. I did not hear him.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to have it answered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order for return.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLEMING—MARINE INSURANCE BROKERAGE —REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF QUESTION

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Before you leave questions, Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that on Monday I called your attention to the fact that one of the questions, which appeared as No. 3 on Monday's order paper, had not been answered in the answers tabled in the house by the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance. My remarks will be found on page 2485 of Hansard. Is the parliamentary assistant in a position now to supply the answer to the fifth question, which was not answered at that time?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): If the hon. member had asked what insurance was placed with Dale and Company we would have been glad to give the information, but he did not mention the name of the company and we could not give that information. I shall be glad to give it as soon as I can.

Mr. FLEMING: The question reads: "What other insurance does such broker hold" and so on. The reference is to Dale and Company all through.

Mr. MAYHEW: If the hon. member had said what broker he was referring to we would have got the information but he did not mention the broker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot permit a debate on the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is trying to smoke the government out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Tory ambiguity.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CONSOLIDATED MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY—BRILLIANT DAM—DEPRECIATION AND TAXES

Mr. HERRIDGE:

For a copy of all agreements, correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda, reports and other documents exchanged, from January 1, 1940 to December 31, 1946, between the government of Canada or any department or officer thereof and any officer, agent or representative of West Kootenay Power and Light Co. Ltd., or Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Ltd., or of either of them or of any other corporation concerned with, interested in or participating in the construction of a dam and power plant on the Kootenay river near Brilliant, British Columbia, together with statements, accounts and reports showing the total cost of this project and the amount of accelerated depreciation allowed to any one or all of the above corporations in connection with their respective income taxes or excess profits taxes in respect of the above mentioned power project.

Mr. MAYHEW: Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is not for the Speaker to decide if a notice of motion for the production of papers is to stand or to be adopted. I would ask the minister concerned to cooperate with the Speaker in order that he may give the house the proper answer.

Mr. HERRIDGE: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, was this motion carried or did it stand?

Mr. SPEAKER: It stands.

Mr. HERRIDGE: On a point of privilege, this is the second time this motion has been stood over. Will the minister say what reason there would be for standing over such a reasonable request?

Mr. MAYHEW: This concerns more than one department, and we are investigating to see whether we can comply with the request. We are not prepared yet to say whether we will give the information or not. We think we will be able to do so on Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

FISH

REQUEST TO PROCLAIM PRICES SUPPORT ACT

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this being private members' day, there is no opportunity to direct questions to a minister. I should like the consent of the house, however, to permit one question being asked. The Minister of Agriculture made certain announcements this afternoon with respect to the adjustment of the prices of certain dairy products. The question I wish to ask has to do with another food product, namely, fish, on which no such action has been taken.

In view of the prevailing relatively low prices for fish in the maritime provinces and in central Canada, will the Minister of Fisheries advise what steps the government is taking to meet this situation and, more specifically, will he consider proclaiming the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, so that steps may be taken to establish floor prices for this product?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): As there are no orders of the day, I believe the question is out of order. However, I will say that this matter has been and is receiving the constant attention of the department, and it is the intention of the government to proclaim the Fisheries Prices Support Act just as soon as a suitable person is selected to be chairman of the board.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

PROPOSED CHANGES IN STYLE AND TITLES—"KING OF CANADA"

Mr. MARQUIS moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, at the next conference of the representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions, the representatives of the dominion of Canada should request the conference to adopt a resolution recommending to the parliament of the United Kingdom and the parliaments of the dominions that an act be passed making it lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty to make such alteration in style and titles of His Majesty, more particularly so as to include in such style and titles the words—"King of Canada."

He said: This resolution is, I fear, rather of a technical nature, but given the present status of Canada, of a very practical importance. It expresses the wish of this house that at the next conference of the nations of the commonwealth, the latter will pray His Majesty to make an alteration in his title so as to include therein the words "King of Canada". The title of His Majesty the King is based upon the proclamation under an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom known as the Royal Titles Act of 1901. It was altered in 1931 to give effect to certain resolutions adopted by the imperial conference of 1926. I wish to quote a passage from the report of the interimperial relations committee of this conference, usually called the Balfour declaration:

> They are autonomous communities within the British empire equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or internal affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth.

This declaration makes clear the spirit which prevailed at that time. It was conducive to a new legal status and to an alteration in the royal title.

On this point may I quote Doctor Maurice Ollivier, joint law clerk of the House of Commons, from his excellent book which I dare say most members of parliament have read, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", at pages 300 and 301:

> The royal title has been altered three times in the last sixty-five years. The title which had been proclaimed under the Royal Title Act of 1901 was "George V, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."
> When the Irish Free State acquired the status of a dominion, it was recognized that this form of title hardly accorded with the altered state of affairs. Having ascertained His Majesty's wishes and obtained his consent a slight change was made pursuant to the recommendation of the conference of 1926 so that the royal title is now: "George the Sixth, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."
> It is also a convention that this title and that the act relating to the succession should not be altered without the consent of all the dominions. This proposition of the conferences of 1926, 1929 and 1930 appears in the following lines of the preamble of the Statute of Westminster.
> "And whereas it is meet and proper to set out by way of preamble to this act that, inasmuch as the crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British commonwealth of nations, and as they are united by a common allegiance to the crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the throne or the royal style and titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the parliaments of all the dominions as of the parliament of the United Kingdom."

But if we refer to the Statute of Westminster, we shall see that Canada has been given the right to pass her own laws, without the consent of the parliament of the United Kingdom. May I refer hon. members to sections two, three, four and eleven of the Statute of Westminster with which they are acquainted and which I need not read here?

Those provisions deal with the repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, with extra-territorial powers, with the inapplicability of the acts of the United Kingdom to the dominions, and finally to the word "colony", in Imperial Statutes, which is stated not to extend to the "dominion".

According to this legislation, Canada was no longer a colony. She had the right to pass laws relating to internal and external affairs. As a member of the British commonwealth, she had become one of the realms of His Majesty the King.

As to external affairs, may I again quote Doctor Ollivier at page 293:

> By the statute of Westminster, Canada has complete freedom from control administratively, judicially and legislatively. Having those powers, Canada is sovereign and as evidence of her sovereignty she fulfils the two international tests of sovereignty, entering into treaties with foreign countries quite independently of the United Kingdom, as we have seen, and exchanging diplomatic representatives with them.

At the time the Statute of Westminster was passed, Canada had not yet legislated on most of the subjects on which she was entitled to legislate. But, since then, many laws have come into force under the authority of our parliament.

Since the adoption of the Statute of Westminster, not a session has passed without the Canadian parliament legislating in consequence thereof. This legislation has covered a very wide field, and our government has tackled therein many problems with courage and vision, problems which previously were to a certain extent, if not entirely, outside our jurisdiction.

Those acts, amongst other matters, dealt with the shipping laws, the admiralty, the exchequer court, the oaths of allegiance, the abdication of His Majesty, official secrets, the royal seals, the navy, the army and the air force, etc.

All this legislation—and I have mentioned only some of the statutes—has given a new status and a new importance to the body of our federal laws. The alteration that has occurred is due to the constitutional evolution of our country which has been brought about in an orderly manner with the inevitability of gradualness.

I want to put on the record a further quotation from Doctor Ollivier's book at page 316:

> We now possess all the attributes of a sovereign state, amongst others: the right to legislate without interference, right of foreign diplomatic representation, right of abolishing appeals to the privy council, extra-territorial powers, and finally the right to decide what amendments if any, are to be made to the Canadian constitution.

To illustrate better the constitutional evolution of the dominion, it is interesting to turn back the pages of contemporary history a few years and to consider what happened at the coronation of King George VI, on May 12, 1937. Prior to that date the coronation oath, as provided by older legislation was as follows:

> Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the respective laws and customs of the same?
> I solemnly promise so to do.

The oath which was provided and which George VI took in 1937 was in the following form:

> Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your Empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?
> I solemnly promise so to do.

The new oath was the consequence of our constitutional evolution embodied in the Statute of Westminster. It illustrated, for all the world to see, the distinct legal personalities of the dominions, which, as stated by Doctor Kennedy in his book, "The Constitution of Canada", in no sense whatever "belong to" the United Kingdom. And further to quote Doctor Kennedy:

> It is interesting to record, in this connection, that Canada, conscious of the inappropriateness of the term "belonging to," had already eliminated it from the oath of allegiance which holders of public office take in Canada.

The alteration follows the constitutional development of our country, and we have to consider now our real position among the nations of the world. Canada is represented abroad by highly qualified ambassadors, who enhance her prestige and make her better known in all parts of the world. Their close relations with governments of other countries contribute to the furtherance of world peace.

The increase in our trade has given to this dominion a most predominant influence amongst the nations. Canadian ships are carrying the name of this country to every part of the world. People abroad have learned to understand us better and to appreciate our way of living.

Even before the war, when His Majesty the King visited Canada, he addressed us as "King of Canada".

Canadians are not vassals of other countries, but subjects of His Majesty George the Sixth who, being a constitutional monarch, acts, as far as Canada is concerned, as King of Canada, and then only upon the advice of his Canadian ministers.

May I quote on this subject the Ottawa Citizen of November 9, 1945, in an editorial entitled "King of Canada":

> Since King George is constitutionally King of Canada with his own Canadian ministers to advise him the inclusion of the word "Canada" in his official title is merely recognition of a constitutional fact.
> A change in the King's title so as to include the words "King of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa," would doubtless be approved by King George himself. To him, his Canadian tour, as he has often said since, was one of the greatest experiences of his life.
> Moreover, it is not a small matter that in all royal documents sent to every country in the world or appearing in proclamations in the United Kingdom, the name of Canada should be there for millions of people constantly to see.

A well known French paper, Le Devoir, in its edition of November 7 speaks as follows:

(Translation):

> Each dominion is not designated by name: it is implicitly mentioned in the expression "British territories beyond the seas". The word "territories" savours of disdain and does not correspond with the constitutional evolution of those countries which we are prone to praise. The English wording of the enumeration is most respectful: George the Sixth, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." We note here the word "Dominion" which is not in the French version.
> Since the Statute of Westminster, the government of the countries of the British commonwealth of nations are equal in principle; they are respectively designated under the names "Government of His Majesty for the United Kingdom", "Government of His Majesty for Canada", etc. The King is King of Canada, of Australia, of New Zealand, of the Union of South Africa to an equal degree and just as directly as he is the sovereign of Great Britain. His reigning majesty asserted his direct kingship over Canada at the time of his visit to Ottawa in 1939. He sanctioned bills, received credentials from the minister in Washington and spoke of "My Kingdom of Canada". However, the instruments issued in the name of the monarch do not expressly mention Canada amongst the kingdoms.

(Text):

As members of one family, with different branches, all united by personal union under the same king, can we not be clearly identified as different realms of the king especially when we are just coming out of the recent war?

The most significant part taken by the Canadian people at home and in the front line during the conflict established our position as a sovereign state.

Like the United Kingdom, Canada has declared war of its own free will, without for instance, like the Soviet republics, waiting to be attacked by the forces of nazism, and this war was conducted by our own government and our own people without any interference from outside powers, but with complete cooperation. Victory has become a glorious reality due to the combined effort of Canada and other allied nations. The magnificent contribution we have made in money and manpower speaks loudly for our love of freedom and self-government.

At the end of this terrible conflict, have we not the right to claim a better designation of our beloved country? Have we not the right to ask for the full recognition of our actual status as a free nation? During these painful years, Canadian statesmen have discussed on equal terms with statesmen of other countries, Canadian soldiers have fought and died with no less courage than soldiers of any other allied country. Canada has, thus, as a result of those tremendous sacrifices, won her place amongst the victorious nations of the world. As an equal member of a British commonwealth, is it not just and fair that Canada's name be embodied in the designation of His Majesty's titles?

The crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British commonwealth of nations. As the head of a family, a father would proudly designate each of his children and not differentiate between them, so are we hopeful that the king may designate in his title each of the countries united by a common allegiance to the crown.

The object of this resolution is to suggest that its subject matter be brought up in the next imperial conference in order that steps be taken to include Canada's name and the names of the other dominions so that they may be included in the designation of His Majesty's royal title. In discussing this question, the house may put forward recommendations which might be the basis of subsequent consultation with His Majesty the King and with the other interested governments.

Especially when we have adopted recent legislation respecting Canadian citizenship and a separate ministry of external affairs, I suggest that we should unanimously accept the principle involved in this resolution. This could not bring an immediate change to the royal title because it is in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the royal style and titles requires the assent as well of the parliaments of all the dominions as of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this house will, when the time comes to deal with this matter by legislation, take the necessary steps to give to our country its real significance in His Majesty's royal style and title.

Mr. J. A. DION (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I second the resolution put forth by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis). I quote:

That, in the opinion of this house, at the next conference of the representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions, the representatives of the dominion of Canada should request the conference to adopt a resolution recommending to the parliament of the United Kingdom and the parliaments of the dominions that an act be passed making it lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty to make such alteration in style and titles of His Majesty, more particularly so as to include in such style and titles the words —"King of Canada."

To sum up, we request that at the next conference of the representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions, His Majesty's royal titles be modified in order to include the words "King of Canada".

It has been said and repeated on several occasions since the enactment of the Statute of Westminster, that the dominions which make up the British commonwealth are equal in status, in no way subordinate to one another in any aspect of their domestic or international affairs and united only by a common allegiance to the crown.

Every one of them should therefore be on the same footing when designated in His Majesty's titles. The historic statement made by Lord Tweedsmuir, former governor general on the sovereignty of Canada has often been quoted. It reads as follows:

She is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain or from the United States or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations but to Canada and to Canada's king and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

This opinion was recently corroborated in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), when he said that Canada, from now on, must take her own stand on external affairs.

Since Canada is now a sovereign state and as such her sovereign, His Majesty the King, must be officially designated as the King of Canada, it must be admitted that from a practical standpoint, we are still lacking certain attributes which denote the full sovereignty of a state. Those attributes may be summed up as follows:

1. The right of Canada to amend her own constitution.

2. The abolition of appeals to the privy council.

3. The selection of a distinctive flag which does not bear the emblem of another country.

In regard to the first point, everyone knows that our country must still request from the British parliament authority to amend her own constitution. In this respect we are lagging behind the other dominions, such as Australia, the Irish Free State, South Africa and New Zealand, who now possess that right.

I understand that in practice the present procedure is as follows: An address is voted by the parliament of Canada to the parliament of the United Kingdom informing the latter of the desired amendment to the Canadian constitution. The British parliament, acceding to the wishes of the Canadian parliament, approves by its vote the amendment to the constitution of Canada as expressed in the British North America Act.

The fact remains that the process is quite unworthy of a sovereign state. No country fully master of its destiny can tolerate some other country's interference in the matter of the changing of its constitution. I realize that this principle is recognized by the vast majority of both Canadian and British statesmen, but its application is being delayed for reasons of convenience which, sooner or later, must also be discarded. However, before Canada is allowed to change its constitution, we shall certainly have to look carefully into the machinery and methods whereby the change should take place. If Canada is to change its constitution, we must know just how it should go about doing so and to that end a dominion-provincial conference must be called to study the matter. An organization must be set up and endowed with full authority to act, completely respectful of the rights and prerogatives of both the provinces and the central government. This conference should take place in an atmosphere of calm and serenity above futile party bickering. To succeed, it should be free from animus and from political argument which can only spread dissent and give no positive or lasting results.

The second point I wish to stress and which now prevents Canada from declaring itself a sovereign state, is the maintenance of appeals to the privy council. Yet this tribunal itself recently declared that the Canadian parliament has a perfect right to abolish such appeals. All we have now to decide, is the proper time to achieve that end. In my humble opinion, the sooner it is done, the better shall true Canadian interests be served.

It cannot indeed be held that a state master of its destiny should confer upon a tribunal, however respectable, in some other country, the right to interpret its laws and its constitution. All the more so since, in constitutional matters, the privy council had handed down interpretations which were equivalent to actual amendments of the Canadian constitution. The venerable court was then overstepping its judicial powers and entering the legislative field. Indeed, in the case of the Temperance Act, the privy council decided that an emergency situation was not necessary to empower the federal government to invade the field of provincial prerogatives as defined in section 92 of the British North America Act.

With a few exceptions, all jurists today admit that a Canadian court should be called upon to hand down final decisions in cases relating to civil and constitutional rights. Appeals to the privy council in the criminal field have been abolished many years ago and no one has dared to suggest that the Supreme Court of Canada jurisprudence had been on a lower plane than that of the privy council.

If, in matters of constitutional law, it could be claimed that our present supreme court does not offer sufficient guarantees, means of changing its constitution should be considered, but, at all events, we feel that an exclusively Canadian court should be called upon to hand down final decisions in all Canadian cases in the civil, criminal and constitutional fields.

The third point, which I shall not labour, but which I take the liberty to mention, is that of a distinctive and essentially Canadian flag, bearing the emblem of no other country. I hope that Canadian opinion, more and more enlightened, will finally realize that a country such as Canada must have a real flag, which may be unfurled anywhere as a solely and decidedly Canadian emblem. Canada, due to its wonderful development in both the national and international fields, due, especially, to the sound policy of our present prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who has established embassies in all the important countries of the world, Canada, I say, is presently acknowledged as an international power. But an international power should be a truly sovereign state and a truly sovereign state cannot allow another state to amend its constitution. It may not permit a court of another country to interpret its statutes and its constitution and it should not accept a flag unless it be absolutely distinctive and show no emblem originating in another country. Moreover, a truly sovereign state must insist that, in the designation of the sovereign to whom it renders allegiance, its name be directly mentioned.

Briefly, to be a truly sovereign state, Canada must be in a position to call its king the King of Canada. For this reason, I sincerely thank the hon. member for Kamouraska for having moved his resolution.

I take pleasure in supporting it with all the means in my power and I shall also be glad to vote for it.

(Text):

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The motion before the house illustrates the necessity of abolishing private members' days immediately, particularly when there is so much other important work before us at the present time. In the first place the motion is out of order. What does it propose to do? It proposes to change the title of His Majesty. According to a great textbook the office of the crown is indivisible. Instead of bringing in a bill along these lines the hon. member proposes a resolution. If we discuss all the resolutions on the order paper we shall be here until after September. Private members' days should be abolished altogether.

Let us read the motion to see what it says:

That, in the opinion of this house,—

It is not the opinion of this house or of the country. I continue:

—at the next conference of representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions—

There is no conference proposed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said that it is a daily conference with the other dominions and with the overseas authority. This proposal was discussed at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896. At that time it was proposed to call the reigning sovereign, the late Queen Victoria, the Queen of Canada. What this motion proposes would mean a change in the British North America Act as amended, because the office of the sovereign is described therein. It is the same whether the sovereign is a king or queen. The office is described as King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, Defender of the Faith. That is the present title. It may be amended next year because of the situation in India. This motion refers to a conference of the representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions, and that the representative of the Dominion of Canada should request the conference to adopt a resolution. What conference? There is no conference. Representatives of New Zealand and Australia were here and asked for a conference on trade, defence and migration within the empire, and also preferences. What did we do? We rejected it. There used to be, every ten years or so, what is known as a conference, which is all set out in a textbook. That book gave the title of the king. I am not going to read it today because it would be a waste of time. I hold in my hand a copy of that textbook, which sets out the status, sovereignty, autonomy, of the sovereign and of the component parts of the empire. It is a modern textbook. The Statute of Westminster also gives the status, rank and titles of the sovereign. It states that the office of the king is indivisible. He is king of all the dominions overseas. I shall come to that in a moment.

Let us pursue this a little farther. The resolution continues:

—the representatives of the dominions and of Canada should request the conference to adopt a resolution recommending to the parliament of the United Kingdom and the parliaments of the dominions that an act be passed making it lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty to make such alteration in style and titles of His Majesty, more particularly so as to include in such style and titles the words "King of Canada."

He has no power to do that. It is all in the British North America Act as amended. The office of the king is described therein. There is no conference. This resolution proposes to request His Most Gracious Majesty to change his title, which he cannot do. He is now the king of Canada and he has always been the king of Canada, king of all the dominions overseas. The title has not been changed.

Let us examine this question further. It is founded on separatism. There is a regular wave of separatism, liquidation and scuttling the empire in the world today, nnt only in the dominions but in other parts of the empire. That is going on here—also change the flag, the anthem—yet hon. members pay no attention to empire affairs, and some of the press are not much better. Little or no attention is paid to it. I do not blame them for that; far from it. These academic matters, like this resolution, are not worth discussing at the present time, particularly when we have more important matters with which to deal. Here we are wasting a whole day on these academic matters. Last night the budget was delivered and it may be days before it is discussed. The same thing happened last year and the year before. We had discussions on the flag, the anthem, appeals to the privy council, and on many matters such as status, sovereignty, autonomy and so forth. All these things involve a change in the status of Canada. This motion is based on the status of Canada, on our autonomy and sovereignty. The resolution is based on that. Our status and autonomy were good enough for a million men in the first world war. They went overseas voluntarily under that status; 130,000 of them fell on the field of battle, and what they did changed the whole history of the world. In the second world war five times as many went, and at ten times the cost. If our status, autonomy and sovereignty were good enough for these men it should be good enough for those who stayed at home.

I wish to point out that the present gracious sovereign and his gracious queen paid a visit to the hon. member's constituency, Kamouraska, and to the constituency next door in his province, Temiscouata, at Riviere du Loup. No part of Canada gave a finer welcome to the king and queen than did the loyal people of Quebec. These people have done a lot for the country and for confederation.

This matter of king of Canada came up at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, but it did not get very far. The resolution is not properly worded. No part of Canada gave a better welcome to the king than did the counties of Kamouraska and Temiscouata. The school children with flags marched around the park five or six times. The stay which was supposed to take about half an hour took an hour and a half. The gentleman who is now chief justice of New Brunswick, Hon. Joseph E. Michaud, but who was a minister of the crown at that time, was in charge of the visit. The king asked him if all the school children of Quebec were at the gathering at Riviere du Loup. All the people of Quebec acted in the same way, of giving the king and queen a wonderful welcome.

I should like to refer to the visit of the king and queen and the gracious Princess Elizabeth to South Africa. The princess made a speech which appealed to me, as I am sure it appealed to other hon. members. It was made to the youth of twenty-one years of age and under, in the whole empire. I hope it will be read for many days in this country and in the schools; her solemn declaration and dedication of a lifelong service to the empire by a girl of twenty-one years, in her appeal to all youth, which reached the hearts and minds of all the youth of our glorious empire.

I am not going to say much more about this motion, because there are others who no doubt wish to take part in the discussion. But there seems to me to be a wave of separatism passing over this country at the present time. We have thirty-six representatives here from foreign countries whereas we used to have none. We have twenty-six ambassadors abroad on the seven seas representing Canada. A list was given the other day; compare that with Great Britain. Great Britain is represented in foreign countries by no more than fourteen ambassadors. France has fewer representatives abroad than the Dominion of Canada. We have more than Russia or the United States. I cannot help thinking that there is a deliberate attempt to scuttle the empire, liquidating parts of it here and there.

I wish to point out the law in regard to this matter. I submit that the motion is out of order because the object sought can be attained only by means of an address from both houses of parliament to the parliament of Great Britain to change the British North America Act. It cannot be done by resolution. The only procedure that we can adopt is an address by this House of Commons and the other place. An address to whom? To the king and the parliament of the mother country—an address to amend the British North America Act. After all, is not His Majesty at the present time the king of Canada, and always has been, and also king of all the dominions overseas? In this connection I would like to read from the "Statute of Westminster and Dominion Status". I recommend this book to hon. members. They will find it well worth their attention. The author is K. C. Wheare, London, England. I quote:

> It has seemed necessary at the outset first to distinguish constitutional rules of strict law, as exemplified by the Statute of Westminster, from non-legal constitutional rules, as exemplified by the conventions declared in the Imperial Conference Reports, and immediately thereafter to assert the interrelation and interaction of these two classes of rule, as exemplified in the term "dominion status," because there is a tendency, in the discussion of British constitutional development to underestimate the importance of rules of strict law, and in particular of statute, in that development; to overestimate the importance of non-legal rules; and seriously to misconceive the relation of the two classes of rule to each other. It is asserted, for example, that Great Britain and the British empire have an "unwritten" constitution.

That is what this motion seems to contemplate.

A constitutional statute is regarded therefore as something alien to the spirit of the constitution. On such a view of the nature of the British constitution, and of the constitution of the British empire, it was inevitable that the passing of the Statute of Westminster should appear to be a mistake. Some members of parliament in the United Kingdom and in the dominions objected to the proposal to pass the statute, not because of the terms it contained, but because it was a statute. Lord Buckmaster, an ex-Lord Chancellor, put this point of view in the House of Lords during the second reading of the Statute of Westminster Bill. He said that he intended to support the bill, but that he felt it was a mistake. "It is not—he said—that its actual terms offend any of the relationships existing between ourselves and our dominions. It is that it is, as I believe, for the first time, an attempt made to put into the form of an act of parliament rules which bind the various component parts of the empire, and that I regard as a grave mistake." He went on to assert that "the thing which has made this country grow is that it never has had a written constitution of any sort or kind, and the consequence has been that it has been possible to adapt from time to time, the various relationships and authorities between every component part of thiis state, without any serious mistake or disaster. That is what I think ought to be the ideal aimed at between ourselves and the various other nations which together make up the British empire . . . You should avoid as far as possible putting a definition of what the relationships may be into the unyielding form of an act of parliament. That is what this statute has attempted to do."

Chapter 7 of this book, the Statute and the Legal Status of Canada, sets out the law on this subject—and this is regarded as one of the most learned text books we have. I quote from page 177:

The fundamental fact in the case of the Dominion of Canada was that it was a federation. The powers and functions of the federal and provincial parliaments and governments were demarcated and their existing distribution was guaranteed by an act of the United Kingdom parliament, the British North America Act, 1867. This act was unalterable in essentials by the federal or provincial legislatures in Canada; it was completely alterable by the United Kingdom parliament only. From 1867 to 1930 inclusive, it had been amended seven times by that parliament. No clear rules regulated the procedure by which amendments of the British North America Act, desired by the provincial or federal parliaments in Canada, should be transmitted to and executed by the United Kingdom parliament . . .

Thus dominion status, after the passing of the Statute of Westminster, as before, though its predominant characteristic is conventional equality of status, contains legal ingredients which are different and are unequal from one dominion to another. Apart from this common ingredient of conventional equality, the recipe differs in each case to a greater or less degree. Dominion status to-day, it should be emphasized, means equality of conventional status, but it does not necessarily mean equality of legal status or identity in the legal rules which define that status for each dominion.

It can be seen that from the legal point of view what is proposed here is not the proper form in which the motion should be presented to parliament. As I have pointed out, the proper procedure should be through an address by both houses of parliament praying for an act to change the British North America Act.

On the question of policy, is it desirable at this time that we should pass a motion of this kind? After all, consider what the mother country has done for us. She has borne the brunt of the war, and there is no reason to believe that the status, the autonomy and the sovereignty of Canada are at this moment endangered. If our status is good enough for over a million men who enlisted, so many of whom died, so many of them having suffered so much on land, on sea and in the air, then I suggest that that status should be good enough for those who stayed at home. Is there really any interest in this motion? Look at the slim attendance there is in the chamber today, at the very mention of the word "empire". We barely have a quorum. Next to the Christian church, Mr. Speaker, no other agency has contributed more to the freedom, liberty and civilization of the world than the mother country has done. For two and a half years she stood alone, save the dominions, while others did nothing, and but for her we would have lost the war.

I would like to have your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on my submission that this resolution is out of order on the ground that it is not in the form of an address to both houses. In my opinion it is not necessary. In fact, I think it would be a good thing for parliament and the country if private members' day were abolished altogether for this year so that we could devote our time to the consideration of practical questions for the welfare of the people.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): We have heard with interest the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who is one of the most distinguished members, but unfortunately we cannot share all his views. If we did, the hon. member would not be sitting on the other side; he would be here.

An hon. MEMBER: You would be over here.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Don't worry; I do not think you will ever see that day. The hon. member for Broadview claims that there is no conference of the nations of the commonwealth at the present time. No, but the motion speaks of the next conference of the nations of the commonwealth, and surely there will be a "next" conference one of these days, as surely as the sun will rise tomorrow.

This is an important matter, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Broadview thinks it is not. He thinks we are wasting the time of the house at great cost, but I do not see any force in that contention. We are discussing item No. 4, which is to be found under notices of motions, and since this is private members' day we are free to discuss such motions until six o'clock. If we dispose of the present motion we can go on to Nos. 5 and 6, so that we are not losing any time, particularly when we are dealing with so important a subject.

The hon. member does not always speak in the name of the opposition, but as usual he recalls the days—and it is well that they should be recalled from time to time—when the empire did much for Canada. I think, however, that we should sometimes recall—it is done more often on this side than on the other side of the house—what Canada has done for the empire.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration provides for the recommendation to the next conference of the nations of the commonwealth that the royal style and titles of His Majesty the King include the specific designation of His Majesty as the King of Canada. May I compliment highly and sincerely the sponsor of this resolution, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis) who, in the circumstances, has not only demonstrated the great progress he has made, since his election to this parliament, in the way of mastering the English language, but shown for himself, for his constituency and for the population of this country which is of French extraction, his and our great devotion to His Majesty the King of Canada; his and our love for this country of ours which is called Canada. The hon. member for Kamouraska has quoted the Balfour declaration, which dates back to 1926 and which stipulates that all nations of the British commonwealth are autonomous and equal in status. He also quoted excerpts from "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", written by our distinguished and, I was going to say, genial and outstanding law clerk of the House of Commons, Doctor Maurice Ollivier, indicating that to alter the royal style and title of His Majesty requires the consent of the parliaments of all the nations of the commonwealth. Therefore I feel that this is an exceptional occasion when the voice of this nation should be heard in support of a resolution which is specifically and categorically Canadian and which at the same time is designed to augment, if it can be done, our respectful and loyal devotion, and our common allegiance to the crown.

As hon. members have probably noticed, I have purposely used the word "nation" instead of "dominion". I am sure the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) will not agree with me in that. I will further add that "dominion" is a word which should be used as seldom as possible in this house. I will go farther and say that the word "dominion" is a remnant of colonialism which should be banished as soon as possible from our official texts. I will go even farther and say that the word "dominion" is a word which offends the sentiments of a substantial part of the population of this country, is a word which is largely responsible for the legitimate doubts which we deliberately implant in the minds of statesmen of other friendly nations as to the accuracy of the evidence of the legal and constitutional status of this free parliament and sovereign state. For example, what would hon. members think of countries such as France, Holland, Belgium and even Italy or Germany if they bore the official designations of the dominion of France, the dominion of Holland, the dominion of Belgium, the dominion of Italy or the dominion of Germany and at the same time, Mr. Speaker, claimed equal status with the greatest powers of the world either at the peace conference table or at the united nations meetings? Hon. members would say that those nations may be right; nevertheless they act as if they were wrong, having regard to the designation of their official status, especially if none of those countries which I have just mentioned had a national flag representative of their traditions or aspirations, or a national anthem; but had a dominion day to celebrate. I would say that if there is a place in this world where the word "dominion" should disappear, as used to designate our country, Canada, it is in the wording of the royal style and titles of His Majesty the King.

How much more deeply, Mr. Speaker, Canadians of all creeds, of all races, of all extractions and of different languages, would feel in their hearts and souls their loyalty to the crown on the day they heard and could legally say, "George the Sixth, by the Grace of God King of Canada".

Let us be realistic about this matter. With all the respect we owe to the Balfour declaration or to the provisions of the Statute of Westminster which was so ably quoted by the hon. member for Kamouraska, the term "dominions beyond the seas" is no longer good enough for a substantial part of the population of this country for the purpose of designating Canada in the title of His Majesty the King, but should be changed to the King of Canada. Even if this resolution is adopted there may yet be a long period of time before this matter will be brought to the attention of a conference of the nations of the commonwealth.

Therefore, in the meantime, I would respectfully urge hon. members who share the views which I express at the present time, to refrain as much as possible from using, in their addresses in this house and in all their addresses in public, the word "dominion" when applied to Canada. It is so easy and so natural to say "Canada", "the government of Canada", "the parliament of Canada" or "the Canadian parliament", instead of "the Dominion of Canada" or "the dominion government", and so on. The dominion government of what; of Australia; of New Zealand; of Canada? It does not say. Some hon. members may wonder why I have these telephone directories on my desk. Looking up the telephone directories for Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec and other cities, what do we find if we look under the word "Canada"? I take the Ottawa directory, and I find: Canada Cement; Canada Dry Cleaners and Dyers; Canada Dry Ginger Ale; Canada Starch; Canada Wire and Cable Company, and so forth. Then if I look under "Canadian", I find: Canadian Ayrshire Breeders' Association; Canadian Congress of Labour; Canadian Feather and Mattress Company; Canadian Mercantile Agency; Canadian National Institute for the Blind. How long would it take a stranger to this country, a visitor from the United States, for instance, to find the words "government of Canada" or "Canadian government"? It would take him as long as it took me to find the same words when I first came to Ottawa. It was only after a considerable length of time that I persuaded myself that in order to find the telephone numbers of the Canadian government I had to refer to the word "dominion", but in the case of a stranger coming to this country his reaction would be that, in spite of all we say, we are still a colony.

Why that should be so I do not know. It is that way because it has always been that way. I respectfully suggest that instructions should be issued that in the next issue of the Bell Telephone directories, not only in Ottawa but all through this Canada of ours, government offices may be found under the heading "Canadian government" as the offices of the high commissioner for Australia may be found in this very book under the heading "Australian high commissioner", and as the high commisisoner for New Zealand may be found under "New Zealand high commissioner." We are not dominioners: we are Canadians. We are not dominion citizens; we are Canadian citizens. If we are truly proud of Canada, this land of ours, and of our title of Canadians, why do we in so many instances endeavour to hide those glorious names from the sight of strangers and, what is far worse, from the eyes of our own children? And until such time as our truly Canadian patriotism is recognized and interpreted by official texts of appropriate legislation, let us in this free, autonomous and sovereign state—unfortunately without an official Canadian flag; unfortunately without a Canadian national anthem, but with a Dominion day to celebrate—when referring respectfully to our king say that His Majesty is the King of Great Britain, of Ireland and of the dominions overseas, but that at the same time, above all and in the first place, in our hearts, as it should be in our texts, His Majesty is the King of Canada.

Mr. LEON J. RAYMOND (Wright) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to pass up the opportunity of discussing the resolution moved by my excellent friend the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis). However, I intend to limit myself to a few brief remarks.

Besides, the resolution does not call for lengthy explanations. Its wording is quite clear. What does it request? It reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house, at the next conference of the representatives of the United Kingdom and of the dominions the representatives of the Dominion of Canada should request the conference to adopt a resolution recommending to the parliament of the United Kingdom and the parliaments of the dominions that an act be passed making it lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty to make such alteration in style and titles of His Majesty, more particularly so as to include in such style and titles the words "King of Canada".

The hon. member for Kamouraska merely asks that His Majesty should be officially designated, as far as this country is concerned, by the title corresponding to Canada's true status.

Now, as regards Canada, His Majesty King George and Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth are King and Queen of Canada. Indeed this country is an autonomous and sovereign nation. It is the equal of Great Britain and of the other members of the British commonwealth. It is subordinate to none of them. Under the circumstances, those who reign over it cannot but be actually King and Queen of Canada, for the same reason, to my mind, why the King and Queen of Denmark or the monarchs of Norway or Sweden, are respectively King and Queen of Denmark, Norway or Sweden.

This fact has now been acknowledged by a great many Canadian citizens and even by a large number of our public men.

I well remember the expressions of thanks of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe at the laying of the corner stone of the new supreme court building in Ottawa by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth in 1939. Addressing the august and charming sovereign, he said:

> The royal visit which honours us—a fact of unprecedented historical importance—enables me to address Her Majesty as the first queen of Canada and to convey to her, and to His Majesty the King, the assurance of ever unfailing loyalty and devotion, as well as of sincere and respectful affection from our whole people.

In these words, the late Minister of Justice was simply acknowledging the fact that Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth are King and Queen of Canada.

The fact is also acknowledged by a large number of Canadians. During the royal visit which I just mentioned, Their Majesties were readily designated by the expression King and Queen of Canada.

Some jurists will undoubtedly try to confuse a crystal clear issue and pretend that the British Crown is indivisible. In my opinion, such a theory sprang in the minds of people interested in impeding the achievement of autonomy and sovereignty of the British colonies. They used that theory to postpone the development of the colonies.

One must not, however, take that contention too seriously. The same physical person may hold various offices. For instance, the Prime Minister of a country may well be the chairman of some association. In the same way, the sovereign who rules over the British countries may at the same time be King of Great Britain, Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand. Such a situation implies no contradiction, and we often see the same physical person holding a plurality of moral attributes.

It would be advisable to have legal documents reflect the situation which exists in fact. Those who would derive the greatest benefit therefrom are the heirs to the British Crown. If Their Majesties were officially called King and Queen of Canada, they would be closer to the hearts and minds of the Canadian people, who would be more devoted to the Crown, for if the sovereign who rules over Canada were designated as King of Canada, they would regard him more as their own. I cannot see any valid reason to oppose such a change. The only pretence which might be brought up is that by designating Their Majesties as King and Queen of Canada, the bonds which unite the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations might be loosened.

On the contrary, the change proposed by my hon. friend from Kamouraska would have the opposite effect. Indeed, it is the Crown which unites the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations and not economic or political bonds, and anything which tends to increase the devotion of the people to the Crown should be encouraged, as it would be an excellent means to rally the British nations round their Sovereign.

I understand that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) stated a moment ago that this motion was out of order. I do not intend to discuss this matter, but I wish to say, interjecting perhaps a sentimental note, that as the years go by the word "Canada" assumes a deeper significance for us; from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we no longer regard Canada as a stopping or trading place, but as the fatherland. Those of us who—though broadminded—are deeply rooted to their native soil, cannot be blamed if they claim to be Canadians first and foremost, if they think as Canadians, if they prefer Canada to any other country, if they want it recognized as their fatherland, with their own King, if they want their country to attain greatness and to go forward in order to play unrestrained her part in the Commonwealth and in the world.

Through implementing the resolution presented by the hon. member for Kamouraska, not only would we contribute to the fostering of patriotic feeling in Canada and to the strengthening of the bonds which unite the various parts of the Commonwealth, but we would add greater weight and lustre to the name of Canada among the nations of the world.

I have no other course left to me, therefore, but to approve of the motion before the house, to congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska and to suggest that Parliament make the proposed change as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to make a few remarks on this resolution may I read briefly from the resolution itself, which requests—

. . . that an act be passed making it lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty to make such alteration in style and titles of His Majesty, more particularly so as to include in such style and titles the words "King of Canada."

In speaking on this resolution, I am fully conscious that it has been introduced by a Quebec member, my good friend the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis), and that this matter is generally regarded as of outstanding importance and significance to all Quebec members. But I do not think we should lose sight of the fact that this is the House of Commons for all Canada, and that it is the responsibility of members, whatever part of the country they happen to represent, to analyse the significance to their constituencies of steps such as those envisaged by this resolution. To the average citizen it matters little whether the king is known as the king of the dominions or more specifically as the King of Canada. His full title is "George VI, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British dominions beyond the seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India". Most of us—I believe I am safe in saying all of us—have a clear understanding of the symbolism involved, and what the king stands for. We fully realize that he is the symbolic head of the great British empire; and I do not believe this change of words would make any great practical difference to the layman, though it may have a great deal of significance for students of the constitution or historians who are concerned with the various steps in the development of Canada toward full nationhood. In other words, I feel that the rank and file of Canadian citizens will regard this as an academic problem.

There is, of course, the strong feeling that by adopting this resolution we would be taking another step in the direction of complete and separate nationhood; and there is no denying the fact that we have been growing quite quickly in this direction in recent years. The Statute of Westminster in 1931 guaranteed our status as a nation, and the Citizenship Act passed by this parliament further clinched the deal. Recently we have had up for consideration the matter of a distinctive national flag, or drapeau Canadien, and the question whether we should continue to call one of our national holidays Dominion day or change it to Canada day .

There is a growing feeling in Canada that we may be rushing somewhat too quickly along this road. By keeping these issues of nationalism before the people we may in fact be making Canadians conscious of our internal difficulties and problems. The feeling is growing that at the moment we need a shake-down period to consolidate the gains we have made and to give us a chance to become more familiar with our new strength, to get used to it and to work out our problems arising therefrom. Growing pains can be uncomfortable. There is a feeling in many quarters that our differences of race, language, religion and so on could be more easily overcome if we had greater solidarity and separate entity as a nation. But I am not at all sure, Mr. Speaker, that as a member of the British commonwealth we have been denied any opportunity to overcome whatever obstacles we might have had or might still have in this direction.

At this point I should like to refer the house for a few moments to some of the problems with which my own province of Nova Scotia has had to cope, because I think in good measure the rest of Canada might well take a lesson from the road Nova Scotia has travelled. As all hon. members are aware, Nova Scotia was discovered somewhere around 1497 by John Cabot, who set foot on Cape Breton island just five years after Columbus discovered America. I would also remind hon. members, at this time, that it was some forty years later, in 1534 I believe, that Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence to make his landings on this continent. Then at a later date, in 1621, James I of England deeded all the land that now comprises the three maritime provinces and part of Quebec to Sir William Alexander. He justified this action because of the prior rights established on behalf of England by John Cabot. During this development period the French Acadians played a strong and active part in the growth of Nova Scotia with their establishments at Louisburg, Port Royal, Beauséjour and other centres. The names of Marc Lescarbot, Samuel Champlain and Pierre du Gast with their Order of Good Cheer go deep into our provincial history. There is a rich French heritage in Nova Scotia. Then, too, there were the Germans from Hanover who were so closely linked with a sovereign who later became George I of England that their ties with Britain are unquestioned. I say these ties are unquestioned because, coming from Lunenburg, the centre of the German settlement, I know this to be the case; but I can tell this house that there are many people in Canada who, particularly during the first world war, felt suspicious of this colony because of their German background. This suspicion, of course, greatly maligned a class of people whose loyalty to Canada as a nation within the British commonwealth of nations has been a bright beacon whenever this country has been under stress. They have not hesitated to fight against their former fatherland wherever there was a call for them to do so.

Then, too, there were the Gaelic-speaking Scots, who made a noteworthy contribution as our hon. friends from Pictou and Cape Breton will attest. It seems that these Gaelic-speaking Scots have the ability to make a contribution wherever they land. Since that time we have had elements of other foreign nations within the province. I mention the great part which the United Empire Loyalists have played in the development of Nova Scotia. I also would recall the group known as the Canadian Yankees. These last two classes within the province were at odds with each other during the American revolution. But each contributed in its own way toward the development of the province, and some very fine books have been written on the part they played. One in particular, written by a native of Nova Scotia —Tom Raddall—sets forth in a clear and interesting way the close association between people in Nova Scotia and their friends in the United States.

The house is well aware that we have not been without our serious and unfortunate racial incidents, one of the most regrettable of which culminated in the expulsion of the Acadians from Nova Scotia at Grand Pré in 1755. Longfellow's immortal poem, "Evangeline", is based on this unfortunate incident.

But Nova Scotia has been able to take all these racial differences in her stride and mould the various factions into a unified group whose only interest is the welfare of the province. In the main, the differences have not impeded the province in its march forward, as is evidenced by the leading place she is taking in Canadian history. As is well known, Nova Scotia is the cradle of responsible government and is the only province in the dominion which is unified under a flag of its own. In that connection I should like to read briefly from a book, "The Book of Ultima Thule", by Archibald MacMechan. I quote:

> Only Nova Scotia has a provincial flag, not English, not French, in origin, but all its own. It is a white flag with the blue St. Andrew's cross (saltire) dividing the "field" in four. In the centre is the double-tressured lion of Scotland, the ruddy lion rampant in gold. You recognize, of course, the arms of Sir William Alexander, first grantee of the province, still borne in part by the baronets of Nova Scotia, that order of nobility to which Sir Arthur was so proud to belong. Sir William was a Scot, a poet, and a favourite of that kindly Scot, King James, First of England, but Sixth of Scotland. He burned to found a kingdom in the New World, and was granted the province of Acadie.

When in 1867 we entered confederation, the system of unification within the province did not stop.

My purpose in presenting this brief background of racial history and the problems encountered, is to demonstrate that even before confederation the process of welding these different religious and racial groups into one unified whole was well under way and it did not stop after we entered into confederation. Although, after confederation, our status, like that of the other provinces, was that of being just one of several provinces within the Dominion of Canada we have never felt that this fact was an impediment to the development of unity within the province. We have lived with this matter of provincial sovereignty, now provincial rights or provincial autonomy, so long that we have been able to take it in our stride, as is evidenced by the fact that we have in Nova Scotia overcome all problems resulting from race, language and religion. Nationhood or, indeed, true provincial unity is something that must be developed by the people. Legislation will not do it.

To go one step farther, even as Nova Scotia did not find it to be any lasting obstacle to provincial unity to be only one of the provinces forming Canada, I do not believe it to be any obstacle to Canada's status as a nation that she is one of the British commonwealth of nations. I say in this connection that there was no "lasting" obstacle to provincial unity in Nova Scotia because I would not want the house to believe that there was no obstacle at all resulting from these various racial problems and racial groups.

I know that in this house we all agree, regardless of language or race, that it has been to Canada's advantage in full measure that she has been a member of the British commonwealth and that we have had the privilege of enjoying the benefits accruing to us from this association. I am aware that this matter of benefits is not a one-way traffic, and as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) has said, the British commonwealth likewise should be pleased that Canada has been a part of that commonwealth.

To return to the resolution, I do not feel that it presents a practical handicap to us to have the king known as King of the British dominions beyond the seas. Our status as a nation is assured regardless. It is not just a matter of words. It is an accomplished fact and one of which we are all proud. Almost every day events within Canada as well as the part which the dominion is playing with respect to other nations are serving to justify and emphasize our status as a nation.

Not being a lawyer or a student of constitutional history, I may be missing some of the significance of this resolution; but, as I see it, it is not a matter of outstanding practical significance. The rank and file of people in Nova Scotia, and in my constituency of Queens-Lunenburg in particular, are pleased with our status as a nation and I am sure they are not too dissatisfied with the king's title as it is at present. If, however, this debate shows that it would be to Canada's advantage in any way, shape, or form, to have the title altered so that the king would be designated separately as the King of Canada, we would find no grounds for opposing the resolution.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to offer to this house one or two personal views with respect to the resolution before us. I am speaking simply as one member and upon my own responsibility.

I am not familiar with all the constitutional intricacies involved in the resolution, which calls for a change in the title of His Majesty to designate him as the King of Canada. I sometimes wonder how much members of parliament regard their responsibilities as members. When I was first elected to the House of Commons I, as I suppose all members did, received from the Clerk of the House Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. As a newly elected member I, of course, began to read through it. Right here may I say I am reading it not because I am raising a point of order; I am reading it only to bring to our attention some of our responsibilities. I discover that in note 21 on page 6 the following appears:

> Every member as soon as he is chosen becomes a representative of the whole body of the Commons, without any distinction of the place from whence he is sent to parliament . . . That every member is equally a representative of the whole (within which by our particular constitution is included a representative, not only of those who are electors, but of all other subjects of the crown of Great Britain at home and in every part of the British empire, except the peers of Great Britain) has, as I understand, been the constant notion and language of parliament. Every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned, serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general, not barely to advantage his constituents, but the commonwealth.

[Mr. Winters.]

The quotation is taken from "Blackstone", volume 1, page 159. I do not think anyone will question Blackstone's ability as a constitutional lawyer.

I have nothing to say against the discussion of such trivial things as fertilizer for farms, gopher poisons or nails for building purposes. These things are important to some people, but I wonder whether, in the exercise of our duties, we have not forgotten that they go far beyond these matters. I wonder whether we have not been just a little negligent in thinking through the problems respecting the destiny of our commonwealth. If the general idea lying behind the resolution under discussion is to have His Majesty's title read "The King of Canada" I can take no particular or great exception to the change, if the desire is to have His Majesty designated as such. If, however, the idea is to have Canada take any further step which will tear us loose from the British commonwealth, then I personally would take the greatest exception to it.

I rise this afternoon to speak with some feeling and with some emotion. I was born in England of English parentage. My father is buried there. My boy gave his life in sacrifice for the freedoms which the British crown has always stood for. Since the war I have been able to rescue my mother from the old land. I say "rescue" her.

The present title designating His Majesty reads:

> His Most Excellent Majesty George VI by the grace of God of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.

I call attention particularly to the phrase "dominions beyond the seas, king". I do not wish to be an alarmist; I do not wish to sound a note that should not be sounded. How we have sung with a good deal of exuberance, "There will always be an England". That, Mr. Speaker, is my prayer. I do not say that prayer; I pray that prayer. But I trust that I am not out of line when I say that it is not beyond possibility that the term "dominions beyond the seas" may come to be obsolete. England today is economically bankrupt. The people of England today are going through the greatest hardship that perhaps history has ever recorded. The plight of England is, to some extent, beyond our imagination. I doubt whether the average member of this parliament has been able or could possibly be able really to look behind the scenes, and I cannot believe that a couple of snowstorms is the reason for it all.

I said that I did not want to be an alarmist. I say with a great deal of emotion that today England is occupied country. That statement may take a little thinking through. It is true that foreign armies are not there, but I say this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, it is my personal conviction that a foreign way of life is there. I say that one of the things we should be most concerned about is our Christian democratic way of life and the solidifying of the British commonwealth of nations in that one great common tie which has, throughout the ages, characterized the relationship of the peoples of that commonwealth. With that thought, I am going to resume my seat. I say, in conclusion I do not think it would be harmful for me to repeat what I said, that if behind the present resolution the motive is to tear us loose from that commonwealth, then I would be against it. But if the motive behind the resolution is simply to change the title so that His Majesty can be specifically designated as the King of Canada, I see no particular reason to oppose it.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish, at the outset, to compliment the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis) on his courage. The placing of a motion on the order paper entails in itself no difficulty, but to express it in clear terms without trying to disguise one's intention, or to lessen its scope, calls for courage, especially when the wish so expressed can wound feelings which arise from an extreme sentimentality or conjure up in the minds of some people recollections which they do not want to banish.

The honourable member for Kamouraska believes in the future of his country; that is normal for a good Canadian like him. He believes that a nation like ours must grow, assert itself, and take a larger part in world affairs. To do that it must advance and develop along constitutional lines. It must advance, even though the great powers, as they are called, courteously block its way toward the important place it should and will eventually occupy among those whose wisdom in domestic administration should bespeak the valuable part they can take in the drawing up of a peace programme for the whole world.

It is a world-wide psychological fact that wars have often been hatching for a long time before coming to light. They may lie fundamentally in a peace treaty based on temporizing only, which is a palliative, rather than on true principles with no solution of continuity among its essential parts, the union of which makes for permanent operation. They also lie in exclusive commercial agreements endangering the interests of other countries which have no raw materials; in the delimitation of boundaries which are unacceptable to certain nationalities deeply rooted in the neighbouring country, of boundaries unacceptable to a whole country whose population is often too large and must expand beyond those boundaries in order to breathe and live. By the way, this is the most important problem to be solved by Germany. Prior to the last war, Germany, with a population of 69,600,000 people, had an area of 181,700 square miles; today, with a population of 71 million people, it is enclosed in an area of 137,640 square miles. Let us remember Hitler's cry for raw materials and living space for his people.

Also in the way of preliminary remarks which are necessary, in order to understand the specific object of the motion under discussion, I would add that the causes of wars often lie in the lack of judgment of certain governments which, instead of admitting the legitimate desire, the necessity of an evolution toward a freer, a more autonomous and, I was going to say, a more independent status, effect underhand deals which in most cases, do not proceed directly from them but from certain organizations or so-called key men whose actions and untimely utterings—although they are always in line with the policy laid down by the political parties of the country since centuries—wound the feelings of those rising countries whose inexhaustible resources are their greatest guarantee, especially when they are in a position to enjoy them and prevent them from passing over to strangers.

Policy laid down since centuries: The Canadian Press of April 16 contained a statement made by Viscount Bennett before the Women's Advertising Club of London, England, to the effect that Great Britain is no longer able to assume the defence of the commonwealth. Here are his words:

> Which means that we must look to a common defence policy with common objectives. Such a policy will have to be adopted without delay.

Lord Bennett is not satisfied with advocating the eternal policy of the lords of the admiralty, mentioned in earlier days by Laurier, but he adds:

> It is evident that one of the dominions is willing to seek the protection of Uncle Sam. As far as we are concerned, he adds, we should see to it that the oldest member of the commonwealth, that is your country, take the initiative in calling an imperial conference.

The eternal fear that Canada be too close to the great republic across the border, the eternal fear of the necessary evolution of a great country. Moreover, his statement is—and we are surprised to hear it from a former prime minister—a malicious allusion to a country which, with our brilliant and mighty cooperation, played a leading part in the last war.

Another so-called key man takes the liberty to utter untimely remarks and express his fear, proving at the same time beyond all doubt that our constitutional evolution is our strength and is known the world over. Speaking before the Royal Empire Society, H. V. Hodson said:

(Text):

As a country, Canada feels that if she is not 100 per cent Canada, she is, she feels, merely an appendage of the United States.

(Translation):

And he adds:

(Text):

It is all evidence that Prime Minister Mackenzie King was the principal accessory when the dominion government or at least some of them acted so that the imperial conference was quietly smothered in its bed a year ago.

(Translation):

He continues as follows:

(Text):

The dominions have only begun to assert the privileges of national status which they have acquired in the last generation.

(Translation):

This clearly shows his presumptuousness, and the idea he has of his own importance. He goes on:

(Text):

These privileges included the right to be represented here, there and everywhere by their own diplomatic envoys; the privilege of singing out of tune and being an argumentative party to every international negotiation that concerns them; and the small boy's right to cock a snook at his elders.

(Translation):

The only thing lacking to complete the picture is that an ambassador should tell us what national flag we should have.

Whatever those gentlemen may think, Canada is growing, although she is still young. She has reached maturity with a population of 12 million in a country which could contain an empire; she is strong enough to claim the privilege of selecting newcomers. That Canada should belong to an association of free countries gives rise to no complaint on the part of anyone, except those who are too much affected by imperial preference. That is what we find in the book by Sumner Welles, "Time for Decision", which was published in London and New York in 1944.

On page 176, he writes:

(Text):

I was impressed with the unhappy effects which the Ottawa agreements, providing for imperial tariff preferences, had had on the economy of all nations and particularly on that of the United States.

(Translation):

We see no great danger in this motion asking that in view of our slow constitutional evolution, the king actually reigning over the British empire be called King of Canada. It means only the bringing of our status to its logical conclusion. Eventually—one never can tell—it may be suggested that the crown, symbol of the constitutional King of Canada, be substituted to the union jack, emblem of another nation, on our national flag, itself subjected to the inevitable trend of events. These things cannot be avoided, Mr. Speaker. Time will follow its course. Those who wish to stem the course of events will fail in their attempt if they are not careful in aiding and guiding them. Doctor Ollivier, in the preface of his book "Le Canada, pays souverain", writes as follows, on page 9:

Our modern times are by no means monotonous. Our own generation, having witnessed a war unparalleled in history, bloody or peaceful revolutions, the collapse or dismemberment of time-honoured empires, is now called upon to witness the shattering of the classical moulds in which our universal concepts of state and sovereignty were shaped.

The most extraordinary changes have taken place in the international field: the birth of a soviet state, of a fascist state, the creation of the league of nations and, finally, the evolution of the British empire.

This book, if it were written today instead of in 1935, would add: the birth and the inconceivable strength of a soviet state, the birth and collapse of two fascist states, the creation of a second league of nations under a different name and the evolution of the British empire which Churchill himself fears to see liquidated under the present socialist government.

Such is evolution, the march of time, such is, too often, the unforgivable mistake, the abuse of strength, the excess of faith in what certain great men consider as being eternal, which is only human. There is, to use a well chosen expression of my pastor, but one government that will never fall, but one empire which resists to all attacks: everyone, even its most indomitable enemies, know and fear it, although it is not necessary that we name it. Mr. Speaker, it is one of man's characteristics to be slow in acknowledging the inevitable and more so because his interests are always at stake.

Let us suppose, for a moment that the motion be agreed to and that the next imperial conference grant our wish: a new step will have been taken and no one could accuse Canadians of a lack of patience. Other countries might, unwarrantably, no doubt, practice this virtue to a lesser extent.

Fruit is good to eat when ripe; independence is a fruit which a nation must pick when it is ripe. The great republic to the south had to endure the frightful war of secession before it could finally pick the ripe fruit of independence.

Are we to believe that Poland, alternately dependent and independent since the glorious dynasty of Ladislases, will never be prepared for the enjoyment of a benefit so jealously prized by less advanced communities?

Judging from what is taking place, according to newscasts, India, which seems to have been promised independence, does not apparently show any greater readiness for it. Moslem and Hindu rivalries, the surgings of hitherto peaceable sects, foreign intrigue readily arousing a still queasy population, all seem to stand in the way of full independence. The British United Press announced last night that the United States of Indonesia who have just been granted independence, were on the brink of civil war. It will then be readily admitted that a maximum of genuine, deep, and not a merely apparent national unity is required within a nation that considers itself ripe for independence.

Our constitutional evolution is as inevitable as that of other countries. No one can stay its progress. It is all the surer for its being slower, more enduring. With each new step we now take, we grow circumspect and watch the next step. With each new war, we seem to hesitate.

Perhaps it is because of circumstances, of necessities arising from our union, from our nearness to a great country, our awareness of being called upon to take a leading part in world affairs. I congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska for introducing this motion and hope that the people of Canada will keep on showing patience, steadfastness and judgment, and will display even greater confidence, if possible, in the future marked by Providence for a country whose strength and courage compel recognition on the part of the most sceptical, the most timorous and especially the mightiest.

(Text):

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to say a word of appreciation to hon. members who took part in this debate for the high tone in which the matters have been discussed and for the interesting material which has been brought to the attention of the house. My colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I were looking at the terms of this motion when the debate commenced and he supplied me with the words which, I think, properly describe this: one of the signs of the inevitability of gradualness. There is no doubt that the present royal style and title is not in full accord with the constitutional position of the units of the commonwealth and other lands over which His Majesty is king. This title is also the result of gradualness. One part of it, Defender of the Faith, if I am not mistaken, is a memento of a compliment paid to King Henry VIII by the Pope of Rome and has always been maintained in the description of the titular head of the United Kingdom. The form in which the royal style and title now appears is, as hon. gentlemen know, "George VI, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." This wording was established by a royal proclamation issued under the great seal of the realm and published in the London Gazette on May 13, 1927, in the exercise by His Majesty of the powers conferred upon him by the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act of 1927. In it there was retained the expression "Defender of the Faith". There was retained also the expression "Emperor of India", which was first added to the description in 1876. There was also retained the expression "the British dominions beyond the seas", which appears to have been incorporated in the royal title by virtue of a statute of 1901. Though in many documents in which the words "dominion beyond the seas" were used, the word "dominion" commenced with a capital "d"; that was not so originally. In the statute of 1901 power was given to make addition to the style and title of the crown in these terms:

> It shall be lawful for His Most Gracious Majesty, with a view to the recognition of His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas—

That is with a small "d", referring to his dominions beyond the seas and the lands over which he exercised royal authority.

> —by his royal proclamation under the great seal of the United Kingdom issued within six months after the passing of this act, to make such addition to the style and titles at present appertaining to the imperial crown of the United Kingdom and its dependencies as His Majesty may see fit.

Following that statute, a proclamation was issued setting forth the style and title of

His Majesty in two languages, not the two languages which are official in this country, but the two languages used for such and like documents in England; that is to say, the English language and the Latin language. In the Latin language the words were:

et terrarum transmarinarum quae in ditione sunt.

That is, the lands beyond the seas which are under dominion. I looked up "in ditione" to see just what was the origin, and I find it is one of the expressions of Caesar's De Bello Gallico.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if he translated the expression correctly? I thought he said "under the dominions"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, "under dominion."

Mr. CHURCH: What is wrong with the title now? Are you objecting to it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: What is wrong with it now is that it is somewhat out of date; it does not make any distinction between the condition of those lands beyond the seas whose peoples have attained autonomous self-government, and the colonies which are still lands under dominion, administered from the colonial office.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) says that to the layman this does not appear to be anything of importance, that it does not make much difference. I quite agree with him. Those of us who are within the commonwealth know exactly what the situation is, and it is not important as to whether or not it is accurately described in the title of His Majesty. That has no effect whatsoever upon the regard in which he is held here or upon the fact that in law, constitutionally he is our king; he is the King of Canada. The way in which he is described in this title has no effect upon that for us. But to others who are not within the commonwealth it may appear ambiguous; and those who remember their Caesar and their De Bello Gallico may think the "et terrarum transmarinarum quae in ditione sunt" are in the condition in which were the lands Caesar described as "in ditione Germanorum" or "in ditione Romanorum." That may or may not be important. Certainly it is not the fact. We are not "in ditione Germanorum"; we are not "in ditione Romanorum", and we are not "in ditione—"; I do not know what the Latin word would be, but whatever would be proper to describe the English people. We are not under the dominion of any but ourselves and His Gracious Majesty as King of Canada.

That is the fact, but it is also the fact that in the Statute of Westminster we, the United Kingdom and the other autonomous units which, in the declaration of 1926, were declared to be all of equal status, agreed that there would be no further change in the royal style and titles without the action of the parliament of the United Kingdom, the parliament of Canada, the parliament of Australia, the parliament of New Zealand and the parliament of the Union of South Africa. This resolution directs attention to the fact that the style is not now in accord with what is the fact, but it also in terms recognizes that nothing more than a hope can be expressed by any one of the units, because the consent and concurrent action of all is required to bring about any change.

The resolution says that at the next imperial conference there should be a recommendation that all these parliaments concur in making this change. Well, I think a change will be inevitable in the course of this inevitability of gradualness. Have we reached the point where it is necessary that it be made at once? That is something upon which there may be various divergent opinions. All I can say as to the position of the government is that, this matter having been discussed in the high tone that was maintained throughout the debate, it will be considered by the government as its duty to ascertain from the representatives of the other autonomous units of the commonwealth if they feel that it should be considered at the next meeting. I think I can give the mover of this resolution the assurance that we shall ascertain, through ordinary diplomatic channels, if it is convenient to the other members of the commonwealth of nations that this matter be considered the next time there is an imperial conference. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) says none has been fixed. He is quite right, but these conferences take place from time to time. This resolution does not ask that a conference be called, and I would not want to give the assurance that we would ask to have a conference called; but I feel sure that at some near or later day there will be an occasion when representatives of the autonomous units of the commonwealth will be in session, and I think it would be proper to ascertain, through diplomatic channels, if they consider that when there is such a conference this matter should be on the agenda. It is something that I am sure will be considered in the same spirit in which it was discussed in this house. We cannot forever maintain forms that no longer represent the substance; and the substance has been changed. The substance is now different from the condition that existed when this form was adopted. When will that change have to be made? How soon will it have to be made? Certainly it will be made some day.

Mr. CHURCH: If I may ask the right hon. gentleman a question, would not any change in the style of titles require a proper address from both houses of parliament, and would it not involve a change in the British North America Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think it would involve any change in the British North America Act, because the language in which the title is now expressed is not the language we find in the British North America Act. The language we find there is:

The provisions of this act referring to Her Majesty the Queen extend also to the heirs and successors of Her Majesty, Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

That is no longer the form in which the royal style and titles is expressed, so I do not think it would require any change in the British North America Act. But it would require the concurrent action of the parliament at Westminster, of the parliament at Ottawa, of the parliament at Canberra, of the parliament at South Wellington, and of the parliament at Pretoria. Until all that is done, there would be no change legally made which would conform with the terms of the statute of Westminster.

Mr. FERGUSON: Would there be discussion on it, before discussion took place in this house? Would an item of that kind be discussed at a conference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. All I am saying this afternoon is that, through the ordinary diplomatic measures, we shall endeavour to ascertain whether the governments of the other members wish to have it on the agenda for discussion at the next conference.

Mr. FERGUSON: Then it would be discussed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, it would be discussed there; and it would have to come back here, and be discussed here, before it could be done.

Mr. FERGUSON: Would all the points pertaining to it be discussed at the conference, prior to its being discussed in the House of Commons?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the whole matter would be discussed at the conference. They would discuss as to whether or not it was advisable to take such action. There might not be agreement; and unless there was agreement it could not be done. It is something which any one of the units could prevent. One dissenting state could prevent its being done. It would have to be something to which all those governments unanimously agree.

Mr. FERGUSON: A discussion in the conference prior to its being discussed in this house might give a wrong impression throughout the world respecting the thoughts of the majority of Canadians regarding the subject, the way real Canadians feel on the subject.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not admit that real Canadians would feel that it was necessary to keep the title in such form as would give anyone the impression that this country was still in ditione Anglorum.

With this declaration, that we shall ascertain whether or not others would feel desirous of discussing it, it seems to me that perhaps the hon. member would be content to have his motion dropped. It cannot produce any effect, unless there is discussion, and unless out of that discussion unanimous approval ensues.

Mr. POULIOT: Queen Victoria is not dead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the leave of the house to withdraw the motion?

(Translation):

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, after this statement by the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), which agrees in every respect with the purpose of the resolution, I beg leave to withdraw it.

(Text):

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the right hon. gentleman enlighten the house as to just how he will proceed to get in touch with the other dominions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That will be through the offices of the high commissioners in the several capitals. That is the way in which these things are always done. The high commissioners will be asked to ascertain in London, in Canberra and in the other capitals whether or not those governments feel that the next time there is a conference this should be on the agenda.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Last night the leader of the opposition asked me in regard to the time for resumption of the budget debate. The government gave consideration to the request this morning, and have agreed that Tuesday next should be the time at which the financial critic of the opposition will resume the budget debate. But it is the intention of the government that, once that debate commences, it shall be pursued without intermission until its conclusion.

As hon. members will have seen from the order paper, next Monday is taken over for government business.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then will this be the last private members' day?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; Wednesdays are still left, and there are the private members' hours on Tuesday and Friday evenings.

I think it is safe to say that the legislation of the government is practically all ready, and the length of the session will depend upon the length of the budget debate and the cooperation we receive from hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to private members' days. We have received excellent cooperation thus far, and I trust it will continue. If so, I think this session will be greatly shortened thereby.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 1, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AS TO CANADA'S POLICY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the house resumes the debate on the second reading of the bill to amend the Immigration Act, I should like to set forth, in broad outline, the government's policy with respect to immigration.

The policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration. The government will seek by legislation, regulation, and vigorous administration, to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can advantageously be absorbed in our national economy.

Like other major problems of today, the problem of immigration must be viewed in the light of the world situation as a whole. A wise and productive policy for Canada cannot be devised by studying only the situation within our own country. For example, temporary but effective limits on any policy that is to be applied immediately are created by the problem of providing ocean transportation and of establishing inspection facilities in certain countries to which access is difficult at present. Moreover, Canada's policy has to be related to the social, political and economic circumstances resulting from the war. Among other considerations, it should take account of the urgent problem of the resettlement of persons who are displaced and homeless, as an aftermath of the world conflict.

Under existing circumstances, therefore, Canada's policy with respect to immigration falls, necessarily, into two parts: measures designed for immediate application, and a long-term programme.

Let me point out at once that with regard to immigration at the present time, there is confusion of two fundamental points; namely, the extent to which immigrants may legally enter Canada, and the extent to which they can physically get to Canada. At present, the limiting factor is not our legislation or regulations, but the shortage of transport. Through Canada's high commissioner in London, the government has kept in active touch with shipping authorities and transportation companies in the United Kingdom to see what may be possible in the way of special shipping services. As to what may prove feasible, I am unable to make a report at this time. Other countries interested in encouraging immigration face precisely the same conditions, and are experiencing the same difficulties. The problem of transportation is a very real one. It cannot be overcome in a week or a month, or indeed within the next year.

The shortage of shipping means that Canada cannot secure more immigrants simply by changing laws and regulations. Since those persons we would be glad to welcome will not all be able to come, the shortage of shipping also means that we have to decide to which immigrants prior opportunity to come to Canada is to be given.

Because of the limitations of transport, the government decided that, as respects immigration from Europe, the emphasis for the present should be on the admission of the relatives of persons who are already in Canada, and on assisting in the resettlement of displaced persons and refugees.

Up until the end of the war and since—under order in council P.C. 695 of March 21, 1931—four broad categories of persons were admissible to Canada. These were:

1. British subjects from the United Kingdom, Ireland, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Australia or the Union of South Africa, who possessed sufficient means to maintain themselves until employment was secured.

2. United States citizens, similarly possessed of means of maintenance.

3. Wives, unmarried children under 18, or fiancees of men resident in Canada.

4. Agriculturists with sufficient means to farm in Canada.

During the 1930's, due to the adverse economic conditions of the period, these provisions were necessarily interpreted in a restrictive manner. Because of improved economic conditions, it is now possible to interpret them broadly. It is the intention of the government, under present circumstances, to have the regulations so administered that British subjects from the United Kingdom, Ireland, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Australia or the Union of South Africa, and citizens of the United States, who desire to enter Canada will only be required to meet certain standards of health and character, and to show that they are not likely to become public charges.

At the end of the war, it was felt that conditions in Europe made it desirable to widen the categories of relatives of Canadian residents who could be admitted to Canada. As a result these categories, some time ago, were extended substantially. Recently, the terms of admissibility were extended to include still wider groups of relatives. All married relatives who are admissible are now granted the right to bring their families with them. I would ask leave of the house to table a copy of the order in council—P.C. 1734 of May 1, 1947—which extends the terms of admissibility.

The government has also extended admissibility to persons who are suitable for employment in the primary industries. As hon. members are aware, Canada's primary industries are experiencing an acute shortage of manpower.

The resettlement of refugees and displaced persons constitutes a special problem. In the intergovernmental committee on refugees, and in the discussions in the united nations leading to the establishment of the international refugee organization, Canada has taken an active part. In this connection, the government has taken measures respecting the admission of refugees and displaced persons, and also of Polish ex-soldiers. These measures, though not of wide scope, are practical steps within the present physical limitations imposed by transportation.

Canada is not obliged, as a result of membership in the united nations or under the constitution of the international refugee organization, to accept any specific number of refugees or displaced persons. We have, nevertheless, a moral obligation to assist in meeting the problem, and this obligation we are prepared to recognize.

The government is sending immigration officers to examine the situation among the refugee groups, and to take steps looking towards the early admission of some thousands of their number. In developing this group movement, the immigration branch and the Department of Labour will determine jointly the approximate number of persons who can be readily placed in employment and absorbed into various industries and occupations. Selection officers will then consider applicants for entry into Canada, examine them on a basis of suitability and physical fitness, and make arrangements for their orderly movement and placement. Persons so admitted will, of course, be included in whatever quota Canada finally accepts as its share in meeting the general problem. In taking these steps the government is seeking to ensure that the displaced persons admitted to Canada are of a type likely to make good citizens.

Let me now speak of the government's long term programme. It is based on the conviction that Canada needs population. The government is strongly of the view that our immigration policy should be devised in a positive sense, with the definite objective, as I have already stated, of enlarging the population of the country. This it will seek to attain through the development and energetic application of productive immigration measures.

The population of Canada at present is about 12,000,000. By 1951, in the absence of immigration, it is estimated that our population would be less than 13,000,000 and that by 1971, without immigration, the population would be approximately 14,600,000. Apart from all else, in a world of shrinking distances and international insecurity, we cannot ignore the danger that lies in a small population attempting to hold so great a heritage as ours.

The fear has been expressed that immigration would lead to a reduction in the standard of living. This need not be the case. If immigration is properly planned, the result will be the reverse. A larger population will help to develop our resources. By providing a larger number of consumers, in other words a larger domestic market, it will reduce the present dependence of Canada on the export of primary products. The essential thing is that immigrants be selected with care, and that their numbers be adjusted to the absorptive capacity of the country.

It is of the utmost importance to relate immigration to absorptive capacity. In the past, Canada has received many millions of immigrants, but at the same time many millions of people have emigrated. Of the latter, a large proportion were young people born in Canada, and others who had benefited by education or training received in Canada. The objective of the government is to secure what new population we can absorb, but not to exceed that number. The figure that represents our absorptive capacity will clearly vary from year to year in response to economic conditions. At the present stage, when Canada is returning to a normal situation after wartime disruption, it is impossible, with any degree of accuracy, to make forecasts as to our future power of absorption. For some time to come, no matter what special shipping arrangements we may be able to achieve, conditions of transport will limit the number of immigrants. When that limitation ceases to prevail, it will be necessary to consider further what measures will best achieve the adjustment of immigration to the numbers that can be absorbed into the economy of Canada.

With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination. I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a "fundamental human right" of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege. It is a matter of domestic policy. Immigration is subject to the control of the parliament of Canada. This does not mean, however, that we should not seek to remove from our legislation what may appear to be objectionable discrimination.

One of the features of our legislation to which strong objection has been taken on the ground of discrimination is the Chinese Immigration Act. This act seems to place persons from one particular country in an inferior category. The government has already initiated action for the repeal of that statute. Chinese residents of Canada who are not already Canadian citizens may now be naturalized. Once naturalized, they are permitted to bring their wives and unmarried children under 18 to join them in this country.

The East Indians legally resident in Canada are British subjects who have resided here for many years. They are therefore Canadian citizens. As such, their wives and unmarried children under 18 are admissible.

With regard to the Japanese, I stated, on August 4, 1944, at which time we were at war with Japan, that the government felt that in the years after the war the immigration of Japanese should not be permitted. This is the present view and policy of the government. It will be for future parliaments to consider what change, if any, should be made in this policy.

There will, I am sure, be general agreement with the view that the people of Canada do not wish, as a result of mass immigration, to make a fundamental alteration in the character of our population. Large-scale immigration from the orient would change the fundamental composition of the Canadian population. Any considerable oriental immigration would, moreover, be certain to give rise to social and economic problems of a character that might lead to serious difficulties in the field of international relations. The government, therefore, has no thought of making any change in immigration regulations which would have consequences of the kind.

I wish to state quite definitely that, apart from the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act and the revocation of order in council P.C. 1378 of June 17, 1931, regarding naturalization, the government has no intention of removing the existing regulations respecting Asiatic immigration unless and until alternative measures of effective control have been worked out. Canada recognizes the right of all other countries to control the entry or non-entry of persons seeking to become permanent residents. We claim precisely the same right for our country.

I wish to make it equally clear that the Canadian government is prepared, at any time, to enter into negotiations with other countries for special agreements for the control of admission of immigrants on a basis of complete equality and reciprocity.

Through the years of depression and war, and consequently of greatly restricted immigration, the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources and its offices abroad were reduced to proportions wholly inadequate to cope with an active immigration policy. With the end of the war, and in the light of changed economic conditions, the government has already taken steps to expand and strengthen this branch of the public service. To carry out the government's policy effectively, immigration services will be further developed to meet expanding requirements.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the Prime Minister would permit a question with regard to the urgency of the transportation problem, has he or the government received any information as to the success of the reported plan of Australia which used an aircraft carrier or aircraft carriers to transport immigrants from the United Kingdom to Australia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of Immigration has been following the activities of other countries, but I am not myself in a position to make a specific reply to my hon. friend's question. It might be brought up when the immigration bill is before the house.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the Prime Minister permit one further question? He has referred to the immediate policy and to the long-term policy. As to the immediate plans could he give the house some idea of the numbers that will be involved in immigration to this country in the immediate future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that my purpose in presenting this statement today was that I expected there would be a number of questions asked upon the further discussion of the immigration bill. I thought it would be helpful to hon. members if at the outset before we got into that discussion, I made as clear as I could the policy of the government generally. As to any question of numbers or the like, I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow the question to be answered when we are discussing the bill at some further stage.

INCOME TAX—COSTS OF COLLECTION

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What was the cost for the fiscal years 1945-1946 and 1946-1947 in each taxation division and province of collecting income taxes (a) salaries; (b) expenses; (c) legal fees; (d) total for Canada?

COGSWELL STREET HOSPITAL, HALIFAX

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What did the government pay during the fiscal years 1944-1945, 1945-1946, 1946-1947, in connection with the Cogswell street hospital, Halifax, N.S., for (a) rental; (b) maintenance; (c) improvements; (d) cost of operations, including salaries and fees?

BELLEVILLE ARMOURIES

Mr. STOKES:

1. What alterations or improvements were made by contracts let by the Department of National Defence or Department of Public Works at the armouries at Belleville, Ontario during (a) the year 1944; (b) the year 1945; (c) the year 1946; (d) the year 1947, to date?

2. To whom were contracts let and for what specific work?

3. What was the gross expenditure made under each contract?

4. What, if any, of the above contracts are uncompleted?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS ON MONDAYS AND WEDNESDAYS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, the 5th day of May next to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: I hope, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will see that it is very much in their own interests that this motion should carry. The house has now been sitting for over three months, and most of the business of an ordinary session is still before us. I myself would be glad to amend the resolution to include Wednesdays as well, if there is a general feeling among hon. members that I should so do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After all, it means that possibly only one member will have a chance to discuss his particular resolution. I am sure there will be other occasions on which that opportunity will be afforded. If hon. members agree I would ask to have the motion amended to read:

That on and after Monday, the 5th of May next, and Wednesday, the 7th of May next, to the end of the session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays and Wednesdays over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO OTHER PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, as a result of representations made to British Columbia members. Is consideration still being given to the extension to other provinces of the prairie farm rehabilitation measure? If so, when may a decision be expected?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Consideration is still being given to the matter. I am not yet in a position to state when an announcement will be made.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he will soon be able to make an announcement of policy and bring down legislation with respect to the reclamation of the marshlands of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Last year the minister announced that a bill had been drafted and gave a general outline of the policy. The interested parties are very anxious to have a further pronouncement of policy on behalf of the government.

Mr. GARDINER: The legislation referred to last year had to do with the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to other parts of Canada as well as the Palliser triangle in the west. The answer to this question would be the same that I gave a few moments ago to the question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The legislation is still under consideration, and I am not in a position to say what will be the result of that consideration.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would point out that the reclamation of these marshlands is in a somewhat different position, inasmuch as it has been unanimously recommended and approved by all members of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

PROPOSED CHANGE IN ROYAL STYLE AND TITLE—PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I sent him a copy of a statement with the cases, and the references in Wheare on the Statute of Westminster regarding the matter which came up yesterday afternoon, having to do with His Majesty's style and title. When he has had time to consider the question, will the minister give a reply, say next week?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think that the reply can be given at once. If the hon. member will look at Hansard of yesterday, I think he will find it was made quite clear that it was my view at least that under the Statute of Westminster no change in the royal style and title could be made without the unanimous affirmative action of the parliament of the United Kingdom and of the parliaments of the other units of the commonwealth, and that the abstention or refusal of any one of them would prevent the action of the others from being effective. I think that is also the doctrine which is expounded in the text book to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. CHURCH: And Hon. Howard Ferguson said in 1932 it would need the consent of all the provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question. Is it his intention to consult, or is it necessary for him to consult, with the provincial governments before he consults with the other dominions in reference to the change of His Majesty's style and title?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The only requirement of the Statute of Westminster is that there be concurrent action by the parliament of the United Kingdom and the central parliaments of the other nations of the British commonwealth. There is no requirement in the Statute of Westminster for consultation by the central government of one of the units of the commonwealth with the provincial governments of that unit.

CANADA STEAMSHIPS—ALLEGED REPUDIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Have representations been made to the minister or to the Department of Labour alleging that Canada Steamships Limited have repudiated in whole or in part the agreement made with its employees following the seamen's strike of last summer? If such representations have been made, has the minister investigated the complaint, and does he contemplate any action in the matter? As I did not give the minister notice of this question, it will be satisfactory to me if he will take this as notice.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I will answer my hon. friend right away. He knows the state of the industry and he knows the direction from which the question springs. I want to say to my hon. friend that in this dispute the Minister of Labour will accept his responsibilities as Minister of Labour.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not questioning that point.

STRIKE AT MASSEY-HARRIS PLANT, BRANTFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Has the Minister of Labour been advised of the work stoppage at the Massey-Harris plant at Brantford, to which his department authorized the movement of some two hundred Nova Scotians to take employment because of the current labour shortage? Will the minister's department make arrangements for the maintenance of the personnel taken from Nova Scotia to the Brantford area, for the duration of the work stoppage?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The unemployment of the men brought from Nova Scotia apparently is due to a shut-down of the Massey-Harris plant at Brantford, caused by a labour dispute. Disputes in industries of this nature come under the jurisdiction of the department of labour of the province of Ontario. Knowing the provincial minister, Hon. Mr. Daley, and the officials of his department as I do, I am sure this Brantford dispute will be dealt with promptly and justly. However, I have given instructions to the officials of my department to obtain information as to the extent of the work stoppage in question and its effect upon the men from Nova Scotia. I shall be glad to let my hon. friend have such information when it is received, but I should point out that the national employment service does not provide for the maintenance of men who have become idle because of labour disputes.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

QUALIFICATIONS OF APPLICANTS FOR ADMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I have not given him notice, but I do not think he will need it. On April 29 the minister announced that the Royal Military College of Canada would be opened in September, 1948. Will he assure the house that entrance to the college will be open to youth with matriculation; in other words, will he assure us it will be an educational as well as a purely service training institution?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): The present plan is that entrance to both Royal Roads and the Royal Military College, when opened again, will be senior matriculation or its equivalent.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION

CHANGE IN SYSTEM OF PRIORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether it is true that the War Assets Corporation has discontinued the priorities system as of yesterday, April 30. If so, what action has been taken with regard to requests for priorities already filed and not yet dealt with?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): A change has been made in the system of priorities; the premiers of the nine provinces were advised accordingly some weeks ago. There is no change in the system as it affects real estate and buildings. In connection with other material, priorities are honoured if the material is in stock at the time; but the old principle of listing priorities against future receipts has been abandoned. As far as existing priorities are concerned, if they have not been filled up to the present they will be subject to new applications at the time the material is received.

UNITED NATIONS

ACTION BY COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING ARTICLE 41 OF CHARTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what British commonwealth governments have introduced legislation purporting to give their governments powers similar to those contained in Bill 132, an act to amend the charter of the united nations? Normally this question would go on the order paper, but the urgency arises from the fact that this legislation may come up for consideration before an answer could be given to a question on the order paper.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary for State for External Affairs): Even Homer nods, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend asks what other government has introduced legislation to amend the charter of the united nations.

Mr. GRAYDON: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; that was the language my hon. friend used, and it is the language used in his written notice. That is why I say even Homer nods, because legislation to amend the charter of the united nations would not be competent to this parliament or to the parliament of any member of the British commonwealth.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was a typographical error.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is on the order paper a bill entitled "An act respecting article forty-one of the charter of the united nations," and I take it my hon. friend's question has to do with legislation of the character contained in the bill thus entitled.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought "Bill No. 132" would be sufficient to identify it to the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will have inquiry made in order to give my hon. friend not only the names of the units of the commonwealth where such legislation has been introduced, but also the dates and reference to the action of their respective governments and parliaments.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could that be done by tomorrow?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As soon as I received notice of my hon. friend's question I communicated with the legal adviser and asked him to get the answer ready just as soon as possible. He told me he could not have it for three o'clock today, but that he would use the utmost dispatch to get the material together.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

INQUIRY AS TO FIXING OF FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): Following the announcement yesterday of increases in the price ceilings of dairy products, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether consideration has been given to setting floor prices for dairy products.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Most of the prices announced yesterday were floor prices. The only exception, I think, was butter.

SUGAR BEETS

REFERENCE TO DIFFICULTY OF FACTORIES IN SECURING NECESSARY SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice. Have they been informed that the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company is having serious difficulty in signing beet contracts, and that on April 28 it had less than 25,000 acres signed up, hardly enough to supply one of the company's two sugar factories in 1947? If this is found to be the case, will the minister tell the house whether or not he is contemplating any action to meet the situation?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I had not been informed of the facts mentioned by my hon. friend, but I do not think the government is contemplating any particular action in the field to which he refers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask if it would be the intention of the government to permit one of these sugar factories to remain idle this year because of a shortage of sugar beets?

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF SELECT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): On April 2 the house appointed a select committee to review radio broadcasting and the reports of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. When is it the intention to call this committee together? It was appointed a month ago.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): The motion setting up the committee was passed prior to the Easter recess. Until today there has been no request by anyone to have the committee sit, but it is ready to be set up at any time.

CHEESE

SHIPMENTS UNDER UNITED KINGDOM AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): A moment ago the Minister of Agriculture announced that most of the dairy product prices mentioned yesterday were floor prices. Is it the intention of the government to requisition all the cheese made in Ontario and Quebec from April 1 until late this fall in order to fulfil our agreement with the United Kingdom? If so, is it the intention to take the cheese at the floor price instead of the ceiling price?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate that all the cheese of Ontario and Quebec will be taken to be sent to the British market. I assume the amount sent will be the surplus, which is usually about seventy per cent of the cheese produced in Canada. Any cheese which is taken will be taken at the floor price, which was announced yesterday. It will be bought at that price.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee had completed consideration of the orders in council referred to in the schedule. There is now before the committee the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), as follows:

That the schedule to Bill No. 104 as amended be further amended by printing therein the text in full of the orders in council numbered in the first column, as amended by those numbered in the fourth column in the said schedule.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): This would be expensive and, I submit, unnecessary. It would make a bulky volume of statutes for the year 1947. Not only have the orders in council been tabled, but they have been reduced to consolidated form and distributed. I do not believe there would be any demand on the part of the public to have them bound in the statutes. From time to time these orders in council will be subject to revocation, either in whole or in part, and the public would derive no advantage from having them published in the statutes.

The public of course should be able to pick up the volume of the statutes and see what any piece of permanent legislation is. But the publication of these orders in council does not give the public that information, because of the power of revocation contained in the legislation itself. I think it would be a mistake to publish all these orders in council, for the reasons I have stated.

Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the schedule as amended in committee carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to offer to one of the orders in council which has been carried. I refer to P.C. 7475, which appears in the schedule at page 4 of the bill. The day before yesterday an order in council was passed amending the regulations of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation so as to make it clear that in certain instances the government may recover subsidies, whether they are payable by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation or by other departments or agencies of government. Therefore I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to this act in the column entitled "Amending orders in council" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 7475 of 26 August, 1942, and immediately beneath the figures "390 31/1/47":

"P.C. No.	Date
1711	29/4/47"

I may have made my explanation too concise, but I shall be glad to answer any questions about it.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 2, 4 and 7 of the bill have not yet been carried. The committee will now proceed to consider section 2.

On section 2—Orders and regulations continued in force.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move the following amendment:

That section 2 of the act be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) Notwithstanding subsection one of this section, the orders and regulations specified in the said schedule shall be read and construed as if the provisions set forth in the column of the said schedule entitled 'Amendments' had been duly enacted as amendment thereto to take effect from the commencement of this act."

It is obvious to hon. members who have followed my language that the addition of this subsection becomes necessary as a result of amendments to the schedule.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I point out that an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). While I have no desire to press the amendment, my recollection is that it was moved, and that there was a request that it be allowed to stand. Perhaps the Chair would inform the committee as to whether or not such an amendment is before us.

Mr. FLEMING: I think that was an amendment to section 4.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was section 2, and it was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver North.

The CHAIRMAN: I have been handed an amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North, as follows:

Wherever the word minister is used in the schedule to this act, the rights, powers, duties, liabilities and functions of that minister shall extend and apply to such boards, and other public bodies, officers, subjects, services and properties of the crown as may be designated or assigned to the minister by the governor in council over which the minister shall have the control, regulation, management and supervision.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot accept that amendment, worded as it is. If there were any demand for such an amendment it could be accepted in different terms, but I submit that no amendment is necessary. Some of the orders do contain provisions that the boards shall be subject to the direction of the minister, but the minister is charged in every case with the responsibility of administering these orders. I submit that nothing would be gained by making any amendment, and I would prefer that no amendment be made. I think I should say that I have had some conversation with the hon. member for Vancouver North and I have explained my point of view. While I cannot say that it is agreeable to him, nevertheless I do not think he would be insistent upon the amendment being made in the light of the explanations that I have given him.

Amendment negatived.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Orders and regulations may be revoked.

Mr. KNOWLES: The amendment which you have in your hand, Mr. Chairman, is recorded in Hansard of April 17 at page 2130. I would point out that the day after it was moved the Minister of Justice suggested an alternative wording. I should like to ask the consent of the committee to withdraw the amendment recorded on April 17, so that I can move the wording suggested by the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. KNOWLES: I now move:

That section four of the act be amended by adding thereto the following:

Provided that notwithstanding anything in this section no provision of any order or regulation of the governor in council specified in the part of the schedule to this act entitled "wartime prices and trade board" shall be revoked by the governor in council unless addresses have been presented to the governor general by the Senate and the House of Commons praying that such provision be revoked.

In order to make the meaning of this amendment more clear, I should like to repeat the wording which I used before, which was as follows:

Provided, however, that none of the orders listed in the schedule to this act under the section headed wartime prices and trade board may be revoked without the consent of parliament.

The purpose of this amendment is to give parliament an opportunity to put a brake upon the government with respect to decontrol in the field of prices. It is clear that it is not possible to prohibit the government or the wartime prices and trade board from changing price ceilings and doing other things allowed under the provisions of the order, but some of us feel that it should be made clear that the whole price control structure should not be subject to revocation by the government without the consent of parliament. In other words, there are two matters at stake here. One is the supremacy of parliament over the government with respect to this matter, and the other is the attempt on the part of the house to make known its will to the government.

Speaking about this matter before, the Minister of Justice stated, quite correctly, that even if this amendment were to pass—and I appreciate his offer to put it to a free vote—it would still be possible for the wartime prices and trade board to scuttle most of this machinery and its effectiveness.

Mr. MERRITT: All of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, that is true, for all that this would require is that the order in council be kept on the statute books. It would have no legally binding effect, but it would have a moral effect. After all, in the relations between parliament and the government there is such a thing as good faith, and that is the basis of my amendment. I believe that if parliament passed this amendment, the government would recognize what it means and would feel bound to reconsider its attitude toward price decontrol.

If the need for slowing down price decontrol was ever demonstrated, it was demonstrated in this House of Commons within the last two days. The night before last we were told of tax reductions soon to take place; in fact the wording used suggested that there were to be "slashes" in income taxation. But when one looks into the matter he finds that a married man with a wife and two children earning $150 a month will—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is referring to a debate during the present session on another subject.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not quoting from any other debate. I am simply—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the words used in the rule are "referred to". The rules of the house prevent an hon. member from referring to a debate on another subject.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the point of order, there is still another ground; the hon. member is referring to the terms of another resolution on the order paper.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order if he is referring to the terms of another resolution. In any event he is referring to another debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was speaking about price control, and I wanted to refer to the price of one commodity, namely, butter. An announcement was made yesterday in this house that the ceiling on the price of butter had been increased to permit an increase in the price of ten cents per pound. I have before me a government publication put out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare which contains statistics showing that the average consumption of butter by families in this country is 2.3 pounds per week, the average family in this case being four persons. The announcement made yesterday afternoon means that twenty-three cents per week, effective immediately, will be taken away from the average family. I was trying to compare that with the nineteen cents a week which was given to a married man with two children earning $150 a month according to the announcement made in this house the night before last, effective two months hence.

It is that sort of thing—nineteen cents to be given two months hence and twenty-three cents to be taken away immediately—that presents this parliament with the issue which is summed up in this amendment. Are we satisfied to let the government go on with its headlong policy of price decontrol, or do we want in the name of the Canadian people to put some kind of brake upon that policy? I have in mind as well the fact that half the wage earners in Canada are in income brackets where they do not pay any income tax at all. They do not get even nineteen cents increase in their net income, but they have to pay this increased price which will amount to twenty-three cents a week, and that comes all at one crack.

I could discuss other items, but I am not going to—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: —for the simple reason that I want that one to stand out, if I may say so, to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because there is the issue put clearly by what has happened in the house in the last two days. I call upon hon. members to accept the opportunity which has been given to us by the Minister of Justice for a free vote, and pass this amendment as an attempt to put a brake upon the government with regard to its headlong policy of price decontrol.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend is putting his amendment on the ground that he is condemning the policy of the government, I certainly will vote against it; but I stand by what I said, that any hon. member can vote exactly as he wishes on this amendment. I do not accept for one minute the meaning of an affirmative vote that the hon. gentleman gives to it. By his language he is attempting almost to turn this into a vote of censure, and that is not my understanding of what the effect of this vote would be. The only reason I am accepting this, if the committee wants to do it—and I am not going to vote for it myself, because I do not see that it accomplishes a thing—is that it does not make any practical difference in the situation, and the matter of good faith will not come into it at all. We feel that we must have some freedom in the matter of decontrol. If the amendment goes through, we shall accept our responsibility, just as we shall if it does not. The administration of the orders may go on just as it has in the past. I have defended and now defend the policy which the government is following. I know my hon. friend's view is that we are proceeding too rapidly. Many other hon. members of the committee say that we are proceeding too slowly. We think we are proceeding about in the way in which we should proceed. I have full cognizance of my hon. friend's views in the matter, but I cannot accept his advance interpretation of what the result of this free vote will be.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have just one other word to say, and it is this. Speaking on this matter a few days ago the minister said that support of this amendment would be commendation of the work of the wartime prices and trade board. Perhaps he used the word "affirmation" but at any rate it was in that tone. If the passing of this amendment expresses confidence in the work of the wartime prices and trade board in regard to price controls, then it can be inferred that we are asking for the continuation of the good work it did during the war years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to say just a word or two. There is a ground on which this amendment is particularly important. It is not as trivial and as simple a matter as the Minister of Justice seemed to imply in what he said. It does have practical value, for the reason that it puts in the hands of parliament the decision which parliament must take. As the bill stands at the present time, if it is not amended the government tomorrow may pass an order in council throwing out the wartime prices and trade board altogether. I am not saying they will do that tomorrow, but they could. The reason we should like to see this matter decided in parliament rather than in the cabinet itself is that there are members on the other side of the house who are not in agreement with what the government is doing at the present time in the matter of decontrol.

When the minister says that a vote on this amendment may amount to a vote of censure, he may be perfectly correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: Excuse me: I did not say that, and I do not say that. I am saying that the language of my hon. friend almost asks that the vote be considered as such, and I do not accept that for one minute. Hon. members may vote as they like on this motion, but the vote will certainly not be regarded by the government as any criticism whatever of the course the government is taking.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The minister is welcome to take any interpretation he likes.

Mr. ILSLEY: So long as I may, that is all right. I do not want any question of bad faith arising.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to point out clearly that it is not a question of party politics; it is not one particular group in the house urging some point raised by that group, because I have in my hand a copy of the debates of April 2 in which the hon. member for Bonaventure, speaking on this bill, used these words—and if it cannot be taken as censure I do not know what it can be taken as. At page 1978 of Hansard he said:

> Not only does it mean the retention for the time being of such controls as we know to be beneficial to the Canadian people in order to hold and stabilize our post-war economy, but in many cases it also means the reimposition of some of the controls which have been lifted. I shall go still farther—and I am in good company, along with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and many other hon. members—and say that I believe that it is possible —it should be possible—to devise some means whereby we shall never return to the old system of control by private enterprise to the detriment of the common people of Canada.

That is what he had to say so far as price controls were concerned, and it is certainly not in line with what the government is doing at the present time.

Speaking on April 17, as found at page 2143 of Hansard, the hon. member for Fraser Valley used these words:

> I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he said that this government and no other government dare take off these controls, but they are taking them off bit by bit and we see the profits that are being made as quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar yesterday and as quoted in the Star today. The United States is admitting that they cannot control prices as the present time.

Further on he said this:

> I want these controls to be more effective. I want some controls to be restored.

These are two members sitting on the government side of the house who spoke plainly in opposition to the present stated policy of the government. They said in their speeches that there were many other hon. members—I do not know whether they meant many hon. members on this side of the house or on the other side of the house, but I presume they meant their colleagues on the other side—who took the same attitude. If that is so; if there are many private members on the other side of the house who feel as these hon. members did, then there is a good reason why the final decision must be left to the house as to the length of time during which the wartime prices and trade board shall operate. A vote of this sort—and I should be very happy if all hon. members were in their places to take part in it—would reveal to the government a rather different type of attitude from the one they are taking at the present time on the question of decontrol. I therefore urge strongly that every hon. member be available to express his opinion on this amendment.

Mr. SHAW: I should like one or two matters cleared up. Am I correct in assuming that even though the committee may pass this amendment, legally it does not bind the government in any way whatsoever? Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not deprive the government of freedom to decontrol, because within the framework of the existing orders in council, board orders, administrators' orders and controllers' orders may be made which will carry out the process of decontrol. The only things that must remain are the orders in council themselves, which will stay there until voted by the presentation of these addresses. I made careful inquiries to ascertain whether there would be any real restriction upon freedom to remove ceilings, for example, or to raise ceilings, or to take any other step in the process of decontrol, and I was told that there was none. However, the wartime prices and trade board would have to remain in existence until the orders in council were removed either by the lapse of time or by the action of parliament. Therefore I think the motion accomplishes nothing. However, as I have said, if members want to vote for it we have no objection. It is a direction that the board must remain there for at least that length of time. I am satisfied that it will remain there for that length of time; I am satisfied that it will have to, and that the rental control organization and certain other organizations which derive their existence from these orders in council must remain there for the period provided in the act or until parliament itself would do away with these organizations. Therefore the government will not be embarrassed by the amendment, but it must be made clear that the amendment is not accepted by the government as in any sense a criticism or censure of the policies which it has followed. I do not think it has any bearing one way or the other on confidence in the government or approval of its policies.

Mr. SHAW: Am I correct in assuming that the sponsor desires through this amendment to prevent the government from making any changes whatsoever in the direction of decontrol between the time of prorogation of this parliament and the commencement of the next session?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, that could not be done by this amendment.

Mr. TUCKER: If the government may make any changes in regard to decontrol what would be the object of keeping the board in being and paying them salaries when they might have nothing to do?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is interesting to be in the position of having to answer questions instead of ask them. I thought I had answered that one before, Mr. Chairman. I will try to say it again in a tone of voice less offensive to the minister, although I still feel strongly about the matter. I suggest that if parliament passes this amendment, as I hope it will, and thereby expresses its approval of the job done by the wartime prices and trade board, that will be at least an indication to the government that parliament wants price control continued and a serious effort made by the government through the wartime prices and trade board to prevent increases in prices such as have been taking place in recent weeks. That is the issue before the committee.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: yeas, 14; nays, 63.

Mrs. STRUM: We have not enough votes to carry amendments or to defeat the government, but we would be failing in our duty if we did not express the protests of the people in our constituencies against government action in the matter of price control.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. This clause does not in my opinion permit of a full discussion of price control. According to the standing order all discussion in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. This clause has to do with revocation. I will read it:

> The governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation continued in force by or made under this act.

It is a question of the power of revocation.

Mr. MacINNIS: If revocation of the order can be discussed, Mr. Chairman, how can one possibly discuss revocation without discussing the order itself and the matters that come under it? As this covers all the orders I submit that all the matters dealt with in the orders are open to discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not intend to prevent the hon. member from referring to the orders or regulations, but her references should be in relation to the power of revocation.

Mrs. STRUM: I am not, of course, an authority on procedure, but I understood that this was the key clause covering all the orders and their revocation in whole or in part. I may have misunderstood the wording, but I understood that this was the key which leads to all the orders and all parts of all the orders, and I interpreted this clause as being the one on which you could discuss the revocation of price controls.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it that that is correct.

Mrs. STRUM: That is what I wished to discuss, the revocation of price control orders. Am I in order in doing that, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is in order.

Mrs. STRUM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have been alarmed at the publicity being released recently by the wartime prices and and trade board which would give us to understand that prices in Canada must follow the price levels in the United States. I could quote speeches from various persons now in the employ of the department, and I must say that this publicity is to me alarming because we all know that price levels in the United States are alarming not only to us but to the people of that country. I plead with the government to protect the Canadian consumer to a much greater extent through these orders which clause 4 would give the government the power to revoke in whole or in part.

Last year on July 5 the then minister of finance made an extended statement in the House of Commons on the need for having emergency control. At the time he made that announcement he was restoring the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar, and speaking of the need for controlling prices and thereby safeguarding the Canadian consumer he said at page 3180 of Hansard:

Perhaps the greatest threat to the stability of prices in Canada comes from the rise in prices in the United States and, to a lesser extent, in other countries.

Then he outlined four different steps which the government was taking to safeguard the Canadian consumer against those price rises in the United States.

But since that time two things have happened. Prices in the United States have continued to rise, and Canada has gone a long way in her policy of decontrol. The question I am now asking the government is this: Does it propose to allow Canadian prices to continue to follow the pattern of prices in the United States? If so, what technique does it intend to use (a) to raise the wages of workers in Canada to the same level as wages in the United States; (b) to raise the level of farm prices to the same level as farm prices in the United States, and (c) to provide purchasing power for persons of small fixed income such as civil servants, pensioners, and perhaps those living on small annuities or the income from small investments?

Speaking of the prices in the United States, the president of that country almost every day warns business that they must not and cannot continue to exploit the consumer. We hear statements like these, which appeared in the Toronto Star of April 21:

President Truman today warned business leaders that continuation of present high prices threatens the nation with an "economic cloudburst."

"If we are to avoid a recession . . . prices must be brought down. Present business conditions permit, in fact, they require lower prices in many important fields. There is one sure formula for bringing on a depression or a recession. That is to maintain excessively high prices. Buying stops, production drops, unemployment sets in, prices collapse, profits vanish, business men fail.

I believe that we as a nation can prevent this economic cloudburst. But it requires prompt, preventive steps."

But it was at the doorstep of business that he laid the greater responsibility for preventing a depression. To business he said:

[Mrs. Strum.]

"If we are to avoid a recession we must act before it starts.

Profits in the aggregate are breaking all records. In 1946, corporate profits, after taxes, were 33 per cent higher than in 1945. In the first quarters of 1947 they ran even higher."

"There are some who say that prices are not too high so long as buying stays at high levels. From the human standpoint, I reject this argument. It provides no answer to those living on fixed incomes, such as teachers, civil servants and widows. It provides no answer to those veterans who must pay substantially more for houses than they are able to afford."

"Our system of private enterprise is now being tested before the world. If we ignore the needs and shirk the responsibilities of our economy, we shall lose both our power to help others and our capacity to inspire others."

This is what President Truman thinks of the economic policy of the United States. I submit to the government that we have the machinery to control the profits of industry, but we are gradually throwing it out the window and allowing business to take the place of government. We should be unworthy of our responsibility as representatives of the people if we did not object to that under this clause.

I now wish to put on the record the difference between Canadian food costs and United States food costs; because if we are to allow our prices to reach the levels of the United States prices, this is what we can expect in the matter of price increases in the various articles of diet. These Canadian figures are taken from chain store advertisements of April 2, 1947, in the Ottawa Journal, and the United States figures from a quotation by Mrs. Douglas, congresswoman from California, and placed on the record on April 2, 1947. With the permission of the house I should like to place this table on Hansard. The figures are as follows:

Comparison of Food Prices
U.S.A. and Canada

	U.S. Mar. 12	Can. Apr. 2	Difference Price	Per cent
Flour	.08½	.06½	.02	30.7
Butter ...	.82	.45	.37	82·2
Milk	.17	.15	.02	13·3
Eggs	.69	.44	.25	56·8
Pork chops	.73	.49	.26	....
Bacon ...	.79	.59	.20	33·8
Shortening	.42	.21	.21	100·0
Coffee ...	.49	.49	.00	....
Peas	.19	.13	.06	46·1

Soap chips	.34	.24	.08	41·6
Sausage ..	.49	.32	.17	53·1

That gives us an indication of what we can expect in the rise in the cost of living if we accept the fact that our prices must reach the levels which prices have now reached in the United States.

What about the difference in wages? Here are some wages in the industries of manufacturing, electrical machinery, furniture, automobiles, iron and steel; and with permission of the committee I should like to place this table on Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mrs. STRUM: All right; I will read them, then. The figures are as follows:

Per Capita Weekly Earnings
December 1946

Industry	U.S.[1]	Can.[2]	Difference	Per cent
Manufacturing	$46.83	$34.54	$12.29	35·6
Electrical Machinery..	49.23	35.69	13.54	37·9

[2]Can. figures from Labour Gazette, March, 1947.

What about farm prices? What are we going to do about them? If you accept the United States structure, then you are going to have to go back and revoke your treaties with the British government and you are going to have to allow the farmer these increases in his prices. These are the prices as at Chicago and Winnipeg, and are the latest figures available:

Commodity	United States	Canada	Difference
Oats	$ .87	$ .65	$ .22
Wheat	2.89	1.55	1.34
Barley	1.61	.93	.68
Hogs	26.50	21.60	4.90
Beef	24.75	14.50	10.25
Flax	7.50	3.25	4.25

I ask the government to tell us if they are going to allow farm prices to follow the level of farm prices in the United States; is that what they believe in? The policy of the government is based on two premises, both of which are faulty. They say that volume will reduce prices. That is not being experienced either in the United States or in Canada. They say that the buyer can strike. Well, what happens when the buyer strikes? The buyer punishes two groups of people. The buyer withdraws his purchasing power and punishes the manufacturer who has the privilege of putting the ticket on the goods; but he also puts out of work the people employed in that industry. Already that has begun to happen in the United States, where we have seen some industries close for the first time in eight years. I submit that is a stupid, clumsy and wasteful method of punishing big business for taking excessive profits.

If we have to go through another depression in order to reduce prices I think we shall have failed in our duty as members of this parliament, because we had all the machinery for price control and the people of this country had confidence in it. Again and again the ministers have told us that it worked, that it saved the consumer millions of dollars, that it saved us from inflation, that it saved us from all the evils of an unregulated economy in war time. And while the government may say that, as a nation, the emergency is over, I wish to say that for the individual the emergency is just beginning. I have in my hand two letters from old age pensioners in Vancouver. In the last one, which I received only yesterday, the writer says:

> Also I may say the rent situation is a disgrace.
> This is since the controls were taken off.
> In this house room rents were raised from $3 weekly to $7 weekly. They are ordinary rooms, no proper facilities for washing, one bath and toilet for fourteen people, and no one bothered to do anything about it.

In the same letter she tells me that large department stores such as David Spencer, Woodward and Hudson's Bay are now discharging people sixty-five years old, and that all married women over thirty-five are being discharged and refused work. So we are tightening up on the labour situation; we are letting rents go up; we are letting butter reach 60 cents a pound; we are taking the subsidy off milk. At the same time we can give almost half a million dollars to Crane, so that we enlarge their plant facilities in order that they may extend their output, and then we take off price control to let them set the price on their plumbing fixtures, though they are a monopoly and part of a cartel arrangement. I say to the government that if through this measure they now render abortive the remaining section of our price control machinery, they shall deserve the trouncing they will get at the next election.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not rendering any machinery abortive at all by this legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT: You did when you voted down that amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friends had better not go out and say that. I am afraid that is just what they will try to do, but it is not so. I may never get an opportunity to answer their speeches, so I will just have to answer them in advance, here. That amendment did not mean anything, and if it is going to be used as a basis of political attack on the government, it will be an unworthy attack. I agree with the hon. member who just took her seat that care should be exercised in our decontrol, and the only point I am making now is that by enacting this section we are not doing anything, nor did the members of this house on a free vote, by defeating the amendment, do anything whatever to lessen the effectiveness of our price control.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE OF RATIO OF LOAN TO LENDING VALUE UNDER PART I, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and more particularly:

To increase the ratio of loan to lending value under part I of the act, to include under part I houses having two family housing units, of which one is to be occupied by the owner, to extend the period of amortization of home ownership and rental housing project loans to thirty years, to empower life insurance, trust and loan companies to purchase, improve and sell land to be used for residential housing developments, and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee to such companies the return of the principal invested in such land and improvements, together with interest thereon at a rate not to exceed two per centum per annum.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I thought the minister was going to make a statement.

Mr. HOWE: This resolution proposes amendments to the National Housing Act. When speaking to this house on February 7 I dealt in some detail with the housing situation. It does not seem necessary, therefore, for me to deal with housing exhaustively at this time. However, it might be well for me to review the reasons for introducing changes to the National Housing Act this year after substantial amendments were made at the last session. The amendments which we now propose are occasioned by changed conditions. The price to the home owner and the cost to the builder of new residential construction is considerably higher today than it was a year ago. On the average, prospective home owners appear to have rather less cash available for down payment than they did a year ago. There is an increasing number of cases where the income of the prospective home owner is insufficient to meet the monthly financing charges and taxes.

We need a larger amount of rental housing. Although there is still considerable demand for home ownership, the majority of families seeking accommodation are looking for rented premises. I dealt with the need for rental housing in some detail on March 25 when tabling in the house the order in council providing for accelerated depreciation and priorities to stimulate the volume of rental housing. The fundamental reason for the lack of activity in this field is that capital costs appear excessive to the investor in rental housing. It is perfectly true that economic rentals are being allowed by the rentals control for new rental housing. These fixed rentals are considerably higher than rentals on comparable property in the immediate area. The encouragement by way of priorities and accelerated depreciation, as well as our intention to provide a longer term of amortization, make the financing of this type of housing more attractive, but do not overcome the fundamental reservation of the builder or owner that his capital investment will be extraordinarily high in relation to comparable property built a few years ago. The only solution, satisfactory to the owner or builder, is some manner by which these capital costs can be reduced. Such reduction does not seem in immediate prospect.

We fully appreciate that the troubles which beset housing at the present time are physical rather than financial. We also know it is not possible by financial means to create housing if owners and builders consider that the costs are far too high. Nevertheless we do feel that the National Housing Act must be amended in keeping with the present situation and anticipated needs. It is on account of the changed conditions which I have briefly outlined, and because we wish the National Housing Act to be fully effective, that we are introducing amendments for the consideration of the house at this time.

I will now outline the main amendments to the National Housing Act, which will be contained in the bill.

We propose an increase in the ratio of loan to lending value under part I of the act. The ratios at present involve a 90 per cent loan on a $4,000 lending value, grading down to an 83 per cent loan on a lending value of $6,000. We propose that where there is some control on the end sale price of the house to the home owner, the ratio of loan on a $3,000 lending value shall be 95 per cent, grading down to 90 per cent on a $6,000 lending value.

Up to now, a duplex has been financed under part II of the act as rental housing. We propose to finance the construction of a two-family unit on a home ownership basis, provided that the owner occupies one of the units. In many respects this type of housing has more of the aspects of home ownership than rental housing. The effect of the change will be to allow rather larger loans on owner occupied duplexes than has been the case in the past.

We propose an extension of the period of amortization in respect of both home ownership and rental housing loans. The purpose of the change is to effect a reduction in the monthly payments of the home owner and thereby permit people with smaller incomes to enter into the home ownership class. The effect of a longer period of amortization on rental housing loans will be to make the investment in rental housing more attractive by a reduction in the monthly debt service.

In an effort to assist in meeting the need caused by the shortage of serviced land, we propose that the lending institutions be vested with power to buy land and service it for sale to prospective home owners and builders. Some municipalities are reluctant to service fringe area land. As a result, a builder must finance the building up to the stage of the first mortgage advance, and also pay for the installed services. By this measure we hope to ease the shortage of land, and to assist the builder by reducing his working capital requirements. The government will guarantee the lending institutions against loss with respect to land so assembled, and in turn will control the sale price to the prospective home owner. I will deal with this proposal in detail at the time of the second reading of the bill. In addition to the provisions which I have outlined, it is proposed by the bill to add to the National Housing Act a section which will empower the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make a direct loan to a borrower to assist in the construction of a house or a rental housing project.

The act already authorizes the corporation to make loans to limited dividend companies, and loans to mining, lumbering, logging and fishing companies to contruct housing projects. The proposed section differs from these in that it enters the field already occupied by joint lending. The reason for the proposed amendment is that the lending institutions feel that to increase the ratio of loan to lending value and increase the period of amortization opens up a field not attractive to them. They have expressed reluctance to the proposed changes, with respect to both the higher ratio loans and the longer period of amortization for home owners. The section would also make it possible for the corporation to make loans in areas where the lending institutions are hesitant to make loans. We consider that the corporation should be empowered to make direct loans when joint loans are not available, so that the facilities of the National Housing Act will always be available.

The bill will propose two other changes which are technical in character rather than ones which involve basic principles. We will be seeking authority for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to convey property which it is administering for the crown. We have in mind particularly Wartime Housing units which are being sold to tenants. The transfer of property from the crown by letters patent is cumbersome, laborious and slow. This will be particularly applicable with respect to the transfer or conveyancing of a large number of small lots upon which Wartime Housing units have been built. Comparable authority is held by the Canadian farm loan board and the director of the Veterans' Land Act.

Finally, we will ask for a procedural amendment whereby the corporation will report upon the operations of the National Housing Act at the same time and in the same fashion as it reports on its own corporate operations.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, with respect to this resolution to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, I for one feel that the facilities of the act should be extended into the field of subsidized housing. Housing is one of Canada's most urgent problems. When one realizes that a large percentage of the residents of this country live in quarters leased from landlords, he cannot help recognizing that the number of houses actually owned by Canadians is altogether too small. According to the Canada Year Book for 1941, the census figures show that in urban centres owner-occupied dwellings represented only forty per cent of all occupied dwellings in Canada. In the large cities the situation is even worse. According to the tenants' league, more than eighty per cent of the families resident in Montreal are tenants. Most of these people are tenants, not of their own choosing but because they have not had sufficient income to provide homes for themselves.

The Curtis report of 1943 on housing stated that two-thirds of the Canadian people cannot afford rentals exceeding $25 a month. This group, which represents 66⅔ per cent of Canada's population, obviously cannot afford, on their present incomes, to buy or to build homes sufficient for their own needs. Almost every family in Canada would like to own a home of its own.

Wartime housing is a type of subsidized housing, but is not so in the strictest sense of the word. Even at that, it is inadequate to meet the needs of Canada's growing population. It is a selective enterprise providing housing for only a small part of the veteran group who are desirous of obtaining homes.

If homes are to be provided for the low income group, comprising two-thirds of Canada's population, it seems apparent that the government must adopt a programme of subsidized housing similar to that in countries such as Sweden, Denmark and the United Kingdom. Only by such a programme can the needs of our citizens be met.

I do not propose at this time to discuss the housing programmes embarked upon by the governments of these countries. But I wish to emphasize the great need of such a programme in Canada. Present inducements to builders and to investors appear wholly inadequate to provide the type of low-cost housing which the majority of Canadians require.

Housing is still one of Canada's most acute shortages. The situation has been aggravated by the return of veterans who are seeking to set up households; and by others, too, who are endeavouring to obtain separate accommodation, after doubling up during the long and terrible war years. This shortage will probably remain with us longer than any other, if the backlog of housing construction contracts is any indication. In order properly to appreciate the problem, one must review housing construction in this country for the past two decades. In the ten years prior to the outbreak of the war, economic conditions were so bad that people were unable to provide sufficient capital with which to build or purchase homes. As a consequence, many were forced to double up with friends or relatives. When war production began many families moved to the larger centres to seek employment and this taxed the available housing accommodation in those centres. In a short time the demand for shelter exceeded the available supply.

For years housing construction has lagged in Canada because there was no government subsidized building programme. As an example, in 1933 only 14,000 housing units were built in Canada and in the year of the outbreak of the war, 1939 only 39,000 housing units were erected. These hardly took care of the demand created by the natural increase in population. I believe that this in itself is sufficient proof that low-cost housing cannot be provided without some scheme of subsidized housing on the part of the government. Canada entered the war years with a housing deficiency and even in pre-war years many of our people were living in very close quarters.

Because of the improvement in economic conditions brought about by war production, the marriage rate increased and new families demanded homes. At the conclusion of the world conflict thousands of young veterans returned home intent on marriage or accompanied by European brides and hoping to set up homes here in Canada. Many of those young men are still seeking suitable shelter. Canada is now entering a period of reconstruction and housing is one of our greatest needs. Construction costs today are prohibitive for those in the low income group and without government assistance there is little hope that these people will ever have decent homes. The government must take the leadership in this matter, so that Canadians, whether rich or poor, may be able to secure homes of their own.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe that hon. members in all sections of the house will welcome a resolution that will help relieve Canada's mounting housing problem, but a resolution of this kind should not be allowed to pass without the administration being requested to change its policy and to proceed in another direction. I do not think there can be any disagreement with regard to the proposal made by the minister with respect to increasing the ratio of loans to lending value; secondly, to including under part I houses having two housing units, third, to extending the period of amortization and, fourth, to providing facilities so that direct loans can be made.

I presume that under the fourth proposal made by the minister it will be possible for the citizens in rural sections to take advantage of the National Housing Act. A year ago I had some experience with the administration here in connection with attempting to get clearance for loans on rural housing, but the machinery is so complicated that I do not think any loans have been approved up to date in the part of the country in which I live. I feel that we should offer as vigorous a protest as possible against the proposal that we empower life insurance, trust and loan companies to purchase, improve and sell land to be used for residential housing developments, and authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee such companies the return of the principal invested in such land and improvements, together with interest thereon at a rate not to exceed two per centum per annum.

Here is another example of a democratic government handing over to private organizations outside parliament responsibilities which should be assumed by either the federal authority, the provincial authority or the municipal authority. The fact is that the municipal and provincial authorities have not the financial resources with which to embark on a building programme that would meet Canada's need, but the dominion authority proved, during the period of the war, that we did not lack man-power and that we had plenty of materials and financial resources to do whatever was physically possible.

I can recall when the minister was receiving criticism because Canada had failed to produce engines for our planes. As I recall it, he pointed out that to embark on an engine production programme would tie up 8,000 men for two years and there would be no guarantee that at the end of that time the engines which would be produced would be satisfactory. The minister stated, and quite correctly, that after careful review it had been decided that rather than tie up 8,000 men for that period and use large quantities of materials it was better to make a deal with United States manufacturers who were prepared to guarantee that we would have engines for all the planes that could be manufactured. But never once during that discussion did the minister say that Canada did not have the financial resources or the material resources; it was a matter of using our material to the best advantage.

The government should lead the way in demonstrating to the country that we can repeat wartime performances now, that we can build houses for our people, that the question of need will be the determining factor rather than the amount of money that may be available. I suggest that if the minister were prepared to go as far to meet the desires of the provincial and municipal authorities as he is prepared to go to meet the life insurance and other lending institutions we would make greater progress. His statements to date would indicate that private enterprise is not prepared to build housing on a rental basis for much less than $70 a month. As the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) has pointed out, at least two-thirds of the Canadian people are not in a financial position to take advantage of that type of housing.

I have here a brief which was submitted by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities to the special committee of the House of Commons on reconstruction and reestablishment which sat in May, 1942. I find that at that time this organization was giving careful consideration to housing as a post-war undertaking. Its brief points out:

In the 1941 census, 25 Canadian cities housing a population of 30,000 and over, were subjected to a housing survey. Based on returns from every tenth dwelling, the survey revealed that 61·5 per cent of the people of these cities lived in rented quarters; 38·5 per cent were home owners. Of the tenant homes, 53·6 per cent paid less than $25 rent monthly; 36·3 per cent less than $20; and 16·5 per cent less than $15. Nearly 42 per cent of all the houses, both rented and owned, were built of wood, and 20 per cent of the total were obviously in need of exterior repairs. More than 17 per cent had neither bath nor shower; 4·5 per cent depended on outside toilet facilities; and nearly 10 per cent shared toilet facilities with others. Thirty per cent had no means of refrigeration, either mechanical or ice.

When it is remembered that these figures included returns from both large and small cities, from cities a century and more old, as well as cities that have come into being during comparatively recent years, it is understandable that the returns from some of the cities show an even more aggravated and serious state of affairs than the inclusive and over-all facts undoubtedly reveal. For instance, bearing in mind the type of dwelling likely to be available at a rental cost of less than $15 per month, the survey showed that 25·5 per cent of the total households in Hull were in this category; 25 per cent in Saint John, New Brunswick; 15·7 per cent in Montreal; 15·1 per cent in Sherbrooke; 15 per cent in Saskatoon; with proportionately large percentages in other Canadian municipalities.

There can be no doubt that an alarming and acute housing crisis has been piling up and awaits urgent action in the immediate post-war years. Decent housing accommodation for low-wage income families remains the unresolved major problem of our urban committee.

Universal experience, confirmed by Canadian experience, testifies to the fact that unassisted private enterprise has been unable to provide decent housing for those of low income.

In order that a large proportion of Canadian urban families should not continue to live in unfit dwellings, and in order to supply the urgent need for housing facilities, conforming to an acceptable minimum standard, for the low-income groups, and thus to attack the serious problems of health, welfare and order, which are directly related to inadequate housing, we believe that:

1. A bold national policy should be adopted for rehousing the low income groups at acecptable minimum standards, as a cooperative undertaking among federal, provincial and local gov ernments and private enterprise.

This policy should be designed to stimulate local initiative, recognize local circumstances, and vest the control in a properly constituted local housing authority.

2. The federal government should extend, in accordance with local needs, financial assistance to local authorities, conditioned on the existence of a comprehensive town plan and housing programme meeting satisfactory standards.

3. The appropriate federal housing agency or department should extend capital grants, long-term, low-interest loans, or annual rent subsidies to cities, in order to permit them to carry out a local housing programme.

4. The federal government should also extend and provide long-term low-interest loans, up to 90 per cent of the loanable value (say with a maximum of $6,000), for housing purposes to individual home builders and building societies.

5. A model provincial housing law should be prepared, to enable local communities to take part in a national housing programme, and to carry out community rehousing programmes, in which public and private groups can cooperate. The provinces should be encouraged to enact legislation in conformity with such a model provincial housing.

6. Finally, municipal authorities should consider the reduction of the rate of taxation on buildings and the corresponding increase of such rates on land, in order to lower the tax burden on home owners and the occupants of low-rent houses, and to stimulate rehabilitation of blighted areas and slums.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these carefully prepared recommendations submitted by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities should have been the basis for these proposed amendments rather than representations which are designed to benefit the insurance and lending institutions. I submit that the type of housing which will be brought into being as a result of the concessions to the insurance companies will be available for the top third of the Canadian people who would be able to get housing somehow or another even without this legislation. I admit that they might have to pay more but they would be able to find some housing. The people in the lower brackets, at least two-thirds of the Canadian people, are still not going to be able to get any assistance from the type of legislation the minister has brought before us today.

A few years ago I visited some of the housing projects in the United States which were made possible through the cooperation of the federal government and local authorities. In New York city I had an opportunity to compare the publicly owned houses and those built by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. It is true that the Parkchester development in New York by the Metropolitan Life was a good deal better than anything that had been undertaken by private companies up to that time. They cleared out quite a large slum area and made houses available at lower rents than are prevailing in similar apartment blocks in New York. But the rates are still so high that the people in the lowest income bracket are not able to take advantage of the legislation; whereas in the Vladeck houses built by the New York city housing authority five-roomed apartments were made available for $6 a week, for people with low incomes, as a result of the federal government of the United States recognizing that maintaining slum areas places a heavy burden on all the people. If you enable slum dwellers to live in modern houses which are well built, well heated, with playgrounds and modern facilities, you will decrease your crime costs, fire hazards, health costs and, in general, make a better citizen. I am sorry to see that in the United States the experience gained while the late President Roosevelt was at the helm is not being used. But we have had sufficient experience in the United States to demonstrate that private enterprise is not going to solve the problem; that not until you get a federal authority prepared to work in cooperation with city and municipal authorities can you face the problem. I should like the minister to reconsider the bill that he is proposing and offer to the municipalities and to the provinces the concessions which he is apparently prepared to give to the life insurance companies.

I feel sure that in the Dominion of Canada there must be municipal authorities which, in the face of the urgent housing situation, are prepared to go along with the federal government. I have discussed this matter on previous occasions. Unfortunately the government has not taken the advice which I have given on many occasions and which the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities gave in 1943 to try to reach some agreement between the different government agencies; but even at this stage the minister might indicate that he is prepared to give the provinces or the municipalities at least the consideration which he is prepared to give to life insurance companies, namely, that he will guarantee that they will not lose money if they acquire land and embark on a housing programme; that they will have at least two per cent on their investment. I think anything less than the same sort of offer to the municipalities will not be acceptable to the majority of the people of this country.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): During the present session of parliament considerable attention has been given to the subject of housing. I regret that I should have to detain the house at this time, but I have not occupied much time previously on the subject. I recognize fully that the resolution before us has to do with amendments to the National Housing Act of 1944. However, it is recognized, or at least it should be recognized, that the National Housing Act is designed to meet a part of a greater problem which we are endeavouring to overcome, not only through this one act, but through a number of activities on the part of the government.

In my particular part of Canada housing is certainly a serious problem. I recognize that it is not as serious there as it is in the more congested urban areas. When considering housing, and the problem of housing which is facing us today, I am reminded constantly of certain conditions which have resulted in an acute problem in this year, 1947. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, that problem has its roots in certain conditions which prevailed during the years prior to the outbreak of the recent war. It has been said, and it is definitely recognized today, that probably the greatest single problem facing the home builder or the prospective home builder is the tremendous costs involved. I know that, prior to the war, lumber, which today costs in the neighbourhood of $55, $60 and $70 a thousand, was to be had for as little as $12 to $16 a thousand, and I hazard the suggestion, too, that lumber which we purchased prior to the outbreak of the war for $14 to $16 a thousand was a better grade of lumber than that for which we are called upon to pay $50, $60 and $70 a thousand today.

But we found very little building going on even then and I think the reason for that is well known to us all. We were faced with tremendous unemployment problems. There was then no shortage of labour, but there seemed to be a shortage of the determination to utilize available facilities for the purpose of adequate home construction. One change that has taken place since those middle thirties is that money costs today are, generally speaking, considerably lower than they were then. One of the difficulties prior to the war was an inability to arrange adequate financial terms because of the high interest rates then prevailing. I am pleased to know that in some respects this one problem has been overcome. At that time, when we were faced with higher interest costs, taxes were usually paid separately from the contract and certainly they constituted a tremendous burden. Then there was the compounding of interest on loans made for housing purposes. Before the war and during the war and more particularly today there has been this tremendous upward climb in municipal tax rates. I think it is true of every part of Canada that municipal tax rates are climbing to staggering heights. The prospective home builder of today in so many communities hesitates to build because he fears the forfeiture of his home within a period of a very few years on account of the increase in the mill rate.

When we entered the war, decent housing accommodation was the exception rather than the rule. I mention that just to underline the fact that housing is not a problem that has come upon us merely since the outbreak of the war. It has been a chronic problem and is accentuated today by the fact that more people are financially able to build; in addition, a great many marriages took place during the war and that has stimulated the demand for housing; also a great many people, wives of servicemen and others, have come to live in Canada since the cessation of hostilities. This has all accentuated the demand for housing. Persons who never before could contemplate home construction are today contemplating it. But first they are faced with the critical material shortage.

I happen to be one of those unfortunate individuals who have built homes for private use within the past two years and I know something of the headaches with which one is afflicted during the course of such a venture. When one speaks of costs being shocking he is not exaggerating at all. I hate to speak in a personal way and do so only to illustrate my point. I paid $55 and $65 a thousand for shiplap which ten years ago I would not have used in the construction of a chicken coop. I paid $77 a thousand for two-by-tens which ordinarily I would hesitate to use in the construction of any outbuilding. This condition applies not only to lumber but to practically every other article that goes into the construction of a home, with the result that today a five-room house with bath will cost $8,000 or upwards, unless you are just going to throw it together, and even then I doubt if you can do it for very much less than that. Some of these five or six-room houses, complete with basement and possibly an attached garage, are being built for a price in excess of $10,000. What is the immediate effect of that? The ordinary individual contemplates the possibility that within five or six years property values may have depreciated to the point where those homes will be worth only $2,500 to $3,500. There are scores of people who are hesitating to build today because of the danger of taking that tremendous loss in capital value on account of depreciation because of economic conditions. For the ordinary person who requires a dwelling, building is almost entirely out of the question under present conditions.

I spoke of assessments and taxes a moment ago. This is what we are faced with in most of our municipalities. Assessments today are running from 60 to 100 per cent of present-day property values. It is hard to believe, but it is true that in some municipalities a person owning a $4,000 home is today being called upon to pay anywhere from $185 to $225 a year in taxes alone. I know of cases where these new $8,000 homes, which may be worth only about $4,000, have an annual tax charge now of $400 a year. I do not want to mention any particular municipality and I shall not do so, but it is a fact that in certain municipalities these conditions do obtain. I could produce tax statements to show tax charges of from $200 to $400 a year on homes running from $4,000 to $7,500 or $8,000. That is discouraging home building. It is cheaper today to rent than build. Consequently many people who are in a position to build are refraining from doing so as long as they can rent quarters even at $35 or $40 a month, because then they have no taxes to pay and no depreciation of property value to face. That depreciation is not recognized at all by the income tax officials when you are living in your own home.

It seems to me that one should be prepared to admit the fact that the government recognizes the problem. I am fully prepared to admit that fact. I think it is only fair to admit that any person in this country who is at all observant sees the problem. I am prepared to admit also that the government, in its own way and according to its own belief, is making a concerted drive to meet the problem and deal with it effectively. But on the other hand I am prepared to assert that the problem is not being dealt with effectively today. It seems to me that we must adopt other methods to supplement those which are at present in effect, and I propose to make reference to at least one other method which I think should be used.

During recent years we have recognized the principle that production has had, in many respects, to be financed by the government. We have had bonuses and subventions paid to railway and shipping companies for certain specific purposes. Industrial development has been presumed to have been assisted by the imposition of tariffs for the benefit of industries employing Canadian labour. Consumer bonuses have been paid with a view to stimulating trade and consumption. I say that now we have to recognize another principle, and that is the payment of subsidies for home construction, subsidies administered effectively and to whatever extent required to meet the problem. Other methods have served a purpose; other methods will continue to serve a purpose, but a solution is what we are now seeking; and I say that the only effective solution which is now left to be applied is the direct subsidization of private dwelling construction.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to repeat many of the things which have been said on this subject by several previous speakers, but I rise particularly to support the point of view put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I feel that I must do this because in one section of my riding—and I am now referring particularly to the city of Trail—we have an immediate need for some 500 houses. That immediate need is also felt by at least 200 veterans in that district. Under our present conditions, I am quite certain that private enterprise cannot cope with this need. I am not going to give reasons and arguments for that statement. I think they are obvious to anyone who has studied the situation. I do not believe this act will provide houses for two-thirds of the Canadian people who require them. It is not providing the houses at the present time. I think experience proves that. But I believe that our experience to date with Wartime Housing points the direction in which our housing policy should be turning.

As far as my constituency is concerned, in the city of Nelson there have been or are now under process of construction fifty houses under Wartime Housing and 125, I think, in the city of Rossland. In fairness, I must compliment the officials of the department on the work done in that connection. I believe the work in both cities has received general commendation. The houses have been reasonably well constructed and the people who are going to occupy them are, I think, well satisfied. To that extent the problem in those two cities has been solved, although I understand that the city of Nelson intends to apply for further houses, if they can be obtained. We used that technique with success. I want to say that the officers of the department and the contractors in question should be credited with a good job. The contractors in both cases were local firms who took a certain local pride in the project and who cooperated with the city, with the legion and with the departmental officials. Where you have cooperation of that type you have a reasonable chance of success.

Unfortunately, however, we have not been able to provide for the major housing needs of the constituency I represent, which includes the city of Trail. There we have a particular problem which, I am sure, cannot be solved by private enterprise and cannot be solved under the terms of the National Housing Act. We have a city, with a population of about 14,000 people, which is limited in area and without further ground for housing expansion. Therefore it is not possible for the city of Trail to apply to have houses built under Wartime Housing, because those houses must be built within the confines of the corporation. Here we have some 500 houses required at the present time; as I said before, we have some 200 veterans—men who served this country—waiting for homes for their families, some of whom are living in basements and under disgraceful conditions, because of the constitutional difficulties presented under the municipalities act of British Columbia and the attitude of some private owners of property surrounding the city.

That is, I think, a concrete illustration of the soundness and the validity of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie. That problem cannot be solved without cooperation, and a policy which permits cooperation, between federal, provincial and municipal governments. The federal government would have to provide the funds. The provincial government would have to provide the legislation, and make arrangements for the extending of the city's boundaries; and the municipal government would, of course, have to cooperate as they do under Wartime Housing. This is a concrete illustration of the need for cooperation between all three types of governments if we are to build houses and build them within a reasonable time in the future.

Why should this be such a problem? During the war, when the needs of this country required the building of a $10 million plant to produce ammonia products, a plant was built in short order in the city of Trail, in the municipality of Tadanac. And quite close, when we required a $12 million power plant for the production of power, the plant was built. Material and labour were obtained. All that was done in order to supply the needs of war. At the present time we have human needs which must be supplied. There are 500 families waiting for houses to live in—and of those 500, at least 200 are veterans who cannot secure satisfactory accommodation—because there is no policy which permits their problem to be solved. I am not blaming the municipal authorities. Their hands are tied, because they cannot extend the boundaries of the city under the provincial municipalities act, and because of the attitude of certain owners of property surrounding the city.

In conclusion, I say that if we had a housing policy based on the principles of Wartime Housing—which I think have been successful in most respects—which permitted cooperation of national, provincial and municipal authorities, who were determined to solve the problem as we solved our problems during the war, the housing needs of our people would be met in a reasonable time.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): While the problem in my constituency is not exactly the same as that which has been described by some other members, nevertheless it is a serious one and I think it should be drawn to the attention of the minister. He probably already knows about it from other sources, but I believe it should be drawn to his attention here also. I agree with the three previous speakers in what they have said regarding this need. Swift Current is not an industrial city. With the exception of one or two larger plants, it is comprised mostly of small businessmen and people like that. It is not a corporation city. The result is that a great many of our returned men prefer to build their homes within the city limits rather than to take advantage of the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act, or of Wartime Housing, of which there is none in this city. They want to build their private homes on lots which they can choose. The city council made available to them city-owned lots at a nominal price and the local contractors there—small enterprises operating on their own—have been doing their best, within the framework of the National Housing Act to provide the necessary homes for veterans who cared to have them constructed in that way.

The severity of the winter and last fall's bad weather prevented a start on many of these houses. The consequence has been that the rising of prices and the inability of the contractors to get the material has slowed down operations greatly, and the legion is becoming quite concerned. The legion is a body representative of the people around there. The membership is close to four hundred. It is composed, I believe, of about 100 veterans of the last war and 200 or more veterans of this war. The veterans are a reasonable bunch of men; they are not at all rambunctious in their ideas, and they give careful consideration to the things which they propose. I think I could not put the situation before this house in any better way than by reading the resolution which was passed there quite recently and which came to me in the mail. I should have preferred to have this representation made during the discussion on the appropriate section of Bill No. 104, but it fits in very well with the present discussion. This resolution was sent to the federal control board. I presume that is the timber control board or the people connected with that matter in the minister's department. This is what it says:

Whereas the housing situation is still acute and a first problem for federal, provincial and municipal governing bodies and

Whereas the costs of building increase month by month with such material beyond the reach of the average wage-earning citizen and particularly the returned service man and woman and

Whereas the ex-service person through these inflated and prohibitive costs is least able, though most deserving, to purchase his home

Be it resolved by the Canadian Legion, Swift Current branch, No. 56, and its ladies' auxiliary, that this housing situation be brought once more to the notice of the federal control board with an urgent request that these housing material costs be brought into line, compatible with the service man's purse and that he be given priority in all building material.

And further be it resolved by the Canadian Legion, Swift Current branch, No. 56, and its ladies' auxiliary, here assembled:

That the federal control board continue to control building costs and

That contractors building under the N.H.A. be allowed to purchase necessary material direct from manufacturers thereby cutting material costs to an immeasurable extent.

The last sentence would indicate that these contractors must buy through the retail trade. That seems hardly fair, because, while these contractors are not great national figures or big businessmen, they are men with a considerable investment in equipment, and if their equipment and men are tied up waiting for material the men will drift into other employment, the equipment will stand idle and the houses will not be built. If these men were operating under the National Housing Act and its terms were wide enough —as I believe they may be with this amendment, if something better does not come along—they would be able to go direct to the source of supply and perhaps make arrangements for much of the building material they are unable to get at the present time.

I would ask the minister to give this point his serious consideration. The people are deserving. They have done their best for the country. They are not asking any special favour. They have jobs; they are earning money; they are trying to settle in homes they will own themselves and to become taxpayers of the city. They want to carry on like other citizens, to become part of the community, and everything possible should be done to make these homes available to them. They want to buy these homes and pay for them, but they know it is no use undertaking contracts which their earning power will never make it possible for them to fulfil. They are earning good money; they will be good citizens, but they will never become wealthy. Their arrangements for the future have to be made on the basis of what they expect to earn. They simply cannot get these houses with the present building costs, as I think the minister knows very well.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MERRITT: I did not take part in the discussion this afternoon; on previous occasions in this house I have expressed my view on the need for low-rental housing. However I should like the minister to tell us, during the committee stage, whether or not any conversations have been held or are proposed with the provinces, so that the proper jurisdiction as between dominion, province and municipality in the housing field may be ironed out. We know the minister does not favour low-rent housing, as he said in the house this session.

Mr. HOWE: When was that statement made, that I did not favour low-rent housing?

Mr. MERRITT: That you did not favour subsidized low-rent housing.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes; but you did not say "subsidized."

Mr. MERRITT: Then I should have said it. The minister has said he does not favour subsidized low-rent housing; but, whatever his view may be, there is no doubt, as I think he will agree, that there is no clear definition of responsibility in the low-rent housing field as between the three authorities, and that this is holding back what others might do in this field. It is causing considerable difficulty in my own city right at the present time, as the minister knows, in connection with the negotiation of contracts for Wartime Housing and emergency shelter. I feel sure that at the root of the difficulty I just mentioned is this problem of division of responsibility.

I really rose to ask some specific questions with regard to the proposals the minister is now bringing before the house. He is proposing amendments to the act to increase the percentage of the lending value that may be advanced. On July 29 of last year I pointed out, at page 3982 of Hansard, that with the lending value of $4.60 per square foot under the National Housing Act, as it apparently was at that time, the actual loan a borrower would obtain on a $6,000 house would not be 95 per cent of the first $2,000, 85 per cent of the next $2,000 and 70 per cent of the balance, as would appear at first sight, but rather 67 per cent of the cost of building that house today. Since I understand it has always been the practice of private mortgage companies to lend up to 60 per cent of the value of a house, this act is not doing as much good as might appear on the surface. Instead of getting 83 per cent of the cost of construction, as would appear to be the case, the borrower actually gets only about 67 per cent, so that in the case of a $6,000 house he must put up about $2,000. To change the section of the act which places a ceiling on the amount of the loan, to revise that ceiling upward by five per cent in the case of a $4,000 house and seven and a half per cent in the case of a $6,000 house, as the minister is proposing to do, in my opinion will not do as much good as would be done by an upward revision of the cost per square foot upon which the lending value is based. Since the lowest cost per square foot under integrated housing in Vancouver is now, as far as I know, something like $5.65, and the cost per square foot in the case of houses built under the National Housing Act but not under the integrated scheme would be from $6 to $7 or $8 per square foot, I think this $4.62 is the figure the minister should raise at the present time. I should like to ask whether he will give the committee the present cost per square foot upon which the lending value is based under the National Housing Act and whether, if it is still $4.62, he will be prepared substantially to increase it.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry; at the moment I have not the figure at my finger-tips, but I shall be glad to get it and have it when we reassemble at eight o'clock. I believe it varies in the various sections of Canada. It is revised from time to time, to keep in step with realistic building costs. But I cannot tell my hon. friend what it is for the Vancouver district at the present time. I shall get the information for him, and have it available at eight o'clock.

Then, as regards meetings between the cities, the provinces and the federal government, to place the responsibility for housing, let me say that there is no doubt whatever as to where the responsibility for housing rests. The British North America Act states that responsibility for property and civil rights shall rest with the provinces, which places the immediate problem with the municipalities The federal government has accepted a responsibility for dislocation of population during the war, and for the providing of housing for returned veterans.

We have had cooperation from cities and provinces in varying degrees. Some cities and some provinces have been most cooperative, and have undertaken almost anything the dominion has asked them to do. Other provinces and other cities have not been so cooperative. The major difficulty in many cities is the assembling of the land, which is a joint responsibility of the city and the province.

For example, as I have said before, in Toronto there is hardly a square inch of land inside the city limits which would be available for low-cost housing; and that city cannot annex adjoining land which would be available for low-cost housing, without the cooperation of the province. I believe consideration is being given to that problem, and I mention it only as being typical of many cities.

The position of the federal government is quite clear. We seldom refuse an invitation from a city to build Wartime Housing in that city. That involves certain cooperation from the city, by way of making available suitable property, and in the fixing of a tax rate compatible with the type of housing that Wartime Housing builds. But I believe that, in meeting all requests for that type of housing, the dominion is going a long way toward discharging any responsibility it has in the field of housing.

Then, the federal government has accepted the responsibility for making available low-cost money for private home building. Under the National Housing Act funds for housing are being made available at rates lower than have ever obtained up to this time. Furthermore, it has instituted the integrated housing plan, which provides assistance to builders who are willing to limit their profits to a proportion that the crown believes reasonable. In that way the government has taken direct action by making available cheap money for private building, and in the field of government—sponsored integrated housing, and by guaranteeing the builder against loss, if the builder will guarantee the purchaser against excessive profit; and by offering to build Wartime Housing when requests are made by cities, and when the need is real.

What further cooperation can reasonably be asked of the federal government, I am not sure. It hardly seems to me that the government could be in closer contact with the provinces and cities than it is at the present time. I can assure my hon. friend that if either cities or provincial governments wish to sit down with the federal government to work out a concrete proposal, the federal government will be very glad to participate.

Mr. MERRITT: When the minister brings in figures with respect to the lending value per square foot, could he bring in a figure showing cost per square foot in Vancouver, and in any other city concerning which he produces lending value figures?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MERRITT: Last year the minister said that in his opinion the cost of construction had increased 150 per cent over 1939. It was on that ground, I believe, that he raised by ten per cent the lending value in cost per square foot. Today he has referred to the fact that prices and costs are much higher than they were a year ago. Will he say what percentage over 1939 costs of construction have reached at this time?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to give that.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister mentioned that the amendment to the act will depend upon the exercise of control over the end price. I understand this is going to be an amendment to the National Housing Act, and that therefore it will not operate as price control under bill No. 104, which has just been passed. I should understand that this would be a permanent provision. Will he explain the nature of this control over the end price, as it is to be introduced into the National Housing Act?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no amendment to the National Housing Act to limit price. The price limitation comes under the integrated housing plan, where the builder agrees with the government, prior to undertaking construction, to make houses available for sale at a certain price, which involves a known amount for contractors' profit. In that case the government guarantees to buy the house from the contractor at his cost, that is, the predetermined cost, in the event that he cannot sell it privately. The contractor agrees to sell to the veteran at another price, which involves a profit which the government considers reasonable. That is the plan to which I referred, providing limited profit.

Mr. MERRITT: I thought I was following the minister closely in his statement this afternoon, and it was my understanding that when he referred to the ratio of loan to lending value he said that this increase of ninety-five per cent for houses with a lending value of $4,000 and ninety per cent for those with a lending value of $6,000 would depend upon control being placed over the end price.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MERRITT: Surely that requires an amendment to the National Housing Act.

Mr. HOWE: No; it refers to housebuilding under the integrated plan.

Mr. MERRITT: I see.

Mr. HOWE: My recollection—and I shall ask permission to correct myself if I am wrong—is that houses built under Wartime Housing, in general, are built slightly under their lending value; and houses built under the integrated plan are built at not more than five to ten per cent over the lending value. That is my recollection. I presume it does not apply universally. Private buildings, where there is no cost limitation, depend largely upon the profit that the contractor expects to get through the sale of his house. That is beyond the control of the government. For instance, on the $6,000 house, which my hon. friend suggests is $2,000 over the lending value, I would presume that a large part of that $2,000 is the contractor's profit. Under the integrated plan there can be no such spread as that.

Mr. MERRITT: In effect the amendment will be that the ratio of loan to lending value will be increased in respect of integrated housing but not in respect of normal lending under the National Housing Act.

Mr. HOWE: The lending value will be the same for the same value of house. But, unless it is under the integrated plan, the government has no way of guaranteeing that the house built privately outside the plan will be sold to a buyer at a value which has any particular relation to the leading value of the house. The lending value is based on the cost of the building and not on the selling value.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was interested in the minister's statement that housing is certainly not a federal responsibility, and I wonder if he would indicate whether it was necessary to have an amendment to the British North America Act in order to pass the first Dominion Housing Act or latterly the National Housing Act? Were those acts regarded as interfering with provincial and municipal rights? Then I should like the minister to make a statement with regard to the government's policy as to subsidies. I understood him to say that he personally was opposed to subsidies, but it appears to me that by these amendments he is providing subsidies to the insurance companies. At least they are being guaranteed that they cannot lose on their investment and if that is not a subsidy I do not know how one could describe it.

Mr. HOWE: I said that under the British North America Act the primary responsibility for housing rests with the provinces, since housing comes within the field of property and civil rights. However there is nothing in the British North America Act that prevents the federal government from assisting in housing. Old age pensions are also a matter of property and civil rights and undoubtedly are the primary responsibility of the provinces; yet the federal government contributes to old age pensions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then there is nothing to stop you from doing a really good job if you want to?

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing to stop us from helping to any extent we want to, but that does not reverse the principle that under the British North America Act the primary responsibility for housing rests with the provinces. As far as subsidies go, a fine line can be drawn. We can say perhaps that Wartime Housing is subsidized due to the fact that it enjoys somewhat lower taxes than would be considered an economic level in a city. It also enjoys low-cost land which would have a commercial value far greater than the nominal cost paid by Wartime Housing. Those are subsidies, if you like. They are reasonable subsidies, having in mind that the government is paying the full cost of constructing the house. However, if my hon. friend will read certain papers he will find that it was stated here in Ottawa that the city was subsidizing Wartime Housing through giving free lots and installing services. I think it is desirable to keep away from cash subsidies to the greatest extent possible. A policy of subsidization may be all right in a time of emergency but it is not desirable as a continuing policy.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister indicate the number of housing units which will be built as a result of these amendments? Am I not correct in assuming that, by and large, these houses will be made available to people in the upper income brackets?

Mr. HOWE: That is not the intention; the intention is to provide housing for all the people of Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At what rate per month?

Mr. HOWE: The rate for wartime houses still runs from $21 to $35 a month. Integrated houses are built for sale at reasonable figures. It is the intention of the government to finance housing that is within the reach of all people in Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister is adopting a new principle here. We are being asked to guarantee private companies a minimum of two per cent, and I think the minister should give some indication as to what the plans are, how many houses will be built for rent and at what monthly rent?

Mr. HOWE: Under the National Housing Act the government guarantees the lending institutions against loss, but that provision applies only to the value of developed property. The amendment would provide that the cost of assembling the land may also be guaranteed by the federal government. This is simply an extension of the present policy.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is correct, but I think I am also correct in saying that so far the federal government has not been asked to pay anything, that there have not been any losses incurred. We are now going into the business of buying land and there is nothing to prevent these lending institutions from bailing out some of their real estate and asking the taxpayers to carry the burden. I think we should have some indication as to what the plans are that have been discussed and what rentals will be charged.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will find it expressly stated in the bill that the purchase of land is subject to the approval of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The location of the land, and the prices paid, must be approved before a loan will be granted for the assembling of the land. The government recognizes that building is definitely being retarded on account of the fact that in certain cities it is impossible to buy serviced land. Cities are not extending their services as rapidly as is required to meet their housing needs. The provisions which will be inserted in the act will enable private lending institutions to assemble land under government guarantee, after the project has been approved by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

For example, one of the leading life insurance companies is planning to assemble some desirable building property near the city of Toronto and make it available to builders at a reasonable cost. If the project is carried out, a builder who desires to build in that area will be able to buy individual lots which are properly serviced, such as are not available at the present time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I still have had no indication from the minister as to what type of housing will be available as a result of the change. I am advancing the argument that the housing which will be available will cost people $75 a month or more, and I wish the minister would indicate that I am wrong, that he is planning to make housing available at $25 or $30 a month. The evidence is that we are short of housing for people who cannot afford to pay even $25 a month. I think the amendments to the act should make some provision for people who just cannot afford to look at houses costing $75 a month.

Mr. HOWE: The National Housing Act has nothing to do with housing that is rented for $75 a month and over. As I have stated before, the National Housing Act is concerned with housing that can be rented for $70 a month and under. All I can say about rentals is that Wartime Housing is still building houses that rent from $21 to $35 a month. Housing being erected under the integrated plan usually costs $6,000 or less per unit. They are both low-cost projects. The land assembly would be for the purpose of low-cost housing.

It is impossible to say at the moment just what will be built on the lots but certainly it will not be expensive houses.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWE: I promised to answer the hon. member's request for information about lending values in Vancouver. I would point out that allowance in lending value is made for varying types of houses, depending upon the type of construction, quality and other factors. For instance, in the case of bungalows in Vancouver, our basic costs used by the corporation as a basis upon which lending values are determined, show a range from $4.10 to $5.60 for a bungalow of frame and stucco, with hot air heating, open fireplace, and tile or equal bathroom floor with no garage. Generally the larger the size of the bungalow, the lower the basic cost per square foot. These figures are adjusted in accordance with the quality, suitability of layout, and even location of the residence. I would point out to the hon. member that the agreed sale price under an integrated agreement is a maximum of 110 per cent of the lending value. The amount of the repurchase price under the government guarantee to the builder amounts to 100 per cent of the lending value plus carrying charges between the time of completion and the time of the implementing of the guarantee.

Pressures continue to be placed upon us to increase lending values. However we feel that included in today's actual costs are a number of items which should not properly be capitalized into long-term mortgage debt. For this reason we are unwilling to raise our lending values even to the level of the agreed sale price under the integrated plan.

The hon. member has also asked for our estimate of present building costs as compared with the pre-war level. With all the unusual items which today add to present building costs, this figure can be established only in general range. As at February, 1947, we believe that the average cost of residential construction is of the order of 157 per cent to 173 per cent of the 1935-39 base. I recall that the hon. member suggested that I said building costs had risen 150 per cent. That is, of course, not the case. The index stood at 150 per cent instead of 100 per cent as of the 1935-39 range. My statement was that costs of building had increased 50 per cent. It has now increased from 58 per cent to 73 per cent of the 1935-39 base. This wide range indicates a varying amount of increase by areas. I may say, however, that, although the absolute cost of small residences per square foot is not as high in Vancouver as in other sections of the country largely because of climatic conditions, nevertheless the ratio of increase in the present cost level over the 1935-39 base is probably higher on the Pacific coast than in any other section of the country.

The hon. member has asked whether the increased ratio of loan as provided in the new legislation applies to all National Housing Act loans, or whether its application will be limited to houses upon which there is some control on the end sale price. The latter is the case, and the use of the increased ratio of loan to lending value will be subject to regulations established by the governor in council.

Mr. MERRITT: I believe I asked one other question. What was the actual cost per square foot of building a similar bungalow in Vancouver? I have the lending value per square foot. Can the minister give an approximation of the actual costs?

Mr. HOWE: I said that under the integrated plan the sale price is 110 per cent of lending value, so that the cost must be close to the lending value. The sale price allows for a profit to the builder. It depends, however, on the builder. There are builders in Vancouver who are quite willing to sell under the integrated plan at 105 per cent of lending value. Other builders cannot approach that by a considerable margin. In other words, it depends to a good deal on the skill of the builder.

Mr. MERRITT: The proposed increase of five per cent to 7½ per cent will not assist anyone other than the builder under the integrated scheme. Has the minister any figure on the going cost per square foot of an ordinary home under the National Housing Act, not under the integrated scheme?

Mr. HOWE: The sale price of houses built under the National Housing Act without price limitation is running about 126 per cent of lending value. Of course we have no way of knowing what the builders cost is, but we believe there is quite a considerable margin of profit in the price.

Mr. REID: Under the old act, if the minister will remember, many statements had been made and cases had arisen where the corporation would lend in one city or town and not in another. During the time I was home at Easter, complaints were made to me that no one could, under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, procure a loan in the municipality of Burnaby. I was surprised at that because, when the act went through, we were given assurance that there would be no discrimination in districts. Has the minister any information on the matter? If not, would he take this as a notice and look into the matter, because the complaints were made to me in good faith by those who went into Vancouver and made application to build under this scheme and were refused.

Mr. HOWE: I find it hard to understand that situation in Burnaby because we have 500 loans in one project in that municipality. However hon. members will notice that, under the amendments now being considered by the committee, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has taken power to lend directly rather than through the lending institutions. This will enable the government, in appropriate cases, to make housing loans in any part of Canada, regardless of whether it is a part favoured by the lending institutions or otherwise.

Mr. REID: I am glad to have that information.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is there any provision for lending money to individual builders? Suppose a man wants to borrow money on his own account and build his own house without the intervention of any agency whatsoever; has the government considered any measures whereby that sort of thing can be met?

Mr. HOWE: There are many loans of that type. Under the provisions of the amendment the government can lend to an individual builder directly, although in many cases it may be convenient to make the loan through a lending institution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What are the terms upon which the government would lend money in such cases?

Mr. HOWE: Exactly the same terms as through the lending institution, a loan at 4½ per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I gather that this legislation is designed to relieve the housing shortage and get more houses built. Can the minister give the results of the conversations and discussions between the lending institutions and the department and indicate the approximate number of housing units which are to be provided and their price range?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I cannot give the conversations with the lending institutions because I have not talked with any of them. The government is setting an objective of 80,000 completed houses in 1947, and we have every expectation of reaching that objective.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It hardly seems reasonable that this legislation would be brought down unless some use were to be made of it. I gather that there must be some interest shown by the lending institutions or we would not have this measure before us. Can the minister indicate where it is proposed to make use of the amendment and how many units are expected to be completed in 1947 and 1948 if this goes through?

Mr. HOWE: This legislation has been proposed by the government with the thought that it will assist in the building of low-cost housing and widen the range of those who are able to take advantage of the act. The principle of land assembly we believe to be important and the lending institutions agree with us. After all, the first requisite for housing is suitable land on which to put the housing. Our objective of 80,000 houses in 1947 has been set, having in view the ability of the construction industry to assemble materials and complete that number of houses.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister say how many municipalities in Canada have made representations to the government with a view to getting these benefits which will be available to lending institutions and indicate what sort of reception they have received? I imagine that if some municipalities had this sort of provision made for them they would be prepared to give an undertaking to build a specific number of houses. The hon. member for Halifax will agree that they have a labour problem and a housing problem in his district, and nearly every other large city in Canada is short of housing. I imagine that if this opportunity were afforded to the municipalities and they could be assured of the return of the principal invested in land and in improvements and a guarantee of two per cent on their investment, a great many municipalities would give an undertaking that there would be houses built in the near future. I understand that some municipalities have made representations with a view to getting these benefits. Would the minister indicate how many there have been?

Mr. HOWE: I have never heard of any municipality in the Dominion of Canada undertaking to build any houses. So far as I know, no municipality has.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps I might say a word on that. I had a question on the order paper the other day, and the parliamenatry assistant to the minister and the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation gave me some information which the committee might like to have. My question could not be answered at it appeared on the order paper, but they kindly gave me information along the lines I asked for. It shows that quite a number of municipalities in Canada have passed resolutions asking the dominion government to amend the National Housing Act so as to make funds available to the municipalities. Resolutions have been passed, for example, by the city of London, the city of Brandon, the district of Burnaby in British Columbia, the city of Edmonton, the city of Hamilton, the city of Prince Albert and the city of Regina in Saskatchewan, the township of Stamford in Ontario, the city of Toronto, the city of Winnipeg, the city of Windsor, and two resolutions by the city of Vancouver. Perhaps I might read one which is fairly short and typical, although the resolutions are not similar in all respects. This resolution was passed by the city council of Toronto:

> That the dominion government be petitioned to bring in new housing legislation along the lines of public low-rental housing legislation in effect in England and the United States and providing for federal loans up to 90 per cent of the construction costs of low-rent housing projects to be built and managed by proper municipal housing authorities and further providing for annual federal subsidies to such housing authorities up to three per cent of development cost to enable such housing to be rented to low-income families.

