The Panel, when it discussed this question, felt that these proposals indicated a misconception of the role of NATO in combating Soviet penetration. NATO-directed aid would be politically unacceptable in many parts of the world and would probably be inefficiently administered. It was felt that this was essentially the responsibility of the larger Powers. NATO's role should be limited to consultation on problems and action left to the larger Powers.

Apart from the Secretary-General's Report, the United States Delegation intends to make special reference under this item to the need for developing political consultation within the Alliance without suggesting any new procedures or "rigid bounds" for such consultation. They will also raise the question of disarmament and indicate that NATO should give high priority to seeking a safeguarded disarmament agreement.

The additional points which the U.S. will raise presumably under this item relate to The Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy and the question of Economic Cooperation within NATO. The purpose of raising these two subjects is apparently to seek a reaffirmation in NATO of the broad principles of cooperation on Atomic Energy for peaceful uses and on economic matters. Such a reaffirmation would be intended to offset and balance the announcements which are expected to be made concerning the stockpiling of nuclear warheads and the deployment of IRBMs in Europe.

The Canadian Delegation should find it possible to agree to references in the communiqué incorporating the views of the United States, which largely reflect our own. A statement which the Prime Minister might wish to make under this item is under preparation.

Interdependence and Better Utilization of NATO Resources

A number of proposals have been put forward for discussion under this item. The principal ones are those of the United States Government which include:

1. The Establishment of Stockpiles of Nuclear Warheads in Europe.
2. The Provision of Intermediate Range Ballistic Missiles to European Countries.
3. Cooperation in Scientific Research, Education and Manpower
4. Coordinated Production of Advanced Weapons
5. Balanced Collective Forces.

The United Kingdom have also submitted two Proposals which relate to two of the United States Proposals. They are entitled:

1. Cooperation on Defence Research, Developments and Production of Military Equipment
2. Balanced Collective Forces.

The Netherlands Government has also submitted a far reaching set of Proposals involving increased cooperation in the military, financial and production fields. They envisage the need for additional common financing where this would eliminate duplication and waste. More specifically, they propose:

1. The Unification in Peace Time of the European Air defence Command
2. Greater Coordination and Unification of the European Logistics System
3. The Creation of a NATO Authority Capable of Expressing an Authoritative Military Opinion on the Qualitative Characteristics of Certain Types of Military Equipment
4. The Coordination of Research and Development.

The French Government has proposed the establishment of an Atlantic Community Foundation for Scientific Research.

Briefs on these various proposals have where possible been prepared. However, with the exception of the question of Scientific and Technical Cooperation, the proposals appear to be of much more direct concern to the United States and the European Countries than to Canada. The stockpiling of nuclear warheads and the provision of ICBMs to Europe are obviously questions of primary concern to Europe. The Panel considered that Canada should support these Proposals as they involve the strengthening of the shield and deterrent forces. The question of their acceptance, the form of control under which they would be placed, the public reaction in NATO countries, in the Satellites and in the uncommitted countries, all provide difficult problems, but they are problems on

 The implications for Canada of these proposals are not yet clear. The immediate emphasis is on coordinating European Research and Production but there could be implications for us in terms of our ABC relationships with the United States and the United Kingdom. The Departments mainly concerned with these problems have not yet studied these questions in any detail. Their initial studies have not evolved any very coherent Canadian position. We could be expected to support the Proposals in general to the extent that the new initiatives are intended to make European production more effective. Agreement could only be reached at the December Meeting on the broad principles involved.

The discussion on Balanced Forces is, according to the United States and United Kingdom proposals, designed to reaffirm and give new impetus to the implementation of this fundamental NATO principle. The principle implies that each member country, in deciding the size and composition of its defence forces, should take into account not only its own national requirements but the need to provide, by the most economical means, total balanced forces to serve the requirements of NATO as a whole. If this principle can be reaffirmed, it is envisaged that some of the smaller navies and air forces (i.e. those of Belgium and the Netherlands) might be combined and that, in general, there would be a greater concentration of military roles than has heretofore been the case.

The Canadian defence effort since the inception of NATO has been formulated in accordance with the principle of balanced forces. We should, therefore, be able to give our full support for the principle and its application.

What emerges from the consideration of the main proposals of substance before the meeting — with the exception of those relating to Scientific and Technical Cooperation — is the conclusion that the important decisions to be taken at the December Meeting are of less immediate and direct concern to Canada than to the European Countries and the United States. Our own defence effort is closely integrated with that of the United States on this continent, but this will not be discussed at the December Meeting where the emphasis will be on European Interdependence.

While we could be expected to express our general approval of most of the proposed initiatives, the countries which will have to take action on them are principally the European countries and the United States. We should not, therefore, enter too deeply into the discussion on this item of the Agenda.

Declaration by Heads of Government and Communiqué

Early in November, when it became apparent that Proposals concerning stockpiling of nuclear warheads and the provision of IRBMs to Europe would be before the December Meeting, we discussed with other Member Governments a proposal envisaging the preparation of a Declaration which could be issued by Heads of Government in addition to the normal Communiqué. Our idea was that the Communiqué should outline the decisions taken at the Meeting, while the Declaration could state the main principles of the Alliance and give some guidance on the line to be followed on major political issues such as disarmament and the easing of world tensions. The underlying thought was that some broad statement of principles would not only mark the importance of the Heads of Government Meeting, but would serve to offset the adverse political effects of the main military decisions to stockpile nuclear warheads and to station IRBMs in Europe.

Our proposal met with a very favorable response and we later submitted points on which such a Declaration could be based. These, together with suggestions made by other Governments, have been incorporated into a draft Declaration which will be submitted to the December Meeting. It is not yet agreed that the Declaration should be issued separately from the Communiqué. The United Kingdom and United States Delegations favor issuing it as a preamble to the Communiqué, but this question may be left for Ministers to decide.

A drafting group will probably be set up at the Ministerial Meeting to prepare the Declaration and Communiqué in final form.

DECEMBER MINISTERIAL MEETING — PAPERS SUBMITTED BY DELEGATIONS

The Council had a lengthy discussion today on the USA paper concerning a "NATO Atomic Stockpile." In his introductory remarks, Burgess stated that this was an extremely important proposal formulated in the spirit of greater interdependence to strengthen the Alliance and, in this respect, it responded to Pineau's suggestion at Bonn. It meant that USA NATO Allies would have the same weapons as the USA forces and all would be equals in this field. Secondly, the proposal met NATO military requirements as stated by SACEUR. Thirdly, agreement in principle to such a stockpile did not prejudice storage locations and did not compel any particular nation to have a stockpile on its own soil. Finally, the offer was made in the spirit of individual and collective obligation to the Treaty. The Standing Group representative referring to the political directive and to MC48/2 stated that, in the opinion of the Standing Group, the USA proposal was in principle a satisfactory method of providing the required nuclear capability to NATO shield and strike forces.

2. Both the Belgian and French representatives, while appreciating the USA offer, expressed the view that the conditions (USA custody in peace and authorization of the President for use in war) might cause difficulties of a political and psychological nature regarding acceptance. Burgess was careful not to reply directly to these points, believing that detailed attempts to establish a blueprint would really only benefit the enemy. Although there might be theoretical political difficulties, in practice there would probably be none as the delivery systems would be in the hands of European troops.

3. Spaak thought that it would be foolish to attempt to press the USA further and that the principle of USA custody in peace and use only on presidential approval in war would have to remain unchanged. For the Europeans, there were certain questions which needed early answers

- (a) were all countries ready to accept the equipment;
- (b) if some were and others were not, a military problem would be created;
- (c) would they accept all types or would they make distinctions;
- (d) if some countries would not permit their own forces to have weapons equipped with nuclear warheads, would they allow other forces so equipped on their own territory? He then asked for views round the table.

4. Although a number of delegations were without instructions, some initial reactions were obtained, in addition to those already given by Belgium and France concerning the difficulties of the conditions. The UK delegation indicated that they were prepared to accept the American proposal and that the conditions created no major problems. The Dutch, Germans, Greeks and Italians, although without firm instructions, indicated that the conditions would probably be acceptable. Both the Danes and the Norwegians stated clearly that they could not accept atomic stockpiles on their territories and did not want other forces so equipped located there. We used the instructions which you had given us, stating that, although no Cabinet decision had been taken, Canada would probably support the proposal and agree to arming Canadian Forces in Europe. We considered it best that the warheads should remain in USA custody in peace and, taking up a point previously made by the Norwegians, we believed that it would be unrealistic to envisage hostilities in which the USA did not take part. Therefore, there was no practical difficulty. From this discussion it emerged that there was no basic objection in principle to the proposal which, if adopted, would present the Russians with a united front and thus enhance the deterrent. This was of the greatest importance, all the Council would be doing would be to open the door to the principle, but its application would be more difficult and at this stage countries would have to establish their own individual positions. The representatives of Denmark and of Norway agreed that their present positions did not run counter to the principle.

5. At the outset of the meeting, it had been stressed by the USA that any decision contained in the communiqué would be of the greatest importance and it was advisable to prepare something on this point with a minimum of delay. The communiqué should indicate the agreement in principle without enumerating the potential difficulties in application. It was accordingly decided that a drafting group consisting of representatives from Belgium, France, Germany, the UK and the USA should attempt without delay to frame that section of the communiqué which will deal with this matter. The drafting group is meeting this afternoon and will report back to the Council as soon as possible.

DECEMBER MINISTERIAL MEETING — BRIEFING BY SACEUR ON IRBMS

General Norstad gave his briefing to the Council today. In his opening remarks he gave a definition of the IRBM, described its functions and made his own interpretation of the USA proposal.

2. SACEUR stated that the existing IRBM had a range of approximately 1500 miles, but it could be employed against targets at lesser ranges. In its present configuration it was rather a large weapon, requiring extensive logistic support, particularly in the form of fuel, although the basic infrastructure needed was not alarming. While the missile had a certain amount of mobility, it could not be moved rapidly or with ease and it was best to employ it at a hard or protected site.

3. With regard to the missile's role, it represented, from the military standpoint, an improved method of dealing with targets, the destruction of which was essential for SACEUR's mission. General Norstad believed that it should be used in the first instance against such targets, but it had, in addition, a strategic capability and therefore added to the over-all effectiveness of the deterrent of the Alliance. Its adoption was a natural and essential development, absolutely necessary for NATO.

4. General Norstad, in his interpretation of the USA proposal, understood that the USA would make equipment of this type available to NATO as a whole. NATO would accept the missiles and they would thereafter be turned over to the forces of NATO nations requiring them. He believed that acceptance by NATO in principle was an essential first step rather than the conclusion of bilateral agreements. Forces having the weapons should be under the control of the NATO military authorities in peace and war. Only acceptance by NATO as a whole would permit suitable organizational and control systems to be worked out. As a second point, it was his understanding that there was no proposal to equip USA forces in Europe with IRBMs and the latter were therefore not included in the present USA offer which was directed towards its European partners. Thirdly, it was not necessary for every European country to have IRBMs or for any particular country to do so. It would not be militarily advisable for all European countries to hold them, nor was it essential that they should be stationed in any particular place.

5. The Norwegian representative opened the question period by enquiring what the time factor was regarding the provision of these missiles. SACEUR estimated that the first equipment could be made available within one year and that they could arrive rapidly after that time. Equipments were probably not the limiting factor, but rather logistic preparation and training, the latter also taking about twelve months. The USA planned to open a training school in the USA for their own forces on March 1. General Norstad hoped that it would be possible to train key personnel from other nations at the outset. Training fell into three categories relating to airframes, propellants and guidance systems.

6. The Belgian representative asked whether IRBM sites were not in fact very vulnerable. SACEUR replied that they were vulnerable, like any equipment lacking a high degree of mobility, but this vulnerability could be reduced by hardening sites and by using natural protective features. In any event, the introduction of IRBMs would increase the over-all dispersal of the retaliatory force and the second generation of these missiles would have far greater mobility.

7. The Netherlands representative asked if the missiles were sufficiently accurate to fulfill a designated military task. SACEUR claimed that the accuracy was very high, being twice as great as expectations at the time of design. They could be used against specific targets rather than area ones. In reply to a further question from the Dutch concerning the strategic value of the missiles, SACEUR said that an IRBM located in the vicinity of Paris could easily attack a target in Moscow and beyond. The Dutch were also concerned with the question of costs. SACEUR used the comparison of a squadron of aircraft needed to perform the same tasks. While the initial costs of a squadron of missiles (fifteen missiles) and of their ground environment might be anywhere between 35-50 million dollars, over a period of years the total comparative costs, including maintenance, would not be very far different, although he admitted that his estimate did not include hardening of sites. At least he wanted to get the principle established that it would be desirable to trade one squadron of aircraft for one of missiles. This would greatly enhance existing NATO delivery capabilities in reply to a first Soviet attack. Commenting on an intervention by the Greek representative as to how this fitted into the proposal made by the USA regarding atomic stockpiles in Europe, SACEUR expressed the belief that this would be a special application of the principle. For the control of nuclear warheads, it would presumably be necessary to have small USA technical teams attached to the forces of NATO countries which were equipped with IRBMs. He did not foresee any difficulty in such a procedure.

8. The French representative pointed out that SACEUR's suggestion for having IRBM forces under NATO operational control in peace constituted a far-reaching departure. General Norstad was most emphatic in pointing out that this was absolutely essential for certain critical categories of weapons, including IRBMs, which would have to be used at the outset of war. It would be quite impossible at that time to go through a period of transition from national to allied control. He planned to make some very definite suggestions in this regard during the course of the coming year.

9. The Portuguese representative wanted further particulars regarding the use in the field of IRBMs and to know what was the tactical unit for their employment. SACEUR reiterated that a squadron or a battalion consisted of 15 missiles, one per launching site, dispersed over a wide area. This was the biggest unit thought to be feasible under any one command and the dispersal area was designed to achieve the greatest possible security. Its actual size would depend on practical considerations of terrain.

10. In his concluding remarks, General Norstad expressed the hope that NATO would give agreement in principle to the proposal in December and that certain countries might even state that they were prepared to accept missiles. He was ready to give his own views on those countries which could most appropriately make a start. Unless these decisions were taken, it would be impossible to go ahead rapidly with the training programme which he had in mind.

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT TO MEETING OF NATO HEADS OF GOVERNMENTS, DECEMBER 16

Following is definitive text of Prime Minister's statement, Begins:

Mr. Chairman, the primary purpose of our meeting here is to reinforce our Alliance, to assure its continuing unity and to reinvigorate its basic objectives. We are here to assure that the NATO defence structure first erected to meet the needs of 1949 is now adapted to meet the needs of 1957 and the years ahead. We must see now we can organize our collective resources to render impregnable the defensive capacity of the Atlantic community in the nuclear era. And all of us have hoped that there would have been a considerable degree of agreement reached with the Soviet Union on measures of disarmament. Indeed I ventured in September at the UN to express the hope that this present session of the Assembly would be the disarmament session. Those hopes have been frustrated. As a consequence of the failure of the disarmament proposals, we meet here today to strengthen our military position and to ensure that until the day that the negotiation of disarmament is possible, we shall have the strength necessary to preserve our security and maintain a strong position from which to negotiate at any and at all times.

We feel particularly frustrated by the lack of co-operation on behalf of the USSR in the field of disarmament because of the importance the Canadians as a whole attach, under adequate safeguards, to a cessation of nuclear tests. We recognize that public feeling is very strong on this issue and we would continue to give it high priority if and when negotiations can be resumed.

The recent Soviet advances in the field of military technology have given added urgency to reconsideration of our collective security arrangements. Proposals have been under consideration and have been mentioned here today for the strengthening of the military side of our Alliance. One already referred to is the proposal to form a NATO stockpile of atomic warheads. This follows logically from the decision taken in 1954 to organize our forces in Europe on the understanding that they would be able to use such weapons to repel attacks.⁵³ The proposals to establish ballistic missile units in Europe go beyond those earlier decisions and involve questions which no doubt the NATO countries concerned will wish to consider very carefully, for it must be reconsidered that the stationing of these new weapons in Europe will bring many serious implications of a political and financial nature as well as of a military nature. We consider that these proposals, along with the other proposals of the Supreme Allied Commanders, included in their minimum force studies, should be carefully studied early next year. We support the suggestion of holding a ministerial meeting to deal with these problems as soon as the preparatory work on them has been completed.

The Canadian government is of the opinion that the best way for the Alliance to build up the collective military strength required by its defensive strategy is for each member country to make the type of contribution which is best suited to its resources and capabilities. This fundamental principle of balance in our collective forces which has long been accepted by NATO as a doctrine has guided the Canadian defence effort in fact. Viewing the Alliance as a whole, there is still a pressing need for even greater integration of our individual efforts, which demands a closer examination of this problem of securing balanced collective forces.

I mention as a striking example of effective integration, the arrangements recently made by the USA and Canada for an integrated air defence system in North America, which we designate as NORAD. As a result of this integration, we hope to achieve a more efficient and more economical defence for the retaliatory forces based in North America. I would emphasise that this integrated force is an integral part of our NATO military structure in the Canada/USA region and will report to the Standing Group and the NATO Council in a manner similar to that followed by the other NATO military commands.

NORAD is a formal expression of the close working arrangement we have been able to develop with the USA in providing for the protection of the (group corrupt) power, on which we all rely for our security. I want to say this in the presence of the President of the USA — we in Canada have found in this as in other fields that we have been able to work out with our powerful neighbour effective methods of co-operation, methods that respect the interests and the national integrity of both partners while achieving the substance of our common objectives. This is our testimony, Canada's testimony, and who is better qualified to give such testimony than the nearest neighbour of the USA.

We are now more than ever acutely aware of the need to pool our technical knowledge that was referred to at length today by Mr. Dulles. That is most important both from the point of view of security and for the economic welfare of the NATO community as a whole, to increase support for scientific research. We believe that the most promising avenue for NATO scientific co-operation lies in the field of applied research and technology where the objectives of programmes can be reasonably set out in advance. We believe that NATO, and through the Committee to which reference has been made if it is fitter, should be able to play an important role in promoting the co-ordination of national programmes in this regard. There is also an obvious need for active collaboration in the development of new arms and equipment extending to the sharing of work among us on major weapon systems. We find ourselves in this position, that Canadian scientists and engineers who have been engaged in the development of aircraft and other defence equipment are at present seriously under-employed owing to the stage reached in our own programmes. This we believe provides an opportunity for fruitful work if we can work out methods of advanced weapons.

And now I want to make a reference in particular to the economic situation. No matter how we may develop this Alliance for military purposes, I believe that the time has come for a fuller implementation of the provisions of Article 2 of the Treaty. Under that article we pledged ourselves to eliminate conflict in our international economic policies and to encourage economic co-operation between our nations. We in Canada feel that NATO must at this meeting do something in regard to the undertaking of Article 2. At the present time we should have in mind in deciding upon our relations and in particular with the under-developed nations in need of our assistance. We must not, and this has been referred to several times this afternoon, and we dare not forget the needs of the less advanced areas of the world, the conscience of the free world will not accept a situation where half of mankind is well fed and the other half is starved. And such a situation invites Communist mischief. Standards of living have not been rising fast enough. Offers of aid from the Communist Bloc cannot fail to be attractive to people struggling desperately for economic advance.

Anyone will agree that the promise of parliamentary government or of democracy will not meet the needs of hungry peoples. I would like to see something coming out of this conference along the line of assistance to under-developed countries, the establishment of something in the nature of a food bank whereby there will be available under a NATO direction food available for distribution among those countries that today stand in danger of being over-run by the Soviet by economic means. The work that is already being done in NATO helps to keep its members informed of Soviet activities and guides them in their own plans and programmes of economic aid. In trade and economic matters, NATO members, we agree, must try to march in step so that jointly as well as individually they will promote the welfare of their peoples and the defensive power of this Alliance.

I dare to hope too, that in this conference we shall discuss measures to prevent depression and alleviate economic recession among any or all of our members, for it is in that that a major danger faces the free world today. We should try to follow national policies designed to promote economic growth and stability, constantly bearing in mind the interests of our allies lest in pursuing our own immediate interest, economically, we hurt our friends and so reduce our collective strength.

Mention has been made today on several occasions of the question of consultation. I want to say a word about that. The habit of co-operation, the neighbourly frame of mind, that is the leaven of the NATO association, and without it, this partnership would indeed be sterile. This leaven we carry with us into other international agencies. Since the war, members of the Atlantic community have been the architects and builders of a number of international institutions designed to maintain economic stability and to promote trade and development. Economic as well as military discussions and decisions must always be viewed in their international political context. We look upon early political consultation as imperative in promoting true co-operation within this Alliance. In accepting the principle of interdependence, each of us has had placed upon us increased responsibilities in the field of consultation. Consultation occurring as a matter of habit, with member governments refraining, if at all possible, from adopting firm policy stands or making major political announcements on questions that may affect the interests of their NATO partners until they have consulted them. No NATO country can be expected to give automatic support to policies outside the NATO orbit if agreement has not been reached through consultation in advance, and I put it in its briefest form when I simply say this, that outside the actual NATO area there can be no commitment without consultation. And I think that is generally accepted. NATO cannot live in isolation, bearing in mind the vital, perhaps decisive importance, of enlisting the goodwill of uncommitted countries. I suggest once more that we give extra attention to the economic provisions of the agreement.

Now then, Sir, most of us before coming to this meeting, and it has been referred to on a number of occasions, have received messages from Marshal Bulganin putting forth his views upon the relations between members of NATO, the USSR and its satellites. When Khrushchev made a proposal early last month for a meeting of leaders of the major powers, speaking for my own country I said that no nation should shut the door on any proposal that might offer the prospect of a solution to major problems or that might lead to a decrease in international tension. However, I also pointed out that the sincerity of the Soviet proposal must be measured in the light of the earlier refusal of the USSR to participate further in the deliberations of the Disarmament Commission of the UN, that a meeting with the USSR would not necessarily lower international tension, but in fact might create a sense of false security.

There is much that can be done, however, to furthering understanding between Russia and the West in the spheres of human, scientific and cultural relations. We saw an example of that recently in the cultural agreement between France and the USSR. In Canada we have had increasing contacts with the Russians through exchange of visits. I believe that if enough progress can be made in this way, consideration should be given to the possibility of holding further negotiations on matters of substance at a later date with greater understanding and confidence but always underlining this — once the USSR gives evidence of a serious desire to reach agreement I would point out this, that public opinion in various countries — and I am speaking my own — is growing impatient of the argument that the West is not yet prepared for discussions in this regard.

We must continue to demonstrate a willingness to negotiate with the USSR — that is of the essence. This will require what has been referred to already today as a flexibility in our approach and a readiness on our part to meet a challenge on a front much wider than that covered by the NATO Alliance itself. It will be the duty of NATO, however, while maintaining its solidarity and strength, to re-assess the essential requirements of Western security, and by vision and an imaginative approach — and I have heard that approach today — many suggestions that have been made here, and in particular from the USA, have that imaginative approach, to seek through negotiation as well, a settlement of our differences.

Sir, we must carry a message back to our people — something more than a material advantage or material changes, or merely the expenditure of money. This is not time for defeatism or vain glory, but as I meet here with you I feel that we have an appointment with destiny, not only of the half billion human beings here represented but of free men everywhere in the world. The member nations of NATO are the heirs — as it has been said today — of the spiritual values of Western civilisation. We endeavour within our own society, as the President of the USA said this morning so eloquently, to ensure that through the practice of tolerance, liberty and freedom become meaningful. Again he spoke this morning of our concept that the state was made for man, and not man for the state, and in fact that was his thesis; that principle is the very rock of our defence; that principle we must maintain unimpaired. There will be difficulties — there are difficulties — that are apparent to you, but they must be dissolved. Before us is the great design — the ways and the means to achieve that destiny is in our custody. Ends.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — DISCUSSION BY FOREIGN AND DEFENCE MINISTERS ON NATO STOCKS OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS AND THE PROVISION OF IRBMS

The discussion this morning took place on the basis of a draft communiqué regarding "NATO Defence" which had been prepared by the international staff, this including both the question of nuclear warheads and of IRBMs. We are not giving you this text at the present time, since a number of important amendments are to be made to it. In particular, the Norwegian delegation suggested several changes. These would imply that, although, in the light of the Soviet threat, the Council recognizes that IRBMs with a nuclear capability will have to be integrated into the NATO defence pattern, the NATO military authorities will first be asked to consider the problems and to submit recommendations. In fact, some delay in the provision of these missiles would be inevitable and the interval under the procedure proposed should be used for further earnest efforts by the West to negotiate a disarmament agreement with the USSR. Furthermore, the Council in permanent session would examine the various questions of an economic and political nature which acceptance of IRBMs and nuclear warheads would involve. Most delegations, including the USA, appeared ready to accept the Norwegian suggestions, provided there were no inference in the communiqué that NATO military necessities were being subordinated to Soviet political manoeuvres. The UK suggested that it would be preferable to refer to stocks of nuclear warheads rather than to depots.

2. The French were most insistent that the communiqué should contain a reference to the conclusion of bilateral agreements between the supplier and recipient countries on the stationing and use of IRBMs. Although it was recognized that bilateral discussions would certainly have to take fully into account the points raised by France, most delegations were of the opinion that these particular problems should not be unduly emphasized in the communiqué. It would suffice to state that the siting of the nuclear stocks and missiles would be decided in accordance with NATO defence plans and in agreement with the states directly concerned, and that their use would only be on NATO authority. It was important not to diminish the public impact of the communiqué by controversial questions and, in any event, it might in due course be a matter for multilateral negotiations rather than strictly bilateral ones.

3. The text of that part of the NATO defence section of the communiqué dealing with the foregoing matters will be amended to take account of agreement reached and will be submitted to the plenary session. At that time we will communicate it to you.

4. Although the discussion this morning was directed primarily towards general principles and to the communiqué, several countries intimated that they would, in due course, be prepared to accept IRBMs on their own territory. Both Greece and the Netherlands gave such assurances and Italy intimated a probable acceptance provided it were made very clear that their use would only be effected on NATO authority.

NATO HEADS OF GOVERNMENT MEETING — DECEMBER 16-19

This meeting of the Council at Heads of Government level had quite a different character from the normal Ministerial Councils held each year in December. Normally, the December meeting has before it an Annual Review of the military programmes of the Alliance — carefully prepared and agreed beforehand at official level. Other subjects for discussion are also normally carefully prepared at official level. This meeting, on the other hand, was called in haste, had no agreed papers before it, and yet had to deal with the most fundamental problems affecting the whole future of the Alliance, its relations with the Soviet Union and the countries on its flanks. In such circumstances, all that could be expected was a series of decisions of principle to guide the future work of the Alliance. The fact that carefully prepared specific decisions were not taken should not be regarded as a criticism of the meeting. The time was not ripe for such decisions. The meeting should be judged on the correctness of the decisions of principle taken and the Alliance can be judged next year on the manner in which they are implemented.

Background

The reason for calling a special meeting of Heads of Government was to give urgent attention to the implications of the Russian scientific successes (the launching of an ICBM and satellites) of the previous months. These will fundamentally alter the strategic position of NATO. In the first place the East/West situation will become very shortly one of mutual deterrence or nuclear stalemate when both sides have the capability to destroy each other with nuclear missiles. This is an important change from a situation in which the West held the main deterrent forces but one which had been envisaged for some time. The second and more drastic factor was the indication that the Soviet Union was more advanced in its development of intercontinental missiles than the United States and the possibility that there will be a time gap in which the USSR will have an ICBM capability when the USA will not.

This situation gave rise to two related reactions in the U.S.: (1) a drive to catch up with the USSR on missile development and related scientific research; (2) a move toward closer cooperation with her allies. The principal strategic importance of closer cooperation with NATO was the need to station intermediate range missiles, which will be available in 18 months, in Europe where they can be as effective as intercontinental missiles, and so offset the anticipated Russian ICBM capacity. There was also a need, however, for a united political response to the new situation.

The Soviet scientific successes had been coupled with a renewed propaganda offensive directed toward establishing the Russian aims of peaceful co-existence and disarmament — albeit on their own terms. These had an unsettling effect in many parts of Europe — particularly in the opposition parties, where it was felt that some new approach to the Russians should be made. The meeting was thus faced with a delicate balancing operation in which the need for strengthening the Alliance, and arming its forces with modern weapons had to be offset by a careful consideration of the possibilities of making some further moves toward realistic disarmament negotiations.

The U.S. move toward closer collaboration within NATO, which was worked out with the U.K. in bilateral talks between Messrs. Eisenhower and Macmillan in Washington last October, envisaged renewed efforts to strengthen the collective defence of the Alliance in a spirit of trust and interdependence. Interdependence meant the rationalization of force contributions, defence production and cooperative scientific research. These bilateral talks, however, gave rise to suspicion in Europe, and particularly in France, that a tightly knit nuclear entente was being developed between those two powers and that the rest of the Alliance would remain in an outer circle. This underlying suspicion broke out into open dissension in France over the Tunisian arms episode.

The meeting was overshadowed by a long period of uncertainty while the U.S. developed proposals to be put before it. They were, in fact, received in capitals a little more than a week before the meeting began. In the meantime speculation based on leaks to the press in Washington stimulated a controversy in Europe over the political problems related to the stationing of nuclear weapons and particularly IRBMs (which have a strategic offensive role) in Europe.

The U.S. programme for the meeting consisted of nine proposals of which the first five were of substance and the rest intended as dressing.

1. Establishment of stockpiles of nuclear warheads in Europe.
2. Provision of intermediate range ballistic missiles to European countries.
3. Cooperation in scientific research, education and manpower.
4. Coordinated production of advanced weapons (including a U.S. offer to provide blueprints for IRBMs for production in Europe under a suitable authority).
5. Balanced collective forces
6. Disarmament

7. Political consultation
8. Atoms for peace
9. Economic cooperation in NATO.

These proposals were followed up by European proposals related to them but in some cases providing more detailed suggestions for what should be accomplished mainly in the fields of coordinated production, balanced forces, and scientific cooperation.

Prior to the meeting, the more hopeful had suggested that this might be known as the "Interdependence Council" where far-reaching decisions might be taken to rationalize force contributions and production — thus enabling an adequate defence effort to be provided less expensively. It soon became apparent, however, that interdependence was a long term objective and that the tenor of the meeting would be set by the more immediate problems related to the introduction of nuclear warheads and IRBMs in Europe and the problem of disarmament. On both of these questions there were divergent views. Another trend which appeared, more strongly than was suspected prior to the meeting, was a preoccupation with NATO's interest in the areas outside the Alliance where Soviet penetration might turn the southern flank of the Alliance in the Middle East and North Africa.

The Heads of Government Meeting

The agreed agenda for the meeting contained two main items: (1) Principal Problems Facing the Alliance; (2) Interdependence and the Better Utilization of NATO Resources. At the meeting, however, this breakdown of subjects and procedure was not followed. On the afternoon of the first day, opening statements made by each delegate for the most part mentioned all the main issues before the meeting (C-R(57)82 of Dec. 16). It became apparent, however, that several countries wished to establish political preconditions before taking military decisions. The second day was therefore taken up with the establishment of agreed texts for the communiqué on political issues and the third day was devoted to the military, scientific and interdependence paragraphs for which the way had been prepared by the previous day's discussion.

Accordingly, after the first afternoon the meeting primarily devoted its attention to the communiqué and, under the chairmanship of Mr. Spaak, neither Ministers nor Prime Ministers were allowed to stray far from the draft texts before them. The fact that Ministers and Prime Ministers devoted a major portion of the meeting to drafting instead of exchanging views on the wider aspects of problems facing the Alliance was most unfortunate but it was a reflection of the general lack of preparation for the meeting. On the other hand, it resulted in a comprehensive Declaration and Communiqué and focused attention on the public nature of the meetings.

There was indeed little that transpired at the three and one-half day meeting that did not find its way into the press. Delegations individually briefed the press on the opening statements of their Heads of Delegations and some statements were given to the press in toto. Since the remainder of the meeting was devoted to the Declaration and Communiqué there were no truly secret, formal discussions. The concentration of Heads of Government and Ministers in Paris did however provide a unique opportunity for informal private contacts which in part prepared the way for the main decisions on IRBMs and nuclear warheads. President Eisenhower discussed Cyprus with the Greek and Turkish Prime Ministers and Algeria with the French Prime Minister. We know little of what transpired in these private meetings but it may be assumed that they were of considerable importance in strengthening understanding between members of the Alliance and aligning positions to be taken at the Council meetings.

There was much common ground in the statements made by Heads of Governments. Firm support for the Alliance, the need for unity and further strengthening of its defence structure, the necessity for more effective political consultation, the desirability of economic cooperation and cooperation in the fields of science and technology were highlighted in most statements. Mr. Eisenhower's presence provided both a focal point as well as a catalyst for the emphasis on the unity and effectiveness of the Alliance and his and other opening statements provided firm groundwork for the Declaration and Communiqué.

Mr. Adenauer's statement struck the keynote of the later balance which was achieved in the Communiqué. While stressing the importance of NATO taking the initiative in countering Soviet political moves, he emphasized that the Alliance must be so organized as to be ready to meet aggression at any time and for this purpose the Alliance as a whole must be equipped with advanced weapons equal to those of the potential enemy. He went on to stress that NATO was not only a defensive alliance, but a Community whose main function was to create favourable conditions for the peaceful coexistence of all nations. Accordingly efforts should be continued to ease tensions between East and West and confidence should be created with respect to relations with the uncommitted world.

Mr. Eisenhower recalled that NATO had been conceived as a collective defence organization. It should always be made evident that its signatories would seek to end the need for great military establishments and to release large resources for the welfare of mankind. While reaffirming the position taken by the U.S. on the disarmament proposals of last summer, he suggested that a Technical Advisory Group should be established in NATO to keep disarmament problems under continuous study.

He stressed the importance of adequate preparations for self defence and of NATO's determination to use force if necessary. He solemnly assured the Council that the U.S. would come at once, with all appropriate force, to the assistance of any NATO nation subject to armed attack. Equally he believed that each member nation would similarly respond, should the U.S. or another member country be attacked.

The U.S. shared the view that political consultation should be developed and broadened in the Council. With regard to the Soviet policies of penetration, Mr. Eisenhower thought that the time had come for an enlarged individual and collective effort to advance the development, trade and well-being of the less developed countries of the world and to improve trade and financial conditions. He indicated that the U.S. Congress would be asked to increase the Development Loan Fund from its present figure of 300 million dollars by an additional 625 million dollars and to increase the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank by an additional 2 billion dollars. In addition the U.S. would participate in the expanded U.N. technical assistance programme and Congress would be asked to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreement legislation for another five years.

Mr. Dulles then read into the record the main U.S. proposals which had been circulated to member governments prior to the meeting. The U.S. endorsed the idea of a NATO Missile Training Centre and would participate in a NATO atomic stockpile whereby nuclear warheads would be deployed under U.S. custody in accordance with NATO defensive planning and in agreement with the nations directly concerned.

The U.S. was prepared to make available IRBMs for deployment in accordance with the plans of SACEUR and with the agreement of the countries directly concerned. Mr. Dulles proposed that a coordinated program of research, development and production of a selected group of modern weapons including IRBMs might be initiated in Europe. The U.S. was prepared to assist this program and would support the weapons base in Europe by procurement for U.S. forces as well as for U.S. military assistance programs.

Mr. Dulles thought it would be useful if NATO established some closer ties with the other regional defence organizations. He suggested that a start might be made by an exchange of experience and appreciations of the world political situation. The Secretary General might explore this suggestion.

He stressed U.S. support for the establishment of a NATO Science Committee to take action to increase scientific manpower and facilities cooperation in research and exchange of military and civilian scientific personnel. Where possible he thought action should be carried out through the mechanism of existing institutions such as the OEEC. With regard to Atomic energy, the U.S. was planning to seek the necessary legislative authority to permit cooperation with NATO countries in the development of atomic submarines.

M. Gaillard's statement was motivated by the desire to bring France into a position of nuclear equality with the US and UK and by the wish to have NATO extend its concern to the problem of Soviet penetration of its Middle Eastern and African flanks. He welcomed the US proposals for stockpiles of Nuclear Warheads and the construction of IRBM sites in Europe and announced that France would make available technical and training centres. He thought however that only general decisions should be taken on these matters at the meeting — leaving the detailed issues to be worked out in bilateral negotiations.

In connection with the threat to the flanks of NATO, he stressed the need for common policies in areas outside NATO and said the French Government would not be opposed to creating a NATO fund for economic action to be used in the interests of defence in certain countries outside the NATO area.

Mr. Macmillan made a statement implying general support for the US proposals and picked up the US suggestion that there should be some practical linking of defence plans among the regional defence organizations (i.e. SEATO and Bagdad Pact).

Mr. Lange (Norway) and Mr. Hausen (Denmark) directed their attention to the US proposals on nuclear warheads and IRBMs. They stressed the need for further elaboration of the proposals and implied that decisions on the stationing of IRBMs in Europe might better be delayed pending further reactions from the Soviet Union on disarmament. Neither Norway nor Denmark planned to establish stocks of nuclear warheads or IRBM sites on their territories. Mr. Lange mentioned the Polish proposal for a nuclear free area in Eastern Europe as one which was receiving considerable public attention in Norway. He thought this idea should be carefully examined to see whether it contained elements which could be used in a constructive policy for peace.

At the other end of the scale, Mr. Menderes welcomed strongly the US proposals on nuclear warheads and IRBMs and left no doubt that the Turkish Government wished to have these weapons. The remainder of his statement revolved around the great danger of Soviet encirclement of NATO through the Middle East and North Africa, and the need for NATO to recognize that it faced "full scale" aggression in the Middle East. It was of the utmost importance to organize NATO to act before rather than after the event. Some permanent relationship should, he thought, be established between NATO and the Bagdad Pact and the Alliance should support those Middle Eastern countries which had shown their willingness to resist Communist aggression.

Mr. Karamanlis (Greece) also implied support for the US proposals on nuclear warheads and missiles but stressed that the sacrifices and obligations to be undertaken by member countries should be of a general and uniform character. The deployment of these weapons should be based on purely military considerations. With regard to economic cooperation, attention should be paid to the needs of underdeveloped countries all over the world and particularly in Europe. To this end a European Development Authority should be established with collective resources to induce development in the weaker European countries.

Mr. Zoli (Italy) also agreed to the need for reinforcing the nuclear deterrent by equipping NATO forces with modern weapons, for closer integration of member forces, and for collaboration in scientific research and in the production of new weapons. While not mentioning the Pella Plan for a development fund for underdeveloped countries, he stressed the importance of common action in NATO to counter Soviet penetration. He also thought that closer relations should be developed between the Alliance and other countries which, like many of the South American states, exercises considerable influence on world opinion.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the proposal to stockpile nuclear warheads followed logically from the 1954 decision that the shield forces should be organized on the assumption that nuclear weapons would be available. He stressed however that the implications of stationing IRBMs in Europe would require careful consideration and should be studied early in 1958. He agreed to the principle of integrated balanced forces and indicated NORAD was a striking example of this principle. He informed the Meeting that NORAD would report to the Standing Group and the NATO Council in a manner similar to the other military commands.

He stressed particularly the need to implement Article II of the Treaty and the necessity of raising standards of living in areas subject to Soviet Penetration. In this connection he proposed the establishment of a Food Bank which could make food available, under NATO direction to countries in danger of being subjected to Soviet economic pressure. Mr. Diefenbaker also referred to the question of disarmament and stressed the need to demonstrate a willingness to negotiate with the USSR, and the desirability of establishing contact with the Soviet Union in the spheres of human, scientific and cultural relations to establish an atmosphere of confidence which could pave the way for negotiations when the USSR gives evidence of a serious desire to reach agreement.

Apart from the specific national views outlined above, the general tenor of the first days discussion was one of unified resolve to strengthen the Alliance, to increase effective consultation and to further the principle of interdependence with regard to forces and production. There was a recognition of the shift of emphasis that would have to be made to counter the Soviet politico-economic offensive in the Middle East and other areas, though the NATO role in connection with action in this field, it was fairly widely agreed, should be limited to consultation — leaving the implementation of policies to individual countries. The main divergences of view were related to the stationing of IRBMs in Europe and the question of negotiation with the Soviet Union on disarmament. In this connection the Soviet peace campaign exemplified in the Bulgarian letters had its effect in reinforcing the hesitant attitude of some of the European members.

Declaration and Communiqué

The Declaration and Communiqué, which are annexed to this report,^{†55} contain a comprehensive restatement of the principles and objectives of the Alliance and a series of agreements in principle which will guide its work over the next year. The Declaration had been drawn up prior to the meeting on the initiative of the Canadian Delegation and was agreed without any very substantial discussion after the insertion of a Canadian paragraph (para 7) relating to the growing desire for freedom in the Satellites.

The Communiqué is divided into six sections: International Situation, The Working of the Alliance, Disarmament, NATO Defence, Scientific and Technical Cooperation and Economic Cooperation. The main elements relate to the U.S. military proposals on nuclear warheads and IRBMs, disarmament, and the expression of the Alliance's concern with developments outside the NATO area.

International Situation

The discussion on this section of the Communiqué reflected the general concern which had been indicated by Heads of Government at the danger of Soviet penetration into areas outside the Alliance, particularly the Middle East and Africa. It found expression in the first paragraph of the Communiqué which states that "Our Alliance cannot therefore be concerned only with the North Atlantic Area or only with Military Defence. It must also organize its political and economic strength on the principle of interdependence, and must take account of developments outside its own area."

Middle East

The discussion on the Middle East was in two parts, the first related to the Communiqué and the second concerned with the relationship of NATO to the other regional Defence Organizations, of which the most important was the Bagdad Pact.

Mr. Zorlu (Turkey) in a lengthy statement reviewed the situation in the Middle East, stressing that Russia was now permanently established in Syria and had unlimited objectives aimed at the domination of the whole area, and indeed the whole southern flank of NATO from the Caspian Sea to the Atlantic. He thought NATO should realize the menace and the need for a wholly coordinated policy in the Middle East. He thought NATO's aim should be the maximum of economic cooperation with Middle Eastern Countries without openly revealing political motives. Every effort should be made to support and encourage the openly pro-Western states in the Middle East so that they could recognize the advantages of Western links and impress public opinion accordingly. Although it was not the Turkish intention to demand any extension of NATO responsibilities to the defence of Bagdad Pact countries, individual NATO countries could lend strength and support to them.

Mr. Selwyn Lloyd (UK) was in general agreement with this rather restrained statement of Turkish views. NATO should be impressed with the gravity of the situation and every support should be offered to pro-Western Middle East Governments. There should be greater coordination of economic help and more exchange of information, ideas and principles relating to Middle Eastern affairs.

With regard to the Communiqué, Mr. Lange (Norway), while agreeing with the need for a general awareness of the importance of the Middle Eastern situation, felt that in view of the sensitivity of the Arab world, the less said about it the better, but that everything should be done to ensure concerted action in the future. This view was supported by the United States, Denmark, Greece and ourselves. Mr. Hallstein (Germany) thought the Communiqué might allude to the fact that the Middle Eastern situation had been discussed by the Council and that peace in the Middle East could only be maintained and specific problems solved if their peoples remained internally and externally free and independent. The initiative of any countries which might lead to economic stability and well-being of their populations would find the Alliance ready to help such peoples to participate in economic exchange and political life of the world as independent partners with equal rights. This general statement formed the basis of the reference to the Middle East in the Communiqué.

The Question of NATO establishing some informal links with other Defence Organizations (the Baghdad Pact, SEATO and the Organization of American States) which had been raised by the U.S. Delegation and supported strongly by the United Kingdom and Turkey, was discussed in relation to the Communiqué. It was, however, decided not to make public any mention of this suggestion. Mr. Spaak pointed out that there was no intention of establishing more than an informal relationship with these organizations with a view to exchanging information. The Norwegian, Danish and Canadian Ministers felt that the most practical and realistic way in which this informal relationship might be established would be for the member countries who belonged to these other regional organizations to keep their NATO partners informed of their activities. There was general agreement that it would be useful if the various defence organizations could gain a better understanding of the problems and situations faced by each of them. It was decided that the Secretary General should explore the possibility of developing such relations with the other defence organizations as would facilitate an exchange of information and opinion on a mutually agreeable basis, and to report back to the Council.

Africa

The paragraph on Africa in the Communiqué was inserted at the insistence of the French Delegation, which was seeking some indication of NATO support for French North African policies. Mr. Dulles thought that a mention of NATO's interest in North Africa might do more harm than good, although he recognized that NATO countries should consider what concrete measures they could take to halt communist penetration in Africa before it was too late. Mr. Macmillan also thought the emphasis should be on the help which all NATO countries could give to the economic development of Africa — including the United States and Canada. Mr. Gaillard insisted, however, on a reference to the special role of Europe in Africa. The paragraph which was agreed was in very general terms expressing NATO interest and willingness to cooperate in the development of conditions of stability and economic and political well-being in the African countries. It does, however, make reference to the historic economic and other friendly ties between European countries and Africa which would make such cooperation particularly desirable and effective.

The Communiqué also includes references to Berlin and the problem of German reunification on which there was no disagreement. There was also no formal disagreement to the inclusion, at the request of the Netherlands Minister, of a reference to NATO's concern over the situation in Indonesia, although the Secretary General pointed out that it might do more harm than good.

Working of the Alliance

This section which contains a reassertion of the unity and cohesion of the Alliance and a paragraph on political consultation gave rise to no differences of opinion. The paragraph on political consultation while reflecting the unanimous views of all member governments does not break any new ground. There was general agreement that there was adequate machinery for such consultation in NATO. What was needed was to develop the habit of consultation.

Disarmament

The most extensive discussion of any section of the Communiqué took place on disarmament. Three separate trends emerged. Firstly, the United States, strongly backed by Turkey were prepared to have the Communiqué merely reiterate the willingness of NATO countries to negotiate with the USSR on the basis of the Western Proposals and in the new UN Commission. The United Kingdom, France, Belgium and Italy, felt strongly that, for psychological reasons, the NATO meeting should make a gesture to public opinion and express the Alliance's determination to do all in its power to promote the relaxation of international tension. The Norwegian, Danish and Canadian Delegations were seeking a realistic and flexible approach to the USSR. The balance was in favour of making a gesture to public opinion and the US found no real difficulty in agreeing.

The discussion took place within quite rigid limits. It was known that the US and UK would not agree to a summit meeting with the USSR at this stage; nor would any of the member countries take seriously the USSR proposal for a special 82 member UN meeting on Disarmament. It was equally well-known that the USSR, which had rejected the 5 power formula and the 24 member UN Commission because they were outnumbered in these bodies, would not be likely to accept new proposals along these lines emanating from NATO.

With this background in mind, Mr. Pineau proposed that NATO should charge the four ministers who were members of NATO and who had been members of the UN Subcommittee to invite the USSR to meet with them in order to discuss disarmament problems on the basis of the UN resolution. This proposal received Norwegian, United Kingdom and Belgium support, but Mr. Pella and Mr. Dulles thought care should be taken not to under-mine the UN Commission which was to begin its work on January 1. Mr. Dulles thought that NATO might meet the objection of the French by submitting to the Commission a proposal that, should the Commission consider it useful, NATO would be prepared to cooperate along the lines suggested by Mr. Pineau. Neither Mr. Pineau nor Mr. Lloyd thought that this would provide a sufficiently forceful political gesture on disarmament as an offset to the military decisions to strengthen the Alliance.

A text which incorporated the essence of the French proposal but which took account of the US concern was agreed. It states that: "Should the Soviet Government refuse to participate in the work of the new Disarmament Commission, we would welcome a meeting at Foreign Ministers' level to resolve the deadlock." Mr. Dulles' reiteration that such an offer in the Communiqué was "only a psychological exercise" was confirmed two days after the meeting when Mr. Khrushchev turned it down.

A US proposal that a Technical Group should be set up inside NATO to study the practical side of disarmament was approved without discussion although it was not clear precisely what the US had in mind.

NATO Defence

After the opening statements of the Norwegian and Danish Prime Ministers it was anticipated that some difficulty would arise in connection with the drafting of the section of the Communiqué relating to the stockpiling of Nuclear Warheads and the stationing of IRBMs in Europe. The main difficulty was, however, removed when Mr. Lange reversed the position his Prime Minister had taken. He said that while his government would have preferred that a decision on the siting of IRBMs in Europe be postponed until a renewed attempt had been made to reopen negotiations with the Soviet Union on disarmament, it was apparent that the general feeling of the Council was that a decision should be taken at the Meeting to initiate the introduction of these new weapons in NATO's common defence plan. The Norwegian Government therefore accepted the principle that IRBMs would have to be introduced if it were made clear in the Communiqué that the stockpiling of nuclear warheads and the introduction of IRBMs were placed in direct relation to the policies of the USSR with regard to these new weapons; viz, that in the face of the declared Soviet policy to stockpile these weapons and the repeated threats to use them, the NATO countries had no choice but to introduce more modern weapons in their own defence plans. He hoped however, that the time necessary to work out the various political and economic problems related to the introduction of these weapons would be fully used to make a renewed and earnest effort to overcome the present deadlock on disarmament.

When the Danish Minister associated his government with Mr. Lange's statement, the way was cleared for the decision set out in paragraph 20 of the Communiqué.

The Meeting was able to consider only superficially and procedurally the proposals relating to interdependence and balanced collective forces. While these subjects are of the utmost importance it was recognized that they would have to be studied by the Permanent Council before any precise decisions could be taken. There was no disagreement in principle with these proposals but only a very general reference to them was made in the Communiqué indicating that they should be studied as a matter of urgency and that a military conference at Ministerial level should be held early in 1958 to examine them.

Scientific and Technical Co-operation

The Communiqué reflects complete agreement on the need for increased national and cooperative efforts in scientific and technical fields. There was no discussion of specific measures which might be implemented (i.e., those contained in the Task Force Report and the Report of The NATO Parliamentarians). It was agreed that a NATO Science Committee should be established forthwith and a Science Adviser appointed to the Secretariat. The intention is that the Science Committee should meet early in 1958 to formulate a program for implementation by NATO.

Economic Cooperation

This section of the Communiqué was based on a draft submitted by the U.S. Delegation. Mr. Dulles said that two ideas had been borne in mind in presenting it:

(1) it was important in the interests of mutual economic cooperation to increase the strength of the Alliance in order to support military costs and the welfare of populations, and

(2) it was important to make clear that the Alliance was greatly concerned with the economic plight of certain underdeveloped countries where the Cold War was now being waged with intensity.

There was no disagreement with these principles. However, a paragraph introduced at the request of the U.K. expressing support for the European Economic Community and the Free Trade Area gave rise to some controversy. The Greek Minister wished to include a special reference to the need for a European Development Agency as a prerequisite to their support for the Free Trade Area. A form of words, based on an OEEC text, indicating that full account would be taken of the interests of the less developed member countries proved sufficient to meet the Greek position. The United Kingdom would not agree to any mention of a European Development Agency.

Mr. Diefenbaker also made it quite clear that Canadian support for the Free Trade Area depended on the exclusion of food, drink and tobacco from the items included in it. Although we did not insist that a mention of our position be made in the Communiqué, it was recorded in the minutes of the final session.

Conclusions

In assessing NATO's response to the fast approaching strategic situation of mutual deterrence, which emanated from the Meeting, the most striking fact is the emphasis on the unity of the Alliance and on the need to strengthen its forces and introduce the modern weapons they require. The reversal of the Scandinavian opposition to the introduction of IRBM bases in Europe paved the way for the main military decisions of the Meeting and ensured that the West would enter any future negotiations with the Russians from a position of strength.

This emphasis on the strength of the Alliance was offset by a forthcoming attitude on disarmament and negotiation with the USSR. Mr. Macmillan summed up this attitude in the phrase "we arm to parley." It is significant, however, that the offer of a Foreign Minister's meeting with the USSR was intended as a gesture to NATO public opinion rather than a realistic endeavor to bring the Russians to the negotiating table. Apart from the Scandinavian and Canadian delegations who favoured a more flexible approach on disarmament, there was no inclination to depart from the Western Proposals which had been submitted to the UN Sub-Committee.

Apart from the balance drawn between strengthening the Alliance and disarmament, the most important new trend which developed was the recognition that NATO could not be concerned only with the Atlantic area. There was no attempt to extend the commitments of NATO but there was quite general agreement that member countries should coordinate their political and economic policies in the Middle East with a view to preventing further Soviet penetration. The decision to investigate the possibility of establishing informal links with other defense organizations including the Baghdad Pact is a confirmation of the trend toward increased NATO preoccupation with the threat to its southern flank.

While the Meeting did not come to grips with the important proposals relating to interdependence, it provided a point of departure for the urgent reconsideration of force contributions and more rational production and procurement of military equipment. The United States offer to provide IRBM blueprints to an appropriate European Missile Authority and the indication of their intention to purchase military equipment for their own forces in Europe will provide a stimulus to the implementation of the principle of interdependence. These are, however, long-term problems which will require extensive negotiation before it will be possible to foresee practical results.

The decision to set up a Science Committee will facilitate the implementation of the principle of interdependence. A draft NATO program for scientific and technical cooperation has already been drawn up by the Task Force and supplemented by the Report of NATO Parliamentarians. The Science Committee when it meets early in 1958 will have the elements of a program prepared for it and so should be able to submit proposals to Council without undue delay in view of the general agreement of member countries on the broad lines of scientific cooperation in the Alliance.

The Heads of Government meeting was successful in establishing agreement on a balance between military and political issues which faced them and in establishing principles to guide the future work of the organization. The balance may, however, be a precarious one. The bilateral negotiations on the stockpiling of nuclear warheads and the stationing of IRBMs in Europe will continue to be overshadowed by developments on disarmament between East and West and there can be little doubt that the Russians will exploit every opportunity to create division in the Alliance on this issue. The implementation of the principle of interdependence will provide the Alliance with great problems involving conflicting national interests. It remains to be seen whether any substance can in fact be given to this principle.

Ottawa, October 23, 1957

My dear Prime Minister:

Discussions have been taking place for some weeks in Paris among a group of NATO countries concerning emergency financial assistance to Iceland.

The present position of these discussions is summarized in the attached draft memorandum to the Cabinet, which, in its conclusion, recommends that Canada should participate, along with the United States and West Germany, in providing a loan to Iceland. The proposed Canadian contribution might be of the order of one and one half million dollars.

The security of Iceland is a matter of general NATO interest, but I think is of particular concern to Canada. As you will note from the attached memorandum, Canada is one of the three countries from which the Icelandic Government would prefer to receive assistance. In view of the large Icelandic community in Canada, it is perhaps natural that Iceland should look to Canada in this emergency.

If you agree, I should like to bring the matter before Cabinet at an early date, since the Icelandic Government's financial difficulties have reached so critical a stage that it must decide very soon whether to accept an offer of Soviet assistance. A Canadian decision is, therefore, urgently required.

A letter† along similar lines with the enclosure is being sent to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence.

Yours faithfully,
SIDNEY SMITH

ASSISTANCE FOR ICELAND

The Canadian Government has been approached by the Secretary General of NATO with a request to provide emergency economic assistance to Iceland in concert with some other NATO governments.

2. The Secretary General first became seized of this question in July when the Icelandic representative informed him that the Soviet Union had offered his government a long term loan of $25m., repayable over 20 years at 2%, and a shorter-term credit of $3m. According to word received from our NATO Delegation on October 22 the amount of the proposed long term loan offered by the Soviet Union has now been increased to $32m. The supplementary $3m. credit would be earmarked for the construction of twelve fishing vessels in East Germany, and would be repayable in Icelandic exports to the USSR. There have been several meetings between M. Spaak and representatives of a number of NATO countries, including Canada; in addition, two senior economists from the International Staff have visited Iceland to report on the situation first hand and to devise possible measures of immediate assistance. The OEEC is conducting a longer-range study of the situation with a view to recommending solutions to the fundamental economic problems.

3. From the investigation conducted under M. Spaak's direction, it has been clear that Iceland requires immediately a minimum of $8m. to meet pressing obligations for the construction of a cement factory, rural hydro-electric schemes and loans to fishermen and farmers. An additional $1m., required to purchase motors and gear for the fishing vessels being constructed in East Germany, can, it is believed, be provided in the form of commercial credits by Western European members of NATO.

4. There are strong arguments of a politico-military nature in favour of helping Iceland to overcome its immediate financial difficulties and avoid the acceptance of Soviet aid. The security of the island has great importance for Canada and for other members of the Atlantic Alliance: the country is a natural link in sea and air communications between North America and Europe and an essential linch-pin in the extension of radar lines between the two continents. Because of its geographical position Iceland is a key point for the defence of NATO countries against air attack, for the safe convoy of supplies by sea and for the movement of defensive fighter aircraft from North America to Europe. There is no doubt that the defence of member countries of NATO would be seriously threatened if these facilities were unavailable in time of war.

5. Quite apart from its current financial difficulties, Iceland's political position within NATO cannot be considered satisfactory. Over 30% of the country's foreign trade is with Iron Curtain countries, which places it in a position of vulnerability to Soviet pressure. Furthermore, the Communist Party polled 19% of the vote in the last election and in consequence has two Ministers in the present coalition government.

6. Iceland's current economic difficulties are not unique and are essentially the result of an overly ambitious programme of investment pursued since the war; according to information provided by the NATO International Staff, investment of various kinds has absorbed about 30% of postwar national product and has included an exceptionally large proportion of housing in Reykjavik. Successive governments since the island's separation from Denmark have attempted to diversify the economy so as to reduce dependence on fish exports, through development of the very sparse natural resources (such as hydro-electric sites). In proportion to its population the country is large and like Canada must incur large expenditures on "overhead" in transport and communications, particularly when an attempt is being made to modernize them rapidly. All these developments have achieved encouraging results but since they were overly ambitious they have imposed a strain on the budget and the balance of payments and have caused acute wage-price inflation.

7. Five countries, the United States, Italy, Norway, Denmark and Germany have expressed willingness to participate in a multilateral NATO loan to Iceland, while France and the United Kingdom have indicated that they might be able to grant commercial credits. Italy and Norway, however, were contemplating loans of only approximately $250,000 each while Denmark's possible participation, though not specified, would probably be on an even smaller scale. The Icelandic Government considered that the assistance to be provided by these countries would total so small a sum that it would not justify the adverse publicity (and its effect on the country's credit standing) that would result from discussion of the island's economic problems in the three parliaments concerned. They therefore indicated to M. Spaak that they wished to make bilateral arrangements with not more than three countries, i.e. United States, Germany, and Canada. The most recent word from Washington is that the United States would be prepared to match any assistance provided by other governments, i.e. provide $4m. of the suggested total of $8m. The German Government has indicated its willingness to make available D.M. 7 1/2m. or $1.8m. and efforts are being made to have it increase this offer to perhaps $3m. If Germany is in fact prepared to offer $2 1/2m. Canada should consider making available $1 1/2m. if the NATO objective of an $8m. loan is to be met.

8. There are a number of forms which a programme of Canadian assistance to Iceland might take:

(a) Consideration might be given to assisting Iceland commercially, i.e. by trying to encourage the import of more Icelandic goods or by providing export credits. Although Canada has imported very small quantities of fish from Iceland, there is no possibility of providing assistance through an increase in such imports. There is also little possibility of assisting Iceland merely through export credits insurance coverage of commercial bank loans since there is little scope for providing Canadian goods or commodities. We understand in particular that there is no possibility of Iceland taking Canadian wheat or flour.

(b) An alternative might in principle be an outright grant of assistance as a special form of Mutual Aid. Action of this kind would require amendment to existing Mutual Aid legislation which only authorizes assistance for military purposes and Iceland has no armed forces. Furthermore, a grant under Mutual Aid would take the form of quasi-military items, whereas what Iceland needs is cash in the form of a loan.

(c) A long or medium term loan is the only satisfactory means by which Iceland's needs can be met. In discussing the matter with M. Spaak, the Icelandic representative has spoken of a loan at "normal" interest rates and has never suggested that NATO countries should attempt to match the terms of the Soviet offer. The precise terms would be the subject of negotiations between the Icelandic Government and the lending countries but it is to be expected that they would be comparable to those of loans by the International Bank, i.e. in the neighbourhood of 4%. There are at present no funds available for such a loan so that a new parliamentary vote would be required. This could be so worded as to indicate that it is for a NATO country which is not eligible for Canadian Mutual Aid, in order to preclude other NATO countries seeking economic assistance on the same basis.

9. In conclusion it would appear that the possibilities of assistance to Iceland are really limited to a government loan. In view of the urgent need to help Iceland overcome its present difficulties without recourse to Soviet aid, it is recommended that approval be given in principle to the making of a loan of up to $1.5m. on terms and conditions to be negotiated with Iceland and which would be approximately the same as those to be negotiated between Iceland and other participating NATO countries.

N.A.T.O. LOAN TO ICELAND; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

6. The Prime Minister reported that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had informed him that the government had been approached by the Secretary General of N.A.T.O. with a request to provide emergency economic assistance to Iceland in concert with some other N.A.T.O. governments. In July, the Icelandic representative had informed the Secretary General that the Soviet Union had offered his government a long-term loan of $25 million repayable over 20 years at 2 per cent. According to the latest word received the Soviet Union had now increased its proposed long-term loan to $32 million.

From investigation conducted under Mr. Spaak's direction, it had been made clear that to complete current projects Iceland required immediately a minimum of $8 million, of which Canada was asked to provide $1.5 million. Mr. Spaak had been pressing the Canadian N.A.T.O. delegation for an early answer. A telegram† had been received that morning stressing the urgent need for an early decision in N.A.T.O.