As I said, no two resolutions are alike, but this one is typical.

Mr. HOWE: It may be typical of city councils to pass resolutions, but I would point out that, outside the province of Saskatchewan, no municipality in Canada has authority under its charter to enter into a housing project. The city of Toronto obtained authority from the electors to enter into the Regents Park project, and that is the only exception so far as I know, except that blanket authority has been given to the municipalities in Saskatchewan. However, it has been the feeling of the government that if a city wants to go into housing the authority that provides the money should make the investment and supervise its administration. The history of municipalities in the housing field has not been entirely happy, although there have been notable exceptions. Certain cities have made a great success of municipal housing projects, but a far greater number have made a dismal failure. The federal government believes it has an efficient administration for the building and administering of housing and that any federal money to be spent in that field should be spent through the administrative machinery set up by the federal government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: To be logical, the same principle should be carried out with the life insurance companies if they want to go into the housing business. I think the federal government has just as much right to make money available to municipalities for housing as to life insurance companies. The resolution says that the purpose is:

> . . . to empower life insurance, trust and loan companies to purchase, improve and sell land to be used for residential housing developments, and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee to such companies the return of the principal invested in such land and improvements, together with interest thereon at a rate not to exceed two per centum per annum.

I cannot imagine any municipality in Canada that would not consider this a very good proposal to be made to them. I know there are two cities in Saskatchewan which would be prepared to go along now because they have enabling legislation. There is a shortage, and resolutions have been passed. I know the experience in municipal housing in Canada was not a very successful one following the last war; but we have such an organization as Wartime Housing. In spite of previous criticisms I have made of Wartime Housing, there has not been any question about the administration or of the efficiency of that organization.

In all countries in the world we have had some valuable experiences since 1918 and 1925. In the United States, in Great Britain, in Sweden—as a matter of fact, in nearly every important country with the exception of Canada—we have had experience where local authorities have gone into housing and made an outstanding success of it. I am greatly disappointed that the minister is not prepared to give to local and provincial authorities at least as favourable a break as he is prepared to give to life insurance companies. I know it is now too late for many of the cities to get enabling legislation through for 1947, but when this bill is going through, I cannot see any reason why we could not establish the right of the local authorities to get at least the same consideration as the lending institutions get. I would say that the local authorities should get greater consideration because they will be driven, by public opinion, to provide housing for people in the lower brackets, whereas the life insurance companies will be able to cater to the people who supply the funds to life insurance companies and will be able to select their risks, and, as in the past, they will be able to make their investments so that the federal government has not any serious financial risks. Will the minister indicate if he would consider broadening the legislation to make available to municipalities the benefits which he is proposing for the lending institutions?

Mr. HOWE: The cities, municipalities and provinces of this country are today in better financial shape than ever before in their history. They are able to borrow money at lower rates than ever before in their history. There is no reason why one taxing authority should subsidize another taxing authority to take on obligations in the field of the latter. If the provinces and municipalities wish to go into the housing business, I do not know of a thing to stop them; on the contrary, I believe they would be discharging a duty which is theirs and not that of the federal government.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether it would be profitable to discuss the financial position of the municipalities at the present time. The municipalities are at present, apparently prosperous, but the prosperity is more apparent than real. They are apparently prosperous because they did not do any repair or construction work during the war period. I think the minister knows that. Today every municipality in Canada, I am quite satisfied, has a backlog of repairs, services and construction which it cannot possibly meet with its present limited taxation powers. The minister said before the dinner recess, I think, that there could be cooperation between the dominion, the province and the municipality in this matter. I think the dominion government has done considerable; but, so far as my information goes, the provinces have not done anything at all, and the municipalities have not done a great deal more. But the municipalities have not the taxing resources which will enable them to carry on a project of this kind. I agree with the hon. member for Mackenzie that the same assistance or the same privileges should be given to the municipalities as are given to the insurance, trust and loan companies which, in my opinion, according to this resolution, are not taking any risks whatsoever; the government is taking the whole risk. If the same privileges were given to the municipalities I believe that they would accept them.

Mr. MERRITT: A moment ago I think the minister suggested that I was wrong in saying that he had said last year that costs of construction had gone up 150 per cent. I have what he said on July 22 last; at page 3683 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> Three steps could be taken to help meet this problem:
> First, increase lending values to the current level of building costs which is of the order of 150 per cent of the 1939 level, with variations in different parts of the country.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will agree that, taking the 1939 level as 100 per cent, 150 per cent represents a fifty per cent increase.

Mr. MERRITT: Oh, yes. I do not think I suggested anything different.

Mr. HOWE: If I understood you to say anything different I am sure you did not intend it. I am sure you intended to say a fifty per cent increase instead of a 150 per cent increase.

Mr. MERRITT: I intended only to use the minister's own words.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so.

Mr. MERRITT: But I did not rise only to straighten that point out. I intend to read on and come back to the point I was asking questions about before. The minister went on to say:

> This has been done by the corporation increasing lending values by an additional 8 per cent as from April 29, 1946, so as to bring lending values into line with cost levels. We believe that present lending values are very close to the actual cost of building plus a fair builder's profit, but do not make allowance for extra costs such as delays in delivery of materials, inefficient labour and the very long profit being taken by some builders. We are unwilling to make loans on extra costs of this kind.

It was just at that time, I think, that the minister introduced the integrated scheme. I have made a calculation based on what he said a moment ago about present-day costs being 126 per cent of lending value, and I find that under the ordinary scheme, without using the integrated housing, the actual loan made will be, as I take it, 75 per cent of 83 per cent of the lending value, which is only 62 per cent of the cost of construction. This will mean that in all houses not built under the integrated scheme, 38 per cent will be required to be put up by the owner.

I can very well appreciate the minister's reasons for bringing in the integrated scheme. But surely materials are—or we hope they are—in a little better supply than they were a year ago and are going to get continually into better supply; labour will become more efficient; and surely the long profit the minister complains about is, in many cases, due to the unwillingness of the builder to take a risk on delay and inexperienced labour. He must cover himself, and he will be quite prepared to take a smaller profit if he can be sure of covering his contract. When I look at the figures I find that, of the loans approved last year, less than one-third were integrated loans. I want to leave with the minister the thought that, unless everybody turns over to the integrated scheme—which they perhaps will not do, even though perhaps they could—during this coming year, he should give consideration to increasing that lending value, because right now you are not getting much more out of the National Housing Act loans than you would get on a private loan before the scheme ever came into being. I should like to ask the minister now what his experience is with regard to integrated housing. Are more and more builders coming under the scheme? Is there any limit to the number who may come in? What considerations govern the minister and his officials in permitting builders to operate under integrated housing? What stamp of approval must be put on the builder before he is considered eligible to come under the integrated scheme?

Mr. HOWE: About 3,000 units were signed up under the integrated scheme last year, and present prospects are that about six to seven thousand will be signed up this year. The only limitation in accepting a contractor under the integrated housing plan is whether he can make the price; in other words, if he can offer a cost that is acceptable under that plan. Some builders cannot do so; it costs them more money, but there is no reason why any efficient builder cannot come under the integrated plan if he wishes to do so and is willing to accept the profit limitation. If a contractor wants to go after big profits and somebody else wants to support him in that cause, there is nothing we can do about the matter, but the house built under such an arrangement is no better than the house built under the integrated plan. If it costs the buyer fifteen or twenty per cent more, the buyer is out that much and the state has no obligation in the matter.

Mr. MERRITT: Could the minister say what percentage of the builders in Vancouver, for instance, would be building under integrated housing and what percentage under the normal system? Has he any figures on that?

Mr. HOWE: By units, probably about twenty per cent would be under the integrated system, and about eighty per cent under the National Housing Act.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. MERRITT: But can the minister tell me how many builders are taking advantage of the plan?

Mr. HOWE: Ten builders in the Vancouver area are taking advantage of the integrated plan.

Mr. TIMMINS: From what the minister has said from time to time with respect to the building organizations under the control of Central Housing I have taken it that fundamentally and primarily these schemes are for the purpose of providing homes for veterans. On Friday last I made a statement based on a report appearing in the Financial Post, that integrated housing had been found unworkable as far as veterans' preference was concerned in some areas of Canada, and that for this reason Central Mortgage was permitting the builders to dispose of the houses to civilians in the first instance, we will say, as against veterans. I should like to know from the minister whether the statement I made, based on the newspaper report, was correct; if so, what are the areas where the veterans preference has been dropped in respect of integrated housing, and whether a new policy has been established in that regard.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the only integrated project where the veterans preference has been lifted is at West Kildonan, Manitoba, where there were some larger houses in which the veterans did not show an interest. There is a complete veterans preference for houses under the integrated plan, but if there is no demand from veterans, it will be the policy to offer them to civilians.

Mr. TIMMINS: How long does a builder have to advertise a house to veterans before he may turn around and sell it to a civilian?

Mr. HOWE: The rule is six months, unless it is evident to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that there will be no demand in that area from veterans.

Mr. TIMMINS: Does that mean the builder would have to hold the house for six months before he could sell to a civilian?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. TIMMINS: Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked as to the number of builders in Vancouver who were under the integrated plan as contrasted with ordinary builders. I understand that in the Toronto area only about nine builders are under the integrated plan, whereas there are some 450 builders in the whole Toronto and York area. Could the minister tell the committee what reason he has for expecting that the extension of this plan will bring more builders in the Toronto area under it.

Mr. HOWE: I will make this prediction for my hon. friend, that there will be many more builders under the integrated plan as houses sell less freely at the present exorbitant prices being charged by builders.

Mr. TIMMINS: Just to clear the record, I take it that this resolution is not so much an attempt on the part of the loan companies and the insurance companies to enter this particular field as it is an expression of the desire on the part of the government to see that they take their proper share of the responsibility for homes. Following that up, I take it that the cost of making the original survey of the land, if an insurance company takes on such a project; the cost of preparing the plan, the cost of presenting that plan to the planning board, the cost of sewers, sidewalks, pavements and all those things will come within the word "improve" as used in this resolution and will form part of the principal investment; and I take it that the government is guaranteeing that their financial return will be at least two per cent on that money as well as the other money the company may put up. In addition, is there any check on how much money the insurance companies or loan companies may make on these projects? Are they limited to two per cent, or what is the check on companies coming under this procedure?

Mr. HOWE: The insurance companies are limited to two per cent. Any profit beyond that must be returned to the crown.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a question to ask in regard to these two family units. If a man owns a house which he rents, he is allowed to deduct taxes and carrying charges from his income tax. What is to be the position of a man who lives in one part of a two-family unit which he owns? Supposing the house costs $6,000. The carrying charges would be $280 or perhaps a little less; the taxes would be probably $200, making a total of $480. What arrangement can or will be made in regard to his income tax? After all, he will be living in part of that property, so what will be his position?

Mr. HOWE: I am sure I do not know. We have a tax expert here, and without an official ruling from the income tax branch I would not want to give an opinion.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I draw it to the minister's attention because it is important to know just what the situation is to be, whether, if he is living in the house, he will be allowed half of the carrying charges.

Mr. HOWE: There are thousands of those cases, particularly in Quebec. I am sure the income tax branch has a ruling on the subject. I can only suggest that my hon. friend might ask the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister said that in the West Kildonan area the veterans preference has been dropped. There is a distinct shortage of veterans houses in that area. What is the value of those houses? I presume they were dropped because they were out of reach of the ordinary veteran.

Mr. HOWE: The storey and a half house is about $6,100 a house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And there are no applications from veterans; is that the reason for dropping it in the area?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BREITHAUPT: In my district Housing Enterprises are doing very fine work. They are building quite a few fine houses, but greatly above the cost which some of the people requiring them can pay.

I have a question I should like to ask the minister, and it is this: With construction cost increases indicated by him, undoubtedly there are many veterans and others who would have been interested in renting homes constructed by Housing Enterprises Limited, or under the integrated housing plan, and who may now wish to turn to homes built under a plan perhaps more within their financial reach. Is Wartime Housing being continued? If so, has any change taken place in the plans of construction whereby basements and furnaces are now being provided for those who require comfortable houses at more reasonable rentals than are possible under other plans?

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing is certainly being continued. It has been the policy of Wartime Housing to keep to the low-cost range, for obvious reasons. It is a low-cost rental product. Exceptions have been made where, for special reasons, basements have been installed. But a fairly general answer to the question asked is that the policy remains unchanged, and Wartime Houses are built without basements.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister spoke about the cost being $4.10 per square foot. I have always heard of the cost of a house being computed on a cubic foot basis. I should like to know what he means by a cost of $4.10 per square foot. Let me give an example. Let us take a one-storey building, 24 x 50, which is the favourite size in Wartime Housing. Does that mean that this can be built on a basis of $4.10 for the square footage?

Mr. HOWE: It is the floor area, measuring the outside dimensions of the house. But if the hon. member is used to the cubing method, if he will take that figure and multiply it by eighteen, or divide it by eighteen as the case may be, he will get the same result. The ratio is about 18 to 1.

Mr. McMASTER: It is about twenty-three cents a cubic foot.

Mr. HOWE: That sounds about right.

Mr. McMASTER: I doubt if you can do it. You would have lots of buyers. If you take it on the illustration I have given, and figure at $4.10 per square foot, even for a one-storey building, you will still have lots of buyers. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would the minister mind if I ask for some help, on behalf of the people I represent. I am asking this seriously, and I hope he will answer seriously, if he can. I agree with what has been said on behalf of all low-income earners in Canada, and I share the concern which has been expressed. At the present time I am speaking on behalf of people who are greatly concerned about their own position. I have listened to questions asked by various members, and the replies made by the minister. I want him to tell me if I am incorrect in my understanding of what he said, when I say I understood him to say certain things. First, I believe the minister said that the government policy was not to have any more cash subsidies; is that correct? The government does not believe in any more cash subsidies for housing? The minister says nothing, so I take it that that is correct.

Mr. HOWE: What does the hon. member mean by "any more"?

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, "any"; I will take out "more".

Mr. HOWE: We are subsidizing housing, yes. We are subsidizing emergency housing. I suggest that the hon. member might not lay down any policy, other than the policy which I am explaining at the present time.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not laying down a policy.

Mr. HOWE: I would not suggest that he set out what the government believes. That is something that is decided from day to day.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am trying to have the minister put me right, if I am wrong in my understanding. He said this afternoon—and I think Hansard will bear this out when it is read tomorrow—that the government did not want to use any cash subsidies for government housing, or something to that effect. Is that correct, so far?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Also, the other day, during the discussion on Bill No. 104, he told us that prices of lumber were going to rise, to compensate lumber producers for any loss they might suffer in the export market. Is that correct? Now, with those things in mind, and realizing, as he should, that there are a great many people, particularly in the city I come from, who are in the average or lower earning groups, I should like him to answer my question. That will materially affect the permanent situation, because we have no speculative interests there, and no likelihood of any great appreciation in capital. There may be an increase today in the book value of a house a man may own, as compared with the value of ten years ago. He may have a house that he built for $5,000, which he could sell today for $10,000. He could leave one house, but he would have to pay $10,000 for another one, in a different location, and would be only changing his position, rather than his capital standing.

Another reason that there will not likely be any great amount of money earned by the average person there is that our business is small business. They exist only by virtue of the fact that they serve the people in the surrounding area. If the farming community works and produces it is able to buy the services and goods provided by the merchants and the other people in our city, but not in quantities sufficient to create riches, or any high salaried positions.

The veterans coming back are in this class. They are taking jobs which will range from $100 to possibly $150 a month. Only a few of the more highly trained will get more than that. Most of them will be unlikely, even in a lifetime, to arrive at a position where they will earn more than $2,000 or $2,400. Possibly a few will go to $3,000, but very few will go above that. The earnings will be along the lines I have indicated. A great many of them will probably remain in the $150 a month class.

I should like the minister now, in all seriousness, to tell me this: If he were one of those men in that position, if he were a veteran back there now—and these are the people who are causing the legion such great concern—and if he were not in the position he occupies today, if he can imagine that, and were in the position of one of those veterans, how would he go about getting one of those homes? Would he make a cash payment, and hope to be able to pay it off? If he will tell us that, and put it on the record, it will be a good thing for those who do not read the record, and also for those who do read it, and who need advice from a competent man.

Mr. HOWE: I presume the problem of acquiring a home has not changed greatly since the time my hon. friend and I were being married and were trying to acquire homes. We rented until we saved enough money to make payments on our homes. Then we made the payments, took out mortgages, and for the next few years we saved to pay off those mortgages.

I presume anyone who builds a home today is in much the same position. No great magic that I know of has been introduced into the situation.

If I may say another word to the hon. member for High Park, the figure of $4.65 per square foot which I mentioned was for a fair sized bungalow in Vancouver. A bungalow in Vancouver has nothing in common with housing in High Park. The lending value of the type of house that would be built in High Park would be considerably higher than the figure I mentioned.

Mr. McMASTER: I notice that the time for payment has been increased from 20 to 30 years, and perhaps the minister could give me the amount per month per $1,000 for the 20-year period and for the 30-year period.

Mr. HOWE: For the 20-year period it would be $6.30 per $1,000 per month and for the 30-year period it is $5.09 per month.

Mr. POULIOT: Are home plans still available in the department?

Mr. HOWE: A new book of plans has been issued which, we believe, is bigger and better than the previous books. I shall be glad to supply my hon. friend with as many copies as he wishes, priced at $1 per book.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister, but I have another suggestion. I think every member of the committee is doing his best to help the minister and his department solve this grave and serious question of housing. Any man, whether he be a military man or a civilian, who desires to build a home wants to be informed about the conditions he must meet in order to take advantage of the legislation. At the present time this legislation is quite obscure to many people I suggest that a short, concise and complete booklet should be issued to indicate to the man on the street how he can take advantage of the provisions of this law and build a home for himself and his family.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing like giving service to my hon. friend. I have here in book form exactly the information he wants and I shall be glad to send it to him. It is printed in English and French. This copy happens to be in English. Since the hon. member is perfectly bilingual, I am sure he will be able to use it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know whether the Minister of National Revenue heard me ask the minister of reconstruction what allowance in income tax would be made to a man who built a two-family house and lived in one part himself, but if not I should like him to tell me what such a man could deduct for taxes, carrying charges, depreciation and so on.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for the booklet he has sent me since it seems to be most interesting, although I have not had time to read it all. I should like to suggest that when a publication of the importance of this one is put out his officials should send it to us. I have received many publications and, while I do not keep them all, I have not returned one. I would be obliged if, in the future, they would send us things like this when they are off the press.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That a bill be presented to the house to amend the Penitentiary Act to make provision, inter alia, for the appointment of a commissioner and two deputy commissioners and for the payment of such salaries thereto as are approved by the governor in council; and that the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to such commissioner and deputy commissioners.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): A motion similar to this, dealing with penitentiaries, has been before the house for almost ten years and it is about time that some action was taken. I remember very well listening to the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, one of the ablest men who ever sat in this house, a most distinguished gentleman. What used to amaze me was his facility to speak both languages and his loyalty to all that this country stands for. I remember the last time I heard him speak he stood up and said, "I cannot go on any longer," or words to that effect, "unless such and such a resolution is passed".

I do not know whether that was in 1937 or 1939, but I have here Hansard for 1938 and I am going to read what he said on that occasion when he rose on the orders of the day. Apparently a bill which had been passed by this house had been turned down in the senate, and he said:

> Before the orders of the day are called I wish to make a statement concerning the bill to amend the Penitentiaries Act which was adopted by this house unanimously but will now fail to be placed on the statutes of this session. The government is disappointed and I, personally, am sorry, indeed very sorry. When I stated in this house on my responsibility as Minister of Justice that I needed the proposed change for the proper administration of penitentiaries, the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) declared that he waived all his objections to the bill because of that statement.
> What I regret more particularly is that this legislation involving a social question of momentous importance, has been rejected in another place . . .

Apparently this has been going on since 1938 up to the present. I do hope the minister gets whatever he wants if it will help him to bring about reforms in the administration of the penitentiaries. I have no doubt that he was in his seat when the late right hon. gentleman made the statement I have just read. I just wonder why something cannot be done. We have been told every year that it is because of the provinces; it is because of the dual control over crime. I am not familiar enough with it to know just why it is. I do know that the federal government controls penitentiaries.

This bill calls for the appointment of a commissioner and two assistant commissioners. I have no objection to it. I should like to see it go through. I should like to see the commissioners appointed and get on with whatever has to be done. I believe everyone in the house is interested in penal reform; I have been interested in it for years. It has been a subject of study by me for quite a few years. I have felt that after-prison care was something we were away down on, something with which we did not seem to be able to grapple, how to take care of a prisoner when he is let out of the penitentiary. If the new commissioner and his assistants can bring in some report to the minister under which after-care to the prisoner can be improved above what it is today it should be done, because it is really not carried on today, except what is done by private institutions such as the big brother movement and the association of police commissioners who do interest themselves, as I know very well from my connection with the efforts in Toronto under the last chief of police we had, General Draper, who spent a lot of his time with the police association in after-prison care. That should be extended and expanded. If the minister has that in his mind I am sure that his commissioners will follow out whatever instructions he gives in that regard.

I have said that I have been interested in this matter for a long time. I have spoken on it before. I went to England for the purpose of studying the Borstal system. The Borstal system has been in operation in England for many years and has given eminent satisfaction. I believe they wholly reclaim 58 per cent of all first offenders. That is something to aim at. I am sorry to say that here in Canada, so far as I know, that is not the case. Many young offenders who commit major crimes for which they are sent to the penitentiary, are sent among hardened criminals. Often when they come out they are frequently more criminally minded than when they went in. Surely there must be some method by which that could be improved.

The minister has read, as I have, what was said in 1946 by many organizations, that we were down near the foot of the ladder so far as prison reform is concerned; I presume I should say, so far as the reformation of criminals. Often when they come out they are frequently more criminally minded than when they went in. Surely there must be some minor jails under the provincial governments, as we have been told here, why cannot we do something? That is what I should like to know. Are the hands of the federal government so tied that nothing can be done? If not, will the commissioner and his two assistants be able to find some method that up to the present we have not been able to put into operation to reform criminals and to cut down their being released to go out into the world again and greatly increase the number of crimes committed in the country.

I am convinced that every hon. member will go the limit to help the minister in any programme that he can bring in, including the appointment of the commissioner and his two assistants, to reform the method of taking care of criminals in Canada. I do not know that I can say much more. I have given the matter a lot of study. I myself went to many of the prisons in England. I stayed in them and ate in them. I stayed in them all day long; I was locked in to see how the men are trained and taught and how they are reclaimed. They are separated. The first offenders, or young men, are not in the same part of the prison in Glasgow or Wakefield, near Leeds, as the hardened criminals. Whether we can do that in Canada I do not know. I shall be anxious to hear what the minister proposes or hopes will be the outcome of the legislation to be founded on this resolution. I for one—and I am sure the same can be said for all other hon. members—will support him to the limit if he brings down a programme whereby the reformation of criminals in Canada can be greatly improved over what it is today.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is a great humanitarian. His tribute to the late Mr. Lapointe was felt by all. Hon. members are, I am sure, grateful to him for remembering a great minister of justice and for recalling what he meant at the time when he sponsored the idea of the penitentiary commission. I also remember two persons who insisted on that and who were our mutual friends, the late Harry W. Anderson of the Toronto Globe and our former colleague Miss Agnes MacPhail. They did not belong to the same political faith, but they both believed in the reformation of criminals and their change of heart after a certain period in the penitentiary.

Naturally, the purpose of the penitentiary commission was excellent. If Mr. Anderson and Miss MacPhail had not insisted so much, perhaps we would never have had such a commission; but I remember the day in the house when Miss MacPhail undertook the defence of a convict and a former minister of justice, Mr. Guthrie, took out of his pocket a record of that individual which was quite different from the description which Miss MacPhail had given of him. It is all right to be kind, but there are some convicts who are dangerous men, and there are recidivists, which proves that sometimes it is dangerous to be too kind. I will not mention minor offences and first cases of petty smuggling or things like that. That is just the spirit of adventure; but when a man goes into housebreaking or commits a crime mentioned in the criminal code, he has to be examined by doctors, and perhaps his mind is not all there. He must be treated as humanely as possible. I do not believe in galleys and the punishments of the middle-ages, in the carcan and all that. I do not believe in that system at all, because it is my deep conviction that even those who infringe upon the provisions of the criminal code and have been found guilty of a crime should be treated just as well as it is possible for society to permit. On this I do not believe that there is any difficulty; but there is something else. I have read the report of the commission. I remember the day in late summer when the hon. member for Vancouver South asked Mr. Lapointe, who was then Minister of Justice, why the commission had not been named. I told him plainly, in as good English as I could use, that I was responsible for it because I had told Mr. Lapointe that there were intrigues behind the appointment of the commissioners, and Mr. Lapointe promised me that no one who had been on the investigating commission would be appointed to the penitentiary administrative commission. I wonder if my hon. friend remembers that. It is all on Hansard. It took place on the last occasion when Mr. Lapointe was piloting his estimates through the house as Minister of Justice. My memory of it is so good that I remember the hon. member for St. Paul's stating that evening that he wanted the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to take the place of the provincial and the municipal police. Those are recollections of past days.

At that time there were serious objections to the appointment of an administrative commission as suggested by the investigating commission. If hon. members will take the trouble to look at their report they will see that it was padded up to make a great big book. One need only look at the bibliography of the report to realize the bluff of the investigating commissioners. They mentioned in their report all the books that had been published on penitentiaries. If they had read them it would have been superfluous for them to charge so much for their travelling expenses. If they had read those books it would not have been necessary for them to visit Sing Sing and other penitentiaries. They had no reason to go there because the books gave complete information on the subject. If they went there it was because they had not read the books. But why pad the report? The expenditure was extravagant. I complained about it, and one of the commissioners told me that I was not a friend of his because I had spoken my mind in the house and said what I thought about the matter. There must be an end to that kind of vagrancy in bureaucracy.

My hon. friends are complaining all the time about bureaucracy. They say there is too much bureaucracy. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is so much more bureaucracy that we are asked to instal today. I wonder if a single member who votes for this resolution will be justified in speaking one more word against bureaucracy. Everybody has his mouth full of bureaucracy —bureaucracy here, bureaucracy there. This is more bureaucracy and apparently everybody is ready to swallow it. What of the people who complain of high taxation on account of bureaucracy? This is bureaucracy of ten years ago. Ten years ago the civil servants numbered 50,000; today they number 160,000, and we have not enough; we want more. There is, I know, a spirit of benevolence, of human fraternity and the brotherhood of man. That spirit certainly exists, but just the same we have to apply the axe somewhere, and I do not see how we can instal more bureaucrats in Ottawa when we have not the courage, just because of personal friendship, to dismiss anyone. I have said this already and I repeat it. The wife of such and such a bureaucrat may be a friend of the wife of such and such an official in the department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking of any one particular bureaucrat or official. I am speaking of the bureaucrat type, where the wife of the bureaucrat is the friend of the wife of the official, and their children play together. If an incompetent bureaucrat is fired the official knows very well that he will have trouble at home, because his wife will say, "Why did you fire the husband of my very dearest friend?" And then the children will come and say, "Daddy, daddy, daddy." They will repeat it several times, and then they will cry because they will be unable to play with their little friends who will be mad at them because their father was fired by the official. That is how we go on. All that has been said about bureaucracy has been platonic, and if members are sincere they must vote against the proposal before us. Why not make a reduction of personnel in the Department of Justice, so that there will be no more expenditure to the public account of such schemes which have not been put in force for ten years. We have waited so long and during that time the wave of bureaucracy has been swelling higher and higher all the time. Now on the crest of the wave we want to put the cork on the penitentiary commission—very high on the crest of the wave. More bureaucracy.

I sympathize with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who is a personal friend of mine and for whom I have a great admiration, but I do not think he is logical. I see my hon. friend the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) sitting next to him. I also have a great admiration for him and he is a personal friend of mine. I have consideration and esteem for him, but I find that he and the hon. member for Davenport are most illogical.

Mr. GREEN: I have not said a word.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not a mind reader, but I remember the hon. member's past speeches.

Mr. GREEN: I was just smiling at you in a friendly way.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not displease my hon. friend for a kingdom, for, although we do not agree on everything, I have a soft spot in my heart for him, and I am quite sincere when I say that. He was kind to me once and I shall never forget it.

An hon. MEMBER: How many soft spots have you?

Mr. POULIOT: Not many. This is a serious matter. If I have prevented my hon. friend the member for Vancouver South from repeating what he has said in the past I have rendered a great service to him. I have prevented him from contradicting himself by approving this increase in the number of bureaucrats.

I will now leave it to the house, Mr. Speaker. I think I have spoken plainly enough to be well understood. If some hon. member declares himself in favour of this appointment, that is his business. I respect freedom of thought and of speech, but I tell him that he will be depriving himself of the right to complain in the future about bureaucracy in Ottawa.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker the first time I saw or heard my hon. friend who preceded me (Mr. Pouliot) was over at the Hull assizes some years ago, where he had a jury of young gentlemen like those from Quebec I see opposite me, weeping copious buckets of tears. This problem to which he has referred tonight goes back twenty years to the time when Mr. Harry Anderson was editor of the old Toronto Globe, a real reform newspaper. He took up the cudgels for penitentiary reform, aided by a pioneer in it, the Telegram. The city of Toronto had established a gaol farm for young offenders on Yonge street at Thornhill and another one for women at Concord near the city. They introduced many reforms which had been put into force in Britain twenty-five years ago, including the payment of fines, which later reform had resulted in closing half the prisons in Britain.

This resolution deals with two questions, the appointment of a commissioner and two deputy commissioners, and to provide for the payment of their salaries; and, second, that the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to the commissioner and deputy commissioners. So far so good. But a military gentleman was appointed in April a year ago to make a report on the penitentiaries, and when we got his report we found that he made some of the recommendations which were made by Mr. Harry Anderson of the Globe twenty years ago and which have yet not been adopted.

We should have some further system of inspections of these places other than by crown officers. These are all crown officers mentioned in the resolution. If grand juries are not to be allowed in, somebody should be allowed to go in respresenting the public. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross) has a large delegation going to Niagara Falls next week-end. There is no reason why there should not be, under the act at the present time, a board of visitors, as there is now already, consisting of members of parliament and others. If the minister will not allow grand juries to go in, he should arrange for some visits by committees when the house is sitting. I do hope that something will be done about this matter of real prison reform, because it has been made a political football for twenty years.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I rise to speak briefly in support of the remarks made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I certainly could not agree with the opinions of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I want to compliment the government on marching triumphantly behind the leadership of Canadian public opinion and Canadian conscience in these matters. I am quite sure there is a great demand for improvement in our penal administration and I think this legislation represents a step in the right direction. I am of opinion that, under the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), in the very near future we are going to see something done in this matter.

Before sitting down, I wish to say that, in my opinion, the whole success of our form of penal institutions, their administration and their improvement in the future will depend almost entirely on the type of personnel who are appointed to these high positions. I do hope that every consideration will be given to selecting men who are not of military mind, who do not have an entirely disciplinarian outlook, but who have a full and complete understanding of human nature and its treatment under these conditions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: Before the resolution carries, will the minister explain to the committee just how far he is proposing to go in the bill? I notice that the resolution mentions only the appointment of a commissioner and two deputy commissioners. It may be that the intention is to make other improvements in our penitentiary system; and I hope there are to be improvements along the lines suggested in the Archambault report and also in the report of Major-General Gibson. Will the minister give us in some detail what his plan is for improving the penitentiary system?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I think it would be more appropriate to do that at a later stage. This is a very simple bill. It changes the plan which was laid down in the Penitentiary Act of 1939, an act which has not been proclaimed. The act of 1939 authorized the appointment of a penitentiaries commission consisting of three persons; and the government after giving careful consideration to the desirability of appointing a three-man commission, came to the conclusion that it was more desirable to appoint a one-man commission with two deputy commissioners. The appointment of a one-man commission and two deputy commissioners is the whole purpose of this bill. I think it is due the committee that I give some reasons why that change in plan was decided on.

The Penitentiary Act, 1939, was enacted as a result of the report of a royal commission appointed to investigate the penal system of Canada. Heretofore the administration of the penitentiaries has been the direct responsibility of a superintendent who has reported to the deputy minister of justice and has acted under his instructions, subject to the direction and approval of the minister. It is true that the superintendent was assisted in his duties by three inspectors, but in practice not only all matters of policy but all day-to-day administrative decisions in connection with penitentiaries were submitted to and dealt with by the superintendent personally.

The royal commission considered that the problems of penal administration were too large in scope and too serious in results to be thus concentrated in the hands of one man. They referred to the system of administration in force in Great Britain where there was a prison commission consisting of a chairman and two other commissioners, one administrative and one medical, reinforced by four assistant commissioners. They pointed out that under this system each member of the commission assumed responsibility for his own share of the work of the department and each of the assistant commissioners was entrusted with a particular phase of the prison problem and with the inspection of a particular block of prisons. The royal commission emphasized the advantages of a system which permitted greater delegation of administrative responsibility and division of the various duties involved in penal administration amongst a larger group of officials. They also recommended that for purposes of administration the prison commission should be responsible directly to the Minister of Justice in the same manner as the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, since it was felt that the deputy minister of justice as chief law officer of the crown should not be burdened with penitentiary administration.

The Penitentiary Act, 1939, accepted the general principles involved in these recommendations; that is, an augmented staff to deal with penitentiary administration and direct responsibility to the minister, and provided, in section 4, for the appointment of three commissioners to replace the superintendent and, in section 8, for the appointment of three assistant commissioners to replace the former inspectors. It further provided, in section 5, that the commissioners should, under the minister, have direct control and management of all penitentiaries and over all matters connected therewith with power, subject to the approval of the minister, to make rules and regulations for their administration, management and discipline.

The bill which it is now proposed to introduce does not alter the size of the organization which the royal commission considered desirable for the administration of the penitentiaries and which parliament approved in passing the 1939 act. Nor does it change the principle of direct responsibility to the minister for penitentiary administration. The only change it contemplates is that there shall be one person responsible to the minister for the administration of the penitentiaries, with whom he can deal directly rather than a commission of three men each with equal responsibilities. It will in no way prevent a suitable division of responsibility under the commissoner for the various phases of administration amongst the deputy and assistant commissioners, as contemplated by the royal commission. It should, in fact, make it easier for these officials to concentrate upon the particular phases of administration to which they will be allotted without the necessity of their becoming responsible for all matters of policy. It will also facilitate the appointment of those who have special qualifications for the branch of the work to be allotted to them.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

It is to be anticipated that there will be the fullest consultation between the commissioner and his deputies and assistants, and that their advice in their own spheres will receive full consideration when decisions affecting policy have to be made.

However valuable multiple bodies may be in consultative or advisory capacities, it is a sound principle of responsible government that, in administrative matters, there should be one responsible head charged with the duty of making decisions for his department and of submitting to superior authority recommendations for which he assumes responsibility. It is significant that in a recently published Manual of Suggested Standards for a Correctional System prepared by the American prison association in October, 1946, after lengthy consideration by the outstanding penologists and authorities on prison administration in the United States, the following statement appears:

> In a decreasing number of states the correctional institutions are administered by a board of three or more salaried, full-time members (known as board of administration, board of control, etc.), either with the chairman serving in the capacity of executive director or each member administering a prescribed part of the programme. Such a board seldom gives the correctional institutions as effective administration as a strong department of correction under a single qualified commissioner would. The best opinion is against this multiple-executive form of administration and strongly in favour of the single professionally qualified administrative head, whether with or without a policy-making board of part-time non-salaried laymen.

It is also significant to note that the federal bureau of prisons in the United States, which is responsible for the administration of all prisons under the jurisdiction of the federal government, has adopted this principle of a single director as its administrative head.

In paragraph 16 of his recent report General Gibson has outlined the proposed allotment of responsibility to the deputy commissioners and the assistant commissioners. With proper consultation and mutual confidence and understanding between the commissioner and his assistants there is every reason to anticipate that the organization proposed will accomplish satisfactorily the purposes the royal commission had in view in recommending a larger body to administer the penitentiaries, and at the same time will adhere to the principle of a single responsible head that recent administrative practice strongly favours.

Perhaps at this point I should place on record parts of the report of General Gibson to which I have referred:

> The royal commission proposed the appointment of a prison commission composed of three members to administer the penal system of Canada responsible directly to the Minister of Justice. It is evident that in making this recommendation the royal commission had in mind its further recommendation—

And I think this is important.

—that the federal government take over the administration of all the prisons in Canada, thus centralizing the control of the Canadian penal system under the government of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did that include the provincial prisons?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, which we do not propose to do.

As will be stated later, it is not yet considered practicable to give effect to this recommendation—

I do not know whether it will ever be practicable to give effect to the recommendation.

Mr. GREEN: From what page is the minister reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: Part of the time I am reading from page 8, and part of the time I am interjecting my own comments.

As will be stated later, it is not yet considered practicable to give effect to this recommendation and the government has recently decided that for the present it is preferable to entrust the administration of the penitentiaries of Canada to a single commissioner assisted by two deputy commissioners, with a headquarters organization consisting of the inspectors and staff of the present penitentiaries branch, the inspectors being reclassified as assistant commissioners.

It is proposed that one deputy commissioner will be primarily charged with the selection, training, assessment and further reconstruction of the staffs of the penitentiaries and with the organization and supervision of a training school for penitentiary officers. He will also be responsible for the supervision and development of the educational facilities in the institutions under the control of the dominion government.

It is proposed that the second deputy commissioner will be primarily charged with supervision and development of the medical and psychiatric services, physical training and recreational facilities as well as the development of research and statistics to assess the adequacy and results of present and proposed methods of correctional treatment.

The next paragraph, which I shall not read, deals with the assistant commissioners. The bill will concern itself with the appointment of the commissioner and two deputy commissioners; that is really what the bill is. We must proclaim the act of 1939 after we make the changes parliament considers appropriate, and the government is recommending to parliament that, instead of proceeding with this three-man commission, we substitute instead one commissioner and two deputy commissioners, for the reasons I have given here. In the late thirties much faith was reposed in three-man boards or five-man boards or larger boards, and there is much to be said for that form of organization in dealing with certain matters. But in the legislation the principle of responsibility to the minister is preserved, and I think parliament would want it preserved. It is provided in the bill that the penitentiaries commission at all times must be subject to the direction and control of the minister, and it is our view that better results will be obtained if, instead of having a board under the minister, we have one commissioner under the minister. That is, we think, a better form of organization, provided that you get a good man; and I do not think I should hesitate about stating who the commissioner will be if this legislation goes through. The commissioner will be General Gibson, who up to this moment has been doing a special task of examining the whole problem. I should make it clear, too, that this recommendation did not emanate from him. This recommendation emanated from the government. It was not he who recommended that he be the sole commissioner; it was the government that asked him to be the sole commissioner, subject to the approval of parliament, and we anticipate that it will be possible to get highly qualified deputy commissioners, each of whose work will be clearly delimited and defined in the way I have mentioned, and that this organization will form the best basis for effecting certain changes and imporvements in the penal system of Canada.

So often I hear that the government should carry out the findings of the Archambault commisison. One of the recommendations of that commission was that in some way the dominion government should take charge of the penal system of Canada, which, unless indefensible duplication existed, would involve the taking over of a large number of provincial institutions. We have not the slightest indication that the provinces would be willing to have that done, and we have not any intention of trying to centralize authority and power in Ottawa in that way. It may be that there is much to be said for a complete integration of the penal system of Canada. But a division of responsibility is clearly contemplated under the British North America Act, and it is our intention to respect the provisions of that act.

I see that some hon. members have read the report of General Gibson, a report which, in my opinion, is a practical one. The steps which were taken by General Gibson before he came to his decisions are set out in his report; and I think those who are interested in the improvement of the penal system in Canada have been much impressed with his report.

I am not in a position at the present time to say that the government will do everything General Gibson recommends in his report; but certainly we are very much more likely to go to that length than we are to go to the full length recommended by the Archambault commission. I am not saying that the Archambault commission report was not a valuable document and an important contribution to the cause of penal reform in Canada. But I do say that certain recommendations in it are, in my judgment, impracticable; and that the recommendations made by General Gibson in his report are for the most part at least practicable and desirable.

Mr. MacNICOL: After listening to the minister, all I can say is that I hope a great advance will be made. The minister did not say anything about the reclamation of prisoners. I have not read the report about which he has spoken, although I did read the Archambault report.

However I like to find things out for myself. I have travelled extensively to do so, and for a long time, along with many others, I have asked myself how we can reclaim the prisoners who come under the care of the federal government. I appreciate we cannot do very much for those who come under provincial care. I believe that, generally speaking, the provinces are acting in the matter; I know Ontario is. Mr. George Dunbar, the member from Ottawa in the local house at Toronto, is the minister in control of penal institutions. Last year Mr. Dunbar went to England to make a survey, and I believe that, in doing so, he covered about the same route I covered when I made my survey of British prisons, and the manner in which they deal with the reclamation of prisoners. In England and Scotland they use the Borstal system, and the institutions over there using that system are increasing in number because of the beneficial results obtained.

Apparently, however, unless we can use it in connection with the young offenders who are sent to our penitentiaries for major crimes, we cannot carry out that system in the federal field. But I do not see why we cannot. I am one who believes that many serious crimes are committed without any intention on the part of the young men concerned to commit crime. Perhaps a young man may have some twist in his mentality; I believe a considerable percentage of young folk may not be 100 per cent mentally competent. I do not mean that they are crazy; but there is something wrong with them which prompts them to do something they ought not to do. Perhaps, instead of being incarcerated with hardened criminals who—and I agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata—might be beyond redemption, these young men could be reclaimed.

Will the new board have authority to introduce reclamation methods in federal penitentiaries for first offenders? Surely they can go that far. Surely we can reclaim those young men, just as they do it in England, although, in England it is all under one government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they have an easier system under which to work. With our federal government and the nine provinces it becomes more difficult. But can we not introduce something along the lines of the Borstal reclamation programme for the benefit of first offenders in federal penitentiaries? Perhaps the minister has not had time to give the matter all the thought he would like to give it. I have given it thought for a long time, and have made a careful survey. I am one who believes that a goodly percentage of first offenders in federal penitentiaries could be reclaimed. Will the government's programme include the reclamation of first offenders?

Mr.ILSLEY: I have read a number of speeches which have been made in the house through the years about penal reform, and I remember in particular the substance of a sentence used by the hon. member for Spadina in one of his speeches, where he said that the three principles which ought to be observed are classification, segregation and after care. If hon. members will look at General Gibson's report they will see that he is fully aware of the importance of classification, segregation and after care, and that he has recommendations to make under each of those headings, although perhaps he does not use those exact terms. Some progress has already been made.

I do not know that I want this evening to go into a discussion of methods of dealing with prisoners, because the principle of the bill is a very simple one. It is a step which must be taken to set up the organization to deal with the problem. At a later stage I shall be prepared to discuss the Borstal system, and how far it is possible for the dominion government to do anything in the application of that system here in Canada. The whole problem is complicated by the division of responsibility between the federal and provincial governments, but probably it will not be impossible to apply certain features of the Borstal system, even in connection with some federal institutions.

It must be borne in mind that the Borstal system is not a penitentiaries system at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a reclamation system.

Mr. ILSLEY: A Borstal institution is not a penitentiary.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a reclamation of offenders.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I am glad he is at the head of this department, because he has the habit of making some changes and securing some efficiency for the money expended.

Is a definite policy to be adopted of training these officials? Before the minister took charge of this department, most of the officials just learned from experience. I found out that you cannot learn the police business in a day. We had a chief of police who had been at the head of our force in Toronto for thirty-five years. He retired, and a deputation came to me and wanted to put a businessman who had no training for the work into that position. I told them, "You cannot learn Eaton's or Simpson's business in a day; how are you going to learn to be chief of police in a day?" It is the same in this department. The civil service commission have been making the appointments, based mostly on party patronage. The result is that they have not had the class of official they should have at the head of this most important work.

I hope the minister will be able to make some of the necessary changes. Every large corporation or business has a new manager or a new president who could take hold the next day. I hope there will be some such new system adopted in this department. Since the Archambault report was tabled ten or twelve years ago, they have recently changed for the better one hundred of the regulations. I should like to see them go farther and confer with the provinces about what should be done in connection with the Borstal system. A return was tabled this session stating that this matter was waiting a conference with the provinces. Ontario and Toronto have been leaders in reform and they had two or three crime institutions in operation in 1910, long before the Nickle report of 1921, at North Yonge street cure farm for men, and for women a farm at Concord, taken over in the war by the province for a hospital. Mr. Dunbar, the provincial secretary of Ontario who represents an Ottawa seat, has opened a reformation school at Brampton, I believe, for youthful offenders.

Another matter I should like to see looked into is that of definite and indeterminate sentences. The late Chief Justice R. M. Meredith took the view that a sentence of 365 days in a provincial institution plus an indefinite period was not legal. I hope the minister will look into this problem of indeterminate detention. It is not in the public interest.

Mr. TIMMINS: There seems to be more involved in this matter than the mere appointment of three officials; apparently it is linked up with a programme which is essential if these officials are to function. I should like to ask the minister, who is the person who has been directly responsible up to this time for administration in connection with these matters? Who has been directly responsible to the minister? Is the work of that person who is directly responsible to be superseded by these new appointments? Many of us have read General Gibson's report which is quite comprehensive and covers the whole field, but I think we should like to know what express programme is to be handed to General Gibson and his two assistants to carry through. I do not think we should be asked to appoint a commissioner and two deputies when we do not know what parts of this report are to be formulated into a programme in order that we may have a definite penal system in the future.

Mr. ILSLEY: At the present time there are a superintendent and inspector.

Mr. TIMMINS: Is the superintendent vested with plenary powers under the minister to do many of the things set out here?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not just sure how far the Penitentiary Act goes in giving the superintendent power. I speak subject to correction, but there are certain vacancies in the organization. One of the inspectors has been acting as superintendent and another inspector has retired. Instead of there being a superintendent and three inspectors, there is an acting superintendent and one inspector. With the shrinkage of the organization it became necessary for someone else to take on additional duties, so that, for the last six months or so, General Gibson has been engaged to a considerable extent in administrative duties in connection with the penitentiaries.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will the programme go into effect with the appointment of the commissioners?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would prefer to state at a later stage just how far the commissioner will go in carrying out the recommendations made by him in the report that is before the house. As I say, undoubtedly most of that report should be put into effect at the earliest possible moment. The carrying out of some of these recommendations may have to be deferred and it is possible that not all of them will be carried out, but these are matters that will have to be considered. I shall have to make a statement at a later date as soon as the decisions are arrived at.

Mr. TIMMINS: Would the minister consider the suggestion that in the meantime only the commissioner be appointed and that the government wait until the commissioner is fully seized of these matters before appointing the two deputies? Then, when the deputies are appointed some programme should be brought down.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is desirable that the commissioner be appointed as soon as possible and I would hope that the deputies would be appointed shortly afterward. I made the statement a while ago that the commissioner would be General Gibson. A minister should not make a statement like that; he should say, which I am quite prepared to say, that the recommendation of the government—

Mr. GREEN: We heard you the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY: —to His Excellency the Governor General will be that General Gibson be appointed.

Mr. TIMMINS: Having regard to the report that we have before us, I think we are all pretty much in agreement with that appointment.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am sorry that I was not in my seat when the discussion began tonight and have therefore missed many of the things said by the Minister of Justice. I am one of those who have read this report very carefully. I am impressed with its goodness. It is indeed a step in the right direction. However I was sorry to hear the minister say that the government is not prepared to adopt all the recommendations made in this report, because to me they are all alike, commendable. However, as the minister said, it is the first step. We who are interested in this subject will watch the development of these commissioners' work very carefully indeed.

In recent years I have been one of those who have been very much impressed with the Borstal system as it is being worked out today in the old country, and I should like to see that system adopted in Canada on a federal scale.

There is one item on page 11 of the report which I should like to read:

> Your commissioner, therefore, recommends that authority be obtained for the establishment of a new institution in the province of Quebec, separate from St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and that this institution be of the reformatory type to which could be transferred the youthful and reformable offenders sentenced to terms of two years or more in the province of Quebec. It is anticipated that the principles of the Borstal system may be applied to this institution.

And so on. So far as Canada is concerned, the only place where the Borstal system has been tried out was in British Columbia a few years ago. I am happy to say that that system is again to be reintroduced in that province. I hope that its usefulness will be of such a nature that we shall watch it carefully in the House of Commons, and that we shall be prepared to adopt it more generally across the dominion because, if there is one phase of our penitentiary system which is weak today, it is that of sending young offenders of the reformable type into our federal penitentiaries where they meet from day to day the most hardened criminals that we have in the country.

It is noted from time to time in this and other reports that some of these young men come out of our federal penitentiaries infinitely worse than when they went in, just because of their association with hardened criminals. The mistake, to my mind, is made in the first place by putting these young reformable-type prisoners into these institutions.

I noticed that the minister said a Borstal institution is not a penitentiary. I admit the truth of that statement and I hope they will never be looked upon as penitentiaries. I remember visiting a Borstal institution in Lincolnshire, England, last fall. There it is spoken of as an institution. The word "prison" is never used. I admit that it is what is called an open Borstal. There are both closed and open Borstals; but there the word "prison" is not used. In fact it is a punishable offence if any boy mentions the word "prison". There are no locks and no bars. The boys are treated with every degree of trust and confidence. They are being trained day to day to become the type of citizen they ought to be. I should like to see that system developed more and more in our Canadian prison institutions.

There are many other matters in connection with this report that one might speak on; but, as I said a few moments ago, I have not prepared any speech in this regard. I have read the report. I am impressed with it and I believe it is indeed a forward step. I hope that, if not all, as many as possible of these recommendations may be carried out.

Mr. KNIGHT: I wish to say a word on one phase of what the minister has said. I am particularly glad that definite and skilled instruction is to be given to the people who are to be in charge of the penitentiaries, and who are responsible for their administration. That has been one of the greatest drawbacks of the system which we have had up to now, and it is something about which the country can complain.

I was interested in the fact that one of the deputy commissioners is to be the instructor, as it were, of the inspector's staff. He is a man who assumes a tremendous responsibility and the man who, if he is left alone and is not interfered with, will imprint his ideas in regard to care in penitentiaries upon the whole penitentiary system. In my opinion, his selection is a matter of tremendous importance. I hope we have decided that education is perhaps the most important work that can be carried on in connection with prisoners. Surely at this time these institutions should be considered not merely as punitive institutions but almost wholly as reformatory.

Speaking of commissions and of their reports, I should like to put on the record my admiration of the report of the commission which studied the prisons and penitentiaries of Saskatchewan, a commission headed by Doctor S. R. Laycock. That report more than any other which I have read attacks the problem of crime from the right angle, that is to say, reformative, to which I have already referred.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): May I say a word in support of what the hon. member said about the Borstal system. It is true that it is only an institution; it is not a penitentiary. But, of course, some accidents happen once in a while in Borstal institutions. The other day I saw a report in a paper that a young detainee was guilty of an assault on one of the guards; but it was just an accident. I do not say that to speak against the Borstal system, because I favour it.

A week ago, I believe, in Quebec the legislature adopted a law to provide subsidies for the study of juvenile delinquency in that province. I may say, in passing, that I do not approve the centralization of all the penal systems in Canada. If there has to be centralization, I trust it will be done only after a long and careful study and parleying with the different provinces.

The hon. member said that some of our young detainees were coming out of penitentiaries worse than they were when they went in. That is true. I have a special case under consideration, a young man who is not an idiot or insane, but who has been sentenced for three years for robbery of some kind. I know he was not responsible, because he had taken a glass of wine with a companion he had just met on the road. I am positive that it may happen that when he comes out he will be worse than when he went in. He is easily influenced. One thing I noticed in the Gibson report is that Colonel Gibson said there is only one psychiatrist in one penitentiary in Canada, Kingston. There was none in any other penitentiary. That is due to the lack of administration and comprehension of the status mentis of all prisoners, especially criminals. In the Toronto Star of April 24, 1947, I also noticed an article by Wessely Hicks. In this article he mentions that Mr. Edmison, president of the Canadian penal institution, a lawyer with a lifelong interest in penology, recently visited penitentiaries across Canada. I should like to quote the following from that article:

> I visited Stony Mountain, Prince Albert and New Westminster penitentiaries in the west. I visited Dorchester prison in New Brunswick, and the penitentiary in Kingston. There was one psychiatrist at Kingston, Doctor C. M. Crawford, and he is the only psychiatrist attached to any prison in Canada.
> Every prison should have at least one psychiatrist to deal with abnormal offenders such as sex perverts.

And so forth.

I have read that just to come to the question I wish to ask of the minister. Is it the intention of the government to appoint a medical man as one of the two deputy commissioners on the new commission that is proposed? I think that is essential.

Mr. ILSLEY: The nature of the duties to be discharged by one of the deputy commissioners would, it is expected, call for some knowledge of medicine or psychiatry. I cannot say anything about the intentions of the government beyond this, that we shall be disposed to accept the recommendation of General Gibson as to the division of responsibility between the two deputy commissioners. I placed those duties on record tonight. The language is very carefully framed. I will read it again:

> It is proposed that the second deputy commissioner will be primarily charged with supervision and development of the medical and psychiatric services, physical training and recreational facilities as well as the development of research and statistics to assess the adequacy and results of present and proposed methods of correctional treatment.

If those are to be his duties the government will seek a man qualified to discharge them, which, I assume, would call for some knowledge of medicine or psychiatry.

Mr. GREEN: I take it from the reluctance of the minister to give any details of his plans for improving the penal system in Canada that he has still somewhat of an open mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that he will give the most careful consideration both to the Archambault report and to the report of General Gibson, but I am a little worried for fear that General Gibson will not be supported as he should be. There are in his report certain suggestions having to do, for example, with the treatment of young offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. I can assure the minister that in British Columbia at any rate, the utmost interest is being taken in the treatment of the young offenders. Our government there is planning to establish a Borstal home, and I know I have had representations from many responsible citizens in Vancouver, and no doubt there have been similar representations from other parts of the province, all urging action on this question of penal reform. That one question of what is to be done with the young offenders is, I think, the key question worrying most of the people who are making these representations. General Gibson deals with that problem and on page 16 of his report he makes this recommendation. After discussing the Borstal system and the treatment of young offenders and pointing out that the provinces have a certain jurisdiction over the young offenders, the general says:

> These developments emphasize the necessity for a conference of the responsible authorities to determine the respective responsibilities of dominion and provinces in dealing with this problem and to define and coordinate the action to be taken by each to avoid overlapping and duplication of facilities.

I should like the minister to tell the committee whether or not he is prepared to call a conference of that type at an early day. It does seem to me that such a conference is important in working out proper plans for improving the methods of dealing with these young offenders.

Another recommendation made by General Gibson has to do with the prisoners' aid societies. His remarks will be found at the bottom of page 16:

> Your commissioner is of opinion that the activities of these societies should be encouraged and recognized and recommends that when a society demonstrates that it has been organized to carry out its duties with a reasonable degree of efficiency, provision should be made for it to receive financial assistance from the dominion government, based on the numbers released from federal institutions who have been assisted by its activities, to supplement the funds received from other sources.

I should like the minister to tell us whether or not he agrees with that suggestion and whether the government intends to take action that will enable support of that kind to be given to these voluntary associations.

One other question has to do with the training of personnel of the penitentiary staffs. General Gibson emphasizes in different parts of his report the great need for giving modern training to the staffs of the penitentiaries, and at page 9 of his report he says that in the middle and higher range of salaries the penitentiary employees are not getting proper pay at the present time and he recommends that there should be a revision upwards. My third question of the minister would be whether or not the government is willing to make the necessary changes by way of giving these officials proper salaries and by enabling General Gibson to set up a proper training school for his staff. If there is no willingness to support the general on these different points I am afraid he has not very much chance of making a success of his new position. I should like to have the minister's answer to these three questions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to give my answer at a later day. On the question of salaries, my impression is that a great many adjustments upwards have already been made.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will find that recommendation on page 9 of the report.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the date of the report? It was in February, was it not?

Mr. GREEN: February 5, 1947.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There will be no hesitation on the part of the government to pay the men what they ought to receive. The trouble about that is that there is never any agreement about what people should receive. It is the whole problem of pay of the civil service in all its branches. Thousands and thousands of adjustments are being made all the time, and I am not aware that at the moment this particular class of officials of the government is being discriminated against.

Mr. GREEN: If I may interrupt the minister, General Gibson does not say that there is discrimination, but he does say that if he is to have the proper type of personnel to do the work he is of opinion that the salaries will have to be increased.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they are being increased. I understand that process is going on.

About the conference with the provinces, I shall have to make some statement later about that. I am not, at the moment, prepared to say that a conference will be called or when it will be called. I would assume that probably there would be a conference with the provinces.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood the minister to say earlier that he had reason to believe that the provinces would not be willing to give over their jurisdiction under the British North America Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have no reason to think they would; and I assume, from the general tone of a great many speeches that are made by members of provincial governments, that they would not.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is clear that General Gibson is not advocating that the dominion should take over all responsibility?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN: He merely says that there should be a conference to define the respective fields and to work out a method of cooperation, which I think is quite proper and quite within the terms of the British North America Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the third question, again?

Mr. GREEN: It had reference to prisoners' aid societies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, grants to prisoners' aid societies. I cannot make any statement about that now. That is a matter for the treasury board, the Minister of Finance and the government generally. The matter is not yet at such a stage that a programme of financial aid to these prisoners' aid societies could be instituted. I have discussed that recommendation, but that is the fact; it is not yet at such a stage that a programme of financial aid could be instituted.

Mr. KNIGHT: I wish to ask a question, in view of what the hon. member for Portneuf said. Is his information correct that there is only one penitentiary in Canada which enjoys the services of a trained psychiatrist?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 177, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK AND BANK OF CANADA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a very simple one. It just extends to the Bank of Canada and the industrial development bank certain provisions which now apply to other banks. Section 29 of the Canada Evidence Act provides for the proof of entries in books and records kept in a bank. Subsection 5 is being amended so as to include the industrial development bank established by chapter 44 of the statutes of 1944-45, and also the Bank of Canada.

There are just two sections in the bill. I have dealt with the first one. The second deals with the definition of "corporation". Section 29A of the Canada Evidence Act is being amended to correspond to the definition of "bank" in subsection 5 of section 29. I shall have to get the Canada Evidence Act.

The first section of the bill before the house reads as follows:

> Paragraph (a) of subsection five of section twenty-nine of the Canada Evidence Act, chapter fifty-nine of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "(a) 'bank' means the Bank of Canada, the Industrial Development Bank and any bank to which the Bank Act applies, or to which the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies, and includes any branch, agency or office of any such bank;"

Paragraph (a) of subsection 5 of section 29 of the Canada Evidence Act is the same, with the omission of the underlined words; that is, with the omission of the words "the Bank of Canada" and "the industrial development bank". The significance of the change is that section 29 will now apply to the industrial development bank and the Bank of Canada; and when it does, the following provisions will apply to those banks:

> Subject to the provisions of this section a copy of any entry in any book or record kept in any bank shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry and of the matters, transactions and accounts therein recorded.
> 2. A copy of an entry in such book or record shall not be received in evidence under this section unless it be first proved that the book or record was, at the time of the making of the entry, one of the ordinary books or records of the bank and that the entry was made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that the book or record is in the custody or control of the bank and that such copy is a true copy thereof; and such proof may be given by the manager or accountant of the bank and may be given orally or by affidavit sworn before any commissioner or other person authorized to take affidavits.

Then follow certain other provisions. The marginal notes relating to these other provisions are as follows: cheques, proof of "no account"; not necessary to prove official character; compulsion of production or appearance; order to inspect and copy; notice; computation of time. Those are the provisions that apply to legal proceedings affecting banks, and hereafter those provisions will apply to the Bank of Canada and the industrial development bank.

Mr. GREEN: Merely extending those provisions to the Bank of Canada and the industrial development bank?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is section 1. Then section 29A of the Canada Evidence Act is the section that permits the admission in evidence of a print, whether enlarged or not, from any photographic film of an entry in any book or record kept by any government or corporation and destroyed, lost or delivered to a customer after such film was taken, and of any bill of exchange, promissory note, cheque, receipt, instrument or document held by any government or corporation and destroyed, lost or delivered to a customer after such film was taken, and of any record, document, plan, book or paper belonging to or deposited with any government or corporation. I have not read the whole section, but that is the essence of it. It is an authorization for the admission in evidence of photographic or photostatic copies.

Mr. GREEN: The amendment seems fair enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The reason we do not have to say anything about the Bank of Canada in this section is that the Bank of Canada is already mentioned, so that it is only necessary to add the industrial development bank.

Mr. MENARY: I should like to ask the minister if banks are responsible for bonds, notes and papers placed in safety deposit boxes for safe keeping. If the bank should be broken into or the boxes broken into and bonds stolen, is the bank responsible?

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman wait until we are in committee?

Mr. MENARY: I am sorry.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"bank."

Mr. MENARY: If a customer has bonds or notes or papers in a safety deposit box and the bank is broken into and the contents of those boxes removed, who would be responsible? Is the bank responsible, or would the customer be responsible? Could the minister answer that question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid it would be improper for me to give legal advice even if I knew what advice to give.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not rising to speak on the bill itself but to protest against third reading being given at this time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Next sitting, then.

Mr. HANSELL: This afternoon a bill was reported from committee and read the third time and passed, and I do not think that is a good practice to follow. Usually we have some little time between second and third readings, and I think this motion should come up at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

PROOF OF TREATIES BY PRODUCTION OF "CANADA GAZETTE"

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: The purpose of the bill is to provide for the proof of treaties to which Canada is a party by the production of a copy of the Canada Gazette or a volume of the acts of the parliament of Canada purporting to contain a copy of the treaty or by production of a copy purporting to be printed by the king's printer for Canada. The only section in the Canada Evidence Act under which a Canadian treaty can be proven is section 24, which requires production of a copy certified under the hand of the proper officer or person in whose custody it is. Section 20 provides for proof of imperial treaties by production of a copy of the Canada Gazette or a volume of the acts of the parliament of Canada purporting to contain a copy or by production of a copy thereof purporting to be printed by the king's printer for Canada. The amendment proposed will, for the purposes of the Canada Evidence Act, place Canadian treaties in the same position as imperial treaties.

Mr. TIMMINS: What would be the practical application of this amendment? Would it have something to do with extradition, or something of that kind? Would it apply where a treaty for the extradition of prisoners would have to be read into the record?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot give an instance. This was requested by the Department of External Affairs. It seemed reasonable, and we went ahead with it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Proclamations, etc., of governor general.

Mr. TIMMINS: I notice the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in his place. Could he give us the practical application of the amendment?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Certain treaties are implemented by legislation, which place obligations upon citizens of Canada. There may be occasions when the existence of such a treaty would have to be proved. It might be in civil proceedings, or even in proceedings of a criminal nature.

Take, for instance, the treaty with respect to migratory birds. There may be a violation of the provisions of that treaty, sanctioned by penalties enacted by Canadian laws. And it might be necessary to establish before the courts the existence of the treaty. It constitutes a fact that may have to be established in the course of judicial proceedings. And, just as in the case of imperial treaties, it is felt that the method of proof should be the same as that established by the Canada Evidence Act for other documents emanating from public authorities.

Mr. TIMMINS: Having regard to section 21 (a) of the proposed bill, we find that it says:

> By the production of a copy of the Canada Gazette, or a volume of the acts of the parliament of Canada purporting to contain a copy of such treaty, proclamation, order, regulation, or appointment or a notice thereof;
> (b) By the production of a copy of such treaty, proclamation, order, regulation or appointment, purporting to be printed by the king's printer for Canada.

It has always been my impression that there was a good deal of formality necessary in respect of the proving of matters of much less importance than the proving of a treaty. It seems to me that an order simply printed in ordinary form by the king's printer would hardly bear the formality necessary to protect us in respect of a serious matter such as this.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The evidence of statutes, the evidence of orders in council, the evidence of any public act done by the proper public authority may be made by the production of a copy of the statute printed by the king's printer, or, if it is an order in council, by the production of a copy of the official Gazette where it appears, or in other cases it may be that the proof can be made by the war orders and regulations printed by the king's printer.

The fact that a document emanates from the office of the king's printer is usually regarded as sufficient to give it authenticity. In my own province this provision would not be required. In our civil courts under the civil code—I think it is article 1229—there is a rule providing for the manner in which these formal documents can be proved.

We now have treaties entered into between Canada and other nations; and all that is proposed in this bill is that the provision which existed heretofore for proving the kind of treaties by which Canada had been bound—that is to say, treaties made by the imperial government, and purporting to extend to all parts of the empire—be applied to the treaties which are made by our own Canadian authorities under the constitutional powers now enjoyed by Canada. It is not a new form of proof that is being introduced. It is merely the extension of a form of proof that has been of long usage to a new document which did not exist at the time the rule was formerly stated.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 26, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain the bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is the usual bill which comes before parliament each year and calls for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. This year the appointment is sought for the firm of George A. Touche and Company of the cities of Toronto and Montreal.

Motion agreed to, bill considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, May 2, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

First report of standing committee on standing orders—Mr. MacLean.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED SEPARATION OF CERTAIN PARISHES FROM TEMISCOUATA CONSTITUENCY—STANDING ORDER 68

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I see by Votes and Proceedings, Nos. 58 and 59, that two petitions from hundreds of electors of Temiscouata county have been turned down because they had not been drawn in proper form, "and therefore should not be received." We go by standing order 68 which says:

> A petition to the house may be presented by a member at any time during the sitting of the house by filing the same with the Clerk of the House.

These petitions were sent to the house and were tabled in the house. At the time of presentation there was no debate. They were endorsed by the member. The only difficulty is that they were addressed to Mr. Speaker and to members of the House of Commons instead of to the Honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled. That is the first point. On this first point, the fact is that those petitions which have been tabled could not have been mentioned in Hansard if the House of Commons had not been assembled. It is a matter of using or not using sacramental words. The wish of the electors of my county has been conveyed to you, sir, and to my hon. colleagues by that petition.

Mr. IRVINE: To whom is the petition addressed?

Mr. POULIOT: It is addressed to Mr. Speaker and hon. members of the House of Commons. There were three words missing—"in parliament assembled." The House of Commons was in fact assembled, because if the House of Commons had not been assembled the petition could not have been tabled. Then there should be the words "The petition of the undersigned... humbly sheweth"; these are not on the petition. I regret that, but I wonder if those words are indispensable. Then the citation says: "Follows the subject matter on the petition, in the third person through, and commencing each paragraph with the word 'That'." It was not necessary to have several paragraphs; my electors are not strong on red tape and they cut it short. They said in very clear and plain language what they wanted done. Then there is the prayer. The prayer is the expression of the wish.

Mr. IRVINE: What was the prayer? That is important.

Mr. POULIOT: The prayer is that they did not want to be taken away from Temiscouata county as it is now. That was the prayer, and it was set out in fair language. There is some confusion about the prayer—and I am speaking about the lay prayer, not the religious prayer. Then there is the conclusion, which we very often see in petitions, "And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray." That is not in there. Those are the sacramental words that are not in this petition. Everything else but that is in accordance with the spirit of parliamentary practice and tradition; everything else required by the standing order is complied with by the petition. Therefore, sir, if the house is generous enough to give unanimous consent, I would move that this petition be referred to the redistribution committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I think the house ought to give unanimous consent to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). We should not be governed so much by the form as by the substance of a petition such as this. When the common people of Canada decide that they want to petition the House of Commons, we should place as few obstacles as possible in the way of their getting their views tabled in the house. I suggest that we waive any technicalities in this matter and allow the petition presented by the hon. member for Temiscouata to be tabled as he suggests.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out to the house that I have already refused some petitions because they were not prepared in accordance with the rules of the house. I should not like to put before the house the motion to accept the petition presented by the hon. member for Temiscouata before having had the opportunity of seeing it. I have noted the remarks made by the hon. member, and he may be assured that due consideration will be given to them.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON CONSTITUENCY TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): May I present to the House the petition, addressed to the House of Commons in parliament assembled, of a number of Canadians and British subjects residing in Yukon Territory, praying that Mackenzie district be not included with the electoral district of Yukon; and they give their reasons. This petition is in order.

UNITED NATIONS

EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): On April 16, as reported at page 2096 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I asked if the minister could inform the house what stage the Canadian government's plans had reached for the setting up of a Canadian commission of what is popularly known as UNESCO. Is the minister now prepared to answer that question?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government's plans with respect to the setting up of a Canadian commission of UNESCO have not yet been definitely agreed upon. As I informed the hon. member on April 16, on a proper occasion I shall be glad to discuss everything that has been investigated and considered in that regard, but I could not do it in a short answer to a question on the orders of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: May we expect an early decision and statement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, it is a matter of considerable importance, and the setting up of this commission is something which will have to be done in a form that it will not be easy to change afterward. There will be a large number of bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters who will be concerned; and it will not be easy, after the plan has been announced and the commission has been set up, to modify its composition. We therefore feel that we should take considerable care and be sure that we are getting it in the form in which it will be convenient to have it permanently established.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO OTHER PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister tell the house if legislation will be introduced this session to extend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to other parts of Canada, and in particular to British Columbia?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): There is nothing I can add to the answer which I gave yesterday to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The question is under consideration; and just as soon as it has been decided I shall make a report to the house.

SUGAR BEETS

DIFFICULTY OF FACTORIES IN SECURING NECESSARY SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to ask three questions of the Minister of Finance. I have not given him notice of these, so perhaps they will have to remain as notices of motion.

1. Has the minister investigated to find out how many acres of beet contracts the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company had signed up by the close of May 1?

2. Will the minister investigate before Monday, May 5, at three o'clock and report to the house on Monday afternoon?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As the hon. member knows, it is not in order for him to ask oral questions on matters which are not urgent. I would suggest to him that as there is no urgency in this matter, he should put his questions on the order paper.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is impossible to hear what Your Honour said, but may I put the third question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I point out to Your Honour that 50 million pounds of sugar are involved for Canada in 1947, and the urgency is that if these beet contracts are not signed up immediately, it will be too late.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would again suggest to the hon. member that he put his questions on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT MASSEY-HARRIS PLANT, BRANTFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. It is a follow-up to the one I asked him yesterday. Has his department any further report regarding the Nova Scotians his department moved to Brantford? He stated yesterday he might have some information today.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no report as yet, but if I get it tomorrow morning and my hon. friend is in the city, I will let him know.

UNITED NATIONS

ACTION BY COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING ARTICLE 41 OF CHARTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has an answer to my question of yesterday with respect to the parliaments of the various commonwealth countries and article 41 of the united nations charter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have information with respect to two of the parliaments, and yesterday afternoon we cabled to secure the information from the other commonwealth governments, but as yet have not received replies. I inquired just before I came into the house at three o'clock, and the replies have not yet been received. As soon as they are received I shall communicate the information to the house.

CANNED LOBSTERS

INQUIRY AS TO IMPORT LICENSING SYSTEM IN SWEDEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I was unable to give him notice of the question, or give notice to you, Mr. Speaker, as I just received it prior to coming into the house. Has the government of Sweden imposed an import licensing system against our canned lobsters? If so, what effect will it have on prices, in view of the fact that our lobster season opened May 1?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): I shall have to take note of the question and give an answer on Monday.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

ACTION BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING PROPOSED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in reference to the announcement he made just before eleven o'clock last evening. Will the effectiveness of the changes in respect to old age pensions, which he said would commence as at May 1, depend upon provincial agreements? If so, have the provinces been informed of any part they must play in the matter?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As the hon. gentleman knows, of course once the legislation is passed the provincial governments must enter into agreements with the federal government, and arrangements are being made to that end.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether it is the intention of the government at this session to bring down a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The Prairie Farm Assistance Act is also under consideration, and I shall make a statement in due course.

IMMIGRATION ACT

REPEAL OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT—BONDING OF PERSONS IN TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Glen for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the bill to amend the Immigration Act it is practically essential first to devote some moments to a consideration of the statement made yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which was the first comprehensive statement by the government on immigration that has been made since I have been here, and, as far as I know, since the conclusion of the war.

Of course it is early as yet to attempt a detailed analysis of the statement or its effect on Canada's immigration problem, but I think one can safely say that as to the portion of the statement dealing with the immediate application of the policy—referring to the admission of relatives of Canadian citizens, and to our part in taking care of the displaced persons in Europe—there is very general agreement. Particularly is that so in reference to the part dealing with the admission of relatives of persons already resident in Canada. Indeed, if one might be permitted a criticism of that part of the statement at this stage, it would be that the statement has been too long delayed, or at least the application of the policy has been too long delayed, because after all perhaps no country in the world is in a better position than Canada to play a full part in relieving the distress and suffering of those displaced persons. We have seen evidence on the part of hon. members belonging to all parties of a very great and urgent desire that we should take our full part in relieving that distress. So I think that the criticism does apply, that it is to be regretted that the statement was not made earlier, and particularly that the policy was not worked out and put into effect perhaps as much as a year ago.

In this connection I would urge upon the Prime Minister and the government that when those officials of the immigration department, whom he indicated were being sent to Europe to investigate this matter of the displaced persons, go over there and interview these people, they do not place too narrow an interpretation upon the words "enemy aliens." Surely this should be treated as a humanitarian problem, and the only principle applied should be to assist those persons who are in need of assistance by permitting them to come to Canada on the basis of their need and their suitability, not on the basis of any narrow legal interpretation as to whether or not they are enemy aliens. Probably all hon. members have received letters from or have knowledge of Canadian citizens with relatives in Europe, in what were enemy countries or enemy occupied countries, who wish to have those relatives brought to Canada; but because at the moment we have this limitation against the admission of enemy aliens those relatives cannot be admitted. I personally know of a Canadian citizen who has relatives in Austria. Those relatives were put in a concentration camp by the Germans where at least one of them died, and they do not know whether others died there as well. He is anxious that his surviving relatives, particularly his sister and her sons, should be permitted to come to Canada and live with him. He can provide them with accommodation and can give them support, but at the present time, though they were put in a concentration camp by the Germans, and though at least some of them died there, under present regulations the entry of those people would be delayed because they are regarded as enemy aliens. So I would ask that our immigration officials who are being sent to Europe to look into this question of displaced persons, be not confined to a narrow, technical interpretation of those words, but that they be empowered to examine every case upon its merits. If a person is deserving and desirous of coming to Canada, then he should be allowed to do so.

As I have said, in general there certainly are grounds for agreement with the first portion of the statement made yesterday, dealing with the immediate application of the government's immigration policy. As to the other portion, however, dealing with the long range policy, I feel there is cause for considerable disappointment. If we analyse that portion of the statement we find that it lays down a number of broad general principles with which we can all agree, and indeed which have been urged from time to time by members on all sides of the house. I should like to read those principles. As reported at page 2644 of Hansard for Thursday, May 1, the Prime Minister said:

> The policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration. The government will seek by legislation, regulation, and vigorous administration, to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can advantageously be absorbed in our national economy.

At page 2645 he elaborated that by saying:

> Let me now speak of the government's long term programme. It is based on the conviction that Canada needs population. The government is strongly of the view that our immigration policy should be devised in a positive sense, with the definite objective, as I have already stated, of enlarging the population of the country.

With those general principles there can surely be nothing but agreement. But when it comes to the practical application of those principles, that is, the actual policy of the government with regard to immigration, there is no such definite pronouncement, and it is here, I submit, that there is cause for genuine disappointment.

I should like to read what the Prime Minister said when he dealt with the actual policy. I find that after laying down these very general principles, by which he said the government would be guided in the detailed application of this immigration policy, the Prime Minister went on to build up the situation to the point where one might assume that the government was ready immediately to apply this immigration policy or, if not to apply it, at least to lay down a general outline so that the country, and particularly those who are anxious to emigrate to Canada, might know exactly how they would eventually go about doing it.

But when it comes to the point where one might expect to find this general outline laid down, one's expectations are not realized. We find that the Prime Minister is reported at page 2646 of Hansard in these words:

> For some time to come, no matter what special shipping arrangements we may be able to achieve, conditions of transport will limit the number of immigrants. When that limitation ceases to prevail, it will be necessary to consider further what measures will best achieve the adjustment of immigration to the numbers that can be absorbed into the economy of Canada.

And with that statement, we were left. There was no indication, even in general outline, of just how the government proposes to go about applying these general principles to the policy the development of which it has in mind.

There is no indication, for instance, of where we will look, or to what countries we will look, for our immigrants. There is no indication of the general type and classification of the entrants who will be permitted to come to Canada. There is no indication that the government is prepared to enter into negotiations with, say, the governments of the United Kingdom, France or the Netherlands, or the low countries—there is no indication of negotiations with those countries with regard to plans for assisted immigration in the future. There is no indication as to what measure of assistance will be provided to immigrants, or indeed whether any assistance will be provided.

All these matters could surely have been covered in a general outline of a plan for immigration, even one which was to be put into effect only at a future time. The practical importance of laying down such a general outline can be realized, I think, when one calls to mind the fact that there are now large numbers of people, in Europe especially, looking to that day in the future when they may be able to emigrate to the new world. I suggest we should make known our intentions for the future, and should do it at this time, even though we cannot now put it into effect, so that those who are anxious to emigrate and who, if they cannot come to Canada, or do not know they will be permitted to come to Canada and as a result will look to Australia, South Africa or South America, will know that they will be able at some future time to come to this country. I have in mind people of the best type, who are anxious to make their homes in the new world. They will now be anxious to choose Canada as their future home. But if we do not do this, or take some such step, then surely it is quite possible that we will lose our chance to get the best, the most active and the most desirable type of immigrants for this country. We know, for instance, that Australia, South Africa and others of the British dominions have their plans. Indeed, they have agents in Europe and the United Kingdom at this time who are receiving applications for immigration. I suggest Canada should do the same.

In short, the principles of our long-range immigration policy have been laid down. With those principles there is general agreement. I would urge the Prime Minister and the government to go further, and to commit themselves not only to the priciples, which no one questions, but to the policy, so that the house and country will know in general outline how they are going to accomplish that to which they are committed. Otherwise I suggest the Prime Minister and government lay themselves open to a serious charge of evasion.

Turning to the other feature of the bill now before the house, I should like to deal with the matter of the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act. It is some two months since this matter was last discussed in the house, so I should like to refer Your Honour and hon. members back to some of the suggestions made at that time by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

At the conclusion of his remarks as they are reported in Hansard for February 11, we find the hon. member saying this at page 313:

> In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, once more I would ask that this house and this country, before this bill is passed, be given full details concerning Chinese immigration that will be allowed if the Chinese Immigration Act is repealed, and what will be the future policy in regard to Chinese immigration.

That was his first point. Then he went on to make two further points, which should be considered in connection with this matter. He said:

> Also we should be told the policy of this government toward the suggested united nations control over immigration into Canada, and in the third place we should be told the policy of this government concerning Japanese immigration.

Apparently the Prime Minister gave careful consideration to those three points suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver

South. There was certainly a long delay in proceeding with this measure, which might justify one in concluding that the government was impressed by what had been said. But further evidence that consideration was given to those suggestions is found, I think, in the fact that when the Prime Minister made his statement yesterday, he did deal specifically with those three points. I think congratulations should be extended to the hon. member for Vancouver South for the contribution he made in the matter; and certainly I should like to express appreciation of the fact that those points were covered in the statement so that now when we come to discuss this matter we have knowledge of what the government's policy is.

The Prime Minister covered the matter of united nations control of immigration when, as reported in his statement at page 2645 of Hansard he said this:

> Canada is not obliged, as a result of membership in the united nations or under the constitution of the international refugee organization, to accept any specific number of refugees or displaced persons.

And again:

> I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a "fundamental human right" of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege. It is a matter of domestic policy. Immigration is subject to the control of the parliament of Canada.

With those statements certainly we in this party are in agreement. And in view of the possibility, through some other interpretation of the united nations charter, of our being called upon to accept large numbers of immigrants from any country which might suggest that they be allowed to come, I am certainly glad to have the statement from the Prime Minister that no such attitude would be adopted.

He dealt also with the question of Japanese immigration in these words:

> With regard to the Japanese, I stated on August 4, 1944, at which time we were at war with Japan, that the government felt that in the years after the war the immigration of Japanese should not be permitted. This is the present view and policy of the government.

So that aspect of the problem of immigration has now been settled. It arose only with respect to the application of P.C. 2115, which deals with Asiatic immigration generally. We are glad to have the Prime Minister's assurance that the present policy of this government is that Japanese immigration will not be permitted.

With regard to a request for a definite statement of policy with respect to Chinese immigration, I find that no such definite assurance and no such definite outline of what the policy will be was given. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated distinctly, as reported on page 2646 of Hansard:

> —apart from the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act and the revocation of order in council P.C. 1378 of June 17, 1931, regarding naturalization, the government has no intention of removing the existing regulations respecting Asiatic immigration unless and until alternative measures of effective control have been worked out.

That brings to mind the question: What is to be the effective control of Asiatic and Chinese immigration? From what the Prime Minister said it appears it is to be only P.C. 2115, which prohibits oriental immigration except for persons coming within certain specified categories. I suggest that that is not satisfactory, for at least two reasons. First, the matter is too important to be left to an order in council for disposition. A matter of such importance as immigration from the orient surely is a matter which should be determined by the government on the basis of a measure submitted to and approved by the House of Commons. The Chinese Immigration Act, which we are being asked to repeal, was a measure passed by the House of Commons, and I suggest it would be proper if the alternative immigration measure was one which had been submitted to and passed by the House of Commons.

Perhaps a more important point is that orders in council can be repealed without being submitted to the house. Orders in council have been forgotten and overlooked in the past, and new orders in council with entirely different provisions can be passed without reference to the house, or passed when the house is not sitting. It is not sufficient safeguard to say that they can be revoked by addresses subsequently passed by both houses of parliament. In dealing with matters concerning an immigration policy it is essential that the decision of parliament be obtained before the policy is put into effect.

I urge again that the proper way to determine a Chinese immigration policy, the proper way to limit immigration from China or any other country in the orient, would be by concluding a treaty with that country. Such a treaty need not be concluded on the basis of discrimination. It is not unfair or unjust, and I have the support of the Prime Minister's own statement for this, for Canada to say that we would prefer to have one type of immigrant rather than another. That is exercising a right which is just and proper and which is within our own power to exercise. In his statement on previous occasions with regard to this subject the Prime Minister has indicated that China said she would not regard it as discrimination if we were to ask her to limit the number of immigrants coming to this country. What she is anxious for is to be treated on a basis of equality in making such a treaty. What she wants is to have negotiations carried on in an aboveboard manner. Now, therefore, we are suggesting to the Prime Minister that that would be the proper way to make arrangements with regard to Chinese immigration; we should not leave it merely to be determined by order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? Why not say that in my statement I said that the method that will be adopted is to seek to make treaty arrangements on a reciprocal basis so that each country would receive the same treatment and consideration?

Mr. FULTON: The Prime Minister did refer to that, and I was coming to it in a minute. He said that the Canadian government was prepared at any time to enter into negotiations with other countries. The point I was about to make when the right hon. gentleman interrupted was that on several occasions in the past he indicated that he felt we should make a treaty with China and at one time he indicated that that treaty was in the course of negotiation. The point I wish to make is that that would be the proper way to do it, and that it should have been done already. I was then going on to ask what had become of the treaty and why it had not been carried through to conclusion. I should like to refer to what the Prime Minister said in 1943 when this matter was being discussed in the house when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were up for consideration. Consideration was being given to the desirability of removing the discriminatory features of the Chinese Immigration Act. The Prime Minister recounted a conversation he had had with Madame Chiang Kai-Shek when she had mentioned the elimination of these discriminatory features, and then he went on to say, as reported on page 4683 of Hansard of July 12, 1943:

> I believe it should be possible to work out a reciprocal arrangement between Canada and China which would be helpful to both countries.

Then in the next year, on April 17, 1944, the matter came up again in connection with a treaty which had been concluded with China with regard to the exchange of diplomatic representatives. Apparently that treaty provided that the two countries should continue negotiations and should enter into a treaty with regard to such matters as immigration. At that time the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 2065 of Hansard:

> The treaty provides that, not later than six months after the cessation of hostilities, the two governments will enter into a comprehensive modern treaty of friendship, commerce, navigation and consular rights; meanwhile, questions affecting the rights of Canadian nationals in China and questions affecting the sovereignty of the republic of China, which are not covered by this or previous treaties, will be decided in accordance with generally accepted principles of international law.

> On January 17, 1944, we presented the Chinese minister with a draft of an immigration treaty, which, if approved and implemented by Canadian legislation, would supersede the Canadian Immigration Act of 1923 against which so many protests have been made.
> The draft treaty provides for the admission to either country on renewable permits for temporary residence of nationals of the other country belonging to approved categories.

Apparently the treaty was in the course of negotiation at that time. It was then intimated, although not stated definitely as a matter of policy, that the treaty would be concluded before the Chinese Immigration Act would be repealed. On April 24, 1944, the Prime Minister again referred to the same matter, and I quote from page 2282 of Hansard:

> Should the proposed treaty with China, which I mentioned on Monday last, be concluded before the end of the session, there will be a measure to amend the Chinese Immigration Act.

On the basis of those statements it seems fair to say that the intention at that time was that a treaty with China should be first concluded so that all matters respecting immigration between the two countries would be governed by that treaty, and that then the Chinese Immigration Act would be repealed. While I have been careful to say that that was not stated as a matter of policy, it does appear that it was the intention.

It is significant in this connection that we are now asked to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act and we have no detailed policy to replace it, a policy which it was then indicated would be incorporated in a treaty to be concluded between the two countries. In this connection I would ask the Prime Minister what has happened to that treaty? Why has the treaty not been concluded? Is the matter still open, and is it intended to conclude such a treaty? Will that treaty be comprehensive and all-embracing with regard to immigration? On our part we urge that that would be the proper way to handle the immigration question as between the two countries. A treaty concluded between equal countries and incorporating terms which each country has presented to the other as being the proper basis upon which to admit immigrants from the other country would be the most satisfactory method of removing all traces of discrimination with regard to any limitation which might be placed upon such immigration. So we urge that such a treaty should be comprehensive and all-embracing, covering all aspects of immigration, both the admission of the wives of persons of Chinese origin now resident in Canada and the admission of Chinese immigrants in the future. We submit that this should not be left merely to regulation by order in council. I think it would not be too extreme a statement to say that the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act should not be proceeded with until we have answers to those questions and until we have such a treaty or some permanent definite policy to put in its place.

There are further questions which come to mind when considering this matter in the light of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday, concerning particularly the admission of the wives and families of Chinese at present in Canada. Does the present proposal in the light of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday mean that all the wives and families of Canadian Chinese now resident in Canada shall be permitted to come into Canada when this bill is repealed and the order in council is in force as the only means of governing Chinese immigration? In that connection the house should recall the numbers involved. There are over 22,000 males of Chinese origin living in Canada who have wives and families living in China, and of those 22,000 over 12,000 reside in the province of British Columbia. I would ask specifically, would not an influx of 22,000 wives and families into Canada and over 12,000 wives and families into one province alone, British Columbia, be, to use the Prime Minister's own words, a "considerable oriental immigration"? In his statement yesterday the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 2646 of Hansard:

> Large-scale immigration from the orient would change the fundamental composition of the Canadian population. Any considerable oriental immigration would, moreover, be certain to give rise to social and economic problems of a character that might lead to serious difficulties in the field of international relations.

I ask this question of the Prime Minister or perhaps of the Minister of Mines and Resources: Would not the immigration of 22,000 Chinese wives and families into Canada and of over 12,000 into one province alone come within the category of "considerable oriental immigration"? I think we should have an answer to that question before we are asked to pass this bill.

We have said that the whole matter should be covered in a treaty. There are other questions which should be answered. If all these wives and families are to be admitted, are they all to be admitted in the first year after the Chinese Immigration Act is repealed, or how many are to be admitted each year? Will an unmarried Chinese now living in Canada be allowed to go back to China, marry and then bring his wife back under the order in council, or is it contemplated that it will be applied only to those already married? We should like the government to give a detailed statement of its whole policy with regard to the question of Chinese immigration and its application under P.C. 2115, as well as a statement as to how P.C. 2115 is to be administered.

This is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker, particularly for the province of British Columbia. I am speaking for myself here, but I do not think any British Columbia member would take a stand against the admission of the wives of these loyal Canadian Chinese who have made such a contribution to our province. They have been extremely good citizens there. We have no Chinese problem in the same way that we have a Japanese problem, and in illustration of that fact I mention that in British Columbia the Chinese amongst others were given the right to vote this year. That is a concrete indication of the way we feel about them. They are now accepted into our citizenship. They are my constituents just as much as Canadians of the white race are my constituents. I am not at the moment opposing the admission of the wife of one of these Chinese citizens, but I do want to know what will be the policy. How many will be allowed to come in and when will they be allowed to come in? Will Chinese now resident in Canada be allowed to go back and marry and bring back their wives to Canada? I should like an answer to those questions before I am asked to agree to the passing of this bill, particularly in the light of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday that he did not propose to permit any considerable oriental immigration into Canada. It makes us wonder, however, if they are all allowed to be brought in, whether British Columbia will not once again be saddled with what is truly a national question.

In conclusion I repeat that we feel we are entitled to answers to those questions, either from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Mines and Resources, before we are asked to pass this bill, and that we should have a full statement from the government as to just how this policy will be administered under P.C. 2115. Particularly would we like an explanation with regard to the treaty which was at one time being negotiated with China, and whether those negotiations are still continuing, and whether such treaty when concluded will embrace all questions of immigration as between Canada and China. If the treaty has been dropped, we should like to know why it has been dropped and whether it is intended to resume negotiations in the future. I feel that we should have answers to those questions before we are asked to give second reading to the bill.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon must be to express my personal gratification that the subject of Canadian immigration has come under the personal attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Two years ago, speaking for the second time in the house, I spoke on immigration. Since that time a number of other members have made their contributions to the subject, particularly the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) and the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I venture to say this afternoon that the opposition to a large extent have made the policy expressed by the Prime Minister yesterday. If you go back over the history of immigration in this house during the last two years you will find, Mr. Speaker, that that contention is well founded.

Along with a number of other hon. members I welcome the action which has been taken by the government to admit members of the families of Canadian citizens and residents, members of the veterans forces who fought beside us in the war, and this delayed assistance to displaced persons. I welcome particularly the action taken on behalf of Canadian women engaged to men overseas. The action which the government is now taking places these women in the same category as men. It allows them to bring their fiances to Canada.

Two other things remain to be done, Mr. Speaker. One is to follow up the remarks made by the Prime Minister in his statement yesterday as reported at page 2646 of Hansard, where he said:

> The immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources and its offices abroad were reduced to proportions wholly inadequate to cope with an active immigration policy. With the end of the war, and in the light of changed economic conditions, the government has already taken steps to expand and strengthen this branch of the public service.

[Mr. Fulton.]

It is my opinion that in spite of the fine service given by this branch, the extreme courtesy which they have extended to me on all occasions, it could still stand further support from the government and a further increase in staff to deal with this urgent problem.

The second thing I want to say this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, is this. We have heard the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) speak of treaties this afternoon; we must now be prepared to ask the labour government of Britain for a treaty. I have made some study of this subject. As I understand it, the labour government are restricting the emigration of their people, and this applies not only to Canada but to other empire countries. Britain stands in history at about the same point that France stood when the Huguenots left there to take to the far corners of the earth their genius in art, in architecture, in industrial organization, in craft work, and in many other specialized lines. Britain is now about to be forced to export some of its "know-how". It must export its "know-how" because a great many of these people want to leave. I am one who agrees with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who stated yesterday that Britain is an occupied country, occupied by an alien form of government. I am prepared to say that socialism in the years to come will add to Britain's many other burdens which have resulted from the war. We must now be ready to receive the torch from these people, to accept the "know-how", and to give them the freedom which they will be denied at home.

When I rose I said that my remarks would be brief. In closing may I refer to what the Prime Minister said on page 2645 of Hansard, that the government's new policy will be energetically applied. He was there referring to enlarging the population of the country. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that "energetic application", to quote the Prime Minister's words, means something at this time. In the two short years that I have been here we have seen the government in many frames of mind. I hope that in this instance "energetic application" means what it says.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the hon. member if this is not the second time that he has spoken on the second reading of the bill?

Mr. SKEY: I spoke on the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was very good, anyway.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): I do not intend to detain the house more than a few minutes, but there is one aspect of this situation which I wish to bring to the attention of the government and of the house. Before I do so I should like to express great appreciation of the part taken by the Canadian government in regard to assisting in the problem of refugees at international meetings. We were certainly pleased to see that at the meeting which set up the international refugee organization, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), on behalf of Canada, took such a leading part in urging that the nations of the world as a whole take some interest in these most unfortunate people. That attitude was approved throughout western Canada. I am sure too that the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, in which he indicated that the problem of displaced persons was to get special consideration at the hands of the government of Canada, was greeted with a great deal of relief and satisfaction by many people in Canada who have relatives who are refugees and displaced persons in Europe. They will be very thankful for that statement.

I have heard people who came from Europe, because of policies adopted by the present government after the first great war and just before the start of the recent war when part of Czechoslovakia was overrun, state to the Prime Minister that if it had not been for action taken by the present government they would not be alive today. I have heard others say that they never went to bed at night without getting down on their knees and thanking God that they had the privilege to come to this free country. Therefore I do not think that members of the house can have any complete understanding, unless they know personally people who feel like that, of how much this statement of yesterday's will be appreciated by many people in Canada with relatives in these camps and among the refugees and displaced persons in Europe today.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said at page 2645 of Hansard:

> The resettlement of refugees and displaced persons constitutes a special problem. In the intergovernmental committee on refugees, and in the discussions in the united nations leading to the establishment of the international refugee organization, Canada has taken an active part.

As I say, I am pleased that that attitude has been taken by the government.

There is, however, one matter which I feel I must bring to the attention of the government. I hope that I am not properly informed on it, but if I am, it is a matter which should receive attention at once. In the mandate of the intergovernmental committee which was adopted on August 17, 1944, the following appears:

> The mandate of the committee extends to all persons, wherever they may be, who, as a result of events in Europe, have had to leave, or may have to leave, their countries of residence because of the danger to their lives or liberties on account of their race, religion or political beliefs.

That is a statement which is in accordance with the most humanitarian traditions of our country—that if anyone has to leave his country on account of his race, religion and political beliefs we should be ready to extend to him a helping hand. Unfortunately that was not carried forward into the international refugee organization. I understand this was largely due to the pressure of the Soviet Union and the states under its influence. That is what I understand; but I may be wrong in this but I do not think I am. In any event, section (d), part II, of the constitution of the international refugee organization reads as follows:

> Persons who will not be the concern of the organization:
> 4. Persons of German ethnic origin, whether German nationals or members of German minorities in other countries, who:
> (a) have been or may be transferred to Germany from other countries;
> (b) have been, during the second world war, evacuated from Germany to other countries;
> (c)—

This is the part that is important.

> (c) have fled from, or into, Germany, or from their places of residence into countries other than Germany in order to avoid falling into the hands of allied armies.

The part that has particular reference to the people I am going to speak about is this:

> Have fled . . . into Germany . . . in order to avoid falling into the hands of allied armies.

The only substantial group that applies to are the people who lived in the Baltic states, in parts of Roumania, in Czechoslovakia, parts of Poland, Russia, and the Ukraine. Those people, because of their known anti-communist attitude, fled before the advancing Soviet armies into Germany. Where it was known particularly that they were of German ethnic origin they felt that it was safer for them to find refuge in the hands of the British and Americans than to fall into the control of the advancing Soviet armies. I take it from this that the international refugee organization does not take any interest in anyone who is of German ethnic origin, where for example he and his ancestors may have lived in the Baltic states for several generations, perhaps for a hundred years. If he is of German ethnic origin and was known to be anti-communist and fled into Germany, IRO does not regard him as their concern. What IRO does, of course, is a matter to be decided on at international conferences. That is something that I have no right to find fault with here, because we know there is great difficulty in getting things agreed to in international meetings which we might perhaps like to have agreed to there. What I do say is that what IRO does is one thing and what we do under our immigration administration is another thing. In this I entirely agree with the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as reported at page 2646 of Hansard:

> With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination. I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens.

I would say this, and I think that all hon. members of the house will agree with me, that among our finest immigrants have been those who came to us from the various countries of Europe, who are of German ethnic origin. We have in Canada literally hundreds of thousands of people who are of that descent. If the IRO says that those people are not of any concern to them, I think we in this country should not let that influence us in our immigration policy. If those people are within the four corners of our immigration policy, if they come within the type of persons who would otherwise be admissible, the fact that they are not under the control or aegis of IRO should not prevent us from having our immigration officials interview them and permit them entry into Canada. To have any other policy is to permit IRO, under the influence of the Soviet union in that regard, to say in effect that we shall not admit people of German ethnic origin into our country.

Let there be no mistake about the matter. I am not at the present time speaking about people who are enemy nationals, although I do say this, Mr. Speaker: the war has been over long enough now that if there had been any real desire on the part of the Soviet union to have real peace rapidly established, I think we would have had a peace conference before this and those people would no longer be enemy nationals. But be that as it may; I am not at the moment speaking of enemy nationals. I am speaking about people of German ethnic origin who may have lived in the Baltic states for example—they and their people—for generations and who are not German nationals any more than General Eisenhower is a German national—of German ethnic origin perhaps, but not German nationals. Within the British zone and the American zone there are literally thousands of these people that IRO will have nothing to do with. They are regarded as the charge of the German people. Where their relatives in this country desire to have them admitted to Canada and they are within our immigration regulations. I do ask the government, no matter what IRO has ruled, that they be admitted. They have shown, by the type of people they are, by the kind of relatives they have here, that they would be fine citizens of this country. Where they want to come here in order to be with their relatives, I ask the government to make no discrimination in that regard, and I earnestly urge that these people be admitted to Canada just as readily as any others among those refugees and displaced persons.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have been more or less shanghaied into this debate by my genial and witty friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Speaking on this measure when it was last before the house, he said—and I quote from page 327 of Hansard:

> The members from British Columbia, with the exception of one, are unanimous in this, and that one cannot help himself. He is a very fine man, but he cannot help himself because he has to do what he is told.

Then in the very next paragraph the same speaker says:

> I believe it is up to this government to give us a clear-cut decision in this matter; although I might not agree with it, I might have to agree with it.

Indicating that perhaps he is the one who has to do what he is told. But that is only incidental, Mr. Speaker.

I want to say a few words on what appears to me to be the most important feature of this bill, and that is the part of it which provides against certain discriminations which have been hitherto applied to people of the Chinese race who have been brought into this country. That I think is a most important feature of the present discussion. It is true that the whole question of immigration has been opened up, and the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday I think was timely and will probably save a good deal of futile speculation and debate as to what the policy of the government is with respect to immigration. I think it hardly necessary to say that what we do and how we treat our citizens of Chinese origin is not a matter for British Columbia alone; it is a national matter, a matter in which the whole good name and honour of Canada is involved. While I have every sympathy for those of Chinese origin who may have suffered discrimination in Canada, and which discrimination at least in part is now being removed by the bill before us, my chief reason is not to speak in the interests of such citizens merely, but to speak in our own interest, in the interests of Canada. When we permit discrimination against one section of our citizenry we are doing harm to ourselves, far more harm than we are doing to the group against which we discriminate. And so it is because of the good name of Canada, because of the freedom for which this country stands, at least theoretically and, I am glad to say, stands for in most things really; it is because we want to guard against any infringement of our own accepted principles of freedom that I am going to insist, as far as I can, on the complete removal of discrimination against any class of Canadian citizens.

The legislation proposed is a partial remedy for a long standing wrong. I need not go into details in that regard, because hon. members of the house know exactly to which things I refer. One of those discriminations still stands; that is, that residents of Canada of Chinese origin, unless they are Canadian citizens, still cannot bring in their relatives, their children or their wives, whereas other immigrants coming from other parts of the world can do so. As far as I know that is the only discrimination now remaining against our Chinese immigrants; all the others are being removed. So the bill may be said to be a denial of the murder of the spirit of racial inequality, while closing the door on the skeleton which still may be used in evidence.

Mr. LOW: You will have to explain that one.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, we shall leave it for further consideration. I think when my hon. friend sees it in Hansard he will understand its meaning. As I say, this is the last vestige of inequality which stands, and I am urging the minister in charge of this legislation to give consideration to its removal. I suggest that he either extend to immigrants from China who are now in Canada the same privilege that is extended to all other immigrants, or else impose upon all others an equal restriction which would mean that immigrants from other countries, unless they are citizens of Canada, could not bring in their wives, children and relatives. That would put them on the same basis. We cannot afford to have two standards of dealing with either our immigrants or our citizens, and that is the point I want to emphasize. I want to make a plea for equality of treatment to all who are permitted to come within our gates.

I have already pointed out that I believe those who are defending the discrimination have no desire to inflict any hurt upon any member of the yellow race; but they do so. Not only that, but they are inflicting greater harm upon Canada herself. I want to take issue particularly with the viewpoint expressed earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who happens not to be in his seat; I am sure I shall say nothing he would want to deny even if he were here. In his remarks the hon. member told us he wanted to keep his eye on the ball, which was the main immigration policy; then he promptly kicked the ball off the field entirely and was still looking for it in the bushes at the close of his remarks. But that is only in passing.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It is probably locked up in the cupboard with your skeleton.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member gave us an illustration which I want to quote and use in another sense. His illustration was this, that if he found his neighbours in need of economic assistance he would not invite them all to live at his house, but would give of his substance to the utmost of his ability to maintain his impecunious neighbours in their own homes rather than bring them into his own. I think that illustration may have some real point if he applies it to a general immigration policy. But let me apply a similar illustration to the actual situation with which this bill deals. Let me suppose that the hon. member for Lethbridge invited a number of his neighbours to have a meal with him, to enjoy his hospitality. When they arrived he picked out two or three and said, "You have to eat in the kitchen. You cannot come into the main dining room with the rest of us; you stay out here." Perhaps two or three of them would be sent down to the basement with their plates. I know the hon. gentleman would never think of doing that. He is far too courteous and too kind to do anything like that; but if he did he would be regarded as a snob, not only by those who were forced to sit in the kitchen but also by those who were allowed to sit at the table with the host himself. That is pretty much the situation. In this particular at least we do not allow these people to sit at the table with the host; we deny them that one little privilege. We put them in the kitchen and say, "You stay there; you cannot have all the privileges." Since this is such a small thing I hope the minister and the Prime Minister will reconsider it. Its effect upon the ultimate immigration policy would be very slight, but its effect upon the name of Canada may be very great. That is a matter which must be taken into consideration by those who will represent Canada around the international table dealing with the problems of the united nations. I cannot imagine that anyone from Canada would want to feel that this country could be properly criticized for that particular failure or limitation in our democratic principles.

The hon. member who just took his seat spoke about the number who would be involved if all our citizens of Chinese origin were permitted to send for their wives. It is not a matter of a thousand or two that must be taken into consideration; it is a matter of principle. We are either going to extend the principle or we are not, and the matter of a hundred or fifty or two hundred or a thousand or five thousand does not come into the picture at all. I do not see that there is a shred of argument in favour of stopping short of giving Chinese residents of Canada exactly the same treatment that we give all others who come from other parts of the world.

As to the main immigration policy I have not very much I want to say. As I have said, I think the Prime Minister's statement was timely. I believe in the main it has met with favourable response from the house.

I have just listened to an hon. member who, speaking on this phase of the discussion, made reference to Great Britain. He said that Britain is an occupied country—occupied by an alien government. Mr. Speaker, that statement will stand on the records of this parliament as a monument to the ignorance of that Conservative member. I am prepared to leave it at that. I believe future history will give my hon. friend the answer. To say that a government that has been elected by the British people in a democratic way, a government that has not lost a by-election in two years, is alien, is not only to express abysmal ignorance, but to offer insult to the British people. I hope the leader of his party will apologize for him before the discussion closes.

This I want to say, that while there is great room in Canada and while there are great resources in Canada for a great many more people, and while in that regard most of us are in agreement with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he says that we should seek to gain a greater population, still I question whether we could carry out such a policy at the present time. I question whether we could get the immigrants. For from all northern and eastern Europe, including Russia—from all that vast territory—there will be no immigrants. And there will be very little immigration from those other countries such as Norway, Sweden and Britain for some time at least.

Great Britain is not refusing to send immigrants to Canada because there is an alien government there, as was suggested by the previous speaker; but, because in her tremendous rehabilitation programme she needs all the workers she has. She cannot afford to send them out to another country. The same is true of such countries as Sweden, Denmark and Norway, and those other democracies from which, as I have said, we have in the past received such excellent citizens.

So that I think the thing for us to concentrate on at the present time—and I believe the Prime Minister said this—is that of giving priority to the refugees, of whom I understand there are between 800,000 and one million in Europe. They are homeless; they are pretty well helpless, and they are driven to the point of starvation. If we can accommodate more people in Canada at the present time, if we can fit them into our economic system and give them employment and some assurance of being able to find work by which they can live, then I think we ought to make it our first effort to take as many of them as we can. And we can afford to leave the other phases of an immigration policy for future consideration. Not only do we want to have those people from the point of view of our own population, but we owe it to them and to humanity to do our best to absorb as many of them as we can.

In this regard I would say to the Prime Minister that I think we might do more than we have done. It is true, as he pointed out, that one of our great difficulties has been to have shipping sufficient to carry them. But I think an effort might have been made to get some shipping, and I still think something ought to be done in that regard. People who are in the condition of many of the refugees in Europe are not looking for first class passage on the Queen Elizabeth. They will be glad to get here on more modest transports. We might very easily have used some of our cargo boats temporarily fitted up to carry a considerable number of those refugees from Europe.

Somehow or another Australia managed to bring in 50,000 children in one year, and has undertaken to take 70,000 immigrants each year. If Australia can do that, then surely Canada ought not to be behind in a programme of that kind.

Next I say that with regard to the whole oriental question I must agree with the Prime Minister that this country, like every other country, must say who are to come here. We have that right. And if it be the wish of this country that any nationality be excluded, that is the business of the country. It is far better to exclude them, whoever they may be, than to admit them in a position of inferiority, under which they are not permitted to enter into all the privileges enjoyed by Canadian citizens.

Mr. GILLIS: Send them to the maritimes and they would be right at home.

Mr. IRVINE: I conclude with this, that there still remains a point of discrimination in the legislation. I am going to vote for the bill, because it represents a very considerable improvement. However I am pleading with the Prime Minister to go a little bit further so as to remove the one remaining discrimination which, I say, is a disgrace to Canada, and does more harm to us than it would do to anyone, even if it were our intention to do harm by maintaining it.

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, we are now dealing with Bill No. 10, to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act, first reading of which took place on February 7. This bill has been framed so as to deal with two different subjects, and from the expressions of opinion from some seventeen or eighteen members who have already spoken, it is evident that the bill is contentious.

Immigration cannot be approached without dealing with emigration. Today a most alarming condition is rapidly developing in Canada. It is a repetition of what occurred in 1920 and 1930. During the past eighteen months hundreds—yes, thousands—of Canada's first-class citizens have been emigrating across the border to the United States. Of course this is through no fault of their own, but is due to conditions existing in Canada at the present time. Young Canadians with families, who have been educated in our colleges, collegiates, technical schools and universities, are going across the boundary line to better themselves, because no suitable employment or positions are available for them here at home.

It will be recalled that in the early twenties Canada lost 100,000 citizens annually over a period of ten years. That means that a million good Canadian citizens left Canada to take up their homes in the United States. Something was wrong. Canada's emigration should be most carefully supervised to see that there is no recurrence of the happenings of those early twenties. During that ten year period 150,000 entered Canada annually, 50,000 coming from the United Kingdom and 100,000 from central Europe and elsewhere. That is, of every three immigrants who entered Canada only one was British, and for every three immigrants who entered Canada we lost two native sons to the United States. Doctors, nurses and members of other professions left Canada in the early twenties and are today holding senior positions in the United States. My mind goes back this afternoon to a legion reunion which was held in 1940, the first year of world war II. The eastern Ontario meeting was held in Kingston and members of the various branches attended. One was a young returned soldier of world war I who had gone to the United States in order to find employment and had located in Rochester. Twenty years later he returned to visit his friends, bringing with him his Canadian wife and three children. This boy who fought for Canada in world war I and who had the right to expect that Canada would provide employment for him on demobilization was compelled to seek his future in the United States. This case is only one of many Canadians who went to the United States in that ten year period. Think of what Canada has lost and let us see that it does not occur again.

A statement is due to the house and it should come from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is in his seat today. I welcome him back. He should tell us what steps are being taken by the government to make it possible for young Canadians to see a future in Canada and obtain employment with suitable remuneration. Government immigration policies seem to have been discussed by various ministers of the crown. When the time came to present the order in council which permitted the entry of Polish immigrants it was sponsored by the then Minister of Justice, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has given several interviews on the subject of immigration and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) went out of his way a few days ago to define the government policy on immigration. We more or less expected that any leadership on immigration would come from the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), but the minister has been silent in so far as defining what the government's policy will be on this important question. On May 1, the Prime Minister submitted to the house the government policy.

On April 30, 1946, when the house was discussing the citizenship bill, the minister seemed to go out of his way to place on record the number of British subjects who had been deported between April 30, 1930, and March 31, 1945, and I refer hon. members to page 1076 of Hansard of April 30, 1946. He did not show the number of admissions from nor did he show the number of deportations to other countries. I go back a little farther to the dominion-provincial conference held in November, 1927, when Canada's immigration policy was an item of consideration. Premier Taschereau of Quebec declared that sixty per cent of the inmates of the asylums in Montreal and forty per cent of the inmates of jails were aliens. He stated he believed that such people should be deported as fast as they came to this country. In referring to aliens he could not have been referring to those of British stock. Therefore we must be careful today and not make our policy too wide open.

When Lord Jellicoe was in Canada he referred to immigration. He stated that between 1920 and 1930 upwards of 250,000 persons had annually left the shores of the United Kingdom to settle in other lands. Of those 250,000, only about 50,000 arrived in Canada. We find that of every five persons who left the United Kingdom only one came to Canada. Why did Canada not do more to encourage immigration from the United Kingdom? Let us see that the same mistake is not made again in the next few years. Definite action should be taken by the government at the present session with respect to immigration.

Many people in the country are greatly disturbed because of the coldness of the government toward British immigration. The citizens of the British isles have been brought up to believe in the same ideals and the same type of constitutional government as we have. Our soldiers fought side by side for the same way of life. Thousands of young desirable British immigrants are most anxious to come to Canada and sufficient encouragement is not being given them by the present government.

Mr. GLEN: There is no discrimination against anyone from the old country; the only difficulty is to get transportation to come here.

Mr. KIDD: I shall answer the minister in a moment. I can only refer to the old saying that a horse will starve while it waits for the grass to grow. These young men, many with families, and those who have been demobilized from the armed forces, have been most anxious to come to Canada but are now turning their eyes elsewhere. The same thing is happening today as happened twenty-five years ago after world war I. At that time the young men who were desirous of coming to Canada went to Australia, New Zealand, Africa and the United States.

It would appear that many people, both in the government and among its supporters, are giving much time and thought to the immigration of new British stock. I am of opinion that it is urgently needed and that something should be said on behalf of the large numbers in the United Kingdom who are intending to emigrate as soon as conditions there will permit. I believe that now is the important time for this country to show both an interest and a concern that will attract these people as soon as they are able to come.

Let us not forget that England spent millions of dollars in finding homes in Canada for the United Empire Loyalists. Those people settled in the maritimes, along the shores of the St. Lawrence and lake Erie and lake Ontario. Just as those men had the pioneer spirit, so have many of the young men in the United Kingdom who are desirous of living within the empire. All they are asking is an opportunity. Just as we have British preference in trade and commerce, so should we have British preference in immigration. At the top of the list should be those young men of the empire trained in Canada during world war II and who, during that training period, formed such a favourable impression of Canada that they are most anxious to return.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house some figures in the Canada Year Book, 1942, at page 153, showing the arrival of immigrants into Canada between 1920 and 1930. It is interesting to break down and examine the official figures of immigrants who came to Canada during that ten year period. At this point I wish to bring to the attention of the house the figures for 1927, which is only an average year. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house, rather than read this tabulation I shall place it on the record.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member the consent of the house?

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the hon. member the details of the deportations to Britain between 1930 and 1940?

Mr. KIDD: I can tell the hon. member where that can be found.

Mr. IRVINE: Put them both on and we will let it go on; otherwise we will not.

Mr. KIDD: The question is all right, and I would refer hon. members to page 1076 of Hansard of last year. At that time the minister was asked to put on the record the admissions and the deportations.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the hon. member put them on together?

Mr. KIDD: I think you will find them there. If you are not satisfied, I will exercise my right and read them but it will take a few minutes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Go ahead.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to put the figures on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. KIDD: The figures are as follows:

I should like to say a few words about immigration from Newfoundland. Canada should give every consideration and priority to the citizens of Newfoundland. The majority of Newfoundlanders are today from British stock. They come to Canada for their advanced education, attending Dalhousie, McGill, Queen's or Varsity. A great many of these young citizens then remain in Canada. In the late thirties, because of Canada's discouraging immigration policy, many a young Newfoundlander left for Boston and New York. The result was that they were lost to Canada and the empire. Newfoundlanders who desire to emigrate to Canada should be given every cooperation and priority.

Frequent reference to the subject by prominent men has brought Canada's immigration problem much before the public. Who is to grapple with it? The proportion of British people coming in steadily falls off and people from the continent of Europe are taking their places. Annual reports and annual meetings of various institutions in Canada have dealt with this problem. What is wrong with Canada's immigration policy? For a time the government's policy resulted in bringing into Canada large numbers from Europe whose conditions and background made assimilation difficult, while the movement from the British isles was discouraged with vexatious and petty restrictions.

As far as Canada is concerned, her immigration policy is not a problem of numbers; it is a policy of the possibility and advisability of mixing the old world with the new.

There are few Canadians who will not agree that this country needs more people to help liberate the wealth that lies in its resources, to build up its domestic markets and to make lighter the burdens of its people. We have reached a point in our national progress where the country is better able than it has been for many years to commence to assimilate a number of desirable new citizens. Canada needs them and needs the wealth which the class of people I have in mind would bring and develop.

Here is a plan to provide us with immigration and good citizens:

(a) Our resources are capable of progressive development and of providing a high standard of living for a greater population, and there is the obligation to provide opportunity for citizenship on equal terms to numbers of kindred-minded people.

(b) Immigration should be under the direct control of the government without any subsidiary arrangement with private interests.

(c) With a view to the perpetuation in Canada of a democracy in the British tradition, preference in immigration should be given to those whose political background, intelligence and love of freedom are likely to fit them for such a democracy.

There is need in the dominion of Canada for men who have the pioneer spirit.

Immigration should be on a definite quota system.

All potential immigrants to the dominion of Canada should be required to pass a strict medical examination, including X-ray, at or before reaching the port of embarkation and to comply with such other regulations as may be prescribed from time to time.

The government of today, through its immigration branch, has within its power the foundation of Canada's future prosperity. Let us continue to perpetuate British traditions. Let Canada leave no stone unturned in the next few months to extend a welcome to and make possible the entry into Canada of all displaced personnel in the United Kingdom who desire to come.

Let us keep Canada British. The importance of this subject in relation to Canada's future points directly to the necessity of a full-time minister of immigration.

The minister of immigration asked me a question a moment ago about the British coming to Canada. Let me give an illustration. During the war, near Kingston, at Collin's Bay there were 5,000 British lads of the finest British stock within the empire training for the fleet air arm. The father of nearly every one of those boys was an admiral or high-ranking officer in the navy. Two or three hundred of these boys married Canadian girls, and after the war they took their wives home to Britain. Many of them now want to return to Canada. Some of them have children and they want them to be near their grandparents in this country. In addition, there are many single boys and single girls in Britain who want to come to Canada. I recall one instance about which I wrote the minister many times. He replied courteously and has been of great assistance in that case. One young girl from Kingston married an English boy and they had a child. They returned to the old country after the war and now they want to come to Canada. She thought her passage would cost her two or three hundred dollars. She had to wait six months for transportation and then it cost her between five and six hundred dollars. The boy returned by aircraft carrier. That is the finest stock we can bring to Canada and every assistance should be given to them. We are subsidizing the bringing of Poles to this country. I was at a meeting last Monday which had to do with the bringing out of a couple of thousand girls to this country. I claim that they are being subsidized; they are getting free transportation. While subsidizing them and giving them free transportation, we are not doing the same thing for British stock.

Mr. GLEN: Does the hon. member say that we are subsidizing them?

Mr. KIDD: I will not say you are subsidizing them but you are helping to pay their passage. They are coming here free. Their passage is being paid. They are being assisted.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member is leaving the impression that the government is assisting in their passage.

[Mr. Kidd.]

Mr. KIDD: You are helping to bring out single Poles.

Mr. GLEN: No; the British government is doing that.

Mr. KIDD: I put a question on the order paper and the answer was that you paid part of it.

Mr. GLEN: The British government is paying the expenses of the transportation of the Poles to Canada.

Mr. KIDD: I think Canada should pay for it. I differ with the minister there. If the Poles are good enough to come to Canada we should let Canada pay for them.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before giving my observations on the bill, I should like to make a brief reference to what the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) said. While the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is quite capable of expressing himself in his usual forceful, clear and concise manner and does not need me to come to his defence, I must say that the hon. member for Cariboo placed on exaggerated interpretation upon his remarks. I do not intend to pursue that matter farther, except to say that clarification, if clarification is necessary, will be made by the hon. member himself.

May I now refer to Bill No. 10? When this bill first came before us I could not help but observe the two distinct sections of it, one having to do with the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act, and the other having to do with the provision for the admission to Canada of dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces who have served overseas, without being subject to the provisions of the immigration act. I for one feel, sir, that these two sections should never have been included in one bill. While they are not entirely unrelated, the relationship is so remote that one is put in the position of having to support the two in order to support either one.

There may be some who are not in favour of the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act —let me hasten to assure you, sir, that that is not my position—but in order to register that position effectively the hon. member has to vote against the provision for admission to Canada of those dependents of servicemen. That is cutting a corner pretty sharply, and I feel that it is bad policy for the government, which at all times, I believe, is seeking support, to put us in a position of that kind.

When I first examined this bill I was a bit hesitant about rising and asserting that I was prepared to offer unconditional support to the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act. At that time we had not been given any indication whatsoever of government policy relative to immigration. There was enough said to suggest to me that we might be faced with an open-door policy, and I for one was not and am not prepared to support an open-door policy as applied particularly to certain races. Now, sir, in view of the Prime Minister's long overdue, but certainly welcomed, statement of yesterday, I have no particular objection to the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act. I think the two most significant assertions of the Prime Minister are found at page 2646 of Hansard, in the first column where he refers to fundamental human rights. He said:

> With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination. I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a "fundamental human right" of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege.

And so on. I shall not quote the rest of the paragraph. I agree wholeheartedly with that expression of opinion. I have sometimes wondered whether we have people in the country who believe that these persons do have a fundamental human right, as it were, to enter our country in such numbers as they might see fit.

Farther along, the Prime Minister said:

> There will, I am sure, be general agreement with the view that the people of Canada do not wish, as a result of mass immigration, to make a fundamental alteration in the character of our population. Large-scale immigration from the orient would change the fundamental composition of the Canadian population. Any considerable oriental immigration would, moreover, be certain to give rise to social and economic problems of a character that might lead to serious difficulties in the field of international relations. The government, therefore, has no thought of making any change in immigration regulations which would have consequences of the kind.

I am prepared to designate these words as words of wisdom; but it will not surprise me at all if the Prime Minister himself is accused of racial discrimination as a consequence of this statement. The expression "racial discrimination" has been bandied about altogether too much to suit me. We know that the communists have adopted the policy of branding all non-communists as fascists. I actually believe that some in this country are using the expression "racial discrimination" indiscreetly and indiscriminately and for a purpose, and are deliberately creating difficulties among the people in their relationship one with the other. That may not be very clear, but possibly I have left an indication, at least, of what I am thinking.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that we have two problems: First, we have the problem of displaced persons, the refugees in Europe. I doubt whether there is an hon. member in the house who does not have the greatest of sympathy for those most unfortunate people. It is terrible to be hungry; it is terrible to be without adequate clothing, and it is more terrible to find oneself subjected to all that the elements of winter may offer. It is my personal conviction that Canada, using reason and good judgment, can play an effective part in meeting this great problem. The Prime Minister indicated that Canada is prepared to play its part. I think it is fitting for me to say that among the refugees we have good and bad people. I am sure that among them we have many who understand and appreciate the democratic concept of life. I am sure that among them there must be thousands who have something to contribute toward the general welfare and upbuilding of this great Canada. On the other hand, I am convinced that among them must be many who have no appreciation whatsoever of what democracy means. The fear which I have felt right along is that in the great volume of sympathy which we have within our beings we might be inclined to open our doors wide and say, "Enter". To me that could be one of the most dangerous procedures imaginable. I was, therefore, pleased yesterday when the Prime Minister said that representatives of the immigration branch would proceed to Europe and examine prospective immigrants, with the idea of selecting many of them for entry into this country.

There are many things which one could say about immigration. Yesterday the Prime Minister indicated that during the thirties, on account of the adverse economic conditions of the period, these provisions were necessarily interpreted in a restrictive manner. He was referring to the general immigration regulations and the increase of admissible persons. He said further, as reported at page 2645 of Hansard:

> Because of improved economic conditions, it is now possible to interpret them broadly.

I mention that for this reason. I am not and have not been very happy about the interpretation and administration of the regulations that we now have. I have a number of cases that I intend to use for illustrative purposes, but let me hasten to say that I have always enjoyed splendid cooperation from the immigration authorities with whom I have come in contact from time to time. But they seem to be faced with a multitude of regulations, and a double multitude of interpretations. I wonder whether these persons themselves, as honest as they may be, as desirous of serving as they may be, are not somewhat confused. I find a great variance of interpretation between the immigration branch here and the district officers which we have across the country. I suggest to the minister that immediate steps be taken to get some uniformity of interpretation and to get rid of a lot of—I do not know whether this is the proper expression or not—redundant regulations—useless regulations, at least.

Here is a typical example which I bring to the minister's attention. Here is a man approximately forty years of age. He served with distinction in the French forces. Later, he served with great distinction in the French underground forces. He had a brother-in-law in Canada who has farmed here most successfully for a long period of time. This man made application for the admission of his brother-in-law, who is at present in France. The first attempt was that of endeavouring to bring this brother-in-law in as a brother-in-law. That seemed to be fine. Everything went beautifully until suddenly the question was asked, "Where is this man's sister?"—the wife of the farmer who had made the application. We had to admit that she was dead. Therefore the officials stated, "In view of the fact that she is dead, her husband is no longer the brother-in-law of the prospective immigrant." A most peculiar thing! So we thought, "We will get around that," and we made application for his entry as a farmer. He was a qualified farmer and had been a successful one until he was deprived of all his properties as a consequence of the war. As I say, we made application for his entry as a farmer. Everything seemed to be just fine until someone said, "Now, has he the money with which to establish himself?" The answer was, "No, but his brother-in-law is prepared to set him up on a quarter-section of land, with buildings, stock and everything, and give him title." We were told, "We are sorry; he must have the money to buy the properties and establish himself."

So, having been beaten there, I said, "Since the brother-in-law of the person whom we are desirous of bringing in is not regarded as a blood relative, we will get his son—the nephew of the prospective immigrant—and have him make application, because he is a blood relative." But no; that was quickly ruled out on the ground that the nephew could not qualify as an applicant under the regulations. I could probably think of a few more things that we were faced with, but the long and short of it is that this prospective immigrant is still somewhere in France. He is penniless and unable to establish himself because of conditions over which he had no control. That is not just an isolated case. I am not endeavouring to be unduly critical, but I am pointing out exactly what we are faced with. In fact, this statement was made to me, "These immigration regulations are not designed as regulations to permit the entry of immigrants; they are designed as regulations to exclude immigrants." That conclusion is arrived at only as a consequence of the innumerable obstacles which officials seem capable of throwing in your way when you try to procure permits for the entry of a so-called admissible person.

I shall mention just one other case, that of a young Danish lad. He was born in Canada and his parents were successful farmers. In fact I do not know of any who are more successful in the farming line than are the Danish people who have settled in great numbers in my part of Alberta. This lad's parents were highly respected people; they were British subjects. This lad went overseas at the outbreak of the war. He did so in order to see relatives whom he had never before seen. He also went over for the purpose of attending the agricultural college. He was unable to return to Canada. He served until that country to which he went was subjugated. He then entered the underground forces. I may say that he has shown me the documents covering this. While he was serving with the underground forces he married and his wife had two children. He got back about a year ago, but every conceivable type of obstacle has been thrown in the way of his wife's entry into the country; and that boy who is endeavouring to establish himself on a farm, to have a home for his family when they arrive, is now forced to send over $70 or $80 overseas every month in order to provide for his wife and children, unless the case has been solved very recently and I have not been so advised. The last information I had was that he was being bled of Canadian dollars—and incidentally so is the country—in order to maintain his family over there. He could have brought them here, because on two occasions he had air passage arranged for them, but obstacles were thrown in the way. As I say, I want to be perfectly fair. If that case has been solved, I am tickled to death; but if it has I have not been so advised.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer; in fact, there are a couple of other matters. I find upon examination that medical men are not permitted entry into this country unless they are British subjects or United States citizens. With the acute shortage of medical doctors in Canada—and I am told that there is now an acute shortage of approximately two thousand—these persons are not regarded as admissible. Not only that, but I am advised on good authority that even during the war many of these medical men who had come over—some just before the war and some early in the war—were not permitted to engage in the practice of their profession. In fact I am told on good authority that some of them were engaged in the censorship department here in Ottawa, while their services could have been of much more value had they been permitted to practice their profession here. Unless some good reason is given, I believe that these qualified medical doctors should be permitted to enter Canada. After all, we are constantly told that one of the chief obstacles to the establishment of a suitable health programme in Canada is the lack of doctors and as well, of course, the lack of qualified nurses. I hope that the minister will give this matter some consideration.

Mr. GLEN: Is there not this feature which enters into the matter? A doctor or medical man coming into Canada must have his licence and must clear himself with the medical association.

Mr. SHAW: That is all known by me. I am not asking that a medical man be permitted to enter Canada as a medical man and just simply be given authority to practise without meeting the requirements as determined through examination set by whatever body is responsible for doing that. But you have thrown up that barrier against the medical man as such coming in. He is not qualified as a farmer. He cannot be regarded as admissible, as nearly as I can determine, under any other section of the Immigration Act. Therefore I feel that a special provision should be made.

Mr. GLEN: You are speaking of countries other than the United Kingdom and the United States?

Mr. SHAW: I mentioned earlier that British subjects and United States citizens do qualify. I have in mind, for example, a case which I brought to the attention of the department, and that was one reason why I mentioned this. This young doctor is Swiss; he is now director of the Jimma hospital in Ethiopia. He was in Canada about three or four years ago as a member of a medical mission. As a consequence of meeting a missionary in Africa, whom I know, this man wrote me. I was told that he could not possibly enter this country. He is a graduate of about four universities. I would not ask that he be brought in, placed in a hospital and told to go to work, or permitted to establish himself in practice somewhere in the country without examination. But I think he should be permitted to enter, write his examinations and, if qualified, given a chance to establish himself here, provided that he is the type of person we should like to have in Canada, quite apart from his professional qualifications.

There is another question which has made me wonder; I have not very strong feelings in connection with it, but I am asking for information. We had a number of Poles brought to Canada. Please do not misunderstand me. Certainly I am not one of those who criticize any person because of his racial origin or religion. I never ask a man what his racial origin is, nor do I ask him what his religious faith is. I take him for what I find him to be, regardless of those other things. I am told that before those Poles came to Canada they were signed up as members of the British army for a period of two years. That came on pretty reliable authority. If that is true, my question is, why? I will just leave it at that point.

I have no great desire to take up much more of the time of the house, but I should like to refer to one more paragraph of the Prime Minister's observations yesterday. At page 2645 of Hansard he said:

> The fear has been expressed that immigration would lead to a reduction in the standard of living. This need not be the case. If immigration is properly planned, the result will be the reverse. A larger population will help to develop our resources.

I agree with that.

> By providing a larger number of consumers, in other words a larger domestic market, it will reduce the present dependence of Canada on the export of primary products. The essential thing is that immigrants be selected with care, and that their numbers be adjusted to the absorptive capacity of the country.

I wish to make just one observation in that connection. Of all that the Prime Minister said, I am less in agreement with that paragraph than any other. If the essence of that statement is correct, why did the United States, with its tremendous population in proportion to area, as compared with Canada, take such a terrific beating during the last depression? Moreover, if that is true, why did we curtail our immigration during the depression years? If that constituted even a partial solution, then I think we should have brought in immigrants in greater numbers, instead of making our policy much more restrictive.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): I should like to take a few moments of the time of the house to refer to this matter of immigration. First, I wish to say I agree with the ideas and ideals expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I do not think I need go over those things he said, with which I am in accord, but for a moment I want to refer to the position of Canada and her need for immigrants. In the past it has been impressed upon many of us that we are a country of vast areas, with a sparse population; and I think it is obvious that we can bring people to this country and give them a higher standard of living than they would have anywhere else in the world, so that they will be quite prepared to pay higher prices for our products than if they remained in their native lands. Something else we can share with them is our national debt; we will gladly divide that up.

I rather resent some things about immigration, and one is the fact that some of those who come to this country bring with them political ideologies which are foreign to the North American continent. It seems to me that when they are so anxious to come here they should be prepared to accept our ideas and ideals in regard to government. I would be quite prepared to accept, as I believe we as Canadians would be prepared to accept, a quota system for those who wish to come to this country from Asia. As for the so-called Chinese Exclusion Act, I think we should bring that legislation up to date in such a way that we shall be treating these people in a humane and friendly manner, to right the wrong that has been done in the past. In the city of London we have a Chinese family by the name of Wong, to whom I should like to refer. In that family are eight children, of whom three are doctors; one is now at Osgoode Hall, a member of the legal profession, while the remaining four are in business in London. They are among the very finest of our citizens.

The hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Kidd) mentioned the drift of our young people to the United States. That is to be regretted. It seems to me that we are losing the cream of our crop and bringing in the skim milk, and I doubt if we are to improve very much our position in this way. It is evident that something is wrong when these young people leave our country and go elsewhere. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) mentioned that immigrants were brought in. That is not my understanding. They come to this country of their own free will; they are clamouring to come here. They are not brought in; but when they do come they should be quite prepared to accept our laws and regulations.

One hon. member said something about enemy aliens. In western Ontario we had a good number of prisoners of war working on farms, and I have had many individual farmers come to me wondering how they could have those men returned to them. Since losing the prisoners of war, some of these farmers have had Polish veterans working for them, and they are quite prepared to take back their prisoners of war and help them become established in this country. I have also met delegations of farmers who were quite prepared to take prisoners of war and so-called enemy aliens. I have neighbours who have been in this country for twenty-five years, originally coming from Hungary. They have relatives in Hungary who are now destitute and hungry, but they are classed as enemy aliens and cannot be admitted to this country. I think it is much easier to make democratic people out of them by bringing them to this country than by keeping them starving in Europe.

The Polish veterans have been mentioned, and I should like to state this fact. While I was home last week, I went to the Department of Labour in London, where I was told that, of the 122 Poles placed through the London labour office, fifty-one have left the farms on which they were originally placed, and that some of them have moved two and even three times. So that in this question of immigration we face quite a problem. Also only the other day I was told that one of these Polish soldiers had married, that he has a family and that he is applying for family allowance. I was wondering what the status of his wife and the child would be.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks with a short description of the activities of certain young Canadian-born Chinese who, in 1944, volunteered for service in the Pacific. The majority of these young men came from British Columbia, and I give this illustration, because I believe it is indicative of the spirit of the Canadian Chinese.

These boys—they were little more than youths—were trained in the most hazardous of all operations, that of acting as saboteurs behind the enemy lines. They were taken to a remote part of British Columbia, and there were taught how to use explosives, how to speak various dialects of the Chinese language, and were also given a smattering of Japanese. They received a most intensive six months special training.

I was one of a few people who went to visit these young men while they were being trained. I remember sitting around a camp fire one summer evening discussing with them the future of the operations they would be undertaking. One topic of conversation to which they invariably returned was that, while they were pleased to do this work and to take chances for Canada and for China, they did hope that when the war was over they would be recognized as full Canadian citizens, and given the franchise.

I am pleased to remind the house that the government of British Columbia has given the franchise not only to these young men but to all Canadian-born Chinese. These men went to the far east and carried out with distinction the tasks assigned to them. The majority of them have returned. I am pleased to say I have received communications from them reporting on how they did their work, and how they are now reestablishing themselves in the life of the community.

Only last month I received a letter from one of these men who asked if he might continue his service to Canada, and might be given an opportunity of joining one of the reserve army units, in order that he might pass on to other young Canadians—perhaps other young Canadians of Chinese extraction —some of the experiences he had had, and what he had learned while he was in Asia. I am pleased to say I wrote the officer commanding the district, giving him the name of this young man, and that only today I received a letter in reply, saying that this young Canadian-born Chinese is to be given an opportunity of joining one of the reserve regiments.

I bring this matter to the attention of the house as an indication of the desire of these young men to become Canadian citizens. Anyone who has had any experience in connection with victory loan campaigns and Red Cross drives will know that the Chinese living in Canada have set an inspiring example for other sections of the community in their generosity in those drives, as well as in promoting their own drives to assist Canada.

I believe I am speaking for a large section of the population of British Columbia when I say we admire and respect the Chinese. We dislike seeing placed upon them any restrictions which might be considered inhumane or which would not apply to other sections of the population. We bear in mind the fact that only a small proportion of the male Chinese living in British Columbia have their wives with them. It is unfortunate for them, and is a source of irritation; and perhaps there is a feeling almost of disgrace when it is remembered that for so long a time it has not been possible for these men, who have been in Canada for many years, to bring their wives to this country.

The majority of the male Chinese on Vancouver island are men who are now past middle age. They have performed humble work for many years, without having the comfort of their wives and families, except for short periods of time when they have gone back to China. Therefore I think I am correct in saying that the majority of people in British Columbia would like to see that handicap removed from these Chinese men, now that they are becoming citizens of Canada.

But we have to be practical in the matter, and we must realize how many Chinese males whose wives are living outside Canada there are in the country. The latest figures for British Columbia show that there are some 13,174, whereas in all of Canada there are some 23,556. If these Chinese male residents in Canada were allowed to bring in their wives and their dependent children under the age of eighteen, according to the present regulations only a small number—about 8,000 of them—who are Canadian citizens, would be permitted to bring in their families. But the remainder are eligible for Canadian citizenship, and I presume the vast majority of them will accept the opportunity of becoming Canadian citizens. Therefore we may see coming to Canada, if the doors are thrown wide open, not a few hundred Chinese ladies and their children, but several thousand of them, perhaps no less than 40,000, which, I believe, would not be an extreme figure at which to place it.

I suggest that it would be utterly impracticable for us in British Columbia to absorb anything like that number of Chinese females at the present time. The majority of the Chinese live in the cities. Only a comparatively few live in the country, although there are some market gardeners on the outskirts and a certain number of men work in the logging camps and sawmills. But, as I say, the majority of those who have families live in the cities, and Chinatown in Victoria and Chinatown in Vancouver are terribly overcrowded at the present time and could not absorb any additional population. Where are we to house this large number of Chinese women and children if they are permitted to come here? Every school on Vancouver island is overcrowded at the present time. Reference was made earlier in this debate to medical services. Very few of the Chinese in this country at the present time belong to the professional classes, and therefore the care of any large number of Chinese wives and children who might come to this country would be an added burden upon our already overtaxed medical and dental and teaching services.

I feel that we must ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give the people of British Columbia some assurance that there will not be a flood tide of these wives and children into the country. I was heartened by a sentence in his statement yesterday when he said that it is of the utmost importance to relate immigration to the absorptive capacity. I would ask that that statement be applied to the Chinese families who may come in as soon as this act is repealed and to the additional number who would be allowed to come in as soon as Chinese residents take out their citizenship papers.

I should like the government to have a vivid picture of the Chinatowns in our coast cities and to realize that it will be a disgrace to this country if a large number of Chinese come here and are thrown into these already overcrowded slum conditions. I hope it will be possible to limit the entry of wives of Chinese who are here to those that can be absorbed readily. This may impose a little hardship on Chinese in this country who may have to wait a little while longer for their wives to come here, but I think it would be a wise and judicious policy to limit the families coming in to a trickle until such time as accommodation can be made available for them.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) and I took part in a ceremony in Winnipeg at which we were presented with citizenship certificates. They were presented at the same time to representatives of other ethnic groups in Canada. On that occasion the minister made a speech which I applauded when he sat down—a speech upon which I now congratulate him. If my memory serves me aright, he said that he and we others who were with him had a great advantage over other Canadians in so far as we had chosen to come to this country, while those who were born in Canada were here entirely by accident. I know I chose deliberately to come to this country. It was a land of hope; it was in the western hemisphere, the hemisphere to which the peoples of the world are looking for leadership and guidance. Through the years that I have been here my pride in Canada has steadily grown and each time something has happened to hurt that pride I have felt practically a physical bruise.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

There is in this bill a principle at stake, a great principle of human justice. On other occasions I have charged the government with discrimination in connection with certain of its immigration regulations and orders but, after discussion and correspondence with the minister, I am now convinced that that discrimination no longer exists. I congratulate the minister and the government upon that state of affairs. But in this bill we have a certain type of discrimination. I should like to remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of what he said yesterday, and I quote from page 2646 of Hansard:

> This does not mean, however, that we should not seek to remove from our legislation discrimination which appears to be objectionable.

I feel that Chinese residents as such are discriminated against, and that is something which hurts the good name of Canada in the world at large. Yesterday my colleague and roommate, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), came back from New York where, along with other members of parliament, he had attended the meetings of the united nations. He came back filled with jubilation at the knowledge that Canada's name stood high among the nations of the world. We do not want to do anything which will tarnish or sully that name; yet we risk that by placing Chinese residents on a different level from that of other residents in Canada.

I ask the government most earnestly to reconsider its position. After all, in effect what difference will it make if we give to Chinese residents the same rights given to other residents? We can assume, I think, that many of these Chinese residents will take out their citizenship papers when they find out they can bring their wives and children to this country. It is merely a matter of postponing, perhaps for a few months or a year or two, the time when their relatives would come to this country. For the sake of a year or two I do not think it is worth risking having our representatives at the united nations held up to the scorn of other nations. We accepted certain obligations under the charter and we have to fulfil them. I ask the government to reconsider this matter and put Chinese residents of Canada on exactly the same basis as other residents.

I agree substantially with what the Prime Minister said yesterday and there is only one comment I wish to make, one which I made the other day. This concerns refugees in the displaced persons camps in Europe. Anyone in this house who has had anything at all to do with these people, anyone who has read the stories concerning them must realize how desperate is their position. Many of them have only hope left, and if they are not going to be given something to bolster up that hope I hesitate to think what may happen. To give them additional hope I repeat the suggestion I made. The teams which are going over to Europe to examine potential immigrants could examine these people and if they come within the rules or regulations they could be given a visa or a letter, some document which would let them know that eventually we would be prepared to take them into Canada. Obviously we cannot do so now, because we have been told repeatedly about the difficulties of transportation, but at least we can give them that hope which they need so desperately. If we do that we shall have gone far toward fulfilling our obligations to these dreadfully unfortunate people.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I realize the importance of the refugee problem and that it is a difficult one to handle. I have one suggestion to make with regard to the refugees, and that is that it might be well to bring in certain family groups of them who are known to have democratic tendencies. That would make it easier for them to work out their own destinies here.

I understand that about 100,000 applications have been made to Ontario House in London by British people for permission to come to Canada. I have a recollection that the Right Hon. Winston Churchill said not long ago that there were 6,000,000 people too many in Great Britain at the present time, and I have no doubt that the more people from Great Britain that we took into Canada, the more we should ease the hardships which they are experiencing today with respect to the shortage of food. It would mean just that many less to feed in Great Britain, and, further, they are the right kind of people we want in this country. We should give the people of Great Britain who bore the brunt of battle for so many years alone the preference in coming to this country. Very few people in Canada who have not been over to the old country realize the terrible hardships with which they have to put up today, and I can certainly say, from letters that I receive from Great Britain, that conditions there are pretty grim. For all these reasons I think we should do everything we can to give the British priority in coming to Canada.

I wanted to speak particularly on the question of Chinese immigration. I have in my riding a great number of Chinese. There are quite a few of them in the city of Toronto and in the province of Ontario. I have known some of these Chinese intimately. I was connected with the Chinese war relief fund, and I know how much the average Chinaman in this country and especially in Toronto sacrificed in order to send relief to the people of his own country. We must not forget that China was at war for many years before world war II and that conditions in that country are still by no means settled, and we should give the Chinese every consideration. I never met a finer man in my life than Chong Ying of the city of Toronto. Some years before the war he wanted to bring his boy over here but it could not be done. That was a great disappointment to him. He is the head of the Chinese in the city of Toronto. Now he is an older man. There is another very fine Chinaman I know, Ernie Mark, and many others. Ernie worked hard and is still working hard collecting money in Canada to send relief to China. There are many others I know who are very fine people indeed, kindly, loyal to Canada and highly respected.

In my city many Chinese who have married do not live in Chinatown but have places of their own around the city. I think that is much better than living all together in a congested area. We should do everything we can to help out the Chinese who are here now.

A great deal has been said about the Chinese in Canada. According to the 1941 census, there were 34,627, of whom 30,713 were males and 3,914 were females. I suppose there are more now. But the point I wish to make is that eighty-two per cent of these Chinese in Canada are over forty years of age. While they might bring out their wives, I doubt that they could bring out their families because their children would now be over twenty years of age. No Chinaman has been allowed to return from Canada to China since 1931, so that their children in China must now be over twenty years of age, and I do not think there is any danger of having a large influx of Chinese families. Again, sixty per cent of the Chinese in Canada are over fifty years of age. This makes it clear that there is not much danger of a large immigration of Chinese families to this country.

We asked the Chinese to come to Canada and welcomed them here, and so far as the Chinese in my own city are concerned, I know them to be very fine citizens. One of their difficulties is that they are forced, under present conditions, to live unnatural and abnormal lives, being practically forced to live a life of celibacy in congested areas. If they had their wives with them they probably would not live in the centre of Toronto but would move out into houses of their own.

It is almost six o'clock and I should like to give just a few more figures before I sit down. In the metropolitan area of Toronto there are 2,559 Chinese, of whom 2,275 are males and 284 are females. I have not the number of Chinese born in Canada, but the figures I have just given include a great many children who were born in this country. I just wanted to take a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to speak of the kindness and loyalty of the Chinese I have known and to put these figures on the record.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 59, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company—Mr. Reid—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Capital stock.

Mr. GREEN: I have no intention of opposing this bill. The British Columbia Telephone Company are applying under the bill for permission to increase their capital from $11 million to $25 million. There is no doubt that they are faced with a great need for more expansion. I have clipped out of the paper received today from British Columbia a large advertisement by the company headed, "Report on the Telephone Situation." It goes on to apologize to the people who have applied for telephones but are unable to get them. It tells them why it is impossible to make these installations at the present time. There is no doubt that the company will have to put in a great many thousand new telephones and will require a great deal of money to do so.

However, I think there should be some assurance given to the committee, by the hon. member for New Westminster who is sponsoring the bill, to the effect that there is not to be an application for an increase in rates. That has always concerned me when bills of this type come before the house. In this case, where there is a big increase in capital, I think it is essential that some protection should be given to telephone users of British Columbia. I understand that the hon. member has been authorized to give assurance to the effect that the company has no present intention of applying for an increase of rates and will not make any such application unless compelled to do so by extensive changes in conditions.

Mr. REID: That is my definite understanding.

Mr. GREEN: That assurance is clearly worded and contains a statement to the effect that an application will not be made unless the company is compelled to do so and then only by reason of extensive changes in conditions. If the hon. member for New Westminster is prepared to give that assurance on behalf of the British Columbia Telephone Company I for one shall have no objection to the bill passing.

Mr. REID: I am authorized to do so, and it is my definite understanding.

Mr. IRVINE: I just wish to bring to the attention of the committee a point which I raised in the standing committee when this bill was before it. The hon. member who is piloting this bill through the committee gave us a good outline of the project, and explained it very well. The point that I wish to bring to the attention of the committee and to the sponsor of the bill is the great need which is apparent in the rural sections of British Columbia for a further expansion of service. Of course the capital which has been provided by this legislation might well be used for that purpose or it might not; and it is in order that we may have some assurance that it will be used, in part at least, for extending the service in the rural districts, especially in the central and northern sections of the province, that I now rise.

The British Columbia Telephone Company is already well established in the better settled sections of the province, where, of course, a telephone system would pay better than it would in sparsely settled districts. It is so well established that in these points it virtually has a monopoly of the best section of the country; and unless it is an unusual type of corporation, it will not expend any more money than it can help in sections of the community which do not pay very well. That is only a natural thing for us to expect from a company which is, like all other companies, in the business for the profits that may be made as well as for services that may be rendered.

I should like to have some assurance that it will not continue to confine the expenditures of its newly authorized capital to communities which are already fairly well served, but that it will extend its services to communities which have none. Of course I believe that a telephone system should be a public utility; that the provincial government should have taken over the whole service. But that is a matter for the provincial government and the people of British Columbia; we cannot deal with it here. We are asked to allow this company to carry on its business and extend its capital sufficiently to be able to do so; but the public should have some protection. The last section of the bill, for example, which gives the only protection that is given reads:

> The company shall not have power to make any issue, sale or other disposition of its capital stock or any part thereof, without first obtaining the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada of the amount, terms or conditions of such issue, sale or other disposition of such capital stock.

There is some control over the issuance of its stock, but apparently there is no control of the company's action in regard to what particular project the stock will be issued about. Therefore it might very well neglect almost entirely the rural communities which need services so badly.

It goes without saying that, in certain sections of British Columbia, the population is sparsely settled, and that in such districts it would not be a very good paying proposition for a private company to build telephone lines. Nevertheless the service should be an over-all proposition, so that the company may make up in the well settled portions of the communities what it might lose in the more sparsely settled. There ought to be some measure of protection in the public interest in respect of the company's operations.

Mr. REID: As pointed out by the hon. member, he did bring forward that very matter when the bill was before the committee. At that time I gave him, quite naturally, all the assurance that I could.

The application which is before us at the present time is due particularly to the great demand by commercial business and people in the lower mainland, but it is not complete with them unless telephones are taken out into the country and into the district which the hon. member represents. Unfortunately the head of the company fell sick and could not be here. But I have been given assurance that the very matter referred to is to receive the personal attention and keen interest of the head of the company in the light of the suggestion made by the hon. member, so that, if possible, service will be given.

Mr. CHURCH: As a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines I attended the hearing on this particular bill. I wish to raise some questions regarding the way in which these bills are considered. This bill is not a private bill; it is a public bill which affects everybody in Canada. Do not forget this: we had a long fight with the Bell Telephone Company, a public utility, here in 1927.

In the first place, I take objection to the way in which we are considering these private bills. These should be reported by the committee reporters, so that the members of the House of Commons will have some evidence of what the bill is all about. We do not now know anything about it. We report divorce bills in both houses; I should probably say in this house and another house. I do not know whether I should call the other one a house or not, because they are away at times. What I want to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, is that this is no way for consideration to be given public bills like this one is.

British Columbia, which I last visited in 1927, has been a happy hunting-ground for many years not only for light, but for power, transportation, telephone and other companies. I want to refer to this telephone company mentioned in the first clause of the bill, and I will show you who they are. They are an American trust; that is what they are. They found British Columbia a happy hunting-ground. In 1909 we in our city had a big fight and I myself had to take the case to the railway commission before the late Mr. Justice Mabee. There was a difference in the telephone rates in our city; part was the old city as far north as Bloor street and the new city practically north of Bloor street. In the new city the company were charging $132 for business telephones and $82 in Deer Park near Mount Pleasant cemetery. They would probably have put us all in there if they had kept on. After the city council decided not to take any action on the application, I myself applied to the railway commission on behalf of all the telephone users in the Toronto district. What was the result? After hearing evidence from electricians and other people for eight weeks, the chairman said he had learned more in the last ten or fifteen minutes when I pointed out to him that the principle of the telephone was only that of pole and wire. I pointed out that it did not cost any more for water because you were farther away from the pumping station and that it did not cost any more for gas because you were farther away from the gas station, or for your electric light because you were farther away from the power house, and I asked why it should cost more for your telephone which is simply a pole and wire principle. The chairman marked it down, and I want to say that just now somebody has sent me a note asking me to make my remarks short. I will just continue my remarks as long as I like.

In 1909 the city of Toronto applied to Ottawa and came down to the railway committee. What we proposed was to place all these telephone and express companies under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada under the Railway Act. We, the representatives of the municipalities, were simply howled down, such is the influence these companies had and such was the lobby they had here then at Ottawa, before a committee set up to consolidate the Railway Act. Now you are doing business in a different way. You are afraid to tell the public what is going on. In this case there is no written evidence of what happened before the railway committee of the House of Commons, or any report on it. They might as well have met in private. There was not a single reporter there, as was the case with another bill the other day. But you have a report of divorce cases that do not affect the consumer. I could, if I liked, go back home and not bother my head about this; but I do it because I am here to protect the interests of the public. I did not come to Ottawa to advance my own interests. I came to Ottawa as a sacred trust. I came here to try to do something for the ordinary working people of the country and advance their best interests. I do not expect to get anything out of it under the party system, nor do I ask for anything.

I will tell you one thing on this particular question. I visited the province of British Columbia in 1927—and I will be through in seven or eight minutes now—and it was then the happy hunting-ground for company promoters like this one. It is the richest province in water powers, but the rates there were then prohibitive. I do not know how the small farmer got along then. He had not his light in his barn as we had then in Ontario. It is the richest province in water power, and in some places the water was not fit to drink then. I may say that in 1927 the rates for water were two or three times what our rates were, and not only those, but for light and power and the telephone rates; they may have marked them down now. They want us to increase their capital stock from $11 million to $25 million. I am not complaining about the rates. It is the people who pay the rates; I do not pay them. British Columbia is the richest province in water power I have ever seen, but they have been a long time in doing much about a hydro system for light and power, and the same is true with the telephone.

[Mr. Church.]

I come now to the principle of the bill. This company is part of an American trust, a subsidiary of one. I am reading now from "Moody's Manual of Investments." As to the history of this company, it used to be called the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company. I may say that it would not be necessary for me to read all this if the committee's proceedings were recorded, but the committee do not know anything about it; I mean our present committee. You never had it reported. You do not know who they are. They can come here and apply for anything. We do not know anything about it. We just pass the bill. It is called as a private bill. How are we to know about it? How am I to go back and explain why I voted away public rights like this?

The history of this company is as follows:

Incorporated in Quebec December, 1934. As of April 16, 1935, acquired all the assets of the National Telephone and Telegraph Corporation which was incorporated in Delaware, December 7, 1926, as British Columbia Telephone and Telegraph Company.

It is a subsidiary of a large American trust.

Business: company has investment in companies which operate telephone exchanges in British Columbia and the Dominican republic.

Properties: a subsidiary, British Columbia Telephone Company, company operates without competition sixty-four telephone exchanges and 163,135 telephones, serving a population in excess of 500,000, including the metropolitan areas of Vancouver and Victoria. Other subsidiaries operate 5,320 telephones, serving various municipalities throughout British Columbia.

Then they go on to give the United States companies. Then they formed, by act of parliament, the British Columbia Telephone Company which is controlled by the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, a subsidiary of the American trust, associated telephone and telegraph system. The capital structure is set out here and also the history which is as follows:

Incorporated in Canada in 1916 as Western Canada Telephone Company; name changed to above—

British Columbia Telephone Company.

—November, 1919. In 1923, acquired business and assets of British Columbia Telephone Company Limited incorporated in 1891 as Vernon and Nelson Telephone Company; name changed in 1903; acquired Provincial Company and Delta Telephone Company. In 1929, acquired Fort George and Alberta Telephone Company, East Kootenay Telephone Company and Chilliwack Telephone Company.

Then as to management, the directors were largely American, although there are some Canadians. Under "property" we find this:

Owns and operates over 97 per cent of all the telephones in British Columbia, including the entire system of the metropolitan areas of the cities of Vancouver and Victoria, and owns all of its exchange buildings and sites in connection therewith. Also owns and operates an extensive long distance system, including four submarine cables from the mainland to Vancouver island connecting with the city of Victoria. Lines also connect with the western terminus of the Trans-Canada Telephone Sytsem. Company conducts its business under powers contained in its charter and without necessity of local or special franchises.

Now we come to the operating revenue which is given as follows:

1939	$5,794,023
1940	6,050,009
1941	6,547,552
1942	7,166,626
1943	7,755,871
1944	8,136,621
1945	8,723,801

You do not notice any net profit of $11 million. Here is what it is. For the last year of record the net profit is $1,324,979 and it came up from $1,297,384 in 1939. The figures for net profit as given here are:

1939	$1,297,384
1940	1,222,337
1941	1,361,350
1942	1,363,060
1943	1,273,038
1944	1,280,351

Mind you, I am not objecting to the people of British Columbia doing as they please about this. It is none of my business, after all, but this company has been placed under federal control. While I appreciate what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and others in his party, as well as some of my own party, have done in this connection, it is not for me to say what should be done under the bill. I have not time to go over the balance sheets, the liabilities and assets of this company. I do not want to talk out anybody's bill; I am not that kind of man, but I do object to the way this bill is drawn up. Now they want to obtain an increase in capital from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000. Somebody is going to cut up a pretty nice melon. I think hon. members would have to go away down to Mexico or some other place to get a melon as juicy as that. Not many years ago the Bell Telephone Company came along and cut up a melon amounting to $75,000,000, and the people of Ontario had to pay for most of it. At that time, if you had one share you got a nice split also of new shares, and no doubt the same procedure will be followed here later on. I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen to my left have any melons like that to cut up. There is very little money in the real melons they import in North Toronto, which sell at forty or fifty cents each. This is the juiciest telephone melon I have ever seen.

What does this company do? They apply to the senate and to our railway committee. No reporters are there, and very few members; the bill might just as well have been considered in private. We have an important meeting like that going on and hardly a line appears in the house for the public who will have to pay for it. I am not here to criticize the press at all; I have found that it does no good. You can never answer a newspaper, as they always have the last word. However I do complain about the way we are doing our business. Here the railway committee has given this company power to obtain another $14,000,000. When we get away up in amounts like that the figures become astronomical. I do not know that I can say much more about the bill, but I object to all these profits. We do not know anything much about this bill or this company; yet we are asked to support it. Among the directors you will find some of the very same people who served an American trust so faithfully and well in these two subsidiary companies, American-owned. Many of the directors and shareholders of these companies live in the United States, in Delaware and almost every other state of the union. They include all kinds of people; I cannot find their names and addresses at the moment. They come over to Canada and find things very easy over here. They got away with a stock increase of $75 million in 1927 in the province of Ontario. Only one or two members would sit here for the whole evening, night after night, in an attempt to prevent the Bell Telephone Company from increasing its capital stock by of $75,000,000 in 1927 in the province of up the melon by a big split of shares. They got away with it then and they are going to get away with it now because of the way we do business. We have no records or reports before us. We do not keep records. We have records concerning divorce cases and everything else, but we cannot afford to spend the money to keep records in connection with a great public utility like this.

In Ontario, since we have taken light, heat and power away from the control of people like these and given it to the Hydro, the rates have been reduced three or four times, and the same thing could be done in regard to telephone rate service. This company got an extra million dollars in capital in 1941, only a few years ago, and they did not spend or use it all. They probably put it aside. We do not know whether they sold the shares; we could not get any information. Last year the operating revenue of this company was $9,628,000, while the net profit was $716,544, according to the report submitted to the annual meeting last year. Mind you, they are probably giving good service at fair rates now; I believe that is particularly true in connection with long distance service; but the minute you give them $25,000,000, just see what will happen. They say there will be no increase in rates for a while, but wait and see. That was one of the reasons we had to make a change in connection with certain public utilities some years ago. We were asked to place the express companies and telephone companies under the control of the railway commission. At that time the chairman was Mr. Justice Mabee, a brilliant man who was appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. He brought down the rates in Toronto from $82 to $32, for a flat rate for Greater Toronto. Business telephones had been paying $132, and he cut that rate for a flat rate for the whole down to $52 and made them get along with the revenue they obtained. That applied all over that district, north, south, east and west. No wonder they applied for a big capital increase; next year they came here and wanted $75,000,000 in capital. So I say this is the juiciest melon I ever saw. Talk about the Montreal melon you used to be able to buy in the stores; it was never in it with what these people can do. All Ontario had to pay for that little deal, and then the stock was split splendidly. It is too bad hon. members did not have some of that stock; they would make more money than by sitting here talking of a bill about which we know nothing.

I do not think I need say anything more. We might just as well give them the title deed of the house, and I warn you, Mr. Chairman, to nail down the parliament buildings before they get through. I saw the Beauharnois boys in the building today. Then the other night over in another branch, in a place down the hall, they were going to give a bill second reading before it was even printed. That was in the chamber of the saints everlasting rest in another part of this building.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Coming from a district in the interior of British Columbia which has a considerable interest in this bill because it has a large number of telephone users, I wish to say a few words. Before proceeding to do so, however, I must say that, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview this evening, I can see that party changing its name in the near future from Progressive Conservative to Socialist Conservative.

The bill before us requests authority to increase the capital of this company to take care of necessary expansion. This company has almost a monopoly in British Columbia. I do not object to that, because in the first place I believe that telephone service and public utilities generally can be carried on satisfactorily only on the basis of monopoly or near monopoly, if you want to have efficient administration, to keep down costs and to provide good service for the public. Let me say at once that I stand for the principle of public ownership, and wish this were a public monopoly instead of a private monopoly, but we have not reached that point yet, and we have to face the situation as it is.

This is virtually a private monopoly seeking an enlargement of its capital to serve the people of British Columbia. When it comes to the question of giving any monopoly rights and privileges we have to be very careful to protect the public, because in the case of a monopoly the customers have no choice. For many years I have been a customer of the British Columbia Telephone Company, together with a good many of my neighbours and constituents. I may say that in the past this company, like many other large corporations in Canada, has had what I consider very poor public relations. In the first place, it has covered the larger places and, in my opinion, has often ignored the smaller ones. The result has been that the smaller places have had to get along with much less service, and a less efficient service.

In addition to that, in my opinion, in past years its public relations were poor. But companies of this type, like many others in Canada, are now learning and making progress in that direction. They are realizing that the public of this country are not going to put up with that kind of treatment. I believe that during the last few years there has been a great improvement in the public service, and in the public relations of the company. I believe it must have some new officials, and some more progressive minded administrators.

In my district there has been a considerable expansion of service taking place, and some improvement in the service for the small communities. I understand that some of this money is required to improve the service in the rural areas. I have been careful in going into this matter and have listened to the presentation of the bill by the hon. member for New Westminster. Then, I have asked questions; and in view of my careful inquiry and my personal knowledge of the situation in the interior of British Columbia, coupled with the assurance given this evening by the hon. member for New Westminster to the hon. member for Vancouver South concerning rates, and knowing the need for an expansion at this time of the telephone service in the interior of British Columbia, I shall have no hesitation in supporting the bill; because we are living under a capitalistic system and this capital is required to expand the telephone services so urgently needed by that section of the public I represent.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that in 1941 or 1942 the British Columbia Telephone Company made application here for an increase in capital to the extent of $10 million. Because of the war, and the likelihood that an issue of that kind would interfere with the raising of money for the war, the increase granted was cut down to $1 million, which I believe the company has never used.

So that while I, too, favour public ownership of an institution of this kind, I am not opposing the bill, because there is no alternative in the province of British Columbia to the British Columbia Telephone Company. I am quite satisfied that it badly needs this new capital.

May I say, with all due regard for the sponsor of the bill, that I do not place much faith or reliance in the statement that no increase in rates will be applied for. My own opinion is that it is almost inevitable that, as the company expands its business with this new capital, and serves more customers, an increase in rates will be asked for. The only protection we have is that any increase in rates will have to be approved by the board of transport commissioners. So that I am supporting this, in so far as it needs my support, with my eyes open in that respect.

I do not think this committee paid sufficient attention to what was said by the hon. member for Broadview. The telephone business on the North American continent is a huge monopoly. As the hon. member for Broadview said, the British Columbia Telephone Company is controlled entirely by the Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company. And it, in turn, is controlled by the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company of Wilmington, Delaware. In the last analysis, these are the people who will determine what will be done.

The Bell Telephone Company and the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company of Wilmington, Delaware, control, between them, the whole of the telephone business on the North American continent. The Bell Telephone Company controls in the United States and in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, while the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company controls in British Columbia, South America and Philippine islands. This, then, is no small business, and we should keep these things clearly in mind when we are dealing with this matter. However I am satisfied that the company needs the capital for which it is now asking; at least it needs some of it. Perhaps it will need it all in the next ten years.

I notice that the city council of Vancouver has examined the bill and, if it has not given its approval, at least it has offered no opposition. In regard to the matter of the application for increasing rates, it will be noticed that in the amending bill of 1941 section 6 (3) said:

> No application for increase of the rates shall be based on any increase of the issued stock of the company as authorized by the amending act of 1941, but this provision shall not apply to or limit the power of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada (or any successors to its powers), to fix just and reasonable rates upon application by the company for increased rates based on other grounds.

That section is deleted from the present bill.

The city of Vancouver, referring to that, said this:

> We have also considered the company's application to repeal subsection (3) of section 6 added to the company's charter in 1941. Having regard to modern principles of rate making, we think the section is of little importance either to the city or to the company. As, however, it was apparently added to the act with the intention of serving as a measure of protection to the company's subscribers, we make no recommendation on the application with respect to it.

And further on they say:

> Our recommendation is that the company be notified that the city has no objection to the amendment by which it seeks to increase its authorized capital from $11 million to $25 million, subject always to the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to the issue, sale or other disposition of such stock or any part thereof.

And, for myself, I say, "To the approval of the board of transport commissioners in the matter of rates." As I have said, I am not opposing the bill. I shall vote for it.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, April 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When this bill was last considered we had reached section 7.

On section 7—Line of railway described.

Mr. GILLIS: Like everyone else who has been talking about private bills this evening, it is not my intention to hold up this bill. Nevertheless that is the effect it has. The last time we discussed this bill I was one of those who were not satisfied with its going through without our being given an explanation of the wide and sweeping powers contained therein. I suggested at that time that I should like to have an assurance from the hon. member who is piloting the bill through the house that this is a Canadian company, that it is not a subsidiary of some company in the United States. I should like him to tell the committee the personnel of the board of directors, whether they are Canadians, whether they are tangled up with other interlocking companies in Canada and the United States.

Next, I should like either the hon. member or the Minister of Transport to tell the committee why it is necessary to set aside three sections of the Railway Act in order to set up this railway company.

Mr. RINFRET: The hon. member's first question was with reference to sweeping powers. There has been some talk about these sweeping powers, but I am afraid there has been some confusion between this company and the one which has obtained from some government concessions or leases in connection with natural resources in the northern part of Quebec and in Labrador. The company which has obtained concessions or leases from the provincial government is a distinct entity from this railway company.

The company which obtained the concessions and leases is the Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited, and I can assure the hon. member that that is practically a wholly owned Canadian company. A total of 9,768 shareholders residing in Canada hold 3,913,084 shares; 2,063 shareholders residing in the United States hold 495,470 shares; 39 shareholders residing in the United Kingdom hold 5,571 shares and 306 shareholders residing elsewhere hold 505,875 shares. The shareholders residing in Canada represent 80 per cent of the total shareholders and they hold 79·5 per cent of the 4,920,000 shares outstanding.

The directors of this company are Mr. Jules Timmins, Montreal; Mr. Leo Timmins, Montreal; Mr. Murdoch, Toronto; Mr. John I. Rankin, Montreal; Mr. Allen A. McMartin; Mr. N. A. Timmins, Montreal; Mr. D. N. Dunlap, Toronto; Mr. Alphonse Raymond, Montreal; Mr. T. Waite, Toronto. I think that answers the questions asked by the hon. member.

Mr. GILLIS: I asked why it was necessary to set aside three sections of the Railway Act in order to legalize this company.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: To what section is the hon. member referring?

Mr. GILLIS: To section 9.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are on section 7, but perhaps I could answer the hon. member's question. I shall not deal specifically with section 9, because reference is made to this in other sections as well. This is a bill to incorporate a railway company to construct a railroad from a point on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river to a point in northern Quebec and it must be subject to the terms of the Railway Act. The operations of this railway must be subject to the jurisdiction of some board, which in this case happens to be the board of transport commissioners. Section 368 of the Railway Act provides that a company seeking the powers set out in section 11 of this bill, namely, to generate, acquire, use, transmit and distribute electrical energy, must submit itself to the jurisdiction and procedure of the board of transport commissioners. Section 368 of the Railway Act is rather lengthy and I should not like to read it but it makes tolls, rates and charges subject to the jurisdiction of the board. I have dealt with only one part of the question asked by the hon. member and, before dealing with the others, perhaps I should wait until we reach the particular section.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am wholeheartedly in favour of this bill, for the simple reason that these people—I do not care whether they come from the United States; that would make no difference to me—are going to spend millions of dollars in this country to provide employment. All they are asking from this House of Commons is the right to build a railway; any lands and so forth that are involved belong to the province of Quebec. As far as this house is concerned, we can do one of two things; we can talk this bill out or vote against it, but in doing so let us all remember that we have been talking about full employment and if we talk this bill out we shall be killing the very thing of which we have said we are in favour.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to make a few remarks on this bill and I do not want to kill it.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not kill it with kindness.

Mr. IRVINE: I agree in part with the statement just made by the hon. member for Calgary West that we need railways and development and, if we cannot do it in any other way than by creating a monster profit corporation, it is better to do it in that way than not at all. To that extent I agree with him wholeheartedly, but I want to take this opportunity to say that from my point of view I think it is a regrettable way of doing it. There is a decided connection in my mind between the existence of iron ore in the territory and the building of this railroad. If there is anything Canada needs more for its industries than iron ore, I do not know what it is.

An hon. MEMBER: Then let us develop it.

Mr. IRVINE: Exactly, and I think this is a case where the federal government should have set aside these resources for the good of Canada and seen to it that this ore was brought to Canadian industry for the service of the people of Canada.

Let me say next that, while this government and the opposition champion—

Mr. RINFRET: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to point out that the resources to which he is referring are a matter of provincial rights on the one hand and the rights of Labrador on the other.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand that there are provincial rights and other rights in Labrador, but the federal government has the right to set apart whatever it considers is for the general benefit of Canada. It could have done that and I believe it should have done that.

Mr. MITCHELL: You cannot set apart something that does not belong to you.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend can argue that out with the Minister of Justice, and I think he will find that the point of view I have expressed is correct. At any rate let me go on to say that I am not presuming to criticize the government of Quebec for the action it has taken. That action is perfectly in keeping with what other governments throughout Canada have done throughout the whole history of Canada in granting licences to these companies. I think within the years to come there will be ample reason for objecting to what is now being done in this house, and I wish to present my views just as other hon. members do.

Free private enterprise in which some hon. members believe so ardently seems to be completely wiped out in this gigantic project. Take, for example, the Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited with two subsidiaries, the North Shore and the Labrador Company. Let us look at the privileges they get. Hollinger Consolidated, North Shore branch, has the exclusive right—

Mr. RINFRET: May I again interrupt to say that they are not getting those privileges by this bill or from this government. They have been given them by another government.

Mr. IRVINE: I appreciate that. I am merely showing that there is a connection between what has been done by another government and what this government is about to do. Without the one the other is useless. It is all very well to talk here of a fait accompli and say you have to go on with it. I do not have to; my hon. friend may have to. I have a right to my objection and to my vote against this bill. I have a viewpoint and I am going to express it. I am not claiming any privilege that every other hon. member does not have. I want to show the privileges which have been granted to this company in the name of free private enterprise.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to deal specifically with clause 7.

Mr. IRVINE: Clause 7 deals with the railway concerned.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Clause 7 does not deal with what has been done in the past.

Mr. IRVINE: No, but without what has been done in the past clause 7 has no meaning. If the Chairman rules me out of order I cannot do more, but I think I am in order in saying that there is a connection between this railway and the vast resources, exclusive rights to which have been given to certain private corporations. I want to show what those rights are.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member kindly to discuss this clause and not deal with the past at all.

Mr. IRVINE: Clause 7 reads:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway starting at a point on the St. Lawrence river, somewhere between the Rivière Marguerite and Rivière Moisie, in the province of Quebec; thence in a northerly direction following the valley of the Rivière Moisie or the valleys of the Rivière Moisie—

Hon members will excuse my French.

Mr. GRAYDON: You will soon get your second wind.

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend suggests that I am talking out the bill I will sit down at once.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall be glad to make that suggestion if you will sit down.

Mr. IRVINE: I know my hon. friend is very anxious to assist free enterprise, but this is private monopoly and that is why I do not like it.

Section stands.

IMMIGRATION ACT

REPEAL OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT—BONDING OF PERSONS IN TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just finished putting on the record some figures relating to our Chinese population. It will take me only a few moments to conclude what I have to say on this bill.

The Chinese people feel hurt at the treatment they have received. They are glad that the Chinese exclusion bill is to be repealed, but as our allies in the war they are hurt at the lack of recognition of China on equal terms with ourselves as a nation. It is not the numbers of their nationality admitted about which they are concerned but about their lack of recognition as an equal. I am sure that any mutual arrangement between China and Canada in this regard will be quite satisfactory to them, and I hope that negotiations will be entered into between the two nations which will lead to a complete understanding. The principle, which is what they are concerned with, will then be recognized, of their treatment as an equal.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): The bill under discussion embodies in itself a problem which has interested me for a certain number of years, and I should not like to see it receive second reading before taking my stand once more on this very dangerous question of immigration.

Of course I do not want to discriminate against any race. In his statement the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 2644 of Hansard:

The policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that orientals are not easily assimilable. Even if I do not discriminate against them I have to admit the fact. I hold in my hand a clipping from a Quebec newspaper which I shall read in French because my ability does not go so far as to translate it. It is from L'Action Catholique, January 27, 1947, and deals with Chinese immigration.

(Translation):

The Chinese living in Canada demand the amendment of the present immigration act. They want their fellow countrymen in China to be allowed to come to Canada with their wives.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Our newspaper has often protested against the immoral aspect of an immigration act prohibiting wives from accompanying their husbands. For many years, Chinamen could enter Canada but Chinese women were excluded. Such a regulation is immoral in itself and conduces to countless immoralities. We need not labour the point.

We therefore hope that the Canadian government will adopt a reasonable and fair immigration policy. There is no reason why British subjects alone should be allowed to come to our country.

I agree with this last statement.

There is no reason why women should be excluded where other races are concerned. It is contrary to moral law and the principles of the Atlantic charter and the united nations organization.

This article is signed by Louis-Philippe Roy.

(Text):

Surely I am permitted Mr. Speaker, to speak generally on immigration as a whole and discuss the principle of immigration on second reading of the bill. We should first make a very careful survey of the amount of farm acreage we have to see how many acres are left untilled at the present time in order to see how many farmers we can establish on land ready for them and, second, of districts where there is a possibility for newcomers to make a decent living and not be on the shoulders of the various governments of the country.

In some parts of Canada the natural growth of the population is sufficient to take care of the unoccupied areas. Take my own province. I think the natural growth of population is sufficient there for that purpose. In the statement of the Prime Minister, I read these words as reported at page 2644 of Hansard:

The government will seek by legislation, regulation, and vigorous administration, to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can advantageously be absorbed in our national economy.

I hope this selection will be very carefully carried out. This is a point that has to be most carefully observed. Being a free country, we have the privilege of selecting our own citizens. I believe that every Canadian should be most concerned about the selection of immigrants. What I fear most is the bringing in of people who would be a danger to our institutions. We have suffered too much in the past and recently by the coming here of people who are a burden and a danger and who are proving to be ready, on account of their allegiance to other countries, to put our country in the hands of nations advocating an ideology which, to say the least, is harmful and destructive of our democracy. We cannot afford, the present world situation being what it is, to renew that experience too often.

The Prime Minister's statement continues:

Like other major problems of today, the problem of immigration must be viewed in the light of the world situation as a whole. A wise and productive policy for Canada cannot be devised by studying only the situation within our own country.

The Prime Minister was right when he made that statement, and I believe he had this in mind. We have to examine carefully the background of every immigrant, however well recommended they are, and however strongly supported they may be by anyone or any organization dealing with immigrants. I do not know if such an organization still exists, but we have had them in the past. We shall probably see the old ones coming out again or new ones being formed. I know they are not sponsored, supported or encouraged by the government; but the government must not be too lenient; it must keep a close and careful watch on people who would feel like commercializing immigration. This has happened in the past. Anyone who has read the Hornby report knows that Colonel Hornby advocates subsidies to railway companies or navigation companies and subsidies to organizations dealing with immigration. I do not want to have any part in that.

If the government wishes to increase the population in order that the economic burden may be placed on more shoulders, it has to think of the social, political, and ideological future of this country. Since the coming of Cartier, we have been constructing and we do not want any pathological agent of any kind to dismantle the structure so patiently erected.

There are refugees; there are homeless people. Everyone knows that Canada has already done her share. She is ready to help some more, but let us do so intelligently and constructively. This is what I am trying to do in my remarks. In the statement of the Prime Minister we read this, as reported at page 2644 of Hansard:

Up until the end of the war—under order in council P.C. 695 of March 21, 1931—four broad categories of persons were admissible to Canada. These were:

1. British subjects from the United Kingdom, Ireland, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Australia, or the Union of South Africa—

And so forth:

2. United States citizens, similarly possessed of means of maintenance.

3. Wives, unmarried children under 18, or fiancees of men resident in Canada.

4. Agriculturists with sufficient means to farm in Canada.

I think point No. 4 should be the first to be considered. If, after a careful survey of all our farm acreage, we find that we can absorb farmers to add to the natural growth of the population, which is fair enough in some districts, I do not need to name them; it is well, but not before being sure of it. Why take the risk of increasing the population of the cities? There may come a period when the breadlines will be created again and the country will have too many to take care of. One has to foresee that eventuality, and I am glad to see in the declaration this:

During the 1930's due to the adverse economic conditions of the period, these provisions were necessarily interpreted in a restrictive manner.

It is the duty of a good government to foresee the possible return of bad conditions, not necessarily coming out of the internal situation, but due to the intimate connection of the different countries of the world on the economic ground. I read again:

The government has also extended admissibility to persons who are suitable for employment in the primary industries. As hon. members are aware, Canada's primary industries are experiencing an acute shortage of man-power.

Much has been said lately about the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) and about the Department of Immigration granting him permission to bring from Europe Ukrainian girls to work in his industry. Special conditions prevailing there, I do not see any scandal in that fact. The hon. member for Beauce and all the former members for Beauce whom I knew, are too good Canadians to discriminate against their own constituents and their own population. I read in the statement these following lines:

Canada is not obliged, as a result of membership in the united nations or under the constitution of the international refugee organization, to accept any specific number of refugees or displaced persons. We have, nevertheless, a moral obligation to assist in meeting the problem and this obligation we are prepared to recognize.

I have here an article from L'Action Catholique of Quebec, setting out a declaration of the Archbishop of Montreal, Monseigneur Charbonneau, speaking on immigration, tolerance and education:

(Translation):

His Excellency Archbishop Joseph Charbonneau, guest of honour of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce yesterday, at the Windsor hotel, spoke in favour of a policy of selected immigration which would enable thousands of wretched and homeless Europeans living under woeful conditions to associate themselves with us and thus "cause our ancestral heritage to fructify, without threatening our traditions and institutions." The Archbishop of Montreal, continues the article, in expressing those views, was recalling an opinion stated by His Holiness Pope Pius XII in a recent address in which he pointed to America as a country of boundless space and inexhaustible resources, and thus in a position to shelter many of those unfortunate people of Europe.

(Text):

I continue quoting from the statement of the Prime Minister:

With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination.

This last quotation is extremely important.

I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a "fundamental human right" of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege.

Let this privilege, Mr. Speaker, be granted to future good citizens only, and it is not discrimination against anyone but an undesirable citizen. This democracy wants to live. Let us not inoculate her with germs of death. As for mass immigration, I am absolutely opposed to it; I always was and I always will be.

In a conference speech delivered over CHRC in Quebec a month ago, I put my position very clearly. Since I have not the necessary ability to translate it as it reads, I will read excerpts from it in French. I know that for those interested in this national problem it will be easy to have the translation in Hansard.

(Translation):

In that lecture I made the following statement: There is one kind of immigration which is inevitable; there is one which, to a certain extent, is acceptable. There is still another which a government solicitous about the good administration, the welfare and the peace of the country they govern cannot accept and indeed must oppose, and that is the mass immigration advocated by some people interested in the setting up of powerful associations whose purpose is to promote extensive migrations.

The immigration that is inevitable is the moving of persons from one country to another; it involves people whose financial resources are considerable enough to entail a loss for the countries they leave and ensure a gain for those where they take up residence. That inevitable immigration also includes experts in all fields of science, whose talents are recognized throughout the world and whose services are often sought by universities which are anxious to benefit from their learning as well as from their outstanding reputation. It also includes bona fide settlers whose love for agriculture impels them to look for other more fertile lands, and who, to support their families, need a larger area of tillable land. Such immigrants leave their countries in order to improve their lot and because of their resourcefulness and industry they are a distinct asset to their new country.

Further, economic conditions are frequently the cause of greater migrations during difficult periods, thus favouring certain countries at the expense of others. Several years ago, we ourselves experienced a great migration of our compatriots from the province of Quebec to the New England states, where they now form an influential group; that was a distinct loss to Canada. Is it not true that in all countries and among all races, people very often feel the urge to travel from one place to another, in order to improve their lot, to seek larger fields of endeavour, or, as noted among certain tribes, to satisfy their thirst for adventure.

I spoke at the beginning of desirable immigrants. I mean by that people of sound mind, of excellent physical condition and possessed of sufficient means to be regarded as desirable in any country. Further, economic and political circumstances must play an important part in the selection of immigrants. I remember that, in 1937, a reporter of L'Evénement interviewed Canon Philippe Casgrain, chaplain of the Immigration Branch.

Because of prevailing conditions, therefore, Canon Casgrain had come to the conclusion that no one living in England or some other part of the British empire had anything to gain by settling in this country. After referring to the failure of the Hornby plan, submitted to the British House of Commons, the eminent cleric felt that England was too badly in need of her young people to allow their removal to Canada.

And on the basis of news brought us by various periodicals, we can readily realize that an act to promote British emigration would hardly be effective at this time, because British labour must have reinforcements for the completion of the established programme, the "planning" popularly so-called, of the new socialist government now in power.

England was then busy on its large-scale armaments programme.

Today, she is carrying out a sorely needed economic programme.

Furthermore, because of the terrible droughts which they had suffered in previous years, the western provinces were unable to absorb new immigrants, in spite of the vast areas of land which they could offer to a much greater population than they then had—

Well controlled and screened immigration may prove beneficial to the newcomers themselves and to the country in which they settle, inasmuch as they are desirable and their services are required. But, on the contrary, if the country is not even in a position to offer work to its own people—

Such was the case during the unemployment period which lasted from 1930 to 1935.

—it is obvious that the increase in population resulting from immigration would in no way provide for better social and economic conditions. It would only make things worse.

Canon Casgrain, it must be remembered, spoke at a time when unemployment was rampant in Canada.

(Text):

I am through for tonight, Mr. Speaker, but I am going to watch very carefully how this new policy is put into force. This problem has always interested me deeply, and I am going to watch the Minister of Mines and Resources very carefully and closely. I repeat that I am against mass immigration. I think we can accept good, selected immigrants, but only in the proportion that our land can absorb them. It is no use having immigrants come to our cities. In my own province the proportion of population in the cities and rural districts has changed until now the larger proportion is in the cities. I think we should follow the policy set out in paragraph No. 4 of the Prime Minister's statement, and first bring in farmers and settlers, rather than workers whom we do not need in our cities. I know there are special cases, but I speak of matters in general. I have confidence in the minister and the government, and I hope they will not leave the door ajar, as an hon. member said last year in speaking on this subject. Let us not have any mass immigration; let us have selected immigrants, and for God's sake let us realize that in order to be democratic it is not necessary to call to Canada all these people from Europe and Asia. To be democratic we must save our own democracy first, and think as Canadians before everything.

Mr. JULIAN H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): As a member of the federal parliament I shall endeavour to speak of immigration as it affects the Dominion of Canada in its entirety, not only the province of Ontario from which I come. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) dealt briefly with the subject of immigration. The war has been over for approximately two years, and the people of Canada are wondering what is to be done in regard to this vital matter. In my opinion it is one of the most vital questions with which we should be concerned at the present time. We lack information and the people require it in order that we may reap the benefits to which this country is entitled because of its natural resources and fertile fields from coast to coast. During the years from 1900 to 1907, when the Liberal party really functioned as such, I give them a great deal of credit for the immigration policy they put in force, under which people were brought from Europe to the western provinces. Today the sons and grandsons of those people are a credit to this country. Some of their sons sit in this House of Commons, and that just shows what happens when you bring the right type of people to this country.

During the last few days we have heard a great deal about the Chinese and the Japanese, about our obligations to these people and to the Poles. Today I understood the minister to state that this country had made no financial contribution toward the cost of bringing these Polish soldiers to this country. That may be so, but that was not the answer given a question asked in this house on March 27. The question was:

What has been the total cost of bringing Polish immigrants into Canada since January, 1946, including transportation, food, clothing, medicines and hospitalization . . .

How much of this expenditure has been borne by Canada?

The answer by the labour department to the question of how much of this expenditure has been borne by Canada was:

Approximately $121 per man borne by British government and $90 per man by the dominion of Canada.

Possibly the minister does not know what the labour department is doing in regard to immigration, but if they are that far apart I think they should get their heads together. Now let me read into the record a question asked on February 17 by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black):

What was the total transportation cost and by whom was it paid? How many Poles were permitted to enter Canada in 1946?

The answer by the Minister of Labour was:

Transportation from Halifax to central distribution centres in each province—approximately $125,000, paid by the federal Department of Labour.

During the war we saw many newspaper accounts about the bravery of the people of the British isles, England, Ireland and Scotland. If any subsidy is to be paid in order to bring immigrants of the right type to this country, I believe Canada could well afford to consider first those heroes from the British isles, their wives and their children. I have the utmost regard for what the Polish soldiers did for us; I also remember what some of them did against us. I hear hon. members speak about bringing displaced persons from Poland and parts of Russia, but as I think back I recall that many of those who took part in acts of espionage against this country were of Russian origin. So I agree with the previous speaker that we cannot be too careful in dealing with this question. But if we are badly in need of immigrants, why not go to other parts of the world from which we know came the forefathers of many people in this country today, men who laid and carried out plans of which we are all proud? I could mention France, England, Germany. In the first war I fought against the Germans for four and a half years, and I am sure they fought as willingly for their country as I did for mine; but I must say that the German immigrants who came to this country prior to the first war were a credit to Canada, as were their children. And their children and grandchildren died for this country in the last war. I do not think it is sufficient for the Prime Minister to say:

> . . . the government has kept in active touch with shipping authorities and transportation companies in the United Kingdom to see what may be possible in the way of special shipping services. As to what may prove feasible, I am unable to make a report at this time.

I do not think it is enough to say that, after two years, the Prime Minister and the immigration branch cannot give this house a report on their findings in regard to shipping facilities. We need men badly in Canada. Some people seem to have the idea that the Englishman, the Scotsman and the Irishman cannot use an axe or cannot farm. Some years ago I had the good fortune to work back in the bush, up in the Hudson bay area. My brother and I at that time were the only two Canadians there, the rest of them being English, Irish and Scotch, who had never even seen a bush of that magnitude, and certainly had never had an axe in their hands prior to joining our party. But in the course of three weeks those men were able to cut bush with anyone. Do not think that because a man comes from London, England, he cannot learn how to use an axe, or cannot become acclimatized.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Nobody said that.

Mr. FERGUSON: I did not hear that.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Nobody said you cannot use an axe if you came from England.

Mr. FERGUSON: I have heard other people say it, and if my hon. friend wishes to take the nom de plume of a nobody, when he speaks about some people in Canada, that is his privilege. I heard many people in Canada say it, and I repeat it.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): You said it before; I never said it.

Mr. FERGUSON: I believe we cannot allow this question of immigration to go along as it has been going. Our lumber companies, our paper companies, need men in the bush; and the right kind of immigrants, the right kind of persons coming to Canada, will not take necessary work from Canadians. It will not affect our returned soldier settlers.

We plastered this country from coast to coast with big signs reading "Welcome Home", when the soldiers were coming back. Now, did those signs mean that our Canadian soldiers who were returning were to remain in their home towns for a few days, and then go a thousand miles to Manitoba or two thousand to British Columbia to work in the bush? I say, no. Those men should be able to obtain employment in communities to which they were welcomed when they came home. This country can obtain immigrants who are willing and capable to go into our forests, into our mines and on our farms to produce the raw materials with which our soldiers can work in our factories and cities. And they are entitled to that privilege.

I am not an advocate of chasing the returned men out to the wilderness, when they have previously lived in towns, and calling them a bad lot because they do not take the first job offered to them a thousand miles from their own homes.

I personally severely censure the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) because, thus far, his statement has had no weight in it. There has been no substance in it, and it has given no encouragement and no enlightenment to the people of Canada on a most vital and important question. I understand from the press that Australia has endeavoured to and has succeeded in obtaining boats to transport British immigrants to Australia. Here we have a country of 12,000,000 people, closer geographically to England and the British isles than Australia is. Yet, according to the press, in order to obtain the type and calibre of immigrants we need, our immigration branch has failed to do this.

I believe we should encourage immigration from the United States. I have travelled through that country to some considerable extent, and I know that the eyes of many United States youths are focused on Canada and on the great possibilities in this country. If immigration were encouraged, and those great possibilities were pointed out to the youth of the United States, they would come here, instead of our having the younger generation of this country leaving Canada at the rate of 20,000 a year. There is no rhyme or reason for it. There is no encouragement regarding immigration, and the great achievements which can be accomplished by the right kind of effort have not been pointed out by the government, and particularly by the immigration branch.

Mr. GLEN: Would the hon. member give some evidence on this point? He spoke about the transportation Australia had furnished for immigrants. Has he any evidence of it? Can he supply the house with evidence of it?

Mr. FERGUSON: I shall be delighted to look up the newspaper; possibly you missed it. It was published in several papers.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether I should add anything now, but I want to say this to my hon. friend, that I do not think anybody, including himself and myself and the government—

An hon. MEMBER: All right.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have some feeling in this matter. I know as regards my hon. friend and hon. members of the official opposition, or any other party in the house, none of them would place anything in the way of immigration from the British isles to Canada. Let us clearly understand that. But at this particular moment immigration from those British isles to Canada is as free as to any country in the world, including Australia and New Zealand. Let us be fair about it. My hon. friend talks about 50,000 people going to Australia, or 70,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: Who is making the speech?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am.

Mr. TUSTIN: Why should you; the other hon. member has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL: But he sat down.

Mr. FERGUSON: I did not mention 50,000 or 70,000 people going to Australia. Do not put words into my mouth.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us read the record. It is a target, you understand.

Mr. FERGUSON: What do you mean by a "target"?

Mr. MITCHELL: I mean that 50,000 or 70,000 is a target; I do not mean my hon. friend is a target.

Mr. FERGUSON: I did not mention 50,000 at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that we are on second reading of the bill, and that no member has the right to speak twice.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the floor. I want to repeat that immigration, or emigration to Canada—

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, is the minister asking the previous speaker a question, or is he—

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is making a speech on second reading.

Mr. MARTIN: Members of the government have a right to speak.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then, if the minister is making a speech, may I point out that he has already spoken in the debate on second reading. His speech is reported at page 325 of Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, I was answering a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, he was answering a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I must call his attention to the fact that the privileges of the house apply to both sides, and that he can speak only once on second reading. Of course he has the privilege to put a question to the hon. member.

Mr. MARTIN: He is answering a question.

Mr. ADAMSON: On a point of order, I understood that the Minister of Mines and Resources put a question to the hon. member for Simcoe North, and that the hon. member yielded the floor so that the question could be asked. But he yielded only for the question. He had not concluded his remarks, and therefore he still has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that I think he is the most expensive luxury in this house. I understand that the cost of debates is $60 a minute. He has taken up his share of time.

Mr. KNOWLES: If that is the minister's answer to the point of order I raised, it is an admission that he was wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is another $50.

Mr. MITCHELL: He could be a little charitable when I am answering a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the minister should wait until we get into committee of the whole.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on this subject. First, I wish to commend the government upon the steps already taken to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act. Inadequate as this now appears to be, it is at least a step in the right direction. Because of that, I commend the government upon the action taken. The repeal of this act is a forward movement to eliminate, in part, racial discrimination exercised in the past against this group of Asiatic people. However it appears that much has yet to be done to remove all discriminatory tendencies in the administration of our immigration laws. May I refer at this time to a statement made by a prominent churchman, Very Reverend Doctor Peter Bryce, who stated in a recent speech:

> Race prejudice must go. Colour discrimination must be put aside. The Christian ethic is everlastingly true and not only true but indispensable.

Another statement has been issued by the Ottawa diocesan synod of the Church of England, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of May 1, and I quote, in part:

> This synod opposes any advantage being given to immigrants of any racial or religious group.

There should not be any preferred races if Canada is to escape the charge of having discriminatory legislation. One race cannot be accepted as superior to another. Indeed there is no superior race. Canadian boys laid down their lives to defeat militarism promoted by a race which rated itself as supermen. Those people believed themselves fitted by their racial characteristics to rule the world. Let us have done with superior races and preferred nations. A continuance of such a policy gives rise only to hatreds and contributes to war psychology.

The world is faced with the problem of finding homes for refugees created as a result of militarism and anti-race prejudice run wild. The world has been saved from aggression and totalitarianism, but in the wake of that great world struggle to free the world from these influences there has been created much distress. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) say in his statement yesterday to the House of Commons that, while Canada is not obligated as a result of membership in the united nations or under the constitution of the international refugee organization to accept any specified number of refugees or displaced persons, we admitted a moral obligation. We in this group are pleased that that admission of moral obligation was made. Undoubtedly Canada has that moral obligation.

But we must go farther than just to admit a moral obligation. The Prime Minister added to his first statement by saying that machinery is to be set up to move some thousands of refugees to Canada. I shall look forward with interest to the number that are admitted. I hope that not too many barriers will be placed against the qualification of these refugees for entry into Canada, and it is to be hoped that other limitations will not be used as an excuse for not bringing these folk to our shores. In this connection, may I refer again to the remarks made yesterday by the Prime Minister, as reported on page 2645 of Hansard. He said:

> The resettlement of refugees and displaced persons constitutes a special problem. In the intergovernmental committee on refugees, and in the discussions in the united nations leading to the establishment of the international refugee organization, Canada has taken an active part. In this connection, the government has taken measures respecting the admission of refugees and displaced persons, and also of Polish ex-soldiers. These measures, though not of wide scope, are practical steps within the present physical limitations imposed by transportation.

With regard to transportation I have heard several people say that the lack of shipping has been the chief reason why displaced persons have not been moved to Canada. May I ask the minister at this stage if representations have been made at any time by the British government with regard to relieving the situation of displaced persons in camps in British occupied Germany? Many fine people from the Baltic states are to be found in the British zone. While those people are of German ethnic origin, they have never been our enemies. Britain has already taken some 250,000 refugees but she is not in position to accept a great many more. I am sure that if Canada would agree to admit some of these Baltic people Great Britain would provide the shipping accommodation. Would the minister make a note of my question so that it can be answered at the conclusion of my remarks?

The situation facing these refugees is tragic and their condition is grave, so much so as to demand speedy action on the part of the Canadian government. Tens of thousands of these hopeless people are roaming the streets and highways of Germany, Austria and Italy. Day by day these people are becoming mentally sicker and sicker, believing that no country or people want them. Many thousands are dying of malnutrition and disease. The condition of these people is such that anything which is to be done for them must be done with dispatch.

I believe that if Canadians were acquainted with the terrible conditions which these people face there would be a growing demand from all sections of the country that something be done on their behalf immediately. During the last war Canada poured out blood and treasure to establish freedom throughout the world, freedom not only for ourselves but for every people, regardless of race, colour or creed. If we are to have that freedom for all people which the united nations charter has set up as a right, some effort must be made to provide economic freedom for people as well as political freedom. There is very little hope of obtaining economic freedom for the displaced people in Europe.

Wars bring many after problems, not the least of which is a pressing refugee problem which appears most serious in many parts of Europe. The united nations are faced with the task of locating homes for these people who are the heirs of a militant fascism run wild. There are many folk in the areas laid waste by the invaders who face a hopeless future, a future in which there is little or no opportunity for them to earn a decent living. While some of these people may have political freedom, many are denied even a measure of economic liberty which all of us desire. This in large part nullifies the effect of any political liberty that they may have gained.

Canada as a responsible member of the united nations has a moral obligation to these helpless refugees. With our ample stores of natural resources and a territory largely unpeopled, Canada should be in a better position than most nations to accommodate large numbers of the world's homeless. Many of these people have knowledge and skills which Canada needs. Refugees admitted to Wales in the United Kingdom have been responsible for setting up sixty types of new industries. I have a clipping taken from the Christian Science Monitor, bearing the date line Cardiff, Wales, October 9, which reads:

> History is repeating itself here.
> More than a thousand years ago, the surrounding valleys began to rise to prosperity as a direct result of the welcome they gave foreign craftsmen—the Danes and the Saxons.
> Now a major part in rebuilding the shattered economy of industrial South Wales is once again being played by foreign firms, the greater part of them refugees from Europe.
> Like the Huguenots who found refuge in Britain from religious persecution in the 16th century and repaid a hundredfold by the establishment of the British silk industry, most of these firms which sought shelter from Hitler-dominated Europe now are repaying Wales for the welcome they received by establishing light industries completely new to this area.

Industries of a special character involving the manufacture of finer chinaware, jewellery, fine textiles and plastics now employ thousands of Britishers because of the establishment of these manufactures by refugees. A few have even made a contribution to Canada's economic progress by setting up industries here. Refugees of this type can aid in Canada's development. They will not contribute to our unemployment problem but rather will help to solve it. All too few of them have been admitted. Their numbers could be substantially augmented.

I may add that western Canada should be glad to welcome people with such knowledge and techniques in order to establish a balance between industry and agriculture, which is so much desired on the plains. There is on the western prairies an abundance of raw materials, a large consumer market, and quantities of cheap power in the form of coal, oil and natural gas, which should be an inducement to the establishing of industries on the western plains.

The refugee problem is a challenge to our humanity and hospitality. It is real and it is urgent. Many of these people are desirous of entering our gates as the applications for entry on files in the immigration branch can attest. It is an immediate problem which should be dealt with separately and not in any way confused with the immigration question as a whole.

These people need succour. Our humanity should dictate the course to follow and selfish interests should not prevail.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, representing a riding that sent many battalions and regiments and many, many thousands of soldiers overseas to fight in the last world war as well as in the first, it is not much wonder that I have been receiving communications approving particularly of section 3(4)(b) whereby the wives or widows and children of soldiers will now be able to come into Canada. Many of these soldiers left wives or widows and children overseas, and I am very glad, therefore, that the minister has seen fit to write into the bill this clause permitting of their entry into Canada. These soldiers were not all of Anglo-Saxon stock, although I am safe in saying that perhaps ninety per cent of them were of Anglo-Saxon stock. Davenport is a riding that gives a good cross-section, Your Honour, of every race, and I am proud of all the different races I have the honour to represent. Many of my constituents are Jews and I am glad to pay a tribute to the Jews in my riding. They are a great business people, aside from other worthy characteristics. Many streets in Davenport riding have been built up by the Jewish merchants of Toronto, and to them and to their people I can say that I am happy indeed that they are there.

Many of these people have approached me to see if anything can be done to have admitted into Canada the last remaining member of their family in Europe. I have in mind one family that lived in Germany and consisted of thirty-six people altogether, grandfather, grandmother, brothers, sisters, uncles and children, and today just one is left out of the whole thirty-six, which means that the other thirty-five were killed in the war. They have been begging me to do what I can to have the last remaining member of the family admitted to Canada. Whether the bill permits that, I do not know, but I know the bigness of the heart of the minister and if the bill does not permit it, I trust that he will have some regulation made whereby the last remaining member of the Jewish family I have in mind—and the Jews suffered more than any other people on the continent during the war —will be permitted to come to Canada.

I have many Ukrainians in my riding, and having been in big business for many years, in the iron and steel business, I know that many Ukrainians were employed in that industry and did splendid work there. I am glad to have Ukrainians in my riding, not only because of their ability to work in industry, but because I know from my travels that there are perhaps no better farmers than the Ukrainians. I have seen them in every part of the west in which I have been and I can speak highly of that race too.

I have a number of French Canadian families in my riding, and I must tell my French Canadian compatriots that, though living in Toronto, they are just as loyal to Quebec and its traditions as if they were living in Quebec. I am happy to inform my French Canadian compatriots in the house that these French Canadian families in my riding do not carry on politics there because they all vote for me. I have been in some of their homes and I have found them thrifty people, keeping their homes in fine shape. The men are excellent workmen. They read the English papers and I send them the French papers too, so that they can keep abreast of happenings in Quebec.

I have quite a large number of Poles in my riding. In my time there were perhaps 250 or 300 Poles working in the large industry in which I was engaged. They are wonderful iron moulders. They take naturally to the iron industry, and as the bill introduced by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) was under discussion tonight looking to the development of the iron mines in Labrador and northern Quebec, I thought to myself that, if that iron industry ever gets going, what a fine place that would be for our Polish citizens to serve and do a fine job. They are great industrial workers, but that is only one characteristic; they have great aptitudes in the arts and sciences, and I find them in high positions everywhere.

I have in mind a Ukrainian family. They are the grandchildren of the pioneer himself, a Ukrainian who could not speak a word of English when he came here. He brought his wife with him, of course, and raised a family here. One of the sons of that father has six children, of whom three are male and three are female. Three male members of the family of this pioneer, once removed from the grandfather pioneer, are highly educated men. Two of them are big engineers; the other is a doctor. The three girls have all graduated in arts from the university. Two of them are teaching school. One of them is a teacher in one of the big collegiates. Who in the world can complain of admitting people like that? These are excellent citizens. They help to build up a country. I love all races. I have not a feeling in my heart against any race. We are all God's creatures. We are just what we were born. We had nothing to do with our ancestors. I am happy to find all races doing well in Davenport riding.

I mentioned the Poles. In that regard I wish to say that some days ago I read in the papers an article that I just did not understand. It alleged that the hon. member for Broadview said something in the house about the Poles. I did not hear it myself. It seemed to be not too pleasant toward the Polish people. I can say this about the hon. member for Broadview, that no other race in the country has any more consistent defender than the hon. member has been of the Poles. The hon. member for Broadview would not intentionally say an unkind word about any race. I have known him for years, and particularly during the long years when he was mayor and controller in Toronto. I always thought he was the choice par excellence of all races. I am under the impression that what was in the paper must have been a misunderstanding of what the hon. member for Broadview said. He would not say anything about any race that was not in their favour.

In my riding I also have Italians. I can speak of them in the highest terms. The Italians in the Davenport riding are contractors and are doing good jobs. They are thrifty and are getting along as we would want to see them get along. They take part in different activities, and in my contact with them I find they are as reputable citizens as one will find anywhere.

Then I have quite a number of Czechs in my riding. An hon. member spoke about the Czechs a few moments ago. Like the Germans they have the ability to invent and produce. In the Davenport riding there are quite a number of German and Czech families. Their inventions, their productions and their interest in industry are commendable. We are glad to have them here.

Hon. members will be surprised to learn that I have a few Japs in my riding. I am not one of those who despise the Jap, not by any means. The Japs with whom I have come in contact may not be the same kind of Japs that I have heard some hon. members speak about. All I can say is that the Japs in Davenport riding have given a good account of themselves. Those around them seem to consider them excellent citizens.

I have a number of Chinese in my riding. Earlier in the evening someone mentioned the Chinese. I doubt whether there is any race in the world that is more patient than the Chinese. Their patience is amazing. They are called the patient Chinese. They, too, have taken a good part in industry in Toronto, apart from laundries and things of that kind. They have big business establishments, and so long as they devote their time to building up the country they deserve consideration.

Then we have quite a number of coloured families who have come from the southern states. I suppose most of them are employed on the railways. I do not know what we would do without our coloured families; I do not know how we would get along if they did not do the jobs they do. Therefore Davenport riding is a cross-section of all races.

As I said at the beginning, I am going to close with this. The predominant part of my riding, not less than ninety to ninety-five per cent, is Anglo-Saxon. As I said a few moments ago, they sent many brigades and many regiments and many, many thousands of soldiers overseas by voluntary enlistment to defend the empire. Naturally I am just as proud as I can be; I could not be more proud, of the Anglo-Saxon population of Davenport riding. During the late war and in all the activities of the city, in business, in learning, in the arts and sciences they stand high. I shall conclude with this: None of us can afford to discount any race. In the world's history they have all been to the top. In the days of Caesar, the Italians were on top. Later on, the Poles were on top of the world. Even the Turks were on top of the world at one time. In the days of Napoleon the French swept Europe. Therefore they have all demonstrated that they have the characteristics to make real people, to make a real nation. And, sir, if they do their part here in Canada I for one will be glad to have them come here.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a statement yesterday on the government's immigration policy which falls, as he pointed out, into two parts: first, a long-range immigration policy, and second, immediate measures to permit entry to Canada of displaced persons and refugees. With the government's long-range policy I am in entire agreement, and I wish to commend the Prime Minister and the government on that policy, even though the announcement may have little practical value and may mean little for some time to come. Nevertheless the Prime Minister's statement in this connection makes Canada's position clear, and I am sure that the policy he announced will meet with the general approval of the Canadian people.

In dealing with the long-range immigration policy, the Prime Minister made what I consider to be eight important points, and I may add that I agree with every one of them. These were the eight points:

1. That the government was in favour of allowing a substantial number of immigrants to enter Canada.

2. That an increase in population would not lead to the lowering of our standard of living, but that the opposite would be true.

3. That a larger population would provide a larger market for our primary products and would reduce in some measure our dependence on export of our primary products.

4. That a large population would contribute substantially to the development of our natural resources.

5. That Canada should receive immigrants on the basis of our economic absorptive capacity.

6. That the people of Canada would not favour a fundamental alteration in the character of our population.

7. That Canada should reserve to herself the right to control the entry or non-entry of persons seeking to become Canadian citizens, regardless of the charge of discrimination.

8. And this point or consideration is the most important in my view, that Canada "cannot ignore the danger that lies in a small population attempting to hold so great a heritage as ours," to use the Prime Minister's own words. No responsible Canadian can disagree with the Prime Minister on that statesmanlike statement.

Coming now to the other part of the Prime Minister's statement, namely, the one covering the immediate immigration policy to provide entry to Canada of displaced persons and refugees, I must say that, although I shall support the bill, I have several reservations to make. In the first place, hon. members will have noticed that the statement which the Prime Minister made yesterday was extremely carefully prepared, which indicates that the Prime Minister attaches a great deal of importance to it.

Second, it was the Prime Minister who made the statement in the house and not the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). That, too, carries a certain significance. It is true that the Prime Minister made a general statement only and that the results may be better than those we have had in the first two years since the end of the war. But if the results are not any better than the government has shown in the past, then the government's announcement will be of little practical value. I do not wish to be unduly critical of the government's immediate immigration policy, but I am sure that past experience justifies me in taking a more or less scrutinizing attitude. It was on May 28 of last year that the government passed two orders in council granting permission to certain classes of people to enter Canada. It will be a year on the 28th of this month since those orders in council were passed and only a handful of people were permitted to come into Canada. If Canada is to show her humanitarian attitude in the solution of this problem, I personally believe that we must speed up the work in the immigration branch and also speed up the setting up of the various offices throughout Europe. So far, Canadian immigration offices were opened at Athens, Greece; at Lisbon, Portugal; at Paris, France; at Brussels, Belgium; at The Hague, Holland; at Oslo, Norway; in Czechoslovakia; and we are told that offices will soon be opened in Poland. If we are anxious to help displaced persons and refugees, if we are really sincere in our desire to help them, why not set up immigration offices in Germany, in Austria and in Italy? That is where the displaced persons are and that is where most of the countries have their immigration missions.

When I was in Rome two or three months ago I had the privilege of interviewing the Argentine immigration mission. They had their immigration minister in Rome selecting the type of people whom they wanted. It is very fine for us to say that we have set up offices in the various countries to help the refugees so that they may travel to all these points, apply for their visas and be examined medically. But the fact remains that refugees have no means of travelling to those points; refugees have no permission to leave their camps and travel to the various countries in order to be examined, and from which they could emigrate to Canada or other countries. The job must be done on the spot and that is one thing that we in Canada have overlooked.

I notice, from the report on immigration and labour, that the director of immigration, Mr. Jolliffe, made the statement that offices cannot be established in Germany, for Germany is under military occupation. That, Mr. Speaker, I submit is not correct; because, as I pointed out, the Argentine mission is in Rome; and Italy was until February 10 and, as a matter of fact, still is occupied territory. These various South American countries have their immigration missions travelling all over Europe selecting the best immigrants they can get. It seems to me that we are working more or less under a misapprehension that the displaced persons are the type of persons whom we must scrutinize almost with suspicion; we must of course, scrutinize them to a degree. But after having seen the displaced persons, I disagree with those hon. members who state, and repeat, that we must be perhaps overcareful and not allow any of them to come in. That would be the effect, because we are emphasizing so greatly the fact that we must be so careful. The very fact that displaced persons are where they are today is because they have held democratic ideals so high that they have given up their old homes and moved westward so that they may join the western European nations and the United States. Surely we will give those people an opportunity; surely we will choose or take our lot from the very first group that wants to come out.

I am going to be frank and say this: unless Canada moves at a more rapid pace than she has done thus far, we are not going to get the best type of immigrant. The best type of people will go elsewhere. They cannot continue to live in the camps which consist of old garages, old military barracks and old stables. In them are people of all ranks among whom are persons who, I must say, in many respects are much better than we are. There are in those camps persons who have written numbers of books and persons who can make the most remarkable things out of practically nothing. If any of us found ourselves in a camp, what could we do? What would our talents be? But we forget these things. We feel that we are on this continent and are safe, that we do not have to worry about anybody in Europe. I maintain that if the Canadian government were serious in this matter they would have sent an immigration mission to Europe last year to investigate conditions and bring in certain recommendations to the government and to this parliament. But no. We do not care what happens to the displaced persons and refugees. We pass orders in council. Last year, on May 28, the Minister of Mines and Resources tabled certain orders in council in this chamber. Since then, in one year's time, only fourteen people of my origin were admitted to Canada. Those people cannot stay in the camps indefinitely and we must realize that.

I might point out that the organization known as IGCR—intergovernmental committee for refugees— is doing good work in Europe. I have had several interviews with Canadian representatives—as a matter of fact, they were Canadians themselves—and they were doing everything in their power to speed up the bringing of a certain number of displaced persons to Canada. But they were helpless. They pointed out that the regulations were such as to permit hardly anyone to leave. They could not go into the camps and demand that certain individuals be handed over, so that they might be examined and have their documents prepared in order that they might leave. First of all, they had to ascertain whether the person in a displaced persons camp was a relative; they had to investigate his history, and then on this side we make an investigation into the economic condition of the person applying for the admission of that relative, and so on. I spent three months travelling in Europe where these displaced persons are. I have seen these people; I have seen the conditions under which they live, and I must disagree with the suggestion by the Prime Minister that transportation facilities are not available and therefore we must wait until they are. As a matter of fact he stated that it may be more than a year before transportation can be provided. Well, if we are to wait another year some of these people in Europe will not be able to last that long.

Then the Prime Minister pointed out that it is not the regulations that matter, that they will not speed up the entry of these people into Canada. If it is a fact that ships cannot be provided, nothing can be done about that phase of the problem, but if these persons were granted permission to come to Canada; if they were given visas, then they could obtain transit visas which would enable them to go to France, Holland or Belgium, obtain employment there and help rebuild those countries. Then, when we could provide transportation we could call them up and they would be ready to leave. So I plead with the minister to give his most sympathetic and serious consideration to that partial solution of the problem. Grant visas to the people who are acceptable to us, who we feel might come to Canada, and let them emigrate elsewhere for the time being until they can be brought to this country. Then certainly we would be doing a humanitarian job.

I must say that when representatives of the various countries asked me about Canada's immigration policy I had to keep my lips closed and say nothing. They asked me why Canada with its vast area and rich natural resources would not accept any of these people, while a little country like Britain could accept hundreds of thousands of them. The British people stood by their humanitarian principles, and personally I bow my head to them. We know the British people are short of food and short of housing. We know it is more difficult for them to accommodate Europeans who do not speak their language, but they do accept them, while we are putting off playing our part in the matter. Two years have passed; now we have another announcement made in the house. What will be the next step?

As I have said, I agree wholeheartedly with the first part of the Prime Minister's statement, but if I understand that announcement properly the indications are that those people in displaced persons camps have little hope of coming to Canada, with the exception of those who may be able to stick it out, no matter what happens. Recently I read in the newspapers where some of the British and United States military authorities said that unless IRO takes over the problem of looking after displaced persons the British and American governments may be forced to send these people back under the Soviets, regardless of the people's wishes. Surely a statement like that is of great concern to Canadians who have relatives in these camps. I cannot emphasize this phase of the problem too strongly.

If time permitted I would wish to bring to the house a picture of the life of these people. Just here I might refer to an article appearing in World Report of August 15, 1946. in which it is stated that the United States of America, the United Kingdom and Canada contributed ninety-four per cent of all the money that was placed at the disposal of UNRRA. It was also stated that forty per cent of the supplies distributed by UNRRA were distributed in the areas dominated or controlled by the Soviet Union. It does not seem logical that the English-speaking countries of the world should contribute ninety-four per cent of all the money spent by UNRRA and yet allow themselves to be pushed around by the Soviets on this question. That is, however, the fact. United States military authorities in the occupied zones of Austria and Germany, and the British military authorities in those countries, as well as in Italy where there is a joint occupation force, have simply allowed themselves to be pushed around at every suggestion coming from Moscow. They fear what Moscow is going to say if they refuse to hand over these people. They fear what Moscow may say if they help these people to emigrate to other countries. It seems to me that we should stand on our own feet to avoid being pushed over the precipice, and say we believe that we should provide an asylum for the homeless, the stateless, the unfortunate people of Europe. There is only a very small number of them. As a matter of fact, I think the problem has been exaggerated, so far as numbers are concerned. Many say that there are simply millions of people. There were; but displaced persons now constitute a very small problem, if a number of countries agreed to take a share of the responsibility. Canada could take a share of that responsibility, and need not move only at the time when the senate committee begins its work.

Incidentally, at this point I wish to pay tribute to the senate committee on immigration and labour for having done a great service for this nation in bringing about a discussion on immigration during the last session. I extend my hearty thanks to them again this year for having begun to do the same thing.

Those who are worried about the type of people found among displaced persons have no reason to worry. I for one am confident that they will love Canada and be grateful to Canada and we will love them if we allow them to come in. But I do want to say that of the many displaced persons in the camps, people of Ukrainian origin. people of Polish origin, people of Latvian, Lithuanian, Estonian and Yugoslav origin, not one is a communist. Surely that should be a point in their favour. I am certain that if they are allowed to come into Canada not one of them will ever support communism; they will be the strongest defenders of democracy. And they have proven it thus far, by having lost everything, by having to give up their homes and all their earthly possessions in order to defend and to stand up in defence of the principles of freedom.

I pointed out to General Fenshawe, who is head of UNRRA in the British zone, that he should do everything in his power not to allow forced repatriation of those unfortunate people. They have no armies behind them; they have no propaganda machines behind them; they have no economic means behind them. They are simply helpless, homeless and unfortunate people. I said to him, "Stand by these people, and you will never regret it." If we do not stand by them now, what will they think? If some of them live long enough to be shipped back under a dictatorship, surely we Canadians should rather welcome them now as immigrants than to meet some of them, perhaps, with bayonets, coming from the north. Surely we should realize that.

I am glad that when the Prime Minister made his statement he did not miss saying that we cannot ignore the danger which lies in a small population attempting to hold so great a heritage as ours. That is the most important point of all. If we disappoint these people now, after we have appealed to them for more than thirty years to believe in Christianity, to believe in democracy, and then, when they want to cling to democracy and Christianity, we tell them, "No, we cannot accept you; we are sorry, but our regulations do not permit of our taking you" or, "We have no boats", such answers are not good enough. They have given up everything for the ideals I have mentioned.

I should like now to read from an article which appeared in the Evening Standard of London, England, under date of February 7, 1947. Lieutenant-General Sir Frederick Morgan, in a speech delivered at a luncheon given by the News Review World held at the Savoy, said this:

> What a distressingly typical symptom of our rising tide of bureaucracy it is that has wished on these unfortunates the label "displaced persons." This unhappy term, carelessly or perhaps even cleverly used, has come to be associated in most people's minds with shiftless mendicancy, even with criminality. How wrong this is.
> Though most of you know why these displaced persons became displaced, it is not strikingly evident why they remain displaced and why it is so vitally urgent that something be done now to help them. They cannot help themselves. In the popular conception UNRRA has failed, and failed most notoriously in its DP operations. What better means of economising, you may argue, than to withdraw our help from the DPs and let them fend, somehow or other, for themselves. They have no governments at their backs likely to complain. Have I overdrawn the picture? Maybe, maybe not.
> Well, what is to be done now? Must anything be done? It must indeed. For whether we like it or not we are committed to succouring these homeless people.
> Have we helped them so far merely to turn round upon them now and tell them we intend to do no more? God forbid. Do we tell them to get back behind the iron curtain and take their medicine?

Why is it that we cannot grasp this problem of the absorption among our own teeming millions of this small remnant of misery that owes its sufferings so much to the fact that it has friendship towards us? What is stopping us? A rapid and positive solution is so much to be desired from every point of view. We in this country—

He is speaking of Great Britain.

—are crying out for labour.

I say roundly that it is incumbent on us, the British, to set an example in the matter by dealing quickly and fearlessly with our share of the problem with the quarter million or so of DPs in our British zone of Germany.

Let us bring them here, I say, not as expatriated minorities, but as the families of our friends, for such they are. You may adduce difficulties of feeding or of housing. But we feed them now in Germany.

To them, I assure you, the veriest pigsty in England would be a palace in comparison with what they have had to inhabit these many years. And there seems to have been, to be, little difficulty in housing, and feeding many thousands of our enemies and ex-enemies—prisoners of war.

Is this too much to ask? Are we, by any chance, afraid to face up to it for fear of what are called repercussions? If so, let us just remember that the obstacles which exist are man-made. Man made the restrictions, man can unmake them if he wills.

We should think this problem through carefully once more and we should set wheels in motion if we mean what we say. Passing orders in council and changing regulations are not going to help these people who are in displaced persons camps. It is an immediate problem; it is an urgent problem, and its solution has been dragged out now for two years. We have hardly admitted anyone; we simply clamped down and sat tight and said, "We are trying; we are considering the matter." That is not good enough. I should like to give the minister and his officials and the government all the credit to which they are entitled, based on the recent announcement, but I fear that if I begin to laud the government they will simply sit back, and the results at the end of the year will not be any better than they were at the end of last year. Whatever is to be done should be done quickly.

Even though it may be late, I suggest that the government should send an immigration mission to the United States and British zones of Germany and Austria and to Italy to see these people, to study them and to study the conditions under which they live. I can tell this house that some of these men and women whom I met there are just the type of people Canada could be proud of, and I am sure we would gain a lot by letting them in. I should like to commend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) upon having agreed to grant permission to several industrialists to bring in a few of these displaced persons.

Some hon. members have criticized the government for taking that step, but it seems to me that they are somewhat hasty because no one as yet has exploited these people. I believe these industrialists are sincere in trying to help these people. If they bring in a number of them at their own expense and later deduct transportation expenses from the money earned by the workers I think it is an excellent idea. It is one way of solving the problem and doing our share. So I thank the ministers for having agreed to permit the bringing in of a few of these people.

One could speak on this subject for hours and hours, but by saying over and over again what has been said once I might not be making the case any stronger. I have been critical of the immediate policy of the government in connection with the bringing in of displaced persons, because I feel so keenly about the matter. I know the conditions under which these people live. If we allow them to stay in these camps much longer some of them will simply not be able to stand it. We would not have been able to stand it if we were in their position. They have gone through six years of war and have been two years in these camps, and we are expecting them to wait still longer.

I will close by appealing to the minister and to the government to put into practice the regulations which have been tabled. If the whole job is speeded up and done well, I shall be only too glad to rise in my place to express thanks to the government for having done their part in solving this great humanitarian problem.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to add very much to the remarks I made when I spoke on Monday last. However, I should like to comment on a point or two, now that we have the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before us. On Monday last I raised the question of action in the matter of displaced persons and particularly of refugees, and I was pleased to note that in a few days we had before the house something which gave us a basis for further discussion. I think the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) was prepared to say a word or two on Monday last, but he did not have an opportunity. I was glad to note that the Prime Minister used words which indicate that at least something definite is being undertaken at this time. He is reported on page 2645 of Hansard as saying:

> The government is sending immigration officers to examine the situation among the refugee groups, and to take steps looking towards the early admission of some thousands of their number.

I take it, by taking those words at face value, the Prime Minister meant that the government is taking definite steps at this time toward speeding up the admission of these classes of people.

Before going on to the next point and as an aside I wish to say that I think the house ought to be congratulated upon the high plane of the discussion which has been carried on today. It was a great pleasure and satisfaction to me, listening to this problem in which I have such a close interest, to hear hon. members one after another deal with this problem from the point of view of a sense of responsibility which this country has. It is no use approaching it from one particular angle because it is a two-fold problem. First, we must consider what we can do with our immigration policy to help Canada and, second, what we can do to help people outside Canada. I was pleased to note that hon. members did not approach this problem from the one point of view alone, but took in the whole picture.

I was pleased also to note that those who referred to the various races which make up this country did so in the kindest terms. I think it augurs well for the future of this country when hon. members, regardless of race or creed, can rise in their places in this house and say things about each other in that fashion.

I wish to put on record a recommendation that was sent on to me and submitted, I believe, to the government some time ago by the Ukrainian Catholic Council of Canada, which speaks for five dominion-wide Catholic organizations. I do so, because in two simple paragraphs they set out clearly and succinctly what I believe the government might well consider as a short-term and a long-term policy. First, as a short-term programme, they set out this:

> It is desirous that the dominion government, at the least, arrange for the immigration of the refugees who already have affidavits from their Canadian next-of-kin, and for whose transportation and welfare guarantees have been made by these Canadian citizens.

Then, as a long-range policy, they suggest this:

> Furthermore, it is thought that the dominion government should embark upon a bold but sensible immigration policy, and like Canadian governments of the past seek to stimulate the material development of Canada by changing our stringent immigration laws and devising a wholesome government immigration plan that would integrate the flow of immigrants with the development of the country, geared to our potential resources and to a scientifically-determined, desirable population level.

That, in very few words, sets out an immediate and a long-range programme which we might very well consider. I think we all realize that there is a difficulty involved in trying to say today what our immigration policy should be a year hence or two years or five years from now, because the economic conditions of the country at that time will have a great deal to do with the absorptive capacity of the country.

I want to mention again a suggestion I placed before the Minister of Mines and Resources on Monday, and that is whether he would not take under consideration the issuing of visas to people who have been found to be in admissible classes but who, for the time being, cannot find transportation to come to Canada. I am sure that when he takes part in this debate he will have something to say on that subject. I think he realizes the importance and the necessity of doing that in certain cases, since there are many people who, because they have nothing to show that they will be admitted to Canada, are being hounded around and being told to go back to their country of origin or go elsewhere. In other words, they are not only displaced but find themselves as unwanted people in the displaced persons camps. A document of that sort in tangible form would be something for them to anchor themselves to and would give them hope.

I do not need to say much more. It is almost eleven o'clock; but before I conclude I wish to refer to the other part of this bill which has been almost forgotten in the recent discussion, and that is the provision for the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act. I am not going to repeat all the fine things that have been said about those of the Chinese race in this country. I know we all want our laws to be as fair as possible to all concerned and, since this provision means the taking of one more step toward wiping out any discrimination which may exist, to that extent I am in favour of it. Much has been said in this debate about developing tolerance among the various races in this country. Desirable as that may be as an immediate objective, what we need in the long run is not mere tolerance but the real thing, which is the human instinct of mutual respect for the sanctity of mankind. Nothing less than that will ever do away with discrimination in the end. I think we are slowly and perhaps a bit impatiently moving toward that goal.

On motion of Mr. Mutch the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 5, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

ACTION BY COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING ARTICLE 41 OF CHARTER

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) inquired about the action of the parliaments of the other units of the commonwealth with respect to article 41 of the charter of the united nations. Our files contained the information with respect to the United Kingdom and New Zealand, but did not contain anything definite with respect to the other units of the commonwealth. Through our high commissioners we have since ascertained exactly what the position is.

The House of Commons of the United Kingdom approved the charter of the united nations by resolution of August 23, 1945. The United Kingdom deposited its ratification on October 20, 1945. The parliament of the United Kingdom enacted the United Nations Act, 1946, which was assented to on April 15, 1946, and which contains provisions similar to those contained in our Bill No. 132, which is now before parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is, relating to article 41?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Relating to article 41, with the exception that there is no limitation in the United Kingdom Act upon the penalties which can be imposed for violating any regulation made under the powers delegated to the government of the United Kingdom.

The parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia has not enacted special legislation with respect to article 41 of the charter. It did, however, by act of parliament, approve the charter.

New Zealand deposited its instrument of ratification on September 19, 1945. The General Assembly of New Zealand in parliament assembled on September 16, 1946, enacted the United Nations Act, 1946, which empowers the government to make regulations in the manner provided for in our Bill No. 132. There is a limitation on the penalties which are fixed by the statute; and they are limited to twelve months' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds for an individual or a fine not exceeding one thousand pounds in the case of a company.

In South Africa, although the instrument of ratification was deposited on November 7, 1945, there has not been any legislation with respect to article 41.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the military staff committee's report to the security council with respect to an international police force have any effect on the present disposition to press this legislation at the present session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think it will. As the hon. member knows, there are three procedures fixed for settling international disputes: (1) attempted conciliation; (2) measures under section 41 which involve sanctions other than military sanctions, and (3) recourse to military sanctions prescribed by the security council. This has to do with only the second stage of proceedings for settling disputes; and it was our feeling that although there might not be any immediate prospect of having to use these powers, we did not want to be in the position where any delay whatsoever in respect to the setting up of effective machinery of the united nations could be attributed to us.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED SEPARATION OF CERTAIN PARISHES FROM TEMISCOUATA CONSTITUENCY—REFERENCE OF PETITIONS TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, will you kindly give your ruling concerning the petitions which were submitted to the house the other day?

Mr. SPEAKER: On Friday last I said to the hon. member for Temiscouata, as reported at pages 2694 and 2695 of Hansard:

May I point out to the house that I have already refused some petitions because they were not prepared in accordance with the rules of the house. I should not like to put before the house the motion to accept the petition presented by the hon. member for Temiscouata before having had the opportunity of seeing it. I have noted the remarks made by the hon. member, and he may be assured that due consideration will be given to them.

I have examined the petition of the hon. member, and have prepared the following statement:

The house is not seized of a petition addressed to the members without mentioning the words "in parliament assembled". In that case a motion has to be made in order to bring it to the attention of the house. When petitions are not properly addressed, the clerk of petitions reports that they cannot be received. They may then be referred to the standing committee on standing orders which has power to report to the house whether or not they should be accepted.

The general allegations of the petition are concluded by what is called the "prayer", that is, the request in which the particular object of the petitioner is expressed. The words "and your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray" are not essential. "May" says that those words are "generally added" but they are not necessary; and petitions without them are valid.

I suggest to the hon. member, therefore, that he present a motion that this petition be referred for consideration to the proper committee, which would be the standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move:

That petition presented by the electors of the parishes of Notre Dame des Sept Douleurs, Ste. Rita, St. Paul de la Croix, St. Cyprien, St. Emile d'Auclair and St. Jean-Baptiste de l'Isle Verte be referred to the committee on standing orders.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria) moved:

That the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented on Friday, May 2, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANNED LOBSTER

STATEMENT AS TO IMPORT LICENSING SYSTEM IN SWEDEN

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): On Friday last the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked whether the government of Sweden had imposed an import licensing system against our canned lobsters. I am informed after conversations with the Swedish legation that a temporary import licence procedure has been imposed in Sweden. The present shortage of United States and Canadian dollars permits them to import only essential goods. Canadian canned lobster is in good demand in Sweden, however, and if conditions improve sufficiently, imports of canned lobster may be permitted into Sweden later in the year.

I am unable to indicate what effect this present situation may have on lobster prices.

POLISH VETERANS

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN MONTREAL "STANDARD"

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My attention has been called to an article appearing in the Montreal Standard of May 3 in which it is stated that a number of Polish veterans, who were brought from Italy last fall to work on Canadian farms, had served with the nazis. The heading of the article is entirely misleading. The impression which might be drawn from the heading and from a reading of this article is that the men referred to were men who were nazi sympathizers and that the Canadian selection mission had accepted these men for entry to Canada under pressure from the heads of the Polish corps. I wish to correct any such impression and to say that it is entirely unfounded.

The Canadian selection mission was initially instructed by the government that they were not to consider applications from any members of the Polish armed forces who had served with the German forces or behind the German front with the German labour corps during the period of the war. However, representations were made by the Polish military authorities pointing out that among those Polish veterans who desired to come to Canada there were a number who had been forcibly conscripted by the Germans and enrolled either in the German armed forces or in the German labour corps and who had deserted at the first opportunity and made their way into allied lines to join the Polish corps. It was represented that men in this category who had risked their lives to desert for the express purpose of joining the Polish corps and had subsequently enrolled in and had actually fought with the Polish corps against the axis powers prior to V-E day would be unfairly discriminated against if they were refused consideration for admission to Canada along with other Polish veterans. These representations were transmitted to the government and it was agreed that Polish veterans in this category would be considered eligible for selection purposes along with other Polish veterans. To this extent and to this extent only the original instructions to the mission were varied. All applicants for entry to Canada in this category were nevertheless screened by the security representatives on the mission in the same way as every other applicant. The screening included not only verbal interrogations but also a check of the military and intelligence records relating to them.

I wish to put this on the record in justice to the men themselves and to refute any suggestion that we have permitted any person to come to Canada in this group of Polish veterans who has nazi sympathies. This is not the case and in fact, as the statement shows, every precaution was taken to eliminate the possibility of inclusion of any such persons in the group selected for entry.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the minister permit a supplementary question?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has there been any trouble or difficulty in connection with any of these men? Is it true that in some cases deportation proceedings are under consideration?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can be very frank with my hon. friend. There have been complaints in the opposite direction in regard to being nazi sympathizers. There are in this country a number of people who feel that anyone who does not agree with them is a nazi, and that goes for every member of this House of Commons.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What do you mean by that?

Mr. MITCHELL: They call you that, too, if you bother to take notice of them. However, I may say that consideration is being given to sending two of these Polish veterans back to Great Britain.

FEED GRAINS

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Did the increases in the price of No. 1 feed barley and No. 1 feed oats as announced by the Minister of Agriculture in his statement in the House of Commons on 17th March, 1947, increase the price of these grains in Nova Scotia, and, if so, by how much?

2. Did the above-mentioned increases in the price of barley and oats increase the cost to Nova Scotian farmers of feeds involving these grains?

Mr. GARDINER: I have discussed this question with the hon. member and we agreed that in its present form it will not get the information he requires. I therefore ask that it be dropped, in order that it may be reworded.

AUSTRALIAN AND NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Mr. DROPE:

1. How much Australian and New Zealand butter was brought into Canada this year?

These matters are now under consideration by the Peruvian authorities.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the proposed resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SUGAR BEETS

PRIVILEGE, MR. BLACKMORE—LABOUR SUPPLY—INTERNATIONAL POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Friday I sought permission to ask of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) three questions, aiming to learn from the minister, in the first place, whether or not Ontario farmers are signing 1947 contracts to produce sugar beets for the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company in sufficient numbers to enable that company to run both of its factories during 1947; and, in the second place, whether or not the government realized that inability to run the Wallaceburg factory in 1947 would lose for Canada 50 million pounds of sugar, or about five pounds of sugar for every person in Canada.

Your Honour, considering the length of the questions, suggested that I put them on the order paper. To Your Honour's ruling I freely bow. Nevertheless there is attached to this matter of the Ontario beet sugar industry in 1947 such a degree of importance and immediate urgency that I conceive it to be my duty to move the adjournment of the house to discuss this matter. Having in mind, however, the fact that the house is anxious to make progress today with various pressing matters, and has therefore specially decided upon the programme for this afternoon, I wonder if it would not be fitting that I should rather ask the Minister of Finance if he will agree that I should present to him now certain questions concerning the progress of the Ontario beet sugar industry. Will the minister so agree?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The hon. member has sent me notice of the questions he intended to ask, but I have no objection to his putting them. I shall take them as notice and try to give him an answer tomorrow if possible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The questions I desire to ask are these.

First, how many acres of sugar beet contracts had been signed for the company by noon of May 5?

Second, what steps does the government contemplate to enable Ontario beet growers to protect their labour supply from being attracted from them by tobacco growers as was done in 1946, and,

Third, has the government considered how adversely Canada's failure to produce beet sugar to her plant capacity in 1947 might affect the willingness of the United States to grant Canada sugar from the international pool in the years 1947 and 1948?

LUMBER

INCREASED DOMESTIC PRICES ON WEST COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. As the April 30 lumber price increases on the domestic market appear to compensate British Columbia coastal operators several times over for losses through reduced export quotas, will the minister state what other factors, beyond compensation to the lumber companies, were taken into consideration in increasing domestic prices on the west coast by more than forty per cent?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Several factors were taken into consideration. The first, as my hon. friend has mentioned, was the desire to obtain a greater proportion of the British Columbia cut for domestic use. Another factor was that prices for west coast lumber have not been changed for some eighteen months. In the meantime there has been a sharp increase in cost, in part through increased wages. Third, account must be taken of the fact that past prices for lumber are not only far below prices of any other lumber in Canada, but are far below the cost of production; and that fact is preventing the procurement of certain types of lumber, such as flooring and other high grades, which the mills will not produce at the old prices. The adjustment leaves the price in no event any more than sixty per cent of the price that is being obtained for lumber for export. The adjustment brings the price of British Columbia lumber about in line with prices in other parts of Canada; and it will, I think, mean a much better distribution of western lumber throughout Canada, which is highly desirable, as the shortage of heavy timber from British Columbia is having a serious effect in restricting construction work.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Have any of those companies gone broke yet?

Mr. HOWE: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WORK STOPPAGE IN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK—SUBSIDY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, arising out of a statement which appeared in the Toronto Star of May 3, copy of which I have sent the minister and therefore I shall not read it into the record. It was to the effect that the minister had made some subsidy arrangement that might solve the work stoppage problem in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Has that statement been called to the minister's attention, and can he indicate what subsidies arrangement he intends to make for the purpose of meeting the difficulty in the two provinces mentioned?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has not been a party to the negotiations leading up to the settlement of the coal strike. The position of the minister was made clear in the house some time ago—that when settlement had been effected, appropriate subsidy arrangements will be made on the basis recommended by the royal commission on coal, namely that the subsidy be a transition subsidy, and that it be not larger than the subsidy paid before the strike took place. The department has informed the Minister of Labour that a subsidy will be granted in amount required to implement the proposal of the Minister of Labour for the settlement of the strike which was made in this house some weeks ago.

Mr. GILLIS: Then the statement in the Star has no foundation in fact?

Mr. HOWE: No.

BERRY PICKERS FOR THE FRASER VALLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if any arrangements have been made between the dominion and provincial departments of labour to bring berry pickers from the prairie provinces to the Fraser valley for the coming season and, if not, will consideration be given to this matter?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can assure my hon. friend that negotiations are going on between my department and the government of British Columbia, in fact with every province in Canada where a similar problem exists, in an effort to meet the situation. My hon. friend shakes his head, but this is a headache I have had for the last six years and there will be the same action taken this year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You do not have berries in all the provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: We will deliver the goods, I think, as we always have.

TOURIST TRADE

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT TRAVEL AND SPORTSMEN'S SHOWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. Is Canada represented at the international travel exhibition now being held at the Grand Central Palace, New York and if so, by what branches of the department?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The policy of the department is to alternate with our exhibits between travel bureau shows and sportsmen's shows in the United States. At the present time we are exhibiting at the sportsmen's shows on the Pacific coast and next year we will use the facilities of the travel shows.

HOUSING

SURPLUS DWELLINGS IN BREMERTON AREA, STATE OF WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply if he has received a telegram from the city clerk of Vancouver asking him to ascertain from Commissioner Dillon Myer, of federal public housing authority in Washington, D.C., whether or not a city approved non-profit organization would be granted the privilege of acquiring and bringing to Canada 1,600 war surplus dwellings which are now situated in the Bremerton area in the state of Washington? If that telegram has been received, could the minister say whether there has been any action taken along the lines suggested?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The wire was received and this reply, signed by myself, was sent to the city clerk under date of May 2:

> We are only justified in approaching United States authorities if city of Vancouver or administrative organization formed by it will make firm bid at asking price which I understand is four hundred dollars per unit. On such advice will take matter up through Canadian embassy Washington. Provided city of Vancouver will take administrative responsibility directly or indirectly through non-profit organization such as citizens rehabilitation committee we will make emergency shelter grant of five hundred dollars per unit. Dominion will not import Bremerton houses on its own account nor are we prepared to make mortgage loans on Bremerton houses if moved to Vancouver.

I have tried to make clear in this house the position of the Bremerton houses. We regard them as being substandard housing. We regard the estimated cost of establishing them in Vancouver as being in excess of the cost of providing houses of the same standard with Canadian materials and Canadian workmanship, provided the government is willing to take the responsibility for providing that type of housing, which it is not. The government believes that it is justified only in building houses of a type suitable as permanent homes for Canadian citizens, and we regard the Bremerton houses as not being in that class.

BRAEFOOT VETERANS' LAND ACT PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if instructions have been issued that one of the houses, namely, 1421 Harrop road, erected under the Braefoot Veterans' Land Act project, be torn down and the veteran occupant ordered to vacate? If so, is the veteran being provided with other accommodation while his home is rebuilt?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I received notice of my hon. friend's question just an hour ago and I endeavoured at once to get in touch with Victoria but without success. The information available here is that no house is being torn down. There is substantial reconditioning of one house. If I have any further information later on in the day I shall communicate at once with my hon. friend.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Will the Minister of National Revenue please advise the house the reason for the delay in calling the radio broadcasting committee?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): On Thursday last the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked a similar question. Arrangements have been made with the whips of the parties whereby the committee will be called this week.

IMMIGRATION ACT

REPEAL OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT—BONDING OF PERSONS IN TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA

The house resumed from Friday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Glen for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, because I consider the question of immigration the most important question before this house, indeed the most important that confronts the people of Canada now or will have to be faced in the measurable future, I find myself approaching what I have to say today with a great deal more diffidence than is usual when I rise to speak in this house.

I am sure I express not only my own opinion but that of the majority of the people of the province from which I come when I say that the section of the bill which rights the wrong respecting Chinese immigration has been long overdue and will be generally approved by the public.

I do not propose to deal this afternoon with the humanitarian arguments for immigration into Canada. No words of mine could add to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) on this and other occasions, to the moving and eloquent appeal last Friday night of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) or to the speeches of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) to which we have listened on one or two occasions.

By the statement which he read to the house the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made it abundantly clear that the government of the day, headed by himself, is fully cognizant of the responsibility of Canada and of our duty toward those unfortunate people from whom we may well seek immigration. I think I owe a debt to the Prime Minister for the conciseness of that declaration, because it eliminated much of what I would otherwise have had to say. I hope that in what I desire to put before the house this afternoon I may be able to contribute toward making his task and the task of the government easier in implementing the policy, both short and long term, which he enunciated the other day.

I think that no member of this house needs to be convinced of the unanswerableness of the humanitarian argument for immigration. I am equally sure that no intelligent member of this house needs to be convinced that there are two sides to the question of immigration. There is the duty which has been pointed out to us of making some contribution to the unfortunates of this war, and there is the duty, which we share with all parties in this house, of taking advantage of an opportunity which is now available to do something for Canada itself. In other words there is a great opportunity for Canada today in immigration, and it is of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, and of our own needs, that I purpose speaking this afternoon.

Ever since 1914-15, and the drying up at that time of the flow of immigration to this country, and even through the early thirties when there was some lowering of the bars and some immigration permitted, we Canadians generally have been busy explaining and apologizing for and explaining again the fact that we had abandoned the traditional policy of this country of seeking first to colonize our own territory and then to expand our population and our industries. Over the years the department of immigration has come to be relegated to the status of a subdepartment under another minister. I have not consulted with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) with respect to the observations which I now propose to make, but I know something of his understanding of the problem and of his conception of his own responsibility, and I have no hesitation in saying that in so far as the proposals I shall make are designed to give clearer and quicker effect to the government policies enunciated by the Prime Minister with respect to the department over which the minister presides, he will I am sure be in full agreement with them. In so far as I am critical of the department of immigration I am equally sure that the minister will feel obligated to defend it.

During the years the department of immigration, once a great and important one, has been relegated to the position of a branch of another department, and there has not been in the past few years, as there once was, a minister charged with the responsibility of seeking and selecting immigrants abroad to meet a demand in this country. The department has been instinctively inclined to feel that its mission was to exclude those who sought to come here. With respect to this I charge no one in particular. I simply state it as an incontrovertible fact.

If Canada is to make either the short-term or the long-term policy enunciated in the house the other day by the Prime Minister work soon enough to be effective, to accomplish its humanitarian purpose and to produce the full benefits which Canada hopes to receive from that policy, the department of immigration needs at this time to be born again. It is my view that we need a full-time minister of immigration, and we need one now. The task of heading this department will, I submit, challenge the best brains which the Prime Minister can invite to the task. It needs something of the Canadianism of a Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the dynamic administrative capacity of a Clifford Sifton. More than that, it demands at this time a man who is able to distinguish between a policy of immigration which was an attempt on the part of the country to colonize its own lands, and a policy of immigration such as we now need, the purpose of which will be to bring about a planned and controlled expansion in this country. There is a vast difference between the two. Because it is a terrific problem, because it is to my mind the greatest single problem that confronts the federal government in Canada today, I should like for a moment to examine some of the reasons which lead me to make that statement.

Does anyone anywhere in Canada think that without a sharply increased population we shall be able over the years to increase our national income, or even to keep it at its present level? Our industries are hopelessly localized in thinly populated areas in a country which is only thinly populated. That being so, if again we come to those times and conditions where a shift of population will be necessary in the interests of the workers as well as of the producers, we shall find ourselves in a difficult if not a hopeless situation unless we restore something of the original programme of immigration, which was to expand and develop a more thickly populated country.

Immigration means more than that. Planned and controlled immigration means a home market for our surplus production. It means, and this is equally important, adding to the productive power and skills of the workers of this country, which is so necessary to the economy of this country, so necessary if we are to retain our place in the markets of the world. Immigration means something more which is important to every person in the Dominion of Canada. It means broadening of the base of taxation to pay for the services which we demand, and to pay for and maintain the defence which Canada must have. I think it was in 1937 when, speaking in this house on defence, I said that 12,000,000 people cannot forever hold half a continent in a land-hungry world. Those words were true then; they are equally true now. I believe that if we do not seek to double or approximately double the population of this country in the next twenty years, we stand in imminent danger of losing our present position as a free and independent power. I believe that in June, 1940, we were within weeks of such a position. I fear that such a situation may arise again. I know that we can and do rely on our neighbours, the United States, to stand with us against any attempted violation of our territory, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am realist enough to know what the price of that might ultimately be. Furthermore I believe that failing to carry out such an expansive policy of immigration the logic of circumstances and the pressure of economics will, apart from any threat of war, be sufficient during the years to accomplish that fusion of interests of the north American nations which would result in that same loss of sovereignty which I had anticipated in case of attack.

It is not to be assumed, Mr. Speaker, because I say these things that I speak for the open-door policy of immigration. That policy functioned well when we were following what I have called the Canadian policy of colonizing our own lands. I do not suggest that that policy would function in the changed conditions of the moment. But I do suggest that the people of Canada demand, with a growing impatience more liberal immigration policies—not just policies of immigration, but the carrying out of those policies in a way which will result in bringing immigrants to the shores of Canada.

I have said that there is an insistent demand for liberalized policies. I am equally convinced there is an insistent demand that the policy of today and tomorrow shall be one calculated to bring prospective immigrants in contact with a plan for making them part of the economy of this country. In other words there must be a direct correlation between the man and the woman and the job and industry in Canada. My view—and I suggest it is the view of the majority of Canadians—is that the need for immigrants is immediate, urgent and vital to Canada.

For fear that I be accused of speaking without authority I wish to quote from one or two resolutions which have come to my hand, as I think they have come to most hon. members. In a policy declaration of the seventeenth annual meeting of the Canadian chamber of commerce, which met in Winnipeg in 1946, under the heading "Immigration," there are these words, which I contend, sir, support the view I take:

> Canada must have a vigorous immigration policy immediately. This country needs and can support a very much greater population and the present opportunity may be the last in which we can freely choose the immigrants who will fill our thinly populated country.

I have another brief comment from the same source which I should like to give. It reads as follows:

> Canada was built by the energy, skill and initiative of immigrants and her future growth will be accelerated by bringing in those with technical and scientific skills and experience as well as those prepared for labour on the farms and in the factories. Today as perhaps never before there are men of skill and experience with the capacities to establish new employment—creating industries, who are footloose in Europe and seeking opportunities in countries where they will be welcomed.

The Garment Manufacturers Association of western Canada, in a letter dated December 31, 1946, addressed to myself, again raised the question of immigration. With your permission, sir, I should like to quote one sentence from the letter, as follows:

> We are of the opinion that unless immigration is permitted, our industry is bound to suffer to a considerable extent.

I also hold in my hand a resolution of the Canadian Corps Association dated February 13, 1947. I should like to quote one sentence from the preamble, as follows:

> And whereas in the opinion of this association immigration is the most vital public necessity in Canada at the present moment . . .

These three quotations, Mr. Speaker, representing business men—the chamber of commerce, those who employ people—the needle trades, and one group of veterans in Canada, would seem to give point to the claim I make that there is general agreement on the part of the public in demanding the immediate opening up of immigration into Canada.

Speaking of the many thousands who can be assimilated into Canadian citizenship, as suggested in the chamber of commerce resolution I have just read, I realize the fact that such people do exist, and their need is as immediate, urgent and vital as is our need for immigrants. It is our good fortune that in coming to their assistance we, the people of Canada, are in a position not only to help them but to do a great service to our own country.

This and succeeding governments will be expected by the people of Canada to profit by their own mistakes and by the mistakes of their predecessors. It will be expected of them that Canadian standards of work and life, economic and cultural, shall be enriched and not debased by the type of immigrant who is encouraged to come to this country. This policy which we enunciate they will be expected in point of fact to put into practice.

I hope the house will not think that in emphasizing the urgency of immigration at this time I am unaware of the problems of transport and housing. I shall have something to say on that a little later. I am aware of the difficulty. I mention it because I am concerned that those who may be directing their attention to the problem of immigration shall not use these difficulties as an excuse or a cloak for inaction.

At long last it does seem that the people of Canada are awakening to the realization our fathers had, that we have both a duty and an opportunity to enrich our heritage and the heritage of our children. We need to remind ourselves over and over again that when we come to consider the question of immigration that it is we, the people of Canada, who in the long run profit by the right kind of immigration, and we profit more greatly than the immigrants themselves, no matter how difficult may be the situation from which they come.

May I say a word or two about the mechanics of immigration itself. At page 2645 of Hansard of May 1, 1947, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

> The government is sending immigration officers to examine the situation among the refugee groups, and to take steps looking towards the early admission of some thousands of their number.

That is, of course, an evidence of the recognition of the urgency of the position. I am expressing my own view, and I am sure the view of most of the people of Canada, when I say I hope that these words will be implemented speedily by the actual arrival of immigrants to Canada.

Despite the shipping shortages, which are real, I suggest to the Minister of Mines and Resources, who is concerned with this problem, that probably five to ten empty vessels will arrive at the port of Churchill this summer. At slight cost, and I am sure without any complaint from the immigrants themselves as to the inconveniences which they might be called upon to suffer, it will be possible before this fall to bring several thousand immigrants into the heart of the country via that route. That it will be done I feel sure, if the department sincerely desires to get them and get them quickly.

Despite the housing situation in Canada I estimate, on the best information I can get, that Canada this year could absorb at least 80,000 single men or men who are married but whose families in the countries from which they come are adequately provided for until such time as the housing shortage no longer exists. Those who remember the former periods of immigration will recall that one of the largest exports from this country for a number of years was the money which was being sent home, to support their families, by men who came to this country as immigrants. That continued until such time as they could bring their families to Canada to live with them. It is a situation which is not too difficult.

I suggest that the 80,000 single men who could come in this summer be absorbed in the mines, in the forests and on the farms without causing a fraction of one per cent disturbance to the housing problem. Relatives of persons who are already citizens of Canada could be brought in. They might cause a little inconvenience, but certainly less inconvenience than where they are now. It would be a beginning which, although small, would be satisfactory, and would be evidence not only of the good will but of the good faith of this dominion. If we have a department whose duty it will be to find and select people and get them here, I think with such a beginning we might safely feel we were at the dawn of a new and brighter era.

I should like to say a word or two about another aspect of the immigration problem, that of emigration. Far too much sentimental nonsense has been talked about Canadian born who themselves emigrate. I do not reproach those who lament the going to the United States or elsewhere of the sons and daughters of Canada; as a matter of fact, I share the feeling of loss. But, sir, when it is suggested that these migrations or emigrations of Canadians to the United States and elsewhere are somehow connected with the general question of immigration into Canada, then you get a picture of the situation which, I submit, is wholly erroneous. Large numbers of immigrants have come in the past, are coming now and will continue to come to Canada, just as they do to Mexico, because they have failed to get in under the immigration quotas in the United States where they have families and friends and where they desire to go. That condition is one over which at the moment we have no control, and probably never shall have; but a considerable number of those who came to this country and later went to the United States came for that purpose and in that fashion. There is no use in charging anyone with the job of finding out what their future intentions are, because it cannot be done. That accounts, I submit, for a considerable number of the immigrants who emigrate.

Not only that, but there is an emigration which consists largely of doctors and nurses, engineers and to quite a considerable extent chartered accountants. This represents a serious loss to the population and to the economic and social life of Canada. But I do not think anyone would suggest that the bringing in of immigrants who in the first instance come largely from the labouring classes has in any way contributed to the necessity for these leaving us. On the contrary I think that if we increased our immigration sharply, the opportunities for professional people who now emigrate would be very much better in Canada than they are today. Anyway, I wonder if the house or the people of Canada generally think it is necessarily a bad thing to have a steady flow of some of our best people from this country to the United States, our friendly neighbour, a country so much larger and stronger than we are that we should hardly dare to differ from them? And if the alternative is to keep these people at home, does anyone think that our sons or daughters, or even humanity itself, would be served to advantage if they were kept in Canada to do jobs which were far below their capacity?

Scotland's greatest contribution to the world has doubtless been made through her sons and daughters who have made their homes in the far corners of the earth. By their philosophy and their industry, their skills and capacities, they have contributed largely to the various societies of which they formed a part. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that we cry too much about our loss, which is so often humanity's gain. Back in the early twenties every member of the graduating class in engineering in a western university went to South Africa, South America or the United States. I took the trouble to check up in 1939 and I discovered that all but two were back here, employed in their professions; they were in responsible positions in the Canadian engineering world. We sometimes overlook the fact that our sons, by their excursions into other lands, seeking experience which it is difficult for them to gain at home, are but preparing themselves to make an even greater contribution to the life of their own country, Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am deeply conscious that I have failed this afternoon to do justice to my theme. For instance, I have not emphasized the contribution which the last generation of immigrants made to this country. Without checking it up, I venture to say that a large number of the members of this house are themselves of that gallant company. I know that many more of us are the first-born sons of immigrants. That being the make-up of this House of Commons, I assume—and I think rightly—that we in this chamber are aware of the contributions generally which that generation of immigrants which came in the early 1900's—and some of them before that—have made to the peace and prosperity, the well-being and development, cultural, social and economic, of this country. There is no reason to believe that succeeding generations will not, under the conditions which prevail today—infinitely better than those which the earlier pioneers experienced—enhance their reputation as immigrants and do their part in making this Canada into the sort of place we believe it can be and which the Minister of Finance in his budget speech the other day, expressed belief it would be.

My plea, then, is for a national effort for what I conceive to be the great national need. We in Canada have established a high standard of social services, and we have no intention of going back. We hope for better things. We will not lower our standards without a struggle; and I suggest that we can maintain the social services and other high standards we have in the country only if we are able to maintain our national income. I for one do not believe that it will be possible to maintain our national income in the years to come without adding to our population. We must work, we must consume, we must export. That being so, we need the reinforcements which a fresh influx of controlled immigration will give in the field of initiative, in the highly skilled trades, as housing becomes available and in the places where they can be used at the moment; in the camps, on the farms, in the forests. I think these things are essential. The idea of full employment, as it has been bandied about by politicians and others in this country from time to time, is for the future meaningless unless we are able to develop a population which will be able to a larger extent to support itself, to defend itself, to bring fresh effort and endeavour, fresh experience and fresh knowledge into the battle of life. This is the normal situation in any country which depends as largely as we do on its relationships with the rest of the world. This government, this House of Commons and the people of Canada are faced with a decision. We may approach this great opportunity in a spirit which will delay and impede our national heritage; I hope we shall not do that. But, sir, I am so sure of the rightness and the inevitability of this policy in Canada that I believe the logic of figures and the march of time will save us from ourselves, if it is not too late.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, while I should like to take some time this afternoon in urging that Canada should offer hospitality to the homeless and helpless people in Europe, taking into account our great resources and their need, I propose to confine my remarks to the part of this bill affecting the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act.

As a Canadian I blush with shame every time I think that for twenty-four long years we have had on the statute books of this country an act known as the Chinese Immigration Act which selects a group of people on the basis of race and says:

> The entry to or landing in Canada of persons of Chinese origin or descent irrespective of allegiance or citizenship, is confined to the following classes, that is to say,
> (a) The members of the diplomatic corps . . .
> (b) The children born in Canada of parents of Chinese race or descent, who have left Canada for educational or other purposes, on substantiating their identity to the satisfaction of the controller at the port or place where they seek to enter on their return;
> (c) (i) merchants . . .
> (ii) students . . .

I am sure that most Canadians welcomed the Prime Minister's statement on January 27 of this year to the effect that this obnoxious legislation was to be repealed. The Prime Minister in his press release of January 27 said that the effect of the repeal will be to remove all discrimination against the Chinese on account of race, and to bring Chinese persons under the general provisions of the Immigration Act and no longer under legislation applying exclusively to persons of Chinese origin.

Well, what do we find? We find the government does not propose to carry out the Prime Minister's promise, because both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) have made it very clear that again there is to be racial discrimination, and the Chinese are to be brought under P.C. 2115 passed September 16, 1930. In part this order in council says:

> From and after the 16th August, 1930, and until otherwise ordered, the landing in Canada of any immigrant of any asiatic race is hereby prohibited, except as hereinafter provided.

If the Prime Minister's promise were to be carried out of course the Chinese would be placed in the same category as all others, and they would be admitted to Canada under P.C. 695, passed on March 21, 1931. This order in council permits the entry into Canada of the wife or unmarried child under eighteen years of age of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such dependent. So the position is that we are still to have legislation in this country based on racial prejudice.

I would remind the house that Canada has subscribed to the charter of the united nations, which contains these words:

> We the peoples of the united nations, determined . . . to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small . . . and for these ends to practise tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours . . .

Then in article 1, paragraph 2, the purposes of the united nations are set out as follows:

> To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.

And in article 55, chapter IX:

With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the united nations shall promote:

c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Now in 1947 parliament is asked to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act but still keep the people of Chinese origin in an inferior position. My information is that only 8,746 of the Chinese resident in Canada will be eligible to bring in their relatives under the order in council that is to apply to them, which is P.C. 2115. It might be mentioned that for many years Chinese could not become citizens of Canada because of P.C. 1378, passed June 17, 1931, which prevented Chinese from becoming citizens without the consent of the Chinese government. No doubt there was some justification for the passing of that order in council at the time, because France, the United States and the United Kingdom had extraterritorial rights in China and probably it would have been possible for Chinese to take out citizenship in other countries and then take advantage of the rights granted to citizens of those countries. But in recent years the Chinese have been most anxious that citizens of that country should not be treated any differently than the citizens of other countries, in respect to obtaining citizenship in this country. I was very glad, during the debate on February 11, to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources state, in reply to criticism by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that this obnoxious order in council would be repealed, and that was done very soon after. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar quite correctly said, "You are perpetrating a cruel hoax if you allow this to go on after it has been pointed out to you. I say you are letting the Prime Minister down and placing the whole Liberal party in a position where they might be termed guilty of hypocrisy."

When this legislation was before the house in February the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made a very commendable speech, as he does on many occasions. However, he did his party an injustice when he said that since the passing of this act only eight persons had been admitted from China. My information is that nine persons have been admitted, and I hope the hon. member will not mind this correction being made in the official record. I was interested in reading the debates which took place when this act was passed, and I would like to remind the house that the present Prime Minister was Prime Minister at that time as well. At page 2312 of Hansard for April 30, 1923, the Prime Minister said:

If, however, we lose sight of the international aspect and use expressions—either unguardedly or for other reasons—which are certain to be repugnant to peoples of another part of the world, I am afraid that instead of helping to relieve a very serious situation we shall only be creating—perhaps not for ourselves but for others—a situation which will be infinitely worse.

The Prime Minister took exception to the obnoxious head tax, and went on to say:

I could never see how Canada, from any self-respecting point of view, could impose a poll tax on working people coming from another country, and at the same time have its population subscribe to funds for missionary purposes to teach the heathen the most elementary principles of Christianity. The government has shared that view and has felt that any indignity of the character of the imposition of a poll tax upon a people in any other part of the world was something to which we, as a Christian community, should not lend our approval. So we have decided to abolish the head tax for that reason if for no other.

Still later the Prime Minister said:

I am not saying what the effect of this legislation may be when it is passed. What I am saying is that no country that I know of, under the British flag, has ever attempted, or in the name of British justice and fair play, and fair dealings with the peoples of other parts of the world would attempt, to enact an exclusion law against another nation, regardless altogether of the status or standing of the classes that may be affected.

Well, I hope the Prime Minister meant that. He did not know what the effect was going to be, but the hon. member for Spadina has told us the effect; the result has been that nine persons in twenty-four years have been admitted to Canada. If that is not an offence to the people of China I do not know what you would call it.

Mr. REID: So many of them were coming to Canada in those years that the exclusion act had to be put through. The head tax did not stop them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The facts are—

Mr. REID: Those are the facts.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —that the parliament of this country passed legislation based on racial prejudice which never should have been passed by any self-respecting parliament; and in this day, when we are trying to create understanding, no self-respecting parliament can subscribe to legislation which selects a group of people and says, "You shall be debarred because we do not like your colour." regardless of whether or not persons desiring to come here have any crimes chalked up against them.

Mr. REID: If you had lived in British Columbia, you would have been with us on that occasion, too.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I would remind the house of the fine words expressed by the Prime Minister of Canada some twenty years later, under different circumstances. This was the day we had as our guest in this chamber a very distinguished world figure, Madame Chiang Kai-shek. On that occasion the Prime Minister was especially eloquent, when he said:

To Madame Chiang Kai-shek I extend the sincerest of welcomes on behalf of the government, the parliament and the people of Canada. We welcome Madame Chiang for what she is in herself. We welcome her as the devoted wife of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, the great leader of the republic of China. And we welcome her as the interpreter of the needs and the virtues of the patient and heroic people of China, the first great power to resist axis aggression.

Later the Prime Minister said:

We would ask you, Madame Chiang, to carry to the Generalissimo the expression of our high regard for him, and the assurance that the people of Canada have unreservedly joined with the people of China in putting forth their utmost effort to destroy the evil forces that now seek to dominate the world.

We should like you to tell the men and women of China how unbounded is our admiration of their unswerving fortitude. Their uncomplaining courage has not been surpassed in the annals of human resistance. Canada, in common with all the united nations, is increasingly conscious of the debt that freedom owes to the unconquerable spirit of China.

Naturally all members of the house in this chamber on that occasion warmly and roundly applauded Canada's spokesman, as he certainly was speaking for the people of this country. And on the same day, after Madame had spoken, the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), who at that time was occupying the position of Speaker, said:

Madame Chiang Kai-shek, I would seek to convey what has been made so manifest by this audience during your address—the deep sense of gratitude that you have evoked by your message, and the privilege which is ours to have heard not only the voice of China, but the voice of freedom, expressed by you in most eloquent terms and phrased in graceful English, comparable with the best in our literature. I speak not for both houses of parliament alone, but for all Canada, when I express the profound admiration of its citizens for Chung Hua Min Kou, or in our language, literally meaning "Chinese People's Country", the lovely name of the new China. And if I may be permitted to say, you have captivated all our hearts.

And then at the close of his remarks:

It is for the good of all mankind that your and our race and peoples should understand and share friendship. May God in his infinite wisdom sustain and preserve you, and on that glorious day when this war shall cease, Canada will gladly join with your people in their long awaited triumph, and will joyously repeat with you: Forever China.

And if I may say so, I think the minister was in the finest form I had ever known him to be. He had the happy faculty in those days of expressing, more eloquently than most of us could, the sort of sentiments which should be expressed on an occasion of that kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is always in good form.

Mr. POULIOT: True.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I sincerely hope before this legislation is passed the Minister of Mines and Resources will indicate that he has changed his opinion, that order in council 2115 affecting Asiatic immigration has been repealed, and that all persons coming to Canada will be considered on exactly the same grounds, without any question of religion or race or origin.

Mr. GLEN: Is it the hon. member's argument that we should repeal order in council 2115?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: And that all immigrants should then come under order in council 695, with the section dealing with Asiatic immigration deleted from 695?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is right.

Mr. GLEN: That is your argument?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is right. I feel that Canada cannot go to the meetings of the united nations and at the same time have discriminatory regulations, such as P.C. 2115, which apply to persons of Asiatic origin, and bar from our country the relatives of so many people. I am sure people in China can never accept the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Mines and Resources at their full value while they subscribe to that sort of legislation.

In the report on the second part of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations I noticed that Canada was forced to make a statement on November 25, 1946, regarding India's complaint against South Africa. While the name of the spokesman for Canada is not indicated, I presume it was our Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was chairman of the first committee on political security. If I am wrong in this, the minister will no doubt correct the record. But I suggest it must have been most embarrassing for Canada to take part in a discussion where India was justly complaining about racial discrimination in South Africa. On November 25, 1946, Canada's spokesman said:

> As it seems to me, we are all agreed that the item presently before this joint meeting has legal and political aspects of the first magnitude.
> The Indian delegation has proposed that this assembly call upon the South African government to revise its policy in respect of Asiatics in general, and Indians in particular, and to report to the next session of this assembly the action it has taken in this regard.
> The South African delegation does not deny that there exists in South Africa legislation which discriminates against Indians.

And further down:

> I must at the outset express full agreement with the delegate of China that the question of policy involved in this issue is of greater significance than the question of law. It does not follow, however, that we can neglect to give adequate consideration to the important question of jurisdiction with which we are undoubtedly faced . . . It is worthy of note also that article I of the charter states in clear terms that it is a purpose of the united nations to promote international cooperation in "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion." This is an unqualified obligation which rests upon each member of the united nations.

I submit that it is hypocritical for any delegate from Canada to stand before a meeting of the united nations and throw stones at South Africa, while we have a skeleton in our closet which proposes to have one set of regulations for people of Asiatic origin and other regulations for people of non-Asiatic origin.

The hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) on Friday made reference to a family in his constituency, and stated:

> In the city of London we have a Chinese family by the name of Wong, to whom I should like to refer. In that family are eight children, of whom three are doctors; one is now at Osgoode Hall a member of the legal profession, while the remaining four are in business in London. They are among the very finest of our citizens.

One of the members of the family was an interne in the city of Saskatoon, and I have heard from doctors and patients alike that she was one of the most brilliant young medical doctors they have had in their hospital. It could be argued with force that these three medical doctors, all of whom were born in Canada, are making a valuable contribution to our Canadian economy. It is proposed to bar the admission of such children, just because the father is not a Canadian subject.

So long as P.C. 1378 was in effect it was almost impossible for Chinese residents in Canada to get their citizenship papers. Not only had they to get consent of the central government in China, but they virtually had to repudiate the great country of China. Their applications had to go to the province, to the county, and then to the village. The people had it drawn to their attention that here was someone who had been born in China but who was now repudiating his country and wanted to take out allegiance to another country. It took months and sometimes years to get a final decision. And because of the red tape only a small number were ever able successfully to complete their papers.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is the hon. member advocating that we throw down the immigration bars and let them come in without regard to any regulations?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No; I am suggesting that we should put people of all races in exactly the same position. Canada has the right to decide who will come. But I object to having legislation which says that we shall have one law for Asiatics, another for Scotch, another for French, and another for people from another country.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You think they should all be treated alike?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If Canada is going to subscribe seriously to the principles of the united nations, then I say we cannot afford to have racial discrimination in our statutes, or to have orders in council which give effect to racial prejudice.

The hon. member for Middlesex East referred to the Wong family, which is fairly well known in this part of Canada. Hon. members might be interested in hearing about a Saskatchewan man who is not well known except in one small centre. I refer to Charlie Quan, who came to my constituency in the hungry thirties when people in the dried out areas were going north to settle in the bush country. He felt that he should go too and he found himself in a little place by the name of Somme, which suggests that it was settled by veterans of world war I. He had the only restaurant, the only sleeping quarters that were available to the public. He was cashier, waiter, cook and dishwasher; he ran the entire establishment. One day his total sales amounted to only five cents for a package of chewing gum, and on another day two chocolate bars comprised his total sales. The first time I stayed there the only sleeping quarters available were hard board bunks without any springs or mattress. However, there was no charge made for anyone making use of that accommodation; you merely paid for your meals. Out of his very small earnings Charlie was able to send money home to China to educate his children. His oldest son became a civil engineer. I have had correspondence with this young lad for a number of years. I remember his first letter was written while in high school, and he deferred sending it until he could have his English teacher check it. He mentioned to his father that it would be inexcusable for one who had had the advantages he had to make a mistake in English. I wish some of our Canadian youth were as anxious about the use of English.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why stop at the youth?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have in my file a letter dated October 30, 1937, from the younger Quan in China. This was written about six months after he had become an engineer. He says:

> China is a nation fond of peace. After the fighting had started, several attempts were made to obtain a truce but all failed and fighting broke out. Events revealed that Japan is prepared to challenge China, Asia and then the whole world. China resists Japan's aggression not only for the preservation of our territory and rights but also for the preservation of harmony and peace in the world. China is ready for the coming long war. In case of necessity China makes the supreme sacrifice. We don't care or don't smile when one town or village is lost or recovered. We wait for the victory in the last fighting.
> In the past three months Japanese forces gain in China was not equal to loss. We trust the longer the fighting exists, the quicker the Japanese forces decompose.

I must thank the Minister of Mines and Resources for making it possible a year ago for this young man to visit his father. He had been selected by the Chinese government to take post-graduate work in the United States—and he finally found himself in San Francisco. The Canadian regulations would admit him provided he was assured he could return to the United States, but the United States authorities would not give him any guarantee that if he left the United States his status would be reestablished. Although he had not seen his father for twenty years, although they were only a few hundred miles apart, he was reconciled to going back to China without seeing his father. However, through the kindness of the minister it was made possible for him to be admitted to Canada to visit his father, after which he returned to the United States where he completed his work.

I think a great injustice is done when by regulation we bar such persons as young Quan just because of race prejudice. I hope the minister will give consideration to repealing this order just as he did the other objectionable order, P.C. 1378. If he can do that, I am sure that people in all parts of Canada will feel that we have taken a step forward. Just as the passing of legislation in 1923 was one of the things which made international understanding difficult, the maintaining of this type of legislation makes it more difficult for the nations of the world to understand and appreciate each other's difficulties. In view of the fact that there are very few people involved, I think the minister should meet the request that comes from this section of the house.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speech delivered by my hon. friend. If I am not mistaken he is in favour of mass immigration from the orient.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I did not say that; I merely asked that the Chinese be placed in the same position as people of other nationalities. I did not discuss the broader question of immigration; I was asking merely for the removal of regulations which result in discrimination.

Mr. POULIOT: On that I agree with the hon. member. I think one of the best speeches made since the beginning of the session was that made in another debate about the Japanese by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). I speak as one who comes from the part of the country where there are the largest number of broad-minded people. I refer to the province of Quebec where no discrimination exists against any one. The people of my province have proved that on many occasions by electing English-speaking gentlemen in French-speaking constituencies. They were satisfied with them so long as they were satisfied with their policies. This should be known to all. On those occasions the province of Quebec proved to be broad-minded and without prejudice.

I wonder if this question of immigration is being considered as it should be. We are now discussing this bill and then we shall deal with the bill on housing. In my view we should have first settled the matter of housing and then we could see what we could do for immigrants. If we have no houses in which to shelter them when they come the situation may be quite embarrassing. The housing problem is far from being settled in spite of the splendid efforts of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). It is strange that when we discuss certain matters we consider first that which should be in the second place, and this is one example.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke a few days ago about immigration he said that transportation was limited. That is true, but transportation is not the main problem in connection with immigration. Transportation is a secondary problem; the main problem is that of selection. The hon. member who just spoke said that race should not be a consideration when the qualification of an immigrant was under review. He is perfectly right. There should be no question of race at all; the only question should be whether or not the newcomer will prove an asset to Canada. If a man has a good background; if he is willing to come to Canada and consider Canada as his country, then he should be admitted. It is only after that inspection has taken place that we should consider the transportation of that man and his family to this country.

We should not forget that the old pioneers of French as well as of British extraction were simply immigrants to this country. Champlain was an immigrant. Jacques Cartier was not; he was a navigator. Monseigneur de Laval, the first Quebec bishop, was an immigrant. He belonged to a noble family in France and was a chaplain at the French court. He could have done very well over there but he came here as an immigrant. So did many people of British extraction, but they decided to come and settle in this country, do their share in developing it and raise their children here. We are all the same. We have only to consider who the first pioneers in this country were to realize that we are all descendants of our ancestors who, the moment they decided to come here, made Canada the country of their choice. So I say that we are all descendants of immigrants, and we have no reason to be ashamed of that. It is the same in all the British dominions. In Australia, New Zealand and Africa, all the white people are descendants of those who went there from various parts of Europe, settled in those dominions and helped in their development.

At times we hear it said that we should have no immigrants. That is the point of view of some people, and while we may differ from it we must respect their right to their point of view. Any immigration we have should be selected immigration, selected at the source, and we should do nothing in our immigration policy just to please another nation. I do not see how our immigration policy should be related to the social, political and economic circumstances of other countries, even if those circumstances resulted from the war. We should consider the conditions in our own country and in each case we should consider the effect of the admission of one immigrant and his family to this country. How can we fix any quota on immigration now and say that we shall bring in so many displaced persons, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, one hundred thousand, unless they are all examined in the first place to see whether they will be an asset to Canada if they do come here?

We are not far away from the last war and there is still prejudice against some peoples of European countries with whom we have been at war. I understand that these effects of war last quite a long time. During the war we heard so much propaganda against the peoples of central Europe that we are still under the impression that they might make bad citizens and that we must ban their entry into Canada.

In Europe so many people have suffered deeply during the war and post-war that they want to get away from Europe. They want to go to another country where they can enjoy a liberty which they have not known in Europe for a very long time, scores and scores of years. They say: We will go to America or Canada, where life is different, where people enjoy liberty. That is a great tribute to our country. But in the first place, to those who have suffered from the evils of both wars in Europe and to those who have suffered from hunger and cold and from the lack of shelter we must show the conditions which they will experience in Canada and tell them how they can make good in this country. For instance, if Canada is described to them as a land of liberty, as a true democracy, they will be greatly surprised to find controls in force in this country when they come here. We must not disappoint them. We should tell them the truth about this country. Advertisements should not be used only to promote the interests of transportation companies, rail and water. There should be no exaggeration in the advertisements; the people should be told the plain facts about Canada. They should be told about our mode of living, and as far as possible—and I believe this is possible—we should aim to admit only those who have the same mentality as our own.

I have no prejudice against Chinese women, although no one in Canada will contend that the majority of Chinese women have the culture of Madame Chiang. It is a serious matter to open the door too wide to Asiatic peoples, because their mode of living is entirely different from ours and they may be miserable after they get into this country. That is not a matter of discrimination at all. I just put it to hon. gentlemen: Is the education of Chinese women the same as that of white women? It is entirely different, and perhaps Chinese women would be disappointed when they got here. That is an angle of the question to which I draw the attention of my hon. friend.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is what Ontario people say about the residents of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not compare them with Chinese women, but I will say that their education is much more like that of the residents of Quebec than is the education of the Chinese and I am sure my hon. friend will admit that, although he is a great humourist at times.

I can understand that the people of Europe who have suffered so much not only physically but mentally now want a change, and if they break their family ties and get away from the traditions which they have so long cherished in their native land, whether it be the British isles, France, Germany or any other country, it is because they want something different. They want to come to a country where they can breathe. I hope no one of them will be disappointed when they come to Canada; that here they will enjoy liberty and the respect of their fellow citizens, provided that there is room for them here. So long as we have a certain number of unemployed I do not see how we can bring into this country people from outside who will do at lower rates work which does not exist for our own people. The standard of life in Canada is higher than the average standard of life of people under similar conditions in Europe. Therefore our people need more to live on than do Europeans. Asiatic people need less to live on than do Europeans.

If our own people suffer from unemployment for any consideration, because there is less work, because the company cannot afford to keep a certain personnel, et cetera, et cetera, they have to say at home receiving the benefits from the unemployment insurance commission. What will they think of immigrants coming to this country by the shipload to take their places in jobs, in plants, in any kind of work? It creates discontent, and discontent breeds many troubles.

It is not the question of race which should be the subject matter of the inspection of immigrants; it should be the background. The inspectors should be qualified men to consider not only the physical health of those who want to come to Canada but also their mentality, because those who come here as subversive agents are the most dangerous of all, and Ottawa is a place for spies. We know about it. We were all put to shame on account of it. But there is something else. It is common knowledge that a woman who was under the roof of the high commissioner for the United Kingdom was a pink communist since 1932. She was there under the wing of all the high commissioners who succeeded each other, spying for another country.

Mr. JAQUES: What is her name?

Mr. POULIOT: My friend knows as much about the matter as I do. I will not insist upon it. He knows about it. I am stating a fact which is public; it is not secret, and it has been announced in the press. Those who do spying, subversive propaganda and others may be wolves disguised as lambs to get into this country and create trouble. Therefore the check must not be on the race; the check must be on the person who is coming here. That is one point which I wish to bring to the attention of the house.

Moreover, sir, what shall we do with the mass of immigrants who may come to this country? Will they be farmers? There is no room for them. There is very little room left for farms in the St. Lawrence valley, in the Ottawa valley or in the west. The best lands have been taken. The only thing to do is to develop the north and bring selected immigrants to the north. But, first, the north should be opened. We should have railways to go there. There should be surveys of land. Make a choice of the best possible land, the most fertile land. We should send prospectors to the north to develop the mines. Can one expect the immigrants to live as the first pioneers did who came to this country, and go to the north in a canoe and portage and all that? We should have roads for them. Therefore, unless there are better communication facilities with the north, I do not see how we can have mass immigration into this country. There is great wealth in the north. According to the explorers, including the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who spends so usefully his leisure time during the summer in visiting the far north, there is unsuspected wealth in the north. These are elementary considerations. If we are to bring immigrants to this country the coming of each of them should be such an asset to the country that he will repay Canada in some way or another by being a country builder.

If we have some difficulty it is precisely because the matter is not considered seriously enough. Some people would like to have only citizens of British countries come here. They know very well that in every British country, as in ours, there are citizens who belong to other races. I shall ask my hon. friends from the western provinces who are the best farmers that they have there. They will answer me quite rightly that there are some who are of every origin. If they take a farmer from central Europe, Hungarians and others, they will realize that they are progressive and they make a success of their farms. The same thing applies to those who come from countries nearer Russia, people from Germany, Italy and from all over Europe. Generally they do very well, and I do not see why they should be banned from this country when they would be an asset to Canada if they were admitted here.

I bring all these matters to the attention of the minister. He is an able man; he is gifted with that rare quality of common sense. I believe, too, that he is a good Canadian, notwithstanding the fact that he was not born in Canada. He is a much better Canadian than some who were born here, as I said to him also when he occupied the Chair.

We may naturally consider the question of refugees and displaced persons with Christian charity. We must do that, but the government should not be a benevolent society to assist all those who have suffered in Europe. It is a physical impossibility to do that. Because a man has suffered in Europe, it does not follow that he will become a good Canadian citizen. There must be something more than that. The fact that a man or woman is a refugee is not a qualification for admittance to Canada; not at all. But that is not to say that, because one is a refugee, he shall not be admitted to Canada with full honour if he has the necessary qualifications to show that he will be a good citizen and will live up to the expectations of the minister, the government and the population of this country.

I come now to the practical steps which may be taken within the present physical limitations imposed by transportation, and I say that we should not complain and say that the transportation facilities are not as good as they were previously. My reason for saying that is that it gives the minister the time in which to shape a policy of immigration. He may call it planning if he wishes; that is his own business. But it should be a well-thought-out and well-inspired policy. I do not believe in too great a moral obligation to assist other peoples of the world unless the people of Canada are well looked after and there is no unemployment in this country, at least in the technical trades. Assistance may be given individually by those who wish to do something; but, with the burden of taxation that we have, I do not see that as a nation we can any longer come to the assistance of the other countries of the world, especially when they snub Canada whenever she has a suggestion to make at the various meetings or conferences. If I say that, it is not because I have no Christian charity; it is because I think of my own people before thinking of others. I may be called a nationalist, but I believe that Canada is a country which exists and that Canadians should be looked after first; then, if we have something left over, we shall help others. I say that charity begins at home.

The Prime Minister mentioned some thousands who were coming here for early admission. What is the number? I will ask the minister these questions and he may answer me later. What will be the quota that Canada will accept as its share in meeting the general problem of immigration? What are the measures of productive immigration, and what is productive immigration as mentioned by the Prime Minister in his statement the other day? He said also the essential thing is that immigrants be selected and that their numbers be adjusted to the absorptive capacity of the country. What is the absorptive capacity of the country? How many immigrants can we accept, and where? They will land in Halifax, Montreal, Quebec city or Vancouver, but where will they go afterwards? That is not an academic matter. If a man, a woman and their children decide to come to Canada, it will probably be with the definite purpose of settling here. Therefore we should be ready to receive them just the same as when we invite them through the officers of the Department of Mines and Resources. They will be the guests of Canada until they settle down. But no one invites guests until he is able to offer them shelter and hospitality. That is the thing to think about, and I find that until now the discussion has been theoretical and vague; there has been nothing definite about what will be done with the immigrants after they have arrived in this country If Canada does not live up to their expectations, we shall be severely judged by them, and they will be right. They will have the right to blame the government and the people of this country for not delivering the goods when those immigrants come here.

I have tried to make a moderate speech, but this is a matter that I have been thinking about for a long time. I am not opposed to the change with regard to the Chinese, but China is a country which is still at war with the communists. How can we make the distinction between a Chinaman who is a communist and a Chinaman who is not a communist? To us, they all look alike. In addition to that, the admission of Chinese will perhaps be one means of the infiltration of communism into this country. We are not at war with China; they were our allies during the war. Part of that immense country of China was our ally, but the other part is at war with our ally. Whether they are supported by another country, I do not know; I presume so. But they are communists. If the minister seeks to prevent the admission of communist Chinese men or women, it will be very easy—in fact, easier for them than for anybody else—to defraud the inspectors and put it over them. When I say that, it is not because I hold any feeling of discrimination against the Chinese but because I think of the future. I do not want any communists, whether Chinese or white, to come to this country. That is my point of view. The same situation prevails among the populations of Europe. There are communists among the British people, just the same as there are among peoples of different racial origin in the other countries of Europe. Suppose we have to admit one who is a communist, or a pink communist, such as one who came on an official mission not long ago; the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) fixed him up, and I tried to do my best too. He was admitted with full honours. I need not name him, which would only give him more publicity, but he came to this country, paraded here, and was very well received. We even had him at the parliamentary restaurant upstairs, where he made a little speech. He was a pink communist, but was welcomed here.

I leave all these considerations with the minister and trust that with his usual good judgment he will make the best of the problem. With his usual care and patriotism I am sure he will see to it that immigration is not resumed for the sole benefit of the transportation companies or those whose business it is to secure permits for the newcomers. This debate has been conducted on a high plane, and I hope it may continue so. I hope this important question of immigration will be scrutinized carefully by all members of parliament, just as it is considered very deeply by the Canadian people at large.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): In opening my remarks upon this subject, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), to whose speech on Friday last we listened with great attention. I think everyone in the chamber must have been greatly impressed with his grasp of the subject and the sincerity with which he spoke, a sincerity due, I feel sure, to the personal knowledge he gained through an inspection of conditions in the displaced persons camps in Europe. I want to join with the hon. member in expressing fear lest this great announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—great although a year or two years late—may not be followed up by that energetic action which is necessary to translate into something concrete, a good policy, wanted by the whole country for a long time. So far we have had only the word; we have only gotten over the first hump, that of deciding that we are going to increase the population of this country through immigration. As yet we have not gotten down to the equally important business of translating that word into vigorous action. When the Prime Minister spoke he indicated that such action was contemplated. I want to express my hope that it will not be necessary for various groups of interested people and members of parliament to exercise the same pressure that has been required to bring the government over the first hurdle they had to surmount. In dealing with this subject the Prime Minister said, at page 2645 of Hansard:

> The government is strongly of the view that our immigration policy should be devised in a positive sense, with the definite objective, as I have already stated, of enlarging the population of the country. This it will seek to attain through the development and energetic application of productive immigration measures.

We shall attempt to hold the government strictly to that statement, and see to it that they do adopt the energetic measures they promise. There is very much to be done before this decision, great as it is, can be translated into effective action. The necessary action does not lie only abroad, in the opening up of new immigration offices and making some special arrangements with regard to these refugees who so greatly desire to come to Canada. If we are to bring a large number of immigrants to this country over a period of years a great deal must be done internally if we are to absorb sufficient numbers to carry out the purpose laid down by the Prime Minister. It will require considerable cooperation between the government, industry and labour. It will require negotiations with other governments. Above all it will require a large capital development of our natural resources, so that we may put people to work and give them a stake before they go on the land, as we probably hope most of them will do. We shall have to look to the north; we must see how we can stimulate prospecting and the mining industry generally, so that we can be sure of an ever-expanding number of jobs for people coming to this country. In a smaller compass we shall have to think in terms of assisted passages, special ships, and so on.

Then we must not overlook one important means of fostering immigration, to which I should now like to refer shortly; that is the scheme exemplified by the Fairbridge farm school near Duncan on Vancouver island. I am sure the minister knows about that scheme, but for the benefit of others who may not, let me say that it is a school set up for the training in Canadian ways of young boys and girls brought in from the British isles. The general policy of the school is set out in the principal's report for last year:

> It is to settle in Canada boys and girls of British origin, selected in England and approved by Canadian immigration authorities. The interpretation of the word "settle" by this administration is to give the children such education and training under conditions of home care as will fit them to earn their own living as responsible Canadian citizens.

I want now to read another important paragraph in order to bring the crux of the matter to the attention of the house and particularly to the attention of the minister:

> The extent of the education so given depends entirely on the funds available for that purpose whether supplied by the British isles or by Canada.

The school has been in operation for over eleven years, and has been very successful during that time, though all along it has been plagued by lack of funds; and it has not had any assistance from the dominion government. As at December 31, 1946, its strength was sixty boys and twenty-one girls. When it was designed I understood that its establishment was supposed to be fixed at 250. The difference, I suggest to the minister, is accounted for principally by the fact that funds for a much larger establishment have not been available. When one is considering the value of such schemes it is interesting to refer to the disposition of the graduates of the school in those eleven years. Of the male graduates, twenty-five per cent are now engaged in agriculture in Canada while four per cent are in occupations related to agriculture. Some twenty-one per cent are serving in the merchant service. We know how important that contribution was to our war effort. Then in industry and in business we have a further twenty-five per cent. The remainder are classified under manufacturing and building students, armed forces trades and miscellaneous. Of the girl graduates fifty-two per cent are engaged in applied home economics, twenty-six per cent are housewives and the remainder are classified under sales and service, business and nursing, manufacturing and miscellaneous. It will be noted that the majority of the graduates from this school have gone into occupations in Canada to which we sorely need recruits, and they have amply justified the purposes for which the Fairbridge school was established.

When one turns to the war record of the graduates, he finds it very good indeed. At the termination of hostilities with Japan, ninety-five per cent of the boys and thirty-six per cent of the girls eligible by age to volunteer to serve, had done so. I do not suppose that record has been exceeded by any other institution or group in Canada.

For this, school funds have been provided from two sources. Two-thirds are provided from Great Britain, and one-third comes from private donations by Canadian citizens, and by the British Columbia government.

The sums necessary to carry on the work for 1946 were divided as follows: private donations from Canada, $16,553, and a provincial grant of $12,500, making a total from Canada of about $29,000. From England the amount was $69,384. If this school is to be carried on in the future, and is to continue to make the contribution it has made toward training young people in Canadian ways and customs, it is urgently necessary that it be given further financial assistance in Canada. It becomes increasingly difficult to get funds from Great Britain and the total funds available have not been enough to fill up the establishment originally intended. There is a great field for the minister, not only in this one school on Vancouver island, but in the establishment of other schools operating on similar principles in other parts of Canada.

One of the energetic steps the minister could now take would be to look into this question of schools for the training of child immigrants in Canadian ways, and seeing to it that we have a continuous source of new Canadians brought in, in their tender years. There are many countries which at the present time are not willing to give up their manpower; but they would not mind making the young children available, if their parents wished them to come, so that they might have an opportunity for a greater future in this country. I hope the minister will take under his serious consideration, this particular scheme, and schemes of this kind, and perhaps make them one of his first energetic steps.

I wish now to turn to the matter of oriental immigration—Chinese immigration—for the sole purpose of refreshing the minister's mind on the questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when he spoke on Friday afternoon. I am anxious to hear the answers to these questions when the minister closes the debate, because they are most important to the people of British Columbia.

Dealing with the subject, the Prime Minister said this:

> I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a "fundamental human right" of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege. It is a matter of domestic policy. Immigration is subject to the control of the parliament of Canada.

Those words will be most reassuring to the people of British Columbia. The Prime Minister went on to say that the Chinese Immigration Act was to be repealed upon the grounds of a seeming discrimination against our ally, China. I would join him in any attempt to remove any possible idea that Canada discriminates against that or any other country which was our ally in the war. But at the same time I wish to point out to the minister that the step we are taking in repealing this act, despite the clear enunciation of our policy, namely, that we have control over our own immigration, is a serious step for the house to take.

The Chinese Immigration Act, which was passed in 1923, was not put upon the statute books suddenly, but was enacted only after many years of effort on the part of those who were facing the practical problems we have heard discussed at such great length. We are now breaking down a safeguard which has existed on the statute books for twenty-four years, one which has been most important to many people in British Columbia. I shall not go into detail on that point, because I think it has been fully covered in debate. However, under the measure now before the house it would be possible, simply by the repeal of this act, for the Chinese population in Canada to be tripled.

If members from British Columbia are to justify the letting go of this safeguard, not only must they be told the policy of the government as stated by the Prime Minister, with which I am sure most of us agree, but they must be told also the practical results they may expect from the application of that policy. We must not be left in the position where we do not know what will flow from what we do today. We want to know, in particular, if this is really a friendly gesture to our ally, or if it involves a major change in practice.

With that in mind I would refer now to the questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops. First of all, what is the situation with regard to the treaty with China? Have negotiations been broken off? Are they continuing? If they are continuing, do they include the subject of immigration? What relationship has the repeal of this act to the negotiations for a treaty with China?

Second, how many Chinese does the minister expect will come to Canada in 1947, 1948 and 1949 as a result of this policy? Will the policy permit wives of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin to be brought in when the marriage occurs after the date of the repeal of the act? I understand that we calculate most of our estimates of future population in relation to the year 1971, and I should like to know if the minister could make any forecast of what the Chinese population of Canada will be in that year and as a result of this policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, oh.

Mr. MERRITT: I hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs laughing, but in his statement the Prime Minister was able to forecast the total population of Canada in 1971.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite different.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since when have those two hon. gentlemen become experts in population?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a typical remark from Peel.

Mr. MERRITT: Perhaps the minister has the same information at his disposal as had the Prime Minister. Not only in connection with oriental immigration but in connection with our general immigration policy I am sure the house would like to hear from the minister about some of the practical measures which will arise out of the Prime Minister's statement. First, are we to control our general immigration on a quota basis? Second, how many immigrants, generally speaking, will be brought into Canada in 1947, 1948 and subsequent years as a result of the policy just enunciated. For instance, Australia made a forecast of how many they expected to bring in year by year, and I think the house would be interested in hearing what the minister has in mind.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in immigration for quite a number of years, and in the first speech which I made in this chamber in 1945 I made a plea to the government to adopt a large-scale immigration policy for Canada to be put into effect immediately our service men who were then overseas had been repatriated. Thus I was happy to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announce, on Thursday last, an immigration policy of considerable extent. It was one of the few government announcements which I have heard with which I was in entire agreement. In fact it would appear that the government had been studying our party's policy on this matter and had decided to adopt it. Be that as it may, they have seen the light and I trust that the policy as announced will be carried out energetically. I would have been even happier with the Prime Minister's announcement if he had outlined specific means by which the policy was to be carried out. However that is an omission which the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) will probably correct when he makes his speech.

In connection with displaced persons in Europe, I hope that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), as reported on page 2736 of Hansard, will be adopted and carried out by the government. He suggested that immigration offices be set up in Germany, Austria and Italy where these displaced persons are to be found. I agree thoroughly with him, because there is no use in setting up offices in places where displaced persons are not living. If we are to help these people by bringing in a considerable number as settlers, immigration offices must be located where they are or immigration officers must go to them. It is manifestly impossible for them to go to the immigration offices.

In this connection I should like to make a plea for the Balts, the former citizens of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. I understand that these people constitute the largest single group in the displaced persons camps in Germany. I understand also that a certain number of these people are of German extraction and, as the regulations stand at present, they would not be considered suitable immigrants to this country. I should like the government to wipe out or to pay no attention to that regulation which, I think, was made by some international organization having to do with moving these people out of Germany. I am sure that many of these people would make the best type of citizen. There is no question that a considerable proportion of our population of German origin have proved excellent settlers in this country, and I do not think we should hold the fact that they happen to be of that particular ethnic origin against these people and refuse to let them enter.

A considerable number of refugees are without relatives in Canada, and I have no doubt that many of these people are of the best type in the refugee camps. I hope that the policy as announced by the Prime Minister of bringing out relatives of persons now in Canada or workers for primary industries will not be carried out so as to exclude some of the best of the refugees in the displaced persons camps. I would much sooner bring out people who would make good citizens, who would make outstanding contributions to the life of this country, whether or not they have relatives here, than I would bring out a poorer type of refugee who happens to have relatives here. The suitability of the person and the contribution which he can make to this country should be overriding considerations when we are dealing with refugees.

The government gave financial assistance to the bringing out of certain Polish soldiers to this country, and I took it from the Prime Minister's statement that similar financial assistance would be given to some of the displaced persons now in Europe. I have no quarrel with that, but I should like to ask the minister whether the moneys which have been expended to bring out the Polish soldiers are considered as loans which they will be required to repay, or considered as outright gifts. My view is that they should be considered as loans, and I think the same thing should apply to the cost of bringing out refugees from Europe under the newly announced policy.

Financial assistance should, in my opinion, be extended in even greater measure to immigrants from the British isles. They follow our way of life; they have essentially the same laws and particularly they speak the same language. As a result, they are assimilated almost immediately upon arriving in Canada. In my view, one of the chief things to look for in selecting immigrants, no matter where they come from, is how readily they can be assimilated into the life of this country. There is not the slightest doubt that the people of the British isles can be assimilated much more rapidly than those from any other land, and therefore they should be given the preference. And so, Mr. Speaker, I say that when financial assistance is being given to people from any other country a greater measure of it should be given to assist people from the British isles. I am not advocating that the assistance should be in the form of straight grants but, if a system of repayable loans were put into operation to assist people of the British isles to come to this country, you would have a large number of applicants. Undoubtedly at the present time millions of people in the British isles are anxious to emigrate, but a very large number of them have not the financial means to do so, particularly in view of the extremely high cost of ocean transport. I would strongly urge upon the government that consideration be given to a scheme of financial assistance to assist immigrants from the British isles.

I do not know whether the government have on foot any scheme or schemes to secure transport, which has been one of the big bottlenecks in bringing anybody to this country. If they have, before they bring anyone from Europe or anywhere else they should use some of that transport to bring to this country the fiancees of our own ex-servicemen. I know a considerable number in that class who are still in Europe. I have been working personally for over a year on the case of a well-to-do farmer just south of Calgary. During the war he was overseas and immediately upon his return he pleaded to get his fiancee brought out. Well over a year has passed, and the last I heard, some two weeks ago, was that his fiancee was still in England and unable to get transportation. To begin with, there was considerable delay because of the difficulties in getting all her papers in order. That is one thing which the immigration branch, now that its staff is to be increased, should iron out, so that people can get their papers quickly. There should be no delay on that score, but there was a considerable delay in her case.

Furthermore, when the government makes special provision for transportation, the very first people who should be brought out are the financees of our ex-servicemen. I have never been able to understand why fiancees were not included with wives in some modified form of the provisions which were made for bringing the dependents of our ex-servicemen back to this country.

I am in complete agreement with that part of the bill which deals with the bringing of dependents of ex-service men to Canada. But there are some cases of hardship caused by too strict and literal an interpretation of the act. and perhaps because of the wording of the act, which I find is interpreted literally.

I have another case on which I have been working for well over a year. It is that of a Canadian of Belgian extraction. He came to this country at the age of four with his parents. He returned to Belgium in 1931 and got married. He brought his wife back to Canada and lived here until shortly before the war. They had a child and his wife and child went back to Belgium with him. He returned to Canada just before the war broke out, and she was to remain a few months longer and then join him, but she was caught by the German invasion of Belgium and remained behind the German lines throughout the war. This man joined the army in 1940 and was overseas for more than five years. He did not get back to this country until January, 1946. He attempted to get his wife out under these provisions for bringing out dependents, wives and children, but was turned down because the act says that they must be dependents of men who were married overseas. He was not married overseas and therefore was not considered to come under the provisions relating to wife and children. He was not allowed to bring them back under this scheme, and as a matter of fact had considerable difficulty in getting them back under any scheme. It took him a long time and eventually cost him about $1,000. I do not think the act should be interpreted so literally as to exclude a case of that kind. particularly when the man's wife and child had endured some five years of the German occupation. When we come to consider the bill in committee I should like to have an assurance that cases of that kind will be included or that the wording of the act will be changed to include them. This was a case where great injustice was done. I think the man should be reimbursed the amount of money he has paid out to bring his wife and child to this country. The treatment he got was a very bad return for a soldier who spent five years overseas and went through the entire period of fighting in northwest Europe.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to disappoint the minister by not allowing the bill to pass at this time, but I consider the subject matter of the bill so important that everyone in the house who is vocal should register an opinion upon it.

Mr. GREEN: We are all vocal.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to state, first, that I recognize the problem which was passed to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) that the immigration branch requires at this time a full-time minister. I do not think immigration can be properly handled by any one person who has to preside over all the ramifications of the Department of Mines and Resources, and if I were advising the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the appointment of a minister of immigration I would recommend the hon. gentleman who now occupies the post of Minister of Mines and Resources. I do not think the department could be in more capable or more humane hands. He has also demonstrated, while Speaker of the house, that he is very good at shadow-boxing among the different complexes to be found amongst members on all sides of the house. I believe he is sufficiently well posted in the art of diplomacy to handle this difficult problem of immigration, because it will involve many ramifications in the years to come. Whatever Canada is to be in the future will be determined by the people whom we bring into this country in the next few years.

I shall be as brief and as explicit in what I have to say as I possibly can. First, I wish to say that I see the question of immigration which confronts Canada today, in two ways. The first and immediate problem which has confronted Canada in the last few years is that of relieving misery in Europe. We were committed to undertake our proportionate share of that relief. Along with all the other countries which were our allies, we went to war for the purpose of liberating the oppressed peoples of Europe who were under nazi domination. Since the armies of liberation went in, about all we have succeeded in doing is impounding these people again. They are still in camps; they are still under military supervision; they are still wondering what is to happen.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced his new regulations a few days ago he said that the immediate concern of the Canadian government was to be that of bringing from Europe refugees and displaced persons who had relatives in this country who were able to provide for them if and when they arrived here. That recommendation must have been written by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), because it is a Scotch recommendation. They are able to come if they can pay their way; if they are not they can stay in the camps in Europe.

Judging from the discussion which has taken place in the house, one would assume that no people were brought to this country during 1946, and that if there were any they were carefully scrutinized on the basis of the announcement of the Prime Minister. That is not true. A few days ago I was surprised when I picked up a copy of the standing committee on immigration and labour's report, dated April 30, 1947. I found that, according to figures tabled by Mr. Jolliffe, deputy minister for immigration, in 1946 we permitted to come to Canada 117,798 people. They were not displaced persons. Of that number, 71,719 came in from the United States, Britain, and so forth. Britain and the United States contributed the largest number. Canadian service personnel dependents to the number of 46,079 came in. That is quite all right. They were legitimately entitled to come, because to all intents and purposes they were Canadians. But the 71,719 who were brought in were not selected on the basis of relieving misery in Europe. They were brought in here apparently because we needed them, not that they needed us.

If the principles announced by the Prime Minister in amending the regulations are to be followed out, then we have to do more than just announce principles. There must be a practical application of them. We have taken a lot of people in 1946, but we did not relieve very much misery in Europe. That should have been the first and immediate problem. After the war finished, I believe we should have started immediately and permitted anyone to come into this country who had relatives and friends here who were permitted to assume obligation for them. We have fallen down on the job very badly there.

During the past couple of years our immigration regulations have been restrictive. The reason for that was, of course, the building up of machinery in Europe through which we could work. Nevertheless the practical application of the regulations we may have had has been violated badly, in my opinion, by the government permitting by order in council two industrialists in this country to proceed to Europe and select for their own industries people to come to this country and work. This was done during the time when the house was sitting, during the time when a bill was on the order paper to deal with the question of immigration. During that time an hon. member who operates a textile mill in Quebec was given permission by order in council to proceed to Europe and to select for himself personnel to take employment in his plant. I believe that is something which should be condemned by every right-thinking person in the country. That is commercialized immigration. That will not help relieve the stress among people who are impounded and who have sacrificed everything they had in other countries for the purpose of preserving democracy and freedom in this world. In my opinion, that smacks of the old auction block, of the days of slavery, when the slave was taken onto the market—

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GILLIS: If it has any bearing on the subject before the house.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is the hon. member aware of the steps which the hon member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) has taken within the past twelve months to recruit Canadian employees to work in his mills? Does the hon member know that a number of—

Mr. GILLIS: That is not a question.

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member know what proportion of his mills are not operating because of lack of personnel?

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know, and so far as I am concerned no hon. member knows what steps he took or in what condition is his industry. The matter was arranged behind the scenes. Permission was granted him by order in council while the house was in session. In my opinion, this should never have been done, because the question of immigration was to come before the house. In answer to the hon. member's question, I wish to say further that if wages and conditions in the hon. member's textile mills will guarantee a living wage to workers in this country there are thousands of Canadian girls in Canada who will take employment in the textile industry.

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member think so?

Mr. GILLIS: I am sure of it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock, I was making some observations on our immigration policy. As I stated at the outset, I thought the problem was divided into two aspects. I was dealing with the humane aspect at that time and was being critical of the application of our policy along humane lines. I said that I agreed with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that one of our first obligations should be the relieving of misery in Europe. I was pointing out to the house that I did not think the attitude, as set out in the order in council, was a proper one in permitting industrialists from this country to go to Europe and commercialize, as it were, the miseries of the people that we relieved from the nazi regime. To me it is not a new thing. That has been the immigration policy in Canada, as far back as I can remember, in any industry; not only in the textile industry, but in steel, in coal mining and in the heavy industries particularly.

Mr. BENTLEY: And west coast lumbering.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. GILLIS: And lumbering, too. For many years the policy has been to allow those who wanted cheap labour to go to Europe or any other country they desired to go to and to bring into this country people who were worse off than ourselves, for the purpose of establishing low-wage standards for people to be employed in that industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I correct my hon. friend there? That is not true of the early days in Quebec; it is not true of the early days in Nova Scotia, and it is not true of the early days in Manitoba.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know upon what the minister bases his observations. But I do know it has been true of Nova Scotia at many times during my lifetime.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt my hon. friend again?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The three movements of immigration in Nova Scotia were, first, in 1621 when the barons of Nova Scotia were allowed to take possession of the esplanade of Edinburgh castle; second when the Hector came to Pictou in 1773; and, third, when Norman Macleod came out in 1817, and that had nothing to do with industry.

Mr. GILLIS: The history that is now being cited by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) is very well known to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have forgotten it, then.

Mr. GILLIS: My ancestors happen to go back to stock who were driven out of Scotland at that time for economic reasons and who chopped the trees off the province of Nova Scotia. But at that time there were no heavy industries in Nova Scotia. I am talking about the period after heavy industry was established in that part of the country, after the Scotch had come in there and laid the basis for those industries. The legislatures in Nova Scotia deeded over their heritage to the economic royalists to do that, and also the resources that they won at that time. Their heritage was taken from them.

I said a moment ago that on many occasions during my lifetime, after the establishment of the steel and coal industries in that province, agents of these companies went to Europe and brought in European labour; and it was difficult, on several occasions within my memory, for the mine workers, the steel workers and those employed in the heavy industries in that end of the country—and I think that is true of the whole of Canada—to hold the gains they had made over a period of years, because of the lack of knowledge on the part of these people who were brought in and the contracts which they were obliged to sign before they came in. That is the period I am talking about. This business of sending someone over to bring in labour from Europe is not something new. It is something that goes back at least thirty years in this country.

Mr. BENTLEY: And longer.

Mr. GILLIS: But at this time, in my opinion it is much worse to permit it than it was during those days, for the simple reason that I see an industrialist from Canada going to displaced persons camps in Europe in exactly the same way as I would see a lot of women crowding around Freiman's store tomorrow morning to attend a fire sale; only in this case it is a fire sale of human misery. Advantage is being taken of people who have nothing, where any door that is open to them is welcome. If we in this country are to take any people from displaced persons camps, for humanitarian reasons, it is our job to see to it that, if we have to take them in here, they will be given sanctuary and that, when they take employment in any industry, they take it upon the standards established by Canadians over the years.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what the idea is.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue that with you. You argue that in your own caucus and get the facts. We have not got them here.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you talking about?

Mr. GILLIS: I am telling you the story as I see it; and if you have anything to say which refutes anything I have said, you can get up in the house and put it on the record.

Mr. GRANT: Talk to the Chair.

Mr. GILLIS: The other angle of it is this. Our immigration laws are being exploited in many ways. I will give the house an example of what has been happening for the last couple of years. You have another form of backdoor immigration, particularly on your west coast. I have a clipping here from the Prince Rupert News, which is headed "World shipping racket exposed." What is happening there is that the merchant marine built up by the Americans and by ourselves is being sold to private interests. A ship which is commissioned in the United States by a private company will put aboard a United States crew. That ship cannot get a crew of any other nationality in the United States, because of their immigration laws. But that ship can go into Vancouver and discharge that United States crew—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he knows his remarks should be relevant to the principle of the bill which is before the house. We are not discussing the merchant marine. The bill before the house is entitled, "An act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act." The first section is to provide authority for the detention, guarding and bonding at the ports of entry and exit and while in transit, of parties travelling through Canada to some other country. The next section provides for the repeal of section 80 of the Immigration Act; and the third section provides for the admission to Canada of the dependents of those who have served overseas in the armed forces. Therefore I would ask the hon. member to discuss the principle of the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I am endeavouring to do, Mr. Speaker. I am talking about immigration; I am talking about backdoor immigration, and I am pointing out to the minister that the regulations, as we have them today, are being violated. I do not expect that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), with the department he has to supervise today, is able to be in touch with every section of this country and know what is being done by way of immigration. I was pointing out to him that a ship can come in Vancouver, discharge the United States crew, take aboard a Chinese crew or one of any other nationality, and bring them in for that purpose. They do that merely by registering under the Panamanian government. This article, which I need not read—no doubt the minister has read it, since it is in a newspaper from his own province—points out that the merchant marine of both Britain and the United States is being threatened because of racketeers who have registered under the Panamanian government for the purpose of getting around the immigration regulations not only of Canada but also of the United States, by commissioning these ships in that way. So the point I want to make is that this form of backdoor immigration is leaving Canadian seamen on the streets in Vancouver, while these ships are commissioned with aliens under the Panamanian flag. I am just giving that as a piece of information to show the minister that his regulations are not being observed as I think he would want them to be.

In regard to the long-range programme of immigration, I agree with the statement made by the Prime Minister, that we can take people into this country only as we are able to absorb them, and that, while we are taking them in, we should be careful to see that they fit into the economic structure of Canada. While I am on that subject I would point out to the minister that, before a long-range programme is undertaken on that basis, there is considerable checking up to be done in Canada. If immigration is to be carried on in this way it must be planned and integrated so that each province will be in a position to absorb its share.

I am going to speak for a moment about my own end of the country. I think it is about time the Canadian government endeavoured to organize the economy of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in such a way as to keep in this country the 15,000 Canadians we have been losing from the maritimes to the United States each year for the past fifteen or twenty years. That statement was made recently in the Nova Scotia legislature; it is not something I am throwing around. If we are to have a long-range immigration programme to bring people into this country, one of the first responsibilities of the government is to check our resources province by province; to develop those resources; to devise some method whereby our own poeple can be placed at work before more people are brought in and dumped into the ranks of the unemployed.

The situation in the maritimes is serious. There is plenty of land there, thousands of vacant farms throughout New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The rehabilitation of those farms is necessary. People in Nova Scotia would go on farms, provided that they could get some assistance. Therefore one of the first obligations of the government in relation to a long-range immigration programme is to check our resources province by province, so that the people who come in will be placed where they may be able to make their best contribution.

In the matter of immigration, Canada is faced with the problem that today we have only two provinces in which there is any industry. The centralization of industry in Ontario and Quebec is one of the things that will retard immigration, and until there is decentralization and the establishment of at least secondary or subsidiary industries both east and west to take up what the basic industries are producing, and immigration handled accordingly, in such a way as to balance the economy, we shall not get very far with it.

Just here I should like to say a few words about something said during this debate by both the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). I believe they made a statement which does not do very much credit to a member of this house. That statement is to be found at page 2702 of Hansard for May 2. The hon. member for Trinity was speaking, and had this to say:

> I am one who agrees with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who stated yesterday that Britain is an occupied country, occupied by an alien government. I am prepared to say that socialism in the years to come will add to Britain's many other burdens which have resulted from the war. We must now be ready to receive the torch from these people, to accept the "know-how," and to give them the freedom which they will be denied at home.

Coming from a Conservative member particularly, I believe this is a statement that should be expunged from the record, because it is an insult to over eleven million English people who exercised their right under democracy to elect the kind of government that is today functioning in Britain. I should like to call to the attention of the hon. member for Trinity and the hon. member for Macleod—

Mr. HLYNKA: The hon. member for Macleod did not say that.

Mr. GILLIS: He is quoted here as having said it.

Mr. HLYNKA: Read what he said.

Mr. GILLIS: He had better read what the hon. member for Trinity said. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal, which is not a socialist newspaper, quoting something it thought was good enough to take from the New York Times. The caption is "Courage and Liberation," and this is from the Journal of February 26, 1947:

> A noble tribute to Britain comes from the New York Times . . .
> "As a power, exercising dominion by force of arms, Britain has indeed grown weaker. She cannot now impose her wishes upon unwilling peoples. But this is not the whole picture—she no longer wishes to. The oak of British democracy, rooted in Magna Carta and the bill of rights, thrusting out new branches in the reform bills of the nineteenth century, in equal suffrage, in social security legislation, resisting the tempests of two world wars, has not ceased to grow. We may quarrel with the economic theories of the labour government. We cannot dispute that it is government of, by and for the people, and that it stands for a national conscience."

And further on:

"An old empire, in its imperial phase, is at its twilight. But the brave spirit which created it need not die . . . In its hour of darkness it breathes courage and liberation."

That certainly is not a statement from socialists; it is a statement from a Conservative paper, clipped from the New York Times, another conservative paper, which is at least fair enough—

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a Democratic paper, is it not?

Mr. GILLIS: Well, it is more or less independent, but it was reprinted in the Ottawa Journal. Without any further words from me, that slaps the hon. member for Trinity in the face for the small, weak, anaemic statement he made in reference to a government that was elected by a majority of the people in Britain.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I have listened to this debate for some time with a good deal of interest. I must say I support the statement of the previous speaker in reference to the present government of Great Britain and his criticism of the statement of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey). In one sense, however, they were quite correct. Britain is an occupied country, occupied by an idea whose time has arrived, and which no force can stop.

I was pleased the other day to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announce the government's immigration policy. From now on, in order to answer the many letters I receive in this connection it will not be necessary for me to put together a lot of pieces in order to inform my constituents as to the government's immigration policy. We now have a clear statement, and I am sure that, on the whole, the policy will meet with general acceptance in the house and throughout the country. It was the usual carefully worded, cautious statement, and at the present time I see very little to criticize in connection with it. But I believe it will take a period of time after that policy is put into effect before we can correctly assess it.

Much has been said this evening on this question of immigration, and I am going to be quite brief. Personally, I think our first obligation, as far as immigration is concerned, is to those people, regardless of their nationality, who have suffered because of their opposition to nazism. We must first of all give consideration to admitting those who have demonstrated by their past activities their loyality to democratic principles—and again I say, "regardless of nationality."

It has always been noticeable to me throughout the years that these racial antagonisms grow when people are at distances from one another, and when they fail to know and understand one another. In the district in which I live there are people of many races: Italian, Polish, German, central Europeans and people of British stock; and these animosities disappear when they get to know one another and work together for some common objective. I have noticed in my experience the wonderful effect of working in cooperative organizations, trade unions and farmer organizations, where they seem to overcome these racial animosities, and build up a spirit of fellowship, by working for a common objective.

Our top priority should be the victims of the nazi concentration and work camps. Before passing on, I wish to urge upon the minister that the many thousands of British veterans who served in this country during the war, and who realize what a great country we have, should not be overlooked. They and their dependents should be brought as soon as possible as immigrants to this country.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, and correctly, that an immigration policy, to be successful, had to be tied to some planning and development of our natural resources. So far as our immediate immigration policy is concerned, I am all for doing all we can to relieve the suffering of those victims of tyranny in Europe, for bringing them out, possibly to stay with relatives, or to live under temporary conditions until permanently settled.

Then, so far as our long-term policy is concerned, I am quite sure it will not be successful unless it is tied to a planned development of our natural resources. I noticed that one or two speakers in the Progressive Conservative party referred to that, although perhaps they avoided the words "planned policy", or avoided the word "planning." I believe, if this policy is to be successful, the government must take into its confidence large representative groups of people. We have to build up in them a spirit of working with a common objective, as we did during the war. We have to give local communities and the larger districts—the provinces, and Canada as a whole—a common objective to work for in the future.

I believe the government should take into its confidence veterans organizations, labour organizations, farmer organizations and employer organizations, and tell them what it is doing from day to day. It should also tell them what it proposes to do, and should seek their advice, thereby so far as possible enmeshing the people of this country in the putting into effect of the government's policies. If more of that is done we shall remove in some cases the causes of artificial differences, and give the people something to live for. I am convinced that the more the people are enmeshed in the administration of their own affairs, the better will be the development of this country.

Before concluding, may I say that when the minister speaks I suggest that he give the house more detail on this question of immigration. He should tell us where the government intends to locate immigration officers, the type of staff which will be used in those offices and how it will function, the procedure of selection, the forms to be filled out and the questionnaires used. It should tell us how it intends to make certain that no unsuitable person will enter Canada, the type of medical examination anticipated, and such things as financial standing, and matters of that kind. More than that, I believe that in a matter of immigration, in which all the people of Canada are concerned—and they are concerned in a successful immigration policy and the development of a successful immigration scheme—the government should make a periodical report, not only to the house but to the Canadian people, as to the success they are having in the development of the immigration policy, and in the distribution of these people throughout the country.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words about the bill under discussion, a bill which, as presented to the house, still permits a measure of discrimination. I am hopeful that when we reach the committee stage the remarks made by various speakers in the debate will cause the minister to consider an amendment to the bill to remove this discrimination. However the bill is a great improvement on the present legislation and, because of that, while still hoping the minister will see fit to amend it, I intend to support it.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few minutes to discuss this measure and, before I shall have finished, I crave your permission to bring one particular case to the attention of the minister.

During this debate we have heard much about doing things without discrimination as to race, colour, creed, sex and so on. These are not new words, nor is the expression a new one. It was adopted in the Atlantic charter by two of the greatest men of this age; it was followed at San Francisco, where the excellent representatives of this country attended. But I could not help wondering, as I sat listening, if all of us who use this expression, and affirm it, have been quite honest in so doing.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Idealism is a wonderful thing. No individual or no nation will get very far unless it holds these ideals high. But that is not the last word, because we live in a practical age. It is easy to say that if we all applied the golden rule to one another we would have no difficulty whatsoever. But unfortunately, sir, two of the most moving factors in human conduct continue to be fear and selfishness. As human beings we are far from perfect in our relationships with one another, or as nation to nation, continent to continent or block to block.

So I come back to this expression, "without discrimination as to race, colour and creed". It is a wonderful thing to say. It sounds well. I am not suggesting that anyone in the house has spoken, so to speak, with his tongue in his cheek. We speak about the coloured races and, with respect to them, we say that we want their immigration limited because they will not assimilate.

Let us consider our Jewish friends. I am proud to say that in the place from which I come there are many of them, and among them are some of my most intimate friends. I have discussed this problem with them. They say to me—and truthfully—"You say we are clannish, that we herd together". I say, "Yes, you do". The man I have in mind is an able man, belonging to my own profession, and he says to me, "I want to ask you this question: Why do we do it? The answer is: Because you compel us to do it".

Let us of the white race—and they are of the white race, of course—when we complain about others not being assimilable, admit that it is not the fault of those races. It is our fault that they are not assimilable into our life. I know I am not going to make any friends by what I say now, but I say that those people who rise to heights of oratory and accuse the government or anyone else of discrimination in matters of colour are not honest in doing so unless they are prepared to have their daughters marry these coloured people. That is tough, but it is realistic and it is absolutely true.

I turn now to the question of Chinese immigration, and I wish to say a word for my Chinese friends in the province from which I come. They are splendid citizens. You can go into any small town in Alberta and you will find that the Chinese with the store or restaurant is perhaps the most generous giver to charities, the largest subscriber to victory loans or to any community effort which you will find. In the city in which I live they are highly respected. Look over the crime annals of this country and you will find very few Chinese convicted of serious crimes. Just search your memory and you will find that there are few indeed. But I am not suggesting for one moment that, because of that, our doors should be opened wide to large Chinese immigration. I say that, not because of prejudice with respect to race or colour; I say it, because I do not believe it to be in the interest, selfish if you like, of Canadians living in this country. These statements are at least frank and, as I say, they will not do me any good in many places.