Five N.A.T.O. countries, the U.S., Italy, Norway, Denmark and Germany had expressed willingness to participate in a multilateral N.A.T.O. loan to Iceland, while France and the U.K. had indicated that they might be able to grant commercial credits. The Icelandic government, however, had indicated to Mr. Spaak that they would not wish to make bilateral arrangements with more than 3 countries, that is, the United States, Germany, and Canada. According to the latest telegram from the Canadian N.A.T.O. delegation, the United States would be willing to contribute $5 million on condition that the balance of $3 million was forthcoming.

The Icelandic government was not interested in commercial credits. They had shown no interest in taking wheat or flour.

7. During the discussion the following views were expressed:

(a) Nothing short of compelling necessity would justify Canadian financial assistance to Iceland at the present. This assistance would have to be authorized by Parliament. Assistance could not be provided under existing mutual aid legislation, which authorized aid for military purposes only. The history of Canadian government loans had not been a happy one. Several borrowing countries had defaulted their payments. This was always liable to create political problems.

(b) In the last election in Iceland, the Communist Party had polled 19 per cent of the vote and, in consequence, had two ministers in the present coalition government. The Icelanders appeared to be playing off the western countries against the U.S.S.R. In a sense, the request for assistance in the present terms was a form of blackmail.

(c) Since the war, the Icelanders had been living beyond their means and had brought their present indigence upon themselves as a result of an overly ambitious programme of investment pursued since the war. It was true, however, that the western countries bore some responsibility for the situation in Iceland in that they had not bought fish or imported other goods from Iceland on a sufficient scale.

(d) Canada's share of assistance was out of all proportion. For political reasons apparently, the Icelanders did not want to be obligated to the U.S.A. by asking or accepting too large an amount from them although the U.S.A. appeared disposed to provide the entire loan.

(e) It should be borne in mind that, if Iceland were allowed to fall under Soviet domination, the defence of member countries of N.A.T.O. would be seriously impeded.

(f) Canadian assistance could take the form of agricultural commodities now in surplus such as dry skim milk, cheese, wheat, or flour.

8. The Cabinet noted the Prime Minister's report and agreed that a loan of $500,000 be offered to Iceland to purchase specified Canadian agricultural commodities, including wheat, flour, dry skim milk, and cheese.

NATO LOAN TO ICELAND

The Cabinet decided end of October that we would agree to offer one half million dollars for purchase of agricultural products in Canada, namely wheat, flour, cheese or dried skim milk. Your recollection, therefore, is correct. NATO Paris was so advised on October 30 and Wilgress informed orally the Acting Permanent Representative of Iceland.

2. On November 27 Andersen indicated informally to our NATO Paris delegation that Icelandic authorities were reflecting on the use they might make of our offer. He said that Iceland was not interested in the commodities listed because they are already receiving such commodities from USA under PL 480. He inquired whether the Canadian government would indicate what other commodities would be available.

3. On December 5 we asked our NATO mission to assure Anderson that we would be prepared to consider provision of other agricultural commodities and that the following products would be available; fowl, eggs, apples, tobacco, potatoes, animal foodstuffs. We would hope that dried skim milk could be included in any list of Icelandic purchases. We also asked NATO Paris to transmit suggestions from the Icelanders as to other agricultural products in which they might be interested.

4. We do not yet know whether our offer as it stands is acceptable. Consideration has not been given to the terms and conditions of the loan nor as to when parliamentary approval might be sought.

5. We are asking NATO Paris for Icelandic reactions to our proposal of December 5 and to keep you informed.

Andersen, Permanent Representative of Iceland, passed through Paris last week-end on his way to the Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea. He endeavoured to get in touch with me but was unsuccessful. He therefore asked his deputy to inform me that the Icelandic government would appreciate if we could keep our offer open for the time being.⁵⁷ They have no intention of making use of the offer in the near future but are still studying possibilities of future purchases of Canadian agricultural products under the terms of the Canadian government offer.

LOAN TO ICELAND

1. In view of continued interest of Iceland in Canadian offer when in Iceland last week I thought it useful to make discreet enquiries of USA mission as to progress of their negotiations. I was informed by Olson, Counselor of Embassy, that USA offer of five (5) million had been taken up. Conditions attached are that loan should be spent mainly on completion of revenue producing projects such as cement plant. Olson said negotiations on German offer of two (2) million were going on but he knew nothing of proposed terms. I did not repeat not think it advisable to enquire from German Ambassador or Ministry of Finance.

2. In addition negotiations for USA surplus agricultural products are now in progress. I understand USA offer will virtually fill all Iceland's agricultural requirements including wheat, wheat flour and tobacco. Olson thought Iceland might be interested in taking apples and canned fruit under proposed advance from Canada since USA are unable to supply.

3. As you know Iceland produces all its own requirements in dairy products and meats. It is exporting some lamb and aiming to export cheese. Agricultural production is heavily subsidized and farmers are strong politically. These facts explain lack of enthusiasm for our offer of dairy products.

4. Exchange difficulties are certainly not lessening. Present official rate of 16.26 to USA dollar is badly out of line with reality and there appears to be considerable black marketing in exchange. I was told twenty-five (24) to thirty (30) to the dollar was easily obtainable. Exchange regulations are obviously not repeat not policed adequately perhaps largely due to shortage of experienced personnel. Rumours exist about prospective devaluation but Cabinet is seriously split on issue and labour unions strongly oppose devaluation. Devaluation alone would obviously not repeat not remedy situation. An OEEC party visited Iceland within past fortnight but I was unable to discover their conclusions if any.

NATO: ASSISTANCE FOR ICELAND

At end of yesterday's meeting of Committee of Economic Advisers, McCarthy, USA Representative, made some very critical observations about promised German loan to Iceland. He recalled that USA loan had been completed in December and it had been expected that German assistance on similar terms and conditions would also be made available about that time. It was now nearly the end of March and negotiations were still stalemated; Icelandic negotiator had been in Frankfurt for six weeks and had been able to make no progress. It was time Germans stopped trying to treat matter as a commercial transaction. There was no question of Icelanders being able to discriminate on terms and conditions between the two lenders and the Germans should stop trying to exact more favourable terms. If things went on as they were all the good would be drained out of the operation and the whole thing might boomerang so far as NATO was concerned.

2. Gregh intervened to add that Mr. Spaak was also very concerned about delay and had already sent a letter to German delegation on the subject. Schmidt was rather taken aback by these unexpected broadsides. He said he was not familiar with reasons for the delay, agreed that early action by Germany would be desirable and said he would bring the observations made to the attention of his authorities.

NATO: ASSISTANCE FOR ICELAND

On April 23 Acting Secretary General read prepared report to Council concerning success of restricted committee initiatives. Statement will be circulated as annex to NATO document CR(58)28, but in essence outlines Export-Import Bank loan of 5 million dollars and its accompanying terms, and also German loan of approximately 2 million dollars on roughly similar terms.

2. Icelandic representative thanked Council for its successful efforts stating that Iceland has always attached importance to economic cooperation within NATO and the help extended on this occasion within context of Article 2 is much appreciated by his country.

REDUCTION OF U.K. FORCES IN GERMANY — SUPPORT COSTS

One of the black clouds which has during the past few months been edging over the NATO horizon is the problem of the German contribution to meet the local costs of U.K. forces stationed in the Federal Republic. Over the past few years, the German willingness to pay these costs has hardened considerably. Last year, it was only after protracted and difficult negotiations that the Germans agreed to pay support costs of £50 million at a time when U.K. forces were being reduced from 75,000 to 55,000 ground troops. The first tranche of the reduction (13,500 men) was carried out in 1957 and the WEU Council agreed last January that the second tranche (8,500 men) could be withdrawn in 1958. The U.K. Government has made it clear repeatedly in both NATO and WEU that the retention of 55,000 men (7 brigades) on the continent, after April 1, 1958, depended on a satisfactory solution of the support costs problem.

Up to the present, no satisfactory solution has been found. After bilateral negotiations had failed, the U.K. last December invoked the July 26 Resolution (CM(57)112) in NATO, under which a country in balance of payments difficulties can have its situation reviewed by experts appointed by the Secretary-General. The U.K. also invoked the balance of payments escape clause of the revised Brussels Treaty. The report of the NATO experts (CM(57)152 of Jan. 6) confirmed that the U.K. was experiencing serious balance of payments difficulties and that the stationing of U.K. forces in the Federal Republic constituted a heavy additional burden on its balance of payments.

Following receipt of the experts' report a restricted NATO ad hoc committee was set up to examine the basis on which assistance might be given to the U.K. We accepted an invitation to participate in this Committee somewhat reluctantly after representations from the U.K. High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa and on Mr. Wilgress' advice. We were obliged to recognize that the implications of possible future U.K. withdrawals from Europe were of broader significance than what had been a financial dispute between the U.K. and Germany. We were not, however, willing to contemplate NATO solution based on multilateral contributions.

The first effort of the Ad Hoc Committee was to induce the U.K. and the Federal Republic to renew bilateral negotiations. The Federal Republic showed some flexibility in these negotiations by offering quite substantial concessions aimed at relieving the U.K. balance of payments difficulties (i.e. advance debt repayment, advance deposits in London earmarked for armament orders) and slight budgetary concessions by offering interest rate concessions. The U.K. turned down all these offers, however, on the grounds that they merely postponed the foreign exchange problem. The U.K. maintained its position that outright German payments to meet local costs were necessary. Such payments would, of course, also relieve pressure on the U.K. defence budget — a relief which the Federal Republic seems no longer prepared to provide.

The attached NATO telegram 654 of March 12[†] sets out this text of the latest UK proposals submitted to the Ad Hoc Committee last week. They comprise a three year solution under which the UK would:

(1) Maintain 7 brigades in Germany in 1958-59, if the Federal Republic agrees to: (a) advance repayment of £45 million post war debt, (b) maintain in London £67.5 million now on deposit in the Bank of England to meet future debt repayments and at a reduced interest rate, (c) deposit with Bank of England interest free at least £50 million for new armament orders.

(2) Reduce to 5 brigades (45,000 men) in Germany in 1959-60 and 1960-61. (2 RAF would also be reduced from 220 to 102 aircraft by end of 1960-61) on the understanding that the UK would provide only £20 to £25 million of the total local costs estimated at £36 million. The difference of £11 to £15 million, the UK would expect to be provided by her allies.

This UK proposal is apparently based on a firm cabinet decision not to accept a financial commitment for local stationing costs of more than £20 to £25 million and it has been intimated that if other NATO countries including Germany are not prepared to contribute in 1959-60 and 1960-61 to the stationing costs, UK forces might have to be reduced further — perhaps to the level of three brigades.

POSSIBLE CANADIAN ATTITUDE

Force Levels

The UK proposal to reduce their forces in Germany by two brigades for financial reasons comes at a most inopportune time. It involves a unilateral reduction at a time when there is at least a prospect of bargaining with the USSR for some thinning out of forces on either side of the East/West German border. SACEUR is opposed to any further UK withdrawals and has received with disfavour the UK proposal to reduce to 5 brigades. Finally, there is a danger that other countries will follow suit. In view of these considerations, it would appear desirable for the UK financial problems insofar as they involve NATO should be considered on the assumption that 7 brigades (55,000 men) would be maintained in Germany until 1960-61. This would involve local costs of £47 million of which an indicated minimum of £22 million might have to be contributed by other NATO countries.

Financing

The UK request for German balance of payments aid in 1958-59 is close to what the Germans have already offered and therefore it should not prove too difficult for them to agree to it unless the prospect of further UK reductions hardens their position.

The main problem centers on the prospect of a multilateral NATO contribution in 1959-60 and 1960-61. It would appear highly unlikely that the majority of NATO countries would contemplate a contribution to UK stationing costs. Apart from the lack of realism in thinking of a broad multilateral scheme for this purpose, it would set a most undesirable precedent.

Both the UK and Mr. Spaak consider that most of the £11 to £15 million, required from NATO if the UK were to reduce to 5 brigades, could be secured from the Federal Republic under the umbrella of a NATO scheme. There must, however, be some doubt about this. The remainder might have to be provided by the US and it is possible that we might be asked to contribute.

The Canadian position on the UK/German support costs question has consistently been that it is one for bilateral negotiation and settlement between these two countries. It is apparent, however, that it has now become a problem of much broader implications. The new UK proposals have faced NATO with a choice between

- (a) providing a substantial contribution to local stationing costs with a view to maintaining 7 UK brigades in Germany.
- (b) refusing to contribute to local costs and running the risk of having the UK forces reduced to 3 brigades.
- (c) providing £11 to £15 million in support costs and accepting a reduction of UK forces in Germany from 7 to 5 brigades.

Although the UK proposals have been presented as a package covering three years; it would appear that the proposal for 1958-59 could be separated from the proposal for the following two years. Procedurally, it might be possible to suggest that a settlement for 1958-59 might be concluded bilaterally with the Federal Republic on the basis of the UK proposal.

With regard to the years 1959-60 and 1960-61, it is apparent that no quick decision will be possible, but Council might decide on a procedure for considering the UK proposals for 1959-60 and 1960-61. The first requirement would seem to be a formal request for SACEUR's views on the UK reduction to 5 brigades. If SACEUR maintains his view that a further reduction should not be contemplated, the investigation of the problem might proceed on the assumption that 7 UK brigades would be retained in Germany.

It is difficult to envisage what form future negotiations might take. In order not to set a precedent, it might be preferable to restrict them to those countries most likely to participate in a settlement and to endeavour to arrange a settlement outside NATO. The countries likely to be involved would be the Federal Republic, the UK and the United States and possibly Canada.

While it is too soon to formulate a Canadian position on the financial implications of the UK proposals for 1959-60 and 1960-61, our Delegation will require guidance for the discussion of the UK memorandum. It is for consideration whether such guidance might contain the following points:

- (1) We are very disturbed by the force reductions which are contemplated in the UK proposal in the years 1959-60 and 1960-61.
- (2) In particular, we feel that the timing of such reductions would be highly unfortunate.
- (3) We would hope that multilateral financing could be avoided.
- (4) In any case, we have difficulty in seeing how the various measures outlined in the UK memorandum can successfully be considered together.

II. REDUCTION OF U.K. FORCES IN GERMANY; SUPPORT COSTS
(Documents ED 7-58 and ED 8-58† had been circulated.)

3. General Foulkes said that before the Panel went on to consider this question, members might want to know that, according to information available to the Delegation in Paris, the United Kingdom authorities were considering postponing the submission of their proposal to reduce their forces in Europe to five brigades, at least until after a Summit Conference.

4. Mr. LePan referred to the points one to four in the last paragraph of Document ED 7-58, and said that they were suggestions for a tentative position to be taken at present by the NATO Delegation, and were not intended to preclude the consideration of any proposals which Canada might make later. There were a number of uncertainties which made it difficult for this country to take a stronger or more definite position at this time. We were not sure, for instance, what would be the results of the reconsideration of strategic thinking that seemed to be underway at the present time, and what the implications would be for the size and nature of our forces and for our defence expenditures.

5. As far as the proposed reductions in U.K. forces in Europe was concerned, we might take a position of clear-cut opposition, which would not be inconsistent with the stand we had taken in the past. On the other hand, it was possible that changes in strategic thinking had undermined the basis for such opposition, and furthermore we might wish to prepare the ground for similar withdrawals of Canadian forces in the future. If this was the case, we should perhaps condone or even welcome the proposed U.K. reductions.

6. It was difficult to assess the real reasons for the strain which had developed between the U.K. and Continental countries on the question of reductions. The Continental countries seemed to be disposed to think that the U.K. was trying to withdraw from military responsibilities in Europe, and the U.K. was in a mood to believe that she was being forced out of Europe. Difficulties over German import restrictions and in the negotiation of a Free Trade Area and, above all, the recent meeting between France, Germany and Italy on co-ordination of defence production might have contributed to this attitude in the U.K. There was a real danger that old suspicions among the European NATO countries were re-emerging, and Canada should pay some attention to the means of avoiding the development of an ugly situation there.

7. Mr. Plumptre suggested that for the purpose of briefing Ministers prior to the Defence Conference, Document ED 7-58 should be expanded along the lines of the statement Mr. LePan had given. It should be indicated to Ministers that, although the financial implications of the U.K. proposal were not great, the broad problems involved were very important. It should be recalled that Canada had relinquished its claims for support costs in Germany, and that if a similar action were taken by the United States, there would be plenty of money made available to meet the U.K. proposal. If, nevertheless, some financial assistance from Canada would help the problem, such assistance should be seriously considered. This would not mean that we would favour common financing as a means of assisting the U.K., for that would probably be an inappropriate method.

8. General Foulkes expressed concern about the position of some other member countries, for instance Greece and Turkey, who were in a worse financial position than the U.K., and for whose forces a given amount of financial assistance would go further.

9. Mr. Miller said that since the forces in Western Europe were not an effective shield now, the proposed U.K. reduction could not be objected to on military grounds as destroying the shield concept. Furthermore, the amount of money involved in the U.K. proposal was not large. It seemed, therefore, that a great storm was being created by a problem that was rather small in both military and financial terms.

10. Mr. LePan said the U.K. might have decided that because of their unfavourable currency reserves situation, they must draw a firm line on expenditures, and stick to it. They might regard their support costs proposal as representing their maximum possible contribution. However, it was hard to determine what weight should be assigned to the financial considerations entering into the U.K. decision on this matter.

11. Mr. Rasminsky doubted that the savings to the U.K. that their proposal would provide was the determining consideration. The U.K. had made considerable additions to their exchange reserves recently. Was it not possible that the U.K. were using their proposal as a lever with which they hoped to obtain better terms in the European economic arrangements that were being negotiated?

12. Mr. Plumptre said that if the proposal were meant as a bargaining counter, it would have been much more effective to have asked for more support for seven brigades rather than less support for five. The U.K. government was probably concerned about meeting their obligation to end conscription.

13. Mr. Bryce said that the immediate problem was to provide the Delegation with guidance for the preliminary discussions of the U.K. proposal. No firm instructions could be provided without consulting Ministers, and it was not possible to propose a course of action to Ministers until we had a better appreciation of the German reaction to any Canadian offer to share in the provision of assistance. Was the immediate guidance suggested in the last paragraph of Document ED 7-58 satisfactory to the Panel?

14. Mr. Plumptre suggested that point 3 of the suggested guidance might be revised. We should indicate that we regarded a solution as important for the Alliance, and that at the official level we would not shy away from a solution involving financial implications. Multilateral financing would not, however, be an appropriate means of providing assistance, particularly because of the difficulties it would entail for Canada, after having waived support costs for our own forces.

15. Mr. LePan said that our Delegation had been asked by the U.K. not to say anything in the preliminary stages of discussion that would prejudice the possibility of a U.K.-German agreement on the U.K. proposal. Therefore, if the Panel agreed to the four points in Document ED 7-58, with the amendment to point 3 that had been suggested, this should be sufficient guidance for the Delegation at present.

16. The Panel:

(a) approved for the guidance of the NATO Delegation the four points in the last paragraph of Document ED 7-58, as amended during the discussion;

(b) agreed to give further consideration at a subsequent meeting to the Canadian position on the U.K. support costs proposal.⁵⁸

UK FORCES IN GERMANY

The Secretary General has circulated report of Ad Hoc Committee set up to deal with foreign exchange problems connected with the stationing of the UK armed forces in the Federal Republic of Germany. This report is to be considered by Council at the meeting on May 14. We shall be guided by your previous instructions. Following is the text of the report, Text Begins:

The Council on January 16, accepted the conclusion of the experts, Brofoss, Frère and Rueff, that the UK government were justified in requesting the assistance of their partners for a solution of the currency difficulties which would arise for them in 1958-59 as the result of stationing British forces in Germany; and it agreed to the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee to consider the problem, consisting of the Permanent Representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, the UK and the USA, under the chairmanship of the Secretary-General.

2. The Ad Hoc Committee held eleven meetings at which various suggested solutions of the problem, relating to the financial year 1958-59, were discussed. However, none of these was found to provide a possible basis for a settlement. The UK government then suggested that, instead of a solution relating to the year 1958-59 only, a settlement should be sought covering the three years 1958-59, 1959-60 and 1960-61, on the basis of which the UK could declare her intention to maintain certain levels of forces in Germany up to March 31, 1961. The Federal Government of Germany accepted the suggestion of a three year settlement.

3. At the last meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee the Federal Government and Her Majesty's Government expressed their willingness to accept, in the general framework of a NATO-wide solution of the problem, a three year settlement, comprising the following provisions:

(a) The Federal Government for their part would, as a measure of mutual aid according to Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, in order to alleviate the foreign exchange problem connected with the stationing of British forces in the Federal Republic,

(i) make in 1958-59 and each of the two following years an annual payment to Her Majesty's Government of £12 million;

(ii) deposit with Her Majesty's Government interest-free a sum of £50 million from which Her Majesty's Government would pay the claims of British manufacturers in respect of armaments supplied to the Federal Government;

(iii) make in 1958-59, out of the balance of the £75 million deposited by the Bundesbank with the Bank of England in 1957, advance payment to Her Majesty's Government of the three annual instalments of the post-war economic debt which would have otherwise fallen due for payment on Aug/62, 63 and 64 respectively, subject to their obtaining the waivers which would be required in accordance with the provisions of the London debt agreements of 1953;

(iv) intervene with the Bundesbank in order that at the request of the Bank of England an arrangement might be found for meeting the wishes of the latter bank regarding the payment of interest on the balance of the £75 million deposit referred to at (iii) above.

(b) Her Majesty's Government for their part would assume the commitment of finding from their own resources:

- (i) in 1958-59 the balance, after taking into account the payment of £12 million received from the Federal Government, of the local DM costs involved in maintaining British forces in Germany (at the level of forces accepted by the Western European Union for this year these costs are estimated to total £47 million);
- (ii) in 1959-60 and 1960-61 an amount for local DM costs of around £25 million in each of these years.

On the basis of these provisions Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to declare through NATO their intention to maintain in Germany in the years 1959-60 and 1960-61:

- (a) a minimum of 45,000 men (5 brigade groups);
- (b) 2 TAF (with a strength starting at 220 and ending at 102 aircraft).

The reduction in (a) above from the figure of 55,000 which has been accepted by the Western European Union as the revised strength of the British Army in Germany for 1958-59, would not begin until the first quarter of the calendar year 1959. There would be no reduction of 2 TAF below its present strength of 220 aircraft in 1958-59 and 1959-60 but the strength would be reduced towards the end of 1960-61 to 102 aircraft.

The local DM costs of maintaining the forces at these reduced levels in 1959-60 and 1960-61 are at present estimated at £37 million each year. Of the costs in each year, under (a) and (b) above £12 million would be covered by the payment received from the Federal Government and the balance, even if this should exceed £25 million, would be found by Her Majesty's Government from their own resources.

4. The Ad Hoc Committee has agreed that its work is now completed and that the proposed settlement should be referred to the full Council. Text Ends.

UK FORCES IN GERMANY

Introducing CM(58)79 in Council this morning, Spaak explained that it outlines solution finally agreed in Ad Hoc Committee without going into various alternatives discussed or views exchanged. He drew a distinction between financial and military aspects of paper, suggesting that so far as the latter are concerned, no repeat no concrete problem would arise until such time as question is again raised in WEU. He recognized that, if the question of a further reduction should be raised there, and WEU country was at liberty to express views; the same applied, with respect to all NATO countries, in relation to Annual Review consideration of UK forces. He thought that financial aspect was one on which Council might agree now, and he hoped that it might prove possible to avoid again raising military aspect as a problem in WEU.

2. Blankenhorn said Germany recognized that UK proposals on force levels are dependent on proposed three year financial settlement. He said UK should do everything possible, if further reduction is made, to counterbalance by improvements in military efficiency. On this basis Germany would not repeat not object if UK found it necessary to raise question of a further reduction in WEU. On German undertaking to make advance payment of debt settlements, Federal Government would consult with the other interested countries before proceeding.

3. Roberts emphasized that proposed reduction to 45,000 in 1959-60 and 1960-61 was a minimum. There would be no repeat no reduction below 55,000 until first quarter of 1959, and there would be no repeat no air force reduction until 1960-61. UK would like to maintain an army of 55,000 in 1959-60 but scope of financial agreement it has proved possible to work out does not repeat not allow this. He reminded Council that UK and Germany are the only contributors.

4. Roberts said that if NATO could by some means find some additional arrangements to cover additional amount of the DM equivalent of 8 or 10 million pounds, needed to support the 10,000, the UK would be happy to try to maintain its forces at its present strength in succeeding years. At the same time, he warned that, since present plan will involve an additional expenditure in foreign exchange for UK of 35 million pounds this year and at least 24 million pounds in each of the following two years, UK would not repeat not be a potential contributor to any further arrangement. Moreover, they would consider that any negotiations to this end should not repeat not be a continuation of the negotiations now concluded, since UK could not repeat not countenance present arrangements being called in question in any way.

5. He noted with approval that Spaak had indicated that there need be no repeat no reference to WEU now because there would be no repeat no further reduction this year. UK government will try to defer a reference to WEU as long as possible, and hopes that it may never be necessary.

6. On counter-balancing any reduction, Roberts recalled that UK is already increasing the combat efficiency of the 55,000 and will shortly be providing them with more modern armaments. These forces will be the first, after USA forces, to receive such armaments.

7. Roberts recognized that arrangements for advance debt payment give UK preferential treatment over other creditor countries but hoped that they would nevertheless concur.

8. Belgian representative agreed with Spaak's opening remarks and was particularly gratified that we need not repeat not necessarily face a further reduction to 45,000. He was, however, concerned about effect in other NATO countries if possibility of such a reduction were included in official announcements of settlement. These countries might begin to think that the Annual Review can be side stepped and that countries may reduce forces unilaterally.

9. He questioned wisdom of an agreement covering three years rather than one. This, he said, carries us into the realm of financial and economic conjecture and provides a settlement not repeat not based on the views of experts and therefore outside the expressed terms of the established NATO procedure.

10. French representative welcomed Roberts' emphasis on minimum character of possible reduction but shared Belgian concern about publicity. Moreover, he said, French defence efforts and French interests in WEU are involved, and nothing should be done to limit French freedom of action in WEU forum. There is also the somewhat legal problem of the position of debtor countries. All these questions require careful consideration and French representative could not repeat not commit himself to support report today.

11. Netherlands representative supported Belgian intervention and emphasized danger of an announcement involving a possible further reduction of 45,000, both within NATO and with respect to any negotiations with the Russians.

12. I expressed satisfaction with conclusion of the agreement and welcomed extension of the period of proposed agreement to cover three years because it would avoid a recurrence of difficulty each year. I said that we nevertheless have to consider future and must clearly distinguish between WEU and NATO interests. I fully shared Netherlands concern about effect of publicity and hoped that it will not repeat not be necessary for official announcement to include any reference to possible further reductions of UK forces on continent. This should not repeat not be necessary until such time as matter is raised again in WEU.

13. Furthermore, in NATO, we should clarify our plans for handling this question in future. It should be approached dispassionately and without any preconception that further reductions will necessarily be made. At the moment, no repeat no additional source of funds is in sight but all possibilities should be investigated. On military side, we need an investigation to see what economics can be effected. Also, as German representative had suggested, the combat efficiency of UK forces on the continent might be increased and possibility of further economies for UK forces should not repeat not be overlooked. In this connection I referred to possibility of streamlining the HQ structure.

14. Procedurally, I said, problem will have to come within the orbit of 1958 Annual Review. Consideration will have to be given in this context to MC70 and broad objectives of NATO defence planning. The military authorities in preparing their guidance will no repeat no doubt take into account force breakdowns for UK in MC70 which mentions seven brigades. Annual Review will also afford an opportunity for consideration of financial aspects, in the normal way, and this should be the way in which NATO deals with financial problems of this kind in future.

15. USA representative praised UK and Germany for stretching themselves to reach agreement. He thought that statements made today by UK and German representatives are very important and that they should be part of the record in the same way as CM(56)79. He fully shared anxieties of others on publicity. UK have a problem vis-à-vis their parliament but so have others. Some formula avoiding the impression that NATO has approved a reduction to 45,000 should be worked out.

16. Roberts, commenting, agreed that 1958 Annual Review should be used to consider the forces aspect, while efforts at the same time were made to find the money to make a further reduction unnecessary. He disagreed with the view, expressed by several, that a NATO military opinion on the proposed reduction be sought now, since this would be premature. On publicity, UK would do its best to prevent possibility of a further reduction to 45,000 in the best possible light but could not repeat not avoid mentioning it to parliament, since there will be criticism and the government must tell the whole story. On possible further economies affecting UK forces he thought UK was already doing pretty well but friendly advice was always welcome.

17. Spaak proposed that Council take note of report but also note that certain delegations had reservations with respect to possible force reductions which they might raise either in WEU if question arises there again, or in the course of Annual Review. It is possible, he reflected, that a solution of the further problem may be found in the meantime.

18. On publicity Spaak recognized problem but thought it necessary to understand UK requirement. Both UK and Germany must be frank with their parliaments or risk trouble later on.

19. Blankenhorn wanted Council to “approve” rather than “take note” and felt approval should be of “proposals” rather than of agreement between UK and Germany. For Germany this is and must be a NATO, not repeat not a bilateral solution; this should be reflected presentationally. He also wanted a reference to mutual aid under Article 3 rather than to “stationing costs.”

20. Belgian representative opposed German proposal that Council “approve.” I thought it was acceptable if approval was on understanding that it did not repeat not affect position of WEU members in WEU, and did not repeat not limit freedom of action of NATO countries in Annual Review. UK, recognizing German political requirement, strongly supported German representative, although no repeat no one supported his further proposal that Council recommend implementation of the financial proposals. Roberts thought this would be unacceptable to his government.

21. Spaak tried hard to get agreement on a formula of the kind he had originally proposed which would be put back to governments as a draft decision. USA representative argued that this could not repeat not be done in Council and asked that staff draft a resolution and a document embodying UK and German statements at the meeting. When pressed by Spaak he said he would like these incorporated in some way in a document to be approved by Council.

22. It was agreed staff would circulate a paper for consideration May 21.

UK FORCES IN GERMANY

At a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee this morning the difficulties were resolved in connection with the preparation of a draft resolution. Roberts was able to assure the Committee that the UK statement in parliament will be of a kind satisfactory to NATO,⁵⁹ that is it will not imply that NATO have agreed in a further reduction of UK forces below the level accepted in WEU. In view of this it was agreed that the draft resolution need not be too precise regarding future reductions in forces since this involved a number of legal technicalities. Further, it was accepted that the resolution of the Council would be kept secret and need not be made the basis for a communiqué by NATO. It was felt that no

UK FORCES IN GERMANY

Following is text of draft resolution of the Council concerning UK forces in Germany, Begins:

The Council

(1) Took note of the proposals made to NATO jointly by the Federal Government of Germany and the UK Government with a view to the solution, through the application of the principles of Mutual Aid set out in Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, of the foreign exchange problem connected with the stationing of British forces in the Federal Republic of Germany in accordance with NATO plans.

(2) Took note of the statements made at the meeting of the Council on May 14, 1958 (C-R(58)35), in particular those made by the representatives of the Federal Republic of Germany and of the UK and by the Chairman as regards the implementation of these proposals.

(3) Took note also of the statements of some delegations who expressly reserved the position of their governments, should the implementation of the above proposals eventually prove to involve a reduction of the British forces stationed in Germany from 1959 onwards.

(4) Recognizes in this connection that any possible change after 1958 from the levels already agreed in WEU would be the subject of prior consultations in NATO, according to the normal procedures, and of decisions in WEU.

(5) Recommended that the Federal Government of Germany and the UK Government should put the proposed financial provisions into effect, with the co-operation of other member countries concerned as necessary.

(6) Recommended that every effort be made in good time with a view to finding the means for maintaining the present level of the British forces stationed in Germany after 1958. Text Ends.⁶⁰

CYPRUS

There have been two unsuccessful attempts at NATO mediation on the Cyprus question during 1957. An offer of good offices by Lord Ismay in March 1957⁶¹ failed due to Greece's rejection of his proposal to call a meeting of the parties involved. Mr. Spaak for his part was busy working behind the scenes from June 1957 on. Towards the end of the year, however, general elections in Turkey and the debate on Cyprus at the United Nations, caused him to postpone his initiatives indefinitely.

Little concrete progress has been achieved towards a solution of the Cyprus question in the last few months, although renewed efforts at negotiation with Greece and Turkey have been made by the United Kingdom. At the Twelfth Session of the General Assembly, Greece concentrated its efforts on obtaining a United Nations vote in favour of self-determination for Cyprus.⁶² The United Kingdom and Turkey, on the other hand, argued in favour of a fairly general resolution similar in character to that adopted at the Eleventh Session, which called for a resumption of negotiations. A late attempt to produce a compromise resolution omitting specific reference to self-determination, in which the Canadian delegation rather reluctantly took a part at United Kingdom urging, was unsuccessful. The debate remained inconclusive as the Greek resolution, recommending the application of the principle of self-determination failed to receive the required two-thirds majority in plenary session.

The NATO Council approved this resolution on May 21, 1958. In October 1958, the United Kingdom announced that it would maintain its forces in Germany at a level of 55,000 men throughout 1959 and absorb all foreign exchange costs to maintain these troops after the United States provided more funds to the British government through the Mutual Weapons Development Programme. On the occasion of the Baghdad Pact Ministerial Council Meeting, held in Ankara January 25-31, 1958, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd conferred on Cyprus with members of the Turkish Government. The Turks maintained that the Island should be partitioned as Turkey could not allow the Turkish Cypriots to be ruled by the Greek majority. They were strongly opposed to the course of action which had been considered during Sir Hugh Foot's discussions with United Kingdom Government and which envisaged the deferment of the exercise of self-determination for a fixed period of years, the introduction of self-government during the interim period, and the early lifting of the emergency in Cyprus itself. They indicated, however, that an arrangement which would provide for a Turkish base in Cyprus and some form of self-government which would fully satisfy their concern for the Turkish Community might prove acceptable.

In Athens Mr. Lloyd emphasized the dangers of communal strife in Cyprus and the probability that any further violence, whether on the part of EOKA or the Cypriot Turks, would make partition inevitable. He endeavoured to find out from the Greeks whether there would be room for a compromise on the basis that Cyprus should advance towards self-determination as a unitary state within a fixed number of years, provided that Turkey's strategic requirements were met by the introduction of a Turkish enclave at an appropriate stage in the constitutional development of the Island.

The Greeks considered that Treaty obligations combined with United Kingdom bases should satisfy Turkish security requirements, and they were opposed to any suggestion that the Turks might be given bases before the future of the Island was finally decided. The Greek position was officially still unqualified self-determination but they indicated that they would be prepared to consider a solution on the following lines, providing that they did not have to put it forward themselves; the Island should remain as a unit; after a short period of self-government it should be given independence within the Commonwealth, binding itself not to seek to change its international status for a further period of years; it should submit to obligations regarding minorities and also with regard to foreign policy and armaments; the change in status might be subject to a vote in the United Nations and the new state should become a member of NATO.

On the question of the procedure under which an attempt to a solution might be made the United Kingdom offer of a Tripartite Conference in London to discuss the future of Cyprus generally was still open; alternatively there might be a Conference on strategic questions only. The Greeks rejected both suggestions as they preferred bilateral conversations conducted by the United Kingdom Government with the Greek and Turkish Governments separately.

Throughout the discussions in both Ankara and Athens, Mr. Lloyd made clear that whatever happened the United Kingdom bases under United Kingdom sovereignty would remain in the Island. This was accepted by both Turkish and Greek Ministers.

The United Kingdom Government subsequently considered the implications of the Foreign Secretary's talks and decided that the United Kingdom should:

- (1) initiate further discussions with the Turkish Government to ascertain whether they would accept a compromise solution (that Cyprus should advance towards self-determination as a unitary state within a fixed number of years, provided that Turkey's strategic requirements were met by the introduction of a Turkish enclave) and to clarify their conception of the scope of a Turkish base in Cyprus.

- (2) on the assumption that there were to be a Turkish base and possibly a Greek one, in addition to the United Kingdom bases, prepare studies of possible constitutional development for the remainder of the Island territory.

At present, it does not appear that the United Kingdom Ministers have the intention of pursuing the Greek ideas concerning the political future of the Island. They feel that the difficulties involved in such a conditional Commonwealth solution would be obviously too great.

The United Kingdom, for some time, has been genuinely anxious to find almost any solution which would prove acceptable to all parties. The attitudes of the Turkish and Greek Governments are still, publicly at least, hardly reconcilable. However, both Governments seem to be equally anxious for an agreed solution which would not involve too much loss of face. Undoubtedly, it will be difficult for them to renounce the public positions they have taken on this and which are basically that Turkey requests partition and that Greece insists on self-determination through a plebiscite.

The present terms of reference of the United Kingdom in regard to the future of Cyprus do go a long way to meet Turkish security requirements. It might prove very difficult, however, to persuade the Greeks to agree to them since it would defer self-determination for a fixed number of years (perhaps ten), and would give Turkey an immediate foothold on the Island. On the other hand, they represent an important concession on the part of the United Kingdom Government in that they now have come to commit themselves firmly in favour of introduction of self-determination after a fixed period of time. Also, the present plan avoids at least the immediate danger of partition, which the Greeks do not want, and would mean the early lifting of the emergency restrictions which the Cypriots do not like.

The Canadian Government is anxious that a peaceful, just and, if possible, lasting solution be found to the problem of the future of Cyprus. Although Canada has no immediate interest in the Cyprus dispute, we have, as a member of the United Nations, the Commonwealth and NATO, a deep concern that a settlement acceptable to all parties concerned be reached. The Canadian Government does not consider that it is in a position to put forward concrete proposals; this must be left to the interested parties.

The attached letter from the United Kingdom High Commissioner was delivered to the Prime Minister today. Before it arrived, I was telephoned by the High Commissioner who said that he had sent the Prime Minister two copies of the letter and enclosure and indicated that he hoped that the second copy would be sent by the Prime Minister to Mr. Smith. I told the High Commissioner that I could not guarantee that the Prime Minister would in fact pass on the copy, but that I would keep an eye out for it. As it happened, the letter was delivered when I was with the Prime Minister. I pointed out that it would be necessary for the Department to prepare material for the discussion with Mr. Macmillan and subsequently for our representative to the North Atlantic Council. The Prime Minister readily agreed that a copy be shown to the Minister and to the Department.

Dear Prime Minister,

I have been asked by my Government to send you the text of a draft statement of policy about Cyprus which it is proposed to make to Parliament on the 17th June. The text of the statement is enclosed.

I have been asked to let you know that a full summary of the statement will be communicated to the Turkish and Greek Prime Ministers on the 10th or 11th June, together with a covering message from Mr. Macmillan. The message will be to the effect that the two Prime Ministers are being informed in advance of the announcement in the United Kingdom Parliament in order that they may have an opportunity to comment privately to the United Kingdom Government; that meanwhile they are asked to keep the communication secret; that even when the statement has been publicly announced it is hoped that they will abstain from public comment of a destructive character; and that after the debate in the United Kingdom Parliament Mr. Macmillan would be willing to meet the Greek and Turkish Prime Ministers, either separately or together, with a view to discussing and explaining the Plan and how it might best be put into operation.

The statement is also being shown to Mr. Dulles, who has been told that we greatly hope that he will give us his full support which we believe may make all the difference between success and failure of the Plan. Mr. Macmillan will be discussing the Plan with Mr. Dulles in Washington.

The United Kingdom Government intend to give a summary of the information contained in this letter and the Parliamentary statement to the Governments of certain N.A.T.O. countries on the afternoon of the 12th June. The United Kingdom Permanent Representative in Paris will no doubt discuss the matter thereafter with his colleagues as appropriate. The United Kingdom Government intend to instruct the United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council to explain our policy to the Council at its meeting on the 16th June. My Government hopes that when the Council meets they will feel able to express their Governments' support for our policy. Mr. Macmillan has asked me to let you know that he will wish to discuss the Plan with you during his visit to Ottawa. In these circumstances you may wish to withhold any instructions to Mr. Wilgress until you have had an opportunity for discussion with Mr. Macmillan.

Yours sincerely,

CYPRUS
DRAFT STATEMENT OF POLICY TO BE MADE TO UNITED KINGDOM PARLIAMENT
ON 17TH JUNE, 1958⁶³

Aims of Policy

The policy of Her Majesty's Government in Cyprus has had four main purposes:

- (a) to serve the best interests of all the people of the Island
- (b) to achieve a permanent settlement acceptable to the two communities in the Island, and to the Greek and Turkish Governments
- (c) to safeguard the British bases and installations in the Island which are necessary to enable the United Kingdom to carry out her international obligations
- (d) to strengthen peace and security and co-operation between the United Kingdom and her allies in a vital area.

2. These are the aims which Her Majesty's Government have consistently pursued and which have guided their efforts in recent months to find common ground on which an agreed settlement might be reached. It is deeply regretted that all attempts in this direction have hitherto proved unsuccessful.

3. In view of the disagreement between the Greek and Turkish Governments and between the two communities in Cyprus, and of the disastrous consequences for all concerned if violence and conflict continue, an obligation rests with the United Kingdom Government, as the sovereign power responsible for the administration of the Island and the well-being of its inhabitants, to give a firm and clear lead out of the present deadlock. They accordingly declare a new policy which represents an adventure in partnership — partnership between the communities in the Island and also between the Governments of the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey.

4. The following is an outline of the partnership plan:

The Plan

(i) Cyprus should enjoy the advantages of association not only with the United Kingdom and therefore with the British Commonwealth but also with Greece and Turkey.

(ii) Since the three Governments of the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey all have an interest in Cyprus, Her Majesty's Government will welcome the co-operation and participation of the two other Governments in a joint effort to achieve the peace, progress and prosperity of the Island.

(iii) The Greek and Turkish Governments will each be invited to appoint a representative to co-operate with the Governor in carrying out this policy.

(iv) The Island will have a system of representative government with each community exercising autonomy in its own communal affairs.

Prime Minister Macmillan issued this official statement in Parliament on 19 June 1958. See United Kingdom, House of Commons, Debates, 1957-58, Volume 589, pp. 1315-1318.

(v) In order to satisfy the desire of the Greek and Turkish Cypriots to be recognized as Greeks and Turks, Her Majesty's Government will welcome an arrangement which gives them Greek or Turkish nationality while enabling them to retain British nationality.

(vi) To allow time for the new principle of partnership to be fully worked out and brought into operation in the necessary atmosphere of stability, the international status of the Island will remain unchanged for seven years.

(vii) A system of representative government and communal autonomy will be worked out by consultation with representatives of the two communities and with the representatives of the Greek and Turkish Governments.

(viii) The essential provisions of the new constitution will be

(a) there will be a separate House of Representatives for each of the two communities and these Houses will have final legislative authority in communal affairs

(b) authority for internal administration other than communal affairs and internal security will be undertaken by a council presided over by the Governor and including representatives of the Greek and Turkish Governments and six elected Ministers drawn from the Houses of Representatives, four being Greek Cypriots and two Turkish Cypriots

(c) the Governor acting after consultation with the representatives of the Greek and the Turkish Governments will have reserve powers to ensure that the interests of both communities are protected

(d) external affairs, defence and internal security will be matters specifically reserved to the Governor acting after consultation with the representatives of the Greek and Turkish Governments

(e) the representatives of the Greek and Turkish Governments will have the right to require any legislation which they consider to be discriminatory to be reserved for consideration by an impartial tribunal.

(ix) If the full benefits of this policy are to be realized it is evident that violence must cease. Subject to this Her Majesty's Government intend to take progressive steps to relax the emergency regulations and eventually to end the state of emergency. This process would include the return of those Cypriots at present excluded from the Island under the emergency regulations.

(x) A policy based on these principles and proposals will give the people of the Island a specially favoured and protected status. Through representative institutions they will exercise authority in the management of the Island's internal affairs, and each community will control its own communal affairs. While the people of the Island enjoy these advantages friendly relations and practical co-operation between the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey will be maintained and strengthened as Cyprus becomes a symbol of co-operation instead of a cause of conflict between the three allied Governments.

The Future

5. Her Majesty's Government trust that this imaginative plan will be welcomed by all concerned in the spirit in which it is put forward and for their part they will bend all efforts to ensuring its success. Indeed if the Greek and Turkish Governments were willing to extend this experiment in partnership and co-operation, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared at the appropriate time to go further and, subject to the reservation to the United Kingdom of such bases and facilities as might be necessary for the discharge of her international obligations, to share the sovereignty of the Island with their Greek and Turkish allies as their contribution to a lasting settlement.

CYPRUS

Mr. Diefenbaker asked Mr. Macmillan to explain the new United Kingdom proposal for Cyprus. Mr. Macmillan said that after much careful thought the United Kingdom Government had decided to try to persuade the Greek and Turkish Governments to accept the "principle of partnership" as the basis of a settlement of the Cyprus question. The United Kingdom plan was an attempt to combine the maximum degree of internal self-government for the Island as a whole with arrangements for Greek and Turkish management of their own communal affairs. It envisaged a seven-year period at the end of which the United Kingdom would share its sovereignty of Cyprus with Greece and Turkey. Mr. Macmillan referred to this as a "tri-dominion." He agreed that there were no precedents for the deliberate creation of such an entity, but said that the United Kingdom Government was determined to work towards this objective because it seemed preferable to the alternatives respectively favoured by Greece and Turkey. He indicated that the United Kingdom Government had given consideration to the possibility of pulling out of Cyprus altogether but that they had discarded this idea because their "Baghdad Pact bases" would be jeopardized if the Greeks and the Turks were left to settle the issue between themselves.

Mr. Macmillan said, after referring to his advisers, that the initial reaction of the Greeks to a summary of the United Kingdom proposal had been "angry." Mr. Macmillan did not expect that the Turks would be attracted to it either since it fell so far short of partition. He had fully expected that the initial reaction would be bad, but the United Kingdom Government did not intend to be discouraged by this. They intended to put all their weight behind it. Mr. Macmillan had himself offered to go to Athens and Ankara if the Greek and Turkish Prime Ministers wished. (He later said that he had not yet had replies to the personal messages he had sent to the Greek and Turkish Prime Ministers). Mr. Macmillan added that the United Kingdom proposed to place the onus for the success of the plan on Greece and Turkey; by keeping the dispute going they were "closing their eyes to the realities" of the East-West struggle.

Mr. Diefenbaker asked what the United Kingdom would do if the United Kingdom proposal proved definitely unacceptable. Mr. Macmillan said that it would be better if both the Greeks and Turks turned it down than if one accepted it and the other rejected it. In general, Mr. Macmillan left the impression that the United Kingdom Government was staking almost everything on the new proposal and that it had no clear alternative in mind at this stage.

Sir Norman Brook then referred to the new timetable for the discussion of the United Kingdom proposal in the North Atlantic Council. Mr. Spaak would be convening tonight (June 12) an informal meeting of Council members less the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey. There would be a full Council meeting tomorrow, June 13, and this would be followed on Monday by a "final" meeting of the Council, and on Tuesday, June 17, by a public statement by Mr. Macmillan.

In reply to a question about the outcome which they would hope for from the consultations in NATO, Mr. Macmillan said that they would "appeal to everyone" for support in making the new proposal work. At another stage, in the same context, he said that they hoped for "a NATO blessing."

Mr. Smith wondered if Canada might give its support to the United Kingdom proposal in the NATO Council. Mr. Diefenbaker called the United Kingdom proposal "a new development in the art of compromise." It was a very involved plan, a novel suggestion which perhaps one needed to be fully familiar with local conditions to understand.

Mr. Léger wondered whether from the United Kingdom point of view it would be satisfactory if the Canadian representative in NATO recommended that the three countries concerned should negotiate on the basis of the new United Kingdom proposal. This would, as Mr. Macmillan knew, be consistent with the traditional Canadian position on such matters.

Mr. Macmillan did not answer directly but said that from the United Kingdom point of view it would be helpful if the NATO Council were to go on record in support of the United Kingdom proposal "as a great idealistic effort."

In reply to a question as to the position likely to be adopted by other NATO countries, Mr. Macmillan indicated that apart from the Greeks and the Turks, only the United States and Canada had been informed. Mr. Dulles had agreed to give it full diplomatic support.

Consideration of the Cyprus question in the NATO Council was among subjects discussed by ministers with Mr. Macmillan this morning. Your position in the Council tomorrow should be along the following lines.

2. We welcome the initiative taken by the United Kingdom government in providing a new basis for a settlement of the Cyprus issue. We consider that the UK has shown great ingenuity and very much hope that our two other NATO friends, i.e., Greece and Turkey, will be as forthcoming in response.

3. We realize that the solution of this question will require concessions by all parties directly concerned, but believe that it would be in the general interest of the Alliance that the UK proposal should not be rejected without the most serious consideration.

CYPRUS

At private meeting of Council June 13, UK representative outlined their new proposals which are known to you and which they intend making public Tuesday June 17. However, UK representative at end of Council meeting today indicated that if situation in Cyprus deteriorates seriously over weekend they may feel obliged to make their statement earlier than Tuesday.

2. UK representative emphasized to Council that UK continues to plan on basis of four policy objectives;

(1) Long standing UK responsibilities on island and their continuing attempts to meet legitimate interests of all its inhabitants and to play for its future well being.

(2) Any solution would have to be acceptable to UK, Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities, and to governments of Greece and Turkey.

(3) Need to safeguard military bases on island in which NATO is directly interested.

(4) Need to strengthen co-operation with UK allies in vital Mediterranean area.

Roberts then referred briefly to previous proposed solutions, [n]one of which have known common ground among above mentioned five parties directly concerned (UK, Greek and Turkish Cypriots, and governments of Greece and Turkey), and therefore UK felt obliged as the responsible authority to give firm and clear lead in present situation. Key note of UK proposals is proposed partnership among 5 parties in putting an end to present crisis, and in negotiating towards future final settlement. In answer to Turkish permanent representative, Roberts stressed again that UK proposals if accepted and successful would be in force for 7 years and subject to extension. Moreover, UK, subject to necessary reservation concerning status of military bases, would be prepared to consider "sharing sovereignty over the island with the 5 parties most immediately concerned" (see above). In conclusion Roberts emphasized gravity of Cyprus problem for the Alliance, both as regards relations between its members and as regards NATO's interest in the Island itself and stressed his government's wish to have NATO Council consider the problem in that context.

3. In conclusion Roberts said he did not repeat not expect the plan to appeal to all concerned nor was UK asking Council (or Greece and Turkey) for immediate comment. On the other hand he was instructed to ask Council, including Greece and Turkey, to consider the problem with respect to its importance for the Alliance, and in the meantime to discourage any acts or statements which would prejudice calm and objective study of UK proposals.

4. According to Greek representative, new British proposals would not repeat not be enthusiastically received in Athens but in view of gravity of situation Greek government would want to examine them carefully. Melas also undertook to transmit UK request regarding avoidance of provocation and expressed hope that UK would do all possible to safeguard life and property "in view of events in the past few days."

5. Turkish representative then launched into a long statement which he admitted was based on his own assessment of the situation as he had not repeat not yet had instructions from Ankara. He turned at once to the question of partition, pointing out that UK proposals made no repeat no reference to that possibility. Sarper then gave his opinion that partition has in fact taken place spontaneously since both Greek and Turkish Cypriots are moving to areas and villages where they are respectively in the majority. Re the principle of partition, he reaffirmed his governments support and their readiness to discuss details. Sarper referred to India, Ireland and Trieste as examples of successful partition. Finally, Sarper rejected Turkish responsibility for past or present violence on the island.

6. Re UK proposals specifically, Sarper asked whether further details would be available, and more particularly on how the Joint Council would work (majority or otherwise) and secondly, what the situation would be after first 7 years of application of plan. In replying Roberts emphasized (1) that present plan envisages continuing UK sovereignty and there is therefore no repeat no question of self determination during that period ("if self determination should ultimately apply, UK statement of December 19, 1956⁶⁵ would apply to both communities"); (2) Roberts repeated that, subject to the reservation regarding bases, the future of the island after 7 years would be open to discussion including the possibility of UK sharing sovereignty among the 5 parties already mentioned; (3) he also emphasized that he had no repeat no more details than outlined in the plan as transmitted to both the Greek and Turkish governments (and, he thought, also to all NATO governments during latter part of this week), which really tended to emphasize UK readiness to negotiate if their proposals were accepted in principle.

7. We spoke along the lines of your telegram under reference and Belgium, France, USA, Germany and Netherlands followed suit. In particular France and USA emphasized importance of problem to the Alliance. Majority of delegations also quite pointedly described UK proposals as imaginative and disinterested and therefore meriting full and careful study. French delegation indicated that they may have further specific comment when Council meets again p.m. Monday, June 16 to continue discussion and a number of delegations, including USA and Germany, emphasized their willingness to assist in any way possible in finding what USA described as an urgent and imperative solution.

8. In summing up, Spaak made a useful statement stressing that UK had brought this problem before NATO, and member governments are therefore obliged to do more than keep a polite silence. As a guide to further discussion to be held Monday, June 16, Spaak suggested that delegations consider following questions: (1) Do governments agree that UK action in bringing their proposals before NATO conforms to NATO procedures? (2) If so, governments might consider drawing attention of the parties concerned to their obligations under the UN and under North Atlantic Treaty to settle their problems peacefully; (3) Governments might indicate a readiness to assist in any way possible towards a solution of a problem with such grave implications for NATO; (4) Governments might also consider how best to assist in establishing the necessary calm atmosphere during which UK and other proposals might be given serious study. Referring to the situation as no repeat no longer amenable to reason and logic as far as the Cypriots are concerned, Spaak suggested that NATO might, for example, consider preparing a strong, positive statement asking governments concerned to exert themselves to re-establish peace and the cessation of violence since the latter will have no repeat no bearing on final solution. Spaak suggested that the statement might also include a reference to the necessity of compromise and perhaps also make a specific request that new UK proposals be studied carefully.

9. Spaak was careful to express appreciation to the UK for its presentation to Council and at the same time to express sympathy to Greece and Turkey. He requested the latter to take note of what appeared to be a fairly widely held opinion of impartial parties that UK plan is imaginative and disinterested. He also suggested that Greece and Turkey's acceptance of UK proposals as a basis for negotiation would be in fact a NATO position, and that the Secretary General and the North Atlantic Council would be ready to lend any assistance requested.

10. In conclusion Spaak emphasized again the need for NATO governments to formulate a positive position, for communication to the 3 governments, and delegations should therefore request instruction in time for Council meeting Monday afternoon June 16. In referring to his own tentative suggestions outlined above, Spaak also made an interesting observation to the effect that the internal affairs of member countries of this sort are of direct interest to NATO as a whole and should be considered by NATO countries in the light of their possible effect on the Alliance.

11. Action required: Please advise in time for Council meeting Monday June 16 (presently scheduled for 3 p.m. Paris time) any further comments you wish us to make, including your views on above proposals of Secretary General.

CYPRUS

This morning, in private meeting of Council that at times became heated, Turks in effect accepted Council's bid for a conference to discuss UK plan, but Greeks, for time being at least, rejected it. Best that could be done in circumstances was to agree (without committing parties concerned) that a conference should be convened as soon as preparations through diplomatic channels, perhaps including NATO representatives, indicated that it would be useful.

2. Sarper (Turkey) spoke first. He pointed out that only ultimate solution, as far as his government was concerned, was partition but he acknowledged that it was not repeat not incompatible with partnership. He went on to suggest that a conference of three Prime Ministers (Turkey, Greece and UK) should be convened as soon as possible with prospect that representatives of both communities in Cyprus join the conference "once negotiations enter a promising course." He felt that such a conference could be held without damaging publicity and in any case it would be better than the suspicions to which bilateral negotiations would give rise. As for UK plan, he could accept it as a conference document but not repeat not "as a document de base." This would leave Turkish and Greek governments free to submit their own papers as conference documents. He hoped that if a conference was to be convened, UK would not repeat not for time being disclose their plan.

3. Melas (Greece) then read (with what seemed to us some disappointment) his government's instructions. They were "unable to adopt UK plan as a basis of negotiations" but were willing to "discuss matter with UK through diplomatic channels," as could also Turkish government. When pressed he conceded that if the Turkish government wishes to discuss matter bilaterally with Greek government, he thought his government would be willing. Bilateral talks could be "used as a truce" and would be more discreet than a conference.

4. As for UK plan, he elaborated that Greek government felt the communal approach was too weighted in direction of partition, results of which the Greeks knew only too well. He then made some references to Armenian and other massacres which led Sarper to accuse him hotly of trying to turn Council's sympathies away from its one Moslem.

5. After further discussion, Spaak summed up, as reported in our opening paragraph, and was supported by entire Council though the three parties concerned did not repeat not comment. As several representatives said, NATO's prestige was now engaged in the effort of finding a solution. Sooner or later, Spaak pointed out, the five parties (i.e. including representative of both communities) would have to come to the conference table and there they would have to discuss UK plan, whatever other papers were also tabled. Both he and Greek representative strongly urged that Mr. Macmillan's statement this afternoon should stress the provisional nature of their proposed solution in an effort to get away from arguments about the future or final solution which would not repeat not be prejudiced by the régime proposed by the UK for the next seven years. Roberts agreed with this advice, adding that his government could only say for the period after the next seven years that they hoped to avoid partition and preserve a partnership among the three co-sovereign governments while maintaining the unity of the island.

6. Sarper's only reaction to this advice was to resist any impression of NATO pressure upon Turkey and to urge the most rapid progress towards a conference.

7. It was agreed that Mr. Macmillan could say that the general opinion of the Council was in favour of diplomatic talks to prepare a conference, and that in the meantime all public statements should be restrained. As UK representative pointed out, main debate in parliament in London will take place next week although Mr. Macmillan will speak this afternoon taking this morning's Council discussion into account, and wording the statement so as to avoid, as far as possible, adverse public reactions by Greek and Turkish governments.

CYPRUS

The UK will begin the implementation of their plan for Cyprus on October 1. This will include the acceptance of a Turkish Government representative in the person of the Consul General in Nicosia.

The Greeks have declined to associate themselves with the implementation of the UK plan, claiming that neither the Greek Government nor the Turkish Government have any place in the administration of the island.

Led by the Secretary General, NATO has been attempting to postpone the application of the UK plan or at least minimise the reactions in Greece to its implementation. It is believed in some sources, including the Greek, that the Greek Government may be forced to resign or even to withdraw from NATO. The US take this possibility seriously, the UK discount it.

While we are in general sympathetic to the UK plan as a demonstration of their desire to reach a satisfactory compromise, and you have conveyed this view to Mr. Macmillan, we are not so convinced that they are doing the right thing in insisting on the immediate implementation of their plan in the face of Greek opposition. Its virtue was that it was a compromise which would attract both Greece and Turkey. Since it has failed to attract the Greeks, largely because of the conspicuous association of the Turkish Government in the island's administration, the UK are abandoning their efforts to reach agreement and appear to be making common cause with the Turks to force the Greek hand by facing them with a fait accompli. The Greeks for their part have not abandoned their determination in this situation to pursue the question in the United Nations.

A conference within NATO also remains a possibility.

CYPRUS

Following for the Minister:

On urgent instructions from his government, the Turkish Ambassador called yesterday afternoon on Mr. Watkins in your absence to present the following request from the Turkish government:

(a) They urge that on the question of Cyprus the Canadian government should not give in to the "blackmail" of the Greek threat to leave NATO.

(b) They request the Canadian government to exert its influence on Greece to adopt a "better attitude" on the Cyprus question and in particular to make concessions at least comparable to those the Turks contend they have made.

(c) They would appreciate knowing before Friday's Council meeting what will be the position of the Canadian government on which instructions will be sent to Mr. Wilgress.

2. In making this request the Ambassador had been specifically authorized to explain in the most definite way that the Turkish government would not accept a new Conference of Three on any other basis than the discussion of the UK plan. They were not, repeat not, prepared to attend a conference which would discuss the Spaak plan.

3. The Turkish Ambassador reviewed the Cyprus case completely. In view of his evident agitation and his concern that his government's position had not been fully put before you, he was allowed to take what time he wanted. He took two hours. It is not necessary to review the traditional Turkish arguments, all of which he brought forward. He stressed throughout the Greek attempt to blackmail NATO by the threat of withdrawal from the Alliance and was not prepared to concede that this was a real possibility except as a most remote contingency. He made it abundantly clear by specific repetition that Turkey would insist on partition and he repeated that they would fight for partition, cost what it might. There is no room to doubt that in the Turkish judgement the implementation of the UK plan is the prelude to eventual partition. He spoke throughout of England and Turkey being on one side and Greece on the other. He made no reference to the Turkish abandonment of their rights to the island under the Treaty of Lausanne but based their claim for entitlement to participate in the island's administration on the UK offer and, more recently, on Roberts' statement in the NATO Council to the effect that they were entitled to participate. He speculated on the unlikelihood that in the UN Canada could adopt a position against the UK and Turkey in favour of Greece.

4. He developed the arguments in support of the Turkish claim that Cyprus is vital for their military security. He depended heavily on the assumption that Greece is on the brink of turning Communist and he took Greek hostility for granted. It was striking that throughout his long presentation he never acknowledged as a possibility Cypriot independence with suitable guarantees for the Turkish minority.

5. Perhaps the most disquieting thing about his presentation was the clear assumption that Turkey and the UK are now moving along the road which will lead to eventual partition and that the only role for the NATO Allies is to attempt to get Greece to accept this, for which Turkey is prepared to fight.