I go a step farther. We must stop somewhere. We must admit that what we said in San Francisco means that we shall open our gates wide and lose sovereignty in choosing those people we suggest may come to our shores. We must do one thing or the other. I am still one of those people who, having regard to the interest of this country, think we should be just a little choosy in naming the persons, races if you like, that we ask to come to this country. I do not think this problem is entirely an immigration problem. Take the Chinese, for example. Speaking only for the part of the country where I know them, I know they have succeeded. Why? Because they are prepared to work any number of hours a day in order to get themselves along. My hon. friends over here talk about planning, and I am going to have a word to say about it. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) had something to say about that.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am glad.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think you will be before I have finished, because I will convert you. The hon. member said a moment ago that we in this party had not mentioned the word "planning". I had not noticed that and I accept his word for it. Certainly we have not and I trust that we never shall mention that word "planning" the way that they use it. The word "planning" is a good word; it is an old word. Is there any business in the world, be it privately or corporately owned, that does not plan? Is the budget in this House of Commons anything other than a planning for the future? Are the estimates which we shall soon discuss anything other than planning the country's finances for the coming year? Nothing in this world succeeds without some planning, but the planning that hon. gentlemen to my left want is planning done by their little group to operate the lives of everyone in this country. That form of planning we do not want and I trust we never shall. Now I have dealt with their planning.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You did not even come near to it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I hear a young hon. gentleman over here say that I did not even come near to it. He is half my age, but I will shoot him or I will run him and I will beat him.

To come back to what I was trying to say before I was so agreeably interrupted by my hon. friend to my left, you cannot consider your immigration problem without considering your economic problem. By that I mean hours of work and all that sort of thing. Some people are willing to work long hours, and it is to their credit that they do so in order to benefit themselves in this world. I think you will find that nearly everyone who has succeeded in this world has not paid much attention to an hourly day or an hourly week of some proportion. My hon. friends over here keep saying, "Let us cut the hours shorter and shorter," and at the same time they want to welcome people who are prepared to disregard daily and weekly hours completely. There is a gap there which I should like someone over here to fill in after I have finished.

I agree with the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) and other hon. members on this side who have stated that we are having great difficulty in the operation of our present regulations. In other words, I think the difficulty is technical. Lest anyone should misunderstand me, may I pay a tribute to Mr. Jolliffe, superintendent of immigration, who has been kindness itself to me and has given every assistance he can. I have been dealing with him in connection with a case, as has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The facts are comparatively simple and I am going to give names.

There are two people by the name of Heimers who had lived for a long time in the city from which I come. This married couple worked for Picardy's, which is one of those lunch places that we have, which is owned and controlled in the effete east, which is how you describe Toronto when you want to be polite to them, which I rarely do. I am going to ask the minister to take a note of this case, and I want three ministers to take a note of it because it involves three different departments. These people went to Germany in 1939 to visit the parents of the husband, who lived in a town, the name of which I cannot remember at the moment. With them went a girl by the name of Scotland whose parents I do know very well. She was on her way to Switzerland to study at a university there. Heimers had return tickets both by sea and by rail and were on two months' leave from the positions which they held with Picardy's, having saved up their holidays throughout the years. While they were in Germany, war broke out. They endeavoured in every way they could to get home, even consulting the Swiss diplomatic people and seeing everyone with whom they could get in touch. Unfortunately, in one of our bombing raids the Scotland girl, who was not allowed to go to Switzerland, was killed by one of our planes going over Germany.

This man is a naturalized British subject. The wife's parents are naturalized British subjects and live outside Winnipeg. She came with her parents to Canada when a babe three months of age, and she was under the impression that she had been born here. They were arrested by the gestapo and served a term in gestapo camps. He was beaten and received all the usual treatment that prisoners get in a gestapo camp. He was there officially because he had sought to leave Germany and had failed to join a troop, the name of which has escaped me for the moment. He escaped from camp just before the Americans came. He escaped with his wife and nurse who helped them to get out, and he met the United States troops. I have copies of letters from United States officers saying that in the skirmish that then took place twenty-four Americans were killed and that, had Heimers not given them information, their casualties would have been numbered in the hundreds.

Somebody has done something with respect to this man that I cannot find out. I have recommendations as to his character from the police in the occupation zone, from United States officers. The reason given that he was not allowed to return was that his wife had not told the truth as to her citizenship and that she was, in fact, a Russian. She came here a babe in arms at three months of age. Her parents were naturalized and she thought she was too. She travelled on a Canadian passport, which they still keep in shape. While the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I were dealing with Mr. Jolliffe and receiving sympathetic consideration, we suddenly learned that the case was out of his hands. Why? Some other department of government is starting in to cancel this man's naturalization, and it has been cancelled, although he has not even been heard. He is told now that he can go to Berlin—I think it is Berlin—about the end of July and make his appeal.

I am not talking about people of whom I do not know something; although I do not know them personally, I know a great many of their friends. This man worked and organized one of those displaced persons camps for the Americans from May until July, resigned his job and started to go home. He cannot get to England. We are worrying about bringing people in from here and there. Let me in fairness say this. There may be something in this case which I do not know. The reason I do not know it is not because I have not tried to find out.

There we find these two people, Canadians if there ever were Canadians, imprisoned by the gestapo on account of a lack of sympathy with the nazi cause, and we cannot get them home. The man's naturalization is cancelled without his even being heard. With great respect, I want to know how this government or any agency of this government can cancel this man's naturalization without giving him an opportunity to be heard. An appeal at some indefinite time and at some indefinite place is just not good enough. I leave that. I have not mentioned it in this house, although we have been here for two and a half months, but in conversation with my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, we thought perhaps it was time that it was brought to the minister's attention. Let me again repeat that I have received no discourtesy whatever from the department, nothing but kindness and generosity in Mr. Jolliffe's treatment of me and, I am sure, of my hon. friend as well.

I now turn to the broad policy of immigration and I shall be only a moment or two. We heard the policy announced the other day and everyone has been loud in his praise of it. I am sure I would join that happy and cheering throng if I knew exactly what it meant. I can understand the short-range plan because that is simple. We are simply enlarging the field of relatives allowed in. We are all for that. I am quite sure that no one will deny that.

But what is this great long-range policy that we have heard of? I know it covers pages; but here is what it is in a sentence: We shall take what the country can absorb. That is it in one sentence. There is just nothing more to it. With that I am in hearty agreement. But—and here is where my planner friend, the hon. member for Kootenay West, might even agree with me, I think we should have something more than the mere statement, with which we will all agree, that we shall take as many as the absorptive capacity of the country can take. What is the absorptive capacity of the country? Is it one thousand, two thousand, ten thousand, one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand a year? I have not the least idea what it means and perhaps the minister would go into more detail when he closes the debate. I sincerely trust that he will, because no one will dispute that this country should have all the immigration that its absorptive capacity will permit—and that, we are told by people on both sides of the house, is an immigration policy showing great vision! It is just a trite phrase, a truism. It is meaningless, unless we learn from the minister who operates this department just what that means in numbers and in the type of persons that we are to absorb.

I want to point out—and in saying this I appreciate the difficulties of the minister and of the government at this time—that the last large immigration we had was back in the 1900's. I knew something about that, because I worked on a railroad widening dump on an extra gang with a lot of people who had come in at that time. But in those days we had free homesteads and our immigration came largely to settle on free land. Instead of people reading figures to me out of books and telling me how many millions of acres of arable land we have in western Canada, I want somebody to tell me where they are. I want somebody to tell me how close they are to a railway. I want somebody to tell me how much brush and rock there are on them. We are not living today back in the 1900's. We have an entirely different situation to meet, and it seems to me that the immigration which we now seek must go largely into industry in this country. This confronts us with an entirely different problem from that which we met back in the 1900's.

Therefore may I close by saying that I am glad the Chinese Exclusion Act is being repealed. I thoroughly believe that at some day this house must admit that the problem of British Columbia with respect to orientals is not a provincial matter but a dominion matter, in the same way that I say, with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia has ceased to be a provincial matter and is something which must be regarded as for the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and I do not always see eye to eye; but, as he has already indicated, it was by agreement between the two of us that we decided to raise this afternoon or this evening the case to which he has already made reference. He has given the particulars in considerable detail and little more needs to be added; but I would join with him in urging the minister, either through his own department or by whatever necessary contact needs to be made with two other departments, to try to have this case settled as quickly as possible.

If he looks up the record he may find one slight discrepancy in the account which was given by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I set it right so that the minister will not be able to tell my friend that he was wrong. It has to do with the status of Mrs. Heimers who did become a Canadian by the naturalization of her parents and who was a Canadian until she married. At the time she married, her husband had not yet been naturalized. He was naturalized later, but that naturalization did not cover her. She did not know that when she went to Germany. I emphasize the point, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has already done, that these people, possessing the German language, Mr. Heimers being of German descent, endured a great deal of persecution, as one can imagine, because of their refusal to cooperate with the German authorities while they were in that country during the war.

It does seem to me that the appeal which the hon. member has made and which I support, should receive thorough consideration in the hope that action might be taken at an early date. As he has indicated, our contacts have been with three departments, the Department of Immigration, the Department of External Affairs and the Department of the Secretary of State. I hold in my hand a letter which I received a few days ago from the acting under-secretary of state for external affairs, dated April 25, referring to this case and saying in part:

> Mr. Heimers requested that his case be heard by a commission of inquiry.

The letter explains that a formal notice that his naturalization was to be revoked had been served on Mr. Heimers. I quote further:

> This request was granted, but the office of the registrar of Canadian citizenship advised by telephone today that the case would not be heard until August, 1947, which is the next sitting of the commission.

In the meantime, according to letters which I have received from members of the family here in Canada, Mr. and Mrs. Heimers have been moved from one camp to another, and their plight is really as pitiable as that of any of the displaced persons about whom so much has been rightly said during the course of this debate. These people, however, are Canadians, simply away from home.

I might explain that my connection with the case arises from the fact that Mrs. Heimers has a sister in Winnipeg whom I know, and they have two brothers who served in the Canadian forces during the war, one in the army and one in the air force. All these things together make it seem a pretty pitiable case, and I do hope that the action which my hon. friend and I have taken in raising this matter in the house after so many months of contact with the departments concerned will result, in effect, in consideration being given to it at an early day.

While I am on my feet, I just want to add my voice to the expressions that have been given with regard to the progress we are making in eliminating racial discrimination from our statute books. I use that word advisedly. We are making progress. But the point that some of us have been trying to make is that the government will not get in the eyes of the world, if you like, the credit that it deserves for such steps as it has taken until it goes at least one little step farther. As the minister knows, until recently there were on the statute books of Canada three measures effecting discrimination against the Chinese. There was, first of all, the Chinese Immigration Act. Then there was the order in council denying to Chinese in Canada the right to become naturalized unless they got the permission of their government. Then there is order in council P.C. 2115. Of these three measures, two are now to go by the board. The bill before us, when it becomes law, will repeal the Chinese Immigration Act, and the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced the revocation of the order in council respecting naturalization. But that leaves upon the statute books of Canada order in council P.C. 2115, which still discriminates against people of Canada on racial lines.

I hold in my hand a copy of today's Toronto Globe and Mail. One perhaps should be quoting from the Winnipeg Free Press when he is addressing the government. Their pages are full of advice along these lines, but I quote this because it is current. The Globe and Mail takes the position that the government should surely go one step farther and give to all persons residing in Canada the same rights or impose against them the same restrictions without drawing a racial line. I quote the significant sentence from the Globe and Mail editorial:

> There should be no restrictions on human beings of any race or national origin living in Canada which do not apply with equal weight and effectivness to all.

I hope that when the minister replies in this debate he will tell us whether any consideration is being given to the repeal of P.C. 2115.

Mr. GLEN: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: This afternoon the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was speaking along the same line as the hon. member is now. I asked him this question: Did he advocate the repeal of order in council 2115 and thus bring all immigrants under order in council 695? I asked him then: Would he then have immigration under order in council 695 with the clause regarding Asiatic immigration deleted from it? And his answer was, Yes. Is that the hon. gentleman's answer?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. I would make definitely the same answer. There is no reference to Asiatics in P.C. 695.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was not the question asked.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reference to Asiatics is in P.C. 2115. If I have misunderstood the minister's question I should be glad to have him put it again.

Mr. GLEN: The last sentence of P.C. 695 reads as follows:

> The provisions of this order in council shall not apply to immigrants of any Asiatic race.

I asked the hon. member for Mackenzie if all immigration then would be brought under order in council 695 and whether he was in favour of the deletion of the clause regarding Asiatic immigration and his answer was, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry; I did not understand the minister's question. My answer to both parts of it is, yes, and I hope that when the minister replies at the close of this debate he will tell us what the attitude of the government now is toward P.C. 2115; whether they will consider revoking it, and if not whether the government can suggest some further move, some compromise step, if you will, that might go a little bit farther toward removing these racial discriminations within our own country.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I wish to say a few words on this immigration bill. I come from a riding which, during the last war, sent as many men per capita as any rural riding in the Dominion of Canada. There are many families in my riding who sent four boys, and that is a record to be proud of. The population of my riding is mostly British, although some are Polish, Ukrainian, Swedish, Norwegian and German; and I must say that out of this great melting-pot they have emerged as true Canadians.

Last spring I had the pleasure of attending a reception in one township largely populated by Mennonites, and I was struck by the loyalty of these boys and the number enlisted as they came forward to receive their gifts presented by the township in appreciation of their sacrifices for Canada. I remember well speaking to one of these settlers; he was the father of one of these boys. He told me that his father stole out of Germany at the age of seventeen, came to Canada, took up a bush lot, and out of the forest hewed a home for himself and his family. That these people have contributed much to our country, cannot be disputed. One needs only to drive through this district to see the fine barns and houses which have been erected.

I would ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) if offices where prospective immigrants may apply will be set up in England, Scotland and Ireland as well as in other countries mentioned. In this connection we should not forget that the Norwegians, the Swedes and the Danes blend well with our people. True, we must help with the displaced people of Europe, but we must see to it that we are not bringing to our shores those who are communistic in any way. That is the real danger. I am sure that the government will guard against this. We must build in Canada a nation of truly democratic people so that we may become a great nation. We have plenty of room and many vacant farms. I think an immigration policy along selective lines is the one for Canada. We want more people to use our products, to work in the factories and on the farms.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that when the minister speaks, he will close the debate.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must say, in the first instance, that I think this debate on immigration has been really worth while. I am indeed glad to have the expression of opinion which has been given from all sides of the house with regard to it. To me, the one surprising thing was the unanimity, the agreement that there was about the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on May 1. That statement was, of course, the result of constant and close attention given to the many problems arising. It was felt—and I think all will agree—that it should come with the authority of the Prime Minister, and he made the statement for the government.

When opening the debate on this bill I did not speak at any great length, because I was of the opinion then, as I am now, that when I was dealing with a bill of this kind my duty was to confine myself to the terms of the bill, and that a general discussion of immigration on that bill was entirely out of order; and I expressed myself to that effect. But during the course of the debate it has broadened out, and has become a debate on immigration in general. Therefore I shall have to reply to many of the things which have been said, hoping that when we come to the bill we shall be able to confine ourselves to it.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was critical of my attitude in that respect. But I think he will agree with me that the attitude I took then was the proper one in the circumstances with regard to a bill such as this. I said then that the effects of the bill and the provisions of it I would be able to deal with in committee when we got to it; and I hope I shall be able now to deal with the criticism and the suggestions that have been made by hon. members, and do so within the time limit this time, although I may have to ask the consent of the house to extend it.

First of all, I would point out that when hon. members are talking about policy with regard to immigration, sometimes that term is loosely used, and what they are really asking for are amendments to the regulations under which our immigration policy is carried out. For the purposes of the record I think I should state now just the steps which have been taken with regard to immigration. From 1930 on, as everyone knows, there has been very little immigration. In that year, 1930, the Bennett government passed order in council P.C. 2115. That is the one which has been discussed a great deal by hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. party. That order provides as follows:

> From and after the 16th August, 1930, until otherwise ordered, the landing in Canada of any immigrant of any Asiatic race is hereby prohibited except as hereinafter provided:
> The immigration officer in charge may admit any immigrant who otherwise complies with the provisions of the Immigration Act, if it is shown to his satisfaction that such immigrant is—
> The wife or unmarried child under eighteen years of age of any Canadian citizen legally admitted to and resident in Canada, who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents. Provided—
> And this proviso is the one that is a matter of concern at this moment.
> —that this regulation shall not apply to the nationals of any country in regard to which there is in operation a law, a special treaty, or agreement, or convention regulating immigration.

This order in council contained a proviso, as will be noted, which made it not applicable to persons of Chinese race, their admission being governed by the Chinese Immigration Act which we now have before us.

On March 21, 1931, the Bennett government passed order in council P.C. 695, which set forth the provisions under which immigrants may land in Canada and which drastically reduced immigration into the country. Certain amendments have been made by the present government. The consequence of the passing of P.C. 695 and P.C. 2115 was to diminish immigration to a trickle, and the machinery for immigration was greatly reduced. When the war came in 1939, naturally all immigration from the continent of Europe ceased. The position in Europe today, two years after the war, is still chaotic. Travel is difficult and, in many cases, impossible. Frontier difficulties are extremely great, and the immigration authorities have found great difficulty in reestablishing their inspectional facilities on the continent.

The first duty of the government was to arrange for the return of service men and their dependents. This was accomplished in a shorter period than was ever contemplated, and the government was immediately faced with requests for the entrance of many people resident in Europe who had relatives in this country. Nine months after the finish of hostilities, the government widened the door to permit the entry of certain classes of relatives of these residents of Canada. The government believed that it could give relief to the anxieties of many of our residents and citizens by permitting the entry of their relatives, and that these should have a priority for entry from abroad. Further, these new immigrants could be accommodated with their relatives, and thus would not render more difficult the extreme shortage of housing, because at that time the housing problem was acute. Therefore order in council P.C. 2071 was passed on May 28, 1946, adding to the classes of immigrants who might enter Canada:

> The father or mother, the unmarried son or daughter eighteen years of age or over, the unmarried brother or sister, the orphan nephew or niece under sixteen years of age, of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relatives.
> The term "orphan" used in this clause means a child bereaved of both parents.

Since that date, following representations made by many people in Canada and after investigation by officials, the government decided to enlarge the provisions of the regulations with regard to the admissible classes of relatives and also to include and provide for the admission of other categories of occupational groups whose entry was desirable. Accordingly on 30th January of this year P.C. 371 was passed, providing for the admission of the wife, unmarried son, daughter, brother or sister, father or mother, widowed daughter or sister with or without unmarried children under eighteen years of age, orphan nephew or niece under eighteen years of age, of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relatives. The term "orphan" used in this clause means a child bereaved of both parents.

This order in council further provided for the admission of (a) an agriculturist having sufficient means to farm in Canada; (b) an agriculturist entering Canada to farm, when destined to a father, father-in-law, son, son-in-law, brother, brother-in-law, uncle or nephew engaged in agriculture as his principal occupation, who is in a position to receive such immigrant and establish him on a farm; (c) a farm labourer entering Canada to engage in assured farm employment; and (d) a person experienced in mining, lumbering or logging, entering Canada to engage in assured employment in any one of such industries. The last order in council was presented by the Prime Minister when he made his statement the other day. It substitutes paragraph 3 and makes the following as the regulations under which immigration will be coming to Canada. It provides for the husband or wife, the son, the daughter, the brother or sister together with husband or wife and unmarried children, if any; the father or mother, the orphan nephew or niece under twenty-one years of age of any person legally resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relatives. The term "orphan" used in this clause means a child bereaved of both parents; and 5: a person entering Canada for the purpose of marriage to a legal resident thereof, provided that the prospective husband is able to maintain his intended wife.

In order to cope with what undoubtedly would be greatly increased immigration, it was recognized that steps had to be taken immediately to set up inspectional services in Europe. This was no easy matter. Suitable accommodation had to be obtained, and what would have been simple in pre-war days became a major problem in war-ravaged Europe. There were further delays in the necessary negotiations with the different governments in the countries where these inspectional facilities had to be set up, but by the end of 1946 those facilities were established in France, Belgium and Holland, and facilities for examination were established by Canadian missions in Norway, Denmark, Greece and Portugal. Also facilities are now available for Switzerland and Czechoslovakia, and it is expected that arrangements will be made for Poland shortly. With every possible dispatch the department is completing the administrative details to cope with the large immigration created by these wider and amended regulations.

I was much interested in listening Friday evening to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) give an account of his recent experiences in Europe. The hon. gentleman probably left Germany before our inspectional teams went into that country, and the other evening he asked what arrangements if any had been made by this government with regard to refugees in that country. Prior to the war, under its mandate the IGCR dealt with persons who fled from their country of residence or citizenship before the second world war for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political oppression. During the second world war the mandate was extended to include additional displaced persons; persons who, as a result of the action of the nazi or fascist regimes, were deported from or obliged to leave their country of nationality or former residence for forced labour or other causes; persons who have resided in Germany or Austria, being of Jewish origin, or foreigners or stateless persons victims of nazi persecution. The mandate does not include nationals of enemy countries, volkdeutsche, prisoners of war in allied hands, war criminals, traitors, persons who have assisted enemy forces, and those who fled into Germany to avoid falling into allied hands.

The hon. gentleman asked, why not set up immigration offices in Germany, Austria and Italy? There would be no advantage in setting up regular immigration inspectional offices in those countries at this time, because prospective immigrants could not proceed to such points of examination. Those enemy countries are under military control, and residents cannot move freely from place to place. The department now has two inspectional teams in Germany examining displaced persons whose cases have been approved. The intergovernmental committee on refugees locates these prospective immigrants, obtains travel permits, et cetera, and transfers them to convenient centres for examination by the examination teams. These teams will also operate in Austria, and possibly in Italy in the same way.

On Friday the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) made reference to persons of German ethnic origin, but who are not German nationals, who are now in occupied territory. It is quite true that the IGCR is not empowered to deal with these people. The Canadian government, however, is prepared to accept as immigrants those of this category who are otherwise qualified for admission to our country. Canadian immigration officers have been directed to facilitate their entry. It is, of course, difficult under present circumstances to take effective action. We are, however, doing what we can to solve this problem.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister to make a statement in reference to immigrants from Yugoslavia and Greece?

Mr. GLEN: Yugoslavia and Greece are not alien enemy countries, and therefore they will fall into the same category. As far as Greece is concerned, we may have immigration now, and we have offices in Greece in order to examine applicants there. We have no inspectional facilities set up in Jugoslavia, and therefore I cannot deal with them now.

At this stage, perhaps I should refer to some questions I was asked, before dealing with the bill. I was asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), what is to be the effect of control on Asiatic and Chinese immigration? The hon. member suggested that P.C. 2115 is not enough, and that it could be repealed. That is true; it could be repealed, but I would refer the hon. gentleman to the statement made by the Prime Minister, in which at page 2646 of Hansard he said:

> I wish to state quite definitely that, apart from the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act and the revocation of order in council P.C. 1378 of June 17, 1931, regarding naturalization, the government has no intention of removing the existing regulations respecting Asiatic immigration unless and until alternative measures of effective control have been worked out. Canada recognizes the right of all persons seeking to become permanent residents. We claim precisely the same right for our country.

I think that answers that question.

The other question the hon. member asked was, "I would like to ask the Prime Minister what has happened to that treaty"—meaning the Chinese immigration treaty—"and why has the treaty not been concluded. Is the matter still open, and is it intended to conclude such a treaty?"

The answer is that up to the present it has not been found possible to reach agreement on the basis of a treaty that would be satisfactory to both countries. The matter is still open for further negotiation. And I think the sentence I have already read with regard to the Canadian government's being prepared at any time to enter into negotiations with these countries for special agreements for the control and admission of immigrants on a basis of complete equality and reciprocity answers that question.

The other question the hon. gentleman asked was, "Does the present order in council, in the light of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday, mean that all the wives and families of those Canadian Chinese now resident in Canada shall be permitted to come to Canada when this bill is repealed and the order in council is in force as the only means of governing Chinese immigration?"

The answer to that is that the wives, and the children under 18 years of age, of Canadian citizens, can come to Canada.

Then the hon. gentleman asked another question regarding the influx of these numbers and what it would mean, and whether they would all be in this year. I will reply to that later.

I should like now to deal with the question of what it has meant in the way of extension of the regulations by way of immigration. We have admitted to Canada, since the war ended, up to December 1946, immigrants to the number of 77,693, or equal to those admitted during the five-year period from 1935 to 1939; and this during the time when we were in the throes of transition from war to peace. I take it that these regulations will probably be sufficient to cover more immigrants than those for whom there is transportation available.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the minister mean the average of those years from 1935 to 1939, or the whole period?

Mr. GLEN: The total of those admitted during that five-year period.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Has the minister a breakdown of that?

Mr. GLEN: I have not, but it can be obtained.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is a total?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, that is a total.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), after reading the provisions of the first two orders in council, expressed what seems to be the opinion of many, when he said that the minister had surely opened the door.

I should like now to deal with the bill before the house, because, after all, that is the only matter before us with which the house is called upon to deal.

According to the census of 1941, there is in Canada a total Chinese population of 34,627. Of these, there are 30,713 males and 3,914 females. They are settled by provinces as follows:

Prince Edward Island	45
Nova Scotia	373
New Brunswick	152
Quebec	2,378
Ontario	6,143
Manitoba	1,248
Saskatchewan	2,545
Alberta	3,122
British Columbia	18,619
Yukon Territory	3

The Chinese male population, married, is 23,556; the Chinese male population, single, is 5,866; the Chinese female population, married, is 1,177, and the Chinese female population, single, is 2,569. The separated, divorced or widowed number 1,459. There are 6,694 persons of the Chinese race born in Canada, who are therefore citizens of Canada, and 2,055 persons naturalized. This makes a total of 8,749, leaving approximately 26,000 of Chinese origin in Canada who are not Canadian citizens.

I do not develop these figures, and for two reasons: first, I have not been able to obtain a breakdown of those who are Canadian citizens according to conjugal status and sex and, second, because one would be more or less venturing into the realm of speculation by further development of the known figures.

However it has been estimated—and the house must understand that the following are purely estimates; the census of 1941 records that there are 2,202 females in the age group under nineteen years of age. This reduces the number of persons of the Chinese race who would be eligible to bring wives and children to Canada, under P.C. 2115, to a maximum of 6,547.

Of the 6,547 I have just mentioned—

(1) There are men who are married in Canada and whose wives reside with them. These are estimated at 300.

(2) There are men who brought their families to Canada before 1930. They are estimated at 700.

(3) There are Canadian-born males who will marry Canadian-born females, estimated at 2,000.

These three groups represent an estimated 3,000 persons. If these figures are substantially correct there are in Canada about 3,547 Canadian citizens of the Chinese race who will be eligible to bring their wives and families to Canada. One must take into consideration also that some of this number are not yet old enough to marry.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked the question whether a single person could proceed to China, marry there, and then bring his wife to Canada, under the provisions of order in council P.C. 2115.

The answer is yes, provided that the man is a Canadian citizen.

A second question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South was as to whether it would be permissible to bring to Canada "picture brides." The answer is, no.

Mr. GREEN: What about the Chinese in Canada now who becomes naturalized from this date forward? He can then bring his wife and children in?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, he can. I would point out that of the 26,000 who still remain in Canada, who are not citizens, and therefore do not obtain the benefit of this legislation until they become citizens, it will be a purely speculative effort to state how many may become citizens of Canada. The hon. member's guess would be just as good as mine in that respect.

Mr. GREEN: How many of them are now married?

Mr. GLEN: Of the 26,000?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: All I have here are the census records, and the figures I have already given. The number of persons who would be eligible to bring wives and children to Canada is now reduced to a maximum of 6,547.

Mr. GREEN: The minister should have the figures of married males in Canada, and of married females in Canada.

Mr. GLEN: I gave the figure of 23,556, for the Chinese male population, married.

Mr. GREEN: And only 1,177 females married?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, 1,177 females are married.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member wait until we reach the committee stage to ask his questions of the minister.

Mr. GLEN: As I said, the hon. member's guess in these matters is just as good as mine. If the proportion of the estimate which I have given would be eligible if the Chinese act were repealed meant approximately one-third, then it would mean one-third of 26,000 might take advantage of the law and become Canadian citizens. The families such citizens would have in China and the children under eighteen years of age are unknown, and therefore the number must, as I have already said, be in the realm of speculation.

I should like to address myself to the remarks of the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and those made today by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When the bill was first introduced on February 11 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar used pretty strong language in referring to what he termed "hoax" and "hypocrisy". As reported on page 331 of Hansard, he asked that P.C. 2115 be repealed and that citizens, regardless of race or creed or colour, be placed on the same footing in this country. After reading a press statement, he went on to say:

> What do we find upon examination of this measure? That discrimination is to remain unless, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested this afternoon, we bring all our immigration under order in council P.C. 2115 instead of order in council P.C. 695. Because if we fail to remove this limited Chinese immigration from P.C. 2115 and bring it under P.C. 695, what have we? We have renewed discrimination: That a resident in Canada of Chinese origin must be a Canadian citizen before he can bring his wife and family into this country, whereas a Canadian resident of European origin can bring his wife and his children under eighteen years of age into this country, whether he is a citizen or not. To remove discrimination we must make the choice.

Well, now, what does that mean? P.C. 2115 was passed on September 16, 1930, by the Bennett government for the purpose of dealing with the entry of Asiatics into this country. That order, which I have already read, provided that the regulations should not apply to the nationals of any country in regard to which there was in operation a law or special treaty or agreement or convention regarding immigration. Such a law now exists with regard to the Chinese and will continue to exist until the house repeals the Chinese Immigration Act by Bill No. 10, which we are now discussing.

By repealing P.C. 2115 the hon. member has proposed to remove discrimination between Europeans and Asiatics and to place that Asiatic immigration under the provisions contained in P.C. 695. That has been emphasized this afternoon by both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Mackenzie. His last sentence in the paragraph I have read, reads, "To remove discrimination we must make the choice." Supposing we made that choice and removed the discrimination to which the hon. member refers. All Asiatics would then be entitled to apply to be admitted as immigrants who could comply with the provisions of P.C. 695. Take one category only—and others are equally applicable to Asiatics—that of a farm labourer entering Canada to engage in assured farm employment, as an example. Would any one doubt that many thousands of Chinese could qualify as such?

The house will recall that I asked both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Mackenzie if their argument was to repeal P.C. 2115, leave all immigration under P.C. 695 and delete from P.C. 695 the clause which provides that the provisions of the order in council shall not apply to immigrants of any Asiatic race. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not understand my question, so I stated it again to him and I think he understood it.

Mr. FULTON: What was his answer?

Mr. KNOWLES: The answer was, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In both cases.

Mr. GLEN: I wonder if the hon. gentleman realizes what his words meant? I am speaking now of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. If what he meant in his argument to remove discrimination was as I have already stated, then certainly the only method which he must propose to remove that discrimination of which he spoke as between Europeans and Chinese is that the law should state that no Canadian resident of European origin may bring his wife and minor children into this country unless he is a citizen. He said, to remove discrimination we must make the choice; that is, the government must make the choice. I suggest to these hon. gentlemen that to remove discrimination they must make the choice as to whether they will include Asiatics in P.C. 695 and grant them all the privileges now enjoyed by European immigrants or, conversely, to remove that discrimination between these people and take from the Europeans, the Ukrainians, the Poles and all those from continental Europe the privileges which they have enjoyed for so many years under the law. The government would have to repeal the provisions concerning Asiatics as contained in P.C. 695.

These extensions, or widening of the doors as some call it, were made because of widespread opinion throughout the country that we should take some steps to assist people in Europe who were relatives of residents and citizens of Canada. The repeal of that order would not, I think, meet with very much approval. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar gave as his opinion on February 11 what I have quoted, but shortly thereafter he had somewhat of a change of mind. His oratorical outburst brought doubts and the apostolic certainty with which he then spoke required modification. In any event, the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday evening, February 15, reported an interview which he had given and in which he is reported to have said:

In conformity with the united nations charter there should be equality of treatment for all foreigners under Canadian immigration law.

Further on, he is reported to have said:

However, equality of treatment as to admission to Canada having been established by law, he favoured "gentlemen's agreements" being made with India and China on a reciprocal basis to govern the numbers of East Indians and Chinese to be admitted to the dominion.

[Mr. Glen.]

In a further paragraph it is stated:

Mr. Coldwell agreed that the acid test of assimilability is intermarriage but, he added, neither the Chinese nor the Indian governments favour intermarriage of their nationals coming to Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is wrong with that? There is no conflict there between what I said in the house and what is reported in the newspaper. You are trying to make something appear which does not appear.

Mr. FULTON: So did you.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is no conflict there. A gentleman's agreement is not discrimination.

Mr. GLEN: I was dealing with the hon. gentleman's speech on February 11 when he was referring to "hoax" and "hypocrisy" with regard to the use of discrimination. I asked a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Mackenzie today, if their argument was to repeal P.C. 2115 and to have immigration brought under P.C. 695, which was, I take it, the argument which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had made on February 11, deleting the sentence at the end referring to Asiatics—

Mr. KNOWLES: And they both said, yes.

Mr. GLEN: Yes, they were in agreement with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I was pointing out that the repeal of P.C. 2115 meant that all the regulations with regard to immigration would come under P.C. 695, and that the deletion of the sentence at the end referring to Asiatics would give Asiatics the same right of entry into our country as Europeans obtained under the law. I pointed out that that would be the effect of the policy advocated by the hon. gentleman, and that, conversely, if he did not want that, he would have to remove the discrimination between Asiatics and Europeans by denying to Europeans the rights they have hitherto had under the law to obtain entry into Canada and bring in their wives and children.

The hon. gentleman asked the government to take its choice. The government is taking its choice. The choice is being taken by asking the house to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act, and the control will then be placed under P.C. 2115.

As to the admittance of Chinese residents in Canada to the privileges of citizenship, the impediment, which was almost insuperable, has been removed by rescinding the order in council requiring them to have the consent of the minister of the interior. The government has made its choice and it is in conformity with the policy stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the house on May 1, at page 2646 of Hansard, where he said:

I wish to state quite definitely that, apart from the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act and the revocation of order in council P.C. 1378 of June 17, 1931, regarding naturalization, the government has no intention of removing the existing regulations respecting Asiatic immigration unless and until alternative measures of effective control have been worked out. Canada recognizes the right of all other countries to control the entry or non-entry of persons seeking to become permanent residents. We claim precisely the same right for our country.

I wish to make it equally clear that the Canadian government is prepared, at any time, to enter into negotiations with other countries for special agreements for the control of admission of immigrants on a basis of complete equality and reciprocity.

The government has made its position clear.

The hon. gentleman also expressed grave anxiety and concern about Canada's position in the united nations if we did not accede to his wishes. I would be much more concerned and feel much more anxiety if this bill did not pass, because then it could be said with justice —and in my judgment the accusation would be unanswerable—that by refusing to give Canadian citizens of Chinese origin the right to have their wives and children live with them in Canada we had violated the charter and denied those citizens what has been and should be considered as an inalienable right to live in family. We say, further, that legal residents in Canada of Chinese origin may become citizens and have the right to bring their wives and children under eighteen years of age, and in order that no obstacle shall be placed in the way of doing that, P.C. 1378 has been repealed. This government has gone much farther than any preceding government. By the bill before us we are removing any hindrance to Chinese residents in Canada from becoming naturalized citizens. That is the policy which the Prime Minister enunciated in his statement of May 1, and that is what, I repeat, is being carried out.

The question was raised, and an endeavour made to make it a debating point, that Australia had made arrangements with the British government by which Australia was able to secure immigrants in much larger numbers than Canada was ever able to do. I would refer hon. members to the statement made in the House of Lords at Westminster by Lord Addison in column 1064 of the British Hansard. He was dealing with the question of how many emigrants the British government could deal with and said the numbers would be very much fewer than the number of applicants. He went on to say that the number moved in the first year would probably be 6,000 to 6,900, or something like that, and that the numbers would be more than doubled the next year. I mention that to show the house that the difficulty in obtaining transportation is very great. We are continually in communication with the high commissioner in London. We have explored and shall continue to explore and exhaust every avenue by which we may get ships to bring in the immigrants who are ready to come to our country in larger numbers.

In closing, let me say, so far as the anxiety of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is concerned about our position before the united nations, I am quite sure that the representatives of this government in the person of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) will so conduct themselves that the interests of Canada will not be prejudiced.

Motion (Mr. Glen) agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Company may be required to deposit bond.

Mr. GLEN: The purpose of the proposed amendment to section 33 of the Immigration Act is to give authority to the immigration inspector in charge at a port of entry to safeguard the passing in direct transit through Canada from one port to another of groups of persons who, not being admissible as immigrants, might remain in Canada if not so controlled. The proposed amendment will enable the inspector in charge at the port of entry to ensure the departure of such parties by requiring the transportation company carrying them across Canada to place a bond as a guarantee of departure. Paragraph 16 will authorize the governor general in council to prescribe the amount and form of the bonds and make regulations for the guarding of such persons while in transit and for their detention at the port of exit while waiting embarkation or completion of arrangements for their departure.

It often happens that bodies of men come from one port and go across Canada to the south. In order that we might have some control of these men, it is thought necessary to have this provision so that we shall know who the parties are that are going across the country.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to correct a misunderstanding that has arisen with regard to my speech on the matter of immigration. I spoke on the second reading of the bill on February 11. Outside of about five minutes that I took on Monday, April 28, to speak on the motion to go into supply, I have not had anything to say regarding the merits of the bill. For many years past I have been a consistent supporter of the Polish people. Today the Minister of Labour complained about misleading headlines in the Montreal Standard of Sunday last with regard to Polish soldiers. I wish to complain about the same thing. With regard to the Toronto newspaper I have in mind, especially the heading of April 29 last, I have not a complaint; it is just a difference of opinion.

In the return which the Minister of Labour gave to me he distinctly said that some of the Poles were conscripted into the German army, but that they fought on the Italian front and in northwest Europe. In addition to that, the minister of labour in the old country, Mr. Isaacs, reported to the British house that 58,000 of these men were in uniform in the military camps in Britain since the German war closed. They are not doing anything at all with the exception of 400 who are working on the farms and some in the woods. If we wish to bring them here, let us have some of these men, instead of those from Italy, because there were 1,902 Polish airmen killed in the battle of Britain. If there are to be priorities these are the Polish men who should be brought here instead of some of the others. There is a difference of opinion as to whether some of them or all enlisted voluntarily or were conscripted. There is a big difference of opinion on that; a difference in England, Italy, Canada, and a difference in the United States; so much so that Mr. Byrnes, who was secretary of state in the United States, refused to permit them to come to the United States.

I have always been, between the two wars and in them, a supporter of the Polish people. Before the second war I urged that we should lend them money, after Munich, to secure an airport. In conclusion, I wish to say that there should be a further check-up or report so that the Canadian people will know how many were volunteers and how many are not. The matter should be cleared up, because there are five or six different opinions on it. Looking through the British, Canadian and United States press, the British Hansard, the library, and reading Mr. Byrnes' statement and the statement of the minister of labour of Great Britain, Mr. Isaacs, and the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Immigration here who made a clear statement—he generally does make a clear statement on any matter that he discusses—I find that there is a difference of opinion on this matter.

I have no objection to the bill. As I said at the beginning, I made a statement when the bill came up on February 11. Between the two wars a million men went away to the United States by emigration. With regard to priorities, it should be given to the British people.

My third reference is to shipping. There is not a ship today for British people to come to this country. On February 11, I urged that they should have priority; that we should utilize the merchant marine and all kinds of vessels to bring them here. During the war we borrowed many ships from the French, the United States and the British. If there is to be any priority at all, I have always contended that it should be shown to our own kith and kin in the old country before we open the doors wide to European-wide immigration, and provide emergency ships for them.

Mr. GREEN: During his speech the minister gave some figures with regard to the possible number of Chinese who would be bringing in their wives and children. May I ask—

Mr. GLEN: Would the hon. member ask that question on section 4?

Mr. GREEN: I do not care which section I ask it under so long as I am not ruled out of order. I warn the minister I want to ask also about the policy on the Japanese. That was included in the Prime Minister's statement the other day. I do not wish to let this section pass if I am to have the objection raised on section 4 of the bill that it is too late.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will not be any later then than now. There has been a broad debate on the second reading, and the bill is now in committee on four sections. The rule is that in committee the debate should be confined strictly to the section under consideration. There is in this bill no section which deals with Japanese immigration. After the time that has been spent in debating this bill, I do not think it would be conducive to the dispatching of the business of the house to reopen it.

Mr. GREEN: But the practice has been that fairly wide discussion is permitted on the first section of the bill. Where the Japanese come into the question is that P.C. 2115 is directly in issue in this bill because it is to become the policy covering Chinese immigration. I want to find out whether or not P.C. 2115 is also to apply to Japanese in the future. Therefore there can be no question about my being in order in raising that subject. I have no objection to waiting until the fourth section is called if that is what the minister wishes.

Mr. GLEN: I was not expecting that the hon. gentleman would raise again the question of the Japanese because, after all, there is nothing more I can say with regard to the Japanese that has not already been said by the Prime Minister in the statement he made, as reported at page 2646 of Hansard. He said:

> With regard to the Japanese, I stated on August 4, 1944, at which time we were at war with Japan, that the government felt that in the years after the war the immigration of Japanese should not be permitted. This is the present view and policy of the government. It will be for future parliaments to consider what change, if any, should be made in this policy.

I submit that we are again out of order if we discuss the Japanese at this time. When the bill was before the house in the first instance I took exception to the general discussion. Twice I protested that the matter should not be discussed on the bill, but I was not successful in having my protest acceded to, and we have had a discussion for three days on the general policy of immigration, which is not referred to in the bill—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister speak a little louder, please? It is impossible to hear him down here.

Mr. GLEN: What I am saying is that I was endeavouring when the bill was first introduced—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Louder. You are discriminating against us down here.

Mr. GLEN: I do not want to do that.

Mr. GREEN: You will have the united nations after you.

Mr. GLEN: When the bill was first introduced in the house, I was taking exception to a general discussion of immigration on this bill. I thought the time for a general discussion on immigration should have come on my estimates. However I was not successful in having that practice lived up to, because for three days we have had a general discussion on immigration which has, in a way, something to do with this bill. If it is now proposed that we should also deal with the Japanese on this bill, which refers only to the Chinese, I submit that it is not in order. That general discussion is allowed on the first clause of a bill has been, I know, sometimes the practice, but it is not the law and is not according to the rules of procedure of this house. The law of the house is that the discussion shall take place on the sections of the bill. What may have been the practice before might have some merit if no lengthy discussion had been had with regard to the principle of the bill; but in this case an extremely lengthy discussion took place, and I submit that we are confined to the clauses of the bill and that from them we should not depart.

Mr. GREEN: As the minister knows very well, having presided over this house for five years, it is impossible to ask questions on the second reading of a bill. When he now says that, because there was a long discussion on the second reading, there should therefore be no questions asked when the house is in committee, he is neatly evading or edging around the problem.

Mr. GLEN: No. The hon. member is proposing the introduction of the Japanese into a bill which has to do with the Chinese.

Mr. GREEN: The policy on the Chinese in Canada has been covered in the debate, but the Prime Minister's statement has been the main topic of discussion and one paragraph of that statement is the paragraph just read by the minister, which deals with the future, and with this government's present policy on Japanese immigration. I want to ask the minister the method by which it is proposed to carry out that policy. I realize that there is another order in council which provides that there shall be no immigration from an enemy country. I presume that, for the time being, that order in council would prevent immigration from Japan. But how does the government propose to implement the policy announced by the Prime Minister concerning the prevention of Japanese immigration? That is the only question I wished to ask. That is the information I should like to get, and I think the committee is entitled to it.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. gentleman is asking me to explain what may be the policy of the government with regard to the administration of the law so far as the Japanese are concerned.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister gave the policy. What I want to know is, how it is to be implemented?

Mr. GLEN: I wish to point out to the hon. member that the Prime Minister gave the policy not on the bill but as a statement on motions before the house, with no intention that the contents of it would be brought into the discussion on this immigration bill. I cannot, and I do not think the hon. gentleman would ask me to go any farther in a statement on government policy than the Prime Minister has already gone in the statement which I have just read, and especially in that last sentence.

It will be for future parliaments to consider what change, if any, should be made in this policy.

As the hon. gentleman himself says, at the moment Japan is an enemy country and therefore we can have no dealing with her.

Mr. GREEN: I am not talking about a future change in policy. I am asking the method by which the government proposes to implement the policy announced by the Prime Minister. I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister, when he made his statement on immigration on May 1, in the very first paragraph said that he was making the statement because there was to be a discussion on immigration; obviously he made that statement for the purpose that the whole statement would be available for discussion on this bill. It may be that the minister does not know how the Prime Minister's policy with regard to Japanese immigration is to be carried out. If he does not yet know how it is to be carried out, I would ask him to say so; we are entitled to know. On the other hand, if the government has some way of implementing that policy, we are also entitled to know what it is.

Mr. GLEN: I am sure that the hon. gentleman would not wish me to state a policy applicable to circumstances which have not yet arisen. When the time comes when we are dealing with the Japanese not as enemy aliens, that will be the time for the policy to be stated.

Mr. GREEN: You have not a policy or plan?

Mr. GLEN: There is no plan that I know of.

Mr. REID: I wish to ask the minister a question which has to do with transportation. We have been informed that transportation from Great Britain to Canada is limited. Has the minister any information as to the proportion of Canadians obtaining transportation on ships arriving at New York from Great Britain? The statement has been made that the United States have a greater proportion of passengers on those ships coming from Great Britain and arriving at New York. Has he any information regarding that? If that is so, I think a request should be made that this should be rectified.

Mr. GLEN: We have no information.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Repeal.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just before the section passes, I wish to say a few words. I have no particular objection to the section passing, but I believe it is fitting that the members of the committee should realize what we are doing in passing this bill. The figures which the minister gave, if I remember correctly, indicate that there are just about as many Chinese in British Columbia as there are in all the rest of Canada put together. In passing this law we are simply saying to British Columbia, "We are going to dump an impossible problem on your doorstep; you must take it and like it". We in the other parts of Canada, many of the provinces of which have an almost negligible number of Chinese living in them, are telling British Columbia what she must take. I hope that, in the working out of the policy, the government and the minister will take some sort of measure to see that some sort of justice is given to British Columbia. If that is not done I believe the members of this house will live to rue the day. You cannot expect a province of British people to take a monstrous injustice, such as is being forced upon them in this bill, and tamely submit to it. I think we must face that fact.

All the time while the Japanese were going into British Columbia, the men in charge at Ottawa callously and short-sightedly disregarded the interests of British Columbia. What was the result? Something we are all sorry about today. We disregarded British Columbia, because all she could send here was about seventeen or eighteen members. Such a few members can talk themselves black in the face and the members from other parts of Canada can shrug indifferent shoulders and disregard their pleadings. In my judgment, that is not the kind of attitude upon which to build a strong, united and secure Canada.

There is another matter that comes to my mind. I do not wish to say anything to occasion undue alarm, but a good many members of the house would appear to be taking the point of view that we are never going to face any further difficulty with people from the orient, and that the last war has been fought with people from the orient. I do not think people in our generation have a right to take that supine attitude. We have in our keeping the welfare of generations yet unborn.

Once more I urge that, in working out this bill and in the administration of the policy, the minister and the government take pains to see that there is not an impossible accumulation of people of the oriental races in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to say at once that I deeply appreciate the solicitude of the hon. member for Lethbridge for British Columbia; but I want to tell him that as long as that province continues to send to this house such alert and vigilant representatives, in every party, as have been sent to this parliament, British Columbia has nothing to fear for the future.

Mr. GREEN: This section has to do with the Chinese, and I, too, should like to express to the hon. member for Lethbridge my appreciation, on behalf of the people of British Columbia, for his remarks this evening. We are always grateful for help of this type, and we have had it all too seldom here in years gone by. I should like to check with the minister the figures he gave a few minutes ago in the course of his speech, concerning the number of Chinese who might be able to bring in their wives and children under the new government policy. In the first place, I would ask whether those figures are of the present wives of Chinese, or whether they take into account future marriages.

Mr. GLEN: They are the present wives.

Mr. GREEN: I understand, then, that the figures the minister gave deal only with Chinese already married?

Mr. GLEN: The figures are from the census of 1941, giving the total population.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say there were 8,749 Chinese born in Canada or naturalized here. Was that figure correct? That was the figure the minister gave on February 11.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And of that number, the minister said it was estimated there were 6,547 married Chinese who could take advantage of this change in the law.

Mr. GLEN: There were 6,694 persons of the Chinese race born in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: I am getting at the minister's estimate of the number in that group of 8,749 who could take advantage of the change in the law and bring their wives from China. The figure I have is 6,547.

Mr. GLEN: The number of persons of the Chinese race eligible to bring wives and children to Canada would be approximately 6,547.

Mr. GREEN: Then the minister said there were approximately 26,000 Chinese who are not Canadian citizens?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Then the minister estimated that about one-third of those might take advantage of the new provision?

Mr. GLEN: That was a guess, an approximation.

Mr. GREEN: That would be about 8,666. As I understand it, from the figure of 6,547 the minister deducted 3,000 who, he said, probably would not take advantage of the provision. For example, he said about 2,000 young Chinese males in Canada would probably marry young Chinese females in Canada, and there were certain other exceptions, making a total of 3,000 which he deducted from the 6,547, leaving 3,547 who might take advantage of the provision.

Mr. GLEN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Add to that figure the 8,666 and we get a total of 12,213. So the estimate of the government is that 12,213 Chinese males, married at this time, may well take advantage of this provision and bring in their wives and children under eighteen years of age. Is that correct?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, that is substantially correct. Of course the assumption would be that they would become naturalized.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, the 8,666 would first have to become naturalized. In addition to that, as I understood it, any Chinese who is a Canadian citizen can go to China, get married and bring back his wife, though under our new citizenship law she is not a Canadian citizen. Is that correct?

Mr. GLEN: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: There is no doubt about it; they can go to China, get married and bring their wives back to Canada?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. I would not want to limit the boundaries of love for a Chinese citizen of this country who wished to go abroad and marry someone in another country. I do not think I would care to be one of those to object.

Mr. GREEN: I am very glad the minister is such an ally and supporter of Cupid. I just want to get the figures. The position then, is that, according to the government's own estimate, we face a possible influx of 12,213 Chinese wives, and, in addition, whatever children are under eighteen years of age. In addition, from now on we can have Chinese go to the orient, marry and bring back their wives?

Mr. GLEN: That will be the situation when the act is repealed.

Mr. GREEN: That is the position we face at the present time?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Today about fifty-three per cent of all the Chinese in Canada are in British Columbia, so that British Columbia would have to face the prospect of having well over half those wives and children settling in that province. The minister will admit that is a reasonable estimate?

Mr. GLEN: It is purely an estimate.

Mr. GREEN: Well, may I suggest to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and other members from British Columbia, apart from the C.C.F. members who in the last few days in this house have spared no effort to get orientals for British Columbia, that this may very well be a serious situation, and that it may call for some change in government policy or for some amendment to P.C. 2115 when we can see just how the order in council works out. On the basis of the very estimate given by the Minister of Mines and Resources, there is the possibility of an influx into Canada of Chinese wives and children which may be as great as the total Chinese population in Canada at the present time, which is 34,627.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the hon. member deny a husband, by law, the right to live with his wife?

Mr. GREEN: Then, can the minister tell us the present law in the United States? As I understand it, when they repealed their Chinese Exclusion Act they put the Chinese on a quota.

Mr. GLEN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: I have here the reports from the United States congress, showing that the quota is 105 a year, allowed to come into the United States. There is some provision made in addition to that for the Chinese wives of United States citizens. That was passed in August, 1946.

I have been unable to get complete information with regard to the provision respecting the entry of wives. But, through the parliamentary library, did get a report from the Chinese embassy to the effect that the quota allowed is twenty-five Chinese wives who may be allowed to enter the United States; but, that in fact, since the change in the law only about ten had come into that country.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: That twenty-five is allowed how frequently?

Mr. GREEN: The answer from the librarian stated that the quota allowed twenty-five Chinese wives to enter the United States—and I presume that is each year—but that, in fact, only about ten had come into the country since then. I am not sure that these figures are accurate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not think they are.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give us a full statement of the present United States law?

Mr. GLEN: I have not that.

Mr. GREEN: I would suggest that he get those figures, because it would seem there is quite a big difference between the United States law and the proposed Canadian law. That should be checked by the minister's department. I understand that at the present time he has no figures under the United States law.

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My information—and probably it was entirely incorrect—was that the United States law was much more generous than we are trying to be in this instance.

Mr. GREEN: No; I think the minister will find that that is not so. Certainly the quota now for Chinese into the United States is 105 a year. There may be wives of United States citizens allowed over and above that. I would ask the minister to get those figures.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Vancouver South said a few minutes ago that members of the C.C.F. group in the house—and I use the words he used—had spared no effort to get orientals for British Columbia in the last few days. That statement is so obviously inaccurate that I cannot but rise to comment upon it. We are not anxious to secure orientals for British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: You certainly do not talk that way.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nor are we anxious in that respect for any part of Canada. But we are anxious to see to it that a country which calls itself democratic shall remove the last vestiges of racial discrimination. That is the point. And so far as immigration of orientals into this country goes, there are few orientals who want to come to this country, a country in which they have never been particularly welcome. I say again to the minister, as I said on February 11, I think it was, that if this country were prepared to enter into a gentlemen's agreement with the Chinese government, the flow of Chinese immigrants into this country could be controlled.

But we are not discussing Chinese immigration in this bill. What we are discussing, actually, is the right of a Chinese to bring into this country his wife and his children under eighteen years of age. That is what we are discussing.

Mr. GLEN: Correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I say to the minister that the discrimination which has been kept on our statute books still remains, when the Chinese resident of Canada is put on a different basis from the resident of any other alien nationality in this country. There is a discrimination.

The minister says to me that I would do this, that and the other thing. I put it squarely up to the minister: How does he propose to remove this discrimination? It is all very well for us to talk in the house about oriental immigration, or all the rest of it, which does not come under this bill. But let me remind hon. gentlemen that the day is past when any nation, whatever its colour, can look down upon any other nation, and treat the nationals of that country as an inferior people.

Mr. JAQUES: Does that apply to Spain?

Mr. COLDWELL: It applies to every country of the world.

Mr. JAQUES: Then why did you want to keep them out of UNO?

Mr. COLDWELL: Why did we want to keep Spain out of UNO?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Because UNO is an organization of democratic peace-loving countries. And so long as Francisco Franco remains dictator of Spain, is it right to call Spain a democratic country or a peace-loving country?

Mr. JAQUES: It is racial and religious discrimination.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will not enter into a controversy with the hon. member regarding Spain, because Spain does not come under this bill.

Mr. JAQUES: According to you.

Mr. COLDWELL: But I am quite willing to enter into a discussion with my hon. friend as to what constitutes democracy.

Mr. JAQUES: That is what you say.

Mr. COLDWELL: And as to what constitutes justice among the people of a nation.

Mr. JAQUES: Are you the supreme judge?

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not accept race hatred, as it is preached by some people in the United States, and their fellow travellers in the Dominion of Canada.

But what I was saying was this, that my objection to this particular measure—and I am going to support it, because it does go a considerable way toward removing discrimination—my objection to an aspect of this measure is that it does not remove discrimination that should be removed at this time.

We are members of the united nations organization. We have removed several skeletons from the Canadian cupboard lately, when the province of British Columbia removed disabilities against East Indians and Chinese, in the matter of the franchise. Those skeletons have been removed from our cupboard, I am thankful to say. But so long as any vestige of racial discrimination remains, we are open to attack in the united nations organization, because we are not carrying out the principles upon which that organization was founded.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Does he believe that the control of immigration is a matter for a country itself—and in our instance, Canada—or does he think the united nations organization has authority over immigration into Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall answer that clearly and concisely. The united nations organization has no authority to decide anything that we shall do within the sphere of our domestic jurisdiction. But we have a moral obligation when we sign a charter guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms, when we pledge our word to remove discrimination on account of race, creed or colour.

I say to my hon. friend the member for Vancouver South that I agree, immediately, that this country has a right to decide upon its immigration policy. But I say to my hon. friend also that no liberal—and I use the term in the proper sense, with a small "l", and not in a political sense—can possibly condone any policy based upon racial discrimination. That is what I say. No liberal, no man who calls himself a liberal, can possibly condone a policy which is founded upon racial discrimination, discrimination on account of race, or creed or of colour.

The bill before us is a very simple bill and, since it removes certain disabilities, we are going to support it. But I say to my hon. friend that, had the government been consistent and followed the policy which we understood the Prime Minister laid down in his statement when he said that all discrimination would be removed, then all residents in Canada—that is all we are talking about—whether they be of Czech origini, or Scandinavian origin or of any other origin, would be at liberty to bring in their wives and children under eighteen years as they may do now and would be in exactly the same position as residents of Chinese origin. In other words, if we allow Czech, the Swede, the Norwegian or any other national resident in this country to bring in his wife and children, then the resident of Chinese origin should be accorded the same privilege if we are removing all vestiges of discrimination as the Prime Minister indicated. That is the point I am making.

To the minister who turns to me and says, "What would you do?" I say, "What are you going to do to remove this vestige of discrimination?" What is he going to do to remove this blight on the escutcheon of Canada? What is he going to do to justify the calling of that government over there a Liberal government. Liberalism once stood for something very different from that which is included in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am greatly thrilled indeed to have a lecture on Liberalism from an arch socialist in this house. I want to tell him that I was raised in the cradle of Liberalism and I have been a Liberal all my life. He has not met the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who referred to the possibility of a great preponderance of population of another race coming into our province of British Columbia with only a million people. We have to face this question not only as a nation but as a province which must consider the proper preponderance in order to keep the herd pure, in order to keep the old Anglo-Saxon-French balance and the central European balance proper in this country. When he talks about Liberalism to me, my goodness, it is the biggest insult I ever had in this house.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): He was talking to a member of the herd.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have reason to believe that my hon. friend was once tinged with Toryism, that he was possibly a Tory, but now he is a red-hot, fire-brand socialist. We over here are Liberal reformers; we believe in the essential idealism of Liberalism; we believe in the essential principles of liberty and freedom; we believe in the dominance of the white race in the Dominion of Canada, and for that we stand.

Mr. GLEN: I was objecting at the beginning to the introduction of something other than the clauses of this bill tonight. The hon. gentleman has astutely taken the opportunity to reply to me, but he forgets the issue. I am putting the question to the hon. member—

Mr. COLDWELL: I will speak again.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So will I.

Mr. GLEN: —as was stated by two of his followers this afternoon, that he believed and that they believed, that their argument was that immigration should be brought under P.C. 695 with the deletion of the clause regarding Asiatics. Is that the position the hon. member is taking?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but not with your interpretation of that position. Do not try to twist what we are saying. We want the removal of racial discrimination in so far as that order in council goes. You know where the discrimination is as well as I do.

Mr. GLEN: The question that was asked of those two hon. members was: Are you proposing to repeal order in council 2115, and the answer was, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They said so.

Mr. GLEN: The repeal of order in council 2115 would place immigration under the regulation of order in council 695. I asked them if they proposed to take the clause dealing with Asiatics out of P.C. 695, and the answer was, yes. That means that the law and the regulations governing immigration into this country, if their wishes were acceded to, would be under P.C. 695, and then any person resident in Canada could bring in his father, his mother, his brother and every one of the denominations in the categories that are included in 695. That is where you would be.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why not?

Mr. GLEN: Is it the policy of the C.C.F. party that every Chinese in this country may bring in his father, his mother and all the other categories?

Mr. COLDWELL: Can other races do the same thing?

Mr. NICHOLSON: All the Chinese who have been legally admitted to Canada would be in the same position as the Swedish or other people.

Mr. GLEN: Also agriculturists.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Certainly.

Mr. GLEN: I read to the house the statement the hon. member made with regard to the assimilability of these people. He said that the acid test of assimilability is intermarriage, but that neither the Chinese nor the Indian governments favour intermarriage of their nationals coming to Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said that, yes.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member stated, I think positively, that they will not assimilate with our Canadian people. Therefore he wishes a gentleman's agreement. That is not what was said today.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is what I said.

Mr. GLEN: Your two followers did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do you agree with everything in every particular that individuals behind you say?

Mr. GLEN: Your followers said today that they wanted immigration under P.C. 695; yet in the interview you gave you said that the acid test of assimilability is intermarriage, but that neither the Chinese nor the Indian governments favour intermarriage of their nationals coming to Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say that the acid test of any nation's non-discriminatory policy is equality. You are trying to dodge the question: What will you do?

Mr. GLEN: Exactly what this bill is doing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then you do not remove discrimination.

Mr. GLEN: We take the position, as was stated by the Prime Minister, that Canada recognizes the right of all other countries to control the entry or non-entry of persons seeking to become permanent residents and that we claim precisely the same right for our country. That is the position I am taking.

Mr. JAQUES: We have heard a lot about racial discrimination as applied to orientals and the people outside Canada, but I should like to take up the case of racial discrimination against the oldest citizens of Canada. I ask the leader of the C.C.F. to answer this question: Is it not the fact that Indians in this country are not allowed to consume alcoholic beverages as white men are?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are dealing with section 2, which relates to the repeal of section 80 of the Immigration Act. That refers to the Chinese only.

Mr. JAQUES: I was merely giving an illustration of racial discrimination, and I wanted to hear the answer of the leader of the C.C.F. on this particular aspect of racial discrimination. I state the fact that the Indians as a race, and for no other reason than that they are of the Indian race, are not allowed to take a drink the same as I am allowed to take a drink, or as the leader of the C.C.F. is allowed to take a drink; and I ask the leader of the C.C.F. whether he would advocate that Indians be allowed to drink as freely as he and I are allowed to do, and if not, why not?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. JAQUES: It is an example of racial discrimination.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will, however, answer the question. The way in which the Indians in this country have been treated has been a blot on Canada's good name.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is correct when he says that the question has nothing to do with the section under consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have been making a great fuss over who is going to flood the country and who is going to have a drink and who is not, and I think it is time that we got down to a reasonable understanding of the issues involved. If the Chinese are put on the same basis as other people so far as their right to enter this country is concerned, that does not mean that Canada must allow the entry of every Chinese who comes within the regulations and asks to come here. We do not admit everybody from other countries who comes within the regulations. It is pretty difficult, as a matter of fact, for any person of any race who does come within the regulations to enter Canada now. There is, I suppose, no discrimination against Poles entering this country. As a matter of fact, quite a number of them entered Canada fairly easily not so long ago. Yet I have been making inquiries on behalf of a Canadian citizen who fought in the last war and whose daughter was in Great Britain during the war and married a Polish soldier. This Canadian citizen wants to bring his daughter and son-in-law to Canada but he cannot. If we can apply restrictions of that kind to Poles why cannot we apply them to the Chinese without being charged with discrimination? We certainly can make what laws we like, but these laws should apply equally to peoples of all nations. If the Minister of Mines and Resources says that he does not agree with that, he is repudiating the statement which the Prime Minister made in January, that we were removing all discrimination. You cannot remove discrimination and at the same time maintain it.

Mr. FULTON: How would you reduce the number of the Chinese who may come in? If you say that any agricultural labourer may come in, how are you going to keep the Chinese out?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think any agricultural labourer from any other country who wants to come to Canada can come in now. If they can, very few of them are coming in. With the removal of all discrimination there is no reason in the world why conditions cannot be made that will limit the number of Chinese coming into this country in proportion to the numbers of any other race entering the country.

Mr. FULTON: That is quite different.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not different at all.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member is speaking of a quota system?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am speaking of a quota system. If the removal of discrimination requires a quota system, then let us have a quota system, but do not let us shout to the world that we are removing discrimination while at the same time we are maintaining it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister made reference to my remarks this afternoon and I feel that he did not draw effective conclusions. I will repeat again what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said. On January 27 the Prime Minister promised this country and the world that, so far as Canada was concerned, the effect of the repeal would be to remove all discrimination against the Chinese on account of race and to bring the Chinese under the general provisions of the Immigration Act and no longer under legislation applying exclusively to people of Chinese origin.

The minister has said that the government is going back on that promise of the Prime Minister, that it is not the intention to remove racial discrimination. I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that normally quite a number of Canadians go to China as merchants or as missionaries. We would think it unreasonable of the Chinese government if they insisted that every Canadian who went to China should become a citizen of that country before being permitted to bring in his wife and children, and naturally the people of China consider it unreasonable that we have one law for the Chinese and another for Europeans.

It was mentioned earlier tonight that the United States was still discriminating against the Chinese. but according to my information the United States in 1943 repealed their Chinese exclusion act. The president of the day, the late President Roosevelt, is quoted as saying:

> China's resistance does not depend alone on guns and planes and on attacks on land, on the sea and from the air. It is based as much on the spirit of her people and her faith in her allies. We owe it to the Chinese to strengthen that faith. One step in this direction is to wipe from the statute books those anachronisms in our law which forbid the immigration of Chinese people into this country and which bar Chinese residents from American citizenship.

That was in 1943. If P.C. 695 does not meet with the approval of the administration I think it is imperative that an order in council be drafted immediately which will be acceptable to the government and which will remove completely any discrimination on account of race or religion. I make this last plea with the minister to repeal P.C. 2115, and, if he cannot accept P.C. 695 with the last paragraph struck out, that he amend it to place all people in the same position because, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has pointed out, it would not mean that every applicant would be accepted. The administration would still have the authority to decide who should be admitted. But we cannot go to the united nations meeting with this sort of regulation in effect in Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to put one more simple question to the minister. Those of us who have been talking about this question in the house and those who have been writing editorials about it have tried to focus attention on what amounts to one pretty small group. I am not going back on any of the general statements I have made, but we are talking now of one small specific group, namely, Chinese persons resident in Canada who are not citizens, and our suggestion is that Chinese persons legally resident in Canada who are not citizens should have the same right as European persons legally resident in Canada. We made our suggestion as to how that right should be extended to them, the right to bring in their wives and children. The minister objected to our way of doing it on the ground that it was opening the doors too wide. Other members of this group have made an answer to that and I am not going into it farther.

Mr. GLEN: What was the answer? I did not get the answer, if there was one.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not going to take up the time to give it again. It is on the record from the leader of this group and from the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am really trying to narrow this down to the specific group which most of us are immediately concerned about. What I am saying is that if the minister does not approve the way that we suggest doing it, on the ground that it opens the doors too far, has he not some suggestion to meet this particular group? Is there not some way in which he can provide for Chinese residents now resident in Canada, whether citizens or not, by permitting them to bring in their wives, just as European persons do who are resident in Canada and who do not happen to be citizens? One answer that he might make is that they can become citizens. That is admitting that he is prepared to have that number come in. Why not remove from the statute books that racial discrimination with respect to these people? Has he any suggestion?

Mr. GLEN: As I understand the hon. member's question, he is asking that I should consent to P.C. 695 being applicable to Chinese in the same way as it is applicable to anyone else. Because of the argument that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was adducing in the house when he was speaking and also the hon. member for Mackenzie, I asked the specific question whether that was their argument. That would mean that under P.C. 695 the Chinese would have the same rights as Europeans to come into this country and in a year bring in their wives under certain conditions and all the other categories of relatives. Does the hon. gentleman seriously mean that I should consent to such an amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are not asking that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure the minister must have misunderstood the question I was putting to him, for he asked me this question before and I gave him my answer categorically without any hesitation. I have accepted the fact that we cannot agree on that, and I am trying to see now if there is not some point between his position and mine to which the government might move. I am trying to ask him if there is not some way, in an amended form of P.C. 695, if you like, by means of which provision can be made just for Chinese persons resident in Canada, whether citizens or not, to bring in their wives and children.

Mr. GLEN: I should not like to say that there was. At the moment I would not care to say that we could meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am asking the government to give consideration to that point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to recall to the committee a matter which I brought to the attention of the house some days ago. If we allow a sufficient number of Chinese to come into British Columbia to become the predominating element I should like members of the C.C.F. to tell us how we should be able to prevent discrimination against the white people in British Columbia.

Mr. GILLIS: Why pick on British Columbia?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because it is an illustration. Hon. members have simple minds. I am trying to get the matter down so that they can get hold of it. Hon. members of the committee must bear this in mind. We must prevent the white race from being discriminated against, and particularly the Anglo-Saxons. It is a simple matter for us to put so many people into this country who are not of our particular way of life as would make it impossible for us to have a chance to live.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the French-Canadians?

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right; I shall put them in too. You can get so many Chinese and Japanese into this country that the ordinary Canadian, French or British would not have any chance to live according to the standard of life to which they are accustomed. If anyone pretends that a situation such as that would not be discriminating against our own people I should like to see him rise in his place and give his reasons for his belief. This is a matter which needs to be faced.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I assume that the transportation system on the Pacific is just as bad as it is on the Atlantic.

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Very well. That strengthens the argument I am going to advance. Within a year Chinese residents in Canada can take out citizenship papers. Then they are entitled to bring their wives and children under eighteen years of age to this country. If we grant them that right now as residents, with the situation on the Pacific being as bad as it is on the Atlantic, they will not be able to bring these relatives of theirs into this country for more than a year. Therefore, why maintain this discrimination against them? Will the minister please answer?

Mr. GLEN: I do not know what the question is, really.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): It is a statement of fact, that if we grant that same equality of right to the Chinese residents in Canada that we do to other residents, because of the nature of things in the shipping world they cannot bring their relatives to Canada within a year or two. If we permit them to take out citizenship, as we shall, I assume, they will do so by the time the year has expired. Then they will have the right to bring their families here. We are making no difference at all so far as immigration into this country within a year is concerned. Why then continue this discrimination?

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Dependents permitted to enter Canada.

Mr. HARKNESS: Since we are now off the Chinese question for the time being, I should like to bring up the matter of the transportation of dependents of ex-service men to the country. Can the minister tell us what arrangements are being made for the transportation of such of these dependents as are still overseas? What space is being secured? When are these people to be able to get over here?

Mr. GLEN: I am informed that they must apply for their own space in order to get here.

Mr. HARKNESS: Does the Canadian government make no arrangements so far as space for these people is concerned? Does it not aid them in securing space?

Mr. GLEN: Up to the end of last year they did, but not now. There is no provision made for it now.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to urge upon the minister that arrangements be made to secure space for these people, and in addition to the particular dependents who are mentioned in this section, that aid be given to secure space for the categories of people I mentioned this afternoon, fiancees of returned men and close relatives, mothers, brothers, sisters, fathers, and so forth. I do not think we shall be able to say that we have solved the problem of bringing these dependents of ex-service personnel to this country until these people are over here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say to my hon. friend that a committee is now functioning in England under the chairmanship, I think, of Mr. Norman Robertson, considering all these related questions with reference to transportation of relatives and dependents of ex-service men.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to know how the thing is functioning. Is it actually getting these people over? I mentioned the case of the fiancee of one of these men of ours who has been trying now for well over a year to get the girl over, but she is still in England. What is actually being done?

Mr. CLAXTON: There never was any provision for fiancees.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am urging that there should be.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is one of our hardships.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. HARKNESS: Call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is it not possible to get this bill to the third reading stage for tomorrow in order to get it over to the other house? We have had a very fine discussion on all stages of this bill. If the committee would consent to get it up to the third reading stage tonight they could bring up the other points tomorrow with the consent of the house.

Mr. FULTON: I have a question to ask. The minister gave figures of 77,000 tonight. Can he say how many of these include dependents such as are covered in this bill, and fiancees and brides of Canadian soldiers who returned to Canada?

Mr. GLEN: Wives, 31,807; children, 14,272; total, 46,079.

Mr. FULTON: Of the 77,000, 46,000 are war brides and families?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 3 carry?

Mr. HARKNESS: No, Mr. Chairman. There is one other matter I wish to take up in connection with this. It is the case of men who were married before the war started, whose wives were caught over in Europe—in England, or wherever the case may be—and who, because of the particular wording of subsection 4 (b) of this particular act, are not included. I asked this afternoon if the minister, when we came to take up this section, would say whether anything would be done for those people. I instanced particularly the case of a man whose wife was caught in Belgium, who had great difficulty in getting her back after the war, and who had to pay for her himself. I expressed my idea that wives and children of men who did serve overseas should have the same privilege as wives who were secure whilst the men were over there. Has the minister anything to say in that connection?

Mr. GLEN: I am afraid I am not in a position to help them. There are many in the same category as those the hon. gentleman speaks of where the expense had to be borne by somebody but not by the government. I am afraid I cannot do anything to help in that connection.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the section carry?

Mr. HARKNESS: No, Mr. Chairman. In that event I should like to move a small amendment: in line 29, after the world "while", insert the words "or before". The subsection would then read:

> The wife or widow of a member of the forces who is not resident in Canada and who was married to such member of the forces while or before such member of the forces was serving outside of Canada or the territorial waters thereof . . .

And so on. I offer that amendment in order to protect those people, however many there are—I do not suppose the number is very great, but there is a great hardship on those who are in that situation—and to bring them within the meaning of this act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GLEN: No. This would mean an addition to the amounts that might be provided, so far as I can see it just now; and I am afraid that I could not accept that amendment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister has got the point?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why should a man who got married, who was over in London and who perhaps did not do any fighting but had an office job and picks up a bride over there, be in the position where we bring her back, yet here is a married chap—one who was married in Canada, with a Canadian wife who was caught in Belgium, which was the illustration given today—whose wife is discriminated against in favour of a bride that a soldier picked up?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why should that be? This husband served five years over there and he fought all through northwestern Europe. Apparently I have used a wrong expression somewhere, Mr. Chairman. That does seem to me to be a reasonable change which is asked for.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend consent to this? The amendment is obviously out of order, as pointed out by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Mines and Resources. Would he leave it to the two departments of immigration and veterans affairs to look into this matter very carefully and sympathetically, and see what they can do to meet the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary East?

Mr. HARKNESS: Have you ruled my amendment out of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: It is obviously out of order if it calls for an additional expenditure. The minister has stated that it would involve additional expenditure, and therefore I rule it out of order.

Mr. HARKNESS: Then, if the amendment is ruled out of order, Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly accept the suggestion made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, that the matter be looked into. I trust that it will be looked into and that something will be done about it; because I think it is a disgraceful situation that we should have people in the situation of the man that I described this afternoon as compared with other men who went over, merely took part in the occupation force, secured wives and the government brought them back.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON CONSTITUENCY TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): With the leave of the house I present to the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled the petition of a number of Canadian and British subjects residing in Yukon, petitioning parliament not to add the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories to Yukon electoral district, and giving their reasons for such petition. I think the petition will be found in order according to the form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TUCKER—VETERANS AFFAIRS—ALLEGATIONS AS TO CONDUCT OF COMMITTEE

On the order of motions:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): I should like to speak on a question of privilege affecting this parliament and a committee of parliament. It has to do with a letter which is being sent through the mails bearing the signature of Tom L. Poulsom, Rochfort Bridge, Alberta. From time to time since the session started members of parliament have drawn to my attention copies of this letter which they have received by mail from constituents. They have suggested that as the conduct of the special select committee on veterans affairs for 1946 is called in question, as chairman of that committee I should make a statement. I had hoped that the sending out of these letters would cease and perhaps a statement would not need to be made. However these letters seem to be still going out so I decided I should give the facts to the house.

This letter makes general accusations of forgery and theft against the soldier settlement board. It suggests that the veterans affairs committee should have called him, Poulsom, as a witness, and that in not doing so, criminal civil servants, in his words, were being "shielded" and "wet-nursed" and that swindling of the veteran, dominion treasury and taxpayer was being permitted to go unchecked by members of parliament.

At the start of its work the veterans affairs committee, in accordance with the usual practice, set up a steering committee. This committee, consisting of Messrs. Green, Brooks, Wright, Quelch, Croll, Tremblay and myself, was to decide, among other things, on what witnesses should be called. When Poulsom made his first accusation, pursuant to instructions by the steering committee I asked him to send details of his charges giving specific facts, names, dates, places and details; otherwise the committee would not consider them. Mr. Poulsom's response was to repeat his general charges.

The steering committee thereupon on May 23, 1946, further considered the matter. It had formerly decided that so much work lay before it that it was doubtful if it could be completed no matter how assiduously the committee worked. The steering committee had therefore recommended to the committee as a whole that no individual case would be heard unless same was sponsored by some representative organization. This recommendation had been communicated to the committee as a whole and was accepted and approved by the committee. The committee, as the house knows, consisted of sixty members of parliament, all ex-servicemen. In view of this policy of the committee and the further fact that Poulsom had not been willing to bring forward a single fact to substantiate his general charges or even to make a specific charge of wrong-doing, the steering committee on May 23, 1946, decided to recommend that Mr. Poulsom be informed of the committee's policy not to hear representations from individuals unless sponsored by representative veteran organizations or other responsible bodies. This recommendation of the steering committee was concurred in on May 23, 1946, by the committee itself on a motion duly made and carried. References to the matter may be found in the records of our proceedings of May 21 and 23.

From the foregoing, it will be seen that my actions in the matter were taken on the instructions of the committee itself.

To the extent that Mr. Poulsom's charges relate to his own dealings with the soldier settlement board the director reports as follows: T. L. Poulsom was established under the Soldier Settlement Act by an agreement for sale dated October 16, 1919. Due to his failure to live up to his agreement he was served with notice of rescission of contract on December 8, 1942. Poulsom's appeal was heard by Judge Matheson at Edmonton on March 29, 1943. Matters in dispute were fully heard. Poulsom's solicitor was J. Boyd McBride, K.C. A final settlement was reached between Poulsom and the board.

Confirmation of the settlement is contained in an official letter dated March 29, 1943, from Poulsom's solicitor to the district superintendent at Edmonton in part as follows:

> This is a final and absolute settlement of all points which heretofore have been in dispute extending over a period of many years . . . this letter has been dictated in Mr. Poulsom's presence.

The director reports that he has carried out his part of these proposals.

He also reports that Mr. Poulsom has from time to time circulated charges against the soldier settlement administration alleging perjury, forgery, theft and other crimes. The director reports that there is no evidence in departmental records indicating that any of the alleged offences have been committed by members of the departmental staff, but if Mr.

Poulsom thinks any offence has been committed, he may lay a charge before a magistrate. He was invited to do so a year previously, but no such action has been taken by him.

So far as I am concerned I repudiate any suggestion that our veterans affairs committee shielded any wrongdoer. Such a suggestion is most unfair and unjust to the members of this house who were members of our veterans affairs committee. Poulsom was given a chance to make a specific charge. He refused to do so but continues to circulate his general charges. These charges are of such a general nature that it would be difficult for anyone to take action on them to disprove them, and so they are unfair to the civil servants involved. They are also unfair to a committee of ex-servicemen who did a great deal of work in two sessions considering and recommending legislation to improve the programme for the rehabilitation and reestablishment of our ex-servicemen and women. I need hardly say that in the course of its work our committee protected or shielded nobody.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STUART (CHARLOTTE)—STRAIT OF CANSO

Mr. A. W. STUART (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of privilege in reference to statements in the Halifax Herald of April 26 and 30, which I feel should be brought to the attention of the hon. members of this house, particularly the maritime members.

The first article appeared on the front page of the Halifax Herald of April 26, and featured, "Canso project laughed down in house session," by Evelyn S. Tufts, staff correspondent of the Halifax Herald. The second item appears on the editorial page of the Halifax Herald of April 30:

> And with Mr. Gillis laughed down, one may wonder what the other maritimers were doing? Was no voice raised to champion the questioner?
> Surely important public works projects which afford new facilities for maritime industry and transportation are worthy of the consideration of all maritime members, regardless of party. Surely any move towards relieving unemployment in maritime areas is their concern, as well. Let us believe that, if they did not support the member for Cape Breton South, at least they refrained from the ill-timed laughter.

I was in my seat, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) rose to ask the Minister of Transport the question I have mentioned, which was ruled out of order by the Speaker. If a scene such as described in the Halifax Herald did take place at that time, I failed to see it. "The general uproar—the cruel, vulgar, ill-timed laughter"—this statement is unwarranted and greatly exaggerated and would appear to be steeped in political prejudice.

As I have stated in this house on previous occasions, constructive criticism is very helpful and should be appreciated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege as briefly as possible.

Mr. GILLIS: Without reading it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Stop making a political speech.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): This is of great importance to the maritime provinces. As I have said in the house on previous occasions, constructive criticism is very helpful and should be appreciated.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Criticism of this nature, however, contributes little and has a very damaging effect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I really believe I have given the hon. member enough latitude.

Mr. KNOWLES: Too much.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is this type of journalism—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to abide by the rules. He has had ample time to state his question of privilege, and should not use it to make a speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let him make the rest of his speech on the budget.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

VANCOUVER AIRPORT—PROPOSAL TO TRANSFER FACILITIES TO ABBOTSFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply or, in his absence, his parliamentary assistant. This might be taken as a notice. According to the press, Mayor G. McGeer is not willing to accept an agreement for the Vancouver airport. If this is correct, will the minister arrange to transfer Pacific coast Trans-Canada Air Lines facilities to the Abbotsford airport, which is the only one on the Pacific coast free from fog the year round and capable of expansion to handle the largest Trans-Pacific aircraft?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have not had an opportunity of getting an answer to the question. Perhaps the hon. member would let it stand as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT MASSEY-HARRIS PLANT, BRANTFORD—DISPOSAL OF WORKERS FROM NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is interested in the present position of the men who left the Cape Breton area of Nova Scotia to work for the Massey-Harris Company, Limited, at Brantford, where there is a stoppage of work. I would like to inform him that ninety men left the area referred to in order to work in the factory at that plant. Since twenty-four moulders walked off the job on April 30, the entire factory, employing 500 men, has been closed. All the ninety men from Nova Scotia have been offered other employment by the company, that is, clean-up work, yard work, etc., at the minimum rate of pay they were guaranteed before leaving Nova Scotia. So far, sixty men have accepted the offer, leaving 30 men not now working. All these men are being furnished with board and accommodation in the company's bunkhouse.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you very much.

STRAIT OF CANSO

BRIDGING PROJECT—CALLS FOR TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Have tenders yet been called for the construction of a causeway across the strait of Canso? If not, are they in the course of preparation?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked that question the other day. At that time he was called to order, and told that the question should have been put on the order paper—just as this one could. But I will say this to him now, that the method of transportation at Canso is being given very serious consideration. When a decision is arrived at it will be announced in this house as government policy.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK AND BANK OF CANADA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 175, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT

REPEAL OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT—BONDING OF PERSONS IN TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask some indulgence from the house today because I have been ill and have not been able to prepare myself as I would have liked. However, the house will at least benefit, inasmuch as I shall not speak as long as I otherwise would.

When we adjourned on Tuesday last we were in what I suppose might be called a sort of sunshine atmosphere. The budget which the minister had read was one which it so happened that most of us in this chamber were able to benefit from, and we were inclined to think well of it. But I am inclined to think that as time has gone on there are people who began to reflect and as other considerations entered into the matter some misgivings may have entered their minds and they may not be quite so sure that all is well.

I do not intend to labour again the question of the surplus. That has been dealt with, and I have no doubt will be dealt with again. I think really it was a bit of good clean fun, but it does occur to me that if some of the finance ministers of former days, men like Mr. Fielding and Sir George Foster, were able to come and ask the minister, "Is it really true that you were able to have a surplus which was made up by selling things which you had not had to pay for out of taxes, which were paid for out of borrowed money?" and if the minister had said, as he would have said, "Yes, that is quite true," they would have said, "Well, these are rather strange and wonderful days; you have certainly progressed beyond the days when we lived."

What should we ask of a budget? What is it for? Obviously, first of all, it is a statement of the country's expected receipts and disbursements, and also it is a statement of any changes in taxation. In the second place, and perhaps just as important, it should try to give us, and the minister did at considerable length, a picture of the country's position —not merely a set of figures, although they are important, but an attempt to try to make the people of the country understand the situation that they are facing. In the old days when one year merged into another, and there was practically no change except a few dollars here or there, that was not of great importance, but in a year like this, when we stand on the verge of so many new and strange things, it becomes of vast importance. Later on I shall have some things to say about that.

I come now to the matter of the budget, and I want to say one or two things about it. We have a measure of taxation relief which has been given to a group of people in the country that I think deserve great consideration, people whom I call—I am speaking now of people with incomes of from $3,000 to $7,500—the middle class. It seems to me that all history shows that where the middle class is strong, then the state is strong. Where the middle class disintegrates and disappears, then the state is weak. I want to come back to that.

At the moment all I say is that I welcome—I hope it is not an entirely selfish remark when I make it—what the minister did. My only regret is that there were other things that were not done. My only regret is, and I shall have more to say about this later, that it seems that the minister has taken the view that he cannot do anything for business because business is doing pretty well and therefore he would just let well enough alone, until the end of the year at any rate. There is another great class in the community which is affected mainly by indirect taxes such as sales and others for which nothing has been done. Indeed their position at the present moment is being rather worsened.

I know the difficulties that have arisen, and I sympathize with the minister because of his position at the present time. This is perhaps a difficult moment for advantages to be given to others and not to these people because at the present time they are suffering from nothing more than this: I fear that during the war they got the idea that there was never going to be any readjustment, that the big money was going to go on, that somehow or other they could have big money and that prices would be kept down. In other words, they thought they were going to have it both ways.

At the moment it is particularly unfortunate that we here who believe in removing controls, and I am one of those, at the present time are at a most unsatisfactory moment, as you might say, from the point of view of the people of the class of which I am speaking. We are in a period when there is bound to be a certain shaking out of prices, a certain inequality. In the United States they are beginning to get the benefit of production and I am glad to observe that for the last three weeks the trend of prices has definitely been downward. We have not that condition here as we would like to have it, and therefore at the moment we have the unfortunate situation, to which I shall refer again, that the minister has done absolutely nothing—I think that is a fair statement—to take measures to meet the difficulties which notwithstanding his optimistic statement he himself sees only too clearly.

Having said that, I wish to say also that while the minister has put in many caveats—I am going to read one or two of them—while the minister has brought out this and that difficulty, nevertheless as a whole the minister's line is that things are good, that things are booming, that everything is going well and that all we need to do is to keep along in that way. I want to point out first of all that the minister is cautious. He has several caveats here and I shall read one or two of them. He said:

> . . . We must also recognize the special and temporary character of much of the expenditure that is the stimulus of our present high level of income . . .

He says again:

> Much of the large expenditure of business on plant and equipment represents accumulated or postponed requirements and does not give us any reliable guidance as to what we may expect on a continuing basis.

Again he says:

> Consumers, too, are probably . . . spending more and saving less than they normally would with incomes at present levels.

All these things he says, and yet I leave it to anyone who heard or read his speech that the general tenor left in our minds was that we are virtually in the midst of a boom; that we ought to be satisfied and extremely happy, that there is nobody on the whole who should be more contented than we are, and of course that is correct. Nevertheless I am not satisfied with the position which the minister gave.

If you will remember, the minister talked constantly about money, money. He measured things in terms of money; he measured progress in terms of money. I have had for many years a friend whose business it was to try to gauge the course of business in various countries of the world, and he always used to say to me, "Don't talk to me money. Talk to me commodities. Talk to me quantities of goods—real things." Therefore when I find the minister saying as he did say and apparently confining himself to that, that our national income was such and such, I say: Don't talk to me national income. I say talk to me commodities, goods, quantities of this and that.

The minister laid great stress on the fact that our income had gone up from 1939, when it was $5·5 billion, to 1947, when it was $11·1 billion. That sounds in a way quite magnificent. You will say we have doubled our national income. And not a word was said to warn us: Oh, but there is a great catch in this. You must remember that the money is twice as big but the quantities are not twice as much, the goods are not twice as much. Though I confess it is hard to arrive at the true correcting figure, nevertheless if you take the rise in prices and apply them you will reduce that $11·1 billion of money to something not very far from $7·5 billion in goods. If that is correct then the increase from 1939 is not double, from $5·5 to $11·1; it is really from $5·5 to something like $7·5 billion. What does that mean? That to me is the explanation of what we hear every day, of what we have dinned into our ears every day. It is the explanation of shortages and I confess I have found it perplexing. That is why we hear everywhere and every day that something or other is short, and we all do hear it. Therefore I suggest that when we talk about this figure of money, when we deal only with that and talk only of national income, we are dealing with something which is illusory, something which means nothing until you begin to define it.

And so I say that this situation which the minister shows us is not anything like as good as those figures would indicate. In fact it is a very dangerous situation because it is a situation such as was described to the British people in a white paper that said something like this. They said that in England there are seven billion pounds of money chasing around six billion pounds of goods, and they said of course that that situation is fraught with great danger because it is one of the greatest pressures towards inflation. I think at the present time that truths like this are needed to be told and understood. There is no question in my mind that we are in for a difficult period. There is no question in my mind that people have got to understand that there has to be forbearance, that if everyone rushes off without delay seeking what seems his own immediate interest the common interest may be so greatly injured that the interests of every one of us may be injured. I think what we need is a great deal of wholesome telling of the truth in a way that people can understand it. We are not in an easy position. The minister was very frank to say that. He has protected his position. He has given us really a very fair position except for this, that he has left us with this picture of wonderful progress. He has left us on the whole with the feeling that everything is good, and that if it is not good there is nothing we can do about it. Because, mark you, while the minister outlined these difficulties, and in particular said that if things went bad in the United States that would be very serious for us here, as it will, nevertheless if things go bad in the United States there will be a lot of things here that we shall have to try to do and we should be trying to prepare ourselves for that now.

I want to say a word about this question of prices. It is so full of importance and so full of difficulty. Let me take a case that is before us right now, one that is in everyone's mind because it happened no longer than within a day or so of the minister's budget, and because it affects every household. Let me take the price of butter. The average price of butter from 1926 to 1929—some farmer correct me if I am wrong—was 44 cents. Then in the depression from 1935 to 1939 it went down to 28 cents, and in August 1939 it was 27 cents. I suppose there is not one of us who went through that depression who did not think what a dreadful thing it was that the farmers were getting only 27 cents. When I say one of us I mean people like us who are intelligent. There was no serious man who was not troubled about the fact that the farmer was getting so little, and who did not want to find a way for the farmer to get more, and who did not realize that an improvement in the farmer's position would improve the position of all of us. Well, very good. The farmer was getting 27 cents in August 1939, and gradually during the war the price was allowed up to 45 cents, which I suppose was little if any more than the cost. Bear in mind, if you go back to 1926-29 the price was 44 cents then.

Mr. FAIR: How do 1929 and 1935 compare?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I told you. I said the price was 28 cents in 1935.

Mr. FAIR: And between 1929 and 1935?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will just go back to this. The price in the reasonably good years was 44 cents. It came down to 27 cents in 1939. During the war it went up to 45 cents, which was the price it had been away back in 1926, and now it has been increased. Some people talk as if the end of the world had come. Why is that? It is not because these people are unreasonable. It is because they have been deluded. It is because they have somehow or other got the idea that wages could go up and that other prices could be maintained indefinitely. The fortunate thing is—and this is what the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has been saying for many months—that butter production is now beginning to increase, and we may have the better situation which we have been waiting for so long.

I want to end this by making this point. We need I think a great deal of wholesome plain truth-telling from those in authority so that there shall at the present time be the maximum self-restraint, self-control, mutual understanding, unwillingness to believe that every other man in the community is a crook. The place to get that from is in wise and considered statements from those in authority.

I would like to turn for a moment to deal with the three bases of our economic position as it is. I suppose it would be fair to say that the three main bases are: first, government expenditures; second, foreign trade, and third, the improvements and extensions being made by individual companies.

As to government expenditures I shall say nothing. That has been dealt with. We know that this year they will be less than last, but they will still be substantial.

As to foreign trade, all I wish to say at the moment is that there we have a situation which has been painted for us so clearly many times, and that is one of the reasons why I feel so regretful that the Minister of Finance has done nothing to consider the situation of business, the situation which has been painted so many times so clearly, and recently by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Much of our foreign trade is made possible only by the fact that we lend the money.

I wish to say a word about improvements and extensions, because this item is astonishingly large, and I think it is well for us to dwell on it. It is well for us to dwell on it for a moment, particularly because of some observations that were made in the house some weeks ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The figure for improvements and extensions during the current year is $1,700 million, a staggering sum, much the largest on record. In the low point of the depression I believe the corresponding sum was only $200 million. In 1929 I believe it was $1,100 million and it was the same in 1945. Here we have a record of $1,700 million. Most of that comes from where? Most of it comes from profit. It is desirable for us to know that. I took occasion to check up to make sure whether most of these amounts would be made up of bank loans, and I was assured it was not. The great bulk of it would be made up of profits, from the accumulation of companies themselves. I want to point out what an enormous work that is doing; and that leads me to say just a word about the question of profits.

In the house some weeks ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned quite a list of profits, many of them large. I hope I do not do him an injustice, but if my memory serves me rightly, when he gave these profits he practically said, isn't that terrible? He did not ask whether fair prices had been charged; he did not ask whether fair wages had been paid; he did not ask whether moderate dividends had been paid; he did not ask whether this money was available, as we know it is, for the most useful social services that can be given. I do not believe that these points were absent from the mind of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but I fear he felt it was enough for him to say that there were large profits and that that was what interested a great many people. I suggest to him that if he finds that the prices and the wages are fair and that there are no inordinate dividends—and he can satisfy himself on that—then these profits are a perfectly social thing, and that as we see it now, they are being used in a most social way.

I wish to say a word about these companies' expenditures. No one will agree more readily than the minister—and he has already stated it—on how vital they are for our well being in this very year; how vital it is that the confidence, the courage and the readiness to take risks which impels people to launch out the vast sums, shall continue. He will agree that if want of confidence should arise, if the situation should change, it would be a very serious thing indeed. Therefore I find myself regretting very much two things: first of all the excess profits tax was not done away with.

I would not have dared to say that in the house eighteen months ago, but I hope I have been here long enough, whatever people may think of my opinion, that they now believe I express at any rate my own opinion and do not speak for anyone else. I just wish to say this about the excess profits tax. I am all in favour of corporations being taxed, but I believe they should be taxed intelligently. The former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) spoke strongly about the excess profits tax in the beginning of 1945. The present Minister of Finance did nothing to show that he disagreed with him, and yet that tax, I regret to admit, induces people sometimes to hold back when they should not. It has a tendency to induce business to carry on business in a bad way, in an inefficient way, in an extravagant way. There is no reason that I can see for continuing it. It just seems to me as though no one was ready to make a decision.

The second thing I want to say is that I think it is the greatest pity in the world that nothing is done in this country to try to encourage new industry, new enterprises. I was surprised to learn not so long ago that in the United States they gave advantages, preferences to new industries to a considerable amount—I believe as high as 38 per cent in taxation so that they can get on their feet. Those of us who believe in free enterprise must believe that the very cornerstone of it is that new enterprise must come in; that it must correct the balance; that it must provide competition; that it must be the balance wheel which prevents the evils which my friends to the left often speak about, and that difficulties sometimes exist.

Mr. IRVINE: Always.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No, not always; we would not be here if they existed always.

I wish to say just a word about the method of tax collection. We have heard about that for some time, and I think we are growing disappointed that so little is done. The other day I took occasion to call up a friend who has a great deal to do with tax collection, and I said to him: "Is it just as bad as ever?" He said: "Yes, practically as bad as ever." He said: "Of course, it is not the fault of the department; it is the fault of the law". I was relieved to hear the minister say the other day that a new act was on the way. I was relieved to see that he was taking time off to look at it himself, because he is an expert and an experienced man; but it is only one of the many things he has to do. I believe it is so urgent to get it done that I hope at last it will be shoved along and that we shall have no more dilly-dallying with it.

I am not going to say anything today about economy. I hope and believe that some of my colleagues will fill up the gaps in my speech. I just wish to say that I think it is terribly hard, when one has been spending billions, to get down to mere millions, and when one has been spending millions to get down to mere thousands. I shall not do more than mention the classic remark of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), made to myself, incidentally: "Oh, yes, we may have saved a million, but what is that?" or words to that effect. I was struck by the speech made by the present Minister of Finance a year ago in connection with the budget, in which he laid a great deal of stress on the fact that members of the opposition had been a little irresponsible in asking for expenditures. I would refer him to the third chapter of Genesis where he will find words to this effect, "The woman tempted me and I did eat." Speaking seriously, I would say that the government is the government and we here after all can only bat things up to them. They have to make the decision. But I was disappointed, because I have always regarded him as a very serious man, with the remark made in this house last summer by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) in his reply on the budget speech. If I remember correctly, after referring almost with contempt, I must say, to various suggestions which had been made on this side for economy, which he characterized as rather unworthy of serious consideration, he then said, "Well, we will have to try to think up something ourselves." I thought that was late. The estimates were down—I am not sure whether the supplementaries were down —and it seemed to me to show an attitude towards this question which is not likely to produce the results that we want.

I want to say a word about inflation, just a word dealing wholly with the question of money supply. The minister did not deal with that, and in a way I was sorry that he did not because I think it is important. I think it is important for us to remember that the means of payment in the hands of the public, that is to say, the money or its equivalent which people have in their hands, is two and a half times what it was in 1939. It was then $2,400 million and now it is $7 billion. I would urge strongly that that huge amount should be reduced, and incidentally I am glad to see the minister the other day began a measure of reduction by partly paying off a maturing loan out of the government's own resources. I will not say more about that, particularly as I see that my time is running on.

I want to say a word about the whole question of easy money policy and I want to connect it with the question of interest rates. I also want to connect that particularly with that middle class that I spoke of a while ago, because in my opinion the existence of a strong middle class is vital and I believe the existence of a strong middle class is imperilled and perhaps made almost impossible by the conditions of today. I will not spend more than a minute in recalling to your minds what has happened to those countries where either they had no middle class or where the middle class disappeared.

Let me say that by middle class I mean people, neither rich nor poor, who have a great desire to look after themselves, to provide for their present and for their future, and to be beholden to nobody, not even the state. They used to be regarded without question as the backbone of the community. They existed only to a very small extent in Russia, and that was why revolution could so easily make itself felt and control Russia. The middle class used to be strong in Germany. We can remember when before the first great war the socialists were strong. They were not socialists in the modern sense; perhaps they would be called radicals or leftists; nevertheless they were strong and they had an influence. But they disappeared. There was inflation first of all in 1924 and then around 1931, and then finally in Hitler's day they were wiped out and that made possible this terrible abortion of the constitution, the terrible abortion of human relationships which prevailed in Germany.

For that reason I say that I believe the preservation of a strong middle class is important not merely economically but as going down to the very roots of our political being. What is happening to the middle class at present? Let us compare them with, say, fifty years ago. I think three things have happened. First of all of course costs have gone up; secondly, to a considerable extent, payment by special effort has become less common and they have not been able relatively to make the same wages; thirdly, the rate of interest has struck them. Fifty years ago the man who retired with a modest competency could get five or six per cent on it and he could reckon on living the rest of his life upon the proceeds. What happens today when he receives three per cent? And he is lucky if he gets that.

I believe that when we are considering this matter of the low-interest rate policy—and I know it is difficult, though it is attractive from the government's point of view—when, I say, we are considering this low-interest rate policy I suggest that this very important factor be taken into consideration—it is very important indeed—that there are large elements in the community who are suffering greatly by that policy. One other thing I would like to say in this connection. I would ask whether we can go on freeing other things and leaving the rate of interest tied down tight. Personally I very much doubt it and I think it is a matter worthy of the most serious consideration.

I want to say a word about the United States exchange. I thought the minister dealt with that in rather an airy fashion. He did say that we had suffered a loss of resources of some $600 million, but he pointed out, what is true enough, that that is because we were prosperous and had to import a lot. Nevertheless the fact is that our resources were greatly depleted. Then he went on to say, and this surprised me: "Well, if it gets difficult, after all we had a difficult situation in 1942 and we took some quiet, effective measures then"—as much as to say, "We will deal with the situation now in the same way."

Well, let us look at 1942. Although there was wisdom on our part, it was not our unaided wisdom in 1942 that dealt with the situation. The truth is that in 1942 the war dealt with it; the needs of the United States dealt with it. We remember very well that in 1942 the United States had need of many things from us. We for example had skills in war manufacture which they did not have at all. We were ahead of them in radar and in this and that, and for us to look with equanimity upon this situation now and bring in 1942 as a parallel is to me not dealing with the matter at all.

Finally I was disturbed with a remark which is attributed in the press to the governor of the Bank of Canada. I want to be very careful on this because it was only in the press and I think it may have been an off-hand remark. I would not take it too seriously, but the governor was quoted as saying that it would be to our advantage—this is in connection with the whole question of exchange—if the price of gold were increased in the United States. That disturbed me very much because, I suppose, there could not be a more inflationary measure and because it seemed to me that if that was the only way, or was one of the serious ways, which the government regarded as a possibility of dealing with this thing, or of finding a way out, then it seemed to me the matter was not being dealt with as it should. Of course we all know that the final solution of exchange is trade, and I think we all agree, with reservations—I mean reservations in that we do not give up what we have until there is something better—that what we need is multilateral trade. But I call attention to the fact that even in our own cabinet we seem to have very great disagreement on that point. We have the Department of Finance in favour of multilateral trade, but apparently we have the Department of Agriculture absolutely against it, because whatever can be said for or against the bulk agreements with Britain, certainly they are not in accordance with multilateral trade. Certainly they are going to make it difficult; and incidentally it is highly open to question whether it was necessary for us to sell all the wheat to Britain at such a low price and whether we needed to entirely let out the United States from carrying some of the load.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that to me this budget, in spite of its sunshine features, is disappointing. It is a kind of wait and see budget, a kind of do nothing budget; yet before the year is out there may be a good many things that need to be done, and we may look back and regret that at least some of them were not done.

But the thing about which I complain most in this budget, the thing I wish to mention in closing, is this. I think of all the neglects of this budget by far the greatest is in respect of the field of dominion-provincial relations. I make no apology for coming back to this question, as I have done several times, because I believe not only that it is of vast importance but that somehow or other it is being relegated to a sphere far below that which it is entitled to occupy. It seemed to me that the other night the minister spoke about the relations between the dominion and the provinces as you might speak about the relations between any group of eight or nine persons or institutions who had found it convenient to make a business arrangement with each other and who had carried on that arrangement as long as it was convenient, but who must be always ready to face the fact that perhaps they might not continue to find it very convenient to work along together. To me that is not only profoundly wrong; to me it attacks the very basis of our society. I should like to read, to the minister particularly, some words of a man who is often quoted. I understand he was a very dull speaker, and always emptied the House of Commons, but certainly he wrote well. I want to read these words, and as I do so perhaps some hon. members will be inclined first of all to say, "Well, that is just a lot of high falutin' sort of sermon stuff." I do not think it is, and later I shall say why I do not think so. This is Burke on society:

> Society is indeed a contract. Subordinate contracts for objects of mere occasional interest may be dissolved at pleasure—but the state ought not to be considered as nothing better than a partnership agreement in a trade of pepper and coffee, calico or tobacco, or some other such low concern, to be taken up for a little temporary interest, and to be dissolved by the fancy of the parties. It is to be looked on with other reverence; because it is not a partnership in things subservient only to the gross animal existence of a temporary and perishable nature. It is a partnership in all science; a partnership in all art; a partnership in every virtue, and in all perfection. As the ends of such a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations, it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born. Each contract of each particular state is but a clause in the great primeval contract of eternal society, linking the lower with the higher natures, connecting the visible and invisible world, according to a fixed compact which holds all physical and all moral natures each in their appointed place.

Now I want to make the statement that if it were not that what I have read is a plain statement of fact, we would not be in this house today. It is only because those things are true, and practically true, and because there always have been enough men who lived up to them and made them true, that we are here today. Consider what is happening now. Here am I, an ordinary member of the opposition. I am able to stand up and express my views; I have just the same right, or almost the same right to speak as the Prime Minister has. Is that not a remarkable thing? Does that not mean this is a marvellous institution? What is the genius of our whole institution? It is the rights of minorities. Why, when we put pieces of paper in ballot boxes every five years, do we accept the verdict? Several times during the last twenty years I have not liked the verdict at all, but I have always obeyed it; and why? Because deep down I felt that the rights of the minority would be protected, that the minority would have a chance, and that this great institution built on these principles, spiritual principles and no others, would see to that; and that it was worth protecting, even though in the judgment of the electorate we had not been able to persuade them that we were right. Then take another thing; take the majesty of the law, on which we very often fail to reflect. Think of the majesty of the law; and I need not go further. I simply say that the principles I read to you very briefly go to the very basis. They are practical. There is nothing illusory about them. We would not be here today; we would not be enjoying the prosperity we have today if it were not for the moral background which is behind this.

Now I want to read a short extract from a very different person, a brilliant man well known in this country, who died in his prime. I often think of what he might have done had he only lived. These are the words of D'Arcy McGee, speaking just before confederation:

> Miracles would cease to be miracles if they were events of everyday occurrence; the very nature of wonders requires that they should be rare; and this is a miraculous and wonderful circumstance, that men at the head of the governments in five separate provinces, and men at the head of the parties opposing them, all agreed at the same time to sink party differences for the good of all, and did not shrink, at the risk of having their motives misunderstood, from associating together for the purpose of bringing about this result.

I have just one thing to add. I suppose we must admit there have been times within this last year when it would have been difficult to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference. It might have been suggested that on the part of one or other it was being done from weakness, that it was an act of appeasement, that somebody was going down on his knees to somebody else. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the present economy is free of all those difficulties. The governments have balanced their budgets. They are out in the open. Nobody need take off his hat to anybody else. Everything is free and clear, and they can talk man to man.

But I do suggest this, that in this confederation nobody can suggest that things are happy at the present time. We have our difficulties. Here in the House of Commons we learn from each other—at least I hope we do. They have a saying in French, I believe, tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner. We learn to understand each other better here, and therefore we overcome our difficulties. But the difficulties are there. And it seems to me that every day that goes on, as things are now, the matter gets worse. Mark you this: things are well enough now, but of some of the difficulties outlined so clearly by the Minister of Finance should come upon us, let us say within the next six, nine or twelve months, we should need every ounce of strength that comes from standing shoulder to shoulder. And if this time should come, and we were not all together, the people of this country might well ask some questions. We have always said—and everyone is guilty of this—that there are certain things which needed unity, which needed the action of all.

Here you have a family—and I am not forgetting the late Mr. Lapointe's saying that the dominion was not the father but, as I believe he said, the child of the provinces. I am not speaking constitutionally; I am just speaking in a human way. Here we have a family capable of working together, and yet we have at the present time the two eldest—

Mr. IRVINE: The prodigal son.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My hon. friend knows his bible well, but sometimes wrongly. Here we have the two eldest who have grown up to be bigger and stronger than the others, but who want to play their part together—we have them for the present, I say, partly outside. Is it necessary that we should go on like that? I said the other day that a friend of mine had said that it was a scandal, and I do not know if that word is too strong. But I would say this, that it seems perfectly clear the initiative must come from the dominion.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as was fit and proper, was the chairman of the conference. But I say again that if there are those who can recapture enough of that spirit—and it was a real spirit—which put this country together, and carried on through unbelievable difficulties, and if that spirit could be recaptured today, we would have a chance to get together, and to go along together, instead of as at the present time, hopelessly divided.

I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance
> (a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living;
> (b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture;
> (c) fail to provide for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference in order to complete satisfactory agreements with the provinces and a dominion-provincial programme of social security, health and public investment."

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the great honour conferred upon him in his being selected to follow a distinguished line of ministers of finance and to introduce the annual budget. I was unable to be present that evening, but I am told by my colleagues that the minister's speech was of a kind which followed well the traditions of his predecessors.

I wish to say, too, I am glad to see the hon. member from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) back in his seat this afternoon, and able to act on behalf of the official opposition. I disagree with most of what he said, but I appreciate the contribution he makes to the debates of the house.

First let me make a comment on his criticism of my reference a few weeks ago to the profits that had been made in Canada over the past year. I had drawn attention to the largely increased profits made at a time when the costs of living were rising and the ordinary common man found it difficult to meet his obligations and to provide for his family. The figures I used on that occasion were, I believe, all from the Financial Post, although one or two may have been taken from some of the published reports in the Globe and Mail. I pointed out that one company showed an increase in profits for 1946 over 1945 of 309 per cent, that the Bruck Silk Mills Limited showed an increase of 255 per cent. I admit I was wrong in one of my percentages, that dealing with Moirs Chocolate Company. I am glad to correct that this afternoon. The error was not my fault, but was due to a typographical error in the Financial Post. They gave a figure of $266,000 as profits, when the figure should have been $206,000. So I shall have to reduce the amount of profits which I gave, on a percentage basis, from an increase of 226 per cent down to 153 per cent.

But, Mr. Speaker, I still contend that even if the profits are used in the manner in which my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario says they are used, and not for the immediate payment of dividends, yet they are retained and added to the capital of these vast incorporations; so that after a period of time what actually happens is this, that the community has paid for the industry, and the shareholders own it. That is the effect of adding to capital from profits. May I point out that at the very outset of the war we urged the imposition of a capital gains tax. We foresaw large accumulations of capital in the war period, and prices and depreciation allowances were such that we contended it would be appropriate for the government to introduce a capital gains tax. Such a tax sooner or later will have to be considered by a successor to the present Minister of Finance.

I was particularly interested in the argument of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario with regard to purchasing power. Hon. members will recall that he gave the amount of circulating medium or money at the present time as $7,500 million or thereabouts, and suggested that this should be reduced—at a time when it is essential that our people shall have circulating medium in order to buy what we hope will be the additional products of peace time industry. It seems to me that that is going entirely the wrong way about the matter. As for interest rates, an increase of course would be satisfactory to the people who clip coupons and collect interest, but it would be most unsatisfactory to the hundreds of thousands of people who lack houses and other facilities and who would have to pay that interest. I am glad that the government intends to maintain the kind of cheap money policy that has been followed in this country for the past number of years.

I want to come now to a criticism of the budget from the point of view of this party. As I said, the minister made a remarkable speech, and he introduced a remarkable budget. Not only did he place before the house the results of the country's financial activities last year, the receipts and expenditures, but he showed in cold figures the effect of the great struggle we were lately engaged in and which not so long ago was brought to a victorious conclusion. The condensed estimated balance sheet of the dominion given by the minister to the house shows that on March 31 this year our net national debt had reached the colossal figure of $13,069,261,000. That is more than half the estimated value of the assets of every kind of all the people in Canada in 1927. The interest on this colossal debt is more than three times as large as it was before the war.

If we take the unmatured funded debt of Canada, which was given also in the table submitted to the house by the minister last week, of $16,524,161,000, we find that the interest obligation on that huge sum amounts to $437 million a year, or, as my recollection serves me, within $120 million of the total pre-war budget of this country. Thus apart from the sorrow and suffering occasioned by our losses in killed and wounded, we see what modern war entails in financial debt and interest obligations. May I take this opportunity of saying again that the lessons of this war should teach us that not only is war costly, but if we are to play our part to end the anarchy in international affairs which lies at the root of all war, we must be prepared not only to stand with the united nations against aggression wherever it may occur, but to do all in our power to remove, within as well as without our borders, the economic anarchy which produces war. Of course that this will involve the nations in a surrender of a portion of their national sovereignty should not deter them from the task.

I think the budget was greeted with rather premature approval. The minister was able to make some statements which caught the public eye but which will not withstand close analysis. He was pleased that the government had entered the year with—and I use his words—a surplus larger than the accumulated total of all previous surpluses in our history. I am going to join the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario in the criticism he made the night the budget was introduced of the large surplus of the financial year, but I shall do so from an entirely different standpoint. I question, not the amount but the manner in which this surplus was achieved.

The minister said that the total revenues for the year exceeded by $509 million the forecast made in the budget speech last year. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said that we should not be grateful because the government took several hundred million dollars in taxes more than they needed to take. Neither the minister nor the financial critic of the opposition pointed out the real causes of this very large surplus, which I think in the main were two. First, there were the huge profits extracted from the people by industry and corporations, and which were reflected in the large increase in the proceeds from excess profits taxes and corporation income taxes. These accounted for the receipt of an additional $147,700,000. The second factor, however, I think is more important. I refer to the reduction or the elimination of subsidies on various consumer goods such as milk, edible oils, starch, sugar, beans, molasses, soap, tea, coffee, wool, cotton and other essentials which enter so largely into the cost of living of persons in the lowest income brackets. Some of these were removed only recently and did not affect it to any great extent, but the milk subsidy was removed last October. If profits had been curbed and the subsidies continued the surplus would have been far less.

In other words, the minister's surplus was achieved at the expense of every consumer in Canada, an expense falling most heavily on those least able to bear the burden. It is therefore not a matter which should invite congratulation, but on the contrary it should invite some condemnation. Incidentally this condemnation should be directed not only at the members of the government but at the members of the official opposition and such other hon. members who were persistent in their efforts to remove subsidies and controls.

Equally deceptive is the widely heralded approval of tax reductions. Newspapers last Wednesday morning headlined their stories with such captions as, "Personal income tax slashed." They took the minister at his word when he said:

> I am consequently proposing to make a substantial reduction of taxation in this budget. Moreover I am proposing to concentrate this reduction almost entirely in the field of personal income tax.

But did he do so? No. The total reduction in personal income tax is about $110 million, but the reduction in the excess profits tax of $279 million made in last year's budget, and the additional $10 million in this year's budget, make a total reduction of $289 million. Thus the estimated total excess profits tax for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, is $160 million as against $449 million for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947.

Viewed in this light one can characterize the budget as a big business budget, which should satisfy our friends of the official opposition.

Nor will the reductions in personal income taxes bear very close scrutiny. The minister contended that the greatest proportion of relief was given to taxpayers in the low income brackets. He based his contention on what I think was a deceptive calculation, that of percentage reduction from the old tax levels. He said this:

> The reduction as compared with present rates is as much as 54 per cent in the bottom bracket, but is limited to about 6 per cent or 7 per cent in the top brackets.

As a statement of fact, of course, that is quite true. Then the minister put on Hansard three tables of three different categories of taxpayers, comparing the new and old rates on the percentage basis. I have looked up the records and I cannot find when a similar percentage comparison was used before. On the contrary in some cases where there have been sharp increases or sharp decreases in personal income tax the amounts have usually been stated to the house in dollars. I am therefore going to ask permission of the house to table the same three categories of income taxpayers with the percentages given by the minister translated into dollars. May I have the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, to do that?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the permission of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you. I may say this is the first time in my twelve years here that I have asked to put a table on Hansard, and I am pleased to get the permission of the house to do so this afternoon.

The tables follow:

Those tables give a very different picture of the reductions. Thus the minister's 54 per cent reduction for a single taxpayer in the lowest income brackets amounts to only $6 per year, but the 7 per cent reduction for the taxpayer in the $200,000 bracket means a reduction of $10,385.

Mr. ABBOTT: You might put on a table showing what the increase was.

Mr. COLDWELL: The man with an income of $5,000, in the group for which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was making a plea just now, has a reduction more than fourteen times as great, and a man with an income of $10,000 a reduction more than thirty times as great as the man with the $1,000 income.

The minister said that in making these reductions he wished to remove any serious barrier against a taxpayer working overtime. In our opinion the effective means to that end would have been to increase the exemptions to say $1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. Any objection that this would be reflected in the higher brackets, and of course objection would have been raised, could have been met by making the necessary adjustments in the graduated income tax. Increased exemptions, I might add, would have removed entirely, perhaps, in the case of the average working man, and almost entirely or at all events would have gone a long way towards meeting the criticism in the case of the farmer, doing away with what I consider to be entirely legitimate grievances.

Equally deceptive was the comparison between the proposed new Canadian personal income tax and the proposed new taxes in the United States. The minister's table is designed to support his contention that he is taxing the low groups in Canada less and the higher groups more than in the United States. That is incorrect, because he takes no account of the fact that in most of the states of the United States there is a state income tax as well as a federal income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I put a footnote to the table to that effect.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is probably right, but I am taking the minister's statement in his budget speech. New York, for example, imposes a state tax of 7 per cent on incomes of $10,000 or more. The married man with an income of $10,000 in New York state would pay $1,619 in federal income tax, plus $700 in state income tax, or a total of $2,319, while the same taxpayer in Canada will pay $1,990 or $329 less.

The minister said that Canada could not carry a tax burden significantly higher than that in the United States because, and again

I use his own words, "There is a risk of a serious drain of Canadian personnel to the south for this reason alone". I wonder if the minister really thinks this is a significant reason for the loss of young Canadians to the United States. To my mind the real cause of the drift of our young people to the United States is that the standards of living as expressed in wages and agricultural returns in Canada are too low in comparison with the costs of living and the costs of farm production. I think that is probably the reason.

Mr. JACKMAN: How about the C.C.F.?

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member asks me how about the C.C.F. We were not in power anywhere in Canada from 1930 to 1935 when emigration to the south and deportations to England were on a scale such as we had never had before in the whole period of our history. I would hope that any kind of government in the future would endeavour to see to it that—

Mr. MACKENZIE: We were not in power then.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I thought my hon. friend would assume, the question having come from a supporter of the government that was then in power, that that in itself was an adequate answer to the question put.

The minister also said that because of the influence exerted by the larger economy, that of the United States, upon the smaller one, Canada, we cannot for long follow widely divergent tax policies without causing serious stress. Mr. Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, made a similar statement quite recently. He said that sooner or later our price level would have to be adjusted with that of the United States. One is hearing that quite frequently these days. It implies that Canada's economic and tariff policies must inevitably be governed by what the United States does. I think that practically all members of the house will agree that that is a dangerous attitude to take. If we accept the domination of our economy by the United States we admit that we have lost the battle for full employment and continuing prosperity as well as our long-continued struggle for Canadian independence. My colleagues and I refuse to submit to such domination in this field—and, may I add, in any other field.

Mr. ABBOTT: There was no suggestion by Mr. Towers or myself that we were under the economic domination of the United States

Mr. COLDWELL: It is implicit in the minister's statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not implicit.

Mr. COLDWELL: We shall not quarrel about that. I am simply expressing our point of view. We are not narrow nationalists, but we want Canada to occupy her proper place among the family of nations to which alone we are willing to allot certain aspects of our national sovereignty.

No; this budget does not do what the government would have us believe it does. The exemptions under the new budget are $750 for a single person, $1,500 for a married couple, and $1,700 for a couple with two children.

During the course of his argument the minister made a significant statement which I should like to underline. He said, as reported at page 2554 of Hansard:

> The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada.

No doubt this statement was carefully checked by his advisers, but surely, Mr. Speaker, it is a sad commentary on the standard of living in this country, during the period of the highest national income that Canada has ever experienced. Indeed the minister expressed satisfaction because, as he said, as reported at page 2543 of Hansard:

> Today we see a Canada enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory.

He commented:

> We would appear to have ample excuse for self satisfaction and easy optimism if we took account only of our immediate situation here at home.

But the Toronto welfare council estimated that in 1944 a family of five required $1,864 a year in order to meet their bare living requirements. No frills were provided, no insurance, no allowance for health services, no provision for telephone, none for old age and so on—just the bare necessities of living. Since then, as I said a moment ago, the costs of living have risen sharply. The night before last I heard that the bureau of statistics had issued its recent figures showing that the cost of living jumped sharply in the month of March—not April, when a number of controls were removed, including rents—by 1·7 per cent, and that we were now over 30 per cent higher in cost of living than the pre-war level. So that according to the minister more than half the people of Canada are living below a minimum standard. Where is the cause for easy optimism and self satisfaction of which he spoke? Where is the justification for sticking to the exemptions which were in effect last year? Indeed apparently the minister intends to profit by the increases in price level. Last year he collected $298 million in sales tax. This year he expects to collect $325 million through the sales tax. Again let us remember that these bear most heavily upon those whose incomes are small, and like the tariff, the excise tax and so forth, they are hidden taxes; they are subjected to pyramiding as the articles pass from the wholesaler to the retailer, to the ultimate consumer and so on.

Then, too, the government is retaining the refundable portion of the income tax paid in former years. Food, clothing and shelter have risen sharply. Many families require these amounts now to meet the necessity of the purchase of houses, furniture, and clothing. To my mind, the consumer, and indeed the small business man as well, could very well do with payment of these refundable amounts. I know that that would mean that the government would have to change the policy which it has laid down, but I think it would be justified in doing so. Because of what I have already said I wish to move a subamendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That the following words be added to the amendment:

"(d) fail to raise the income tax exemption levels; and

(e) fail to make any provision for the more than half of our population who are compelled to live on incomes below the present exemption levels."

Indeed I find the budget speech in other respects somewhat illogical. The minister said, for example:

Had our taxes been raised gradually and under normal conditions to their present levels, had they been increased for the productive peacetime purposes of national development and social security rather than for the unproductive purposes of war, then the present levels might perhaps have been acceptable and tolerable as continuing levels.

The minister then argued that since the tax level had been raised for war purposes, it must be reduced. In other words the productive peacetime purposes of national development, well-being and social security must be secondary to the unproductive purposes of war. That is post-war defeatism which we must not accept. Indeed the minister warned that a recession might come—I put it mildly. This house should be concerned in maintaining those high levels of production, accompanied by a wide distribution of purchasing power, to ensure that depression will not come. The answer as to how higher standards of living can be secured is summed up in just two words, higher production. The major aim of the government's fiscal policy should be directed to maintaining and enhancing the high levels to which the minister referred in such glowing terms. But the budget will not do this.

Another criticism I make of the budget is this. A modern budget must be more than merely a discussion of revenues and expenditures. Its financial proposals should form a part of an integrated national plan for increased production and the distribution of purchasing power among the people. Ever since the movement represented by this group was founded—and indeed long before that time—the men who represented labour and farmer parties in this house, the old Progressive party, the old Independent Labour party and so on, contended that what is physically possible is also financially possible. This, of course, depends upon intelligent planning for the increased production of goods, and their equitable distribution being regarded as the principal problem facing this nation. Upon its solution depends the maintenance of full employment and the level of agricultural returns. These depend again on spending. Spending is of two kinds, consumption spending and investment spending, spending for capital equipment. Consumption spending gives employment, while savings give employment only if they are invested for the purpose of capital equipment, such as factories, machines and so on. This is where conscious economic planning in the public interest becomes essential; for there is nothing under private enterprise which automatically maintains both types of expenditure at a sufficiently high level for prolonged periods to guarantee the maintenance of employment and of purchasing power.

Under private enterprise, decisions to save and to invest are made by different people at different times. If a boom develops, investment is high; but if a recession threatens, investment capital remains idle and after a while a depression follows. Obviously the state can have very little control over the rate of saving of the individual under capitalism or indeed under any modern democratic system. Hence it is essential in a highly developed society like ours that there shall be a considerable control over investment if we are to maintain anything approaching a high level of employment. Indeed at times it will be necessary, we believe, for the state to supplement savings by financial operations through a publicly controlled financial system to maintain both a satisfactory rate of investment and purchasing power. But under our system of private enterprise and private banking there is no adequate machinery to direct investment into desirable socially useful and effective channels. Indeed, no private agency could possess either the knowledge or the facilities to perform the task. Government reports all indicate that plans made by individual private businesses last year fell far short of their targets because they did not know the over-all picture concerning available supplies and so on. I venture to say that the statement tabled in the house this afternoon on behalf of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), giving an outline of the business possibilities for the coming year, will have exactly the same defect, because each individual planning does not know what the over-all picture of the economy is in which he plans.

The view that investment must be planned and controlled by public agencies is not peculiar to the C.C.F., nor is it peculiar to socialists. Lord Keynes in his book on the "General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money", said:

> The duty of ordering the current volume of investment cannot safely be left in private hands.

This view was emphasized by Sir William Beveridge in his report to the British government several years ago on "Full Employment in a Free Society". Hence the modern budget should devote attention, and considerable attention, to the planning of investment, and this parliament should establish a national investment board to operate under a statute of parliament, defining its responsibilities and its powers.

Now obviously the control of investment cannot be effective without proper control of the banking system. The Bank of Canada under the present system can and does exercise some, if inadequate, control over the volume of credit, and that is a great gain over what we had some years ago. But the national central Bank of Canada can exercise no control over the direction of credit. This is in the hands of private chartered banks. They must be governed by the protection of the interest of their shareholders and, I do not think it is unfair to say, of the corporations and interests in which they, that is the banks or those who control them, have some interest. But lest someone should say that I am making a charge against directors of banks, may I say that there is nothing improper in their doing that—as long as the banks are private institutions. The Financial Post survey of corporate securities, and the directory of Canadian directors, show that 94 directors of three of the largest banks in Canada hold between them some 800 directorships in 484 corporations and dozens of major industries. Included in the 800 directorships are 185 chairmanships or presidencies of companies, and knowing the conditions within the industries they direct, and being responsible for their success, they might be expected, to say the least, to be overcautious in financing the establishment or expansion of competitive enterprise.

Thus we believe that the banking, monetary and investment policies as well as taxation must be under the control of economic organizations responsible to the Canadian people through their elected representatives. The rules of the house preclude our moving for the socializing of the financial system. On February 3 of this year we sought to amend in this particular, the motion to adopt the address and approve the speech from the throne. The house did not then approve of our oft-repeated demand in the words we used calling for "the socialization of the financial institutions and monopolistic industries of the country" so that we could "plan the full and proper use of our natural resources and our currency and credit, in such a way as to provide full production and a rising standard of living for the Canadian people." That is what our amendment in February stated.

Events since then—this budget itself, and fears expressed by the minister and highly-placed economists and authorities, that a recession may come and come soon—emphasize the need for the policy outlined in our amendment to the address, and if the rules of the house permitted we would have moved it again today instead of what we have moved, although we believe that what we have moved is an important criticism of the budget policy.

In our opinion, then, the budget on the whole is disappointing, for it neither relieves the man in the lower brackets from burdens imposed by government policy and rising prices caused by removal of desirable controls and the abandonment of useful subsidies, nor indeed does it plan adequately for the future welfare of the Canadian people.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I have listened with great interest to the two speeches that have been delivered this afternoon and I must say that with much of what both speakers have said I can agree. There were, of course, in each some things which I could not accept, but as the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) spoke I could imagine that if he remains long enough in the house he will become a pretty good social crediter. He is making real progress. There were a number of things, which he said in a considerably better way than I could have said them, which reflected entirely the views which I take on a number of important problems that face Canadians at this time. I want to congratulate him and also to congratulate my hon. friend the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). It was unfortunate that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was not physically up to par today. I should like to have seen him in form, ready to tear into the budget, as I know he could very well have done had he been well.

With those words I should like to place squarely before the house the position of this group with respect to the budget. My first words must, of course, be words of sincere congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on his maiden effort in presenting the budget. I believe everyone in the house enjoyed, as I know I did, his clear and rather jaunty but forceful presentation. In fact the minister had a way about him, an air of jovial, good-natured flexibility that carried us along in such a happy mood that we did not fully appreciate for some hours afterwards just what kind of medicine he was prescribing for members of the house and the people of the country. The minister's announcements of a huge surplus and of his income tax reductions were greeted with more real enthusiasm, I believe, than any budget announcements have received in a good many years.

But upon more sober reflection during the days following the presentation of the budget the enthusiasm of members of the house and of the people generally throughout this country subsided to a considerable extent. I believe most hon. members fully appreciate the indications in the budget of the strong present position of Canada and the highly satisfactory degree of stability with which we seem to have emerged from a disastrous war. Whether those indications are real or somewhat fancied will, of course, become apparent in the years to come, but I think the Minister of Finance has much reason for satisfaction in that he has been able to begin his career in the treasury department by bringing in one of the few balanced budgets Canada has had since confederation, and that he has been able to report at the outset of his experience that Canada's prestige is high throughout the world. It is only to be regretted that the retiring minister of finance (Mr. Ilsley) did not have that privilege after the burdensome war years during which he occupied that position.

I feel certain the minister himself realizes that, while he has been able to bring down a budget reflecting among other things Canada's strength, stability, balance and prestige, in reality we are at a most critical stage in the development of our country. There is no need for me to emphasize that the eyes of the world are on Canada, because our responsibilities in the world community of nations are very great indeed. We are poised in an in-between period. The war, with its strained activity, its restrictions, scarcities and lavish spending for destruction, is behind us, and we face an era in which our newly realized powers of production are seeking to be set free to make available a great abundance of much more diverse products than Canada has ever before known in her history. We are one of the remaining countries committed to a system of individual enterprise; and, though sometimes it appears that our commitment in that respect is something of a half-hearted, vacillating affair, nevertheless we are committed. And because that is so, the eyes of the world are upon us, some hoping we shall succeed in demonstrating to a confused world the superiority of that system, others hoping and planning that we shall fail utterly. That is why this is such a critical time. That is why people had every right to look for some evidence in this budget that the government is aware of our position and that it realizes the necessity of bold and sensible action to meet the needs of the challenging, dangerous time immediately ahead.

I do not wish to be pessimistic at all in my approach to a criticism of the budget. Actually I have great faith in our country and considerable optimism about its future. But when I think of what governments and finance ministers of the past eighty years have done to Canada I feel much as the old churchman felt when, in commenting upon the results of the missionary work his church had been doing, he was led to explain, "Surely God is with us, or these missionaries would have ruined the church a long time ago." I am sure Canada can achieve a glorious future, but if we are to realize that future I say that governments and finance ministers will have to repent immediately of the errors of commission and omission that have made waste of so much of our heritage.

Mr. BELZILE: And listen to the prophets.

Mr. LOW: Yes, and listen to some of the prophets, but I do not see very many in front of me, particularly in the section occupied by the intruder.

As I view this budget, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see in it any tangible evidence that the government realizes the extremely critical nature of the times in which we are living.

Perhaps when the minister gives his rebuttal he will point out to us what things in the budget provide for a serious programme of conservation and an orderly development of our resources. Perhaps in his rebuttal he will tell us what there is in the budget to indicate any determination on the part of the government to do its part in keeping the gross national production high; what provisions in the budget reflect the government's determination to keep useful employment at a high level, at least a level high enough to guarantee widespread contentment on the part of the Canadian people; and what encouragement there is in the budget for business to expand to meet the pressing need for goods and services in this country. Thoughtful people are asking what there is in the budget to indicate that, as we advance into the period of mass production of consumer goods, the government will have in readiness a policy and machinery to maintain consumer purchasing power at a level sufficiently high to maintain a balanced economy. These and many other questions are being asked by Canadians as they search this budget for signs upon which to base their hopes for the future.

In a general way, the budget is a whopping big $2,450 million baby. I must say that, buoyant as were the spirits of the minister when he presented it to us, he himself must have been aware that this offspring will take considerable nourishment from the Canadian people. The sum of $2,200 million is a large amount to lift from 3,000,000 families in one year, but $2,200 million is what the minister proposes to tax out of the Canadian people in 1947. This means that the average Canadian family will have to dig up over $700 in taxes during next year. The average Canadian family therefore wonders if it can carry that load and still meet its own needs in these times. Wearily most of them look ahead wondering if there is to be any substantial relief from the heavy burden they bore so patiently during the war. I commend them for their patient forbearance during that time.

The average taxpayer is to be congratulated on what he did during the war. Without complaining he met conditions as they arose, and he met them extremely well. But as our taxpayers strain to see into the future two facts stare them straight in the face. The first of these is this. It appears that the government has committed itself to yearly expenditures of around $2,000 million, a sum more than three times the budget of the last year before the war. The second fact is that the load can be borne only if the gross national production and Canada's business activity remain at or very near their present high levels. These are sobering facts, to be sure, and no one will blame the Canadian taxpayers if they show some anxiety about the future. Even if this national production remains at over $11,000 million a year, we shall have to pay over to this government twenty per cent of that production in the form of taxes.

At first glance the budget appears to have made sweeping reductions in the income tax rates. This phase the minister emphasized with such gusto that most of us were at first inclined to overlook the fact that he disappointed many thousands of Canadians by not raising the exemptions as they confidently expected him to do. Speaking for this group, we have always advocated the raising of the exemptions, and we will not relax our efforts in that respect. We still feel that these exemptions should have been raised and that more taxpayers in Canada should have been relieved entirely of the burden of taxes, particularly in the light of the fact that so many of our people, as has been pointed out already by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) have been languishing on a standard of living away below what they should have had. One newspaper writer put it in this way: "It will be Liberal strategy, of course, to whoop up the size of the cuts in the income tax and to hush up the omission of reductions in sales and excise taxes." But let us take a look at the income tax reductions and see if they really are sweeping. I think hon. members will recall that a few weeks ago the Ottawa Citizen carried a budget for the married man living in Ottawa, and having a weekly income of $40. How would he fare under this budget? He will pay in 1947 the sum of $94, as compared with $118 under the old rates. He will save the huge sum of $24, or about forty-eight cents a week! His saving will be cold comfort in the light of the increase in the cost of his living which came at about the time the budget was brought down.

This example gives a fair indication of what has been done to taxpayers generally. Let me hasten to say to the minister that he is to be congratulated upon framing his income tax proposals at least with a view to encouraging wage-earners who are in the middle brackets, and wishing to provide them with an incentive to higher earnings, and therefore a greater productive effort. Had the cost of living remained at pre-budget levels, the minister's action would have done much to settle labour generally. Reductions in their income tax would have been clear salary or wage increases, as indeed they will be in the future when an abundance of consumer goods available will bring living costs down.

It will be much to the advantage of wage-earners, therefore, to hasten the day of lower consumer goods prices by maximum effort now to produce goods, so that the finance minister's promise for the next year might be made good. Labouring men and wage-earners generally are not likely soon to forget that the so-called tax relief for this year is only a gesture. About 2,000,000 wage-earners in Canada are fully conscious of the fact that this budget does not mean a single thing for them, except higher living costs for some months to come, a thing largely avoidable when one considers that another $100 million could have been taken off taxes in such a way as to reduce the cost of living, and without in any way endangering the financial stability of the government.

The minister is planning for a large surplus, anyway, a surplus much larger than he has any right to expect the Canadian people to be happy about, in the light of their present circumstances. It is my judgment that the government owes it to the Canadian people generally to tackle the problem of hidden and nuisance taxes, and to tackle that problem with earnestness and sincerity. That would indicate, it seems to me, whether or not the Liberal party is really interested in the common man—the little fellows—as they so often say they are.

The government proposes to take from Canadians this year $1,045 million in the form of indirect taxes, most of which are hidden or nuisance taxes. That means that around forty-seven per cent of all the tax revenue this year will represent feathers plucked from the goose in the so-called painless method. From the government's point of view there is, of course, something to be said for these indirect, hidden taxes. But from the point of view of the common man there is much more to be said for the removal of many of them at the earliest possible time. These are the taxes which are responsible for the increasing costs of production. They are applied at various stages of manufacture and the assembly of consumer and capital goods, so that they have a general pyramiding effect upon prices. The ultimate consumer is the goat who has to pay them. And it is mainly those taxes which have been responsible for the widening divergence between farmers' incomes and the cost to them of the many things which they have to buy.

I should say it would make a most interesting research problem, if one were to attempt to untangle the maze of hidden and indirect tax applications to a selected list of common things bought every day by the people. But I will say this, that I have gone far enough into the matter to be convinced that it would be far from easy, and I am convinced it would take the skill of highly trained cost accountants to get anything like an accurate picture of the whole complicated mess; because that is just what it is, a complicated mess.

I have not the full facts before me, but one can get some idea of what is involved by taking cigarettes as an example. I am told that the actual legitimate cost involved in a package of cigarettes that sells for thirty-two cents is about eight cents. The remainder of twenty-four cents is pyramided taxes of a great many varieties. This may be an extreme example; it probably is.

I am not so much concerned about luxuries as I am about things we have to buy from day to day in order to live, but the example illustrates the general effect that hidden taxes have on consumer prices. Certainly the Minister of Finance could have performed a real service to the Canadian people by removing some of these taxes altogether, and by reducing others to a lower economic level. He could have taken off safely this year, in my estimation, $110 million of this particular tax burden; and, had he done so, the resulting possible decrease in living costs would have made his income tax rates reductions worth something to the Canadian consumer. Before I leave that may I say that it would have meant something tangible to the more than 2,000,000 wage-earners in this country who are not included in the benefits derived by the reduced income tax rates.

In this connection there is another angle which I should like briefly to mention. In my estimation the best barometer for measuring efficiency of government is the tax level, compared with the services that are being granted to the people for their money. People can readily measure the efficiency of their government only if their tax levels are easy to see, if they are right out in front of them, like a huge thermometer. But if the goose is to be plucked without knowing it is losing its feathers, or, in other words, if fully half our taxes are hidden ones that people cannot see, or cannot immediately discern, then Canadians can have no accurate way of telling whether or not their government is doing a decent job.

For this, and also for the reason that indirect taxes do add to the cost of production, the minister has utterly failed the Canadian people at this time by not including in the budget provision for abolishing and/or lowering sales, excise and nuisance taxes. When the people of Canada learn the true facts about our tax system, they will surely rise in righteous indignation, and put into office a government which will begin at once the simplification and downward revision of the whole process of tax structure.

I should like to turn for a few moments to the matter of trade. In his speech the Minister of Finance made these two statements:

> We now have reached the time when Canada may expect to benefit from the new international machinery which has been established during recent years to aid in international monetary and financial affairs.

And again he said:

> Some of our largest customers are buying more from Canada, because of their abnormal needs at present, and because other normal sources of supply are not available, than we can reasonably expect them to buy on a continuing basis. We must be prepared for reductions in some or all of these abnormal expenditures of various types in the not-too-distant future, and we must be prepared for the changes and adjustments in our production necessary to fit it into a more permanent pattern.

With regard to the first statement, I shall content myself at this time by simply saying that I sincerely trust it is not merely an expression of a pious hope. At the time we ratified Canada's approval of the Bretton Woods agreement, I did not hear much, if anything, from the government about what action they were prepared to take to impress upon large creditor nations with which Canada does business that a high and satisfactory level of international trade must depend upon their willingness to accept imports of goods from us to pay for their exports of goods to us.

The government, as we have already pointed out, rushed into that agreement without stopping to consider the very high price that Canada is likely to have to pay for a very doubtful privilege. But, now that we are a party to this tax, our job is to use our influence on every possible occasion to drive home to our neighbour to the south, especially, her sacred responsibility in this whole matter of trade. I believe I am right when I say that to a very large extent the economic stability of nearly every country on the earth and the peace and security of the world depend upon the attitude of the United States of America toward trade. Somehow the man on the street in that great country must come to understand how great that responsibility really is.

With regard to the second extract from the minister's speech I should like to say just a few words. Canada ought to prepare herself and her machinery right now to meet what the minister has forecast with respect to a reduced foreign demand for Canadian goods. Two things are prominently in my mind about that matter at this time. The first is this. It stands to reason that as keener competition for markets develops throughout the world—and that will come sooner than many people expect—we in Canada will be forced to lower our cost of production of a good many things if we are to retain our markets abroad. Here again I contend is a strong argument for the complete overhaul of our taxation structure and for the abolition of much of our indirect taxation that adds to the cost of production. In my judgment it would be worse than short-sighted for us merely to wait and see what happens, as is so often the attitude adopted. The removal of these taxes now will help to put us in a much better competitive position later on when the need is upon us.

In the second place, we ought to be giving much attention to the local market. After all, only a comparatively small percentage of Canada's business is done with countries abroad. We ought to be turning our attention to the fullest possible satisfaction of our internal demand for the goods and services which we in Canada can produce. I do not mean by this to neglect our foreign trade. Far from it; let us expand it to the utmost without lowering the standard of living of the Canadian people; I emphasize that, without lowering the standard of living of the Canadian people.

That means, of course, balancing our exports with our imports. What I have in mind is that when the time comes that the present abnormal demand for our products drops off abroad we should be well on our way to potential economic self-sufficiency in the essentials of living. I am sure that is the only safe position for Canada in the next fifteen years or so. We should take every precaution to see that if strikes or social upheavals in other countries or war interfere with our sources of supply our people will not suffer because we have neglected to develop our own resources at least to the extent that we could within reasonable time satisfy our own basic needs. I would have felt much better about the budget if I could have found in it some evidence that the government intends putting Canada into such a position at the earliest possible time.

It was gratifying to note from the minister's speech that he expects production in Canada during 1947 to reach $12,000 million at prices slightly higher than those prevailing in 1946. We may be fairly hopeful then that employment will continue at a high level during the year. It is most important that such be the case, for without a high level of income the people will not be able to pay the tremendous volume of taxes required by the government to fulfil its commitments. In fact there can be no guarantee of real prosperity if we do not make possible the production of vast quantities of goods and their distribution to the masses of the Canadian people. I wonder if this government is facing up squarely to the problems associated with keeping production high. There is little in the budget to indicate its attitude in this respect.

Competent authorities estimate that it will require production to the value of approximately $1,000 a year per head of population if we are to maintain a high and satisfactory level of wage-earning employment. Investigation in the United States, where conditions are not very much different from our own, indicate that that country must produce not less than $170 billion worth of goods a year to reach anything like full employment. From that it would appear that in Canada we must maintain between $11 and $12 billion worth of production a year to do a similar job. Henry Kaiser recently made this statement:

If we fail to have full employment we will not only face national bankruptcy but a social upheaval in which the American democratic form of government might well be swept away.

I believe it is just that serious a matter. Now I do not like the term "full employment", because there is something about it which reminds me of Schikelgruber and his "full employment", but I do recognize the need of providing opportunities for useful employment with appropriate incomes for the vast majority of our people. I believe this calls for careful organization and for vision on the part of the leaders of this nation.

Many leading men in the United States have been studying the whole problem of employment, with its related problems of production, markets and maintenance of purchasing power at a level to balance with the production. The United States congress has recognized its responsibility in meeting the problem by passing the full employment bill. They are determined to provide jobs with pay to all Americans who wish to work. There is much evidence that leading thinkers in the United States now recognize that the major difficulty to overcome in any programme of high production and employment is that of maintaining consumer purchasing power at the point where the goods produced and the services offered can be taken off the market and consumed and used by the people.

Beardsley Ruml, about whom the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) spoke a few days ago, educator, social scientist and business executive, chairman of the board of R. H. Macy, Incorporated, and a director of the national bureau of economic research in the United States, said recently in an article he wrote for Cosmopolitan magazine:

We were able to sell what we produced in 1946 as a result of four strong abnormal forces operating in 1946—reconversion spending, inventory building, net exports abroad, and lower government receipts than expenditures during most of the year. The forces that gave us full employment in 1946 will be weaker in 1947. And so we will have a weakening of the 1946 basis for full employment. The future must find the substitutes for the abnormal war and war conversion props to consumer purchasing power. Will they be found in 1947?

The production in 1946, to which he refers, in the United States was approximately $180,000 million. What Mr. Ruml said of his own country holds good here in Canada. There will be no use in thinking that pent-up wartime savings will prop up consumer demand. Mr. Ruml had something to say about this, too, and I quote:

There is no solace in a so-called pent-up demand. There has always been a pent-up demand, even at the lowest points of depression. The question is not demand, but effective demand. Our economic reconversion must be to find a peace-time substitute for those non-recurring strong forces which were the legacy of war and post-war disorder.

It is the quantity of money in the pockets to buy that makes employment. Our biggest job in the future will be to maintain that kind of purchasing power at a level high enough to ensure the distribution of our whole production. If we fail in that, our way of life, our freedom, the individual system of responsible enterprise are all doomed. There are a great many people thinking in just those terms today. Take a look at what Harper's magazine crack writer John Fischer has to say, as reported by Richard L. Strout:

Russians are scared by their cast-iron Marxist logic about American capitalism. No amount of argument will shake their doctrinaire belief that American capitalism will produce a major depression in the next fifteen years, that this will produce fascism, and that this will produce war.

He continues:

Thus if there isn't a depression in the next fifteen years, the Russians might change their tune. Facts will speak louder than words. From all this it can be argued that one way to preserve international peace in the world is to prevent that depression which the Russians believe will lead to war.

That argument applies equally to the widely-held opposite thesis that Russia is hoping for a major depression in the United States, with the consequent weakening of American economic and political power abroad, paving the way for further Russian expansion and influence. Thus a healthy American economy and wise trade policy are considered imperative checks to the spread of communism.

Mr. Speaker, however we look at the situation we are facing a most serious situation and problems which have their very roots in our economic system. In Canada we are challenged by the same forces that challenge the United States. If we fail now to meet that challenge, if we fail to make the necessary adjustments in our financial and economic organization by which we can avoid these disastrous depressions, we might just as well make up our minds that freedom of enterprise and every other kind of freedom will move out of Canada and communism will move in.

The minister, it seems to me, could have made himself the white-haired boy if in his budget speech he had declared he would find a way of maintaining purchasing power in the people's pockets sufficient to guarantee continued high production and employment for our people and freedom from the fear of depression and insecurity, even if it means the necessity of cutting loose from the present restrictive outworn system of distribution. I recommend to him, we have always recommended and we continue to recommend, the compensated-price discount or subsidy machinery put forward by the group with which I am associated, together with the earliest possible institution of a debt-free money system. I say there is yet time for the hon. Minister of Finance to become the white-haired boy. I challenge him—and I hope he will listen to what I say to him at this time—to rise in his place in this house and in his rebuttal say what he will do when there begin to appear unsaleable surpluses of goods in our country, the first signs of coming depression. A bold declaration from him would do more than even he could imagine to settle the minds of the people and to make the enemies of our way of life crawl away into their holes to stay. Let the Minister of Finance remember that communism and marxism and fascism do not thrive and spread amongst a happy and contented people who have dynamic faith in their way of life, a faith that is buttressed by the treatment which their way of life metes out to them in the form of security and freedom.

I do not wish to speak longer. If the rules of the house did not forbid I might at this time move an amendment, but the rules forbid that until one or the other of the amendments at present before the house is disposed of.

Mr. KNOWLES: You cannot do it even then on the budget.

Mr. LOW: No; I was mistaken. Under the rules we are not allowed to present an amendment. But were it not that the rules forbid it, we would have presented an amendment along the lines of our economic policies in which we in this group have great faith.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, as I rise this afternoon to ask you for the privilege of the floor and to address this august assembly I assure you that I shall present my own thoughts, not written and rewritten and corrected, but the sincere beliefs that I hold myself, which possibly may not make as fine reading as the impeccable language we have heard this afternoon, but will, I repeat, be my own thoughts and those, I believe, of the majority of the people of the great province from which I come.

As I enter the arena this afternoon I do not do so with the thought of breaking a lance with the redoubtable warriors who have already entered it. I wish only to help the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and this Canada of ours by once more pointing out to him and to the hon. gentlemen of this assembly the tremendous possibilities of the resources of Alberta which I am going to ask all hon. members to help develop.

Some of the statements made by speakers who have preceded me struck me as requiring some answer; but, having recently sustained an injury which has compelled me to be quiet and from which I am not yet fully recovered, I thought my duty would be better fulfilled were I to speak only of the things I mentioned at the outset.

Lately the Imperial Oil Company has made a great discovery of oil. I am not boosting the Imperial Oil Company; I am simply reciting a fact. They have discovered one of the most important oil wells ever found in Alberta, a few miles south of the city of Edmonton, near the town of Leduc. Many times in this house I, as member for Athabaska, have tried to impress the people of this country with the possibilities of the tar sands of that great Athabaska region. I have said to the doubting Thomases of eastern Canada that over there lie resources which are so vast and so immense as to stagger the imagination and which could make this Canada of ours, in spite of the doubts expressed in this budget debate so far, one of the wealthiest and most self-contained countries in the world.

First I mention oil, then gas and coal. No nation can be powerful in time of war and rich and prosperous in time of peace unless it has a plentiful supply of these resources. We all know but often forget that Alberta possesses more coal, lignite, bituminous, semi-bituminous and semi-anthracite, than all the rest of the provinces put together, and that they constitute a large percentage of the coal resources of the British empire. I do not overlook the fact, and I hope nobody does, that a shortage of this material, without which no nation can be great and powerful, may develop. Experts in the United States are predicting today a shorter life for the oil resources of that country than for Canada's. Lignite was used by the Germans for years as a source of oil and gas. In the tar sands of McMurray and along the great Athabaska river are hundreds of millions, yes, billions of barrels of potential oil if we Canadians would only use the talents and the courage that we have in this country and show the same adventurous spirit of our ancestors who centuries ago were drawn there by the appeal of this great western country. I say to the Minister of Finance, who presented such a wonderful budget, cheerful and able, that if we develop the resources of Alberta alone, in a few years, in a few decades at most, the Minister of Finance can close his books and not worry about surpluses or meeting the obligations of Canada.

Some hon. members listening to me today may doubt the incredible, the staggering resources we have in that province which today has a population of less than the city of Montreal. That population may be only 800,000, but what a great population it is, what a population of pioneers! When I was a young fellow in the Edmonton district with my father, who homesteaded some twenty-five miles north of that city nearly sixty years ago, we had confidence in that country; we had confidence in ourselves. Some years later, in the legislature of Alberta as well as in the House of Commons of Canada, this country of youth, I was astounded and sorrowed by the expressions of doubts, of despair even, of the future of that great country and particularly of the possibilities of Alberta. I am now, sir, walking in the shadow of life, but I still have the spirit and the courage of youth, and I use my voice to the best of my ability to boost Alberta.

In 1922, on the floor of the legislature of Alberta I predicted that under the soil of the province—and may I say that that soil is good enough for anything; its fecundity is beyond comparison—there was the wealth of which I have spoken, immense resources of oil and of all minerals; but I was made the butt of jokes when I asked the province of Alberta to pay a bonus of from $50,000 to $100,000 to the first company or individual that would find this oil and bring in a producing well of at least 1,000 barrels a day. How they laughed at me! Today, Mr. Speaker, the work has been done and the field has been proved. At that time I deplored and I still deplore the fact that our public men, the provincial government as well as the federal government, never saw fit to retain to the holders of the topsoil the natural resources underneath. When a homesteader went out west, thirty, forty or fifty years ago and gave everything he had, gave his health, his brawn and his courage in order to develop that great western country our government, if you please, saw fit, I suppose for the sake of the large corporations now benefiting by their development, when they gave title to the homesteader, to give him title to the surface only. He could cut the trees, pull the stumps, take out the stones and through that labour break his heart and his back in developing that great country, but if there was a million dollars under it, it went to somebody else; he had no right to it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is still going on there.

Mr. DECHENE: I do not wish to be interrupted, Mr. Speaker, in the picture I am giving of that great country, but I say to the hon. member for Lethbridge that both of us should be boosting Alberta.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You are doing a splendid job.

Mr. DECHENE: I proposed a motion that a bonus should be paid, but I was thought to be foolish. What is happening right now? Go down to the Edmonton district where an oil boom is taking place. What do you find? A large company with unlimited capital has already filed claims on the whole country. There are farmers who have been there for fifty and sixty years, and all that the law compels the big company to do is to pay them for some ten or fifteen acres which they may take. They may pay them $50 or possibly $100 an acre in damages and take out oil worth millions of dollars. They are not compelled to pay them a cent of royalty, because, according to the opinion of the people of those days, the resources should be retained by the crown, for the benefit of whom? Not for the benefit of the homesteader.

I know I have not enough time at my disposal to tell the whole story. Forty minutes is not long enough. One could speak for two or three hours about Alberta and its possibilities and not tell one-quarter of the story. The thing that we want done in that province, the thing that we hope hon. gentlemen from eastern Canada who control the finances and the power will do, is to develop that province. Do not just criticize us because we speak about wheat. If there were another crop failure in western Canada where we would not have ten bushels of wheat to export, every business house from Halifax to the head of the lakes would be worrying and losing money, because that is where the money comes from. That great country has grown tremendous exportable surpluses of billions of bushels of wheat. It has raised millions of dollars worth of cattle, millions of dollars worth of hogs, which have been placed on the markets of this country. It has been the lifeblood of this country. All that we require is something to help us for further development. We have done more for the lifeblood of this country; we have put more into the business system of this nation than will ever be computed or paid back. We have in a few seasons put far more into Ontario and Quebec in the years before the war than people realize or recognize. Sometimes when I sit here in this corner of the house I wonder at the ideas I hear expressed by some eastern members about the supposed beggars from western Canada. I do not come here as a beggar; I come here as a man representing one of the wealthiest provinces in resources not only of this country but of any country in the world of a comparable area. I said we have coal, oil, gas and resources of every kind and people. And what people, the best human stock in the world. Let us carry on in the tradition of the old-timers who went beyond the great lakes, beyond the prairies, and who saw the vision of wealth and of achievement, who saw, through the rays of the setting sun in the great Pacific, over the ice fields of the Rocky mountains, the smile of hope, the smile of nature, who saw a country which God has so generously endowed. What a place for our young men!

I shall not discuss the details of the budget this afternoon, but I should like to show you, Mr. Speaker, the possibilities of that great province. We have to do something to develop its resources. That is why I am here today. I am not here with my hat in hand or on bended knees asking anything from anyone except what is coming to us. I have lived in that province for nearly sixty years. I would ask all hon. members to support me in the appeal I have made, as set out in a simple resolution which I have had on the order paper for many sessions, to have these gaps of railways filled in. I am not asking for anything that would cost this country unnecessarily a five-cent piece—that is an expression which is well known. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have no right to refuse that appeal made on behalf of the people in that district.

The word of a government should be as sacred as the word of honour of any man engaged in business. I remember when I was a young fellow my father said to me, "Boy, we did not need any notes in my young days. When you made a deal with a friendly farmer or businessman in our province and that man said he would pay you on the first of November, you did not need any note from him. He would pay you on that date; if he did not, he was dead, because nothing would prevent him from meeting his obligations."

When those settlers went west in that Alberta and Athabaska country and developed homesteads they had a right to expect that communications would be supplied them. I would remind hon. gentlemen of what the Saskatchewan government did in the years from 1930 to 1938. There is a man, right in this building working for one of the top men of this government, who was one of the officials that helped to move the people from the dust bowl in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We had given charters for these proposed railways and that should have meant that these roads would be built. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company secured a charter for a road from Prince Albert in a westerly direction, through Meadow Lake, to connect with the Canadian National Railways, in the vicinity of Cold Lake, and we thought that railway would be built so as to carry out the terms of that charter. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company I say is responsible, and if the shareholders will not agree to the spending of the necessary money to complete the gaps in that line, so that the road may join with that which my good friend the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) has advocated so eloquently in this house, and which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has also advocated, so that communication might be carried on to the west coast, providing the necessary transportation in that northern country—I say, sir, that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will not begin operations on that work we should cancel the charter and set the Canadian National Railways to work in that territory with a view to having these lines built for the service of these people.

On other occasions I have spoken of the condition of these people. It was not lack of initiative or lack of courage or endurance that was responsible for their plight, but conditions over which they had no control, a calamity similar to that which had also afflicted the United States and the people of the mother country who, as we know, have suffered in the past winter from terrific storms. Sometimes you may wonder why these people in the district I speak of had to move away from the soil that they had cultivated, but the answer is obvious. That soil would no longer grow anything for them. They suffered from these conditions for two, three, five years and we had to take them out of that part of the country. We brought these people to the north country.

I have seen hundreds of these people going through my own town with broken-down hay racks and wagons, their horses played out, with a cow or two, which they had somehow or another saved from starvation, lagging behind because they were too weak to keep up with the procession. But these people had one thing left. They had the courage and the guts to move hundreds of miles to the north country, and there they are now. And, believe it or not, under those conditions they have made good again. There are prosperous settlers now in that country. Let us give them those lines which they have been depending upon in order that the fruits of their toil and of their courage, seeing that they have started life twice over, so to speak, shall not be lost to them.

I do not know what politics has in store for me, and that is not very important. The fate of an ordinary man in politics is of no consequence; it is only a drop in the bucket, and as a man gets older it is worth still less to him. But I should like to live long enough to be able to tell those people, whose sacrifices I have witnessed, to whose courage I can testify, that the transportation facilities which we promised them have been built by the country.