6. In this situation there is no reason to think that direct intervention by Canada on one side or the other would ease the way to agreement. I therefore suggest that Mr. Wilgress be instructed to continue to follow the line we have been taking: that the problem is essentially one for the Three Powers primarily concerned and that we should be prepared to co-operate, in company with our other NATO Allies, in assisting them in reaching agreement through consultations within the Alliance, to the extent that this would be helpful. Without approving in detail the Secretary General's recent initiative, I think we should support the spirit of his intervention which is consistent with the recommendation of the Committee of Three. We might also say that a new conference which could consider modifications to the UK plan, such as those proposed by the Secretary General, would appear to be sufficiently flexible to merit acceptance.

7. This telegram is being sent to our NATO delegation and if you agree with the recommendations would you please send an emergency telegram to Mr. Wilgress telling him so. I will then inform the Turkish Ambassador.

We are reporting in greater detail in a separate telegram† on Council discussion on October 13. In meantime we repeat below text of a further draft Council record which Spaak submitted at end of Council meeting. This draft Council record will be further discussed p.m. October 15 in hope of reaching agreement.

2. In summary you will note that draft procès verbal discussed October 7 has now been dropped because of strong objections to certain parts of it by both Greece and Turkey with which you are already familiar. On October 13, therefore, Spaak concentrated all his efforts on getting agreement to holding of conference by making its terms of reference as unobjectionable as possible, i.e. by including in draft Council record a short statement of each country's point of view regarding basis on which they would approach such a conference.

3. Unless we hear to contrary by October 15 we will be guided by your telegram S-400 of October 7.† However, you may wish to comment on last paragraph of new draft Council record. Suggestion is now that conference should take place on territory of a friendly and possibly allied 3rd party who might also supply a chairman for conference. Participation of other countries and particularly of an observer from NATO is in fact still open but trend is towards host country to the conference providing a chairman with possibility of a NATO observer.

4. Above report is necessarily brief and as mentioned we are reporting in a separate telegram regarding Council discussion October 13. A further point to be decided is whether or not repeat not new draft Council record should be made public, but you will note that it has been drafted with that in mind.

Text Begins: Council, in its examination of problem of Cyprus, heard statements from representatives of the countries directly interested. It took note: that governments of UK, Greece and Turkey accepted idea of calling a conference at an early date; and that these three governments looked with favour on presence at this conference of representatives of Greek and Turkish communities of the Island. It noted that, for purpose of this conference, UK government desired that its plan should be examined, and agreed that it could be defined or modified on any point on which agreement was reached at the conference: Greek government, for its part, desired that suggestions put forward by Secretary-General of NATO September 24 should be discussed. Finally, Turkish government asked that UK plan should be taken into consideration but agreed that any amendments could be put forward at conference, and moreover intends itself to present such amendments. The three governments are also in agreement that, apart from discussions proposed above (in regard to a temporary solution of the problem of Cyprus) the discussion of a final solution should also appear on agenda of the conference. Council notes that these points of view, though each containing its own particular elements, are neither contradictory nor irreconcilable. It therefore hopes that UK government will take initiative in calling a conference in the conditions indicated above, and suggests that this conference should take place on the territory of a friendly (and allied) third party which could lend assistance to the conduct of the conference (and with participation of an observer from NATO); and that it should be presided by a personality not repeat not a national of any of the countries directly interested and chosen by agreement between governments of those three countries. Text ends.

5. As indicated in above brief report phrases which have been left in brackets in text of course indicate questions which are to be further discussed.

We are gratified at the signs of progress in bringing the three points of view together so as to make it possible to arrange for another conference. Since we continue to take the view that decisions are for the Three, we have no specific additional instructions to offer. The following, however, is for your guidance in case the meeting develops in such a way that you consider a statement of our views would be pertinent and helpful.

2. The statements of the Turkish position, and to some extent of the Greeks', over the past weeks, have made it clear that while the UK plan was proposed without prejudice for the final settlement, each sought to move some way towards achieving a final solution consistent with their declared policy. In the face of this fact there might be something to be said for even a preliminary discussion of a final solution.

3. While there is no indication of what "friendly third party" might be in mind as the host country for the conference, we would prefer that Canada should not be considered.

4. We note that there is to be further discussion regarding the participation of an observer from NATO. This is something about which we do not feel strongly. If the parties concerned sought to have NATO associated in this way, we would see no objection. On the other hand, since NATO can be kept informed by the principals themselves, there would not appear to be any need to have a NATO observer — and indeed to press for one might suggest that NATO will otherwise not be kept informed.

CYPRUS

Since Council last met October 17, Spaak has been having intensive negotiations with UK, Greek and Turkish permanent representatives. Crux of problem has been participation of other NATO representatives in a Cyprus Conference. UK and Turkey had accepted addition of Spaak and an American but Greeks had been holding out for one other NATO member. Roberts had told us yesterday evening that Melas had asked him informally whether Canada (among other countries) would be acceptable to UK as an additional member. In replying, Roberts had simply questioned whether Canadian government would wish to be represented. We have had no repeat no direct approach from Greek delegation and in view of today's developments, question of our participation is unlikely to arise.

2. This morning October 22 Spaak reported to Council on deadlock reached (without mentioning names of any of the possible additional countries).

3. Roberts then introduced a new UK proposal which he described as extreme limit of their concessions. It was that the parties should agree to a conference on basis of October 13 Secretariat statement as conveyed by Spaak explanatory letter of October 17.† UK proposed to convene a conference in Paris of UK, Greece, Turkey and the Cyprus communities, with attendance of Secretary General to whom at a given moment UK would yield chair. Since in these circumstances conference would be held in "moral presence of NATO Council," there would be no repeat no need for other NATO countries to attend as observers. "at any moment," Roberts continued, "Secretary General will be able at his discretion to report to Council on proceedings of the Conference, or to convene a Plenary Session of Council to consider position reached. It would be invidious to pick out any NATO government to sit in on the Conference as an observer; moreover some governments have declared themselves unwilling."

4. Another long discussion followed. Sarper (Turkey) came back to amendments which his government would like to make in the October 13 agreed statement while Melas (Greece) was very doubtful that his government would be able to accept a conference on basis now proposed by UK.

5. Spaak at least pretended to be quite ready to throw in sponge and he read to Council a draft communiqué announcing failure of NATO's efforts to reach agreement. However, he added in strongest terms that he thought whole situation had become ridiculous. After urging Turkish government to drop its amendments; he explained to Melas why he thought Greek government should in its own interests accept UK proposal as "most generous and best they have ever offered." He even claimed that UK was virtually proposing that NATO Council take over Conference and he warned that impartial opinion would not repeat not consider Greece justified in refusing. Though UK proposal could have far reaching implications, we think Spaak was partly exaggerating for effect.

6. Although Sarper asked whether all members of the Council were prepared to accept responsibility for NATO implied by the UK proposal, there was no repeat no indication from today's discussion that any NATO government was likely to stand in way of what now seems the best hope for convening a conference. UK proposal was specifically supported by Italian, Netherlands, French and Belgian representatives, though the French indicated they would prefer to see Greece accept attendance by USA and Spaak.

7. Spaak will be away from Paris on visits to Brussels, Bonn and London during next few days but will see Sarper, Roberts and Melas before he goes tomorrow morning October 24. In meantime Sarper and Melas will have a chance to talk to their foreign ministers who are here for OEEC meeting. If agreement is reached on UK proposal, delegations will be notified by Secretariat and an early announcement can be expected if Greek answer is in the negative, Council will consider matter further October 29 when some announcement of failure might have to be made.

CYPRUS

At the request of the Turkish representative, Council met again this morning before Mr. Spaak left for Brussels. Although Sarper was able to report Turkish acceptance of the UK proposal of October 22 for a conference of the interested parties plus Spaak in Paris, the Greek representative said that he very much doubted whether his government, which would be meeting in Athens this afternoon, could accept this proposal to which both his Prime Minister and his Foreign Minister (who has returned to Athens this morning) are opposed.

2. With what Roberts obviously considered indecent haste, Spaak then came forward with an alternative compromise proposal in a further effort to meet the Greek position. As rephrased after Council discussion, this alternative to the UK proposal read as follows: "In addition the Council suggested that in order to lend their good offices to the participants in the Conference, a representative of the USA and the Secretary General assisted (as suggested in the Committee of Three Report) by one of the permanent representatives, should attend the Conference."

3. While he obviously could not repeat not say that his government would not repeat not accept this proposal, Roberts thought it would be very difficult for them to do so especially in view of the fact that Greece was rejecting the UK proposal before the Greek government had even met to consider it.

4. Whether by accident or design, the Greek representative put Mr. Spaak in the embarrassing position of having to admit he had given his "compromise" proposal to Mr. Averoff over the phone earlier today before the matter had been discussed in Council and in a form rather more favourable to the point of view of Greece. Roberts must now feel that Spaak has wilfully undercut the UK proposal for a more restricted conference, although it looks to us as if Spaak did so only after concluding from his talk with Mr. Averoff that the UK proposal would certainly not repeat not be accepted by Greece.

5. In an effort to make the "compromise" more acceptable to the UK, it was agreed this morning that the permanent representative who would be chosen by Mr. Spaak would at least nominally belong to the "NATO Delegation" rather than serving as the representative of his government (as Greece would prefer). In addition the compromise formula would apply to a conference in Brussels rather than Paris.

6. Roberts spoke of another alternative proposal which for the moment he is keeping up his sleeve until he has had the definite reply of the Greek government to the proposal he made yesterday.

7. The reference in the Spaak compromise proposal to the Committee of Three Report is to paragraph 7 which suggests that the Secretary General be empowered when exercising his good offices, to ask the assistance of no repeat no more than three permanent representatives chosen by him with the consent of the parties to the dispute.

8. Sarper said he would recommend the Spaak compromise to the Turkish government.

CYPRUS

This a.m.'s discussion of failure of NATO efforts to convene a Cyprus conference took several unexpected turns and led to disclosures regarding backstage negotiations with Mr. Spaak which probably none of three interested delegations had expected to emerge in light of Council. Putting together evidence available here, position would seem to be that Greek government has simply decided for its own internal as well as external reasons that it would prefer not repeat not to go to a conference in present circumstances. They will instead go ahead with their complaint in UN, where they think they can have more impact on public opinion than would be possible in a minority position at a NATO conference. As Melas told Spaak last Saturday, Greek government is convinced that a NATO conference would at present be bound to end in failure and that it would be better, both from their own point of view and from point of view of NATO interests in Greece, if they did not repeat not go ahead with such a conference.

2. Though this appears to be the actual position of Greek government, their public presentation of the matter will be rather different. Melas said in Council today that immediate reason for disagreement was enlargement of conference as proposed by Greece. UK and Turkey had refused this proposal. That was the end of the matter as far as Greece was concerned. They could not, repeat not, with dignity, go on bargaining forever.

3. UK and Turkish representatives in Council countered this argument by asserting that their governments had been prepared to meet Greece on question of composition. Roberts said that before they had known of Greek government's decision to break off negotiations for a conference, they had communicated to Mr. Spaak on Saturday a.m., UK acceptance of Mr. Spaak's alternative proposal of October 24, that in addition to the five parties concerned and Secretary General, there should be not repeat not only a USA observer but the Norwegian Permanent Representative Mr. Boyesen. This was specific proposal which Spaak had discussed with Mr. Averoff before latter left for Athens last week. Melas indicated that if his government had been able to consider this proposal on Friday as a solution acceptable to UK and Turkey, a different decision might have been taken. As it was Greek government had felt compelled to bring matters to a head and it was now too late to go back on their public announcement. When asked point blank by Spaak whether Greek government would consent to a conference at which USA, French and Italian governments were represented, Melas said that this would of course be acceptable to his government since it was their original proposal.

4. UK and Turkish representatives indicated that it was still possible for their governments to reconsider this proposal but Melas repeated that it was now too late.

5. In point of fact the only public reason which any of the three governments could give to explain failure of NATO's efforts is that agreement on composition of conference could not repeat not be reached; and when it is realized publicly that the two sides were very close even on this question, there will be a good deal of bewilderment (perhaps even in Greece and Cyprus) as to the real reasons for the failure.

6. Faced with this situation and imminent parliamentary debates at home, both Roberts and Sarper pressed for immediate publication of principal NATO documents. This was not repeat not opposed by Melas although he plainly felt that such action would be unhelpful to his own government and indirectly to standing of NATO in Greek opinion.

7. Although Roberts and Spaak suggested that principal documents be issued by Secretary General, this procedure was not repeat not acceptable to most of the Council who felt it would only serve to put one of the parties (Greece) in a bad light and would thereby make it more difficult for a Cyprus conference to be held once UN debate was out of the way. For similar reasons most of us resisted a NATO communiqué. Majority on both points was led by USA and Norwegian representatives. Roberts however strongly resisted what was clearly the wish of majority and said that his foreign minister might very well have to use the full texts in Parliament tomorrow. Since there was no repeat no disagreement among parties concerned, he did not repeat not see how the rest of us could object.

8. The rest of us did however point out that efforts had broken down not repeat not over the texts which were agreed apart from composition but really because Greeks had decided that at the moment they did not repeat not want a conference.

9. Finally it was agreed in each of our parliaments an effort would be made to "accentuate the positive" in pointing out that NATO efforts had already brought the parties much closer together than they had been and that the door was open for a conference at a later time. At this point however Melas indicated that the Greek government would prefer bilateral talks following the UN debate. This was in effect rejected by Roberts for the UK.

10. Within the next few days and in any case before UN debate on Cyprus takes place, we may therefore expect the three interested governments to make public the following texts: (a) the Spaak proposals of September 24; (b) the Council's revised procès verbal as it stood on October 23 and (c) the covering letter from Spaak to the three governments. The public can then draw their own conclusions fortunately without benefit of any superfluous comment from NATO as such.

11. In view of the outcome the Council has perhaps been wasting its time for past month but this verdict should we suggest be withheld until we see whether a Cyprus Conference will after all take place early next year. Anything that could be done through the wording of UN Assembly's resolution to facilitate this result would be worthwhile.⁶⁷ For in substance the three parties are now hard put to it to explain why they differ, at least on procedure for direct negotiations.

CYPRUS

I paid my first call on the Greek Permanent Representative on November 21. The discussion centred on Cyprus.

2. Mr. Melas believed that the Secretary General had played a useful role in trying to bring the parties more closely together and that on the whole discussions in Council had been helpful even if no real progress has been made. He had personally been in favour of a conference throughout and had so advised his government. He had come to the conclusion, however, that the Turks were opposed to any settlement at this stage and that the UK and the USA were unwilling to put the required amount of pressure on Ankara to bring them to a better understanding of the situation. He did not think that the discussions in the UN would be of any material assistance, although he agreed with me that possibly the best result of such discussions would be a resolution requesting the parties directly concerned to get together again. If this materialized and a conference was held, he thought that the chances of success were very slim. At present, in his view, the Turkish government is too weak internally to accept any reasonable compromise.

3. Mr. Melas agreed that London had shown some flexibility during the latter part of the negotiations, but added that the British could never regain in Greece the "immense prestige" that they had before the Cyprus issue became so acute. Unfortunately, he thought that of late the stock of the Western Powers in Greece had gone down, while the Communist bloc was gaining ground all the time. This did not lead him to the conclusion that the relations between Greece and NATO should be further weakened; on the contrary, in his view, they should be strengthened and in this respect he very much hoped that any solution to the Cyprus issue should have a NATO label.

4. In order to avoid some of the complications inherent in a situation partly based on the weakness of the Turkish government, Mr. Melas suggested that possibly, once the discussions in the UN were over secret negotiations might be held between the parties directly concerned; once enough progress had been made and a solution was in sight the matter could then be brought again before the Council so that at least part of the credit for a solution could be given to the Alliance.

CYPRUS

I met my colleague from Turkey and asked him whether anything new had developed on Cyprus front as a result of negotiations conducted by Foreign Ministers of UK, Greece and Turkey during Ministerial Meeting. Sarper replied that there was reason to be "cautiously optimistic." There seemed to be goodwill on part of all to find a way out of present impasse. Public opinion however was highly inflammable on this issue in Greece and Turkey and governments would have to be extremely cautious if new round of negotiations was to be fruitful.

2. I think we can infer from Sarper's remarks that Turks are gradually giving way on the idea of strict partition in geographical sense. He pointed out for example that it would be extremely difficult if not repeat not impossible to move people from one place to the other. What they now had in mind was what he called "intellectual partition." There would be no repeat no such thing as a "Turkish minority" in Cyprus but rather a "Turkish community" whose rights would be guaranteed like those of Greek community by the Three Powers and a treaty to be signed and registered with the UN. Sarper added that he could not repeat not go into much detail since these ideas were being discussed at this very moment in London, Ankara and Athens. When questioned as to role of NATO if any in such a solution he replied that if everything went well NATO need not repeat not concern itself with problem. In event of a new failure it was most likely that Council would be seized of the matter once more.

3. In conclusion Sarper said that in his own view "Le jeu de Chypre n'en vaut pas la chandelle" and that it was essential that some understanding be reached between his country and Greece on this issue in view of mounting tension created by the Soviet Bloc.

4. Sarper did not repeat not suggest that the 3 governments concerned were on verge of agreeing, even about procedure for negotiations, but his reference to NATO not repeat not needing to concern itself with problem is, I find, somewhat disturbing. There are certainly psychological advantages in giving any eventual solution a NATO label as Melas, Greek Permanent Representative, said to me November 21 (my telegram 2772 November 24).

LETTER FROM THE PRIME MINISTER TO GENERAL DE GAULLE

The accession of General de Gaulle to the premiership of the French Republic⁶⁸ has come at a time when our present Ambassador in Paris, Mr. Désy, is on sick leave prior to his retirement (on July 9)⁶⁹ and Mr. Dupuy, whose appointment to succeed Mr. Désy has been announced, is not due to reach Paris before September.

I feel, however, that the exceptional nature of the Gaullist régime, the uncertainties regarding its future policies and the rather special personal characteristics of the General himself warrant careful attention on our part to the possibilities for reinforcing our good relations with the French Government and with General de Gaulle.

In the past, and it must be recognized, when he had little expectancy of coming to power, General de Gaulle has expressed views on NATO and relations with the Soviet Union which, if they were to become French Government policy, would undermine the Alliance. Following an interview with de Gaulle on March 20 of this year, the British Ambassador, Sir Gladwyn Jebb, reported to the Foreign Office that "it seems obvious that if the General were ever in power he would adopt a policy of appeasement toward the Soviet Union and that this would be only too likely to result in the breakup of the present system of Alliances." The General expressed his view that a world war was "most improbable" and if the people of Western Europe were really convinced that this was so, they would, in the long run, simply refuse to make the enormous sacrifices which would be necessary to prepare for such a war. Hence, he thought NATO was doomed whatever the Russians did or said. He placed little importance on the introduction of IRBMs into Europe — feeling that these would be out of date in three years when ICBMs were introduced. He thought there would not be a war then since the Russians were becoming quite "embourgeoisés" and their offensive against the West would increasingly take the form of cold war and propaganda measures.

These views expressed in private conversation should not necessarily be taken as a philosophical foundation for a new French policy in NATO and vis-à-vis the Soviet Union, but they are of sufficient importance to warrant attention. General de Gaulle has explicitly indicated to Jebb — through General Billotte — that he would do everything to see that

Désy now back! [Sidney Smith]

NATO was used for the purpose of forming a common policy as between the USA, UK and France — notably as regards Afro-Asians and Africa. His cabinet includes such strong NATO supporters as Mollet, Pinay and de Murville who should serve as a modifying influence.

We would not envisage any immediate difficulties for NATO if only because other problems (North Africa, the Constitution) would have priority. Nor is it likely that France will question the fundamentals of the Alliance. What we may expect, however, is that difficulties may arise from de Gaulle's efforts to establish a more prominent place for France in the Alliance.

The situation is uncertain however and we therefore feel that special efforts should be made to establish intimate relations with General de Gaulle and his immediate advisors. Canada might have an important role to play in this connection in view of our special relationship with France as a result of our history and French speaking population.

With the foregoing in mind, I wonder whether you would consider suggesting to the Prime Minister that he send a letter of congratulation and good wishes to General de Gaulle. A draft letter† is attached. It includes an invitation to the General to visit Canada and places emphasis on the relationship of France to Canada and North America.

If you and the Prime Minister consider that such a letter should be sent, I would further suggest that you might wish to ask General Vanier, in the capacity of Ambassador Extraordinary, to deliver it. General Vanier, now in retirement, is a personal friend of General de Gaulle and has had close connections with him during and after the last war when he was accredited to the "Comité Français de la Libération Nationale" in London and later when he was Ambassador in Paris. While he was there, he won the respect and indeed affection of a large section of the French public.

For these reasons, I think General Vanier could be of considerable value to us in establishing close relations between the Canadian Government and the Gaullist régime. I have not, of course, got in touch with him, but I should think that he would agree to undertake a special mission. If so, it might have a profound effect both on de Gaulle and on the French public and provide a symbol for the special importance attached to the links between Canada and France. I am attaching an outline of instructions† which might be given to General Vanier.

The timing of this initiative is of some importance. There would be obvious advantages in delivering the letters as soon as possible. General Eisenhower has already sent a letter of congratulations. On the other hand, there might be some advantage in delaying an approach until General de Gaulle could reserve a reasonable amount of time for an interview with General Vanier. In any case, it would probably be inadvisable to delay too long. The precise timing would probably have to depend on the reaction we might have from General Vanier and on information which may be forthcoming regarding General de Gaulle.

I should be grateful for an indication of your wishes regarding these suggestions.⁷⁰

GENERAL DE GAULLE'S MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT

Over the last few days, both Herter and Caccia had mentioned to me privately an approach which General de Gaulle had made in the form of a personal letter to the President⁷¹ and to Prime Minister Macmillan in the last week of September outlining his views on the role of France in Allied Council's dealing with political and military strategy.

2. Today in discussion with McBride, Head of the Western European Office of the State Department, we were given the following information on a private basis on the background of this matter. Apparently although the French President's note was dated September 17, it was not repeat not delivered to Mr. Dulles by Alphand here until September 24. We understand that the letter from de Gaulle to the President dealt primarily with France's support for USA policy in the Far East, and indeed McBride described it as "an encomium" of the American position. To the letter was attached a three-page memorandum which in essence raised two main points: (1) a strong statement of the French claim to participation along with the USA and the UK in a political Standing Group to guide and coordinate the overall policies of the NATO Alliance; and (2) a statement of the French desire to participate together with the USA and the UK in military and strategic planning on a global basis. Herter had mentioned a special emphasis on Africa. Since the communication was in the form of a letter to the President, McBride could not repeat not show us the text, but he added that the memo, in addition to making these two points, implied that the French President envisaged formal and institutional changes in the structure of NATO arising out of the 10-year review to which reference is made in Article 12 of the Charter to incorporate these suggestions concerning the special role of the Three Powers. A similar communication was sent to the Prime Minister of the UK. McBride said they understood that a copy had been brought to Mr. Spaak's attention, and in some way or other (he did not repeat not attempt to identify responsibility, but our strong impression was that the Americans feel the leak came from NATO in Paris) word of the French proposals reached both the Italians and the Germans.

3. In the case of the Italians, the State Department has been receiving at various levels strong counter-statements of the Italian views which are in substance highly critical of the French proposals. The Germans are also understood to be opposed to the French proposals. Further, Mr. Spaak himself had taken strong exception to them, and we were told expressed himself as saying that their implementation in the manner proposed might mean the end of NATO.

See United States, Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS), 1958-1960, Volume VII, Part 2, Washington: Government Printing Office, 1993, pp. 81-83.

4. There has been no repeat no public reference in the press here to the de Gaulle proposals, but McBride told us that there had been a leak in the Italian Socialist Paper Il Popolo. The State Department, however, is anxious to keep any publicity about the proposals to the absolute minimum, and privately wish that the French had explored them with officials before outlining the proposals in a high level exchange between the two Presidents. So far as the Americans are concerned, McBride said that only an interim reply had been sent expressing appreciation for the views expressed relating to the Far East in the covering letter, and indicating that the proposals in the memorandum itself were far-reaching and would require very careful study. We received the impression that a fuller reply would not repeat not be forthcoming for some time, not repeat not only because the Secretary is just returning today from Duck Island, but also because the proposals are regarded as presenting very real difficulties. McBride said that essentially these proposals were not repeat not new. They had been made repeatedly during the era of M. Bidault. The new element was the strength with which they were advanced by the French President and the strong attitudes of resistance expressed on the part of other Europeans like the Germans and the Italians who had got wind of the proposals.

5. It was important, McBride thought, to avoid simply rejecting the proposal, although he agreed that it would be equally difficult to accept them. In view of our interest in the problem, he undertook to keep us in touch with State Department thinking on the reply as it develops.

Memorandum by High Commission of the United Kingdom

Ottawa, October 7, 1958

N.A.T.O.

General de Gaulle addressed to the Prime Minister on September 17th a letter and a memorandum, the texts of which are enclosed. A similar communication was addressed to President Eisenhower. General de Gaulle has given a copy to M. Spaak and its contents have become known to the German and Italian Governments.

2. Both the Prime Minister and President Eisenhower have sent an acknowledgment to General de Gaulle indicating that the memorandum raised such large issues that time would be required before a considered reply could be sent. The General's initiative will require most careful handling since the suggestion of a three power directorate, able to "take joint decisions on all political matters affecting world security," would be manifestly unacceptable to other members of N.A.T.O., and would be equally unacceptable to Commonwealth countries, the United Kingdom or the United States. On the other hand, the General has identified a very real problem.

3. The United Kingdom authorities are consulting with the Americans about the reply and had hoped that the question could have been dealt with in such a way as to impose the minimum strain on the North Atlantic Alliance. It now appears, however, that M. Spaak has been showing the memorandum to certain N.A.T.O. representatives in Paris, and that members of the Alliance as a whole are aware of the French initiative.

4. In general it seems to the United Kingdom Government to be in the interest of the N.A.T.O. Alliance that the matter should be handled with the greatest care. The United Kingdom Government will wish to avoid giving the General a straight rebuff and while they have not yet worked out in consultation with the Americans their line of reply, it seems desirable that the United States and United Kingdom authorities should, so far as possible, deal with the French authorities to start with, rather than let the proposals become at once a cause of unco-ordinated N.A.T.O. controversy. Later on, however, the whole subject might well have to be thrashed out in N.A.T.O., and this may well prove in the end to be the best way of handling it. The present feeling of the United Kingdom Government is that it may be necessary to agree to tripartite talks with the French; in that event the United Kingdom would attempt to persuade the French that their objectives will be better served by improving the functioning of N.A.T.O. rather than by dismantling the organisation.

Following is the text of the letter from General de Gaulle to the Prime Minister of September 17th and of the accompanying memorandum.

You will no doubt recall that at the time of our conversations in June, I underlined the importance attached by the French Government to some rearrangement of the general conditions governing the defence of the free world. I mentioned to you that we would be putting forward proposals on this subject.

Subsequent events have confirmed the French Government in their intention of setting out this problem in a manner appropriate to its scope. I have therefore instructed M. Chauvel to inform you of it personally on my behalf and to draw your attention more particularly to the attached memorandum which I am addressing also to President Eisenhower. I strongly hope that this document may form the subject of an early and thorough discussion between the three Governments.

I need hardly say how happy I would be to learn your personal views on a matter which so deeply affects the future of our two countries and of the whole free world.

Recent events in the Middle East and in the Straits of Formosa have gone to show that the present organisation of the Western Alliance no longer answers the essential security requirements of the free world as a whole. Risks are shared in common without there being any corresponding indispensable co-operation over decisions taken and responsibilities incurred. This prompts the French Government to draw certain conclusions and to make some proposals.

1. The Atlantic Alliance was conceived and functions in the context of a hypothetical area of operations which no longer corresponds to political and strategic realities. The world being what it is, an organisation such as N.A.T.O., limited in scope to the security of the North Atlantic, cannot be regarded as adequate to its objective in disregard of the immediate and direct interest to Europe of what is happening, for example in the Middle East or in Africa, and ignoring that indivisible French responsibilities extend to Africa, the Indian Ocean and the Pacific, just as do those of Great Britain and the United States. Another consideration is that the radius of ships and aircraft and the range of missiles have rendered such a narrow system militarily obsolete. It is true that it was thought at the outset that atomic armaments obviously of capital importance would for long remain the monopoly of the United States and that this might have appeared to justify on a world-wide scale the effective delegation to the Government in Washington of decisions about defence. But here again it must be recognized that this attitude is based on an assumption that is no longer valid.

2. The French Government does not consider that the security of the free world, or indeed of France itself, can be guaranteed by N.A.T.O. in its present form. In its view, political and strategic questions of world, as opposed to regional, importance should be entrusted to a new body consisting of the United States of America, Great Britain and France. This body should have the responsibility of taking joint decisions on all political matters affecting world security and of drawing up and if necessary putting into action strategic plans especially those involving the use of nuclear weapons. It should also be responsible for the organisation of the defence, where appropriate, of individual operational regions such as the Arctic, the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Indian Ocean. These regions could in turn be sub-divided if necessary.

3. The French Government regards such an organisation for security as indispensable. Henceforth the whole development of their present participation in N.A.T.O. is predicated on this. They would propose invoking the procedure for the revision of the North Atlantic Treaty provided for under Article 12, if that were necessary to achieve the desired result.

4. The French Government suggests that the questions raised in this note should form the subject of the earliest possible consultations between the United States, Great Britain and France. They propose that these consultations should take place in Washington and at the outset through the channel of the Embassies and of the Standing Group.

GENERAL DE GAULLE'S LETTER ON NATO

I took the attached papers⁷² to the Prime Minister on the evening of October 7. As Mr. Bryce may have mentioned to you, the Prime Minister reacted very strongly. He was, of course, concerned about the implications of General de Gaulle's letter and memorandum but what evidently worried him much more was that Mr. Macmillan had allowed almost three weeks to go by before informing him.

2. The Prime Minister said that he intended to call in the United Kingdom High Commissioner and express concern that in a matter of such importance to the United Kingdom and Canada alike, the United Kingdom had not taken the Canadian Government into its confidence until it was obvious that we should learn of it through NATO channels.

⁷² Voir le document précédent./See previous document.

3. The Prime Minister made few comments on the substance of the issue. He dismissed the French initiative as one which betrayed on the part of General de Gaulle a totally unrealistic assessment of France's power and influence in NATO affairs. He singled out for approval the first sentence of paragraph 2 of the French memorandum, ("The French Government does not consider that the security of the free world ... can be guaranteed by NATO in its present form."), but he went on to say that he disagreed entirely with the solution which the French proposed in the following sentences of the paragraph. The Prime Minister did not think, however, that the United States or the United Kingdom would need to be reminded of the impracticability of General de Gaulle's proposal, and the inference to be drawn from his comments was that we should rely on the United Kingdom and United States to deal with General de Gaulle rather than engage in loud protests ourselves about his proposal.

4. Referring to the probable reaction of the Federal German Republic, the Prime Minister said that General de Gaulle's proposal was certain to offend Chancellor Adenauer, more particularly since he and General de Gaulle had so recently had discussions which were described by both parties as being cordial and frank.

5. This morning the Prime Minister again referred to his irritation at being kept in the dark by Mr. Macmillan. He had not had time to call in Sir Saville Garner and wondered whether a more effective means of conveying his reaction might not be to send a message to Mr. Macmillan. At first he said that he would like the Department to prepare a draft of such a message, but later he modified this instruction somewhat and asked simply for our general views on the whole matter.

6. The Prime Minister will be returning to Ottawa at approximately lunch-time tomorrow, October 10, by which time I think he would like to have a memorandum containing departmental views. I suggest that this memorandum should not only deal with our views on substance, but should contain suggestions and, if necessary, a draft of what might be conveyed in a message from the Prime Minister to Mr. Macmillan, or orally to Sir Saville Garner.

7. I venture to suggest also that in formulating our recommendations on this subject we should have in mind the talks which the Prime Minister will be having in less than a month's time in London, Paris, and Bonn.

8. I should add a special word of warning to explain the security classification of this memorandum. The Prime Minister is most anxious that word of his reaction to this development, and of the consideration he is giving to sending a message to Mr. Macmillan, should on no account become public knowledge. His instructions to me on this point were most explicit and emphatic.

GENERAL DE GAULLE'S LETTER RE NATO⁷³

The recent communication from General de Gaulle to Prime Minister Macmillan and President Eisenhower reflects his strong dissatisfaction with the North Atlantic Alliance in the context of modern developments and the global commitments of its larger members. In the process he may have diagnosed a weakness of NATO, but his remedy is surely lethal for the patient, and hardly new. The concept of a Three-Power directorate to take joint decisions on all political matters affecting world security and for drawing up and, if necessary, putting into action strategic plans, especially those involving the use of nuclear weapons, revives in a different form an old French idea which involved the establishment of a restricted combined Chiefs of Staff Committee with extensive authority. This idea and a similar German scheme for a political standing group in NATO were never seriously considered.

Views similar to those of the French leader were expressed recently by Field Marshal Montgomery. In a farewell address to the Council he stressed the need to revise the NATO structure to enable it to cope with the global problems; there was an urgent requirement for common policies between the group of nations with a parochial outlook and those with world-wide interests and for new strategic planning on a global basis. He stated that the NATO command structure was highly inefficient and not capable of directing a modern war.

The evidence suggests that prestige is a major factor motivating General de Gaulle's initiative, in the same way that prestige goes a long way towards explaining the French attitude respecting nuclear tests. This striving for recognition as a member of the "Big Power Club" undoubtedly reflects a distorted assessment of France's position and influence in world affairs but nevertheless it exists. The General seems obsessed with a desire to regain for France under the 5th Republic, the full glory of years long past. It is also probably his hope that "joint decisions on all political matters affecting world security" would in practice mean United States and United Kingdom support for French policies in North Africa and other areas where France has urgent problems.

From reports we have received from Washington it appears that General de Gaulle conveyed similar ideas orally to Mr. Dulles as long ago as last July. The Secretary of State is not prepared even to consider the French suggestion of a political standing group. While he is prepared to admit that there are many subjects on which close consultation between the three larger powers is desirable, any formal arrangement covering all subjects would obviously be unacceptable to most of the members of NATO. According to information reaching Mr. Wilgress through the German Permanent Representative, Chancellor Adenauer was "very put out" when he learned of de Gaulle's proposals and he has written to the French leader expressing his concern and indicating that the carrying out of such proposals would never be acceptable to German public opinion.

On the basis of the information supplied by Earncliffe, the United Kingdom view is that the control concept of a three-power directorate with wide powers "would be manifestly unacceptable to other members of NATO and would be equally unacceptable to Commonwealth countries, the United Kingdom or the United States." On the other hand, they recognize that the General "has identified a very real problem." Their objective is to avoid giving the General a straight rebuff and, at the same time, deal with the matter in a way which would minimize the strain on NATO.

To achieve this objective they are planning to consult with the United States with a view to preparing their replies and to lay the groundwork for later tripartite discussions. They propose to deal initially with the French authorities in an effort to avoid letting the matter become a centre of an uncoordinated controversy in NATO. However, they have indicated that the matter may well have to be thrashed out later in NATO and that, in the long run, this may be the best way of handling it. We have no reason to believe that the United States authorities are planning a different approach in this respect. Mr. Dulles has indicated that he is in no hurry to reply and that he is hopeful officials in the Quai d'Orsay can be instrumental in convincing the General of the inherent difficulties in the way of implementing his plan and thereby make it less necessary for other governments to comment critically.

During your discussion with Sir Saville Garner you may wish to take the following line.

The procedure which the United Kingdom authorities have in mind seems sensible, particularly since it is designed to avoid uncoordinated debate in NATO on a proposal which in its present form reflects primarily a disagreement between the three larger powers.

Since there appears to have been some delay in forwarding the proposal to the United States Secretary of State, it might be interesting to know approximately when the communication dated September 17th was received by the Foreign Office or Mr. Macmillan. (Earncliffe have not been able to enlighten us on this score but they undertook to find out; Sir Saville will probably have the answer.)

As a substantive proposal our preliminary reaction is that the French plan is unacceptable to Canada for the following reasons:

(1) It suggests that the middle and smaller powers of the Western Alliance, which also have commitments and responsibilities, should have little or no say in the direction of the policies and plans of the Alliance;

(2) If presented within NATO in its present form the resulting debate would be acrimonious, uncoordinated and disruptive;

(3) It would have a particularly damaging effect upon the uncommitted countries which might interpret such a move as an impingement upon certain areas in which they claim a direct interest and would probably reinforce the misgivings they have often expressed about the militaristic tendencies of the Atlantic Alliance.

Clearly the General's initiative contains highly objectionable features. It is, in our view, the primary responsibility of the United States and the United Kingdom to dissuade him from pressing it and to attempt to extract any positive aspect from the proposal. We are wondering, in this connection, whether there might not be some advantage in recognizing that, in part, the question of political consultation appears to be directly involved. More precisely it seems to relate to the problem of consultation on matters which lie primarily outside the NATO area. In the past two years many of these matters have been discussed in the NATO context and the range and frequency of such consultations have increased. However, in the light of the General's intense dissatisfaction, it is for consideration whether the time is not ripe for a re-examination within NATO of the whole concept of political consultation with a view to identifying weaknesses and, where appropriate, suggesting means of improvement. The Canadian authorities would be prepared to explore in NATO the various aspects of political consultation at an early date.

You will appreciate that the views expressed above represent the Department's thinking. Although the incoming telegrams have been referred to the Department of National Defence on a limited basis, we have not yet received their comments on the de Gaulle proposal. Our inclination is to prepare a combined political-military assessment if it is clear that the French intend to press the matter in its present form.

GENERAL DE GAULLE'S MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT

This afternoon we were given some further information on this matter by Dale, the Acting Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs in the State Department.

2. As you will be aware, the initial reply⁷⁴ to Premier de Gaulle consisted of little more than a routine acknowledgment accompanied by an indication that the subject was a complex one requiring a considerable amount of study.

3. According to Dale, a further communication has now been sent⁷⁵ to de Gaulle and apparently was delivered to him yesterday or today. This communication was also of an interim character although it went a good deal further than the first reply.

4. In this new message, the USA authorities express their agreement with de Gaulle's view that the threat is a global one. They also agree that there should be adequate arrangements for dealing with this threat wherever it might arise.

⁷⁵ Voir ministère des Affaires étrangères, Documents diplomatiques français, 1958, Tome II, Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1993, pp. 560 à 561.

See FRUS, 1958-1960, Volume VII, Part 2, pp. 108-109.

5. On the question of political consultation in NATO, the USA reply notes the progress which has been made in this field over the past few years and particularly in recent months when useful discussions have been held on situations outside the NATO area such as those in the Mid East and in the Far East. The USA authorities have also found the consultations in NATO valuable in concerting policies with respect to the Soviet Union on a variety of matters. While improvements should undoubtedly be sought in the methods of consultation, the USA authorities are convinced that it would be unwise to resort to devices (such as the rather exclusive arrangement proposed by de Gaulle) which would "weaken the bonds which have been developed among all repeat all NATO members."

6. Regarding military arrangements, the USA authorities do not repeat not favour a change which would lessen the sense of participation by countries which considered their interests (and their forces) to be involved. (In this connection Dale remarked that there seemed to be no repeat no inclination on the USA side to regard the Standing Group as an appropriate or acceptable "Directorate" for even military "cooperation" on a world wide basis. He personally had the impression that during the recent past the Standing Group had declined in importance in relation to the Military Committee, even for activities confined to the NATO area.)

7. On de Gaulle's suggestion for an extension of the geographical area covered by the North Atlantic Treaty, the USA reply is rather negative. It points out that the extension of the area to encompass, for example, such regions as North Africa and the Mid East would create extremely serious difficulties for some of the present members of NATO (Dale mentioned particularly the Scandinavians).

8. Generally the USA reply notes that while certain kinds of changes in either the civil or military fields might be unsatisfactory and might be objectionable to many NATO countries the USA authorities agree that the NATO organization should be capable of "adapting itself to changing circumstances." The nature of the adaptations which might be required is a subject which the USA would be prepared to join in exploring "through appropriate channels."

9. After giving us this outline, Dale observed that, as we had no doubt noticed, Secretary Dulles was using the occasion of this exchange of correspondence with de Gaulle to revive ideas which the Secretary had aired at several times in the past about the need for some "reorganization of the Western world." The Secretary's thoughts on this matter had been discussed at some length during Prime Minister Macmillan's visit and had lain behind the proposals which had then been made for a meeting of the Heads of NATO Governments. These ideas had not repeat not been carried much further at or following the Heads of Government Meeting which subsequently took place last December. Dale thought Secretary Dulles was not repeat not displeased that the correspondence with de Gaulle should provide an opportunity for re-examining the possibilities in an appropriate (but unspecified) forum. The willingness of the USA authorities to explore such changes as might be desirable and practicable in Western organization made it possible for them in effect to turn down some of de Gaulle's more extreme views in a manner which they hoped would be regarded as constructive and not repeat not offensive. They were most anxious not repeat not to give offence to de Gaulle in the present situation.

10. Dale remarked that they had very much in mind the imminent visit of Prime Minister Diefenbaker to Paris and they would keep us informed on any further developments in their thinking which it might be useful for Mr. Diefenbaker to know about before his conversations there, even though this particular subject might not repeat not come up specifically in those talks.

Dear Mr. Smith,

You will remember that we had a talk the other day about General de Gaulle's letter addressed to Mr. Macmillan about N.A.T.O. I passed on your comments to my Government who were most grateful for them.

I have now been asked to let you know that Mr. Macmillan has sent a reply to General de Gaulle's letter. This was handed to the General on the 21st October by the United Kingdom Ambassador in Paris and I enclose a copy herewith.

The United Kingdom Ambassador, acting on instructions, re-assured General de Gaulle that we were in favour of the proposed tripartite talks at Ambassadorial level, provided they were organised so as to cause the minimum embarrassment to our allies and were calculated to produce the best results.

The Ambassador also urged on General de Gaulle the wisdom of acting on a suggestion by Mr. Dulles that any tripartite conversations of the kind envisaged by the General should (to allay American anxieties over possible repercussions within N.A.T.O. of the General's original memorandum) be conducted on the basis of a fresh initiative in the form of letters to the United States Secretary of State and to the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary from the French Foreign Minister proposing talks on the subjects raised by General de Gaulle.

I have been asked to let you know that we are not letting M. Spaak or the German or Italian Governments see the text of Mr. Macmillan's letter though they will be told its general line.

Yours sincerely,
J.J.S. GARNER

TEXT OF REPLY FROM MR. MACMILLAN
TO GENERAL DE GAULLE'S LETTER OF SEPTEMBER 17TH

I was most grateful for the message you sent me just before my visit to Bonn, saying that you had no objection to the views which you had set out to President Eisenhower and myself about the organization of the defence of the free world being touched upon in the course of my conversation with Dr. Adenauer. I found that the Chancellor was already informed of your views in a general way and your message therefore made it possible for us to have a discussion about them. I pointed out to him that you had drawn our special attention to one of the main problems which now faced the West as being that of co-ordinating resistance to Communism on a world wide scale. The Chancellor quite agreed with this but I should not conceal from you that he did not like the actual solutions you had in mind.

2. For my part I am sure that you are right in saying that as things are at present some of the individual members of the alliance can be exposed to risks resulting from decisions which they themselves have had no share in taking. I also think that you are right to draw attention to the fact that the responsibilities of some members of the alliance are not confined to the geographical area which happens to be described in the N.A.T.O. Treaty. They are in fact world wide. These are certainly matters which should be looked into. But I think it as well that in considering these problems we should recognize at the outset that because of the difference between French and British traditions of thought we are likely to approach them from rather different points of view. You feel that there should be institutional changes in the alliance. Of course this would have the advantage of order and consistency. But as you well remember we are apt to be empiricists by nature, perhaps too much so. We would be inclined to look for a solution which could be developed from what already exists and which could most easily be made to work in practice. I think we must try and reconcile these differences of approach.

3. Meanwhile I think that it might be useful if I were to indicate one or two of the points in your memorandum upon which we would like to have some clarification. You advocate the creation of a new body consisting of the United States, United Kingdom and France to which political and strategic questions of world importance would be entrusted, and which would have the responsibility of taking joint decisions, it is not clear to me whether or not it would be your intention that this body should operate by unanimity, in other words whether each member of it would have the right of veto over the decision of each other member on matters affecting world security. Secondly I am not clear whether it is your idea that it should replace some of the present functions of N.A.T.O., or whether N.A.T.O. would continue in a subordinate role alongside other regional organizations covering other parts of the world. You will, of course, be aware that the political discussion in the Council of N.A.T.O. do in fact already range far and wide beyond the confines of the N.A.T.O. area, and although I would not suggest that the procedure is entirely satisfactory the problems of the Middle East and of the Far East have all been brought up and debated in the Council within the last few months.

4. I am certainly indebted to you for calling attention to these problems which face the alliance. Without doubt they need resolving. I do not think that we can hope to do so in a great hurry, but I agree that we should consider ways and means of doing so.

Paris, October 23, 1958

SECRET. OPIMMEDIATE.

Reference: Letter of General de Gaulle to President Eisenhower and Premier Macmillan.

For Under-Secretary from Dupuy.

In course of recent conversation with Joxe (Secretary General) at Quai I referred to rumour from Italian source about a letter having been sent by General de Gaulle to Washington and London. He said he had intentions of talking to me about it and then read most of its text before making following comments.

2. [Group corrupt] of France is first of all European. General de Gaulle is convinced that France must go as far as possible in its cooperation with other European nations in the financial economic political and military fields. This includes production of common armaments with the only exception of nuclear weapons.

3. In military field General de Gaulle considers that NATO has fulfilled its main purpose in preventing a Soviet aggression against Western Europe but that it is no longer adapted to meet global menace now developing in other parts of the world. In other words he fears that the "Western Maginot Line" as he calls it might be by-passed through Soviet initiatives in Asia and Africa, and that unless a Western co-ordinated defence be organized to cope with this increasing pressure the Western world is bound to lose in the long run.

4. I interrupted to say that this analysis of the world situation coincided almost word for word with that of Marshal Montgomery who for many years had been concluding to the necessity of a master plan covering the whole planet. Joxe agreed that General de Gaulle's assessment was also essentially military but his recommendations were more fluid in the sense that he would be satisfied at least at this stage with a political Standing Group composed of USA, UK, and France, because of their world commitments, that would be entrusted with mission of studying conditions and developments outside NATO area, and report to their NATO partners. This larger scope of the big Three would involve a revision of NATO statute in order to adapt it to these new circumstances.

5. Before mentioning this question of revision, Joxe became hesitant as if he were himself unhappy about it or echoing the resistance of own department. He explained after, as if giving an excuse: "You know the General. He likes to provoke a 'choc'." As far as he was concerned Joxe did not repeat not seem to approve at all of this method. He said that in course of his conversation with Mr. Dulles and Mr. Macmillan, General de Gaulle had already referred to necessity of coordinated policy on a world scale. There must therefore have been less surprise in Washington and London. In any case Joxe did not repeat not expect an early reply.

6. I recalled that in the past USA had been rather reluctant to let other nations partake in world responsibilities less because they insisted on monopoly than because it was felt that except UK no repeat no other nation had the means of assuming larger commitments outside NATO zone. Joxe commented that this would be no repeat no longer true when France would be producing nuclear weapons. I found this remark of particular interest since it shows that the General is trying to cash in anticipation on credit his country will obtain if and when it is able to produce the A or H bomb. Therefore his initiative could be interpreted more as a preliminary sounding than a proposal requiring immediate and lasting decisions, since France is not repeat not strong enough to intervene on a big scale in Far or Mid East.

7. However, this does not repeat not mean that General de Gaulle's move does not repeat not require delicate diplomatic handling if complications are to be avoided at a later stage. The importance of consultations on a global scale is obvious enough and therefore the question of associating France more closely to such consultations is worth considering in order to give the General some sort of satisfaction. The danger lies less in consultations themselves that could take place on an informal basis through diplomatic channels or otherwise than in new framework suggested by the General. If one remembers the hesitation and reluctance of certain NATO partners when it came to admitting Greece and particularly Turkey into the Alliance, one can easily imagine that setting up a special Standing Group covering world problems and a revision of North Atlantic Treaty might shake the organization to its very foundations.

8. Joxe said that Germany and Italy had managed to obtain a copy of memorandum through NATO and has since been bombarding the Quai with questions. To such an extent that M. Couve de Murville had called in German and Italian ambassadors in order to give them explanations that might quieten down their government but Joxe was unable to tell me whether his minister had been successful or not.

9. In course of our conversation Joxe repeated several times that information he was giving me was meant for my personal consumption, which led me to think that he was talking to me on his own responsibility without wishing his name mentioned in my reporting to you. May I therefore recommend that circulation of this telegram be limited as much as possible in order to avoid revealing my source.

GENERAL DE GAULLE AND NATO

By way of supplementing the background notes in Mr. Robinson's possession we are outlining below a few additional comments on General de Gaulle's initiative which may be useful to the Prime Minister during his conversation with Mr. Macmillan.⁷⁶

2. Although the evidence suggests prestige may be a major factor motivating the General's proposal and his solution undoubtedly reflects an unreal assessment of his country's present position and influence in world affairs, we can perhaps welcome his initiative insofar as it concentrates attention on a problem which has plagued the Alliance since its inception and which will not be solved because it is shelved.

3. While we are prepared to admit the logic of the General's analysis of the difficulties facing the West in any attempt to co-ordinate resistance to Communism on a world-wide scale, we are inclined to the view that he is laying the blame on NATO for its inability to meet a situation with which it was never intended it should deal. In a sense his general thesis challenges the idea of NATO as a regional defensive grouping of more or less like-mind ed countries trying to make themselves into something that could be called a community.

4. It should be recalled that when the North Atlantic Treaty was drafted care was taken to explain its special nature as a regional defensive Alliance under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. An extension of NATO's scope into a global commitment would strain the compatibility of NATO and the United Nations Charter, leaving aside the question of the willingness of all members to remain in a broadened organization. In this respect we can perhaps derive some satisfaction from the reference in Mr. Macmillan's reply of October 21 to the traditional British preference for an empirical over an institutional solution.

5. It seems apparent the French leader either overlooked or minimized the extent to which his solution would be unacceptable to Canada and the other members of NATO. In the light of the evident dissatisfaction of many smaller NATO members with policies pursued by their larger partners in the Middle East and with the obvious lack of consultation it is indeed unrealistic to expect them not to react sharply to a suggestion that the big Three should exercise overriding authority with respect to the plans and policies of the Western Alliance.

6. If we agree that the major and urgent problem of the years ahead is to find a peaceful settlement with the Soviet Bloc on many issues, the type of omnipotent triumvirate envisaged by de Gaulle could well inspire greater suspicion of Western intentions on the part of the USSR and so make reasonable accommodations harder and not easier to reach.

7. In the eyes of many uncommitted countries, including important members of the Commonwealth, a reorganization of the Western Alliance as proposed by de Gaulle would probably be regarded as an attempt to impinge upon areas in which they have a direct interest. To this extent it would be particularly repugnant to Canada bearing in mind the role we like to play in the Commonwealth. In addition it might well serve to reinforce the misgivings of such countries about the militaristic tendencies of the Atlantic Alliance.

8. In the light of these and other objections which can be registered you may also wish to express your agreement with the careful manner in which Mr. Macmillan's reply rejects gently de Gaulle's solution while raising questions designed to spin out the exchange and to avoid having it raised in the NATO forum in its present form. At the same time the UK reply does not, in our view, reflect adequately the extent to which the General's solution is manifestly unacceptable to Canada and other members.

9. Now that his proposal has become public knowledge it may well be unrealistic to expect that it can be forgotten and a more acceptable proposal substituted, as the US and UK appear to have planned. Moreover, because of their evident interest in retaining a cordial relationship with the General (an interest which we share), the US and the UK may be reluctant to exert much pressure on him. In the circumstances you may wish to advise Mr. Macmillan that you intend to take up during your conversation with General de Gaulle some of the reasons why we can see serious objections to the solution he has in mind. You could underline as Mr. Spaak has done, the serious repercussions which would flow from a formal French attempt to press their proposal in the present form in the NATO context. At the same time you could indicate that the French initiative points to the need for a careful re-examination of the whole process of political consultation in the light of recent developments in order to examine its weaknesses and to recommend improvements. Canadian policy has consistently been designed to encourage regular and effective consultation in NATO as a means of giving substance to the concept of an Atlantic community. We have recognized however that such consultations are only possible and effective to the extent that those members of the Alliance with world-wide commitments or which are most directly concerned with specific problems are prepared to strengthen political cooperation on them in the NATO context.

10. We have our doubts about Mr. Spaak's constant efforts to establish common NATO policies, or the enunciation of a NATO position on issues arising outside the NATO area. In addition we are disturbed that he considers he has a mandate to develop links with other regional alliances possibly leading to a coordination of the policies of regional alliances. It was of course not intended at the outset that NATO should be directly involved in commitments or responsibilities outside the area covered by the treaty. We must however recognize the extent to which all NATO nations are now exposed to risks as a result of actions taken by one or more of them. We all have an interest in the policies pursued by our NATO partners, in particular the more powerful. There is therefore, it seems to us, a clear obligation on the part of the major powers to keep their partners better informed as to their thinking on major issues. However, it is for consideration whether NATO consultation on problems outside the Atlantic community should not repeat not be primarily for the purpose of keeping all members of the Alliance fully apprised of the considerations which are being taken into account in the formulation of individual members' policies, and should not be regarded as necessarily leading to the formulation of a common NATO policy with respect to specific problems.

11. It would seem to us best to recognize that the sense of community within the Alliance has not repeat not developed to the point where the major powers are prepared to subject their plans and policies regarding issues outside the Alliance to their NATO partners for modification and approval, particularly when vital national interests are at stake. However, consultation within NATO in the early stages of national consideration of problems requiring a national policy would permit governments to take into account the views of their NATO partners and so shape their policies as to command the greatest possible degree of support in NATO.

12. The above represent a few additional thoughts which the Prime Minister may wish to keep in mind during his talks with Mr. Macmillan and possibly later with General de Gaulle. We might emphasize that the points we have made in connection with political consultation (paragraphs 10 and 11) are not intended as definitive formulas but rather as talking points on which an exchange of views might be useful.

PRIME MINISTER'S TOUR: TALKS WITH GENERAL DE GAULLE

On the assumption that Joxe carries out his promise to give us the text of the de Gaulle memorandum to Eisenhower and Macmillan, and in the light of the obvious seriousness of possible developments, I believe it would be desirable if the Prime Minister raised the question of the future of NATO and France's relationship to it with de Gaulle, even if the General does not repeat not do so. I am not repeat not making this suggestion merely because Joxe has in fact invited the Prime Minister to do so, in support of the opposition of the Quai d'Orsay to de Gaulle's proposals, but because this may be the only opportunity for some time for us to speak to de Gaulle on equal terms. De Gaulle's remarks to Jebb may have been made in a fit of temper, but be that as it may there is an obvious latent tendency for de Gaulle to play his own hand without the assistance of his allies. Adenauer has already been very forthright and to the point with Joxe and I believe there would be merit if the Prime Minister saw fit to be equally forthright during the forthcoming talks.

2. I have consulted with our NATO delegation and the following suggestions are put forward for your consideration as to the line the Prime Minister might take.

(a) In the first place de Gaulle and the Prime Minister would probably not repeat not be meeting at all had NATO not repeat not been brought into existence and functioned with such a relative measure of success, whatever the defects of an alliance of this size must be.

(b) We have recognized the imperfections of NATO and have always believed it right and proper that the UK, the US and France should consult privately on matters of mutual interest. These matters have quite naturally normally been of global scope. Such private arrangements have not repeat not, however, in our view, in any way relieved the Great Western Powers of their duty to consult with the members of the NATO Alliance in the NATO Council. Canada, however, could not repeat not accept decisions made by one, two or three of the Great Powers which affected NATO without prior consultation. In short we could not repeat not accept the notion of a political standing group which would have in effect the direction of the political strategy of the West without wider consultation. The NATO area was admittedly confined, but to widen the area of its responsibility would only lead to the withdrawal into neutrality of a number of the middle and smaller powers in the Alliance. These powers, no repeat no matter how small their military contribution, might be very essential to the maintenance of the status quo in Europe, and we for our part consider that any action which would lead to the withdrawal of any of these powers would be a retrograde step and would in fact be the first step leading to the collapse of the Alliance. If this occurred none of us could hope even with the closest cooperation between the French, British and Americans, for the continued liberty of what remained of the free world.

(c) The world in our view had changed as much with respect to its international problems since the days of the war as Canada had changed in its stature and responsibilities. We were ready and willing to encourage the Three Great Powers to consult on world problems, but we were quite unwilling to accept any position in NATO whereby the Council became a rubber stamp for any policy that the Great Powers chose to pursue.

(d) We had no repeat no quarrel with the General's contention that strategic problems are global, and accordingly it was proper and even essential that those powers which could dispose forces rapidly anywhere in the world should consult together. Strictly speaking, it was true to say today that only the Soviet Union and the US were in this category, but not repeat not even the US could dispose of its forces around the world where it wished without the cooperation of its allies. This was particularly true in Canada today where the most vulnerable approach to the US lay across Canadian territory. We for our part could not repeat not accept, for example, an American view of world strategy which did not repeat not coincide with our own with respect to the Northern hemisphere. If this were true of ourselves, it surely must be obvious that this was equally true in many other parts of the world, especially in Europe.

(e) While, therefore, we were ready and willing to welcome private consultations between the Three Great Powers, we are unwilling to be dictated to as to strategy or as to the most desirable political course to pursue. Inconvenient though it might be to the Great Powers, the facts of international life were now different to what they were in 1945 and we hoped and expected that de Gaulle would recognize this, and also recognize that however clumsy the NATO machinery might be, consultation between the Three Powers was no repeat no substitute for consultation amongst the members on the basis of equality if we are to preserve the position intact against the Soviet Union.

3. In other words, the delegation and ourselves hope that the Prime Minister may add Canada's weight to the views the General will now have had from most of the other principal members of the Alliance and in the strongest terms from Mr. Spaak. Here again, however, the Prime Minister might prefer to be positive in putting to the General the advantages of a flexible system of political consultation, beginning with three or four or five (depending on subject) always extending to fifteen at appropriate stage.⁷⁷

GENERAL DE GAULLE'S PROPOSAL FOR POLITICAL DIRECTORATE

I paid my first call on de Courcel on November 19 and took this opportunity to raise with him the problem posed to the Alliance by General de Gaulle's recent initiative. De Courcel told me that he would be glad to follow up the Prime Minister's talk with General de Gaulle on November 5, particularly in view of the many misunderstandings about the initiative which had arisen since.

2. He first gave the background against which the General's initiative should be viewed. This has already been reported in paragraph 3 and 4 of Paris reference telegram, and need not repeat not be repeated here. In brief the General is less concerned with the state of NATO than with the state of the world. The situation in Europe is now fairly stable and will not repeat not be disturbed in the immediate future; but it has become essential for the Western Powers with world responsibilities to coordinate their policies. This, in de Courcel's view, was particularly true in the strategic field, but also in the economic and aid policies of the Western Powers. Throughout the discussion, however, de Courcel, while alluding to the global responsibilities of France in general terms, referred specifically to ⁷⁷ Pour un compte rendu de la rencontre du premier ministre Diefenbaker avec le Général de Gaulle, voir les documents 392 et 394.

French interests in Africa and the Mid East. He mentioned Madagascar and the African South Atlantic seaboard as regions which were of special and direct concern to France where complications might arise which, if not repeat not dealt with properly, could considerably weaken the West. France, he said, was willing to assume special responsibilities for such regions but they expected in return to be consulted by the USA and the UK on developments in the Mid East and for that matter even the Far East.

3. De Courcel confirmed what we already know, that General de Gaulle had not repeat not requested that a French General be appointed as Supreme Allied Commander. Nor repeat nor for that matter, was he interested in a reorganization of NATO with a view to giving special responsibilities to a so-called "Political Standing Group." In fact the French delegation would not repeat not raise the problem of political consultation in NATO, although it would be glad to join in discussion on this subject if the matter was raised by the Secretary General or any delegation at the forthcoming ministerial meeting. De Courcel said that France welcomed political consultation in the Council and would continue fully to cooperate in this field. At one point he said. "We don't intend to do anything behind your backs." De Courcel made it quite clear, however, that the French would continue to discuss the matter of closer coordination of world strategy with London and Washington outside the NATO framework.

4. During the conversation de Courcel made the point that NATO was not repeat not equipped to meet all the problems with which the West was faced. There were countries such as Denmark and Norway which would refuse to accept certain commitments outside the NATO area. Nor repeat nor was he sure of the attitude that a country like Canada might take were it asked to assume new commitments. It was, therefore, much more realistic to think in terms of a different set-up and not repeat not upset the present happy relationship existing between NATO members.

5. As an example of the importance that certain countries attach to establishing closer relations with one another outside the NATO framework, de Courcel referred to the intimate relationship in the field of defence which Canada had found it necessary to establish with the USA.