I am making this plea tonight for those people and, I repeat, I am not asking a favour. I am not asking for anything on bended knee, or hat in hand, because we never do that in that country. I do not very often ask for the privilege of holding the floor, Mr. Speaker, and this is the first time I am speaking this session, so that I am sure you will bear with me as I tell the story of the people in that part of Canada. Some weeks ago, over in the Chateau Laurier, one of the engineers of the Department of Mines and Resources presented a report on the new findings in the Fort McMurray field, some twenty or twenty-five miles west of the location where we had been working in connection with the Abasand oil. In that district they found clear lakes of bitumen. Anyone who wishes to inspect them can see the plans in the department which the engineers brought back and the description of the lakes containing bitumen to a considerable depth ready to lay on the roads of the country to make pavements. These lakes, according to the chief engineer, who is one of the best in the country—I do not suppose I need to mention his name—have a capacity of 500,000,000 barrels of bitumen; something simply staggering. To those hon. gentlemen from eastern Canada these figures may appear incredible, but they are not so to the people in that part of the country. We have heard farmers talking about yields of from fifty thousand to sixty thousand bushels of wheat, and that is not a dream; it is true. Well, if you operate on fifty acres and you lose your crop you can get by; but when you operate on an area of a thousand or two or three thousand acres, failure means a very great deal to you. That is why our farmers are so greatly interested in the prices of twine, gas and everything else. I suggest to hon. gentlemen that they should not criticize the farmers too severely if the latter seem to be bitter at times, because they have to operate on such an extensive scale that it is a tremendously expensive business to them, and if we do not help them to secure the instruments of production as cheaply as possible, we cannot be surprised if they complain.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you call it six o'clock. I had hoped to be able to complete my remarks before the dinner hour, but I have taken only twenty minutes and I should like to speak for the other twenty minutes this evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARJORIE WINNIFRED BEARMAN SMEALL

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina, for Mr. Maybank) moved the second reading of Bill No. 155, for the relief of Marjorie Winnifred Bearman Smeall.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have on the order paper resolution No. 42, which I realize I cannot hope will be reached this session, so that I am going to take this opportunity of saying what I had intended to say in speaking on that resolution. First, I want to bring to the attention of the house the fact that the divorce laws of Canada are perhaps the most restrictive in the western world, and I think reforms are long overdue to remedy the grievances brought about by our present iron-clad laws. In order that the house may appreciate the shortcomings of our legislation, I should like to relate briefly the history of divorce in England, on whose laws the Canadian law is founded.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know I am completely out of order, but I wonder if my hon. friend would permit the committee to give consideration to the non-divorce bills on the list, and then take up this divorce legislation?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Do I understand that the debate is being adjourned?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; let it stand temporarily. If Your Honour will be kind enough to call those bills on the list which are not divorce bills the house might deal with them and then consider any objections there may be to the divorce legislation.

Mr. CHURCH: Under what rule is that done?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No rule at all, but I think it would be a sensible thing to do.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house Bill No. 155 stands.

CANADIAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 171, to incorporate Canadian Nurses' Association.

Mr. MARTIN: I just want to say that I have discussed this bill with the sponsor, and I will offer a suggested amendment in committee, which may well be considered there. I need not take up the time of the house with the proposed amendment this evening.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that this bill will be considered by the private bills committee. That is necessary, because there is a difference of opinion among the nurses as to the desirability of having a Canadian body at present, at a time like this.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 172, respecting Guaranty Trust Company of Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the mover explain the bill? We have quite a few of these trust companies now.

Mr. BROWN: As sponsor of this bill I shall be very happy to explain it if my hon. friend would like an explanation. It so happens that in the statutes of 1931 the parliament of Canada enacted that the aggregate of the sums of money borrowed and money entrusted to the company for investment, the repayment of which is guaranteed by the company, shall not exceed seven times the amount of the company's unimpaired paid-up capital and reserve. The annual statement of Guaranty Trust Company for 1946 shows that authorized and fully paid-up shares amounted to $500,000 and the reserve fund to $400,000, or a total of $900,000. Seven times this amount would be $6,300,000. It also shows that the guaranteed trust account, being trust funds for investment, were $5,683,042.28, which is nearly seven times the amount of the authorized, fully paid-up capital stock and the reserve fund. So in order to protect investors and persons such as widows and orphans whose funds are entrusted to this company, it is necessary that an application be made to increase the capital stock.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend if this is the same company that is reported in the newspapers to have recently purchased the Capital Trust Company of Ottawa and Toronto?

Mr. BROWN: I do not know whether this is the proper time to discuss these matters. My understanding is that bills of this kind are referred to a committee where full disclosure is made and questions are asked by members of this house. For the information of my hon. friend, however, I may tell him that I understand it is the same company; but this has absolutely nothing to do with the taking over of any other trust company.

Mr. CHURCH: Some of these trust companies are not for the general advantage of Canada at all. They have been much criticized in one or two court decisions, and this parliament should be very careful. A number of companies were established during the war; many of them moved their head offices around and increased their capital stock. This company is moving from Windsor to Toronto and increasing its stock from $500,000 to $1,000,000. There are some paper charters out at the present time, and I just wish to protect public rights. The public who have business with these trust companies deserve some protection, because the matters dealt with and the properties covered are very largely provincial. There has been some criticism by the securities commission of certain companies coming here to Ottawa and getting federal charters when they are not federal at all. I hope this bill will be carefully examined by the private bills committee as to the necessity for the change, the increase in capital and the objects; I hope they will investigate the finances of the company and all the rest of it, and if it is all right, then parliament can act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

WOMAN'S AUXILIARY, MISSIONARY SOCIETY, CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 173, respecting the Woman's Auxiliary to the Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada.

He said: This is purely a change in name; formerly it was just called the woman's auxiliary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 7—Line of railway described.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Chairman, as I am the representative for the constituency in which this railroad is to be built, I believe I should say a few words on section 7, especially in view of the amazing contentions introduced into the discussion recently by some hon. members. I should like to say, first of all, that, notwithstanding the wishes of certain individuals there are still in Canada provinces which have their rights and powers, and it seems to me that it might as well be said once and for all that no one can foresee the day when there will be only one central power in Canada. If any such thing should ever happen, the confederation would be broken altogether.

As has been already said by the hon. member for Outremont, section 7 deals exclusively with the right to build a railroad. It has not anything to do with mining development. According to paragraph 5 of section 92 of the British North America Act, each provincial legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects therein enumerated; and paragraph 5 refers to the management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon.

Then, if we want to know what are the public lands belonging to the provinces we must refer to section 117 of the British North America Act, which states:

> The several provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this act, subject to the right of Canada to assume any lands or public property required for fortification or for the defence of the country.

[Mr. Church.]

And we must also refer to sections 108 and 109, which state that in matters such as this the provincial governments have the absolute right to dispose of the lands, and to grant permits to mining corporations.

In virtue of the powers thus given, the legislature of Quebec passed a law in 1946, which is set out as chapter 42, 10 George VI, of the statutes for that province. This measure is entitled, "an Act to promote mining and industrial development within New Quebec. In sections 1 and 2 it is stated:

> 1. The minister of mines—

That is the provincial minister.

> —is authorized to grant to Hollinger North Shore Exploration Company Limited, in replacement of the special licence number 4676 which it presently holds, a special exploration licence under conditions specified in——the following sections.

And in section 2 of the same act it is stated:

> This licence shall be issued for a period of time running from the date of its issue until June 30, 1952.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is entirely out of order to discuss in this chamber the granting to the Hollinger company of the necessary permit for the exploitation of the mining fields in that area. That must be taken as a fait accompli; and the only question is this: Is this parliament to give to another company the right to build a railroad to facilitate the exploitation of these mining fields? Therefore I am entirely in favour of the principle of the bill, and I shall support section 7.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to make a few remarks on section 7, which gives the right to build this railroad. Before we proceed to give this right I suggest that we should be most careful. Looking back over the history of this country, one realizes that similar rights have been granted without full information and without guarantees as to what was to be done with these rights. In many instances this has resulted in restricting the development of the country.

I was a member of the committee which dealt with this bill and gave it serious consideration. This is an important matter, but no record was kept of the proceedings of that committee. A record should be kept of a committee of that type, something in the nature of our Hansard report, so that we may have some record of what was said in committee by witnesses.

In addition to that, this large corporation—I presume it is such—had the unmitigated gall to come before the committee without presenting any proof or any complete information as to what they intend to do, as to what developments are intended, nor did they give any guarantees for the future. It is because of that that I wish to speak on this section.

I remember when I was a small boy, coming from England to this country, that we traversed the west looking for land, and considered settling in Saskatchewan at one time. That was the time, of course, when no Englishman need apply, except at a real estate office or a recruiting office. We applied at the real estate office, and put down $100 an acre, cash, for heavily timbered land in British Columbia. That was forty years ago. It was land which had been purchased by a corporation connected with a railroad.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the section.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am illustrating the principle of granting this right. It is only one illustration out of hundreds, where companies bought land previously from the government for $5 an acre, surveyed it, often incorrectly and sold it to British settlers in the following year for $100 an acre, cash.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Section 7 deals only with "line of railway described." The section only describes the railroad, and has no reference to what happened forty years ago.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Mr. Chairman, I think I have the right to illustrate what happened years ago, and what may happen again in the future.

This is a most important matter. As I pointed out before, there was no verbatim report of the committee proceedings, and the sponsor of the bill has not given a complete and elaborate statement to this committee. If I am permitted to do so I am going to present some facts as to what has happened in the past, to illustrate that this very same procedure in the past has worked to the detriment of many Canadian people, and to the detriment of the development of Canada.

Hundreds of those people, many of them without any substantial means, sweat out years of their lives in developing those properties. The owners who purchased from the government guaranteed certain rights and also guaranteed certain road developments. Those developments did not happen. Why? Because at that time they were not tied down. They made a verbal bargain, and had made certain promises in their literature. The government of the day had nothing concrete from which they could work to keep those people to their agreements.

That is why I object to this bill, without knowing more about these proposals. I have before me a book called "The History of Canadian Wealth," by Myers, a volume I would recommend to hon. members who are interested in the development of Canada. They will get it in the parliamentary library, and I recommend that they read it, because it gives dozens of illustrations of what happened in the past in connection with the development of this country. I am just going to read the preface before going on with my argument. It reads:

> The rapid concentration of wealth in Canada is no mere fancy. Already, it is estimated, less than fifty men control $4,000,000,000, or more than one-third of Canada's material wealth as expressed in railways, banks, factories, mines, land and other properties and resources.
> To say that this small group of individuals control so vast a wealth and the agencies of its production does not imply that they own it all. Between ownership and control there is a difference, yet the reverse of that is commonly supposed. By means of their control of financial markets and distributive systems, a small number of men may effectively control sources of wealth which still may remain under individual ownership, as witness the case of the farms, of which control farmers throughout Canada are bitterly complaining. Also it is not necessary for magnates to own all of the stock of railroads, banks, factories and mines; much of that ownership may be distributed among small shareholders, yet by their predominantly large holdings of stock, and through their power of directorship, those magnates can and do control those diversified, and often financially interconnected, sources of wealth.
> The process of centralization of wealth has been steadily going on for nearly thirty-five years. The removal of unrestricted competition was first evidenced in the case of the railways of Canada. Beginning in about the year 1879, a considerable number of smaller and formerly independent railways (some of which had already amalgamated) were absorbed by the large systems such as the Grand Trunk—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely this is all out of order?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I agree with the hon. member for Calgary West. The section states that the company may lay out, construct and operate a railway starting at a point on the St. Lawrence river, and I do not see how the hon. member, when he is dealing with this particular clause, can bring in something that happened long ago.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am trying to bring it in, in this way—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary West is sound and I ask the hon. member to deal specifically with the clause.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Do you rule that I am out of order when I am quoting this in support of my argument?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I am asking the hon. member to deal specifically with the clause.

Mr. GILLIS: May I say something on the point of order? I can understand why the hon. member for Calgary West does not like this story, because apparently it is treading on the corns of some of his friends. The particular bill before the committee is simply history repeating itself. The hon. member for Kootenay West is dealing with boundaries and territories and resources which were handed over to previous railway companies, and section 7 describes the territories that this company is to take over. He is trying to avoid a repetition of the handing over of the resources of this country which was done in the past.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will deal specifically with the territory through which this railway proposes to go he will be in order, but surely he is not in order in dealing with something that happened long ago. My hon. friend knows that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the section being considered. If the hon. member will deal with this section he will be perfectly in order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, the hon. member for Cape Breton South said that I was raising the point of order because this hurt some of my friends. I do not even know the name of one man who is connected with the railway, nor do I know any person who has anything to do with it at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I was referring to the little bit of history being read by the hon. member for Kootenay West, not to this bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to try to keep within the terms of the section.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am quoting from this book to show what happened in the past when clauses of this kind were passed by former parliaments without any guarantees. The preface continues:

> The highly centralized character of the Canadian banks is well known; the branches of the important banks extend over an immense territory; twenty-six of these institutions have 2,888 branches.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Again I ask the hon. member to deal with the territory through which this line is going; to deal particularly with this section.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. POULIOT: On that point of order, what the hon. member is reading has reference to grants of land being made for the building of railroads, but this case is entirely different. The area belongs to the province which has made a deal with the company. An act has been passed by the legislature of Quebec and there is no question of property rights. There is no question of our granting lands to this company; the only question is giving them the right to build a railroad on land which they already have. That is entirely different and that is why the hon. member is out of order. What he is reading may be interesting but it is not at all pertinent to the case.

Mr. ADAMSON: This bill does not pretend to deal with the granting of land, which in this case belongs to the province of Quebec.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, will you decide my point of order?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Kootenay West should deal with this clause.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I quite understand that lands are within provincial jurisdiction, but this parliament can ask that certain information be given by this company before the bill is passed, in order to protect the rights of the people in the province as well as the rights of the province concerned. We all know that the granting of a charter to a transportation system will give monopolistic control over the area concerned. I maintain that this parliament can do something to protect the people of this country and the people of that province by making certain that this railroad will be built within a certain time and by insisting upon having full information as to the owners of this company, their intentions, the developments they intend to undertake, when they intend to complete the road and so on. That is why I take exception to this bill being passed without that information being given to this committee.

Mr. RINFRET: A full opportunity was given to every hon. member to go to the committee on railways and ask the representatives of the company any questions they wished.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to rise to a point of order. No member of parliament has to go before a parliamentary committee as do outside people. Our place to ask questions is in committee of the whole, if we so wish.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to ask one question about section 7. We are giving the company the right to build a railway and, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the other night, we can only give them jurisdiction in Canada, and only capacity to act. I would call the attention of the government to a meeting held today between fifteen representatives of Newfoundland and the British government in London, England, regarding Newfoundland's future government. The representatives of Newfoundland were insisting that Labrador be part of that country, and said they are now to come to Canada in June and go into the question of the tenth province of Canada's federation, Newfoundland and Labrador, and the whole future of it. Under section 7 the company is given power to act, capacity powers only as a corporation to construct within Canada. To proceed with construction beyond Canada they will have to deal with Newfoundland and Labrador. I understand that they dealt with them twenty years ago but spent only about $100,000. While I do not believe in railways and coal mines and electric distribution systems being taken over as is now being done in England, I believe that the Canadian National Railways should have had a survey made of this territory not only in Canada but in Labrador. The policy of our national railway in the past has been to go into territories far less profitable than this proposition may turn out to be. While these mining men are going in at their own expense and surveys have been made under section 7, the fact remains that we are giving away public property. We have only the capacity to give the company railway and subsidiary powers to operate within Canada. For anything else the company wants outside Canada, hotels, power, highways, ocean services, vessels, elevators, wharves, it will have to deal with the provisional government of Labrador and Newfoundland. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if that is not right?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right, though perhaps not quite complete. The purposes of this bill as I read it are two-fold. One is to incorporate a company, thereby giving it the capacity to acquire powers through any jurisdiction that may be willing to grant powers to it; and the other is to build a railway from a point on the St. Lawrence in Quebec to the border between Quebec and Labrador. That is something which, under the British North America Act, can be granted only by parliament. There is no doubt that the parliament of Canada cannot grant the right to the company to build a railway in Labrador, but the parliament of Canada can grant the capacity to the corporation to go to the government of Labrador and acquire from that government the right to build in the territory governed by the commission government.

Mr. POULIOT: A moment ago I heard one hon. member say that he has the right to argue in this committee just as well as in the railway committee. He is perfectly right. The difference is that in the railway committee witnesses and experts can be heard and be asked questions to satisfy the minds of hon. members who desire information.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, in order to ascertain the opinion of the provincial government in regard to this bill, I sent a copy thereof to the premier of Quebec, asking him to kindly let me have his views.

I received today the following telegram, copy of which I shall hand over to the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret). It reads as follows:

Thank you for your kindness in sending me copy of Bill "H" re Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, which I have received this morning, a few moments before the house met. Insofar as the territory of the province of Quebec is concerned, it is obvious that the provincial authorities alone have the power to deal with hotels, water power and their operation as well as with transportation by truck, bus and automobile. In the province of Quebec, there are proper agencies having the power and the duty to supervise and control the operations arising from the use of highways and the development of provincial natural resources. As always, we are prepared to cooperate sincerely with the federal authorities in order to solve the problems which concern both the dominion and the provincial authorities, according to their respective constitutional rights and on a friendly basis if possible. However, you understand that encroachments can never serve as a basis for cooperation. Again I thank you for your courtesy in this connection.

Maurice L. Duplessis.

I wish to ask the hon. member who has sponsored this bill whether it is the intention of the company to have subsidiary companies exercise the rights which may be granted to it under this bill. It is necessary to distinguish as between the right itself and the power to exercise such right.

This information would be of great interest to the public.

(Text):

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think the general remarks just made by the hon. member for Temiscouata apply to section 7. They might apply to section 11. I will reserve my reply until we reach that section.

Mr. CHURCH: The subsidiary companies operating power sites, elevators, hotels, ocean services, wharves, aeronautics services outside Canadian territory are not under the control of the province, and must deal also with Labrador. High power costs have added heavy costs to mining production in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Issue of securities.

Mr. FRASER: This section says:

The securities issued by the company shall not exceed the cost of the railway constructed or under contract to be constructed.

How does section 16 fit into that? Section 16 says:

The company may lay out, construct, instal, maintain, equip and operate a pipe line or lines for the purpose of the transportation or transmission of oil . . .

And so forth. Does that mean that the securities issued under section 8 could not be used for this purpose?

Mr. RINFRET: Section 16 was amended in the committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Agreements with other companies for sale, lease or amalgamation.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Would the sponsor of the bill explain this section?

Mr. RINFRET: It deals with working agreements with other railways. At the present time there are no other railways in sight there or near this railway, and therefore it may appear curious to have this provision in the bill. But, as the hon. member will have seen by section 7, the Labrador government will be asked to grant permission by way of agreement for this railway line to pass through Labrador, and it might well be that Labrador might insist on having a railway company incorporated in Labrador. In that case this railway will have to be connected with the Labrador railway and power has to be taken to make the necessary agreement with this new company. That is the purpose of section 9.

Mr. MacINNIS: With reference to subsection 2, section 147 of the Railway Act prohibits the railway company from either directly or indirectly employing any of its funds in the purchase of its own stock. Why is that section being set aside? Does this come under a special act, or is it otherwise provided for in the Railway Act itself?

Mr. RINFRET: As the hon. member has pointed out, section 147 of the Railway Act prohibits any one railway company, unless specially authorized, from investing in the shares or security of another railway company, but, as I have pointed out, it might be that another railway company will have to be incorporated in Labrador which will have to be financed by this company. Of course we shall have to get the power to incorporate under subsection 2 of section 9. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask a question on section 9, subsection 2. There is no railway company yet. How can they acquire the stock, shares, bonds or other securities of other companies?

Mr. RINFRET: I have just explained it.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not see how they can do it; they are not an entity yet, or a railway yet. It is contrary to the Railway Act also, and outside Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: This road will not be built for ten years, anyway.

Mr. RINFRET: Five years.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to find out if under section 9 of this bill as worded it would be permissible for the company now seeking the charter to form holding companies outside Canada. The note in the margin says: "Agreements with other companies for sale, lease or amalgamation." The section itself concludes by saying, "whether within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada or not and whether within or outside Canada." Does this section permit the company to set up holding companies outside Canada over which this parliament or the Quebec legislature has no jurisdiction?

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think the section goes that far. It authorizes the company to enter into agreements with another railway company outside Canada, such as a railway company in Labrador, in case the government of Labrador insists upon having a railway company incorporated under its laws instead of coming to an agreement without any incorporation.

Mr. GILLIS: What I have in mind is not particularly a railway company. With this road goes a lot of other powers, the development of electricity, pipe lines, gas and that kind of thing. Could this company form a holding company in the United States and sub-lease the resources in that area to a company outside Canada over which none of our legislative bodies have any jurisdiction?

Mr. RINFRET: Section 151 of the Railway Act deals with exactly that, and section 9 is subject to the provisions of section 151 of the Railway Act. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. KNIGHT: In reading section 9 of the bill, the sponsor has referred to another railway company. Section 9 says "any other company"; it makes no reference to a railway company.

Mr. RINFRET: That is exactly the last answer I gave. If the hon. member refers to section 151 of the Railway Act he will find the answer.

Mr. GILLIS: Will the hon. member give us a brief explanation of it?

Mr. RINFRET: It is a long section.

Mr. GILLIS: Summarize it.

Mr. RINFRET: The note says: "Agreement for sale, lease or amalgamation of railway." Then it refers to "approval of shareholders; board to recommend sanction; notice in Canada Gazette; newspapers", and so forth. The notice has to be put in the Canada Gazette and in the newspapers. Then it refers to proceedings upon sanction, notice of evidence and exemptions in certain cases.

Mr. GILLIS: They deal with railways.

Mr. RINFRET: With railways.

Mr. GILLIS: This section deals with other companies.

Mr. RINFRET: Section 9, subsection 1 reads:

> Subject to the provisions of sections one hundred and fifty-one, one hundred and fifty-two and one hundred and fifty-three of the Railway Act . . .

I have just referred to section 151 which refers only to railway companies.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Subsection 2 of section 9 reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section one hundred and forty-seven of the Railway Act the company may acquire the stock, shares, bonds or other securities issued by any such railway company or acquire any interest in any such stock, shares, bonds or other securities.

Is it necessary in this case to set aside section 147 of the Railway Act?

Mr. RINFRET: As I said a moment ago, section 147 of the Railway Act prohibits any railway company from investing in shares and securities of any other railway company except as specially authorized. The connection in this case will be between the Canadian railroad and what might be the Labrador railroad. Because of that, there has to be a special authorization from parliament to authorize this company to buy the shares or stocks of the other Labrador railway.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Electric and other power.

Mr. CHURCH: Has anybody control over the power rates under this section? High power costs have been fatal to mining production in Canada.

Mr. DORION: This section deals with powers that come under provincial jurisdiction. It deals with electric power, power to generate, acquire, use, transmit and distribute electric and other power. My submission is that we cannot give to the board of railway commissioners any power to deal with matters that come under the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec. Quebec has a board to deal with such matters. The board is set up under the provincial electricity board act, which was passed by the Quebec legislative assembly in 1945. If we were to pass this section as it stands it would come in conflict with what we already have in Quebec. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon):

> That, in the first and second lines of section eleven, the words "section three hundred and sixty-eight of the Railway Act" be deleted and that the words "chapter twenty-one of the Statutes of Quebec, 9 George VI, 1945" be substituted therefor.

Mr. RINFRET: A few moments ago the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) referred to various sections of the British North America Act. I did not answer him because I knew this amendment was coming. Section 92 of the B.N.A. Act, subsection 10, reads as follows:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships; railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the provinces with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

Therefore, under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act railways extending beyond one province do not come within provincial jurisdiction, but within federal jurisdiction. So far as section 117 is concerned, which he referred to a moment ago, it reads as follows:

> The several provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this act . . .

I suggest that section 92, subsection 10, to which I have just referred, deals with property which has been otherwise disposed of. To my way of thinking, what is now being attempted is much more an encroachment by the province upon federal rights than the other way around.

So far as the telegram which the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) read is concerned, and the question which he has put on that matter, I wish to assure him that if at any time the company have a surplus of power over what they need for their own purposes they will certainly form a new company which will have a provincial charter and which will come under the jurisdiction of the provincial board.

So far as sections 14 and 15 are concerned—I know the question is going to be put there—if at any time the bus service becomes more extensive than for the company's own purposes a new company will be formed to render public service, and that company will be a provincial company and will therefore come under the provincial board.

Mr. DORION: The hon. member has referred to subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act. That subsection deals only with lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and so on. Here in section 11 of this bill we are dealing with electric power. As I said a few minutes ago, we are called upon to give the company power to generate, acquire, use, transmit and distribute electric and other power, and this comes under provincial jurisdiction. That is why I moved the amendment.

Mr. RINFRET: I would refer the hon. member to section 368 of the Railway Act, which reads:

> Whenever in any special act passed after the seventh day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, it is stated or provided that a railway company shall have power to acquire, transmit and distribute electric and other power or energy, such company, subject to the provisions of this Act, may for the purposes of its undertaking acquire, but not by expropriation, electric and other power or energy, and transmit and deliver the same to any place in the municipalities through which the railway is built, and receive, transform, transmit, distribute and supply such power or energy in any form; and may dispose of the surplus thereof, and collect rates and charges therefor, but no such rate or charge shall be demanded or taken until it has been approved of by the board, and the board may revise such rates and charges whenever it deems proper.

So that I may satisfy the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay as far as I possibly can, I would move—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is about to move an amendment, but we can have only one amendment at a time.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. DORION: I have only one more word to say. In section 368 of the Railway Act, just read by the hon. member, it is stated that the company might have the right to organize electric power, but the section states definitely "for the purposes of its undertaking". Here in section 11, however, we are giving a general power to generate power and distribute electricity.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not interested in this bill except from the point of view of the Department of Transport, and I have read carefully the amendment which my hon. friend has proposed. The amendment, if passed, would have the effect of delegating from the federal parliament powers to a provincial government, and the effect of that would be to render this section wholly unconstitutional. Anyone could thereafter move before the courts to strike out and declare this section unconstitutional. That is borne out by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Quebec Railway versus the city of Beauport.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Has he not something there in the words "for the purposes of its undertaking"?

Mr. DORION: The minister has referred to the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company case. I have here the judgment of the supreme court, which will be found in Canada Supreme Court Reports, 1945 at page 16. The notes were read by five judges and, as the report states at page 17, this question came before the supreme court when the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company asked the board of railway commissioners to fix rates of tolls that were to be charged. The company applied for an order of the board of transport commissioners approving its tariff of tolls for the carriage of passengers on the motor buses operated by it. It was held by Justices Rinfret, Kerwin and Rand that in 1939 an amendment to the charter of the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company was passed by this house which amendment read:

> It is enacted and declared that the company's now existing powers—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Just before we began the discussion of these particular bills, my good friend the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) moved a resolution in regard to certain other bills, and I think it would be proper to have that debate adjourned so as to keep the proceedings in order.

Progress reported.

MARJORIE WINNIFRED BEARMAN SMEALL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Croll (for Mr. Maybank) for the second reading of Bill No. 155, for the relief of Marjorie Winnifred Bearman Smeall.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Earlier in the evening the hon. member for Spadina moved the second reading of certain divorce bills. He now moves that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I admit I could not complete my remarks before six o'clock and that therefore I must inflict myself upon you for a few minutes longer. I believe that in my style —as you notice, I have nothing written before me—and being in the habit of saying what I think and talking about things I am supposed to know something about, I have made a point as to the necessity of this government and the government of Alberta coming to a thorough understanding of the immense possibilities in the development of the tremendous natural resources of that province, which I discussed for a few minutes. I know that this time will not be lost.

Some time ago I was reading one of the greatest writers and thinkers of his century, Victor Hugo, and I was struck with one statement he made at a time when things were most desperate for his great country, France, as bad almost as they were in the last war. I speak of 1871, and I would ask for a minute of your time to refer to those days, because at that moment everything seemed to be lost. The country was absolutely defeated; its armies were dispersed over the soil of France; the conquerors were tramping through the halls of the nation with their hobnailed boots, imposing harsh terms of peace. Hugo was himself a member of the chamber of deputies, which met under the walls while the commune was burning the city. Everything seemed desperate; they said, "Well, what is the use?" Then Hugo uttered these words: "Gentlemen, no effort is ever lost." You all know how true that is. Sometimes you have wondered what is the use of what you are trying to do. I see around me young members, men of talent, ability and courage, who one day are going to make their mark in this chamber where I am so proud to be tonight. Sometimes they will be inclined to be discouraged and to ask, "What is the use?" If they remain true to the cause they espouse; if they keep pressing forward they will find later, when perhaps they think their ideas have been forgotten, that their efforts have not been lost. Therefore tonight I repeat that celebrated phrase, which I am unable to translate: "Fût-on un million d'esclaves, je suis libre." It is because I know I am appealing to a friendly house, because I feel that I am appealing to real Canadians, because I know, as I said a moment ago, that these efforts will not be lost, that I am asking the house to consider building the gaps in these railroads about which I have spoken so often. I say again that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are unable to complete the gaps on their line because they must produce profits for the shareholders, we have the right here to cancel the charter they obtained in what, after all, was Canadian National territory. They were granted these charters away back in the boom years of 1927, 1928 and 1929 because even then they could see the tremendous possibilities of that great northland, which knows no crop failure.

I remember in 1937, when Saskatchewan suffered drought, hearing a man express the view that Saskatchewan was done. What an awful thing to say! Why, we have only started in the west. We are only beginning; and all we are asking you, through my feeble voice as member for one of the largest ridings in this dominion, is to lend us your help so that the development of that great western country may be carried out as promptly as possible. The province of Alberta cannot by itself construct the highways and railroads that are needed. For instance, they are unable to construct the highway from Fort McMurray to Edmonton which would make available those great tar resources of which I was speaking this afternoon.

If I had time I should like to say a word about another resource.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. DECHENE: My voice is giving out. I know what I am about to say will sound like heresy to my good friends from the east and west coasts, but I say quite sincerely that the greatest fish in the world, bar none, do not come from our coastal fisheries but from our northern lakes. I have in my constituency

Cold lake, where we catch trout at depths of three and four hundred feet. They are so good, so incomparable that we find it hard to get any for our own use, because the Chicago and New York markets will take every fish they can possibly get from that part of the country. In that connection hatcheries should be built. I may be told that this is a provincial matter, but that is not entirely the case. We must work this thing out together.

Having said so much, let me say this. I would not speak in this way if I did not have confidence in this government and in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I know that all of us, no matter what may be our political affiliations, are proud of the tremendous job done by the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) during the war. I met him on a street-car one day after a difficult evening during one of the most sombre, terrible years of the war, when he was being criticized not only from across the way but right from this side of the house by some very able men. If I tell this incident I know you will all appreciate it. He said to me, "I hope I am doing the right thing; that is all I worry about, doing what is right." He went on to say, "Those two men may drive me out of political life, but if they do I will go down with the feeling that I have done my duty to my country in its years of struggle and peril." I said to the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, "Your name will stand high. It will be remembered in the schools of this land when those other men have been absolutely forgotten." And in his successor I salute one of the ablest young men in the political life of this country. Under the former Minister of Finance the bonds of the province of Alberta were redeemed, so that today our credit is 100 per cent. I know when the province of Alberta comes to the present minister it will be received as that province and its people ought and deserve to be received.

I will not keep the house any longer. I regret having inflicted myself upon you; but since I have a few minutes left I should like to describe northern Alberta in June. Let us go home for June. Then the wild roses grow rank along the highways. Their aroma is the first thing that strikes a stranger. They grow almost like trees, and they are the colour of the cheeks of our girls and women. There is nothing more beautiful than northern Alberta in June, nothing lovelier than a northern Alberta June bride. Now, in spite of a late spring, our farmers are on the land. They may crab about the price of gas, the price of twine, the price of this and the price of that, but don't worry; the strong, valiant, courageous yeomen of Alberta are on the land now patiently putting in their crops. Through you, sir, may I tonight address a prayer from the bottom of my heart to Providence to bless their labour and give them a bumper crop.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), I realize that there is a place in Canada almost as beautiful as my own riding of Peterborough. The hon. member spoke about the wonderful fish in Athabaska. I know he has never been to my riding and caught some of our wonderful muskellunge, because I believe Peterborough is the best game fishing district in the whole of Canada.

In taking part in this debate, I consider it proper to offer some constructive suggestions and also do a little criticizing of the government, because I believe they deserve quite a bit of criticism. I happened to be in New York city, attending the assembly of the united nations, when the budget was brought down, and I noted that the New York newspapers placed a rather rosy appearance on it. But that rosy appearance was only on the surface, and was likely created only by the rose-coloured spectacles of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). When the average Canadian citizen had a chance to sit down with a copy of the budget speech before him and, with the aid of his own reading glasses, had an opportunity to digest the speech, he found it was not as rosy as it appeared at first glance. Indeed, one worker in my constituency said to me last Saturday that he thought the Minister of Finance was trying to follow in the footsteps of Barnum, that great founder of the circus, and the man who coined the expression, "There's a sucker born every minute". He built his circus on that assumption.

However, today the people of Canada are not fooled as easily as they were in those days. Although we find some reductions in the income tax, the reductions which the people of Canada expected, after two years of peace, are not there. In fact, at the present time war taxes are still found in the budget. The Minister of Finance failed to remove luxury taxes on articles which are not luxuries at the present time. In that connection I would refer, first of all, to table silverware—knives, forks and spoons—which we require in our ordinary everyday lives. Veterans returning from the war had to pay a twenty-five per cent tax on all the flatware they required for their tables.

Another luxury tax is the one on alarm clocks. I am particularly interested in this, because they are manufactured in my own city, and I do not think an alarm clock is a luxury.

Mr. MAYHEW: It's a nuisance.

Mr. FRASER: A worker has to pay about $3 for an alarm clock, and on top of that a luxury tax of seventy-five cents. He must pay for the luxury of having an alarm clock to waken him in the morning so that he may go to work to earn a living, and to earn enough so that at the end of the week he may have the luxury of seeing taxes deducted from his wage cheque, by way of income tax.

As I said before, on the surface the budget looks all right, and it would seem that the government had been able to manage the country efficiently. But that is only on the surface; because the methods used by the government, as pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), to balance the budget, were certainly unethical, and methods which would not be allowed in any ordinary business in Canada or in any other country of the world. They have robbed Peter to pay Paul; they have taken money out of one pocket and put it into another. They have taken capital and used it for income. And when I say that I mean that their surplus is nothing more than the proceeds from the sale of war assets, war assets which were bought by the taxpayers of Canada during the years of war, and with their money. But today, instead of those proceeds being placed back in capital account to pay off part of our tremendous debt, they are shoved into income. We see listed the sum of $372 million from the sale of war assets; and in this amount is included amounts received from the sale of ships which were built after the close of the war at a cost of $80,000, but which were sold off the ways for only $20,000. Then, office equipment was sold in the original crates at practically scrap prices. Many more millions of dollars could have been added to that $372 million from the sale of war assets if War Assets Corporation had been run on a businesslike basis, instead of on the catch-as-catch-can basis on which it was operated. According to a return tabled in my name on March 15, War Assets Corporation spent $210,631.08 last year, just to remodel and alter their office building in Montreal to take care of some of their 7,000 employees.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance said there would be a reduction of twenty-nine per cent right across the board. This, too, was featured in the newspapers. But he did not tell us that that was only twenty-nine per cent off present income tax, and that even with that percentage taken off it was far from putting the taxpayer back on the level of pre-war years.

In 1938 a married man with his wife and two children, and with an income of $3,000, paid only $9 in taxes. But in 1948 the same man must pay $230 in taxes, or an amount twenty-five times as great as that he paid in 1938. A single man with an income of $3,000 paid $104 as a tax in 1938, while in 1948 the same man must pay $420, or four times the former amount.

No consideration whatsoever has been given to the fact that a married man with a family must look after and rear his children. Believe me, the man with a family finds today that it costs at least three times as much to bring them up as it did in 1938, on account of increased taxes and prices.

After a comparison of the taxes of 1948 with those of 1938, it is clear that there is absolutely no reason in the world why the government should not have a real instead of a false surplus this year, because they are getting in so much extra taxation, as compared with the amount taken in before the war. But they have not been able to declare that real surplus because they have been extravagant in practically every department. Until they cut out that extravagance and waste they will never have a real surplus.

After paying income tax, the average family today finds that there is no chance of putting anything aside for a rainy day, no chance of saving anything to buy a home—even if they could buy one, because the government has certainly failed to provide homes for the people of Canada. The average family today finds it almost impossible, after paying income tax, to put aside a little money even to take a summer holiday. Prices are at an extremely high level. When I was speaking on the budget last year I said that the cost of living index was based, not on what you could buy but on what you could not buy. This year the cost of living index is still not right. If any hon. member doubts my word all he has to do is to go on the street and ask any housewife. She will soon tell him what is what. Here is a clipping with regard to that which states:

> Finally admit cost of living index wrong
> The dominion bureau of statistics confirmed with figures Friday what any housewife could have told it a long time ago: That the cost of keeping the larder filled, the body clothed and the house furnished is considerably more than the official cost of living index.
> Between August, 1939, and the end of 1946 the official increase was 26·1 per cent. By last month it had risen an additional 2·8 per cent.
> But while these figures represented the official average advance, they did not give much indication of some of the things housewives have been howling about. Egg prices are 70 per cent higher than they averaged in the period 1935-39. In the same class are cheese, round steak, rolled rib roast, stewing beef, veal, bacon, lard, rice, beans, corn syrup and lemons.

The bureau computes its index by averaging the weighted representative price figure for each of six main essential item groups: Fuel, rent, foods, clothing, home furnishings and services and miscellaneous.

The food group advanced 47·4 per cent, clothing 31·1 and home furnishings and services 28·2. Fuel moved ahead 10·3 per cent, rent (computed before the recent increase in domestic rentals), 9·2 and miscellaneous, 12·6.

The clipping does not say that at the present time, in order to secure things for her home, the housewife must wear out shoe leather going from store to store trying to find the things she wants. She can find no shirts for her husband, no diapers for the baby and no soap with which to wash them. Butter is up ten cents a pound; bacon is up over seventy per cent and is as scarce as hens' teeth. Rentals are supposed to be up only nine per cent, but try to find a house, an apartment, a room or even a dugout. You will find it is almost impossible. If you can get an unfurnished room you will find that it will cost you almost as much as a furnished room cost in 1938, perhaps with board thrown in. The poor taxpayer has been getting it in the neck right along and it is time that more consideration was shown for him, especially the man in the low-income group.

It costs more for clothes, more for home supplies, and more for a car if you can get one. Then, added to that, in order to make the taxpayer's life more miserable, the government has retained the sales tax on electrical power. There is also the tax on telephones, and the transportation tax which gets you coming and going. A few departments have reduced their expenditures this year but they should have been cut far more. It would have been easy for them to cut expenditures this year, because some of the departments last year had carryovers from the war which they have not this year. Perhaps it is time that all departments had a real good house-cleaning. I feel quite sure that if a survey were made of each department hundreds of thousands of dollars could be lopped off the estimates.

I should like to give a few cases. While these may represent only small amounts, when enough small amounts are added up it runs into the millions. The government have been thinking in billions and I know it is hard for them to get down again to millions. They should remember that Canada has a population of only 12,000,000; we are not in the billion dollar class.

[Mr. Fraser.]

I had an answer a short time ago to a question I had asked regarding a piece of property the health department was renting on Parkdale avenue, Ottawa. The department is paying $18,000 a year rental for this property. There is no reason why that department should rent this building at the present time, because the government has buildings which were erected during the war and which would be suitable to house this department for the time being until building materials are more plentiful and until such time as building is needed in order to give employment to our people.

I said the rental of this building was $18,000 a year and I should like to figure this out in income taxes. A married man, with a wife and two children dependent upon him, paid no income tax on a $2,000 salary in 1938, but in 1948 his tax will be $36. On that basis it would take 500 taxpayers paying $36 each into the government treasury to look after this one rental. On top of that the health department is going to remodel the building. I have not the figures, but from what the return says I should judge that will run into another $18,000. That means another 500 taxpayers to look after the repairs, or a total of 1,000 taxpayers to look after the total expenses of one building which is not needed at all. That is certainly poor business on the part of the government. The return states that it is the intention of the Department of Public Works to have this building fitted up with special plumbing, sinks, partitions, et cetera, to meet the requirements of the health department.

I have another case, small as it may be, but, as I said before these small amounts run into the millions when they are added up. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation issue a booklet every two months, or six times a year. This booklet is fifty-two pages in size and weighs about half a pound. I have one of them here. It does not help building in Canada one bit, because it deals only with housing in the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Sweden and so on. It may be interesting but it does not help the veteran in Canada to get a home. I consider this is something that is absolutely useless and could be done away with.

Another thing that could be done away with because it is not of much use to Canada is the short-wave broadcasting station on the Atlantic coast. It is no use for Canada to try to keep up with the Joneses. This is costing us over $3,000 a day. I have here a clipping stating that the appropriations committee of the house of representatives in the United States have definitely decided to do away with their short-wave station. This report, which is dated April 23, states:

House group kills programme of U.S. broadcasts abroad.

The state department's entire programme for broadcasting the American way of life to the world has been doomed by an appropriation sub-committee of the house of representatives, it was learned today.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine that you and most hon. members have visited a circus at one time and perhaps you carried water for the elephants, as I have done. You know what an elephant eats; you know how much they eat. At the present time the dominion government has a white elephant on its hands. This is just as much an elephant as any you have ever seen or ever expect to see. This year that white elephant is asking for $819,409 more than last year. In fact it is keeping the poor old taxpayer doubled up trying to pay for the feed of that elephant. The elephant I am speaking of is the film board. The film board perhaps is doing some good in putting out films for schools and for educational purposes, but the process of making these films is an extremely costly proposition. There are other ways in which the films could be made that would cost the country a great deal less money.

That same film board is at the present time subscribing to 127 magazines, periodicals and journals. I do not know what they cost, but I have my doubts whether there are ten men or women in the film board who ever read a quarter of these publications. This year nearly every branch of the film board is asking for more money. There does not seem to be any real check on the expenses of this outfit. I have a sample of their expense accounts here on my desk. Here is one for the period just before and during the 1945 election. It is for different members of the film board: trip to Quebec city, April 14, $200; May 28, another trip, $120; trip to Quebec, $300; May, another one, $350; other trips, $50 and $48. These are all for different persons and are dated around April, May and June. Here are two more trips, one for $150 and another for $300; June 7, trips to the maritimes, trips to Toronto. There are trips all over the country.

An hon. MEMBER: One to Halifax?

Mr. FRASER: They will likely be going to Halifax for the election there.

We also have the Canadian information service, now under the Department of External Affairs. The cost this year of that information service as far as I can gather from the estimates is $241,200. That is not bad if it were not for the fact that nearly every department of the government advertised last year through the civil service commission for additional staff to handle advertising publicity in the respective departments. This extra help they are taking on in each department will amount to over $91,000, plus several other thousand dollars on which I have not been able to get the exact figures.

The Canadian information service, according to a return that was tabled in my name this year, show that in their offices in London they have three men receiving salaries, living allowance and travelling expenses; in Paris they have three men or women all receiving salaries, living allowance and expenses; in Washington they have twelve in the office, all receiving fairly good salaries, living allowance and travelling expenses; in New York they have seven, all receiving salaries and a living allowance which runs as high as $1,680, and travelling expenses—$424 is the highest. In all, the total is $82,872. They are getting nearly as bad as the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan, where they have jumped the expenditures on their information service from some $31,000 up to $73,000 in the last couple of years. They are using it to put out C.C.F. literature, or at all events they were. The Canadian information service, as I have said, have offices all over the country. If they are going to do a job they should keep it in one office and not have it in every branch of the government.

This year the following departments of the government have all increased their expenditures: Transport, up over $5,000,000; Secretary of State; Reconstruction and Supply, up over $10,000,000; Public Works, Public Archives, Prime Minister's Office, Post Office, National Revenue, up over $5,000,000; National Health and Welfare, up over $13,000,000; Mines and Resources, Legislation, Labour, Justice, Fisheries, External Affairs, up $1,779,000; Agriculture. I could go on for hours—

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know you do not like to hear of the government wasting the taxpayers' money.

I have a few suggestions to make before I sit down, and I hope that they are constructive. During the past year, many people have spoken to me about deductions from their income tax for medical expenses. The majority of people feel that the present exemption is not right. They consider that all medical and hospital expenses should be allowed, especially for those in the low-income brackets. A man with a salary or wage of $2,000 a year would have to have medical and hospital expenses in excess of $80 a year before he could make any deduction for medical expenses.

An hon. MEMBER: Try the C.C.F. plan.

Mr. FRASER: And you pay for it through the nose in Saskatchewan. If a man's medical and hospital expenses amount to $82 he could deduct $2 from his taxable income, and that is all. This question of deductions for medical expenses should have been considered by the Minister of Finance when making up his budget. If he would allow all deductions for medical and hospital expenses we would have a healthier Canada, because people would feel a little more free to go to the doctor if they felt that there would be some relief for them. But at the present time there is absolutely none.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is always a problem, going to the doctor for relief.

Mr. FRASER: If more people would go to the doctor before they are sick we would have much less sickness in Canada. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Another method by which the taxpayer could be saved a few dollars is in the cashing of war savings certificates, some of which become due this year. The chartered banks of Canada should be allowed to cash these certificates for their customers whom they know and who have accounts with them. In that way the government would be protected; the holder of the certificate would be protected, and the bank would be protected. As it is now holders of these certificates must take them to the post office and must wait for perhaps months for their money to come back to them, and there is the chance that their certificates might get lost as many certificates were lost when people were subscribing for them.

I should like to ask the minister a question. He is not in the house at the present time. Before he left the chamber he told me that he had a bad cold, and he excused himself. At that time I suggested to him that he go to his hotel and go to bed. That is the only way to get rid of a cold. His parliamentary assistant is in the house, and I shall put to him the question that I intended to put to the minister.

Mr. MAYHEW: If the hon. member has any good suggestions they will reach the minister.

Mr. FRASER: It is not a suggestion; it is a question. Is there anything in the income tax act which says that the taxpayer must make out his own income tax return? If he is wrong he is penalized for it. If he makes a mistake they charge him extra. I know we are all told we have to make out our own income tax returns.

Mr. MAYHEW: No.

Mr. McCANN: You make your own returns.

Mr. FRASER: Yes. It is the job of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) to collect the revenue, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is, I understand, the one who checks the returns.

Mr. McCANN: Not at all; he has nothing to do with it.

Mr. FRASER: It all has to go through the hands of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. FRASER: If the return is wrong the taxpayer is charged an extra tax. A simple form should be prepared by the Minister of National Revenue. On that form the taxpayer should be asked what is his income, what is his status, and what are his deductions. That form should be sent in to the minister's office and the minister's department should figure out what the tax is.

Mr. McCANN: No. The law is that every man must assess himself.

Mr. FRASER: I know, but look at the mistakes which have been made. That is the reason I am bringing this up. I have a return here which proves I am right. It is dated February 14, 1947. The first question was:

How many income taxpayers (a) individual; (b) corporation were paid rebates during 1946?

The answer was:

(a) 1,312,112.
(b) 1,033.

That meant all kinds of extra work for the minister's department. It would have been much easier—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There was tax deduction at the source.

Mr. FRASER: Yes; that could be done too. The minister's department will eventually have to make out the taxes for the people. Last year there were $49,538,800 rebated to the individual taxpayer.

Mr. McCANN: That shows good work.

Mr. FRASER: It might be good work, but a lot of that rebate went away back to 1940 because the minister's department is so far behind in its work.

Mr. McCANN: No, it is not.

Mr. FRASER: Perhaps not now; the department is gradually catching up. I know some people have not received final receipts for their 1943 returns yet.

Mr. McCANN: Excuse me for interrupting. I can say that with reference to the assessments, if you take the district of Ottawa, at the end of December, 1946, 99·5 per cent of the 1945 returns which were made on April 30, 1946, were assessed and completed. You cannot beat that record. I will admit that in some divisions, in some district offices it was away below that. We have had an enormous shortage of staff.

Mr. FRASER: That proves what I have said. In Ottawa where they have the head office to look after their returns and do not have to bother with four or five different offices to check on them the return is looked at, checked, and sent out again, but with the district offices it is an entirely different proposition. In these offices they tell you that your return is all right. You make out your cheque and give it to them. Some months, or perhaps two or three years after, you are told that you owe an extra $2, $3, $4, $5, or perhaps $200, $300, $400 or $500, and then you are charged interest on that.

In closing, I wish to quote two paragraphs from an editorial of the Peterborough Examiner of May 1, which I believe hits the nail on the head.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Which nail? I thought there were none left.

Mr. FRASER: I do not mean wire nails.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Finger-nails.

Mr. FRASER: It is only a figure of speech. The Secretary of State said "finger-nails." But the builders of Canada find it impossible to get nails of any kind.

Mr. MARTIN: Stick to income tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How can you hit them on the head?

Mr. FRASER: The Minister of National Health and Welfare suggests that I should stick to income tax. He does not know nails. Perhaps there are none left in his riding.

Mr. MAYHEW: What about the editorial?

Mr. FRASER: The editorial reads as follows:

> Each citizen would be wise to balance some of his increases in living costs against the reduction in his income tax. Butter has just risen ten cents a pound; what does that mean to you in a year? What will the increase in your fuel bill be? Do these, and other increases leave you much of what you are supposed to gain by your tax reduction?

You will find that you are in the hole and very much so. I continue with the editorial:

> It may be that the budget has hidden virtues which have escaped us. We hope so. But we shall not feel any benefits which may be inherent in it for some time. Meanwhile, it appears to us to do little except make certain adjustments designed to preserve the existing balance.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Any hon. members who reflect the feeling of the house when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought down the budget on April 29 and any of those who represent the true feelings of their constituents, must, I am convinced, come to the conclusion that the budget was generally satisfactory to all Canadians and outstandingly satisfactory to the vast majority of them.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who, in recent years, through his untiring efforts helped to develop Canada to the point where such a budget was possible. But for him it might well be that the relief granted would not have been anything like the amount it was. In saying this, I do not wish in any way to detract from the present Minister of Finance, who certainly started out on the right foot in presenting his first budget.

What was needed to counter the widespread criticism as well as to stimulate necessary production was a sizeable decrease in personal income tax. The relief afforded was beyond the hope of most. In a country the size of Canada it is entirely impossible to satisfy everybody. There will be complaints from private citizens and from opposition members. Many of these complaints may be bitter and a few of them may even be justified, but it cannot be denied that the government is steering a safe and steady course. It is the even breeze and not the squall that results in a ship's best over-all progress.

From Nova Scotia's point of view one of the main considerations in the dominion-provincial financial discussions is the matter of the small tax fields, particularly the electricity, amusement, and pari-mutuel taxes. The revenues from these sources in Nova Scotia are not large, but there is a worth-while principle involved if it is acknowledged that the provinces, in order to obtain a full measure of autonomy, are to have tax fields of their own. These particular fields can be regarded as emergency fields. They were entered into only during the war, when it was necessary to tap sources of revenue previously untouched. I share the opinion of the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald and the Nova Scotia government that the federal government should withdraw from these fields at the earliest possible date, and, having done so, should not return to them unless there is another emergency.

The budget speech dealt briefly with subsidies. This is a word that, in itself, is the antithesis of free enterprise because, if an industry or function can flourish on its own merits, subsidies are not necessary. It is only when industries are not self-supporting but when they are nevertheless essential to the over-all economic structure that subsidies as we know them become necessary. Nova Scotia is in the unfortunate position of being concerned with subsidies probably more than any other province, and I know that in Canada there is an impression, either conscious or subconscious, that the particular subsidies which Nova Scotia is paid, or has been paid, for the operation of her coal mines, and is being paid on freight rates and other phases of her economy, are a shameful indication of the province's weakness. This impression does not reflect the true situation.

When one analyses the circumstances more closely, it becomes evident that this matter of subsidies is anything but one-sided. That Nova Scotia and other outlying provinces have subsidized Ontario and Quebec since confederation is well known and evidenced by many facts, among them being that the large percentage of our manufactured goods is obtained from these two provinces, and that in many instances the large taxable revenues in these provinces are derived from estates and other sources built on moneys funneling to them from the outlying provinces.

The transactions of the Canadian export board and the Canadian Commercial Corporation alone will serve to underline my point in this connection. In a reply tabled on March 17, 1947, to a question I placed on the order paper, it was shown that the total value of contracts awarded by the Canadian export board and the Canadian Commercial Corporation as of that date was $330,872,575. This amount was broken down by provinces as follows:

British Columbia	$32,356,280
Alberta	1,273,956
Saskatchewan	70,990
Manitoba	931,626
Ontario	122,637,489
Quebec	171,102,255
New Brunswick	348,628
Nova Scotia	2,151,351

A closer analysis will reveal that of this amount, by provinces, Ontario received $30 per capita, Quebec $47 per capita, and Nova Scotia $3·4 per capita. The over-all average for all of Canada was $27 per capita. On a percentage basis Ontario received 37 per cent, Quebec 51·5 per cent, and Nova Scotia ·65 per cent. It might sting New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island members to know that their provinces received ·105 per cent and zero per cent respectively.

It is true the above returns show that the prairie provinces fared rather badly, but when one considers the amounts accruing to these provinces from contracts for wheat, beef, hogs and other farm products, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and Prairie Farm Assistance Act, it becomes clearly evident that the maritime provinces get anything but the best of the deal. British Columbia members will be pleased to know that their province stands third highest in point of benefits from the contracts in question.

I do not wish to create the impression that I am criticizing the manner in which the Canadian Commercial Corporation or its predecessor, the Canadian export board, have placed these contracts. I have seen no evidence of partiality and with very few exceptions I believe the contracts to have been awarded in the best possible way. I have the highest regard for Mr. Low and the other officers of the corporation. I am merely trying to show the disadvantages Nova Scotia suffers through force of circumstances and the fact that she is not a producer of products which are normally in primary demand by foreign countries.

When the question of loans to foreign countries was before the house, maritime members supported it strongly. We took the stand that being favourably located on the Atlantic seaboard, and with good harbour facilities available at Halifax, Saint John, Sydney, Lunenburg, Liverpool and elsewhere, we were naturally in line for a large return, because we have always felt that, based on tradition as well as practical considerations, our natural field was export to European and South American countries, the United States and other countries which are more readily accessible from our ports than from any other ports in Canada.

With such disappointing returns developing in the face of our optimistic expectations, the various members may draw their own conclusions as to how they would feel if the province they represent found itself in the same predicament.

At the risk of drawing this argument too fine, but with the purpose in mind of placing clearly before the house Nova Scotia's attitude toward the over-all economic set-up and this matter of subsidies, I should like to go a few steps farther, using as my basis this total amount of $330,872,575 in contracts awarded by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Quebec and Ontario together, with sixty-three per cent of the population in Canada, derived, from contracts let in these provinces, a financial return of 88·5 per cent of the total, whereas Nova Scotia, with five per cent of the population, received only ·65 or slightly more than one-half of one per cent of the financial return. If one considers that the average return per capita for all of Canada from contracts let was $27, and that for Nova Scotia it was only $3·4, it is a simple matter to show that on this deal alone Nova Scotia subsidized the rest of Canada in the amount of approximately $15 million and, Mr. Speaker, this is by no means an isolated illustration. It goes on all the time, year in and year out. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are, in fact, subsidizing the rest of Canada, despite the fact that some of the other provinces choose to give the impression that they are subsidizing us. This is the reason why, when coal subsidies were removed some time ago, I stated in this house, during the debate on emergency powers, that Nova Scotians need not feel badly in accepting payment of subsidies, and that this practice is not nearly as iniquitous as many people would have us believe.

Then, too, we must not lose sight of the fact that many products are manufactured in central Canada under the protection of tariffs, and we in the outlying provinces are forced to buy from these sources goods that we could obtain cheaper from other countries if there were no tariffs. This, in our opinion, is a direct subsidy, paid by provinces such as Nova Scotia to central Canadian industry. This is an old and well recognized story, but I again wish to make it clear that these problems are real. Nova Scotians are realistic; they want to see Canada go forward as a nation, and if these tariffs help toward our industrial development as a country, we cannot oppose them; but Nova Scotia wants an equal opportunity to advance with the rest of Canada. I wish to emphasize again that we do not seek or wish any of our undertakings to be subsidized to the point where industry or labour feel they do not need to exert their greatest and most efficient efforts to achieve maximum output, but where subsidies are indicated in order to allow outlying provinces, having economic problems such as those facing the maritime provinces, to assume their rightful place in Canada's economy, we do not make any excuse for justifying them.

This inequality in Canada's economy is one of the reasons, too, why Nova Scotia was justified in seeking the best possible settlement under the dominion-provincial tax agreements, because the proposals offer a means of tapping the revenue of the more fortunate provinces and distributing it to the less fortunate provinces.

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member would permit a question, does he think the dominion government ought now to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference with a view to bringing about satisfactory agreements covering the tax fields, social security and public investment?

Mr. WINTERS: In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can improve upon the statement made in this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I did not direct my question to the Prime Minister; I asked the hon. gentleman's view on that matter, if he cared to give it.

Mr. WINTERS: While dealing with Nova Scotia's economy, I should like to draw the attention of this house to a few problems respecting our fisheries. I will not deal with fishing operations at any great length at this time, because there will be another opportunity later, when the fisheries estimates are before the house; but I wish to say a few words about labour problems as they apply to our fishermen. Before doing so, however, I should like to express the view held by all fishermen that this budget is eminently satisfactory to them, in that it provides a good measure of relief from personal income tax. The policy of averaging incomes over three years is also meeting with universal approval. In Nova Scotia generally, and in Queens-Lunenburg in particular, we have always prided ourselves on the harmony existing between labour and management. Communities and towns are comparatively small, with the result that people in all walks of life grow up together as neighbours. Almost without exception they have known each other well, and I am aware of no other place where there is less of what is commonly called "class distinction." Without fear of contradiction I can say that we have had happy community lives. During the war, returns from fishing were good, and when compared with many other industries it must be accepted that a relatively high standard of living obtained. Then suddenly into this harmonious picture were injected seeds of dissension, culminating in what may yet prove to be a ruinous strike in which the issue boiled down to one of union recognition, the union involved being the Canadian fishermen's union.

Let me say at this point that the lot of the fisherman has not always been happy. He was the poor relative in our working class. His hours were long and his returns small, but in recent years the government has assumed its rightful responsibility on his behalf, with the result that his status has been considerably improved. With respect to the recent strike, then, one cannot help seeking in one's mind the underlying reasons for the strange and contradictory developments. It came as a sad realization to us within the constituency, and a surprise to the rest of Canada, to know that the worm boring from within, as is so often said, was communism. We are usually led to believe and we generally accept as a fact that communism breeds on dissension and poverty, but in this instance neither of these elements was present. This was not a classical field for communism, and that fact, in itself, makes the happenings all the more sinister. That this element could come into communities where happy, harmonious relationships prevailed, and where pride in standard of living abounded, should be a matter of the gravest concern for every thinking Canadian.

That the fishermen should be entitled to collective bargaining and other union privileges is denied by no one; in fact I personally and, almost without exception, the fish operators feel that labour should be encouraged and guided in this direction for its own good and the good of the country at large. I am sure that if the fishermen wish to organize within the framework of applicable legislation they will be given every support and encouragement, so that they may have an opportunity of enjoying the benefits of collective bargaining. In fact the Nova Scotia government is enacting measures to provide the legal facilities.

As a class, fishermen must not be discriminated against, and I am sure they will find there is no such intention. The rank and file of the fishermen realize that the right to organize and enjoy the benefits of unionization involves responsibility, and that they must develop their organization on a sound basis in order to inspire trust and confidence. It goes without saying that part of this responsibility is the selection of good leaders. No one denies the fishermen the right to choose their own leaders, but they will realize that in large measure the success they achieve as a union will depend upon the men they elect to direct them; and I am sure they are aware that their future is not associated with communism, which has shown itself to be vicious and irresponsible. The welfare of the fishermen is emphatically not its first consideration. As Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, said when speaking in the Nova Scotia legislature, "communism is not a political party; it is a revolution".

[Mr. Winters.]

Too often the farmer is the forgotten man in Nova Scotia's economy. Our farmers feel that in many respects the farm policy is based upon the western farm colony and overlooks the small farmer who is contributing in a worth-while way without any opportunity for a sizeable return. There are in Queens and Lunenburg counties hundreds of farmers struggling under what would be considered by western farmers to be extremely adverse conditions. It is almost impossible to obtain farm labour, and when it is available it is at rates which are almost prohibitive. Costs of feed are high, and the fear is that they will go higher. A recently authorized increase in the price to the western farmer of barley and oats resulted in an increase of feed prices in Nova Scotia which in many cases turned a self-supporting operation into a losing one. I refer particularly to poultry. At about the same time that the price of feeds was increased the ceiling on eggs was lifted as a measure of compensation, and at a later date it was completely removed. However, instead of the price of eggs going up it actually went down, and the farmers were forced to destroy thousands of chicks. It is hoped that the recent upward revision in the price of eggs sold under British contract will rectify this situation. I refer to the announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture in this house on April 30.

Another handicap to the farmers of Queens and Lunenburg counties is the lack of the bovine tuberculin test. This test has not been applied for some years, with the result that farmers in these two counties are not allowed to sell their stock in tuberculosis-free counties and are obliged to accept correspondingly lower prices for their products. I am well aware that there is an over-all shortage of qualified veterinarians in Canada, but I would impress upon the minister the great importance attached to this problem and urge him to take the necessary action to have these tests applied at the earliest possible day.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would say that Nova Scotia's economic problems are far-reaching. The budget as such did not provide a solution of our provincial problems, but we hope that the dominion-provincial financial agreements, which were presented last year and subsequently modified, will go a long way in that direction. The average individual in Nova Scotia feels that the budget has gone a long way to solve his own personal problems, and as such the citizens of the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg endorse it.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, at this time I wish to discuss a subject which is of the utmost importance to western Canada; that is the subject of irrigation. This is now considered by the people of western Canada as of paramount importance to the rehabilitation of the dried-out areas of the western prairies. The interest in irrigation which has recently developed in western Canada is the logical result of the associating of memories of the drought-stricken prairies of the thirties with the evidence of the value of irrigation, which has been so well demonstrated by successful projects in southern Alberta and in the semi-arid regions of the United States. One need hardly recall the suffering which the series of dry years brought to the prairie people, and in particular to the residents of southern Saskatchewan. The fear of those terrifying and depressing years still persists. That is the major reason why, during the past dozen or more years, people have been moving from southern Saskatchewan in such large numbers. A larger proportion of these people have abandoned farming entirely, since for them it was a hopeless venture. These farmers were so disillusioned that they decided to seek other means of making a livelihood. And because Saskatchewan is largely an agricultural province, people desirous of seeking other occupations were obliged in a great many cases to seek employment elsewhere.

The drift from Saskatchewan has been most alarming. The census of 1941 showed that the province had 25,000 people less than in 1931. When the natural increase of some 11,000 persons a year is added to this loss, it will be observed that in the decade 1931-41 more than 135,000 people have migrated from Saskatchewan, the great majority of them to British Columbia, eastern Canada or the United States. And I would point out that this vast loss occurred before the present C.C.F. government took office in that province; it took place during the regime of a Liberal administration. But no one would, I hope, be so unwise as to blame any provincial government for this trek from the Saskatchewan plains. It is the result of repeated years of drought; and no government has control over climatic conditions. If blame is to be placed anywhere for this situation, one must fix it on the federal governments of the nineties, and the first quarter of this century. While these governments could not control the weather in the area affected, they did have, at that time, control of immigration and colonization. It is now generally accepted in the west that the peopling of the Palliser triangle was a grave mistake, and federal governments of the nineties, and even later, are responsible for this error. Certainly the people who settled there are not responsible, because they knew very little about the country when they settled in that particular region. Thousands of people from eastern Canada, the United States and Europe came to this area with faith in their hearts, and with the hope of making a good living on the land. They remained only to lose faith and to find poverty, where the promise of wealth was held out to them by colonization officials.

The rainfall in many parts of the region is too uncertain to permit of successful farming, except for those who can afford modern power machinery and large acreages of land. The early settlers had limited resources, and therefore in most cases were unable to cope with the vicissitudes of the drought-ridden areas. By dint of hard labour, and by depriving themselves and their families of the necessities of life, few have become independent; but they are all too few.

Why this mistake was made it is difficult to understand. Almost a hundred years ago Palliser reported that most of what is now populated country was little more than a semi-arid desert. People were nevertheless induced to settle in that area, by the gift of free land by the federal authorities. Railways were constructed; towns and villages sprang into being, while the newcomers looked to the future with hope. Occasionally there was a good crop. Farmers then paid off their most pressing debts, allowing the remainder to wait in the hope of another bumper yield.

But there were more failures than big crops. In the past forty years, at least twenty crops were recorded as failures in a large part of southern Saskatchewan. That is the cause of the decline in population of that region in the west today. But despite this depopulation, there are still hundreds of thousands of people residing in the area of the Palliser triangle. In that area are many millions of dollars of investments in railways, elevators and other properties. The removal of this whole population to other regions is unthinkable, and quite unnecessary if the country were irrigated. And, despite unfavourable weather conditions at times, the people of southern Saskatchewan love the prairies. They are remaining in the hope that irrigation projects will make living there more pleasant and profitable in the future, and that Canada will soon realize that the irrigation of that area is practicable.

The region I have been discussing can produce great wealth in agricultural products. This has been amply shown when the rains come. The provision of irrigation works to provide moisture would meet the need when the rains fail. This huge area cannot be set aside as wasteland without seriously disturbing the national economy of the country. Many people and organizations are today advocating increased immigration to Canada. Thousands of newcomers to this nation could find homes within the Palliser triangle, if the region were irrigated.

It is necessary to provide water only during the crop growing season of a few weeks each year. Many small streams such as the Souris, Qu'Appelle, Long and Wascana creeks have sufficient spring flow, if conserved, to provide moisture for hundreds of thousands of acres of land, the finest in Canada.

The period of reconstruction following a devastating war has arrived. Irrigation of the Palliser triangle could make of the vast dried-out areas a populous and Eden-like garden of fertility. The value of irrigation has been well demonstrated in the Lethbridge district of Alberta and in scores of semi-arid regions of the central and northwest United States. These projects are rehabilitating farm land and have resulted in the production of millions of dollars worth of agricultural products.

More than 500,000 acres have been irrigated in Alberta and 4,500 successful farm units have been set up. Farms in the irrigated district now have assured yearly incomes. New industries have followed this development and employ many workers. To illustrate, I need only refer to the sugar refining industry which has contributed so largely to Alberta's economy. Last year this industry produced millions of pounds of sugar; in fact, eleven per cent of Canada's 1946 consumption.

Irrigated farms also permit of more stock raising and dairying because a supply of fodder is assured. Ranges which supported one steer on forty acres now finish for market two animals per acre. Soil which formerly produced sixty-five cents worth of beef now produces $130 worth of sugar beets per acre. Land which could barely average ten bushels of wheat per acre now produces thirty bushels and upward. It is estimated that for every square mile irrigated the population in the district increased ten-fold.

That is only a small part of what irrigation can do for the prairie lands within the Palliser triangle. It will make the output of new wealth constant and will direct into the national economy a stream of revenue which will not fluctuate with recurring periods of drought. Irrigation has done great things in the United States. The following article clipped from the Globe and Mail of April 30 of this year indicates what is happening in the United States:

> The large scale "grass roots" movement like that now taking hold in the west is a proved device in the United States. Several years ago, to stimulate the development of irrigation in the northwestern states, a similar organization was set up. The results have been truly remarkable. Since the movement commenced, 5,000,000 dry acres have been placed "under ditch" and plans call for the extension of water facilities to a further 10,000,000. Washington has spent about one billion dollars on this work. If this figure seems extravagant, one need only balance it against dividends on investment. The total cash returns from crops in the reclaimed areas in the United States for the combined years of 1945 and 1946 equalled almost $900,000,000, or 90 per cent of capital outlay.

Subsidies and Prairie Farm Assistance Act benefits may temporarily relieve a condition and have served a useful purpose, but they cannot solve the problem of recurring drought. Irrigation is the only answer. The proposed irrigation scheme on the South Saskatchewan river would irrigate a large tract of land. The experience gained by the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act justifies embarking on such a venture. The cost of such an enterprise on the Saskatchewan river would involve the expenditure of upwards of $25,000,000. This, together with other suggested projects, might even necessitate an expenditure of $100,000,000. But this programme would provide water for some 2,000,000 acres of excellent soil, and 20,000 farms of 100 acres each would be established. The servicing of the newly irrigated area would require thousands of people. In all, a project of this kind would support more than a quarter of a million population.

Such a development would create millions of dollars of new wealth. Small industries associated with agriculture would be set up. Sugar refining, canning, meat packing plants and dairying are accepted as certainties. Young people who seek employment elsewhere in Canada could find profitable employment in their own province. The drift of population from the prairies would be retarded, if not wholly stopped.

This new wealth will make a prosperous prairie region. As a result, eastern industries could not help but profit from the increased sales of consumer goods to the western provinces. But the major benefits are not to be measured in dollars and cents. The people in the west would have a new faith in confederation. They could look to the east with a feeling of friendship and appreciation. A new unity would result and a harmony prevail which hitherto has often been lacking.

The development of a full-scale irrigation programme for the prairies would be an investment in the future of Canada. I submit that such a project would be a sound reconstruction venture which would return tremendous dividends to the whole of Canada's economy. The undertaking would require a large initial outlay of capital, but the war proved to Canadians that what is physically possible is financially possible. Officials of P.F.R.A. state the project is physically possible, so I ask: Why the delay? The need is obvious. The land in the area is the world's finest and the water potential available in the Saskatchewan river and the other streams in the province. Canada cannot afford to procrastinate in this matter. The area must be rehabilitated. A western Canada irrigation programme should be the government's major reconstruction measure. I appeal to the government to embark on this national project without delay.

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this late hour to make a few observations on the budget and with regard to several subjects dealt with therein. I should first like to say something about the method of bookkeeping which has been carried out during the last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It is unfortunate perhaps that news was given out early in the year by the Minister of Finance that there would be a substantial surplus, because it started a great demand for lower taxes. The minister said frankly that perhaps this was not justified by the facts, and he stated, as reported on page 2553 of Hansard:

> Economic conditions alone would hardly justify immediate tax reduction. As I have already stated, there are still substantial inflationary pressures pushing our prices and costs up. Reductions in taxes may add to these pressures in some measure, though they should reduce some of the demand for higher wage rates.

I would suggest that that is a poor foundation for a reduction in taxes unless a corresponding cut is made in the expenditures of the country. The matter is really worse than it looks. The minister has stated that the expected surplus of $352,000,000 was simply because we had received from War Assets $372,000,000 from the sale of certain articles, which by every system of good bookkeeping should have been capital return. If that had been capital return there would have been a deficit of $20,000,000.

I have watched with a great deal of concern the operations of the foreign exchange control board. I have felt certain over the past year, as I am today, that the operations of the board will work a great hardship on the people of Canada. It will mean that we shall have to take an immense loss which we would have been saved if the exchange had been allowed to find its own level. It is a sort of system of subsidies which people do not appreciate and which benefits most perhaps those who need it least, and in the long run the loss to the country will be considerable. On page 17 of the 1946 report of the foreign exchange control board appears this statement:

> Canada's external United States dollar assets were reduced by $330 million in 1946, of which $263 million is accounted for by the decline in liquid reserves of gold and United States dollars.

If I understand the operations of this board that means that we have lost $330 million just as surely as though we had spent it in another way and that we have nothing to show for it except perhaps greater trade with the United States. This must have been known to the board. It was so, because in the proceedings before the committee in the other place the governor of the bank said that would likely be the case and then he made the remarkable statement that he thought it would be good for Canada to import as much as she could, regardless of how it was to be paid for.

In the last year it has been stated that our trade with the United States was an adverse one of $603 million. That was progressively getting worse during the year. According to a recent statistical report for the month of March, that trend is continuing, because in that month our imports from the United States amounted to $136,606,000, while our exports to that country amounted to $79,453,000, showing an adverse balance of over $57,000,000, and if that is continued during the year it will mean a greater adverse balance than we had last year. It is likely to continue, because in the month of February our exports had dropped from approximately $79,000,000 to approximately $63,000,000. The latest report does not give the imports. But there was a falling off in our exports to the United States of $16,000,000 in February. If that continues, then as surely as anything in this world Canada will lose a substantial amount of money by the operations of the foreign exchange control board and this will be another debt to be shouldered by the people of Canada.

The minister expected a revenue of about $2,450 million during the present year and against that he had estimated ordinary expenditures of $1,285 million, or an increase over the previous year of about $52,000,000, and a very great increase over the year before that.

He has also other expenditures of $710 million, or total expenditures of $1,995 million. Yet nothing is said about the large amounts of money that must be advanced to the United Kingdom during the present year. About $600 million of the one and a quarter billion has already been given; another $600 million is to be advanced, and perhaps $300 million more will be advanced to other countries of the world on the three quarters of a billion dollar loan promised to them. So in the immediate future Canada will not be paying her way, because these are very doubtful assets, and the rate of interest paid by the people of Canada will increase to a great extent during the coming years.

There has been an advantage given to the taxpayers in Canada in all income brackets, but the advantages are much less for the taxpayer with a low income than the benefit he would have received if some of the hidden taxes were removed. I have made a computation of some of these hidden taxes, using as a basis the amount that an ordinary man with a family would spend on these taxes. I have dealt with only four or five special taxes. I have dealt, of course, with the sales tax, which produces $328 million, or an average of $27 for every Canadian citizen. I have preferred to say that each ordinary citizen might spend $13.50 a year as his share of this sales tax, leaving the man in the higher income brackets, the wealthier people, to pay a considerably larger proportion. But the man in the lower brackets has to pay his share of the sugar tax, for instance, the soap tax and the amusement tax and for candy and other things like that which the children must have. I have found that the average man with a wife and two children would be paying $60 a year in these taxes.

On that basis I find that the ordinary family is paying a considerable amount of money in this hidden way, far more than the relief it is getting through the income tax deductions just made. I find that married men under the $3,000 bracket without children, who are saving in income tax, according to the latest statistics of taxpayers issued by the income tax office, $8,170,000, are paying $10,000,000 in these hidden taxes. That is, they have been saved $8,170,000 in income tax and they are paying $10,000,000 in hidden taxes. Married men, with an income less than $3,000, with a wife and one child, have a saving of $7,350,000, and they are paying hidden taxes amounting to $9,850,000. Married men, with two children—and this is the favourite example given by the Minister of Finance—make a saving in the case of those with incomes of under $3,000—I am dealing only with incomes of $3,000 or less—of $2,800,000. But actually the men in that class, including those who do not pay taxes at all, pay $13,500,000 in hidden taxes. Married men with three children save $1,300,000 and contribute to these hidden taxes about $7,000,000. Married men with four children save only $500,000 by these income tax reductions, yet contribute in hidden taxes, $9,000,000. The family with five children or more, because of the greater amount they must buy, save nothing but must pay in sales tax alone at least $15,000,000. I am speaking only of those with incomes of $3,000 or less.

Therefore 726,000 people of Canada have been saved $18 million. These same 726,000 people contribute the sum of $64 million to the treasury in these hidden taxes. These are all people in income brackets of less than $3,000. The minister has said that in these brackets he is relieving a great many taxpayers. The computation which I have made leads me to believe that, while it has relieved some, there are at least 720,000 single income taxpayers and about one million married taxpayers who are still paying taxes.

I have tried to prove my figures of who have paid sales taxes and other taxes by the number of families that receive family allowances. From the last report which I have at hand I find that 1,592,751 families receive family allowances. They have a total number of children of 3,638,030. On the basis of $60 for each family they would spend about $94 million in these taxes. There are 475,000 married people with no children who are spending on the basis of half the amount of $60 a family on these hidden taxes. They spend $14 million a year. If we take it in that way it would amount to $108 million that is spent by married men with children and without children on these hidden taxes. For that reason I believe the minister should have reduced the sales taxes and these other hidden taxes. They are hidden taxes, but they affect the people more nearly and more severely than do the income taxes. They see the income tax; they know about it, but these sales taxes they do not see. The larger the family, the more of these taxes they pay. For this reason I would say that the minister has not framed his budget in a way which will relieve the family man and the man in the lower income bracket. It will relieve them to only a small extent. It does give a measure of relief to some, but it does not go far enough to help those whom it should be his duty to help.

On motion of Mr. Thatcher the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT MADE IN BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to ask the indulgence of the house, as a matter of privilege, while I correct an error I made yesterday in my speech on the budget. At page 2807 of Hansard I am reported to have said:

> The total reduction in personal income tax is about $70 million, but the reduction in the excess profits tax which will come into effect at the end of this current year is $279 million, or nearly four times as much.

And then I added, "I took the figures from the minister's own budget". I am sorry I made an error in calculation and I should like to correct it. I stated that the reduction in the excess profits tax which will come into effect at the end of the year was $279 million. This is not correct. This reduction is not the one which will come into effect at the end of this year but is the anticipated reduction made by the previous Minister of Finance in his last budget.

The minister stated that the total tax reductions in the current year would be $160 million. Reductions in personal income and gasoline taxes total, according to the minister, $150 million, of which $40 million is gasoline tax. Therefore the figure of $70 million which I gave is incorrect; it should be $110 million. This means then that the reduction in the excess profits tax from December 31, 1947—when it will end—to March 31, 1948 will be $10 million. The result is that the total excess profits tax for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, is estimated at $160 million as against $449 million for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947. But while I am correct in saying that there will be a reduction of $289 million, not $279 million, the present Minister of Finance is responsible for only $10 million in this financial year. Therefore my statement yesterday was to that extent in error and I am pleased that the house has allowed me to make this correction.

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT

Mr. POULIOT:

1. In virtue of the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act, and in each province, how many loans have been (a) applied for, and (b) granted?

2. What is the total amount of the loans granted in each province, in virtue of that act?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1 and 2. (a) No record is available as to the number of loans applied for which the banks do not forward to the department of veterans affairs for concurrence. The department of veterans affairs has concurred in the following applications up to and including May 5, 1947:

Province	Number	Amount
British Columbia	203	$ 391,661 57
Alberta	319	542,556 88
Saskatchewan	185	322,889 28
Manitoba	124	238,416 65
Ontario	656	1,112,052 47
Quebec	134	213,538 34
New Brunswick	45	65,112 50

(b) Reports of loans granted by the banks are made quarterly. The figures for the period January 15, 1947, when the Act was proclaimed, to March 31, 1947, are as follows:

Province	*Number	*Amount
British Columbia	57	$112,712 80
Alberta	114	185,390 40
Saskatchewan	43	67,572 33
Manitoba	35	68,190 66
Ontario	179	275,132 98
Quebec	36	67,790 00
New Brunswick	9	15,529 00
Nova Scotia	13	15,621 66
Prince Edward Island ..	7	8,300 00
	493	$816,239 83

*Subject to adjustment.

The difference between the number and amount of loans concurred in and the number and amount of loans made, is due to (1) difference in dates; (2) delay in delivery of equipment, etc., for which loans were concurred; (3) delay in making loans pending completion of legal formalities.

BARBARA ANN SCOTT

QUESTION OF AMATEUR STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Perhaps the question which I am about to ask should be addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), but the Prime Minister might take this as a notice. In view of the alarming news in this morning's papers with regard to the Olympic status of Barbara Ann Scott, I wonder if the government has cabled or will cable our Olympic representative in England, Mr. J. C. Patteson, to see that her interests are protected.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would be the first to do everything in my power to protect the interests of Miss Barbara Ann Scott, but I think the young lady is more than able to take care of herself.

SUGAR BEETS

CANADA AND DOMINION SUGAR COMPANY—CONTRACTS—ALLOCATIONS TO CANADA—LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): It will be recalled that on Friday last the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked three questions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I propose now to answer the first and third questions; the second will be answered by the Minister of Labour.

The first question was as to how many acres of sugar beet contracts had been signed by the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company by noon, May 5. The answer is that we are informed by the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company that up to May 5 they had signed contract for 26,029 acres of sugar beets.

The next question was whether or not the government had considered how adversely Canada's failure to produce beet sugar to her plant capacity in 1947 might affect the willingness of the United States to grant Canada sugar from the international pool in 1948. In reply I would state that sugar is not allocated to Canada by the United States, but through the international emergency food council of which Canada and the United States, as well as many other countries, are members. Beet sugar production in Canada in 1946 was 30 per cent greater than the average for 1935-39. This is a greater increase than that of any other beet sugar producing country. Given at least average climatic conditions it is expected that production in Canada in 1947 will exceed that of 1946. In the light of these facts there can be no adverse reflection upon Canada's contribution to the world sugar position.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Lethbridge asked what steps the government contemplated taking to enable Ontario beet growers to protect their labour supply from being attracted from them by the tobacco growers. I am not aware of any serious difficulties that occurred in 1946 because of competition between tobacco growers and those engaged in the raising of sugar beets. I am advised that the labour supply was adequate for both those branches of our agricultural economy. As my hon. friend knows, the control over the movement of labour was abolished some time ago and it is not the intention of the government to direct anybody into the sugar beet or tobacco fields. That was a war emergency and, thank goodness, it is past and gone.

I might say that it is anticipated that the labour supply for agriculture generally in Ontario will be tight this year. Policies which have been so successful in the past, one of which was the recruitment of labour in the southern states for the tobacco fields, will be carried out this year. The dominion-provincial machinery for the supply of seasonal farm labour will be in operation in 1947. It is anticipated that there will be some hundreds of former Polish soldiers arriving in Canada in the course of the next few weeks, and they will be apportioned in consultation with the provincial authorities.

EVAPORATED MILK

PRICE INCREASE—PROPORTIONS TO PRODUCER, PROCESSOR AND WHOLESALER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. R. DANIEL (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and I am sorry I have not given him notice. While my question may not be a matter of national emergency, judging by the number of telephone calls I received while I was home over the week-end it must be very close to it. My question is this: What portion of the recent one cent per tin increase in the price of evaporated milk is to be received by the producer, the processor and the wholesaler? Will the minister please provide the same breakdown with regard to the price rise in cheese and butter?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would think that is a question which should go on the order paper.

SUGAR

ALLOTMENTS TO CANADA FROM INTERNATIONAL POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Will the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance state how many short tons of sugar have been allotted this year to Canada by the international food pool?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member an answer today, but I shall see that he gets it.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

SHORTAGE OF TRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to give notice of this question, but according to a message I have just received it is of most urgent importance, particularly to a couple of young farmers. I will direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture although there may be other ministers who are affected. This young man says it is impossible for him and some of his neighbours to get tractors. Will the minister state what is the actual situation? This man says that he cannot go on with his spring work.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): That is not a question which I would be in position to answer, nor would any of my officials, because it concerns others. I would point out that there is a shortage of tractors. Farmers write in to me saying that they are not able to get tractors. The fact is that there are not the tractors available in Canada today to meet the demand. As to why these particular men are not able to get theirs, I cannot say without having more information.

Mr. LOCKHART: It is reported that forty per cent more are being manufactured in the United States than were manufactured last year. Perhaps we might get a larger quota.

Mr. GARDINER: There is an agreement with the Americans as to how many come here.

CEMENT

AVAILABILITY TO VETERANS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I have not given him notice, but I do not think it is necessary, because this is really urgent. Will he tell the house what is being done by his department to see that veterans are able to secure cement in order to construct their houses? There is a desperate shortage throughout the country at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Order paper.

Mr. FRASER: That is not for the order paper.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): That is a type of question which it is difficult to answer offhand, particularly without notice. The production of cement in Canada today is higher than at any time in the history of the country. The veterans are receiving the priorities with respect to their housing which have been outlined previously.

Mr. FRASER: Will the parliamentary assistant check this matter and give a full answer tomorrow?

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I should like first to join with others who have congratulated the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the capable way in which he introduced his first budget. I tell him sincerely that it is a pleasure for those of us who are inexperienced in the house, particularly on the opposition side, to work with a minister who remains at all times courteous and friendly.

Some people look upon the budget merely as a balance sheet of the nation's affairs. If it shows a surplus, they feel in a general way that it is a good budget. I think most members of the house will agree that this is a rather superficial viewpoint. I agree that a balanced budget is desirable, and I think that wherever possible the government should present one. But I do not think that a surplus should be the controlling aim of the Minister of Finance, because after all it is conceivable that a budget might be balanced on the hardships and difficulties of the Canadian people.

In analysing the effectiveness of this budget I think we should look at the way in which it proposes to meet the major problems facing this nation today. As I see it, if this budget is a good one it should do three things. First, it should provide tax relief particularly for Canadians in the lower income groups; second, it should extend social services; and third, it should make plans to keep employment at a high level in the future. If this is a good budget it will, in my opinion, meet those tests; but if it is not a good budget, it will fail to do so.

During the year the minister reported a surplus of $352 million. After the tremendous deficits of the war years I think most Canadians will welcome that rather agreeable figure. At the same time, as the minister himself admitted, we must remember that that surplus was achieved by very unusual methods, such as the sale of war assets. Moreover it was achieved by removing subsidies on certain articles which vitally affect the cost of living, a procedure which is causing real hardship among our small wage earners in this country. Therefore I am in agreement with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), although for different reasons, that the government should not be too proud about this surplus.

For the ensuing year the minister is forecasting a surplus of $190 million in round figures. Whether that surplus will be achieved or not depends largely upon economic conditions. I understand that if Ontario and Quebec should soon sign tax agreements with the dominion government the federal treasury will have to pay out annually an additional $110 million. Therefore I suggest that it is problematical whether the government will achieve the surplus that is forecast for the coming year.

A comparison of governmental receipts today with pre-war receipts is interesting. In the last fiscal year according to the minister's statement the federal receipts were $2,984 million. In 1938, the last year of peace they were only $516 million. That means that our taxes in Canada today are still roughly about five times what they were prior to the war. Some people are wondering if this very great discrepancy can be justified.

The main change brought about by the budget, indeed so far as I can see about the only change, was the provision for a reduction in the personal income tax. That was a welcome provision, yet the reduction was considerably less than we were originally led to believe. At page 2554 of Hansard the Minister of Finance stated:

> Under this new schedule, the average amount of tax will be reduced by about 29 per cent.

Newspapers all across the country featured this statement. Perhaps my mathematics are not what they should be, and I speak subject to correction, but so far as I can figure it out, the personal income tax has only been reduced by about 15 per cent—not 29 per cent.

At page 2552 of Hansard, according to the minister's figures, personal income tax receipts in the fiscal year 1946-47 amounted to $695 million. At page 2557 of Hansard the minister estimated that in 1947-48 personal income tax receipts will be reduced by $110 million. That works out, as far as I can see, to a reduction of 15 per cent or a little better, and not 29 per cent. There is quite a difference. Notwithstanding that fact I am quite prepared to admit that taxpayers in the upper and middle income groups have been given a real measure of tax relief. But the budget fails completely to provide proportionate benefits for those who are in the lower rungs of the economic ladder.

Once again when we first look at the minister's figures we may think that the lower income groups are being given a substantial reduction; the figure of 54 per cent was mentioned as the reduction being made for those in the lowest bracket. But when you boil these percentages down to dollars and cents you see that the concessions do not amount to very much. The actual increase in take-home pay is increased by 50 cents for those in the lowest category and by one or two dollars a month for those in the next brackets. In other words the reduction is far below the tax relief that would have been granted if the minister had raised the exemption levels.

What is even more significant is the fact that no relief whatever is given by the budget to wage earners who do not make enough money to pay income tax, and more than half of all Canadian wage earners are in this category. In other words the group hardest hit by the increase in the cost of living gains nothing by this budget.

The minister saw fit in his budget address to lecture Canadian business, and perhaps Canadian business needed to be lectured, on the need for business to get busy and reduce prices. But a day later another minister saw fit to make an announcement in the house which permitted the prices of butter, cheese and eggs to go up. There is no consistency there, because these articles affect very considerably the cost of living. On the one hand the government's decontrol policy is allowing the cost of living for the small wage earner to increase steadily. On the other hand the government gives him no help whatever by way of reduced taxation. I do not think that this budget is giving the "little man" a fair deal, and I contend that this is the first defect of the budget.

The second question which I think we should ask ourselves in analysing the budget is this. Does it attempt to extend social services? As hon. members know, in this country today there are many Canadians such as our aged, our crippled and others, who are living in conditions of hardship, and some even in conditions of poverty. The only security that these people can have is through adequate social service measures. The government made a start in building up a system of social services in Canada some years ago when it introduced the family allowances bill and the Unemployment Insurance Act, but there are still three yawning gaps in Canada's system of social services. We lack health insurance; we lack unemployment assistance; we still lack adequate national old age pensions, and even if the new old age pension bill is introduced next week I think we shall still lack adequate old age pensions.

In its proposals to the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, the government had this to say at page 28 of its brief:

. . . there still remains a tremendous job to be done in improving the national health and in extending the benefits of modern science and medical care to all parts of the nation and all sections of the population.

At that time the government urged the early implementation of a comprehensive social security programme. Dealing with costs it had this to say:

A significant volume of social security payments, flowing into the consumer spending stream, will stabilize the economy of the country as a whole and work against a fall in the national income. Social security payments therefore become, in these circumstances, a powerful weapon with which to ward off general economic depression.

These are good statements, Mr. Speaker, but if the government really believes them, and I think it does, why has more not been done about them?—because even the government's supporters will admit that since August, 1945, Canada has not gone very far along the road to social security. Instead the government has used as a reason, or an excuse, for not proceeding, the failure of the dominion-provincial conference.

In his budget the minister had this to say about social services as reported at page 2548 of Hansard:

The government of Canada looks forward to the day when the agreement of all or substantially all the provinces will make possible the achievement—

Then he goes on:

. . . of a comprehensive programme . . . of . . . social security.

Surely in view of the huge surplus which the government professes to have shown, we might have expected more in the way of social security. The budget presented by the Minister of Finance contrasted sharply with the budget which was presented in the British House of Commons a few weeks ago by the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Dalton. Here is what Mr. Dalton had to say in his budget speech about social service in Great Britain:

During this last year we have made history in the social services. We have mounted without halt or hesitation the great social programme which the electors voted for when this majority was returned. The National Insurance Act, the National Health Service Act and the Industrial Injuries Act have been placed upon the statute books and family allowances have been paid from August 1, 1946, and the higher old age pensions has been paid from the beginning of last October. We are entitled to say that the new Britain represented by this House of Commons has taken the cost of social security proudly in its stride, and the money has been found, and the measures passed and the benefits are being enjoyed by those entitled to them.

I ask the house to contrast that budget statement with the one made by our own Minister of Finance. Britain, ravaged and devastated by war; Britain, with her trade and with her industries disrupted, has still been able to bring in a system of social security which includes every person in the British isles. Poor as they are, they have found the money to do these things.

Today six provinces have agreed to the dominion proposals. I understand that a seventh is almost ready to do so. I wonder whether the government could not consider the institution of social services in the provinces which have already signed the agreement. In my opinion the failure of the government to extend social services is the second defect of the current budget.

The third question which we should ask ourselves in analysing this budget is, what steps have the government taken to maintain a high level of employment in the future? Many people in this country today are worried lest the current economic boom may soon end. They are worried about the possibility of another depression, and consequent unemployment such as we had prior to the last war. The minister himself must share these fears, because time and again in his budget he referred to the fact that our present levels of prosperity and high employment are temporary, and that sooner or later we must expect a reduction. At page 2548 of Hansard he said:

Our revenues are based on very high levels of production, incomes and imports, which we probably cannot expect as normal levels in future years.

And again on page 2549:

Our surplus is a real one . . . but it has been obtained at high levels of revenue and expenditure which do not necessarily give an accurate indication of the shape of things to come.

In other words, the minister admitted in his budget speech that he is expecting that levels of income and prosperity may soon be lower; yet so far as I can find in the budget, there is no indication anywhere that the government has tangible plans to do something about that situation. We in the C.C.F. believe that this is the third major defect of the budget.

The government's attitude toward trade is typical of their lack of planning. About one-third of our national income comes from exports, and about three out of every eight workers depend on the healthy condition of the export trade, for their jobs. In his white paper on "Employment and Income" tabled in the house in April, 1945, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) had this to say:

"Post-war collaboration along equally bold and imaginative lines is essential if expanded world trade is to reinforce domestic employment policies and contribute to freedom from want . . ."

And again:

The government has pressed and is continuing to press actively for a wide collaboration in the reciprocal reduction and removal of trade barriers—agreements must be reached at an early date.

And yet two years after this statement of government trade policy we in Canada have not had one single tariff decrease. Instead a few months ago, the minister announced that on dozens or even hundreds of articles the tariff which we had in the pre-war years would be reimposed. These tariffs had been suspended during the war. I wonder whether the reimposition of pre-war tariffs, is the bold and imaginative trade policy which the government has spoken about. Personally I cannot see anything imaginative about such a policy. It seems to me on the contrary that the government's trade policy is timid and vacillating. The present budget has not one tariff decrease in it. In view of the deteriorating position of our export trade today I think this situation could be very dangerous.

During the past two years Canada, for humanitarian and business reasons, extended loans and credits to European countries to the amount of several billion dollars. These credits allowed our foreign trade to reach almost fantastic proportions. But many Canadians have not realized that the prosperity which we have enjoyed has been artificial, and it still is artificial. Today these loans are being used up very quickly, and yet the economy of the countries in Europe is still so badly crippled that when the loans are gone it is doubtful whether they will be able to continue to buy in Canada. Here is what a Reuters correspondent had to say about it some weeks ago:

It is probable that, within a year from now, Britain will simply not have enough money to buy all the goods that the overseas primary producing countries will want to sell her. France, and most of the other European importing countries, may be in an even worse case.

In other words, our country is faced with the blunt fact that very shortly we are likely, unless something happens, to see our export trade drop very considerably. Today we in Canada are watching our credits and loans being used up, knowing that when these credits are gone we face a shrinkage of our markets; knowing that if that shrinkage comes, we shall have considerable unemployment; and yet all that the government has to say in its budget speech about trade is this—and I quote from the minister's speech:

We hope that out of the negotiations will come sufficient reductions in tariffs to make it practicable to establish an international trade organization.

Surely too much is at stake to base our trade policy on a hope, yet that is precisely what the current budget does.

At the moment the Geneva trade conference is sitting. Before our delegation went to Geneva this parliament was given no opportunity to discuss the policy which they would follow there, nor was it given an opportunity to debate the policy which the delegation would take to the imperial conference which preceded it. Perhaps the Geneva conference will succeed. I think everyone in the house and in the country hopes that it will; yet newspaper reports which come from Geneva seem to be increasingly pessimistic so far as I can see. If that conference does fail I ask the government what alternative policy it has to offer the people of Canada.

The budget, moreover, gives no indication of better planning in the domestic field. This is very strange, in view of what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had to say a few years ago in the white paper to which I have referred, and from which I quote the following, at page 1:

In setting as its aim a high and stable level of employment and income, the government is not selecting a lower target than "full employment."

. . . it will be necessary in this (post-war) period to initiate plans and programmes to provide over later years for the successful pursuit of policies directed to the attainment of high and stable employment and income.

And on page 14:

Government expenditures, like private expenditures, play an important part in determining the level of employment and income.

These are very fine and, I think, correct statements; but despite these laudible objectives I can see little indication that the government has done very much about them. That is to be regretted because there are so many projects which Canada urgently needs today. To refer to only a few, I would point to irrigation works in western Canada. In the west we are facing another drought cycle, yet very little is being done to remedy the situation. Irrigation works are self-liquidating and eventually would not cost the taxpayer anything. There are other projects of a like nature.

Our criticism of this budget is that it does not plan. It holds out no hope whatever that we can have steady and enduring prosperity in peace time. I contend that the third requirement of a good budget has not been filled by the government. The budget, then, has overlooked the lessons which were learned during the war years. It has failed the people of Canada in this critical time in three respects: first, by its failure to provide tax relief for Canadians in the small income category; second, by its failure to extend social services; and third, by its failure to plan for future full employment. In short, it has not provided security for the people of this nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to say a few words in French so as to emphasize the following inference: In these critical times, the budget has frustrated the hopes of the Canadian people on three main points.

First, it has not lightened the small wage-earner's burden of taxes.

Second, it has introduced no social service proposals.

Third, it has suggested no definite plans to prevent an unemployment crisis.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. THATCHER: In short, Mr. Speaker, it has not provided for the material security of the nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I have listened to budgets in this parliament from several ministers of finance, and I feel that I too must congratulate the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the presentation of his government's financial statement. The presentation of a budget is always a solemn occasion. I can well remember ministers of finance who seemed to be nervous and fearful of the outcome, but I was a little doubtful when I observed the genial new Minister of Finance present what was in a way a bigger budget than any we have had, with much more assurance—in fact in comparison with many other ministers of finance he seemed to display almost reckless assurance—that everything was going to be all right anyway.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

I could not help thinking of the difference between this budget and budgets that have been presented in this house in the past. I believe the first budget to which I listened in this house was for $340 million. Prior to the war, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) has just said, the revenue in Canada was $436 million. In 1946-47, almost two years after the war, we find ourselves with a revenue, from taxes, of $2,459 million.

In his presentation of the budget the minister pointed to many decreases in our tax burdens, but as was said by the previous speaker, they are not exactly as they look on paper. They do not come into effect until the first of July, and therefore the 29½ per cent average reduction in income tax is actually only 14½ per cent; and when you consider that almost fifty per cent of Canadian taxation is indirect, in the form of sales tax and many other levies, then the reduction is only about seven per cent. It is therefore not very much of a decrease.

I know that those interested in business, in the development of this country, and in the question of providing employment, are greatly alarmed that there was not a real decrease in our taxation. Only 52·5 per cent of our taxes today represent direct levies, while 47·5 per cent are indirect; in other words, one-half is received through the front door and the other half is brought in by the back door. But they all come from the Canadian people just the same. And there is no consideration, may I point out, for the poor man as regards the sales tax on the shoes he buys for his children.

We are, it is true, in a time of post-war prosperity, and no one should assume we are preaching depression if we suggest that we may return to normal times sooner or later. But there is little preparation in this budget. There are only expressions of fear from the government, but there is little preparation for the day that might very well come upon us. I do not mean by that we have to recede to a day of depression. I think this country is strong enough to endure even the weaknesses of the government now responsible for the management of its affairs. I have great faith in Canada, and one needs great faith in view of the reckless experiments we observe from time to time.

The true test of whether we are taxed in accordance with our business ability is not alone in the rate of taxation, or the number of dollars which are collected now or what might have been collected in 1938 or 1939. The test must have reference to the proportion of the tax to national income. I say to those on the government benches—and I have given some thought to this matter, which I think is worthy of note—that in 1938, the year before the war, on our national income, which it is true was much less—it was at that time about five billions whereas it is approximately now twelve billion dollars—the proportion of the tax was only 8·55 per cent. The year following the war, with a national income of twelve billion dollars, we are extracting from the people in direct and indirect taxation $2,459 million, or 20·49 per cent of the national income. If there is a business man within sound of my voice I would ask him to take cognizance of this situation; for the rate is 150 per cent higher than what was imposed upon the national income in 1938 and 1939.

I feel that in view of this trend the government might well have considered reducing our taxes further. In the third year following the war, the huge spending machine that was built up of necessity during the war might be dismantled. At least we should have some signs of an attempt to dismantle it. I realize that the veterans' payments, family allowances and old age pensions all must be provided for. But surely the time has come to insulate our economy against the days when we may return to a more normal condition. I cannot help but think that while our economic position internationally is strong, there is no one so optimistic who does not pause to realize that when we return to normal times, this period of more or less inflated economy will be changed to a certain extent. I cannot help but think that the government must have listened to many throughout the country. It must have listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) when he urged them to reduce taxation by at least 33⅓ per cent; and on the strength of the government's own estimates submitted to this house, that could have been done. Last year the taxation burden upon the people was very heavy. I realize, however, that you cannot decrease taxation so long as there is inefficiency and reckless extravagance in government; and, Mr. Speaker, I charge this government with being reckless in their extravagance in maintaining a bureaucracy which was built up, evidently through necessity in time of war, and adding to a regiment of civil servants which should have been decreased instead of increased. Unless we get down to hard, sound business—

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought my hon. friend was going to say, let us get down to hard times.

Mr. ROWE: No one contributes more to hard times, Mr. Speaker, than those who talk about them; and if this government fail to tax themselves into hard times, they will likely talk themselves into hard times.

Mr. MITCHELL: You will never get full employment as a prophet of gloom. Don't be so gloomy about it. You talk as though you wanted a depression in this country.

Mr. ROWE: I was telling you that there was no need for a depression; but if you have something new on employment, I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have the highest employment figures in the history of this nation.

Mr. ROWE: You have many things higher. I am telling you that you have the highest taxes, too, in the history of this nation. I am not going to be sidetracked, Mr. Speaker. The minister often does not contribute much when he himself is speaking, and he always contributes less when I am speaking. But I do say that one of the reasons—and no one knows it better than the minister who has just interrupted me, why we have these high taxes. There were 2,655 added to the department of the controller of the treasury and 492 to the Department of Agriculture. I know there is a lot of help needed there, but I wonder if 492 were necessary to that department. It is little wonder that 237 had to be added to the civil service commission to count the numbers going into the other departments. No wonder it is difficult to relieve the burden of taxation.

The minister has heeded the call for some reduction in taxation, and has given a few reductions where it is most politically expedient. But business has had no relief; corporations have had no relief; development enterprise has had no relief. There is no relief or encouragement for individual endeavour, individual initiative or private enterprise, which some of those on the other side still believe is the fair way of developing a nation's economy and giving employment.

But, sir, we have the hidden taxes that are bringing in about fifty per cent of this revenue. About fifty per cent of the revenue is being recklessly spent in adding more and more to the government bureaucracy to carry out functions of departments that are supposed to be almost extinct. Today if a farmer puts a wire fence around his field, or buys a cake of soap for the kitchen, he pays hundreds of taxes, and they are covered up accordingly in the costs. You do not need to take my word for it, Mr. Speaker. You and the minister are both hero worshippers of the ex-minister of finance. I remember what he said in 1941, and I quote from his speech as reported in Hansard of April 29, of that year, at page 2354:

> These indirect taxes are not such as I should be comfortable in recommending in normal times but when the need for revenue is great and when the need for concentrating our energies on the successful prosecution of the war is so vitally necessary, we must have recourse to taxes which if not good taxes are better than others which we have rejected.

Nuisance taxes and the ones which he referred to are not good taxes, but Mr. Speaker, they are still with us. The war is over and the government is now boasting about a surplus. Surely if these taxes were not good taxes in a time of emergency, in that bitter and tragic time, when we needed money to fight an enemy, they are bad taxes when we are boasting of a surplus. As I say, the people are asking that these nuisance taxes be removed; they are asking the government to give them room to breathe and room in enterprise to meet some of the ordinary taxes. Even if the government has decided to hold on to these nuisance taxes and indirect taxes until just a few months before an election, surely they might have been humanitarian enough to take the nuisance tax off soft drinks and the baby's candies at this time. Surely they would still have enough left, because there will be a list of taxes a page long that can be removed at election time. Not only will they be removed then, but they will have to be removed economically if the government does not want to tax this country into a depression, let alone talk it into it.

I can hear the rumblings over in the east block when that budget was being prepared: "When are we going to have an election?" "We are not going to have one this year; go easy boys. leave them on." Yes, the need is evident, Mr. Speaker, when it is realized that these hidden taxes are not only on luxuries; they bear just as heavily on the poor man's family requirements as on the rich man's family. They are, however, different to this extent. They can be taken more or less by painless extraction. Years ago if a man happened to mangle his leg in the bush it was sawed off without an anaesthetic. But as a result of the thankful march of science we have arrived at the point where he is taken away and, through the use of ether, the leg is removed very gently. It doesn't hurt as much, but the man winds up without a leg just the same. At the present time we find that this government has dealt with only about fifty per cent of taxation. Under the present tax system, as the present prosperity recedes, we automatically raise the percentage of tax to the national income. Just as the previous speaker has mentioned, in this budget the taxes are raised. This year the taxes are as high on the poor man's requirements as they were last year. The effect of taxes over the whole dominion is higher because of the increased cost of living, and because of the increased cost of production. The sales tax was 8 per cent on a $100 article; it is now 8 per cent on a $125 or $150 article under inflated prices that prevail at present.

I noticed that the day before the budget was brought down the Minister of Finance tabled the report of the foreign exchange control board. In that it is evident, from the point of view of trade, Canada is on a fantastically dangerous road. We are paying for our purchases in the United States, and we are selling our products elsewhere for money we have already lent. In other words, we are paying for our own exports at the present time.

The day before the budget was brought down the Minister of Finance brought in the report of the foreign exchange control board. I do not think it was ever intended that it would get as much publicity as the budget. The budget was more political, and this was more factual. But at page 13 of the report of the foreign exchange control board for the year 1946 we see where we bought $430 million worth of merchandise more than we sold to the United States. This is $74 million more of an adverse balance of trade than we had in 1939.

We have had, true, a balance of $100 million in non-monetary gold, and that was in spite of the fact that this government in an arbitrary manner last July reduced the price of gold $3.50 an ounce, and did nothing in this year to restore any encouragement to the gold mining industry which probably did more in time of depression than did any other industry to pull this country through. And if they were preparing for the days that some of them say are going to be less prosperous than today, then surely they might have given some slight attention to some form of development which would increase prosperity and enable us to withstand an adverse balance if there was one.

Our tourist trade netted us $83 million last year. That was $20 million less than 1929. Our net interest and dividend payments are up. They were $204 million. or $32 million more than they were in 1929. Our payments for freight and shipping is put at $66 million, or $32 million more than in 1929. And the miscellaneous items are listed at $82 million, which is $68 million more than 1929.

All in all we are down $603 million in our accounts with the United States of America in the year 1946. We would have been worse off had it not been for certain war supplies which were sold to the United States. We are told that $372 million worth of war supplies were sold. They were paid for out of wartime taxation, and in many cases they were sold for a fraction of what they cost. The proceeds from sales of war assets have been used in peace time to cover peacetime inefficiency. Thus we have a political surplus of $350 million instead of a factual deficit, on operating deficit, of $20 million.

Now, I do feel that no one would think for a minute that it is a fair presentation to the people of Canada. I ask the government this question: When they had so much money lying around, and such inflated revenues, why did they not present their budget to the people of Canada in a businesslike way? I know if I presented to the company for which I am responsible a financial report such as this, I would be apt to be put in gaol.

Mr. MITCHELL: Did you hear the comment that has just been made?

Mr. ROWE: No; are you going to transmit it to me? What is it?

Mr. GARDINER: Just as well you do not know.

Mr. ROWE: Well, there would be no chance of the Minister of Finance being there with me; but probably some of the rest would make fair company. But I know this, that those in the cabinet who are laughing can laugh this off just as glibly as the Minister of Finance can say it. That is a sample of the glibness and of the smug complacency which prevails throughout the department of finance, and even at a time when our revenues and expenses are two or three times higher than they were, and a couple of times higher than they should be.

There seems to be a reckless assurance that nothing can happen. Like the reckless optimist, they do not care what happens as long as it does not happen to them. They do not seem to have taken seriously the thought that this will ever end. It is like the group who had a party, and when the party was over they did not know what to do with what was left over, or what was not spent.

What has this government done to lighten the burden of these payments to the United States? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is almost moved to tears when he tells us about what his department and the country have done for Great Britain. But his colleague the Minister of Finance does not tell the same story. I see according to page 15 of this same report of the foreign exchange control board that we exacted $150 million in gold from the British people in order partly to offset this adverse United States balance.

I notice further that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), through the wartime prices and trade board, allows, in respect of lumber to house the poor, cold Britisher at the present time, a charge almost twice that which is charged in Canada. But when the Canadian wheat producer sells Great Britain wheat they must sell it at $1 a bushel beneath what they can get on the world market.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the policy of this government, which does not know where it is going. I realize, too, that we have collected $87 million of United States funds from sales to UNRRA. A few weeks ago the leader of the socialist party, to my left, suggested we were charging too much in Canada for pulp and paper. But I observe what the Minister of Finance says at page 15 of this same report, namely that that was one of the main items which saved us from further disaster.

What is this government doing about it? The simple answer is: Nothing. They have no fixed policy. In fact, they have as many policies as they have ministers of the crown. I think the Right Hon. the Minister of Agriculture should be a minister without portfolio, as well as heading the department of agriculture, because it would seem that he speaks for all departments of government. He went out west a month ago and announced an immigration policy.

Mr. GARDINER: And you did not vote against it.

Mr. ROWE: He said 12 million people would be brought to Canada by his government.

Mr. GARDINER: And in the house you would not vote against it.

Mr. ROWE: You did not bring that in, because the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), who is in charge of the immigration branch, evidently made another speech altogether. I will give you his; it is not the same as yours at all. Evidently he was away too. You have been wrong in your own department so much I hope you do not attempt to make him wrong in his.

Mr. GARDINER: You voted for it.

Mr. ROWE: According to the Vancouver Province the Minister of Agriculture stated that we want millions from Europe, that we need 12 million. When he came east to Edmonton he dropped his figure a bit. As he came east his figure got lower, and by the time he reached Edmonton it had dropped to 10 million. But in the matter of immigration I say that if anybody is to give the policy in parliament, then surely the Minister of Mines and Resources, as the responsible minister, should be left with that responsibility. Evidently his figure is not the same as that of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: It is about the same.

Mr. ROWE: Is it about the same? But it sounds different, and it was said differently, and the people do not believe it is the same. I would ask those who are not interrupting me to find any similarity at all in those two statements.

On the one hand we have the verbatim report of the statement of the Prime Minister, the real minister in charge of immigration—not the political minister—when he says at page 2645 of Hansard of the present session:

> It is of the utmost importance to relate immigration to absorptive capacity. In the past, Canada has received many millions of immigrants but at the same time many millions of people have emigrated. Of the latter a large proportion were young people born in Canada, and others who had benefited by education or training received in Canada. The objective of the government is to secure what new population we can absorb, but not to exceed that number.

It is reported by the British government that 300,000 from the United Kingdom are ready to go to the dominions. Plans are said to be under way for the transportation of 200,000 to Australia. It is reported that plans are laid for 40,000 to go to South Africa. Yet here we are, the senior British dominion, faced with uncertainties brought about by the different policies that have been enunciated. We find now that because of those uncertainties there is virtually a blockade against British immigrants coming to Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture went west and announced a new policy of national socialism; suppose we should call it Liberal national socialism. I have an article here but I know he recalls it well enough to make it needless for me to read it.

Mr. GARDINER: You do not understand it.

Mr. ROWE: Evidently you did not understand it very well because you said that anything that a corporation would make in times of prosperity, they should give to you in taxes, and yet when they had a loss in other times they should bear the loss themselves. The minister understands how to add up revenue. He also can add four or five hundred more civil servants to his department, a department that has been dismally responsible for the failure—

Mr. GARDINER: You had better stick to your paper.

Mr. ROWE: Well, if I stuck to agriculture as close as you did I would hope to do a better job than you have done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nobody in Canada believes that.

Mr. ROWE: You are not a farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: You had better try sitting on the treasury benches for a little while.

Mr. ROWE: Thank you, but I would not sit with those who are sitting there now.

Mr. GARDINER: The people did not leave you very long when you were sitting here.

Mr. ROWE: I am not inviting myself. No doubt the right hon. minister feels that it is good talk in certain quarters, and I can understand that because his friendship to those to my left has been more obvious and more conspicuous than any of the speeches he has made. I can understand why he would take that attitude. We do not seem to have one government; we seem to have one that is masquerading with two policies, one for the country and one for parliament. The minister states and the governor of the Bank of Canada states that our chance of untangling ourselves from the North American orbit is through a return to free exchange trading. The Minister of Agriculture was sent to London by the Prime Minister to make a wheat agreement. He made an agreement which is virtually an agricultural cartel, a cartel embodying agreements covering nearly all our farm products, tying socialistically our whole economy to the European system and making it impossible for us to sell our farm products in the United States. If our farmers were allowed to sell their products in the United States, as our lumbermen and manufacturers are allowed to sell theirs, you would have a rectification of our balance of trade almost immediately. As the minister knows well, our farmers would receive thirty per cent more for their products. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) raised lumber prices fifteen to twenty-five per cent to increase production, and that lumber is going to house the shivering Britishers, but the Minister of Agriculture, even though his customers are starving over there and the production of farm items is falling off in almost every line, states that if we are to have stabilized prices for farm products, then prices cannot rise every time costs of production rise.

Mr. GARDINER: What would the poor taxpayer have done?

Mr. ROWE: You had better talk to the farmers; there are enough taxpayers among them to know what you haven't done.

Mr. GARDINER: What would the poor taxpayer have done if he had had to pay thirty per cent more for his food?

Mr. ROWE: I have just as much regard for the taxpayer as the minister has and my party would never have exacted such impositions on him as the minister's party has.

Mr. GARDINER: Five cents per pound for butter when your party was in power.

Mr. ROWE: And we got for him more than world prices, and your government gets him less. I shall have a little more to say about that later on, if the minister will wait in patience. The Minister of Agriculture assures us that the British government will not break its agreements for Canadian farm products, but as a matter of fact he has broken nearly every agreement he has made with the British. He has established a precedent and set the pace for the breaking of agreements. His bacon agreement of 1946 has not been consummated. He has failed to meet his egg agreement of 1946. His cheese agreement of 1943-44 fell short of fulfilment; his cheese agreement of 1946 was another lost hope. His evaporated milk agreement of 1940-41 was a dismal failure, and his evaporated milk agreement of 1942 was an idle dream. What does the Minister of Agriculture do in order to salvage some of the agreements he has made?

With his other socialist friends he has repeatedly anticipated an early depression. In consequence he agrees to sell 600,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat four years in advance to the British government at prices ranging downward from $1.55 to $1 a bushel, and accordingly is selling to the British government at prices ranging from fifty cents to $1.23 less than the prices the wheat board are quoting to other customers. It is common knowledge that the greatest contributor to a depression is the bear operator, and one of the greatest bear operators in Canada today is the Minister of Agriculture.

No government with a vestige of prudence would sell any farm products short, let alone 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. The facts of the situation are that they make this British socialist government the single purchaser of our export surplus of wheat. We now observe the novel spectacle of a Liberal government in Canada closing the grain exchange in Winnipeg and a socialist United Kingdom government opening the corn exchanges in Liverpool. We have our government today pleading with the farmers to produce more, but they are told that if their costs rise they will not get increased prices.

When the wheat board bill was being discussed in parliament the government tabled an international agreement and our delegates were sent to London to discuss that agreement. It is common history that the conference in London broke up because the British government would not agree to a price of $1.20 for the crop year 1949-50, and $1.10 for the crop year 1950-51, the first year after the agreement expired. When the British empire agreements were made I can recall Liberal members of parliament denouncing them vigorously for a full six weeks. There are some hon. members here now who were here then and I know it would be embarrassing to them if I read some of their speeches. I have not the time to do so, but I know it would be amusing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It might do you good.

Mr. ROWE: It would not do you any good. I think it would be amusing for the rest of the house to hear what some of those who sit so complacently on the government benches had to say. I know that the minister who just interrupted me was one. I think he ridiculed the British preference proposals.

Mr. MITCHELL: What was the price then?

Mr. ROWE: You were not there.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, yes, I was.

Mr. ROWE: You were down in the corner. I can remember now; you were one of the conscripts to liberalism.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say to my hon. friend that he never had a chance to be a conscript and the Minister of Labour was never a conscript—and I speak in a military sense—I was a volunteer.

Mr. ROWE: Does the minister mean that he volunteered to become a Liberal? I did not know that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said I was not a conscript.

Mr. ROWE: The ministers who are so glib in interrupting me were most vigorous in their opposition, and I can remember that very well. I remember at one time they twitted the Right Honourable Mr. Bennett for receiving only six cents more for wheat on the British market, but here today we are asked by the same glib-tongued critics to take $1.25 a bushel less.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did you not vote for it?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, I voted for British preference, but you did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did you not vote for it when it was before the house?

Mr. ROWE: No, I did not vote for the wheat agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You were not here.

Mr. ROWE: You did not vote for the imperial preferences in 1932. Yours was the party which rebelled because we were receiving only $10 million more than world prices. You now ask us to support your government when you are going to receive $200 million less a year. The Minister of Agriculture made just one mistake about the Hon. Mr. Strachey, the British food minister. The Hon. Mr. Strachey is a clever man, but he is an Englishman working for England. The Minister of Agriculture made one mistake; he thought Mr. Strachey was working for Canada. The Minister of Agriculture is a great politician but a tragically impotent businessman.

The government knock down the price of wheat and force the western farmers to grow oats and barley while the world pleads for wheat. They seize the oats and barley and have it fed to Canadian hogs to try to salvage the remnants of the broken bacon agreements, and when all that fails they call on the taxpayers of Canada to put up enough money to keep the Danish hog producer out of the British market. Such is this negative policy of the present government.

Mr. GARDINER: Why not get a new speech?

Mr. ROWE: No one needs a new speech more than the minister, who has interrupted. You will find little but politics in anything he has said in the last ten years. Let me tell him that the farmers are not asking for a new speech from him but for a new policy, and the minister hears the rumbling in the mulberry bushes; make no mistake about that. If there is an unpopular man among the farmers of this country it is the right hon. gentleman who just interrupted.

I have already mentioned wheat prices and the disadvantage under which our Canadian producer sells.

An hon. MEMBER: Make your own speech.

[Mr. Rowe]

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker, I will do like ministers sometimes do in the question period and say: If you have any further questions to ask, meet me out in the hall and I can explain there with less embarrassment to yourself and the gallery and the government. I have already mentioned wheat prices and why the farmers are dissatisfied with the present government. Personally I like the right hon. gentleman who interrupted very much, much more than I do politically. He is a much better politician than statesman ,and everybody knows very well why.

I turn now to hog prices. On March 1, last, the price of hogs in Toronto was $16.50 and $29.08 in Chicago. Cattle were $15 per 100 pounds in Toronto and $25.15 in Chicago. Lambs were $16 in Toronto and $23.60 in Chicago. On March 6, the price of wheat in Canada was $1.35 against $2.89 in Chicago. Potatoes were $1.64 per 100 pounds at Saint John, New Brunswick, and $2.70 in New York. Oats were 61½ cents in Winnipeg and ninety-nine cents in Chicago. Butter was forty-two cents in Montreal and sixty-nine cents in New York. And now after the Minister of Agriculture has made such unique progress in demoralizing our Canadian agriculture, he says that here the wheat farmers are on their own, that the government will not pay any further losses. Speaking in this house on February 25, last, as reported at page 768 of Hansard, he said that the government would stand for no further losses, that the farmers had to do their own stabilizing hereafter. The farmers now realize that they have a ceiling and no floor, and it is no wonder that the agricultural walls are beginning to collapse all over the country.

A word on international trade. Those of us who sat in this house in 1932 can remember how the members of the Liberal party at that time spent six weeks in opposing the empire agreements and finally voted against them. But now the Liberal party, after all these years, realizes what a splendid foundation those empire agreements were for negotiating trade agrements with the United States. Two weeks after the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) came into power he completed the negotiations for an agreement which Mr. Bennett had begun with the United States.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member may continue.

Mr. ROWE: As my genial interrupting friends have permitted me to go on I will be sporty enough to say that they can interrupt me as much as they like. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here just now but am glad that he was able to be in the chamber at the opening of the sitting. He was leading the opposition in this house at the time of the empire trade agreements in 1932 and how well I remember him saying on one occasion that they were the work of a Tory conspiracy. What does the Liberal party think today of that Tory conspiracy? On April 14 last the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in answer to a question is reported at page 2000 of Hansard to have said:

> I think we all regard the empire preferences as something quite precious which we do not intend to give up unless we get something which together we consider to be better than what we already have.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I point out to my hon. friend that the empire preferences were Liberal policies introduced by Fielding in 1897 and had nothing to do with the Ottawa agreements, which were quite a different thing.

Mr. ROWE: That is true, and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre said that away back in 1932, but unfortunately he was not present to support the policy of Laurier in 1898, but in 1932 he saw fit to oppose them. I cannot understand why he would do that. If I had been in the hon. member's place I would have supported the old Liberal chieftain, and I should like here to compliment Laurier who had a much stronger British preference policy than the hon. member's present leader has.

I see by the Financial Post that Mr. Clayton, under-secretary for external affairs in the United States, stated recently that the reason why so many United States industries moved to Canada in 1932 was the preferences which had been secured by the Bennett government in the empire trade agreements. Mr. Clayton is no more politically-minded than you or I—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Speak for yourself.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend has, of course, every right to be proud of Vancouver, but other cities in western Canada are anxious to get more industrial plants and they appreciate that many United States industries set up branch plants in Canada as a result of the empire trade policies which my hon. friend's leader on one occasion called a Tory conspiracy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The growth was because of Liberal policies.

Mr. ROWE: But it was some satisfaction at last to hear the Acting Prime Minister say "We all regard the empire preferences as something quite precious." It was some satisfaction to find that those who came to scoff in 1932, like the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, remained to appreciate the empire preferences in 1947. There is an old saying that some day the chickens come home to roost. What the Bennett government did in those days made it possible for the present government to boast about so many things which they have since done as a result of those agreements.

The Prime Minister no doubt may speak with the cautious dignity of his years; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) may give his budget with more reckless assurance, but I believe that the country is doubtful as to who is leading Liberalism in Canada today. I should like to compliment the Minister of Agriculture. I believe he is probably leading Liberalism at the moment. In fact I shall go a step farther and say that I cannot conceive of any conspiracy in Canada to supplant Liberalism in this country by a policy of national socialism which would be more effective than the leadership he has given. We often wonder why we see the friendship between those to your right, Mr. Speaker, and those to our left. One promises socialism of industry in the future while the other gives us socialism of agriculture in the present. The utopia of the socialists to our left is to control industry first and agriculture last. That has now been supplanted by the Minister of Agriculture, who gives us the modern form of Liberalism which is to control agriculture first and industry last. The government supporters call this modern Liberalism; the taxpayers call it stream-lined socialism. Similarity between these two socialistic groups is no less conspicuous now than their friendship. One discourages free enterprise by reckless talking; the other discourages its progress by reckless taxation.

There is nothing so fearful as fear. I do not want to twit the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) who said he was twitting me the other day. I do not think either he or I have contributed anything by preaching depression in this country. I am satisfied—and I know he and every hon. member who listens to me this afternoon will agree with this—that there is nothing more important than to tell the world of the strength of Canada. To speak seriously, Canada is a strong government. As I said at the outset, it must be strong or it could never endure this administration—

Mr. MITCHELL: You just said "government"; don't change the record.

Mr. ROWE: The letter killeth but the spirit giveth light. May I say that there is nothing so fearful as fear. In that there may be vague hopes of political success for the C.C.F. socialists, the party to my left. The only hope they have is in a depression. I say, Mr. Speaker, that no single factor contributes more to a depression than their continuous talk about depression and of a return to the 1932 period. I say that in all sincerity.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who has talked about a depression for the last hour?

Mr. ROWE: I have not. I have emphasized on many occasions that we are going to return to normal prosperity. Surely the hon. member knows the difference between that and a depression.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member has been talking about a recession for the last hour.

Mr. ROWE: I was talking about a return to normal prosperity, and if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is so foolish as to think we are not going to return to normal prosperity, then he would make a bad colleague for his party if they ever assumed the responsibility of controlling all the industries of Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: Tell us what "normal prosperity" means in your language.

Mr. ROWE: Normal prosperity in my language would not mean depression in yours, if you were telling the truth.

Nothing can do more to frighten and hinder venture capital than talking of a depression. If the Minister of Finance were here he would say the same thing. Canada is a great country and can endure minor weaknesses, and it has endured the talk and noise of those to my left. Unless we have a return to a depression hon. members to my left have very little chance of ever assuming power.

We should develop our own resources by having more courage. Let us think of the courage which won the war; let us think of how we can win the peace. If we get down to hard business and give enterprise a chance to breathe we shall have prosperity. Let us, however, beware of false economy. At the present time half of our taxes come from an inflated national income through indirect and wartime levies. Let us prevent depression by preparing for normal times. Let us encourage development by reducing taxes further. The war is now over. For twenty-five years, those who sit to your right drummed across the dominion national unity as their watchword and political war cry. It was bannered and heralded from coast to coast. I urge their leader with all his years of experience—and I say in all sincerity I regret that he is not here this afternoon—that in the twilight of his years, after having flown the banner of national unity to meet political expedience, he use it once more to see if we cannot halt the trend toward centralization of government, to see if we cannot tear up the blueprint of the federal wartime control system which we adhered to during the war because we thought it was necessary. Let him now make national unity a slogan of reality. Let him restore to our provincial governments their rightful place in the constitutional government of this country. Surely if our forefathers could meet almost a hundred years ago and establish the unity which was then established, the man who has carried the banner of national unity for a quarter of a century so glibly can now, before he leaves office, do something to bring the provinces together. Today they are wider apart than they were when the present Prime Minister took office. In all sincerity, I would urge the government to consider meeting the provinces once more to see if they cannot revive and restore the unity which their regime has evidently shaken so badly.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): The income tax reductions which are being over-publicized are quite deceitful. The wage-earners in the lower brackets are always the hardest hit. Can anybody with a family lead a decent life under the circumstances imposed by the present budget? The government is reducing the income tax, whereas it should be stamped out altogether for this category of wage-earners. Is it reasonable to tax the salary of the head of the family who is drawing such a small salary?

People earning between $1,800 to $3,000 should not pay income tax, owing to the increase in the cost of living. For the same reasons, salaries of single persons earning up to $1,200 should be tax free. And married people without children should pay no income tax up to $2,000.

Let us examine our so-called commercial prosperity. As a matter of fact it is non-existent. I can prove this statement by quoting the following warning given by Mr. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada:

> Canada cannot continue indefinitely to sell on credit on overseas markets, while it must make up with American dollars the huge deficit in its commercial balance with the United States.

Under long-term contract, we are selling a considerable amount of our products at prices below those at present prevailing on the international market. As long as we follow such methods, the commercial prosperity of Canada will remain artificial. The presents and gifts which the government granted and is still granting to overseas countries forecast a dire future for our country.

Our Canadian economy cannot survive on such a basis of commercial exchanges. Let us not forget that our trade with the United States is important inasmuch as our economy is concerned. In 1946 our exports to the United States amounted to $894 million while we exported only $610 million worth to Great Britain. How is the United Kingdom paying for these exports? Not with its money. It digs into our pocket-book in order to pay the debts it owes us. On the whole, we are being fooled. We are sending to Great Britain wheat, meat, minerals, building materials, thousands of automobiles, while our own people cannot obtain an automobile and must purchase nails, tin and all their building materials on the black market. England enters into commercial agreements with European countries like Poland, and these agreements are based upon considerable quantities of products which England is buying from Canada on credit. As far as England is concerned, this is a true political economy; for Canada, it simply means abandoning our economy and our prosperity.

It is high time that we look toward the United States inasmuch as our trade is concerned. Canada needs United States dollars urgently, otherwise we shall have to face the most terrible inflation. The danger is imminent. Commercial institutions are continuously warning the government. Canada should reduce to its lowest possible minimum the credit sales of its export products. We cannot maintain our commercial balance by continuously floating loans. These facts must be revealed. The Canadian people should not delude themselves and live in a dreamland. Our country must not be duped into a state of illusive prosperity.

I now wish to draw to the attention of the government the considerable increase in the cost of living. It seems that every effort is being attempted to bring about inflation. In spite of an adverse vote of the House of Commons, the government abolished the subsidy paid to milk producers. In the interests of producers and consumers, parliament went on record as being against the removal of this subsidy. The Canadian people, through their representatives, requested that it be continued. Our so-called champions of democracy did not pay any attention to this request. Once more, they infringed upon the prerogatives and sovereignty of parliament. Like dictators, they rule by orders in council. They also recently discontinued the subsidies paid to butter producers and producers of other vital foodstuffs. Thus the small wage-earners will be all the more exploited. The decrease in income tax, embodied in the present budget, will be null and void, because the consumer will pay much higher prices for the milk and butter which are essential to the existence of his family. This budget was devised for reasons of strategy and appeasement. The government has been doing so for many years. It endeavours to appease and postpone action. It learned this during the war. It acted gradually, step by step, when it wished to induce us to participate in the war, and again to have us swallow mobilization and conscription. Always the same indirect means, the same promises and commitments which are never fulfilled.

Through the servility of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which has been its maid of all work, for the last ten years the government has been spreading its insidious propaganda over the air. This publicity agent has become its servant, its slave and its monopoly. It lent its broadcasting facilities to communist spies and traitors. It refused to outlaw the communist party. Recently, in a public address in Great Britain, Tim Buck severely criticized and insulted Canada before the whole world. And Tim Buck is still free; he was never put out of the way. But Laval-Two Mountains is being done away with. The Liberal party cannot tolerate a member who keeps his word and honours the mandate he received from his constituents. It cannot forgive the one who is now speaking to you, the victories he obtained in 1940 and 1945, despite the bandits who were stealing or manipulating the contents of ballot boxes. I have nothing but contempt for those who are trying to suppress me today. The people are with me, and I scorn the petty politicians. They are inferior beings who are appreciated as such by their fellow-Canadians. Time is a great master. Envy was not created by God, but by the devil. And God is stronger than the devil. God annihilated all plots of Lucifer. Hitler the antichrist, his ally Mussolini, were caught in their own snares. Stalin, the sacrilegious, atheist and godless potentate; Stalin the cherished child of the Liberal party; Stalin, the grand master of espionage in Canada and throughout the world, will meet his Waterloo like all the others. Ambition and injustice kill their authors. Some persons have no other object in life. They are the first to disappear. They will no longer be here; I will remain because I always lined up with truth. Because they have no ideal of beauty and truth, persons with a partial, disloyal, unfair and persecuting mind inevitably bog down in the mire of their own lives. Since the redistribution of electoral divisions will cost the public treasury considerable amounts of money, I consider it my duty to refer to this matter, which I intend to examine more thoroughly at the end of my remarks.

A while ago, I referred to the possibility of an economic crisis which will be inevitably brought about by the policy of the government. In support of this statement, let me quote the opinion of the experts of the Banque Canadienne Nationale:

> Before the war, our favourable commercial balance with the United Kingdom approximately counter balanced, year in and year out, our deficit with the United States. But the pound sterling can no longer be converted freely against American dollars. Although London promised to reestablish the free convertibility of its pound on July 12 next, it is to be feared that this will be impossible. This action would not give us any American dollars, whatever be the amount of our favourable commercial balance with the United Kingdom, as long as we do not procure Great Britain with the means of paying its purchases in Canada.

At the end of their report the financial experts of the same bank give this solemn warning:

> As long as our trade with the United States shows a deficit which we cannot normally make up, the state of prosperity which certain people proclaim will be artificial. We should not create an atmosphere of false prosperity which will only lead us to a tragic awakening.

Nevertheless the government is opening our doors wider and wider to immigration. Is it relying on the artificial prosperity of Canada? It should be very cautious if it does not wish to witness once more the period of unemployment and extreme poverty we went through a few years ago. As long as we can not give employment to our own fellow citizens, we should close our doors upon immigration. Our own people should come first. If we tolerate that foreigners fill the jobs to which our own workers are entitled, we shall deny them their right to existence, we shall be ignoring the sacrifices of our veterans on the battlefields.

Now let us examine a much talked-about subject, dominion-provincial relations. The powers of the dominion and the provinces with regard to taxation are defined in the British North America Act. If the federal government had adhered to that act, all these useless discussions and unending conferences could have been avoided. In spite of the privileges granted the provinces, the federal government keeps on infringing every year upon the taxation domain reserved to the provinces, by violating the jurisdiction determined by our constitution.

Mr. MICHAUD: Which?

Mr. LACOMBE: I do not wish to be interrupted without my permission, in accordance with the rules of the house. I want my forty minutes.

Mr. MICHAUD: All right.

Mr. LACOMBE: The most serious danger is this interference by the central government as regards the collection of taxes granted the provinces by the British North America Act. In support of my statement, I refer to the memorandum of the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal. More than four thousand businessmen protested against this invasion of provincial jurisdiction by the federal government. This memorandum states that the economic and taxation problems cannot be solved by a violation of the constitutional rights and prerogatives of the provinces. Ottawa will never be able to subdue the prerogatives which the provinces hold in their own right. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) raises no hope as to a possible reopening of discussion between the federal government and the provinces on this most important national subject.

Mr. Speaker, I find, as many others do, that the attitude of some members of this house is strange. They are loud in their demands for tax reductions. These same members voted for Canada's participation in the war, mobilization and conscription. Their vote brought death to more than fifty thousand of our young men. They are the ones who supported the handing over of thousands of millions in gifts to England.

Those whose votes accumulated a debt of $20 billion which the taxpayer must now foot, are not entitled to be inconsistent to such an extent. Are they now satisfied with their work? Canada is the laughing-stock of the world. We are excluded from world peace conferences. Canada is either playing the part of a secondary nation, or takes no part at all. Its territory is invaded by the soviet spies whom this country has fostered. Communist cells are multiplying in this country under the benevolence of the present government which refuses to outlaw the communist-minded Labour-Progressive party. The same government refuses to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. And yet, peace, charity and justice shall come from nowhere but the Vatican. But the next war will spring from the Jewish and masonic clique who are against the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican.

This war will come sooner than we think, in a world armed to the teeth with infernal machines invented by the diabolical genius of a few persons. The next war will not spring from Christian Spain, already condemned by Mr. Wilgress, who was then representing our country at the united nations. It will come from atheistic and godless Russia. Where the Lord is not, there we find hatred, ambition, domination, injustice and wholesome death. As ever, thanks to our imperialists, our colonials, and those men without backbone, we shall be caught in the turmoil. When that day comes, the world shall have lived.

Referring once more to the redistribution, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the following facts. At the very first meeting of the House of Commons committee appointed for the purpose of readjusting the representation in this house, I submitted to the members of the committee representations which I deemed fair and reasonable. I then asked that the towns of Laval des Rapides and Pont Viau be annexed to the riding of Laval-Deux Montagnes. According to the 1941 census, Laval-Deux Montagnes had a population of 33,498 persons. Since that time, this figure has increased considerably. If the members of the committee had accepted my viewpoint, they would have done justice not only to Laval-Deux Montagnes, but also to Argenteuil. As a matter of fact, according to the 1941 census, the population of Laval-Deux Montagnes, together with that of Laval des Rapides and Pont Viau, which actually belong to l'Ile Jesus, would have totalled 38,082 persons. Nobody can deny that such a population was sufficient, when one compares it to the population of Glengarry, 18,000; Vaudreuil-Soulanges, 22,498; Stanstead, 27,972.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he cannot discuss the redistribution bill because that bill is before a special committee.

Mr. RINFRET: Let him go on.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am actually discussing the budget, Mr. Speaker; the redistribution of the federal divisions will necessarily involve expense.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. That matter is before a special committee, and it is not in order for any hon. member to discuss it until that committee has made its report.

Mr. RINFRET: Let him go on.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no. What are rules for?

Mr. LACOMBE: All right, Mr. Speaker; I will wait and discuss the question when the report of the committee is made in the House of Commons.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is better.

Mr. REAL CAOUETTE (Pontiac) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on behalf of the electors of Pontiac county, of the Electors' Union of the same county, of the Electors' Union of my province and of Canada at large, since everyone in Canada wants the same results.

I am responsible neither to nor for any political party; I am only responsible to my constitutents and I must therefore speak in their name.

It was my intention to say a few words about redistribution, but I shall not do so until the committee has submitted a report.

As for the budget, the liberal press and controlled radio have tried to impress upon the population that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had revealed himself an ideal treasurer and that his budget would be hailed throughout the country. It is rather the opposite. Everyone expected that exemptions would be boosted to at least $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. Nothing of the kind happened. The young man earning over $750 per year ($14.45 per week) will still be unable to keep his small income entirely to himself, and that also applies to married persons whose income exceeds $1,500 per year (or $28.85 per week). The government demands its share. Income tax, therefore, is levied on as many people as before.

True the amount to be paid has been reduced, but the reduction is very slight, as far as the small wage-earners are concerned. The income tax of a person who is single and who earns $1,000 per annum will be $26 lower than last year, that is to say, 50 cents less per week. That person will pocket an extra half dollar, which is a most comforting thought when, at the same time, there is an increase of 10 cents a pound in the price of butter, 4 cents a pound in that of cheese, 1½ cent a dozen in the price of eggs, all of which results from the policy of the very government which decided to substitute rising consumer prices for producer subsidies.

Those who are in the higher income brackets ought to be more thankful than anyone else to Mr. Abbott. Granted, the income tax of the single taxpayer earning $1,000 is decreased by $26 and that of a father earning $2,000, is reduced by $32, but that of the single taxpayer who has the good fortune of netting himself $5,000 is lower by $370, while if his income amounts to $10,000, he pockets $785 more than previously. The hon. minister annually favours the single taxpayer in the $50,000 bracket with $2,598.

Apart from these income tax cuts, insignificant as far as ordinary incomes are concerned, the budget offers no new features.

True to the practice followed by his predecessors, the Minister of Finance has presented us nothing but a statement of our estimated revenues and expenditures. The people of Canada have had nothing more. One finds no statement of our assets and liabilities. We have no means to know which side of our balance sheet shows greater progress, if our country has increased its wealth and what part of that increase is to be divided among the country's shareholders, the Canadian people. The budget speech is silent on those points. Can one imagine a business firm being satisfied with a simple statement of its revenues and expenditures? What company knows nothing of its assets and liabilities?

Is there also a company that fails to distribute dividends when it is prosperous?

Is Canada prosperous? Yes, if we are to believe the Minister of Finance. But what makes, according to him, the prosperity of Canada? Where is it to be found? Does it reside in the amount of goods exported from the country or in the amount consumed by our people?

In the minister's mind, it consists probably in the amount of money that may be extorted from the taxpayers without causing open revolt.

The Union of Electors stood for the removal of income tax on all incomes under $3,000 per annum. Personally, I have received thousands of petition cards and signatures—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What a farce.

Mr. CAOUETTE: My hon. friends opposite should open their ears and shut their big mouths if they wish to understand.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Why don't you shut yours?

An hon. MEMBER: I too have received some.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Hundreds of requests came to me, asking for the removal of income tax on all incomes under $3,000 per annum. The Honourable Minister of Finance has completely forgotten that voters throughout the country have made similar representations and are clamouring for the exemption from taxation of all incomes under $3,000 per annum.

Of course the budget which has been brought down represents the total of taxes and expenses of the government. His Holiness Pope Pius XI stated in Quadragesimo Anno that those who control money and credit are the masters of our lives and without their permission no one dares even breathe. Without the permission of those who control money and credit, no one dares even breathe.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Did you read it in Latin?

Mr. CAOUETTE: My hon. friend should read it in French in order to get it through his thick skull and grasp its true meaning.

Who controls money and credit in this country? Who controls the economic lifeblood of the Canadian people? It is certainly not the government since they spend their time digging into the pockets of the taxpayers and taking their money away from them.

Mr. BRUNELLE: They are "diggers".

Mr. CAOUETTE: They dig into the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers to take away from them the money which they have earned by the sweat of their brow.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. CAOUETTE: And they spend all the taxes which they levy on scarcities while there are in Canada tremendous possibilities for development.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAOUETTE: There are tremendous physical resources which could provide the Canadian people with comforts, freedom and security through the distribution of money and purchasing power to the consumers, and this we can do by the distribution of a national dividend out of the profits which the people of this country, as individuals, have earned by their labour, in the 300 years since the discovery of Canada. Mr. Speaker. . .

An hon. MEMBER: It's 400 years!

Mr. CAOUETTE: Four hundred years. All the better.

Mr. Speaker, after three or four hundred years of toil on the part of our ancestors, the first settlers of Canada, when those citizens have worked hard at scientific development, and have progressed, is the Canadian people to be deluded into the belief that Canadian society is forging ahead? It is heading for disaster, for it shows a deficit instead of a profit. Instead of surplus of assets, we are shown an increase of liabilities. Electors are being misled, the Canadian people is being hoodwinked, dazzled by figures purely and simply made up by Canadian bankers. Mr. Speaker, money and credit are controlled by the leaders who gave the signal for war in 1939, the leaders who started the depression in 1929. Those who control credit and money are responsible for the last ten years and for World War II. Unless and until the government does away with those "controllers" of our economic blood, or deprives them of their powers over this nation, there is no use hoping for a better democracy or a better standard of living for Canadians. In a country like ours, wealth cannot be distributed as long as it is held by those who "control" the economic life-blood, those who want, by all means, to create destitution in the midst of abundance, who wish to keep the people in a state akin to slavery. Unless such a situation is done away with, our country will turn more and more to communism.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, in 1931 the same Pope Pius XI stated, in quadragesimo Anno:

Our leaders have forsaken their noble tasks and have become the servants of private interests.

Our leaders have become but the slaves of financiers; such is the meaning of that excerpt. In times past, I believe, Canada had a good Conservative government, but it was no better than the Liberal government. In 1935, depression was still with us; it ended only in 1939, when Hitler, the scapegrace, decided to invade poor Poland. Therefore, it was Hitler who put an end to the 1929-1939 depression and brought prosperity to the world, since we enjoyed its benefits only during the war.

During the war, the government has borrowed fabulous sums of money; it has increased our national debt to such an extent that it will be impossible to repay it, since according to the budget speech now in the red in the amount of some $17,000,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, during the 1939-45 war, an Englishman, a German and a Canadian were talking about science and the progress it had made during the war.

An hon. MEMBER: That one has whiskers on it.

Mr. CAOUETTE: So have you, my friend. Speaking first the Englishman said:

An hon. MEMBER: We have heard it before.

Mr. CAOUETTE: In order to show how his country was advanced in science, the Englishman said: "My friends, when a man dies of heart trouble, we take out the old heart, put in an artificial one and the man comes back to life." The German meant to prove that science had made such progress in Germany that when a man had his head cut from the shoulders they had a special glue with which to stick it back in place and that after the operation the patient was feeling fine. The Canadian found that very funny and started to laugh. "In Canada," he said, "science is much more advanced than that. We have found out long ago how to replace a human heart by an artificial one. Sticking one head on shoulders is easy in Canada, we can even stick a dozen heads on the same shoulders. We have made even further progress, because men without head and without heart are at the helm in our country.

Mr. Speaker, after the war years we have gone through, there are some unemployed in the country. We find them everywhere in Canada, in Montreal, in Quebec and in all other cities; yet the Minister of Finance states that prosperity prevails in Canada. Representations have been made from all over the country urging the minister of Finance to bring down a sensible budget, in line with Canada's assets. Representations have even been made by little children asking that taxes on chocolate and soft drinks be removed. Protests have come from all parts of the country. I have here a wire requesting the repeal of the tax on soft drinks. I have a letter from an educational institution of my riding and a wire from the Val d'Or Bottling Works stating that the quantity and quality of soft drinks even at five cents a bottle would equal the pre-war standard. Poulin and Son, Rouyn bottlers, have sent me the following wire:

Do utmost to repeal soft drink sales tax plus bringing price back to five cents and benefiting public. Quantity and quality will remain the same in each bottle. Counting on your help.

Here is another one from A. N. Drouin, of Val d'Or:

You may rest assured that the quality of my products will remain the same and the retail price five cents should the tax on soft drinks be removed.

I have also a letter from Saint-Michel-Archange School, Rouyn, Quebec, asking for the removal of the tax on soft drinks and stating that the same request was made last year without any tangible result. I quote from that letter, the following excerpt:

As we explained last year, the said tax is still in force despite the fact that the war has been over more than seventeen months. The two-cent war tax represents a 40 per cent increase in the pre-war price and, in our opinion, no other Canadian product is saddled with such a heavy tax.

Our school boys and school girls drink the greater part of our soft drinks. Since they have but little money available for the purchase of a few delicacies, they are often compelled to envy their comrades who can afford those harmless drinks which they covet but are unable to buy owing to the two-cent increase.

I submit that these children should be granted by the Minister of Finance their request for the privilege of buying and consuming chocolate bars and soft drinks.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, another letter asking for the removal of the tax on soft drinks. It was sent to me by the Sacred Heart League in Rouyn. But the Minister of Finance takes no heed. Such representations are not coming only from Pontiac county but from everywhere in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Coca-Cola?

Mr. CAOUETTE: Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola as well. These requests are coming perhaps from your own children also.

Mr. MICHAUD: Milk is much better for them.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, some people are beginning to realize that prosperity in Canada depends upon the exportation of many of our products. We think that by exporting our goods we increase the wealth of the country. I asked a question last week on the production and export of automobiles in Canada. Canadians are anxious to buy cars in many cases for their business while shortages are being created in order to force those who secure those automobiles to pay four, five and even six hundred dollars extra on the black market.

During a ten-month period, from June, 1946, to March, 1947, Canada has exported 33,238 passenger automobiles while the Canadian people are clamouring for cars.

It is claimed that those countries where motor cars have been shipped are suffering from distress and dire poverty; why then send them automobiles to drive in? We should send them foodstuffs instead and keep our automobiles for our own people who need them.

Mr. GAGNON: That is right.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Then we would serve our own people before serving people from other countries.

Mr. GAGNON: Quite true.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. CAOUETTE: The commodities which find their way into the homes of our own people are a true yardstick of our prosperity.

His Holiness Pope Pius XI said in the Quadragesimo Anno encyclical that the economic system will serve its true purpose only when it provides everyone with a share of the goods which nature and industry can supply. That share should be sufficient to provide everyone with the means required for an honest livelihood.

When shall each and every citizen of this country be assured of at least a decent living? When Canadians are given the buying power that will guarantee them a decent livelihood, a decent competency.

That is why the budget speech of the Hon. Minister of Finance should have included a paragraph—I should have been delighted to find it there—granting each and every Canadian citizen a national dividend based on surplus production, in fact on their own buying power, out of salaries and profits.

If Canada is really and truly prosperous, why not grant this dividend to this country's shareholders, to everyone of its citizens? Companies do it for their own shareholders; why cannot Canada do it for its shareholders, those who hold a stake in Canadian society?

Mr. Speaker, we now hear about communism more than ever before. There is talk of legislation to outlaw communism. Already, in the province of Quebec, a law was enacted some ten years ago prohibiting communistic activities within the province. Representations have already been made, in Ottawa, to have the labour-progressive party banished from Canada. Possibly hundreds more will be made within six months or a year.

Mr. Speaker, it will be useless to enact anticommunist legislation, measures to abolish the labour-progressive party, or padlock laws. Never shall we be successful in checking communism through legislative means. There is but one easy and swift way of checking its spread and that is by guaranteeing every citizen of the country a decent competency, a minimum standard of living and the possibility of earning his keep and avoiding unemployment. If we ensure that our citizens enjoy these benefits there will never be any threat of communism in Canada.

To support what I have just said, I wish to read from a series of publications entitled "Construire" (To Build) an article by Rev. Father Dugre in number 10 of that series:

Doctors tell us that germs are present everywhere, that we swallow them wholesale, but that they are dangerous only in so far as they fall on favourable ground. So, Russian propaganda is ever present; but if the Canadian or Quebec social state is in such a healthy condition that the germs fall among a happy people, communism will ever strike inattentive ears.

"Thank you. We are doing all right. We can still do without a revolution."

Would that not be our best defence? We are offered the Russian style of happiness; let us oppose it to our own sort of happiness; let us organize a social life that will challenge all competition, develop for ourselves and the poor, those easy victims of communism, a beneficent and general prosperity that will leave no room for discontent and will relieve the plight of our families, of our young boys and girls and of the overflow of our population. Then we may feel secure. If, on the contrary, we should limit ourselves to appeals to patience, to hopes for eternal bliss in the midst of poverty, without consideration for a minimum of earthly happiness, we would be betraying the Church.

If there is a country where material well-being is possible, it is Canada. In the wealth which God has placed at our disposal, for us to develop, we must find a full rich life or else we are clumsily transgressing the will of our Creator. Yet he is not to blame. The guilty ones are those shortsighted statesmen, who would try to justify their inertia by such excuses as "strictest economy" or by contending that "unemployment is worldwide," as though the function of money were not to serve the people and as if our vast and young Canada were in the same condition as those overcrowded countries of the Old World.

Here is another very important paragraph, Mr. Speaker:

Let us leave unto Caesar the task that belongs to Caesar and ask him to consider our lowly citizens. He has the responsibility over those questions on which depends social happiness, bread and butter, houses for our people, the establishment of our youth, joyful employment and the movement of money. Caesar will have to exert himself. Some poisons act as remedies: the fear of communism will begin to inject wisdom into needed reforms. Let us not delude ourselves: our democracy is imperfect, often hypocritical and heartless. It overdoes "taking into serious consideration" warranted complaints, requests for readjustment, reform, assistance and land. It is too weak towards the powerful, too harsh on the little man. Hence, speculation, abuse pluralism, questionable contracts which give rise to bitterness, envy and desperate actions. None of this should happen in our young country with a potential prosperity from millions of sources hampered by filthy lucre or reserved for immigrants.

Mr. Speaker, my time is almost up, but I could carry on for another forty minutes; however, I shall await a further opportunity to continue the education of my hon. friends from the Little Chicago section.

Mr. LANGLOIS: Thank you, sir, you are very kind.

Mr. CAOUETTE: If for one moment after the bringing down of the budget I had been allowed to enact a bill or to replace the hon. minister of Finance, my first step would have been to deprive the banks of their power to create money, that is to say, the credit of the nation; I would have forbidden all those Canadian bankers to create money or credit in this country and I would have transferred that power to the government. If a single banker had then tried to create credit or money he would have been treated in the same way as any other individual who is guilty of counterfeiting five dollar bills or bills of any other denomination; I would immediately have asked the officials of the Department of Finance to distribute one hundred dollars to each Canadian citizen, for a period of six months, instead of straining themselves to find ways and means of taxing the people.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not enough.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): You should have given more.

An hon. MEMBER: The period is too short!

Mr. CAOUETTE: I would have immediately told the people, by means of the radio and the newspapers, you will not receive any more cheques for that amount before six months.

Some may say that a family of ten would get $1,000 and a family of twenty, $2,000. But there can never be more than thirty-six people in one family.

Distribution would be general for the benefit of every Canadian. People would be encouraged to work and to produce more. I would tell them that during the next six months no new money will be issued, that they will earn their wages as usual, without anybody being socialized, and that at the end of that period, if they have produced more, they will be given more. If they have produced much, they will receive much. If they cease producing and there be more money than products, money surpluses will have to be taxed where they lie. They will have to be taxed if there is too much money in circulation for the available goods. This would be in the interest of our people. In this way, employees and workers would be encouraged to work and to produce more. We have the example of the subsidies which were granted during the war to encourage production. When they were removed, prices went up. Consumers could not buy as much as before and producers had to produce less because of a curtailed demand. Therefore I suggest that subsidies should be continued while controls should be removed in this country. The Minister of Finance, as well as the hon. members opposite, claim that to distribute the sum of $100 to each Canadian citizen would be sheer folly. Parliament has the power and the duty to assume control of the issue of money and credit in the country and to distribute them fairly in order to help all our citizens and to provide them with the security and the freedom which would be theirs if purchasing power were based upon the tremendous possibilities of Canada. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends have voted themselves an additional $2,000 last year; did this increase in their indemnities make them any lazier than they were last year?

An hon. MEMBER: You have accepted it yourself.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Yes I did and I would accept an additional $2,000, but before doing so I would vote $2,000 for my constituents and for the citizens of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I am not easily offended but sometimes I cannot help it.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead, you are doing fine.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, is it impossible to carry out such a programme? The Liberal party frowns as much as I do upon communism.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Likewise the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CAOUETTE: And I think that the members of the C.C.F. party are not fond of it either.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We are not too sure about that.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Members of the Social Credit group are flatly and irrevocably against communism in all its forms.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, if we wish to ward off communism, it is time the members of this house united their efforts in fighting the rise of communism in this country. In order to do so, it is time we struck a balance of this country's assets and liabilities, we determined the profits earned by the work of organized society and distributed new money to all members of that society who shared in the economic and social activities which led to Canada's vast production, a society which represents the great physical producing power of our country.

Mr. Speaker, were everyone in this house to contribute toward giving the Canadian people that guarantee, toward giving Canada to the Canadians, toward using Canadian money and production to the advantage of the citizens of our country, I could warrant that communism would never win any ground here, because our people would be happy and fully satisfied, knowing that Canada would henceforth be theirs and realizing how grand it is to live in such a wealthy country as ours, in a country that needs no one from outside to dictate to it. Let us be worthy of our responsibilities. We are all responsible to the Canadian electors and not to a party. Our duty demands that we deprive the financial magnates of their power to control and that we place the assets of the country at the service of the Canadian people.

(Text):

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): After listening and catching the odd word, I am sure that some of us have regrets at not having a real knowledge of French so that we could understand the oratory and enthusiasm to which we have just listened. However, I still see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) delivering his budget. He stood up; he spoke up; he had something that he was extremely proud of, and then he sat down. If other hon. members did the same thing we would not have the urgent need for improvement in our acoustics.

I had some regrets when I heard the budget. I thought the luxury taxes would be eliminated. I had not understood thoroughly the reductions that had been made. Of course, to me jewellery and jewellery stores should not be taxed as luxuries because they sell things which are absolutely necessary to the home life of Canada. Take clocks and watches and wedding rings. Anybody would admit that the use of a wedding ring is necessary for the upbuilding of a good home. I congratulate the minister on the announcement which appears in the press today that $17,500 will be proposed in the supplementary estimates for the support of the Olympic games. I think it is in keeping with good Liberal policies, and it is telling the youth of Canada that they should keep fit physically and mentally. I am sure that when the Olympic games are on and our own flag rolls up high, when our lady from Ottawa, Miss Barbara Ann Scott, takes part, whether she wins or not, we shall be extremely proud of her.

This brings to mind one of the outstanding needs of the House of Commons—and it is not loud speakers that I am going to speak about. The outstanding need of the House of Commons is, first, a good gymnasium and, second, a good swimming pool. When we come here and the session opens we are in fit physical shape, but we have to do so much sitting around that we do not get our physical exercise or our setting up exercises unless we do them in our own rooms. I can see men putting on fat. Hon. members will agree that fat is a dead weight, and doctors will tell us that it is a tug on the heart; therefore we should have a good gymnasium. I hope that when Ottawa is beautified we shall have this institution to help to beautify the human body.

I should like to make some reference to the provinces. Perhaps somebody with more weight and intelligence could deal with this matter better than I, but I am going to deal with it in my own way. I look on Canada, the land of my adoption, as a big family. A properly regulated Christian family has authority somewhere. It should be in the father; sometimes it is in the mother, but it is usually in a combination of both, since they are one. The family of Canada should not have its authority in British Columbia; it should not have it in Quebec; it should not have it in Ontario; it should have it here in Ottawa. There should be an authority that Canada will be proud of. I do not think we would be very proud of our cabinet ministers if they went so far as to change the constitution of Canada to the detriment of our country. I hope that there will be no breakdown in that regard. I am thinking of the song that is sometimes sung here, "The more we are together, the happier we will be."

I should like to congratulate the minister in that he did not forget old age pensions. In that respect he supported what was contained in the speech from the throne. Some people outside the house thought there would be an increase in old age pensions. If the pension is increased to $30 I hope that every province in Canada will add as much as British Columbia has added to it, and therefore there will be a decent pension for our old age pensioners. As I said before, if the Liberal government is left long enough in power I expect that one day the old age pension will be $50 a month.

I should like to speak of the pensioners of the first great war. I have congratulated the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) behind his back on the work that he, his committee and the government have done in looking after the pensioners of the recent war, but I find that pensioners of the first war need some consideration. I have had delegations call on me, and I had sense enough not to promise more than I was sure of. I had one group of men tell me of a pensioner who was getting a 100 per cent pension, and this is what I found. He pays $33 a month rent; groceries, $30; coal, $10, and that does not heat the house very well; meat, $12; milk $9; bread, $2.50; light and telephone, $7.50, making a total of $104. All he gets is $100, and his rent is to be raised $5 a month because of the change in the rental regulations. The same amounts I have given do not include anything extra for medicine; they do not include anything for clothes for himself or his wife. They do not include anything for insurance or the odd bottle of ginger ale, and I think the Minister of Veterans Affairs will give more consideration to these pensioners. I have advocated before that employees on railways and elsewhere should have a national pension sponsored by a central authority in the dominion government. It should be contributory, because, as we know men who earn good salaries are inclined to spend their money as they receive it and they are nearly always broke the first week after they get their pay. But if a man is compelled to contribute to a pension fund he will have something in his old age. Alternatively, he should be compelled to put his money into annuities.

In Fort William there are two things that we would like the government to pay a little more attention to. Our hospitals are in straitened circumstances. When I think of our hospital and what it is doing for the dominion government, I suggest that we should have more consideration in connection with the building of the new McKellar hospital wing. I am informed by our hospital board that fifteen beds are necessary at all times for veterans and Indians. I will not say more about that just now, but I think some attention should be given to it.

When I spoke before in the house I mentioned an outstanding need in northwestern Ontario and west of Fort William, and that is that some consideration be given to the distress under which gold miners are trying to do their work. We have in the Shebandowan district a splendid place for operations in gold mining and we think some relief should be given. We have these resources that are perhaps second to none in all Canada.

Some reference was made this afternoon to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). A good deal was said, and then I thought of the farmers in my own district and the benefit they have derived from the experimental substation there. I can remember when I bought eggs at fifteen cents a dozen by the case, but farmers do not have to sell eggs at that figure today. They are better off and are better satisfied than they have ever been, and we hope that we shall not find it necessary to go back to the old way of doing things.

When I think of the reduction in taxation proposed in this budget, and how it affects me, I can see that it will give me a little more money to spend, and if there is anything I like to do it is to spend money that is my own, so that the more I get in the form of a reduction in taxes, the more I shall have to spend. I think, therefore, that what is given in the budget in this way comes in very handy.

I am sorry that the children cannot get their chocolate bars and soft drinks, but I am informed by a doctor of dentistry that this is not so bad because it is a splendid thing for children's teeth when they do not have so much sugar. I know from my experience as a boy that the more candy you eat, the oftener you have to go to the dentist.

When I think of the reduction in taxes I think of a donkey we had on the farm at one time. If you twisted his tail something was bound to happen and you would not be standing there when it did. But if you twisted the donkey's tail the donkey would be there just the same. You did not change the donkey. Well, you can find fault with this budget all you like, but the reduction it makes is a splendid thing and I congratulate the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the house would like to go into supply and, since it is almost six o'clock, with your permission I would ask that you call it six o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Jackman moves that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The object in calling the item is merely to get it before the committee and not for discussion. I would ask that it stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

130. Departmental administration, $183,173.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The purpose here is also to get the item before the committee.

Item stands.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask how many departments are now in?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think this will make eight. That is my recollection. I believe there were six in before tonight.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—SECOND REPORT—REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ITEMS TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Mr. S. M. CLARK (Essex South) presented the second report of the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved:

That items Nos. 434, 435 and 479 of the estimates for 1947-48, approved and reported upon on Thursday, May 8, 1947, by the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

APPLES AND HAY—GREY COUNTY, ONT.

Mr. CASE:

1. To whom was the concession awarded in connection with tenders for apples and hay in the A.F.V. range, St. Vincent township, Grey county?
2. What was the amount of the successful tender?
3. Was this the highest tender submitted?
4. What was the amount of the second highest tender and by whom was it submitted?
5. Is the concession let for a period of five years?
6. Has a surety bond been required to guarantee the proper care and maintenance of the orchards? If so, in what amount?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Mr. H. L. Isaacs, Thornbury, Ontario.
2. $3,800 a year.
3. Yes.

4. $3,500 a year. Mr. Richard F. Doran, Meaford, Ontario.

5. Yes.

6. No.

SUGAR BEET DISEASE—NEMATODE

Mr. MURPHY:

1. What areas in Canada are infected with the sugar beet disease known as nematode?

2. Are any areas infected with any other sugar beet disease? If so, where?

3. What efforts are being made to control or eliminate these diseases?

4. Is transport of sugar beets restricted in any of these areas? If so, where, and what transport restrictions or orders are in effect?

5. Have any representations been made with respect to control or elimination of this disease? If so, by whom?

6. Has any provincial government suggested a dominion and provincial proposal, contribution or action to control or eliminate this disease? If so, what provinces made such offer or proposal and what action has the government taken?

7. What are the main causes for spreading this disease, and what, if any, action by entomologists, engineers or other government agents has been taken or recommended to eliminate such causes?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. A single field at Glencoe, Middlesex county, Ontario, and twenty-three farms embraced in an area of approximately four square miles at Blackwell, Lambton county, Ontario.

2. Yes. Sugar beet diseases of at least occasional economic importance in Canada, together with the provinces in which they are known to occur, are listed below:

Cercospora leaf spot (C. beticola)—British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick.

Fusarium root rot of seedlings (F. culmorum)—Alberta.

Phoma leaf spot and black leg (Phoma Betae)—British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario.

Ramularia leaf spot (R. beticola)—British Columbia.

Rust (Uromyces Betae)—British Columbia.

Damping off (Rhizoctonia Solani)—Manitoba.

Black root of seedlings (various fungi)—Ontario.

Black heart (boron deficiency)—Ontario, Quebec.

Curly top (virus)—British Columbia.

Savoy (virus)—Ontario.

Mosaic (virus)—Ontario.

Rhizoctonia rot (Rhizoctonia Solani)—Ontario.

3. All the diseases listed are under observation or study and where of known value or use recommendations for their control are made known to the affected growers or industries:

Cercospora leaf spot, Fusarium root rot, Phoma leaf spot and damping off are only occasionally sufficiently prevalent to be of economic importance, but not sufficiently so to warrant recommending control measures.

Ramularia leaf spot and rust are occasionally severe enough to cause an appreciable decrease in crops of beet seeds in the Fraser river valley and on Vancouver island, B.C. These are under study at the Dominion Laboratory of Plant Pathology, Saanichton.

Black heart, which occurs occasionally, can be controlled by an application of borax to the soil.

Curly top and mosaic occur occasionally in seed fields, and can be controlled by roguing the infected plants in the seed fields and in the fields where stecklings are being grown.

Savoy is occasionally present in sugar beets destined for the sugar factory. Since infection has already taken place, nothing can be done to control the trouble; removing the infected plants only reduces the crop.

Black root of seedlings is prevalent wherever sugar beets are grown in south western Ontario. Several fungi are usually found associated with the trouble, and some adverse soil condition is no doubt partly responsible. It may cause as high as six per cent of the acreage sown to sugar beet in that part of Ontario to be abandoned—ploughed up and sown to something else. It is more prevalent in late sown than in early sown sugar beet fields. This trouble is being investigated by the Dominion Laboratory of Plant Pathology, Harrow.

Rhizoctonia rot of sugar beet may cause a loss of roots as high as 20 per cent in some fields in some years. Crop sanitation and crop rotation are the only practicable means of control.

4. Yes. The nematode in question, Heterodera schachtii, has been designated a plant disease within the meaning of the Plant Disease Act of the Province of Ontario, R.S.O. 1937, chapter 346 (as amended by 1941, chapter 42, and as amended by 1942, chapter 30). The regulations under this act are in force in the Blackwell area described as follows:

"The area in the township of Sarnia, in the county of Lambton, bounded on the north by lake Huron; on the east by the Brigden sideroad from lake Huron to the king's highway No. 7; on the south commencing at the Brigden sideroad by the king's highway No. 7 in a westerly direction to where the said highway curves south, thence continuing along the old road which continues westerly from the point the king's highway No. 7 curves south to the sideroad between lots 21 and 22; and on the west commencing at the said old road in a northerly direction to lake Huron along the sideroad between lots 21 and 22, and as continued northerly to lake Huron, is hereby designated as a 'precautionary area'."

The transport restrictions in this area, as covered by regulation under this act, are as follows:

"Sugar beets within the precautionary area shall not be transported, except by railway cars, outside of such area and sugar beets from outside such area shall not be transported into the precautionary area provided that sugar beets outside the precautionary area may, with the written approval of the provincial entomologist, be transported to the London Road shipping station.

"(a) Wagons and trucks used in the precautionary area in the handling and delivering of sugar beets shall have boxes with tight fitting bottoms and tight fitting sides and ends for four inches above the bottoms and shall be free from holes and cracks of sufficient size for dirt to sift through.

"(b) In the precautionary area sugar beets shall be forked from the boxes of the wagons and trucks and all the dirt remaining in the boxes shall in each case be weighed out with the wagons and trucks.

"In the precautionary area dirt shall be returned to the field from which the sugar beets are harvested.

"Earth from railway cars used in the transportation of sugar beets from the precautionary area shall be completely removed by washing at the sugar factory and all such earth and water shall be disposed of in a manner approved by the provincial entomologist."

Further orders in effect are:

"Sugar beets on any field which is found to be infested with the nematode, Heterodera schachtii (Sugar Beet Strain), shall be harvested as early as possible and shipped in as few railway cars as may be arranged.

"Beet seed shall not be grown within the precautionary area.

"If the owner or lessee of any property affected by the provisions of the act or of these regulations, fails to comply with the act or these regulations, or if the owner or lessee of such property is out of the province or his whereabouts are unknown to the inspector, the inspector, with the approval of the provincial entomologist, may make such arrangements as he deems necessary to have such control measures or treatments carried out and any expense incurred shall be payable by and recoverable from the owner or lessee of any such property in accordance with the provisions of the act."

[Mr. Murphy.]

5. Yes. By the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company.

6. No. There being no proposal no action could be taken.

7. The nematode is spread by flood water, transported in infested soil on the best crop or crop remains, by mud and soil adhering to footwear, the feet of farm animals and equipment. The restrictions stated above in reply to questions 3 and 4 are all designed to reduce to the practical minimum the spread of the nematode. The pest has been under study and investigation since 1931. For the last two years, in cooperation with the sugar company and chemical industry, the dominion Department of Agriculture has been actively studying the utility of soil fumigants as a control measure. These might, if an ideal fumigant could be found, conceivably eliminate the pest.

INDIANS—MOTHERS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Has any assistance in the form of mothers' allowance been paid to Indians on reserves in the province of Quebec by the government of that province?

2. Were instructions given to any officials of the Indian Affairs Branch to have this assistance discontinued? If so, what instructions?

3. What steps have been taken by any officials of the Indian Affairs Branch to have such payments discontinued?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. The Acting Inspector of Indian Agencies in verbal conversations with the responsible provincial officers drew their attention to the existence of duplication of relief services already provided by the Indian Affairs branch, as a result of such payments.

FEED GRAINS—COST TO NOVA SCOTIA FARMERS

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Has there been an increase in the price of No. 1 feed barley and No. 1 feed oats since 17th March, 1947, and, if so, how much?

2. Did the above-mentioned increases in the price of barley and oats increase the cost to Nova Scotia farmers of feeds involving these grains?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Oats:

New ceiling, 65 cents in store Fort William.

Previous ceiling, 51½ cents in store Fort William.

Or advance in ceiling of 13½ cents.

New subsidy, 10 cents.

Authorized advance in price 3½ cents per bushel.

Barley:

New ceiling, 93 cents in store Fort William.

Previous ceiling, 64¾ cents in store Fort William.

Or advance in ceiling of 28¼ cents.

New subsidy, 25 cents.

Authorized advance in price, 3¼ cents per bushel.

If all grades of oats and barley trade at ceiling as they are at present, the advance would be as above.

If oats trade at floor prices, there would be no advance in oat prices for No. 1 feed or lower grades, as the floor price is 61½ cents per bushel (10 cents above the old ceiling, and this is covered by subsidy).

If barley trades at floor prices, there would be an advance of ¼ cent a bushel for No. 1 feed or lower grades, as the floor price is 90 cents per bushel or 25¼ cents above the old ceiling (25 cents per bushel of which is covered by subsidy).

The floor price schedule is as follows:

No. 1 C.W. oats, 65 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 2 C.W. oats, 65 cents per bushel until further notice.

Extra No. 3 C.W. oats, 64 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 3 C.W. oats, 63 cents per bushel until further notice.

Extra No. 1 feed oats, 63 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 1 feed oats, 61½ cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

No. 2 feed oats, 61½ cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

No. 3 feed oats, 61½ cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

No. 1 C.W. 6 row barley, 93 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 2 C.W. 6 row barley, 93 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 1 C.W. 2 row barley, 93 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 2 C.W. 2 row barley, 93 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 2 C.W. yellow barley, 92 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 3 C.W. yellow barley, 91 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 3 C.W. 6 row barley, 91 cents per bushel until further notice.

No. 1 feed barley, 90 cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

No. 2 feed barley, 90 cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

No. 3 feed barley, 90 cents per bushel until July 31, 1948.

In the case of off-grades, and grades lower than No. 1 feed oats or No. 1 feed barley, the selling price will be the spot price or 61½ cents per bushel in the case of oats, and the spot price or 90 cents per bushel in the case of barley, whichever is the higher in either case.

2. Answered by No. 1. Increase, if any, would be in proportion to the oats and/or barley used in preparation of the feed.

BARBARA ANN SCOTT

QUESTION OF AMATEUR STATUS—MESSAGE TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE ON OLYMPIC COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr.

Homuth) asked me if I would interest myself in the cause of Barbara Ann Scott, and see that the young lady got all the protection possible. He asked me if the government would send some message to the Canadian representative on the international Olympic committee. Yesterday, after the meeting of the house, I sent the following message:

Ottawa, May 7, 1947

J. C. Patteson, Esq.,
Canadian Pacific Railways,
London, England

I was asked in the Commons today if the government would cable you as the Canadian representative on the international Olympic committee to see that Barbara Ann Scott's interests were protected in the present controversy. Government will appreciate your doing all possible to protect Barbara Ann's interests to the full. Please advise what reply you would wish me to make to the Commons on your behalf.

Mackenzie King

I received the following message this morning:

London, 1947, May 8

Mackenzie King,
Ottawa

Yours seventh. Am awaiting report from Canadian Olympic committee concerning Barbara Ann Scott which understand air mailed sixth. Upon receipt will immediately reply to President Edstrom at Stockholm who you can safely assume will consider facts impartially and dispassionately. You have my assurance do all possible protect her interests.

Meantime deprecate this excessive publicity which is certainly not helpful.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL FROM SERVICE OF CHIEF OF INFORMATION SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the press there was an intimation that the chief of the information service of the Department of External Affairs was contemplating leaving his position. Is the minister in a position to make an announcement with respect to the authenticity of that report?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot say what any member of the public service may be contemplating. All I can say is that there was no intimation of any such contemplation given to me.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean directly or indirectly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Neither directly nor indirectly.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

COAL

USE OF OIL-DRIVEN LOCOMOTIVES—EFFECT ON MARKET FOR NOVA SCOTIA COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Is his department replacing the coal and steam-operated locomotives in Prince Edward Island with oil-driven diesel engines, and also is it testing out large unit diesels between Montreal and Halifax? Let me point out that if that is so, this would destroy one of the best home markets we have for Nova Scotia coal.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not give me notice of his question. While I would be prepared to make a statement on it now, I do not think it would be wise to do this until I have ascertained all the facts. Then I shall be glad to give a reply.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JAQUES—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been called to an article on the front page of today's Montreal Gazette. The so-called interview was a statement which I gave to the Gazette yesterday over the telephone. Obviously most of the remarks, including the quotations attributed to me, are pure fabrications. What I said of Gerald Smith was that he had done more to expose communist plots than any other public man in the United States of America. And what I said I would do in Canada was that I would do my best to expose communist plots here.

It is true that I did address a meeting in Philadelphia last Thursday night. The meeting was sponsored by the American Gold Star Mothers—mothers who have lost a son or sons in the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has stated his question of privilege, and should be satisfied, without feeling that he is obliged to make a speech.

Mr. JAQUES: I have only one sentence to finish, Mr. Speaker. This was a meeting of mothers who had lost a son or sons in the war; and I am proud to say they gave me a most friendly reception.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the presentation of his first budget. It might be termed a tax-weary budget, and I predict it will not be his last one.

Before mentioning the various provisions presented to the house, I should like to correct an impression the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) may have made when he answered an interjection of mine in regard to why our young men were leaving for the United States. I suggested the C.C.F.; and the leader of the C.C.F. mentioned that there might be other reasons. To quote him precisely, he said this:

> The hon. member asks me about the C.C.F. We were not in power anywhere in Canada from 1930 to 1935 when emigration to the south and deportations to England were on a scale such as we had never had before in the whole period of our history.

That was a statement which, at that time, I was not able to refute. Since then, however, I have obtained figures

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is too much noise in the chamber. I must ask hon. gentlemen to moderate their voices, because it is most disagreeable for the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have, however, obtained figures for emigration to the United States from Canada for the five-year period ending 1930, and I find that it amounted to 299,000. And for the five-year period ending 1935 it amounted to 37,000, which is in strange contrast with the words of the hon. member, when he said that emigration was on a scale such as we had never had before in the whole period of our history.

As to the deportation of people from Great Britain, who had not acquired the five-year citizenship period in this country, I find that for the whole ten-year period 1932-42 they amounted to 9,501. I should also like to point out that the number of Canadians returning from the United States during the five-year period ending 1935 was 56,000, whereas the number of Canadians who emigrated to the United States was 37,000. Apparently many Canadians who were in the United States found that conditions in Canada under Right Hon. R. B. Bennett were much more favourable than were conditions in the United States. I trust that the leader of the C.C.F. will be more careful in statements he gives to the house. Up to the present I have always taken them at their full face value; now I realize I must scrutinize every word, and I am afraid I must advise the Canadian public to do likewise.

The Minister of Finance cautioned business not to increase their prices unduly. That was sound advice, and in this regard the minister was following in the footsteps of President Truman. What he said was that business men should reduce their prices as volume and efficiency of business expand. That is all to the good, and a course of action which sound business men willingly follow; for nothing attracts additional competition like high profits.

I should like to put on record the margin of profit on a dollar of sales of some of our representative companies for the year 1946. May I say to the C.C.F. that some businesses did not do so well in 1946 as they did in previous years. I think it will be apparent to the house that the margin of profit per dollar of sales is not as substantial a factor in the price level as is commonly believed, and perhaps the attempt to make business the whipping boy is not as well founded as our C.C.F. friends would like to make out.

The following is a list of companies selected because the figures were readily available, showing the percentage net profit per dollar of sales in 1946: Aluminium Limited, 10·95 per cent; British Columbia Packers, 2·16; Burns & Company Packers, ·035, or one-third of one cent; Dominion Dairies, 1·55 per cent; Dominion Stores, 1·29; International Nickel 22·30; Laura Secord candies, 7·91; Loblaw Groceterias, 2·28; Massey-Harris, 3·03; Silverwood Dairies, 1·80; Tamblyn's drug stores, 3·87; Zeller's Limited, 4·36 cents. It is obvious that even in a sellers' market the margin of earnings is a small factor in the price to the consumer.

In relating these percentages to one another two considerations must be borne in mind. One is the rapidity and volume of turnover, and the other is the relative proportion of capital to other factors. If at great capital cost an industry renders itself entirely automatic, as the hydro-electric industry virtually has, almost the sole cost is the servicing of the capital; hence the earnings per dollar of sales must be greater than in many other industries. This explains why all heavy industries with great plant expenditures must have a relatively high return per dollar of sales. Another factor is that some companies do a single operation and make a profit, while others handle the article from the raw material stage to the consumer's home, and there is only one profit, despite the many handlings.

Earnings generally were good last year due to abnormal volume making up the slack of the war years and the filling of inventory pipe lines and the virtual absence of selling costs. The value which the public is putting on the price of shares would indicate that much harder sledding is ahead.

May I now say a word or two in regard to the figures which the Minister of Finance brought down in his budget. Last year this country contributed to the coffers of the federal treasury almost $3,000 million. The expenditures were $2,632 million, leaving an apparent surplus of $352 million. We may indeed rub our eyes when we see such colossal figures, for it does not seem many years ago when our normal budget of revenue and expenditures ran around $500 million, and the C.N.R. deficits of $50 million were considered by many to be leading the country into bankruptcy. That does seem a long way away from the present. Canada is, however, but the sum total of its people, and no one's individual finances have mounted in anything like the scale in which the dominion government's finances have gone up. Since governments create nothing, the people are therefore entitled to get some idea in regard to taxation and the spending of the huge sums of money which today the government takes from the people.

The government is without question the biggest business in the country, and yet we find in the cabinet thirteen lawyers and two business men. That may be why we have a political rather than a business budget.

Mr. McILRAITH: A good budget and a good cabinet.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A people's budget.

Mr. JACKMAN: We have already heard about the alleged surplus of $352 million arising from the fact that the sales of war assets amounted to $372 million, an extraordinary item. The bonds which were sold to buy these assets are still outstanding and remain unpaid. They are held by the banks, insurance companies and by the people generally, and yet the money which was received from the sales of these goods was not used to retire any of the debt. Indeed I wonder what the government would have done had they received from the sales of war assets not $372 million but let us say $1,000 million or $2,000 million. Surely their consciences would have pricked them then, but the principle remains the same in any situation.

Mr. ABBOTT: We would have reduced the debt by that amount.

Mr. JACKMAN: Last year there was also the failure to set up an adequate reserve against the large amounts lent to Great Britain and to various European countries for the purpose of rehabilitating them and purchasing goods in Canada. Altogether about $1,700 million in loans were granted, and yet this government set up a reserve of $25 million. It is very much like a good man lending a group of friends, who had been sick or who were recovering from operations about $1,000, hoping that when they recovered they might be able to get on their feet and repay him, but in the meantime he set up a reserve of $15 against the possibility that one or more of them would not be able to repay in full. If the government had acted as a business man would naturally act in such circumstances, and set up a reserve of about 20 per cent, the total surplus of $350 million would have been used for that purpose. It serves no useful purpose to fool ourselves about these loans. We hope that they will come back one hundred per cent, but it is only common ordinary prudence to allow for some reserve, and that reserve should be allowed for when the proceeds of these loans are being spent in Canada to swell our whole economy on which our tax rates are based, and on which the coffers of our treasury becomes swollen. This is the time when the reserve should be set up, and not at some other time.

We are not so much interested in the criticism of the government's presentation of its accounts for last year as we are in how it proposes to run the business of the country for the coming year. The estimates last year exceeded expenditures by $137 million. Not only the government but perhaps we of the opposition are also subject to criticism for allowing estimates to go through beyond the spending possibility of the government, and that spending possibility has never been underestimated. Perhaps it might be well if we adopted more of the method carried on in the United States, where appropriations come before the house in a more general over-all way than they do under our system. Certainly when the estimates come down it is very difficult to get items substantially reduced, and the government therefore must take the responsibility for the vast expenditures which it has saddled upon the people of the country. This year the estimated expenditures on ordinary account are up $12 million at $1,304 million, or $108 per head of population. Then we have in addition demobilization and reconversion expenditures of $56 per capita, equal to $164 in all, on both ordinary and special account.

I am quite sure that many people in my riding would rather be content with half the services which the government is providing and have $82 per head returned to them for their own use. Little do they realize that these vast sums of money are being extracted from them, because so much of it is taken silently through indirect taxation. If they could have the money themselves they could spent it in their own way, which they would much prefer to do rather than have the government dictate to them exactly what they shall have and what they shall not have.

I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that the only way we can get our taxation down, the only way in which we can get the economy of this country on a sound basis, is not by attacking all the individual items which come before us in the large blue book of estimates; we must decide how much we can spend, just as any ordinary person or ordinary business would do. Here it has always been the custom to spend all we like on everything we need. Of course, we can afford it because we have twelve million people! But we never seem to think how we shall raise the money or what sacrifices will be entailed on the part of our people when we are considering the spending of money.

We should first of all estimate what we can safely take from the people of Canada in the form of taxation and keep our economy in full production, and then decide how much, and whether all of it would be usefully spent. But as it is, we have gone on spending for years and years various amounts, and the day of reckoning must come when ways and means must be found for the raising of this money. Only last night all hon. members received in their mail an envelope containing a number of blue sheets from the civil service commission advertising for new staff.

I have nothing against any one of these items, which I shall put on the record, but if we do not consider whether we can afford things before we go and spend our money or do our hiring we shall never get the expenditures of the country down and taxes down to a rate where we shall be able to restore incentive to our people. I do not suppose there is a member in this chamber who could not use the services of some other person. I could use the services of a research worker, as many others no doubt could in their business; we can all use additional staff now and then. If it were merely a question of writing out a ticket and getting additional staff by that simple operation we would have considerable expenses to cope with and there would be nothing left. The cost of services would go up. But this government decides that something may be useful and therefore we must have it.

This is the list of the applications which are called for in the public service. This is in one day's mail. For the experimental farm there are four assistants with salaries from $2,100 to $3,600. Then, also in the Department of Agriculture, there are eight soil specialists, male, with salaries from $2,100 to $3,300. There is an inspector of concentrated milk plants, Department of Agriculture, salary $2,700 to $3,000. In the Department of Mines and Resources they are calling for no less than thirteen associate geologists ranging from $3,000 to $3,900. Then there is a publicity editor and writer for the Department of Fisheries, Ottawa, $3,600 to $3,900. Then we have for the Department of External Affairs, foreign service, officers required, grades 1 and 2, a total of from 25 to 30 with salaries ranging from $2,700 to $3,900.

I do not doubt for a moment but that all these positions are required or that the persons to be employed would be useful. But this is building up a tremendous overhead for the country to carry, and I do not think we have any proper control. If this goes on we shall get ourselves into the position where the people—those that are left who are not already on the public payroll—will find that they have a crushing burden which they can no longer support, and we shall find ourselves in a first-class depression.

It is only through increased production that we can raise the standard of living. The present budget should be looked at from that point of view and from that point of view alone. Is it a production budget or is it just a political budget? This budget, in the words of the minister, proposes to concentrate the reduction almost entirely in the field of personal income tax. What the minister did was good, but it did not go far enough. He has at last discovered that the people are tax weary, that the present scale, to use his own words again, would constitute a serious impediment to the full working effort and a brake upon the drive and initiative of men and women in all groups and classes—and I would underline "all groups and classes."

However else the minister might have liked to distribute his reductions, political and economic necessity required that he should first give attention to the lowering of the personal income tax. This necessity made the budget a comparatively simple one as far as what it did was concerned. Its sins of omission are more important. For those whose modest incomes do not bring them into the taxable brackets, the failure of the government to reduce indirect taxes on a long list of items such as clocks, watches, radios, phonographs, toilet articles, leather goods, telephone and telegraph tolls, silver-plated tableware, candy, soft drinks, to say nothing of the heavy special taxes on amusements, motor cars, tires and the 25 cent tax on a 33 cent packet of cigarettes, the budget brought no relief. These taxes bear most heavily on those who can least afford to pay them. The removal of rent controls and the cancellation of wartime tariff suspensions also increase the cost of living.

Of far greater importance to the low-income group was the withdrawal of subsidies with no compensating benefit. Last year those subsidies which made things seem cheaper than they really were—goods sold below cost—amounted to $208 million, or $17 per head, for every man, woman and child, and when you take the small family budget in the lower income groups, you can realize how much that difference will mean to them.

Mr. KNOWLES: How much did they save as a result of that?

Mr. JACKMAN: The lower income groups?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: As a result of the removal of subsidies?

Mr. KNOWLES: Because of the $208 million, how much was saved to the consumers of Canada?

Mr. JACKMAN: What I am suggesting is that $208 million was used to subsidize various articles and these subsidies are fast disappearing and the people will have to pay that much more. Perhaps the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) realizes that butter went up ten cents a pound the next day, and cheese four cents. In my riding, may I say to him, many families will be doubly grateful that this parliament passed unanimously the Family Allowances Act.

What the Progressive Conservative party has advocated for some time would now afford some relief to that great class of taxpayers whose incomes are in the low taxable brackets, and will be hard hit by the increased cost of living due to the government's action. We have advocated the raising of the minimum exemptions from $750 to $1,000 for single persons and from $1,500 to $2,000 for married persons. The government claims that if the exemptions were increased it would be unfair to those who pay no taxes. What then, may I ask, was the case last year when the very slight increase in the exemptions exempted half a million small taxpayers from paying any tax at all? The government cannot have it both ways. What the government should do is follow a production expansionist policy, and give the workers every encouragement to earn more by producing more. In any event it is not desirable to tax incomes below the $1,000 and $2,000 limits, which I consider "socially necessary exemptions". Our government should not become an agency for lowering the standard of living of the Canadian people.

Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that experience does not bear out the popularly held opinion, which at one time I shared, that some tax on everyone makes all the people tax conscious and therefore government-spending conscious. The theory seemed good, but the result has been quite to the contrary. The parliamentarian, much less the workingman, can scarcely grasp the billion dollar figures in which we now deal, and the only result of taxation in the brackets below the "socially necessary exemptions", as well as higher rates of taxation above those brackets, has been to demand higher take-home pay. That is the only pay that counts. High taxation—and last year it began at 22 per cent above the minimum exemption of $1,500—was a fruitful cause of labour unrest. Such taxation does not have the educative effect it was believed to have, and results in permanently raising the cost of production.

Apart from the refusal to raise the exemptions, the schedule of reductions is not well designed to raise the standard of living, which can be done only through greater production. The minister used honeyed words when he said:

> Nine out of ten taxpayers will find their taxes reduced by 29 per cent or more from existing rates.

That is good politics, because nine out of ten votes are more than sufficient to ensure anyone's election. Perhaps the government forgot to count the very great number who are not taxpayers or who pay very little tax, and to whom the increased cost of living, due to the budget, is worse than a positive increase in taxation. The minister then went on to say:

> The reduction as compared with present rates is as much as 54 per cent in the bottom bracket, but is limited to about 6 per cent or 7 per cent in the top brackets.

Of course everyone knows that taxation must consider ability to pay—that is, the higher the income the higher the rate—but everyone in all economic classes is faced with greatly increased living costs. The severe impediment to a full working effort, and the brake upon the drive and initiative of men and women in all groups and classes which the minister mentioned, applies to all classes. Extraordinary rates of taxation were cheerfully borne during the war years as a relative small sacrifice; but if the minister had been as much interested in production as in votes, he would have realized that the same carrot which he admitted had to be dangled before the humblest workingman to remove "the serious impediment" or to take "the brake" off, must also be dangled before the biggest business or professional man.

One of the advantages of being a politician is that one has friends in all walks of life; and I have yet to find that people are really very different when it comes to the important things of life. Generally speaking they are moved by the same desires; and two common desires are economic security and advancement, even though they may be on different levels. If the minister felt it was necessary to provide a carrot with 54 per cent nutrition for one class, we might have thought the same reasoning would have led him to follow a similar course, and certainly a course which was better than to have provided a carrot with only 6 per cent nutrition, for those in the upper brackets. The government is budgeting for a surplus next year of $190,000,000, so that there might easily have been a little more nutrition all round and, may I say, a little more production.

A businessman would be just as much interested, if not a little more so, in encouraging those whose work in a competitive market had entitled them to higher pay. Because on them he is relying for his most difficult type of work, and they are the hardest to replace; but not so the Liberal government. Since there are not very many in the higher pay class, their votes are not really important.

Mr. ABBOTT: Those rates affect the individuals with an income of $250,000. There are not very many of them.

Mr. JACKMAN: No, and there are not very many above $10,000 a year.

Mr. ABBOTT: They get about twenty per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the government did what was right, it might be misunderstood politically. A glance at the rapid increase in tax rates, not in the $250,000 bracket with which the Minister of Finance seems to be so familiar—

Mr. ABBOTT: Just by hearsay.

Mr. JACKMAN: —but in that bracket after $1,500, we find that on the next $100 the tax is 10 per cent; on the second $100 it is 12 per cent, and it goes up to 18 per cent on the fifth $100 after $1,500. The rate still goes up on a scale which no one could possibly climb, because the degree of ascent is much too great. That shows how quickly the government starts to discourage the worker nowadays. If one looks at the report of the Canadian National Railways and divides the total wage bill by the number of employees, he will find that $2,000 is considerably below the average salary. A married man pays a tax at the rate of 20 per cent on anything over $2,000. Quickly it climbs until at $17,000 it becomes 50 per cent and then climbs up to 80 per cent until it reaches the class with which the Minister of Finance is so familiar.

Then there is the surtax on investment income, which may be substantial. My own opinion is that while there must be some scale, it ascends too rapidly and too high to restore the incentives and to take off the brakes the minister mentioned. Unless some people are human and some are mechanical, I am quite sure that he is wrong.

It is also interesting to look at the comparison of our new rates with those proposed in the United States. Up to $2,750 income the new rates in Canada will actually be lower than they are in the United States. But after $2,750 it will be more expensive to earn your living in Canada than to go across the line. I should have thought that the minister and the government would have been just as much interested in keeping on this side of the line those bright young people, some of our best technically trained young men and women, who are leaving Canada to go to the United States; yet he fixes a limit of $2,750. Let me tell him here and now that that is not the objective which these young people have in mind when they leave our country and go across the border. One wonders why the Minister of Finance, inasmuch as he is an old gunner of the first war, does not raise his sights and aim at the target instead of at no man's land; because that is what he is doing here.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a striking figure of speech; it is pretty good.

Mr. JACKMAN: When the minister draws up this scale with the dividing line of $2,750, he is doing something which accomplishes absolutely nothing; because a man earning less than $2,750 is very likely to be a workingman, and let him try to go across the border. It will be found that he comes under the contract labour classification and is not allowed across the border. But if you take a young man in the white collar class, a university man or other technically trained person, he will have no difficulty in crossing the border. So the minister's proposal accomplishes nothing. He is aiming at a class which cannot get across the border, and he gives no satisfaction to those who can.

Income tax in Canada in pre-war days was sufficiently moderate not to prove a brake on incentive. The rate of increase during the war was astounding; and in addition to pointing out the need for revenue the government used to argue that because of the increased prosperity and the shortage of civilian goods some of the money or purchasing power had to be drawn off in taxation in order to prevent competitive bidding for goods in short supply. The house will recall that even compulsory savings were resorted to in order to accomplish this end. Many goods no longer are in short supply and it is expected that many producers soon will be looking for buyers. If we are to keep full employment, as much purchasing power as possible should be restored to our people.

One of the greatest disappointments of the whole budget was that it contained no reference at all to the income of married women and the effect that the earning power has on the taxes of the husband. As it stands today a wife may earn only $250; once she earns more than that amount the husband's marital exemption of $750 is reduced dollar for dollar with the wife's income. The result is that if the wife earns $750 or over she is not only taxed by the government but the husband loses his entire marital exemption of $750. So, looking at it from the standpoint of the family income, the wife who works is subjected to an enormous tax, and this has a very bad effect on our whole working economy. The result is that incentive is gone. What the country needs today in order to meet its problems is more production; but solely as the result of government planning—and I hope my C.C.F. friends will take a look at government planning here—we find married women workers in our light industries, our textile trades, dress goods factories, domestic help, office help, nurses, and so on, stopping work just as soon as they have earned $250. Yesterday in this very building one of my friends told me his experience was not only that they stopped work; they came to work one day and did not feel like working the next day, when they wanted to go shopping or to do something else. So they just left and did not turn up until it pleased them, and did not care very much because they could only work so many days in the year, and if they did not work in his factory there were plenty of other factories looking for work people. So this halter on incentive, if you like, this check on production leads to great difficulties in running our factories, particularly in the light trades. Many of these married women do not have to work; they have available time, and are prepared to work only if there is enough incentive. The previous Minister of Finance said he thought it would be unfair to give the husband his marital exemption in any case, but has the government ever looked into the situation? The fact that a married woman works means that additional family expenses are incurred; there are more meals outside the home, perhaps someone to do the housework, and less economy in the running of the household. And this whole matter is not one which concerns any real reduction in revenue, because it might easily be shown that there would be a positive increase in revenue if this very foolish taxation of married couples where both are working was removed. So it is simply a matter of government policy, which is foolish in the extreme.

Before leaving the personal income tax brackets might I remind the house that in all the remarks of the Minister of Finance it was implied that such reductions as he brought down were due to the insistent demand of the people, not to government leadership. Further reductions are necessary; but if these incentive reductions must come through popular clamour I fail to see how we are ever going to get a production budget which is so necessary for the welfare of our people, for without business leadership and the ability to assume risk our economy will stagnate and all our people will suffer. At page 2554 of Hansard we find the minister saying:

> It is the high marginal rate of tax on additional earnings that discourages additional work, enterprise and initiative, and consequently we must aim in our reductions at cutting down these marginal rates of tax.

Unless some Canadians are human and some are mechanical it is absurd to argue that a man in the 22 per cent bracket, which was the starting bracket after $1,500, needed a reduction to restore his incentive and to take the brake off production, and at the same time to say that the man in the 50 per cent bracket does not need the same treatment. This budget gives one man a 59 per cent reduction and the other a reduction of about 18 per cent.

Those who provide business leadership, those who are willing to risk their savings and their capital, are vital to the expansion of our industry and to full employment. Present tax rates prevent saving for investment; they require annual inroads on capital to maintain the standard of living to which their work has entitled them, and result in refusal to undertake the risk of new business because the government shares only the profit and not the loss. They find government bonds, which are as nearly riskless as anything can be, better investments. We need the best brains—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JACKMAN: —the best management, the best leadership, the best workmen in all fields that we can provide and encourage. I say to some of those who seem to be amused that I certainly do not find the best brains over there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I just say, then, that a good engineer does not oil part of his machine only. The government creates nothing; let us be sure that it does not destroy!

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, several of those who have preceded me have complimented the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on this remarkable budget, so I do not think it necessary to add to those complimentary remarks at this time. Rather I should like to express my regret that the financial critic of the official opposition was not feeling at his best in his effort to criticize the budget. I say that in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, because I believe the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) can do a great deal better than he did the other evening.

Mr. MERRITT: That is very generous of you.

Mr. JACKMAN: He did extraordinarily well, we thought.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How is the weather in Halifax?

Mr. ISNOR: Someone suggested that I was about to make a political speech in connection with the Halifax by-election, and may I say in all frankness that I hope it will help. If I could make a speech equal to the budget speech there would be no question of the by-election in Halifax.

Mr. FRASER: There evidently is a question about it.

Mr. ISNOR: No, not very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not if you go down there.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to touch upon one or two points raised by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman). He referred to the criticism of immigration by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I do not intend to go into the figures, because it is not necessary; a simple explanation is all that is needed. The same conditions existed in the United States from 1930 to 1935 as unfortunately we had to put up with under the Bennett regime. It is only natural that young Canadians who were in the United States were unable to pay their board and therefore returned home where they would not have expenses to meet. I think to a large extent that is the answer, and it requires no elaboration.

The hon. member referred also to the large revenues we were taking from the people of Canada. The fact that the people of Canada are able to pay that, and pay it cheerfully, indicates the great prosperity we have. I do not think anyone minds paying a fairly good price for an article provided he has the money, but if you have not the money, no matter how cheap a thing is it is still dear. That is an old business maxim that is fairly well recognized. I think we are in a very fortunate position in Canada to be able to carry on in such a cheerful manner.

The hon. member referred to war assets having been taken into consideration in arriving at the surplus. It is true that there was a return of $362 million from the disposal of war assets, but the hon. member must remember that those goods were paid for and charged up in our regular budgets of previous years. You cannot show it in one place and not in another. It was debited to the country in the regular way and naturally when these things are sold the receipts are put into revenues.

Mr. COCKERAM: This was borrowed money, and they were paid for out of taxes.

Mr. ISNOR: You cannot repudiate a statement made by a former minister of finance that we were both taxing and borrowing to pay for our war effort. It is safe to say that the great bulk of the war assets were paid for out of taxes obtained from the people of this country, so why should not the $362 million go into our revenues?

Mr. ROWE: That is a new way of financing.

Mr. ISNOR: Does the hon. member know of any better way after we have disposed of the goods than to use the revenue for carrying on our operations? Perhaps at some future time he will enlighten me.

Mr. ROWE: I certainly know a better way, but I do not want to take up your time.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Tell it to the country.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member referred to this budget as being not a business budget but a political budget. I do not know what he meant by that. It may be because of my lack of experience in the political arena, or because I cannot follow political manœuvres as well as the hon. member for Rosedale, but I say to him that it does not matter where he goes, he will find people praising the Minister of Finance for one of the finest budgets that has ever been brought down.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Very few.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am sure it is not the way the hon. member runs his business.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Even in Toronto.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Rosedale says that that is not the way I run my business. I run my business in the same economical manner as the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: And you are equally successful.

Mr. ISNOR: I have the same objective in mind—not to have a deficit, as happened so often when hon. friends on the other side were in power, but rather to work for a surplus, and a handsome one.

Mr. ROWE: You did not sell part of your building to get a surplus, did you?

Mr. JACKMAN: You did not charge the cost of your inventory into your sales?

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to remind hon. members that on second reading of a bill they do not have the right to speak twice.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for trying to prevent these interruptions. However, I do not mind them because this afternoon we have had it fairly dull up to now. When nine out of ten people you meet are smiling, you know that there is good reason. That reason is to be found in the words used by the Minister of Finance when he said that nine out of every ten are going to enjoy income tax reductions of from 29 to 54 per cent. This budget has been particularly pleasing to a large class of people with which the hon. member for Rosedale has not been in particularly close touch, those in the lower brackets who are going to enjoy a 54 per cent reduction.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How much does that 54 per cent work out to in dollars?

Mr. ISNOR: I will tell you in just a minute. To a large number of taxpayers the proposed rates of income tax will bring the Canadian personal income tax below the proposed United States tax. It is true, as the hon. member for Rosedale has said, that there will be a slight difference for those in the higher brackets, but as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) so rightly said, that is the way it should be. I am for those in that particular income bracket—and perhaps that also will be classed as a political statement. All right; if it is, the fact is that we are looking after the greatest number of our population who are wage earners. Those are the people I am particularly interested in. I know that the hon. member for Rosedale and the people of his particular circle are well able to look after themselves, but I think the government is to be complimented upon taking particular pains to see that the reductions apply particularly to these other people.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the hon. member tell me whether I am right or wrong when I say that during the depression years when the Liberal government were in power there were 10,000 people on relief in Rosedale riding?

Mr. ISNOR: If there were 10,000 people on relief in Rosedale riding it certainly would surprise me. If that is so, then there was something lacking somewhere in Ontario which I did not know about.

Mr. JACKMAN: It was under a Liberal government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What about your provincial government?

Mr. ISNOR: I can only say that when one is dealing with a budget which applies to all parts of Canada you cannot take one little section of a riding, even though it is considered important by the representative; you must take the over-all picture. At the end of March, 1947, we had the greatest number of usefully and gainfully employed we ever had in the history of Canada. and this is due largely to the policies of the present Liberal government.

Mr. BROOKS: What about Nova Scotia today?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, what about Nova Scotia?

Mr. ISNOR: I will answer for Nova Scotia in a moment, but I suggest to the hon. member for Royal that he stick to New Brunswick and let his deskmate ask questions about Nova Scotia.

Mr. FRASER: Don't worry; he can look after himself.

Mr. ISNOR: I cannot help thinking back to the evening when the Minister of Finance presented this budget. I sat here looking at the faces of my friends opposite in the Progressive Conservative party. I saw the expressions of wonderment on their faces.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He always was a good performer, with little to work with.

Mr. ISNOR: Then I looked beyond, to their left, down to the C.C.F. group. Their faces led me to think that they must be asking themselves: "Could this really happen? Could a budget such as this be brought down, particularly when we have heard so much about blue ruin, depression and the like?" Then I looked into the galleries and I saw there the happy expressions which joined with the Liberals in saying, "Well, that is a wonderful budget."

Mr. GILLIS: What were you drinking that night?

Mr. ISNOR: In a broadcast I made recently I said I wanted to be fair to the social crediters; they semed to be just as happy as hon. members sitting on the government side of the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They do not realize what 54 per cent means.

Mr. ISNOR: I remember the generous applause which greeted the Minister of Finance when he rose to speak, and the loud acclaim which was given his opening optimism when he declared, in ringing tones, that the huge and difficult budgets of war years were behind, and that we were all very, very happy to realize that fact. I noted the loud acclaim which met his declaration that Canada is today enjoying matchless prosperity.

May I pause here to pay tribute to a great Nova Scotian, the former minister of finance. I think it is because of his policies, and the policies of the government, that the present Minister of Finance was able to present to the house and the country such a splendid budget.

Mr. BROOKS: There must have been some reason.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a good one.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not detracting at all from the Minister of Finance—and, indeed, he is sincere enough to agree with me on that.

Mr. ABBOTT: And the minister did say it.

Mr. ISNOR: In fact I think he is one of the most brilliant men we have ever had in the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Which one?

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROOKS: What about that fellow who shouts "hear, hear" all the time; what about him?

Mr. ISNOR: I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance say that the government was in accord with the general principles of free enterprise, and stated that it was a sensible way of getting things done. I do not wish to discuss this whole question of free enterprise this afternoon, because it might not properly link up with a discussion of the budget—this fine budget which is so acceptable to the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Rosedale referred to increasing supplies. With increasing supplies of materials, with efficiency and cooperation of labour, with greater production and with ample salaries, Canadian business enterprise is in a most favourable position. Last weekend it was my privilege to visit the busy city of Hamilton, and I was pleased with the manner in which they carry on business in that city. Members from all the groups in the house were present, and they, with me, remarked about the efficiency of one plant in particular that we visited, where we saw the complete production from start to finish of a Canadian product. This was not just an assembly plant, but rather a plant doing a complete job. What did the president of that organization say? He said, "We are expanding, and we hope to build another unit"—and he told us the size of it—"which will employ an additional 600, as soon as we can get the materials to build and to go ahead with our plant." There was no blue ruin there, no fear of expanding production so far as that plant was concerned.

The same applies to a great many of our industrial plants. They are not afraid to go ahead because of the excess profits tax, they are expanding as quickly as it is possible for them to do so. This is a good sign for Canada.

Mr. LOCKHART: The hon. member missed the best part of the area down there; he went right by it.

Mr. ISNOR: Oh, no; we saw your part of the country, but like some other sections of Canada you are a little backward so far as the weather is concerned.

Yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said there was no relief for business and earlier in the debate the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario could not find anything in the budget that would be good for business. Let me refer to a large class which this budget will affect in a satisfactory manner. I would refer hon. members to the year book for 1945, which shows that in 1941 we had engaged in the wholesale business in Canada 24,758 employers. They, in turn, employed 94,627 males and 22,844 females. In addition there are 13,656 proprietors actively engaged in wholesale lines. I shall add the figures together later on, to show the effectiveness of it.

In the retail business there were 137,331 retail stores employing 297,047 full-time employees. That is subdivided into 188,658 males and 108,389 females. In addition there were 95,561 part-time employees. Added to these were 131,823 proprietor workers engaged in their own stores. These are figures which are worth thinking about. These are the people who are going to enjoy the benefits of the budget in a marked fashion.

In personal services, such as barber shops, beauty shops and the like, there were 14,259. Again referring to the city of Halifax—and possibly I shall be criticized for mentioning this, because of the approaching by-election—we have 915 retail stores, each employing in proportion the same number of employees as are employed elsewhere in Canada. In the town of Dartmouth we have 147 stores. All these will benefit. There is a total of 669,817 taxpayers who will derive direct benefit from the budget.

As at May 1, 1947, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics shows that there were 17,425 reporting employers, who reported 1,853,195 employees. This figure is exceeded only by those of 1943 and 1944. Just think of that—1,853,195 gainfully employed in Canada at the present time. The average weekly earnings of workers in these firms reporting stood at $35.88 as compared with $32.44 a year ago. A weekly salary of $35.88 for fifty-two weeks of the year would give a total of $1,850.16 per individual. Of this group of 1,853,195 who averaged $1,850 a year, if single they paid a tax last year of $257. Under the new taxation rates they will pay $180, which means a saving of $77 for each individual, or roughly speaking a saving of 30 per cent of their tax. The married man who was paying $68 will pay $36 under the new rates, which will give him an additional spending power of $32 or 47 per cent. If you take the number that I have given and multiply it by the $77 saving I have mentioned, you will find that the total saving to this class alone amounts to $142,696,015. That is a remarkable saving, and yet my hon. friends of the opposition rise in their places and say that it does not mean a thing to the average taxpayer.

Mr. ROWE: It does not, if you take the increased cost of living into account.

Mr. ISNOR: If you put "ifs" in you can build up any kind of structure. I shall answer by saying if this had not taken place they would have felt the increased cost of living much more.

But speaking of the increased cost of living, I should like to refer my hon. friends to the increases following the first great war as compared with the present situation. I say that is once again a tribute to the present government. They took action which was not taken after the close of the first great war. Because of the control exercised and the foresight of this government our buyers are placed in a splendid position. It is true that the cost of living is high but, to use the word used by my hon. friend, if these controls had not been exercised it would be a great deal higher than it is today.

Mr. GRANT: That will keep them quiet.

Mr. FRASER: It will not keep us quiet because you cannot buy the stuff today. The index is based on the things you cannot get.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister from Kings!

Mr. GRANT: Louder.

Mr. ISNOR: Knowing that I am a business man I am sure that some of my hon. friends on the other side are wondering what I shall have to say about the excess profits tax.

Mr. ROWE: And the sales tax.

Mr. ISNOR: That is about the only thing I have heard any real criticism of over there. They have asked why we did not do away with the excess profits tax to allow expansion of industry in Ontario and Quebec. Even though this may be a little hard for the big men in Ontario and Quebec to take I shall say right here that for the rest of Canada, for the maritimes from which the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) come, and elsewhere in Canada with the possible exception of Ontario, it is good news, because they do not want the excess profits tax to be thrown back into the laps of these big men, particularly at the present time when they are still operating to some extent under wartime prosperity. I do not hesitate to say I believe that if we had not put the excess profits tax into effect during the war we would have created a large number of millionaires in Canada, which would not have helped the situation.

Mr. COCKERAM: Business did not object to it during the war.

Mr. ISNOR: What has happened to these men? It is true that they had a standard profit fixed for them on the 1936-39 basis. They were given pretty generous treatment, but they were obliged to pay the excess amount over their normal business, and rightly so. I say that as a business man. Why? Because I believe that owing to the excess profits tax they were able to set up a reserve which it is doubtful that any except a very few would have done. They have that 20 per cent refund coming to them, which is a good nest-egg.

Mr. ROWE: What is the situation if they had a small profit in those years?

Mr. ISNOR: In which years?

Mr. ROWE: In the years of standard profit.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member intimated a moment ago that perhaps he was better versed in business matters than I am. Surely he must know that these men had an opportunity to overcome that difficulty. If they had a depressed business during the period, they were permitted to appear before a board of referees and have a standard profit set. It could have been properly adjusted. In fact during the past two or three months auditors and chartered accountants throughout the country have been kept exceptionally busy because they felt that the excess profits tax would be wiped out and they would not have the opportunity in the future of presenting their case.

Mr. COCKERAM: Some of them are not adjusted yet.

Mr. ISNOR: Some of which?

Mr. COCKERAM: Some of the standard rates.

Mr. ISNOR: There may be the odd one, but the great majority are adjusted. They have cleaned up practically all of them. I would say they have done an exceptionally good job so far as the adjusting of profits standards are concerned.

Mr. McIVOR: Were any millionaires made in this war?

Mr. ISNOR: None of my friends were in that class; therefore I cannot answer.

Mr. COCKERAM: You did very well.

Mr. ISNOR: I was fairly successful; I worked hard. I did not kick about the excess profits tax.

Mr. COCKERAM: You are saying other people did, which is not correct.

Mr. ISNOR: I used it to good advantage, to continue people in employment, to do my little bit toward helping the country.

Since I have paid so many compliments to the Minister of Finance perhaps I may be permitted to be a little critical at the moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Good.

Mr. ISNOR: That is the beauty of being an independent member like myself; I can be critical even of my own government.

Mr. BROOKS: It must be pretty bad when you criticize it.

Mr. ISNOR: I am going to mention the luxury taxes, because I feel there is discrimination against certain people. There are not many retailers in the House of Commons; therefore I am justified in bringing this to the attention of the minister. No doubt he had to decide this year—he does not take me into his confidence—what would be best for the country as a whole. In his judgment he decided that he should allow certain taxes to remain and to give, as he did, certain taxpayers reductions ranging from 29 per cent to 54 per cent. I should like to point out to him that the sales tax is spread over every commodity and over practically every type of sale. In addition he penalizes jewellers, furriers, the leather people and other trades. It is because of that discrimination that I draw his attention to the luxury tax, and I suggest to him that it should be looked into. Perhaps it is too late to do anything this year, but it should be looked into for the future in order to bring all on the same level.

I hold in my hand a brief which no doubt has been received by all hon. members. It comes from the Canadian Retail Federation. I have not had an opportunity of studying the particular sections referred to, but I do know the story well enough to refer to such items as the hon. member for Rosedale has already mentioned. A fountain pen is a very necessary thing in these days, and yet the Minister of Finance says that to use a fountain pen you must pay a 25 per cent additional tax. Clocks—some of us cannot get up in the morning without a clock—have a luxury tax placed on them. Trunks, billfolds, shopping bags, are taxable; oil paintings, oriental rugs, and many other items incidental to living in the way enjoyed by the hon. member for Rosedale, are not taxed. That is why I say there is discrimination.

Mr. COCKERAM: There is discrimination.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister is in the same high category.

Mr. ISNOR: My hearing is pretty good, but I cannot hear a whisper. I quote from the brief of the federation.

> It has been suggested that the moment is inopportune to repeal the excise tax upon the items to which we have referred, because to do so would involve pressure from other groups who would demand similar treatment. If this argumen is valid, it would appear to us that it would be applicable to any budget period—which gives rise to the fear that these so-called special wartime taxes are now to become part of our permanent economy.

I think the Minister of Finance will agree that these were purely wartime measures put on to prevent spending and an increase in the moneys that came into the hands of individuals. I quite agree that during war time that was justified.

Mr. McCANN: Revenue was needed too.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Cut out some of the extravagance.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not think that revenue was the really important point. Some of these items did not run into very many million dollars. I would point out to the Minister of National Revenue, and I do so in a kindly spirit, that there is a question whether it is wise from another angle. The great majority of our merchants in Canada keep proper records, but there are those, and there are such people in all classes, who evade this type of tax, and it is this type of tax that leads to evasion, rather than the regular sales tax, collected as it is in a fair manner. I hope the minister will bear that in mind.

Mr. McCANN: We know that, and we have caught up with a lot of them.

Mr. ISNOR: I thought I would mention this as a duty to those who have presented the matter to me from time to time.

I was struck by an article I saw recently in the Financial Post. I generally look to the Financial Post to see what it has to say, since it leans to a great extent to the views of those whom some would call our Tory friends, but whom I prefer to describe as Conservatives. The Financial Post says that the Tories ask first to raise old age pensions, then eliminate the radio licence fees, then increase agricultural floor prices—that, I believe, came from the leader of the opposition—then raise income tax exemptions, as the member for Rosedale suggested, and treat veterans more generously, just to mention a few of their suggestions; and in the same breath they ask that taxes be reduced.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Cut out the extravagance.

Mr. ISNOR: I would ask the hon. gentleman to look over the estimates and then point definitely to any extravagance so far as this government is concerned.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have done it on more occasions than one.

Mr. ISNOR: I have referred to the statement of the Minister of Finance that the object of the budget was to encourage free enterprise. I do not know whether that is the best term these days. I prefer "progressive" enterprise. I looked up the word "enterprise" in the Oxford dictionary and I find this meaning given:

> Enterprise: Undertaking, bold or difficult one, courage, readiness to engage.
> The method of the enterprising is to plan with audacity and execute with vigour; to sketch out a map of possibilities and then to treat them as probabilities.

That is what the Minister of Finance is doing in his budget—looking to the future, and giving the average taxpayer an opportunity to increase his spending power, thus keeping up employment and production, in which my Conservative friends are so greatly interested. I suggest that they should be supporting the budget to the limit instead of engaging in petty criticism.

May I say a word to those representing labour?—and I believe that in a measure I represent labour. I believe the real interest of labour lies with an independent economy rather than with socialism, which again and again has destroyed labour's opportunity. Organized labour has a greater stake in the private enterprise system than either management or capital; for that system is the union's chief hope of survival, and I say that without fear of contradiction by any of those who pose as leaders and supporters of the labour group.

I wish to throw out another constructive thought. I have nothing whatever to say about the social measures being brought out by this government. The country as a whole owes them a debt of gratitude for the manner in which they have enlarged social services, and with the additional social measures coming into operation I would hesitate to be the least bit critical, but I believe that we can invest in undertakings that would be productive and self-liquidating. We could invest to a greater extent in that direction than we are now doing. I believe the country would do well to follow the advice that has been given, not from one source but from different quarters in this regard. The member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) brought up the question of irrigation as it applies to his particular section of the country, and other members from the west have also discussed the question. If it can be shown that such projects are self-liquidating, then I think the government would be well advised to undertake them. With that thought in mind I would ask the government to give serious consideration to greater investment in projects that might be undertaken in connection with breakwaters and wharves for the benefit of the fishermen along the Atlantic. I could elaborate on that, but I think that one sentence covers the subject as well as it could be dealt with if I spent half an hour trying to make a stronger case.

I throw out these suggestions to the Minister of Finance, but I am not unmindful of the representations that have been made in the past and during recent years in regard to the marshlands of Nova Scotia. There is a wonderful opportunity to do some useful work that would add to the wealth of our province. If these projects are undertaken—fisheries and the marshlands—we can look forward to a greater degree of prosperity in the maritimes.

I am in accord with what has been said—and I do not hesitate to give him credit for having raised the question—by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with reference to the Canso project. The question has also been raised from time to time by others. Last year the member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry) made a very strong appeal to the government in the matter. I am happy to associate myself with these gentlemen and other members who have brought this question to the attention of the government. I also associate myself with the member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) who last night discussed subjects relating to Nova Scotia.

Mr. FRASER: The member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) has been bringing up the question of the marshes for the last six years.

Mr. ISNOR: I said there were others. The hon. member would not allow me to forget the member for Cumberland—

Mr. FRASER: You would not forget him.

Mr. ISNOR: —and I am happy to link his name with the others. I might even go beyond that and look back to the period from 1940 to 1945 when the then member for Colchester-Hants, Mr. Purdy, made such a strong plea. At that time the member for Cumberland joined Mr. Purdy in his representations.

Mr. BROOKS: What has been done about it?

Mr. ISNOR: It has been getting careful attention, and I am very hopeful.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Due consideration.

Mr. ISNOR: I am surprised at the hon. member for Royal laughing it off.

Mr. BROOKS: I was not laughing it off. I was laughing at your ancient history and nothing being done; that is all.

Mr. ISNOR: I for one am anxious to see these three projects undertaken, along with others.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He has unanimous consent; give him a new start.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house, the hon. member may continue.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you, sir. I was just going to make one more point in connection with the transfer of labour from the maritimes. It is unfortunate that such a thing has to take place. All members from Nova Scotia regret it. The hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield) will appreciate what has taken place so far as his own town is concerned. There is an article in to-day's Truro paper headed, "Shortage of materials affecting Truro's textile mills." It goes on to say that this company from Ontario, the Monarch Knitting Company, are now in the maritimes looking for women workers to be transferred to Ontario for employment. Truro is an aggressive and enterprising town. We are very fortunate to have here in the House of Commons a man of the type of the hon. member for Colchester-Hants. His firm has done a great deal for Nova Scotia and for Truro. I should hate to have the continued employment which he has given to the town of Truro affected by the transfer of workers or by people from Ontario being permitted to come in and take from him and from other manufacturers any of their skilled help. The manufacturers in Truro have done a wonderful job, not only for Truro but also for Nova Scotia and the whole of Canada. As an hon. member said to me one day about Stanfield's underwear, "It is right there on your breast, no doubt." The great majority of members are no doubt wearing it. Stanfield's underwear is sold from one end of Canada to the other. I suggest to the Minister of Labour and those on the government benches that they do not permit the transfer of labour from Nova Scotia but that instead they encourage to the greatest extent possible the purchase of products made in Nova Scotia and in the maritimes generally in order to increase employment in that part of the country.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, with at least two of the observations made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Isnor) I am in hearty accord. The first is that we should encourage all over Canada the establishment of self-liquidating projects and enterprises. The second is that the industry of this country should be decentralized. I wish to join with the hon. member in a protest against the way in which the industries of Nova Scotia and the maritimes have been undermined, weakened, destroyed and brought to the central provinces in times past. I wish to support him in the contention that these industries should be restored to the maritimes; and if it requires government assistance to accomplish that objective, I should be in favour of government assistance even though it does require expenditure.

This afternoon I had intended to speak about the matter of taxation and debt, but certain things which have occurred in the house have made me feel that it was my duty to leave those two topics for discussion at a later time and to turn my attention, and that of such members of the house as will follow me, to the problem of our beet sugar industry in this dominion.

At the present time we are in danger of losing 50,000,000 pounds of sugar production in 1947. I have brought that fact to the attention of the house two or three times already by means of questions. Let me once more draw the matter to the attention of the house and the country; it is not one which should be treated lightly. Last year, Canada and Dominion Sugar Company had 26,681 acres of beets signed up by contract. Of that number. 23,375 acres were harvested. They produced 70,000,000 pounds of beet sugar. Evidence for this can be found in Wellington Jeffers' article in the Globe and Mail of January 18, 1947.

Only yesterday, on May 7, hon. members heard the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) announce that up to noon May 5, this sugar company has had signed up only 26,089 acres. It is quite obvious that the sugar company has not the chance this year to produce the amount of sugar that it had last, even if it has the exceptional weather conditions which favoured its efforts then.

The farmers are not signing up because they fear a shortage of labour. In 1946, 575 acres of beets were lost because there was not sufficient labour to care for them. Hon. members heard the announcement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) yesterday, but his announcement was like most of the announcements which have come from the government during the last few months with regard to the sugar industry—it was full of fallacies, misrepresentations and illusions.

For the information which I am going to give to the house this afternoon, I shall draw largely on a pamphlet entitled, "When can Ontario's Beet Sugar Production be Restored?" published by Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited, Chatham, Ont., in January, 1947. Hon. members will therefore know that the figures which I use are pretty likely to be dependable.

It might not be generally known that Mr. S. R. Noble, sugar controller during the war, on January 27, 1947, told the joint delegation of the Canadian Sugar Beet Growers' Association and the Beet Sugar Processors of Canada that he was apprehensive of a more critical situation in Canada's sugar supply for the end of 1947 and the first half of 1948 than anything which has yet existed. Evidence for this will be found in a document entitled, "Notes on the dominion subsidy on domestic beet sugar production." I do not know how many hon. members have access to this document, but anyone interested may read the one in my possession. The document is signed by Mr. H. Sulkers, secretary of the Canadian Beet Producers' Association and other men prominent in the beet sugar business. Their signatures make the document authentic. In the light of the fact that Mr. Noble told these gentlemen that solemn truth, I must say that I find myself completely at a loss to understand the indifferent attitude which the government is taking in the matter of signing up the remainder of these beet contracts for this year. There is plenty of labour in the country if the beet sugar industry can get it, and there is plenty of land available.

On May 7, as recorded at page 2845 of Hansard, the Minister of Labour made this remark:

I am not aware of any serious difficulties that occurred in 1946 because of competition between tobacco growers and those engaged in the raising of sugar beets. I am advised that the labour supply was adequate for both those branches of our agricultural economy.

It is quite evident that the minister had not gone into the problem far enough, or he would not have made a statement like that. May I tell hon. members some of the things that occurred last year, according to the information in my possession. Last year the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company sent out scouts to enlist labour for the beet fields. These scouts visited the counties of Norfolk and Simcoe and the Niagara peninsula, and had a considerable measure of success. At the Petrolia camp the company established a hostel to make it easier for those working in the beet fields to find accommodation, in order to encourage them to remain there. One day there were thirty beet workers, a cook and a helper at that hostel. The next day only the cook and helper were left; all the men had been lured away by the tobacco growers. How had they done this? They had offered the men higher wages than the beet raisers could afford, considering the relatively meagre income they were to receive from their beets. I am told the tobacco growers offered the men $125 a month, and in addition said they would give them work inside during the stormy weather. These attractions were simply beyond the power of the beet growers to meet, and as a result the men left. All a farmer has to do, if he is contemplating signing a beet contract or refusing to sign one, is to keep in mind one or two bitter experiences like that. All that is necessary is to see a part of that 575 acres of beets going to ruin because of lack of labour, to warn him off any possibility of signing a beet contract. There are, at best, so many risks involved in beet growing that he cannot afford to take an additional chance like that.

Mr. MAYHEW: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would put on record the last part of the statement I made in the house, starting with the words "Beet sugar production in Canada." Otherwise I think he will leave the impression that there has not been an increase in the production of beet sugar in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thank the hon. gentleman. I was just going to do that, and by the time I get through I think he will prefer that I had not done so, because once more the statement is based on too little information. The minister meant well, but he did not have the whole picture. May I read from the statement of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) as recorded at page 2845 of Hansard for yesterday:

> Beet sugar production in Canada in 1946 was 30 per cent greater than the average for 1935-39. This is a greater increase than that of any other beet sugar producing country. Given at least average climatic conditions it is expected that production in Canada in 1947 will exceed that of 1946. In the light of these facts there can be no adverse reflection upon Canada's contribution to the world sugar position.

I now point out to the minister something which, in his busy life, he has probably not had an opportunity to investigate. What we are discussing at the present time is the production in Ontario, not the over-all production throughout Canada. It is quite true that in Alberta, where conditions in regard to the obtaining of labour were much more favourable, production was increased. There the competition of hoed crops, cash crops, with the beet sugar industry was not so intense as in Ontario, as I shall point out in the course of my remarks. In the Ontario scene, however, the picture is very disheartening indeed, as I think the minister will recognize in the light of the figures I shall put on Hansard in a moment. What we are discussing, let me repeat is the Ontario production, for it was in Ontario last year that 50,000,000 pounds of sugar which could have been produced were not produced, because not enough beets were available to supply both the Wallaceburg and Chatham factories, the consequence being that the Wallaceburg factory was left idle. The minister will also be interested to consider that there was a great deal of adverse comment in high places in the United States because of the fact that last year Canada produced so small a percentage of her sugar needs as compared with what she disposal. If Canada does no better this year could have produced with the capacity at her in comparison with what she could do, then I am afraid that adverse criticism in the United States will be much louder and more dangerous, and will be heard much higher up.

May I now give some figures to show the minister how serious has been the deterioration in the beet sugar industry in Ontario during the war years, since the administrator took over. Perhaps I ought to stop here and say that I do not wish to reflect too much on certain hon. gentlemen; but in considering the beet sugar situation since Mr. Noble took over as administrator I have had the impression that he has been deliberately designing the destruction of the beet sugar industry in Canada, and I cannot escape the conviction that he has been deliberately seeking to destroy the beet sugar industry in Ontario. I do not propose to bring before the house at the present time evidence to substantiate that allegation, but before this session is over I shall do so and give the administrator and all his friends opportunity to present a defence, if they feel disposed to do so and if they can. With respect to Ontario's production since the administrator took over, I now quote figures given on page 4 of the pamphlet to which I referred previously, "When can Ontario's beet sugar production be restored?" These are the figures showing Ontario's production of beets, in long tons:

Year	Long tons
1939	39,706
1940	43,747
1941	37,974

Now we begin to see the policies of the administrator taking effect:

Year	Long tons
1942	26,355
1943	8,329
1944	17,629
1945	19,560
1946	31,250

Hon. members will notice that whereas in 1939 this province produced 39,706 tons, in 1946 the production was only 31,250 tons. This shows pretty clearly that something serious has happened to the Ontario beet industry. So much for that.

Now, I think hon. members will be quite astonished when they hear of the devices which have been used to weaken, to choke out, to smother, to strangle the Ontario beet sugar industry. First, there were price ceilings. The price ceiling on sugar has been maintained so low in comparison with ceilings on other crops such as tomatoes, tobacco, beans and corn, that the beet sugar industry has been placed at a serious disadvantage. The price ceiling on beet sugar was brought in at a relatively early period, and has been rather consistently maintained. I am not objecting to the establishment of price ceilings. It was well that the Canadian people should have been able to buy their sugar at a low rate, but the difference should have been made up by the government to the sugar factories or the sugar companies by way of a subsidy, which would have enabled them to carry on and expand without causing the people to suffer. This is an extremely important matter. Another device used was subsidies given to competing crops such as corn, peas, beans, tomatoes and perhaps tobacco, although I doubt there was a subsidy on tobacco. Subsidies were given to these other crops which put them in an advantageous position in competition with the beet sugar industry as regards available labour. This has had a serious effect, being one of the factors which brought about the closing of the Wallaceburg plant during several of the war years.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Another thing has been done about which the ordinary man on the street or even the ordinary member of parliament knows nothing. The beet sugar companies customarily have sold their sugar on the basis of delivered-to-the-trade. They usually have sold their beet sugar in the winter time when rates of transportation on the lakes were higher than in the summer. But the price was fixed on the basis of the lower summer rates. That bled a little more out of the beet sugar industry of Ontario. Not very much blood needs to drip away from a person's body in any given minute to constitute a fearful drain provided that it continues long enough. This drain has been going on constantly during the war years and I am told it is still going on. Hon. members will find this discussed on page 5 of the pamphlet to which I referred.

Prices are the really vital factors which affect the stability of any factory and certainly prices have seriously affected the stability of the beet sugar factories. I should like to quote some figures to show hon. members what has been happening with respect to prices and how it has affected the sugar beet industry in Ontario. First, I should like to read a passage from the bottom of page 6 of the pamphlet from which I am drawing my information. It follows:

> But price was a factor, the only really vital factor, as is shown by comparison with tomatoes and tobacco, both of which increased in acreage as prices increased, despite the fact that the labour requirements of these crops are fully equal to sugar beets.

In that statement a sad story is conveyed. Before giving the acreage figures for sugar beets, tobacco and tomatoes in southwestern Ontario since 1939, I should like to point out that tobacco and tomatoes are the major competitors which have tended to choke out the Ontario beet sugar industry. I feel that these figures may not be very interesting to hon. members, so I shall read them off rapidly and they can get them out of Hansard. The figures for acreage are as follows:

	Sugar beets acres	Tobacco acres	Tomatoes acres
1939	35,850	77,900	21,970
1940	38,010	53,450	22,730
1941	30,100	57,450	24,065
1942	20,700	67,830	22,915
1943	9,200	63,340	20,941
1944	14,500	79,359	29,400
1945	17,660	83,140	26,684

Those figures are significant; they will show hon. members why it is the beet sugar industry in Ontario requires a special kind of help at the present time.

The following figures show the subsidies and other assistance in dollars per ton which have been given to various crops by the federal government since 1942:

	Sugar beets Per ton	Tomatoes Per ton	Sweet Corn Per ton	Peas Per ton	Green Beans Per ton
1942	$2.08	$1.00	$2.00	$7.50	$5.00
1943	3.33	3.00	4.00	10.00	7.50
1944	3.33	6.00	4.00	10.00	7.50
1945	3.33	6.00	4.00	10.00	7.50
1946	4.85	(Subsidy replaced by equivalent increase in ceiling price)

Hon. members can see what has been happening to the beet sugar industry. It has just been gradually choked out. The note to these figures reads:

Dominion government assistance as applied to sugar beets of 16 per cent sugar content. All of these subsidies were paid to growers except the equivalent of 63 cents per ton of beets which went to the processor.

I think that is probably sufficient on that aspect of the question.

I turn now to page 8 of the pamphlet to which I have been referring, where details of the average returns per acre on three important field crops of high labour requirements are given for two recent years:

	1944	1945
Tomatoes	$155.80	$100.80
Burley tobacco	299.00	262.50
Sugar beets	112.53	108.50

Almost anyone will wonder why in the world, in the case of a commodity so important to the Canadian people as sugar, there should have been allowed to continue such a wide disparity in prices. If it was not by design, then how did it happen?

Mr. JOHNSTON: It could have been stupidity.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might have been stupidity and we will allow for that.

Next, I should like to give a comparison of prices per ton on various crops as between 1941 and 1945:

	1941 Per ton	1945 Per ton
Burley tobacco	$290.00	$520.00
Tomatoes	14.10	20.35
Corn, canning	10.75	14.00
Peas	45.00	55.30
Green beans	47.00	77.50
Sugar beets	7.64	10.36

Those figures must impress all hon. members. Supporters of the government in the house, and in radio programmes over the air, have been endeavouring to impress upon the people that the reason the beet sugar industry was not doing so well was that it was not able to compete successfully. How can an industry compete when its hands are tied; and not only when its hands are tied, but when its feet are tied—"hog-tied", as we say in the west.

I turn now to the labour costs aspect of the question. With net returns on sugar beets up thirty-six per cent, labour costs have grown as follows: in 1941, $18 per acre, and in 1945, $33 per acre, or almost double. That is an increase of $15, or eighty-three per cent. The rise in labour cost per acre is greater by over thirty per cent than the rise in net return to the farmer, even including the Ontario provincial subsidy.

I turn to the question of losses through various other kinds of manipulation, which have been exercised to the detriment of the beet sugar industry. I refer to page 9. Two by-products of the beet sugar industry which are of considerable importance are beet pulp and beet molasses. The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company sells dried beet pulp I am told; most of the other companies sell the beet pulp wet. Dry beet pulp, and molasses from beets, constitute two lucrative by-products which greatly add to the general profitability of the beet sugar industry.

Let us see what managers in Canada have done in respect of these two important items. About two-thirds of the dried beet pulp from Ontario in pre-war years was sold in the United States. As from 1941, the Ontario company was directed by the Ottawa feeds controller to sell the product for feed in Canada. In January, 1947, the difference between prices in the United States and those in Canada was as follows: The Canadian ceiling price f.o.b. plant is $26.40 a ton, while the United States price, f.o.b. Michigan plant, just across the border, is $49.40 a ton, or almost twice as much; and the differential against the Canadian producer is $23 a ton.

A similar situation prevails with respect to beet molasses. The Canadian ceiling price f.o.b. plants is $28.75 a ton, and the United States price f.o.b. Michigan plants is $38 a ton, or a differential against the Canadian producer of $9.25.

All that is to be remembered is that the amount of money which the company was able to derive from some of these by-products entered into the amount it paid the farmers for the production of their beets. So that when the company was restricted in its income from the sale of these two by-products it was necessarily restricted in the amount of money it could pay the farmer for producing beets; consequently the farmer was automatically restricted in the amount he could pay for labour.

In 1941 the total Ontario production of beet molasses was 15,628 tons, of which 10,475 tons, or sixty-seven per cent, was shipped to the United States. A similar percentage of beet pulp was shipped to that country. However, of the 1946 output a relatively small percentage was allowed to be exported to the United States.

Under ceiling prices, pulp is relatively cheaper than other cattle feeds, so that the demand has grown in Canada under price control. The demand for beet molasses has also grown in Canada. It is used in the manufacture of yeast, citric acid, and many other products.

Hon. gentlemen will ask if I would advocate that the price should have been allowed to rise, or if I would have favoured keeping prices down for Canadian stock feeders. Well, obviously I would agree that the cattle producer or stock producer in Canada should have been able to get feed cheaply. But that is no reason why the producer of beet pulp should have been penalized. There should have been, I say again, a substantial subsidy which would have made up to the Canadian producer that which he lost because his product was under a ceiling price; but no such subsidy was forthcoming. The dictator who presided as administrator over Canadian sugar concerns just would not listen as regards any of these matters. The result has been that an important Canadian industry has suffered.

I believe that is sufficient on that aspect of the matter. Meanwhile, while all these other adverse developments have been in progress, processing costs have been rising rapidly. At page 10 of the pamphlet to which I referred we find a list of increases in processing costs. These increases are shown as follows:

Labour (base rate per hour)	40 cents	70 cents
Coal (per ton)	$6.29	$7.70
Miscellaneous supplies (per unit)	21·5 cents	48·9 cents
Bags (sugar) (each)...	14·2 cents	23·5 cents
Bags (pulp) (each)	17 cents	31·5 cents

Notwithstanding all the considerations I have mentioned, we have people like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who will rise in their places and try to convey to the house and the country that this industry would require altogether too much by way of subsidies and too much tariff protection in order to survive. How can one describe such an attitude? One cannot possibly characterize it properly without violating the rules in respect of parliamentary good taste.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

There is another aspect which, while not so important, has had its serious effect, since the closing of the Wallaceburg plant. Obviously farmers who produce beets are located throughout the areas in which the Wallaceburg and Chatham plants are situated. When one of those plants is closed, then farmers must transport their produce some considerable distance in order to deliver it to the other plant. The sugar factory had to absorb this cost. I am told that the farmer was paid on the delivered-to-the-factory basis. This is found in the pamphlet to which I referred. Thus the company has had to absorb this loss. Then, too, the company has had to finance subsidies from delivery of beets to the factory to the time of payment for the sugar. In order that hon. members may understand this situation, let me point out that certain subsidies were being paid on the beets, and the factory generally paid those subsidies about the time the beets were delivered. Then, until the sugar was sold the factory could not get reimbursement from the government for the amount it had paid out. The result was that the factory became a sort of banker for the government during six or eight months of the year. Just think of that, for an outrage!

Yet, would the sugar administrator listen? Would the Minister of Finance listen? Would the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board listen? No, not they. They would not listen to this or to any other of these problems, or provide any sort of remedial measure. No wonder the province of Ontario had to step in, with its own provincial subsidies, to save the sugar industry in that province from complete destruction.

The beet sugar industry throughout the war came to the dominion government time after time with well-reasoned briefs—moderate, scientific and factual—and asked certain considerations. Never once have the beet sugar people been given what they have asked for. This year of 1947 was no exception. On January 27, and dates following, the combined beet producers and beet processors of Canada met government officials—first the sugar administrator, and then others—and presented their case. Mr. Sulkers, secretary of the Canadian Beet Growers' Association, asked that an additional subsidy of $1.08 be allowed beyond the 60¾ cents given in 1946, because, said Mr. Sulkers, "the administrator is going to pay eight-five cents a ton more for his raw canes from abroad than he was paying in 1946. If he is to give us parity he must increase the price which we are to receive, and this is what we compute to be the increase which he ought to give us". Would the sugar administrator listen to that? Not he. Would the Minister of Finance listen? Not he.

The beet people asked for certain subsidiary advantages not difficult to give. They asked that the controls be lifted on dried beet pulp and on molasses or the raising of the ceiling price. (Here I would point out, there could have been a subsidy to make up for what they wished.) It was refused. Molasses was decontrolled shortly after, but I do not know that it was because these people asked for it; it may have been.

In addition, they asked that an allotment of three pounds of sugar per ton of beets delivered be given to the man who delivered the beets, up to 200 pounds or up to 100 pounds. The idea behind this suggestion was that a man farming would be encouraged to produce three or four acres of beets to a farm in order to be able to get the additional sugar. It is an obvious device. It would not have cost the government anything. The man, before he got his additional three pounds per ton of sugar, would have produced a ton of beets, and about 300 lbs. of sugar. Would these wiseacres we had in authority in Canada agree with that request? Not at all; that would have been to intelligent for them. They would rather leave the sugar unproduced, which they are doing.

The beet men asked that the factories be not required to finance the subsidies between the delivery of the beets and the sale of the sugar, but that was denied. May I read to the house a statement from the document to which I referred a short time ago, prepared by the beet people and signed by Mr. Sulkers. I read from the bottom of page 2 as follows:

> It was represented with all the vigour at the command of the various spokesmen that maximum domestic beet sugar production would not be achieved in 1947 unless the sugar administrator set his sights considerably higher by way of subsidy.

There is no excuse for the sugar administrator; there is no excuse for the Minister of Finance; there is no excuse for the government. The whole situation was made abundantly clear to them.

Let me now point out two or three other aspects of this question which are serious. In the main, Canada's sugar supply comes from the international sugar pool. Yesterday the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., pointed out that we got our sugar supply from the international pool. That is granted, but practically the dominating factor in the sugar pool is the United States of America. According to information which I have, the United States government bought the whole of the Cuban 1947 crop, which is the important element, the deciding factor in the whole situation. They bought the whole of the crop for 1947. The United States therefore controls it. Let the United States once get the idea that Canada simply does not intend to play her part, that she does not mean to play ball, what would be the obvious decision and conclusion of the United States? I say that, as matters stand, our whole sugar situation in the year 1947-48 is in jeopardy.

There is another aspect of this question which should have a little attention before I close. Much has been said against beet sugar because it requires tariff protection. The argument is advanced all over the country that the industry should not be allowed to survive because it needs tariff protection. Let us look at the tariff protection which some other agricultural products have. Take barley. One would hardly think barley required protection in Canada. Barley has a twenty-five cents a bushel protection under the general tariff and 22½ under the intermediate tariff. Beef has four cents a pound protection under the British preferential tariff, eight cents a pound under the general tariff and six cents a pound under the intermediate tariff. Butter has eight cents a pound protection under the British preference and fourteen cents a pound under the general tariff, twelve cents under the intermediate tariff. I could go on and give a list that comprises practically every commodity which Canada produces on her farms. Look at the protection we have to give to our butter. No one can manufacture and sell oleomargarine in Canada because it comes into competition with butter!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wish to encroach on the time of the house. I will simply close by urging that without further delay the government go to work on this problem and devise means whereby the men who would sign up to raise sugar beets for the Dominion Sugar Company shall be guaranteed their labour, and whatever other encouragement they require.

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): The budget is a subject of great concern to the people of Canada, most of whom were disappointed in it, because some of the taxes that were on might have been taken off, and because some so-called nuisance taxes, as they are known, were not abolished. I am thinking particularly of the heavy taxes on soft drinks and chocolate bars which are largely purchased by the youth of our land. It would seem, now that the war is over, that these taxes might be discontinued. The radio licence should also be abolished. The tax of twenty-five per cent on silverware which was put on during the war, was imposed, if the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is reported correctly, with the idea of discouraging production. This tax has served its purpose, which was to discourage the use of critical materials needed for war purposes. Surely there is no need to continue this argument now that the war has been over for two years. Many veterans and young couples are attempting to establish their homes. Knives and forks are a necessity which should not be subject to a luxury tax of twenty-five per cent.

The special excise tax discriminates between one type of retail sale and another and, in effect, is discriminatory. For example, a refrigerator is taxable; an icebox is not. An electric range is taxable; a coal range is not. Clocks, watches, shopping bags, et cetera, are taxable, while oil paintings, oriental rugs and many other items incidental to luxury living are not taxable. It has been suggested that the moment is inopportune to repeal the extra tax on the items to which I have referred, because to do so would involve protests from other groups who would demand similar treatment. If this argument is valid it would appear to me that it would be applicable to any budget period, which gives rise to the fear that these so-called special wartime taxes are now to become part of our permanent economy. In my opinion it is most desirable, in the interest of maintaining reasonable business confidence, that these irritating and discriminatory taxes should be removed.

The Post Office Department appears to be making considerable money. Apparently it had a surplus of over $10 million last year. Is it not time that consideration be given to bringing the postal rate back to three cents instead of the four-cent rate which has been in effect for some time. I do not think it was the intention that the post office should be a money-making concern; rather it should be a service to the people at cost.

The price of dairy products is of great concern to the people of Northumberland county as well as to the majority of Canadians. Prices have been supported by subsidies and ceiling prices have been put on many products. The last announcement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on behalf of the government is, in my opinion, most unsatisfactory. On May 1, the ceiling price on butter was raised ten cents. If it was the intention of the government to assure reasonable prices to the producers a floor price should have been established at the same time. We have reached the time of year in this country when production exceeds consumption in butter; therefore it is necessary for someone to carry surplus butter during the summer months, which is the high production season. It is unreasonable to expect that any buyer will pay the ceiling price and carry butter for several months only to sell it at the same ceiling price. Producers of butter fat have been placed in an impossible position by this government paying higher amounts for other dairy products, and thereby cream producers are placed at a disadvantage as compared with others.

This situation was accepted during the war, but it is surely unreasonable to expect that it should now be continued. It is owing to wrong government policy that it is necessary to import several million pounds of New Zealand butter, which should have been sent to the British people, who are so greatly in need of fats. Moreover, I understand that some 38,808 pounds of this butter have not been sold in this country after having been brought in.

All the butter that is required could be produced in this country if the producers received a reasonable price. As a result of the present government's policy, consumers are paying more for butter and producers are receiving less. If the ceiling price and rationing are to be continued, a better floor price should be put on products to assume farmers reasonable prices. The cheese producers are not satisfied with the price they are receiving. The minister announced the other day that he would take all cheese at the floor price. Surely this is discouraging to the cheese producers, to hear that the government are going to take all their cheese at the floor price.

Mr. GARDINER: We did not announce that.

Mr. DROPE: If it is necessary to sell at less, then the farmers should be paid a better price and the difference carried by all the people of Canada. A prosperous agriculture will provide one of the best markets for our manufactured goods, and everything possible should be done to assure a reasonable return for our basic industries.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am going to contribute my little bit to this debate. This is not a large or enthusiastic house. The budget, which has been played up both by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and by the members who have spoken from that side of the house, is, in my opinion, a complicated document. To make an analysis of that budget from the financial point of view, under the mechanics of things as they are today, is not a realistic approach to it.

At this time I am not going to make a financial analysis of the budget. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking in this debate, spoke for this group, and I think he went pretty thoroughly into the financial ramifications of the budget. I am in hearty accord with what he said, and I believe that even from that point of view he pretty well exploded the airy pronouncements of the Minister of Finance.

I am going to attempt to tell the house what I think of this budget as viewed by the man in the street, and you cannot discuss this budget realistically without relating it to the rapid increases in the cost of living, because in the final analysis what the dollar will buy for the average man is the thing that counts. Giving him slight tax relief here and there and then taking 100 per cent back from him by increasing his cost of living and lowering his standards is not relief, and that is why I say it is tricky. Viewed as it was reviewed by the headlines of the press, the budget is likely to appear to people as having done something. In my opinion the reverse is true.

Let me mention this in passing, for example. Working the relief out on a percentage basis, taking the statement in the press that the lower income groups were relieved by fifty-four per cent, let us see what that actually means to the man who receives $150 a month and who has a couple of children—and that is about the average across the country, if we take those who are employed and are paying taxes. That fifty-four per cent means a relief of nineteen cents a week. That man eats every week; he pays bills every week, and he saves nineteen cents by that fifty-four per cent reduction. Then the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) comes along the next day and announces an increase of ten cents a pound on butter. The average family, or the family I have been discussing in that $150 income group, will consume about 2·3 pounds of butter a week. Therefore the Minister of Finance the night before gave him a relief of nineteen cents and the Minister of Agriculture took twenty-three cents from him the following day.

Mr. GARDINER: The last member said they didn't pay it.

Mr. GILLIS: The group I am talking about does. So that this man is four cents worse off so far as the actual purchasing power of the dollar, or the standard of living, is concerned than he was before the budget was announced. That is on that one item of food alone. Of course, fifty per cent of our wage-earners are in the group that pays no taxes at all. These people have not sufficient income to pay taxes. Well, the fellow who does not pay taxes is twenty-three cents a week worse off than before the minister brought down his budget, because the Minister of Agriculture, in that one item of food alone, threw back upon him twenty-three cents and he got no relief. He is that much worse off.

Mr. MAYHEW: Suppose the Minister of Agriculture had made his announcement first.

Mr. GILLIS: It would not make any difference, but it was timed very well for political purposes. The Minister of Finance gets headlines to the effect that he is relieving those in the low-income groups, while the Minister of Agriculture might not have been noticed in the ballyhoo there was in the press about the budget. His announcement may not have been noticed; perhaps it has not been noticed to any great extent except by members who are trying to police the standard of living of the Canadian people.

I think what would have been more realistic on the part of the government would have been to step up the exemptions to the figures mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. That would have done away with the necessity for returns. For this group that has suffered a decrease in its standard of living under this budget, plus increases in prices, it would have obviated the necessity of filing any income tax returns, and that in turn would have saved the government a large amount of money in administration expenses. If the government had wanted to do something for the lower income group, and that is the group for which something has to be done, that is the sort of action which should have been taken. This filing of income tax returns, every member will agree, is one of the greatest yearly headaches, and the chap who is not getting anything at all by way of relief and who has to continue filing that return finds himself worse off at the end of the year than before the budget was brought down. If the suggestion I make had been followed, this chap would at least have been saved this headache of filing returns and the government would have got rid of much surplus staff which they have checking returns that do not mean very much to anyone.

Of course the worst beating that people in the low-income groups have taken during the last year has been that increase in the cost of living. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of May 4, which does not bear out many statements one hears with regard to increases in prices. This clipping states—and these are official figures too:

> The cost of living index, reeling under the impact of higher prices, advanced 1·7 points during March to 130·6 at April 1—the biggest jog in the line since 1941—the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported on Saturday.

This is dated May 4. Continuing:

> Higher food prices accounted for most of the increase, while clothing and home furnishings also contributed to the unprecedented rise.
> The bureau's food index mounted from 148·7 on March 1, to 151·6 as beef, sugar, vegetables and fruits were chalked up higher in grocery stores across the dominion. Price increases for a broad range of clothing items advanced the index from 133·1 to 136·9.

Anyone who tries to argue that the low-income groups in this country have received any relief from this budget is either badly informed or trying to fool somebody; because, in the final analysis, by this action alone—by the removal of price controls and by the removal of subsidies—the low-income groups have taken a terrific licking, and the budget offers to them no relief in any way, shape or form. That is the way it affects the man in the street, as he will find when he has had time to analyse it. That budget, if it was brought down for political purposes, will certainly not draw any water to the mill of the government.

I want to devote most of the time at my disposal in this debate to the part of the country from which I come. I hear members of the house say, "The C.C.F. is talking depression; they would welcome a depression; they are going to bring on a depression." May I say that some of the most outstanding economists in North America today are writing books on the subject and, if they know anything about it, they forecast a trend in that direction within the next few years. But at this time I am not going to talk about the general trend. I wish to inform the Minister of Finance and the members of this house, particularly the maritime members, that the maritime provinces have already struck a depression. They have been in the throes of a depression for the last year, and from an economic point of view they are today in as bad a condition as they were in at any time during the depression which preceded this war. I wish to compliment the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), who spoke last evening. Not enough of the maritime members, particularly those on the government side of the house, approach the matter as courageously as he did. By figures which I am not going to bother quoting again, he definitely pointed out the inequality in the distribution of the wealth of this country, as it applies to the maritime provinces. They are, as it were, the step-children of confederation. He did a realistic job.

There are one or two things, however, on which I do not agree with him. He said that one of the main considerations in dominion-provincial relations was the right of the province to retain certain small taxing fields. I do not agree with that statement. I think the tax agreements were a minor item when placed alongside other problems involved in dominion-provincial relations, such as, for example, the question of social security as contained in the original proposals made by the dominion government to the provinces. We cannot forget that most of the people in this country are suffering from the want of medical attention because they cannot afford to pay for it. That applies right across the dominion, with the exception of Saskatchewan, in which province a health programme has been instituted with regard to which some progress has been made. But, generally speaking, you can have as much health in this country as you can buy, under present circumstances; and no more or no less. In their original submissions, the dominion government did propose to institute a health programme. The thing we do not want to forget is that we have a large number of people between the ages of sixty-five and seventy who would have obtained some relief under the original proposals. They are calling for it. I think every member of this house, if he visits his constituency occasionally, will have the same experience that I had. I have had women come in, particularly those who had raised families and had given them to the nation, had lost them overseas—some came back but cannot secure employment—with no income whatsoever and no home, wondering when the old age pension is to be brought down to sixty-five years and take them in. That is a question which would have been settled under dominion-provincial relations. Lack of security is one of the things which is responsible for most of the isms that creep into a country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the hon. member how many veterans who came back from overseas have been out of employment in Canada?

Mr. GILLIS: I can tell the minister that on the island of Cape Breton, from which I come, there are 2,600 registered unemployed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a particular case.

Mr. GILLIS: That is quite all right. I am speaking for the part of the country from which I come.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am talking about the whole country.

Mr. GILLIS: It is up to the other members of the house to speak for their ridings. In the section I come from there are 2,600 unemployed. That is the number registered; and there are many unemployed who are not registered. I will talk to the minister about veterans affairs when his estimates are before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And I will talk to you, too.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall have a lot to say; and after we get through the minister may not be as cocky as he is now.

I was talking about the mothers who had contributed sons to the services which saved the institutions of this country in order that we may sit in seats of this kind and grow fat. These are the people I am talking about. I am talking about dominion-provincial relations, and I am not giving our own premier in Nova Scotia much credit for the quibbling that has been done on this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is a very fine man.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; he is a good Tory.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is a very fine progressive Liberal.

Mr. GILLIS: He is a good Tory. Just a few days ago I noticed an item in the Globe and Mail, which said that Premier Duplessis stood up in his place in Quebec and deprecated the fact that Premier Macdonald was being insulted. He considered that himself, Drew and Macdonald were the future saviours of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You had better leave Macdonald alone.

Mr. MICHAUD: Nobody can use abusive language better than Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. GILLIS: A person is known by the company he keeps. You have that group which I have mentioned which has received no relief from this budget, and who are panhandling a living, as it were, after contributing their all to the nation. That problem might have been solved under dominion-provincial relations.

I said a moment ago that fear is the thing which breeds most of the isms in a country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a short time ago deprecated the fact that there are several groups in this house. What brought them here? It was the failure of the old-line parties to solve the problems of this country. They are the original protesters against the inactivity of those entrusted with the management of the affairs of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are in great minority.

Mr. GILLIS: They will flourish and grow to the extent that you people continue the policy which you have had for the last seventy-five years and which, as far as I can see, you have not changed in any respect, not even in this budget. As to the average man who today produces the wealth of this country—and this goes for the farmer, the fisherman and for every industrial worker—fear is the thing which drives him away from the machines that have exploited him in the past. It is fear of old age, after he has slaved and worn himself out on a farm or in industry, with nothing ahead of him but the scrap heap by way of social security in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: Governments cannot cure old age.

Mr. GILLIS: But you can provide for it, just as you provide for judges and everyone else in the government service. It is the government's function to provide for it. You are squawking because communism is developing in the country, but you fail to provide for those who built this country and produced its wealth.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I point out to hon. members that twenty-five years ago we had sixty-five members down in that corner, and what have we now?

Mr. GILLIS: Well, what is here today is solid, and we are going to stay here and fight this battle to its conclusion. I say, to the extent you continue to legislate for fear in the hearts and minds of the people who produce the wealth of this country, to that extent groups such as this will grow and eventually take power in Canada. All you have to do is look across the ocean to Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, where the modern mechanics of government are being applied to their resources for the alleviation of human misery rather than the amassing of wealth. I said the average farmer and worker feared old age, which means they have to go to the scrap heap. We see thousands of them in this country hobbling around on sticks, with no chance for medical attention. They cannot get in a hospital because they cannot pay for it. Many of them are worn out prematurely. They cannot qualify for that pauper's allowance called the old age pension, so they just walk the streets or depend on what some member of the family may be able to give them.

Mr. McCANN: There was never a citizen of Canada denied hospitalization because he could not pay for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the best country in the world.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know anything about what the minister has just said, but I know that I have had to take veterans of the first war to a hospital in a car, and become personally responsible for the bill.

Mr. McCANN: Where?

Mr. GILLIS: In the part of the country from which I come, and it is no different from the rest of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does my hon. friend suggest for one second that the veterans of Canada are not better looked after than the veterans of any other country in the world today?

Mr. GILLIS: I am saying that maintenance allowances and everything else applying to the veterans should be increased fifty per cent and they would not be too well taken care of.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We all agree with that, but last year this country spent $807,000,000 for the care and after-care of veterans in Canada. That was spent by 12,000,000 people, and I think it was pretty decent, generous action on the part of the people.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, as I told you in your veterans affairs committee and your pension committee, the solution is not to dump all the social security problems upon the veterans affairs department. Other legislation is necessary in this country to augment it. You are handling many problems—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who started it?

Mr. GILLIS: You are handling many problems in connection with veterans of the first war because there is no place else to send them. You generously do what you can for them, but other social security measures should be applied in this country to care for them, because in the final analysis they are not war service disabilities but disabilities of the ordinary citizens of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is part of the programme of the government.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but it is class legislation. You can do something about it for the veterans, while many thousands of citizens of this country are denied any relief for the same disabilities. I was talking about fear because of lack of security. You live in fear from the day you start to work until you go to the grave; and what does the average worker in this country do for most of his lifetime? He tries to carry a $1,000 life insurance policy so that his family may be sure there will be enough money to bury him after he dies He is afraid to die; he is afraid of leaving a family to the tender mercies of an unknown future without his protecting hand. The minister wants to travel a bit in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have travelled it far more than my hon. friend has. I can tell him that I have been in ten times more places in Canada than he has.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, I did not travel in a private car, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nor did I. I travelled through the Peace river country by canoe in 1923.

Mr. GILLIS: You should take a spy-glass with you.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I travelled this country as an immigrant. My hon. friend can never hurl that accusation at me.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, I am hurling it. You travelled on the wrong side of the tracks.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know more about the picture than you do.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. gentleman who is speaking.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister is a bit touchy this afternoon. Either he is getting a little old, or his conscience is bothering him.

Mr. GARDINER: You would like to get into a private car yourself.

Mr. GILLIS: I did travel in a private car, but the caption on the door of the car was "Twelve horses or forty men."

Mr. ABBOTT: I travelled in that car, too.

Mr. GILLIS: It was a private car, and I was never ashamed of it.

Mr. GARDINER: But you would like to get into one of the other kind, too.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not so sure. I'll tag along with the rank and file. I was trying to describe a condition to men who have never had any fear of insecurity, and who have never experienced any of the fears I have been trying to point out. I was going on to say that if the Prime Minister is afraid of groups developing in this country, a situation which he does not like, the thing for him to do is remove that fear from the minds and hearts of the working people by a proper overall social security plan. That will remove it; and you need not be afraid of taxing people for such a plan, either. I had the privilege, for twenty-six years, of working as hard as anyone in this house has worked. I was never afraid of paying taxes. When I had an income that put me in the income tax bracket I was quite satisfied; and I was never afraid of being taxed for the purpose of providing security. I have taken part in meetings for twenty odd years. I have helped write pension acts and insurance acts which we tried to sell to the government of our province or to the corporation for which we worked. We were quite willing to pay our proportionate share of those security measures, but we could never get anyone to go along with us on them. If you are providing something in return for that tax the working people of this country will not be afraid to pay it, but they have not the opportunity.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was doing my best to make everybody on the other side of the house as mad as possible. For the remainder of my time I am going to be specific and try not to tramp on anyone's corns. At six o'clock I was pointing out that the budget could not be properly analysed as to the benefits accruing to the people of Canada unless it was checked with the increasing cost of living. It is no use giving a person something with one hand and taking it away from him with the other. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) stated on Tuesday evening that he came from a riding largely made up of people engaged in the fishing industry, and he said that the fishermen of his constituency would approve the present budget. That might be so if one relies on the press, particularly the headlines in certain sections of the country, but I still submit that the fishermen, on both the east and west coasts, is still the forgotten man. I have a few figures which will illustrate the position of the fishermen, on the east coast at least. The prices for fish quoted in Halifax on May 3 were as follows:

	Cents per pound
Cod	2½
Haddock	4½
Halibut	16 to 20

That is what the fisherman received. On the same day chain stores in Ottawa were offering fish at the following prices:

	Cents per pound
Cod, frozen	37
Smoked fillet	39
Halibut	42

There is a terrific spread between what the man who goes to sea to catch the fish and undergoes most of the hardship is receiving under present price ceilings and what the consumer in central Canada is paying. I am not going to go into the fisheries question in detail, but I should like to refer to a brief put out by the fisheries council of Canada, located at Ottawa. They make a few recommendations which I think should be checked and implemented as soon as possible. One is:

> The "Act for the Support of the Prices of Fisheries Products" approved by parliament on August 15, 1944, has not as yet been made effective.
> The fisheries council desires to urge upon the government the importance of proclaiming this legislation at the earliest possible date. The council's views of this important subject are amplified later in this brief and now may be summarized as follows:
> 1. Early proclamation of the act.
> 2. Board to contain representatives of the industry.
> 3. Use of funds available to promote long term benefits to the fishermen rather than as relief payments or the dole.

I suggest that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) should proclaim that act at the first opportunity so that it may become operative.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How much of the difference between what is paid to the producer and what the consumer in Ottawa pays is absorbed by transportation costs?

Mr. GILLIS: I have not figured it out, but I imagine there is quite a lot of it.

Mr. COCKERAM: And the processing.

Mr. GILLIS: However I think it is something the Minister of Fisheries should take up. The act should be proclaimed and the necessary machinery set up. At the present time, with the prices the fishermen are receiving, they are not able to maintain a standard of living equal to that of those in the rest of Canada who are steadily employed. Some effort should be made to set up the necessary machinery whereby the fisherman will get a reasonable share of the national income. He is certainly working as hard as anyone else in this country.

I should like to say something more with regard to prices, to the Minister of Finance. There is an agitation right across the country for the removal of the tax on soft drinks in order to bring the bottle of pop back to a nickel, and there is also the chocolate bar problem. These two nuisance taxes should be removed, but if they are removed an effort should be made to see that prices do not go up rather than come down.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the hon. member has examined the balance sheets of the soft drink and chocolate manufacturers? I have examined them and I am surprised the hon. member is advocating what he is.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not advocating the removal of these taxes for the benefit of manufacturers of soft drinks and chocolate bars; I am advocating their removal for the benefit of the children who purchase them. I have no more faith than has the hon. member that the larger manufacturers will not shove prices up rather than bring them down, but in the soft drink industry there are a number of small manufacturers in whom I have confidence, and I believe they would pass on that saving to the consuming public. Some control would have to be exercised by the government over the larger ones in order to see that prices were brought down.

I want to say a few words about the depressed condition of the maritimes, and I am going to be as unprovocative as possible. Most people in central Canada, particularly in Quebec and Ontario, when they hear us talking about employment in the maritimes and asking for subventions, are apt to say, "You want this, that or the other thing," and believe that they are giving us something. The reverse is true. When the maritime provinces entered confederation they were the most prosperous part of Canada, and the statesmen of that time hesitated about coming into confederation. The fears which they expressed at that time were well founded because, after confederation, everything that existed in that part of the country that was wealth producing began to be siphoned into central and western Canada.

I want to show the house what was taken from the maritimes, and I am going to speak only about Nova Scotia. I shall let the New Brunswick members speak for themselves. I do not intend to go back beyond forty or fifty years. I say this because I have always looked upon governments, both federal and provincial, as trustees of the resources of the country, who would supervise their exploitation so that the greatest value to every section of the country might result from that exploitation.

The picture I see today in Nova Scotia is largely attributable to Liberal government; because it will be remembered that we have not had Conservative governments on many occasions since confederation in that province.

Mr. MacNICOL: Bad luck for Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very lucky.

Mr. GILLIS: The fact of the matter is that we have not any representatives in the present legislature of Nova Scotia from that party. At least the Liberals have sense enough in that province not to get wrapped up in the other party, and become contaminated, as they have in western Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You get good government in Nova Scotia.

Mr. GILLIS: Here is how good it has been, as I see it. As I said a moment ago, I am not going back very far. A Liberal government had been custodian of our resources during the period I am going to mention. And what did we lose to central Canada? I should like the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor)—the only member from that city at the present time—to pay attention to what I am saying, because he waxed most eloquent this afternoon on how good things were in that part of the country.

Fifty years ago we lost control of our finances. At that time we had the Merchants Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Halifax Banking Company, the Commercial Bank of Windsor, and the Union Bank of Halifax. Maritime capital was being applied to the resources of that province for the purpose of developing it. But all the control of her finances is now in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. ISNOR: What happened to those five banks?

Mr. GILLIS: They were amalgamated, or siphoned off. Try to get money from them today to develop an industry in Nova Scotia which competes with something up here, and find out what happens. They hamstring you. He who controls finance, controls the country.

In addition to that, we lost industry. We lost a cotton mill at Halifax, and one at Windsor. We lost a paint works at Halifax, and three tobacco factories. We lost four or five shoe factories which were employing people, and the people they employed were spending money in Nova Scotia. We lost two silk factories and several woollen mills. We lost a cheese factory at Antigonish, and a fairly large one at that. We lost a cement works which drifted into a merger, and came into Quebec. We lost a large fertilizer plant at Sydney, and a tinplate plant operated by Shaw and Mason of Sydney. We lost a large tar and chemical plant from Sydney. We lost a skate factory at Dartmouth, and a sugar refinery from the same place during the war. We lost a nut and bolt plant which employed 1,500 men, and had been a peacetime industry for some thirty years. It left there in 1943. We lost shipyards at Pictou and a plate mill at Sydney. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) will remember that one. It employed 600 men during the war and it is not operating now. I hope to sell it in the near future, though.

That is the picture showing how well they managed it. That is the way the east has been depressed. That is why there are 30,000 unemployed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there 30,000 unemployed in Nova Scotia?

Mr. GILLIS: In the maritimes; 15,000 of them are in Nova Scotia. If any business employed that kind of manager for two years, and he showed that kind of record in his balance sheet, on the assets side of his ledger, what would happen? They would put him into gaol for about thirty years; and rightly so.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They would make him a Liberal member of parliament.

Mr. GILLIS: We hear a lot about planning. What does it mean to that part of the country? We have lost all that wealth. We do not quarrel so much about what somebody else may have as we do about the control they may exercise over our natural resources, thereby stopping the creation of new wealth. This is the kind of thing that is doing it—centralization in the two central provinces in connection with the financing of industry, and because the distributing organizations are able to keep the east and west depressed, at their will. It is the control they exercise which we complain about mostly.

But they say that private enterprise is planning. Here is the planning they are doing; and it means precious little relief they will bring to the maritime provinces. These statistics are taken from page 9 of the forecast for 1947 on investment by Canadian business, which was made by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and tabled in the house a month or so ago by the minister of that department.

In 1947 they plan to spend $1,066,458,000. That is a lot of money. Where are they going to spend it? They are going to spend five per cent of it in the maritimes; they are going to spend 26·7 per cent in Quebec; they are going to spend fifty per cent in Ontario; they are going to spend eight per cent in the prairie provinces, and they are going to spend ten per cent in British Columbia.

Your free enterprisers, who have money to invest, will spend the most of it in the two central provinces, with the complete centralization which they have today. The east and the west will remain the overseers of the poor, as they have been for a good many years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall finish in a few minutes. In order to get some degree of balance in the economy of this country, if Canada is to become a nation, it will be necessary for the federal government to do some planning itself. So far as I can see, unless the federal government is prepared to institute a programme of public investment in the maritime provinces by way of secondary industries, there is no solution for the problem; it will become worse and worse as the years go by.

I notice that the provincial government has a capital budget this year, and it is spending some money, a little on the highways and on hospitals, and on hotel extension.

Mr. ISNOR: What do you call a little?

Mr. GILLIS: Not much; an odd million or half a million here and there. But the point I make is this, that while these expenditures are all desirable, none of them is a wealth-producing project. They will take the edge off for a short time by some construction work, and will result in hiring some labour at thirty cents an hour to work on the highways, as usual. But some secondary industries must be put into that part of the country.

We have tried it. For example, a small canning factory attempted to open up in Sydney, but they have been held up for about seven months on a molasses quota; and they are still held up. The bridging of the strait of Canso would have got us through this transition period, so far as unemployment is concerned; and that was recommended to the house by a committee of the house in 1942. Nothing has yet been done about it. The borings are completed; the cost of the project is known. In a return tabled in the house on April 23 the Minister of Transport (Mr.

Chevrier) definitely stated that a causeway across the strait of Canso would cost $17,797,000; a bridge, $27,276,000. He ended by saying that this project could not be started because the policy had not been determined. They have been determining that since 1942. That project would have employed 4,000 men for a period of three years and would have got us through this difficult period.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the hon. member who quotes $26 million?

Mr. GILLIS: That is an estimate from the Department of Transport, contained in a return brought down in answer to a question by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). In 1946 an appropriation of $300,000 was voted for the building of a breakwater on Cape Breton island. Although the money was appropriated, nothing has so far been done. That would have created considerable employment. A fish processing plant and a big freezing plant are held up on the island of Cape Breton because the necessary repairs to a wharf in the Point Edward area along the Waterford coastline is held up. Those necessary establishments are held up because the necessary repairs have not been made to a wharf. Many things could be done down there.

I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that if the government is saving its public works programme to take the country over a difficult period which may come two years from now—I will not say for election purposes—they are making a mistake. Quite a few hon. members on the other side of the house who know something about the system and about economics realize that there will be a recession within the next couple of years. It may be a good thing to save the public works programme in Ontario and Quebec and other provinces where there is no recession, but in the maritime provinces the time to commence public works programmes was a year ago. The public works projects to which I have referred are national assets, because, if they are not carried out, when the government gets around to creating some employment in Nova Scotia there will be nobody there to work, since they are leaving that province every day. Our best people are leaving. In the maritimes we lose fifteen thousand a year to the United States. The people who were employed are pulling out.

I would seriously suggest that subsidies, which dovetail into the budget, should again be paid. The removal of the subsidies is the thing which will prevent us from holding the price line and everything else. I do not think it can be held without subsidies.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The minister said that he had a large surplus. That is fine, if the function of the government is to save money and produce large surpluses and allow certain sections of the country to go to pieces, but I do not think it is good government. If the minister had taken some of the millions of dollars which he boasted about here a few nights ago; if he had taken $5 million of that surplus and given it to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in February, we would not have had the whole economy of Nova Scotia torn to pieces today because of a strike in the coal industry, which is the basis of the whole economy of that province. I seriously suggest that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour have a conference to see if the Minister of Labour cannot wheedle a subsidy out of the Minister of Finance in order to break the deadlock down there and get something done.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see, for the Canadian people, any occasion for excessive rejoicings in the advent of a new minister in the Department of Finance. Although no doubt can be entertained as to the ability of both the present minister (Mr. Abbott) and his predecessor, it nevertheless remains apparent to all who listen to them or bow to their wishes, that both these men are equally intent on emptying, as far as possible, the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers.

"The country", states the hon. the Minister of Finance, "enjoys a degree of prosperity unknown in our generation." Without fear of contradiction one might also add that it enjoys the very doubtful privilege of having the most extensive black market organization ever, that the people are still at the beck and call of the most powerful and costliest bureaucracy of our history, that they experience the most terrible scarcity of building materials ever known and that hundreds of Canadians wear themselves out hunting for non-existent housing accommodation, that the burden of taxation is the heaviest ever born by our people in peace time, that the gross debt of Canada is at its peak, since, on March 31, 1947 it had reached a total of $17,659,627,000, while it stood at $3,540,237,614, on March 31, 1938.

The government has announced a surplus of $352,000,000 for the fiscal year just ended, but it should not be forgotten that in addition to the revenue derived from the liberal War Assets Corporation, Canadians, during the fiscal year 1946-47, paid $16,340,000 in excise taxes on automobiles compared to $6,701,000 in 1945-46, which represents an increase of $9,639,000.

On cigars, cigarettes and tobacco, they paid $76,318,000 as against $70,229,000 in 1945-46, the increase amounting to $6,089,000.

On cigarette paper and tubes, $6,943,000 as against $4,645,000 in 1945-46, which represents an increase of $2,298,000.

On gasoline, car owners paid $36,220,000, compared with $29,836,000 in 1945-46, the increase amounting to $6,384,000.

On phonographs, radios and tubes, $2,526,000 as against $646,000 in 1945-46, the increase amounting to $1,880,000.

In 1946-47, Canadians paid $1,185,000 on imports but only $787,000 in 1945-46, which represents an increase of $398,000.

On sugar, $11,339,000 in 1946-47 as against $9,974,000 in 1945-46, which represents an increase of $1,365,000.

On amusements, $14,552,000 in 1946-47 as against $13,387,000 in 1945-46, representing an increase of $1,165,000.

On non-alcoholic beverages, they paid $18,-634,000 as against $16,657,000 in 1945-46, the increase amounting to $1,977,000.

In other words, Canadian taxpayers paid a total of $1,022,120,000 in indirect taxes, as against $821,485,000 in 1945-46, which represents an increase of $200,635,000.

After paying $1,436,400,000 in direct taxes, including $695,000,000 in the form of personal income tax, I am of the opinion that the taxpayers really deserved more than the slight income tax reductions provided for in the budget. The Minister of Finance should have thanked the Canadian people for its magnificent financial support and modestly conceded that the Government had been free to spend as it wished the money thus obtained.

I also find the Minister of Finance rather presuming in his praise of the "speed and smoothness with which we have made the transition from war to peace."

In the opinion of many people, this transition is on the contrary quite difficult and even more costly than the one which followed the first world war. The last two wars in which we have been forced to participate have left painful memories in our minds, and have deeply affected both our hearts and our pocketbooks. People have not forgotten that from 1915 to 1944 they gave away to the federal government, in war taxes and succession duties alone, a total of $9,476,158,656. They are hoping for a breathing spell. The workers who toiled and moiled from 1939 to 1947 to fill the sieve-like coffers of the dominion treasury feel perfectly justified in asking leave to think of themselves and their families. Too much of their war-time wages has been swallowed up by Ottawa for them to put money aside, while this year's budget holds the promise of a future that is anything but rosy. A substantial reduction in tax rates, especially on personal incomes, is necessary if the government wish to avoid criticism on the part of poor people and small wage-earners, if they sincerely desire to prevent the spread of subversive ideas and if they intend to leave to the worker the fruits of his labour so that he may face the future with some confidence. Let us provide our people with bread, clothing and houses and they, in turn, will show their gratitude to their leaders by their respect of the laws and their disregard for diabolical suggestions put forward by communist or other agitators. Such is the request which I place before the authorities on behalf of the fine constituency of Chicoutimi which I have the honour to represent in this house.

I thank the hon. Minister of Finance for his statement that the government of which he is a member "do not contemplate a continuing, large-scale programme of government lending to finance our exports." It is gratifying to hear that the gifts to England have ended and that our government have now decided to look after the affairs of our own country.

Then, he will perhaps find time to solve the problem of dominion-provincial relations, about which I hope I may be allowed to say a few words.

On April 2, 1947, the Montreal chamber of commerce, whose 4,300 members are business men of that city, unanimously passed an important brief on dominion-provincial relations.

Since the problem is weighty and the group which has tackled it extremely competent, the brief deserves the attention of our present leaders and I believe all who are interested in seeing happy relations between the dominion and the provinces would be well advised to consider it.

After openly heralding the importance of "fully preserving all constitutional guarantees granted the provinces," the chamber of commerce stated that:

> . . . the present dominion proposals would bring about too great an economic and financial centralization.
> It adds that the principle on which these proposals are based invariably suggests that the provinces surrender, in return for financial compensation, their power to tax incomes, profits and estates.

The very definition of that procedure evidently implies at least partial centralization as regards not only the levying of tax, but also the enacting of tax legislation. Because of this latter implication, such procedure impedes the free exercise of the rights granted the provinces by the constitution. Provincial autonomy in the taxation field does not consist only in the collection of revenue now purported to be sufficient; a government which is deprived of its power to levy taxes is no longer a true government, because its action is dependent upon that of the authority holding the power of the purse.

After warning against the danger of subsidies which inevitably lead to bargaining between the dominion and the provinces, the memorandum continues as follows:

Much stress is laid on the fact that the agreements would be of a temporary nature, thus preserving the autonomy of the provinces, which could recover at the end of the five-year period, the rights yielded to the dominion government. This argument is in itself sufficient proof that they would have to abandon temporarily the rights and privileges conferred by their autonomy.

As the reasons given to justify such relinquishment are of a permanent nature (maintenance of prosperity through a centralized cyclical budget, through a centralized policy of social security and full employment), it is difficult to see how the nominal five-year period provided for in the proposed agreements could really be significant. Such agreements do not contain any automatic resolutory clause; therefore it would be necessary for the dissatisfied provinces to denounce them in order theoretically to put an end to their operation after the expiration of the basic period. Any province which is not ready to relinquish definitely its taxing power in the fields covered by such agreements must, if it is conscious of its responsibilities to its cititzens and to the country, refrain from authorizing the dominion to put into operation a comprehensive and permanent economic control and social security programme if, in order to retain its constitutional rights it must, five years hence, withdraw from the programme and thus disrupt this machinery. In other words, the settlement of permanent problems, such as full employment and social security by means of temporary agreements could give rise to serious political strife at a time when the country would be in the greatest need of the loyal cooperation of every party.

Finally, in their belief that "agreements between Ottawa and the provinces are needed to maintain in this country the atmosphere of security which is essential to its progress" the Chamber of Commerce submits as a basis for a common understanding that—

(a) each government retain the right to initiate legislation in the fields of taxation allotted to it under the constitution, which seems to be the only system consistent with their respective autonomies;

(b) the provincial governments being restricted to direct taxation, they should be free to resort to it according to their needs;

(c) all governments agree to simplify the tax collection system and to exchange all information needed for such a simplification and for the standardization of legislation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Montreal Chamber of Commerce is to be commended. It has proved equal to the fine reputation which it has gained throughout Canada in the past. Coming as it does in the wake of the Quebec premier's statement, his brief clearly shows that the people of this country are of one mind on this vital matter and that representations made on their behalf by the provincial authorities truly reflect their outlook and aspirations.

My last point is about the Canadian National Railways, whose deficit of over nine and a half millions we've had to make good this year. Should not the government be well advised to consider the possibility of refinancing our railway system's consolidated indebtedness through a new government-backed bond issue at only 2 per cent? With the present rate of between 3 and 5 per cent, in 1946 alone the Canadian public have had to foot an interest bill of $23,358,514.18 on a debt of $530,422,997.55. At 2 per cent, they wouldn't have to pay more than $10,608,459.95.

The saving thus achieved, namely $12,750,054.23, might well be used to improve the service between Montreal, Quebec City and Chicoutimi, so that our district might at long last receive the decent and fair treatment it deserves. The government would do well to give this matter special attention and, they will earn the gratitude of the people of Canada, especially those in the county of Chicoutimi, if the necessary steps are taken.

(Text):

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): If I had been sure that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture would be taken up in the not too distant future, Mr. Speaker, I might have refrained from speaking on this occasion. However I deem it expedient to come back to this question which to such a great degree interests the potato growers of New Brunswick. On February 4, I covered the problem in a general manner and pointed out that it is in bumper crop years that prices go down below the cost of production. I also pointed out that, in the opinion of the farmers of New Brunswick, something should be done to ensure reasonable marketing at all times. In furtherance of that objective I expressed the view that an adequate price could be obtained only through some sort of orderly marketing under an agency of the government. As far as I know, that was the first time that such a policy had been advocated in the house. I was not sure then that the idea would meet with universal approval. It would be presumptuous on my part to claim that it did meet with universal approval, but I can stay that all those who wrote to me or spoke to me about it—and there were many who did—agreed entirely with the suggestions I made on that occasion. In any event, nobody expresed disagreement with the plan suggested, and for that reason I feel that it meets with practically universal approval on the part of our growers.

Before turning to what I feel should be done as regards the future, may I say a word as to what has happened since I spoke in the house on February 4. As hon. members know, shortly after that date the United Kingdom placed an order for a considerable quantity of table stock potatoes from Prince Edward Island, something which probably never happened before and is not likely to occur in the future. Then we received orders from Portugal and Brazil, which was also something unheard of as regards table stock potatoes. In the meantime it turned out that the United States found out to their sorrow that they were short of potatoes with which to fill orders they had accepted from European countries. We all know that early last winter the United States government destroyed considerable quantities of potatoes because, at that time, they had no hope of finding a market for them. But somehow or another they carried the dumping of potatoes too far in the state of Maine. This is the only reason why the price of potatoes rose around April 20. In other words, it was the blunder of the United States government which brought some measure of relief to our farmers recently and at the same time saved this government from the serious embarrassment of having to go into the potato business on May 1, pursuant to the order in council passed last October. In my opinion, this is nothing short of miraculous and it is not likely to happen another year.

The fact that the government was miraculously saved from serious embarrassment as a result of improvident action in the United States should not prevent us from facing the problem for the future as it should be faced. The wheat growers of the west have their Canadian Wheat Board Act which guarantees them a floor price for their product. There is an effective minimum or floor price for practically all farm products. Potatoes are the only exception. The result is that we are left to struggle with the implacable law of supply and demand, which is neither fair nor equitable in years such as 1946. We are also exposed to, and are often victims of, unfair competition in marketing. In the winter of 1945, when I sat in the legislature of New Brunswick, I heard it said time and again that unfair marketing practices were being carried on in New Brunswick particularly as regards the marketing of seed potatoes in South and Central America. An order would come up and a certain price would be arrived at between the dealers. Then another dealer would underbid the former and get the order. It would appear that such unfortunate practices occurred again during the present crop year. It is commonly stated, and not denied, that on the Saint John river, as a result of such unfair competition, the farmers lost money to the tune of some $35,000 in connection with the sale to Argentina last fall.

Mr. SINNOTT: That is peanuts.

Mr. MICHAUD: It may be peanuts to the hon. member for Springfield, but it is not peanuts to the average farmer in my constituency and it possibly is not peanuts to the average farmer in his own constituency. The farmers are again under the impression that something similar occurred recently in connection with the orders from Portugal. Whether there is any truth in the rumour or not is of no practical consequence now, because prices have gone up above anything that the farmers could possibly get on those orders from Portugal and Brazil.

I bring out those facts in order to illustrate the necessity of an effective marketing agency for our farmers. The farmers do ask for such an agency. In support of their request, may I quote from certain reports published in divers papers at the time of the farmers' convention or meeting here in Ottawa sometime around the end of February. The first one is from the Ottawa Journal of February 27, and reads in part as follows:

> The meeting, called by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture requested the directors of the federation to place before the government a draft federal agricultural products marketing act to be dealt with at the present session of parliament.

And further down:

> The proposed act would set up a dominion marketing board with control over distribution, quantity, quality, variety and maximum and minimum prices of regulated farm products in interprovincial and export markets.

And further down:

> G. F. Perkin, Ontario government director of marketing, told the delegates "practically all" cash crops in his province were under marketing schemes, but many farmers felt the need of extending regulations to cover interprovincial and export trade.

When the large majority of producers of a particular product agreed on a marketing plan for their crops, it was "a question of fairness or common justice' that the plan should apply to all.

In the Telegraph-Journal, a New Brunswick newspaper, of February 28, we find a report of the meeting, from which I want to quote just one paragraph:

The federation would have the government set up a dominion marketing board with powers to regulate, distribution, grades, quantity, prices and marketing of certain farm goods going from one province to another or into foreign trade.

Again in the Telegraph-Journal of March 3 I read the report of a meeting of farmers held at Bristol, which I think is in the county of Carleton:

A well attended meeting of potato growers and shippers was held in the community hall at Bristol. Mr. . . . was named chairman and Mr. . . . secretary.

I skip part of it and come to the material paragraph:

It was decided that it was advisable at this time to send a delegation to Ottawa. Setting up of a marketing board and steps to bring about acreage control were discussed. A committee of five was set up to meet the New Brunswick potato council to discuss various matters.

The meeting went on record as being unanimously behind any organization set-up to assist the growers obtain a fair price for potatoes.

There does not seem to be any doubt that our farmers want efficient marketing agencies for their products. Our next consideration is, which government has jurisdiction in the matter? I am well aware of the fact that on this question of marketing we touch upon a complicated constitutional problem. I hardly know more than the ABC's of constitutional law, but the experts of the Department of Justice will be able to correct me if I go too far astray. For that reason I venture to express the following views on the constitutional aspects of the problem. In the first place, I feel that the matter of controlled acreage is strictly one within provincial jurisdiction. The question of marketing, however, may be a matter of either provincial or federal jurisdiction according to the extent of the trade involved. Under section 91 (2) of the British North America Act the federal government has jurisdiction with regard to the regulation of trade and commerce. This section of the act has come up for interpretation in a number of cases, most of which went to the privy council. I have carefully reviewed the digests of the cases, and have come to the conclusion that the gist of the decisions is that the provinces have jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce within their own boundaries but have no authority or jurisdiction to regulate foreign and interprovincial trade.

[Mr. Michaud.]

It is probably due to that generally accepted interpretation that the province of New Brunswick in its act of 1937 respecting the control of agricultural products purported to give to its board authority to——fix from time to time, the price or prices, maximum price or prices, minimum price or prices, at which natural products may be sold in the province at wholesale for resale or use in the province.

That is section 4(1)(c) of our provincial act. Under this act the province cannot fix prices on agricultural products going out of the province. I presume the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has good reasons for not introducing during the course of the present session a farm products marketing act in accordance with the representations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The need for this legislation may not be so urgent in regard to farm products other than potatoes. It is true that under our export and import permits legislation, which was passed early this session, it might be possible to regulate to some extent the export of our potatoes to foreign countries, but in my opinion this would be a clumsy and unsatisfactory manner of trying to regulate this important part of our external trade. Potatoes are one of our important cash crops, possibly the second largest export cash crop, though I have not the figures to make that statement without reservation. In any event, it is of considerable importance, and for that reason I feel that something should be done to ensure proper export marketing.

Then there is the matter of interprovincial trade. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island supply a considerable quantity of the potatoes consumed in other provinces, particularly in Quebec and Ontario. Marketing in these provinces has never been satisfactory because of the lack of proper marketing organizations. For those reasons I feel that we should have a potato marketing board immediately, quite independent of any agricultural products act which may be set up at some future time. May I point out to the Minister of Agriculture that the provincial minister of agriculture agrees with me in this matter. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, I wish to quote from a letter from him dated April 22, 1947. Mr. Taylor, who by the way is possibly the most competent minister of agriculture we have had in New Brunswick since confederation, writes in part as follows:

I am definitely of the opinion that a central marketing agency is the only means by which

New Brunswick potatoes can be marketed to the satisfaction of all concerned. I have stressed this in no uncertain terms with the growers, the dealers and the federal authorities.

Then he refers to our New Brunswick act:

This act is largely along similar lines to that which is in effect in a great many of the provinces, but acts of this nature have no authority in regard to controlling the marketing of any product in export or interprovincial movement. A marketing plan was set up under this act but due to its being general knowledge that there was no legislative power dealing with the export it was of no effect. I have strongly urged on the federal authorities that in order to make provincial marketing legislation effective it is necessary to have a federal act that has the authority in regard to interprovincial and export movements.

And further down:

I trust that the present legislation which is being considered in Ottawa will give the federal authority that is necessary to make a complete job of the necessary legislative authority and should that be the case we would be only too glad to urge on the producers in New Brunswick to organize in order that they may take advantage of same, but failing to provide federal legislation it is absolutely out of the question for our growers to organize and control the marketing under our provincial legislation.

Mr. F. W. Squires, a member of the New Brunswick legislature and former leader of the opposition, recently referred to this matter, I believe in the month of April although I have not the exact date. As reported in the Telegraph-Journal he had this to say:

I must say, however, that as regards the expansion of our potato industry, that the minister of agriculture—

He is referring to the provincial minister.

—has done the best he could, but has met with a refusal to cooperate from certain interests and by a cold-blooded and refractory attitude by the dominion government.

I know those remarks are not justified in so far as they relate to the federal government, but I just wanted to point out to the minister the form of criticism which is likely to materialize in New Brunswick if something is not done by this government to bring about a better marketing of our huge crop of potatoes. I urge the minister either to introduce legislation during the present session or to give such assurance regarding marketing as may be necessary to put our farmers at rest in connection with this problem which is so vital to them. I want to emphasize the importance of their having something definite in this connection before seeding gets underway in my province, and that is the reason I am speaking tonight.

If we are to rely entirely on the Agricultural Prices Support Act should our 1947 crop turn out to be as heavy as the 1946 crop, what will be the policy of the board in assisting the farmers? I wish to warn the minister that, although the steps taken last fall were sound and he is to be commended for taking them, any purchasing which may be done by the government in order to relieve a situation similar to the one we had this winter will have to be done before May 1, and even before April 1, if it is to be of any real assistance to the farmer. The peak price for potatoes is reached about March 1, and I submit that any future policy similar to the one adopted last year should provide for a date not later than March 1. How the date of May 1 was arrived at last fall I do not know, but there has been considerable criticism along the Saint John river as to what occurred when a high official of this Department of Agriculture went there. I do not wish to air that criticism on the floor of the house, but if the minister wishes I shall be glad to tell him confidentially what the farmers are complaining about, and, in my opinion, rightly so.

The easiest and the wisest way to overcome all this difficulty is to provide marketing legislation during the present session. I submit that a potato marketing board could be operated with a minimum of cost to the government and a maximum of efficiency for our farmers. I know some hon. members will say that this is socialistic legislation. Personally I do not care very much about words and definitions; what I am interested in is results. After all, it is hardly conceivable to have a state 100 per cent socialistic or 100 per cent private enterprise. The business of any government should be to strike a happy medium between those two extreme views. We have already nationalized a number of the utilities and services in this country, and with good results. In any event, this marketing board would not be any more socalistic than the wheat board and the other boards which, in my opinion, are performing useful functions. Before leaving this point I wish to urge the minister once more to tell our farmers what they may depend upon next year in the nature of assistance against the possibility of a situation similar to that which prevailed until a few weeks ago in New Brunswick.

Before resuming my seat I wish to make a few comments on some of the criticisms which were voiced by some of the members of the opposition. As we say in French, "A tout seigneur tout honneur". I shall begin with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). In his able speech he used the word "disappointment" very often. To those of us who were sitting on this side of the house it was easy to read disappointment on the faces of the Conservative members when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced the reduction in personal income taxes. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) previously had advocated a cut of thirty per cent. He made sure that the target was too high to be reached by the Minister of Finance, but when it turned out that the average reduction was twenty-nine per cent our hon. friends opposite were very much disappointed and their disappointment was evident on their faces.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred, with tears in his eyes, to the middle class which was not being properly looked after, and he defined that middle class as those with incomes between $3,000 and $7,500. What should be understood by the term "middle class" is not easy to determine. One might think it referred to the middle third of our population from the income point of view, and a more liberal interpretation might take in a larger proportion, possibly the fifty per cent of the middle group between the lower and the higher income brackets. But no matter how we look at it, I cannot agree with the hon. member as to where this middle class should fit in to the scale of income earners.

During the 1946 session the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) placed on Hansard a letter received from the bureau of statistics over the signature of Mr. J. L. Forsyth, statistician. From this letter it appears that according to the 1941 census 32·9 of all wage-earners in Canada had an income of less than $450 a year—that is for the year from June 1, 1940 to June 1, 1941—31·6 per cent had an income of less than $950; 91·5 per cent had an income of less than $1,950, and there were only 6·8 per cent in receipt of incomes over $1,950 a year. Assuming that those figures would require revision upwards in order to bring them in line with present-day wages, I think it is fair to assume that possibly today 75 per cent instead of 91·5 per cent, as in 1941, do not earn more than $2,000.

If we look at the problem from the point of view of income tax returns filed for the year 1945 we find that there are only 165,000 taxpayers with incomes between $3,000 and $7,500, which is much less than seven per cent of the total number of income taxpayers and is only 1·4 per cent of the total population of Canada. In addition, there are 34,500 income taxpayers paying on incomes of $7,500 or more. If we take all taxpayers with net incomes of $3,000 or more we find that they represent about eight per cent of the total taxpayers, and only about 1·7 per cent of the total population. I submit that those figures establish conclusively that the middle class referred to by the financial critic of the opposition cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be considered as a truly middle class of our population. It may be said at the most that it constitutes the middle class of the top five or six per cent in the upper income brackets. As I look at those figures I come to the conclusion that what I consider our middle class is practically income tax exempt, at least so far as married people are concerned, and it is with those people that the government should be primarily concerned.

The hon. gentleman mentioned that much of our foreign trade is made possible only by the fact that we lend money. According to an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), and, I think, filed during the present session, it appears that our exports for 1946 amounted roughly to $2,300 million as against $1,900 million for our imports, leaving a favourable trade balance of some $400 million.

Our loans to Great Britain and to other European countries amounted to something in the neighbourhood of $2 billion, of which $648 million were used up in 1946. The loan clearly contemplated—and no one knows this better than the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario—and may I say I am sorry he is not in his seat—

Mr. CASSELMAN: He is ill, as a matter of fact.

Mr. MICHAUD: The loan contemplated that, to the extent and for the duration of the loan period, we should carry out this loan to a very large extent by our excess of exports over our imports. How could it be done otherwise? Would the hon. gentleman find it better business if our imports had balanced evenly with our exports, with the result that we should have had to advance in actual cash the whole sum of $648 million instead of approximately $264 million, as we actually did.

If we subtract from our total exports that portion which was made possible through lending, there are still left exports to the extent of $1,700 million, which is approximately twice our pre-war exports, and even higher than our wartime exports prior to 1942. When we bear this in mind it will be recognized that Canada is not doing too badly in the matter of foreign trade. And for that reason I cannot see any object in the remarks to which I have just referred, to the effect that our foreign trade is possible only by the fact that we lend money. When the financial critic of the opposition has to refer to this type of criticism, it strikes me that their party cannot find much that is seriously wrong with the budget.

There is just one other subject of criticism from the same hon. gentleman, which struck me most forcibly. It is his reference to the easy money policy of this government and the question of interest rates.

At page 2803 of Hansard we find the following remarks:

> For that reason I say that I believe the preservation of a strong middle class—

Again the middle class.

> —is important not merely economically but as going down to the very roots of our political being.

And further down:

> Fifty years ago the man who retired with a modest competency could get five or six per cent on it and he could reckon on living the rest of his life upon the proceeds. What happens today when he receives three per cent? And he is lucky if he gets that.

And further down:

> I suggest that this very important factor be taken into consideration—it is very important indeed—that there are large elements in the community who are suffering greatly by that policy. One other thing I would like to say in that connection. I would ask whether we can go on freeing other things and leaving the rate of interest tied down tight.

Mr. Speaker, this is where I and, I hope, the vast majority of Liberal members in the house—I am sure my hon. friends directly opposite share this view—and, I hope, the great majority of the people of this country, say we differ radically from the policy of the Progressive Conservative party.

On the other hand, I am grateful that the party has so clearly expounded its position on this important question. The hon. member fears that interest rates will remain tied down tight. I regret to say that his fears fill me with joy. Yes; I do hope that interest rates will remain tied down and will be pressed further down, and tighter. In the middle ages theologians and moralists took the view that it was sinful to charge interest on money lent. This practice was generally described as usury. The immortal drama by Shakespeare, "The Merchant of Venice", is based almost entirely on this very principle. For some reason or another the churches relaxed from this hard and fast rule, and gave tacit approval to the charging of interest. I suppose the answer of the moralist to this change of attitude as regards the ethics of charging interest might be explained in terms somewhat similar to those of the Divine Teacher when asked why, under the old law, a man was permitted to have more than one wife. When it comes to quoting scripture, I am not well versed, and I would not know where to find the passage in question. But my recollection is that the answer was somewhat along this line, that it was on account of the hardness of their hearts. Possibly it was on account of the hardness of the hearts of moneylenders that interest rates were subsequently tacitly approved by moralists and theologians.

Why should anyone be reaping interest, clipping coupons on gilt-edged securities, and sit idle, while someone else toils to pay the interest on those bonds? Why should anyone thrive, in that manner, on the fat of the land? Our present-day civilization, with its highly developed economic and financial system, makes it possible for a person to set aside for the future the proceeds of his labour, in excess of his immediate wants. This excess of his productive activity he can convert into money or liquid assets, and tuck it away in absolute safety to be used at some future time. This happy state of affairs was hardly possible centuries ago, and it is not likely possible in countries which have not reached our degree of civilization, as, for instance, great portions of Asia and Africa.

But the fact that our society makes this situation possible should be sufficient reward for the saver. Therefore there should be no necessity for paying him, in addition, juicy interest in the nature of additional reward for his savings. Please bear in mind that in speaking about interest in this vein I have in mind gilt-edged securities, such as government bonds, and so on. There are a great many people in this country who think as I do. May I just refer to one of them for the time being. Every member in the house knows, or should know, about Wilfred C. Krug, who, every once in a while, writes open letters and advises the Minister of Finance and parliament how to handle money situations. I had heard of this gentleman some time before coming to this house, and I agreed with him almost entirely on financial matters. For that reason I save every letter that comes from him, and commend his writings to the attention of all those who are eager to listen to the other side of the story. Much as I should like to quote extensively from Mr. Krug, I shall confine myself to just two paragraphs which appeared in a letter reproduced in the Windsor Daily Star of March 26, 1947:

> While we detest the reparation policy that Russia is trying to impose on conquered countries, we completely overlook the burden that was imposed upon the Canadian people as a result of the war. A sum of $481,207,000 annually is being exacted from the Canadian people in the form of interest on the national debt. It is a form of reparation demanded by a creditor class for loaning money to help win the war. While those who stayed at home loaned their money at interest, one million Canadians offered their lives without interest. This creditor class will receive approximately $10,000 million interest (reparation) during the coming twenty years and the debt will still remain unpaid. The class will profit year after year because of war. "The burden will continue to be onerous not only for us but for the next two or three generations" unless we do something sensible about the matter.

While we condemn Russia for the violation of the rights of people in other countries, it behooves us to make sure that the rights of our own Canadians are observed here in Canada. These rights are not observed when the Canadian people are taxed $481,207,000 annually in order to permit a creditor class to profit year after year from war. By refunding the national debt, as it matures, through the Bank of Canada, we can get rid of the interest burden. The Bank of Canada has been used to finance $1,868,000,000 of the national debt. It can be used to finance the remaining $15,000 million as well.

I know the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and most of his colleagues would not be able to subscribe to the views of Mr. Krug. I am particularly glad, however, that the Conservative party has placed itself on record in no uncertain terms on this much debated question of interest rates.

Mr. BENTLEY: Are you placing the Liberals on record?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am placing my views on record. If there were any doubt as to whether the Conservatives had receded to some extent from their former position as defenders of big interests and special privileges this doubt has now been completely dispelled by the speech of the financial critic of their party, and for this fact I think we should all be duly grateful.

Just one more word on this point, and it is to urge the government to use the Bank of Canada to finance our national lending as suggested by Mr. Krug. If, however, they should be unable to subscribe wholly to this view I suggest then that everything be done to bring it about slowly by reducing interest rates gradually so that eventually the same results can be achieved. In my opinion there is only one justification for interest being charged, and it is in cases where some degree of risk is involved. If I borrow money to go into business—the lender is perfectly justified in charging me interest at a rate commensurate with the risk involved, but where there is no risk, as in government bonds, I fail entirely to see the reason for the payment of interest, at least at more than a nominal rate. I think my time has expired. Much as I should like to continue I shall conclude.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): This budget reminds me somewhat of the weather; very few people like it; everybody talks about it, and the only one who can do anything about it does not seem to want to. However, speaking in support of the subamendment moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I desire to use most of my time in dealing with the budget and its effects on the farmers of this country. But before doing so, may I make a few observations of a general nature?

First, I wish to repeat what I have said on many previous occasions, that the first charge on the production of a nation must be a decent standard of living for those people who make that production possible. A corollary to that is the fact that a nation's greatness is judged by how well it provides for the aged, the sick, and those suffering from physical handicaps. This was so ably presented by my colleagues, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), that I need not enlarge on it. But I wish to underline their questions wherein they asked why this government is so reluctant to establish the social security programme outlined prior to the dominion-provincial conferences; I would even go farther and add, at least with those provinces that have shown their willingness to cooperate by signing an agreement.

While we all enjoyed the able speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), yet it was astounding to many of us that a man in such a responsible position could adopt such an air of easy indifference to the needs of so many people. For example, he said, as reported on page 2554 of Hansard:

> The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada. Consequently it can be said that any person who pays income tax now has more than an average income, taking his or her marital and dependent status into account.

As my leader so ably proved in his statement which appears on page 2809 of Hansard, the present exemptions are below bare living requirements. Is any greater indictment needed of our present financial and economic system than that, in the peak years of national production and income, over half of our people earning incomes should be forced to exist on substandard levels? But our Minister of Finance blandly goes on in the style of a barker for Ringling Brothers. A person could almost hear him say, "Hurry, hurry, hurry; come this way and see the biggest freak of the year." Just listen to what he said on page 2554 of Hansard:

> I am consequently proposing to make a substantial reduction in taxation in this budget. Moreover I am proposing to concentrate this reduction almost entirely in the field of personal income tax.

If the general public fall for that kind of shell game, then P. T. Barnum's famous words are true. The minister said that he was proposing to concentrate the reduction in taxation almost entirely in the field of personal income tax, while conveniently obscuring the fact that he was piling another $10 million reduction on the $279 million melon that big business had presented to them in the previous budget. In addition to this, the excess profits tax will disappear entirely before this fiscal year is over, which, in the ultimate end, means that the personal income taxpayer is at the short end of the bargain.

When we look at the table on page 2552 of Hansard we find that the Minister of Finance expects a revenue of $325 million from the sales tax, which is an increase of $27 million above last year. It must be borne in mind, as has been pointed out on previous occasions, that the sales tax bears most heavily on those who can least afford it, and should have been reduced or entirely eliminated from everything except those articles which are out-and-out luxuries. But in his hurry to eliminate the excess profits tax the minister could not see his way clear to do so. He even turned a deaf ear to the kiddies in their plea, and continues to filch pennies from them when they buy their pop and candies. Here is another gem from the minister's speech at page 2559 of Hansard:

A short time ago in this house I urged Canadian business men to reduce their prices as their volume and efficiency of business expand. I stated that it is neither proper nor even good business to charge all the traffic will bear. I want to emphasize that view again now. We in the government, and the vast majority in this house and in this country—

I believe he took in too much territory there, I may interject.

—believe in what is now called "free enterprise." We believe in it not as a windy doctrine or a mystic ideology, but as a sensible way of getting things done.

I will prove to him before I am through what that is worth.

It must prove itself and justify itself by its results. With the orderly removal of controls, with increasing supplies of material, with efficient and cooperative labour—

He does not want much, does he?

—and with ample markets, Canadian business enterprise is in a most favourable situation. We all expect it to show its mettle both in production and in marketing. We expect it to show its ability to keep down costs and prices.

And how, I may interject.

In its own long-run interest, as well as in the national interest, business must keep its prices down and its profits within reason.

What a hope! Yes, what a hope! I have here a clipping from the Rural Co-operator entitled "Surprise":

It is only a year ago that the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, then Minister of Finance, solemnly told parliament that the wartime prices and trade board had assured itself that even with an increase of 12½ per cent in implement prices the manufacturer would be earning for the ensuing year profits less than the average of 1936-1939. It must have been a surprise, therefore, to Mr. Ilsley when he learned the other day that Massey-Harris Company Limited had, in 1946, at $2,125,569, its highest net profit since 1929.

Later on, the same paper says:

The one-hundredth anniversary of this company is therefore an occasion for rejoicing, although perhaps more so along Bay and King streets than out on Ontario farms. One index of the progress of Massey-Harris during 1946 was a net gain of four points in the listed value of the common stock. This meant a gain of thirty per cent on capital for anyone who shrewdly bought at the beginning of the year and sold at the end of the year—and, it should be borne in mind, such a gain would be untaxable income. Let a farmer buy a herd of purebred cattle at the beginning of the year and sell the same animals at the end of the year at thirty per cent gain—and he finds the profit on buying and selling that stock is taxable income.

The Rural Co-operator says further:

There would be more justice and wisdom in taxing the speculator's gain and exempting the farmer's.

I most heartily concur in that statement. This is not the only company that showed these profits. Just before I came to the chamber there was a slip on my desk referring to the Toronto Star of May 6, wherein it is said that an average increase of 54.9 per cent in net profits is revealed in the annual reports for 1946 of twenty-seven industrial companies. Again I say to the minister, what a hope!

We in this group and most of the organized farmers agreed to the wheat agreement, believing that the government would hold the price line on the cost of living and production. But the government's action during past weeks caused many of us to believe that once again we have been betrayed, and this budget proves that suspicion. I wish that every farmer in the country could read the speech of the Minister of Finance and then read the one by my leader, the member for Rosetown-Biggar, because I am certain that at least eighty per cent of those farmers would vote for our subamendment wherein we express regret that the government failed to raise income tax exemptions and failed to make provision so as to enable more than half the population who are compelled to live on incomes below the present exemptions to have an opportunity to improve their standards of living.

The farming industry has more than its share of those who must live on a substandard level. I have here a table compiled from figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics. These figures show that, according to the 1941 census, farm operators comprised seventeen per cent of the country's workers; yet in that year they received only 9.6 per cent of the national income. Here are the percentages for several other years:

Year	Per cent
1938	10·7
1939	11·6
1940	10·4
1941	9·6
1942	13·2
1943	11·0
1944	12·8
1945 (Preliminary estimate)	11·0

That is not all. I have here a copy of sessional paper No. 228, dated April 14, 1947, being a return to a motion of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). It discloses this information, showing the number of farmers who filed income tax papers in the years listed and the number of those who were not assessable:

Year	Number filing income tax returns	Number not assessable
1939-40	8,927	7,572
1940-41	18,918	16,783
1941-42	29,281	22,506
1942-43	29,741	22,227
1943-44	68,791	48,544
1944-45	104,588	75,459
1945-46	136,039	82,731

I may say, too, that this return shows the amount of money collected from farmers for income tax in various provinces. This is interesting. The following amounts were paid by farmers in the fiscal year 1945-46.

Ontario	$1,086,179
Manitoba	1,866,590
Saskatchewan	2,587,632
Alberta	1,114,000

All the other provinces put together paid in from the farmers in income tax sums amounting to only chicken-feed, including the province of British Columbia.

Mr. REID: Have you British Columbia?

Mr. BURTON: The British Columbia farmers paid $317,025 in that year. All the other provinces including British Columbia contributed very little compared with the amount paid by these provinces in the way of income tax, which goes to show that those provinces in the farming industry are not so hot as some people would lead us to believe they are. I have not the time to go into all the figures contained in this return, but I can assure the house that it is interesting. Furthermore, I have here a return which was tabled, sessional paper No. 228 D, moved for by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and dated May 1. The figures in that return are brought up to date on percentages and so on. Of the 652,928 farm operators as per the 1941 census, 20·8 per cent filed income tax papers for 1945-46; and, mark you this, only 8·2 per cent of those were assessable, while 12·6 per cent were not assessable. While some of the remaining 80 per cent, or very near that percentage, that did not file returns may be taxable, yet with the severe penalties attached for failure to do so, it is safe to assume that the majority of those whose net income were above the exemption figures have filed their returns.

I contend that the information contained in those two returns once again proves that the farmers of this country have not received their fair share of the national income. It must also be borne in mind that many of the farmers who have been assessed are treated in an unfair manner, because in most cases the small net income on which the farmer must pay a tax is the combined income of two, three or sometimes more members of the family. There are also quite a number of other cases where the income tax regulations place an undue handicap on the farmers. I may say that in this morning's mail I received from one of my constituents a letter, part of which I should like to read for the benefit of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) as well as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). Again this is only an example, one of hundreds if not thousands of similar cases throughout the country. Here is what this man had to say:

> We hauled water winter and summer for twenty years, round trip of four and a half miles for all the stock until 1944 when we drilled a well that in all cost us approximately $900. We were on the point of selling this farm for what we could get for it, and move elsewhere; now my son is willing to carry on right here. I know of two near neighbours contemplating drilling wells this summer. but because of no income tax deduction on it are hesitating; they think they would rather reduce their stock and buy some power equipment instead, which I think is a mistake. I think a drilled well should have a ten-year scale of deduction.

With that and with many other things along that line I most heartily agree. But again time presses and I need not bring more cases to the attention of the ministers. Surely if they look for them, they can find them.

I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members what Mr. W. A. Drummond, a Canadian agricultural economist, had to say, namely:

> Canadian agricultural history shows that with few exceptions it has not been possible to secure enough revenue from any single branch of farm enterprise to keep the farmer and his family throughout the twelve months and to do it consistently year after year.

Is it not strange that an outstanding victim of capitalism is the little man, be he farmer or small businessman? These are the people who would practise private enterprise in its true sense, were it not for the stranglehold that monopoly capitalism exercises on our national economy. Economically, farmers are still little men. They are, therefore, one of the most consistent victims of our present capitalist order. That fact is the underlying reason for the recurring agriculture crisis in our generation. Very often, when spokesmen for big business are talking to the farmers, they try to lead them to believe that we in the C.C.F. would take their farms from them. This is not true. It has been denied officially on many occasions, but still that malicious campaign is going on in some parts of the country. Therefore I wish to deal briefly with the C.C.F. agriculture policy, which is the fourth plank in the Regina manifesto, and I quote:

4. Agriculture.

Security of tenure for the farmer upon his farm—

Let me repeat that, "upon his farm."

—on conditions to be laid down by individual provinces; insurance against unavoidable crop failure; removal of the tariff burden from the operations of agriculture; encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives; the restoration and maintenance of an equitable relationship between prices of agricultural products and those of other commodities and services; and improving the efficiency of export trade in farm products.

The security of tenure for the farmer upon his farm which is imperilled by the present disastrous situation of the whole industry, together with adequate social insurance, ought to be guaranteed under equitable conditions.

The prosperity of agriculture, the greatest Canadian industry, depends upon a rising volume of purchasing power of the masses in Canada for all farm goods consumed at home, and upon the maintenance of large-scale exports of the stable commodities at satisfactory prices or equitable commodity exchange.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the date of that manifesto?

Mr. BURTON: That was July, 1933, the original manifesto of the C.C.F. It has been the basis of the C.C.F. policy during all these years.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was there not a second Regina manifesto?

Mr. BENTLEY: It has not changed once since then.

Mr. BURTON: It has not changed once in so far as that policy is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: Read from the question and answer handbook.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yours?

Mr. GARDINER: The one you wrote.

Mr. COLDWELL: I didn't write it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad you didn't.

Mr. BURTON: If only one of these ministers would talk at a time, Mr. Speaker, maybe I could deal with them. I do not hesitate to deal with them, and I want to say this much as far as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is concerned. He may bring his handbook here and my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, will deal with it at any time and in any way that he wants him to.

Mr. GARDINER: I know it by heart.

Mr. BURTON: And the minister cannot get away with some of the twists that he and some of his colleagues in Saskatchewan tried to pull off at that time. So far as the Minister of Veterans Affairs is concerned, I want to say that we in the C.C.F. have our annual provincial conventions, and we have our national conventions every two years. Our organization is run from the bottom up and not from the top down, as are some other people's political organizations. I also want to say that so long as the fundamental principles which were laid down in the first manifesto issued at Regina in July, 1933, are retained and built upon, we are always prepared to make changes in detail to meet the conditions and the times.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did Agnes MacPhail quit at that meeting?

Mr. COLDWELL: You had better ask Miss Agnes MacPhail, and she will tell you herself. Ask her at the same time why she joined the C.C.F. afterward.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did she leave?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If I may ask a question, did the C.C.F. ever come out definitely for a policy of the socialization and nationalization of land in Canada?

Mr. BURTON: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister knows better. Why repeat these canards?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are not canards.

Mr. BURTON: Apparently those people who are spreading this malicious campaign about the C.C.F. do not all do it in behind the bush. At least I am glad to see some of them have enough courage to come out in the open. Some of those people do not like this Regina manifesto, because that was the first Magna Carta the farmers and ordinary people of this country had. Some people do not like to be confronted with the actual platform of the C.C.F.; they would rather go out and tell the people in and around and behind what they think the C.C.F. policy is.

Perhaps I might be allowed to go on with this manifesto. Some day I would be more than delighted to take the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to a little school we have, so that they may learn the C.C.F. policy properly. This manifesto goes on for several paragraphs to deal with the depression as it existed at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will my hon. friend permit me at some future time to produce proof that the C.C.F. party did definitely come out for a policy of the socialization and nationalization of land in Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly. Any time you can produce proof we shall be glad to see it.

Mr. BURTON: If I may be allowed to continue I should like to quote from the manifesto:

We propose therefore:

(1) The improvement of the position of the farmer by the increase of purchasing power made possible by the social control of the financial system. This control must be directed towards the increase of employment as laid down elsewhere and towards raising the prices of farm commodities by appropriate credit and foreign policies.

(2) Whilst the family farm is the accepted basis for agricultural production in Canada the position of the farmer may be much improved by:

(a) The extension of consumers' cooperatives for the purchase of farm supplies and domestic requirements; and

(b) The extension of cooperative institutions for the processing and marketing of farm products.

Both of the foregoing to have suitable state encouragement and assistance.

(3) The adoption of a planned system of agricultural development based upon scientific soil surveys directed towards better land utilization, and a scientific policy of agricultural development for the whole of Canada.

(4) The substitution for the present system of foreign trade, of a system of import and export boards to improve the efficiency of overseas marketing, to control prices, and to integrate the foreign trade policy with the requirements of the national economic plan.

In season and out of season, Mr. Speaker, we have stated that ownership of property by the individual is not only desirable but should be encouraged. Furthermore, we have frequently made it plain that private ownership of property becomes vicious and undesirable only when such ownership deprives others of similar opportunities; or, even worse, when individuals or groups of individuals use such ownership to dominate and exploit their fellow men. If spokesmen for the other parties wish to criticize our policy in that respect that is their right and privilege; but I do ask them as honourable gentlemen not to misrepresent that policy to the farmers. Or, which is just as bad, when it suits their convenience they tell others that we want to socialize the property of everybody but the farmers. Again that is not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What does that mean? What does my hon. friend mean by that remark? To socialize everyone but the farmers; and that is not true?

Mr. BURTON: That is something your friends do when it suits their convenience; they go out and tell certain people that we want to socialize the business of everybody but the farmers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And that is not true?

Mr. BURTON: That is not true.

Mr. GARDINER: Whom are you going to socialize? What are you going to socialize?

Mr. BURTON: You come to that little school some day and you will learn all about it. I just pointed out to hon. gentlemen that the whole basis of our socialization programme is that those properties which lend themselves to the domination and exploitation of other men are the properties which need to be socialized. I want to say to my hon. friends that the problems of the farmers will not be solved in the way some of them want to do it, by misrepresenting the C.C.F. policies. Nor will tactics of that kind help to solve any of our problems, national or provincial. Therefore I plead for tolerance, fair play and better understanding, that in the end we can all say we have played our fair share in an endeavour to bring about the brotherhood of man.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): In the province of Manitoba, Mr. Speaker, there are other parts as well as the constituency of Portage la Prairie. Tonight, in opening my little speech, I should like to talk for a while about a situation in the federal constituency of Churchill, and I hope and anticipate that the hon. member who represents that constituency will support me in what I have to say, and also that all hon. members from Manitoba will rise in this house and echo or at least endorse the sentiments I propose to express.

In the newspapers of Manitoba within the last few days there has been talk even of the secession of the town of Flin Flon, in Churchill riding, from the boundaries of that province. There have been meetings, not of four or five agitators but of as many as a thousand and fifteen hundred citizens, who have been discussing what they consider to be a grievance, which has assumed such proportions that I feel justified, as I am sure the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) will feel justified, in bringing it to the attention of this house. Their quarrel or grievance is this. The town of Flin Flon is an important mining centre. It has a population generally admitted to be at least ten thousand, though there was some disagreement between the people who carried out the census and the officials of the town. However I believe that is the population. Flin Flon is the entrance to an important mining area in the north. They go into that area by railroad, but they have no highway into it. They feel they are entitled to a road, and I think almost everyone who lives in Manitoba agrees with the citizens of that town in their argument.

The province of Manitoba has a problem in this connection. They have a story to tell; they have a defence to the charge made by the citizens of Flin Flon, but notwithstanding any defence the province may have the citizens of that town have a real grievance. I believe the road should be built. The answer of the province is ths. The Garson government say they do not know what it will cost. I do not think any government could be asked to build a road without the cost first being ascertained. They suggest also that they cannot get contractors to undertake this job or even surveyors to make the preliminary surveys in order to ascertain the cost. If there is really talk of secession—and I hope it is only talk because I cannot believe the people of Flin Flon really want that—the matter would, of necessity, come before this house because it would require an amendment to the Manitoba act in order to change the boundaries of that province.

If the province of Manitoba cannot get surveyors to make a survey of this desired road I think the federal government should undertake the work, whether or not the provincial authorities ask them to do so. If the provincial authorities do ask them, then I think the dominion government should agree to lend the provincial authorities the necessary engineers and surveyors to complete a preliminary survey. I suggest that the federal government should volunteer assistance in the construction of this road or at least study the situation to see whether the road could be built either under joint arrangement between the dominion and the province or solely by the dominion. It might be said that the dominion does not have to build this road because it is a provincial problem. Normally that is true, but in this country and in Manitoba the dominion government has assumed the responsibility for building roads into mining areas, and this is one of the richest mining areas in the whole dominion.

This mining area has no road at all and it is entitled to one. Roads have been built to mines, and I submit that the people of Flin Flon are justified in complaining that some government has not seen their plight and come to their rescue. I am pleading for the town of Flin Flon in the constituency of Churchill, Manitoba, because I maintain that one of the richest industries in our province is being affected by lack of road transportation into and out of Flin Flon.

The building of the road could be justified on the ground of its being an attraction to the tourist trade. We have heard of the great value to this country of the tourist trade and I ask hon. members, what would bring United States tourists and United States dollars into this country in greater numbers than a good tourist road into that vast untouched northwestern part of this country? I will leave that and I hope other hon. members from my province will take it up in their speech.