6. In reply I first referred to the Prime Minister's views as expressed to General de Gaulle and repeated that a political triumvirate within NATO would be totally unacceptable. Considerable progress had been made in a relatively short period in the field of political consultation in NATO and we wished that the trend be continued. The setting up of a political triumvirate would wreck this and prove unacceptable not repeat not only to Canada but to the great majority of our NATO partners. The question of consultation between the USA, UK and France outside the NATO framework was another matter: we could see no repeat no objection to it. On the other hand we had to bear in mind that political consultation within NATO covered a much wider area than that geographically defined by the Treaty. The few meetings I had already attended had partly been devoted to such problems as those of the Mid East, Africa and even Quemoy. There was, therefore, a danger of duplication and even misunderstanding if the same subjects were to be considered at the same time in the Council and on a tripartite basis.

7. As regards his interpretation of the attitude of such countries as Norway and Denmark over additional commitments, I said that I had no repeat no quarrel with the views he had expressed. As far as Canada was concerned the Prime Minister had made our position quite clear to General de Gaulle when he had said that "To extend the geographical area of responsibility of NATO would not repeat not be acceptable to the Canadian government or the Canadian people." Lastly, I pointed out that the reference to the special relationship in the field of defence between the USA and Canada should not repeat not be cited as an example of extra-NATO consultation, since our Arctic frontier was as much of a NATO frontier as was that on the East German front.

8. The following thoughts have occurred to me as a result of this interview of the problem posed by General de Gaulle's initiative as interpreted by de Courcel:

(1) The French are likely to agree to any form of closer political cooperation in NATO and might even pay lip service to the concept. I doubt, however, that they would contribute much to the exercise, though they have been more active in the Political Advisers Committee lately. This is illustrated by a comment made by Couve de Murville to one of my colleagues recently to the effect that "France would do nothing to upset NATO nor repeat nor would it help it."

(2) De Gaulle will pursue his initiative outside the NATO framework. Washington and London will, therefore, have to face this very delicate issue and on the whole I believe it would be wiser for them to face it alone rather than have the Council seized of it, although it might be difficult for Messrs. Selwyn Lloyd and Dulles (to say nothing of Mr. Spaak) not repeat not to refer to it at the forthcoming ministerial meeting.

(3) Seen from this mission, the French initiative must be placed in the new relationship which de Gaulle is attempting to establish between metropolitan France and Africa. It is worth recalling that at the time of the signature of the North Atlantic Treaty the whole of North Africa was under French control and that the Sahara was still dormant. From the strategic point of view this was an ideal situation for the Alliance. The situation is now very different, not repeat not only in Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria, but the Sahara has acquired a new importance for the economic development of France. De Gaulle is merely expressing in more vigorous terms what his predecessor M. Gaillard, had outlined when he launched the idea of the possibility of a Mediterranean Pact. In brief, de Gaulle's initiative is but the most recent chapter in the long history of the relationship between Africa and Western Europe. It may be untimely, awkward and even unacceptable to NATO but the problem exists in a very acute form and some solution must be found if the West is not repeat not to suffer a major defeat which NATO can ill afford.

DE GAULLE PROPOSALS FOR REORGANIZATION OF NATO

McBride, Head of the Western European Office of the State Department, told us in confidence today that on Thursday, December 4, Robert Murphy of the State Department will be calling in the French Ambassador and the UK Ambassador (in Caccia's absence Lord Hood will be present) by way of following up the request contained in General de Gaulle's original proposal for tripartite discussions.

2. As McBride explained the main purpose of the meeting will be to point out some of the difficulties envisaged if the French proposals were to be acted upon, and to put to the French representative, USA and UK views on the importance of NATO consultations and on the need for avoiding any formal reorganization of NATO machinery. We understand that Mr. Spaak is being told in advance about this Thursday meeting and that the individual NATO permanent representatives will also be advised in Paris probably tomorrow. Since de Gaulle's proposals were not repeat not introduced in the Council, the French have taken the position that no repeat no formal notification to the Council is required. Locally here the Italians and Germans are being told as well as ourselves.

3. In advance of the meeting which is expected to take place on Thursday morning, the USA, UK and French have been working out the terms of a brief agreed public statement which would not repeat not be issued until later on Thursday afternoon. According to McBride this statement would refer to the receipt of the communication from General de Gaulle, and would indicate that the purpose of the tripartite meeting was to explore the matters raised in that communication, and in particular would refer to the request of the French for tripartite discussions. McBride added that it was possible that a further meeting might be necessary, but from his remarks we received the impression that the State Department will use this meeting to indicate to the French the difficulties that any formal and continuing arrangements for consultation on a tripartite basis outside the NATO framework would encounter.

DE GAULLE PROPOSALS FOR REORGANIZATION OF NATO — TRIPARTITE MEETING

The meeting December 4 consisted in the French developing General de Gaulle's memorandum on tripartite consultation and questions being put by the USA and UK representatives. The discussion was "diffused." A further meeting has been scheduled for December 10 at which the French will provide answers to the questions asked.

2. The gist of the French argument is as follows: the situation has changed since 1949 in two ways: (a) the NATO area no longer coincides with the area against which the Soviet threat is directed; (b) from a weapons point of view the NATO area is meaningless. What is the remedy? Consultation within NATO has its usefulness but does not meet the new problems. Creation of other pacts have their usefulness but they leave uncovered areas. France proposes the following solution:

(i) In the political and strategic field: to establish some form of tripartite organization to attempt to reach common decisions on matters of global importance. The reason for confining the consultative organization to the USA, UK and France is that they are the three with global responsibilities and that they will be the only Western Atomic Powers. The consultative organization contemplated would not be a directorate but would be more an extension of the tripartite consultations which already take place on Germany and in certain aspects of the disarmament field. No one of the three would exercise a veto over the others and there would be no attempt to impose agreed policies on friendly states. What was being proposed was organized and regular consultation.

(ii) In the military field there would not be an extension of the NATO area, but rather tripartite military planning which would involve the interrelation and coordination of theaters of operations throughout the world (Brown (French Desk Officer) our informant, commented, "We don't know what this means").

3. The points made by the UK and USA against organized tripartite consultation are related to the following:

(a) The problem which would be raised, vis-à-vis Italy and Germany in particular and other countries.

(b) The problem which would be created in the Commonwealth for the UK.

(c) The UK dislike of institutionalized organization.

(d) The proven value of informal consultation e.g. the quadripartite consultations on Berlin.

4. The following questions were asked:

(i) What sort of organization is implied in the French proposal, for instance what sort of machinery would be necessary, e.g., would there be a Secretariat? (The French replied that they did not know.)

(ii) Did the French proposal involve revising the North Atlantic Treaty? (The French did not think so.)

(iii) How would the problem which would be created in the rest of the world by the establishment of organized tripartite consultation be faced up to?

5. Brown said that the Germans and Italians have been informed along the same lines as we. The meeting did not, however, settle how the three should inform their NATO allies on the proceedings. Brown thought it very likely that no decision would be made on this until the next meeting on December 10. He therefore hoped that we would keep this information to ourselves and certainly not repeat not discuss it with the French.

6. As you know, we have already informed the State Department of the sense of the Prime Minister's discussion with General de Gaulle and in particular the Prime Minister's statements that Canada could accept closer consultation between France and her allies but not repeat not a triumvirate which would take decisions without consulting other NATO partners, and that Canada could not accept an extension of the geographical responsibility of NATO since this could lead to a breakdown of NATO itself.

7. Brown said that the French themselves did not seem to be entirely clear on what they were proposing, but the position may be somewhat clarified by the next meeting December 10.

DE GAULLE PROPOSAL FOR REORGANIZATION OF NATO TRIPARTITE MEETING

Dale (Commonwealth and European Affairs) called us today to report there was no significant development at yesterday's meeting with the UK and France. The discussion was very general. There were questions on both sides which he said amounted to no more than enquiries by each side as to what the other had in mind. No answers were given. The questions posed by the French added no substance to what was revealed at the first meeting. A further meeting is projected for the new year but no specific date has been set.

NATO SCIENCE FELLOWSHIP AND STUDIES INSTITUTES PROGRAMMES

At the meeting of Heads of NATO Governments in December, 1957 there was created a Science Committee responsible, in particular, for making specific recommendations to the Council for action on various proposals for increasing the potential of the North Atlantic Alliance in the field of science.

At the second meeting of the NATO Science Committee in July, 1958 three specific proposals were put forward involving financial contributions towards the support and development of scientific research in NATO countries. These proposals were:

- (a) a NATO Science Fellowship programme,
- (b) a NATO programme for Advanced Studies Institutes,
- (c) a NATO programme of grants in aid of Fundamental Research.

Of these projects only the first two commanded general support in the Science Committee. Further consideration of the third was put off to its next meeting scheduled for January, 1959.

NATO Council has now received and agreed in principle to the Science Committee's recommendations regarding the Fellowships and the Studies Institutes programmes. Consideration of the financial aspects of these programmes will take place in Council early in October.

The total cost of the programmes will be as follows:

Fellowships: $1,000,000 in the first year increasing by this amount in each of the next three years.

Studies Institutes: $150,000 in the first year increasing by $50,000 per year until a figure of $500,000 is reached.

Financial implications of these programmes for Canada are as follows:

	First Year			Fourth Year
	Contributions	Value of Fellowships Administered by Canada		Contributions	Value of Fellowships Administered by Canada
Fellowships	$38,300	$48,300	*	$153,200	$193,200
Studies Institutes	5,760	—	*	19,200	—
	$44,060	$48,300		$172,400	$193,200

* In subsequent years the United States contributions can be expected to decrease progressively from 50%, now pledged for the first four years, to a more normal NATO assessment and Canadian contributions will correspondingly rise.

These programmes are the first concrete steps towards the achievement of the goals set at the meeting of the NATO Council at which the Science Committee was established. They constitute (initially at least) a small but important increase in the support for scientific endeavour. They also represent a significant example of common NATO action.

I therefore recommend:⁷⁸

(a) that Canada participate in the NATO Science Fellowships programme and the NATO Advanced Studies Institutes programme;

(b) that Canada's contribution to these programmes be provided from a special appropriation to be contained in the budget of the National Research Council.

RE: PROVISION OF FOOD STOCKPILES FOR EUROPEAN NATO COUNTRIES

1. The Prime Minister spoke on this subject originally at the Heads of Government's meeting in Paris in December, 1957.⁷⁹ It was raised again by Mr. Pearkes at the NATO Defence Ministers' Conference in April, 1958.⁸⁰ On May 28, 1958, the Canadian representative to the NATO Food and Agriculture Planning Committee developed the matter further. On July 19, 1958, when the Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce were under review in Parliament, the Prime Minister made a more extensive statement on the possibility of the Canadian Government making proposals to the NATO countries with respect to the creation of food stockpiles.

2. There have been a number of reactions from the NATO countries to the tentative suggestions that Canada has already made in this respect. Norway has declared itself to be "very interested;" Germany and France have been most cautious in their comments. All show that they would welcome more detail regarding the Canadian plan. It therefore seems desirable for a statement to be made at the Senior Civil Emergency Planning Committee meeting at the middle of October. This statement presumably should go farther in describing the Canadian proposal than others offered to date on this subject.

3. It is proposed that Canada should suggest a plan in NATO, embracing the following points:

(a) That the objective should be to establish useful wartime emergency stockpiles of food in individual NATO countries;

(b) That for the meantime the stockpiles consist of a single item, namely wheat flour;

(c) That Canada would provide an agreed amount of wheat flour, suitably packaged, to be laid down at a Canadian seaport, with all costs up to the acceptance of delivery by the recipient NATO country to be paid by Canada;

(d) That the receiving NATO country would take title to the flour at the Canadian port and would transport, store, maintain and ultimately dispose of the flour, with all costs from the point of delivery in Canada to be borne by the recipient country;

⁷⁹ Voir/See Document 254.

⁸⁰ Voir/See Document 194.

(e) That NATO itself would have no administrative or managerial duties regarding the stockpile in any individual NATO country. It would be wholly the responsibility of the recipient NATO country concerned to administer the stock and to control its use;

(f) That the recipient country would undertake that the stockpile would be reserved for wartime emergency purposes and that as its replacement became necessary, it would be disposed of in a manner that would interfere with normal commercial transactions in wheat and wheat flour as little as possible, and would not be used for human consumption;

(g) That Canada and the recipient country in question would agree on details such as: size of the stockpile, nature of packaging, anticipated storage life, conditions of storage, withdrawal from storage and ultimate disposal when it is no longer fit for its purpose.

4. It appears that wheat flour is the most useful food item that Canada could provide for a wartime reserve in NATO countries and that because of its universal use, its availability, its keeping qualities, as well as the simplicity of management of this single food item, it would be well to begin, at least, with wheat flour. In jute sacks with moisture barrier provided, wheat flour has a sound storage life of about 5 years. In 5-gallon tin cans this storage life is increased to about 8 years. The cost per pound, laid down at Montreal, is comparable for these two packs, estimated at $0.648 in the sacks and at $0.669 per pound in 5-gallon tins. The estimated cost in aluminum containers is several times higher. It is calculated that the cost of a bushel of wheat processed into flour and packed into 5-gallon tins, delivered at Montreal, runs to approximately $2.85.

5. Norway is the one NATO country that to date has shown a fairly positive interest in the tentative Canadian proposal. On the basis of a provision of a supply to meet total flour requirements for human consumption in Norway for a month, the cost to Canada would be approximately $2,200,000 in 5-gallon tin cans. If it could be anticipated that Belgium, Denmark, Netherlands and Norway, for example, should enter such a plan as recipient NATO countries, the total cost to Canada of providing a one-month supply for these four countries would total about $19,000,000. It is not considered that a programme in excess of half this size is likely to be developed in 1959-60. The cost to Canada of a similar reserve for the United Kingdom would be $37,000,000.

6. It is proposed that the cost of the NATO food stockpile programme along the lines suggested above should be regarded in budgeting for 1959-60 as in place of an equivalent amount of mutual aid under the National Defence vote. The nature of the appropriation to provide the funds should be considered at the time the main estimates are prepared. There would seem to be advantages in not including this as part of the mutual aid vote itself but as a separate appropriation specifically earmarked for this purpose.

7. *I recommend*⁸¹ that the Canadian representative to the NATO Senior Civil Emergency Planning Committee be authorized to give details of the Canadian proposal as outlined in paragraph 3 above, subject to a limit at this time of $10,000,000 for the possible cost to Canada of such a programme in the fiscal year 1959-60.

SITUATION IN WEST BERLIN

Khrushchev announced on November 10⁸² that the Soviet Union would hand over to the German Democratic Republic (GDR) those functions relating to Berlin which are still exercised by the Soviet Union. He said the three Western powers henceforth must deal with the GDR on Berlin questions.

2. Khrushchev declared that the time had come to reject that part of the Potsdam Agreement which concerned Berlin. Actually, the four-power occupation of Berlin rests on somewhat informal agreements reached by the commanders-in-chief of the victorious forces after the capitulation of Germany in 1945. In recent years the Western powers have based their claims to access to West Berlin more on established practices than on the uncertain basis of the 1945 understandings. The cessation of the Blockade in 1949 confirmed these arrangements, but did not impart any precision to them.

3. Several motives may lie behind the Soviet action. The most important seems to be the desire to bolster the status and prestige of the East German puppet régime and indirectly to strengthen the solidarity of the Soviet Bloc. Other probable motives are to strengthen the Communist campaign against equipping the West German defence forces with nuclear weapons, to bring about four-power talks on a German Peace Treaty (without discussion on reunification), and to cause discord within the NATO alliance. Khrushchev may also have in mind the possibility of using this means to lead up to a Summit Meeting on Germany.

4. The Western powers have always made it clear through their pronouncements and actions that they would resist any attack or pressure on Berlin and that they fully intend to keep the Western garrisons in the city. In 1954 the NATO Council formally welcomed the declaration of the UK, USA and French Governments that "they will treat any attack against Berlin ... as an attack upon their forces and themselves." (Canada associated itself with this statement. The Canadian Government has often given public support to the maintenance of a free West Berlin, and partly to give evidence of this keeps a small mission in the city.) The Western powers are also prepared for pressure short of an attack, such as renewal of the Blockade imposed in 1948. They have built up food reserves in West Berlin adequate for about a year and if the need arose would have aircraft available to sustain an air lift to fulfil the needs of the 2,200,000 citizens of the Western half of the city.

5. The consensus is, however, that for the foreseeable future, the Soviet Union will not employ military force, or impose a full Blockade. The announcement last week of a trade agreement between the “two Germanies” tends to confirm this. There is also general agreement in Western capitals that the probable first step will be for the USSR to test Western reactions by the substitution of GDR officials for Russians at the military check points on the rail and road routes into Berlin and in the four-power air safety centre. The USA, UK, France and West Germany are seeking to co-ordinate their views, but there is still a sharp divergence of opinion on how best to meet this expected move. The possible courses of action for the Western powers are:

(1) To ignore the GDR guards and to use force if necessary to maintain Western rights on the autobahn and rails;

(2) To stop using road and rail and to institute an air lift to maintain the Western garrison of 10,000;

(3) To accept, under protest, the transfer of control functions to GDR officials, provided there is no increase in the degree of control exercised.

7. The UK is inclined to support the third course; in dealing with East German officials it would state that it regards them merely as agents of the USSR. This would still confer a degree of de facto recognition on the GDR. However, this might not be entirely disadvantageous since, as in Korea, it could be useful, should serious trouble develop, to be able to distinguish between the forces of the USSR and those of its satellites. In addition, practical Western counter-measures could thus be reserved to meet Soviet steps which constituted a more direct threat to the presence of the Western troops in Berlin.

8. According to telegrams received this morning, the three Western powers are discussing the advisability of sending a note to the Soviet Union for the purpose of reminding the Soviet leaders of their various legal commitments with respect to the city. This note which would express the expectation of the Western powers that the Soviet Union would live up to these obligations, would be presented without waiting for the formal communication from the Russians that is anticipated and thus would, to some extent, take the initiative from them.

9. Chancellor Adenauer and most United States officials apparently oppose the slightest concession and consider that the United Kingdom approach would mean embarking on the slippery slope towards abandonment of the Western position in Berlin. The State Department has told our Embassy that the United States is contemplating the possibility of sending a truck convoy through to Berlin under armed guard as a sign of firmness.⁸³

BERLIN

After some initial reticence on the part of the USA, UK and French delegations, we had a good discussion of the Berlin problem in Council in private session this morning November 26 but failed to get any specific indications as to the nature of the "Allied plan" reported in the press this morning. From what USA representative said, it seems that there is no repeat no agreed Western plan for action on the Berlin question but rather a series of alternative courses of action designed to meet each foreseeable Soviet move. Our estimate is that this paper has not repeat not yet received the approval of the USA, UK, French and German governments and will not repeat not be tabled in NATO until it has.

2. Possibly the most worrying development (apart from what the Russians might do) is the disclosure by Burgess (USA) that they are still thinking of running an armed convoy to or from Berlin to establish their right to resist Soviet (or any other) inspection. You will recall from our telegram 2719 November 17† that on November 14 a small USA convoy resisted inspection when leaving West Berlin for East Germany and was sent back to West Berlin, having been held for eight hours by Soviet authorities. It is this challenge that has led the Americans to think in terms of a more forceful initiative to establish a precedent which might be useful if DDR Police took over from the Russians. Washington telegrams 2848† and 2865† November 21 refer.

3. The acting German representative told Council this morning that on November 20 Smirnov had told Adenauer that there was no repeat no need to negotiate on Berlin with the Three Powers. The USSR intend to turn over their occupation duties in East Berlin and it would be realistic if the West German government accepted the fact and took advantage of Soviet good offices to communicate with the DDR re any consequential problems which would be for negotiation. An official Soviet note would be forthcoming, he said.⁸⁴

4. Chancellor Adenauer said that [he] profoundly regretted the ambassador's declaration which represented a serious set back in German Soviet relations, would increase tension and would be badly received by the German people for whom Berlin parliament "is a kind of protection."

5. Burgess then speculated that the postponement of the official Soviet communication, due to have been made last Friday or Saturday, might be the first fruit of Allied firmness both on maintaining the rights of the Three Powers in West Berlin and on non-recognition of the DDR. The USA government nevertheless expect the USSR to follow through in some way and they had reason to suspect that Soviet action might now be limited to putting the squeeze on military traffic with Berlin, while leaving civil (i.e. German) traffic untouched. A resumption of the blockade, however, could not repeat not be excluded.

6. The French and UK representatives agreed with this assessment. The UK representative added that his government were studying the German memorandum on the statute of Berlin (our telegram 2777 November 24†).

7. After these rather thin pickings there was a silence which I broke by observing that although the Council is getting into very interesting discussions on subjects like Africa and the Mid East, it was on a question such as Berlin that all members of the Alliance were most intimately concerned. For that reason, I hoped that the powers who were consulting elsewhere would keep the Council as fully and as rapidly informed as they could about "Western plans" already in the headlines.

8. Mr. Spaak of course heartily agreed. He then offered some comments of his own on the German paper circulated November 23. He thought it would be a mistake to make too much of the juridical aspects of the Berlin problem. (If so?) the Russians would dispute our interpretation of our rights and there would be no repeat no way under international law of proving who was right. Public opinion would be more concerned with the political aspects of the matter. The Germans wanted to be firm: but how far could such a policy be carried? If the Russians now wanted to leave Berlin, could be put in the position of trying to stop them? If we wanted to avoid recognizing the DDR, to what lengths should we go to maintain our position?

9. The acting German representative replied (on a personal basis) that his understanding was that the Russians might simply denounce the Four-Power agreements re Berlin and say that from that time on Berlin would in their view cease to be governed by a Kommandature with four administrative sectors. The Russians could do this without withdrawing their troops from East Berlin. On the other hand, and if they also withdrew their forces, they would argue that the other Three Powers would have no repeat no right to retain their forces in their sectors.

10. At that point, Spaak suggested that the basis of the Allied presence in West Berlin must then be at the request of the German government. The A/German representative said that this was more complicated because the West Berlin area did not repeat not form part of the Federal Republic and it would therefore be difficult for the Bonn government to ask Allied troops to stay.

11. Spaak tended to dismiss the juridical difficulties and insisted that some way could surely be found for Allied troops to stay in West Berlin at the request of a German authority, whatever the Russians did. As the A/German representative commented, however, the next problem would be that of access. DDR police at border control points would be able to stop the coming and going of Western military personnel even if they could do nothing about their presence in West Berlin itself.

12. As for the reasons for the USSR postponing the delivery of their official note, Mr. Spaak wondered if they might not repeat not realize that the denunciation of the Berlin statute would lead to discussions with the Allies not repeat not only on Berlin but eventually on the whole German problem. This might be why the Russians were hesitating, since for months they had sought to avoid any such discussion.

13. Although other representatives did not repeat not comment in today's discussion, the Norwegian representative Boyesen no repeat no doubt spoke for many of us when he said that the powers concerned should not repeat not take our silence as a lack of interest. Rather it was uncertainty as to the right course to pursue. He hoped that there would be real consultation in NATO before any action was decided (this may have been a reference to the possible USA armed convoy experiment referred to above).

14. Burgess undertook to do his best to keep the Council fully in the picture.

15. If there are questions you wish me to put at the next meeting I would be glad to come prepared. If there are further developments in the next few days, we may well have a special Council meeting on December 1. If not repeat not, there will be the regular Council a.m. December 3.

KRUSHCHEV'S PROPOSALS FOR BERLIN

In a long note to the USA, UK, and France (with copies to all UN members) Khrushchev on November 27th offered the Western Powers the opportunity of negotiating with the USSR on the establishment of West Berlin as a free city. He said that if such negotiations had not proved fruitful within six months, the Soviet Union would transfer to the German Democratic Republic its responsibilities relating to Berlin under the Four-Power agreements of the immediate post-war period. In the note Khrushchev said the USSR declared null and void the agreements adopted by the victorious powers in 1944 and 1945 under which a quadripartite status was adopted for Berlin.

2. The Khrushchev proposals are anything but conciliatory in tone, being preceded by many pages of denunciations of Western policies and allegations of aggressive intent. He specifically charged that the Western Powers were using West Berlin for purposes of subversion directed against the Soviet Bloc, and he implied that they had the intention of going beyond their campaign of "indirect aggression" to use the city as a base for plans of a still more dangerous kind.

3. The specific proposals made by Khrushchev in the note of November 27th may be summarized as follows:

(a) The best way to solve the Berlin question would be to have the Federal Republic withdraw from NATO and the German Democratic Republic withdraw from the Warsaw Treaty and for neither of the two German states to maintain armed forces beyond those necessary for internal order and frontier control. The Western part of Berlin should be reunited with the Eastern part and the whole city should become a single unit within the state on whose land it is situated;

(b) Since the unrealistic policies of the Western Powers make this solution unlikely, the Soviet government considers that upon the ending of foreign occupation, the population of West Berlin should be given the right to choose its way of life. Should they desire to continue their present pattern of life, based on private capitalist ownership, the USSR would respect their choice.

(c) The Soviet government thinks it possible for the question of West Berlin to be settled for the time being by making West Berlin an independent political entity — a free city — without any state, including the proviso that neither of the existing German states interfere with its life;

(d) The free city could have its own government and could run its own economy and administrative affairs. It might be possible to agree on the territory of the free city being demilitarized;

(e) The four powers concerned and the two German states could undertake to respect the status of West Berlin as a free city as was done with Austrian neutrality;

(f) For its part, the Soviet government would have no objection to the United Nations also sharing in one way or another in observing the free city status of West Berlin;

(g) The question would arise of some kind of an arrangement with the German Democratic Republic concerning guarantees of unhindered communications between the free city and the outside world — both eastward and westward — with the object of free movement of passenger and freight traffic;

(h) In its turn, West Berlin would commit itself not to tolerate on its territory hostile and subversive activity directed against the GDR or any other state;

(i) The Soviet Union would do its utmost to promote the attainment of these aims, especially by placing orders for such an amount of manufactured goods as would ensure the prosperity of the economy of the free city. It would also provide regular supplies to West Berlin of necessary raw materials and food stuffs on a commercial basis;

(j) For these purposes the Soviet government would be willing to enter into official contact with the German Democratic Republic on behalf of the four powers concerned;

(k) The Soviet government is ready to open negotiations with the USA and other countries concerned on granting West Berlin the status of a demilitarized free city. If this proposal is not acceptable to the USA government, there is no topic left for talks on the Berlin question by the former occupying powers;

(l) The Soviet government proposes to make no changes in the present procedure for military traffic of the USA, UK, and France between West Berlin and the Federal Republic for half a year. If this period is not used for reaching an agreement, the Soviet Union will effect the planned measures by agreement with the GDR. It is envisaged that the GDR, like any other independent state, must fully control questions concerning its space, i.e. exercise its sovereignty on land, on water, and in the air. At the same time there will be an end to all contacts still maintained between representatives of the armed forces and other officials of the Soviet Union in Germany and corresponding representatives of the armed forces and other officials of the USA, UK, and France on questions pertaining to Berlin;

(m) Reckless threats of force in solving the Berlin issue can only aggravate the situation to the danger point. Any violation of the frontiers of the GDR, Poland or Czechoslovakia and any violations or aggressive actions against any member state of the Warsaw Treaty will be regarded by all its participants as an act of aggression against them all and will immediately call forth appropriate retaliation.

4. Assessment—In its present form the Soviet proposal is clearly unacceptable since it would leave West Berlin at the mercy of the Communist forces in the surrounding territory and subject to the Communist influence of East Berlin. The hostile attitude adopted by Khrushchev in his Note does not provide evidence of a spirit of conciliation or flexibility in which a new settlement might be developed. Initial press reports from Washington, London, Paris, Bonn, and Berlin indicate that government officials in those capitols are adopting a skeptical and indeed negative attitude toward the Soviet suggestion. The West Germans appear to be quite worried about this new development.

5. While they are undoubtedly right in rejecting the proposals in their present form, it is to be hoped that the Western powers do not refuse to take advantage of the opportunity of discussing the situation with the Soviet leaders. It would seem wise to make every effort to turn Khrushchev's proposals to Western advantage. For the sake of Western public opinion, if nothing else, it might be advisable for the Western powers to come up with counter-proposals in some form. Possibly some machinery similar to that of the UN Trusteeship system, but with the addition of troops, could be proposed, effective for the whole city. Such a system, with adequate guarantees, might be developed with the understanding that it would enter into force in stages over a period of years. Western troops in Berlin could be reduced only gradually and in accordance with evidence of the success of the Trusteeship plan. Any such possibility would require a significant number of troops operating under the UN banner; certainly something much more elaborate than a group of UN administrators would be necessary. Khrushchev's reference to participation by the United Nations is disappointingly off-hand. This is perhaps not surprising in view of his comment to Mr. Eric Johnston, the film producer, last month to the effect that the United Nations was just a puppet show manipulated by the United States, and that the Soviet Union thought so little of it that it might withdraw.

6. Public Comment—The press have enquired about Canadian reaction to the Khrushchev proposals. It is suggested that the Press Officer be authorized to make a statement along the following lines in dealing with enquiries:

“The formal text of Mr. Khrushchev's lengthy note on Berlin, dated November 27, 1958, is being studied with care. This note was addressed to the governments of the USA, UK, and France but copies are being made available to all UN members. It runs to some twenty-four pages.

“We regret to find that the majority of these pages carry a bitter denunciation of Western policies and are filled with name-calling and invective. Delivery of such a document certainly does not contribute to the relaxation of international tension toward which the Soviet Premier says the USSR is working.

“As to the proposals themselves, it is important to correct any first impressions the Canadian public may have received that Mr. Khrushchev is willing to have all of Berlin placed under a UN system of control. His proposals call simply for the withdrawal of troops and the establishment of West Berlin as a free city. There would be a four-power guarantee of the status of the free city but apparently without any barriers to efforts at political domination and subversion from the surrounding Communist territory. The participation of the UN is mentioned only in an off-hand manner as something to which the Soviet government would not object. The exact wording is as follows: ‘For its part the Soviet government would have no objection to the United Nations also sharing, in one way or another, in observing the free status of Berlin.’ This would hardly seem to provide scope for the UN to play a significant role.

“It is expected that Canadian representatives will participate with the powers directly concerned in an examination in the NATO council of the ideas that have been advanced and in determining the best policy to be adopted.”

BERLIN

I called on Foreign Minister von Brentano this morning and asked him if he could let me know how the German thinking was developing on the issues created by the Soviet notes on Berlin.

2. He began by saying that they had not repeat not, of course come to definite conclusions. Further consideration would be required and discussions with the Three Powers particularly concerned. The one thing which was clear was that the Soviet notes had created an extremely serious situation. The Soviet proposals did not repeat not constitute a basis of negotiation. They were a delayed ultimatum. They were part of a policy of blackmail. If the West did not repeat not remain firm in defence of Berlin the shock to confidence would be felt not repeat not only in Germany but in the Scandinavian countries, Benelux, Greece and Turkey. None would feel confident in the guarantees of their security.

3. His guess was that Khrushchev made the proposals at the time he did because of internal difficulties which confronted him in the Soviet Union and which might come to a head at the Party Congress next month. Khrushchev wanted to divert the attention of the Soviet people from internal problems to foreign affairs. One question which might cause Khrushchev difficulty at the Party Congress was his new educational proposals. An indication that Khrushchev realized he was in difficulties was his repeated attacks on the Bulganin-Molotov group.

4. The West should not repeat not permit the initiative to remain any longer with the Soviet Union. It should make the counter-proposal of a conference either of Heads of States or of Foreign Ministers.

5. I said that the usual explanation of the Soviet move had been that they wanted to strengthen Ulbricht, to force the West into giving increasing recognition to the DDR, and to impede the nuclear arming of West Germany. It had also been suggested that the Soviet Union wanted a summit conference.

6. Brentano said that he did not repeat not agree with the last suggestion. The Soviet could have had a summit conference any time in the last year if they had wanted one.

7. I said that if there was a summit conference I assumed we would propose a discussion of the usual trinity: the German question which would include reunification and a peace treaty; European security; and disarmament. He agreed saying that under the heading of the German question Berlin would be discussed.

8. I said that for the West to propose a discussion at a summit level or foreign ministers level of these three questions would only constitute the first step. Would it not repeat not then be necessary for the West to decide before such a conference were held whether it would rest on its past proposals in respect of these three questions or whether it was prepared to adopt some flexibility in negotiation?

9. He replied that it was disarmament which could provide us with some room for flexibility in negotiation. What we had, however, to keep in mind in making proposals on disarmament was that they must not repeat not change to our disadvantage the existing balance of military power. That was why the Rapacki proposals were impossible. It was essential that USA forces should not repeat not leave Europe.

10. He understood entirely why the Poles wanted the Rapacki plan. It was in their national interests to get Soviet forces out of Poland. For Germany there would be no repeat no advantage in having Soviet troops east of Poland if this meant that USA forces were on the other side of the Atlantic. There was a German saying that what was an owl to one person was a nightingale to the other.

11. At the end of the interview I asked if he could throw some light on the meaning of the Chancellor's remarks on December 2 about the eastern borders of Germany which I had noted had caused a good deal of discussion in Great Britain. He said he had heard the Chancellor make these remarks at the party caucus and he could assure me that the Chancellor did not repeat not mean what some British critics had interpreted him to mean. What he had meant was that it was only an all-German government formed following free elections in all Germany which would have the moral authority to make an agreement on the eastern borders. Brentano then went on to say that the German government had time and time again declared that it would never use force to obtain a change in the existing defacto border. It was also clear that Germany could not repeat not hope to get back these lands from which 12 to 14 million Germans had fled since Poland had to have compensation in the West for its loss of territories in the East.

BERLIN

Following is text of a note on the Berlin question (PO/58/1548) which Mr. Spaak has circulated to delegations today in preparation for Council meeting tomorrow morning December 10. Text Begins:

To facilitate discussion in the Council on the question of Berlin, I think it may be useful to circulate the present note containing some suggestions on the objectives which we should have in mind. These suggestions, of course, are neither complete nor definitive.

1. It is of the first importance that at the conclusion of the ministerial meeting of the NATO Council, there should be seen to be unity amongst the NATO countries on the subject of Berlin.

2. This does not repeat not necessarily mean that agreement must have been reached on a final position on all aspects of the Soviet note. It is clear that it will not repeat not be possible to reach a final position of this kind in the time available.

3. On the other hand, it is essential that the statement of position announced by the NATO countries at the conclusion of this meeting should be sufficiently firm and comprehensive to reassure German opinion and notably the people of Berlin as to the determination of the West to stand by them.

4. It is also necessary to avoid giving the impression to the Russians and to world opinion that the Western Powers are hesitant or dilatory.

5. The right solution, therefore, seems to be that we should aim to reach agreement on a provisional position and perhaps upon an interim reply to the Soviet Union.

6. If this were agreed the question could arise whether the interim reply should take the form of a communication by the Four Powers or whether it should form part of the communiqué of the NATO ministerial meeting. In the former case, some method of indicating the united agreement of NATO with the Four Power replies would have to be considered. A third alternative would be for the Council to issue a special declaration on the subject.

7. Without wishing to prejudge at this stage the nature of the interim reply which might be envisaged, I suggest that it might include the following elements:

(a) a simple rejection (without detail) of the incorrect historical references in the Soviet note;

(b) a restatement of the sources from which the Western Powers derive their rights in Berlin;

(c) a clear statement of what the West is not repeat not prepared to accept in regard to Berlin;

(d) an indication that this interim reply will be followed by further proposals worked out in the light of a study of the wider issues raised by the Soviet note. Text ends.

BERLIN

I had a further discussion with Blankenhorn today over Berlin. In the first part of the conversation he gave no repeat no indication that any progress was being made in Bonn during the discussions held between the UK, USA and French ambassadors on the one hand, and the West German authorities on the other. He intimated that since no repeat no new factor had arisen during those discussions the Western Powers should merely re-state their position at the forthcoming NATO ministerial meeting.

2. I pointed out that this might be acceptable since the NATO meeting was to be held in a few days but that some solution would have to be found before the six-months period was over. I then referred to the suggestion put forward by M. Spaak (my telegram No. 2932 December 9) and asked Blankenhorn whether he agreed that the interim reply to the Soviets be based on the four points listed in paragraph 7 of Spaak's paper. Blankenhorn replied that according to his information the West German government would find it easy to accept the first three points but, for the present at least could not repeat not agree to the fourth one, i.e. that the interim reply "be followed by further proposals worked out in the light of a study of the wider issues raised by the Soviet note."

3. I told Blankenhorn that we were concerned about the general position of the West were the initiative once more left in Soviet hands. He replied that speaking privately he agreed; he hoped that some imaginative and bold approach to the question of Berlin would be found. He had a few ideas of his own which, depending on future developments, he might put up to the Chancellor. He then outlined the following details of a plan:

(a) The West should call for the internationalization of Berlin as a whole and its communication links;

(b) The West should also call for elections to be supervised in the whole Berlin area;

(c) The status of the city should be guaranteed by the UN;

(d) The Western troops now in Berlin (and for that matter the Soviet troops in East Berlin) should continue to be stationed there but under a UN command and serve as UN troops. They would therefore have to be withdrawn from their national commands;

(e) Neither East nor West Germany could use Berlin as its capital.

4. The great merit of this scheme, according to Blankenhorn, was that it would appeal to the uncommitted countries.⁸⁵ It would also place Moscow in an impossible position. His own view is that the Soviets at this time cannot repeat not afford to let go the Eastern sector of Berlin; the great disadvantage (and this is the reason why he was so hesitant in putting forward this scheme to the Chancellor) was that in case of difficulty the moral pressure of the UN might not repeat not be sufficient to prevent the Soviet Union from occupying the whole of Berlin "even if this meant that they would have to withdraw from the UN."⁸⁶

5. I told Blankenhorn that I found his approach extremely interesting and that I hoped he would see his way clear to discussing it with his government. I added that while there were serious risks involved in such a course we should all bear in mind that there were also great risks in trying to maintain a status quo which the Soviets had it in their power to change overnight.

6. At the end of the conversation Blankenhorn repeated once more that these were his personal views and that they might not repeat not prove acceptable to Bonn. Blankenhorn

BERLIN

This morning we went to the Western Department of the Foreign Office where we saw Drinkall who has taken over from Rose as the German expert. Drinkall told us that he would be accompanying Sir Anthony Rumbold to Paris for meetings of experts on Saturday preparatory to the meetings of foreign ministers of USA, UK, France and West Germany. The latter meeting would take place on Sunday afternoon. A public announcement about this is more or less imminent, and you may already have read about it in the press by the time this telegram has reached you.

2. Drinkall confirmed what Killick had told us (see our telegram 4439 November 29†) about the UK not repeat not wanting to lead off in shaping the Western course of action. Drinkall said that the French and Americans would probably bring to the experts meetings their drafts of a Western reply which they were reportedly now working on. The UK for its part would approach the subject by putting a series of questions such as: Should the reply be a long or a short note?; What would be the best time to send off the reply?; Could the "free city" offer be turned to some propaganda advantage in a counter proposal? etc.

3. About the length of the note, Drinkall said that the Russians preferred long notes which they took as an indication of a serious approach, whereas a short note was better from the Western point of view because it helped to focus public opinion on the main issues. About the timing, Drinkall said that it might be a good thing to send the reply just before the forthcoming Communist Party Congress in order to put arguments at the disposal of such waverers as might exist in Moscow who could disagree with Khrushchev on the Berlin question. About the possible propaganda exploitation of Khrushchev's offer, Drinkall said he and his colleagues in the Western Department were toying with the idea of capitalizing on Khrushchev's profession of respect for the wishes of West Berliners. A counter proposal could, for instance, be made to hold a plebiscite not repeat not only in West Berlin but also in East Berlin. The object there would be, of course, to shake East Berlin loose from Communist control in which the Russians might see some advantage in that they could better seal off the whole city from East Germany and therefore stop the flow of refugees. As a quid pro quo, the whole city could be demilitarized and the Western troops could be removed from it, but then such a counter proposal would also have to stipulate untrammelled relations with West Germany (e.g. by agreement on a defined corridor) in order to prevent the economic strangulation which is implicit in the present Soviet offer. Drinkall said that Moscow could always save its face by saying that it was always ready to respect the wishes of the Berliners and that in the plebiscite it was the West Berlin majority that had swallowed up the East Berlin minority. Drinkall said that this was so far pure speculation and only gave that to us as an indication of the sort of question that the UK would raise with the Americans, French and West Germans.

Fishing for Canadian initiative [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

4. At this point, Hancock (Head of the Western Department) broke in to have a word with Drinkall about the possibility of Adenauer coming to London on Friday. A message happened to come through from the German Embassy just at that time saying that Adenauer would not repeat not be able to come on account of a bad cold he had. Hancock and Drinkall very much regretted this because the Foreign Office would have liked to have an exchange of views in advance of the ministers' meeting. As you will have seen from the press, Adenauer has been developing an extremely uncompromising attitude over Berlin, going apparently as far as to refuse to treat Berlin as part of the German question. This is, of course, quite different from the UK line, as stated by Mr. Lloyd in the House of Commons debate last Thursday (see our telegram 4496 December 2†). Hancock said that such a separation of the Berlin question from the whole of the German question was "absolutely impossible" for the UK. The government, he added, could not repeat not sell that to the opposition nor to British public opinion generally. The Foreign Office hoped that they could agree with the West Germans to maintain an absolutely firm position on Berlin and make the Western resolve perfectly clear to the Russians in this respect, but at the same time to get 4-power agreement to an offer to talk over the German question with the Russians. It was made fairly clear to us that, in the Foreign Office's view, whatever counter proposals are worked out by the experts on Saturday and the Foreign Minister on Sunday, they would be wrapped up in an offer of talks with the Russians.

5. We were assured that the four Foreign Ministers would communicate to their NATO colleagues the results of their Sunday meeting. Meanwhile Drinkall confirmed that the Foreign Office had prepared no repeat no other paper such as they had drafted before receipt of the Soviet note and that the general UK line was so far exactly as Mr. Lloyd had stated it last Thursday in the House of Commons. In conclusion, Drinkall said he would try to give us a last minute briefing on developments (if any) in UK thinking either Thursday afternoon or Friday morning before his departure for Paris.

BERLIN

We agree with Spaak that it is important that a show of unity on Berlin result from the NATO ministerial meeting and are disturbed that the UK and the Federal Republic have taken such different positions concerning negotiations with the USSR on Berlin, the German problem and European security. We are in general agreement with the United Kingdom approach. However, we may well be in the minority and fear that the ministers may be stampeded into a sterile reaffirmation of the Western position on Germany; this, as you have suggested, would leave the initiative on Berlin to the Soviets.

2. We have been struck, however, by the possible elements of a hopeful compromise contained in the three telegrams under reference. In particular, we like Spaak's suggestion that there should be a provisional position and an interim reply; the Foreign Office's suggestion that the free city offer should be turned to propaganda advantage by making counter-proposals; and most of all, Blankenhorn's free city plan. Blankenhorn's views are not too different from ideas which have been discussed here and in London but it is very interesting that they have come from a German who is too close to Adenauer. At the same time we realize that Blankenhorn inclines to be more adventuresome in his thinking than the chancellor and, although his views on Berlin may be widely shared in the German Foreign Office, it seems unlikely that they are those of Adenauer and Brentano. Do you think he expressed his ideas to you in the hope that Canada might take the initiative in presenting them in NATO? We also wonder if the United Kingdom Foreign Office, by stressing to us their reluctance to press their views on the USA, France and Germany, are hinting that they would welcome a Canadian initiative.

3. You will be in a better position to judge if Canadian action would be appropriate. However, we would hope that the ministers will agree to an interim reply along the lines suggested by Mr. Spaak with the addition of proposals for the sort of free city status which the West could accept. This would offer a show of unity and deflate the Soviet propaganda campaign. The Western Powers could then take more time for a thorough examination of their position on Berlin and Germany before making more specific proposals to the USSR. We would hope that powers in addition to the United States, United Kingdom, France and West Germany would take part in this examination, especially since present prospects that these Four can agree on an imaginative approach are remote in view of Adenauer's uncompromising attitude, de Gaulle's promise of full support to him, the State Department's apparent uncertainty, and the reluctance of the United Kingdom to take a lead in pressing their more flexible view.

4. If you agree that there is a possibility for a useful compromise you might consider modifying the minister's opening speech accordingly. It might also be useful to give our views to the UK, USA, French and German experts meeting in Paris on Saturday and Sunday to discuss Berlin; this may help persuade the Four Powers not to confront the NATO meeting with a firm, agreed position which we might not like but which would be difficult to change.

5. If it is agreed to send an interim reply to the Soviet Berlin proposals, this could perhaps be most usefully treated as a propaganda exercise. For this purpose, the counter-proposals need not be too detailed. However, they could specify that any free city should embrace both the Eastern and Western sectors of Berlin, that its establishment should be subject to a plebiscite of the Berliners, and that, if the city and access to it are to be under UN control, this should be really effective.

BERLIN

In paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference you express doubt that Blankenhorn's views on Berlin are those of Adenauer and Brentano even if they are widely shared in the German Foreign Office. This is certainly true if your reference is to Blankenhorn's imaginative ideas reported in paragraph 3 of NATO Paris telegram 2933 December 9, as it is most improbable that either the Chancellor or the Foreign Minister are casting this far ahead at present; it is unlikely that either is thinking for the moment of specific alternatives to the maintenance of the Western position in Berlin. Nor is the German Foreign Office doing so as it is much more urgently concerned with the immediate attitudes to be taken on December 14 and 16.

2. It does not repeat not seem equally sure that Blankenhorn and Brentano are so far apart on the need to present counter-proposals of some kind. Paragraphs 4 and 7 of our telegram 608 December 8 report Brentano's express opinion that the West must seize the initiative from the USSR and that a high-level conference should be held.

3. In a talk today with Baudissin we mentioned what appeared to be a discrepancy between Brentano's views and those expressed publicly by Chancellor Adenauer in the last few days. Baudissin said the Foreign Office was only too aware of the way the press had seized on the Chancellor's remarks as signifying that he was not repeat not prepared to discuss the Berlin question, the German question or to make counter-proposals to the USSR. The Foreign Office had tried to obtain a precision from Dr. Adenauer, with only modest success. The Chancellor is now understood to mean simply that the West must not repeat not be panicked into negotiation by force of the Soviet timetable on Berlin. He does not repeat not think that Western counter-proposals should be offered until the West is certain and unified as to what it should propose and what stand it would adopt at a high-level conference. As interpreted, Adenauer would not repeat not necessarily oppose a Western initiative or even negotiations before the expiry next June of the Soviet ultimatum but he does not repeat not think this date should govern the timing of Western consultation and action.

4. Baudissin said that instructions for the German delegation to the Four Power Meeting on December 14 and to the NATO Ministerial Meeting were not repeat not yet final but from the tone in the Special Committee of the Foreign Office set up to draft instructions the line would not repeat not be strictly negative.

5. Baudissin said that the Foreign Office was having difficulty in deciding what recommendations to make about the composition of a communiqué following the meeting of the Four Foreign Ministers on December 14. They were convinced that some statement had to be made as silence would be construed by the press as indicative of serious disunity. However, not repeat not too much could be included in the communiqué as the NATO Council communiqué would have to say something on the same subject; the communiqué of the 15 ministers could scarcely confine itself to expressing agreement with the decisions of the 4 ministers. He thought it might be best if the Four Power communiqué said only that the Four Foreign Ministers were in complete agreement on maintaining the freedom of Berlin, on rejecting the right of the USSR unilaterally to denounce binding international armaments [sic] and that consultations on further action would be undertaken within two days with the other members of NATO. Baudissin said, however, that there were "other parties" who would like to emphasize the "particular interests and responsibilities" of the Four Powers by further revelation of the views shared by the USA, UK, French and German Ministers. We were content to agree that it would be more satisfactory for the other 11 Foreign Ministers if the scope of the Four-Power communiqué were limited to the minimum required for public reaffirmation of a unified approach by the Four.

BERLIN

Late yesterday December 10, Council discussed in private session the Berlin question in relation to the meeting of Four Foreign Ministers in Paris on December 14 and the NATO Ministerial Meetings here next week.

2. Although the UK, French, USA and German delegations took only a limited part in the discussion, since they felt under an obligation to await the results of Four-Power consultations in Paris over the weekend, the consensus of the rest of the Council was clearly in favour of aiming at a statement which could be issued by the NATO Ministerial Meeting next week expressing a firm position with as positive an accent as might be possible to achieve during the intervening consultations among the Four and among the 15. The Four delegations, however, did their best to prevent any of the rest of us from expecting too much from the December 14 Four-Power meeting and indicated that their governments were disinclined to try to push through an interim reply to the Soviet note of November 27, considering that it would be better tactics not to take a position until they are able to give a considered final reply. This Four-Power position will of course mean that nothing in the nature of counter proposals can be expected for next week, although a statement of principle (largely in terms of what the Western Powers cannot repeat not accept) will be prepared.

3. Since the UK, French, USA and German delegations had indicated that in the circumstances they would prefer to do more listening than speaking, Mr. Spaak invited the rest of us to put forward our views before the position of the Four had become fixed.

4. The Italian representative then stressed the grave consequences of Soviet pressure on Berlin. He was worried, he said, by the mood of Italian public opinion and strongly urged that the Four should, when explaining their refusal of the Soviet proposals, make alternative propositions. He realized that there might not be time to develop counterproposals within the next week but stressed that the position to be adopted by the Western Powers must be the subject of private consultations in NATO before it is made public and indeed before it is finally determined by the Four. Even a counterproposal which we knew the Russians would turn down would be helpful in terms of public opinion.

5. Turning to the paper circulated by the Secretary General the previous day (our telegram 2932 of December 9) Grazzi said he could accept it but hoped ministers would be able to go even further.

6. The Belgian representative agreed. To add weight to the argument that we need positive counterproposals on Berlin, both he and later Mr. Spaak asked the Four what they would do in six months time if the Russians went ahead as they had announced they would. No amount of "firmness" would be able to prevent them. We would then be confronted with an even more difficult problem than that which we faced now in developing alternatives to the Soviet proposals. Therefore, it would be better to negotiate from the present position than from the position that would arise in six months. As Mr. Spaak put it, the West could hardly go to war to stop the Russians from leaving East Berlin.

7. The Belgians representative then asked whether it was not to our advantage to try to enlarge the area of negotiations. The Russians had proposed negotiations on West Berlin. Should we propose negotiations on all of Berlin, or on all of Germany, or on an even wider field? The choice would determine the kind of counterproposals that might be developed on the Western side. For instance, we might consider proposing free elections for the whole of Berlin as a free city linked to the West by a corridor.

8. There was complete agreement with the Greek representative when he said that there could be no question of the West abandoning 2 and a half million Berliners. The Danish and Canadian representatives, while recognizing the difficult timetable, also urged that "a not too negative reply" be made to the Soviet proposals.

9. We were assured by the German representative that the Western reply would not be merely negative, although he could not at present say more. He went on to say that Chancellor Adenauer had been misunderstood in his recent remarks about confining negotiations to the question of Berlin. The Chancellor was as convinced as anybody else that no final solution of the Berlin question was possible without bringing in the question of German reunification. However, he was also convinced that German reunification could not be negotiated within six months and therefore thought that Berlin negotiations must have priority.

10. The French representative also confirmed that the references to Berlin in the NATO ministerial communiqué should constitute neither a rejection nor a counterproposal.

11. The difficulty of being positive was underlined by Roberts (UK) who said that the Foreign Office thought any response to the Russians should meet the following tests:

(a) that it would not put the West at a military disadvantage;

- (b) that it would be acceptable to the Germans;
- (c) and to public opinion generally;
- (d) that the Russians would not be able to turn it down at once;
- (e) that it would have some element of novelty.

12. He added that so far it had been difficult to find anything which would meet these criteria apart from "the outline plan" already agreed among the experts in Bonn to meet a wide range of contingencies.

13. As regards Spaak's paper, the UK reaction was favourable on the first four points but (like the French) dubious of the fifth. In general, they considered an interim reply might create more difficulties than making no reply until a final position had been worked out, since Khrushchev could be expected to reply to any interim proposals and thus limit the Four Powers in formulating their final position.

14. Burgess (USA) elaborated somewhat on the statement of principles which he thought might emerge from the ministerial meetings. It should be sufficiently comprehensive to reassure the Germans and the Berliners that the West would stand by them. It should not, however, be entirely negative. Roberts then indicated that the Four Powers might prepare such a statement and ask the other eleven to support it. I said at once that I thought there should be no public statement by the Three or Four before the NATO Ministerial Meeting. The Danish representative indicated his preference for any Three or Four Power statement to be cleared first with the NATO Ministerial Meeting but issued as a Three or Four Power statement rather than as part of the NATO communiqué.

15. In summing up, Spaak pointed out that a series of principles for the NATO communiqué could be firm without being negative. To declare that we would not abandon the people of Berlin was a positive position. We might also be able to declare our readiness to discuss with the Russians not only Berlin but German reunification and a German peace treaty, since it was difficult to see how Allied withdrawal from Berlin would be anything but an abandonment of the city so long as Germany was a divided country without a peace treaty.

FOUR-POWER MEETING ON BERLIN

In spite of our best efforts to avoid a situation in which the NATO Ministerial Meeting would simply be asked to endorse decisions taken beforehand by the Four Powers, that seems to be precisely what the Four will now ask the fifteen to do. The remaining question is whether the eleven will succeed during the next two days in adding anything in the NATO communiqué to what the Four have already said in their communiqué issued here yesterday evening December 14.⁸⁸

2. From talks we have had with the UK and USA experts (Drinkall and Wolfe) it seems apparent that British efforts to avoid a substantive communiqué by the Four and to work for public agreement to negotiate with the Russians, were overborne at the Ministerial Meeting yesterday by the Germans, the Americans and the French. All the British were able to achieve was to modify the wording of the German draft of the communiqué so that the Four would be speaking only for themselves and would not repeat not appear to anticipate a Western or NATO position.

3. The Four-Power meeting of experts began on Saturday December 13 with a list of French and German questions aimed at defining the position of the Four Powers on procedure and substance. A question and answer paper was drafted on this basis during Saturday, with some of the answers in the form of alternatives, where agreement among experts was incomplete. There was some discussion on Saturday of a communiqué and the Germans circulated a draft stressing that they needed a firm statement chiefly to reassure opinion in Berlin where there were signs of disquiet in the form of some cancellation of business orders and bank withdrawals. Among the experts and in the ministerial meetings which followed, the Germans took the position that any offer to negotiate on Berlin or the larger question would be premature and taken by the Berliners as an indication of Western weakness especially if Western counter-proposals could not repeat not yet be given any precision publicly.

4. The UK argued that each of the governments concerned had already made public statements rejecting the Soviet proposal of November 27 and there was no repeat no need now for a collective rejection; at any rate it should not repeat not be in categorical terms. At the same time the British recognized the force of the German argument that if no repeat no communiqué was issued by the Four, there might be some press speculation as to Western disagreements being referred to the fifteen. It seems to have been largely for this reason, and because they found themselves in the minority, that the British did not repeat not feel they could persist in opposing a Four-Power communiqué although they knew the feelings of the Council (including Canada) and though Mr. Spaak had on Saturday asked both the British and the Americans to avoid a Four-Power communiqué in specific terms that would anticipate the NATO ministerial discussion.

5. Apart from German arguments based on not repeat not disturbing public opinion in Berlin, the Four finally agreed that if the NATO communiqué disclosed Western readiness for negotiations there would be little left to say in the replies which the Four Powers will subsequently send to the Soviet Notes of November 27.

6. Although the German statements and the communiqué took up most of the time of the ministerial meeting yesterday, there was also some discussion of the replies to be made to Soviet Notes of November 27. The French already have a draft which they circulated. It is brief and to the point, answering Soviet propaganda charges in an annex. The British reply (which will be circulated among the Four today) will be a long note, although not repeat not very different in substance. The German draft reply will be here before the end of the week and it is expected that another session of the experts of the Four will be held in Paris following the NATO Ministerial Meeting, i.e. Friday or Saturday. However the British do not repeat not expect the Four to have cleared their replies with NATO and be ready to send them until mid-January. The French are hoping for a much more rapid timetable and think it should be possible to send the Western replies before Christmas. They evidently said in the ministerial meeting yesterday that two days should be sufficient for clearing their replies in the NATO Permanent Council. The British regard this timetable as quite inadequate for purposes of NATO consultation.

7. As far as the German position is concerned, the British told us that the statements made by Mr. Brentano and Mr. Brandt at the ministerial meeting yesterday were exactly the same as what they had been saying in public during the past two weeks. The British raised the possibility of a counter-proposal being made in the replies of the Four Powers in terms of West Berlin becoming part of the Federal Republic, with a linking corridor. However, neither Mr. Brentano nor Mr. Brandt would bite on any change of status for Berlin unless linked with re-unification. The Brentano formula was "no repeat no counter-proposals on Berlin itself." Mr. Brandt agreed.

8. When we specifically asked the Americans what if anything of a positive nature could emerge from the NATO communiqué later this week, Wolfe replied that they had been thinking of some reference to the USA note of the end of September on German re-unification to which the Soviet government have not repeat not yet replied. Such a reference might be understood, he said, not repeat not only to indicate that the ball was in the Russian court but as a hint that subsequent talks on Berlin could be envisaged within the framework of negotiations on re-unification. However he gave us the impression that the Americans were in no repeat no hurry to send their considered reply to the Soviet note of November 27 and were perhaps more disposed than either the British or the French to sit out the next few months without really getting into negotiations. As he put it, the USA government saw no repeat no reason to give in to a Soviet ultimatum. They would negotiate when the ultimatum was in one way or another withdrawn. He recognized, however, that his government might not repeat not be able to stick on this position but it indicates that the toughness of the Four-Power communiqué did not repeat not come only from the Germans.

9. Mr. Spaak will be working with a Four-Power Drafting Group of permanent representatives and experts meeting this morning. We know that he will be trying to take the Four at least a small step forward, but it seems unlikely that the Four will have much to add to the position already taken in their communiqué. They hope to work out with Mr. Spaak during the day a formula whereby NATO as a whole might endorse the Four-Power position, possibly with some re-affirmation of the October 23, 1954, Council statement on Berlin. That statement might also be taken as the precedent for a similar Council statement on this occasion, associating the fifteen with the position of the Four.

10. The Council programme for tomorrow morning December 16 has been changed and Mr. Couve de Murville will present the report of the Four on Berlin immediately after the opening public session (for photographers) and the presidential address of Mr. Luns. In other words, the item on political consultation will be taken later and Berlin will come first. Although there will be a good deal of unhappiness within a number of delegations (including our own and the Italian) with the way in which "political consultation" has been applied in the last few days, it is not repeat not yet clear how much of this will be expressed in the ministerial meeting where there will undoubtedly be risks of leaks to the press and great pressure on all to take a united position on the question of Berlin.

11. Please add to the distribution of this message as you see fit.

NATO'S BERLIN COMMUNIQUÉ

As you know from our telegram 10 December 15, we were none too happy with the procedure of issuing a Four Power communiqué on Berlin on the eve of NATO Ministerial Meeting. We also thought the Four might have struck a somewhat more positive note and were disturbed by the briefings which we had over the weekend indicating that the Four hoped to secure little more than an endorsement of their communiqué by NATO Ministerial Meeting, reserving for their own replies to Soviet Notes of November 27 the indication that they would be prepared for talks with Russians though not repeat not on Khrushchev's terms.

2. When we were faced yesterday a.m. December 16 in Council with the proposal of the Four that NATO meeting should issue a special communiqué on Berlin the same day, we were glad to be appointed to the drafting group which consisted of the Four plus Italy and ourselves. This group of officials went to work after lunch on a draft Mr. Spaak had discussed with the Four privately on December 15. In its revised form it was put to ministers at the end of yesterday afternoon meeting December 16 and approved for release yesterday evening after further substantial revisions.⁸⁹ We sent you the text late yesterday (our reference telegram).

3. Even as issued the communiqué reflects a good deal of the Secretary General's thinking which we supported in the drafting group and in Council. The main addition we were able to secure was the final sentence: "They are still ready to discuss all these problems." Our proposal in drafting group was to say more specifically that they were "still ready to meet to discuss all these problems" but when the draft was put to ministers, Mr. Dulles wanted language which would not repeat not yet commit him publicly to a meeting. He indicated that USA would interpret the language of the final communiqué as meaning that the Western Powers concerned were ready to discuss through diplomatic channels or by correspondence with the USSR the German problem as well as European security and disarmament.

4. The Germans worked hard (and in the end successfully) to add "disarmament" to the traditional formulation of "the German problem and European security." Both in drafting group and in Ministerial Meeting, this was resisted by USA and UK who apparently wanted to keep disarmament as a separate issue not repeat not only because of UN and Geneva negotiations unrelated to Germany but (as we were told earlier by the Americans in private) because they anticipated a German bid to take part in the NATO inner circle when disarmament questions are being prepared at the expert level. For this reason also USA delegation are not repeat not enthusiastic about another reference in general NATO communiqué (to be issued tomorrow) to expert studies on disarmament for the Council. They were quite content with such references in the last two NATO communiqués when there were four members on the team but there are now five and they do not repeat not want a sixth.

5. Although Germans got most of their points into the communiqué in one form or another we cannot concur in the verdict of the German press officer here who is reported this a.m. Friday as saying that the Council "completely approved" the German viewpoint in its entirety. As this a.m.'s papers observe quite rightly, the tone of the NATO communiqué on Berlin is less tough and the thought is (we think) expressed in more sophisticated language. We have also avoided the kind of simple-minded endorsement of the fifteen with the Four-Power statement of December 14. The Council did "fully associate itself" with the views of December 14 statement but we resisted successfully a Four Power (chiefly USA and German) effort to have NATO communiqué consist of nothing more than an "amen" to the Four Power statement. The Four argued for this solution on basis of October 1954 precedent. Mr. Spaak however told the Four quite firmly that this would now be quite inadequate a response from the fifteen who must say what they have to say in their own words and (referring to discussions with Russians) with a more positive accent.