There is one matter in connection with income tax that I wish to mention tonight and I do not intend to do so in any critical way. I want to refer to a situation which has developed in the western provinces as a result of the disclosures made by the figures referred to by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton). Whether they are right or wrong does not matter; that is what the people believe. If that belief is erroneous, it should be corrected immediately. There is scarcely a farmer in Manitoba—and I venture the same is true of the farmers in Saskatchewan—who does not feel that he is being discriminated against as compared with farmers in other provinces in the collection of income tax. I can scarcely believe that there is any such discrimination, but the rumour exists and it is causing ill-feeling among the farmers of the west. That rumour should be contradicted immediately by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whoever should make the correction.

I am not arguing whether it is true or whether it is false, but our farmers believe that there are at least seven income tax assessors in the city of Winnipeg working solely on farmers' returns for Manitoba while there are only two in the city of Toronto working on farmers' returns for Ontario. If that is true I submit that the farmers of western Canada should be given exactly the same treatment as the farmers in other provinces. I am not suggesting that the Minister of National Revenue should chase the farmers of Ontario or Quebec; all I am suggesting is that these fears should be cleared up, so that the farmers of western Canada may know whether or not they are being discriminated against in the collection of income taxes. I call upon the Minister of National Revenue to tell this house frankly how many income tax assessors are working out of each income tax division and directing their full-time efforts toward a review of farmers' returns. I maintain that that is something to which this house and the farmers of this country are entitled.

There are some features about the budget that one might like. I do not think the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) is fair when he says that we on this side do not like the income tax deductions. Does he think we are fools or we are less than human? That was a childish statement which should not have been made by a man of mature years. As far as I am concerned, there are five or six objections to the budget. In the first place, I maintain that the Minister of Finance should have increased the exemptions. Had that been done, the measure of relief would have been more in keeping with what the people are entitled to.

I read what the minister said and I heard him deliver his budget speech. It was his first budget and it was the first one I heard, so that we started out together. However, on reading and re-reading what he said I cannot follow the logic of his argument. I still maintain that the proper and better method of providing relief to the people of this country would have been to raise the exemptions. The figures I suggest are $1,000 for single people and $2,000 for married people. People earning less than that should have been set aside and not taxed in any shape or form. It should have been a true exemption; it should have been set aside, regardless of the amount earned. We would then have the position where people who did not earn over $2,000 would not be taxable. The people in the middle income brackets would have had some relief through the raising of the exemptions, relief to which they were entitled.

Mr. ABBOTT: You would have had to tax them in another way; that is the only difference.

Mr. MILLER: I cannot see that argument.

[Mr. Miller.]

Mr. ABBOTT: There are not enough people earning $2,000 a year and up.

Mr. MILLER: We would suggest, perhaps in an amateurish way, that some of the seventeen departments which are showing increased expenditures should show decreases. There is one matter of local interest to me, the taxation of electrical energy. That was a wartime tax which was necessary, but from its inception it has been collected unfairly. The tax is a percentage of the electric light bill. In Manitoba, to which I should perhaps confine myself, there is Portage la Prairie, from which I come; there is the city of Brandon, not far from us, and there is the city of Winnipeg. Winnipeg has a cheap electric power rate. While the rates charged in Portage la Prairie may not be large, they are much larger than those charged in Winnipeg. As I say, these electric light bills are taxed on a percentage basis. In the city of Winnipeg the same number of kilowatt hours would bring a bill of roughly $4, as compared with $10 in the city of Portage la Prairie. We both pay a percentage, and I say that is unjust. I maintain that the tax, if it is left at all, should be on the basis of the kilowatt hours used, and not on the basis of the amount of money set out on the electric light bill. As a matter of fact, I believe the tax is unfair, anyway, and it should have been brushed off the map altogether.

I am going to join with those who said that the tax on chocolate bars and soft drinks should have been taken off. All of us have received letters from these organizations. It is quite obvious that was not a spontaneous effort on the part of the young people themselves. Nevertheless I believe their contentions have great merit. In my own city of Portage la Prairie we have a small soft drink company which employs quite a few people of whom all, I believe, are returned men and women. That industry, if nickel drinks were restored to the market, could enlarge and hire extra people.

Mr. ABBOTT: It could not get any more sugar, though.

Mr. MILLER: The sugar situation could be handled, because I do not think it is a factor, not in the soda-water business. I believe, if the price were returned to a nickel, there would be an expansion, because the whole industry has been built up on the nickel drink. The tax brings in only something like $20 million or $22 million. I believe the highest amount ever taken in was $22 million.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a lot of money.

Mr. MILLER: Yes, it is a lot of money, even to the Minister of Finance. But it is not so much, I suppose, when one talks about a budget of over $2 billion. I know the difficulties with which the minister is faced; nevertheless I am adding my voice to the voices of those who have gone before, protesting against this tax.

I am also not satisfied—and I realize I can do nothing about the matter but raise my objection tonight—that consideration has not been given by the Minister of Finance in his budget to the giving of income tax exemption rights in respect of other members of a farmer's family. I believe consideration has not been had for the fact that, to earn an amount of money, a farmer must earn it through the joint enterprise and joint effort of his wife and family on the farm. I do not believe that has been properly brought home to the people in the towns and cities. However that may be, it is true. Certainly I believe some adjustment should be worked out, so that this fact would be taken into consideration. Certainly if any of us had to bring our wives and families down to our offices to help us make our livings, we would figure out some way whereby our wives and children would receive some consideration in the matter of income tax exemptions.

I also regret that small businessmen, of whom there are many in the riding from which I come, have had little relief in the budget. I shall not enlarge upon that, but shall be content to subscribe to what was said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Drope) this afternoon. I had one of those briefs sent to me, the same as other hon. members did. However I believe much could be done to encourage small businessmen in the small towns; because, after all, during the period of hard times in the west those small businessmen had a pretty tough time of it. They can make a little money now, and I say to them, "All power to you". Let them have every encouragement we can give them.

I realize the difficulty there would be in carrying out my next suggestion; but I must express my regrets that, with his ingenuity, the Minister of Finance did not devise some ways or means of giving some sort of taxation exemption to hog raisers, so as to encourage hog production. I know that is difficult of application, and it is difficult to discriminate between classes. But at the same time it is so urgent, not only to meet our market commitments, but also in the economy of the west, that, in my humble judgment, that hog industry, which is rapidly dying out, should be encouraged. That is the way I still maintain it can best be encouraged.

There is one feature about the budget speech of the Minister of Finance which I like very much, and I want to tell him about it. That was the prophecy he made in his speech where he stated that he would remodel the present Income War Tax Act; and I think he would even change the name of it. I hope that when the new form of legislation is produced in the house it will have the twin advantage of being understandable not only by laymen but by lawyers who, up to date, have not been able to understand the income tax law.

In Portage la Prairie we have an industry of which we are proud, and I should like to say something about it. We are extremely grateful that that industry was located in our midst. It is a pilot flax fibre mill. The Department of Agriculture has built and is operating a creditable experiment in the production of flax for fibre purposes in the western provinces.

An extensive investigation was made as to where that plant should be located and, after a most thorough investigation by experienced men in that line, the city of Portage la Prairie was chosen as the site for it. I understand that it was chosen because the land surrounding Portage la Prairie had been proven to be the producer of one of the best types of fibre flax that could be produced anywhere in western Canada.

On December 21, 1945, I, in common with many citizens of Portage la Prairie and district, attended at the formal opening of that pilot flax mill. Believe me, there were few there who did not have great hopes that at last, in the city of Portage la Prairie and district, we had the mechanics of an industry which might do much not only for our own area, but for the entire province of Manitoba and, indeed, for the whole of western Canada.

Professor T. J. Harrison, chairman of the Manitoba fibre flax committee, was at the meeting, along with the minister of agriculture of Manitoba, and other notables. Professor Harrison told us why the site at Portage la Prairie had been chosen, and the reason he gave was the one I have just placed before the house.

During that time, even while the mill was under construction, there were seeded and already growing in the area surrounding the city 100 acres of fibre flax and 100 acres of oil flax. There was also a ten-acre experimental plot on the provincial government farm. This mill, as constructed, can handle, roughly, 1,000 acres; but there were never, so far as I know, 1,000 acres seeded to both kinds of flax.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What year was that?

Mr. MILLER: The mill was opened officially on December 21, 1945, and it has a capacity to handle 1,000 acres of flax. I know the mill cost over $100,000, and that it has in it the best possible equipment. There is also available equipment for harvesting flax. I am not sure of the figure, but I believe that probably the entire investment by the Dominion of Canada in that plant would be in the neighbourhood of $250,000 or $300,000.

I understand that it employs twelve or fifteen persons, including scientists who are conducting scientific experiments. As I said before, we had great hopes for that mill. We had been led to believe—and not necessarily by officials of the department—that it would be used for experiments, not altogether in connection with oil flax, but mainly in respect of fibre flax. We also calculated that when it proved that flax could be profitably raised and that it was a good type of flax, perhaps the mill would be turned over by the government to private enterprise and expanded, or perhaps the government would expand it themselves. I do not think the experimental stage has yet passed, but in any event the people of the area are slightly worried that the operations of the plant are to be curtailed. That would be a tragedy, not only to us who have, as I said, great hopes for it, but a tragedy to the whole west, because I believe it has been proved that flax to maintain a mill like this can be grown in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask where the suggestion has come from that the activities were to be curtailed?

Mr. MILLER: I am leading up to that. The suggestion has come from the farmers, because ordinarily arrangements have been made to seed, as I say, from 80 to 200 acres of flax in that area. This year no arrangements are being made with the farmers to seed any flax. At the moment fifty-six or sixty stacks of fibre flax—two I think are linseed flax—are piled up in the yard near the plant. But that flax will all be run through by August or September, and all that is in sight is ten acres of flax which is being grown on the provincial farm in the Portage la Prairie area. The board of trade of the city of Portage la Prairie are concerned because we do not want that plant to be curtailed. What we want to know—and perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will tell us that when he speaks—is what is to be the future of this mill. I should like to know if the experimental period has been completed. Is the mill to be expanded by the government? Is it to be sold to private enterprise for the purpose of expansion? Do the officials of the minister's department believe that good fibre flax can be grown in that area and in western Canada? May I just say that I am not complaining or criticizing in any shape or form the officials of the minister's department. On the contrary, I have always had the greatest courtesy and cooperation from Doctor Archibald, from the chief of the fibre division and also from the local manager of the plant at Portage la Prairie. But I suggest that the plant should not be curtailed in any way. I am hoping that it will not, because it is an industry that can do much for the west in proving that this type of flax can be grown in the west.

As I said, the whole district is proud of the mill. We are hopeful of its future and we are confident that something good for the west will come out of it. Our hope is that there will be no curtailment of its activities; that it will be expanded rather than curtailed.

I should lake to say a few words about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and they will be few because quite frankly I know not a great deal about it. I wish to make a few remarks, because I believe that the Minister of Agriculture is still considering whether he will bring in certain changes or a new act at this session. The farmers in our community, which happens to be a reasonably good one, feel that not a great deal of benefit is derived by the farmers of Manitoba from this act. They are not so unselfish as to feel, though, that they would particularly object to a continuation of the one per cent deduction from the sale price of their grains; but they believe that the adjustments of claims should be on an individual basis rather than on the block system as followed now. They would also like to have some provision put in the act for the withdrawal of the farmers of any province who would desire to withdraw from the scheme. I do not know how it could be worked out, except that I imagine it would have to be done with the permission or at the request of the provincial legislature. But I should like to have some consideration given to a provision for the withdrawal of farmers in Manitoba from the scheme if they desire to do so. I am inclined to think that if they could withdraw they would do so; certainly that is true of the most of the area which I represent, unless the act is changed to provide for individual consideration of claims rather than on the present system of the block scheme.

The income tax deductions which were announced by the minister in his budget are not too great an achievement. We were entitled to expect that there would be deductions to that extent. They are certainly nevertheless an acceptable step in the right direction, notwithstanding what might be suggested by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud).

In closing, let me urge upon the minister and upon his department that the government endeavour to economize in the year which lies ahead, so that next year they will have their financial house in order, as it should be now, and be in a position to give the people of this country additional tax reductions, not only income tax deductions but deductions in those nuisance taxes, sales taxes and other taxes which are bearing so grievously upon them.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): In rising to say a few words in the debate on the budget, I wish to preface my brief remarks by extending hearty congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who presented a very good budget in a lucid and impressive way. The minister has brought to the house, to the taxpayers, to the industrialists and to all who are concerned with the economy of the nation an encouraging message. He presented it in such a lucid way that all intelligent people can interpret and understand it, and I am sure they will appreciate it as well. I submit, as the minister himself has admitted, that the job of preparing a budget such as this, with all its virtues, was made comparatively easy because of the splendid condition in which he found the Department of Finance and the economy of the nation, owing to the efficient control afforded by his predecessor and by the series of controls which kept prices down and prevented them from sky-rocketing to altitudes which would be disastrous.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) on his splendid efforts. I join in the expression of sympathy extended to him by my colleague the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor). I really believe that we harbour in our hearts more compassion for the hon. member than did his own party because, knowing he was not physically fit on that day, they imposed an impossible task upon him. They asked him to weave a fabric of constructive criticism when they knew full well that he had not the warp or the woof to make such a garment. In spite of the fact that the workman was quite efficient, he had no material to work with.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario pictured a dim and gloomy condition for the industry and economy of the nation. His diagnosis was not correct, and when he undertook then to pronounce a prognosis for what was to occur in the future, I say that, as these two things go, particularly in medicine—I believe it is the same in politics—if your diagnosis is wrong you have very little upon which to base your prognosis.

I disagree with the hon. member's diagnosis when he pictures such a gloomy condition in our economic affairs, because certainly he knows very well, as everyone in Canada knows and as the world knows, that the economic condition in this country today is quite sound. It must be. After a comparatively short period, after the cessation of the most depleting war, we find 1,000,000 men who were engaged in war services now being placed in industrial pursuits. We find today that our external trade has reached a level that was never before attained. We find that the savings in the banks have increased by large proportions since 1939. We find a great increase in bond holdings, a great increase in life insurance. So that when one looks around him, if he is not prejudiced, I cannot understand why any person would stand up in this house or anywhere else and say that our economic and industrial condition is deplorable, when, as I said before, not only the Canadian people but people throughout the world know that our condition in that respect is sound.

I now come to a point of agreement with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, when he says that governments cannot start industries, that they are not supposed to start industries. I agree with him there. But what governments can do, and what is the responsibility of governments, is to legislate so that opportunity for the initiation and the development of industries will be made possible. On the other hand, private industry must do its share. It is not a bit of use for the government to legislate wisely or to afford opportunities for private industry unless private industry and we ourselves take advantage of that opportunity.

We will all admit that during 1946 a great many of these opportunities were not taken advantage of. At a time when the whole world was hungry, many people starving, and prices and production were at such a high rate, it was unfortunate that we in this resourceful country did not take advantage of that condition and increase production to its full limit. But our production was hampered by strikes and labour disorders and disagreements. In a resourceful country like Canada, where we are capable of consuming only one-fifth of what we are capable of producing, and with the countries of Europe in the condition in which they are today, there should be no such thing as the lowering of production with the resultant unemployment conditions that obtain.

Production and employment are, I believe, the elixirs of the life of a nation, and if we are to bring about peace and prosperity in this country these are the two factors which we must consider as essential. On the other hand, there is no use in asking the primary producer or the industrialist to increase production if the facilities which warrant that production are not afforded. Let us take a few of our primary producers. Take the fisherman, for instance. He is an important element of our producing population, and it is no use asking him to increase his production if he has not an entrance to his harbour; if he has not adequate wharfage room in order to land and process his fish. If he has to leave his boat out to the mercy of the winds and waves; if he has not proper shelter for his boats; if he has not some centre of refrigeration where he can feel secure that he has bait in order to carry on his operations, he cannot produce.

In the constituency where I live and where fishing is carried on to a comparatively high degree, I know of instances, at the time when fish are schooling—I am speaking of shore fishing—when for want of bait the fishermen's production is nil. They should have the facilities. Another thing that should be afforded at certain points along the fishing coast is life-boats, so that the fishermen would have security when they are out and are caught in a storm, in order that they may have a chance to save their lives. I know what happens along that shore. Men who have only comparatively small boats are afraid to go out any distance, but they would certainly undertake to go and increase production greatly if they had that security.

So much for the fishermen. I would say that in the same way every stimulus should be given to the farmer. He must be given every opportunity and every inducement not only to remain on his farm but to increase his production. I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said with regard to the marshlands. I think it was he who referred to them. I believe that this is something which should receive the attention of the Department of Agriculture this year. I am not finding any fault with the assistance which is given to the prairie farmers; in fact, if I were going to make any comment, I would say that it should be increased. I believe that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be extended so as to deal with the whole of the Dominion of Canada.

Not only do I refer to the marshlands, but we have another menacing agency bringing about destruction of our lands along our river shores. Right in the community where I live, the farmers who have intervale land are every year losing acres and acres of it through erosion and ice floes. I think I would be safe in saying that there are some farmers who had twenty acres of intervale land when I went there twenty-five years ago but who, I believe, have not half that amount left today. I know for a fact that the farmers along these rivers have done everything they could to protect their land, but so much damage has been done and so many inroads have been made on the land that today it is impossible for the individual farmer to cope with the problem. When this act is extended, which I hope will be this year, circumstances like this should be taken into account.

As far as the lumber industry is concerned, I believe I can say that in Nova Scotia our production is greater than the demand. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), who suggested the other day that it would be to the advantage of the lumbermen of Nova Scotia if the export quota were increased.

I now come to the mining industry. That is one of our greatest problems in the maritimes. In a country with a climate like that of Canada, everyone will realize that the production of coal is essential. We all know what happens in countries where shortages of coal obtain, as in England. We found that the coal industry there was almost paralyzed. We found that lighting had to be rationed and, what was more deplorable, that there were a great many cold children and people living in those areas.

I understand that most of our coal reserves are in Alberta. We have coal in the maritimes and in British Columbia, but in those areas the mining of coal is difficult and costly. Another drawback with respect to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal is that we are so far removed from our natural markets. This makes transportation an impotrant part of the operation. It is therefore no wonder that the coal problem, particularly in the maritime provinces, has been one of our greatest political and economic troubles.

We have the problem of supplying coal for our home needs and of maintaining a market. The problem is that we must endeavour to maintain not only a supply for our own needs, but a lasting and profitable market in the only place where we can dispose of our coal. We will all admit that the coal miner is a vital part of our economy, and it so happens that he is subjected to more danger in his operations, possibly, than any other person engaged in any other industry. The maritime coal problem is complicated just now by strikes, and this, of course, is one of the vital and serious matters of today. Before the strike was declared, the problem was complicated by a lowering of our production. When production is lowered, the cost of producing rises proportionately. Some people, who are not likely well qualified to judge, blame the miners; some others, who are equally unqualified to find the cause, blame the operating companies. I can say that the miners in the maritime provinces have been accepting a wage which has been consistently lower than that paid to the United States miner or the British Columbia miner.

There is another feature which should be mentioned. The average age of the miner in the maritime provinces is higher than that in either the United States or British Columbia. As far as the companies are concerned, it is a fact that the location of the coal seams makes it difficult to reach them and expensive to work them. There is another factor. I do not know whether it is the fault of the company or not, but, as I understand it, they are now operating on lines which were laid down many years ago. So I say that the companies are quite justified in pointing out their physical handicaps, and the miners are equally justified in pointing out what I have stated before, namely, their lower wage level, their higher average age and the fact that figures on absenteeism must be examined with great care.

Finding a solution for a problem involving so many factors is not going to be easy, and we have not too much time in which to do it; for it is generally accepted that, unless some remedy is soon forthcoming, the mining industry of the maritime provinces is headed for disaster. This disaster would affect the maritimes first and most seriously, but eventually its effect would be felt all over this dominion; and many of the effects would be profound. Therefore I say that it becomes a problem for the entire nation. After all, the prosperity of Canada depends upon the accumulated prosperity of the major factors. Therefore I would say that, in the emergent need for a solution of this serious national problem, the best planning efforts of the coal industry itself, the miners' unions and the government should be coordinated and combined. If we are to maintain the industry, we must have it so arranged that the miner must get a fair wage, the company must have a fair profit and coal must be produced at such a price that it will be competitive with other coals which will appear on the only market we have.

The coal problem is not the only serious difficulty confronting the maritimes, for we now have the problem of unemployment. During the war period we had no unemployment in Nova Scotia. We had no war projects, but enlistment for war service and war work outside the maritimes provided employment for our people. There is one project which was mooted years ago and was promised priority after the war. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to this project in his speech this evening. It is a project which has been proved feasible by competent engineers, a project to which we look hopefully to relieve our unemployment and the resultant exodus of young people from our province. I refer to the spanning of the strait of Canso. This will cost some money, but the amount required will be comparatively small, compared with the amounts spent in other parts of the dominion for projects not so strongly indicated; and it must be remembered that these other projects were far from Nova Scotia but we never hesitated or complained about paying our full share of their cost.

Apart from the benefits which would accrue directly to Cape Breton and the whole of the maritime provinces, and indirectly to the whole dominion, this project has an economic value. If I had time I could show by authentic figures that the savings to be made by eliminating the cost of operating the Canadian National ferry and the highway ferries over a reasonable period of years would more than equal the interest and sinking fund which would be necessary to defray the capital cost. I believe this is a business proposition for the government. The completion of this project will render a long delayed service. It was promised as one of the first postwar undertakings. The plan is feasible; it is of national importance; it is economical. Thousands of our people are idle, so that there should be no delay in getting the project under way. Full employment and full production were two important factors in Canada's successful war effort. The same two factors are equally essential in this conflict on rehabilitation and reconstruction.

I have no doubt that the government has a complete realization of all this, and my reference is for the purpose of emphasis. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, nor is a nation stronger than its major component parts. The maritimes are one of the major component units of this great confederation. They have contributed their share to the cost of public works in other parts of the dominion. They should not be forgotten when their needs are greatest, when they ask for the public works they so greatly need and so richly deserve, particularly when the project for which they ask is for the good and benefit of the whole dominion.

On motion of Mr. McCann the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 9, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) presented the first report of the special committee on radio broadcasting, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISABLED VETERANS ATTENDING UNIVERSITY—FULL TRAINING ALLOWANCE AND FULL PENSION

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table P.C. 1668, amending the regulations under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act. The effect is to allow pensioners in receipt of training benefit to be paid full pension and full training allowance. Hitherto a disability pensioner on training benefit has received less than the combined maximum.

Where there are dependents the pensioner will receive the full augmentation of training allowances applicable to dependents as heretofore and the total amount of pension to which he is entitled as a single man.

This amendment will ease the lot of disabled veterans attending university or other training courses and will, we hope, encourage others to take training.

The regulations permit outside earnings up to $75 a month, but the disabled veteran is less able than his physically fit companion to take advantage of this legislation. By allowing him to receive the full amount of both pension and allowances, we remove what has proved to be a real handicap upon the pensioner.

[Mr. McGarry.]

Mr. FULTON: May I ask the minister when the order in council which he has just tabled will become effective, and whether its provisions are retroactive in effect?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The provisions are effective forthwith, but they will not be retroactive.

FUEL OIL

STATEMENT ON DOMESTIC SUPPLY POSITION

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should make a statement on fuel oil. Last summer I convened a meeting of the various oil producing and distributing companies for the purpose of reviewing the domestic fuel oil situation. Hon. members will recall that at that time there was very serious concern about our coal supply, arising partly because of the coal strike in the United States and partly because of the shipping strike on the great lakes.

The oil companies agreed that if they were given assistance in the creation of storage facilities, they could meet the increasing demand for domestic fuel oil. Assistance was rendered by the steel controller to the oil companies and to the burner manufacturers. As a result, a considerable number of heating units were installed in domestic establishments throughout Canada.

I am now advised that the fuel oil supply for the next heating season is definitely limited, and that the producers and distributors will not be able to cope with the greatly increased demand. In fact it has been stated by some of the companies that there may be difficulty in providing oil to existing customers.

The demand for fuel oil has become so acute that even were it possible to provide substantially increased storage facilities, it is most unlikely that adequate supplies of oil could be imported or produced.

The government has no control at present over the production and distribution of fuel oil. Responsibility for supply rests wholly on the oil companies and their agents. I am bringing the matter to the attention of the house in order that the Canadian public may be warned of the situation that obtains. In our view, any householder who is proposing to instal an oil burner or oil burning space heater in his home should first make sure that he has a firm contract for the supply of fuel oil directly with the manufacturer or importer of fuel oil, or a contract that otherwise clearly ensures a supply of fuel oil from these suppliers.

CEMENT

AVAILABILITY TO VETERANS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser): "Can the minister tell the house what is being done by the department to see that veterans are able to secure cement in order to construct their houses?" As my hon. friend knows, veterans have full priority in obtaining materials for house building. Examination of our records indicates that we have no applications from veterans for cement priorities in the Peterborough area. On a national basis cement is not in as short supply as formerly, and if the veterans in Peterborough will apply to the controller of priorities for assistance it will be forthcoming.

Mr. FRASER: May I ask the minister a question on that? The veteran is allowed priority if he has his house 50 per cent completed. What about the cement for the first 50 per cent?

Mr. HOWE: I may tell my hon. friend that today the veteran has full priority in house building. The 50 per cent requirement has been eliminated.

Mr. FRASER: Further in reference to the statement made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that full preference was given to the veteran building his own house, will the minister tell the house when the regulation was changed from 50 per cent to full priority?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say the exact date, but I shall be glad to look it up. The notice does not seem to have received wide attention; therefore I shall make a statement in the house.

Mr. STEPHENSON: May I address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply? In the course of his statement he made reference to full priority being given to veterans. It is possible that veterans may have to get their nails from the local hardware stores. Will something be done to see that equitable distribution of nails is made to the hardware stores so that the veterans can get nails?

Mr. HOWE: Under the system of full priority the veteran will get priority on nails. Arrangements will be made to see that nails are available to him.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

VANCOUVER AIRPORT—PROPOSAL TO TRANSFER FACILITIES TO ABBOTSFORD

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) asked whether the Pacific terminal of Trans-Canada Air Lines could be moved from Vancouver airport to Abbotsford. I am afraid that the citizens of Vancouver would object, and I cannot promise him that that will be done.

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON ELECTORAL DISTRICT TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): With the leave of the house I present to the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled the petition of a number of Canadian and British subjects residing in Yukon, petitioning parliament that the district of Mackenzie and Northwest Territories be not included in or added to the electoral district of Yukon, and stating their reasons for the petition.

HOUSING

ELIMINATION OF VETERANS' PREFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply take this question as a notice? A report has just reached me that returned men in New Westminster and the Fraser Valley are complaining that priority credits have been eliminated and that all subsidiary preference given to them at the beginning of the year is now gone. Many of them are being cut off supplies.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall investigate the situation. Certainly it is not the policy of the department to cut off any veterans' preferences, and if anything has happened to that end I shall see that it is corrected.

PATENT ACT

PROVISIONS FOR EXTENSIONS OF TIME—SECRECY—ADJUSTMENT OF TARIFF FEES

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 16, to amend the Patent Act, 1935.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Secretary of State whether the amendments which the senate have made to this bill are acceptable to the government? In addition perhaps he might explain the change of date, which I notice in various places, and which corrects or alters the date the government originally proposed.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): When the bill was first introduced it was to provide extension of time for the taking of certain actions required by the Patent Act. The bill has not passed as rapidly as had been hoped when it was first introduced, with the result that it is now necessary to extend the dates. The amendments provide the full time which it is believed should be given to the holders of patents. The government is prepared to accept the amendments.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my sole purpose in taking part in this budget debate this afternoon is to refute and correct some extravagant and inaccurate statements made in connection with departmental expenditures, statements made by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) during the debate on May 6, and to answer a charge made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) when he spoke in this debate on May 7. However, before dealing with these two specific subjects I wish to make a few general observations on the budget as I see it, and as have been conveyed to me by my constituents since the budget was delivered.

It may well be said that "Solomon in all his wisdom" could not fashion a budget that would please everyone. In times like these it is difficult for governments in framing taxation policy to be both popular and wise. The government and the Minister of Finance, I submit, deserve to be congratulated on both counts.

This budget has been acclaimed as a popular budget, and the government has shown courage and statesmanship in the policy which it has pursued. The general reaction to the budget has been favourable if one can take as a criterion the press comments and public conversation which one hears from day to day. It is true that there have been a few blasts of criticism in the house from the opposition. In the main they have been ineffectual and they have only helped to confirm in the public mind the merits of the proposals put forth by the government.

Interest in this budget centres of course upon the changes in taxation. This budget gives nine out of every ten taxpayers a 29 per cent reduction in income tax. Indeed, a great number get much more than that, up to as high as 54 per cent in the lowest brackets, and all told $110 million has been lopped off the collective income tax payments. As compared with the previous rates of 1942, the new rates announced represent an over-all reduction of 51 per cent in the total personal income tax burden of the Canadian people.

Tax relief has been given where tax relief was most needed, to the earners of wages or of medium salaries. I think it can be safely said that our middle class population and people on fixed salaries benefited less from war conditions and suffered more from war taxes than any other class. The budget is framed to ease the burden on those in this income category, which includes young professional and scientific men.

Relief too, and often more substantial relief, has gone to the wage earner. Under the budget of last year 550,000 workers and recipients of small incomes were absolved from taxes. That was brought about by raising the income tax exemption of $750 for single people and $1,500 for married people, which was made applicable from January 1.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you do about them this year?

Mr. McCANN: I will tell you if you listen. Just be patient. There have been no further changes in exemptions, but under the present proposed reductions a married man with two children who earns $1,800 a year will pay this year only $16. Surely this cannot be considered unreasonable. In a great many instances the amounts of reduction have been equivalent to a ten cent per hour rise in wages.

The opposition have been urging the raising of income tax exemptions. It is very evident that they have followed this policy with an eye purely to the political rather than to economic consequences. It is true that there have been no immediate gifts for business. The excess profits tax remains for the present but will go at the end of the calendar year. The corporation tax remains at 30 per cent now compared with 40 per cent throughout the war years. Business men may complain, but they should try to remember that under existing taxes business has been doing very well. The corporation tax may be high and the excess profits tax high, but the fact remains that even after paying corporation taxes and providing for excess profits, most of our business enterprises have been showing substantial profits and doing far better than before the war, and in many cases much better than during the war years. Their statements prove what I have said. Furthermore, business must remember that the government has to find its money somewhere, that in the long run nothing could be more harmful to business than for the government to have an unbalanced budget.

This year we have been in the very happy position of having a surplus of $354 million.

An hon. MEMBER: Where did it come from?

Mr. McCANN: Where did it come from? From taxation and from the sale of some surplus materials we had left over from the war and which gentlemen opposite of your party wanted as gifts to the municipalities to which you belong. In addition, we have been able to reduce the public debt by $354 million. I submit that that is good business and that that is the policy which should be followed when times are as good as they are at present.

A nation is no different from an individual, and any individual who does not attempt to liquidate his debts when his earning power is good, when times are good, has not the first rudiments of business instinct.

I have been in this house now, Mr. Speaker, for a period of twelve years. I have listened to a dozen or more budgets, and I think I can honestly say that this is the first time I have listened to a budget when there has not been one cent of new taxation. That I think should be borne in mind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the house that the hon. member who has the floor should not be interrupted without his permission. Moreover, anyone who wishes to interrupt an hon. member should rise and ask permission to do so.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer for a moment to the amendments made by the official opposition and the C.C.F. party. I submit that the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means ought to be passed unanimously by this house. Furthermore, I do not think that so much time should be spent on this budget debate. In the British house the debate on the budget was completed and the budget items put through all stages of committee in a period of three days. We could well emulate the example which the British house has set.

With reference to the budget amendments that have been made, what is the position should these amendments carry? It means that the government goes out of business and before a new government can come in or the same government comes back it will be impossible to implement the provisions of the budget which give reductions to hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country—reductions which come into effect on the first of July. I submit to you that the opposition and the C.C.F. party, in their amendment and in their subamendment, and in voting as they will, deny to the people of the country, the taxpayers, the right to these tax concessions which have been put into effect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I revert to the matter with which I said I would deal, the statements of the hon. member for Peterborough West. In his speech on May 6, in dealing with a great variety of subjects, he spoke of circuses and of his experience in carrying water for elephants. This may be the background for his statement. He likes dealing with big things. He compared the national film board to an elephant, and a white elephant at that. He evidently concedes some purity in the organization.

Mr. FRASER: There is very little.

Mr. McCANN: He said this year the white elephant is asking for $819,409 more than last year. This statement is inaccurate and extravagant. Had the hon. gentleman examined the estimates he would have found that actually the estimates for the present fiscal year are $211,274 less than a year ago.

Mr. FRASER: Not on ordinary expenses.

Mr. McCANN: The government policy in regard to the national film board is one of retrenchment, both as to expenditure and as to personnel. The hon. gentleman is more than $1,000,000 out. He must have known by now that his statements were wrong.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He has been listening to the minister of reconstruction (Mr. Howe).

Mr. McCANN: He has had ample time during the last three days to make a correction, but he has not had the good grace to do so.

Mr. FRASER: That is not under ordinary expenditure.

Mr. McCANN: On many occasions I have heard the hon. gentleman on a question of privilege correct slight inaccuracies when they concerned himself or his party, which he had a perfect right to do. But when it comes to a matter of wrongly accusing the government or an agency of the government of over-expenditure or extravagance, apparently he is content to have it broadcast from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. FRASER: As it should be.

Mr. McCANN: I am not averse to criticism—

Mr. FRASER: Because you are absolutely wrong.

Mr. McCANN: But I do suggest that the hon. gentleman should have some regard for accuracy and not make such extravagant and untrue statements as he did on May 6.

Now I come to the speech made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. MACKENZIE That was not a speech.

Mr. McCANN: He too evidently thought he was at the circus, but not in the capacity of carrying water. In fact he appeared to be the main spieler in front of the big tent inside the main gate where they keep the elephants.

Mr. GRAYDON: Maybe that is why Hansard confused him with the minister of reconstruction.

Mr. McCANN: He spoke of reckless extravagance and inefficiency with no specific instances to back up his contention. He even went further, Mr. Speaker; he made a direct charge, and I quote from Hansard of May 7, 1947, page 2851. Talking of expenditures, he said:

> Last year the taxation burden upon the people was very heavy. I realize, however, that you cannot decrease taxation so long as there is inefficiency and reckless extravagance in government; and, Mr. Speaker,—

Here are his words.

> —I charge this government with being reckless in their extravagance in maintaining a bureaucracy which was built up, evidently through necessity in time of war, and adding to a regiment of civil servants which should have been decreased instead of increased.

An hon. MEMBER: That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Listen to the facts.

Mr. GRAYDON: Whose speech is this?

Mr. McCANN: In refutation of that charge, and in view of the not infrequent recurrence during recent months of inquiries relating to the fluctuations of total personnel in the civil service since 1939, it was felt that a brief but comprehensive review of the situation might contribute to a better understanding of this whole question by hon. members as well as by the general public. The reason I speak as I do, Mr. Speaker, and in this capacity, is that I was chairman of a committee of a cabinet which investigated the matter of civil service reduction.

During the war years the civil service grew from 52,000 in 1939 to a peak of 142,000 at May 1, 1945. This increase was largely due to the creation of purely wartime departments such as munitions and supply, wartime prices and trade board, national war services, and to the civilian complement of our greatly augmented armed forces. Part of this increase can also be attributed to the additional war duties that were undertaken by many of the old established departments. It must be further borne in mind that during this period the total strength of the so-called servicing departments such as finance, comptroller of the treasury, public works, civil service commission and so on, was necessarily in direct proportion to the over-all strength of the service.

Following the cessation of hostilities in Europe in May, 1945, there was a steady decline in the number of civil servants to a total of 129,000 in January, 1946. This period of retrenchment was followed by one of expansion until, in October, 1946, the total strength of the civil service had all but reached the wartime peak of 1945. Anomalous as this may appear on the surface, there is a logical explanation in fact. As a result of new legislation and post-war reorganization, new departments such as national health and welfare and veterans affairs were being organized and staffed more quickly than certain war departments could be contracted. Further, a more rapid rate of demobilization than had been anticipated in the armed forces necessitated in many instances the taking on of civilians to fill posts normally held by military personnel.

It was at this time, in September of last year, that the civil service reduction programme which had been instituted in the early summer of 1945, was reorganized under the immediate direction of a special ministerial committee. Surveys, conducted by competent authorities, indicated that if vigorous and determined steps were taken by the various departments, reductions of from 15,000 to 20,000 might be effected by the end of the fiscal year without impairing efficiency or interfering unduly with the performance of necessary services.

The objective set for April 1, 1947, has in fact been exceeded since the total net reduction during this six-month period has been slightly more than 21,000 or, on a percentage basis, approximately fifteen per cent.

Total staff fluctuations since 1939 have therefore been as follows:

1939	52,000
War peak (May, 1945)	142,000
January 1, 1946	129,000
October 1, 1946	142,000
April 1, 1947	121,000

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. McCANN: It should be noted that the figures I have quoted represent, as accurately as possible and to the nearest thousand, the total number of civil servants on the government payrolls at a given moment, and that they do not include casual employees paid by the hour, revenue postmasters, and crown companies personnel.

With the consent of the house I propose to place on Hansard a detailed table showing, in parallel columns, the wartime employment peak in all government departments and the total staff in these same departments on April 1 of this year.

The table follows:

(d) Reconstruction and Supply	14,540	902
Total	(4)	120,946

(1) Includes Board of Grain Commissioners, Canadian Government Elevators.

(2) Includes Board of Transport Commissioners.

(3) Includes Army, Navy, Air Force Inspection Board.

(4) In view of the fact that various departments reached their respective employment peaks on different dates, the sum total of this column would be greater than the over-all civil service employment peak, which never exceeded 142,000.

Although the present total number of civil servants substantially exceeds the 1939 total, this is to a large extent an inevitable consequence of many factors, amongst the more important of which are the following:

1. The implementation of new legislation since the beginning of the war. The unemployment insurance commission, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the national film board, the air transport board and the Department of Veterans Affairs are virtually new departments which have come into being as a direct consequence of new legislation. Indeed, the total personnel employed in those departments on April 1 this year numbered 31,998. This is an increase of 28,515 over the 3,483 persons employed in related services in 1939. The departments then were pensions, national health, and the national film board.

2. In several instances new or amended legislation has also resulted in the creation of new branches or divisions in old established departments, such as the citizenship branch in the Department of the Secretary of State, certain branches of the Department of Agriculture, and so on.

3. There have been considerable increases since 1939 in the staffs of the Department of National Revenue, the Post Office Department, the Department of National Defence, the Department of Trade and Commerce and in external affairs. These increases, however, are governed by uncontrollable factors of revenue, national security, foreign trade and international relations, the requirements for all of which have grown substantially since the beginning of the war.

4. As I have pointed out, the size of the servicing departments such as public works, comptroller of the treasury and the civil service commission is mathematically related to the size of the civil service as a whole.

These are but a few of the reasons that illustrate the difficulty of estimating even approximately the normal peacetime strength of the public service. The civil service will continue to be reduced on a graduated scale, largely through diminishing veterans' requirements and the final liquidation of remaining wartime departments.

In the table which I have placed on the record, showing the total number of civil servants by departments, and giving the war peak and personnel as of April 1, 1947, it will be noted that the war departments which are being consolidated or liquidated include the defence departments, which had a civilian war peak of 68,376, and today have 15,762, including army, navy, air force and inspection boards. The further war departments being liquidated include national war services, which at the war peak had a personnel of 2,041 and now has four. During the war the Department of Munitions and Supply had a peak personnel of 14,540; today the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has a personnel of 902.

Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this statement is a complete refutation of the accusation made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I suggest that the charge he made had no basis in fact, and has been entirely answered by this statement.

Mr. FRASER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister said my figures were wrong but if he will look at page 29 of the estimates for 1947-48 he will see that the 1947-48 estimate for the film board is given as $2,078,874, while the amount for 1946-47 is shown as $1,259,465. The increase, as shown in these estimates, is $819,409, which was the figure I gave. I want to say this is just a sample of what happens in connection with the film board.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to remind the hon. member for Peterborough West that an hon. member has not the right to speak twice on the same matter.

Mr. FLEMING: I wonder if I might ask the minister a question before he takes his seat. Has he the figure of the number of employees of boards outside the government departments, including those of crown companies?

Mr. McCANN: If I had them I would have given them.

Mr. FLEMING: Why were they not included? The figures are incomplete without them.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take time this afternoon to reply to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). We all listened to the presentation of a budget which had been very carefully prepared by the young and popular minister, and which has been received with applause by some and disappointment by others. However, I congratulate also the minister's predecessor, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who brought in a surplus from war assets of $372 million, and the two ministers a surplus of $352 million.

The other evening we had a splendid reply by the financial critic of the opposition, the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who was ill. As you will understand, Mr. Speaker, I am acting this afternoon in a sort of utility role, to fill in on the budget. Yesterday afternoon very little interest was taken in the debate, so much so that I thought many of the members were attending the gymnasium proposed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I thought perhaps the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) might be working out on the parallel bars. However, I want to say right here and now that the speech of the minister, giving all these surveys and reports, was the usual budget statement containing very little comfort for the country. We have squandered our resources at a great rate, and as a result we are now part and parcel of the United States economic system. If history repeats itself in connection with financial matters I am afraid that before long they may be in a very difficult position, and I believe that will have a very serious effect on Canada.

Certainly after the years of war the people were looking for some relief from the present intolerable taxes, but I suppose as long as we have over-government and over-taxation there is not much hope. Look at the provincial parliaments; in my opinion they simply duplicate the municipal system, and never should have been created. They were just an afterthought in the minds of the fathers of confederation. That is why we have such heavy taxes. Let me remind hon. members that the last year Sir Charles Tupper was here, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came in, they required only $36,000,000 to operate the whole country. Now we are spending about $1,700,000,000. Then look at the provinces. Ontario used to get along with $6,000,000 a year. Today Ontario expenditures total $127,000,000. Then you go on to the municipalities, and where it is all going to end I do not know.

As I have said before, the most important problem facing us at the present time, into which everything fits and on which everything depends, can be expressed in this way: parliamentary reform, constitutional reform, cabinet reform and law reform. Would it not be in the public interest, Mr. Speaker, if we had the municipal system, under which in committee of supply a private member could rise and move to strike so much money out of the estimates? We cannot strike a dollar off this tax rate, so that all this debate does not mean anything. If a dollar is struck off the tax rate and the government is defeated, it must resign. I say that is a wrong principle. It is my belief that we should change our committee of ways and means so that it would be something like the system they have in Washington, under which congress has some say about the tax rate. If they see fit they can reduce the amount by hundreds of millions of dollars. I believe something similar would be in the public interest in Canada. Something should be done about it.

On February 17, 1937, as reported at page 973 of Hansard, I said:

> A lot of provincial legislatures were created. These are all spending money and the result is over-taxation. These provinces are nothing but a lot of Balkan states fighting among themselves, and the taxpayer is made to pay. The short-sightedness of this act of 1867 should not be allowed to continue any longer because it has brought about in Canada the creation of a state equivalent to slavery among our men, women and children.

And at that time I referred to the over-taxation of the workers and the toilers who have to pay taxes. In my opinion something should be done about it. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec are paying over 75 per cent of the cash taxes of the dominion. Ontario is the forgotten province in confederation. It gets little or nothing, because the Ontario members do not stand together, as do the members from the Pacific coast and from the maritime provinces.

I believe the day is not far distant when something will have to be done about it. Certainly the dominion-provincial conference should have been reconvened long ago, and something should be done to give Ontario some assistance in this way. As hon. members know, the island of Montreal is represented by five federal cabinet ministers. Since 1935 we in the city of Toronto have not had one minister of the crown to represent us in parliament. And this is the condition, despite the fact that our taxes are going up by leaps and bounds, including income tax and sales tax. Receipts from the post office department operations in Toronto were over $13 million in one year. Consider the tax rate, and remember that we have no direct representation in the cabinet. It was in respect of that principle, taxation without representation, that the American colonies rebelled at the time of the Boston tea party, away back in the days of the American revolutionary war.

In my opinion too much of this budget—at least 50 per cent of it—is made up of indirect taxation. This comes from sales tax, and other forms of petty nuisance taxes. The other 50 per cent is from direct taxation. I believe the time is not far distant when we should have some relief from the panic of reckless expenditure which has been going on—spending money like water. Because, do not forget this, that considerably more of our budget should be charged to capital account, and less of it charged to income. This generation has to suffer, in flesh and blood, as well as bear the brunt of pay-as-you-go taxation. We cannot have a pay-as-you-go principle, in view of the gigantic war payment expenditures we must make, amounting to four or five billion dollars in a year.

Something should have been done to eliminate these nuisance taxes which, so far as the working classes are concerned, yield very little profit or revenue to the government. We should have drop letters at one cent in the cities and three cents in the country. Then, in addition to that the nuisance taxes on soft drinks, chocolate bars, and nuisance taxes in other forms should be eliminated almost immediately. But nothing has been done about it. The removal of many of these controls which have hamstrung the public and private business, both wholesale and retail, should have been accomplished long ago.

The key to the solution for inflation is production. Then, we are met with increased prices for coal, milk, rent, food, and many other commodities. The price of butter has gone up ten cents. The time has come when we will have to have a system of checks and balances every year. When one examines the income tax he finds that it is not a reduction of 29½ per cent on the tax levied against many of the people included in the schedule read out by the minister. The tax amounts to only 14½ per cent. In addition to that, all the other forms of taxation have remained high.

As I have said before, production is the barometer which would have kept down inflation; the law of supply and demand would take care of that. On many commodities that law forced down prices in the United States, after the controls were taken off. The government has failed to give any relief in the manner I have mentioned, and in my opinion it has shown a lack of vision and of consideration for the taxpayers.

The extravagance of the government in connection with ambassadors is beyond description. I see that the Department of External Affairs alone is spending $1,779,000 more than it did last year. Ambassadors are travelling all over the seven seas. Some of them do not know enough, when they speak in the language of a foreign country, to ask for their laundry. They are out there, acting as our ambassadors across the seas, but they are only amateurs who learn by experience, with no knowledge of foreign affairs and no knowledge of external affairs. We have now reached the sixty-fifth day of this session, and it is nearly time we had a day devoted to the discussion of foreign affairs, instead of submitting ourselves to the catechism style of: A question a day keeps the ambassadors away.

Some of the members of the press have made good ambassadors and have gone all over the world. In fact, so many ambassadors have been named that we have discovered that the great basic industry for solving unemployment in Ottawa is the appointment of ambassadors, and this is known as the ambassador cure for unemployment. We are spending $1,779,000 more for ambassadors, and the end of it is not yet in sight, because there are at least 200 more days left in the year. Appointing an ambassador a day will keep the tax rate away up, according to the way I look at it.

As I said before, we will have a cold winter next winter. We are now around the middle of May, and our fires are still on in our homes and in this building. In only two or three months the fires must be put on again. Where will we get the coal and other kinds of fuel? What is the government going to do to get it? We have been talking about a national fuel policy; I brought the matter up in the house in 1923, but everybody opposed it. They did not believe in a national system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies to bring coal from Alberta or from the maritimes to central Canada. The government opposed it for five or six years, and then it adopted a system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies. Ontario wants to use coal from Wales, Alberta and the maritimes if it can get it; but nothing is being done about it. Next winter we will have a terrible state of affairs, with old age pensioners freezing in their houses and homes. I do not know how they are going to avoid it.

Then, not only should we have a national fuel policy, but we should have a national hydro-electric policy. I pointed out in 1924 that we should have a national hydro-electric policy for Canada. A return I received at that time shows that we have a potential horse-power in Canada of 45 million of which only 7 million has been developed and some of that is only seasonal, operating in the summer time. One-sixth, or 7 million horse-power has been developed. It was shown that we had not been progressive enough, and that we should have had further utilization of our hydro-electric resources, for heating purposes where possible. I was surprised in 1927 when I was there to find that British Columbia, one of the richest provinces in power, had made very little progress in that direction. That would be a fine solution for the trouble they are having with regard to fuel.

I have been surprised to find that in these days no one wants to own a house, because even if you own it you cannot get into it. Many people are complaining. No contractor wants to build a house. In Toronto 65 or 70 per cent of our citizens used to own their own homes. Today the builders are getting out of house building because nobody wants to own houses or real estate. The government should do something about it. The city architect at Toronto, Mr. Gillies, said the other day the difficulty is that a shortage of low-priced land within the city, and the high price of materials and of labour make it prohibitive for anyone to build houses.

I am going to ask the government a few questions. Why is there a housing shortage? Does the government realize how urgent the problem will be during the coming winter? How quickly shall we get these houses built? Why cannot all the building trades workers be drawn out of the forces and the factories? Is all the building trades labour which is now available being used for the building of houses? No. Go around the streets of Ottawa and in the playgrounds and you will see the answer to that for yourself. Will the government's housing programme be held up because public authorities cannot get land? What are people going to do while they are waiting for houses to be built? Our veterans are living in hovels and basements although they have put their gratuities into buying houses which they cannot get into. There will be a boom in the building trades for five years and then a slump.

In 1935, at my suggestion, the Bennett government appointed a committee of the house to inquire into housing and reconstruction. The committee made a study of the matter and its report was adopted. The money was lent through the banks at a low interest rate, and $86 million was spent to build houses all over our cities. Only $16,000 or less was lost in that venture. We should have a system like that now.

Who is going to do the building? Nobody wants to build except the government. It costs so much to build that the working classes cannot pay the rent asked. What about the materials for the houses and the price of those materials? What is the government doing about that? Nothing that I know of. The cost of materials is prohibitive and the materials are in short supply. That is why one of the leaders in the other place said that nobody nowadays wants to build a house or own one. What about the cost of the new houses and the rent of the temporary houses? On top of all that you have a control system which prevents anybody from getting into his own home. Yet we have money to spend like water all over the seven seas. Where are we getting the money to spend on the Olympic games overseas? Imagine 4,000 contestants going over there with the food, fuel, housing and shipping situation what it is. Do you not think the time has come to drop this government assistance and tell those who want to go to the Olympic games to pay their own expenses? But the government is providing $17,500 for the Olympic games. It would be far better to drop the Olympic games until 1950 and let those who want to go pay for it—contestants, officials and people with badges—4,000 people. Where are you going to get these people housed in London, England? These games should be postponed until 1950 at least. That fine estimable Ottawa young lady would be far better advised to drop the Olympic games altogether and keep the car that was given to her. We should not vote money for the Olympic games because they cause more disunion than union. Hon. members will remember the riots and disorder at some of these contests in Europe in other years. It would be far better for Canada to have them in some large city—at the Canadian national exhibition.

I believe this budget should be criticized because it forgets all about the British empire. Our whole trade from the very start has been based on our relationship with the empire. I quote what Sir John A. Macdonald said at Kingston in 1844:

> I, therefore, need scarcely state my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connection with the mother country, and that I shall resist to the utmost any attempt, from whatever quarter it may come, which may tend to weaken that union.

Forty-seven years afterwards, in February, 1891, he reaffirmed the same doctrine of our close relationship with the mother country, in these words:

> For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the union jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow with association of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die.

That is the policy we should follow—the empire first, last and all the time. Trade should follow the flag, and the flag the trade. We should not give up the British preferences. My friends opposite and my friends to the left used to believe in free trade. They said that the grain trade should flow north and south instead of east and west to Britain and our allies, and the result was that on one occasion wheat went down to 38 cents a bushel. Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1897 brought in preferential trade within the empire and the six cents preference on grain. That policy should have been continued but it was ended by Canada in 1938. But this budget forgets that, and forgets that we are part and parcel of the British empire. I was the only one on these benches who in 1945 voted against the Bretton Woods agreements because I saw the dangers of liquidating empire trade and preferences. I have always strongly supported preferential trade within the empire and shall continue to do so and I believe that a large body of public opinion supports it at the present time. The whole future of the mother country depends upon the dominions. Without the dominions the mother country will become a second Denmark at the edge of Europe, and we shall have little or nothing to say in the peace terms.

What did free trade ever do for the dominions or for the people of this country? As a result of British preferential trade 2,500 United States branch plants and affiliated industries have been established in this country, fifty per cent of them being manufacturing establishments and the others being engaged in finance, insurance, shipping and other services. Many of these branch plants were established in Canada to take advantage of the British preference. I will oppose any change in that policy. It is in this respect that the budget mainly fails.

In 1945 when Germany was beaten—the mother country with the help of the dominions which went it alone for two years was mainly responsible for the victory—the mother country was at the height of its power. We were to see the dawn of a new day for the dominions and the mother country because she then stood at the top of the world. There were certain people who thought that the empire was gone, that it would be disrupted. But in 1945 Britain was at the height of her power and the same is true of the dominions. Our other allies who came in at the end did wonderful work, but if it had not been for the mother country and the dominions they would not have had a chance to win the war. The resources of the empire are vastly superior to those of Russia and the United States because Russia and the United States are land entity propositions while the British empire is spread over the seven seas. Why should we not band ourselves together in preferential trade within the empire? How has it come about that it seems to be almost dangerous for anybody in this house to mention the word empire which has done so much for our civilization?

Are we, the Conservative party, to stand still here?—because it is the Conservative party although it is called "Progressive Conservative." We who have been with the party have supported certain principles. I believe we are making a mistake. We would sweep the country if we stood up for the mother country and advocated those principles instead of standing by and seeing the empire scuttled the way it is. How does it come about that such a thing is so? I have been bewildered when I see what is going on in the press and in other agencies about these matters, about India, Palestine and Egypt and all that kind of thing. I have been surprised at the lack of planning, not only in the budget but with regard to trade, defence and migration within the empire. I have referred before to such things as defence, migration and trade within the empire. The lack of faith which is shown in the budget is illuminating; and faith without works is dead. It seems to me we have more faith in Washington. One of the big mistakes we made in this war was when we surrendered too much political, military, economic and financial initiative to Washington. That was one of the first fatal mistakes we made.

Coming to defence and migration, may I say that history always repeats itself. Yesterday Mr. Attlee said that we are as close to war now as we have ever been. He spoke words of wisdom when he said that. That is obvious when you look at the absolute failure of the united nations and the disappointments at its lack of action. They are holding a meeting in New York on matters which do not concern this country. These matters were settled at San Francisco when they passed the veto. We agreed to it. We had delegates down there who agreed to the veto. One of the big four can veto the other three. One of the players wants to rule the other three. Just imagine a hockey game in which the referee could not rule three players off because of a veto of the majority, 4 to 3. The referee would get the worst of it. That is what is happening in the security council.

I do not blame delegates for wanting to go to New York. We had a banquet the other night but we had only two or three courses; down there they have luxury banquets with fourteen courses and all the liquid refreshments one could desire, 50-cent and one-dollar cigars, and all that kind of thing. That is going on while people are starving. I have read about the banquets in Time magazine and The Patriot of London, England. It is no wonder that our delegates are anxious to go down there. No wonder all parties want to go down there. They can go to see a hockey game, a baseball game or to the theatres. They can go to the Knickerbocker and see oil paintings of Old King Cole while attending this Tower of Babel. All that kind of thing is going on down there while the poor people of Europe are starving. It is no wonder that so far UNO is a failure. All this is going on at a time when in Britain there is no light, no power, and a great scarcity of food.

I will admit that economics is partly the basis of war. I should like to quote from the first epistle of St. James, chapter 4, verse 1:

> From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?

Only through psychology can we hope to solve all these things, these terrible problems of war which Mr. Attlee yesterday said was hanging most menacingly over us because we keep forgetting the very basis of Christianity, as I said a month ago. One thing has come out of the discovery of the atomic bomb; science and religion are coming closer together than they have ever been since the time of our Lord. The very same condition exists in the far east, in the same territory where St. James used these words, "Whence come wars and fightings among you?" All that kind of thing is going on and has been for the past two thousand years. As I said, there is one thing about this atomic bomb; science and religion are marching more closely together, and if we are to have everlasting peace we shall have to carry out what the apostle said in the verse which I have quoted. We should send missionaries to the UNO to help change the hearts of men. The budget forgets all about these things; it says nothing at all about these things.

I hold in my hand a copy of an address given at Winnipeg by Mr. Edward Mallory, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, in which he points out the effects of preferential trade upon industry. Over 2,500 industries have come in the country because of it. As I said the other day in this house:

The Ottawa agreements increased the trade between Canada and Britain by forty-one per cent and between Britain and Canada by forty-three per cent, and we have had multilateral trade. Formerly it was known as most favoured nation treaties. We made these treaties with some thirty-two different countries between the two wars, but they brought us very little in the way of exports. What countries can afford an export market for Canadian goods? Upon exports we live. Markets are available with respect to many things, but the only great agricultural market left in the world for Canada is Great Britain. We acquired a preference in that market for wheat at six cents a bushel, which Sir Wilfrid Laurier once said he would give almost anything to obtain. It is equally true that the preference on apples, pears and so on meant the sale of a million barrels of these fruits from Nova Scotia in one year. What we lack is markets for our exports; and if anyone thinks we are going to find in the United States a market for either our agricultural products on any substantial scale, or for manufactured goods, I am afraid he will be disappointed. The only things they will be willing to take from us are the raw materials from which to manufacture finished products, as they have done previously.

I am much disturbed at the present state of the world. I do not like the terms of the loans made by the United States. In my opinion they are much more like the ruthless and vindictive demands of a victor made upon a vanquished foe than arrangements between allies. It must be apparent by this time that, had it not been for Britain alone, and with her holding out as she did, all would have been ended, and there would have been a complete collapse of civilization.

Then again I said:

I refer to the subject of the bases. The principle of the joint Anglo-American use of bases is now in full operation. But the precedent of long-term leases of bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana, under the fifty-destroyers agreement of 1940 contains the seeds of future conflict. That agreement, which confers 99-year leases on the United States, does not provide for the British use of these bases and apparently contains no release clause in any form. If bases are to be held jointly such arrangements should be made on terms of strict reciprocity. In the present case, the use of land and the cost of bases in allied territory should be charged to lend-lease account and an agreement should at the same time be made to terminate the 99-year lease and cancel it and to transfer the costs of the destroyers to lend-lease account.

That should have been done long ago. I hope it will be done later on. What Mr. Attlee said yesterday is true. Much talk has gone on about British imperialism. As Burke said, we should elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of Providence has called us. That glorious empire has gone to the seven seas and has won the admiration of the world. In the places to which the empire has gone it has given freedom, liberty, good government and civilization. Britain went to war because of her pledge to Poland. The United States and Russia went to war because they were invaded, which is different.

The two bases of Russian expansion are political and economical. As I said last year, quoting the great National Review:

There have been no public claims like Hitler's demands that people of German origin everywhere should be brought within the German sphere. But at the Paris conference there have been statements from the Russian group raising the racial issue. In arguing for the acceptance of Bulgarian claims the Polish delegate, Mr. Rzymowski, declared: "In our opinion Bulgars should receive humane and indulgent treatment. It is the only Slav people among the ex-enemy states." While Molotov was greeted with enthusiastic applause from the Russian group when he said: "The time is past when Slav lands were material for partition among the European powers, when Slav peoples groaned under the yoke of western or eastern invaders. It is well known that the Slav nations have now found their place in the ranks of the allied states and that political life in all Slav countries is being built up along progressive democratic lines.

The prospect for the future looks dismal. There have even been threats from the Russian group of a third world war put in typical Soviet fashion, inversely. Opposition to the aims of the Russion group is said to be due or encouraged by reactionary cliques and fascist remnants who wish to see a third world war. Must, then, the Soviets be allowed a free hand to avoid such a catastrophe?

Recent history surely proves that opposition in time to the nazis might have averted a war which President Roosevelt once declared should be named the war of survival. Opposition now to Russian pretensions is one way in which another world war, another war of survival for our western conception of life, can be avoided.

Here is what a great British newspaper said the other day, quoting a recent speech delivered overseas by Lord Bennett, who used to be prime minister here, in which he made reference to "those powerful factors that are at work in a conspiracy to undermine the unity and destroy the life of the British commonwealth of nations. For some time there has not been an imperial conference at which the various members of the British commonwealth could state their views. We have had no imperial parliament to speak for us. We are developing separate policies in the various nations of the commonwealth, and you cannot have a commonwealth that will endure if the various nations comprising it pursue independent policies."

At no time in the history of the empire has it been more necessary for the dominion of Canada to give support, even if it is only moral support, to the motherland. Our foreign policy should be wrapped up with that of the mother country. Never has it been more necessary that this should be done than now. There is no use in saying that we can depend upon pan-Americanism and the Monroe doctrine. We depended on them in the past and they were found wanting. We are entirely dependent upon the mother country for our liberty and freedom. I am surprised that something has not been said along the line of what Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated, that when England is at war Canada also is at war. I believe that if the time comes again this country will do its duty towards the motherland as it has always done in the past.

The government would be well advised to send at once all the food we can possibly spare for the people in the old land. Instead of that, they have been begging the question all along. The strength and unity of the British empire have been built up by centuries of statesmanship. The dominions, once colonies, have become independent nations under the crown. In Palestine the situation goes from bad to worse for lack of statesmanship; while the little kingdom of Sarawak has been bludgeoned into accepting the status of crown colony in place of its former independence.

Discard preference and let foreigners swamp empire markets and you create unemployment and sacrifice one of the main factors which have welded the British empire into the greatest influence for good since the coming of Christianity. But this is exactly what the government have threatened to do.

The British empire came into being by the colonization of overseas territories and the reservation of the trade of those territories to the mother country. A strong commercial position was built up but as times changed the system was modified. Trade was extended to foreign countries but advantages were given both to Britain and to the colonies by lower rates of duty than those imposed on foreigners.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: Well, Mr. Speaker, there will be another opportunity.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): I cannot share the enthusiasm of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) for the budget. I do not know what handling money does to people, but it makes these two ministers genial, and I suggest that it might be a good idea to try it on all the Canadian people and see what it would do for their dispositions.

We were all pleased, however, to have this statement of the Minister of Finance:

> Today we have just ended a year in which our accounts show a surplus—a surplus larger than the accumulated total of all the previous surpluses in our history.

With that for a financial background you would think that something worth while for the Canadian family would be done, and yet we find that very little is proposed for the relief of the Canadian family in spite of the fact that, according to the minister's own words, more than half of the families in Canada have incomes that fall below the income tax levels, or less than $1,500 for a married couple; and that kind of family income in Canada gives rise to Health magazine, which is the publication of the Health League of Canada, pointing out what the Marsh report uncovered a few years ago. In its latest issue this magazine says:

> One of the largest contributions of the Marsh report was to place in the bright spotlight the shameful income situation of Canadian families. Of every three of our families, two have incomes below a level sufficient to maintain decency and health, one in three falls below even an existence minimum—an income quite insufficient to cover even the bare necessities of life. Small wonder that the giants of hunger, misery and squalor have roamed the land.

The majority of Canadian families lack protection for life and health because of inadequate family income, and they are also victims of bad housing. They have no provision for illness and no provision for comfortable old age. In fact this budget makes the rich richer and the poor poorer because of the price increases through the removal of price ceilings and through the removal of subsidies. It fails in the redistribution of national income, which is part of the Liberal platform; and I say "platform" advisedly and not "policy", because the policy is the direct opposite.

In contrast to what we have done for the Canadian family I want to point out what we have done for Canadian business. On page 2552 of Hansard we have an interesting table giving a forecast of the fiscal year 1947-48 as compared with the fiscal year 1946-47. We find there that the biggest reduction in taxation comes in the category "excess profits tax". We intend to reduce the excess profits tax to the extent of $279 million. That is the biggest drop in any of the items in the national income forecast for next year. The excess profits tax drops from $449 million to $170 million, or $279 million.

Not only do we reduce the excess profits tax, but we remove subsidies, thereby removing their responsibility to help protect the family incomes of those people who drop below $1,500 a year. In addition to that, we remove the price ceilings so that, through sales of manufactured products, excess profits can be maintained. Now what have we done for the family?

An hon. MEMBER: Not we; the government.

Mrs. STRUM: The government, pardon me. I wish to dissociate myself from this action. Looking at page 2557 of Hansard, let us consider the family to whom the Minister of National Revenue referred—the $1,800 a year man with two children. True, he has a reduction in taxation. True, he is down to $16 a year and next year he will be down to $10 a year. The drop is $10. The 1947 tax rate forced him to pay $20. Next year he will pay $10, or he will save $10. But he has two children and they are supposed to drink milk; they are supposed to be drinking a quart of milk a day. That means that his children are supposed to drink 365 quarts of milk each per year, or 730 quarts for two. Through the removal of subsidies, milk has gone up from ten cents to fifteen cents a quart, so that for 730 quarts of milk he pays an extra five cents each, or $36.50. On the one hand, he saves $10, and on the other hand he pays out $36.50; or, in other words, he is $26.50 in the hole. Then, of course, he himself is supposed to drink a pint of milk, and his wife is supposed to drink a pint of milk, but this figure is just for their children. Actually, through the removal of subsidies, even though we have given him $10 off his income tax, he is really $26.50 in the hole; or, if he pays sixteen cents a quart, as many people do, it will cost him $43.80 and he will be $33.80 in the hole, on this new budget.

The great majority of our families fall below $1,500 a year. Not only does this man lose out on his milk, but he loses out on his butter and shoes which are now out from under the ceiling, and on many other articles which go into the cost of daily living. His rent has increased. In many ways his real income does not go nearly as far as it did a year or two ago, so that he is really worse off than ever.

The people with under $1,500 a year are, of course, completely vulnerable. Lack of income puts them in a completely unsheltered position in regard to the paying of rent, the buying of things like milk, butter and shoes, and the many other things that go into the cost of living. As we stated earlier, and as the minister himself pointed out, the majority of the Canadian families are in that unenviable position. No wonder that our health records are bad. No wonder that our crime records are bad. No wonder that we are ashamed of many things in the field of national health and housing.

There are many social costs which do not appear in the budget and which are the result of the failure to provide for the protection of our Canadian families. I should have hoped that, with our surplus which the government is so proud of, we might have undertaken a large-scale public housing project. In any country where this has been undertaken the results have been surprising indeed. I want to quote now from the report of the lieutenant governor's committee on housing conditions in Toronto in 1934. This is what the report says:

> Doctor Chalmers, medical officer of health, Glasgow, is overwhelming in his indictment of bad housing. At a time when sixty per cent of the population lived in one or two-room apartments Doctor Chalmers wrote:
> "In one-roomed houses the death rate was 29·9 per thousand.
> In two-roomed houses the death rate was 16·5 per thousand.
> In three-roomed houses the death rate was 11·5 per thousand.
> In four-roomed houses the death rate was 10·8 per thousand."
> Doctor Chalmers goes on to say that, "Bad housing increases the incidence of all infections, contagious and verminous conditions, of respiratory diseases, and of anaemia, debility and constitutional maladies. The worse the housing, the higher the death rate."
> After the reconstruction of slum areas in Edinburgh, the death rate of these areas fell from 45·5 per thousand in 1892 to 15 per thousand in 1910, or reduced it by two-thirds.

This, to me, is significant, and it was significant enough to be included in the lieutenant governor's committee's report on housing conditions in Toronto; and the bad conditions which were found in Toronto are duplicated right across the country in all our Canadian cities. We find that the infant mortality rate is high. We find that all the things which go to break up families are prevalent in those areas. We find that people are paying out far too much of their income for rent. In the report of the advisory committee on reconstruction, housing and community planning, our own government has this to say about rents in relation to family income:

> On the basis of $20 a month being a desirable rent, nearly 40 per cent of the tenant families in the low-wage group at present pay more than they can afford. Nearly one-third of them pay rents of between $20 and $35.
> These figures are significant in showing the proportions of wage-earner tenants who would be satisfactorily accommodated if it were possible to provide new housing renting at $20 a month. Only in Toronto, London and Windsor would this provide for half of the population in this group . . .
> Allowing not $20 but one-fifth of their normal budget the percentage of families paying disproportionate rent is not 40 per cent, but more than twice as much 88·7 per cent. The city percentages range from 66·5 per cent in Halifax to 92 per cent in Winnipeg.
> In the absence of any changes in basic incomes throughout the country, this is tantamount to saying that three-quarters to four-fifths of this lower third of city families depend on a public low-rent housing programme if they are to be provided with proper housing accommodation.

This is from the report of our own department of reconstruction. There is one place where the government could put some of the surplus revenue, because their own reports indicate that these people will never have adequate housing unless we institute large-scale, low-cost housing projects, financed by this government. Up to this time we have had housing projects that benefit mainly the insurance companies. I was disappointed to see that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) in his latest statement points out that under the new plan which we intend to institute, or which the government intends to institute—again I wish to dissociate myself from this—we are going to double the depreciation; we are going to help them acquire land and then we are going to talk about four-roomed units which will rent for not more than $70. A four-roomed unit renting at $70 will not meet the needs of these people who must be assisted because their incomes will not allow them to pay economic rents.

What about the health facilities of our people? Well, there is not any Canadian standard at all for health. There is not any Canadian standard for pensions. There is not any Canadian standard to take care of widows. There is not even any Canadian standard to take care of the people who are on relief. Much to my surprise today I found that only three provinces have legislation under which the province is responsible for relief. The other six provinces leave it to the municipality, which means that these people who are out of work are completely without protection, except, of course, the limited protection of unemployment insurance, which does not begin to cover all the people who are out of work. So I would urge the government that when we have these substantial surpluses we should not wait for all the provinces to come in before beginning to plan for the protection of the Canadian family.

In this house we are horrified at the divorce rate. We say, "We do not believe in divorce." None of us wants divorce. I do not believe we should ever permit conditions to exist that break up family life; yet here we have low incomes, bad housing, no provision for health, no provision for the widow other than what the provinces choose to give, and so on. We have inadequate provision for the arthritics, the cripples, the people who cannot look after themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: Would divorce cure those?

Mrs. STRUM: All these conditions put a strain on family life, as I think the hon. member will admit. Anything that can take the strain off family life, anything that can house our people under conditions of health and decency and comfort will add to the permanency of family life and will help cut down our divorce rate.

Mr. GRAYDON: How do you explain Hollywood on that basis?

Mrs. STRUM: Perhaps you know more about Hollywood than I do. I just happen to know about normal people, such as I think I represent.

In closing, I merely wish to urge the government to make use of the excellent material for which they themselves have paid. I am amazed at the wealth of material that comes from the bureau of statistics and government departments. If I want something my secretary comes up with armloads of stuff that the government themselves have prepared, as to which the government departments have already done the groundwork and made the surveys. We know what is the matter; we know how to cure it; we know what the government intends to do. Let us do it now.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, often while listening to some speakers in this house I have felt that if an outsider were to attempt to assess the true economic, political and social situation in Canada with regard to the past, and more particularly with reference to the future, he would soon have the feeling that he might as well attempt to square the circle. Truly, is there any other place, with the possible exception of the law courts, where one may sit and listen to an intelligent man assure you that such and such is white, and then hear another prove a moment later that the same thing is black? This is a daily feature of our proceedings, and I suppose it would be childish to attempt to do away with it in this honourable chamber. After all, is not freedom of expression, whether it be of sentiment or of principle, the very essence of a democratic system?

Having said this, without malice toward anyone, I shall proceed immediately with the remarks I wish to offer for the consideration of the house. Obviously I have no intention of touching on all aspects of the budget, but this heartening speech contained features I wish to underline. The first is that in accordance with Liberal tradition it brings substantial relief to the classes of our population most in need of it, the middle class and the small wage-earner. A mere glance at the tables to be found at pages 2556 and 2557 of Hansard shows how successful the minister was in giving concrete expression to his concern for the small wage-earners. It should be pointed out that the average reduction of twenty-nine per cent is spread in such a manner that small wage-earners will benefit by an income tax reduction of more than fifty per cent. Naturally it would have been more gratifying if all of us could have enjoyed such a substantial reduction, but the pressing consideration is to ensure more humane living conditions to those whose incomes are low. Let us remember, on the other hand, that the new budget grants an income tax reduction of from forty-seven per cent to thirty per cent to families with incomes ranging between $2,000 and $5,000, and that nine out of ten taxpayers will find that their income tax has been reduced by twenty-nine per cent or more as of July 1. This year, less than two years after the end of the war, the government is in a position to grant relief to Canadian taxpayers, in respect of personal income tax alone, to the extent of approximately $110,000,000, which will reach $175,000,000 for the full year. Would it not be fair to say, particularly in regard to the province of Quebec, that, while the King government is removing taxes, the Duplessis government is piling them on? But this is another matter altogether; figures speak louder than words, and in any case, "Verba volant, scripta manent."

We were told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), with his characteristic virile optimism, that today Canada enjoys a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory, and he adds that he anticipates high production and high revenue for the coming year. If one stops to think that in many lines demand is still ahead of production, that our exports are being maintained at a very high level, limited principally by production, and that imports from overseas flow into the country in impressive volume without impairing the demand for domestic products, it would seem that there is ample justification for the fine optimism displayed by the comptroller of the national exchequer. It is to be hoped that industrial, financial and trading companies which have not benefited by such substantial tax reductions as have individuals will be able to find the sources of supply they so sorely need.

As to the next fiscal year, assuming that the national income remains at its present high level—which the minister hopes will be the case—he anticipates that government revenues will fall from $2,984 million to $2,450 million, still leaving a surplus of $190 million if the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia do not sign agreements with the federal government, and $80 million if they do. I leave it to the experts in this house, or those who believe they are experts, to assess the economic merits of the budget I wish to discuss the serious question of dominion-provincial relations. In this respect I wish to deal particularly with the interests of my own good, dear old province of Quebec, and with the systematic, deliberate and calculated misunderstanding with the government of Canada nurtured by the camouflaged Tory who accidentally and temporarily happens to be at the head of the government of the province of Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I shall now proceed in the tongue spoken by my paternal forbears. Indeed, I do not hesitate to proclaim in this house, when the occasion arises, the ocial bilingualism of Canada.

In referring to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on this subject, I find in Hansard the following words he uttered. They are those of a man of spirit, of a statesman who has the real interest of the whole of Canada at heart and who wishes to ensure understanding and peace between the various groups forming part of our country. On this subject, I shall quote from the budget speech of April 29 last, the words of the Minister of Finance:

> The stability of revenues assured by the guaranteed minimum payments represents one of the chief advantages of the plan to the adhering provinces.

Far from weakening their autonomy or sacrificing any of their constitutional rights, they have merely found a method of utilizing one of these rights . . .

And, farther on, he said:

With this assurance of stable and rising revenues, they are for the first time in a position to plan with courage and confidence and a sense of real independence, programmes for the efficient discharge of their constitutional responsibilities.

The government of Canada looks forward to the day when the agreement of all or substantially all the provinces will make possible the achievement of the great national purposes which impelled the dominion to make its comprehensive proposals of August, 1945.

And further:

Nevertheless, we do not ask any province to accept a tax agreement unless it believes such agreement to be in its own interest as well as that of the country as a whole. We did our best to shape the offer of last June in such a way as to make it possible and satisfactory for any province to remain out of the agreement if it wished to do so, and we would far prefer to have a province remain out indefinitely than to endeavour to persuade it to come in against its own judgment of where its true interests lie.

As I shall have to refer to this point later, I beg the house to notice particularly the date of the minister's statement, namely, April 29.

I now wish to quote the opinion of a newspaperman whose independence, good faith, talent or patriotism will not be questioned since I refer to Mr. Eugéne l'Heureux, editor of l'Opinion Libre who, on February 7 last, expressed himself as follows with reference to the dominion proposals which were submitted to the provinces. I quote:

Each province has two alternatives: a grant of $12.75 per person based on the province's population in 1942, plus one half the provincial revenue derived from personal and corporation income taxes in 1940, plus also, the statutory grants; or, a $15 grant per capita based on the province's population in 1942, plus statutory grants. In either case, the amount thus calculated would represent the income guaranteed each province by the Dominion government.

The capitations in the amount of $12.50 and $15 would be multiplied each year by the total number of persons comprising the province's total population. Under the said proposals the amount of the capitations would increase in proportion to the national production. Therefore, the provinces are assured of an annual guaranteed minimum subsidy which, in the case of the province of Quebec, would amount to $56,383,000 in 1947. According to statistical estimates, it may even reach $63,011,000.

The 1942 Dominion-Provincial agreement provided for a revenue of $22,000,000 to the province of Quebec.

The margin between $22,000,000 on the one hand, and $56,383,000 or $63,011,000, on the other hand, is in round figures $34,000,000 or $41,000,000.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

No such amounts have ever been placed at the disposal of the province. They would supplement most opportunely the aggregate income derived from various sources and could be used at the will of the legislature for improving education, public health and all the services required by modern standards.

Mr. L'Heureux concludes as follows:

Those who regard such proposals as encroaching upon provincial autonomy should ask themselves whether such a system would not, by coordinating tax collection methods and granting more funds to the province, provide it with the necessary incentive to modernize its whole organization.

Such is the opinion expressed by an absolutely independent writer, following the statement made by the Minister of Finance.

Now, what answer was made to those proposals not only by the premier of Quebec but by the leader of the neighbouring province? Let me give you an idea. Here, on page 14 of the excellent newspaper put out by our French-speaking compatriots of Ontario, Le Droit of May 7th, are purple headlines which I now place before you. Allow me to read them: "The Dominion proposals are unacceptable." This is the hon. Maurice Duplessis speaking. In the next column: "Drew charges the Dominion with blackmail" and finally, to dress up the page, here is a picture bearing this caption: "John Bracken, leader of the opposition, supports Premier George Drew of Ontario at the Young Conservatives' banquet held in Ottawa. From left to right: Mr. Drew, Mr. So-and-So and the leader of the opposition," forming a happy group.

Mr. PINARD: A real rhapsody in blue.

Mr. TREMBLAY: Both denounced in the strongest terms the offer made by the government to each of the provinces of Confederation. I shall quote a statement of one of the premiers and I wager that you will be unable to say whether it was made by Mr. Drew or by Mr. Duplessis. I quote without disclosing the name of the speaker; I ask you to guess:

Putting all his cards on the table, the premier denied that his province had ever thought of negotiating, as six other provinces did, a secret agreement with the central administration. No provincial official has approached, directly or indirectly, any "minor dominion government official" in order to conclude an agreement by underhand methods.

After stating that Canada has reached a turning point in her history, he reminded everyone of his duty to fight to the end in order to prevent the "possible" setting up of a dictatorship which would spell the doom not only of provincial rights but of individual freedom.

A permanent reform of our nation's financial system will never be achieved by the methods which Messrs. Abbott and Ilsley have suggested.

And further on—you may think that I am trying to solve for you the riddle as to whether it is Mr. Drew or Mr. Duplessis speaking; that we shall see—the same gentleman added:

Moreover, Quebec has vital reasons to consider the respect of our constitution as of basic importance.

Now, who's words, do you think, I have been quoting? They are Mr. George Drew's and not Mr. Duplessis's. Turning now to the statement of the Quebec premier, I read as follows:

It is absolutely contrary to facts to say that government officials of the province of Quebec have been authorized to enter into negotiations with the federal government. None but the duly elected representatives of the people have that authority and I am sure that no official has even sought to exercise it.

I shall gladly participate to a plenary conference but I shall never be a party to secret parleys or to the trading of the rights, freedoms and privileges of our Canadian provinces, let alone those of the province of Quebec.

The premier of Quebec and the premier of Ontario are both using the same language.

Mr. PINARD: They are Siamese twins.

Mr. TREMBLAY: My coevals will well remember that in 1911 the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: "Scratch the skin of a nationalist, and you'll find a Tory." We have here the spectacle of a group leader loudly disclaiming connection with the Tory party, which he even goes so far as to rebuke within the province of Quebec. Yet compare his statements with those of the Tory leader in the next province, and you'll find that they both talk the same language. I won't urge that you scratch the skin of the Union Nationale leader in order to find a Tory. You needn't even go to that trouble. Just listen to Mr. Duplessis, and then to Mr. Drew; they both talk the same language. They have the same epidermis, the same skin. They make the same sounds. They're twins, nay Siamese twins, as my hon. friend has just pointed out.

There was talk of autonomy back in 1911. It was then Monk and Hugh Graham who were plotting the destruction of our great fellow-countryman, Laurier. Now, in the year of grace 1947, it is the Drew-Duplessis combine, scheming the downfall of the best government this country has ever had.

Who are the ones, then that have already gone down in history as genuinely great autonomists? Let us look up the political annals of this country for the last half-century, during which Canada has passed from the status of a mere colony to that of a truly autonomous nation and we shall discover the patriotic citizens whose passionate ardour and enlightened Canadianism secured for our country its status of free nation.

We have gone a long way since 1897 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, French-Canadian prime minister of an English colony, had the pluck, or should we say the daring, to state, in Liverpool, before the Duke of Devonshire, during Queen Victoria's jubilee—and I quote:

In this united and confederated country which stretches from the Pacific to the Atlantic, the authority of the sovereign rests on the free and cordial allegiance of five million people who are still called colonials but who proclaim themselves a nation.

And the great Liberal leader borrowed the following quotation from Kipling:

Daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own.

Already Laurier proclaimed us a nation though in truth we were still a British colony. Constitutionally, we had and could have no accredited and official representatives in other countries; we could neither negotiate nor sign commercial agreements which, to be valid, required the seal of the official British representative; the inconveniences which this formality entailed for Canada can well be imagined; England's foreign policy, drafted by London exclusively on behalf of the British empire bound not only England but all her colonies. In 1914, the Tories still claimed that "When England is at war, Canada is at war."

Even after we had secured Dominion status, in 1918, as eminent a personality as Premier Lloyd George stated, in a still celebrated declaration:

The instrument of the foreign policy of the empire is the British Foreign Office. The machinery must remain here. It is impossible that it could be otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, what was impossible has become a fact. Not only does Canada have its own Department of External Affairs, headed by our eminent fellow-countryman, of whom we are very proud, who lays down and directs Canada's external policy, but we also have our ambassadors, consuls, Canadian diplomatic corps, testifying abroad that we have reached the status of a free and autonomous nation.

Obviously, the country was not transformed from "a modest colony into a powerful nation" in the twinkling of an eye, without effort or clash. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

If, after being a colony, our country is now master of its own destiny, and if, on December 11, 1931, the British parliament adopted the legislation officially known as the "Statute of Westminster", it is only fitting that I should recall certain phases of our constitutional evolution, of which the above statute is but the logical conclusion.

We are proud of our autonomy, but we should not forget that the Liberal party gave us its most valiant champions. Laurier was one of the pioneers in that task of national liberation, but Mackenzie King, Lapointe, St. Laurent and the Liberal party pursued without truce, intermisison or respite the lofty ideal of our great fellow-countryman, Laurier. He foresaw its achievement, because he never ceased repeating in his speeches:

Canada is bound to become a nation just as a child is bound to become a man.

Our Tory friends sometimes contend that they brought about the enactment of the Statute of Westminster in 1931. I wonder if they are really unaware of the title of that legislation. What is it, exactly? I quote:

An Act to give effect to certain resolutions passed by imperial conferences held in the years 1926 and 1930.

The 1926 conference, in which our great Liberal leaders, Mackenzie King and Lapointe, played such a leading part, recognized the sovereignty of the dominions and adopted the formula sometimes referred to as the Balfour formula, although some contend that it was drafted by Mr. Lapointe.

I have here a speech delivered at Quebec in 1938 by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and I would like to quote a few excerpts which are of special interest at the present time. Here is what Mr. Lapointe said about the Liberal party's share in the achievement of Canada's autonomy.

The Statute of Westminster is our achievement. When, sometime after 1921, I joined the King government, with my friend, associate and leader, Mr. King, we began working for the recognition of Canada's rights.

In 1923, when I was called upon to sign a treaty with the United States regarding the Pacific fisheries, I refused to have the British ambassador to the United States sign it with us. I contended that Canada's signature was sufficient and I did not let anyone hold my hand.

During the same year, there was trouble in Europe and Mr. Churchill, who was then Colonial Secretary, asked Mr. King whether he would agree to send a contingent to Chanak. He replied: No, parliament will have to decide.

About the same time, at Lausanne, Canada was invited to sign a treaty regarding the boundaries of certain European countries, but Mr. King refused to sign it on the grounds that Canada had taken no part in the drafting of that document.

In 1926, at the conference which has been mentioned yesterday, our charter was defined and Canada was recognized as England's equal, independent and self-governing.

In 1929, I had the honour of leading the delegation sent to discuss and to draft the Statute of Westminster. I worked during two months on the final draft.

At the following session, when I moved a resolution for the endorsement of our work, I was accused by Mr. Bennett of trying to cut the last bonds which united Canada to Great Britain. Mr. Cahan spoke of "stupid," "silly" and "childish" endeavours. But our plan was accepted by the House of Commons and placed on the British statute books in 1930. We were entitled to that right, but it was withheld and we had to fight for it. We were the ones who fought. There lies the difference.

Canadian autonomy was the work of the Liberal party and we owe it principally to the present Prime Minister, grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie, the rebel who, in 1838, was forced into exile with a price on his head because he had led the uprising in Upper Canada for the establishment of a government responsible to the people and not to the Governor General.

The leader of the Liberal party strove for this ideal which he had assigned to himself in his youth with consummate ability, tact and persistence.

Has anyone forgotten the Chanak incident? Mr. Mackenzie King had been leading the Liberal party for only two years and had been Prime Minister for a year when this incident broke out in 1922. Had it not been for the Prime Minister's constitutional knowledge and strength of character, Canada might have been held up to ridicule and—an even more serious consequence,—might have been plunged unwittingly into a new European war.

When the London government asked the dominions to send troops over—their appeal was published in Canadian newspapers before the telegram requesting expeditionary forces had even reached the dominion government—the great Liberal leader answered blandly that it behooved the Canadian parliament to pass judgment on such a grave question and not the Canadian government alone. He added that he would consider, in the light of all pertinent factors, whether the British government's request warranted the convening of a special session of parliament. Because of this firm, dignified stand of the Liberal Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Asquith was prompted to state in the British House of Commons that he was glad there were statesmen in the dominions who had the wisdom to ask why their country should go to war.

With the leader of the Liberal party, this proud attitude is rooted in a deep feeling of Canadian patriotism; with the erstwhile Tory leader it was the inconsiderate cry of the arch-imperialist for whom Canada is still merely "talliable and liable forced labour at pleasure." "Ready, aye, ready" he spontaneously exclaimed at the mere call of the British cabinet, not even knowing why he was prepared to launch Canada into another war.

Then when the British government asked the Canadian government to take part in the treaty of Lausanne, Mr. King's reply was that since Canada had not been consulted in the matter, had not taken part in the negotiations, it would not sign the treaty. He added that he would not even seek ratification from the Canadian parliament.

When in 1923, Canada and the United States signed the epoch-making halibut treaty the prime minister, seconded by Mr. Ernest Lapointe, emphatically proclaimed Canada's sovereignty and, for the first time in history of this country, a Canadian minister, our great patriot Mr. Lapointe, signed a treaty on behalf of Canada "without a British representative holding his hand" according to his own words I was just quoting. To be sure, it created quite a stir in London and there were representations not to say protests from the British minister in Washington; but thanks to his staunch Liberalism and enlightened patriotism, Mr. King managed matters so well that all obstacles were cleared—even Canadian Tory opposition—and Mr. Lapointe alone signed the treaty for Canada.

Meanwhile Canada, under Liberal guidance, has kept proudly proclaiming, on every occasion, its independence and diplomatic autonomy: in refusing to ratify the Locarno treaty, which it had not been invited to negotiate; in declining to sign the protocols of Geneva; in sending out its own ministers and plenipotentiaries in the world's great capitals, and in exercising many another prerogative of an autonomous nation.

In 1926, during Mr. King's second term of office, a Canadian, for the first time, was appointed as representative of our country abroad. Since 1935, we have opened legations in almost every South American country and it may be pointed out that, under the present Liberal government, some ten of our representatives have seen their status raised to that of ambassadors.

During the whole of the last world conflict, Mr. King scrupulously and meticulously adhered to the proud Liberal tradition of ever asserting the sovereignty of the Canadian parliament; in 1914, the participation of Canada in the war had been formally acknowledged by the reproduction in the Canada Gazette of the declaration of war, issued in London at the request of the British government. In 1939, His Majesty the King declared war on Germany for Canada, at the request of the Canadian cabinet, by a special proclamation issued and published seven days after the British declaration of war.

From this fact a well known Canadian newspaperman concluded:

> This can mean but one thing: by asserting its right to declare war in its own name, Canada has also asserted its right not to declare it whenever it may decide that its interests are not at stake.

Then he added this significant sentence:

> It is a certainty that Mr. King is waging war at the side of Mr. Churchill, not behind him.

Writing of "Canada yesterday and today," here is what Mr. André Siegfried stated in Le Monde Français of last July:

> French opinion is now very much interested in everything concerning Canada. The reasons for this are numerous: Canada is one of the victors of the last war, one of the countries who contributed most to victory; it is, on the other hand, and this is of interest to us, a British country with an important minority of French stock. Besides, the Dominion is remarkably placed, due both to its geographical location and its political relations, to serve as an efficient intermediary between the Anglo-Saxon powers. Last, it is a country with a future on this American continent which remains a continent with a future.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate, in view of the immense problems of the day which the provincial, and especially the federal, governments have to face, that, for paltry political reasons, not only the policies of the federal government are being opposed, but attacks are being launched even against the most distinguished members of the cabinet and discussion is barred of propositions that everyone, or at least the majority of citizens of the province of Quebec, acknowledge as being of immediate concern to that province. They are always the same ones as shown by history. Whether they be disguised tories, a nationalist or a national unionist, we cannot admit that they do not at least recognize the good faith of their opponents. Mr. Lapointe condemned those trouble-makers in his speech of December 12, 1938, when he said:

> More than ever we must rally round our institutions and the authority which protects our rights and our liberty. The world situation is difficult, painful and dangerous. Everywhere distrust, hatred and brutality are rampant. Hatred, which divides people, nationalities and races, rears its ugly head.
> Here also, he added, we have our trouble-makers. Those who foster the spread of misunderstanding between provinces or between some provinces and the Dominion authorities, those who pit one race against another, are not worthy of our confidence. Democracy protects our most prized freedom. It even protects its detractors.

In concluding, I hope I have shown that the true autonomists are those who have worked sincerely, conscientiously, intelligently, tactfully and with common sense to attain the real autonomy of our country. Those who refuse to meet the Dominion will have to answer to the intelligent electors of the province of Quebec for their insincerity and for the harm which they are causing daily to our good old province of Quebec.

Mr. FULTON: Does the hon. member know that under the regime of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, conservative prime minister of Canada, this country, for the first time as an independent and sovereign nation, signed the treaty of Versailles? On that occasion, the prime minister of the day fought resolutely, even against the British, in order that Canada might take part in that conference.

Mr. TREMBLAY: I did not quite understand the remarks of the hon. member. However I know that Sir Robert Borden was not at the Versailles conference in 1919 for I happened to be on leave in Paris at that time and I am positive that Mr. Borden was not there.

Mr. FULTON: I shall repeat my question in English.

(Text):

My question was this: Does he not know that it was the Prime Minister of that day, Sir Robert Borden, who fought even against the English and obtained for Canada a place as an independent nation at the peace conference and in connection with the peace treaty signed at Versailles?

Mr. TREMBLAY: I do know that.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): May I, first of all, offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I well remember when he was a new member in this house in 1940, as I was. He has come a long way since that day. In presenting the 1947 budget to parliament on April 29, he certainly made much of a rather disappointing budget, which he said would give an average reduction of twenty-nine per cent in personal income tax, or fifty-four per cent reduction for the single taxpayer in the lowest income tax bracket. He did not go farther and tell us that in that bracket it would mean a saving of $6 for the taxpayer, and that in the case of the seven per cent reduction which is for the much higher bracket, on $200,000 it would mean a saving of $10,385.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Lest I be misunderstood, I want to say right here that we do appreciate the reductions which have been offered; but, coupled with that statement, I must say that the people of Canada were expecting much more along other lines. No increase is allowed in the exemptions, which are now $750 for single people, $1,500 for those who are married and $1,700 for a married couple with two children. We maintain that these exemptions should be at least $1,000 for single persons, and $2,000 for married people.

This budget distinctly discriminates against parents of families. It in no way encourages family life in Canada. That has been the condition in this country for some time, and I wish to give a short example. Let us take three persons, each earning $3,000. Of course that is above the average because, as has been pointed out, the great mass of our people are not able to pay any tax. I am sorry that they are not. At any rate, in the case of the single person receiving $3,000 the gain in the tax reduction is $172.50; the childless married man gains $112.50; and the parent of six gains only $67.50. Yet the percentage tax reductions were 29, 29, and 31 per cent respectively in these cases I have cited.

At the $3,000 level the family allowance for children is almost entirely repayable as income tax, while in the higher brackets it disappears altogether, so that it does not help in any way whatever.

Surely now, two years after the war, something should have been done for family people throughout the country. Up until 1946 a married woman was allowed to earn as high as $660 without taxation. This figure was reduced to $250 in the 1946 budget and now remains at that figure. A levelling-up process should have taken place. Many married nurses and other skilled women are indifferent about working these days, though there is great need for people of this type. This tax affects the production of much required foodstuffs. The farmers' wife should be allowed a greater exemption in respect of dairy produce raised on the farm such as poultry, eggs, garden produce and so on. I wish to endorse the request made by my colleague the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) when he suggested some time ago and again yesterday that there should be an exemption for the married couple on the farm of at least $500 for the production of dairy products or of pork products on the farm. If that were done it would have a most desirable effect and, spread over the whole country, it is surprising what added production it would bring about in hogs and dairy products at this time.

Then there are what have been termed the nuisance taxes on soft drinks and chocolate bars for the children. Certainly these should be repealed, and the five-cent rate on soft drinks and chocolate bars should be provided for the children of this country at this time.

Then there is the twenty-five per cent luxury tax on jewellery, and I have always approved a luxury tax. The Minister of Finance was reported in the daily press quite a few months ago as having said that the budget would provide for an adjustment in this tax. That statement at that time was, I think, improper, because it distinctly slowed up business for that type of merchant throughout Canada. These people would certainly approve fewer words and more action from the minister in that respect. I am one of those who think that clocks, flatware, watches and such articles are essential to young people setting up housekeeping and certainly should not be termed luxuries, as they are for the purpose of taxation at this time. I endorse fully the request made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) that the tax on wedding rings should be repealed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think that is most essential; and I am especially pleased to have the endorsation of my very good friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I hope it will have a beneficial effect, because I have certainly noticed many of the fair sex with their eyes on him in the past.

Mr. GREEN: Is that why he has been waiting so long?

Mr. MAYHEW: He will not care if you take up a collection and buy one for him.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The government should be practising greater economy at this time. I know that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) replied along those lines today. He gave a set of figures of government employees. I remember speaking on the budget a year ago; in fact, on July 10, 1946, and I used these figures which will be found at page 3314 of Hansard:

> . . . in pre-war days there were about 70,000, and during the war the number has increased to approximately 150,000. One year after the termination of the war there has been a decrease of approximately one-half per cent—less than one per cent. Sometimes it is difficult to decide just who are within the civil service and who are in other branches of work under the government today.

The Minister of National Revenue today set forth a number of figures. He stated that in 1939 there were some 52,000; at the end of the war, 142,000; and practically that same figure as of October, 1946. I realize that figures, especially when they are obtained from different government departments, are confusing. I want to refer to a return, sessional paper No. 106F, dated March 27, 1947. The mover was the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), and his questions were as follows:

> 1. What is the total number of employees of the government of Canada, including employees of boards, commissions and corporations appointed by the federal authority as of the thirty-first of December, 1946?
> 2. What is the total amount of salaries, wages and allowances paid to such employees in the month of December, 1946?

Then it says:

> The attached information has been received by the Secretary of State of Canada from several departments of the government.

I am not going to burden the house with all these details; they are lengthy. But, Mr. Speaker, these add up to a total of 173,961 employees of the government of Canada as of December 31, 1946.

Mr. McCANN: All the fellows who were shovelling snow for a day or two.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No; they are not included in this sheet. It is lengthy, and if I had the time I should like to put it on Hansard.

Mr. McCANN: All the casual employees.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The total amount of salaries, wages and allowances paid these employees of the Canadian government for the month of December, 1946, amounted to $26,462,000; that is for one month. At this rate, for twelve months of the year, it would mean $317,544,000 annually. I think the people of this country expect some decrease in the number of these employees at this particular time.

It has been set forth that the cost of the Canadian information service under the Department of External Affairs, will, according to the government's own estimate, be $241,200, for this year. Added to that, each department of the government has its own publicity service at great cost over and above this to the taxpayers. According to another return, dated March 15 last, War Assets Corporation spent some $210,000 last year just to remodel and alter their office building in Montreal to take care of some of their 7,000 employees.

I am sure that everyone in Canada realizes the deplorable situation with regard to veterans housing from coast to coast in Canada, and the great amount of money which has been wasted. Not so long ago in the house the minister made a fine statement trying to rectify conditions for these veterans and said that the government would spend at least $700,000 for that purpose. I understand now that the expenditure will be at least double that amount. This has been a costly and ill-advised piece of business as far as this country is concerned, and has been most unfair to both the veterans and the taxpayers of Canada. Everyone who knows me knows that my sympathies are all with the veterans. They should have better housing conditions than have been provided. It has been a costly piece of business and we do not seem to be able to get it all chased down. One of these matters has been in the courts since a year ago January and we have not yet had a decision. There are other unsatisfactory conditions with respect to veterans housing all across Canada.

The cost of living index for Canada which has been used by the government has been quite misleading and has not taken into account many important items which concern every housewife. While the index shows an increase since 1939 of about thirty per cent, it is actually a great deal higher than that at this time.

I have discussed the plight of the old age pensioner at almost every session of parliament since 1940. I asked then that provision should be made immediately to grant them at least $30 a month and that the age limit be reduced to sixty-five years in the case of males and to sixty years in the case of females. I repeated this request in June, 1944. Since then, the greatly increased cost of living has taken place. On April 28 of this year the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) gave notice of a measure to amend the Old Age Pensions Act by providing increases in the pension and modifying certain of the eligibility requirements for these people.

I maintain—and I have had many requests from farmers in my own part of the country and in other ridings to this effect—that these farmers should not be made the tax collecting agency for the Department of Revenue; that is, that the farmer should not be made responsible for deducting the tax from salaries paid to helpers on the farm and then in turn mailing it to the income tax officials. The farmers think the collection people should be responsible for collecting these salary deductions rather than making the farmers themselves responsible. They dislike that situation very much.

Provision should be made for allowance of the basic breeding herd of cattle as capital. I have requested this in past years on the budget debate. It has been suggested by the producer organization that the basic breeding herd should be considered as a number of live stock equal to what the farmer owned on January 1, 1941. Farm incomes were low and exemptions relatively high at that time. Real estate and farm machinery are allowed as capital, and the basic herd should be considered as a capital asset and be exempt from income tax on the same basis as real estate and equipment. I thought a year or two ago that this organization was getting somewhere with the government officials on that matter, and at this time I repeat the request that it be seriously considered.

During the past year our adverse balance of trade with the United States amounted to some $600,000,000. Much of this could have been corrected by allowing certain of our agricultural products to be marketed in the United States. The Canadian government have refused to permit the marketing of any beef cattle in that country since 1942, and continue to refuse, while since that time Mexico has been shipping to the United States market as many as 500,000 head of cattle annually. A comparison of beef prices, live weight, as of May 1, shows the following figures:

	Winnipeg	St. Paul
Good steers	$14.50	$22.50
Good heifers	14.25	23.75
Good cows	11.25	16.00

The same situation exists in regard to dairy products. On April 29 of this year barley was quoted at Sarles, North Dakota, at $1.70 to the farmer, while at Cartwright, Manitoba, the figure was 67½ cents. Then we have the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement, of which much has been heard in this country. For the crop year 1946-47 some 160,000,000 bushels of that crop are promised to the United Kingdom at $1.55 a bushel basis Fort William, or $1.20 to the farmer at the elevator, together with participation certificates. This crop yielded approximately 40,000,000 bushels more than the average of the previous five years, and according to a statement by Mr. George McIvor, chairman of the Canadian wheat board, as reported in the press last week, we have for export this year to other countries of the world apart from the United Kingdom approximately 70,000,000 bushels, which is being sold at from $2.75 to $3 a bushel. We are now well into the tenth month of the 1946-47 crop year. Thus you will have some idea as to the amount of money the western wheat producer is losing through this deal, compared with what he would get if wheat were exported on the same basis as lumber, manufactured goods and other commodities. In other words, we have lost probably $200,000,000 on last year's crop with respect to the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, and this is over and above the approximately $80,000,000 contribution in regard to the 70,000,000 bushels of wheat used for domestic consumption in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: If I might ask a question, will the hon. member not agree that the same condition does not apply to wheat that applies to cattle? The Canadian government is responsible for the fact that cattle cannot be exported to the United States, but the United States government is responsible for the fact that, regardless of price, Canadian wheat cannot be exported to that country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have always understood that, and I have never requested that our wheat should be exported to the United States. We have exported wheat to some forty other nations, and I am not asking that wheat be shipped to the United States today. We could sell the 160,000,000 bushels we are exporting to the United Kingdom, together with the 70,000,000 bushels, to those forty countries to which we have exported wheat, at the price quoted by Mr. McIvor. That is the point. Certainly the beef and wheat deals are entirely different.

Then I want to say that the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement was the cause of the failure of the international wheat conference, which met in London for some weeks during March and April of this year and concluded without agreeing on a price policy. If there is any need to prove that statement I might quote, first, from the Christian Science Monitor of Boston dated April 24, 1947. It contains a lengthy article from which I should like to read only one or two paragraphs:

> Argentina dissociated itself from price controls at an early stage of the proceedings.

Then the article goes on to give the reasons, and continues:

> "Why should we pay £400 for a British motor car which was worth £200 pre-war," an Argentine spokesman said, "and still export our wheat at so little more than the pre-war price?"
> Britain, on the other hand, is concerned with conserving its dollar currency. Britain's delegates were prepared to accept prices similar to those embodied in the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement. These ranged from $1.55 a bushel in 1947-48 to $1.25 in 1948-49 and not less than $1 in 1949-50.
> The draft agreement laid down minimum and maximum prices of $1.40 and $1.80 for 1947-48; $1.30 to $1.70 for 1948-49; and $1.20 and $1.10 for 1949-50 and 1950-51, respectively.
> If it accepted the agreement as it stood, Britain was, therefore, faced with being able to buy wheat imports at a lower price immediately at the expense of binding itself to pay prices two or three years hence, which it considers will be well above current market prices.

Then an article in the Financial Post of April 26, 1947, is headed "World wheat pact dealt death blow by price dispute." If anyone still doubts my statement, I have the Manitoba Co-operator of May 1, 1947, which carries the same information. There is also another article in the Financial Post of May 10, headed:

> Blow-up of wheat pact averts split in prices
> Believe U.K. would have bought $1.80

All this is, I think, convincing proof of the truth of my statement.

I now wish to repeat what I have maintained in other sessions; that is, that full production is the true basis of real wealth. The productivity of essential goods is real wealth in this or any other nation, and we should never lose sight of that fact. The number of Canadian-born people leaving this country to take up residence in the United States is altogether too great; that statement is borne out by the Minister of Finance in his budget presentation. During the history of this country over 3,047,000 people went to the United States from Canada. The 1940 census showed the number of Canadians in the United States at that date to be 1,044,119. This situation is continuing chiefly because of the difference in the standards of living within the two countries, and because of the lack of economic opportunities on this side of the border. I am convinced that a nation like Canada cannot continue indefinitely and successfully alongside a nation like the United States, with this great economic disparity prevailing as it does today. With our great undeveloped natural resources and our wide open spaces we must build up an economy that will attract good citizens in great numbers, and at the same time provide the required opportunities for our native-born.

I wish to make reference to another matter, the Dominion Elections Act, to ask that provision be made for the transferable vote in dominion elections. In the election of 1940, some seventy-four members, including myself, were elected on a minority vote. In the election of 1945, I believe 150 members of the 245 were elected on a minority vote. During recent years, the multiplicity of parties in Canada has complicated the entire election machinery of the country. The transferable vote has been used satisfactorily for quite a number of years under the provincial election acts of Manitoba and Alberta. Surely members of this parliament should be elected by a majority of the electors who cast ballots in the various constituencies. I would sincerely appeal to the government to make provision for the transferable vote before another general election is held in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that some announcements are to be made before six o'clock, so I should like to conclude by saying that I support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), which reads:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance (a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living; (b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture; (c) fail to provide for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference in order to complete satisfactory agreements with the provinces and a dominion-provincial programme of social security, health and public investment."

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 11—Electric and other power.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Chairman, before the adjournment of the debate on Tuesday last I had moved an amendment to section 11, but after further consideration I have come to the conclusion that if I withdrew my amendment I could submit one which would be acceptable to the sponsor of the bill. I ask leave therefore to withdraw my amendment?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DORION: The section as it stands has, I believe, the effect of granting to the company more powers than are provided for in the general law, section 368 of the Railway Act. The hon. member for Outremont on Tuesday last said at page 2828 of Hansard:

. . . I wish to assure him that if at any time the company have a surplus of power over what they need for their own purposes they will certainly form a new company which will have a provincial charter and which will come under the jurisdiction of the provincial board.

In view of that statement I would be satisfied if the section were amended in accordance with the amendment which I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix):

That all the words in section 11 after the words "and other power or energy" in line 4, be struck out.

Mr. REID: That does not leave the wording correct.

Mr. DORION: The effect of the amendment would be that the company would be dealt with according to section 368 of the Railway Act and have no more powers than those given by section 368.

Mr. REID: This is how it would read if the amendment were carried, "transmit and distribute electric and for the purposes," and so on. There is a word needed to complete the sentence. It is left vague if you do not add another word somewhere.

Mr. DORION: Section 368 of the Railway Act would apply. Section 368 reads:

Whenever in any special act passed after the seventh day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, it is stated or provided that a railway company shall have power to acquire, transmit and distribute electric and other power or energy, such company, subject to the provisions of this act, may for the purposes of its undertaking acquire, but not by expropriation, electric and other power or energy, and transmit and deliver the same to any place in the municipalities through which the railway is built,

And so on. Section 11 as now proposed to be amended would be in accordance with section 368 of the Railway Act.

Mr. REID: I still think there is a word missing.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Vessels.

Mr. HERRIDGE: What is intended here by the construction of wharves and docks?

Mr. RINFRET: The railway running from Seven Islands to the prospective mine will, of course, have to be provided with wharves, docks, elevators, warehouses, et cetera, so that when the ore comes from the mine there will be facilities to accommodate it before being transshipped to the ship taking it at Seven Islands.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the sponsor of the bill able to explain whether the company itself will have all the powers as wharfingers at the docks, or will it not come under the transport act?

Mr. RINFRET: It comes under the Railway Act and therefore under the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. MacNICOL: Montreal has a harbour board and Quebec has one. Will there not have to be some harbour board to operate these wharves?

Mr. RINFRET: I think it comes under the general powers of the board of railway commissioners under the Railway Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that the wharves and docks mentioned in this section will be constructed by the company. Will the granting of the provisions of this charter impose any obligations on the government of Canada to construct wharves and docks in the area mentioned in the bill?

Mr. RINFRET: The Minister of Transport said the other day that he did not know of any such provision in the present law.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would be entitled to have the government build a dock for them. Why should we not build docks there as well as anywhere else?

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Hotels.

Mr. DORION: Under section 14 the company is asking for the right to construct hotels and restaurants with the approval of the municipality. The fact of the matter is that there is no municipality in that area and I do not think there will be one there for a long time. Therefore the only body that would have jurisdiction over that area at the present time is the government of Quebec. That is why I have an amendment to move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). I move:

That at the end of the section the period be replaced by a comma, and that the words: "and/or the Department of Municipal Affairs of the province of Quebec." be added thereto.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to ask a question on this section. Reference is made to authority being given to lay out, manage and lease parks and summer pleasure resorts with the approval, expressed by by-law, of the municipality. I should like the hon. member to explain what is intended in regard to parks and pleasure resorts. I presume there will be a municipality established. If so, will it be a company town?

Mr. RINFRET: As the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has just said, there are no municipalities in that vicinity. As a matter of fact there is not a single inhabitant in that area. The three thousand people who are living in new Quebec at present are all around the district near the sea or the water circling new Quebec. There is absolutely nobody in the area referred to. In order that the company may at some time or another attract some workmen to the area they will have to build houses and hotels, and if they want to attract men there with their wives and children they will have to provide churches and schools. At the beginning there is no question that the municipalities will be company municipalities. But it is not the intention of the incorporators to keep the municipalities as such. As soon as a municipality is sufficiently developed to take care of itself, it is the intention of the company to continue the practice which has been followed in Quebec and to let the municipality conduct its own affairs. So far as the question of parks, which the hon. member for Kootenay West has mentioned, is concerned, these people will, of course, be entitled to have some amusement in the area. It is the intention of the company to ask for powers to build parks for the recreation of the workmen who will go there.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 15—Motor cars.

Mr. DORION: If we were to accept this section as it stands it would mean that all the transportation services, auto buses and motor cars, would come under the jurisdiction of the federal board of transport commissioners. My contention is that this would be contrary to the constitution. That is why I have an amendment to move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). I move:

That all the words after "collect rates and charges therefor" in line 36, be struck out and that the words:

"Provided however that the exercise of the powers conferred on the company by this section shall be subject to all provincial and municipal enactments and the provincial regulations of general application to highways, the regulation of highway traffic, rates and charges, and the operation of motor vehicles thereon." be substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section refers only to Canadian territory? It would not refer to Labrador at all.

Mr. RINFRET: I would remind the hon. member that we are asking only for the power to do it. Before we can come to any arrangement with either the provincial authorities or the authorities of Labrador we must have the power.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have not the legal training which would enable me to answer this question for myself. Has this parliament the jurisdiction to pass a law that no rate or charge shall be demanded or taken until it has been approved by the provincial board? I believe our powers are confined to rates charged under the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: The amendment does not say that. The amendment says that it shall be subject to all provincial and municipal enactments. The board of transport commissioners remains the deciding board.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did not the hon. member say that his amendment was striking out all the words after "therefor"?

Mr. RINFRET: Then we come clearly under the Railway Act, under section 368 and various other sections of that act. The board of transport commissioners is the appropriate authority in the matter.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 16 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Commencement date.

Mr. HERRIDGE: This section says:

The company may, within five years after the passing of this act, commence to construct the line of railway, and may within ten years after the passing of this act complete the said line of railway.

Should not the word "may" be "shall"?

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. RINFRET: I think it comes to exactly the same thing because, if the hon. member continues to read the section, he will see that it says that, unless it is started within the five years, the power becomes null and void. It means the same thing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the bill passes, I have one question to ask of the hon. member who is piloting the bill. If he cannot answer it now it will be quite all right. Anybody who knows anything about the area knows that Grand falls are not far east of this area, perhaps 150 to 200 miles down the river. Is the hon. member in a position to tell the committee whether the company has been visualizing the acquiring or endeavouring to acquire the power rights on Grand falls and, if so, will there be development of power there?

Mr. RINFRET: As I understand it, Grand falls is not in Canadian territory but in Labrador. Some research has been made but there is no definite information on it. Various power sites have been surveyed but no decision has been arrived at. I think the hon. member for Davenport has in mind that at some time it might be possible to develop Grand falls with a view to smelting ore on the spot. The company has examined that feature of the matter but no decision has been arrived at. At the moment the idea is to move the ore to the furnace rather than coal to the mine, because there is no coal in the vicinity and it would be less expensive to move the ore to the furnace than to move the coal to the ore.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I had in mind is that Grand falls are very high and have a great volume of water. These are the two principal facts in the development of power. If the company ever did acquire Grand falls I imagine it would be possible to smelt the ore there. It is being done in Sweden, but we have not done it anywhere in Canada. I hope that in the not too distant future we shall do it.

Mr. RINFRET: I shall pass the information on to the company.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—General advantage of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would somebody enlighten me as to the reason for this section? What is the meaning of it? Is it a standard section which is found in such bills? How much of the company's property is included in the words: "The works and undertakings of the company. . . ." I understand that a large share of the undertakings of the company had to do with provincial resources and was therefore beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament. I should like to know now what the implications of the section are and why it is here.

Mr. RINFRET: The hon. member for Vancouver East has mentioned that certain resources are included in the undertakings referred to in this section, and he has gone on to talk about concessions or leases which are not provided for by this bill. As I said before, all these concessions and leases have been granted by another government under legislation quite different from this. The undertaking under this bill is simply the railroad and the various other powers that have been granted to this railway company by sections 11 to 16. That is the undertaking of the company.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: With the consent of the house, now.

Mr. RINFRET: I move that the bill be now read the third time.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, there are a few words I should like to say. Personally, and speaking for the members of this group on this matter, I do not think the bill should be read the third time. This bill confers wide and sweeping powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. If anyone objects to third reading after amendments, the bill cannot be read the third time now and stands for third reading at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the house consent to the third reading?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting.

CRIMINAL CODE

ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. LaCroix for the second reading of Bill No. 133, to amend the criminal code (illegal organizations).

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I moved the adjournment of this debate and I should like to move the adjournment again.

Mr. LaCROIX: Do I understand that the debate had been adjourned by the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. I am not ready to proceed and I want to move the adjournment again.

Mr. LaCROIX: It stands, then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LaCROIX: Stands.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley) moved the second reading of Bill No. 154, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: This bill is practically identical with Bill No. 9 which was introduced into this parliament by the Hon. C. H. Cahan in 1939. That bill came up for second reading in this house on April 14, 1939, and on motion of the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, the debate was adjourned with the object that, before the house was called upon to vote on the principle of the bill, it should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not this parliament had the power to enact the proposed legislation. This was done and the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the constitutional powers of parliament to enact this legislation, as reported in 1940 Supreme Court Reports, page 49, though one of the learned judges dissented in whole and another dissented in part. From this decision of our supreme court an appeal was taken to the privy council. The hearing of this appeal was postponed until after the conclusion of the war. The appeal has now been disposed of, and the privy council upheld the validity of the legislation. The case is reported in 1947 (1 D.L.R. page 801). The concluding sentence of the judgment as reported on page 816 reads as follows:

> Their lordships are of the opinion that . . . Bill 9 of the fourth session of the eighteenth parliament of Canada entitled "An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act" is wholly intra vires of the parliament of Canada, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

It therefore becomes unnecessary for me to discuss in any way the constitutional aspect of this new bill before us. In reading the debates in this house on previous occasions, when this matter was before parliament, one finds that the constitutional aspect of the situation was always the most prominent feature of the debate, but in view of the binding judicial decision which we have now received, I say that it is no longer necessary to discuss the constitutional aspect.

I have, however, reason to believe that, although we now have the undoubted constitutional power to enact this legislation, there are still some people among us who would hesitate to support this bill for various reasons, but I presume I can honestly maintain that such people are in the minority. I believe, on the other hand, that the vast majority of the Canadian people endorse the principle of this bill, mainly because of a present awareness of Canadian sovereignty, and because of a pride in this sovereignty, a pride that is justified by the achievements of Canada during the war, achievements especially in the production field, which equal or at least approach the achievements of some of the great powers.

This state of Canadian sovereignty is especially emphasized by Lord Jowitt, who delivered the judgment of the privy council. When discussing the argument of counsel opposing the validity of the legislation with respect to appeals from provincial courts, the learned lord said this at page 815:

> It is in fact a prime element in the self-government of the dominion, that it should be able to secure through its own courts of justice that the law should be one and the same for all its citizens. This result is attainable only if section 101 now authorizes the establishment of a court with final and exclusive appellate jurisdiction. The words used by Lord Macmillan in delivering the opinion of the board in Croft v. Dunphy (1933), 1 D.L.R. 225 at page 228, upon a question that arose in regard to one of the specific subjects enumerated in section 91 are equally applicable in the consideration of section 101: "Their Lordships," he said, "see no reason to restrict the permitted scope of such legislation by any other consideration than is applicable to the legislation of a fully sovereign state.

Yet even in spite of this strong prevailing sentiment of sovereignty, as I mentioned before, there are undoubtedly objections here and there, and perhaps even some hon. members might entertain thoughts of doubt and might hesitate to go along with us who advocate that this spirit of sovereignty be given full scope and application; and anticipating their arguments, I might be permitted to mention some of those which might be advanced, all of which are, I claim, untenable and inconsistent with this main argument of mine based upon this idea of sovereignty.

Perhaps the passing of this bill, which I hope we may be able to accomplish, will be another great step in our development through the decades toward Canadian sovereignty. It is but a fulfilment of the growth and development of our constitution, as it has so often been expressed in statements by great Canadians who have gone before; and it has even been expressed in judgments of the privy council itself on numerous occasions.

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

When the Hon. C. H. Cahan spoke to the second reading of this bill in 1939, he said this, as reported at page 2814 of Hansard of that year:

> After all, to my mind the constitution is not a dead organ; it is a living organism, which grows with the body which it animates, and the only way in which we shall ever grow to be a country is by looking at it in that way.

The sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman in the foregoing quotation are but an echo of the thoughts of the fathers of confederation when they formulated the proposals which led up to the British North America Act, and although we may have been criticizing some of the decisions of the privy council, yet on occasion some of the same sentiments were expressed by the learned law lords themselves. In the reference pertaining to section 24 of the British North America Act—reported in 1930, 1 D.L.R., page 98—Lord Sankey had this to say:

> The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits.

To oppose the passage of this bill would, in my humble opinion, only be an effort to hinder the growth of this living tree or of this living organism as described so vividly and adequately by the Hon. C. H. Cahan.

However, as I said, I must anticipate some objections, and in the preparation of my arguments in that behalf I have been greatly assisted by a perusal of the admirable work of Doctor Maurice Ollivier, legal adviser of this house, in his book, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty". I am also indebted greatly to the speeches made in this house upon the subject by the Hon. C. H. Cahan; by the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, a former minister of justice; by Mr. Thorson, the former member for Selkirk who is now, I believe, a judge of our exchequer court; and by other eminent and noted Canadians. It is really their work, their pioneering in this field which I wish to place for a few moments before this house.

One of the arguments against the measure would no doubt be that abolishing appeals to the privy council would take away the prerogative of the king of hearing appeals of his subjects. I wish to differ from this contention, because in the long run His Majesty does not hear these appeals personally, but depends upon his judges; and in making the Supreme Court of Canada the final court of appeal we simply substitute His Majesty's Canadian judges as the final arbiters upon any grievances brought before him by his subjects in Canada.

On page 232 of his book, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", Doctor Ollivier quotes Lord Haldane as follows:

The prerogative of the crown is a vague expression . . . since Lord Coke vindicated the powers of parliament in the days of James I, it has been clear that the sovereign can only administer justice in courts recognized by parliament, and that he cannot interfere with the judges who preside in these courts.

Further, on page 235 of the same book, the learned author, before quoting from the summary of the proceedings of the imperial conference of 1926, makes this valid argument:

. . . if the judgment of the privy council is merely an order in council passed on the advice of a group of imperial advisers to give effect to the report of the committee it is high time that the right of appeal should be abolished and that the King, as King of Canada, should act on the advice of his Canadian ministers, for, as stated in the report of the imperial conference, 1926, "it is the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs."

Another argument which could be put forward against the measure before the house, might be that the abolishing of appeals to the privy council would mean the severing of another link with the British commonwealth of nations. I do not for one minute agree with any such contention. The Hon. C. H. Cahan, in his admirable address before this this house in April, 1939, dealt with this objection in the following words, as reported on page 2812 of Hansard of that year:

For my own part, I fervently favour that imperial connection which is established by our allegiance to the crown and by Canada's membership, as an autonomous dominion, in the British commonwealth of nations, but nevertheless, I am fully persuaded that the continuance of Canada's amicable relations and good understanding with the government of the United Kingdom will best be promoted by the repeal, so far as applicable to this dominion, of such imperial statutes as, the Judicial Committee Acts, which now confer upon the government of the United Kingdom the political authority and the legal right to intervene, at its discretion, in the administration and enforcement of the laws of Canada. Such intervention the people of an autonomous dominion, in my opinion, should not continue to tolerate.

The more free the people of Canada are from the officious intervention in our domestic affairs by the government of the United Kingdom, the more readily will our people assume and fulfil the duties and responsibilities which are implied in our continued membership in the British commonwealth.

I wish to assure the house that I most sincerely and heartily support the sentiments of the hon. gentleman, who was, I believe, a great Canadian. Furthermore, on page 235 of his book formerly mentioned, Doctor Ollivier quotes a memorandum of Australian delegates regarding the provisions of the draft commonwealth bill, and this is what they had to say:

The consciousness of kinship, the consciousness of a common blood, and a common sense of duty, the pride of their race and history, these are the links of empire, bonds which attach, not bonds which chafe. When the Australian fights for the empire, he is inspired by these sentiments, but no patriotism was ever inspired or sustained by any thought of the privy council.

Another argument that might be advanced is that because the privy council has no connection with our politics and with local conditions it would be a more impartial and therefore a more capable body to adjudicate upon Canadian disputes, especially constitutional matters. I may say that this argument is most vigorously attacked and refuted in the debates which occurred in this house some years ago. As a matter of fact, in their criticisms of the decisions of the privy council, some of the arguments advanced were strong, and their condemnations of the privy council were such that I hesitate to go along with them. The criticism advanced, and I say rightly, goes as far as to say that the decisions of the privy council upon constitutional questions have changed and distorted the intention and spirit of the pact of our fathers of confederation. If hon. gentlemen will read the debate in this house in 1937 when the estimates of the Department of Justice were before the committee of the whole, some very strong statements were made as to the failure of the privy council to live up to what was expected of them in the interpretation of our constitution and to interpret the law in the light of Canadian conditions. I should like to quote one portion of Doctor Ollivier's book in that respect, contained on pages 240 and 241, which is simply an editorial of the Ottawa Journal written many years ago, but which is still applicable, and which, I believe, still epitomizes the opinions of some of those who have made a great study of this matter and of the argument as to whether or not a foreign court is a better judge of Canadian affairs than our own Supreme Court of Canada:

Speaking of the following cases: Toronto v. Toronto Street Railway, Winnipeg v. Winnipeg Street Railway and Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company v. The King, the editor of the Ottawa Journal wrote many years ago: "A number of decisions of great importance made recently by the law lords of the privy council have been such as to raise doubt of the equity of that tribunal. Ground is given for the suspicion that, however dissociated the law lords of the privy council may be from our local prejudices or predilections, they may not be without unconscious bias due to their own surrounding and atmosphere . . . several judgments recently given suggest an undue tenderness to vested interests, seeing that in all cases referred to the Canadian courts had previously decided the other way . . . we take the liberty of thinking that the law lords of the privy council are quite likely to be the mistaken ones. And in all these cases it was a question of vested right against the public weal.

"We confess that these cases, coming within a couple of years, shake your idea of the desirability of the opinion of going to the privy council. We believe Canadian judges to be of as high a standard of honour as English judges and to be as judicial in their frame of mind . . .

"At all events, the fact is decidedly discomforting that in law suits affecting three great public contracts in Canada, all of which are governed by Canadian law, all the judicial decisions in Canada should have been in favour of the public and all the decisions of the imperial privy council in favour of the private corporations."

In closing, I should like to emphasize what I said before, namely that, to my mind, the argument which I make, and which is based upon the spirit of sovereignty of the Canadian people, is irrefutable, and that the bill should receive the favourable consideration and approval of this house. I think it will play its part in unifying the Canadian people, and if so it will make a stronger Canada. There is no question about the bonds which connect us with the empire and commonwealth, and a stronger Canada will ultimately be reflected in a stronger British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the proposal set out in Bill No. 154, to amend the Supreme Court Act. There is considerable opposition to this measure, which is based upon a policy contrary to the views held by several of the provinces, which believe that we should have a judicial body such as the privy council to decide questions of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion. These matters have come up in the courts for many years, and in my opinion the privy council seems to be one court where litigants can get justice.

The proposal is founded on a statute which is called the Statute of Westminster. That was one of the most unfortunate statutes ever passed; it was nothing but an empire-wrecking affair. The Statute of Westminster has been construed by the privy council, and were it not for that statute we would not have the right to bring in legislation to abolish appeals to that body. This bill consists of two clauses. The Supreme Court of Canada was constituted by this parliament with certain judicial powers. Under the Supreme Court Act the Minister of Justice has certain powers. That court was found necessary, and it is still necessary to have such a court in a country like Canada with divergent views on many matters coming under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. On the whole, that court has given very good satisfaction.

The province of Ontario is opposed to this proposal, because it believes that the privy council should remain as the great guardian of the rights of both the provinces and the dominion. Under the British North America Act the rights of minorities are guaranteed, and the right to use the French language is also guaranteed. That guarantee would be removed if this legislation were passed. They had an experience like this in the United States at the time Louisiana was purchased; there was a treaty with France. What happened? One of the new governors, Huey Long, came along and took it away from them.

From the time of its inception, the privy council has been the great defender of the rights of minorities in this country; because minorities have rights, the same as majorities. It has been a blessing that we have had this provision. Decisions of the privy council have been most valuable to the unity of this country. One should first look at the Supreme Court Act, and then at the Statute of Westminster; he should read the two together in order to have a clear understanding of this judgment of the privy council.

In 1935, Mr. Cahan, who was then the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, introduced a resolution, because he was not satisfied with some decision the court had given in a case with which he had been connected, although that may not have been the main reason. He was not satisfied with a judicial decision which had been given, and wanted to have the court abolished. That might be an unpopular thing to do, because some people in this country would like also to abolish the high court of parliament, the highest court in our land. In fact they would like to see us abolished, too.

It will be noted that on January 13, 1947, the judicial committee of the privy council decided that the dominion parliament may, in the exercise of the wide amplitude of power conferred by section 101 of the British North America Act, vest the Supreme Court of Canada with final and exclusive civil and appellate jurisdiction within and for Canada. This is found in the explanatory note. It states:

. . . and may accordingly deny any appeal to His Majesty in council either from the supreme court or from any provincial court and regardless of whether the matter in question is within the exclusive legislative authority of the dominion or of the provincial legislatures.

The purpose of the present bill is to give effect to the decision of the privy council mentioned above—

That is the decision of December 13, 1947.

—and also to a previous decision respecting appeals in criminal matters viz: British Coal Corporation v. The King in 1935.

What is section 54 of the Supreme Court Act, which they seek to strike out? It says:

54. The judgment of the court shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, and no appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the court to any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which appeals or petitions to His Majesty in council may be ordered to be heard, saving any right which His Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of his royal prerogative.

Ireland did not wait for that. She abolished the court and abolished the office of Lord Lieutenant, the office of the king and the supremacy of the parliament of Great Britain, and also abolished appeals to the privy council; all of her own volition, despite the fact that at the time Mr. Lloyd George was Prime Minister there had been a treaty setting out that appeals to the privy council and the office of Lord Lieutenant must remain forever. Notwithstanding that, they automatically abolished these things, in their own legislature. Then the explanatory note to this bill goes on to say:

The right of appeal to His Majesty in council has been regulated in certain statutes of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of which two are important: The Judicial Committee Act, 1833 (3 and 4, W. 4, c. 41) and the Judicial Committee Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 69).

The Act of 1833 recites that "from the decisions of various courts of judicature in the East Indies and in the plantations, colonies and other dominions of His Majesty abroad, an appeal lies to His Majesty in council," and proceeds to regulate the manner of such appeal. The Act of 1844 recites that "the judicial committee, acting under the authority of the said acts (the act of 1833 and an amending act) hath been found to answer well the purposes for which it was so established by parliament, but it is found necessary to improve its proceedings in some respects for the better dispatch of business and expedient also to extend its jurisdiction and powers."

Then it goes on to say:

The first section of the Act of 1844 enacts that it shall be competent to Her Majesty by general or special order in council to "provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to Her Majesty in council from any judgments, sentences, decrees or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad."

This bill is in accordance with only one decision. I venture to say the judicial committee would not have given the decision they did, had it not been based on the Statute of Westminster; because, after all is said and done, that is about the only principle involved in the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council. Then the explanatory note goes on to say:

This bill is in accordance with the decisions of the privy council above referred to, which themselves were based on the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 (22 Geo. V, c. 4), sections two and three, which read as follows:—

"2. (1) The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion."

That was another statute, the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the then member for St. Lawrence-St. George, Mr. Cahan, who was an able man and well liked by me and many in the house, did not like. Neither did he like appeals to the privy council. This explanatory note states that the Colonial Laws Validity Act—

. . . shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business before six o'clock.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

EMERGENCY POWERS—GUARANTEE OF LOANS, ETC. —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 23, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the amendments?

Mr. MacKINNON: The effect of the first amendment, the principal one, is to provide that part II as well as part IV of Bill No. 23 will expire on August 1, 1950. Part II as well as part IV are new legislation. Part II of Bill No. 23 deals with the apportioning of the use of elevator and transportation facilities equitably among producers. This amendment, if accepted by the house, means that the power of the board to establish delivery quotas and to move grain in commercial channels expires on August 1, 1950.

Having regard to the fact that parliament will have to consider wheat legislation well in advance of August 1, 1950, the government is prepared to accept this amendment. As a matter of fact, while this bill was before the committee in the other place, on behalf of the government I told the committee we were quite ready to accept the amendment, inasmuch as the whole legislation had to come before parliament before August 1, 1950, and that, in my opinion, the wheat board were not being given any power that they would need in any way to carry out the government's wheat programme, which it is seeking to implement by this bill.

Mr. GREEN: What about the other amendments?

Mr. MacKINNON: The other amendments are minor in character, largely verbal changes. "His bank" is changed to "any bank". The word "the" is dropped and "to that extent" is added after "shall".

Mr. GREEN: What about the one in lines 39 and 40?

Mr. MacKINNON: The amendment is to delete the words "and allowances authorized by the board" and substitute "allowances and costs provided for in such agreement". The chairman and the solicitor of the Canadian wheat board advised that this was not giving any additional security beyond what the act provided, but it was the wish of the people concerned to put in these additional words and the solicitor for the board saw no reason why that should not be done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I had not seen or heard of these amendments until the dinner hour but, looking over them, I am inclined to agree with them for this reason. I did not favour the compulsory features from 1950 on. I can see that if conditions were bad the government might have to set a price for wheat only half of what it is now and they would have power to do that but for this amendment. The solicitor for the wheat board is reported in the press as having said that the real concern of the wheat board is the maintenance of the five-year pool rather than filling export quotas to Britain. I understood that the whole reason for this amendment to the wheat board act was to fill the quotas to Britain; that that was the principal reason for this legislation. I have read at length the report of the solicitor to the wheat board, and he has given his opinion that the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement should be considered in the form of a general treaty rather than an agreement; that there is no harm if they fall down on fulfilling an agreement. He says that the whole object is the maintenance of the five-year pool rather than the filling of the quotas to Britain. Does the minister confirm that statement?

Mr. MacKINNON: No, that is not my understanding at all. The object of the legislation is twofold. It is to enable the wheat board to carry out the agreement that has been made for the sale to the United Kingdom, and, on the other hand, to provide for the payment to the producer of wheat of a guaranteed price, plus participation certificates, for a period of five years.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the import of the amendment on page 15, lines 15 and 16, which deletes the words "directed by the board". Does that take away from the board the power to direct delivery of the wheat to a particular terminal?

Mr. MacKINNON: The solicitor and the chairman of the board agree that this will in no way interfere with the powers they have now.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to say a few words with regard to the first amendment. I think the argument advanced by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is fairly sound; but I would point out that there are some objections to this amendment. We are trying today to get an international multilateral agreement on wheat. The efforts have not been too successful so far, but we still have hopes that such an agreement can be negotiated. If it is negotiated it will probably extend for a five-year period from the time the agreement is reached, and in all probability the international agreement would extend until 1952 or 1953. So if we accept this amendment and it stays in the act until 1950 it would mean that we would be curtailing the powers of the board to fulfil any multilateral agreement to assemble and deliver grain under that agreement. In 1950 it takes from the board the powers which we in western Canada have for a number of years been trying to give to the board, that is the power to maintain orderly marketing in western Canada. It also takes from the board the power to maintain orderly marketing in the fall of the year so that our growers may have a quota. In that respect the amendment is a serious matter. This is something which we have fought for in western Canada, but now in 1950 we are putting the onus on the growers of western Canada to come back again and fight to have this power put back in the act at that time. We should realize just what we are doing by this amendment which is a serious one.

Mr. QUELCH: My first reaction to the amendment when I read it was one of opposition, but, on the other hand, I realize that part IV and part III expire because the government guarantees the price only to July, 1950, and the price will have to be reset at that time. While I still stand solidly behind the idea of the wheat board being a marketing agency, nevertheless I would be bitterly opposed to compelling the farmer to sell to an agency if the price set was an unfair one. Before we go farther with this measure I should like the government to tell us what the new price will be, or I should like to wait until 1950 and see what the new price will be. Then we would be in a better position to go along the lines contained in this measure.

Mr. BURTON: I regret to take up the time of the house, but I feel I would not be doing my duty to a large number of producers I represent were I not to voice a word of protest at this time. While I can hardly agree that the other amendments have little significance, the new clause 19A should not be passed too lightly. As has been mentioned, the wheat board act will have to be considered before the end of the crop year 1950 and I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the insertion of this amendment in the bill now is anticipating conditions as they may be at that time. I suggest that it would be much better to allow the bill to stand as it originally passed through the house and to permit parliament at that time to deal with the matter in accordance with conditions as they will be at that time. While I do not want unduly to oppose the bill, I do wish to protest against anticipating what conditions will be in 1950.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY

EMERGENCY POWERS—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY, ETC.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 22, respecting trading with the enemy (1943), as amended.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy continued.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to say a brief word concerning what I consider to be the commendable face-lifting job done on this bill by the public accounts committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FLEMING: Section 2 of the original bill was linked with the original section 3. They would have permitted the governor in council to amend the regulations which become part and parcel of the act by reason of being in the schedule. That feature of the bill was struck out in its entirety in the committee. I think the committee is to be commended in that respect, in that they have preserved to parliament the exclusive right to legislate, instead of handing over to the governor in council what is, in essence and in fact, a power to legislate.

A number of amendments have been made to the regulations themselves and they are now incorporated in section 2 of the bill.

One other matter is deserving of mention. The original bill did not contain any provision for the submission of an annual report to parliament. I do not need to reopen the discussion of a few weeks ago concerning the failure of the governor in council to render to parliament any report on the administration of the custodian of enemy property, whether it was the administration of property of enemy nationals or nationals of countries overrun by the enemy; whether it was administration of property of persons of the Japanese race in Canada or administration of property of organizations that were declared to be illegal during the war. Under amendments made by the public accounts committee, the custodian of enemy property must now submit to parliament annually a report of his administration, within three months after the close of the calendar year, and the report must be laid on the table of parliament within fifteen days of the commencement of parliament, or if parliament is in session it must be laid on the table of parliament forthwith. It is fair to say that the public accounts committee has done a commendable piece of face-lifting on this bill.

Mr. GOLDING: Before the section passes, may I say that the hon. member for Eglinton has given a good deal of credit to the public accounts committee for the work it did on this bill, but I should like to congratulate the hon. member on the splendid service he rendered to the committee because he gave this bill a great deal of consideration and was very helpful in that regard.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is the last measure under the emergency legislation with which the house has to deal. I should like to take this opportunity to thank hon. members of all parties for their fine spirit of cooperation in getting through the house a difficult series of measures dealing with this transitional legislation. If I might also be permitted to do what is not generally done, I should like to pay tribute to my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) for the great work that he did in piloting the measures through the house. I think the house will support me in that.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 9.17 p.m.

Monday, May 12, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LENNARD—REFERENCE IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" TO NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR CANADIAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): On a question of privilege I wish to refer to a Canadian press dispatch appearing in the Globe and Mail this morning, to the effect that at a one day conference sponsored by the national council for Canadian-Soviet friendship, held in Ottawa yesterday, some——one hundred delegates, including parliamentarians, labour and other representatives attended, with Professor Barker Fairley of the university of Toronto acting as chairman in the absence of Leslie Roberts, Montreal writer, and president of the council.

By failing, sir, to name the parliamentarians who were among the one hundred delegates a reflection is cast upon members of this house. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I was not one of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, I do not think for one moment that the point raised by the hon. member was a question of privilege. Every hon. member of this parliament is free to do as he wishes with respect to any motion or movement on parliamentary or economic history.

MR. REID—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN WINNIPEG "TRIBUNE"

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune under the heading: "Pastor wants house gym for saggy M.P.'s." My objection is to the last paragraph in which I am described as, "Thomas Reid, the Progressive Conservative". I have been called a number of names in my day, Mr. Speaker, but this is the first time I have been referred to as a Progressive Conservative, and I wish to make a correction.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF CERTAIN ITEMS OF MAIN ESTIMATES

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That votes Nos. 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55 and 56 inclusive, dealing with external affairs, and referred to the committee of supply on March 4, 1947, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the standing committee on external affairs for consideration and report.

He said: This is a repetition of the practice of last year.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if it is the intention of the government to take similar action this session with respect to other departmental estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a question for the Prime Minister to answer, not for me.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will have to wait for the ministers of the departments to speak for themselves.

CANADIAN FORCES

DECORATIONS—REFERENCE TO RETURN ORDERED ON APRIL 30

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): On April 30 a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) was passed as an order for return. The question as originally asked, and as it appeared in the Votes and Proceedings, referred to decorations to personnel of the Canadian army only. A correction appeared in Hansard, making the reference to the "armed forces," but the return tabled referred only to the army. I should now like to file a supplementary return to include foreign decorations awarded to personnel of the other services.

INDIAN ACT

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) moved:

That the third report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to continue and complete the examination and consideration of the Indian Act, presented to the house on Wednesday, May 7 last, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON ELECTORAL DISTRICT TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): With the leave of the house I present to the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled the petition of a number of Canadian and British subjects residing in Yukon, petitioning parliament that the district of Mackenzie and Northwest Territories be not included in or added to the electoral district of Yukon, and stating their reasons for the petition.

CANCER RESEARCH

Mrs. STRUM:

1. Has any public body been set up in Canada to coordinate cancer research?

2. If so, how does it function?

3. Has any initiative been taken in setting up cancer diagnostic clinics and treatment centres?

4. What financial aid is being given to cancer research centres by the government?

5. What fellowships are being granted for purposes of cancer research?

6. What facilities are available for post-graduate training of suitable doctors in diagnosis and treatment of cancer?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes. The National Cancer Institute of Canada incorporated as a voluntary, non-profit organization, under part II of The Companies Act, on March 24, 1947.

2. Representatives of the following organizations have been requested to form a voting body who will administer the affairs of the institute through a board of directors: Canadian Cancer Society; Medical Research Division of the National Research Council; Association of Canadian Medical Colleges; Diagnostic and treatment cancer centres;

Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons; Canadian Medical Association; Canadian Public Health Association; Department of National Health and Welfare; Dominion Council of Health; National Federation of Canadian Universities.

The organizational stage in the institute is almost completed and the first official appointments will be made by the various national organizations or associations at their annual meetings to be held during the next two months.

All universities and research centres have been notified to submit applications for grants before June 1 for the present year. Requests for assistance, already received by the institute, amount to approximately $200,000 and the majority of these requests indicate that they will have to be continued for a period of years in order to attract first-class personnel and retain their services for a sufficiently long period to complete their several projects. Not all research centres have had an opportunity to file their applications and thus it may be assumed that the annual recurring budget for research alone will amount to approximately $300,000.

No public appeal has yet been made on behalf of the institute. On inauguration the sole assets of the institute consisted of a grant from the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund, amounting to $150,000 each year for three years, subject to the annual approval of the trustees of the King George V fund.

The permanent headquarters of the institute is, in the first instance, located at Ottawa, and permanent administrative staff will be appointed by the voting members of the institute at the first meeting after their appointment.

3. Yes. The provincial departments of health through various foundations or commissions have set up cancer diagnostic clinics and treatment centres.

4. Funds are available through the national research council for cancer research. Under the dominion proposals to the provinces, special reference to cancer research is made in the health grants under the health insurance section. The national cancer institute has not yet been in a position to formally request financial aid from the government apart from the sum voted by the trustees of the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund.

5. Graduate fellowships for physicians, chemists, biologists or other trained research workers will be made available by the National Cancer Institute of Canada after the projects and personnel have been approved by the scientific advisory committee of the medical Research Division of the national Research council.

6. The faculties of medicine in the Canadian universities and the special provincial diagnostic and treatment foundations or centres are equipped to provide facilities for post-graduate training in this field.

Under section 3 of the Immigration Act, subsection (e) where a member of a family wishing to migrate to Canada is physically unfit for reasons caused by war, to pass the medical examination, what procedure may relatives now in Canada use to satisfy the minister such invalid will never become a public charge?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Information not available.

2. Applications for the admission to Canada of displaced persons are filed by relatives. Arrangements for their examination by immigration teams in Germany and for transportation to Canada is made by the intergovernmental committee on refugees.

3. The department conducts an investigation on the result of which admissibility either with or without security is determined.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

INCREASED SALARIES TO TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS—RAILWAY GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Railway Act to make provision, inter alia, for an increase in the salaries of the commissioners and for an annual grant of two hundred thousand dollars for a period of ten years towards the maintenance of the railway grade crossing fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EDUCATIONAL FILM—OMISSION OF REFERENCE TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Has the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply been called to the educational film now being shown in motion picture theatres throughout Canada showing the development of atomic energy, and in which seven or eight countries are specifically mentioned as contributing to research and discovery? As no mention was made of the great part this country took, will the minister endeavour to find out why the name of Canada was omitted?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have not seen the film and have no knowledge of it, but I shall be glad to make inquiries.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

LAYOFF OF PILOTS AND MECHANICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I also should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Notices in Winnipeg papers on Saturday show a considerable layoff of men from Trans-Canada Air Lines. Has the minister been apprised of this, is he informed upon it, and can he make any statement with regard to it?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I am aware that Trans-Canada Air Lines, who have been conducting an intensive training programme for pilots and mechanics, felt that they had graduated from that programme more men than were needed immediately. The result is that men were sent home with the understanding that a priority list had been established, and when requirements justify it the men will be recalled. However, the committee on railways and shipping, government-owned, is to meet tomorrow and it will have before it the president and officers of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I would suggest to my hon. friend that more details can be obtained at that time.

COAL

USE OF OIL-DRIVEN LOCOMOTIVES—EFFECT ON MARKET FOR NOVA SCOTIA COAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) on Thursday inquired whether steam locomotives on Prince Edward Island were to be replaced by diesel engines. He also asked if large unit diesels are being tested between Montreal and Halifax.

Replying to the first part of the question, the Canadian National Railways inform me that they are taking steps to substitute diesel-electric locomotives for the present steam locomotives on the island division. Apart from the economies which will result, the use of diesel locomotives in place of steam power will relieve the Prince Edward Island car ferry of the transportation of cars carrying coal for locomotive use, but will not materially reduce the number of railway employees on the island. When viewed in relation to the production of Nova Scotia coal generally, the change-over from steam to diesel locomotives will have no effect at the present time as the railway is prepared to accept all the coal offered by maritime mines, and even if in the future the situation should revert to pre-war conditions the quantity involved could not be more than 1½ per cent of the current coal requirements of the railway from maritime mines.

With regard to the second part of the inquiry, the management of the Canadian National advise that the electro-motive division of General Motors, who are builders of diesel engines, have offered to the railway for a few test runs one of their new diesel electric locomotives. It is therefore proposed to use it on the main line between Toronto, Montreal and Halifax for a few test trips some time in June. Its performance will be carefully watched by the technical officers of the railway without any commitment whatsoever on the part of the railway, and when the test runs have been completed it will be returned to the owners.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This policy is destroying one of the best local markets we have in Nova Scotia for our coal. It is one more step towards destroying the market—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman had listened to the reply he would have seen that no such thing is going to happen.

KING'S COUNSEL

CONGRATULATIONS TO MEMBER FOR KINDERSLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) has just been created King's Counsel. As a fellow member from Saskatchewan I should like to extend to him, on behalf of the house, congratulations on a well deserved distinction.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REGULATIONS AS TO ENTRY INTO CANADA OF AUTOMOBILES WITH TRANSMITTING SETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply a question? Perhaps he will not want to answer it today, but if he can do so, so much the better. In the press recently some reference has been made to the prohibiting of the use of two-way radio telephones which were installed in certain automobiles coming over from the United States to Canada. It is not indicated in the press whether this is serious or whether many automobiles are involved, but perhaps the minister or some member of the government will clarify the situation for the house so that we may know where we stand.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The Radio Act of Canada provides that only Canadian citizens may broadcast with radio sets in Canada. The law in the United States is exactly the same. Therefore when Americans bring broadcasting sets across the line, the apparatus is sealed at the boundary—there is no great inconvenience to the owner—so that it cannot be used for broadcasting in Canada. The same practice prevails with regard to a Canadian car going into the United States. Later there may be a change in the law, but until that change is made on a reciprocal basis the present practice must be continued.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are many automobiles involved so far?

Mr. HOWE: I suppose the number is considerable—perhaps a few hundred; but it is small in proportion to the number of automobiles passing across the boundary.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, May 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The discussion on the budget has been proceeding since two weeks ago tomorrow, when the Minister of Finance presented his first budget to this house. On that occasion we were all inspired by the manner in which the speech was delivered, and those of us at least who sit on this side of the house were also inspired by the contents of the speech and the proposals made therein. We have been listening during the past week to a discussion carried on for the most part from the other side of the house. That discussion was introduced by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) speaking for the official opposition, and his speech was followed by one made by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). Each of those speakers introduced an amendment to the resolution, and I presume that it is those amendments which we were discussing during the greater part of the last week.

In order that the house may be reminded of the contents of the first amendment I should like to read at least a part of it. The financial critic of the official opposition has set forth his opposition in an amendment which, apart from his reference to the dominion-provincial conference, is stated in two criticisms, namely, that the proposals of the Minister of Finance:

> (a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living;
> (b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture . . .

I am not going to read to the house the part of the amendment which has to do with the dominion-provincial conference because I intend to confine my remarks largely to what is contained in these first two sections.

The hidden taxes referred to are no doubt customs duties, excise tax, sales tax and taxes which might be termed excise or special taxes. They are estimated to net the government $1,045 million. The direct taxes are estimated at $1,155 million. In other words, each of the two forms of taxation is estimated to bring to the government approximately the same amount. There has been considerable criticism particularly of the indirect taxes, which will bring in about one-half the net revenue. It has been somewhat of a surprise to me that the official opposition should rest their case largely upon a criticism of the indirect taxes which are to be placed upon the people of Canada during the next year.

In my reading of the history of Canada, particularly its political history, I have always been under the impression that the members of the Conservative party were strong advocates of the indirect system of taxation, and that the Liberal party, over a long period of years, had been a strong advocate of the direct system of taxation. As a matter of fact in the convention of 1919—shortly after the Conservative government of the day, during the first war had brought in for the first time an income tax measure—the Liberal party went on record not against the income tax itself but against the manner in which it was being administered by the then government, and indicated to the people of Canada that it was a part of any taxation system which might be placed in effect in Canada by a Liberal government.

I have said that I was surprised that the official opposition should take the position which they took with regard to indirect taxes. But when one reads the amendment carefully, one does not need to be so much surprised. All that the amendment says is that the opposition believe that the Liberal government, formed by a Liberal party, should have gone farther than they did go in the matter of reducing these indirect taxes. That is possibly a criticism which could be expected. But if it is intended to have the people of Canada believe that if we were to have a Conservative government returned in Canada we should have decreased indirect taxes, then I would refer hon. members and also the people of Canada to the record of the Conservative party in that regard.

If one goes back over the years one finds that each time that party has been in power in Canada they have not only in their first budget but continuously in one budget after another raised the indirect taxes, and particularly the tariffs, against the people of this country. Probably I should not need to go any farther back than to the most recent government of that type which we have had, to be able to say that during the period they were in office, in the special session held in 1930 and in the regular session held in 1931 when they brought down their first budget, they raised tariffs to the highest levels at that they had ever been in the Dominion of Canada, even under the old national policy. Then having raised the tariffs to the highest levels at which they had ever been, they increased the next type of indirect tax, known as the sales tax, from one per cent to six per cent in two succeeding budgets. With regard to the excise tax, in each of the first three budgets brought down by the Conservative party during that period of time they increased the excise taxes upon the people of this country.

I need only say that if the Conservative party expect the people of Canada to believe that if they were returned to power they would lessen the indirect taxes upon the people, it will require a much stronger declaration on the part of that party than the mere statement that the Liberals should have gone farther.

On the other hand we have the Liberal record in connection with matters of this kind. The Liberal party went out of office in 1911, as is within the memory of most hon. members sitting in this house, on the issue of reciprocity and the general reduction of tariffs in Canada. They remained out of office until the end of the first war. When they came back and took over the government of Canada in the difficult circumstances which followed that war, the government of the day reduced tariffs continuously throughout their period in office, and also reduced the sales tax as well as other excise taxes, so that at the end of their period in office the rates of taxation in those lines stood at low levels as compared with any previous periods in Canada. And I might go further and say that all forms of indirect taxation in Canada today were brought into being in the first instance by a Conservative government. It is true that some have been maintained in part by the Liberal governments which succeeded those Conservative administrations, but in only one instance has there been an increase in one of these indirect taxes. That was the instance referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), when he said I might have gone a little further. Yes, I might have gone a little further and said the sales tax was increased by the present government in the budget of 1936, in order to take care of the costs which had been placed against the people of this country while the previous government was in power. The intention of the government was to reduce that taxation, just as it had done in other instances. But, Mr. Speaker, we have been through a war which lasted for six years. During those six years the cost of carrying on government was greatly increased, with the result that up to the present time it has not been found possible to reduce that particular form of taxation.

However, in spite of the fact that we were in the midst of war; in spite of the fact that prior to the war tariffs had been greatly reduced under the present government, we went further and entirely removed the duty on farm implements entering Canada, thus carrying out the pledge that had been given to the people of Canada by the Liberal party and repeated over a considerable period of time. So I say that if the people of Canada are looking for a government that is likely to decrease indirect taxes at any time, if they base their inquiries upon the experience of the past they will look to the Liberal party, which on every occasion it has been in power has carried out that undertaking to the people of this country.

Now coming back to the statement made in the amendment itself, may I say that this amendment was added to by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). He did not criticize the amendment of the official opposition. He did not say any portion of that amendment should be left out. He merely added to it. In the amendment introduced by the leader of the C.C.F. party he said the budget should be opposed on two points, and directed the attention of this house and this country to the two particulars in connection with which he suggested the Minister of Finance should be condemned. The amendment condemns the minister because his proposals—

(d) fail to raise the income tax exemption levels; and

(e) fail to make any provision for the more than half of our population who are compelled to live on incomes below the present exemption levels.

The discussion which has followed the introduction of these two amendments has caused those of us sitting on this side of the house to marvel at the difficulty experienced by speakers in both groups on the other side of the house in keeping out of each other's preserves. That is not at all surprising when one reads the amendments again. They might have been drawn in one room by the same individuals. They might have been brought to this house in a desire on the part of those sitting in the two groups opposite to find themselves working together against the government on this occasion. But whatever the reason for the drafting of the amendments in their present form, we have these two amendments before us. The C.C.F.'ers are constantly putting up arguments in favour of the Conservative amendment, and vice versa. One would almost think they are more concerned about agreeing on this occasion than about settling the problems of the people of Canada.

The Minister of Finance did not ignore those in low income brackets, as has been suggested, those who do not pay income tax. He stated they constitute over half our taxpayers, and therefore are responsible for the care of over half our people. He said there would be no increase in taxes which would affect them. He even stated he would not endanger their position for the further benefit of those in the income tax brackets. His statement is to be found at page 2554 of Hansard for April 29, 1947, and is as follows:

If we raised exemptions above the levels established last year, we should in fact be sparing so many from income tax that it would be unfair to the large number of the people who are below the present exemption levels, because we would inevitably be forced to rely for necessary revenues upon indirect taxes which would bear more heavily upon the low income groups.

In a statement of that kind there is no ignoring of this particular group, which bears the full effect of tariff and other indirect taxes, and which represents about half the population of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Over half.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, over half. It is a concise statement of long-time Liberal policy. We favour raising as great a part of the revenues as possible by direct taxes, and placing as large a part as possible of the indirect taxes on those commodities which are not necessities, in order to avoid undue taxation of those in the low income groups through indirect taxes on necessities. Running all through Liberal policy from confederation down to the present time there is found that desire on the part of Liberal governments to avoid, as far as may be possible, taxing the necessities of the people of this country. Therefore on this occasion the minister did not find it either advisable or necessary to increase those forms of taxation which naturally would find their way to this particular group of our population. Both the C.C.F. and the Conservative party have been talking against the imposition of this policy although condemning the government for not going further with a policy which they alone have always believed in and put into effect.

The leader of the C.C.F. party submits tables and waxes eloquent, as usual, in condemning those who have incomes of $200,000. He even condescends to compare the tax of those with incomes of $5,000 and $10,000 with those having an income of $1,000. As a matter of fact in 1946 there were only 2,484 people in Canada who paid income tax on incomes of over $25,000, and there were only 246,000 who paid income tax on incomes of over $3,000. To come right down to the nightmare of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar there were only 109 persons with incomes of over $100,000; and the best estimate I can get is that there will be only between twenty and twenty-five who pay on incomes of $200,000 or over. So, after all, what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is worrying about is that the tax was not decreased sufficiently upon some twenty persons in Canada, according to the statement he made to the house the other day.

Let us compare that with the further statement made by the official critic of the Progressive Conservative party. He was greatly concerned about those with incomes between $3,000 and $7,500. These he described as the great middle class of Canada. He seemed to be concerned about the fact that their income tax had been reduced to an average amount of 29 per cent and that the highest rate of interest they could draw upon investments was a rate of three per cent. He pointed out that therefore they found difficulty in caring for themselves in later years.

There are no doubt a great many fine people in that group who pay income tax on incomes from $3,000 to $7,500. I have nothing to say about those people which would not be complimentary to them, nor have I any comment to make on the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario with respect to their earnings from investments. But I do wish to point out that, good and all as these people may be, there were only 212,000 persons in Canada who paid income tax in those brackets in 1946. Good and all as they may be, I think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is giving them altogether too much credit when he says the future of this country depends mostly upon what he is pleased to call the great middle class, defined as those who are paying income tax on from $3,000 to $7,500.

If I were going to select a middle class for this country I would select a much larger group than that, and I would classify as the great middle class those who pay income tax on incomes below $3,000. How many do we find in that group? They number 2,299,875 taxpayers, or over two and a quarter million of the people of this country. Only a little more than 200,000 pay income tax on incomes over $3,000.

Some people may think that that is a rather bad situation to have in a country; but I am not at all sure of that. I venture to say it would be difficult to find any other country in the world where such a large proportion of the population is in the income group of from $1,500 to $3,000. They are the great masses of the people in this country. Those are the people upon whom almost any country must depend for the development of its resources. I repeat that I doubt if there is any other country in the world which could show a better record.

Certainly it does not bear out the contention of our friends of the C.C.F. party who have been contending in season and out of season that this is a country of millionaires, men who have made great fortunes at the expense of the rest of us, and that therefore any government formed in this country should be formed for the purpose of getting rid of those individuals. May I say again that only between twenty and twenty-five of them are in the group who have incomes of $200,000 or more, and only 109 of them in the group having incomes of more than $100,000. And if we have had government in this country—not always by a Liberal party, but always by either the Liberal or the Conservative party—which has been able to create a condition of that kind, then I am not one of those who will trade it for some new "ism" I know nothing about and particularly for anything which my hon. friends of the C.C.F. have to offer.

There is one thing upon which the two groups opposite have got close together. The Conservatives and the C.C.F.'ers have got together in one line of criticism when they have said that on one day the government took off 29 per cent in taxes, and the next day replaced it with a ten-cent increase in butter. There has been some fancy figuring in regard to this matter, which was first introduced into the discussion by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. He thought that the fact that butter is higher in price now than it was in 1926-29 is a fact to which attention should be called. He went to the trouble of pointing out that butter had gone down to 27 cents in August of 1939. I believe he made a slip of the tongue in that statement; it was 21 cents in August, and 27 cents in October of that year. The hon. member went to considerable trouble to point out that butter was selling at a very low price in the summer of 1939, and that it had averaged only 44 cents back in 1926-29. He raised the question in the minds of hon. members as to whether 48 cents or 50 cents a pound might not be too high a price for butter in Canada at the present time.