6. It is clearly not repeat not the kind of NATO communiqué we would have drafted ourselves nor is it exactly what the Four wanted. It seems to us however to represent a reasonable compromise position on which NATO should at least in public be strongly united.

7. The final communiqué of the Ministerial Meeting is to include a paragraph saying that the Four Powers will be consulting in the Permanent Council regarding their replies to Soviet Notes of November 27.

CONVERSATION WITH VON BRENTANO

Following from Reid:

The Minister had breakfast on December 18 with Foreign Minister von Brentano. Etzdorf and I were present.

2. After thanking Brentano for the invitation to visit Bonn with the Prime Minister and saying how much the Prime Minister had enjoyed his visit to Germany, the Minister asked whether in the German view disarmament and unification were indissolubly linked. Brentano said that the link was not repeat not indissoluble but the issues were closely related. Discussion on disarmament would create an atmosphere where unification could be more easily discussed.

3. The Minister asked about the possibility of the Russians agreeing to free elections in East Germany. Brentano said there were three reasons why the Russians would not repeat not agree. The Russians have never given up an area that they have occupied. Giving up East Germany would have a dangerous effect on the satellites. East Germany was of economic value to the Russians.

4. The Minister raised the issue of disengagement. Brentano said that the term disengagement was subject to many interpretations. Germany wanted disengagement if it (group corrupt) a relaxation of tension but it must not repeat not result in a shift in the balance of forces. Such a shift would take place if United States troops were to leave Germany. If they left Germany they would leave Europe. The USA had told him this repeatedly and only recently. Once USA troops left Europe that would mean the end of Europe. If the Americans go the Russians come in the day after tomorrow.

5. The Minister emphasized the necessity in negotiating with Khrushchev to provide him with the possibility of compromising without losing face. Brentano agreed entirely. He said you must not repeat not treat Khrushchev like a bad dog and drive him into a corner. If so he will bite. That is why Germany in its reply to the Soviet note will offer to negotiate but not repeat not on the basis of Khrushchev's proposal. The German view is that, in the negotiations, each side should be able to bring forward its special worries.

6. I asked how far it is an oversimplification of the issues to say that the Russians will not repeat not agree to the reunification of Germany if a reunified Germany can stay in NATO while, on the other hand, if Germany leaves NATO the USA forces leave Europe.

7. This question was too direct and Brentano sidestepped it. He said that the Russians had never demanded that Germany leave NATO, that they had not repeat not done so at the Geneva Conference nor when Mikoyan visited Bonn this year. Germany is prepared to agree that the East boundary of NATO would not repeat not be advanced as the result of reunification. He indicated that the position was not repeat not hopeless. He went on to say that once the vital European problems are solved, the world would look different and then it might be possible to agree on a new European security system. The main aim of NATO is defence against dangers. One could think of a new state of affairs in which, as the result of an evolution in the Soviet Union and the satellite countries, these dangers are lessened. One should not repeat not then stick stubbornly to forms which have lost their content. One might come to some kind of modus vivendi with the Russians in a European security system.

8. The Minister raised the question of access to Berlin when the Soviet ultimatum expired. Brentano said that if convoys to Berlin are blocked the only answer would be to use force against force. Otherwise you lose the first battle and by this you lose the whole war. Confidence in the determination of the West to remain firm against the Soviet Union would be shaken all over the world and everybody would rush to make their peace with Moscow. (The term he used was a Volkerwanderung to Moscow). We have our own bitter experiences in Germany of the effect of concessions which the West made to Hitler for the best of motives. There was the occupation of the Rhineland in 1935. If in 1938 the West had stood up to Hitler, one hundred thousand lives would have been lost instead of forty million.

9. The Minister raised the question of the possibility of an international status for Berlin, mentioning specifically a suggestion which had been made that West German troops might take the place of British, American and French troops. Brentano rejected in toto the concept of an international status for Berlin. The presence of West German troops in Berlin would be provocative to the Russians. The Russians would say that the West German troops had no repeat no rights to be in Berlin since West Berlin does not repeat not belong to West Germany. Once the USA troops had left Berlin they would never come back. Moreover, Berlin cut off from the West could not repeat not exist economically. It would lose its Western subsidies and be at the mercy of the Pankow government. As for a UN guarantee, we have had bad experiences. Look at Hungary. (Since we were already pressed for time, it was not repeat not possible to take him up on this suggestion that there had been a UN guarantee to Hungary.)

10. The Minister raised the question of the possible recognition of the East German government. Brentano gave a firm "no" repeat "no." The seventeen million Germans of East Germany would say "this is our death sentence." They would be left without hope. The Pankow government is not repeat not composed of German politicians but of Russian policemen. There is no repeat no use in speaking to the DDR. The DDR are only agents of Moscow, not repeat not a government in the proper sense. Pankow has no repeat no influence on its own affairs. Moreover, if we recognize Pankow, we accept the Russian argument that a unilateral occupation by the Russians results in the formation of a government. This we must not repeat not do. The question of the recognition of Pankow is for the West German government not repeat not a question of prestige.

11. Later in the morning I had a further conversation with Brentano at which Etzdorf was present. I said the Minister had been worried by Brentano's reference to the necessity of using force against force to ensure access to Berlin. At what point did he contemplate the necessity of using force? Brentano said that the decisive point would be a demand by the DDR to inspect the military trucks. It would be possible to accept the stamping of documents by the DDR. If, however, the DDR insisted on inspecting the military truck, the truck would return to the Western side and come back under military escort which would force its way through. I said that opinion in many Western countries would find it difficult to understand why the West would risk hostilities with the Soviet Union on this issue when there was a simple alternative of a small military air lift of a couple of planes a day. This is all that would be necessary to carry the military traffic.

12. Brentano said that the worrying possibility was not repeat not the stopping of military traffic but the stopping of supplies for the civil population of Berlin. In his view, the Soviet government would probably tell the DDR not repeat not to interfere with military traffic but to interfere with the civilian traffic. The aim of this would be to starve Berlin out. This had to be prevented otherwise Berlin would be lost. Moreover, if the Western side showed weakness the Berliners, thinking they were about to be given up, might start rioting as in June 1953, as an act of despair. If you are about to be strangled you will resist. An airlift for civilian traffic to Berlin is now impossible. The Berlin of 1948 was, like the rest of Germany at that time, on a "barracks" economy. This is no repeat no longer true. Therefore if the DDR stops the civilian traffic to Berlin, the civilian trucks will have to return with a military escort and force their way through.

13. He went on to say that there was a sound legal basis for such action. The Soviet government had guaranteed free access for civilian traffic to Berlin. The three Western Powers are under an obligation to ensure that civilian supplies reach West Berlin.

14. I said I was not repeat not aware that the Soviet Notes contained a threat to stop civilian traffic to Berlin. Brentano said that there was a definite threat in the Soviet Note.

15. I said that this suggestion that the Western Powers should, if necessary, use military force to get civilian supplies through to Berlin raised such important issues that they surely should be discussed in the North Atlantic Council soon. Brentano replied forcefully that in his opinion, in the next few weeks the North Atlantic Council must discuss what is to be done when the Soviet ultimatum expires.

16. (Etdorf commented to me afterwards that Brentano had in this conversation given an exposition of the German view which was new to the German Foreign Office.)

BERLIN: USA REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES OF NOVEMBER 27

Although draft replies of 4 Powers to Soviet notes of November 27 will not repeat not be ready for NATO circulation until December 23-24, we were shown today text of USA delegation draft and State Department comments on it. Delegation draft had been cleared with 4 Power expert group here but State Department comments have not repeat not yet been cleared with other three.

2. Note is different in form but identical in substance with French, UK and German draft replies, though these delegations (like USA) have yet to clear with their colleagues comments from their foreign offices.

3. Note begins by using Soviet Foreign Office quotations of 1939 to show that it is Soviet government rather than USA which can be accused of pursuing policies of "Hitlerism."

4. Situation in Berlin is "result of very nature of German problem as it has existed since 1945," when more than one third of present Soviet zone was exchanged for Western sector of Berlin as "agreed quid pro quo." On assumption that Soviet Union would not repeat not be willing to turn back to Western Powers those positions of "GDR", USA is not repeat not prepared to relinquish "rights acquired by victory." Agreements of September 12/44 and May 1/45, are therefore binding until replaced in free negotiations. Though Potsdam Agreement is not repeat not relevant to Berlin, it is USSR which has been responsible for fact that agreement could not repeat not be implemented. "Common responsibility for settlement of German question" (including Berlin) was recognized by Heads of Government at Geneva July 23/55.

5. Though USA cannot repeat not prevent USSR government from terminating its authority in East Berlin, it "will not repeat not and does not repeat not in any way accept a unilateral denunciation" of 1944 and 1945 agreements nor is it willing "to relieve USSR of obligations assumed in 1949" (June 6 agreement). Therefore USA will "continue to hold Soviet government directly responsible under existing agreements." This includes Soviet obligations re freedom of access in this respect. The USA will not repeat not recognize substitution of DDR for Soviet authority. The Three Powers have responsibility for the freedom and security of more than two million West Berliners. They cannot repeat not accept arrangements which would jeopardise communications by surface and air between the city and Federal Republic. Therefore proposal for creation of "the so-called free city of West Berlin, as put forward by Soviet Union, is unacceptable." (State Department comment on the point that Western Powers are not repeat not merely trying to retain what Soviet propaganda calls their "privileges" but seek to maintain arrangements essential for freedom and security of West Berlin.)

6. The note then goes on to deny that 10,000 Western troops in Berlin can constitute a threat to 350,000 Russians and over 200,000 East Germans under arms in Soviet zone. "Inhabitants of West Berlin recently reaffirmed in a free vote their overwhelming approval and support for existing status of that city."

7. Finally, USA draft agreed with Soviet government that occupation of Berlin is not repeat not normal and deplors it, but blames USSR for delay in negotiating a peace treaty. After reunification Berlin would take its rightful position as capital of Germany. "Berlin is only one aspect, and not repeat not essential one, of German problem in its entirety," including reunification and European security as well as a peace treaty. "USA has always been and continues today to be ready to discuss it." This was made clear in their September 30 Note offering to discuss in any appropriate forum Western proposals "or any other proposals genuinely designed to ensure reunification of Germany in freedom." "Public repudiation of engagements ... coupled with an ultimatum threatening unilateral action unless it be acquiesced in within 6 months, would afford no repeat no reasonable basis for negotiation between sovereign states." USA could not repeat not embark on discussions with Soviet Union under "menace or ultimatum." Indeed, if that were intended, USA would be obliged to raise a protest in strongest terms. Hence, it is assumed that this is not repeat not purpose of November 27 proposal and that Soviet government, like itself, is ready to enter into discussions in an atmosphere devoid of coercion or threats. USA would be interested to learn whether Soviet government is ready to enter into discussions upon this basis by the Four Powers concerned. It would be object of USA to discuss question of Berlin in general framework of negotiations for a solution of German problem as a whole. USA would welcome views of Soviet government at an early date.

BERLIN

Yesterday evening December 22 the Four Power Expert Group, which has been meeting in Paris, announced that they had reached agreement on the replies to be sent to the Soviet Notes of November 27. As soon as the four governments have approved the final drafts of the experts, the four draft notes will be circulated in NATO, probably by tomorrow December 24. On this basis, Council would consider the drafts on December 29 and they would be sent the following day for release December 31.

2. This timetable means in effect that the Four Powers concerned are assuming that the rest of us in Council will agree substantially with their drafts and have only minor changes to suggest in Council. If any really substantive points are raised, the Four Powers realize that it might be necessary to have a further Council meeting to consider them. Although there is nothing absolute about the present timetable, the Four Powers (and particularly the French and the USA) see advantages in keeping to it if possible. One reason, as de Courcel (French Permanent Representative) told me recently is that the Soviet government should have a chance to consider the replies before Mikoyan leaves for the USA (I am reporting separately on this conversation). Another reason as we have heard from the UK delegation, is that delays for further Council meetings will multiply press leaks and rumours of allied disagreements.

3. Assuming that the other replies which we have not repeat not yet seen will be substantially the same as the USA reply (our reference telegram) our guess is that there will be little disposition in Council on December 29 to press for a more flexible wording of the replies and still less for including at this stage any specific hints of Western counterproposals. From our talks with other delegations here, we think that there will be general support for the Four Powers thesis that these replies are not repeat not and should not repeat not be more than a counter statement of the Western position, coupled with a readiness to negotiate on the entire German problem including Berlin, but not repeat not on Soviet terms, as the NATO ministers declared last week. The only point that may cause some worries is the implication which can be drawn from the USA reply that until the USSR officially withdraw their ultimatum, there will be no repeat no negotiations. If this is in fact the meaning of the USA note, some governments may question this point, although it seems to us that it is (and should be) open to a less rigid interpretation.

4. If, as we expect, the December 29 meeting generally accepts the Four Power replies as drafted, it seems to us desirable that the Secretary General or some delegation should ask when the Council will be in a position to discuss the more delicate (and more important) aspects of the Berlin problem. Indeed in Council we have yet to begin the process of allied consultations in preparation both for negotiations and for contingencies likely to arise in the event of a Soviet withdrawal from East Berlin and transfer to the DDR of control of access to West Berlin. While we must make allowances for the security problem, there has already been enough informed speculation in the press to justify some Council consultations on problems which undoubtedly could affect the security not repeat not only of Berlin but of every member in the Alliance. It is encouraging that the Germans also think (our telegram 2994 December 19 from Mr. Reid) that the Council should discuss in the next few weeks what is to be done when the Soviet ultimatum expires. Perhaps some of the rest of us would also like to discuss what is to be done before the deadline expires, since, as Spaak has repeatedly pointed out, the Western negotiating position may thereafter deteriorate and will certainly not repeat not improve.

5. As soon as we get the other three draft replies, we shall send you the main extracts by telegram. When you have had a chance to study them, request instructions.

BERLIN: DRAFT USA REPLY TO SOVIET NOTE OF NOVEMBER 27

Following is full text of USA draft reply which was circulated to all delegations today. Text Begins:

1. Government of USA acknowledges Note which was addressed to it by government of USSR under date of November 27.

2. Note contains a long elaboration on events which preceded and followed the last war. It attempts to portray Western Powers — France, UK and USA — as supporters of Hitlerism as against USSR. This portrayal is in sharp contrast with actual facts. In this connection we refer to contemporaneous statement made by Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs to Supreme Soviet of USSR on October 31, 1939. In that statement he refers among other things to “conclusion of Soviet-German Non-Aggression Pact of August 23” and points out “We now had a rapprochement and establishment of friendly relations between USSR and Germany.” Statements goes on to assail UK and French governments for their opposition to Hitlerism in following language: “The ruling circles of Britain and France have been lately attempting to depict themselves as champions of democratic rights of nations against Hitlerism and UK government has announced that its aim in the war with Germany is nothing more nor less than the ‘destruction of Hitlerism’ ... Everybody will understand that an ideology cannot be destroyed by force, that it cannot be eliminated by war. It is therefore not repeat not only senseless but criminal to wage such a war — a war for the ‘destruction of Hitlerism,’ camouflaged as a fight for ‘democracy’.”

3. The situation of Berlin of which USSR complains and which it considers abnormal is a result of the very nature of German problem such as it has existed since 1945. When empire of Hitler collapsed the Western allies were in military possession of more than one-third of what is now Soviet zone of Germany. USSR was in possession of Berlin. As a result of the agreements of September 12, 1944 and May 1, 1945 the Western allies withdrew and permitted a Soviet occupation of large parts of Mecklenburg, Saxony, Thuringia and Anhalt. In return USSR granted the Three Western Powers sectors in West Berlin, then an area of rubble.

4. USSR has directly and through its puppet régime — the so-called GDR — consolidated its hold over the large areas which Western allies relinquished to it. It now demands that Western allies should relinquish the positions in Berlin which in effect were the agreed “quid pro quo.”

5. The Three Western Powers are there as occupying powers and they are not repeat not prepared to relinquish the rights which they acquired through victory just as they assume USSR is not repeat not willing now to restore to the occupancy of Western Powers the position which they had won in Mecklenburg, Saxony, Thuringia and Anhalt and which under agreements of 1944 and 1945 they turned over to the disposition of USSR.

6. The agreements made by the Four Powers cannot be considered obsolete because USSR has already obtained full advantage therefrom and now wishes to deprive the other parties of their compensating advantages. These agreements are binding upon all of the signatories so long as they have not repeat not been replaced by others following free negotiation.

7. Insofar as Potsdam Agreement is concerned status of Berlin does not repeat not depend upon that agreement. Moreover it is USSR that bears responsibility for the fact that Potsdam Agreement could not repeat not be implemented.

8. Soviet memorandum purports formally to repudiate agreements of September 12, 1944 and May 1, 1945. This repudiation in fact involves other and more recent engagements. We refer in this connection to the Four Power Agreement of June 21, 1949 whereby among other things USSR assumed “an obligation” to assure normal functioning of transport and communication between Berlin and the Western zones of Germany. This “obligation” USSR now purports to shed. USA also refers to “Summit” Agreement of July 23, 1955 whereby Four Powers recognized “their common responsibility for settlement of the German question,” a phrase which necessarily includes the problem of Berlin. Apparently USSR now attempts to free itself from these agreed responsibilities and obligations.

9. USA government cannot prevent USSR from announcing termination of its own authority in the quadripartite régime in the sector which it occupies in the city of Berlin. On other hand government of USA will not repeat not and does not repeat not in any way accept a unilateral denunciation of the accords of 1944 and 1945; nor is it prepared to relieve USSR from obligations which it assumed in June 1949. Such action on part of USSR would have no repeat no legal basis since the agreements can only be terminated by mutual consent. Government of USA will continue to hold USSR directly responsible under existing agreements. As USSR knows the French, UK and USA governments have the right to maintain garrisons in their sectors of Berlin and to have free access thereto. Certain administrative procedures have been agreed with Soviet authorities accordingly and are in operation at present time. Government of USA will not repeat not accept a unilateral repudiation on part of USSR of its obligations in respect of that freedom of access. Nor will it accept substitution of German authorities in Soviet zone for USSR in this respect.

10. In view of government of USA there can be no repeat no “threat” to USSR or German régime in Soviet zone from presence of French, UK and USA garrisons in Berlin. Nor can there be any military threat from Berlin to USSR and the régime in Soviet zone. Forces of the three Western Powers in Berlin number about ten thousand men. USSR on the other hand is said to maintain some three hundred and fifty thousand troops in Eastern zone of Germany while the régime of Soviet occupied zone is understood also to maintain over two hundred thousand men under arms. In these circumstances the fear that Western troops in Berlin may “inflict harm” appears to be wholly unfounded. If Berlin has become a focus of international tension it is because USSR has deliberately threatened to disturb the existing arrangements at present in force there, arrangements to which USSR is itself a party. The inhabitants of West Berlin have recently reaffirmed in a free vote their overwhelming approval and support for existing status of that city. The continued protection of freedom of more than two million people of West Berlin is a right and responsibility solemnly accepted by the Three Western Powers. Thus USA cannot consider any proposal which would have effect of jeopardizing freedom and security of these people. The rights of the Three Powers to remain in Berlin with unhindered communications by surface and air between that city and the Federal Republic of Germany are under existing conditions essential to discharge of that right and responsibility. Hence the proposal for a so-called "free city" for West Berlin, as put forward by USSR, is unacceptable.

11. As is stated in USSR's Note of November 27, it is certainly not repeat not normal that thirteen years after end of the war there should still remain in a part of German territory a system of occupancy instituted in 1945. USA deplores this fact and the fact that Germany has not repeat not yet been reunified so that Berlin might resume its rightful position as capital of a united Germany. If the treaty of peace, which alone can bring an end to this situation, has not repeat not been concluded with a reunited Germany, the responsibility in no way rests with the Three Western Powers which have not repeat not spared any effort to bring the Four Powers out of the impasse where they have so long found themselves. Pending the conclusion of a peace treaty, the present situation continues.

12. In reality the form of government in Berlin, the validity of which USSR attempts to contest today, is only one aspect, and not repeat not the essential one, of the German problem in its entirety. This problem which has often been defined involves the well known questions of reunification, European security, as well as a peace treaty. It has in the past been discussed without success in the course of numerous international meetings with Soviets. Government of USA has always been and continues today to be ready to discuss it. USA made clear this readiness in its Note to USSR of September 30, 1958 in which it was stated:

'Government of USA is ready at any time to enter into discussions with USSR on basis of these proposals (i.e. Western proposals for free all-German elections and free decisions for an all-German government) or of any other proposals genuinely designed to insure reunification of Germany in freedom in any appropriate forum. It regards the solution of the German problem as essential if a lasting settlement in Europe is to be achieved.'

USSR has not repeat not yet seen fit to reply to this Note.

13. Public repudiation of solemn engagements, formally entered into and repeatedly reaffirmed, coupled with an ultimatum threatening unilateral action to implement that repudiation unless it be acquiesced in within six months, would afford no repeat no reasonable basis for negotiation between sovereign states. Government of USA could not repeat not embark on discussions with USSR upon these questions under menace or ultimatum; indeed if that were intended USA would be obliged immediately to raise a protest in the strongest terms. Hence it is assumed that this is not repeat not the purpose of Soviet Note of November 27 and that USSR like itself is ready to enter into discussions in an atmosphere devoid of coercion or threats.

14. USA government would be interested to learn whether USSR is ready to enter into discussions upon this basis by the Four Powers concerned. It would be the object of government of USA to discuss question of Berlin in the general framework of negotiations for a solution of the German problem as a whole. USA would welcome the views of USSR at an early date. Text Ends.

BERLIN SITUATION

We have examined the proposed replies to the Soviet notes of November 27 as provided in your telegrams 3035,† 3036, and 3040† of December 24 and we have no objection to the general line that is being followed. We do not see that from the Canadian standpoint any basic alterations need be suggested in the Council meeting on December 29.

2. We would think it well to obtain confirmation in the December 29 meeting of your assumption (paragraph 3 telegram 3029) that the USA stand on negotiations is open to the less rigid interpretation you suggest. We think it should be made as simple as possible for the Russians to alter their so-called "ultimatum." (It was, after all, only an "ultimatum" in so far as withdrawal of Russian guards from check points is concerned and not an ultimatum on withdrawal of Western troops.) We would be unhappy if the USA were to require a formal "retraction."

3. If you consider that brief comments on the future outlook are appropriate you could say that we hope that full examination will be given by the Council early in the near year to the possible lines of approach that the Western Powers might conceivably adopt. We agree with your paragraph 4 on this point and think you should make this point if you intervene in Council. We share Spaak's view that the Western negotiating position may well deteriorate if time is allowed to run out.

4. It would comfort us if we obtained evidence that the major powers were, in fact, trying to tackle this problem with vigour and imagination. As we have mentioned before, we hope that the Western position can be firm but not inflexible. The private thinking and exploration of possibilities on the part of the major powers concerned and, indeed, of all NATO members, should not be confined to the public positions we have adopted.

BERLIN

In Council December 29 there was little discussion of draft USA, UK, French and German replies. Delegations seemed to accept the general line proposed. USA and French delegations have circulated minor amendments to their texts which we will transmit by separate telegram. Intention now is that replies will be delivered on December 31.

2. Belgian delegation and ourselves were only countries to comment specifically on draft replies. Main Belgian suggestion was that paragraph 13 of USA draft (their corresponding paragraphs of the other draft replies) should be amended so as not repeat not to infer that USSR has already repudiated the "solemn engagements" referred to. Referring to amendments circulated on December 29 by USA and French delegations, Belgian representative welcomes the reference in final paragraph of both notes to readiness on part of these governments "to discuss question of Berlin in wider framework of negotiations for a solution of German problem as well as that of European security" (USA text). We presume same reference to European security will be included in UK reply although this was not repeat not specifically mentioned in Council.

3. With regard to paragraph 13 of USA draft reply, we spoke along lines of paragraph 2 your reference telegram pointing out that reports of Gromyko's December 25 statement to Supreme Soviet suggest a denial by Gromyko's that Soviet proposals on Berlin constitute an ultimatum. Burgess stated that the four Western countries had given this point serious consideration during drafting processes and have attempted to make allowance for it in last sentence of paragraph 13 of USA text (and similar sentences in other draft replies). However both USA and UK permanent representatives pointed to apparent softening of Soviet statements since Khrushchev's original declaration in early November and also to difficulty of sorting any positive element out of Gromyko's generally negative statement on December 25.

4. USA permanent representative then informed Council that the four Western countries have received during Christmas weekend almost identical Soviet notes concerning terminology generally used by Western countries in referring to East German régime. Emphasizing again that USSR has normal diplomatic relations with East Germany as an independent state, these new Soviet notes apparently warned that future Western notes addressed to USSR will be rejected if they disregard this relationship through the use of such terms as "Soviet zone of Germany," "Eastern zone etc." The four Western governments are apparently still consulting on best way of meeting this problem in their current replies. However on balance both these countries and others considered it desirable to avoid rejection of these replies to Soviet Note of November 27, provided a suitable formula could be found for referring to East German régime without jeopardizing the Western position on recognition.

5. Although precise wording has yet to be decided, USA, UK, France and Germany are apparently agreed that the new Soviet note does not repeat not reject any particular terminology except "Soviet occupied zone." They also expressed interest in Spaak's suggestion (which also seemed to find general support in Council) that replies could be phrased so as to establish distinction between actual territory in East Germany and the East German authorities and in such a way as to be purely factual. e.g. Western representatives could simply describe actual territory of East Germany as "zone assigned to you (i.e. USSR)" East German authorities could also be referred to as "authorities recognized by you (i.e. USSR)." Spaak also suggested that these new notes provide further evidence that one of Soviet objections in participating Berlin crisis is still recognition by the West of East Germany.

6. In summary draft replies as previously transmitted to you will probably be held December 31 along with minor amendments which we will report by separate telegram. Final text of replies will also be circulated as NATO documents.⁹⁰ Incidentally USA permanent representative raised question as to whether Soviet notes re NATO transmitted to all member governments on December 13 should be mentioned in current replies of the four Western countries. It was agreed that this would be confusing and that Council might give further consideration to this particular Soviet initiative early in the year.

LAST THOUGHTS (1958) ON BERLIN

Following for Under-Secretary. In your reference telegram you said that you would be comforted "If we (the department) obtained evidence that major powers were in fact trying to tackle this (Berlin) problem with vigour and imagination." The special Council meeting on Berlin December 29 has been uninspiring and depressing. As a new chapter in cold war the Four Powers Notes in reply to Soviet Note are flat; on substance of the matter they add nothing new. There are no repeat no indications here that the question of Berlin is being pursued with vigour and imagination by the countries directly concerned; it is of such importance however that something must be done about it. Unfortunately I have come to the conclusion that Council will not repeat not be of much assistance in this respect during next few weeks. Smaller powers seem to be paralyzed when confronted with decisions arrived at by the Four Powers. Other avenues should therefore be explored.

⁹⁰ Pour les textes définitifs des répliques, voir/For the final texts of the replies, see Wolfgang Heidelmeyer and Guenter Hindrichs, eds., Documents on Berlin, 1943-1963 (Munich, 1963), pp. 212-233.

2. When looking at timetable immediately ahead of us I am wondering if consideration should not repeat not be given immediately following Mikoyan's visit to USA to having a meeting of Four Heads of Government of countries more directly concerned prior to April Ministerial Meeting in Washington. This would still be within the six months limit and would fall at a time when politically — and for a variety of different domestic reasons — Messrs. Macmillan Adenauer and de Gaulle might be willing if not eager to meet with President Eisenhower. There is some urgency in this matter since according to unconfirmed reports, plans may be made in near future for General de Gaulle to go to Washington. (Dupuy to whom I am referring copy of this telegram may wish to comment on this.)

3. Naturally there are many serious complications ahead if this idea is to be pursued but I cannot think of any other way to get the West out of the rut. In any event such an initiative would it seems to me flow normally from discussions in NATO Council since agreement was reached on desirability for West of discussing with USSR such issues as reunification of Germany and European security. Such a meeting with Soviets requires long preparations and a complete harmony of views between leaders of the West. This could better be done at highest possible level. Happy New Year.

INTRODUCTION

This year's December meeting convenes during a period when the Alliance is being subjected to a number of strains. In part they have their origin in the political and financial difficulties involved in implementing the decisions in principle arrived at during the Heads of Government meeting last December. In large measure they stem from concern over certain aspects of United States policy particularly in the Far East, a growing French independence under General de Gaulle's leadership, and divergent Western views on such fundamental issues as the role of Alliance in respect of global problems, disengagement and the situation in Berlin. The Cyprus issue, the U.K.-Iceland dispute and the breakdown of negotiations between the Free Trade Area and Common Market groups have accentuated internal disharmony within the Alliance. It is a time when the Soviet Union is showing a new cocksureness, when the United Nations is experiencing increasing frustrations in its attempts at agreements, when disarmament negotiations are making little headway and when the forces of neutralism are increasing their influence in many areas of the world.

The situation demands a realistic reappraisal of basic positions. Perseverance and patience will be required if we are to preserve the unity and strength of the Alliance.

Military Problems

2. Traditionally, the December meeting has as its main task consideration of the Annual Review of the military programmes of the Alliance, carefully prepared and agreed beforehand at the official level. The Annual Review, however, was considerably different this year. Largely at our suggestion, it was used not merely as in the past to draw up a balance sheet of the military situation in the Alliance but also as an exercise to find out and study the reactions of countries to the financial, economic and military implications of MC 70 — the recommended minimum force requirements for the period 1958-63, when the costly and complicated weapons of the nuclear age will be introduced into NATO forces.

3. To date, the Annual Review has revealed a large gap between requirements and national capacities and willingness to make the necessary sacrifices. Moreover, the time period covered has varied in different countries' replies, making it doubly difficult to assess the situation. While the tactic of countries putting in 'low bids' is obviously present, SACEUR is of the opinion that a real multilateral discussion will be necessary at the meeting if MC 70 is to be implemented adequately.

4. Because of unresolved defence problems in North America, it was not possible for the Canadian Delegation to be as forthcoming as in previous years. Moreover, the termination of the NATO air training programmes, the virtual conclusion of production of defence equipment for new and reconditioned military equipment prevented us from suggesting that we could maintain the level of mutual aid at even its present level. These proved to be the objects of some criticism from the International Staff especially since the procedure this year was (at our request), intended to project over the next 5 years. Although our defence effort compares favourably with that of other countries, it would seem appropriate for Canadian Ministers in Paris to say a few words about our position in respect to the Annual Review by way of explaining the reasons for our reticence and the immensity of our North American defence responsibilities which form an essential part of the NATO deterrent. On mutual aid, some indication of its level during 1959-60 might be given at the meeting, probably along with some explanation of the reasons for any reduction.

5. Disagreement on the Annual Review, however, will probably be of minor consequence compared to two other developments which may face the meeting. The first relates to recent French and U.K. unwillingness to go along with the NATO military recommendations concerning the integration of European air defence. If one or both of these states persist in their attitude it could well mean the end of one of the most practical ways of ensuring interdependence in the European context.

6. Similarly there are signs that France is refusing to accept the installation of IRBM's and nuclear stock piles on French territory on the terms offered by the United States. While the arguments to date have largely revolved around the financing of the common infrastructure of fixed missile emplacements, etc., there are indications that basically the French are holding out for custody and control over the use of weapons delivery systems and nuclear warheads situated on their territory. In this case the French are obviously creating a delicate situation for SACEUR. To get what they want would require special Congressional legislation to release some of the material. But not only that, it could well create an unfortunate precedent which might be taken up by other countries and thereby weaken NATO control over these weapons of mass destruction.

Political Problems

7. As Mr. Léger has pointed out, the present Agenda for the meeting on the political side bears little relation to the real problems facing the Alliance. These might be summarized as follows:

Berlin and the German Problem

8. The latest Soviet ultimatum on Berlin advocating the establishment of a "free city" for the Western part of the former German capital is clearly unacceptable. More important, however, is the dilemma facing the Western Powers in the face of the announced Soviet intention of turning over their responsibilities for the Eastern sector and communications with West Germany to the G.D.R. authorities in the event of non-acceptance. To date, the main Western Powers have displayed a divergence of views regarding a future course of action. The West German Government favours standing firm. In reply to questions at a Press conference on November 26⁹¹ (before receipt of Mr. Khrushchev's note to President Eisenhower on Berlin), Mr. Dulles indicated that there was a possibility of dealing with G.D.R. functionaries on minor administrative matters as agents of the USSR without accepting the substitution of the G.D.R. for the USSR in the discharge of the latter's obligations towards the three Western Powers. The United Kingdom is currently advocating a solution of the Berlin problem in the context of a modified version of the traditional Western plan for reunification involving an element of partial regional disarmament.

9. While we have indicated publicly our rejection of the Soviet proposals we have not as yet clarified our thinking with respect to possible counter proposals. However, the following principles could serve as guidance in formulating our position at the NATO meeting.

(i) The situation in Berlin is of direct concern to NATO as a whole by virtue of the association of the Alliance with the Tripartite Declaration of 1954;⁹² in the circumstances we should encourage substantive discussions in the NATO Council;

(ii) Western deliberations should go beyond tactics to encompass longer run solutions;

(iii) A realistic rather than a formalistic approach to the problems of Berlin and a German settlement would seem to be required;

(iv) Too much importance should not be attached to the question of routine low level contacts with G.D.R. officials;

(v) We should advocate the avoidance or threat of the use of force in the event the USSR transfers authority to the G.D.R.

(A memorandum outlining in more detail the Soviet proposals on Berlin and the Western reaction thereto is contained in the briefing notes for the delegation.)

Disarmament

10. Arrangements have been made to keep the NATO Council informed of the talks in Geneva on nuclear tests and surprise attack, but there has been no discussion to date in the Council. It appears likely that the Secretariat will have prepared in advance of the meeting a summary of the results at the time of the opening of the Ministerial meeting. Little progress has been made on nuclear tests and the surprise attack discussions are expected to fold up shortly. Some substantive discussion will undoubtedly result in NATO although there is no specific agenda item on disarmament.

⁹² Voir le volume 20, les documents 272 à 274, 280./See Volume 20, Documents 272-274, 280.

11. Briefing notes summarizing the Geneva talks on nuclear tests and surprise attack have been prepared for the Delegation. The section dealing with surprise attack contains an outline of a possible Canadian initiative at Paris. This would encompass the thesis that national, continental and NATO defence and security are not likely to be greatly increased by a system of safeguards based only on inspection, observation and reporting, without additional disarmament measures which would place restrictions on the size of armament or deployment of forces.

12. There is also a section on the recent discussions in the United Nations of outer space. The suggestion is made that there would appear to be a pressing need for giving consideration to the disarmament aspects of outer space.

Disengagement

13. It is not expected that the subject will be discussed at the meeting but the concept will undoubtedly loom in the background. A memorandum† summarizing the Rapacki proposals has been included in the briefing notes along with annexes which describe briefly other plans for disengagement which have been advanced from time to time. The memorandum outlines some of the main objections to the revised Rapacki proposals and suggests that we should not take the initiative in raising the subject at the meeting. In addition, it would seem desirable to avoid appearing to over-emphasize its importance by referring to the subject at press conferences or in any press communiqué.

Political Consultation

14. General de Gaulle's proposals to President Eisenhower and Mr. Macmillan stimulated the Secretary General to prepare a paper on political co-operation which expounds inter alia the following themes:

- (i) Consultation should aim at common lines of policy and action;
- (ii) Because the Soviet threat is global NATO must strive towards a common policy on global issues;
- (iii) Consultation on global issues involves a degree of responsibility on the part of all NATO members.

15. In our commentary on the Secretary General's paper we have reached the following conclusions as a possible basis for a Canadian position at the meeting:

- (i) We agree with the necessity of intensifying and expanding the scope of political consultations, but we cannot accept that a basic objective is the formation of a common policy on matters outside the Treaty area;
- (ii) Although consultation should be regarded as a duty between Allies we would propose in the interests of encouraging discussion that a general understanding be reached to the effect that consultations in whatever context do not imply consent or commitments beyond the military political commitments deriving from the Treaty;
- (iii) When member governments discuss matters of concern to the Alliance outside the NATO framework they should submit the outcome of their deliberation to further consultations within the Council.

15. In addition to the commentary on the Secretary General's report a separate briefing note has been prepared on General de Gaulle's proposals summarizing the reaction in NATO capitals and the Canadian position as explained by Mr. Diefenbaker during his conversation with the French leader.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

1. Following telegram 2933 December 19 from NATO Paris has been approved by Under-Secretary. Text Begins:

“Although we did not repeat not have an opportunity to compare notes with Minister in any detail before his departure for London, our general impression was that discussion of communiqué yesterday p.m. December 18 became chaotic and, particularly on point of military doctrine, suffered from intrusion of Spaak’s own views. By end of meeting yesterday p.m., Spaak from chair had become a strong partisan of German thesis (supported by most of the continental Europeans) that Council’s communiqué reference to readiness to use nuclear retaliatory forces should be unmistakable. Due to these pressures, after a long debate, communiqué paragraph on this subject went considerably beyond NATO doctrine, implying as it does that we are ready to use such forces to repel any aggression. For the Europeans and particularly for Germans, more orthodox language supported by Boty, McElroy and Sandys was regarded as inadequate in context of Council’s current preoccupation with Berlin. To say, as Sandys at one point proposed, that such forces would be ready “should need arise in order to repel aggression” seemed to many of Europeans to imply in this context that NATO might not repeat not use nuclear weapons for defence of Berlin.

2. Minister tried hard to avoid in communiqué any reference to nuclear retaliatory forces, arguing that to repeat familiar doctrine at each Council meeting was unnecessary, and in present context undesirable. He was supported by Norwegian and Danish delegations. However, Sandys, in view of his own proposal previous day when defence matters had been under discussion, felt that it was essential for the Council to take a position mentioning NATO readiness to use retaliatory forces. He had several formulations of his thought in which he strove to combine ideas that retaliatory forces would be used only in event of aggression, and that in this case their use would be dictated by the need. However, so determined were Germans that the Council must nail down (so far as they could in a communiqué) Strategic Air Command and UK Bomber Commands as standing behind Western position in Berlin, that at one critical point in discussion van Scherprenbern (Head of Foreign Office Bonn) got General Norstad to whisper in Spaak’s ear. Mr. Spaak’s next intervention was to explain that while UK and USA proposals were quite correct as a statement of NATO doctrine for internal use, it was politically undesirable to be ambiguous in present circumstances in what we said publicly.

3. Intervention of UK, Scandinavian and Canadian delegations might be summarized by saying that for them credibility of deterrent would be reduced rather than increased by such an extreme statement of what everybody knows to be true NATO position. As finally agreed, there are words intended to meet our position, but our point of view was not repeated not given much satisfaction.

4. In other respects communiqué is, we think, sensible if unexciting. Main differences which arose in drafting were over following points:

(a) Disarmament. Flat statement that Council had heard reports on Geneva discussions was factual. We would have liked to have added a note of hope for success of negotiations but French were clearly opposed to this as far as Conference on Tests was concerned and there was some doubt in other minds as to whether it was realistic to express too much hope for the Surprise Attack Conference which adjourned in deadlock during the day.

(b) In view of the clash in OEEC on December 15 between the UK and French ministers, some reference to the FTA negotiations was perhaps inevitable though many (including ourselves and the Americans) had hoped it could be avoided. Finally, language was found on which the six and the eleven were in agreement. The Minister tried to add to that language the thought that a solution of this matter must be "generally acceptable" (i.e. to the USA and Canada as well) but withdrew when the Germans suggested that Canada was unnecessarily suspicious. We accepted the wording subject to the reservation expressed by the Prime Minister at the 1957 meeting.

(c) Negotiations. Although there was some corridor talk among delegations of perhaps issuing a more direct appeal for top negotiations than had been evident in the Council's communiqué on Berlin on December 16, ministers finally agreed to take more or less the same position that NATO governments would continue to seek a just solution of the German question, European security and controlled disarmament.

(d) East-West. Mr. Dulles made a valuable point by securing the deletion of references to "East" and "West" as open to misunderstanding in Asia and the Mid East, though the replacement phrases ("the free world" and "the Communist world") are not ideal. Later we were assured by Roberts that the Yugoslavs would not object to our reference to "the Communist Bloc," since they consider themselves outside it.

5. A significant omission from the communiqué is the intended paragraph on integration of defence efforts where unfortunately those chiefly concerned could not agree on anything more than the usual clichés which did not seem worth repeating. Some of the smaller European countries had hoped to secure agreement on a more specific reference to the need to economize on defence budgets by rationalization of production of new weapons and integration of European forces and air defence. Well known French difficulties were among the chief obstacles.

6. As Mr. Spaak and the Germans intended, the paragraph about readiness to use nuclear retaliatory forces has caught the headlines. From a few talks we have had with other delegations and with General Parker, representative of the Standing Group, since the meeting, it seems to be generally understood that there is no change in NATO doctrine as a result of this communiqué.⁹³ It is understood, as Mr. Spaak interpreted it in Council yesterday, as an expedient public formulation in the context of Berlin. The actual position remains that limited incursions in the NATO area would be met by limited means. It must, however, be remembered that tactical weapons are part of the shield forces and might be used, if necessary, without taking the decision to use retaliatory forces. The most satisfactory formula is probably that of President Eisenhower, speaking to the NATO Heads of Government meeting last December when he said that the USA would intervene "with all appropriate force." This statement was repeated by Mr. McElroy during the course of the present ministerial meeting.

REPORT ON NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION
 MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING; PARIS (PREVIOUS REFERENCE DEC. 9)

51. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the recent meeting of the N.A.T.O. Ministerial Council in Paris, said that a formal report was being prepared.⁹⁴ The Berlin situation had overhung the whole meeting. The Germans had adopted a tough attitude and wanted to get N.A.T.O. tied down to a statement that the Khrushchev proposals were unacceptable. The U.K. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Selwyn Lloyd, had not been enthusiastic about the four-power statement. With all the talk about political consultation within N.A.T.O. it seemed that de Gaulle had got his way and the Big Four had settled it. None of the other members of the N.A.T.O. powers had raised any objections to the statement of which they had only become aware when it was published in the papers. The Canadian delegation had been inclined to bring up this matter at a meeting but the British delegation had said that this might only strike a jarring note in the discussions. The communiqué amounted to a flat no, and a statement that the terms of the Soviet statement were entirely unacceptable. The French Foreign Minister had reported to the N.A.T.O. Council in the name of the Big Four.

The Minister said that he had been the first to speak after the German delegate and had said that, while Canada was also rejecting Khrushchev's proposals of November 27th, it was believed that to accept the proposals would not mean that Berlin would become a non-militarized zone but a satellite. There was unanimity on this. He had pleaded in favour of a settlement in terms of reunification of Germany. Norway and Denmark had struck the same note. It was to be noted that, in the second communiqué issued on December 18th, Canada could take credit for the positive note contained in paragraph one, which stated that the Berlin question would continue to be given close attention. It was possible that the Russians might wish to talk about reunification of Germany provided the western countries would agree that Germany would not be rearmed.

52. Mr. Smith was somewhat concerned by the German attitude and the policy of "brinkmanship." The U.S. Secretary of State was satisfied that the Russians had been kept out of the Middle East and that they had been out-bluffed in the Taiwan Straits.

53. Mr. Fleming said Mr. Dulles was remarkable in talking about Berlin. Speaking deliberately, with no notes, he had said that, if the Russians attacked Berlin, it might mean the destruction of Western Europe with nuclear weapons but the moment the Russians attacked, the United States would release its retaliation forces and could and would destroy all of Russia. He thought the Russians knew that. Mr. Spaak had said that since the war there was no greater threat to peace than the Berlin question. The German ground forces would soon be the largest in N.A.T.O.

54. Mr. Smith said that there had been no reference during the meetings to the de Gaulle proposal that a political triumvirate be set up within N.A.T.O. There had been no discussion on Cyprus. The representative of Iceland had expressed some concern over the fishing issue. The season would open in January and any serious incidents might cause Iceland to leave N.A.T.O. The Canadian delegation had expressed regrets that the Conference on the Law of the Sea had been postponed to 1960.

55. The Prime Minister recalled that Adenauer had told him Dulles was the one statesman in the world to-day, and respected him enormously.

56. Mr. Fleming gave a brief account of the stormy ministerial meeting of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation in Paris on the Monday preceding the N.A.T.O. meeting.⁹⁵ The British and French had disagreed so strongly that there had been open threats. No solution had been reached and the meeting adjourned until January. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked if the Canadian government would use its influence with the French to persuade them to be more accommodating.

57. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recent N.A.T.O. Ministerial Council meetings in Paris and the brief report of the Minister of Finance on the O.E.E.C. meeting that preceded the N.A.T.O. meetings.

COMMENTS BY MR. D.V. LEPAN

*Canada-United States Joint Ministerial Committee on Defence*⁹⁶

The meeting, although not an eloquent one, was satisfactory from the Canadian point of view. The main item on the agenda was the draft statement, prepared in Ottawa, on the acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canada. There were some revisions and minor changes suggested by the United States. However, Mr. Dulles expressed no dissent in principle with the Canadian draft. It was agreed that the statement would be redrafted by Canada and there was every indication that when final agreement is sought from the United States, it would be very rapidly forthcoming.

NATO Ministerial Meeting: Berlin

2. NATO discussion of the Berlin situation was anticipated by the meeting of the United States, United Kingdom, French and West German Foreign Ministers on Sunday, December 14. Mr. Spaak and the International Staff lobbied energetically but unsuccessfully to dissuade the four Ministers from issuing a public statement on their agreed position, arguing that this would be treating with contempt the political consultation process in NATO. This seemed an extreme view at the time, although there may have been some substance to it.

3. At the December 14 meeting the United Kingdom argued in favour of including in the statement some suggestion of a willingness to discuss European security and German reunification with the USSR. The United Kingdom urged their point, but not too strongly and without success. Subsequently they asked us to take up the theme in Council. Their desire to have Canada pursue the point probably arose from recognition of their tenuous position within the Alliance at the time as a result of their recent stand on such matters as the FTA, Integrated Air Defence and the stationing of United Kingdom forces in Germany.

4. The Minister, in his statement to Council on Tuesday, urged the need to reaffirm in the NATO Communiqué on Berlin the willingness of NATO to discuss the wider issues with the USSR. Support for this view was received from the Norwegians and others.

5. Although on questions of European Security, Norwegian and Canadian views usually coincide, the Norwegians took a somewhat firmer line on Berlin than we did. There seemed to be several reasons for this. First, Mr. Lange is an old friend of Willie Brandt and seemed to have been influenced by the latter who was, of course, in Paris at the time advocating that an absolutely firm line be taken by the West. Second, they seemed to be influenced by the consideration that a show of weakness on Berlin could lead to an erosion of purpose in Western Europe, leading ultimately to the exposure of Norway's northern frontier to pressure by the Soviet Union.

See Volume 25, (forthcoming), Chapter I.

6. There seemed to be two contradictory currents of opinion underlying European views on nuclear strategy as evidenced by the formal and informal discussions on the subject at the meeting. (1) The conventional and still predominate view — that Soviet threats must be met with fortitude if the Western position is not to unravel. This position was more strongly held than had been anticipated by Mr. LePan. Partly this seemed due to Mr. Spaak's influence, and partly because of a fear generally held by Europeans that once the West's position in Europe began to unravel in the slightest, the United States would be reluctant to use nuclear weapons in the defence of Europe. (2) A view beginning to gather steam — that took the form of questioning the conventional view, by asking "are there any circumstances or occasions which would justify risking nuclear extinction?"

7. In the case of Berlin a resolution of views was quickly reached and it was clear that most of the NATO member countries favoured taking a more robust attitude towards the Soviet Union than we would have been happy with.

NATO Defence Matters

8. The Ministerial discussions on defence matters generally and on the implementation of MC-70 specifically were generally unsatisfactory. The briefings were long, but did not lead to consideration and resolution by Ministers of the problems at hand. The United Kingdom had indicated it would make every effort to implement MC-70, but not to the extent of overstraining the United Kingdom economy. In this connection the United Kingdom Minister suggested a new procedure for dealing with NATO's military planning and programming. He proposed that the Secretary-General and his office should function in a way similar to that of the Minister of Defence in a national government, and screen military recommendations to bring them into line with practical reality, and particularly with the financial resources available to implement them. Mr. LePan stated that he had not heretofore realized the degree to which Mr. Spaak had become engrossed in political matters and was both uninterested and inexpert in defence and economic matters. This assessment of Mr. Spaak was strongly held by Mr. Léger and Mr. LePan himself was somewhat disturbed by Mr. Spaak's view of his own role as Secretary-General.

9. The review of NATO and Soviet forces in being and their relative strength in Europe provided in the military briefings was both discouraging and chilling.

The Communiqué

10. Perhaps the most disturbing occurrence during the meeting was the long wrangle which took place over one paragraph in the final communiqué. The day before, General Norstad had expounded the traditional NATO doctrine to the effect that the purpose of the shield, in the event of aggression, would be to act as a brake on any aggressive action sufficient to provide an opportunity for second thoughts on the part of the aggressor before the full weight of strategic forces would be brought into play. When it was suggested that the statement on Berlin in the final communiqué should be worded accordingly, and not imply that the full strategic deterrent would be the inevitable riposte to any "aggressive" Soviet move on Berlin, Mr. Spaak argued that this would constitute a show of weakness on the part of NATO. In his view safety lay in an arbitrary statement of manifest will to use the deterrent in the event of aggression if necessary. Despite the concern of the United Kingdom, Norway, Denmark and ourselves, Mr. Spaak carried the day. However, below the surface of many of the statements made in Council on the subject, there was ample evidence of doubt as to the circumstances justifying the use of the deterrent.

11. In summing up, Mr. LePan identified three strands of thinking on the implementation of NATO nuclear strategy, (a) the official NATO doctrine as expounded by SACEUR which leaves room for choice and consideration in the event of aggression, as between a limited or a full scale nuclear response. (b) the view, as exemplified by Mr. Spaak's attitude, that for presentation and propaganda purposes, no loophole should be left to indicate other than absolute determination to employ the full weight of the deterrent in response to any aggression in Europe. (c) the current of opinion beginning to establish itself throughout Europe, which is based on questioning the justification of risking nuclear extinction in all or any circumstances.

The OEEC Meeting

12. Mr. LePan reviewed the events at the OEEC Meeting on the Monday before the NATO Council Meeting. He noted that subsequently the United Kingdom Chancellor of the Exchequer had held talks with the French Minister. Their meeting held out some prospect that the impasse reached at the OEEC Meeting would be overcome and he suspected that there were important and positive economic developments in the wind as a result.

MR. MCCARDLE

United States-Canada Committee

13. The item of major interest on the agenda of the Canada-United States Defence Committee Meeting, apart from the acquisition by Canada of nuclear weapons, was the discussion on integration of North American defence production. Our Ministers emphasized to their United States colleagues how necessary it was for Canada to participate in the production of the modern weapons which are to be put in use by Canada for the joint defence of North America. Mr. McElroy seemed to be forthcoming in acknowledging the logic of the Canadian position, but committed himself to little more than agreement in principle with our views. He did suggest that United States legislative impediments to free competition for North American defence contracts between the United States and Canadian manufacturers might be removed. However, we were not successful in establishing the idea that Canadian producers should be given some form of preference in order that they might be guaranteed a proportionate share of continental defence production.

14. Mr. McCardle also noted that our NATO Delegation did not have as complete a grasp of the problems for Canada in the North American defence context as might be desired. Since these problems bear so heavily in turn on our disposition towards NATO problems, Mr. McCardle considered it important to ensure that our NATO Delegation be kept fully informed on all aspects of Canadian participation in North American defence.

MR. ROSS CAMPBELL

Ministerial Meeting Debate on Political Consultation

15. The immediate dilemma we faced at the Ministerial Meeting was whether to attempt to make NATO political consultation a reality by digging in on Berlin. The holding of the Four Power Meeting on Berlin the previous Sunday in Paris had reflected rather negatively on NATO's role as a forum for political consultation — in effect, NATO was being asked merely to endorse the position on Berlin arrived at by the Four Powers. However, there were no other member countries inclined to take issue with the way in which the Berlin problem had been presented to the Ministerial Meeting and we decided against doing so ourselves.

16. The manner in which the Berlin problem had been dealt with lent an air of unreality to the general discussion on NATO political consultation. In addition, by pre-arrangement, the de Gaulle proposals for a political directorate were not mentioned; NATO's relationship with other regional alliances was not discussed; and Ministers considered only relatively minor issues. There was some attempt made to define the scope of the area which should be subject to consultation but, amongst the smaller powers, there was no agreed policy on the degree to which NATO should consult on problems affecting non-NATO areas. Mr. Lange, the Norwegian Foreign Minister, perhaps expressed the view of a number of the smaller powers in stating that the consultation process in NATO on events outside the area should be limited to the passing of information, on the grounds that anything beyond this would involve corresponding responsibilities which many member countries would be unwilling and unable to take on.

17. In general, the discussion on Spaak's proposal for the greater use of committees and experts in the political consultation process was inconclusive. However, the discussion was summarized by the International Staff in the Summary Record and inserted in the final communiqué in a way to suggest that Mr. Spaak's report had been formally endorsed by Ministers and that long term studies on various problems as background for political consultation had been agreed. In fact they were not. In this respect the relationship between the discussions by Ministers and the "agreed conclusions" which emerged was little more than ephemeral.

18. There had been a general reluctance to lead off the debate on political consultation, but finally Mr. Dulles began with a frank exposition of the United States view. He likened the relationship between the great powers and NATO Council to that of the relationship between the United States Executive and Congress. He noted that foreign policies were submitted to Congress by the Executive as broad general propositions and, out of the ensuing debate, the Executive emerged with a mandate to execute certain policies. There was no further debate and, in times of crisis, it was not expected that the Executive would consult in detail with Congress on the means employed to implement policy. Mr. Dulles made it clear that similarly, if the NATO powers wished to exert an influence on the policy of NATO or of the several major NATO powers, this should be done at the formulation stage or during a period of relative calm when broad policies could be reviewed and reshaped. The smaller powers could not expect to be allowed a veto over the execution of accepted policies in the face of an immediate crisis.

19. Mr. Cameron noted that the results of the discussion on political consultation had not been unwelcome from the Canadian point of view. There had been, in fact, no agreement to work towards Spaak's declared policy of broadening the area of NATO consultation and responsibility, and there had been no agreement to revise NATO's machinery for political consultation.

20. Mr. Cameron indicated he had received two disconcerting impressions in Paris. The first was the degree to which German views had coloured the discussion at the meeting. There seemed to be many indications that the Germans were coming rapidly to a position of dominance within the Alliance. The second was the extent and manner of Spaak's personal influence over the deliberations at the meetings. This would seem to have been carried much beyond the point becoming to a civil servant.

MR. LEPAN

21. In agreeing with Mr. Cameron on the emerging German influence in the Councils of NATO, Mr. LePan noted that this flowed understandably from the fact that West Germany was already the strongest economic power and would soon be the strongest military power in NATO Europe. The time was soon approaching when little could be decided in NATO against the wishes of the Germans.

The Situation of the Canadian Brigade in Europe

22. In reply to a question by Mr. McCardle, Mr. LePan stated that Mr. Pearkes had returned from a visit to the Canadian Brigade in Germany with great misgivings over what appeared to be its exposed tactical position. Apparently, the Brigade is flanked on either side by under-strength formations whose effectives consist of young untrained conscripts. Under present NATO strategy, the defensive forces in Germany, including the Canadian Brigade, would be required in the event of hostilities, to move rapidly to take up forward defensive positions. It was the considered view of the Brigade Headquarters that, while the Canadian Brigade might be capable of executing the move to its forward position, the divisions on either side of the Brigade would be incapable of doing so. In the event of hostilities, therefore, because of the Brigade's ability to perform successfully the role it has been assigned, it would find itself completely exposed to flanking attacks and without a fighting chance of survival.

23. Mr. LePan understood that Mr. Pearkes was considering advising SACEUR that, because the Brigades tactical position was so exposed, Canada would be considering the possibility of providing armoured support for the Brigade from Canada "at the expense of the Canadian Air Division in Europe."

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

17. The Prime Minister referred to the forthcoming Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference which would open in London the following Wednesday, June 26th.

There were those amongst Commonwealth Prime Ministers who supported the idea of establishing a permanent Commonwealth secretariat. He did not feel that this was a truly practical idea.

At the moment, he was not envisaging making any very precise suggestions or recommendations at the meeting. He was, however, convinced that it was in the best interests of the Commonwealth of reasonable advancement and equal opportunities. Prime Minister Nehru of India and Mr. St. Laurent had achieved a high degree of understanding and there was no reason to believe that this close relationship would not continue after the change of administration in Canada.

He had been asked to make a Dominion Day speech on July 1st in London. In that speech he proposed to stress that the present Canadian government staunchly supported the concept of the Commonwealth and felt that its economic and trade ties should be strengthened considerably. He might take the opportunity, at that time, to extend an invitation to the Commonwealth countries to attend a Commonwealth economic and trade conference in Ottawa. He did not, however, plan to make any direct reference to the economic and trade relationship between Canada and the United States, nor was it his intention to mention the recent Suez Canal difficulties.

18. In the course of discussion it was suggested that it might be inadvisable to attempt to superimpose a Commonwealth Trade Conference over the current negotiations for the establishment of a European free trade market. On the other hand, there were those who felt that, on the contrary, it might be useful to review the whole Commonwealth trade situation before establishment of the European free trade area had progressed too far.

It was also suggested that the volume of trade between Canada and the United States had perhaps gone too far at the expense of Canadian trade relations with other Commonwealth countries and that serious study should be given to this whole problem without delay.

19. The Cabinet noted the report by the Prime Minister, and the comments made during the ensuing discussion, on the coming Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting to be held in London beginning June 26th, and also with regard to the speech the Prime Minister would make in London on July 1st and to the desirability of convening in Ottawa, at an early date, a Commonwealth Economic and Trade Conference, and agreed that Ministers who had specific suggestions to make either on the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting or on the contents of the Dominion Day speech to be made by Mr. Diefenbaker in London on July 1st, should forward such suggestions to him in writing before his departure for London the following Sunday.¹

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I enclose herewith a record of the meeting held on Saturday morning, after the Cabinet meeting, on trade and economic matters and the possibility of holding a Commonwealth meeting to deal with these subjects.

I am also sending you a memorandum prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce in connection with the present Prime Ministers' meeting. You may have received a copy of this latter document but, for certainty, I am sending you one at this point.

Yours sincerely,

[Ottawa], June 24, 1957

A meeting of the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce with officials to consider trade and economic matters which might be discussed at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting was held in the Privy Council Chamber on Saturday, June 22nd, 1957, at 11:30 a.m.

Present

The Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fleming),
The Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Churchill),
The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Bryce),
The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Léger),
The Deputy Minister of Finance (Mr. Taylor),
The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance (Mr. Plumptre),
The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp),
The Assistant Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Isbister),
The Head, Economic Division, Department of External Affairs (Mr. Couillard),
The Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Martin).

Also Present

The Canadian Ambassador to the United States (Mr. Robertson).

1. The Minister of Finance said it was desirable to review trade and economic matters which might be discussed at the Prime Ministers' meeting, so that Mr. Diefenbaker would have present thinking on these subjects readily available for the discussions in London. He suggested that consideration might first be given to the agenda to see whether any item might be added to or subtracted from it.

2. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that he had given the Prime Minister a memorandum which had been prepared by his officials and which might serve this purpose.

3. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the memorandum which had been prepared would probably be adequate as far as the agenda for the Commonwealth meetings was concerned.

The paper referred to some matters which should be considered in connection with the question of a possible Commonwealth Trade Conference and noted the implications of such a proposal. The United Kingdom would be disturbed lest the calling of such a meeting might undermine its efforts to promote the Industrial Free Trade Area for which the U.K. wanted Canadian support. Calling a conference of this nature might not be inconsistent with furthering the free trade area. On the other hand, it might be so interpreted in Europe. The Department of Trade and Commerce was not recommending against Canada supporting the Industrial Free Trade Area, even though these arrangements will reduce opportunities for export of some Canadian products.

As regards the matters which might be raised at a Commonwealth Trade and economic conference, Mr. Sharp made the following points. If extension of preferences were advocated, this attitude would be unlikely to be acceptable in other parts of the Commonwealth. At the moment, on tariff items, at any rate, Canada pretty well enjoyed free entry into the U.K. Australia and New Zealand had recently completed trade negotiations with the U.K., and Australia had obtained its freedom to reduce preference margins along similar lines to what Canada did some years ago. New Zealand was inclined to think that the idea of preferences was dwindling. As far as Canada was concerned, there were complaints here now against low tariffs on some Commonwealth imports, textiles for example from the U.K., textiles from India, and rubber footwear from Hong Kong. It should be noted, too, that Canada had recently applied an import prohibition on cheese, in addition to such a prohibition on butter, commodities which were important to Australia and vital to New Zealand. While these comments appeared to be somewhat negative, it did not mean that a review of Commonwealth trade and economic matters could not be useful. Indeed, there is a good deal to be said for a joint review of Commonwealth trade and for giving consideration to the possibilities of trade promotion within it.

4. Mr. Fleming said that a meeting should not be confined to preferences alone. It might be possible to arrange for the U.K. to take more Canadian agricultural products. He wondered if any material had been prepared on which discussions in this regard might be based.

5. Mr. Sharp said that recently his department had completed a fairly broad study on Canada-U.K. trade. The total physical volume of trade was now much larger than before the war, and of that volume agricultural products, in particular wheat, had assumed a much larger share. The quantities of flour exported to the U.K. were about the same as before 1939. Prior to that time, the quantities of wheat sent to the U.K. were about 50 or 60 million bushels annually; now we thought in terms of 100 million bushels. Sales of raw products and partially processed materials had increased but there had been a curtailment of finished goods. This country had pressed the U.K. with respect to the quotas they applied to many finished goods. Some success had been achieved in this direction and there were prospects of further relaxations. In fact, the U.K. had indicated recently that there would be a further liberalization, but for reasons that were unknown here there had been some delay.

6. The Deputy Minister of Finance indicated his agreement in general with Mr. Sharp's points and went on to refer to the existence of the Canada-U.K. Continuing Committee.

He said that it afforded regular opportunities for exchange of views with U.K. officials. The U.K. had made substantive progress in relaxing some of its restrictions. The recent dollar allocation for travel was another example.

7. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had three points which might be considered in relation to the meeting now convening in London. Firstly, while the agenda was flexible, it would be hard to alter its formal terms at this stage. There would be an innovation this year in that it had been decided that all Prime Ministers would not make extensive opening remarks. Instead, Mr. Macmillan would make a brief opening statement and would be thanked by the Prime Minister of Ghana.

8. The Canadian Ambassador to the United States said that in the past, through informal arrangements, it had always been possible to raise new items. If Mr. Diefenbaker wished to raise the subject of a Commonwealth trade and economic conference, it would perhaps be desirable for him to discuss this first with Mr. Macmillan and then make some soundings as to when the matter might be most easily and conveniently discussed.

9. Mr. Léger added that if the proposal were suggested at the table it would probably be passed on to officials for their immediate consideration.

10. Mr. Léger went on to say that, as regards his second point, his department had had in mind to suggest that the Canadian Prime Minister invite all his colleagues to hold their next meeting in Ottawa, possibly when the Queen was here to open the Seaway. At such a conference emphasis might be placed on trade.

11. Mr. Fleming observed that this might be twenty-one months away and that it might also be awkward to combine a meeting of that nature with the opening of the Seaway when Her Majesty was present.

12. Mr. Léger added that physical arrangements for a meeting could be completed in six months. To set a date convenient to all Commonwealth representatives would be difficult.

13. Mr. Léger's third point was that if it was considered desirable to hold discussions in the trade field relatively soon, the Commonwealth Finance Ministers who would be attending meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank in Washington the third week in September, might be asked to come to Ottawa either before or afterwards to consider trade and economic matters.

14. During the discussion that ensued on the question of a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, the following further points emerged:

(a) If there were a special Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference focussed on trade, and no concrete results emerged fairly soon, it would be unfortunate. On the other hand, a general Prime Ministers' meeting with the emphasis on trade, and of an exploratory nature from which no immediate action might be expected, might be more advantageous. Any meeting of Prime Ministers would take a long time to arrange.

(b) Other Commonwealth countries, such as Australia, appear to be in a different relationship to Commonwealth trade than Canada is. Whereas we would be happy to increase our trade with Commonwealth countries, most others have in fact been trying to increase their trade with the U.S.

(c) No useful analogy could be developed between the Ottawa Conference of 1932 and a contemporary meeting here at this stage. The whole exchange and tariff position had changed so radically since the Ottawa meetings were held. The big problems at the moment for Canada were her relations with the U.S. and relations with the whole new trade and commercial complex emerging in Western Europe. A Commonwealth trade and economic conference might not be of much assistance under these conditions. On the other hand, a review of the existing situation might be helpful.

(d) In a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference the question of economic development would loom large. This subject would appear to be one on which useful informal discussions might be held with the U.K. The British were concerned about capital investment for the underdeveloped areas of the Commonwealth and the fact that they did not have enough capital to satisfy the needs of various emerging commonwealth and empire countries who were restless and looking for assistance. Ghana, for example, appeared to want to develop the Volta River project, whose cost was enormous in relation to Ghana's resources and total population. The British West Indies felt they were not getting their proper share of available capital and wanted aid. Nigeria would soon be asking for assistance too. All of these and others would have their eye on Canada for help.

(e) A good deal of useful work could and had been done in the field of technical assistance. Two channels had been used for this purpose, namely, the U.N. and the Colombo Plan, for both of which Canada had made useful contributions. There might be something to be said for broadening technical assistance machinery, possibly on the Colombo Plan side. No precise value could be put on returns from technical assistance.

(f) On the question of what a conference could be expected to do to help our wheat position, it was recognized that quantities could certainly be disposed of in the Commonwealth if given away. The question arose whether the Commonwealth might not increase Canadian purchases of wheat as an offset to U.S. giveaways. However, it was doubtful if this point would have much effect on India and Pakistan. The U.K. could hardly be asked to do more in this connection because even in the face of U.S. transactions, she had been very careful to avoid damage to Canada's position. Furthermore, Australia is also a large exporter to the U.K.

(g) The wheat problem was undoubtedly the most pressing and severe. One approach might be to find out from the U.S. what measure of cooperation in disposals might be possible. This would require a fresh study of the surplus, both in Canada and the U.S., in relation to the regular commercial demand as well as the non-commercial claims for assistance. The case for giveaways to the hungry people of the world would need to be recognized. Canada might, for instance, say it would share in giving to non-commercial needs in India and Pakistan and offer wheat on the same terms as the U.S. The commercial markets would be treated separately in a manner to be jointly agreed. However, this problem could only be solved in concert with the U.S. and not through the Commonwealth meeting. This kind of proposal, however, required further thought and study.

(h) At the moment, in connection with wheat, it could be said it would be difficult to expect much from a Commonwealth meeting, though the idea of one to help solve this problem should not perhaps be completely ruled out.

(i) It would be helpful to pursue the suggestion to have a Commonwealth Finance Ministers meeting here in Ottawa, either before or after the Bank and Fund meetings. The preference would be for after, otherwise the other Bank and Fund members might feel that the Commonwealth was "ganging up" on them.

Memorandum for Minister of Trade and Commerce

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

I. OUR TRADING OBJECTIVES WITH RESPECT TO THE INDUSTRIAL FREE TRADE AREA AND CUSTOMS UNION

A. The Customs Union of France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands and Luxembourg

1. To assure efficient and cordial trading relations with these countries, as a basis of expanding trade, we should be constructive and friendly towards their customs union which, regardless of our attitude, they will probably put into force. We should not let a situation develop where they can blame us for any failure.

2. We want their common tariff to be low enough to permit us to develop our export trade in grains, raw materials, processed materials and manufactured goods. We want their tariff administration to be equally reasonable.

3. We want them to make as little use as possible of quantitative restrictions against our exports, although they will require some considerable use of restrictions because of currency difficulties.

4. We must insure a continuing market for grain in Western Europe despite their growing desire to protect their agriculture. Out of approximately $400 million of Canadian exports to Europe, about 24 per cent is composed of grains.

5. We must try to keep GATT alive and influential because this is the agreement under which the European countries have made commitments to us in connection with the above points.

B. The Industrial Free Trade Area of the United Kingdom, Scandinavian countries, Ireland, Denmark, Switzerland, Portugal, Greece and Austria.

1. Some objectives as in A above with following changes:

2. Since tariffs against the outside world are unaffected by free trade proposals, we need not be concerned about the levels of their tariffs against us. We must be sure, however, that the administration of tariffs (origin requirements in particular) is not to our disadvantage.

3. The United Kingdom has assured us that they intend to exclude agriculture and food from the industrial free trade area, but we must insure that they do not participate in special side deals which might frustrate the value of these assurances.

4. The United Kingdom Government will undoubtedly seek public support from the Prime Ministers for the industrial free trade area on the grounds that such an area will significantly broaden the scope of the European Common Market and facilitate the achievement of greater productivity and prosperity. Our continuing support for the free trade area should, of course, be subject to a careful study of the detailed agreements now under discussion and of the manner in which they are to be applied so as to achieve, as far as possible, the trading objectives outlined above. It is reasonable to expect that the United Kingdom, with world wide trading interests like our own, will in large measure share these objectives and work with us to achieve them.

II. COMMONWEALTH TRADE CONFERENCE

1. The proposal for a Commonwealth Trade Conference, much as it may be welcomed in London, is bound to be scrutinized carefully by the United Kingdom Government. They will be perturbed lest this proposal should be interpreted in Europe as undermining the Industrial Free Trade Area which the United Kingdom is sponsoring so strongly and for which they are soliciting the support of Canada and other Commonwealth countries.

2. Aside from this possible conflict between proposals for a Commonwealth Trade Conference and the United Kingdom proposal for a European Industrial Free Trade Area, the following observations might be made about the content of a Commonwealth Trade Conference: There is very little if any scope for increased tariff preferences amongst Commonwealth countries. We get free entry or nearly free entry into the U.K. for most of our important products. The only way the U.K. could give us substantially enlarged preferences, therefore, would be to increase its most-favoured-nation tariffs against other countries, a most improbable course for them to adopt. It is significant that Australia has just concluded comprehensive trade and tariff negotiations with the U.K., the result of which was not to strengthen or intensify preferences but to provide Australia with some freedom to withdraw preferences, along lines similar to what we did ten years ago. A New Zealand Delegation recently returned home from extensive trade negotiations in London. The New Zealand Minister, Mr. Holyake, went so far as to say that the negative results of their negotiations "portended a weakening in the Empire preference system." The New Zealand Government have indicated, however, that they wish to attempt further negotiations on preferences next year. On our side, Canadian manufacturers are already restive about the low tariffs accorded India and rubber footwear from Hong Kong. Furthermore, we now prohibit imports of butter and cheese, which are vital for New Zealand and important to Australia.

3. Notwithstanding the foregoing observations about the limitations and difficulties that would surround a formal Commonwealth Trade Conference there might be value in having a conference (possibly at a meeting in Ottawa of Commonwealth Prime Ministers) to review the present position of Commonwealth trade and the possibilities of promoting it.

III. DISMANTLING OF TRADE RESTRICTIONS

1. Import restrictions imposed for balance of payments reasons are the greatest impediment to our exports to the Commonwealth. The U.K. has itself sought to deal with its external financial difficulties within a multilateral framework (GATT, IMF, Convertibility Proposals, Free Trade Area) rather than on the basis of bilateral arrangements with us and other non-sterling countries. We should agree in general with this approach.

2. It would be appropriate for the Prime Minister to press in London for steady progress in the removal of trade restrictions which discriminate against our trade, particularly in manufactured goods. We have already negotiated with the United Kingdom for further relaxations in their import restrictions against our goods, including a fair number of manufactured items and we have every reason to hope that they will respond favourably to representations along these lines from our Prime Minister.

Note: re present Canadian exports to the United Kingdom

Canada now exports to the United Kingdom, in physical terms, somewhat more than pre-World War II and our share of the United Kingdom market is about the same as it was pre-war. However, the composition of our exports has undergone a striking change. By and large, Canada now has a larger share of the United Kingdom market for wheat and flour than at any time except during World War II (in recent years, about 50 to 60 percent). We also have achieved substantial increases in sales of certain raw and processed materials.

These increases in sales of agricultural and raw and processed materials have been offset by a sharp curtailment in our sales of finished manufactured goods which, as noted above, are still subject to strict import controls in the United Kingdom.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—FIRST SESSION²

Mr. Macmillan specifically welcomed Mr. Diefenbaker, Suhrawardy, Sir Roy Welensky, and Dr. Nkrumah. Nkrumah replied briefly and appropriately.

2. Publicity: A first day communiqué on the general pattern of the proceedings and a final communiqué will be issued and related press conferences held. Lord Home will provide general guidance to the press throughout. There may be an interim communiqué at the end of this week.

3. Agenda: The agenda and timetable prepared by the CRO were accepted.

4. Opening Remarks: Mr. Macmillan said the Conference needed to be held to consider the changes which had occurred since the last conference, notably the Hungarian revolt, the Arab-Israeli troubles, the USSR's intervention in the Mideast and the UK's and France's action at Suez which aroused strong differences of opinion in the Commonwealth. He summarized briefly the Bermuda talks³ as friendly and cordial and as revealing that the USA was fully alive to the need for playing an increasing role in world affairs.

5. Disarmament: Departing from the agenda, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd gave an account of the disarmament negotiations as background for the discussion scheduled for July 1.⁴

6. He outlined the development of the negotiations from a search for a comprehensive plan to the search for a partial agreement, and concluded that the differences appeared not beyond bridging on most of the ingredients of a settlement, i.e. force levels, conventional armaments, and measures against surprise attack, but that the crux was the question of nuclear tests and whether they should be linked with the cessation of future production of fissile materials. He saw the present role of the UK as facilitating agreement between the USA and the USSR, and Mr. Macmillan spoke in similar terms.

7. Relations with the Soviet Union. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd contrasted the conditions in the USSR this year and last. The trend was still toward relaxation in the economic and social sectors. It had slowed up in the cultural sector but even here the repressions of the Stalin era had not returned. Khrushchev appeared stronger than ever.

8. In foreign affairs, however, there had been a complete reversal caused by Hungary. The USSR had reasserted their absolute determination to maintain their military grip on the satellites. In the Mid East their objective was to exploit Arab nationalism against the West. They had gained ground in 1956 but had slowed up in 1957. They had not moved into Africa but were studying it, well aware of its importance. In Asia their economic drive was still under way, and they were continuing to work for the complete disintegration of colonialism.

9. He concluded that the USSR wants war even less than they did last year. For one thing, the events in Hungary had frightened them. For another, they do not need a war to achieve their aims. He ended by approving the statement of the President of Southern Vietnam that since communism was not neutral, we could not afford to be: we must defend ourselves against Communist infiltration by increasing our economic strength with a framework of military strength.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — FIRST SESSION, AFTERNOON MEETING

At the afternoon meeting the discussion of relations with the Soviet Union was resumed by Mr. Nehru. He in turn was followed by Messrs. Menzies, Suhrawardy, Louw and Nkrumah.

Mr. Nehru

2. Mr. Nehru's main and now familiar theme was that the Soviets were gradually toning down from a high pitch of revolution and that this development should be welcomed. This process, however, was occurring at the same time as, and was influenced by, revolutions in the fields of technology and the emergence of new nationalisms. We should therefore bear in mind that while still communistic in outlook, the Soviets were participating in the technical revolution and were using for their own purposes as a great power the emergence of new nationalisms. This has changed the Soviet people and while they did not give the impression that they had any quarrel with the régime under which they lived, they were, nevertheless, developing a strong desire for more individual freedom and the good things of life.

3. Mr. Nehru thought that the tragedy of Hungary might have checked certain liberal tendencies within the government, but did not believe that it had stopped the process of liberalization altogether. In his view the only obstacle in the way of liberalization was the fear of war. This was also true in the satellites. The less the tension, therefore, the more the process of liberalization would operate.

4. On colonialism, Mr. Nehru said that all seemed to be agreed that colonialism should disappear. This, he believed, included the UK because of the progress made towards independence in dependent territories. He then advanced the view that communism in Asia had only been successful when it had become nationalistic such as in China. In countries where it had been imposed it had not succeeded.

5. If this interpretation was correct he thought that what was now needed was economic assistance to underdeveloped countries but not tied with military assistance. This would gradually put an end to the cold war, which he thought was senseless unless it be followed by a shooting war which nobody wanted anyway. The programme for the future, therefore, should be (a) a serious attempt at disarmament, accompanied by (b) a non-military approach to international affairs leading to the relaxation of tension.

Mr. Menzies

6. Mr. Menzies took exception with some of the points raised by Mr. Nehru. He agreed that it looked as if the Soviet Union were not intent on a general war, but believed that they saw no objection to localized wars such as in Hungary and the Mideast. Their record since 1945 had been such that they had forced the free world into setting up very extensive and expensive military establishments for the defence of countries bordering the Soviet Union.

7. Mr. Menzies then made some rather vague variations on the theme of neutralism, which he attempted to define as either a refusal to accept military commitments or an indifference about moral, social and military issues. He thought that all countries had a right not to enter into military alliances but they also had an obligation to take sides when freedom itself was in jeopardy.

Mr. Suhrawardy

8. Mr. Suhrawardy agreed with Mr. Nehru on the general theme that the Russians did not wish to launch a global war; he thought, however, that they would take all means at their disposal, short of general war, to push their own national boundaries, and those of their satellites, as far as possible.

9. He thought that economic assistance coupled with military aid was quite acceptable. He saw advantages in the fact that military assistance was granted for defence purposes only, whereas non-committed countries could expand their armaments for aggressive purposes if they so felt.

10. The Prime Minister of Pakistan said that his country had no use for neutralism. They were fully committed to the West and he thought it was in their self interest so to be.

Mr. Diefenbaker

11. Mr. Diefenbaker said he was in general agreement with the views expressed by the UK during the morning session. In his view, the Commonwealth represented a large portion of mankind and should attempt to give some leadership in this period of crisis in world history. He was not thinking so much of agreed sets of principles as some declaration on dedication to freedom. A serious endeavour should be made for all parts of the Commonwealth to cooperate not so much in an attempt to creating a unified policy but rather to make of the Commonwealth an instrument of dynamic freedom.

12. On the West's relations with the Soviets, he said he would like to believe that the USSR had had a change of heart, but there was little evidence to come to this conclusion since the days of the San Francisco Conference. They had not made any change in destination but may have made a detour at the moment to serve their own purposes. This detour was probably due to the fear of expansion of the atomic capabilities of powers other than the USA and the UK. The Soviet position therefore might be somewhat changed in the field of disarmament and it was hoped that some progress might be made. Generally, however, realism seemed to demand that we continue our efforts with forbearance and not let down our defences.

13. Mr. Diefenbaker concluded by saying that if the Soviet Union were in a more cooperative frame of mind it would be easy for them to demonstrate such cooperation by agreeing to certain amendments to the Charter of the UN.

Mr. Louw

14. Mr. Louw's main theme was that he had serious doubts that there had ever been any change of heart in Moscow. He agreed that there was a change in tactics which meant that we should be more than ever on our guard.

15. In his view the Soviets had their eyes turned towards Africa because (a) the continent was underdeveloped and therefore more susceptible to propaganda; (b) the immense natural resources of the continent were still untapped; and (c) the continent was in a strategic position between East and West.

Mr. Nkrumah

16. The Prime Minister of Ghana raised the intriguing question as to what the Conference would do if Poland applied for membership in the Commonwealth. In his view communism had a right to live if it were not imposed by force. The only abominable crime was the use of force. If the spread of communism was to be avoided in Africa the sources of grievance must be removed; otherwise it could become a fertile ground for communism.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — THIRD AND FOURTH MEETINGS

The discussions on the relationship of the Western World with the Soviet Union were resumed on Thursday by the Honorable M.W.H. de Silva of Ceylon who was followed by Honorable T.L. Macdonald of New Zealand and Sir Roy Welensky of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Ceylon

2. Mr. de Silva said that in his view there was a desire for peace in the USSR and that it was the duty of the West to promote this with the hope that there would in due course be a real change of heart among Soviet leaders and people. The best way of doing this at this stage in our relationship with Moscow was to strengthen our trade and develop our cultural relations with them. In his view suspicion merely breeds suspicion.

3. So far as Ceylon was concerned it was the policy of his government to have friendly relations with all countries and to receive assistance not only from the West but also from the Soviet Union. He agreed that an act of faith might be required to reduce tension and that failing this the prospects were indeed very dark. Communism could not be stopped by force; it could only be stopped by a superior ideal. Such an ideal could be found in democracy. One had to bear in mind that where people were poor and miserable they could be attracted by communism instead of democracy. It was therefore the duty of the West to be as helpful as possible.

New Zealand

4. Generally, Mr. Macdonald supported the attitude adopted by the Prime Minister of Australia. He said that in view of its geographical isolation, NZ could easily adopt an isolationist policy. They knew, however, that this would not be in their interest and were therefore cooperating fully and completely with the West.

5. Mr. Macdonald said that we should welcome any liberalization in the USSR but the events in Hungary had indicated that there was no real change of heart in Moscow. The West must therefore continue to work for peace behind the shield it has been forced to build.

Rhodesia and Nyasaland

6. In his short intervention Sir Roy Welensky referred to the fact that expansion of communism in the Mideast would have a profound influence in Africa. The main problem there was that of poverty and if this problem were not solved the West would be in an extremely weak position.

Conclusions

7. In summing up, Mr. Macmillan said that after the death of Stalin there was a change in methods in Moscow but events in Hungary have demonstrated that they can swing back again whenever any of their vital interests are involved. There may, however, in due course be a change in opinions. More and more people in the Soviet Union were asking themselves fundamental questions about their own relationship to the State, to one another, and to God.

8. Mr. Macmillan thought that in the present atmosphere we should continue to maintain some contact with them and try to make inroads in their monolithic system. Meantime we must maintain our way of life, respect for the individual and for law. He summed it up as a policy of watchfulness, hope and faith.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — THIRD AND FOURTH MEETINGS,
JUNE 27, 1957: PROBLEMS OF THE MIDEAST

1. Mr. Macmillan suggested this general area be approached under four heads — the state of the Arab world; the problem of Arab-Israel relations; the Suez Canal régime and the problem of economic development. He hoped there would be an exchange of opinions and then called on Mr. Suhrawardy to open the first subject.

2. Mr. Suhrawardy commenced by describing Arab nationalism as a product of sentiment brought about by antagonism toward Israel. Consequently those who favoured and used it did not want to see any settlement of the Arab-Israel problems, including the refugee question. Egypt in particular had hoped it could do better for itself if it spoke for the Arab world as a whole. It resented the Baghdad Pact and did not need it because Egypt was in no danger of attack. It felt it could afford to attack it and to exploit the situation to gain its own ends. Consequently it turned to subversion in collaboration with Russia and created sentiments against the Pact as well as against Israel and the West. As a result there was suspicion and tension throughout the area.

3. He went on to say that the situation had now changed due to Egypt overreaching itself. There had been the new realignment of Saudi-Arabia and Jordan with Iraq. Russia was taking advantage of every opportunity to intervene in and encroach upon Mideast nations. It was moonshine to talk of Russia wanting peaceful co-existence. On the other hand the USA had acted helpfully and positively in the situation, giving a definite guarantee against encroachment from without, although it had been able to provide no protection against subversion from within.

4. He felt that with USA help the Mideast could now look forward to a period of peace and stability. There was still danger of subversion but Lebanon was a good example showing how this could be resisted in the case of Egyptian intrigues. The ability of countries like Lebanon to resist internal subversion will be a key point in determining whether or not the Communists can encroach further upon the area. Given the developments that have now taken place, he hoped that the Arab nations could get together to solve the Israel issues.

5. He went on to emphasize the defensive nature of the Baghdad Pact, noting that the Mideast countries in it could have no hope of benefitting from aggression. He felt that the changes of global war were lessening and the UN had more influence and authority. The Arab nations should get together on more subjects now, including such things as communications, and should get rid of the causes of trouble by settling the Suez situation and the Arab-Israel questions. In particular, there must be some solution found to the refugee problem despite the fact that many of the refugees themselves did not want a solution.

6. A brief discussion about the refugees then ensued, Mr. Macdonald of NZ mentioning a recent discussion with Labouisse of UNWRA as indicating more hope of settlement if funds could be found to continue their work. Mr. Suhrawardy agreed that some possibility of relatively quiet progress on this refugee issue now existed.

7. In answer to questions from Mr. Menzies and Mr. Louw, Mr. Suhrawardy went on to say that if the Palestine refugee issue were settled the appeal of communism would not be great even among the younger generation in the Arab countries. If this focus of discontent were removed, the Moslem world, for good or ill, were inclined toward being a cross-section of the world as a whole and its loyalties would be based on the interest of the various countries, rather than on religious or other groupings. He spoke of the extravagant Egyptian propaganda by radio in particular as influencing the youth but noted that Russia was spreading its own influence with a quiet but clever unobtrusiveness as exemplified notably in Afghanistan.

8. Mr. Suhrawardy paid great tribute to the help the USA had given the countries in the Mideast, both economically and in its guarantee under the Eisenhower doctrine. He concluded by saying there was a need to bring together the countries of the Mideast in an economic endeavour.

9. At this point Mr. Macmillan then called on Mr. Lloyd to open the discussion on the Arab-Israel dispute. The latter first emphasized the central role of the Russians in the area, particularly in supplying arms on a massive scale to Egypt in 1955.⁵ He noted that the West by contrast had been supplying arms to Egypt and other Arab countries on a reasonable scale and to Israel only to a small extent. He referred to a recent delivery of submarines to Egypt as a wanton act of irresponsibility that could cause greatly increased tensions now in the Mideast.

10. Mr. Lloyd noted that there would be strongly differing views around the table about the events of last October. The UK feels the situation now is much improved from what it was a year ago. Then Nasser was in full cry against the UK and was backed by many others. Iraq was isolated and Israel in a high state of excitement. Some sort of war was bound to have occurred. Now the situation is much better and there is no feeling of imminent catastrophe. The more relaxed situation cannot continue unless something further is done. He turned then to ask what things could be done. He referred first to the UNEF and said he hoped it would be kept in existence.

11. At this point Mr. Diefenbaker intervened and it is probably worth quoting the following from the minutes in extenso: "Mr. Diefenbaker asked how long the UN Emergency Force would need to be kept in being, and whether the presence of the Force in the Gaza strip had contributed to reducing armed incursions into Israel. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd replied that it was impossible to foresee how long the Force would continue to be needed: but he hoped that it would be retained until some modus vivendi had been formally established. Armed incursions into Israel were now relatively rare. The arbitrary character of the frontier made some infiltration inevitable; but organized raids were probably on a lower scale than ever before. It would be preferable, if possible, that an international force should be established along the whole frontier of Israel, except perhaps in respect of the Lebanon. In practice, small forces would probably suffice on the Syrian frontier, and it would be a physical impossibility to police the whole of the frontier with Jordan. But there would be considerably advantage in posting international forces in key areas such as Jerusalem. How far it might be desirable or practicable to increase the size of the UN Emergency Force must be left to the judgment of General Burns. The policy of Israel in refusing to permit UN forces to enter upon her territory was very short-sighted." (It might be noted that Lloyd explained the Israeli policy as being based upon the necessity to ensure her ability in reprisal which she regards as her main defence against the Arabs.)

12. Mr. Lloyd went on to say that there were two main elements in the continued tension: first the ban on Israeli shipping in Suez and Aqaba and secondly the refugee question. He felt that the wisest course in regard to Suez and Aqaba was to take the political heat out of the questions by having the Suez issue approached as a problem of interpretation of the Constantinople conventions and by having the Aqaba issue steered toward the International Court. There was some discussion about the territorial waters questions in relation to the Gulf of Aqaba which can be seen in the minutes in due course. It ended in a strong protest by Menzies against Egypt getting the better of the bedlam on all counts.

13. In regard to the Arab refugees, Mr. Lloyd felt it would be repugnant to do nothing about this despatching task and very difficult to get agreement between Arabs and Israel. It seemed necessary to impose to some degree some sort of agreement on them which they might be prepared to accept. A return to their own properties in Israel would not be a solution in any case, since some 5 percent of the refugees owned 95 percent of the property. It would help if Israel would accept in principle a return of some of the refugees, but unfortunately Israel was willing to take only a very small number indeed. The best hope seemed to be in resettlement in Arab countries once Israel had made some gesture. Only then was there any real opportunity to make any settlement of the Arab-Israel frontiers.

14. Mr. Nehru entered late into the discussion and embarked on the fundamentals of the Middle East situation. He started by tracing the general history of the area from the break-up of the Ottoman empire and concluded that the dominant feeling in the area now was the desire for political independence and nationalism and fear of losing that independence through outside intervention. He stressed that these were backward countries, economically, politically and socially, and they suffered from a shortage of leaders. There was a strong desire now for economic and social progress which in countries such as these depends upon agrarian reform. The land system is essentially feudal. Nehru spoke feelingly of the exceedingly great poverty in many of the rural areas. There were still landlords holding huge tracts of land and there was hardly a place left in the world where society was more distant from communism in its nature. He felt that communism was apt to come into these countries with liberal ideas of land reforms and parties formed to pursue this purpose. He clearly saw danger in seeking solutions to Mideast problems without recognizing this need for land reform.

15. Nehru went on to sketch the central political problem confronting Asiatic countries as being the necessity of dealing at the same time with the consequences of nationalist political revolutions and the insistent demands for economic reform. In Europe the economic change had come first. Turning back to the Mideast, he said that an Agrarian revolution is always simmering there and there was a great breach between the people and the rulers who were not meeting these demands. When other countries have dealt with these Mideast countries, they have dealt of course with their governments and the aid they have given has not trickled down very much to the people. Nehru said that he had put this point to "Ike" who had acknowledged it and said "but what am I to do." Any lasting solution of Mideast problems would not depend upon getting kings and presidents together but dealing with this explosive economic situation.

16. Turning specifically to Egypt, Nehru emphasized that it had undergone great changes since the rotten régime of Farouk had been pushed out by a military group of no great experience, but which for the first time had provided Egypt with honest government by men of integrity. These Egyptians had great ambitions, but they had provided their own country with a suitable and non corrupt administration and had given it a feeling that it had gone through a revolution and tackled the problem of agrarian reform which none of the other countries in the Mideast had done. Consequently there is a feeling in the area that Egypt is more advanced socially as well as culturally than other Mideastern countries and this gives it some status.

17. In regard to the immediate problems, Nehru felt that passions were still so high regarding Israel that it was hard to see settlements being arrived at immediately. He felt that the Gulf of Aqaba does not offer any major difficulty despite the attitude of Ibn Saud. Israeli use of the Suez Canal is a more difficult problem but he felt, like Mr. Menzies, that an answer might be sought through an interpretation of the Constantinople Conventions. The problem with Egypt was one of prestige and if an independent authority could determine a solution as a matter of law, it would be easier for them to accept it.

18. It was true that the attitudes of the Arab states differed substantially in regard to various problems relating to Israel but none of them will take the lead in moving toward a settlement even in such a matter as the refugees. Passions in Israel were also strong. He thought steps should be taken to develop solutions to these Arab-Israeli problems but the approach must be most tactful and aimed at bringing the parties together somehow.

19. In regard to the Baghdad Pact, Nehru said he was unable to agree with Mr. Suhrawardy's interpretation of it. No doubt it was created for defence reasons but what counts is the reaction of it on others, and others have thought it was a new weapon that could be used for aggression. He noted that the Soviet sale of arms to Egypt had followed it.

20. More generally he noted that Russia and the UK had competed for a long period in the Mideast, long before there was communism and that a great power such as Russia would be bound to take a detailed interest in its border states in such an area. Russia may well misbehave in the Mideast and even intervene but it has to be brought into any settlement if stability is to be achieved.

21. Mr. Macmillan opened the afternoon session by calling on Mr. Menzies to speak about the economic situation in the Mideast. Mr. Menzies said that he had been impressed by Nehru's analysis but felt that it was necessary to settle the Arab-Israeli issues before one could tackle the more fundamental problems. It was urgently necessary to have the boundaries of Israel determined with the authority of the UN and guaranteed both ways. Then the refugee problem should be ended by re-settlement.

22. Mr. Lloyd asked how these things were to be done, noting that almost every form of effort had been used to bring about the settlement of this Arab-Israeli dispute. Mr. Menzies suggested the Security Council might be used.

23. Mr. Diefenbaker entered the discussion at this point and the following is the text of the minutes on what he said:

"Mr. Diefenbaker suggested that, alternatively, the General Assembly should empower the Secretary General to seek to negotiate a settlement between the parties to the dispute. In general, he agreed that, although the only long-term solution of the problems of the Mideast lay in an improvement of the social and economic conditions of the peoples concerned, the immediate problem was the reduction of tension between Israel and the Arab states. Recent events had made public opinion in Canada more conscious of the importance of the Mideast, and Canada, who was already contributing to the UN Emergency Force, would continue to cooperate in attempts to solve the problems of the area. The UN force had been condemned in some quarters as ineffectual. He did not share this view, and Canada would contribute to the force as long as was desirable. During recent weeks there had been a resumption of border incidents, and there was some feeling that the Egyptian authorities were no longer in full control of the situation."

24. Further discussion then ensued about the settlement of the Arab-Israeli issues, Menzies arguing that it was urgent that the UN should tackle them afresh, Suhrawardy agreeing that settlement could only be based on Arab acceptance of the existence of Israel and Macdonald of NZ emphasizing that any settlement of the refugee problem would be very costly and encounter strong local opposition.

25. Attention then turned to the Suez Canal and Mr. Macdonald of NZ recounted some of the efforts that had been made in the past year to establish a stable régime for the Canal under some kind of international arrangements acceptable to the main users. He said the present situation was unsatisfactory and a binding international agreement was required. He discussed various means by which this might be sought and then suggested it might be best to wait a little longer before taking any fresh initiative.

26. Mr. Lloyd spoke of Egypt's declaration in regard to the Canal and said it comprised a good deal of substance of the six principles of the Security Council. However it was not sufficiently precise in regard to arbitration, development of cooperation with users and its great defect was its unilateral status. However, he noted there was a considerable community of interest between Egypt and the users and it was clearly to Egypt's advantage to gain their confidence if she was to be able to finance future development of the Canal. Given time and good will, a permanent agreement should not be impossible.

27. Mr. Menzies then spoke at some length and seemed to reflect the frustration of his own mission of 1956. He felt a great objection to the declaration or the absence of any effective insulation from the politics of any one nation.

28. Mr. Menzies expressed the thought that the Anglo-French intervention of last October had produced some useful results in focussing the attention of the world, and particularly of the USA, on the problems of the Mideast. Nasser, however, had been left with control of the Canal. Menzies felt that it was necessary to press on to secure non-political control of that waterway. He felt that it would be possible to exert economic pressure short of sanctions and to mobilize world opinion on the matter. Mr. Suhrawardy expressed some skepticism.

29. Nehru emphasized the registration of the Egyptian declaration with the UN as giving it a higher status than a mere unilateral statement and said the real point at issue was the confidence that countries were ready to place in the Egyptian government.

30. Mr. Macmillan summed up his impressions of the discussion on Mideast affairs and expressed the view that the strength of the Commonwealth association was shown in the way in which the various members had been able to take part in a reasoned and objective discussions of the important issues at stake in the Mideast on which such divergent views had been taken in the past year. He welcomed the direct interest now being taken by the USA in the Mideast. He felt that Arab feelings and attitudes were such that it would be necessary to make a slow and cautious approach to the solution of the tensions between them. He hoped that the regrouping of forces in the Mideast area would enable increasing attention to be devoted to the solution of the great social problems which Mr. Nehru had described.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — FOURTH MEETING, THURSDAY AFTERNOON JUNE 27

On Thursday afternoon, June 27, discussion was resumed on the Mideast. Discussion was opened by Mr. Menzies, and there were also interventions by Messrs. Selwyn Lloyd, Diefenbaker, Macdonald, Nehru, Suhrawardy and Macmillan.

2. Mr. Menzies said that he had been impressed by Mr. Nehru's emphasis on the importance of economic factors, and agreed that in the long term these were fundamental. But the political question of Arab-Israeli tension was also vital, particularly in the short run. Indeed, until this tension is relieved, the minds of men are unduly disturbed by it, and therefore precluded from adequately tackling the region's economic problems. Mr. Menzies suggested that if it were true that any Arab leader seriously entertained the idea of turning the Jews out, all Commonwealth members should try to remove such a notion. On the other hand, it was also necessary to remove the Arabs' genuine fears that Israel will go on expanding its boundaries as it increases its population through immigration. Mr. Menzies considered that efforts should be made to settle the boundaries with minor adjustments where necessary, and to guarantee them both ways. He suggested that the Prime Ministers' meeting should indicate publicly its views on this question, and also on the region's economic problems. Later he reverted to this suggestion that the meeting should call public attention to both problems, arguing that world opinion was in danger of thinking that the cessation of hostilities in the Mideast meant that the real problems of the area were settled, which is far from the case.

3. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd wondered just how one should go about trying to settle or guarantee the boundary question. He cited a number of attempts, by the UK unilaterally, by the UK and the USA, by the UN, and otherwise. All such attempts, he said, had failed. He wondered whether it was now time that another attempt be made through the UN, and if so whether by action in the Assembly or the Security Council.

4. Mr. Diefenbaker said that one possibility might be for the Assembly to adopt a resolution authorizing the Secretary-General to consult with governments concerned with a view to working out an agreement. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed that attention must be paid, both to the long term problems emphasized by Mr. Nehru and the short-term political problems. Mr. Diefenbaker then spoke of UNEF, and said that Canada hoped that reports that Scandinavian countries might withdraw their forces this autumn were unfounded. He told the Prime Ministers that Canada intends to continue its participation and contributions so long as the force is reasonably needed. He considered that the force should be maintained at least for a further period of six to nine months, and that the whole question could then be re-examined.

5. Mr. Suhrawardy said that any settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute could only be based on Arab recognition and acceptance of the existence of Israel.

6. Mr. Macdonald of NZ then opened discussion about the Suez Canal. He felt the present situation was not satisfactory, as some system of international control acceptable to the main users was needed. The London Conference last summer had proposed such a system. Subsequent discussions in the Security Council had produced a looser alternative. The present de facto situation was even less binding. Mr. Macdonald recognized that prospects for a binding agreement were not promising, but he mentioned several alternative ways in which the problem might be approached, including direct negotiations with Egypt by the user governments, or through the Canal Users' Association, or under UN aegis, or alternatively leaving negotiations to the shipping interests. Or perhaps the wisest course would be to wait a little longer for passions to subside. Mr. Macdonald said he had discussed the question with Mr. Hammarskjöld recently in New York, and the latter thought the situation was more stable than at any time in the past two years. The Egyptians were ignoring Israeli use of the Straits of Tiran, and the Israelis were showing similar restraint in not seeking to send their ships through the Canal. It seemed unlikely, in these circumstances, that Egypt would obstruct the transit of cargoes for Israel in non-Israeli ships.

7. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd made a statement which gave the impression that he thought the present situation was not too bad. The substance of the Egyptian declaration was relatively satisfactory and an improvement on anything which Fawzi had offered to Lloyd in the autumn of 1956. Mr. Lloyd thought that the unsatisfactory status did not arise because Egypt really wanted to avoid an agreement, or intended something which could be unilaterally withdrawn, but merely because she wanted to avoid any instrument to which Israel could adhere. Mr. Lloyd seemed relatively optimistic that a settlement could be brought about in due course, in view of the strong bond of common interest between the users and Egypt, and because without such a settlement Egypt was unlikely to get the capital she needed to finance Canal development.

8. Mr. Menzies objected that Mr. Lloyd's analysis ignored the most important part of the six principles, which was the insulation of the Canal from the politics of one nation. He said that Nasser had made no secret to him during his mission to Cairo last summer that his object was to subject the Canal to his political control. Mr. Menzies said that his own mission to Cairo had failed and the Suez Canal Users' Association had been ineffective. The Anglo-French intervention had been severely criticized by some countries, but Mr. Menzies emphasized that it had not been criticized by Australia. He thought it had produced some useful results, particularly by focussing world attention on the region and leading to vigorous USA participation. Nevertheless, the problem of insulating the Canal from politics was as unsettled as it had been twelve months ago. This must be a matter of concern to many countries whose trade passed through the Canal, quite apart from the great ship-owning nations. The problem remained as serious as ever.

9. Mr. Suhrawardy asked what Mr. Menzies proposed. Mr. Menzies replied that people claimed that the UN was useful because it could mobilize the moral force of the world. "I say let it do so," he commented. Mr. Suhrawardy said that the result might simply be to drive Egypt further into Russia's arms.

10. Mr. Menzies' emphasis on how unsatisfactory the Canal situation was seemed to embarrass the UK representatives slightly. But Mr. Nehru stepped in and asked whether Mr. Lloyd did not feel that apart from its unilateral status the content of the Egyptian declaration, as it is working out in practice, is satisfactory. Mr. Lloyd said that he would like to see more precision in the declaration, regarding arbitration and provision for cooperation with the users. There should also be some real guarantee of the development fund, which at present did not exist. Mr. Nehru replied that the essential problem seemed to be one of confidence that Egypt would in fact act up to her declaration. On this matter, Mr. Nehru said that the Egyptian document was an international declaration, and should not be considered merely unilateral. Egypt could, of course, repudiate it, but if she did so this would be much more serious than merely revising a statement of her own, and a number of consequences would follow from such a reputation. Mr. Nehru implied, therefore, that the situation was not, in fact, bad.

11. Mr. Macmillan, summing up as Chairman, said that the past year, since the Prime Ministers had last met, had been one of very considerable strain on all of them. He therefore found it rather heartening that such a fair and objective discussion could take place between individual members, despite the divergences of views which they had taken up during the past year. Mr. Macmillan said that there were not many organizations in the world in which such a discussion could take place.

12. Mr. Macmillan said he had been greatly interested in Mr. Suhrawardy's description of recent political changes in the Mideast and the new groupings of the Arab States. On the question of making further progress toward a political settlement, Mr. Macmillan emphasized the difficulty that though no serious Arab statesmen really believe that two million Israelis can be thrown into the sea, nevertheless none of them dare admit that they accept the existence of Israel. They all accept Israel de facto, but none dare do so de jure. The changes in the alignment of the Arab states might make progress on this particularly difficult, since moderates lay themselves open to the danger of being accused by extremists of betraying their brothers. There was a danger that initiatives to seek a formal settlement, whether through the Security Council or otherwise, would make the situation worse by weakening the moderates and strengthening the extremists. He therefore thought that a slow and cautious process of reconciliation would be necessary, and that a long period of armistice must be accepted as virtually inevitable.

13. Mr. Macmillan appreciated the force of Mr. Nehru's emphasis on long-term economic factors. One of the world's problems, Mr. Macmillan suggested, is that everyone nowadays everywhere wishes to push forward rapidly with economic development, at a rate which would require capital much in excess of the rate at which mankind is willing to accumulate it by savings. But in the Mideast, because of oil, great sums are available for development. In Iraq the revenue is actually being used for social and economic advances. But in most parts of the region, how to bring about such a constructive use of the revenue is, as yet, unsolved.

14. Mr. Macmillan, commenting on Soviet aims, said that the Russians were not trying to spread communism as such, but to spread their imperialist control. Communism is merely one of the instruments which the Russians use for that purpose.

15. The practical conclusions that Mr. Macmillan drew were threefold: firstly, regarding the Canal, efforts should be continued to improve the situation, and Mr. Macmillan was not unhopeful on this score; secondly, regarding the political question of Arab-Israeli tension, the efforts to reduce it must be patient and prudent, and the Prime Ministers should be content to make progress gradually; thirdly, there was a long-term problem of the economic and social development of the region. He hoped that the discussion of all these problems would prove valuable in helping members to formulate their policies on all these lines.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE: FIFTH MEETING

Discussions on the Far East and South East Asia were held at the morning meeting on June 28.

China: Admission to the UN

Mr. Nehru

2. Mr. Nehru opened the discussion by reminding his colleagues that the dominant factor in the Far East was the existence of the People's Government of China, and that to attempt to ignore this was to render impossible a solution of the many problems of the area. He thought that if recognition were not accorded to this government, the result would be less harmful to China than to the UN and the rest of the world. He gave as an example the case of disarmament where no effective agreement can be reached without taking China into account, although China cannot be taken into account since she is not a member of the UN.

3. He welcomed the recent action of the UK in relaxing controls on trade with China.

4. Later during the discussions, Mr. Nehru said that although China's admission would probably be interpreted as a certain set-back to the anti-Communist interests in the area, the reaction of the countries of South East Asia to China was determined basically by their recognition of the fact of her size and power.

Selwyn Lloyd

5. Mr. Lloyd agreed at the outset that the question of Chinese representation was extremely difficult. Logically the Peking Government should represent China. On the other hand, the USA had made it clear that she would almost certainly withdraw from the UN if China were admitted. There was also the complicating factor of Formosa.

6. Mr. Lloyd agreed with Mr. Nehru that the Peking Government would in due course have to be admitted to the UN but he did not think the time had come to force the issue with Washington.

Mr. Menzies

7. Mr. Menzies took the line that SEATO was the foundation of the whole of South East Asia. In his opinion if China were admitted to the UN, this could only be regarded as a victory for Communism and SEATO would suffer a serious set-back.

Mr. de Silva

8. Speaking on behalf of Ceylon, Mr. de Silva said that it was generally agreed throughout Asia that the exclusion of the Peking Government from the UN was an act of injustice.

Mr. Suhrawardy

9. The Prime Minister of Pakistan made an extremely interesting contribution to this discussion following his own personal contact with Chinese Communist leaders. His main impression was that China was very rapidly emerging as a very great nation and that the free world would be confronted in the Far East with problems fairly similar to those they had to face in Europe. During his visit he had found that the Chinese leaders were obsessed by the problems of Formosa and their relationship with the USA. He thought, however, that notwithstanding the effect on China's neighbours her admission to the UN might very well be disastrous since the whole of South East Asia may probably be lost to the free world. In his view it might already be too late to stop the process in any event.

10. Mr. Suhrawardy agreed with Mr. Menzies that SEATO was the only possible obstacle to the expansion of Chinese Communism throughout South East Asia.

Korea

11. Mr. Nehru showed considerable anxiety when referring to the recent statements to the effect that forces in South Korea would be re-equipped with modern arms. He was concerned lest such armaments would be given to South Korean troops.

12. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd made it quite clear that according to his information the North Korean forces had been steadily re-armed with up-to-date weapons and that the corresponding action taken in South Korea was justified. He also pointed out that according to his information there was no question of the USA providing atomic material and warheads to the South Korean army.

Indochina

13. In view of our special interest in this matter, the full report of the discussion on Indochina as given in the minutes is being sent in my immediately following telegram.

General

14. In conclusion Mr. Nehru said that all problems of that region had to be related to the more important problem as to whether or not there was to be peace or war in South East Asia. The answer could only be given by China who was becoming a great industrial power with a rapidly increasing population. The present government was strong enough to remain firmly in power and other countries must therefore adopt either a policy of containment leading to destruction, or endeavour to develop closer relations thereby encouraging the Chinese to pursue a more progressive policy. He could not agree that SEATO represented a bulwark of defence for the democratic countries in the region; in his view the fact was the opposite.

Mr. Macmillan

15. In summing up the debate Mr. Macmillan said that in the light of the discussions in the last two days, the meeting would recognize that the emergence of the Soviet Union and Communist China not only as the exponents of communism but also as great national and expansionist states faced the free world with grave problems. He believed that the democracies had no wish to destroy the Soviet Union or China, nor any wish to be destroyed by them. In his view NATO, SEATO and the Baghdad Pact were necessary mechanisms of defence.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE: FIFTH MEETING

Following is the full report of the discussion on Indochina as given in the minutes of the Fifth Meeting. Text begins:

Indochina

Mr. Nehru recalled that the Geneva Armistice Agreement had constituted three commissions to supervise its implementation in the countries concerned.⁶ The task had proved least difficult in Cambodia. In Laos, however, after the Commission had succeeded in securing an agreement between the Prime Minister of the Laotian Government and the Leader of the Pathet Lao providing that two members of the Pathet Lao should be made members of the Cabinet and that the Northern provinces should be reintegrated in the Laotian State, the USA had exerted economic pressure on the Laotian Government to abstain from ratifying this agreement. In December 1956, he had personally emphasized, both in Washington and in Ottawa, the danger of this course and the risk that Laos would be forced to look to China for assistance.⁷ Both the USA and Canada appeared to have accepted this advice. Last April, however, the UK had sent a note to the Laotian Government condemning the Pathet Lao, and had published this note at the very moment when agreement between the Government and the Pathet Lao seemed to have been reached. As a result, the Laotian Prime Minister, who had negotiated the agreement, had been compelled to resign, and the efforts of two years were in danger of being frustrated within sight of their goal.

In Vietnam, the Government of South Vietnam had refused to implement the Geneva Agreement or to hold the discussions with North Vietnam which the Agreement had prescribed for June 1956. How could the Supervisory Commission function if one of the parties involved did not even recognize the Geneva Convention which was the basis of the Commission's existence? The Government of North Vietnam had now asked the two co-chairman of the Geneva Conference, the foreign ministers of the UK and the Soviet Union, to persuade South Vietnam to begin the discussions envisaged by the Agreement. The UK could claim a larger share of credit for the Geneva Agreement than any other country: and it should now act promptly to save the Agreement from collapse and to forestall a fresh outbreak of hostilities in which South Vietnam would almost certainly be defeated.

In such circumstances, it would not be unreasonable to regard the task of the commissions as hopeless. Nevertheless he did not believe that they should be withdrawn from Indochina any more than from Korea. They exercised a restraining influence which it would be dangerous to dispense with.

Mr. Selwyn Lloyd said that, as regards Laos, the purpose of the Geneva Agreement had been to unite the whole country under the Laotian Government. But the Pathet Lao was sympathetic to communism; and when the Laotian Government had asked for our opinion on the projected agreement with the Pathet Lao, we had been obliged to advise them against accepting the latter's terms, which would have involved the admission of Pathet Lao ministers to the Cabinet and the conclusion of certain undesirable arrangements with China. Laos was a politically inexperienced country, and the risks of infiltration and subversion to which she was exposed fully justified the advice which we had given in an endeavour to save the government from falling under the domination of people whom they were created to control. The situation resembled that in Germany, where the Federal Government rightly refused to contemplate a re-unification of Germany on terms which would entail the inclusion in the government of ministers with Communist sympathies.

In Vietnam, both India and Canada had made a valuable contribution to the preservation of peace by the work of their representatives on the three Commissions. It was true that the Geneva Agreement had envisaged the Governments of North and South Vietnam as meeting in 1956 to consider arrangements for the holding of free elections. Although South Vietnam had refused to attend any such discussion, on the ground that it would in fact prove impossible to hold free elections in the northern part of the country, the UK had continued to press them to recognize that the principle of free elections should in due course be put into operation as a prelude to the ultimate reunification of Vietnam. Tension in the country as a whole appeared to be slowly decreasing and, provided that we did not try to proceed too hastily, there were grounds for cautious optimism about a steady improvement in relations in the longer term. South Vietnam, had in any case, now become an independent country, and it was questionable whether other countries would be justified in exerting pressure on her. Mr. de Silva said that, in Vietnam as in Korea, only time would solve the problem. Circumstances were not yet propitious for reunification, and it would be unwise to attempt to force this issue.

Mr. Menzies said that President Diem had been more successful in establishing a stable and progressive régime than had originally appeared probable. Here again was evidence of the psychological value of SEATO which had helped South Vietnam, as it could help other countries in Southeast Asia, to resist the encroachment of Communism.

PRIME MINISTERS MEETING: DISARMAMENT

1. At yesterday's meeting, disarmament was discussed. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd spoke first and gave a brief review of the position of the four Western delegations on the sub-committee. Mr. Lloyd mentioned the considerations which led the UK to decide to become a nuclear power. Nuclear weapons tend to equate smaller states with larger states. The USSR has a preponderance in men and conventional armaments which the West cannot match. It is the nuclear deterrent which preserves the peace. Mr. Lloyd then went on to say that the Western Powers could not accept an agreement for the suspension of tests even coupled with inspection as proposed by the USSR independently of a first stage disarmament agreement. The UK was, he said, prepared to take certain risks and agree to the suspension of tests if it was linked to other measures of a first stage disarmament agreement. He mentioned specifically adequate inspection, reduction of armed forces and conventional weapons, and a cut-off date for the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

2. Mr. Diefenbaker intervened briefly to say that he was in general agreement with Mr. Lloyd's exposition. Mr. Diefenbaker then referred to three matters in which Canada had shown a special interest, namely advance registration of tests, cessation of tests and aerial inspection. The text of Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks on these points has been given in my telegram 1627 July 2.

3. The Prime Minister or representative of each country then spoke. Apart from Mr. Nehru and, to a lesser extent, Mr. de Silva, there appeared to be general agreement with the point of view put forward by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Diefenbaker. Mr. Nehru's main objection was, as noted below, the Western position on nuclear tests. Mr. Nehru obviously has very strong personal views on the use of nuclear weapons. However, he spoke moderately and though advocating the immediate suspension of tests he did not call for an elimination of nuclear weapons from stockpiles.

4. The following were the main points which emerged in the general discussion:

(a) Cessation of Tests. Mr. Nehru, while he agreed that it would be preferable for a cessation of tests to be part of a disarmament agreement argued that sometimes it is difficult to proceed along several fronts at once. He saw no reason why nuclear powers should not agree to an immediate suspension of tests while negotiations were still proceeding. Agreement on this one subject would facilitate agreement on other elements of a disarmament agreement. Mr. Nehru referred to the harmful effects of tests, and argued that well-fed countries like the USA would suffer less than poor countries such as India. Mr. de Silva also thought that tests should be suspended immediately but he acknowledged that suspension of tests by itself was not enough and that there should also be cessation of production and reduction of stockpiles.

(b) Linking of Nuclear Disarmament with Conventional Disarmament. Several speakers, and in particular Mr. Menzies and Mr. Suhrawardy, argued that nuclear disarmament and conventional disarmament were one problem and not separable. The West should not agree to nuclear disarmament unless there was parallel conventional disarmament. If there was nuclear disarmament without conventional disarmament it would facilitate aggression by powers which had large armies and large conventional armaments.

(c) Fourth Power. There was general agreement about the importance on preventing, if possible, additional powers from becoming nuclear powers. Though immediate suspension of tests would achieve this purpose if accepted by all powers, it was pointed out by Mr. Lloyd that some other powers would probably not agree to forego tests and the manufacture of nuclear weapons, if the present nuclear powers, though prohibited from making tests, were free to go on indefinitely increasing their stockpiles. Other powers might, however, forego the manufacture and testing of nuclear weapons if there was an undertaking of the present nuclear powers not only to stop testing but also to stop the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

(d) China. There was a general agreement that it was unrealistic to envisage a disarmament agreement without China as a signatory. Mr. Menzies, Mr. Nehru and Mr. Suhrawardy were all agreed on this point; Mr. Lloyd said that his government had always anticipated that China would be a signatory. This, however, caused political difficulties for the US and Mr. Lloyd did not know how they would be resolved.

5. Mr. Macmillan summed up the discussion in an emotional but effective statement. He stressed the heavy responsibility resting upon his government in making decisions on nuclear questions. He did not expect his Commonwealth colleagues to share his responsibilities but he hoped for a measure of their sympathy. Mr. Macmillan recalled the horrors of World War I when conventional weapons alone were used. It was not enough to abolish nuclear weapons and make no provision to prevent wars with conventional weapons. The nuclear deterrent was, he said, the best guarantee of peace. No country would wish to start a war with the threat of a nuclear war hanging over it.

DISARMAMENT

Following is the text of Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks at the meeting under reference. Text Begins:

Mr. Diefenbaker said that Canada was substantially in agreement with the views outlined by Mr. Selwyn Lloyd. Canada had earlier been associated with Japan and Norway in sponsoring a resolution in the UN calling for the advance registration of nuclear tests.⁸ The Canadian Government had believed that while there appeared to be no possibility of reaching a wider agreement this proposal might at least be conducive to an atmosphere of co-operation. While the UK, France and the USA had indicated their acceptance in principle the USSR had refused to consider it. Canada had not, therefore, pursued it further. He believed that any agreement on the suspension of nuclear tests should be accompanied by some measure of conventional disarmament and by an effective system of inspection. If the USSR would accept the principle of comprehensive aerial inspection Canada would agree to similar inspection of her own territory. If however agreement on comprehensive inspection could not be reached the inspection of specified areas might be a useful first step. Canada was a near neighbour of both the USA and the USSR and was vitally concerned in any war which might break out in the Polar regions. A limited zone of inspection covering the Canadian Arctic area and the boundary between Alaska and the Yukon would therefore be very desirable.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — SESSION ON DEFENCE JULY 2/57

1. This session included all delegations except, as usual, those of India and Ceylon. It consisted primarily of an exposition of what was in the UK White Paper on Defence⁹ and an opportunity for some discussion of the implications of these for Commonwealth countries other than Canada. There was almost nothing of it new in the exposition of UK policy.

2. One might note that Sandys contemplated that there might be some places where limited war would occur, but he added what was perhaps a truism that if the great powers came into conflict in such local areas on vital issues, all weapons would be used and it would become a major war. He said that the alliances with which Britain and the other Commonwealth countries are involved are intended to prevent these limited wars which might lead to major wars.

3. In regard to Britain's policy on nuclear weapons, he said they had no intention of competing with the USA in a nuclear armament race. However, they did not wish to be completely dependent on the USA in regard to the nuclear deterrent, particularly as there seemed a possibility that when the intercontinental ballistic missiles were developed, the USA might be led to keep its troops at home and develop a more continental approach, in which case the UK would wish to have sufficient power to deter an attack on Western Europe or herself.

4. General Pearkes spoke briefly in response to a suggestion. He was recorded in the minutes as follows:

"Major General Pearkes said that, until a comprehensive disarmament agreement was achieved, Canada's defence policy would be based on close association with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Canada was supporting this alliance in two respects. First she was maintaining her contribution to the warning system and other defence of the nuclear retaliatory forces of the North American Continent. The warning system which stretched across Northern Canada was part of the general defence system of NATO, inasmuch as it should be able to provide some warning to Western Europe as well as to alert the American Strategic Command and the civilian population of North America.

Second, Canada was maintaining substantial forces in Northwest Europe. The Canadian Brigade Group, which he had recently inspected, was in a very satisfactory state of efficiency. He had also inspected the First Canadian Air Division, and had been greatly impressed by the high standard of combat readiness which it maintained and by the efficiency of its watch service. It might become necessary to reconsider both its role and its equipment in the light of the new weapons which were being developed. In the meantime, each wing of the Air Division consisted of three squadrons — two of Sabre Jets and one of the Canadian manufactured CF-100 which was a very effective long-distance all-weather fighter.

In addition to her contribution to NATO, Canada was also making a small contribution to the UN Emergency Force in the Mideast."

5. During a discussion, Mr. Diefenbaker asked whether the reduction in the UK contribution to NATO had been based on a re-assessment of the NATO requirement of manpower or on considerations of financial economy in the UK. Mr. Sandys replied that it had been determined primarily by considerations of economy.

6. The UK Ministers revealed that they had run into serious opposition within NATO to their proposed reduction of forces but they made a spirited defence of their new policy.¹⁰ They went on to say that the UK would continue to need some conventional weapons of the most modern type in order to discharge her world wide commitment in respect of limited war and in addition would need nuclear equipment for a major war.

7. Mr. Suhrawardy made a plea for greater attention to Mideastern defence on the part of the UK.

8. Mr. Louw and Mr. Menzies expressed some concern lest the reduction in overseas garrisons should weaken the situation in their areas. Mr. Sandys emphasized the possibilities of reinforcement through central reserves moved by air transport.

9. Further details, especially regarding matters not of immediate Canadian interest, are available in the minutes which will be available on a Top Secret basis.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE — SEVENTH MEETING

Discussions on the United Nations were held at the morning meeting on Tuesday, July 2.

Australia

2. Mr. Macmillan asked Mr. Menzies to introduce the subject. Mr. Menzies said that both the performance and the future of the UN were matters of controversy in which people tended to express extremist views for or against. But he himself, though he had been highly critical of the UN in the past, had on reflection become convinced that the UN offers the only hope of establishing world order based on justice. The right course, therefore, was to adhere to it strongly, improving it if we may.

3. The basic problem of the UN was to reconcile small nations' right to free expression with the fundamental fact that the main responsibility for peace rests with Great Powers. Were it not for the veto there would have been no Security Council and no UN. But its excessive use had led to the increased power of the General Assembly through the uniting-for-peace procedure, which had been exercised "to the discomfort of some of us."

4. Mr. Menzies mentioned that Mr. Macmillan in correspondence prior to the meeting, had suggested that he say something about the role of the principal organs. Mr. Menzies did not object to the Trusteeship Council, which he thought saw things in some proportion. But he thought much of the Assembly's exhortation and harassing of countries with colonial responsibilities was unrealistic and irresponsible.

5. The Assembly, though called the Parliament of the World, was not really very democratic. It represented governments, some of which were democratic and some not; some big and some small; but all with one vote. The development of voting blocks, to gain or frustrate the two-thirds majority, was a cause for concern. So was the tendency to take decisions speedily, which did not allow governments time to give detailed guidance to their delegations. Mr. Menzies illustrated this tendency, which he characterized as undemocratic, by reference to decisions last autumn on Suez and Hungary. Though in theory the Assembly could only make recommendations, in fact its resolutions have great force, and therefore its procedures should be scrutinized and considered very carefully.

6. Mr. Menzies also referred to the Secretary General's "newly-achieved quasi-executive powers." But he thought the most serious problem was the system of voting in the Assembly, to which further thought should be given. As the UN membership increases, a situation is developing in which the Great Powers, with their major responsibilities, were liable to be outvoted by the smaller nations which have little responsibility. Unless the position could be improved, Mr. Menzies said, there was risk that a Great Power might feel obliged to withdraw completely from the UN. If the present tendency went on uncorrected, he would not give much for the long-term viability of the UN. He thought it important to restore the power of the Security Council.