I was not so much surprised to hear that argument from the hon. member from Muskoka-Ontario; but when I heard the same argument in greater detail and used more effectively by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) I was surprised indeed. The hon. member went to the trouble to figure out that an individual saved 19 cents from his reduced taxation during a certain period of time, and that during the same period he would pay an extra 23 cents for butter for his family, and he drew the conclusion that the man was four cents worse off.

Had it stopped with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I should not have been greatly surprised—because, after all, he comes from a mining area, and may have been speaking more particularly for those who buy but do not make butter. But when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) rose in the house and followed the same argument, but to even greater lengths, I was somewhat surprised. Coming as I do from a constituency which is just across the river—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They don't milk cows in Saskatchewan now.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend has never been in Saskatchewan or he would know they do milk cows; and he would know, too, that they would have to go without butter in some parts of Canada if the people in Saskatchewan did not milk cows.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle stated this, as reported at page 2933 of Hansard:

> The great majority of our families fall below $1,500 a year. Not only does this man lose out on his milk, but he loses out on his butter and shoes which are now out from under the ceiling—

That is news to me with regard to butter; nevertheless it is here.

—and on many other articles which go into the cost of daily living.

I should like to ask, who are these people who do not have an income of $1,500 per year upon which to pay taxes? They are the day labourers, the odd job persons, some small dealers, and the farmers. It is stated that about thirty per cent of Canada's population is on the farm, and that only 3·7 per cent of the farmers paid income tax in 1946. It is not claimed by anyone in Canada, including the inspectors, that any more than seven per cent ought to be checked as to whether they should pay or not when one examines the records. What I want to say is that if we are correct in supposing that some 30 per cent of the people live on the farms, and that very few of them were able to pay income tax in 1946, then we can conclude that of the one-half who are not liable for income tax, almost 60 per cent of them are living on our farms.

When one looks at the situation from that point of view he gets a different result from asking the question: What was the effect of changing the subsidy over into a price and making the consumer pay another ten cents a pound for butter? It should be recalled that the only reason why the consumer was not paying 48½ cents per pound for butter was that the government was paying a subsidy of ten cents a pound on butter fat which works out to 8½ cents a pound on butter. So the price was down to the consumer who bought butter, but the farmer also got his butter at the reduced price if he bought from the creamery. In this instance the public is being told that as the subsidies are taken away, then the amount which was in the subsidy is being replaced in the price; nearly everyone in Canada either wants to eat butter or does eat butter, and instead of charging a tax on all the people of Canada and then making it up to them on the price per pound for butter, they are going to ask the people to incorporate it in the price.

Let me say again that I am surprised that a member from an agricultural constituency should question the advisability of doing that kind of thing at this stage. The government undertook in 1941, when price control was inaugurated, to keep in mind what the farmers did in the war years following 1941 to assist in maintaining a low cost of living. The fact was that all food products were purchased in Canada at a lower cost than elsewhere. I should like to say to some people who are raising the question today, not only in this house but outside of it, that every consumer in this country owes something to the farmers of Canada because of the fact that throughout the whole war period, from 1941 down to the present, food in Canada has been cheaper than in any other country in the world. If it becomes necessary to adjust that situation we should look at all sides of the picture before jumping into print in order to criticize.

In order to assist in maintaining this low level the government started to pay producer subsidies on dairy products in 1942, some months after controls had been put on, and increased them from time to time down to 1945. In 1943, feed grain subsidies were paid to producers. In 1944 the Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed as a guarantee that our undertakings of 1941 would be carried out. They have been. The Conservatives say that the production is down, and the C.C.F.'ers say that subsidies have been removed from time to time and that the cost to the consumer has gone up. Let us agree that both statements are correct. After we have agreed to that, let us examine the farm income for the period from 1941 down to the present, remembering that the volume for sale has been down in the last few years. The gross cash income was as follows:

1942	1,155,900,000
1943	1,441,000,000
1944	1,846,200,000
1945	1,704,100,000
1946	1,759,300,000

The volume was down in 1946 compared with 1945, but the income was up, indicating that not only did we maintain the subsidy plus the price, but we did a little better. Is there anyone in this house who would argue that the farmer is not entitled to it? Judging from this debate the Conservatives object to the price of butter being higher than it was from 1926 to 1929. Judging from this debate the C.C.F. object to the price the farmer does receive finding its way into the price to the consumer. The government believes that during the transitional period from war to peace we should guide the farmer and the consumer back into a sound relationship under which they can deal with one another. We shall endeavour to protect both from any middleman who tries to take advantage of seasonal supplies, either to get his product too cheap or to sell it too high. The fact is, however, that the farmers' income is higher over the last three years than ever before. Even with lower marketings of some products in 1946 as compared with 1945, the gross returns are increasing.

I wanted to make these few remarks in this debate for two reasons. In the first place, I wanted to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon having brought into this house a budget which states so clearly and so concisely the wishes of the people of this country. From one end of Canada to the other, in the press that supports the government and in the press that opposes it, almost without exception the budget has been welcomed. In the second place, I wanted to say that my hon. friends on the other side—I am speaking now of the official opposition—who are continuously calling attention to the fact that the production in some lines of farm products is down and will not accept the real reason for it, have very little encouragement for any policy that they are prepared to advocate when they check the records and find that in addition to the quantity being down, the returns to the farmers are up. The farmers realize that is a condition which has put agriculture in Canada in the most favourable position it has ever occupied in the history of this country.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): May I at the outset congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on his delivery of the budget a few days ago. I think I am only being fair when I say that his delivery was good, but I am afraid that the budget was not as good as it sounded. I should also congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who has just taken his seat. We always find it easy to listen to him. So far as delivery is concerned his speeches are always good. It occurs to me at this time, Mr. Speaker, that in the race which we know is now in progress for the leadership of the Liberal party, there are many contestants.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not as much practice as you fellows.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to say to some of those who are also in the running that they will have to look to their laurels so far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned. A speaker with the great faculty that we all know the minister possesses with his flair for soap box oratory, and his ability to make people believe that black is white, when he is turned loose in a convention I am satisfied that he will give a hard run to the other contestants. So far as his speech of today is concerned I would say that now the Minister of Agriculture is one step up on the other contestants, and we shall have to wait until they speak to see where they are to stand.

On May 6 of this year we had enjoyed peace for two years. It is well I think to compare, as has been done, the budgets prior to the war with the one that we have today. Before the war our budgets ran in the vicinity of $500 million. A few days ago the Minister of Finance asked for $2,400 million odd.

Mr. ABBOTT: The amount was $2,100 million.

Mr. BROOKS: That is what the minister expects to spend; that is not his estimate of revenue.

Mr. ABBOTT: The $2,100 million is the estimate of expenditures.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister has estimated the expenditures at $2,100 million, but he is asking the people for $2,400 million. Whether the expenditures will come within the $2,100 million we shall have to wait and see. During the war the people did not complain—

Mr. ABBOTT: Before any proposed reduction in taxes. I want the hon. member to be correct in his figures.

Mr. BROOKS: I have taken the minister's own figures.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before the proposed reduction in taxes.

Mr. BROOKS: Nevertheless it is between four and five times as great as it was before the war. We can understand that. During the war the budgets were heavy. A million men were in the armed forces. These men had to be clothed and fed. We had to build a large navy; we had to spend millions of dollars on aeroplanes. Money was poured out like water, and it was easy for us to realize that we had to have a tremendous amount of money to carry on.

The people of Canada did not begrudge this money; they did not complain at the heavy burden of taxes which was placed on them to raise that money. The same thing applies to the first year after the war. No one in Canada complained about the great amount of money that was being spent at that time. We knew that the soldiers had to be brought home; we knew they had to be reestablished; we knew that there were balances on contracts which had to be paid, and there were millions of dollars which we were not called upon to collect in ordinary time. But I should like to say to the minister that the war has been over for two years. We, and the people of Canada, realize that there should be no great expenditures such as those that are anticipated. Many people are paying taxes today. The million young men who were in the army during the war are paying taxes. They are not receiving their livelihood, they are not receiving their pay from the government; they are contributing and helping to bear the burden. We know also that we do not expect—and anyone would be foolish to expect—that in the immediate post-war period, or even in the years to come, we can get back to what one might call the normal payment of taxes that we had before 1939. It would be ridiculous for us to expect such a thing. We know that during the war children's allowances were granted to the people of this country and that it cost $245 million more than we were paying in 1939. We also know that the net debt of this country increased from $3 billion to $13 billion, in round figures. The interest on this $10 billion must be paid, and it has increased the interest debt of the country somewhere between $300 and $400 million. We all realize these things. We also realize that of the thousands of men who came back, many were wounded, many required hospitalization and pensions which the government must pay for years to come and which will require many millions of dollars. But in spite of all these things I submit that we should not today be paying $5 where it cost us only $1 before the war. I say that in spite of all these expenditures that I have mentioned. I think that the people will say that there is gross extravagance on the part of any government which requires them to do this.

What I am about to say may seem like going from the sublime to the ridiculous, but some hon. members on this side of the house have mentioned the nuisance taxes. I come from a small town in New Brunswick. One of our chief industries is the manufacture of soft drinks. I receive many letters from people in my own community and nearby asking that the tax on soft drinks be reduced. I say to the government, surely with all the millions of dollars we collected, this tax on soft drinks could have been taken away and the children given the opportunity to buy their "pop" without paying two or three extra cents a bottle for it. The same thing applies to candy bars. We have often heard the expression that it is "like taking candy from a kid." Well, the government today has placed itself in the position of depriving the children of candy or taking candy from children due to the tax on candy bars.

Another point to which I should like to refer is the $250 which is taken off the exemption on income tax of a married man if his wife goes out to work. I know in my own province—and the situation is the same in many parts of Canada—we have many married teachers and nurses who assist in the family budget. We know that there is a great scarcity of teachers all across Canada. We know that there is a great scarcity of nurses. It would seem to me that if the government had the interest of the people at heart they would have done away with this $250 charge and allowed married women in these professions and in others as well to carry on.

I should like to say a few words about veterans affairs. I take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) on the decision he made a few days ago to permit a student pensioner attending university to receive his full allowance. It was a just and fair act. As the minister knows, many of us in the veterans committee last year took that very stand. I am glad that the minister has at last done away with this injustice; but I should also like to call the attention of the house to the fact that last year $667 million were voted for veterans affairs. The amount expended was $607 million. Therefore there was a saving of $60 million on the veterans affairs estimates. When I read this it seemed to me that we were saving money at the expense of the veterans. I do not think anyone wishes that we should save money at the expense of these men.

I should like to mention to the minister some other matters which have been pressed very strongly and which I believe are just as important as the giving of the full allowances to students. One is the raising of the basic rate of pension. When I point out again, as I have pointed out before, that the rate of pension in Canada has not increased since 1920, you will realize the difficulty that pensioners are having in order to live on what seems now a very meagre amount. One reason why the pension has not been increased, it has been said, is that since 1920 the cost of living has not risen in Canada. I believe the Department of Labour has so stated. I do not think there are many people in Canada today who will agree that the cost of living has not greatly increased since the year 1920.

But there is another point. The standard of living of the Canadian people has risen considerably since 1920, and on the basis of that standard of living alone the pensioners should have a much higher basic pension than they receive today. Recognizing this fact, in the United States they have increased the basic rate of pension 20 per cent within the last year.

I would also point out to the minister that the widows and children of pensioners receive what I would call scant treatment. If we consider the present rates of pension payable, the widow with children has an entirely inadequate provision for a decent standard of living. The widow with two children, if the rank of her husband was below that of captain or flight lieutenant, receives a total of $87 a month, which includes $27 for the two children. Should the two children be over twelve years of age, a family allowance of $16 a month is payable.

It is manifestly impossible for a widow to provide adequate shelter, clothing, food, education, medical and dental treatment for three adults on $103, and I would recommend to the minister that this matter be given careful consideration. The seriously disabled pensioners are in the same position. These men find it impossible to supplement their pension with employment. There is no employment even for able bodied men particularly in my part of the country. We hear the minister's department making radio appeals to businessmen across Canada to give old soldiers a chance to work.

I consider that the department and the country owe more to those old men who fought in two wars than an appeal over the radio for someone else to give them a job.

I would turn now to another matter, Mr. Speaker. In concluding the budget address on April 29 last, the Minister of Finance reminded us that in two months' time we shall have occasion to celebrate the eightieth anniversary of the founding of confederation. He pointed out that the men of 1867 had faith in the future of the united Canada which they were striving to build. By making comparison, he emphasized the fact that we had travelled a long way since that time, until today we occupy a position of high responsibility in world affairs and one of great respect. His last words, at page 2562 of Hansard, were:

> If we continue to show the courage, the unity and the spirit of cooperation which inspired the fathers of confederation, and which inspired our people during these last war years, our achievements in the peacetime years ahead will, I am confident, be equally striking.

We agree with that; there is no doubt about it. The name of Canada does stand high in this world today, but it was placed there, as you and I know, by the men who fought the war of 1914-18 and again from 1939 to 1945.

This afternoon, for a short time, I hope I may be pardoned if I speak particularly of a part of Canada which we feel has done its full share and more in the building up of this great country, but which for some untold reason has been shamefully neglected and prevented from receiving a fair portion of the benefits and prosperity which have blessed other parts of Canada.

I will not rehearse the facts, which are so well known by everyone conversant with the history of the maritime provinces. I will not tell you how at confederation we were considered to be, and were, I believe, in fact, the most prosperous part of the dominion. We lost nearly all our manufacturing industries in the succeeding years. Our young people were forced by thousands to leave our three provinces and they came to the west, they went to the United States, until today there are, it is said, more maritimers in the New England states than there are in the whole of the three provinces.

This is the story which has been told many times, and as many times have successive governments promised that these grievous faults would be corrected. I will speak of our situation as we find it today. The maritime provinces today, more than two years after the close of the war, find themselves with 30,000 unemployed. We find that our people are leaving by hundreds. We find there is no new industry being established in these provinces. As a matter of fact, the industries that were established are still leaving. I have only to refer to the speech made by my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) a few days ago indicating that in every town and city in Nova Scotia one can find some industry which has folded up and come to Quebec or Ontario. The same could be said of my own province.

Go into any town and the people will tell you there used to be a shoe factory here, a cotton mill there, farm machinery manufacturers somewhere else. Today they have moved away. That is the situation now. Only on April 11, a month ago, an industry which had been in the town of St. Stephen since 1879 pulled up stakes and moved to Toronto. I have here a newspaper heading which reads:

> New Brunswick loses industry. Soap factory and household name disappear when factory closes.

This was a factory that used to employ many people, turning out 125 tons of soap a week. It was bought by Lever Brothers some time ago and they recently closed it and moved the machinery to Toronto, so that today there is nothing left but the empty shell of a building. I could mention many others, but the member for Cape Breton South did a good job in that regard the other day.

National policies since confederation until the outbreak of the second world war have placed the maritimes under a great handicap. In 1939 the treatment we received from Ottawa became if anything shabbier and more unfair than it had been before. We had hoped for war industries and we had just reason to expect that such industries would be established in the maritime provinces. For one thing, we were close to the sea and we had the people to work in those factories. It would have saved this country many millions of dollars in the cost of transportation if factories had been established down near the seaboard. And the great bottleneck in transportation on our railways would have been avoided. But as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) pointed out the other day, this was not done; and as far as manufacturing was concerned, our situation during the war was worse instead of better. Figures tabled in the house show that $790 million were spent by the government out of the taxpayers' money in the construction of new factories in Canada during the war. Of that $790 million, New Brunswick got $5,004,000, or ·63 per cent, a little better than one-half of one per cent. Nova Scotia fared a little better; they got 2·3 per cent. But less than three per cent of the total of $790 million which Ottawa poured in the development of new industrial capacity in Canada was invested in the Atlantic provinces. We have ten per cent of the country's population, and if we had received one-tenth of the total amount spent, we should have received $79 million. Instead of that we received $23,012,000, or $55,988,000 less than what we consider to be our just share.

Then we also consider some other statistics. I do not wish to repeat what the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg said the other day. The aggregate amount of all the contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply was $11,997,200,000. Of this, $10,660,300,000 or all but $1,366,900,000, went to Ontario and Quebec. On the basis of population again, $1,199,720,000, or ten per cent, should have been spent in our three provinces. Instead of that, the expenditure in those provinces was $380 million, or about three per cent. The difference between what we should have had on a straight population basis and what we got works out to $819 million. I think that the house and the country should not forget that we shouldered our full share of that expenditure of $11,997,200,000.

You may ask me, Mr. Speaker, why it is that I mention these figures. The reason is obvious, I think; it is to show that we have been discriminated against, and to indicate the extent to which this discrimination has gone. We are asking for certain improvements. Our papers today are asking for the building of the Chignecto canal, something which would cost only a tithe of the amount which we were denied during the war. We are asking for the building of a causeway across the strait of Canso, something else which I believe we are entitled to when you consider the great contribution which we have made to the dominion. We are asking for a few million dollars in order to save hundreds of thousands of acres of the finest agricultural land there is in our province. Not only do we think we are not asking for too much, we believe we are not asking for nearly enough when we urge that consideration be given by the rest of Canada to the development of these projects.

In order to make a living today, what do they tell our maritimers to do? Well, a short time ago in this House of Commons we were told to move to Ontario, to come up here to seek jobs.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Terrible.

Mr. BROOKS: The Minister of Veterans Affairs laughs. I wonder what he is laughing about. Is he laughing at the idea of maritimers moving out of their own country?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. I think it is a terrible suggestion.

Mr. BROOKS: Is he laughing at the idea of their being exiled to some other part of the country? As a member of the government I should have hoped he would be more sympathetic than that and would assist in some way to establish industry or create work in that part of the dominion. We consider ourselves just as good as any other part of this dominion, and history will prove that is so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So I believe.

Mr. BROOKS: We have done our part and made our contribution to this country, but the government, Mr. Speaker, have asked us to send our young people to other parts of Canada in order to find work. The government have asked them to leave their homes, their friends and their loved ones, and move away. Years ago we had one mass exile of people in the maritime provinces, and I will say that we do not want another, and I do not think we are entitled to another.

These are not only my own ideas that I am expressing this afternoon. I should like to read an article which appeared in the Financial Post a few weeks ago, dealing with the situation in the maritime provinces:

What follows the war boom in the maritime provinces?

Their unemployment figures in recent months have been among the highest in Canada. Prices in the fishing industry have slumped so seriously that informed estimates predict fishermen's income will be only half last year's. Maritime coal mines are again in the throes of labour trouble. A three-month communist-led strike of deep-sea fishermen has just ended.

It goes on to say:

The critical national importance of these problems emphasizes the value of the work now being undertaken by the institute of public affairs at Dalhousie university.

People will say: Why not help yourselves? Well, the people are endeavouring to help themselves, and the institute of public affairs at Dalhousie university has undertaken an investigation into some of the reasons why these difficulties are coming upon us.

I should like to refer to the question of freight rates. We know that the board of transport commissioners are sitting at the present time and discussing the question whether freight rates should be increased. Nothing is more vital, I should say, to the maritime provinces than the freight rate structure, because we have to buy our goods from Ontario and Quebec, and the cost of freight is added to the cost of those goods. We have to pay the freight on the article as well as the price of the article when it arrives in the maritime provinces. On the other hand, when we sell to Ontario and Quebec we again have to absorb the freight rate so that we get it both going and coming. Any increase in the freight rate structure—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I believe that a ruling was made previously that a discussion of freight rates at this time is not in order, as the matter is at present before the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. BROOKS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have nothing further to say on that subject.

A few days ago I mentioned the marshlands of the maritime provinces. I had hoped that when the Minister of Agriculture spoke this afternoon, he would mention some definite policy with regard to these marshlands. The hon. member for Cumberland has spoken many times on this question, as have other members from the maritime provinces. I have never heard a member from the maritime provinces on any side of the house object to the millions of dollars which we have been spending for the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. We have always felt that it was needed, that it was a good idea, and that we should back it. We are now asking that money be spent on our marshlands, of which there are estimated to be about 100,000 acres; and I can tell this house that this land is as rich as any to be found anywhere in Canada. I have none of these marshlands in my own constituency, but a few years ago I had the opportunity of seeing them at Windsor, Nova Scotia, where I was in charge of a military camp, which I might add was built on the marshlands. While I do not wish to digress, at that time it was felt that this was a peculiar place to build a military camp costing $4,000,000. The land was below sea level, and I remember that one night during a terrific storm the dikes broke and the bay of Fundy wandered at will over the camp, particularly around the hospital, which was built in the very lowest part. It cost nearly $30,000 to repair the damage done at that time. The farmers cannot afford to lay out $30,000 to repair dikes, so this is a problem not for the farmers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick but for the government of Canada, the different provincial governments and the municipal organizations. I hope that some time soon the minister will make a pronouncement on the policy of the government in connection with these marshlands.

A few days ago, speaking to the house about lumber, I mentioned that we should have a larger quota for lumber from the maritimes, and said that our birch was being destroyed by dieback, a plant disease. I said then we were likely to lose a billion feet of lumber, which would also mean a great loss in wages, and that in five years' time this lumber would be a total loss. At that time I asked the minister if he would increase the quota on birch and hardwood for the maritimes in order that this large amount of lumber would not be lost. In reply the minister said:

That is true. We were asked to set a free quota for infested birch. The difficulty is that the lumber from infested birch is exactly like the lumber from good birch, and the result would have been that all the hardwood cut in the maritime provinces would have been infested birch by the time it came on the market.

In other words the minister suggested that the people of the maritime provinces were so dishonest that if given permission to cut and export infested birch they could not be trusted to do so. I make another appeal to the minister to reconsider the matter, because, as I pointed out previously, in a short time this lumber will be a total loss. Not only shall we lose some millions of dollars from the sale of the lumber; we shall lose employment for many hundreds of men, and that is something our provinces cannot afford.

There are many other matters I should like to mention, but I see my time is pretty well gone. We have recommended that the Chignecto canal be constructed. I need not take time now to point out what a great advantage this would be to our provinces from the point of view of trade. We have recommended that we be given a larger lumber quota. We have recommended that the government assist us in connection with the marshlands.

So far as my own province is concerned I should like also to mention the matter of a national park. At the outset let me say that I do not blame the federal government for the fact that while every other province has a national park, and some have two or three, we have no national park in New Brunswick. With the great increase in tourist traffic we expect, and which I am sure we will get in this country, a national park up the Saint John river would be a great asset to New Brunswick. Our provincial government has been derelict in this matter, but I hope the federal government may be able to put some pressure on the local government to the end that a national park may be established in our province within the very near future.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) in an article appearing last year in the Monetary Times:

> On the whole, our country has come through the war in good order and with unimpaired strength. We have many problems but we have much to be thankful for. The prospect of the years ahead is not untroubled and certainly we have no reason for complacency. Nevertheless we can count many blessings for which there is cause to give thanks and there are no problems ahead which sober good sense, tolerance and unity of purpose cannot solve.

I am sure we all agree with that statement. There are no problems which tolerance and good sense cannot solve. I have outlined the problems of the maritime provinces, and I believe that with tolerance, good sense and sympathy on the part of the other sections of this dominion these problems can be solved for the three little provinces down by the sea. We are not devoid of resources. We have agricultural land as fine as there is anywhere else in Canada. We have fine timber lands; we are told that spruce grows faster in the maritime provinces than in almost any other part of the world. We have great apple orchards in the Annapolis valley, and they are being developed also in the Saint John valley. We have the finest fisheries to be found anywhere in the world; as is well known, the north Atlantic, with its cold water, produces the very finest of fish. So with our primary resources if some means could be devised, through tariffs or in some other way, by which we could have some manufacturing in those provinces so that our people would have a balanced economy, I believe there would be no finer place in this dominion than the three maritime provinces.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, as other speakers in this debate have done, I wish to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on this, his first budget speech. I hope I may be able to congratulate him on a more thorough achievement after he presents his next budget. As to the fears expressed this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that there was some collaboration between this party and the Progressive Conservative party, I wish to tell the minister not to let it disturb his peace of mind, because there is no collaboration.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are speaking for us, Angus.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad to hear that. It is difficult to move amendments to a budget, and sometimes to other measures, as we have found out on several occasions during the present session. However, I should like to let the Minister of Agriculture know that there is extensive collaboration at the present time between the Conservatives and the Liberal party right across Canada. They have carried it a long way in British Columbia, so far indeed that now they cannot part. In the other provinces it is proceeding apace; and the more it proceeds, the better we like it.

The Minister of Finance began his budget speech with a reference to the difficult budgets of the war years, budgets which, he said, were evidence of what the people of Canada can do under the stimulus of war. What the people of Canada can do under the stimulus of war is now history. What we can do under the stimulus of peace, if we can find a stimulus for peace under the present system, has yet to be discovered.

The outstanding feature of the minister's budget speech was his lack of faith in what the Canadian people can do under the stimulus of peace. I came to that conclusion after listening to such statements as these, during the course of his speech; and I turn first to one which appears at page 2544 of Hansard, where he states that consumers are spending more and saving less than normal, with present incomes, and that we must be prepared for reductions in this spending.

It seems to me that the first statement should be followed, not by the statement that we must be prepared for reductions in spending, but by a statement something like this: "We can produce more now than ever we did before; consequently we can increase our spending."

Then, at page 2546, after forecasting a gross national income of nearly $12 billion, some $900 million greater than 1946, the minister went on quickly to state that this forecast was subject to a wide margin of error "in these uncertain and abnormal times", particularly if a substantial recession should occur in the United States later this year.

There is not much faith there. Has the government no plan for Canadian prosperity? Must we follow in the wake of our neighbour to the south, if they proceed to disaster?

At page 2545 of Hansard the minister states that one of the main supports of high current production is the result of our loans to Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland and other countries, and he states that these loans are essentially transitional measures. If those loans are contributing to our prosperity, why not continue them? If to discontinue them means not prosperity but depression—and that is the inference to be drawn from the minister's words—why should we discontinue them? The need in Europe is great; but if we can make goods available to the people of other lands, is there any reason why we should not increase consumption in this country? These are some of the questions I should like to hear the minister answer.

Then at page 2548 of Hansard the minister said:

> Moreover, our revenues are based on very high levels of production, incomes and imports which we probably cannot expect as normal levels in future years.

Why not? Because we expect a depression in the United States; and because they expect a depression in the United States, we must have a depression here. That is the purport of the minister's statement.

Then, at page 2549, referring to the budget surplus he said that, while our surplus is a real one, "it has been obtained at high levels of revenue and expenditure which do not necessarily give an accurate indication of the shape of things to come." The conclusion one must draw from this statement is that the government is giving up all hope of directing or controlling the economy of this country.

Then, at page 2561 the minister comes back to the possibility of a recession in the United States, when he stated:

> On the other hand, it must be conceded that some recession in the United States this year is by no means impossible.

And the United States, you know, got back to a so-called free enterprise system before we did. He continues:

> A substantial recession in that country would be bound to have some effects on our own situation, and this in turn would adversely affect our revenues.

During the years I have been in the house I have heard many protests against our colonial dependence on Great Britain. What is the sense of attaining full status of nationhood within the British commonwealth of nations merely to become an economic appendage to the United States? Cannot Canada have economic and social policies over which Canada has some control? It is this lack of faith in the future of Canada, and in our ability to do things for ourselves, which is, to me, the disheartening thing in the budget.

The Minister of Finance referred several times to the wonderful record of this country in the war. But what he failed to say in that connection is what is really important, namely, that to attain that wonderful record the government took the initiative in providing the organization and the money to make our war effort effective. That record could never have been achieved if our war effort had been left to private enterprise. No one, indeed, would have thought of leaving it to private enterprise. So that if anything is clear in the budget, it is that the government has abandoned all intention of directing our peacetime economy. It is leaving the providing of our needs to private individuals who are solely concerned with their own profits. Indeed the minister himself admits this when he states, at page 2559 of Hansard:

> Business confidence and available funds are so high that a good many businessmen are competing more in their efforts to expand their investment quickly than in getting down their costs and keeping down the prices at which they sell their products.

If this statement is correct—and I imagine it is; otherwise the minister, a believer in the private enterprise system, would not have said it—I would ask: Why the elimination of the excess profits tax, so as to give them more money to play around with?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): To create more jobs.

Mr. MacINNIS: But they are not creating jobs. That is exactly what the minister said.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Capital investment creates jobs.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree with that, and I shall have something to say about it later on. That is so, provided that it is proper capital investment, and not uneconomic capital investment.

But what does the minister expect? So long as the government leaves production of the economic needs of the people to the caprice of private enterprise, it can have no effective control over the nation's welfare. As a matter of fact, it can be only a sort of office boy for private enterprise. And for the hon. member who just interrupted, let me tell him that big business itself is becoming frightened; frightened of itself.

In this connection let me quote from an editorial which appeared in the issue of the Monetary Times which came to hand this morning. This is the issue for May, 1947. The title is, "Price Increases and Private Enterprise." It begins by making reference to some remarks made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) in this house, and continues:

With the end of price controls, management has regained control of the nation's economic machinery.

Not the people of Canada, but management.

Except for the safeguard that the government can reinstate price controls if it believes the public is being fleeced, management has now regained the opportunity, which it has long demanded, to prove that it can make a better world under private enterprise than appears likely under any system of socialistic or communistic operation.

Let us see how, according to the Monetary Times, private enterprise is doing that:

If private enterprise is to prove to its detractors that it can be trusted with control of our economic system, it must first of all curb the inflationary spiral that has been set in motion by the more grasping and therefore the less foresighted of its members.

Prices must be brought under control,—

These are the people who were shouting a few months ago for the removal of all controls.

—and manufacturers who are taking advantage of the removal of ceilings to raise prices out of all proportion to values, must be made to realize that as sure as night must follow day, they are fashioning the noose that will hang us all.

Examples are evident in store displays any day of the week which lead the observer to wonder how long the public will stand for it. Bits of twisted iron fashioned into garden furniture for a king's ransom. Poorly made chairs and tables at double the prices and half the quality of pre-war years. Electric and mechanical contrivances with life expectancy of a third, now cost triple, pre-war standards.

That is where all this shouting for the removal of controls has landed us We have been put in the hands of private individuals who have no responsibility to anyone but themselves. We have been told of the wonderful things that were happening in the United States, to which country the minister referred so often, where controls had been removed. There they are also depending on free enterprise, so-called. The government there surrendered to big business pressure sooner than ours did, and consequently the danger of a depression or a major catastrophe is much closer than it is here. Speaking in Washington a few days before the minister's budget speech was delivered, President Truman appealed to private enterprise to bring down prices and to prevent an "economic cloudburst." He said:

A group saw fit to sabotage price control and represented to the public that prices would come down in a free market. This has not taken place and, as a consequence, many American families are spending savings, cashing war bonds and postponing medical care and have gone into debt to an amount fifty per cent more than a year ago.

The same thing is happening here in Canada. We are following the pattern closely even to the Minister of Finance urging business to lower prices. Instead of wasting time pleading with big business, the Minister of Finance should profit from the experience which was so effective in achieving high production and maintaining stable prices during the war. Early in his speech the minister mentioned that consumer purchasing was continuing to expand and that there were few signs of an unwillingness or inability on the part of the consumer to buy what was offered in the market. I cannot agree with that and I think the same statistics that are available to me are available to the minister. I have in my hand here the "Monthly Review of Business Statistics", issued by the bureau of statistics, for March 1947; and it states:

Retail and Wholesale Sales

Dollar sales of retail stores in January, 1947, were 13 per cent greater than in the same month of 1946, about the same average gain as was shown throughout the year.

And again:

Though dollar sales have been moving steadily upward, there is evidence that the real volume of goods sold has been levelling off. When the index of retail sales is adjusted for changes in retail priecs, it has been in recent months only four per cent above its level of the corresponding month a year ago compared with six to eight per cent several months ago and twelve to thirteen per cent in the spring and early summer of 1946.

At the wholesale level a flattening out even in dollar sales is indicated by sales results for recent months. Compared with the same month of the preceding year, sales in January and December were respectively 9·4 per cent and 13·8 per cent greater in contrast to an average gain of 18·7 per cent for the whole year of 1946. Accompanying this trend, there have been increases in inventories in almost all trades, and at the end of January the dollar level of inventories was 29 per cent greater than a year ago.

There is still another indication that consumer purchasing power is running low. This is to be found in the increase in instalment or credit buying. A news item in the Toronto Daily Star of March 22, 1947, points out that as durable goods were coming on the market, consumer purchasing power was beginning to dwindle. The government took cognizance of this fact early in the year, January 15 to be exact, when it lifted the restrictions on consumer credit. A survey of Toronto merchants since that time, in the words of the Toronto Daily Star news item, shows that buying on the instalment plant has been scorching right along. More merchandise on the counters, less cash in Mrs. Consumer's purse, and easier terms have combined to lift instalment selling out of its wartime doldrums.

That is merely an indication of the increasing poverty of the people. The news item points out further that advertising of credit terms has become widespread. Storekeepers are finding the need to advertise credit sales, and they would not do that if they could sell everything they had to sell by cash sales. Goods are sold for as little as ten per cent down with eighteen months to pay for household goods, and twenty per cent for clothing. The article finishes by saying that it is expected that, as durable goods become more plentiful, instalment buying will bounce even higher. This means that the consuming public, particularly that half of the population below income tax exemption levels, cannot buy the things they need without mortgaging their future. Instalment buying is included in the retail sales statistics. All that happens through instalment buying is that goods bought this month, next month and the month after will not be bought eight or nine months hence. As I said, it is mortgaging the future in order to buy today.

That production is catching up with demand can be seen by anyone walking along the streets of any city, and the twenty-nine per cent increase in inventories reported by the bureau of statistics is merely a confirmation of that fact.

Speaking in the budget debate last year, I said that under our present system the ordinary thing was for supply to overcome demand. I pointed out further that that was the root cause of all modern depressions. That is true, and it is the reason everybody today is thinking about the depression which is around the corner. During the depression of the thirties we were always looking for prosperity around the corner but you do not have to look for the depression around the corner. Unless we do something about the matter, the depression will meet us more than half way. If, as I said, the ordinary thing is for supply to overcome demand, then the obvious thing to do would be to increase consumer purchasing power as goods become plentiful. If there was any social purpose underlying our production and distribution that would be the logical thing to do. We could and should go without many things we should like to have in order to build up our capital structure so as to produce a greater abundance of consumer goods, and during the time we were doing that consumer goods would be in short supply because the labour and material required were being used for the production of capital goods. But as soon as we had the capital structure built we should be able to increase our consumer purchasing power. But what we have is just the very opposite. We are generally prosperous, as prosperous as a working class can ever be under capitalism, so long as we have a large-scale investment of capital. As soon as investment falls off, although our means of producing the things we need have increased, we have to go without because we have not the means to buy, and as I mentioned before, we then have the depression that everyone seems to be expecting. Although, according to the Minister of Finance's speech, the government is momentarily expecting a depression—

Mr. ABBOTT: No, no; I did not say any such thing.

Mr. MacINNIS: —a falling off in private investment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say any such thing. I know my hon. friend wants to be fair. I did not make any such statement, nor did I imply any such statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: As a matter of fact, if the minister had been in the house at the beginning of my speech he would have heard me quote from his speech on several occasions where he said that, and if I had the time at my disposal I would quote it again.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will not find anything in my speech where I said expressly or impliedly that I anticipated any immediate depression. I did not use the word "depression" anywhere in my speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: It depends on what—

Mr. ABBOTT: It depends on the meaning you want to take from it. My hon. friend wants to take a meaning which was not there.

Mr. MacINNIS: It just depends on what the minister calls "immediate". Here is what the minister said, at page 2544 of Hansard:

> . . . and consequently they are probably spending more and saving less than they normally would with incomes at present levels . . . We must be prepared for reductions in some or all of these abnormal expenditures.

Then at page 2545 of Hansard, after forecasting a gross national income of nearly $12 billion, some $900 million greater than in 1946, the minister went on quickly to state that this forecast was subject to a wide margin of error "in these uncertain and abnormal times."

Mr. ABBOTT: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am quoting from the minister's speech in Hansard.

Mr. ABBOTT: "The minister went on to state"; I did not use these words.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; the minister did not use these words, but they are close to what he said and contain the implications of what the minister intended.

Mr. GILLIS: Read the words again.

Mr. MacINNIS: "In these uncertain and abnormal times" particularly if a substantial recession should occur in the United States later this year.

Mr. ABBOTT: "Particularly if"; of course.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, "particularly if."

Mr. MICHAUD: We could not have a depression here.

Mr. GILLIS: We have it in half the country. Take your own province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then, at page 2548 the minister said:

> Moreover, our revenues are based on very high levels of production, incomes and imports which we probably cannot expect as normal levels in future years.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no suggestion there of an immediate depression. That is a perfectly clear statement of fact.

Mr. MacINNIS: As I said before, it depends exactly on what the minister means by "immediate". Indeed in one place he referred to the possibility of a depression occurring in the United States this year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to correct my hon. friend. I did not use the word "depression" at any point in my speech.

Mr. GILLIS: Recession.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think that is correct either.

Mr. ABBOTT: You will not find it. I can assure my hon. friend he will not find it there.

Mr. MacINNIS: I shall find it and show it to the minister afterwards.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I were a gambling man I would offer a small wager.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not a gambling man but I do not mind taking a chance on a sure thing.

I wish to say a few words on dominion-provincial relations and social security. As I said the last time I spoke in the budget debate, I am not going to try to apportion the blame for the break-down in the dominion-provincial conference. But since the responsibility for convening the conference of necessity rests on the dominion government, the dominion government should call the conference again as soon as possible. I would say "as soon as possible" is as soon as the session has finished. That conference should continue in session until an agreement is arrived at, or until it is made clear beyond the possibility of a doubt who is preventing an understanding.

An agreement on taxes is only a small part of what must be done if we are to attain for the people of this country the economic advantages and social security which can come only from cooperation between the dominion and the provinces.

There is an urgent need in this country for a national social security programme that will be adequate in its provisions and that will apply all across the country. It must make provision for every Canadian citizen who for any reason is prevented from earning a living. I have before me the proposals of the dominion government to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. These proposals were drawn up some time in the summer of 1945 and at least to a person of my way of thinking they make good reading. I will quote just two or three paragraphs from page 1:

> The preparations must be undertaken against the background of severe depression and the enormous dislocation of war. Under the conditions which existed for nearly a decade prior to 1939, the Canadian economy did not provide adequate opportunities for employment and enterprise; the deficiencies in the provisions for social welfare became strikingly apparent; the structure of government finance in our federal system developed basic strains and weaknesses. The war came before solutions to these problems were reached.

And on the same page:

> The demonstration of the potentialities of the Canadian economy has been one of the outstanding features of the past few years. In a relatively short time national production was doubled. Nearly one-half of this greatly expanded output was devoted to war. In spite of this large effort, the general level of civilian consumption was not reduced; for the lower income groups it was significantly increased.

If we can do that in war; if we can do that when a big share, perhaps half of our economy is devoted to war, is there any reason why we cannot do it in a peacetime economy? If any province or any number of provinces are standing in the way of that being accomplished, these being the proposals of the dominion government, it is up to the dominion government to let the country know who are preventing these things from being done.

To me the disturbing factor is that the government does not seem any longer to be interested in its own social security programme. It seems to have given up the idea, if it ever had one, of instituting a wide programme of social development. The need for social security cannot be met by a small improvement in old age pensions. The eligible age for old age pension is, of course, too high, but the criterion for social benefits should not be based on age. A person of sixty, or fifty or forty, if he or she is prevented from earning a living, should have just as valid a claim on the state for a reasonable standard of living as a person at the age of 70 or over.

I know the question will be asked, who will pay for it? My time is nearly up and I will merely say this. It can be provided for only out of the production of the country. If we are to have an old age pension or old age benefit that will take care of people over fifty, or sixty, or sixty-five, whatever the age we take, it means that those between the age of eighteen and that other age must be willing to produce the goods and services that those older people consume. It is just as simple and concrete as that.

Since we cannot do it by distributing the goods and service direct it can be done only by taxation. I would say—and this applies particularly to members on my right—that the people in this country who were shouting for tax reductions since the end or even before the end of the war have done a disservice to Canada, particularly when they shout for tax reductions and in the same breath ask for government expenditures of every conceivable kind. These things cannot be done without a transfer of income from those who have it to those who do not.

To this group one of the disappointments of the budget is that the income tax exemptions were not increased.

Mr. FERGUSON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: If you are quick I am willing to answer it.

Mr. FERGUSON: Do you believe in no tax reduction and continued expenditures, as the government is doing today? You referred to the group on your right. Do you believe in no tax reduction and continued spending?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know just what my hon. friend means by continued spending. As regards continued spending, we can get our opportunity to deal with that when the estimates are before us. Then let everyone say whether he wants or does not want this or that estimate passed, and then call for a vote on that estimate. In regard to increased taxation, or no lowering of taxation, I say that if we expect people below the exemption levels to live decent lives and be good citizens on incomes of that amount, there is no reason why those of us above that level should not be willing to pay our taxes. That is the position I take.

Mr. FERGUSON: Will the hon. gentleman answer my question?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all the answer I will give.

Mr. FERGUSON: Don't debate. You cannot answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: In his concluding remarks the Minister of Finance used these words, which have already been quoted by the hon. member for Royal:

> If we continue to show the courage, the unity and the spirit of cooperation which inspired the fathers of confederation and which inspired our people during these last war years, our achievements in the peacetime years ahead will, I am confident, be equally striking.

The "if" there is the big question mark, and I would tell the minister that, no matter how much we wish it, there can be no unity without identity of interest, and there can be no identity of interest unless we have a single objective. And we have not a single objective in this country. You cannot have a single objective in a society in which you glorify the right of everyone to do as he pleases, to get as much as he can and to give as little as he must. That is private enterprise and there is no hope of unity in a system of that kind.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Like other members who preceded me, I want to extend congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the eloquence with which he delivered his first budget speech. I believe congratulations should also go to the cheering section on the government side of the house for recognizing some points that were not expressed in the budget, and perhaps congratulations should go as well to some of the ministers who supported the Minister of Finance in their own little ways, though, after all, things were not just as the picture would seem to be.

I also want to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on the progress he is making in learning social credit terms. I hope his knowledge of the technique of social credit is as complete.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the hon. member will support me in what I have said with regard to taxes, I will agree with him.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member for Vancouver East is getting on to our programme very quickly.

The Minister of Finance, in dealing with the monetary question, told us that at the end of March, 1947, we had an unmatured funded debt of $16,524,164,000. That, I may say, is in contrast with approximately three and a quarter billion dollars as at March 31, 1939, just before the war broke out. In 1947-48 interest is estimated to run to $437,517,000, as compared with approximately $128 million for the last fiscal year before war broke out. This means that our interest is now almost four times what it was before the war. In my opinion, a large percentage of that interest is not necessary and might better be employed for the payment of many of the things we in Canada need much worse than we need the payment of interest to individuals who, after all, are creating credit which is based on the ability of the people of Canada to produce and deliver goods and services. I feel that there is no need whatever for a budget such as the one delivered by the minister, and I think the minister himself was just a little bit ashamed at having to deliver such a budget. I am sure we all realize that it is not his alone, but that he received quite a little help in preparing it. At page 2553 of Hansard, under the heading of "Tax policy" we find this:

> Economic considerations alone would hardly justify immediate tax reductions. As I have already stated, there are still substantial inflationary pressures pushing our prices and costs up. Reductions in taxes may add up to these pressures in some measure, though they should reduce some of the demand for higher wage rates.

Then, along in the second column, the minister says:

> Therefore, whatever may be argued from the point of view of immediate economic effects, or long term debt policy, one must reach the conclusion that those who must bear them are not ready to support income taxes on the present scale. In fact, I am sure that were our present levels of personal income tax to be continued, they would constitute a serious impediment to a full working effort and a brake upon the drive and initiative of men and women in all groups and classes.

Farther down in the same column, he says:

> It would appear that if Canadians are asked to carry tax burdens which, after making due allowance for lower cost of living or lower cost of doing business or other offsetting factors, are significantly heavier than those imposed by the United States, there is a risk of a serious drain of Canadian personnel to the south for this reason alone.

Then on page 2554, under the heading 'Personal income tax", the minister has this to say:

> This is the tax that at present levels is proving so unpopular and is causing difficulty. To overcome the situation which I have described a substantial reduction is necessary and I do not feel that we can afford the reduction required in this field and also substantial reductions in other forms of taxation in the face of the responsibilities which Canada finds upon her shoulders in this post-war period.

I said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, that it was unnecessary for the Minister of Finance to come to the house and tell us that he expected to expend so much money in interest during the present fiscal year. The same thing applies to our national debt, because had the policy been adopted which Social Crediters have consistently advocated in this house since we came here first in 1936, Canada would not have a national debt of the present proportions. I might say that we have been supported in the past—I am not sure whether their minds have as yet been changed—by some of the Liberals on the other side of the house. For instance, in the past we had the support of Mr. McGeer—now Senator McGeer—Mr. Arthur Slaght, who represented the constituency of Parry Sound, and for some time the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) also supported that view.

Mr. LOW: Times have changed.

Mr. FAIR: Someone says he is not in now and he does not believe in that way any more, anyway.

Mr. JOHNSTON: He is Liberal leader in Saskatchewan now.

Mr. FAIR: I was rather amused the other day—I think it was Friday—when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), who administers the medicine, rose to speak in support of the Minister of Finance, and in his own polite way told the Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. that they should withdraw their amendments and shut up, that the budget was good anyway. As we all know, the Minister of National Revenue is a medical doctor and in his practice is in the habit of administering bitter medicine. I feel that on this occasion he chose to put a little chocolate coating on it so that the patients would not notice the effect while the medicine was going down.

An hon. MEMBER: It was bad medicine.

Mr. FAIR: I do not feel that he can fool the workers of Canada with the speech he made. They are just as wise now and just as much opposed to the taxing programme as they were before that speech was delivered. We find that at the first of this year the exemption for a single person is $750, and that for a married person is $1,500. Then again, in the case of a married woman who is working or otherwise getting an income of $250, if the amount does not exceed $750 her husband finds the amount of his exemption decreased by the amount of the wife's income over and above $250. If the income exceeds $750, they are both classed as single persons.

Some time ago there was some mention made of this in the press under the heading of "Tax on Marriage". I take it from this that this is a move by the government to discourage marriage because by being married, building their homes and running them as they should be run, people are penalized by way of income tax levies. The clipping reads as follows:

> In a free society it is not the business of the state to seek by applying special pressures to drive married women out of remunerative occupations and thus compel them either to work in their own homes or not to work at all.
> It was done by Hitlerite Germany, but it should not be done by Canada. In Germany it undoubtedly contributed to the discrediting of matrimony, since women were able, as they will be able here if the (dominion government's income) tax scheme is persisted in, to evade such pressures by making their sex relationships informal and impermanent.
> The tax is a tax on being legally married, not on maintaining a joint household.

I believe there is an injustice there which is placed upon married women in Canada. Many of them find that they are compelled to work, since some of them are separated from their husbands, and are at the same time supporting families. The husband is either not in a position to, or will not, support the family and the married woman is compelled to do so and at the same time pay more taxes than she should.

Then again, the present budget does not, in my opinion, afford relief for many who are in the low-income tax brackets or those who are below that level. When I say that, I mean that those who are in the low-income tax brackets do not get very much relief, and those below that level find that the cost of the things which they have to buy in order to live has increased considerably, and there is nothing in the budget to help them. We find that a number of the men and women whom we sent overseas, who during the war had all the supplies they required, are now back in civilian life trying to get reestablished, and with our present heavy income tax levy and low exemptions they are having quite a time doing anything about it.

In addition we have a number of nuisance taxes such as those on soft drinks, which I understand today cost seven cents, though I do not use them; on chocolate bars, which cost eight cents, on theatre tickets, postage stamps, and so on. These nuisance taxes should have been removed, because they were put on during the wartime period, and at least the shooting war has been over now for two years.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us about the high income of the farming population, but he did not tell us what the farmers' expenses were. In my opinion, and as I shall try to show later on, the financial position of the farmers is not as bright and rosy as the minister tried to make us believe. As things stand, it is like the Scotsman who gave his little baby five cents to go to bed and to sleep; then, as soon as the baby went to sleep he came along and took back the nickel and had it for the same purpose the next night. Then we have the increased cost of living. Many people do not believe the index is accurate, and in my opinion they are quite correct in their judgment. If you go into a restaurant, into a hotel or into any store you find the prices of the things you have to buy considerably increased in comparison with the basic period, 1941. In addition to the price we have to pay for our meals, in some cases we find that after you have had a meal and have walked a few blocks you are all ready to eat another meal, because the servings have been cut down so much and in fact have almost disappeared as far as butter and sugar are concerned. I believe it is now time to discontinue the rationing of butter, because last month the bureau of statistics told us that our production of butter had almost doubled. I do not see the use of making butter if you do not go ahead and consume it. Meat rationing has been done away with for some time, and we find very few people, if any, suffering, as they did not during the time meat was rationed. In the case of butter, as was the case with meat, some people do not use all their coupons, and they pass either the coupons or the butter to their friends. So I think at least everyone living at home is getting pretty well all that he needs.

Dealing with the income tax of farmers, I feel that an injustice has been done farmers all across this country in that connection. Until very recently, perhaps within the last year or eighteen months, many farmers did not know they were required to file income tax returns. Many did not have sufficient incomes to require the filing of a return. It is curious that no move was made by the government to collect income taxes during the war period, when high production was needed. Perhaps the government realized that if they insisted on having their pound of flesh at that time the farmers would not work eighteen or twenty hours a day, as many of them did, or might go on a slow-down strike as some of the other occupational groups have done. About a year and a half ago, however, just after the Christmas and New Year's holidays, thousands of income tax blanks were sent out and the farmers were asked to fill them in. Only a small percentage of the farmers kept accurate records, and those farmers were able to file the returns. Those farmers who did not keep records were asked to come to certain towns all over the prairie provinces, where they were met by a number of assessors from the income tax branch. Where a farmer could not produce records these assessors made up an income tax return on the accrual basis. By that I mean they went back to January 1, 1941, and got an inventory of the farmer's holdings as at that time. Then they took another inventory as at the end of December, 1945, and assessed a certain portion of the difference as income for each of the years in between. Then, if they found the farmer taxable they had him pay the tax. Perhaps that system is all right to overcome a farmer's failure to keep records, but I feel that injustices were done the farmers in making up those forms. In most cases, of course, farmers are not bookkeepers. The assessors did have some knowledge of bookkeeping, so that the farmers did not question the statements they made up but, if they had the money, gave their cheques for the amounts involved. In many cases, however, farmers who thought they were out of debt had to go back to the bank and borrow in order to pay their income tax.

Some of those income tax returns included amounts running up to $800, in the case of some of my bachelor neighbours, representing that portion of their upkeep which was supposed to have come from the farm. In my opinion, that should not be done. In 1942 we had a discussion in this house on farmers' income tax, and at that time I felt that we had gained at least some redress for the wrongs that were being done the farmers. On the back of the blue form used by farmers we still find this note re farmers' receipts and expenses:

4. Produce used from "family garden" and small sums usually termed "pin money" obtained by the wife, sons or daughters, by their own efforts, need not be taken into account.

At that time I felt that the minister had met the objection, and that we would have no further trouble, but we find the practice of charging the farmer for the items above still being followed. Only a few months ago I was told by one of the assessors that they charged up $50 per individual in each family for the produce used out of the garden, including fowl, butter, eggs, and so on. In my opinion, since there is no exemption whatever for the wife and family of the farmer, no income tax should be charged on these small items.

I feel also that the farmers have already paid far more than their share of income tax, indirectly. I say this because farmers have been delivering their produce to the market for the past number of years at prices far below the cost of production. They have been given no credit for this. Severe losses accrued during the depression years, particularly between 1930 and 1940, and during the better years since 1942, with better prices, the farmers have been busy clearing off their debts. But while doing that, and in addition to taking care of a condition over which they had no control at all, they were compelled to pay income tax as I have already stated. We have also subsidized the world wheat market for a period of years at a price of $1.55 a bushel for the best wheat grown in the world. If our government wants to be a good fellow with the other countries of the world, why does it not let the Canadian taxpayer pay the subsidy, rather than the farmers and principally the prairie farmers? There might have been some justification for that, but there is no justification at all for having the Canadian farmer subsidize the world wheat market. Then again we have subsidized to the extent of many millions of dollars the consumers of Canada by supplying cheap wheat for flour, so that they may have cheap bread, and may not have a cost of living increase.

Then again, in order that our soaks in the country may have their liquor at a cut price, including the water, we have also subsidized the distillers for some time past. That programme I understand is now discontinued. At the present time and for some time to come the farmers of Canada are subsidizing the British consumer to the extent of the difference between $1.55 a bushel and the price of wheat on the world market, on a minimum of 160,000,000 bushels in 1946 and again in 1947.

Again I ask the government: Why not have all the people of Canada stand the cost of this subsidy, rather than have the farmers do it? In my opinion, the farmers are the geese in Canada which lay the golden eggs. Every attempt should be made to encourage agriculture and do everything possible to bring it into a prosperous condition; because that prosperity on the farm is reflected among all classes all across the country.

Perhaps the government may find some comfort in telling us, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has done on more than one occasion, that the prices arranged by the government have been agreed to by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I feel that that organization, and those smaller organizations of which it is composed, as well as the individual farmers and other consumers who make up those organizations, should have a little light on the prices that are being accepted on behalf of the farmer. It is up to the individual farmers to become organized, as do other occupational groups, and see to it that they get what is properly coming to them, which they have failed to do in the past.

I am quite satisfied that until that is done the farmer will continue to be, as he has been in the past, the slave of the Canadian people. The time has come when that should cease. I think it is a good time now, also, to tell the farmers of Canada that they should consolidate their positions, and that the picnic, as some people describe it, will soon be over.

We have in Canada a potential production which will far more than supply our own needs. Even during the period of war, when hundreds of thousands of our young men and women were not occupied in farming, we were able to supply ourselves and also to export hundreds of millions of dollars worth of our produce to countries overseas. And as the countries overseas which were over-run during the war, and others also which participated in the war, make progress toward becoming self-sustaining, the picture for the Canadian farmer will not be so rosy, if we note the history of agriculture following the first great war.

So I say again that this is a good time to warn the farmers of Canada to put their houses in order, before it is too late. I should also say, in that connection, that in the government's immigration policy steps should be taken to see to it that the people they bring in are placed in industries other than agriculture, because we have enough on the farm at the present time to feed two or three times the number of people in the country. To put more people on the farms will only mean increasing our production and, for that reason, under our present programme, cutting down prices of present farm production.

Perhaps one of the best ways to show the condition of farmers is by putting on record the number of farmers who have been paying income tax in the past, the amounts of income tax paid, and the average paid each year. I have here a table covering the years 1930 to 1938 inclusive, and setting forth the information to which I have referred. I have a similar table giving the same information from 1939 to date, and I should like to place these tables on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to table these figures?

Mr. ABBOTT: What are they?

Mr. FAIR: They are tables which give the number of farmers paying income tax, the total amounts they paid, and the average amounts.

Mr. ABBOTT: Who provided the information?

Mr. FAIR: It is contained in a return brought down in my name.

Mr. McCANN: Then they are already on record.

Mr. FAIR: No, they were given as a return, and are not on record up to the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER: They can go on only with unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the hon. member has an order for return he ought to be allowed to put it on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless there is unanimous consent we cannot permit it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then he can read it.

Mr. FAIR: Am I compelled to read these papers?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has not unanimous consent he will have to, yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Who objects?

Mr. ABBOTT: If these are tables prepared by the Department of National Revenue, then I think probably we can consent to their being put on record.

Mr. FAIR: They have been prepared by the government and tabled in the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: In that event, so far as I am concerned, they may be put on record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. FAIR: The first table I shall place on record shows the number of farmers paying income tax between the years 1930 and 1938, with the amount of income tax paid, and a fourth column showing the average amount paid. It is as follows:

FARMERS PAYING INCOME TAX

Year	Number of farmers	Amount of income tax paid	Average tax paid
1930	2,276	$131,910	$ 57 95
1931	653	36,379	55 71
1932	249	27,620	110 92

The second table gives for the years 1939 to 1945 the same information as that contained in the one I have just placed on Hansard, and breaks this information down by provinces. The table is as follows:

In 1945, the best year so far, the percentage of farmers in the provinces paying income tax is listed below:

	Per cent
Prince Edward Island	2·1
Nova Scotia	1·0
New Brunswick	·3
Quebec	·7
Ontario	3·1
Manitoba	17·0
Saskatchewan	18·4
Alberta	12·1
British Columbia	11·6

Today the Minister of Agriculture told us that in all of Canada 3·7 per cent of farmers were entitled to pay income tax. That, in my opinion, will give a better picture of the condition of Canadian farmers than any tables which could be shown or speeches made by people who do not know what they are talking about. I feel that at the present time income tax levies are too heavy and exemptions are too low. These things certainly help to cut production.

In support of that, I have a table showing production of hogs, which I shall read into the record. These are the figures for the hog population of Canada at June 1 in each of the years mentioned:

1937	4,016,000
1938	3,527,000
1939	4,364,000
1940	6,002,000
1941	6,081,000
1942	7,125,000
1943	8,148,000
1944	7,741,000
1945	6,026,000
1946	5,377,000

I am sure that when we get the record for 1947 it will show a drastic reduction from the figures I have just given.

I believe that at the present time the heavy income tax levied against farmers is to a great extent responsible for the cut in production. Even at present rates it will be noted that for every four hogs the farmer turns out for himself, after reaching a profit of $500, he must turn out one for Mr. Abbott. Farmers do not relish doing that.

Also the method of paying the bonus on barley, oats and feed wheat does not satisfy farmers who are producing grain. They feel, and properly so, that if they are to produce grain and feed hogs they are entitled to exactly the same treatment as the man who does not grow grain but feeds it to hogs. In other words, the bonus on feed grains should be paid to the man who raises the hogs. In many cases those who feed grain are much nearer to their markets and have an advantage over those who grow the grain and feed it.

We have quite a number of complaints about farmers having to pay income tax on returns from the production of poultry, eggs, cream and that sort of thing. I have here a sample letter which was sent to me from Vermilion not very long ago. It refers to an article in the Edmonton Journal which advocated the stopping of production of these small items if the farmers were compelled to pay income tax, and it reads:

> I am enclosing a clipping from the Edmonton Journal of December 13, 1946, out of the letter box.
> For the last three or four years this has been my idea and I would safely say the idea of at least 95 per cent of the farmers of this district. If our dear friend Mr. Ilsley wants to cut into our profits anywhere from a third to forty-two per cent he better come to the farm and help feed these pigs and milk the cows after we get through working in the fields the usual short eight hour day the farmer puts in.
> If the powers that be had the brains we figured they had when we sent them down to look after our affairs they would remove the butter ration in less than six months by simply allowing the cream cheques for pin money for the wives and children of the farmers. I can name any number of farmers who are not milking just for that reason and not bothering to feed pigs in spite of the literary wandering of our pig man, Mr. Gardiner, that farmers make more money out of selling grain.

He goes on to say that he believes he has made his position clear. I am trying to state to the house the stand taken by thousands of our farmers at the present time. Farming is our basic industry and it should be encouraged in every way possible. While newspapers and other records state that our farmers' debt is reduced, and I agree that it is reduced to a certain extent, those authorities who send out those figures must also agree that the farmers' equipment has reached a state where they will have to buy practically a full line of farm equipment just as soon as it is possible to get it. In many cases that will cost the individual farmer thousands of dollars. Farm homes and outbuildings are run down, and many farm homes require electrical and other appliances which are not there at the present time and which should be available to our farm population.

At the present time the prices of our farm products are stabilized to a great extent, but the prices of things the farmer needs are on the increase. There should be a subsidy on the manufacture of binder twine in order to hold down the price. Our farmers are complaining bitterly about the increase in items of production over which they have no control. While the prices of their products are pegged, the prices of things they have to buy are allowed to increase.

An amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is long overdue, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will bring in this legislation so that we may have an opportunity to discuss this at greater length. Many farmers feel that this should be on an individual farm basis and in that way many of the injustices now created would be done away with. I have here a brief which was presented to the government on April 16 by the Alberta Farmers Union and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section. In their summing up they recommend a four-year average for income tax purposes to replace the present three-year period. Then they say that in the case of dispersal sales of live stock, an equivalent number of animals to those owned on January 1, 1941, be considered a capital asset and not subject to income tax. I believe that request is fully justified. If a man invests money in land and proceeds to grow grain on it and raise hogs and that sort of thing he gets an exemption from income tax on the sale of his land and equipment, but the farmer who buys live stock is compelled to pay a tax on his total live stock sales. I believe consideration should be given to this matter at an early day.

Then they advocate an allowance for labour of farm families in connection with production on the farm and also that the exemptions be raised to $1,200 for single and $2,400 for married persons. In my opinion, those exemptions would meet the situation very well. They recommend also that there be no further responsibility for collection of income tax on farm wages and that there be a board of arbitration on income tax cases. There are a number of other things which I shall place on the record when we are discussing the several items of the budget.

Before men and women are no longer able to work, I hope that we shall present them with an old age pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty years, so that they will not have to wait until they are ready to pass away. I should like to finish by quoting a few lines as follows:

A Tired Woman's Epitaph

Here lies a poor woman who always was tired,
For she lived in a house where help wasn't hired;
Her last words on earth were: "Dear friends, I am going
Where washing ain't done, nor sweeping, nor sewing.
And everything there will be just to my wishes,
For where they don't eat, there's no washing dishes;
I'll be where loud anthems will always be ringing,
But having no voice I'll get clear of the singing.
Don't mourn for me now, don't mourn for me never,
For I'm going to do nothing for ever and ever.

In conclusion, I am going to advocate once again the adoption of the Social Credit policy which we hope will be put into effect; and, as a means of bringing this about, that the Bank of Canada be used for the purposes the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said it would be used in his famous Saskatoon speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. During my remarks this afternoon I said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had anticipated a depression in the United States. I find now that the minister said "recession" and there is a great deal of difference.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOW—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT APPEARING IN TODAY'S MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I rise at this time on a question of personal privilege. My attention has been drawn to an article on the front page of today's Montreal Gazette headed: "Jaques admits Social Crediters following 'Christian front' line". The writer, Arthur Blakely, goes on to say:

> This will probably come as something of a shock to Social Credit leader Solon Low, but Norman Jaques told the Gazette in another interview that he did not intend to form a wing of the Christian front or the Christian national crusade in Canada "because the Social Credit party is already doing the same work in this country."

My point of privilege is this. The writer of the article presents an entirely misleading case, and since my name, and that of the movement of which I have the honour to be president, have been brought into what in reality is a private quarrel between Mr. Jaques and some others, I want to make it clear that neither the social credit movement in Canada nor the group of social credit members in this house takes its lead from Gerald L. K. Smith, nor is associated with him in any way. Except for the meagre reports we have read in the press, thirteen of us know nothing about the work Mr. Smith is doing or about the movement called the "Christian Front", which it is reported he heads in the United States.

The social credit movement finds its inspiration in the constructive principles of abundant living as taught by the Saviour of mankind, and in the economic teachings of Major C. H. Douglas of Scotland.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. W. STUART (Charlotte): In rising to take part in this debate I should like, first, to join with others who have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the capable manner in which he has introduced his first budget. It certainly must have given the minister a certain source of satisfaction to announce an encouraging budget and a surplus. During the debate we have heard the minister criticized for announcing a surplus, it being described as blood money and taken from the taxpayers of this country, inflicting great hardship. It would be interesting, however, to know what the opposition would have had to offer if the Minister of Finance had declared a large deficit rather than a surplus. I have little doubt that such a circumstance would have given a better opportunity for constructive criticism, and full advantage would no doubt have been taken.

The changes in taxation in the budget is the portion upon which the greater part of the debate has centred. To many it appears displeasing; to many others it is acclaimed as a popular budget, when it is considered that nine out of every ten taxpayers in the country will receive a reduction of twenty-nine per cent, and in the lower brackets in some cases the reduction is as much as fifty-four per cent. Since 1942 the total reduction in personal income tax is fifty-one per cent, which I look upon as an enormous reduction. For the year 1947, if we take into consideration six months at the present rate and six months at the new rate, a married man with two children with an income of $2,000 a year will pay a tax of $52. The tax for a full year under the new rate would be $36. It would be difficult, I believe, to convince the Canadian people that the rate of tax charged on this income is unreasonable. I would make one other comparison which, to me, is interesting, perhaps owing to the fact that I live on the United States border. A married taxpayer with no children, with an income of $2,000, would pay, under the new rate for 1948 an income tax of $70. In the United States, under the new reduced rates passed by the house of representatives, the tax on $2,000 would be $106. At the present time it is $152, and most of the states in the union have a state income tax in addition to the federal tax.

During the budget debate in 1945-46 and no doubt in other years as well, on many occasions hon. members of the opposition brought to the attention of the house the difference the Canadian income taxpayers were obliged to pay in comparison with the United States and other countries. It is noticeable that during this debate no comparisons have been made in this respect, which would indicate that the tax levied on incomes in Canada was satisfactory in comparison with taxes levied in other countries. An improved condition such as this is worthy of commendation, but obviously it has received little publicity during the debate this year.

Another thing which I believe took much of the sting out of the debate was the fact that just recently the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) suggested that the income tax in this country should be reduced by 33⅓ per cent. When the reduction of twenty-nine per cent was made the margin between that suggested by the leader of the opposition and the actual reduction which we shall receive left little material for honest criticism. Here I should like to read a letter from a citizen of the United States, which was taken from the Ottawa Citizen of May 6. It is addressed to the editor and is a tribute from the United States to Canada. It reads as follows:

To the Editor of the "Citizen"

Having been born in Ottawa and having been a resident for almost twenty years until a few years ago, I still hold Canada very close to my heart. My husband and I regularly go up to the Boston public library to read the Ottawa Evening Citizen, and I have always noted the numerous letters from people complaining of the poor state of affairs that exists in Canada as compared with the United States. It is very seldom that an American because of his great pride in his wonderful country will admit to United States deficiency as compared with another country; this is why I send along a clipping from the Boston Traveller in which it is pointed out—

And this is the clipping:

"Canada's economic record through the war was extraordinarily fine. Its excellence did not have to be established by comparison with our own. The Canadians kept production costs under control, kept the cost of living down, avoided the OPA debacle and did their full share in the war without turning everything topsy-turvy at home . . . If the Canadians can make ends meet, with social programmes in many cases more advanced than our own, and can cut income tax nearly thirty per cent, is there any earthly reason why this country cannot do at least half as well as Canada? What is there about that imaginary boundary line which makes a real difference?"

So you at home may be proud of good old "Canuck land" and of the men who have given Canada a record praised and envied by other countries.

Mrs. Charles S. Kennedy.

Another matter I wish to discuss briefly is that portion of the debate that explained little, and I refer to tariff negotiations taking place at Geneva at the present time which are of great importance to this country. I should like to quote a short paragraph from the statement of the Minister of Finance, which appears at page 2560 of Hansard:

I have already referred to the tariff negotiations now taking place in Geneva. These are of the greatest importance to Canada. We hope and expect that out of them will come sufficient reductions in tariffs to make it practicable to establish an international trade organization and to agree upon a code of international behaviour in regard to import restrictions, export subsidies and other commercial policies. Canada is, of course, prepared to make tariff reductions and reductions in preferences in exchange for tariff reductions by the United States and by other countries. We do not expect one-sided bargains. We are ready to do our full share.

May I say at this point that I have been tagged a free trader for quite some time, justly so I believe, since I believe in freer trade than exists at the present time.

I well remember going as a boy with my father to Eastport, Maine, and other cities and towns along the coast in the United States. In those days the breakwaters and bridges were not lined with customs and immigration officials. At that time we on the border lived in harmony and the maritimes were as prosperous as any other part of Canada. If you had a few quintals of fish or any farm produce to sell you had little trouble with the officials. In fact, if there was one—and very often I saw none at all—you had no trouble. The immigration inspectors and customs officials did not interfere with you. Purchases were made and you returned home without any interference at the Canadian border. When the same condition comes into existence once more the maritime provinces will again take their rightful place among the prosperious provinces of this dominion. The strangulation of trade by excessive tariffs is responsible for conditions in the maritime provinces today.

My next words will be those of congratulations to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), who spoke in this debate on May 6. Many of the problems which he pointed out as having an adverse effect in Nova Scotia would apply to New Brunswick as well. As reported at page 2837 of Hansard of May 6 the hon. member said:

> Then, too, we must not lose sight of the fact that many products are manufactured in central Canada under the protection of tariffs, and we in the outlying provinces are forced to buy from these sources goods that we could obtain cheaper from other countries if there were no tariffs.

This condition is in no way reciprocating because the maritime provinces are unable to compete in the markets of central Canada. Owing to our geographical position, the products of these provinces must be disposed of in the markets of the United States and other countries where they can be transported by water, rather than by rail.

This situation is responsible for the feeling in the maritime provinces that we do not have an equal opportunity of advancing as rapidly as other parts of Canada, and that our progress is being retarded by conditions such as this.

At Eastertime I was in the town of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, and in conversation with a government employee of that town, he informed me that he had purchased an electric refrigerator in Calais, Maine, just prior to that date. A duty of twenty-five per cent had been paid and eight per cent sales tax on the duty paid value or 35 per cent total duty. The cost was still $60 below the price for the same article on the Canadian side of the border.

The protection given the Canadian manufacturers in cases such as this is called tariff. To a maritimer it is subsidy, and when obliged to pay the great spread between Canadian and United States prices on articles such as these, which today are not considered luxuries, but necessities, we are "subsidizing" industry in central Canada. I have yet to be convinced to the contrary.

Another selfish attitude taken by manufacturers of central Canada is the discrimination shown regarding prices paid by citizens of their own provinces, and elsewhere in Canada. With the protection given the manufacturer, why should a maritimer be obliged to pay from fifty to a hundred dollars more for a car in Halifax than a citizen of Ontario would pay. At least one price should prevail in every part of Canada.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, in my own county for example, the products of Ganong Brothers, St. Stephen, New Brunswick, can be purchased in Vancouver for the same price as is paid in the maritime provinces. The canned goods produced in our canneries, in Charlotte county, are one price to all citizens of this dominion.

This gross discrimination on the part of manufacturers in central Canada should be rectified immediately. Too much advantage is being taken of the protection afforded by way of tariff, or subsidy, which in my estimation are one and the same thing.

Canadian manufacturers are today exporting cars, farm "machinery", electrical appliances for household use, dynamos, and many other manufactured articles. In many instances they are being criticized for exporting goods that are greatly needed at home, and many citizens of our own country are unable to purchase cars and machinery to be used in connection with their business.

In this export market we meet keen competition. Regardless of this fact, however, we are able to procure our proportional part of that export business, and in many instances the export price is much less than the Canadian people are obliged to pay, the manufacturers again taking advantage of tariff protection. I fully realize the absolute necessity of Canada exporting not only manufactured articles, but raw materials as well; our prosperity can usually be gauged by the volume of that export business. This should not be supported, however, at the expense of Canadian taxpayers; and wherever possible they should receive the benefit of reduced cost of production.

As an illustration in this case, I can point out a condition that existed in my own province for many years, and I trust that in doing so I shall not be responsible for another lengthy discussion on nails. In Saint John city, the Pender Company manufacture the greater part of the nails that are used in eastern Canada, and many thousands of pounds were exported to the United States previous to the war. On many occasions I have seen these nails being sold in the State of Maine for a dollar or more per keg below the price charged in Canada.

I am fully aware of the fact that this is called "dumping"; in other words, exporting the surplus below the cost our own people are obliged to pay, and although this method is common practice with manufacturers, it would appear to be a more patriotic duty to pass this saving along to our own people, rather than to those in foreign lands.

I believe it was in the year 1928 that the Mackenzie King government decided to lower the duty on automobiles coming into Canada from the United States. This procedure automatically reduced the cost of the cars manufactured in Canada. Ottawa was immediately besieged with delegations of automobile manufacturers from all parts of central Canada. I well remember the gloomy picture they presented to the government of that day, that if the government insisted on carrying out this policy, the manufacturers would be obliged to close their factories, throwing thousands out of employment, because it was utterly impossible to continue operating with any reduction in the cost of the finished article. Regardless, however, of the presentations made on behalf of the manufacturers, the price was reduced. What was the result? The following year, 1929, more automobiles were manufactured and sold in Canada than in any previous year in our history. Employment in this industry was greatly increased, the volume of business increased, and a saving was passed along at the same time to our people, without industry suffering any undue hardship.

We in the maritime provinces find ourselves in a position, as I have stated, whereby markets must be found outside Canada for our production in both raw materials and manufactured commodities.

At the present time the fishermen of the New England states are strenuously opposing the importation of fish from the maritime provinces into the United States. The protection they are seeking, by way of tariff, would completely bar our fishermen from exporting to that country. Should this tariff be imposed, I hesitate to predict just what would happen to our enormous fishing industry in the maritimes. When at least the fate of sixty per cent of our markets hangs in the balance and could turn adversely, if the United States government so decide, one can realize the seriousness of our predicament. The Minister of Fisheries is aware of the situation and is doing everything possible to have adjustments made as soon as possible.

My own opinion is that the New England fishermen are perfectly justified in asking for this protection, because the tariff regulations in Canada have completely barred them from our markets, while our Canadian fishermen were given every opportunity of competing in United States markets. Why the government of this country took this discriminating attitude has never, to my knowledge, been explained satisfactorily. It certainly was not the welfare of the Canadian fisherman that was given consideration, since in no way could the New England fishermen find a market in Canada. This the fishermen of this country are unable to do themselves.

We hear national unity discussed on many occasions. It is a goal worth striving for, and should be the aim of every loyal citizen of this dominion. But let us not lose sight of an even greater accomplishment—international cooperation and good will. In striving to attain that goal, the greatest obstacle one will be obliged to encounter is the tariff wall, the obstacle that has been responsible for wars, depressions, and world-wide calamities, because the imposition of tariffs is beneficial to a minority group, but detrimental to the backbone of our country, the primary producers. When that wall has been scaled, we shall have gone a long way in assisting the custodians of world peace and happiness who, I believe, are sincerely seeking a solution of world problems.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): In rising to take part in this debate my first words must be of congratulation for the splendid way in which the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) presented his budget to the house.

I must say that it was a difficult task for him to perform, because he did not have anything to give and he gave it well.

Mr. ABBOTT: The same to you.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That remains to be seen.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As one Doug to another.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Minister of Finance reminds us what the Canadian people could do under the stimulus of war. Of what they did the Canadian people can be justly proud. Their accomplishment was a magnificent one. But the war is over and the stimulus is gone.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It has been over for two years—

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not over.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): —and the people are tax weary. The cost of living has risen by thirty per cent since 1939. Those are the bureau's figures, which take into consideration only the bare necessities of life. I am sure the cost of living is much higher than that. As I said, there is little cause for satisfaction amongst the people of Canada with the insignificant reduction in taxes which the people will have to put up with. What was so necessary, namely, the replacing of the wartime stimulus with a peacetime stimulus by way of relief from taxation, is conspicuous by its absence from this budget.

Everybody knows that in order to maintain our prosperity in this country production is needed and also trade. That is the only way the cost of living can be reduced. The more rapid is the exchange of goods and services as between the individuals of the country, the more prosperity and the higher the standard of living. I said that it was the people of Canada who were responsible for Canada's splendid war effort. They were responsible for forcing the government to a full-out war effort in the early days. Let me remind the minister that it took the government a long time to get going. Between 1939 and 1941 practically nothing was done. It was thought that it was a phony war, that Canada was going to fight a moderate war, a comfortable war; that is what was told us by some of the cabinet. The house was told that we could not build tanks, that we could not roll steel for the armour plate, and that we could not do many other things. It was only after the fall of France that the government woke up and there was a real stimulus felt, because with the fall of France it was thought that we might have to defend our own shores and that the British fleet might have to come to this side of the Atlantic. There was a stimulus of a panicky nature thrust upon us when we realized how badly alarmed they were in Great Britain, how ill-prepared they were, and when we realized the great strength of the nazi regime. But all through there has been lack of foresight on the part of the government. With all the facilities at the command of the government they should have known—and I am sure the government knew it—and we should have been told that war was inevitable and we should have got busy and prepared for it. On every person's tongue at that time was the old saying, "Too little and too late."

At last, under this stimulus of public opinion and the continued prodding of the official opposition at that time, the government started to build plants and to aid in the extension of others throughout the country—in and around Toronto such plants as Malton, de Havilland, Research Enterprises, Small Arms, Massey-Harris and many others. But no thought was given to the housing problem, to where these thousands of employees who came in there were to live. Time after time the then Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was asked what was to be done about housing these people who were flocking into the metropolitan district of Toronto. The minister lacked foresight and so did the government. What happened? Just what we said would happen. That was that we did not have room for the accommodation of these people. Every time we asked the government to do something, they said it was up to our own people. Still these plants were on the outskirts of the city. Still the government lacked foresight. If they had done something about the matter and provided housing for these people on the outskirts of Toronto, this problem would have been solved. It was not our job. They all flocked into the centre of the city and conditions of living were terrible at that time, and still are. These people are still there and they are mostly in the city, although some of them are out a little bit. But no thought was taken for that. If the government had put up houses at that time around where these plants are, the cost of construction of those houses would have been half what it is today, and we would have had these houses now, which we have not got. There was plenty of labour at that time. In the early stages there were carpenters and so on who could have been used and we would not have had this problem we have at the present time.

The reason I am recalling these things is that I feel apprehensive about the future of this country. What are we to expect in the days that lie ahead? Is there to be the same foresight used by this government as was used before—too little and too late? I note the minister's rosy picture of the present day and of the immediate future and I congratulate him on his cautious forecast for a longer period, but I do not agree with him to the full. He says that Canada is enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded before in living memory. That may be so, to an extent, but it is difficult for a family whose salary is $1,500 a year and under or even higher than that—$2,000 a year and under—to take a rosy view when the cost of living has risen so high and taxes are still so heavy. I shall have more to say about that later. Then again, the minister says:

> We look forward to a year of high production and incomes. Indeed, we would appear to have ample excuse for self-satisfaction and easy optimism, if we took account only of our own immediate situation here at home. Our own position is favourable and encouraging, but beyond the Atlantic and Pacific half the world works slowly and painfully to rebuild its ruins, and until much more progress has been made in both economic and political aspects of international affairs, we cannot afford to be complacent.

I know it is difficult to forecast the future, but with all the facilities and the machinery of government, the brain trust, the statistical department and the hordes of other officials, some idea should be forthcoming but we have not got it. We must remember that our prosperity depends on the maintaining of our foreign trade. Thirty-seven per cent of Canada's whole business must come from that source. Now, what is the situation? I have a statement here I should like to table, if I might have the consent of the house, showing the loans to the various countries.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to place the document on Hansard?

Mr. REID: What is he tabling?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is a statement of the loans to various countries, and how much of them has been used up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The table is as follows:

Loans
United Kingdom	$1,250,000,000
Used	540,000,000
	$ 710,000,000
Belgium	$ 100,000,000
Used	51,000,000
	$ 49,000,000
China	$ 60,000,000
Used	17,634,646
	$ 42,365,354
Czechoslovakia	$ 19,000,000
Used	3,875,448
	$ 15,124,552
France	$ 242,500,000
Used	145,400,000
	$ 97,100,000
Netherlands	$ 125,000,000
Used	66,973,321
	$ 58,026,679
Netherland Indies	$ 15,000,000
	5,400,000
	$ 9,600,000
Norway	$ 15,000,000
	5,400,000
	$ 9,600,000
Russia	$ 3,000,000
	2,866,098
	133,902
Total amount of loans	$1,829,500,000

It will be seen that we lent $1,250,000,000 to Great Britain, which loan is being rapidly used up. Loans to other countries are in a similar position; in fact we are buying for cash and selling for credit; we had an adverse balance of trade with the United States. How good is the credit? What will happen when the loans are exhausted? It seems to me that this must give us food for thought. As will be seen, these loans total $1,829,500,000. The amount used so far is $838,549,513, leaving a balance of $990,950,487. So it will be seen that about half these loans is gone. Nearly all the loans were made in 1946. To my mind, if we take these figures into account, Canada's trade position is not so rosy as it may appear. Our prosperity will be with us just as long as those loans last. The credits were given, of course, for the purpose of helping these countries get on their feet. This nation cannot continue for ever to give credits to these countries. Our future can be gauged only by the progress made by these countries in rehabilitating themselves. In the meantime we are holding ourselves up by our bootstraps.

Though our position is considered by many to be strong for the present, as I see it the position is as follows. We have a favourable balance of trade with all countries other than the United States, excluding mutual aid, amounting to $954,000,000. Our adverse balance of trade with the United States, excluding mutual aid, is $496,000,000, or $603,000,000 including mutual aid. The credits we have given various countries have been used to the extent of $838,550,000. If we take this away from the $954,000,000, our favourable balance of trade with all countries other than the United States, and this leaves us a favourable cash trading balance with the world of $115,450,000, or an adverse cash trading balance with the world, excluding mutual aid, of $380,450,000, or an adverse cash trading balance with the world, including mutual aid, of $487,000,000.

I do not think this is anything about which we should be complacent, especially when we remember that our adverse cash balance with the United States was $603,000,000. Under the circumstances it seems obvious that we cannot increase that unfavourable balance indefinitely. From this one can see how dependent we are upon the economy of the United States, and upon the British commonwealth. I now ask this question. What steps have the government taken to improve our trading balance with the United States? Either we must have more exports to that country or quit buying from it. What are the prospects for the absorption of more of our goods by the United States market? Under modern conditions of exchange we cannot get the same amount of convertible money that we could get previously, because we cannot get it from the continent. Certainly there is nothing in this budget which indicates that any steps whatever have been taken along these lines. Do we have to wait for a report from the Geneva conference? How long will that be? How long will it take to implement the results of that conference? How much freer will trade be after the Geneva conference is over? Just here I should like to read a short note of warning by the governor of the Bank of Canada:

> Canada cannot continue indefinitely to sell on credit in overseas markets while she is incurring a substantial cash deficit in her balance of payments with the United States.

Then later he said:

> During the transition period, while our overseas customers are being financed largely on credit, we shall have to meet most of our balance of payments deficit with the United States out of our own resources. Fortunately we reached the end of the war with large United States dollar reserves. This gives us the opportunity to follow now the kind of multilateral non-restrictive trading policy which it is so greatly in our interest that other countries should adopt. It is obvious, however, that the successful functioning of this policy depends on our being able to realize, in due course, sufficient cash—i.e., freely convertible currency—from our overseas trade to meet our requirements in the United States.
> The extent to which overseas countries can pay cash for their net imports from Canada will depend in turn on how soon they can restore their capacity to produce and to export to cash markets.

I do not want to be a prophet of gloom, but unless there is far greater acceleration in the rehabilitation of these countries abroad I am afraid we are in for a bad time. How vigorously is the government prosecuting its trade with the countries of South America? The one saving factor at the present time, of course, which makes for full employment is the tremendous amount of construction going on; but the construction industry can be responsible for the consumption of only a small amount of wheat, bacon, cheese, hogs, beef and other agricultural products, and other export markets must be found. In addition, some of our manufactured goods will have to be absorbed by other countries. Is the government putting forth its best efforts in fostering trade within the British empire and commonwealth? I hope it is. Somebody must buy these products or we are in for a bad time.

Now I ask, is the government prepared to meet the onslaught of a sudden depression? There is no war stimulus now, and the stimulus of production is lacking in the budget. Having regard to the past record of the government in matters of foresight, one cannot help but be apprehensive. Will the government wait and see until a depression hits us? If a depression comes in this country, it will come quickly and a government policy must be ready to have work started practically the next day, not next year. Is it again to be a case of too little, too late? There can be no excuse for the government of this country when it does not call another dominion-provincial conference. For its failure to do so, it must take the consequences, and the blame must be placed squarely on this government's shoulders.

When I read the minister's remarks about a surplus, I was indeed surprised. When I first heard him my impression was one of agreeable surprise. "Here" I thought, "is where the people of Canada are going to get some real relief from taxation, at last." He said that we had just ended a year in which our accounts showed a surplus, a surplus larger than the accumulated total of all surpluses in history. And in that fine ringing voice of his he made all hon. members on that side of the house thump their desks. I thought about how happy the people would be.

But then we found that he did not have a surplus, at all. It has been stated several times that there was a deficit of $20 million, and a return of capital of $372 million which, of course, should be used to pay off debt. It was not, as the minister said, a surplus larger than the accumulated totals of all the surpluses in our history. There was no surplus at all; and that, in spite of the fact that during that time the payment of $50 million or $60 million at least in subsidies had been discontinued, and despite the further fact that the actual revenue exceeded the revenue forecast by $509,271,000. In 1946 the minister budgeted for a deficit of $260 million, so that it was in excess by $249 million over the forecast. Still they had a deficit.

Of course I am aware of the fact that there are some non-recurring, temporary and abnormal expenditures, some of which were mentioned by the minister. I shall not read his words in this respect, but shall simply point out that he budgeted for a surplus of $190 million over expenditures. Has he taken full cognizance of non-recurring expenditures? Does the government propose to pay off some of our national debt ? We should know it now. Or is it anticipated that there will be a larger surplus by the end of this year, or just before the next general election? Will there be a whopping big surplus which can be used for political purposes? The surplus budgeted for is about $190 million or $185 million. I see by the papers that it will be less than $190 million by $10 million, now that the premier of Nova Scotia has been coerced into signing an agreement. I notice, by the way, that the premier is not pleased about it.

Mr. McILRAITH: He is a pretty good man, though.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This evening's issue of the Ottawa Journal states this:

> Acceptance of dominion government financial proposals on the basis of new concessions made by Ottawa—

And so on. It refers to "new concessions." Some more of the auction sale going on. What a time they are having with him! And I wonder if the government has an auctioneer's licence.

Then, as reported in the press, Mr. Macdonald said that it is his intention—> —of continuing his fight for "just provincial demands and claims" and quoted the words of a ringing Scottish war song: "They have not seen the last of my bonnets and me."

And, believe me, I don't think they have seen the last of him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: All the blue bonnets are over the border.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What will be popular with the people of Canada? The popular thing would be a real effort on the part of the government to reduce ordinary expenditures. I realize, of course, that there are some necessary uncontrollable expenditures, but there are others which are really unnecessary and which are controllable.

Then, as to the matter of extravagance, the government is still so war-minded that it continues to think in terms of war finance. What is a million among so many? What is a hundred thousand, even? It does not make much difference. It seems that a hundred thousand is just chicken-feed these days. That is the trouble with them; they cannot get down to brass tacks so as to see that if you keep a dollar off here or there you will save the taxpayer some money.

I now come to a point about which I must complain. It seems to me impossible to get a straight answer to a straight question in the house. On May 31, 1946, I received a return to a question I had asked in the house, as follows: "What is the total number of employees of the government of Canada including employees of boards and commissions appointed by the federal authority as of March 31, 1946?" And this second question was asked, "What is the total amount of salaries, wages and allowances paid to such employees in March, 1946?

This return left out War Assets Corporation and the harbours board. Of course War Assets Corporation is, I suppose, just chicken-feed. Information respecting the harbours board came to me afterwards as a supplementary, but I had to dig up the information about War Assets Corporation. I knew that they had employees, and that they were spending money.

This year I asked exactly the same question, but added the words "and corporations". Of course all employees of crown companies are employees of the federal government; there can be no question about that, and that includes even the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was not included in this return, despite the fact that all employees of crown companies are employees of the federal government.

I do not know even yet whether the return is complete; indeed I believe I can say it is not complete. However, I shall compare the figures as best I can, from what I have at my disposal, and I shall give the totals which, it seems to me, are important. I shall not give details respecting individual items. Perhaps

I might add that the hon. member for Peterborough-West (Mr. Fraser) asked a similar question, but the figures he received do not jibe with those I received. Some of the figures are the same, but not all of them. He asked for the number of employees as at January 1, 1947, and my question was as to how many there were on December 31, 1946. There was a considerable decrease in respect of several items in only one day.

Mr. McILRAITH: That is all right, it was the end of the year.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): While I am speaking about this matter of returns, I should like to know why it is that a minister of the crown can obtain figures so quickly. Of course his figures refer only to the civil service of Canada, and they do not refer to the number of employees. It took fifty-two days for me to get an answer to my question when I asked how many people were employed by the government of Canada. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) made a great play in the house about the reduction in the number of civil servants. Well, those were civil servants. But what the country wants to know is not so much with respect to the number of civil servants in the country; the people want to know the reduction in the total number of employees of the federal government. That is what they are interested in. They want to know how much money we have to pay them. Despite the fact that the minister showed a reduction of 21,000, that still represents an increase of 52,000 since before the war.

Then, here is an interesting fact. When the minister placed his figures on Hansard last Friday he left out the figures for all corporations. In addition to that, ten other departments were left out. I cannot understand it. In the return which I received some smaller branches were not included, such as the House of Commons, the library, the Senate, the international joint commission, the tariff board and the Veterans' Land Act. There were 2,141 people not included in that return. It just does not make sense. The sum total of the whole thing is that we have 173,961, plus the 2,141; that is the total taking into account the employees of all crown companies and the ones omitted from the return. We paid them at the rate of $317,544,000 a year, leaving out the 2,141 employees. On March 31, 1946, we had 148,711, not including those in the House of Commons and so on, and we paid them $254,865,000, which is not chicken-feed. When we consider that in March, 1944, we had only 145,500 and in March, 1945, we had 149,700, we will realize the increase there has been in that length of time.

As I have said before, there seems to be very little effort on the part of the government to make a real reduction in the number of people employed in the government. We do not know whether in the case of those who were left out of the return there has been an increase or a decrease. There is no use in putting stuff on Hansard like the minister put on the other day, because it gives a false impression of how many people are employed by the government and have to be paid by the taxpayers. If the minister wants to put it on he should take the return that was tabled on March 17 and make a comparison. He will then get somewhere. It is all very well to say that there is a reduction in the number of civil servants, but we know there are lots of people employed who do not even belong to the civil service. One thing about it is that there is one government employee in Canada for every seven people.*

Mr. CLAXTON: That is not correct, and I should like to know where the hon. member got that figure.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It was tabled in the house.

Mr. CLAXTON: The figure is about 1·24 per hundred in the case of federal government employees.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You had better get the return and look at it.

Mr. CLAXTON: The per capita rate in Canada is lower than that of any other civilized country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is roughly 179,000 and you can divide that into 12,000,000; perhaps my arithmetic is not very good.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How does that work out?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is one zero out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Only 1,000 per cent wrong; that is all.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is 173,961, plus 2,141, which gives 176,102. As I said, there are too many trying to look after too few. That is all there is to it. That is not the whole story as far as extravagance is concerned, because you require hundreds of thousands of square feet of office space to house these people. That is not the only thing. In some cases, especially in the Toronto income tax office and several others, they are so crowded that you cannot possibly get efficiency. Then you have to buy all the stationery, desks, tables and so on. Last year we wanted to find out why $300,000 was needed to purchase furniture for the public service, but we can easily understand it now with this increase. Not only that, but many employees are not doing productive work, which all adds to the cost borne by the taxpayer.

When the minister says that a lot of nonsense is being talked about extravagance in the government I think these figures pretty well bear out what it is all about. If some effort was made toward economy perhaps the children of the country would have more chance of getting their chocolate bars back to five cents and their pop back to five cents. Beer is almost as cheap as pop right now and I would rather drink pop than beer any time.

I should like to say a few words about the income tax reduction. We are all glad to see the small reductions that have been made, but I think the exemptions should have been raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. That has not been done. A married taxpayer with an income of $2,000 a year will pay $105 this year, which is a lot of money, and he will pay $80 next year, which is still a lot of money, especially when we consider the fictitious value of so many articles which must be purchased. A married man with two children is in this situation. If he had an income of $3,000 in 1939 that same income will have a value of only $2,100 today and, after paying his tax, he will have left only $1,906 of real dollar value.

A much greater allowance should be made by way of exemption to people with children. The government seems to have hung out the sign used by so many apartments, "No children allowed." It is a well known fact that in my city a family of two can barely get along on $1,500 a year, and at that they cannot have many luxuries. The children cannot have many chocolate bars or coca-colas and the like. Why put a penalty on the housewife when she works? There is work crying out to be done, and yet $250 is all they are allowed to earn at the present time. With present wage rates for women that works out to about 400 or 500 hours, or about fifty or sixty days in the year.

When the children begin to get older and are going to school the need for income becomes greater. Hungry mouths must be fed, so why penalize the husband by bringing his exemption down to $750 if the wife earns $750? What does it amount to for a family with two children with a taxable income of $2,000? They will pay $105 this year and next year, $80. Under these circumstances his taxable income is $2,750 and he pays $218 this year and $180 next year. The family's net gain for the $750 worth of work by the wife is $637 this year, and next year it would be $650.

The hospitals are crying out for nurses. Even with a family of two it is surprising how careful the parents have to be to make both ends meet on $2,000. The shortage of nurses will not be helped by this budget, because those who are married and who have returned to nursing because of the appeals for help are convinced that it does not help them. As I have stated, it places their husbands in a different bracket. The excess might be taxable to the extent of 30, 35, 40, 45 per cent or more. The amount that the wife is allowed to earn should be raised.

There was a lot of nonsense talked by the minister in making a comparison between income taxes in Canada and the United States, and I should have liked to table an example which appeared in the Financial Post.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a few seconds more. I just wish to say a word about dominion-provincial relations. We know that certain agreements have been signed. We do not know what they are. Are they all the same, or is each one different? If so, what are the variations? I do not think parliament should be kept in the dark as to what they are. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has talked so much about national unity. Why not let us have real national unity? Let him practise what he preaches without coercion. Canada must be kept a strong confederation with the least centralization of power in government. Confederation was not consummated in secret, but in the spirit of compromise in the open. Two great statesmen helped by another; Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier, helped by the Hon. George Brown who sank their prejudices for the good of Canada, were responsible. The opportunity is there for the Prime Minister to emulate their example. The consummation of a reconfederation is devoutly to be wished.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): I don't propose to speak at any great length, Mr. Speaker. I am not in the habit of doing so. I do make it a habit, however, to seek some novel, original angle, and present it as briefly as possible. While my few remarks shall bear solely on the matter of income tax, and possibly imply a measure of criticism, I do wish to point out at the outset that they are not meant to cast any reflection on the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whose ability is now a by-word and to whom the people of this country are indebted for the budget under review, nor the hon. the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), whose worldly wisdom and public-spiritedness are so widely appreciated. They do aim, however, at drawing those ministers' attention to a few peculiarities which, in the matter of income tax, appear to me unjustified and are a cause of discontent among the people.

I fully realize that the income tax district offices, the one in Montreal for instance, have had and still have more work than they can handle. As a result of wartime full employment, high wages, lowered basic exemptions, and compulsory savings, from 1941 to 1946 the great majority of wage-earners were subject in the first place to tax deductions at the source and, in the second place, were required to file an income tax report prior to April 30 of each year. Now, according to whether deductions at the source had been too large or too little in relation to earned income, income tax reports have meant a refund or a request for additional payment. In some cases, where reports were assessed only after two or three years, it was only at the end of those two or three years that the individuals concerned were sure that their report was in order. Yet, if the taxpayer in filing his report has made a mistake because the form was too complex for him or for any other reason, he finds, in the case of a claim, that he must pay over and above the amount required, additional interest amounting to several dollars. Had the return been assessed immediately, that is to say during the same year, the interest claimed would have been much lower, but as the months slip by, interest charges accrued which means that the taxpayer must pay them in full simply because the assessors did not find time to do their work sooner.

It will be claimed that from the government's point of view, deduction at the source represents the very best method of collecting income tax. Granted. Still, the business man, whose expenses, even of a current nature, can easily be taken into account as a part of business expenditures—an advantage which is not afforded the small wage-earner—files his return only during the four months which follow the end of the calendar year. It may be objected that if wage-earners filed their return only at the end of the year or on April 30 of the following year, it might prove difficult or impossible to collect the heavy taxes due. This also I admit, but for the very reason that the wage-earner pays his income tax by weekly or monthly instalments, he deserves special consideration. Personally, I feel that administrative zeal overreaches itself by claiming interest from a taxpayer, particularly if the latter is in no way to blame for the delay which is the responsibility of departmental officials, and particularly if it is obvious that he simply made a mistake and has not the slightest intention of swindling the dominion treasury.

In my constituency, several cases are, to say the least, rather peculiar and I am sure that the same applies elsewhere. Several taxpayers have received notices of assessment, even recently, for income tax returns filed, say in 1943; in addition, they are requested to pay an interest which appears to have been fixed rather arbitrarily. On the other hand, several individuals have been requested to pay money for the year 1945—plus interest of course—and threatened with penalties if they fail to do so; the government, however, owes them money for the year 1944, but fails to make a refund, although it certainly will refund the money some day, but without paying any interest. There should not be one law for rich and one law for the poor. I wish to suggest a few things to the government which are prompted by my eagerness to help the small wage-earners:

(a) In my opinion, the assessment of the income tax return filed by salaried persons, that is those who pay the tax at the source, should be made within twelve months following the date on which it is filed.

(b) Any government claim in connection with this return should be made also within twelve months. If I suggested that there should be no claim for interest, the government would immediately point out that such a course is impossible. I bow to their decision, but I wish to add that when the claim is made after the twelve months term, which I mentioned before, it should not include any interest—that would be the government's penalty—or at least only the interest accrued during the year involved.

(c) Any refund should be made by the department within twelve months after the income tax return has been filed. If there is any longer delay, the taxpayer should secure the same rate of interest which would be charged to him were he in default.

Some may look down upon those suggestions. However, they are of general interest and have, I believe, the merit of not having been made frequently in the house. The government sets a definite date for the filing of income tax returns. Well and good. But the taxpayer is entitled to similar protection. If he claims a tax refund, I do not see why the Department of National Revenue should not also be required to discharge its obligations within a specified period.

I shall even go further. In my opinion, if during twelve months the wage-earner has been deprived of the interest on his money, due to the fact that his income tax was deducted at the source, he should be entitled to a further consideration. It might for instance relieve the taxpayer from the obligation to pay his tax if, once his report has been filed, the total unpaid balance is under $50. It might also take the form of a deduction, from the total tax payable, of a sum of $25 to $50, according to salary earned, which would compensate the wage-earner for his interest losses and certain other general expenses of a social character that the business man can easily claim as expenses of management but which the wage-earner must absorb without any compensation whatever.

I have a further suggestion. I have frequently got in touch with the district office, and asked that certain claims for fairly large amounts, made by the income tax department after several years' delay, might be paid by monthly instalments. I secured cooperation. However, many are the people who currently complain that the district collectors' offices are too strict when it comes to exacting payment of claims, that they demand payments that are too heavy to bear, that they bring before the courts people the good will or the temporarily straitened financial condition of whom they have refused to admit. I shall not remain silent when wage-earners of my constituency are ill-treated by the collectors' offices, especially when claims which should have been presented within fifteen months after the filing of the income tax return, are sent only at the end of three or four years. The cost of living has gone up, the wages are lower than during the war years and the financial position of a lot of people has been seriously altered in the last two years. I believe each district office should have a special department, made up of a few employees answerable directly to the national revenue department at Ottawa, whose duty would be to consider complaints from taxpayers who receive claims and who are not in a position to pay them in a lump sum. Such a board would examine cases on their merits, making with the people concerned whatever arrangements would be satisfactory to both parties. Where payment is made by instalments, the interest which is still collected on the unpaid balance—at the rate of 7 per cent I believe—should be cancelled.

I felt it my duty to mention those facts, which give rise to a good deal of dissatisfaction among the people. I think the government should take them into consideration. I believe that the Ministers of Finance and National Revenue will be sympathetic. As regards the budget itself, it gives me much satisfaction. I should have preferred higher basic exemptions; however, I appreciate as a significant step the new scale of rates which means a material reduction in the tax. I would have hailed the abolition of the tax on soft drinks, and I feel that the luxury tax should have been, if not entirely abolished, at least considerably reduced. Some other forms of relief should also have been given. The government have felt that in 1947 they had first to help the people with small and middle incomes, postponing until next year, as stated, relief for industries and corporations and important cuts in several indirect taxes and levies. The present budget gives direct encouragement to people in the lower income brackets. No one could question that. That is why the working class and the people with small incomes are satisfied with it, especially since family allowances paid in 1947 will no longer be subject to any deduction or recovery. Quite a step has been taken in the right direction. The Minister of Finance deserves commendation; I ask him, on behalf of my electors, not to swerve from the right path he has just taken.

(Translation):

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset congratulate my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) on the fine speech he made in the house a few days ago and on his pluck in using the French language here. That was very difficult for him as it is for me tonight.

Mr. LESAGE: One would not think so.

An hon. MEMBER: You are doing very well!

Mr. KNIGHT: I cannot speak this beautiful language fluently, but I am able to read it fairly well and I listen to it with pleasure when my hon. friends opposite make speeches, but I have no chance to speak French, and I need practice.

Tonight, I am expressing myself in French to congratulate Les Compagnons de Saint-Laurent, Montreal troupe that won the trophy awarded during the drama festival held in London, Ontario. They performed Moliere's beautiful play: Le Medecin malgre lui, the first which I read in French.

I am also happy to note that Mr. Bill Walker, from my province of Saskatchewan was judged the best artist of the festival.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us get back to business; the budget must be discussed, and with your permission, I shall continue in English with which language I am far more familiar.

(Text):

The budget is a distinct disappointment, first of all, to those who looked upon it to reduce some part of the cost of their living. That cost of living has been steadily rising and still rises month by month. These people thought they would get some relief from the budget but they got none. The excise tax, the luxury taxes and the sales tax remain the same and the cost of living continues to go up. These taxes I have mentioned must concern the great mass of the people—people who perhaps pay no income tax at all or pay very little. They must, however, buy groceries and clothes and must pay rent, and practically all their income is used for that purpose. They usually have no savings, no war bonds, and such of these as some people did gather during the war years they have had to sacrifice to bolster their wages or their small salaries so that the bonds have gone back into the hands where they usually repose.

I wish to name here some of these objectionable taxes. First, there is the tax on the consumption of electricity. I have already on another occasion brought to the attention of the administration the inequity of this tax, because it is applied on the amount of money, on one's electric bill, rather than on the amount of the electricity consumed. This means that a person in a high cost of production area like my own is paying much more for electricity, in point of tax, than the person in an area of low cost of production such as Ottawa. This tax, though not the method of its application, might have been defended in the war years on the ground that it conserved electricity; but, now that the war is over, it is still discouraging the use of that source of energy, and that is a result which is no longer to be desired, because electric light and power should be cheap to everyone.

We have heard much about the prices of chocolate bars and soft drinks. I do not want to labour a point that has already been covered by other speakers, but I feel, in justice to those who have written to me on the subject, that I should here bring forth the views of my constituents upon the matter.

I think I should state that they consider that the present would be a good time to get rid of these nuisance taxes, which bear particularly heavily upon youth and upon school children. The amount of pocket money which the school children have has no doubt been decreasing in proportion to the amount of money in their parents' pockets, and that latter is a decrease for which this government must accept some share of the responsibility. Everyone would like to see an increase in production and in the use, too, of consumer's goods, but we find standing in the way of that another tax which could very well be reviewed, and that is the tax on many goods sold by jewellers and hardware merchants.

Young veterans trying to establish themselves in their homes are hard to convince that an alarm clock is a luxury, or that knives and forks belong to the same category. Surely the tax upon those things should now be dropped and even the tax on some of the real luxuries, on the ground that it is about time that people should be allowed to get some of them after the long dearth of the war years.

Having concluded, then, that this budget has done nothing to reduce the cost of living, we need not be surprised that everywhere there are rumblings of demands for increased wages and salaries. I was pleased to see that the public school teachers of my own city of Saskatoon were granted an increase of $100 a year the other day; and it is stated quite distinctly in a newspaper that I read that it was given out of recognition of the steadily increasing cost of living. This general demand for an increase in wages and salaries has been brought about by one thing, and by one thing only; that is, the mark-up on the price tags in the stores.

Having discussed what the budget did not do, we might look for a moment or two at what it did. The reduction of income tax to be paid by the individual was widely heralded, I think perhaps more so than was justified. The minister gave the figures of the reduction on a percentage basis, and on that basis it looks very fine. I think it went as far as fifty-four per cent on some of the smaller incomes. But when you translate that percentage reduction into dollars and cents, you do not buy very much with the proceeds. What does this loudly heralded reduction mean, for instance, to the single man in the lower bracket who earns $800 a year? I mean, what does it mean in money? Well, beginning with next July, this man will get a reduction in his tax of exactly fifty cents a month. How does that look in view of the increased cost of living of which I have spoken? Someone has pointed out that the family of four earning $150 a month who might hope to enjoy a reduction of nineteen cents a week, if they live until next July, actually pay out many times that amount a week in increases in the price of food.

My main criticism, then, of this feature of the budget, is that the consumers of the country, and particularly the consumers who cannot afford it, are being mulcted to build up a surplus, and to pay substantial sums by way of reduction in income tax to those who enjoy the higher incomes; and I might say here that I do not mean those few who have incomes of $200,000 or whatever was the amount that was discussed here this afternoon. This money that is being used to reduce the tax on more fortunate people's incomes is being found in part by the removal of government subsidies on many essential commodities like sugar, milk, tea, soap and things of that kind, and all this while the government contemplates complete removal of the excess profits tax during the current year. If we look at the budget from that angle, it furnishes no relief to all those people who are not in a position to pay income tax at all, or to those who are in the low brackets of income.

This idea that the tax was reduced most in the brackets of the lower income is just an illusion. These last-named people should not be paying any taxes at all, and that brings me to a statement of my belief, namely, that the government should have reduced taxation by raising the exemption, in the case of a single person, to at least $1,000 a year before he would have any income tax to pay and, in the case of married persons, to $2,000 a year upon the same terms. That would, of course, have reduced further the number of people who pay income tax. The number of such now, as the minister admitted in his speech, is already less than fifty per cent of those earning incomes. That is a serious admission of the low standard of living of these Canadians in a land of plenty, in what has been described as the peak year of all peak years. There is no indication that the minister or the government to which he belongs has any remedy to meet that situation. Indeed, he rather implied at pages 2548 and 2549 of Hansard that the situation would get worse. It is the apparent lack of any such plan or any such remedy that furnishes us in the C.C.F. with our greatest ground for criticism, for there is no apparent provision for a social service programme.

It is a long time now since the dominion first met with the provinces to work out something for their mutual benefit, but the government is still drifting and is doing no planning, or at least there is no evidence of any. There should be blueprinting of a social service programme and grants should be made by way of provision for research and for such planning. Of course the government lays the blame for the failure of the conference on certain other quarters, and I may say that with that view I largely agree. But the fact that the blame is not altogether their own does not absolve them of their responsibility. They are the party which is charged with the government of this dominion. The government should enter into further agreements for the provision of this social security with the provinces that have already signed. I was glad to see by my paper today that Nova Scotia has joined the number of those with whom an agreement has been reached.

The government points to the amount of money in the savings banks and in bonds as a backlog of purchasing power in the hands of the people. Well, fifty per cent of the people of Canada have no such backlog and they are the people who spend their all on consumer goods. The people who have this backlog are not spending it on consumer goods. They are looking around for places for profitable investment of those funds, investment which will in turn produce more consumer goods but will not increase the purchasing power which is necessary to buy them. When that condition exists, we are in danger of the oft-predicted depression, or as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) put it this afternoon, recession. If and when that occurs, it will find us again a nation divided, with no over-all plan to meet it.

Having criticized the budget, I should like to turn to some of the criticism of it which has come from the official opposition. May I say that I have sincere sympathy, in a personal way, with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who spoke for the official opposition. I have sympathy with him because he was suffering from ill-health. I see that he is not in his seat tonight, and I sincerely hope that he has made a complete recovery. But I must say that he did not feel any more feeble than was the material of his speech. While comparisons are invidious, I cannot help comparing that speech with the concise and virile statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who criticized the same budget, but who did so from a totally different viewpoint.

I was interested in the reference made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario to what he called the middle class. This he defined as made up of those whose incomes were between $3,000 and $7,500 a year. May I tell him, although he does not need to be told, that in terms of money—and those are the terms which he understands—that is not the middle class of this nation. As a matter of fact, the number of people who receive incomes of the mean of those two figures—that would be $5,250—or, say between $5,000 and $6,000 according to the Canada Year Book, in 1942 was 8,390. In 1943 there were 9,691; and these are the numbers the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario characterized as the middle class people of this country the population of which is in the neighbourhood of eleven million. I was interested in this reference by the hon. member to classes, interested, too, in his plea for better interest rates so that those who do not work could have a better standard of living from their investments. The word "class" coming from the hon. member has some significance, since he is a leader in the Tory party, particularly when it is coupled with the little slip he made in the house when he characterized the electors as stupid. I know that was just a slip of the tongue, and perhaps he should not be held to account for it, but taken together with the other matter it has perhaps some significance. When the hon. member was a boy this word "class" was in very common use and had a very different meaning. The class to which one belonged in those days was not altogether a matter of the possession of money. In those days they spoke of such things as birth and breeding and culture, but now my hon. friend falls into the error of which he accused the Minister of Finance in making his rebuttal speech the other day, when he said in reference to the minister, "He talks of nothing but money, money, money." I might say to some of my hon. friends of the Tory party that this is the third session I have been in this house, and since I have been here some of them have discussed little but money, money, money.

So my hon. friend designates the middle class as those who are in possession of incomes of between $3,000 and $7,500 a year, I presume irrespective of how they get it. In his speech the hon. member referred to this middle class —and I want to make it perfectly clear that the term is his—as the backbone of the country. I was reminded of a conversation I had with an old Englishman once as we stood resting our oxen at the end of a furrow. He had been a gardener on some old country estate, and in conversation with me one day about conditions in England he used an expression very like that of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, when he said, "The aristocracy, God bless them; they are the backbone of the country. Why, at Christmas time the master 'ad us all up to the big 'all and gave us a bottle of whiskey and a bag of oranges for the children." My friend did not explain how it came about that his master was the purveyor of all the oranges and all the whiskey; his thinking, of course, did not go that far. In those days, however, the masters retained enough of the old feudalism about them to acknowledge their responsibility to others. If they believed that they ruled by divine right, as some of them did in all good faith, at least they felt some responsibility to the people whose work made that rule possible. In many cases they were men of some culture and some feeling. Rightly or wrongly they despised the nouveau riche of the new industrialism, who in modern society had no particular regard for their workers but, when those workers became old or crippled, threw them into the lap of a paternalistic municipal or other governmental authority. The Tory party, which my hon. friend so ably represents, has of course now transferred its allegiance to this commercial and industrial class, and speaks at all times in favour of its privileged position.

Mr. GREEN: Of course that is a lot of rubbish you are talking now.

Mr. KNIGHT: As my hon. friend spoke I could not help thinking that perhaps those of us who were present at the time the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was giving his rebuttal were witnessing an historic event. I asked myself, is this the swan song of the Tory party? It sounded like a swan song. Toryism is almost dead throughout the world. It is true that in one other place in the British empire, that is in my native Ulster, they have a Conservative government; but there are several reasons for its survival there. By long tradition it has been associated with what they call the Unionist cause, but I want to tell the house that some of its legislation has been most progressive, in fact so progressive that if anyone else were to bring it about they themselves would characterize it, as would hon. gentlemen to my right, as socialistic. This Conservative government in the north of Ireland is being wise in the economic sense. It is travelling ahead with the times. I must remind my reactionary friends in this house who belong to the same party that the Ulster government has a board which completely controls all road transport in that country, both freight and passenger. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is not in his seat at the moment, I think will know that they have the tightest controls in their marketing regulations, that in fact everything produced in the area over which they have jurisdiction undergoes government inspection before it is allowed to be shipped out of the country. That is a Conservative government; but it is not a Tory government. In the matter of electricity there is an electric light board which controls the production and distribution. That government is moving with the times; that government may survive, while I think Toryism here will die a natural death.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) says "Hear, hear." Well, I might say to him that when I hear him talking about his maritime potatoes I sometimes think he should read the legislation that the same Ulster government has enacted in regard to the marketing of potatoes, and the regulations which have been put into effect by that so-called Conservative government concerning other agricultural matters. I notice the hon. member talks our C.C.F. language when he talks about the interests of his own constituents in regard to the matter of potatoes. In fact I would have you know, Mr. Speaker, it is a remarkable fact that many hon. members speak as we do when they have at heart the particular interests of their constituents.

Well, let us leave Restigouche-Madawaska and go back to our Tory friends. I have characterized the things they represent as dead. The Tory party is certainly dead in Saskatchewan; and in spite of the rumours I hear coming from that province in regard to political alignments I refuse to believe that the Minister of Agriculture who, whatever else he may be, has been a doughty fighter against Toryism all his life, can condone the resurrection of that party to any degree, even as a matter of political expediency. There is no doubt in my mind that, while the Minister of Agriculture has no political power in Saskatchewan today, he has certain influence with those who belong to the same political faith. Toryism is certainly dead in England. A short time ago I had a talk with one of the most prominent educators in that country, who, I think, put the matter very well. He said, "In Britain the new order has come to stay. These new men in course of time will probably be divided. Some of them will become more conservative; some of them may become more liberal, going a little to the left, but never again will they be Tories. They will always be new men. The decks have been washed clean for a new state of affairs, for a new philosophy in which privilege shall have no place." But my hon. friends of the Conservative party will say that Toryism is not dead here. Well, I shall admit that. I admit that in one section of this country it is still putting up a fight for its existence. It is girt about and embattled, but even here Catiline is at the gates.

Mr. FRANK T. STANFIELD (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in this debate I do so realizing that but two short years ago we were all very happy that the terrible war in which we had been engaged for nearly six years was about over. Japan was about to collapse, and nobody was worrying a great deal about taxes, or anything else. But we were suddenly faced with changing from an all-out war economy or war effort to a peacetime economy, and we have gone a long distance in those two intervening years to make the readjustment. Suddenly taxes became our public enemy number one. But fortunately we were able to keep our national income at the highest level in our history. Hundreds of millions of dollars were rolling into the treasury of our government. We were told what wonderful savings the government was making in expenditures for the past year, and the millions upon millions from War Assets Corporation that were pouring into the treasury each month.

I was greatly surprised that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not have a larger surplus and was not in a position to make a greater reduction in taxation. However, we have to give the minister credit where credit is due. He has greatly reduced the income tax where reduction in taxes was most needed and deserving, namely on the middle class of people, which people constitute the backbone of Canada or any other democratic country. There is also a sizeable reduction to those with incomes of $2,500 or less, which I am sure is acceptable and commendable. Everyone will welcome these reductions and will admit they will greatly assist in building confidence among our people towards a healthy peacetime economy.

However, I hasten to add, notwithstanding the reduction in the budget, that taxation still remains very high, and I feel there will be as much demand from the people for a further reduction in the next budget, because they have become very weary of being taxed every time they turn around.

One thing I should like to bring to the minister's attention is that the exemption of $100 for each child under the age of sixteen is very small and meagre. What encouragement is there for a man and a woman to bring up a family today? How far will $100 go in keeping a child a year in this day and age? Not very far. It would seem that at least an exemption of $300 for each child under sixteen years and $500 for each child over sixteen years would be much more in keeping with present day standards.

The next matter to which I should like to direct attention, is that I feel strongly the excise tax imposed on soft drinks should have been removed. The nickel soft drink was just part of our way of living on this continent for many, many years. Nobody objected to the tax during the war. Almost everyone—especially the children, and even members of parliament—enjoys his favourite soft drink. Also, especially at this time, when one might say all governments are in the beer and liquor business—and I may also add, are encouraging its sale—I certainly believe the government should have given the public back its nickel soft drink. A child should not have to break his or her dime for what he or she calls a drink of pop. With all the big surplus the government speaks about, to leave the excise tax on soft drinks is merely ridiculous, to say the least.

One hears a great deal these days about the great profits some companies have been able to make in the past two years. Well, here is what the Bank of Canada says about the returns of some 700 companies for the year 1945: They were lower than for the years 1937 to 1939. In fact, the per cent of return of profit on invested capital in 1945 was approximately twenty per cent less than that earned in the 1937-39 period when the volume of business was much less than in 1945. These comparable figures are not available for 1946. But they are certainly higher than in 1945; and why should they not be when everything else is nearly fifty per cent higher than in 1937 to 1939? I am sure, however, that the balance sheets of the 700 companies will show that the return on their invested capital in 1946 was somewhat greater than in the 1937-39 period. And, as I said before, there is no great reason why this return should not be greater. May I also add that there will be few years as satisfactory as 1946 from the point of view of either the employer or the employee. There will be many leaner years.

Now, just a few words about high prices. They are certainly high compared with what we were used to paying, say, three years ago; and some prices are perhaps too high today. But we have likely reached a peak in these high prices, and most of them may be lower before they are higher. I would very much like to make the following observation: Our national debt and the necessary function of our government can only be carried with our national income at about its present level, if we are to maintain our present standard of living. So, if prices are to fall to any great extent, as some people would like to see them fall, why, it is just going to be too bad for us; and it makes me shudder to think just what it would do to the surplus the minister predicted for the present year. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. We can not have a happy and contented land if the products we produce should recede in value in any marked degree, and it is just as well for us to remember that. There may be some levelling off in the economy of our country to adjust this and that; but I, for one, sincerely hope to see things do nothing more than merely level themselves off.

Before I go any farther, I want to say "Thank you," and extend my sincere appreciation to Donald Gordon for the splendid way he served this country during the war and for eighteen months thereafter. He has now gone back to the Bank of Canada, and I wish him many years of happiness. He had to withstand a great deal of abuse while he was administering our price control system. But he did the job fearlessly, ably, and impartially, and his name will long be held in high esteem throughout Canada.

As for controls, I can say I always agreed that they were absolutely necessary during the war years, and for eighteen months thereafter. But since the first of this year they are having entirely the opposite effect, and are retarding our readjustment and our production back to a normal peacetime economy.

At this time I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Drope) in advocating doing away with the hon. member for Northumberland, radio tax. If there is any need or justification for this tax, I fail to see it.

When it comes to the so-called hidden taxes, such as the luxury tax, sales tax, tobacco and gasoline taxes and all the rest of them, during the war these taxes were O.K., but now many of these should be done away with or greatly reduced, because they are a considerable factor in the increased cost of living. However, this question has been ably dealt with by other speakers, so I will now pass on to our own province of Nova Scotia.

Many Canadians who have never been to the maritimes seem to have the idea that maritimers are only hewers of wood and drawers of water. This certainly is a mistaken idea. The maritimes are a beautiful country and the maritimers are the highest type of Canadian citizens. They live a pleasant, happy and enjoyable life. If you do not believe me just go down there to live, and find out for yourself. Unfortunately, on account of its geographic location, it is not the easiest place in Canada to make money or watch the bright lights of our large cities.

Every year thousands of our young people from Nova Scotia leave their province for the large cities of the United States, Ontario and Quebec, attracted by their glamour, fascination and the greater economic reward for their efforts. But those who have remained in dear old Nova Scotia have carried on bravely and have not asked for a great deal of assistance from anyone. Money spent on federal buildings and other federal expenditures in Nova Scotia has been mere chicken-feed compared with that in most of the other provinces.

And now we understand freight rates will be given a nice fat increase, and are we in the maritimes to be the goats again? Ontario and Quebec will say, "Well, if we can afford to pay increased freight rates, you people can too, and if you cannot it is your own fault." It is hard to overcome a thousand miles of geography from Halifax to Montreal, and the good people of the maritimes are deserving of much kinder consideration from the people of the rest of Canada than they receive in the matter of freight rates. Is it going to be the same old story this time?

Even when we ask for a few dollars to repair and reclaim our marsh lands we receive only a few nice words and are extended the hope that some time something may be done. But, no, they just cannot spare a dollar. Why? That is the burning question we would all like to have the Minister of Finance answer. I feel that the Minister of Agriculture would like to see the work of reclaiming our marsh lands carried into effect. My colleague from Cumberland was the first to advocate this policy and, if his advice had been followed, the marsh lands would today be a great productive source of income to the maritime farmers. But what is actually the case is that many of these lands have become so bad that they are just waste areas today.

I can see nothing, not even a glimmer of hope, in this budget for the people of Cape Breton island for better transportation over the strait of Canso. The road traffic will have to depend on a little ferry boat operated and owned by the province of Nova Scotia to get from the mainland to the island or vice versa. They will still have to keep company with the ice cakes in the winter and wait their turn to get on the ferry in the summer. I believe the rest of Canada owe it to the people of Cape Breton at least to give them the assurance that a bridge or causeway will be built across the strait of Canso from the mainland of Nova Scotia to the island of Cape Breton at the earliest possible date.

Also there is nothing in the budget that I can see to make it easier for Nova Scotians to make a living in their own province. We thank the minister for the reduction in income tax; it is much appreciated, but to us in Nova Scotia it is somewhat the same as the poor man receiving some left-overs from the rich man's table.

Not a thing to help us overcome that thousand miles of geography between Montreal and Halifax. What the province of Nova Scotia needs is, first, some assistance to put some of our present resources on a more scientific basis, which changing conditions have greatly affected and, second, some definite programme should be worked out to make it advantageous for many light industries to locate, carry on and prosper in our province. I fully realize that this is easier said than done, but I am convinced that much can be done. There are a lot of good jobs and positions in our province, but the whole trouble is that there are not enough of them. As I said before, our economy needs to be strengthened to overcome that thousand miles of geography. And I see nothing that this government is doing to help our position. It is not any hand-out the people of Nova Scotia need or would take; we have always been able to pay our bills in the worst of times and have a little change left for the collection plate on Sunday morning. We are still part of Canada, although to listen to a lot of people around here one would often wonder. What we would like is a definite programme to strengthen our economy and increase the number of good jobs and positions in our province.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to add a voice from eastern Quebec to the chorus of congratulations which welcomed the budget speech which was delivered in a masterly way by a master in financial matters? My remarks will be confined mostly to this much talked about subject of personal income tax. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when delivering his budget speech, said with great accuracy, as reported on page 2553 of Hansard:

> The rapid rate at which taxes had to be increased in Canada during the war, experienced against our North American background of a long history of low taxes and relative freedom in economic affairs, has given rise to an acute tax consciousness.

The Minister of Finance was well aware of the public feeling when he said that there was an acute tax consciousness and when he added that, even after two substantial reductions made in the two last budgets, the present levels of personal income tax are regarded as excessive by a large proportion of the public. There is no doubt that such a feeling exists generally with the people of Canada and that taxes would have been more acceptable and more tolerable if they had been increased gradually and under normal conditions to the present levels for peacetime production, national development and social security. In fact, when the people realize that the personal income tax for 1948 is levied to provide revenues for social security services such as old age pensions and family allowances they will recognize that, according to the principles of social justice, the combination of a fairly distributed system of personal income tax with the application of a good social security programme is the only way for a government to attain its proper end, that is, to do common good to the citizens of the nation. The only way to arrive at such an end is by collecting from the citizens who can afford it the amounts required to provide the bare necessities of life to those who, through no fault of their own, are deprived of them. That is social justice in its healthiest principles and in its best application.

You will often hear people say—and at times they are well informed people—that the personal income tax involves inequality of charges because too many citizens escape its provisions. One has to admit that that is true to a certain extent, but theoretically and even in fact, because the cases of evasion are the exception, it is still based on the fairest principles of taxation as long as it does not take away from the citizen what is necessary for him and his family to live according to the general standard of living in the country. If it is granted that in order to give sound administration to the country, in order to pay the interest on the national debt, in order to provide for social security, money has to be levied in taxes, I wonder by what system of taxation we could replace the present one.

Should we abandon completely or in part direct taxation and replace the revenues so lost by an increase in indirect taxation? A good example of indirect taxation is the sales tax. Our sales tax is already at the rate of eight per cent, and one has to admit that it increases the cost of living, that it increases the cost of things to the consumer because it applies to some of the necessities of life, such as clothing and furniture. This means that people in the lowest brackets of income have to pay not only the sales tax but an accumulation of profits over and above the tax. I agree with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who is reported on page 2814 of Hansard as saying:

> But from the point of view of the common man there is much more to be said for the removal of many of them at the earliest possible time. These are the taxes which are responsible for the increasing costs of production. They are applied at various stages of manufacture and the assembly of consumer and capital goods, so that they have a general pyramiding effect upon prices. The ultimate consumer is the goat who has to pay them.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave the same opinion. I quote from page 3810 of Hansard:

> This year he (the Minister of Finance) expects to collect $325 million through the sales tax. Again let us remember that these bear most heavily upon those whose incomes are small, and like the tariff, the excise tax and so forth, they are hidden taxes; they are subjected to pyramiding as the articles pass from the wholesales to the retailer, to the ultimate consumer and so on.

In emphasizing the injustices of indirect taxes, both these hon. gentlemen blame the government for not having removed some and even many of them. At the same time the same hon. gentlemen, knowing as they do, that the government needs every cent of the money it will collect in taxes also blame the government, and with more emphasis, for not having reduced more sharply the rates of income tax, and mainly for not having raised the amounts of exemption. One has to be consistent. If the government is to reduce the direct taxes to such an extent that this will mean a considerable loss of revenues the money so lost will have to be collected in the form of indirect taxation.

According to the forecast of the Minister of Finance, the personal income tax in 1948 would bring to the government an amount of $625 million. At a rate of eight per cent the sales tax would bring $325 million, which means that if we replace the personal income tax by an increase in the rate of the sales tax we shall have to triple the rate and to bring it up to around twenty-four per cent instead of eight per cent. Would that mean protecting the lower income taxpayer? I do not have to elaborate and answer. Everybody can see clearly that it would bring about the greatest injustices.

What I have said about the sales tax could be said as well about any other indirect tax, and may I say again, even though the personal income tax has imperfections, according to the best principles of social justice the fairest tax that any government can levy is the personal income tax. But the division of the tax among the various classes of taxpayers must be made according to distributive justice; that is to say, the scales and exemptions must be so distributed as to leave to everyone, first, the minimum necessary to meet his family expenses and, second, the incentive to produce to the maximum of his ability and to improve his standard of living. These two factors, together with the needs of the state, have to be taken into account and coordinated in setting up the exemptions and scales. They were taken into account last year and this year by the past and present ministers of finance, whom I congratulate on the manner in which they have done their best to protect the Canadian family.

To my great astonishment I have read editorials blaming the Minister of Finance for having proposed an income tax system which does not protect the family. I have studied the reasons given for such charges and I think the persons who made them did so only after a rapid glance at the tables given in the budget. Could it be after such a rapid glance that the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar and Peace River made their charges, accusing the Minister of Finance of not having sufficiently relieved the taxpayers in the lower income brackets? Well, they know. As an example, I took the tables placed in Hansard by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar at page 2808. There one may notice that a man without children earning an income of $2,500 would have to pay, at present rates, an amount of $243. In 1948 his tax will be $170. A married taxpayer with two children and with family allowances, earning an income of $2,500, would benefit by a reduction of $63 in 1948. The reduction for the married taxpayer without children would be $73. The reduction for a married taxpayer with two children would be $63; that is to say, a difference of $10 in favour of the married man without children; but what counts is not so much the reduction itself as the amount which has been left to the taxpayer at the end of the year. While the married taxpayer without children would have to pay in 1948 an amount of $170 in taxes, the married man with two children will receive $144 in family allowances and his income tax will be $130, which means that the net position of the married man with two children at the end of 1948 will be an income of $2,514. Not only will he not contribute by an over-all direct tax disbursement to the general welfare of the community; but, owing to the fact that people without any children and people earning large incomes have paid their shares, he will receive $14 more than his actual income. Is such a policy not one that is protecting the father of a family? It is an example of a married man with only two children.

Let us not forget that the more we reduce the income tax rates, the less difference in disbursed money there is between the various classes of income taxpayers. For instance, in the years when the exemptions were at $400 for each child and the rates in some cases were as low as three per cent the exemptions for certain classes of married income taxpayers meant only a reduction in tax of $12 per child. As I said, it all depends on the rates of income tax. The lower the rates, the smaller the difference in disbursed money.

It is important at this point to study the combined effect of family allowance payments and tax reduction. One has to remember that for children under sixteen years of age the exemption is $100 plus family allowances. For the lower brackets of income taxpayers the amount of family allowances received represents more than $400 in exemption on income. With the leave of the house may I place on Hansard a table showing the value of family allowance payments calculated as an equivalent deduction from income under the income tax at various levels of income. The table is prepared for a married man with two children in 1948. It starts with an income of $2,750, because for lower incomes the amount of tax paid is offset by the amount received in family allowances. The table is as follows:

Family Allowance calculated as an equivalent deduction from income under the income tax at various levels of income

(Married Man—two children)

Income	Family Allowance Payment	Equivalent Income Deduction	Income Deduction now given in addition to F.A.	Total Income Deduction	Income Deduction per Child
$	$	$	$	$	$
2,750	144	870	200	1,070	535
3,000	144	720	200	920	460
5,000	144	720	200	920	460
7,000	144	600	200	800	400
10,000	144	480	200	680	340

For instance, with an income of $2,750 a married man with two children will receive family allowances payments of $144. The equivalent income deduction for the whole of the $144 is $870; we have $200 of income deduction now given in addition to the family allowances; we arrive at the total for the two children of $1,070, which means that the equivalent in income deduction per child is $535, when before the war the deduction per child was $400. In the range of incomes from $3,000 to $5,000 the equivalent income tax per child is $460, and from $5,000 to $7,000 the equivalent income deduction per child is $400. It is interesting to note that at levels of income up to $7,000 the deduction from income is never less than $400 per child, when the total exemption from income tax per child over sixteen is only $300. The expenses for a child over sixteen are higher than for a child under sixteen and the deduction is smaller. There is an anomaly there, brought about by the reduction in the rates which have given an increased value to family allowance payments calculated on the equivalent deduction from income tax. May I submit respectfully, Mr. Speaker, that in order to reestablish a better balance the exemption for a child over sixteen should be increased to at least $400.

It has been argued in this house that the proposed reductions in personal income tax for 1947 and 1948 were protecting the people in the middle and higher brackets of income to a greater extent than those in the lower income groups. At this stage, with the permission of the house, I should like to place on Hansard a table showing the distribution by income groups of combined income tax reductions and increase in family allowance benefits in 1948 over 1946 as provided in the budget speeches of June, 1946, for 1947 and April, 1947, for 1948.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LESAGE: I will hand the tables to Hansard:

* As provided in June, 1946, budget speech.

† As provided in April, 1947, budget speech.

Of the total benefit of $330 millions:
60 per cent is given taxpayers having incomes up to $3,000.
75 per cent is given taxpayers having incomes up to $5,000.
87 per cent is given taxpayers having incomes up to $10,000.
12 per cent is given taxpayers having incomes over $10,000.

Hon. members will remember that in the budget speech of June, 1946, from 550,000 to 600,000 taxpayers were exempted from income tax, and it meant a reduction of $24 million. The total reduction announced in 1946 for 1947 was $155 million and the reduction announced in the last budget speech in April, 1947 for 1948 is $175 million, which makes a total of $330 million. Of this figure of $330 million the benefit to taxpayers having incomes under $2,000 was, for 1947, $45 million and, for 1948, $43 million; that is to say, a total of $88 million; for taxpayers with incomes from $2,000 to $3,000, the benefit was $40 million in 1947 and $42 million in 1948, which amounts to $82 million altogether, and they are the largest figures in the whole scale which will appear in the table placed on Hansard.

The total reduction for taxpayers with incomes under $2,000 was 85 per cent from 1946. The benefit was of 80 per cent to taxpayers with incomes from $2,000 to $3,000. On the whole amount of $330 million, 60 per cent is given to taxpayers having incomes up to $3,000.

The Minister of Finance was right in believing that the verdict of responsible persons would be that he has gone as far as he could afford to go under the present circumstances. The new rates bring about a material reduction in all brackets of income and, together with the reductions announced last year for 1947, they will relieve the people of Canada of a heavy burden. May I give a few examples.

We have already covered the fact that in 1948 a married man with two children of family allowance age will benefit by the sum of $14 in family allowances over the tax he will pay. A married man with two children of family allowance age and earning $3,000 in 1946 did not receive anything in family allowances and paid a tax of $259, which means that he had to live on $2,741. In 1948 he will receive $144 in family allowances and pay $230, thus being left with $2,914, instead of $2,741 in 1946. A married man with five children and earning an income of $3,000 in 1946 did not receive any family allowances and paid a tax amounting to $144.65. In 1947 his family allowances, calculated at the strict minimum of $312, will exceed by $106 his tax of $206, and in 1948 it will exceed the tax of $170 by $142; which means that his net position or, if you prefer, the amount he will have at his disposal in 1948, will be $3,142 when his earned income is $3,000. When a married man with two children, and earning $2,500 a year, has at his disposal in 1948, thanks to the combined effect of income tax reductions and family allowances, an amount of $2,514 and a married man with five children, and earning $3,000 has $3,142, we can say that almost all taxpayers with families not only will not have their incomes cut by direct taxation but also will receive money from the government in excess of earned income to help them raise their families.

The ultimate importance lies in the amount of money at the disposal of married persons to help them raise their families. When the taxpayers realize up to what levels of income the amount of family allowance receipts will offset income tax payments, they will admit, I am convinced, that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance is truly a relief for the Canadian family.

For a one-child family it is $2,100; for two children, $2,560; for three children, $3,030; and for four children, $3,500; and so up. However, I sincerely deplore the fact that it has not been possible for the Minister of Finance to give some relief to taxpayers with incomes below $5,000 who have children of over twenty-one years of age attending college or university. The father of a large family wishing to complete the education of his children cannot attain the objective to which he has devoted his life. When he wants to give his children the best heritage possible the law comes along and takes away from him the very money he needs to further their education.

I wonder if it would not be possible at this time to reconsider the resolution and bring in an amendment to the clauses dealing with exemptions, by which amendment the age would be altered from twenty-one to twenty-five for children attending college or university. It may be argued that this would be an exemption in favour of the rich. No, Mr. Speaker. The exemption I am asking for is in favour of the father in the lower income groups, the so-called middle class, who works all his life to give his children the chance to be more valuable assets to their country. Let us not forget that it would mean only an insignificant loss in revenue.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to deal with a criticism most often heard against the budget. There is a strong feeling expressed in this house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for Peace River and others that the exemptions of $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married persons should have been raised to $1,000 and $2,000 respectively. I myself regret that it has not been possible to do something in that direction at this time.

An hon. MEMBER: Why was it not done?

Mr. LESAGE: I will tell you in a few moments.

I believe that an income of $750 is not enough to provide the necessities of life to a single person living in a city or town. On the other hand, there are three main arguments against an increase in the exemption at this time, and they warrant thorough consideration. First, there is the fact mentioned by the Minister of Finance that the exemption level as established last year, taking effect on January 1 of this year, exempts completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada. I know I shall hear my hon. friends of the C.C.F. say that is because the standard of living in Canada is too low, but we have to take the facts as they are.

Mr. GILLIS: But it is still too low.

Mr. LESAGE: I think something should be done to increase the standard of living, not only by this government but by the provincial governments.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. LESAGE: Second, we should not forget that the exemptions in Canada are higher than in Australia, New Zealand, Britain and the United States.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no social security in this country.

Mr. LESAGE: You say there is no social security?

Mr. GILLIS: Not comparable with that in the countries you mentioned.

Mr. LESAGE: Yes, but they pay for it otherwise, and we shall see that in a few moments.

Mr. GILLIS: And spend it back.

Mr. LESAGE: Here is how it goes in these socialistically governed countries. In the United Kingdom the combined effect of basic exemptions and earned income allowance of one-sixth—the budget of April 15, 1947—is to exempt income up to the following amounts: single person, $540; married person, $884, or a little more than half what we have here; married, one child, $1,165; married, two children, $1,456.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the socialist government.

Mr. GILLIS: Did you ever check what the dollar buys?

Mr. LESAGE: In the United States where a dollar does not buy what a dollar buys here—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have you the state tax?

Mr. LESAGE—it is not proposed to change exemptions under the bill passed by the house of representatives. The present exemptions are as follows: single person—$500; married person—$1,000; and for children $500. But in addition, a deduction equal to ten per cent of income is allowed in lieu of deductions for charitable donations and medical expenses; and they have to pay, through a contributory system, for their old age pensions.

Mr. GILLIS: And what else?

Mr. LESAGE: They have no family allowances in the United States, if I remember rightly. The exemptions proposed in the latest Australian budget to take effect as from July 1, 1947, are as follows: single person, $800; married person, $1,267; married, one child, $1,642; married, two children, $1,830. For social services contribution—a tax of roughly 7½ per cent of income—exemptions are as follows: single person, $336; married person, $643; married, one child, $909; married, two children, $1,018.

In New Zealand, income tax exemptions are as follows: single person, $648; married person, $972; children of family allowance age, no deduction; other dependents, $162.

No exemption is allowed against the social security contribution, a tax of 7½ per cent of income.

[Mr. Lesage.]

I said that there were three main arguments against an increase in the amount of exemptions at this time.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to be speaking right after you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LESAGE: I have given two. The third one is that an increase from $750 to $1,000 and from $1,500 to $2,000 would have resulted, in the words of the Minister of Finance at page 2554 of Hansard:

> . . . in a very substantial loss of revenue because it affects all taxpayers, including those in the highest brackets, and the saving for each taxpayer is his highest rate of tax applied to the increased amount of his exemption. . . . If, as some have suggested, we restored the pre-war levels of exemptions, we should have to sacrifice more revenue than the whole of that sacrificed by the rate reductions I am now proposing, and we would be doing practically nothing by such action to reduce the rate of tax on additional earnings for those who remain subject to income tax. It is the high marginal rate of tax on additional earnings that discourages additional work, enterprise and initiative, and consequently we must aim in our reductions at cutting down these marginal rates of tax.

The loss of revenue, as a matter of fact, would have been something around $275 million for 1948 when the forecast loss due to the proposed reductions should be $175 million in 1948.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not go on then and use the Bank of Canada to finance a lot of these things?

Mr. LESAGE: I did not know that the hon. member was becoming a little of a social crediter.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member is a socialist.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is a good idea, though, is it not?

Mr. LESAGE: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member is a socialist, and that is socialist mechanics.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LESAGE: I do not have to repeat the reasons given by the Minister of Finance for being careful at this time. I do not have to repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks about the obligation which would be ours to replace by indirect taxation the revenue the government would lose by a further cut in direct taxation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The people are concerned with what you are going to do with it. The people want some relief. Give the government your suggestions.

Mr. LESAGE: I am going to make my suggestions to my hon. friends of the Social Credit party in French, because I thought the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) would be here, as to what should be done about their "union des electeurs" and I am starting now. I am convinced that hon. members will be pleased tomorrow to read the translation in Hansard.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I hope you learned something from the hon. member for Pontiac. He gave you a good talk the other day.

Mr. LESAGE: I think the hon. member has a good deal to learn. He should first read French history and see what happened when a man by the name of Law, a financier, tried exactly the system the hon. member is proposing now and sent France into bankruptcy, and Law's actions were a background of the French revolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I read some French history in the budget to the effect that over ninety per cent of the farmers in Quebec are receiving less than $1,500 a year.

Mr. LESAGE: It is too bad that the hon. member does not understand French.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But I can read the budget.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. LESAGE: I have here what amounts to a tale on Social Credit by de Maupassant. It is the story of Mr. Law, a very clever piece of writing by Henry de Jouvenel in his book Huit cents ans de Révolution Française. I may have time to read it later on.

(Text):

I do not have to repeat the reasons given by the Minister of Finance for being careful at this time. I do not have to repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks about the obligation which would be ours to replace by indirect taxation the revenue the government would lose by a further cut in direct taxation, but Mr. Speaker, I believe I should insist on that subject in my mother tongue.

(Translation):

When on Wednesday last, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) rebuked the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for failing to remove the tax on incomes of less than $3,000, he mentioned the hundreds of so-called "pressure cards" he had received clamoring for removal of the tax.

I have received a number of such cards myself. The only point they make is that members should be as generous with the taxpayers as they were with themselves when voting themselves a $2,000 exemption. I feel it is high time the people knew that $2,000 exemption only did justice to the members of parliament. Indeed any taxpayer is entitled, in computing his tax, to deduct from income such expenses as are directly incurred in the discharge of his duties as long as they are justified and whether they be travelling expenses, living expenses or what are commonly called office expenses. In the performance of their duties, as members of parliament, hon. members incur yearly travelling, accommodation and administrative expenses well in excess of $2,000. Before hon. members were granted that exemption, they were in an unfair situation because the right to deduct those expenses from their taxable income was not recognized. The $2,000 exemption did not place the members of parliament in a privileged situation; on the contrary, that provision only partially decreased an injustice and placed them on an equal footing with the remainder of the taxpayers.

Let us see what would be, under the present circumstances, the effect of an increase of that exemption to $3,000 on the public finances. We must start from this principle, because it is the only sound one in economics, that the government must take in taxes what it spends on public administration and on social security programmes, particularly on old age pensions and family allowances. The Minister of Finance figures that personal income tax receipts will amount to $695 million in 1947 and $625 million in 1948. If exemptions were brought up for everybody to $3.000, the revenue would amount in 1948, according to my information, to about $200 million, which means a two-thirds reduction or $425 million on the expected returns. If the Canadian people hope that the government will continue to pay for old age pensions, family allowances, pensions to blind and health services, which cost more than $400 million a year—and I am convinced that such is the wish of all my constituents—we will have to find elsewhere the money required for those ends. If the funds are not secured through direct taxation, they must be obtained through indirect taxation.

I quote the very words uttered by the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low):

Indirect taxes are hidden taxes which increase the cost of production and the cost of living.

They are levied at various stages of the production of goods and, therefore, as each middleman must make a profit on the tax itself, the latter is increased manifold before it is passed on to the consumer. Thus, for instance, according to the budget, the present 8 per cent sales tax will bring in $325 million during the next fiscal year. If the government decided to raise the level of exemptions to $3,000, they would lose $425 million, and if they wished to recover that amount by raising the sales tax rate, it would be necessary to boost it to approximately 20 per cent. This means that the prices of some essential products would be increased not only 12 per cent, but that much plus the additional, I should say the multiplied profit accruing to the agent, the wholesaler and the retailer. The prices to the consumer, in the case of certain articles, would thus be increased 50 per cent or even more. The small wage-earner would suffer therefrom, as he would be compelled to pay the increased cost of goods and necessities of life. That is one of the main reasons why I submit that direct taxation, income tax being the finest example of this method, agrees better than any other with the principles of distributive justice.

Mr. Speaker, since I still have a few minutes at my disposal, I should like to quote a few excerpts from a book written by M. Henry de Jouvenel and entitled Huit cents ans de Revolution Française:

The financial genius that was Law or Lass conceived every form of modern credit. He showered them on a distressed country with the cheerful faith of an inventor who ascribes universal powers to his discovery.

That applies to our social credit system, does it not?

M. de Jouvenel continues by pointing out that up to 1721 Mr. Law had scattered all over France paper-money worth billions. A further excerpt will underline the similarity with the Social Credit policy and that of the Electors' Union.

No more debt, no more taxes, no more bankruptcy, no more class distinctions! Life had become one grand festival where, as at the open air stock exchange of the rue Quincampoix, according to Buvat, "thronged all kinds of people, scholars of the Sorbonne, priests and friars who took part in the trading, "as well as lords and lackeys, courtiers and criminals, courtesans and duchesses who danced and fraternized.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear.

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. LESAGE:

. . . Many grew rich so quickly that footmen who had become masters continued to climb, through force of habit, behind their newly bought carriages . . . Under the magic wand waved by the Edinburgh goldsmith's son, precious stones, velvet, silk and gold adorned at a moment's notice the shoulders of beggar girls and destitutes. . . .Millions were pouring from the printing press. . . .

They were printing money just as the supporters of social credit would like to print it.

Millions were pouring from the printing press. Bourdon, a café waiter, picked up 30 and Chambéry, a floor polisher, collected 40. The Chaumont woman, a small-ware dealer in Namour, garnered 100. Duhautchamp, a painter suddenly engaged 90 servants. The sale of high titles became such a prosperous business that the comte d'Evreux, of the House of Bouillon, married the daughter of Crozat, a former lackey, although she was but thirteen years of age. The marquis d'Oise, of the Villars-Brancas family, still in a greater hurry, became engaged, in consideration of an annuity and an endowment of 4 million, to the two-year old daughter of a financier, André, whose 10,000-pound notes were exchanged, a few months later, for a lunch.

It was an area of madness in which the whole social hierarchy collapsed.

Then came the selling out and afterwards the crash of stocks, and finally the flight of Law and panic.

All classes were ruined, and they voiced the same lament in front of the bank's closed doors; the first comers were smothered, and the corpses were then picked up and brought under the smashed windows of Law's house, under the Louvre balcony, in the gardens of the Palais-Royal. Public execration was rising, and no longer made any distinction between, law, the regent and the king.

Pestilence became rife, as happens in every sinister era, and it killed 100,000 people. In 1721, bankruptcy and death had ended the feast.

Social credit had been resorted to, Mr. Speaker.

A dishonoured government, a nobility and a clergy who were disgraced, a people who felt their sufferings all the more because their fall had been sudden, after they had believed for a full year that they had attained happiness; weakness at the top, anger at the bottom; such were the results of Law's sojourn in France.

I shall have concluded in one minute, Mr. Speaker. With the permission of the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I must remind the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

(Text):

Mr. LESAGE: By leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for time to say one word more.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. LESAGE: Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to caution against a number of swindlers, those who have sent or might be tempted to send these so-called pressure cards. I have myself made a serious check-up of the names of those who sent them to me and I found that not 2 per cent of them would pay income tax under the proposed rates. I caution them, as I am by duty bound, for were the government to raise the exemption to $3,000, the small wage-earners would be those who would be the victims, as they would receive less in old age pension and family allowances, and they would pay more in indirect taxes, thereby paying the exemptions granted to those who would have swindled them. Indeed, these demagogues do not work for the benefit of the average farmer, the humble worker or the ordinary family man, but for their own advantage, exacting from those who have to save their money to eat, the sum of 5 cents for one or two cards that cost only a fraction of one cent.

In concluding, I ask the hard-working people of the splendid constituency I represent in this house to throw out of their homes, of their public organizations, these swindlers, these visionaries, these irresponsible demagogues, who attempt to stir up public opinion by unattainable promises in the hope of quenching their own thirst for power and domination.

Mr. J. E. SMITH (York North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations in this debate, I desire to join with those who have preceded me in extending congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the excellent manner in which he presented the budget to the house, and also to congratulate the government upon the contents of that budget, containing as it did a report of a splendid surplus and announcing welcome tax reductions for a great many people throughout Canada. It has, I am sure, been very well received throughout the country, and I submit that it merits the support of the members of this house.

The budget, reflecting the general prosperity of Canada, and revealing the excellence of the job accomplished by this government in reconversion from wartime to peacetime production, has been inspiring to the Canadian people, and tended to create confidence. It has tended to create confidence in Canada and also to create confidence in the government, and at a time when confidence means a very great deal in our national life.

The minister, in presenting a picture of prosperity in Canada, was careful to draw attention to the fact that we live in a world still disorganized after many long years of war, and that until such time as peace, prosperity and plenty are restored to all the countries of the world, there is no need for us here in Canada to be complacent.

Events of recent years have made the world small indeed, and we as Canadians must face up to our responsibilities of citizenship, not only as Canadians but as citizens of the world. Our future in Canada depends in large measure upon two factors: How we are able to get along among ourselves here in Canada, and how we are able to get along with the rest of the world.

Here in Canada we have many reasons to give thanks that our lot has been cast in a happy place. If we would stop more often to count our blessings, and less often to air our grievances I think we could be here in Canada a more happy and more contented people. We face the future in a world still disorganized and weary after long years of war, a world in which there is still a threatening force no less terrifying than war itself. But as Lloyd George said in one of his great speeches of the first war, while there may be shadows in the valley, there is sunshine on the hills. So as Canadians today we are looking to the hilltops, where the sun shines brightly with the hope of better days in the world at peace.

Here in Canada where we are able so soon after a strenuous period of war to present a budget of the quality presented here last week, there is certainly no need and no place for pessimism. We have every reason to look forward to the future with confidence. We know that industry has been converted almost entirely from war-time to peace-time production, and that employment and production are at high levels. Foreign trade has reached heights never before attained and, best of all, the outlook for continued trade and employment is good.

Despite the high volume of production, demand for products of our primary industries continues to exceed production, and the government is to be commended for seeking to give continuing security and stability to the incomes of our farmers by negotiating long-term sales agreements for our products.

Farmers of Canada did a magnificent job during the war, and they did that magnificent job under extreme difficulties. They are continuing to do a magnificent job of production in this post-war era. The coming of peace did not eliminate all the problems of the farmers. The most serious problem confronting farmers today is the acute shortage of farm help. It is not only a matter of wages, as some people point out, because farmers in the district I have the honour to represent are prosperous. They offer good rates of wages for farm help, and still are unable to obtain it. The only solution, as I see it, is for this government to take the initiative in bringing to Canada a large number of farm workers; not hundreds, but thousands of such farm workers could be absorbed on the farms of Ontario, and within a very short time. I think we need have no fear concerning bringing to Canada a large number of immigrants of this type. However, in our immigration policy we must guard against bringing to this country any of those who have tendencies toward communism or any other ism in opposition to democracy, and not in keeping with the ideals of our democratic way of life.

Mr. FULTON: Including socialism.

Mr. SMITH (York North): Not only must we guard against the influx of communists to this country, but I hope that those communists who have been convicted of treason against Canada will, at the expiry of their prison terms, have their Canadian citizenship revoked. They should be deported to those countries which claim their higher loyalty.

We have had a long discussion in the house regarding controls, and I think the people of Canada have reason to be thankful to the government for its control policies. Controls have served Canada well, and I think in the matter of decontrol we have been proceeding quickly enough. But there is one feature of housing control which I should like to mention, one feature which I consider has lingered long enough on the stage of our national planning. I think the time has come when that regulation in connection with housing, which prohibits people who own their own homes from moving into them, should be dispensed with. It may be said that this will cause evictions; but I submit that the hardship and suffering of evictions are no less heart-rending than the sufferings occasioned in those cases where people, many of them elderly and who, by virtue of lives of thrift and industry, own their own homes, are now unable to move into them because of these regulations. I should hope that the regulations might be altered in the not distant future.

Income tax reductions announced in the budget will afford a welcome measure of relief. I think the minister was right in his statement that there had grown up in Canada an acute tax consciousness. Had this been allowed to continue without any reduction in taxation at this time, I agree with the minister that it would have worked against the best interests of Canada and been a hindrance in our reconversion programme.

Like many others, I would have been happy if the tax reductions had continued further, and particularly into that field of so-called nuisance taxes. I am going to mention only one tonight, and to say that I agree most heartily with those hon. members who have advocated the removal of the tax on radio receiving sets. I submit that this tax should be abolished, and for three reasons. First, apparently so far there has not been devised an efficient and economical manner of collection and enforcement; second, it should be abolished because it is unpopular, for the simple reason that so many people know that so many other people do not pay it; and, third, and most important of all, it should be abolished because the ownership of radio receiving sets is now so general in Canada that there is no need for a special tax as a special privilege. If money is needed for the upkeep or maintenance of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it might just as well be taken from the general revenue, thus saving the people of Canada the nuisance and expense of this special levy.

As I said at the outset, our future in Canada depends in large measure upon two factors, namely how we are able to get along together here in Canada, and how we are able to get along with the rest of the world. We look out upon a troubled world and read anxiously and hopefully as conferences are held from time to time throughout the world seeking to establish peace and order throughout the world, and sometimes we are restless and impatient at the bickerings and disagreements between nations. But should we in Canada be too critical of the nations of the world in their disagreement if we honestly look at ourselves and examine the present position of dominion-provincial relations in this country?

I am sure that it was a matter of great regret to all Canadians, irrespective of their political affiliations, that better results did not come from the recent dominion-provincial conferences. Today, looking to the future of Canada and looking to the problems which we face, both nationally and internationally, I agree with those who say that this matter of dominion-provincial relations is one of our most important internal problems. Turning back the pages of history to the stirring days preceding confederation, we find that in those days there was strong support for a legislative union with a system of government providing a single parliament for the whole country. However, the fathers of confederation, in their good judgment and in the light of the then existing conditions, could not be expected to foresee the future of almost a century and they decided upon a federation which provided for provincial governments as well as a central and national government.

There were difficult problems to settle in bringing about confederation, difficulty as to division of power between the national and the provincial governments. Many of those difficulties are with us today. They are so great and so important that it is becoming abundantly clear that, until we settle them, our progress as a nation will be hampered and our plans for the good and welfare of our people will fall short of what we would have them be.

In the confederation debates in Upper Canada in 1865 a supporter of confederation said:

> I am satisfied that one of the great advantages of this union will be found in this, that we will be raised above our sectionalism and come to feel and act as the citizens of a great country.

Canadians everywhere tonight reecho that wish. If we are to achieve the greatness which we deserve; if we are to attain to our rightful destiny we must face up to our problems, not as Ontario Canadians, not as maritime Canadians, not as Quebec Canadians or not as western Canadians; we must face up to them as Canadians. The problems which we face are of such magnitude as to test our best Canadianism.

I said that there was general disappointment of the failure of the dominion-provincial conferences and there has been some discussion in an attempt to assess the blame for those failures. However, I think the people of Canada are not merely so concerned as to who was responsible for the failure of those conferences as they are concerned with the fact that the failure of the dominion and the provinces to come to an agreement is holding up many measures of vital concern to the future of the Canadian people. This government's social security programme cannot be fully effective until some agreement is reached between this government and all the provinces. The issues at stake are so great and so far-reaching that, even in the face of what might seem to be impossible and insurmountable barriers, I should like to see this government take the lead in making another attempt to settle this question. I think the only way to settle these problems satisfactorily is to call a dominion-provincial conference, and I submit that this government would be rendering a great national service by reconvening the conference at as early a day as possible.

When such a conference is held—and I hope it will be—I suggest that those who sit around the conference table representing the provinces and the dominion should discuss something more than who is to tax whom, and how much. I am sure the people of Canada would like to see the representatives of the provinces and of this national government discuss seriously, honestly and free from provincial or political bias, the problem of overgovernment in Canada. We should like to see them discussing in a businesslike manner the ways and means of eliminating duplication of services rendered by the national and other branches of administration. Overgovernment is a burden on the taxpayers of Canada; it continues to grow and it is a burden about which we do very little.

I am sure the people of Canada would like to hear representatives at a dominion-provincial conference discuss a national health policy which would ensure our people against the economic disaster which is visited upon so many through sickness and disease. We should like to see the representatives of the provinces and the dominion agree on a policy of cooperation in the establishment of a hospital building programme which would provide adequate and modern hospital facilities, not only in the great centres of population but in the small communities all across Canada. We should like to see the dominion and provincial leaders discuss ways and means whereby our aged citizens would be better cared for.

The people of Canada would like to hear a discussion at this conference of the matter of jurisdiction and responsibility, so that cooperation would be possible in a great national plan of reforestation whereby the rich resources of our land could be perpetuated for coming generations and our waste spaces made fruitful and productive. These and many other great national problems might well be the topic of discussion at a reconvened dominion-provincial conference, with the possibility of great good to all the people of Canada.

Understanding within our borders is one of our primary needs today, and I repeat that this makes the matter of dominion-provincial relations one of our leading internal problems. To meet the challenges which we face, to meet the problems which confront us, we must have a spirit of understanding and cooperation between all the people of Canada; we must have a spirit of understanding and cooperation between all branches of government in Canada. To that end I am suggesting that we should call as quickly as possible a dominion-provincial conference. If this national government does its part with this conference and the failure and disappointments of the past are forgotten I am satisfied that the people of Canada will be quick to judge if there are still around at conference tables those who are more interested in playing politics than in playing ball with the rest of Canada.

Coming as I do from Ontario, one of the richest provinces of this country, I want it to be known unmistakably that, no matter how we may have been misunderstood, no matter how we may have been misrepresented, we in Ontario are ready and anxious to throw in our lot as Canadians with our fellow Canadians from coast to coast in a united effort to build a better Canada.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