7. However, Mr. Menzies said that despite certain earlier views which he had expressed, he believed that the only solution, for those who feel critical of the UN, lies not, repeat not, in weakening participation in it, or in withdrawal, but the contrary. If the UK and France, smarting with natural resentment, should withdraw from the UN, that would be a serious loss. Mr. Menzies suggested that the true solution was that all of us must pay more attention to the UN in the future than we have done in the past. The UN must be mended, not ended. Its future would not depend on the members' capacity to organize their votes, but on the objectivity, determination and wisdom which each nation brings to its participation.

Canada

8. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed that there was need of a constructive approach to this problem. Though the UN had made mistakes, mankind demanded its continuance. Withdrawal was no remedy. The right course was to seek means of increasing the authority and effectiveness of the organization. The General Assembly had achieved its present position of authority because of the excessive use of the veto in the Security Council. It was, however, difficult to defend a position in which 6 percent of the world's population could control a two-thirds majority in the Assembly. The authority of the Assembly would be undermined unless the tendency towards bloc voting could be checked. It was the duty of every government to come to its own decision on what was best in the interests of the world and to regulate its voting on this basis and not by reference to the selfish interests of a voting bloc. On a realistic view the veto was inevitable. It was also inevitable that procedural reforms should depend on the attitude of the Great Powers. The Charter itself provided for revision after a period of ten years, but revision could not be attempted so long as the USSR remained opposed to it. It was unreasonable to accuse the General Assembly of having adopted a "double standard" in respect of the Mideast and Hungary. It was the Soviet Government, not the Assembly, which was guilty of adopting a "double standard." The cause of world peace would not have been advanced if the Assembly had forced the USSR to withdraw from the UN on account of their refusal to accept the Assembly's resolution on Hungary. The UN was not a supra-national authority. It could never be a substitute for national policy or for international negotiation or diplomacy. It was unfortunate that the USA Government had tended on some recent occasions to rely on the UN to solve international problems which called for policy and leadership by the Great Powers. Despite its defects, the UN still reflected the desire of mankind for some form of world organization. It was the duty of all governments to seek means of increasing its effectiveness, whatever the difficulties; for the alternative to some form of world organization was international anarchy.

Ceylon

9. Mr. de Silva said that the Assembly which he considered a democratic body was the refuge of all the smaller nations of the world and of the first importance to them. Without it small countries would be on their own but in it they can develop consultation and co-operation. It was not surprising that the General Assembly had developed some of the characteristics of other democratic assemblies including the tendency for those with common views and interests to co-operate in groups in order to make their influence felt. Mr. de Silva doubted whether it would be wise to try to revise the Charter at present. The veto despite occasional misuse would have to be maintained since it was a safeguard for the Great Powers and thus for the very existence of the UN itself.

India

10. Mr. Nehru said that a world organization had become essential. It was always easy to criticize its weaknesses but credit should also be given for its achievements though press publicity usually emphasized political conflicts. A balanced view should also recognize the importance of the UN's economic and social activities including those of its specialized agencies.

11. Mr. Nehru said that the UN must reflect the actual state of affairs in the world. We could not hope to make the UN much better than the world in which it operates. The most important improvement in the work of the UN will come through improving our own behaviour in the world and thus reducing conflicts and tensions between nations. Mr. Nehru thought that the recent decision to postpone the question of Charter revision had been wise since any attempt to revise it now would inevitably run into the conflict and tensions which affect the world today. The veto was a realistic recognition of fact.

12. Since the UN was formed new countries had come into existence and many of them were now represented in the UN. Not all however. The absence of China brings an element of unreality into the picture. Mr. Nehru said that the various groupings in the UN were not rigid blocs. The Afro-Asian group, for example, agreed on some matters but disagreed on others. They met together to express and discuss their views. Mr. Nehru agreed with Mr. Menzies that irresponsible voting was undesirable and that there might be some tendency for nations who do not have to carry much responsibility for the consequences to cast votes in large number on various issues without thorough consideration. On the other hand unless the UN sometimes reflected the major urges of mankind as well as material facts it would divorce itself from reality. The movements taking place in Africa and Asia should be recognized and constructively handled so that the aspirations of emergent peoples could be satisfied without creating crises.

13. Mr. Nehru went on to say that Asia and Africa were under represented in the UN as compared with Europe and the Americas. Any Charter revision should face this basic fact. In the Secretariat of the UN as well as in the Council, this proportion existed.

14. Speaking of the Security Council Mr. Nehru said that the conventions governing seat allocation needed reviewing. For example, India, though relatively large and important, could qualify for the Commonwealth seat at intervals of 16 to 20 years and if counted as an Asian country could qualify at intervals of about 28 years. As Commonwealth membership increased the first of these periods would grow longer. Mr. Nehru thought that this was not a very propitious time for changes but the fact remains that the organization does not adequately reflect the real conditions in the world and the developing nationalist movements in Asia and Africa might become disrupted if means were not found to enable their voice to be heard. The inevitability of delays must be accepted but there must not be too much delay.

15. Finally Mr. Nehru said he agreed with Mr. Menzies and Mr. Diefenbaker that there must be no withdrawal from the UN. Any withdrawal of support by Great Powers in particular would be most unfortunate. However much we might regret the failures to achieve the original hopes of the Charter we should recognize that the failures are more those of ourselves, men and governments, than of the UN as such.

Ghana

16. Dr. Nkrumah expressed his country's gratitude for the support from members of the Commonwealth in her application for admission to the UN. Commenting on Mr. Menzies remarks about blocs he recognized that new members of the UN should hesitate before aligning themselves with any particular groups of countries. Ghana was entering the UN with an open mind and wished to explore the world situation and international affairs before committing herself with any group. She was however very conscious of the problems of Africa. Dr. Nkrumah thought the UN valuable in helping to reduce international tensions and hoped that it would help other peoples to obtain independence.

New Zealand

17. Mr. Macdonald said that reliance on the UN was no substitute for national leadership or national policies. Our governments must not only take problems to the UN but ideas for a solution of problems. NZ realized the imperfections of the UN but continued to have faith in it. Support for the UN was the corner-stone of NZ's foreign policy. NZ was a small country but in the UN had had an opportunity to play a role in international affairs and it was often said that her influence there had been more than proportionate to her size. He agreed that everyone should work for the improvement of the UN but this could only be done effectively from the inside. There could be no advantage in withdrawing. Mr. Macdonald told a parable of a man in a local government in NZ who whenever dissatisfied with decisions got up and walked out in resentment. Inevitably his influence declined more and more. Mr. Macdonald emphasized the value of the UN not only through its formal discussions and machinery but the opportunities for informal discussions and contacts between diplomats and statesmen. The understanding thus created was greater than generally realized. Finally Mr. Macdonald said that the Commonwealth as a non-regional multi-racial group had a great part to play inside the UN.

The United Kingdom

18. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd said that the UK Government's attitude to the UN is "adherence and improvement." Mr. Lloyd denied that UK withdrawal from the UN was contemplated.

19. Mr. Lloyd said that the UN had four main roles:

- (1) The work of the specialized agencies which had achieved a lot;
- (2) As a forum for debate which was as such a valuable safety-valve. It was useful for people to be able to blow off steam;
- (3) The UN had a mediatory role and had achieved some measure of success in this;
- (4) The UN had the duty of enforcing the Charter not only by keeping the peace but by enforcing respect for international obligations.

In this regard it had fallen very short.

20. Mr. Lloyd said that last autumn there had certainly been a double standard in the passion with which the UK was assailed as compared with the attitude of many countries toward the USSR in regard to its policy in Hungary. However, Mr. Lloyd hoped that this would be a passing phase.

21. Mr. Lloyd said that the veto must be accepted as a necessary cement. But voting by groups was to be deprecated and would ultimately have a very bad effect. There were Commonwealth meetings for consultation but the Commonwealth was not a voting bloc. The UK was resisting pressure to turn the European group into a voting bloc.

22. Mr. Lloyd felt that there was room for procedural improvements in the UN and efforts should be made to achieve this. But he said "We have got to adhere and make it work." Mr. Lloyd said in conclusion that what worried him was the problem for ensuring respect for international obligations.

South Africa

23. Mr. Louw said that there was no love lost between South Africa and the UN and there were very good reasons for this state of affairs. However, he would discuss the UN in an objective and impartial manner. He spoke as one who had considerable experience having led his country's delegation to four sessions of the Assembly.

24. Many members had referred to the undesirability of withdrawal from the UN. South Africa's reduction of her delegation to the level of token representation had, however, been taken only after eleven years. No government could remain indifferent when its public opinion was aroused by repeated injustices.

25. Mr. Louw said there was a general feeling that all was not well with the UN. In 1946 every country had placed great hopes in the organization. Field Marshal Smuts had played a great part in its formation and had drafted the preamble to the Charter. But after eleven years there was widespread disillusion. Delegations paid lip service to the ideals of the Charter but pursued only national interest. Voting blocs were not a temptation but a fact. It was shocking that caucus meetings actually did take place. There was also horse trading and package deals, facts which knocked the bottom out of the ideals of the Charter. The UN applied a double standard, one to great nations, another to smaller ones. Moreover, important decisions often had to be taken by delegations, without time for instructions from the governments.

26. As regards Suez, Mr. Louw suggested that the failure of the Security Council years earlier to take action when its ruling about free passage for Israeli ships had been defied by Egypt was a contributory cause to the trouble last summer and autumn.

27. Mr. Louw said that the "uniting for peace" procedure, which was adopted in 1950 to circumvent the USSR use of the veto in the Security Council, might have been a useful move in the circumstances then existing, but its effect had been to put power into the hands of a large number of small nations with little sense of responsibility. The damaging effects of this situation in which the Assembly usurped the functions of the Security Council were increased by the growing tendency of the part of certain countries to regard the UN as an instrument of foreign policy. Mr. Louw did not see how the UN in its present form could long endure. Indeed the existence of the UN might itself constitute a danger to peace, and those who blindly relied on it to solve international disputes were deluding themselves. Mr. Louw wondered if peace might better be preserved through cooperation and collective agreements between like-minded nations. South Africa would regard the UK and the USA as like-minded nations. Mr. Louw referred favourably to NATO and SEATO.

28. Mr. Louw concluded that Commonwealth governments must address themselves seriously to the future of the UN and should consider what could be done to obtain the support of other countries for ensuring that the Charter principles were fully observed.

Pakistan

29. Mr. Suhrawardy agreed with Ceylon rather than with South Africa and assessed the UN as the greatest hope for assuring world peace and securing the rights of smaller nations when confronted with the expansionist tendencies of larger countries. He thought that despite a few failures here and there the UN had already achieved a substantial measure of success. The object must be to support and strengthen it.

30. Mr. Suhrawardy thought that blocs might, as Mr. Nehru had suggested, derive in part from widely felt sentiments regarding principles of international order. But such sentiments were not necessarily related to geographical regions. He doubted whether there was any real community of sentiment between Asian or African countries as a whole, or whether there was any such thing as an Asian urge or a Latin American urge. There was of course a general urge for independence, which found an important measure of expression in the UK's policy of granting self government. At the same time, he thought that in certain cases independence, though a natural human desire, might be sought prematurely by countries unable to stand on their own feet, and which might therefore gain independence from one country only to become still more dependent on another.

31. Mr. Suhrawardy did not consider the fact that small countries had a vote equal to that of a larger country necessarily objectionable. As within a national democracy, the weak and small should set their vote to support those leaders in the soundness of whose policies they could have confidence. It was precisely such confidence which explained why many small nations supported what is sometimes called the UK/USA axis (repeat UK/USA axis).

32. The real problem confronting the UN was how to enforce its decisions. There is a danger that its resolutions could be defied by certain countries. The Soviet bloc could defy the UN because the only effective sanction seemed to be total war. But the dilemma was not limited to the Soviet bloc. Sometimes a third country could defy the UN by letting it be understood that if sanctions were imposed it would swing over to the Soviet bloc. The international court might be a valuable method of solving the problem, but it was limited because access to it depended on the agreement of both parties to a dispute. There was also the possibility of economic sanctions, which might be effective in certain cases, or of moral sanctions. Mr. Suhrawardy thought that in time world progress might mean that no nation could long continue to defy world opinion. But some countries were more sensitive to world opinion than others. Within a society the sanction of opinion was backed up by the sanction of a police force, and in international life similarly the UN had already on occasion formed its own police force, as in Korea and more recently with UNEF in the Mideast. Pakistan supported the idea of a permanent UN force to be judiciously used in cases where there was a nearly unanimous UN decision, and such a force seemed likely to be able to keep the peace and lend weight to the UN resolution in question. But Mr. Suhrawardy urged that governments should all give serious thought to the problem of how to enforce UN decisions.

The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

33. Mr. Welensky said that there was in fact a double standard in the UN, one for the democracies and one for the dictatorships. Unless this could be corrected it meant that the UN contained within itself the seeds of its own destruction.

34. In discussion Mr. Menzies agreed that there was a double standard as evidenced in the treatment last autumn of the crises in the Mideast and Hungary. He urged that a special meeting of the Assembly should be called this summer to debate the UN Committee's report on Hungary and thus to marshal world opinion.

35. Mr. Suhrawardy said that it was not the UN itself which applied a double standard, but rather the countries called on to implement resolutions. It was not only the totalitarian dictatorships which defied the UN. There had also been instances of a democracy defying UN resolutions. It was the moral standard of the other country itself, Mr. Suhrawardy suggested, that determines whether or not it will choose to defy world opinion. The real question was whether in this case other governments were prepared to act with determination and to give effect to the sanction of opinion by appropriate modification in their day to day relations with the offending country. If this were done, and economic pressures also applied where necessary, even the USSR itself might eventually be brought to comply with UN principles. The real question is how far we ourselves are prepared to act to back our votes at the UN.

36. Mr. Macmillan summed up by saying that the main purposes of the UN were two-fold, first to maintain peace and second to see that disputes were settled in accordance with the principles of justice. In view of the development of nuclear and other weapons, war became increasingly terrible. This had the effect of maintaining peace but also the effect of making governments reluctant to use force to ensure compliance with UN resolutions.

37. Mr. Macmillan went on to say that since 1945 there had been a great change in the organization as originally conceived. The veto had originally been regarded as essential to the cooperation of Great Powers and thus a necessary cement for the UN, but its frequent use by the USSR had in fact caused the cement to crumble. The consequent growth in the responsibilities of the General Assembly had not been envisaged by the founders. It had been intended that the Security Council would be the managing committee and the governing body. Now that the Assembly had increased its powers, its rules and methods of procedure must be improved.

38. Mr. Macmillan said that the relative movements of the earth and the sun caused serious problems for governments in the UK and other parts of the world with time differences of several hours from New York, since in critical times it was virtually impossible to keep control of the situation and still get a chance to sleep.

39. In conclusion Mr. Macmillan thought that the UN could not be considered a solution to all of mankind's problems, but he agreed that it would be wrong, and indeed defeatist, to abandon the attempt to improve it. He thought that the biggest question was whether the Security Council could recover some of its authority. In this respect much, he suggested, might depend on how far a reduction of political tensions could be secured, for example through disarmament.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE: EIGHTH MEETING — JULY 3: ECONOMIC POSITION OF STERLING AREA AND COMMONWEALTH ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

1. The morning and afternoon meetings yesterday were devoted to economic matters. This telegram summarized the highlights from the Canadian point of view. The text of the minutes on Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks are being sent in separate telegrams.

2. In outlining the UK and sterling area external position, Mr. Thorneycroft, Chancellor of the Exchequer, emphasized the varied and heavy demands on the UK economy. He listed the "politically unpopular" internal measures which the UK Government had taken to meet the situation. He clearly implied the need for other sterling area members to do the same.

3. Mr. Thorneycroft stressed the need to welcome foreign capital investment into the Commonwealth.

4. Questions were asked about tied loans, the call on reserves arising from the servicing of foreign debts, and the economic penetration which foreign investment could represent. The UK view was that foreign capital should be welcome with only necessary safeguards applied by the capital importing countries. At the suggestion of Mr. Menzies, Mr. Diefenbaker made some comments on investment in Canada (see separate telegram referred to above).

5. Mr. Suhrawardy, Prime Minister of Pakistan, spoke of the "crisis" in which the sterling area found itself. (Mr. Menzies at a later point also spoke of the current weak position of the sterling area.) In a thinly veiled attack on India, the Prime Minister of Pakistan decried the recent high rate of drawings by India on its sterling balance: unless all the members of the sterling area showed equal restraint and "played the game," the area's financial resources would be dissipated and the central bank's already insufficient fluidity would disappear. If this fear was not well founded, should not Pakistan be allowed to meet its equally urgent needs and draw down its sterling balance at the same rate? Mr. Nehru replied in equally sharp terms. Mr. Thorneycroft made a finely balanced reply to Mr. Suhrawardy's question.

6. On the subject of Commonwealth development, the UK side listed their contributions and spoke of the strict limits under which they were forced to operate. Mr. Lennox-Boyd, Secretary of State for the Colonies, spoke of the desirability of "getting dominion capital muddled up in colonial territories." He stated that the Messina countries¹¹ had "pulled a fast one" in including their colonies in the Common Market at the last minute. (He said that the BWI had declared that they would not want to be included in the FTA until relations with Canada were clarified.) On this point the UK side spoke of their inability to get the European countries to modify their position and of their determination to mitigate the adverse effects which could be expected to flow from the inclusion of the European colonies in the Common Market. Dr. Nkrumah, Prime Minister of Ghana, made only one reference to the Volta River project and spoke of the need for his country "to find alternatives" to the drawing down of their sterling balances now that they were "free" to call on them.

7. Lord Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, suggested, and it was accepted, that the Commonwealth Economic Committee consider and make recommendations as to how it might expand the scope of its activities in the collection and publication of information on production, trade and consumption of important commodities and on economic development within the Commonwealth. Lord Home suggested and it was also accepted, that Commonwealth experts attending the Atomic Conference in Geneva next year should gather in London after the Conference.

The Messina countries were the six members of the European Coal and Steel Community — Germany, Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, and The Netherlands. The foreign ministers of these countries met at Messina, Italy, on June 1-2, 1955 to discuss the establishment of a united Europe through the creation of a common market.

Europe and the Commonwealth

8. Mr. Thorneycroft stated that the Common Market was a fact of life and "there is nothing we can do to prevent it." He did not ask for Commonwealth support in the negotiations for association which the UK will be entering with the European countries this fall.¹² He spoke in terms of UK national interests and the need for the UK to associate itself, if at all possible, with the Common Market through an FTA. Many things would happen if this could not be done; the UK would be shut out from the European market which would be dominated by Germany; countries like the Scandinavians, Switzerland and Sweden would be drawn into the Common Market rather than the FTA.

9. Most other speakers also spoke in terms of national interests. Mr. Menzies gave the most support to the UK.

10. Mr. Diefenbaker sought and received Mr. Thorneycroft's assurance that "Commonwealth agricultural exports to the UK will not be affected." Mr. Macmillan said that if it came to a choice between the Commonwealth and the European arrangements the UK would undoubtedly choose the Commonwealth, and he spoke of his government's clear determination to hold firm in the field of agriculture. He added "but we may fail."

11. Mr. Welensky, Prime Minister of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, asked whether the FTA was the beginning of the end of empire preferences. Mr. Thorneycroft gave a technical answer and the matter was not pursued.

12. The question of the colonial territories took up some time and Mr. Nehru suggested that Commonwealth countries might take a common line on this matter in the GATT.

13. In summing up, Mr. Macmillan said that the UK also had misgivings about the Common Market and its association with it through FTA. He said, however, that one must recognize the broad and strong political motives underlying the European movement for integration. In the Treaty of Rome the Messina Powers had agreed en principe. What mattered now was the way in which the treaty would be applied and administered. It would be to the common advantage if the UK could through a Free Trade Area influence this new group of European powers in the direction of more liberal and positive economic policies.

14. The meeting was breaking up when Mr. Macdonald, Minister of External Affairs of NZ, returned to a point he had made earlier in general terms: he said he hoped that the meeting of Commonwealth officials next week would consider the possible forms of association by Commonwealth countries with the Free Trade Area. The matter was not pursued.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE: EIGHT MEETING JULY 3

Following is text of Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks at the meeting under reference. Text Begins:

Mr. Diefenbaker said that at the end of 1954 the latest date to which figures were available Canadian private investment abroad amounted to $2,570 millions, of which $1,835 millions represented investment in the USA, $150 millions investment in the UK and $151 millions investment in the other countries of the Commonwealth. Canada, however, had a deficit with the world as a whole and in particular a deficit with the USA which had amounted to $1,300 millions in 1956 and would probably be still higher in 1957. Canada, therefore, needed foreign capital. She had in fact received considerable investment from the USA which now far outstripped the UK as the chief foreign investor in Canada and was in a position to dominate the basic industries such as oil, copper etc. More than 60 per cent of those industries were now owned or controlled by USA interests and Canada was increasingly concerned about the extent to which the determination of her economic development was passing into USA hands. Canadian development looked increasingly to the northern area of the country where the bulk of her resources of raw materials was concentrated. Within the foreseeable future the USA demand for many of these materials would outstrip the domestic reserves and it was for this reason that American interests have been extending their interests in our industries to an extent which might challenge Canada's economic freedom. It was increasingly the USA practice to establish in Canada a subsidiary of an American parent company but to refuse to allow any Canadian to acquire shares in this subsidiary or to have any say in its development. His predecessor as leader of the Conservative Party had been alive to this danger and had suggested that USA investment of this kind in Canada should be permitted only on condition that the boards of the subsidiaries included Canadian members, that Canadian subjects were allowed to acquire shares in these companies, and that in general Canadian interests were treated no less favourably than USA interests. Without some safeguards of this kind the future economic development of Canada would be determined not by the needs of the country itself but by the adequacy of the return on capital enjoyed by a foreign investor. As a result of an extensive enquiry by an independent commission into the future economic development of Canada¹³ the previous government had come to realize the danger. Even today few people realized the threat to the economic independence of Canada. The new government, however, while very ready to welcome investment from other countries in principle, would be on their guard from the outset against allowing control over their economic affairs to pass into the hands of speculative investors in other countries.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE: NINTH MEETING JULY 3¹⁴

Following is text of Mr. Diefenbaker's intervention at meeting under reference as well as remarks made by Mr. Thorneycroft immediately thereafter. Text Begins:

Mr. Diefenbaker said that Canadians were very sympathetic towards the development of political integration in Europe and to the concept underlying the customs union and the Free Trade Area. They were, however, seriously concerned about the implications for Canada if agricultural products were included within the scope of the Free Trade Area. There would undoubtedly be strong pressure upon the UK to modify their policy in this respect. He therefore sought an assurance that the UK would in no circumstances agree to join in arrangements which comprised European free trade in agricultural products.

Mr. Thorneycroft said that it was the firm intention of the UK Government to ensure the preservation in full of Commonwealth interests in the export of foodstuffs to the UK. There had been wide recognition in Europe of the special relationship between the UK and the Commonwealth in this context; and while there would undoubtedly be strong pressure upon the UK to enter into discussions with other European countries about trade in agricultural commodities at least in so far as this trade was affected by domestic agricultural subsidies it had been made plain that the UK could not participate in a free trade area which would involve a reduction in the tariff preferences given to Commonwealth foodstuffs.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE; VISIT BY THE QUEEN; REPORT BY PRIME MINISTER

3. The Prime Minister reported that, during the course of the recently concluded London talks of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, he had been granted a twenty-minute interview by Her Majesty the Queen. The conversations had actually lasted forty minutes. Her Majesty was obviously very happy to come to Canada. She had been looking forward to the visit for a long time. She was familiar with the political situation here and made it clear that she did not wish in any way to interfere with the government's wishes concerning the holding of an early session of Parliament. If the government felt it desirable to have Parliament convened in September, she would be quite prepared to give Royal Assent to a few bills instead of formally opening the session as had been suggested by the previous administration.

The Queen had been simple and natural. It was obvious that she knew a great deal about happenings in Canada and she showed a keen interest in finding out more about the Canadian people and their government. She had a special word of greeting for French speaking Canadians.

In previous Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conferences there had been some reluctance to admit to the Commonwealth additional countries with coloured nationals. This reluctance was natural enough if one considered that a trend of this kind might eventually result in these nations having the majority. However, there had been no evidence of this attitude during the London talks which had just concluded. As a matter of fact, the last paragraph of the final communiqué¹⁵ issued by the Commonwealth Prime Ministers had noted the fact that the Federation of Malaya was on the eve of attaining independence, had extended the Prime Ministers' warm good wishes to the Federation and had stated that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers were looking forward to welcoming an independent Malaya as a member of the Commonwealth. This new attitude was illustrated vividly by Dr. Nkrumah, the Prime Minister of Ghana, who boasted that he had been invited to lunch by Mr. Louw, the Minister of External Affairs for the Union of South Africa.

It was clear that the United Kingdom had to become a member of the proposed European Free Trade Area, as otherwise Germany might eventually dominate Europe from the economic point of view and displace Britain from many of her foreign markets. This general preoccupation with the problem of an European Free Trade Area placed added difficulties in the way of convening an early Commonwealth trade and economic conference.

The Prime Minister of Australia, at first, had been favourably disposed towards holding such a conference but a few days later he appeared to have completely changed his mind. He now held the view that Australia did not want a repetition of the 1932 Conference and felt Australia's freedom of movement was restricted by the 1932 Ottawa agreements. Mr. Menzies had gone on to say that the practical answer to raising the standard of living in southwest Asia was in expanding trade with a re-vitalized Japan. Mr. Macdonald, the Minister of External Affairs and Defence of New Zealand, was inclined to share Mr. Menzies' views. New Zealand had domestic political problems and an early conference might tend to aggravate rather than ease them. New Zealand, too, wished to buy cheaply from Japan. Towards the end of the London talks, there had been [a] closed meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers during which there had been some rather warm verbal exchanges regarding the Canadian proposal for the holding of a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

Despite Mr. Menzies' attitude, he had accepted an invitation to come to Canada and would be in Ottawa from July 22nd to 24th.¹⁶ Mr. Diefenbaker would be absent on the 22nd, on which date it was proposed that Mr. Menzies should have general discussions with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Prime Minister would be back in Ottawa on the 23rd and 24th to continue discussions with Mr. Menzies.

South Africa was not keen on the idea of holding an early conference. Mr. Diefenbaker had the impression that the country did not want to remain too long in the Commonwealth.

It was from Mr. Macmillan that the Prime Minister had received real help and support. Mr. Diefenbaker had received definite assurance from Mr. Macmillan that the United

Menzies met with Prime Minister Diefenbaker briefly in Ottawa on August 1, 1957 as he returned to Australia from London.

Kingdom would not have the position of Commonwealth agricultural products in the U.K. market interfered with by the European Free Trade Area scheme.

Mr. Nehru had seemed a very reasonable man. He had declined with thanks the suggestion that Canada might stand aside this year to let India have the Commonwealth seat on the Security Council, pointing out that Asia, in any event, would be represented by Japan on the Council. Mr. Nehru was facing grave financial difficulties at the moment. India required £200 million immediately to remain solvent. Mr. Suhrawardy of Pakistan was a rough talker who neglected no opportunity to make things unpleasant for Nehru whom he described as a crook, a scoundrel, and an ingrate. On the other hand, Nehru showed a great deal of patience with Suhrawardy's outbursts and never retaliated in kind.

The U.K. Foreign Secretary felt that it would be unwise to expect significant changes as a result of the recent dismissals of Malenkov, Molotov, Shepilov and Kaganovitch from top positions in the Soviet hierarchy, although there might possibly be some lessening of world tension. The Soviet government would undoubtedly continue to press for higher living standards in Russia even though Malenkov, who had, until now, been responsible for this, was one of the four persons dismissed. The only two members of the old guard remaining in the top echelons of the Soviet government were Bulganin and Borashilov.

POINTS RE HIGHLIGHTS OF LONDON CONFERENCE

This document, signed by R.B. Bryce, contains Prime Minister Diefenbaker's first-person account of the London Prime Ministers' Meeting.

Nature of Meetings

Ten countries are represented — the U.K. and four of us in the “old Commonwealth” plus the three Asiatics and Ghana and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This means about 24 of us sitting around the U.K. Cabinet table with about 30 officials and secretaries present as well. There were two relatively short meetings of only the Prime Ministers or their representatives. There were 12 sessions spaced over 10 days, not crowded in themselves but with the many private conversations, as well as luncheons, dinners, receptions etc. our time was very fully occupied.

The meetings are very informal in character. Macmillan takes the chair and usually calls on someone to open the discussions on each general subject, sometimes one of his own Ministers, sometimes one of the overseas Prime Ministers. Usually there are statements after that by most of the Prime Ministers present or their representatives and sometimes, but not always, some active discussion with questions, answers, comments on what has been said, etc. There are no resolutions or decisions except in regard to the communiqué at the end and on the admission of new members such as Malaya, whom we decided in principle we should admit if they apply as they intend to do after receiving their independence on September 1st. The main purpose and value is the exchange of opinions and information so that we can all act with a greater understanding of each other's points of view. To some degree this exchange of opinions and information will help to modify the opinions and perhaps actions of some of us on some of the issues that arise.

The discussions are private and confidential and nothing is supposed to be said about them except in the rather vague communiqué at the end. In fact news keeps leaking out to all the scores of newspapermen in London about what is going on and it presents all of us with difficult problems in what we should say, either off the record or on the record, particularly to our newspapermen from home. I endeavoured to be very scrupulous about what I said to them but there was a lot leaked out from other sources about what went on including some of the things I said myself.

Discussions — General Impressions

In general the discussions revealed a reasonable harmony with no bitterness being exhibited over the events of last year and almost no reference made to the Suez intervention. The most obvious clash was that between India and Pakistan; the tension between these two being evident most of the time and occasionally breaking open into the discussion.

Relations with the U.S.S.R.

This was the first subject discussed and there was really nothing very new or startling brought out. It took place before the Molotov and Malenkov removal but the U.K. recorded the views of their Embassy later on; the significance of this event suggesting that it marked the end of compromise between the Stalinists and anti-Stalinists with the latter now taking control and perhaps being in a more precarious position for some time as far as internal opinion is concerned. The gist of the views about Russia was to the effect that there is no immediate likelihood of them trying to start a war and they seem to have plenty to do at home, but we have no evidence that would justify us in trusting them to a degree that would enable us to reduce our defence effort which is still needed to deter them from aggression unless that is done as part of a balanced disarmament plan.

Middle East

There was a long discussion on Middle East affairs but no serious dispute. Suhrawardy was optimistic about the immediate future in Arab countries but Nehru thought there would never be stability until there was land reform and other economic progress. There was general agreement we should try to improve the refugee situation but no concrete proposals. It was agreed that the problem of Israeli shipping in Aqaba and the Canal should be treated as a legal problem to take the heat off it. Australia, New Zealand and the U.K. wanted to see a more binding agreement on the Suez Canal but India thought the Egyptian declaration was fairly good, was working and should be the basis for further development. Most of us felt the U.N. should be used to try to find settlements to the Middle East issues but we differed on timing. I told them we would keep our force in the UNEF as long as the latter was really needed and useful.

Far East

There was nothing very new on substance. Nehru and other Asiatics argued again for recognition of China. I said little at the meeting but mentioned to the press that recognition was not just a juridical matter but apt to be taken as a gain for Communism. There was little discussion of the Colombo Plan — but in a press conference I said that in my view the Colombo Plan should be extended to other countries and Canada should contribute more to it.

Disarmament

There was active discussion on this based on a U.K. account of discussions with the Russians in the U.N. Sub-Committee. I will be taking up this subject in Cabinet next week to get approval for the Canadian position in these talks. The main point in the Commonwealth talks was that the U.K., Australia and others emphasized there should be no suspension of atomic tests or other measures to limit nuclear armament without some start being made on conventional disarmament too. Nehru would like to go further and take whatever first step was possible, even agreeing to end tests without any related measures.

United Nations (see External Affairs memorandum)¹⁸

There was some smouldering resentment by Menzies and the South Africans and some others about the U.N. but no serious outbursts. There was fairly general agreement on the line taken in the communiqué on this (see 1st para. Page 2).¹⁹ Almost all spoke well of the specialized agencies.

Defence

The session on this did not include India or Ceylon. It was mainly the U.K. explaining the changes in its forces and policy as set forth in its White Paper last spring. Pakistan wanted more U.K. effort in the Middle East and Australia and South Africa were a bit concerned about reductions in overseas garrisons, despite assurances concerning air transport of central reserve. Mr. Pearkes explained briefly what Canadian forces were doing and said our government intended to maintain our forces strong and meet Canadian commitments.

Economics and Trade

Lengthy discussion of the sterling area position took place which the U.K. used to emphasize that they could not meet all the demands of the sterling area Commonwealth countries for capital for economic development and they urged the others to take capital from wherever they could get it. I told them something of our problems with American investment in Canada which impressed the others. It appears the sterling area as a whole is still having difficulties in finding the foreign exchange it needs; the U.K., Australia and South Africa having improved but India and Pakistan being in serious financial trouble. Nehru told us of his difficulties in financing his five year plan. Suhrawardy openly accused India of "not playing the game" and using more than her share of the dollar resources of the sterling area.

On trade the U.K. explained its plans about the Free Trade Area it proposes to enter with the six countries making up the "European Common Market." We have to take the Common Market for granted now whether we like it or not — and the U.K. does not dare to stay out but must try for the Free Trade Area — but it will be hard bargaining. I emphasized the importance of the U.K. holding its position on excluding agriculture from its Free Trade plan and I received a definite assurance in this respect on Commonwealth trade aspects. Others were concerned about agriculture too and several were strongly concerned about inclusion of European colonies but did not want British colonies in. New Zealand wanted the door left open so she could be associated in some way with Free Trade Area herself.

On our ideas concerning a conference on trade, they all see more of the difficulties than of the opportunities, especially Australia and New Zealand, but I spoke pretty strongly in private to them. Macmillan understands our position and is trying to be helpful. I was able to get them to agree to the Finance Ministers' meeting in Ottawa in September but they would not agree to say in our communiqué that they were to consider what should be done now about Commonwealth trade. I made clear to the press in advance, however, that I expected them to discuss trade and they will expect to do so.

I told the press we will be sending a memorandum in two or three weeks to other Commonwealth countries indicating in more detail what we have in mind in regard to such trade and economic discussions.

Mr. J.F. Grandy, (Department of External Affairs),
The Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet, (Mr. Martin).

Also Present

The Canadian Ambassador to the United States (Mr. Robertson).

1. The Minister of Finance noted the passage in the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the recent meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in which it was indicated that the Prime Minister of Canada had extended an invitation to Commonwealth Finance Ministers to meet in Ottawa this year, following the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to be held in Washington in September. Mr. Fleming said he would be sending a formal invitation to Finance Ministers in a few days' time. Meanwhile, preparations for the September meeting should be initiated. Such a conference would be for the purpose of arranging a full-scale trade and economic conference in 1958, to be held preferably in Ottawa.

The Prime Minister of Australia would be in Ottawa for three or four days commencing July 21st,²¹ and the Minister of Finance had been asked to discuss matters of mutual interest with Mr. Menzies with a view to facilitating the success of the September meeting of Finance Ministers, and of any conference which might subsequently be held.

For the September meeting the question of physical arrangements should be considered — dates, accommodation and so forth. Apart from that, the problem of holding the conference itself bristled with difficulties, including diversity of interests, different degrees of development within the Commonwealth, meetings of minds, and others. Nevertheless, it was to be hoped that something more positive than merely agreeing that no harm would come from holding a conference would be achieved. The principal purpose of the conference would relate to trade, but it should not exclude other economic questions. The agenda of the meeting should be wide enough to make it attractive to as many members of the association as possible, particularly the more newly independent nations. On the other hand, it would be the hope of the government that something useful in Canada's trade interests would emerge from the talks. The government had expressed concern about the extent of Canada's trade in only one channel. The U.S. was a good neighbor and antipathy towards her was not the reason for prompting the government to seek a wider diversification of markets. What was sought was a strengthening of Commonwealth ties through an increase in Commonwealth trade.

2. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) As a rule, the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers involved an exposition by the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer of the sterling area exchange position, followed by presentations of various domestic economic situations. Last year the meeting also included an exposition by the U.K. of its proposals with regard to the European Free Trade Area. This kind of session might be held on the first day of the meeting in Ottawa, followed by one or two days of the more general discussions which the Canadian government had in mind. The conference might start here on Saturday, September 28th, with a break on the Sunday and then get into the other matters on Monday and Tuesday. The most satisfactory place to hold the discussions appeared to be the Seignior Club. The Canadian government, as host, should transport the delegates from Washington to Ottawa in government aircraft.

(b) The subjects which the government might wish to have considered at the meeting were related to what the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer might normally present to this annual gathering. For example, a discussion of the facts of the existing sterling area exchange position would lead into trade and the financing of development. From the Canadian point of view, this latter item might not be one which it would be desirable to have on the agenda. Most of the Commonwealth was in a deficit position and Canada itself was a net importer of capital. Even so, if the agenda included an item on the financing of development, practically everyone at the meeting would look in Canada's direction. This should be considered in relation to the form of the invitation to Finance Ministers. It was said, on the other hand, that it was nothing new for Commonwealth Finance Ministers to discuss financing of development at these annual meetings. What would be new would be for Canada to introduce the subject, and if this happened we would be regarded as forthcoming in the matter. However, it would be worth risking discursiveness in discussion, brought about albeit by the form of the invitation, if this succeeded in appropriate first-class representation at the meeting.

(c) The field of communications between members of the Commonwealth might be an item for consideration. A new direct cable from Canada to the U.K. had been approved in principle and this had emphasized the inadequacy of other links in Commonwealth communications. Improvements in this field might facilitate increased trade and at the same time would involve no tariff problems. Canada might even consider a larger share in the cost of any new facilities than might otherwise be the case. This kind of an approach was related to a community of interest amongst members of the Commonwealth as against divisions in other fields. The project was a large one, involving approximately $200 million, with the work taking perhaps as long as ten years. It was pointed out that pursuing this suggestion would involve a departure in policy because when the facilities had been split up some years ago, Canada had tended to go her own way.

(d) There were probably a number of things which the Canadian government might do by itself which would promote greater trade. However, it was a different matter to set up an agenda and hold discussions about items in which all members of the Commonwealth might take a similar interest. It was of the essence to find items where there was such a common interest. On preferences, there would be differences. Canada desired to increase her trade with other members of the Commonwealth, whereas other Commonwealth countries wished to increase their trade with the U.S. It seemed, therefore, that it would be necessary to look outside what could be considered the normal trade field for agenda items. It was said, on the other hand, that while it would be desirable to have a number of strings to our bow in organizing and preparing for a meeting, it would be undesirable to be distracted from the main objectives of trying to increase trade and of trying to get away from having such a high proportion of our trade concentrated in one area. As regards our trade relations, they should be examined not only with our Commonwealth partners, but also with other countries. For example, it would probably be necessary to hold discussions with the Common Market countries, if only to protect future wheat sales.

(e) There was some doubt as to whether, in the invitation for the September meetings, it should be stated that the purpose was to discuss the plans for a larger trade and economic conference, or whether the letter should speak only in more general terms on Commonwealth trade and economic relationships. Direction on this point was required.

(f) If Ministers, other than Finance Ministers, and their officials were desired at the September meeting, the letter of invitation should be drafted in such a way that it would make this possible. Otherwise, it could be expected that only Finance Ministers would attend.

(g) It would be desirable to have background material available for the use of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister in their discussions with the Prime Minister of Australia in about two weeks' time. Australia now appeared to be on the road to giving up her preferences in the U.K. in exchange for concessions elsewhere and would likely be accepting more European imports and imports from Japan. Australia had not had much trade with Canada which would make the discussions with Mr. Menzies not too easy. Another factor to be kept in mind was that Australia, and New Zealand also, by and large discriminated against Canada and we had been urging the Australians to refrain from these practices. Mr. Menzies might feel that Canada would be revising its past attitude if we were to suggest that the important thing was to maintain Commonwealth trade.

(h) In the material for use in the talks with the Australian Prime Minister, the sentimental approach, that anything which would strengthen the Commonwealth as a force for good was desirable, should be noted. The opportunities for improving Australian trade with Canada and for improving trade among other Commonwealth countries should be explored. The fact that notice had been given to the Australians that Canada wanted to renegotiate some tariff schedules should not be overlooked.

(i) Given the existing framework of current conditions, which included the fact that no new preferences could be expected, the need for capital particularly by the under-developed members, etc., it seemed that any proposed Commonwealth discussions would lead into consideration of the dollar-sterling area position and the prospects of sterling convertibility. This, in turn, would lead again to talk of the collective approach.

(j) There would be major G.A.T.T. discussions later this year, including G.A.T.T. consideration of the Free Trade Area and the Common Market. As far as Canada was concerned, we might have important tariff items to renegotiate, such as steel and pipes and tubes, and these negotiations would in the main be with the U.S. as our principal supplier of these items. These factors would circumscribe any Commonwealth discussions at a major Commonwealth trade and economic conference in 1958. In addition, the U.S. Trade Agreements Act would be up for renewal in 1958 which would further complicate Commonwealth discussions.

(k) Officials should prepare information on what a 15 per cent diversion of imports from the U.S. to the U.K. would involve.²² It was also necessary to have considered the implications of accepting sterling for some of our exports. In connection with the first of these two points, it was to be noted that in times of prosperity imports from the U.S. rose in relation to imports from other countries; the reverse was true in depression years.

(l) Serious thought should be given to the possibility of reaching an agreement with the U.S. on disposals of wheat and other agricultural products. The matter was urgent in that U.S. congressional steps in this connection for the next fiscal year were now almost completed. One possibility would be for Canada to transfer a significant quantity of wheat to the deficiency areas of the Commonwealth, to be done in concert with the U.S. What should be aimed at was the preservation of commercial markets of both countries and an agreement as to areas where each might give away surpluses.

If it were considered desirable to pursue this question in Commonwealth talks, it should first be initiated with the U.S. and done so reasonably soon. In thinking about such an approach, the Australian position should not be forgotten as she was a fairly large supplier of wheat for some of the Asian members of the Commonwealth. It should be remembered too that the cost of giving wheat away was very heavy. Including freight, transferring a bushel of wheat to India amounted to $2. Exploring such possibilities might soon become public knowledge and would lead to the danger of losing cash sales.

(m) India's continued membership in the Commonwealth was uncertain and she might well decide to leave. If this occurred, Pakistan and Ceylon would probably follow. It was important, therefore, in considering the future of the Commonwealth, to strengthen relations with India as much as possible.

3. Conclusions

(a) Meeting of Commonwealth Ministers in September in Ottawa.

(i) Letter of Invitation. The letter to be sent to Commonwealth countries, presumably by the Minister of Finance, should be addressed to those who were represented at the recent Prime Ministers' Meeting. However, it should be kept in mind that Malaya will gain her independence on August 31st, and should in due course be included. The invitation should go to Finance Ministers but should be framed in such a way that it would be open to them to bring other Ministers or officials as they may choose. The drafting of the invitation would require more explicit instructions from the Prime Minister as to whether the proposed September meeting was for the purpose of discussing plans for a conference in 1958, or whether it should speak only in more general terms with reference to trade and economic matters.

(ii) Agenda. This to be the subject of an exchange of views between now and September. Officials were instructed to prepare immediately a memorandum† on what the nature of a general conference in 1958 might be, and to include therein items for discussion at such a meeting, to be available for Ministers by the end of the week for their consideration and revision.

(iii) Physical Arrangements. Discussions to be held at the Seignior Club if possible, the Government Hospitality Committee to look into accommodation problems. As host, Canada would arrange to bring delegates from Washington to Ottawa following the Bank and Fund meetings. If possible, the conference to start on Saturday, September 28th, and continue through the following Monday and Tuesday.

(iv) Course of Discussions. Saturday, September 28th, would be devoted to the normal post-Bank and Fund discussions usually held by Commonwealth Ministers, including a review of the sterling area position and presumably a further report on the European Free Trade Area. Sunday would be free. Monday and Tuesday would be devoted to consideration of the wider trade and economic questions and to preparations for the holding, in Ottawa if possible, of a 1958 conference.

(b) Discussions with the Prime Minister of Australia. A brief to be prepared to include a review of the opportunities for improving trade with Australia and of the opportunities for improving trade relations among Commonwealth countries; it being kept in mind that Canada had given notice to Australia that she wished to renegotiate certain tariff schedules; the memorandum for the September meeting would be helpful in this connection.

(c) Diversion of Imports from the U.S. to the U.K. and Commonwealth Countries. A memorandum to be prepared on what the suggestion of a 15 per cent diversion would involve.²³

(d) Acceptance of Sterling for Canadian Exports. A memorandum† to be prepared by the Bank of Canada on the implications of such a step.

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

Repeat Wellington, Pretoria, Delhi, Karachi, Colombo (OpImmediate) (Information).

Please pass following message from the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Donald M. Fleming, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Finance Minister). London please pass through Rhodesia House for Finance Minister of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and through Commonwealth Relations Office for Finance Minister of Ghana.

"1. It has become an established practice to hold meetings of Commonwealth Finance Ministers following the annual meetings of the Bank and Fund. At the recent meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London The Honourable John G. Diefenbaker extended an invitation to hold the meeting of Finance Ministers this year in Ottawa.

²³ Voir/See Document 345.

2. I would like to propose the following arrangements. The Bank, Fund and IFC meetings in Washington are scheduled to end at latest by mid-day Friday, September 27, and we shall be glad to provide air transportation to Ottawa that day. We could then commence our meetings here on Saturday morning, September 28.

3. I understand that at the recent meetings of Commonwealth officials in London it was envisaged that our meeting might be concerned with three subjects:

(i) the position of the sterling area;

(ii) recent developments regarding the European Common Market and the Free Trade Area;

(iii) Canadian proposals respecting the expansion of Commonwealth trade and the promotion of closer economic relations among countries of the Commonwealth.

Perhaps the sessions on Saturday could be devoted to the first and second subjects, leaving discussion of the third subject to take place on Monday and Tuesday.

4. I expect to be in a position before long, and well in advance of these meetings, to put before you a memorandum outlining a number of proposals to be discussed in connection with the third subject. Undoubtedly you, and our colleagues throughout the Commonwealth, will likewise have proposals to make with the same end in view.

5. If, in view of the matters to be discussed, should you wish to be accompanied by another minister he will be most welcome. Will you please let me know in due course how many your party will include.

6. My Government will consider it an honour and pleasure to be host to you and your party. I look forward to welcoming you to Canada and to fruitful collaboration at our meeting.

7. I am sending a similar message to (the Chancellor of the Exchequer and) all Commonwealth Ministers of Finance.

(8. To the Chancellor only. I understand that the Malayan Federation will achieve independence on August 31. Accordingly it would seem appropriate that the Malayan authorities should receive an invitation. If you agree, I would be grateful if you would transmit it on my behalf.)”

When we returned from London about a month ago, you asked me to have prepared a memorandum on the possibilities and means of diverting some 15% of Canadian imports from the United States to imports from the United Kingdom.

In discussion with Mr. Fleming and Mr. Churchill and officials in connection with the Commonwealth trade conference preparations, this problem was assigned to the Department of Finance. They have worked on it intensively and have revised their original paper to take into account comments from Trade and Commerce and External Affairs. They have now furnished me with their revised paper which I attach hereto.

The memorandum makes clear there are many serious difficulties. The pattern of our trade reflects far more than measures of commercial policy and indeed the latter have hardly been a dominant influence in the past decade. Consequently, to divert as much as 15% in the way considered would require quite drastic action.

You may like to think of having some study somewhat along these lines prepared in a form that could be published or that could form the basis of a detailed speech by one of your colleagues. It seems to me there would be some value in a good public understanding of the nature of the problems involved here. The matter of timing, however, is a very substantial one and perhaps it would be better to do this in Parliament on a suitable occasion.

DIVERSION OF CANADIAN IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

The purpose of this memorandum is to consider the diversion of a really substantial proportion of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom, various methods which might be employed to this end, and some of the implications of using the methods examined.

Historical Background

To begin with, it may be useful to indicate the dimensions of the problem in its historical background.

A 15 per cent diversion of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom would mean that Britain's share of Canadian imports would have to increase from 8 ½ per cent, where it stood in 1956, to 19 ½ per cent. Last year Canadian imports from Britain totalled $485 million. With no significant change in the overall level of imports, a 15 per cent diversion would require that Canadian imports from Britain increase to about $1,110 million — an increase of $625 million, or some 130 per cent over 1956 levels.

Historically Britain's share of Canadian imports has exceeded 19 per cent in only five years since 1914. To supply over 19 per cent of Canadian imports on a continuing basis, Britain's position in the Canadian market would have to regain its pre-World-War-I stature. As demonstrated by the following figures, there has been a secular decline in Britain's share of Canadian imports ever since Confederation — in large measure offset by a corresponding increase in the United States share.

	U.K. (% share)	U.S. (% share)	Other (% share)
1870	56.1	32.4	11.5
1880	48.3	40.3	11.4
1890	38.8	46.0	15.2
1900	25.7	59.2	15.1
1900-14	24.4	60.2	15.4
1921-29	16.8	66.8	16.1
1930-31	16.8	63.8	19.4
1932-36	21.6	56.9	21.5
1937-39	17.0	63.2	19.8
1948-51	11.4	68.8	19.8
1956	8.5	73.0	18.5

A wide variety of natural forces have combined to produce this shift in the source of Canada's imports. One important factor has been the relative change in the pattern of Canadian consumption and import demand away from goods in which United Kingdom imports have been more concentrated (e.g. textiles, clothing, leather goods, confectionery, alcoholic beverages) and in favour of goods in which the United States has been the predominant supplier (e.g. consumer durables, petroleum products, fresh fruits and vegetables, automobile parts and components, machinery and equipment, chemicals).

Reinforcing this general trend have been such influences as the more rapid North American changes in technology, styles and fashions and the desire of Canadians to avail themselves thereof; the heavy flow of United States direct investment into dynamic sectors of the Canadian economy bringing with it American equipment, materials and business connections; the more aggressive attitude of American businessmen fostered under their highly competitive domestic conditions; the impact of international marketing arrangements, patent licensing and international corporate affiliations which have helped direct Canadian demand to the United States; the more adequate distribution channels available to United States suppliers, and their ability to follow goods through to final consumers with extensive sales and servicing facilities; the advent of highway transport since the 'twenties, greatly enhancing the ability of United States producers to supply goods to Canada quickly and conveniently; the size of United States production bringing with it possibilities for greater specialization and for fuller realization of economies of scale; the dislocating effects of World Wars I and II on British trade connections with Canada; the more rapid economic growth in North America as compared with the United Kingdom; the depletion of important resources in the United Kingdom, such as coal and iron. Nor should one under-emphasize the real if intangible consequences for trade of the enhanced social interpenetration between Canada and the United States stimulated by dramatic changes in mass communication media.

The main departure during the present century from the declining trend in Britain's share of Canadian imports occurred from 1932 to 1936 when Britain's average share increased by about 5 per cent over 1930-31. A number of factors seem to account for this phenomenon. In part the improvement in Britain's position at that time can be ascribed to the substantially wider preferential margins granted by the 1932 Empire Agreements. This factor, while important, was however only one of a series of developments raising the United Kingdom share of Canadian imports. In large part the shift reflected the uneven impact of the depression on the composition of Canada's consumption and imports. Imports of capital goods, consumer durables, industrial materials and other commodities supplied largely from the United States were the most severely hit by the sharp fall in production and investment. Demand for such items as textiles, clothing, alcoholic beverages and soft consumer goods generally, which are relatively more important in the basket of goods imported from the United Kingdom, fell off less drastically. A further factor was that from 1932 to 1933 the United Kingdom gained some advantage through exchange rate movements, though this was more than lost after 1934. Finally it must be emphasized that the higher United Kingdom share in the abnormally depressed 'thirties was not accompanied by an increase in the volume of imports from that country; in fact, it represented a larger slice of a much smaller pie. Moreover, because of idle capacity in United Kingdom industry, there were no physical obstacles to diverting goods to the Canadian market.

In considering changes in the relative importance of the United Kingdom and United States as sources of Canadian imports, it should be remembered that the trends revealed by Canadian imports are not unique but conform roughly to a world-wide pattern. As the following figures indicate, Britain's share of world trade has declined seriously during the past century while the position of the United States has greatly strengthened. From this standpoint, the deterioration in Britain's relative position in the Canadian import market can be regarded simply as part of a world development which, for quite understandable reasons, has proceeded somewhat further and more rapidly in Canada than elsewhere.

Share of World Exports in Manufactures

	U.K.	U.S.
1876-1880	38	4
1899	34	12
1937	22	20

It should not be inferred from the foregoing comments and table that the trade performance of the United Kingdom since the end of the war has been unsatisfactory, or that the outlook for British exports to Canada and the world generally is bleak. Quite the contrary. In the past decade the United Kingdom has made a remarkable recovery in the export markets of the world; and the prospects for the future are bright. The absolute level of British exports in value and volume terms in several times greater than before the war. Canada now imports from the United Kingdom many times more than it did in earlier years when the British percentage share was higher; the forecast made by the Gordon Commission is that the absolute level of imports from the United Kingdom will more than double over the next two decades.

There is, of course, nothing inconsistent between a large absolute increase in British exports and a decline in the share of the market it achieves. Indeed, this situation may be very difficult to avoid in circumstances of sharply differentiated rates of growth in the various parts of the world. The United Kingdom and other "mature" countries of Europe have not been growing as fast as Canada, the United States, and other relatively "young" and dynamic regions with large and diverse resources.

With respect to the rather sharp decrease in the British share of world trade in manufactured goods since 1950, it should be emphasized that there are special reasons for this occurrence, and that the United States also showed a significant decline during this period. This development reflects mainly the economic recovery of Germany and Japan and the re-emergence of these two countries as important trading nations.

The Composition of Canadian Imports

Turning to the immediate question before us, it is obviously desirable to dismiss from further consideration various groups or classes of Canadian imports where, for one reason or another, there seems little prospect of significant diversions of Canadian imports away from the United States and towards the United Kingdom. The selection of categories is a matter of judgment but such an analysis should be helpful in indicating the approximate orders of magnitude involved. The classification relates to 1954 trade — the last year for which complete breakdowns have been published. In that year Britain's share of Canadian imports was somewhat higher than at present; but this should not alter the basic picture.

Commodities for which the possibility of diversion is non-existent or slight have been classified into five major groups. These are shown in detail in Appendix A.† Group I consists of products which the United Kingdom does not export at all, or only in small quantities. In most cases Canadian imports of these products from the United Kingdom have been negligible or zero. Included in the group are such products as fresh fruits and vegetables, cereals, rubber, raw cotton, lumber and wood products, petroleum, building materials, and the like. This group of products made up 28 per cent of Canadian imports in 1954; Britain supplied only 1 per cent and the United States 65 per cent.

Group II consists of parts and components for use in Canadian manufacturing and for replacement purposes. Included are such goods as automobile and aircraft parts, engines and boilers, farm machinery parts, and components for most durable goods. Because of Canada's heavy dependence on United States imports in the past and the close corporate and technological links between United States and Canadian industry, most of these imports come from the United States. The great number of American-type products in Canada requiring replacement parts and the importance of United States parts and components to Canadian industries manufacturing American-type products make it exceedingly difficult, at least in the short run, for United States imports of these goods to be diverted to the United Kingdom in any volume. In recent years United Kingdom investors have shown a welcome interest in setting up industrial operations in Canada. With this development there has occurred a simultaneous increase in Canadian imports of parts and components. If British direct investment in Canadian industry were to expand, imports from the United Kingdom in this important category of goods could also be expected to grow. But to achieve a substantial diversion of trade in this way would involve, say, a decade rather than a year or two. The total derived for this group is partially an estimate because, as explained in the Appendix, for many trade categories imports of parts and components are not shown separately. This group of products made up about 13 per cent of Canadian imports in 1954 and the United States supplied 95 per cent and the United Kingdom less than 5 per cent.

Group III consists of imports which are more or less non-commercial in character. Included in this category are such imports as military equipment, articles for use by the Diplomatic Corps, tourist purchases, express and post office parcels, settlers' effects, and returned exports. Works of art, books and printed matter have also been included. As imports of these items are mainly governed by factors other than price and ordinary commercial considerations, the possibility of trade diversion through commercial policy is slight. Imports in this group made up 7 per cent of total imports in 1954. The United States supplied 84 per cent of the group total and the United Kingdom 7 per cent.

Group IV includes imports which for various reasons neither the United States nor United Kingdom exports to Canada in any volume. Included in this group are such products as spices, sugar, tea, hard fibres, clocks and watches, diamonds. This group made up 5 per cent of total imports in 1954. The United States supplied 7 per cent and the United Kingdom 4 per cent.

Group V is different from other groups in that it includes those commodities in which the United Kingdom already holds a large share and the United States a small share of the import market. Accordingly, there is little scope for diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom. Included in this group are such products as woollen cloth, china tableware, bicycles, small cars, whisky and platinum. This group made up 4 per cent of total imports in 1954. The United Kingdom supplied 75 per cent and the United States 9 per cent.

The foregoing information on these five commodity groups for 1954 can be summarized as follows:

On the basis of these calculations, about 56 per cent of the Canadian import market offers little opportunity for trade diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom. (Over the long-term future there may be some scope in the category of parts and components.) There are reasons for believing that this figure may well be on the low side. Many classes of imports which, on first glance, appear to offer prospects for diversion turn out on closer examination to be less promising. A few examples illustrate this point: air-conditioning equipment, household consumer durables, heavy construction equipment, railway locomotives and cars, automobile dies and presses, and farm machinery. For reasons of styling, design, lack of productive experience, the character of the home market, or simply lack of industrial capacity, it is difficult to see how the United Kingdom could be expected to make deep inroads into many of these categories — at least in the short run.

Further, the source of imports for certain important categories of goods is influenced by international marketing arrangements, patent and brand licensing, and international corporate affiliations. The importance of this factor cannot be easily ascertained, but it should not be underestimated. It was last investigated by the Combines Commission in 1945 and reported on in "Canada and International Cartels." Under a typical arrangement, the Canadian market for certain products was reserved for Canadian or United States producers, United Kingdom producers receiving corresponding concessions in the Sterling Area and elsewhere. It is generally agreed that these arrangements now exercise less influence on the direction of world trade than before the war. Fragmentary evidence suggests that it may still be important for such goods as certain chemicals and drugs, synthetic fibres, electrical and radio equipment, and certain types of machinery. In cases where these arrangements prevail, attempts to bolster United Kingdom imports through ordinary commercial policy measures would be largely abortive since the source and volume of Canadian imports is more or less arbitrarily controlled.

Taking these various considerations into account, one may reasonably regard about 60 to 65 per cent of Canadian imports as offering only slight possibilities for trade diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom at any rate over a period of a few years. On this basis, a diversion of 15 per cent of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom would, in effect, mean diverting roughly 35 per cent of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom in those trade categories which appear to offer scope for diversion. In 1954 the United Kingdom held only about 11 per cent of the market in these categories. One seems forced to the conclusion that a diversion of the magnitude indicated would depend upon the ability of United Kingdom exporting of goods in these "potential" categories being able to increase their sales in Canada between three and four times.

To facilitate appraisal of the prospect of achieving a substantial diversion in these "potential" categories, a list of the goods comprising the residual Group VI shown in the previous table, has been itemized below.

In the following section of this paper, which is concerned with the ways and means of trade diversion available to the Canadian Government, there will be a number of references back to the above table. At this point, however, it may be useful to make some comments about much the largest single item ("industrial machinery, transportation equipment and other manufactures of iron and steel," i.e. engineering goods). These comments apply in lesser degree to other important items in the table.

Given the substantial tariff preferences now existing for many British imports in these important categories, it would seem safe to make the judgment that further commercial policy advantages, at least of a moderate nature, are not in themselves likely to bring about a three or four-fold increase in Canadian imports, or indeed anything like it, within a period of a few years. The evidence suggests that there are fundamental forces at work, unlikely to be overcome by marginal price adjustments. Indeed, many observers have suggested that for the most part the problem is not the inability of British suppliers to compete in the Canadian market on a straight price basis.

This is not to say that the Canadian market does not offer great and growing opportunities for United Kingdom suppliers in these categories. To realize these opportunities, however, British exporters must become more familiar with the precise nature of Canadian requirements so that they can more adequately provide the right goods at the right place and at the right time. There is ample evidence from British experience in the Canadian market over the past few years that close attention to the requirements of the market in this country coupled with aggressive salesmanship can bring rich rewards in expanded trade opportunities. Moreover, United Kingdom industrial capacity and know-how in the engineering field suggest strongly that this important category of imports provide the greatest promise for both an expansion and a diversion in British trade.

POLICY MEASURES

It remains to consider various policy measures which might be employed to divert a share of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom, their probable effectiveness, and their main implications for the Canadian economy.

As a background for examining these possibilities it may be useful to set out briefly the key obligations which Canada and other Commonwealth countries have assumed under international trade and financial agreements, including the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the International Monetary Fund:

(1) A general undertaking to extend Most-Favoured-Nation treatment to all agreement countries, except for the right to continue certain existing preferences.

(2) An undertaking not to create new preferences, or to widen margins of preference beyond those provided for in the tariff schedules to the GATT or those existing on a certain base date (July 1, 1939 for Canadian preferences).

(3) An obligation not to impose tariff rates higher than those bound in the tariff schedules to the GATT, except as may be modified by re-negotiation and agreement. (A very high proportion of Canadian tariffs is so bound.)

(4) An obligation not to impose quantitative import restrictions except to deal with serious balance of payments difficulties and, in certain conditions, to protect agricultural programmes.

(5) An obligation not to impose exchange restrictions on current payments except with Fund approval.

Encouragement and Persuasion

Since World War II, various attempts have been made to increase Canadian imports from Britain through publicity, appeals, dollar "drives," business conferences, educational programmes and similar methods. The United Kingdom sent a number of "Missions" to Canada to explore the Canadian market, to familiarize themselves with Canadian requirements and to contact Canadian buyers. A Dollar-Sterling Export Board was also set up comprising both British and Canadian businessmen with the same purpose in mind; and this body is still functioning. In addition, after the war Canada's Trade Commissioners actively encouraged British exports to Canada. In recent years, buying "Missions" have gone from Canada to the United Kingdom for the following industries: petroleum, metal mining, pulp and paper and British Columbia fishing.

These and similar activities might be enlarged under government auspices. This could result in some increase in imports from the United Kingdom, but past experience indicates that measures of this sort have a limited effectiveness. Moreover, such measures might prove unpalatable to Canadians if, as might in part happen, they shifted business to the United Kingdom at the expense of Canadian producers instead of American producers.

There are no direct controls over Canadian imports except for a few agricultural products. Canadian tariffs are for the most part moderate; this is especially true with respect to the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries which enjoy substantial tariff preferences. Consequently the degree to which informal encouragement to imports from the United Kingdom succeeds in diverting trade depends, in very large measure, on the efforts made by United Kingdom suppliers to meet the particular needs or tastes of Canadian buyers.

Tariff Reductions

About 60 per cent of Canadian imports from the United Kingdom are entirely free of duty. Of the remaining 40 per cent, a large proportion enters Canada at very low tariff rates (10 per cent or less). Moreover, the free and nearly free categories include a wide variety of basic chemicals, drugs, earthenware products, special types of primary iron and steel, engineering goods, cutlery, aircraft products, electrical parts and machinery, etc. — classification which loom large in terms of Canadian imports and where Britain has appreciable productive capacity. Where Canadian tariffs constitute significant barriers against British goods — 10 per cent or higher — they are generally designed to protect domestic producers against United Kingdom competition (e.g. textiles, clothing, industrial machinery, leather goods, boots and shoes).

Since a very large proportion of imports from the United Kingdom already enters free or nearly free, it is very doubtful whether lower tariffs on British goods now dutiable would significantly increase imports from Britain. To have any significant impact, tariff reductions would have to extend to classifications where protection of Canadian industry is important. Moreover, such reductions would have to be denied to the United States and other M.F.N. countries, thereby conflicting with the "no new preference rule" of the GATT — a rule which the Contracting Parties have shown themselves extremely reluctant to waive. Finally, and apart from the foregoing considerations, available evidence does not support the view that additional tariff advantages enabling British goods to be sold in Canada at slightly better prices would substantially stimulate sales here. An illustration of this was provided by the 1949 sterling devaluation, which in effect gave United Kingdom suppliers an immediate 20 per cent price advantage over pre-devaluation levels and increased the United Kingdom tariff advantage in Canada as compared with the United States. The United Kingdom did increase its share of the Canadian market from 11.1 per cent to 12.7 per cent from 1949 to 1950, but this gain was short-lived; by 1956 Britain's share was some 2 ½ per cent less than in 1948 or 1949. Although it is likely that reductions in tariffs on United Kingdom goods would increase Britain's share of Canadian imports to some extent, even the complete elimination of tariffs would not, of itself, bring about anything like the trade diversion envisaged. A very rough estimate suggests that the complete elimination of tariffs on United Kingdom goods, leaving M.F.N. rates unchanged, would lead to no more than a 2 per cent diversion from the United States as a very maximum.

As for general economic effects, tariff reductions on British imports would lower their prices, thereby benefiting Canadian consumers, producers of export products and producers of domestic goods not in competition with British imports. Further, one cannot ignore the risk that the United States and other countries adversely affected by any increase in the margins of preference enjoyed by the United Kingdom would withdraw trade concessions from Canada thus damaging Canadian exports. If this were to occur it would be an offset to the economic advantages of tariff reductions on British goods.

The burden of tariff reductions would fall mainly on domestic production and employment in import-competing industries. In terms of total Canadian output, the cut-back in domestic production brought about by tariff reductions on United Kingdom imports would probably be quite small. It might, however, be quite significant in certain industries such as woollen textiles which have a relatively high labour content.

Tariff Increases

Another approach would be to increase tariffs against United States goods, leaving tariffs against United Kingdom goods unchanged. Two variants of this approach should be considered: raising M.F.N. rates generally; and raising rates against United States goods only, leaving the rates against other M.F.N. countries at present levels.

There is little doubt that by raising tariffs against the United States and other M.F.N. countries sufficiently substantial trade diversions could be achieved. The main questions are how substantial such tariff increases would have to be, how the market vacated by the United States and other suppliers would change in size, how this market would be shared between domestic and United Kingdom producers, and what the general economic consequences of the tariff increases would be.

As indicated earlier, the prospect of significantly increasing British imports seems quite remote for about 60-65 per cent of Canadian imports. Interest therefore centres on the remaining 35-40 per cent which might conceivably come from the United Kingdom. To achieve an aggregate diversion of 15 per cent, the diversion in this sector would have to be about 35 per cent. Assuming the total level of imports to be unchanged, this would require Canadian imports from the United Kingdom to be three or four times greater than at present. To induce an increase of this magnitude, M.F.N. tariffs in these categories would have to be raised to almost prohibitive levels and domestic prices allowed to rise very sharply.

Sharp price increases combined with very high tariffs on imports from the United States and other M.F.N. countries would, of course, fundamentally alter the Canadian trade and production position. Under such conditions it is not unlikely that Canadian producers rather than British suppliers would take over much of the market vacated by United States and other suppliers. This, in turn, would result in a lower overall level of imports thereby raising Britain's share by depressing the total level of imports rather than by diverting trade. These results could be avoided only in those cases where United Kingdom producers are in a position to make substitutable products easily and quickly available, with the full complement of servicing, parts and so on, which the Canadian market demands. As already indicated, there is evidence that British producers have been reasonably competitive in terms of price with United States and Canadian suppliers in many fields. The main constraint on British sales has apparently been an inability to compete on non-price matters such as delivery dates, servicing and styling. Raising Canadian tariffs against M.F.N. countries would hardly solve these problems; and in many cases it would simply result in replacing United States imports with higher-cost domestic output.

In order to evaluate further the effectiveness of tariff increases it is useful to recall Canadian experience in the early 'thirties. In the main, the higher preferential margins negotiated in 1932 were implemented by raising tariffs against the outside world rather than by reducing Commonwealth tariffs. From 1932 to 1936 Britain's share of Canadian imports was 5 per cent higher than in 1931-32 and 5 per cent higher than in 1937-39. Hence, despite the special circumstances favouring diversion at that time and the sizable increases in preferential margins, Britain's share of the Canadian market increased by no more than 5 per cent and this higher share of the Canadian market was based on a much smaller import value and volume.

Raising tariffs on M.F.N. imports and including higher British imports by raising import prices would raise Canadian costs substantially if such a policy were pushed very far. This would reduce real income in Canada which, in itself, would react against higher imports. At the same time the export sector of the Canadian economy would be hampered on world markets because of its higher costs of production. Furthermore, by stimulating higher-cost domestic production, the general efficiency and strength of the Canadian economy would be impaired. Also, as already implied, a sharp reduction in U.S. imports would create inflationary pressures.

It is quite evident from what has already been said that a policy of this kind would cut across the central fabric of Canada's foreign trade relationships and our international trade agreement obligations. Since what is involved here is not only the extensive widening of preferential margins, but also the withdrawal of many Canadian tariff concessions to third countries, it would be difficult to reconcile such a policy with Canada's continued participation in the GATT. Countries adversely affected by higher Canadian tariffs would almost certainly retaliate by imposing higher barriers against Canadian exports.

A word about the second variant of the tariff increase approach, i.e. raising rates against the United States but not against other M.F.N. countries. Such a policy would perhaps offer greater scope for diversion of imports from the United States. Access to a wider range of countries at existing tariff rates would moderate the adverse repercussions on the domestic economy of higher tariffs against the United States. At the same time the trade benefits accruing to the United Kingdom would also be smaller. Countries like Germany and Japan could be expected to expand greatly their exports to Canada under such conditions — perhaps even more than the United Kingdom, having in mind their recent performance in world export markets.

Finally, and perhaps most important, a policy of outright trade discrimination against the United States would be sure to provoke a violent reaction in that country. Indeed, such a policy would almost certainly lead to a trade war with the United States and all the consequences for Canadian exports which this would entail.

Quantitative Restrictions

By directly controlling the volume or value of Canadian imports, imports from the United States might be restricted to any desired level and Britain's share of Canadian imports might thereby be raised. In principle, restricting imports from the United States through quantitative controls has much the same consequences as restricting them through higher tariffs. The two measures are different administrative arrangements for accomplishing the same result. Accordingly, the comments made above in connection with the higher tariff apply here as well. If United States imports were restricted, domestic prices would rise and this would serve to induce higher United Kingdom imports and greater domestic production.

There are several important differences between quantitative restrictions and tariffs from an administrative viewpoint. One is that the former can be applied more deliberately and with greater certainty as to the restrictive effect on the level of imports. Another is that windfall profits would accrue to those importers fortunate enough to obtain import quotas. Thirdly, a complex and costly organization would have to be established to administer the controls.

During the 1947-50 period of emergency import control in Canada, quantitative restrictions were so designed as to restrict United States imports but not United Kingdom imports. Although these restrictions were imposed for balance of payments purposes rather than for trade diversion, it is, nevertheless, noteworthy that the United Kingdom share of Canadian imports was only moderately affected. In this instance problems of productive capacity in the United Kingdom and inability to provide the type and variety of products demanded in Canada made it difficult for the United Kingdom to take fuller advantage of the restrictions. The experience also suggested a strong aversion on the part of Canadians to direct and arbitrary interference with trade by the government.

Unless Canada were in serious balance of payments difficulties, the imposition of a broad system of quantitative import restrictions would be contrary to trade treaty obligations. As in the case of a general increase in tariffs, a policy of import restrictions designed to divert trade would probably require withdrawal from the GATT and the likelihood of retaliation by the United States and other countries adversely affected.

Quite apart from their implications for Canada's international trade relations, the effects of an extensive system of quantitative import restrictions on the domestic economy would be seriously adverse. Import restrictions would contribute to price and cost inflation and impair the competitive efficiency of Canadian industry in both the home and world markets. This has been the experience of all countries which have used this device. Indeed, the trend in recent years has been for the United Kingdom and other countries — acting in their own interests — to dismantle their systems of quantitative import restrictions, and to confine their use to circumstances of special economic or political difficulties.

Government Purchasing

There is a possibility of increasing imports from Britain by diverting to British suppliers a larger share of Government of Canada purchases. Present Government purchasing policy is laid down in Cabinet Directive No. 16 of May 20, 1950. Under this policy Canadian and United Kingdom suppliers are afforded the same treatment once bids have been tendered and both are allowed a price advantage up to 10% over United States suppliers. British suppliers have an additional tariff advantage over United States suppliers in most cases.

In inviting tenders, however, the practice is to "buy Canadian." This does not require that goods be Canadian produced but only that firms carry on business in some form or other in this country. Foreign firms with agencies, branches or subsidiaries, can request to be put on the tender lists, submit tenders in competition with Canadian producers, be awarded contracts and fill them with imported goods. However, a firm which does not have a business in Canada would not be invited to tender on goods available from Canadian sources.

If requirements are not available from Canadian firms it is, of course, necessary to invite tenders from outside the country — almost invariably in the United States or the United Kingdom. Decisions respecting tenders from foreign countries are left pretty much to the discretion of the individual government departments concerned.

It is evident from the foregoing that United Kingdom suppliers are already in a somewhat favoured position where Government purchasing is concerned. Government purchases in the United States are mainly for defence purposes and are governed by considerations of military efficiency and general defence strategy. If purchases of these goods were to be diverted from the United States to the United Kingdom it would be necessary to make fundamental changes in defence policy. Depending on how far the redirection of Government purchasing was pressed, there might be some scope for trade diversion. However, even if pursued with vigour, this policy could increase Britain's share of Canadian imports by only a few per cent at most.

Other Measures

An exhaustive review of possible measures to divert trade would have to examine various possibilities in the fields of fiscal policy, foreign exchange control, state trading, foreign investment, and restrictive business practices in addition to the alternatives explored in this memorandum. A preliminary survey of these various possibilities suggests that they either offer marginal scope for influencing the direction of trade or are really administrative substitutes for tariff measures or direct import controls. Should it be considered useful, supplementary material on these other measures can be submitted in a separate memorandum.

Conclusion

The essence of this memorandum can be summarized in a few sentences. The source of Canadian imports has been determined primarily by the structure of Canadian industry, the particular nature of Canadian requirements, and the ability of foreign suppliers to provide the required goods competitively. Within this framework there is some scope for moderate changes in commercial policy to influence the direction of imports, but their role is not great by comparison with the other influences at work.

Despite a favourable tariff position in the Canadian market — a substantial body of tariff preferences, many of them of a substantial nature — the United Kingdom share of Canadian imports has, with few interruptions, been undergoing a secular decline for many decades. This development has not been unique to Britain's position in Canada, but has reflected a world-wide trend.

A detailed examination of Canadian imports shows that not much more than a third offers any real potential for diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom. Accordingly, in order to achieve an overall diversion of something like 15 per cent, a very large diversion would have to occur in a relatively small sector of Canadian imports.

Policy measures which are broadly consistent with Canada's present trade treaty obligations, would offer some scope for trade diversion; but striking results cannot be anticipated, particularly in the course of a few years. Moreover, some of these measures would involve Canadian secondary industry in increased competition.

If present international obligations were put aside, more effective trade diversion measures could be devised. Even these, however, could not be relied on to achieve a really substantial diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom. What is more likely to happen under the influence of severe restrictive measures is a decline in overall imports and the encouragement of high-cost domestic industry. Furthermore, such measures would likely result in retaliatory action by the United States and other countries adversely affected. This could have severe repercussion on exports and on Canada's general economic prosperity.

Finally, while Britain's share of the Canadian and world markets has been falling, there has occurred a large expansion in the absolute level of United Kingdom exports. This can be expected to continue. It can be aided and encouraged as far as Canada is concerned within the framework of existing international treaties; and it is, perhaps, in some sense more important than the question of "shares."

[Ottawa], August 14, 1957

MESSAGE FROM THE CANADIAN MINISTER OF FINANCE
TO OTHER COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS

I am glad to say that I have now received definite acceptance from all Commonwealth governments, and we are proceeding to make the necessary arrangements for our meetings at the end of September.

As I promised, I am sending you herewith a memorandum for consideration under the third item on the proposed agenda. You will see that this covers a wide range of topics: many matters in the field of trade and payments; some questions relating to economic aid and development; atomic energy; gold; communication, transport and travel; and certain tax problems. I hope that you may have additional suggestions.

I recognize that it would be impossible to go into the substance of all these matters at the September meeting. I shall, however, be prepared at that time to elaborate some of our ideas; this memorandum is only a summary of what we have in mind.

I would hope and expect that following our discussions each of us might feel in a position to advise his government that there is a real need for a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference to take place after a lapse of several months and on the basis of studies to be carried forward in the meanwhile. A few of the topics, however, would probably merit at least some preliminary discussion in September; for example, those relating to United States commercial policy (paragraph 8), wheat (paragraph 12), dairy products (paragraph 13), and United States action on lead and zinc (paragraph 14). We have already agreed to consider, under the second item on our agenda, the implications for Commonwealth trade of the European Common Market and the proposed association of a Free Trade Area with it (paragraph 7).

In regard to physical arrangements, I am glad to say that we have been able to arrange to hold our meetings at Mont Tremblant, a beautiful location some eighty miles north of Montreal, where we will have a comfortable hotel completely to ourselves. This means that, in order to arrange accommodation, we shall need to know names of those who may be joining your party from your mission in Ottawa, as well as those from overseas.

The preliminary information we have received indicates that very few of those coming from overseas are planning to bring their wives to North America. In these circumstances we are not planning to provide for wives at Mont Tremblant but will be glad to provide a tour and accommodation and hospitality at Montreal and Ottawa for those wives from overseas who will be coming to Canada with members of delegations. We are, of course, arranging for the transportation of delegates between the Montreal airport and Mont Tremblant.

Since my last message I have learned informally that while the Fund-Bank-IFC meetings will indeed be concluded by mid-day on Friday, September 27, it is planned that the ball which has previously been given on the Thursday night, will this year be given on the Friday night. If we all stayed in Washington that night it would scarcely be possible to start our meetings at Mont Tremblant before Monday, and I shall assume, unless I hear from you to the contrary, that it would be your wish to proceed with the arrangements outlined in my last message. However, if there were a general feeling that it would be preferable to stay over Friday night in Washington and travel to Mont Tremblant on Saturday, it would not be difficult to adapt the timetable at this end. In that case, the Conference could be opened on Monday morning and continue until and including Wednesday, October 2.

In conclusion, let me express to you the pleasure it gives my colleagues and myself to know that a member of the New Zealand Government and the Ministers of Finance of the other Commonwealth nations are to be our honoured guests in Canada on this occasion.

MEMORANDUM FOR DISCUSSION BY COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS

1. The Canadian Government desires to increase two-way trade between Commonwealth countries and, in this and other ways, to extend and enlarge benefits that the Commonwealth association can bring to its members. Accordingly, the Canadian Government believes that representatives of Commonwealth governments after making adequate preparations should undertake discussions of a number of questions relating to trade and economic relations between them. There have been many important developments and changes in recent years that make such discussions appropriate and timely.

2. Canada believes that there are opportunities for the expansion of Commonwealth trade in the next few years, to take advantage of increased productive power and resources and to meet demands in expanding markets in the countries of the Commonwealth. We think that positive efforts are required to see that advantage is taken of these opportunities and that suitable arrangements and institutions are available to facilitate that trade and other mutually beneficial economic relations.

3. The Canadian Government believes that the expansion of Commonwealth trade is consistent in general with the maintenance and improvement of trade between Commonwealth countries and other countries. Proposals in this memorandum are, we believe, consistent with the obligations which Commonwealth countries have assumed to others.

4. To begin with matters of trade and payments, there are two general objectives which Canada seeks. Most important of these is the progressive removal of quantitative restrictions on trade. In this process we would like to see priority given to restrictions which impede trade between Commonwealth countries, including Canada. We recognize that some Commonwealth countries, due to the stage and pace of their economic development, are from time to time in balance of payments difficulties to such an extent as to make restrictions necessary, but we hope that these can be regarded as individual exceptions.

5. Second, we hope that the United Kingdom will be able to continue the substantial progress already made toward full convertibility.

6. The Canadian Government would welcome a discussion of the means of developing the sort of environment in which Commonwealth countries would feel able to take further steps in the direction of these major objectives. Some of the following paragraphs bear on these matters.

7. It is evident that the creation of a European Common Market, and the proposed association of a Free Trade Area with it, would constitute a change of the first magnitude in the field of trade for members of the Commonwealth. Prime Ministers have recently discussed general policy aspects of this change, and our officials have explored together some of the more detailed implications. It has been agreed that more discussions on these matters will be necessary both among ourselves and in other groups, such as the contracting parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We believe that a special duty lies upon the Commonwealth to ensure that these European arrangements are "outward looking," that this great initiative creates better opportunities for all and does not lead to the formation of restrictive trading blocs. All Commonwealth countries have a special interest in European plans in respect of trade in agricultural products. We believe that Ministers should discuss these matters further at the September meeting in an effort to ensure that the Commonwealth as a whole may be adversely affected as little as possible and may benefit to the maximum possible extent from the opportunities afforded by these major changes in Europe.

8. The United States has become a dominant influence upon the trade of the whole free world and all of us are greatly affected by its policies and prosperity. We recognize that the United States has participated constructively in the past twenty-five years in the reduction of trade barriers, thus making it possible for all of us to increase our trade with it, to the benefit of all concerned. On the other hand, from time to time United States policies give rise to important questions of concern to several if not all members of the Commonwealth and we consider there would be merit in seeking an understanding of one another's points of view in regard to them. The Canadian Government suggests, therefore, that we should review together various ways in which our countries are affected by developments of United States commercial policy, including actions taken under trade agreements acts, surplus disposal operations, and other policies and programmes of the United States bearing upon trade. We have in mind that Canada, and no doubt other Commonwealth countries too, will be holding discussions with the United States on a number of trade problems and it would be helpful to each of us to know in advance the views of fellow members of the Commonwealth.

9. The Canadian Government is not now proposing a new system of tariff preferences, or of restrictions against trade with non-Commonwealth countries. On the other hand, if fellow members of the Commonwealth could reciprocate, and if it seemed that Commonwealth trade could be promoted on a mutually advantageous basis, we would be glad to engage in discussions relating to tariff adjustments.

10. We have already in Canada a dollar-sterling export board, composed of public-spirited citizens and engaged in promoting imports to Canada from the United Kingdom. As part of a concerted programme for increasing Commonwealth trade, it might well be encouraged to intensify its work and broaden its scope in order to cover imports from other Commonwealth countries as well as the United Kingdom.

11. A direct way in which some increase in Commonwealth trade might be brought about would be through an effort on the part of each Commonwealth government, and its agencies, to ensure that, when tenders are called for, suppliers from other Commonwealth countries are given every opportunity to put in their bids. For its part, the Canadian Government would be prepared to review its system of procurement, of both military and civilian supplies, with this in mind, subject, of course, to strategic and similar considerations.

12. There are a number of special problems of commercial policy we should also like to discuss within a wider context. Four of these may be mentioned; first of all, wheat. The Canadian Government is determined to keep open normal commercial markets for Canadian wheat. It is prepared to retain substantial wheat stocks against needs arising from fluctuations in crops in North America and elsewhere. It has no intention of becoming a weak seller in wheat markets of the world. Nevertheless, it is prepared to give consideration to the use of a portion of its present wheat surplus to enlarge the scale of assistance now being made available to Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan.

13. Second, it seems clear that Canada, like most major producers, must make some special provision in regard to major dairy products. This will likely involve in the future, as in the past, restrictions upon imports at least from time to time. We should like to be able to make arrangements with other Commonwealth countries that under such circumstances assure them of an equitable share of imports required to supplement our domestic production in these fields.

14. Third, there is a danger that the United States, by imposing new duties on lead and zinc, will be withdrawing a major benefit provided to Canada and Australia under our trade agreements. In that event, we would be entitled to take steps to preserve the balance of advantages under the agreements and we should like to discuss our compensating arrangements with fellow members of the Commonwealth, some of whom may be particularly interested, before reaching decisions as to what we should do.

15. Fourth, as long as quantitative restrictions on trade remain, Canada has a number of special export problems in the field of food products which we believe can be met in considerable part by a resumption of traditional sales to the United Kingdom, which need not involve it in any major changes in policy nor any large expenditures in dollars. This we shall wish to discuss with the United Kingdom in the context of an approach to Commonwealth trade as a whole.

16. In addition to questions of trade, there are other matters upon which we are conscious of the need for an exchange of views. Amongst these perhaps most important are investment and development. These subjects were broadly reviewed last month at the meeting of Prime Ministers. There may, however, be particular subjects for further discussion. As for Canada, we warmly welcome the flow of commercial investment that is moving to Canada from the United Kingdom and, for our part, we place no restriction on the access of Commonwealth or other countries to our capital market.

17. Canada and other Commonwealth countries have participated actively in the Colombo Plan. The Canadian Government regards that Plan as an example of the constructive way in which the Commonwealth spirit can be translated into effective action. The Plan has not been exclusive and others outside the Commonwealth have become associated with it. We would, however, welcome an opportunity to discuss certain questions, at least in a preliminary way, within the Commonwealth family; for example, whether the forms and types of aid that have been supplied are best serving the fundamental purposes of the Plan. Nor should discussion of these and similar matters be confined to the area covered by the Colombo Plan; there are now other countries, emerging from the status of colonies, that may well engage our special attention.

18. Several Commonwealth countries are amongst the world's largest producers of gold. The Canadian Government is naturally interested in any proposal affecting its price. Following the meetings of the International Monetary Fund, it would seem appropriate to review this matter together.

19. We in Canada expect to proceed on a large scale with the production and export of uranium for peaceful purposes. We wish to export uranium for these purposes on a commercial basis, subject to effective safeguards to ensure that fissionable products made from it are not diverted to military use. We hope other members of the Commonwealth will agree with the desirability of building up trade on such a basis in order that this great new source of energy may be most fruitfully used for the benefit of mankind without endangering the security of all of us. We should like to have an opportunity of discussing with our partners in the Commonwealth this aspect of trade in uranium and other materials and equipment for producing atomic energy.²⁴

20. In addition, it might be useful to exchange information on our programmes in the field of atomic energy and to discuss the interrelation of trade policies and the development of manufacturing industries in this general field.

21. The Canadian Government would also like to review a number of matters under the broad heading of communication and transportation between members of the Commonwealth. There are, for instance, suggestions for a comprehensive modernization of cable and telephone communications between all Commonwealth countries. Experience with the new co-axial cable across the Atlantic seems to suggest that improved facilities give rise to greatly increased traffic.

22. There is an important shipping matter affecting trade which gives Canada concern. The levels of freight rates on trade between Canada and some other countries of the Commonwealth are so high as to handicap the effective development of direct trade between our countries in competition with other trade. While these are private or conference rates, they are of sufficient importance to warrant discussion between governments to see what can be done to ensure that such rates do not divert trade from the Commonwealth to other channels.

23. Turning to the matter of personal travel, the Canadian Government warmly welcomes the recent decision of the United Kingdom to provide a travel allowance (one hundred pounds per annum) to tourists visiting Canada and also the increases which have been made in travel allowances by Australia and New Zealand. We are examining a request by the United Kingdom that the Canadian tariff should be adjusted so as to facilitate tourist purchases by Canadians who visit overseas countries. We would be glad to review with other members of the Commonwealth the possibility of giving encouragement to travel between our countries.

24. Finally, Canada has a number of tax treaties with other members of the Commonwealth and the Canadian authorities are aware that many efforts have been made to remove or reduce tax barriers to persons in Commonwealth countries investing in other Commonwealth countries. We consider, however, it might be worthwhile to make a survey in this field to ensure that all is being done that can properly be done to avoid double taxation and to facilitate the flow of productive private investment between countries of the Commonwealth while at the same time securing an equitable division of revenue on the basis of recognized principles.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

At lunch yesterday Arnold France volunteered some initial comments on the message and memorandum which Mr. Fleming has sent to Commonwealth Finance Ministers. In Sir Leslie Rowan's absence on leave France is in charge of the Overseas Finance Section of the Treasury.

2. As regards the timing of the message a reply to the Minister of Finance is being prepared, for submission to the Chancellor when he returns to London at the end of this week, agreeing that it would be desirable to stick to the initial plan and to leave Washington p.m. Friday the 27th and start the meeting on Saturday. The Chancellor's message may also suggest that Mr. Fleming, as convening minister, might take the initiative in explaining to Black and Jacobssen the circumstances making it desirable that Commonwealth delegations should leave before the ball. We gather that Mr. Thorneycroft must return to London on the Thursday. France noted that a change in the timetable whereby the meeting would not have opened until the Monday would have left very little time for the bilateral discussions on the Anglo-Canadian trade questions after the general meeting, to which the UK attachés considerable importance.

3. In the coming weeks the Canadian memorandum will be carefully examined inter-departmentally. A first meeting of officials has already been held and from what France said, the initial reaction seems to have been to question whether there is enough in the Canadian proposals to warrant the calling of an early Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. They of course appreciate that the memorandum is only a summary of what the Canadian ministers have in mind and recognize further that a sound judgement on the question of the calling of a conference cannot be reached until ministers have met and discussed the various points in Mr. Fleming's paper and other ideas which may be put forward. In the meantime France seemed anxious to convey the thought that it would be undesirable to stimulate public expectation that a major Commonwealth economic conference would be held at an early date. In this regard he mentioned the hazards of calling a conference which in the event did not produce significant results and also the danger that a full-dress Commonwealth conference would provide a forum in which it would be particularly difficult to resist the demands for investment funds of capital-short Commonwealth countries — demands which would inevitable be focussed on Canada and the UK and which neither country might really be in a position to afford. France did not mention the preoccupation of UK officials with Free Trade Area problems in Europe, but this may well be another factor in their present attitude toward the proposal for a Commonwealth economic conference.

4. Another impression we gained was that UK officials were perhaps expecting rather more radical and far-reaching proposals from the Canadian side than they found in a first reading of Mr. Fleming's memorandum. Not surprisingly there is a good deal of interest here in your suggestions about the diversion of Canadian imports from the USA to the UK and it may be that UK officials were expecting that something explicit on this subject would have been contained in our proposals. It seems clear that Canadian thinking on this subject will be carefully probed, if not during the full meeting, certainly during the bilateral trade discussions.

5. France indicated that UK officials had not yet proceeded very far in their own thinking about new ways in which Commonwealth trade might be expanded and closer Commonwealth economic relations promoted. However, work is going forward in the hope of developing constructive proposals. From one or two straws in the wind it seems probable that thought is being given to the possibility of increasing imports from Canada provided the required additional dollars are seen to be in hand, through action on our part. One fly which was thrown our way was the thought that the Canadian Government might decide to hold sterling as a proportion of our official reserves. One may presume that other ways in which the UK might increase its earning or otherwise obtain the additional dollars thought to be required to finance more Canadian imports are also being explored. Some of the ideas being considered by UK officials will of course never see the light of day and too much should not be read into the above information at this stage.

6. In talking to France and other UK officials about item 3 on the agenda for Finance Ministers, we are being careful not to go beyond what is said in Mr. Fleming's memorandum, while at the same time emphasizing that the points made therein are only an outline of the thinking of Canadian Ministers and that they will be elaborated during the course of the meeting. It would be helpful to have your guidance on the way in which this office could be most useful to you in preparing for the meeting. There may for instance be points on which you would especially welcome advance indications of UK views and others which you would not wish us to discuss before the meeting.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETINGS

1. Since my arrival I have called upon the Prime Minister, Lord Home and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pay my respects and to discuss with them Mr. Fleming's memorandum. This message reports the substance of their comments together with some additional information which my officers have picked up in conversation with UK officials.

2. The Prime Minister expressed the greatest possible interest in your proposals. He used the words "we are most enthusiastic." He said that while his government recognized the need for caution in preparing for a general conference, they did want to get ahead with the discussion of such subjects as had been fully explored and in regard to which there would be some possibility of success. [While] he did refer to the different position of such countries as India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana and Malaya, he did, however, express the opinion that your positive proposals did have a very good effect on the Asian members of the Commonwealth. I raised some question about the press reports that the UK Government is lukewarm to the idea of a general conference. He replied: "That is nonsense. You won't find us dragging our feet." Both in words and in appearance I was greatly impressed with the Prime Minister's very real enthusiasm. In fact, when I saw the Chancellor of the Exchequer later, he said that there was great enthusiasm on the part of most ministers and particularly at the top. This is only qualified by the statement frequently repeated that it is essential that each of the subjects be fully explored in advance to assure success and also that they regard an understanding between the UK and Canada as being of vital importance. The Prime Minister informed me that when Mr. Heathcoat Amory goes to Canada within the next ten days, he will be fully briefed in regard to the subjects raised by Mr. Fleming, and that he will have with him Sir Frank Lee and others whose purpose will be to explore the subjects raised by Mr. Fleming in his memorandum. From my conversation with the Prime Minister I am convinced that the interest in this subject is increasing daily. In fact, he told me that although the press had reported that their long Cabinet meeting yesterday dealt with the Russian announcement regarding intercontinental missiles, the meeting had been devoted to a full discussion of this subject.

3. When I saw Lord Home he had just come from the Cabinet meeting at which our proposal were discussed. He assured me that the UK's response to our memorandum and the proposal for a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, would be "positive." He said that he and other members of the government were excited about this conference and the subjects to be considered, particularly the possibility of increasing UK-Canadian trade. Although he was not specific, Lord Home indicated that there were a number of subjects listed by Mr. Fleming which in his view would repay careful work and from which improved Commonwealth relations in the economic field could be expected to develop. While warmly welcoming the idea of a conference, the Secretary of State emphasized the need for the most careful advance study and preparation, because of the importance of a successful outcome of the discussions. He also expressed some concern that the less developed Commonwealth countries might try to make use of the conference for the purpose of seeking investment capital from those of us who would be in a position to provide funds. In this connection he mentioned the Indian position and the rapid reduction of India's sterling balances which has accelerated in the past few weeks.

4. The Chancellor of the Exchequer received me in a most cordial manner and also assured me that the UK would support the idea of a conference to be held after the necessary preparatory work had been done. His attitude was enthusiastic and I gather he is thinking hard and has his officials working hard on ways in which Commonwealth trade and Anglo-Canadian trade can be stimulated.

5. The only sour note we have heard at the ministerial level was a comment made to one of my officers by Sir David Eccles to the effect that the Canadian paper did not "contain enough meat" to promise good prospects for a successful meeting, and that "as things stood" we should "not expect much support" for our proposals. I am informed that there is reason to question the accuracy or discretion of the President of the Board of Trade. Certainly the opinion he expressed was directly at variance with those of the Prime Minister and the two ministers to whom I spoke. I am sure we can discount his observation completely, more particularly as he spoke before yesterday's long Cabinet meeting which the Prime Minister told me was devoted almost entirely to this subject.

6. The Ministers to whom I have spoken have indicated very great interest in your suggestion that a percentage of our imports from the USA should be diverted to the UK. I am sure that this is the subject to which they will give priority in their discussions with you in Canada. Your suggestion that as much as 15 percent of our imports from the USA might be shifted to the UK has aroused very great interest, particularly among the supporters of the government. This is an additional element on the political side which serves to increase the interest in your proposals, which the members of the UK Government would have shown in any event. We may expect that the UK representatives will put forward some ideas of their own as to how the objective of a major increase in trade exchanges between Canada and the UK might be brought about. It is not clear yet whether the UK's proposals will be communicated to Mr. Fleming in advance of the meeting, or whether they will be reserved for first discussion with you during the day being set aside for bilateral talks.

7. In summary we may take it that the UK will fully support the proposal to convene a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference for both economic and political reasons. The question of timing is considered to be of considerable importance since it must take into account the widely differing preoccupations of Commonwealth countries. We have not had any clear expressions of opinion on this point but the emphasis which has been placed on the need for careful preparation suggests that the UK is not presently thinking in terms of a very early date.

8. My officers continue to receive indications of the active thought which is being given at the official levels to ways in which trade with Canada can be increased. Officials are looking at the remaining restrictions against dollar imports and apparently have toyed with the idea of a Free Trade Area (Canada, UK, Australia, NZ and perhaps South Africa and the Federation of Rhodesia). As indicated in our earlier message, we believe that the UK will be looking for some quid pro quo from us for any move which they might make to increase purchases from Canada. In this connection, their primary interest will be in the proposals we may have for increasing imports from this country. We have also heard again the suggestion that we might consider holding some part of our reserves in sterling.

9. We understand that proposals may be made to you concerning the establishment of bonded warehouses in Canada where British suppliers could keep adequate stocks of spare parts, etc., for quick delivery and that we may be asked again to look at the problem of UK interest in the St. Lawrence Seaway as a provider of shipping services. From one CRO official we have heard that the UK will be proposing that as a new and regular feature of Commonwealth economic cooperation, it should be agreed that senior Commonwealth trade and finance officials should meet annually, possibly in the spring.

10. You may already have heard that Sir Henry Lintott will be joining the group of officials going to Mont Tremblant. It is also likely that Mr. Reginald Maudling, the Paymaster-General, will be attending the meeting. When our officials called on him last week to make his acquaintance and to underline our interest in the Free Trade Area discussions, Mr. Maudling showed some interest in being present. If he does attend, his presence in Canada on the eve of the resumption of negotiations on the Free Trade Area should provide a particularly useful opportunity to make him personally aware of our preoccupation with current European economic developments.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

From talks we have had in recent days with Otto Clarke (Treasury), John Stevens (Bank of England) and Cyril Sanders (Board of Trade), it is possible to supplement our earlier messages about the thinking of officials here with respect to Mr. Fleming's memorandum.

2. It is now clear beyond doubt that the primary interest on the UK side lies in the possible expansion of trade with Canada and the development of closer economic links between our two countries. This they regard as the cornerstone of increased economic cooperation within the Commonwealth as a whole. The current interest has been stimulated by Mr. Fleming's memorandum, by the imminence of the meeting of Finance Ministers and perhaps most significantly by the hope that we will be prepared to take action to help bring about a substantial expansion of UK exports to Canada at the expense of the USA. But these are not the only reasons. We detect some feeling of disillusionment and second thought about the proposed European Free Trade Area which is leading officials to examine even more carefully than would otherwise be the case, the possibilities which might be offered by increased Commonwealth trade in general and trade with Canada in particular. This more cautious attitude towards Europe seems to have come about as a result of the rigidity so far displayed by France in the FTA negotiations and by current European exchange difficulties, particularly the German situation and the recent French action, which are not thought to augur well for future European economic cooperation. Of course there has been no change in UK policy with respect to the desirability of an appropriate Free Trade Area arrangement and the reaction we have picked up may prove only a passing phase. But for the moment the difficulties in working out satisfactory arrangements with European countries give an additional stimulus to positive thinking about trade with the Commonwealth and Canada.

3. There is increasing evidence that, as indicated in earlier messages, UK officials are considering the possibility of dismantling restrictions against our exports, or some of our exports, as part of a deal in which we would make concessions in our market. Otto Clarke mentioned in this connection that to achieve a really dramatic increase in UK exports to Canada would almost inevitably bring into question the absolute level of our tariff against UK goods and thus the existing level of protection for Canadian industry. We gather that, at least as an intellectual exercise, Clarke has been speculating about the possibility of an eventual Free Trade Area or partial Free Trade Area with Canada and perhaps one or two other Commonwealth countries — a technique which would permit adjustments to be made between the member countries which would not have to be extended to outside countries such as the USA.

4. As regards the additional dollar cost which might arise if restrictions against various Canadian imports could be eliminated, Stevens volunteered that in UK thinking there was no question of seeking financial aid from Canada by way of a gift or loan. An increase in the possibility to earn Canadian dollars is what is sought. He did suggest however that the financial arrangements between our two countries should be such that the desired expansion of trade would not be frustrated from time to time because of possible UK shortages of USA dollars. This observation by Stevens may not be inconsistent with the idea of Canada holding part of its reserves in sterling which we have already reported as under possible consideration here.

5. You may assume that UK officials are thinking about the implications for Canada-USA economic relations which measures to bring about a reorientation of our import pattern in favour of this country might imply. No doubt the UK team will be anxious to ascertain in their talks with you how far our own thinking has developed on this aspect of the question. In this connection it may be of interest that Otto Clarke expressed the view that any new measures which might be taken should not be such as to precipitate a reaction from the USA which could be damaging to the interests of our two countries in the American market. His concern was both economic and political.

6. Stevens seemed particularly interested in direct investment in Canada. He made it clear that the UK attitude to such investment was positive and added that the necessary dollars would be found even if this involved disinvestment elsewhere, including the USA.

7. We found Clarke relatively unenthusiastic about the idea of encouraging further investment in the under-developed Commonwealth countries. His feeling was that the limited savings available would be much more usefully and profitably applied in this country and in Canada than in the under-developed areas. He went on to observe that rapid development of relatively primitive economies frequently brought difficult social problems in its train and did not necessarily produce hoped for political results. This may well be a purely personal view of Clarke's but it is of some interest in the context of the discussions on investment which Finance Ministers will be having.

8. I shall be seeing Sir David Eccles and Heathcoat Amory before the end of the week and will be sending you a report on my conversations with them.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

A talk we had this morning with Sir Frank Lee tends to substantiate the information we have had from others about the thinking of senior UK officials with respect to the expansion of trade with Canada.

2. It will be Lee's main task when he passes through Ottawa with Heathcoat Amory to ascertain how far our own ideas have developed on measures which might be taken to facilitate and encourage UK exports. We judge that the range of action which the UK would be prepared to consider as regards exports from Canada will depend a good deal on the kind of report which is made to London. Thus, if we appeared willing to contemplate policy changes which would hold out the prospect of a substantial increase in the UK's earnings from Canada they, for their part, might well be prepared to face up to the abolition of all but a few of the remaining restrictions against Canada. Contrary wise, if what we may have in mind was thought unlikely to bring the UK substantial advantage, their willingness to make adjustments in our favour would be adjusted accordingly.

3. We gathered that if our side of any arrangement seemed sufficiently attractive the UK might be prepared to extend their OEEC liberalization to Canada. Criticism from the US would be countered by pointing out the steps which we had taken to help increase UK earnings in Canada. Thus any new basis for trade with Canada could be used both as a defence and as a bargaining weapon to secure free entry into the US market. En passant, Lee mentioned that in any event the problem of apples and pears would be very difficult, mainly for protective reasons, and that these two sensitive fruits would probably have to continue under restriction. We asked whether at the appropriate time, the UK would be seeking a hard-core waiver for these products. He replied that the problem was more or less permanent whereas GATT hardcore waivers were for temporary periods only. This led us to discuss the present pattern of UK agricultural production and the possibilities of adjustments therein. This issue raises delicate political considerations here, as elsewhere. However, some people to whom we have talked would be happy to see less revenue going to assist UK farmers and it may be that a certain amount of pressure on UK Ministers when they are in Ottawa would not be misplaced.

4. In our earlier messages we have reported indications we have had of some tentative ideas about possible financial arrangements which might be made between our two countries in the context of a major expansion of trade. Frank Lee emphasized that such thinking as was going on was only in the crucible stage, no conclusions had been reached and the matter had not been discussed with ministers. Moreover, such ideas as had been discussed might never see the light of day. What he said does however confirm that some thought is being given to the financial side of the trade question.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING — U.K. PROPOSALS

I attach Telegram No. 2293 from Canada House on this subject recording a conversation with Sir Frank Lee. It has just come to my desk this morning.

The essence of this telegram is an indication that the United Kingdom, which has up to the present maintained discriminatory import restrictions against both Canada and the United States on more or less equal terms (although giving us the breaks here and there), would be willing to consider discrimination in favour of Canada and against the United States if we were willing to pay a sufficiently high price — a price which would no doubt involve outright discrimination by Canada in favour of the United Kingdom and against the United States.

Sir Frank mentions as a possibility that the U.K. might be willing to give to Canadian exports the same degree of liberalization that the U.K. is now giving to European countries under the OEEC. It will take a good deal of detailed work to assess the possible benefits to Canada. I have asked the Department of Trade and Commerce to look into this matter but I very much doubt that they will be able to come up with any very useful answers while Sir Frank is here. My own off-the-cuff reaction is that the advantages to Canada would not be very great. There might be some benefits to Canadian manufacturers, e.g. of chemicals and motor cars, but in general Canadian manufactures are not competitive on a cost basis in the U.K. market. There might also be some benefits to a few marginal agricultural items but in this field the particular arrangements between the U.K. and other OEEC countries will have to be studied in detail.

In general, and on a very preliminary basis, I would question whether the advantages we might gain would be at all commensurate with the disadvantages to our trade which would flow from a policy of discrimination against the United States.

I have a feeling, which I find to be shared by officials in other Departments, that the United Kingdom Government is

(a) under pretty heavy pressure from sections of the Conservative Party, since the 15% proposal, to make a proposal which would seem "dramatic" even though it would be very difficult and costly for us to agree to, and

(b) looking for some avenue of escape in the event that their negotiations for a European Free Trade Area bog down.²⁵

It also seems to me that the United Kingdom may be asking us to give a snap reply on an issue of the highest importance to us. Discrimination against the United States is obviously something that we would not want to embark on lightly. It is no doubt a question that will be in the back of the minds of Canadian Ministers in their discussions with U.S. Ministers next month.²⁶ Final decisions would only be made at the time of our proposed Commonwealth trade and economic conference which is, of course, many months away.

U.K. PROPOSAL FOR CANADA-U.K. FREE TRADE AREA

Colonel Heathcoat Amory had a short talk with the Prime Minister and Mr. Fleming after lunch in the Rideau Club. Also present were Sir Saville Garner, Sir Frank Lee and myself.

Col. Amory said that Mr. Diefenbaker's proposal for a substantial shift of Canadian trade from U.S. to U.K. was considered in London as a bold and imaginative initiative. It had greatly interested the U.K. Government and Mr. Macmillan had asked that he put certain views before Mr. Diefenbaker.

The Memorandum circulated to Commonwealth Finance Ministers by Mr. Fleming had also been welcomed with interest. The next task would be to pick out the most promising items for an agenda for a Commonwealth economic conference.

The proposal for expanding U.K.-Canadian trade, however, was a matter to be pursued bilaterally. It was recognized in U.K. that the figure of 15% had only been used to indicate a kind of target. However, questions were being asked about it in the House of Commons. The U.K. Government had reached the conclusion that a shift of such a magnitude would be a major project. It could not be achieved through normal adjustments, or even by vigorous salesmanship.

The U.K. recognized that Canada would find it difficult to discriminate against the United States, particularly having regard to GATT and the no-new-preference rule. Consideration had been given in the U.K. to the possibility that Canada might restore the preferences that had been removed since 1947. This would be of real benefit to U.K. exports. However, it could not be expected to shift trade to anything like the extent of Mr. Diefenbaker's suggestion.

Accordingly, the U.K. invited consideration of a proposal that Canada and the U.K. should join together in a Free Trade Area. Mr. Diefenbaker asked if this would involve Canada joining the proposed U.K.-European Free Trade Area, from which the U.K. had promised to keep agriculture excluded. Col. Amory replied that this was not intended. The Canada-U.K. Free Trade Area would run parallel with, but would not be a part of, the other. It would, with possible very minor exceptions, embrace both agriculture and industry. It would provide a really substantial advantage for expanded U.K. exports; and, since GATT permitted Free Trade Areas, it would provide Canada with grounds for discriminating against the U.S.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he recognized the advantages it would provide to U.K. exports, but could not see what advantage there would be in it for Canada. As regards the figure of 15% he had recently had a talk with Mr. J.S. Duncan (Sterling-Dollar Export Board) who was now of the opinion that 15% was probably impractical but that something like half that amount should be possible within a reasonable period of time. He also wondered how a closely bilateral Canada-U.K. arrangement would look in terms of the general strengthening of Commonwealth ties, which was the context within which he had suggested a shift of Canadian trade from U.S. to U.K.

Sir Frank Lee then elaborated several aspects of the proposal which Mr. Amory had put forward. Mr. Fleming wondered whether it might not be possible to get an amendment of GATT that would permit progress in the desired direction. Mr. Diefenbaker returned to the point that he could not see in the U.K. proposal any satisfactory results from the Canadian point of view. He did not expect, in all the circumstances, an exactly equal bargain; he could look sympathetically at something which was, say, on a 60:40 basis in favour of the U.K.; but he could not really see that this proposal provided any reasonable quid-pro-quo.

Discussion was concluded because Mr. Diefenbaker had to return to an important meeting. It was agreed that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Amory, together with officials, should explore the U.K. proposals more fully.

In the Chair:

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)

United Kingdom

The Minister of Food, Agriculture and Fisheries (The Right Honourable D. Heathcoat Amory)

The Chairman welcomed Mr. Heathcoat Amory and Sir Frank Lee and invited them to put forward the United Kingdom proposals.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory said that the Canadian Prime Minister's bold suggestion for further steps to expand Commonwealth trade, and especially trade between Canada and the United Kingdom, had been welcomed enthusiastically by his Government and they had been considering how best this suggestion might be translated into practical proposals. His Government had also studied carefully the Canadian memorandum to Commonwealth Finance Ministers and they agreed that the issues set out in that memorandum were, in fact, the issues of major importance.

In considering the possibility of doing something imaginative and dramatic in the field of Canadian-United Kingdom trade relations, United Kingdom Ministers had come to the conclusion that the only way of achieving the objective the Canadian Prime Minister had in mind was to work toward a free trade area arrangement between the United Kingdom and Canada. The United Kingdom side realized that there were obvious practical difficulties in such a scheme but they hoped that Canada would feel that it was a concept which merited serious attention. They had been looking at a variety of alternative proposals that might effectively increase exchanges between Canada and the United Kingdom but had come to the conclusion that none of these would add up to anything that was big enough to measure up to the concept underlying the Canadian Prime Minister's initiative.

Sir Frank Lee said that Canada might consider whether some of the preferences given up by the United Kingdom in 1947 might not now be restored. The United Kingdom side had considered this and various other proposals that might lead to a reorientation of the pattern of Canadian-United Kingdom trade. But while they were not inclined to minimize the importance of proposals along these lines, they had concluded that the free trade area proposal was the only one to give real content to the Canadian Prime Minister's idea. It also had a number of very substantial advantages. It would enable both Canada and the United Kingdom to exercise de jure discrimination against the United States without being in contravention of their GATT obligations. It would be an arrangement that would come into effect gradually over a period of years and thus avoid any dramatic dislocation of Canadian industries affected by the prospective changes. Needless to say, at the end of the day any quantitative restrictions still in effect on Canadian imports in the United Kingdom would have to go; indeed, the United Kingdom would feel that an earlier ending of these restrictions was justified despite the risk that this entailed in terms of additional dollar expenditure. However, because the United Kingdom would not be obligated to remove its corresponding restrictions on United States imports in a free trade area context, the additional dollar outlay involved was likely to be a good deal less significant. Nevertheless the United Kingdom anticipated that some concessions by way of a relaxation of existing restrictions would probably have to be made to the United States at the same time.

On the face of it, Sir Frank Lee concluded, the advantages of the free trade area proposal seemed to be all in favour of the United Kingdom. However, the fact was that the Canadian Prime Minister seemed determined to do something to secure for the United Kingdom a greater share of the Canadian market and this in itself implied an imbalance of concessions. Moreover the United Kingdom would in this case be moving on quantitative restrictions even before the free trade area came to full fruition and this, given the exiguous state of the United Kingdom reserves, was a concession of substance.

Mr. Plumtre commented that the British proposals appeared to fall into two separate categories: first, a restoration of the level of Canadian preferences, and second, the creation over a period of years of a free trade area between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Restoration of Preferences

Regarding the preference issue, Mr. Plumtre said that it was true that there had been some appreciable reductions in margins of preference since 1947. Nevertheless the greater part of the preferences that were of importance to the United Kingdom remained. The fact was that the expansion of United Kingdom exports had probably not been impeded because these exports were not fully competitive in the Canadian market, but by reason of other factors, including delivery dates, availability and the greater attraction of selling in the soft markets of the sterling area. Conversely, such studies as the Canadian side had made did not lead toward the conclusion that a restoration of preference margins would lead to any really substantial changes in the pattern of Canadian-United Kingdom trade. Because so many of the tariff items subject to preferences provided for duty-free entry, there was also a practical difficulty in that any restoration of preferences would have to be achieved not by a lowering of the preferential tariff, but by increases in the most-favoured-nation tariff.

Sir Frank Lee said that in general he did not disagree with the Canadian analysis. Indeed, that was why the United Kingdom had come forward with their alternative proposal for a free trade area. He did think, however, that despite their great initial advantage and the remaining preferences, United Kingdom exporters found Canada a tougher market than the United States. This was largely because of the geographical configurations of the Canadian market. That is why he thought a restoration of preferences should not be underrated since a move in that direction was bound to have a certain political and psychological effect on British exporters.

In reply to a question by Mr. Rasminsky, Sir Frank Lee conceded that in the context of the total economy United Kingdom exports to Canada were a good deal more significant than those to the United States. At the same time, it was a fact that the expansion of British exports had been more effective in the United States than it had in Canada.

Mr. Bowen commented that while it was true that British exports to the United States were small in relation to the total picture, United Kingdom exporters to Canada came up against United States export corporations whom they found to be a good deal more difficult than their parent companies in the United States.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory summed up the discussion about this particular proposal by saying that while a restoration of preferences would be a very useful measure, it would not by itself come up to the scale of the Canadian Prime Minister's original proposal.

Free Trade Area

Mr. Plumtre said that the Canadian side had done some work on the possible elimination over a period of years of Canadian tariffs against the United Kingdom only or in the context of a European Free Trade Area which included the United Kingdom. The results of this study had suggested that broad areas of Canadian industry would probably be wiped out in the process.

Mr. Fleming thought that the textile industry would almost certainly be one.

Mr. Plumpton agreed and added that iron and steel and their products would²⁷ be another.

Mr. Sharp thought that United Kingdom industry stood to gain a good deal more than Canada was likely to gain by way of greater access to the United Kingdom market. Canada already had non-discriminatory access to the United Kingdom market for its raw materials. While in other sectors it faced restrictions, Canada had never pretended that the removal of these restrictions would lead to any great burgeoning of Canadian sales. Indeed, Canada had been contending all along that the removal of the remaining discriminatory restrictions could be achieved at no very substantial cost in dollars. In the same way it was unlikely that the free trade area scheme would yield any very substantial increase in Canadian exports to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Isbister thought that it was probably easier for the Department of Finance to pinpoint the potential damage than it was for the Department of Trade and Commerce to gauge the possibilities of export expansion. No doubt the free trade area scheme would be attractive to some Canadian export industries. By and large, however, it had to be remembered that a large part of Canada's export industry consisted of primary foodstuffs and raw and semi-processed materials which the United Kingdom and Western Europe required in any case to import from outside.

In reply to Mr. Isbister's question whether the free trade area proposal would also be put before other Commonwealth countries Sir Frank Lee replied in the negative. He did think, however, that if — as was unlikely — other Commonwealth countries found the proposal attractive, the United Kingdom would necessarily have to give sympathetic consideration to extending its scope. So far, however, nothing had been said to other Commonwealth countries nor, for that matter, to representatives of United Kingdom industry. There was also the matter of whether the colonies should be included or excluded in the free trade area scheme or if some might be included but not others. It went without saying, of course, that agriculture would be included.

Mr. Isbister suggested that one of the greatest problems that was likely to arise if the proposal for a free trade area were taken up seriously would be with regard to branch plants of United States companies which constituted a sizeable part of the Canadian manufacturing industry. In view particularly of the discrimination which it would be open to the United Kingdom to exercise against the United States in the context of a United Kingdom-Canada free trade area there was a risk of United States companies circumventing the intentions of the free trade area by selling within the area through their Canadian subsidiaries. This would call for origin requirements on an industry-by-industry basis if the position of Canadian industries was to be safeguarded.

Mr. Isbister went on to ask whether in the event that Canada favoured a free trade area with the United Kingdom but also favoured a similar arrangement with the whole of Europe, such a scheme would be as attractive to the United Kingdom as a free trade area confined to Canada and the United Kingdom only.

Sir Frank Lee replied that there were a number of obviously imponderable factors which made it difficult to be categorical. He would not wish to say that if Canada wanted to go into a European free trade area, the United Kingdom would discourage such a move. Indeed it was probable that in due course the two separate free trade areas, each involving the United Kingdom, were bound to coalesce to some extent. In the present context, however, the proposal for bilateral free trade between Canada and the United Kingdom would be regarded as more attractive by the United Kingdom. The alternative scheme of a free trade area comprising both the United Kingdom and Western Europe on the one hand, and Canada on the other, would pose (1) the difficulty of what was to be done with regard to agriculture and (2) the difficulty of European competition which the United Kingdom would have to meet in the Canadian market without the benefit of the existing preferences.

might [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

Reverting to the first point made by Mr. Isbister, Sir Frank Lee thought that the problem of United States firms establishing themselves in Canada for the specific purpose of cashing in on the free trade area relationship was a separable problem. It was also unlikely to be an insuperable one in view of the experience which Commonwealth countries had already gained in the matter of defining origin under the existing imperial preference arrangements.

Mr. Taggart said that it was difficult to see how Canada's agricultural export could be very significantly increased as a result of a Canada-United Kingdom free trade area arrangement. Because of the very high level of agricultural subsidies in the United Kingdom and because, also, there were no very substantial surpluses of agricultural commodities in Canada apart from wheat, he thought that completely free access for Canada's agricultural exports to the United Kingdom market was unlikely to entail an increase of more than about $25 million a year.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory commented that this assumption would depend to some extent on the level of agricultural subsidies in the United Kingdom over the years.

In reply to a question by Mr. Fleming with regard to the prospects for additional exports of meat, Dr. Taggart thought that it might be possible to ship bacon to the United Kingdom in certain years but that the overall picture did not suggest any very significant prospects for export expansion in this direction.

Mr. Rasminsky referred to the complicated picture that would result from the progressive elimination of tariffs by Canada and the United Kingdom, and of discriminatory restrictions by the United Kingdom. This would mean that (1) the United Kingdom would obtain discrimination in her favour in the Canadian market not only in relation to the United States but also in relation to her prospective partners in a European free trade area; and (2) Canada would be accorded discriminatory treatment in her favour in the United Kingdom, not only in relation to the United States, but also in relation to other Commonwealth countries. He wondered whether the United Kingdom regarded these consequences as acceptable politically either in Europe or in the Commonwealth.

Sir Frank Lee said that the United Kingdom had looked at this aspect of the question and that apart from certain specific cases such as Indian exports of rayon, the problem seemed to be manageable. There were very few tariffs on Canadian imports in any case so that the treatment Canada would enjoy under a free trade area régime in relation to other Commonwealth countries would not differ markedly from the present position. Sir Frank Lee did not discount the possibility of repercussions from other European countries but he thought that the European case was a weak one in view of the fact that the Europeans themselves were involved in a highly discriminatory arrangement.

In reply to a question from Mr. Rasminsky as to whether the United Kingdom proposal was being put forward as a contribution to achieving a substantial diversion of trade and whether any estimate of the extent of such a diversion had been made, Sir Frank Lee said that the short answer to this was in the affirmative. While it was impossible to extrapolate the resultant expansion of United Kingdom exports to Canada and while he was reluctant to commit himself to any figure, he thought that the expansion might be of the order of between 25% and 50%, if not more.

In reply to a further question by Mr. Rasminsky as to whether any change was contemplated in the present financial relationships, Sir Frank Lee confirmed that the free trade proposal stood by itself and would entail no change of the kind Mr. Rasminsky had in mind.

Mr. Sharp said that reference had been made to the possibility of negotiations with the United States in connection with the present United Kingdom initiative. He wondered what the United Kingdom had in mind and specifically whether they were intending to use a possible free trade area arrangement with Canada as a bargaining weapon to obtain freer access to the United States market.

Sir Frank Lee said that it was politically realistic to think in terms of negotiations with the United States but that these would be concerned with quantitative restrictions only. Such negotiations were not part of the free trade area scheme that was being proposed to Canada but it would be only natural to review the position with the Americans in the light of any changes in the pattern of trade between the United Kingdom and Canada.

Mr. Fleming asked what would be the reaction of the United Kingdom if Australia and New Zealand came forward with a similar proposal for a free trade area relationship.

Sir Frank Lee replied that the United Kingdom would naturally have to study such a proposal. On the other hand the difficulties that Canadian industry would encounter in a free trade area were negligible as compared with the difficulty that would be encountered by industry in Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. Fleming also wondered whether the United Kingdom proposal would not tend to cut across the Canadian Government's plans for closer relationships between the Commonwealth as a whole. He wondered particularly about the reactions of the Asian members of the Commonwealth.

Sir Frank Lee said that he did not think that, on balance, the free trade area scheme would interfere with the achievement of closer Commonwealth relationships. It had to be borne in mind that conditions in most of the other Commonwealth countries were different and that the Governments of these countries, such as Australia and New Zealand, were committed to heavily protectionist programmes.

Sir Saville Garner thought that this assessment was broadly accurate. It was possible that political and psychological factors would enter into the reaction of countries like Australia and New Zealand. He did not, on the other hand, foresee similar difficulties in the case of the Asian countries.

Mr. Rasminsky said that the Asians would doubtless be interested in the treatment given by Canada to imports from the overseas dependencies of the United Kingdom. It would be awkward if the Asian countries had to be given less favourable treatment in Canada than the exports of British overseas dependencies.

Mr. Isbister wondered about the repercussions which any move such as the United Kingdom contemplated might have on United States commercial policy. There was a danger that the United States might interpret such a move as a turning back of the clock all the way to 1932 and that it would give aid and comfort to protectionist and isolationist groups. More specifically there was the question of whether such a move might have an adverse effect on the trade agreements programme which was due for renewal in 1958.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory said the United Kingdom would hope that a Canadian-United Kingdom free trade area might be taken philosophically in Washington and serve to expedite rather than impede the renewal of the trade agreements programme. He agreed, however, that it was difficult to be sure until one was able to see the pattern emerge more clearly.

Sir Frank Lee added that this was not really a matter of reversing the clock in the particular sense of 1932, that is to say in the sense of creating a whole system of imperial preferences. Much would depend in any case on what happened in the United States. It was true that the United Kingdom proposal could be regarded as to some extent aimed against the United States. Still, the proposal was within the context of what was permitted by GATT, and the United States would continue to have a special position in the Canadian market. Moreover, the proposal to achieve a fundamental reorientation of trade was a Canadian proposal in the first place and the United Kingdom had been merely trying to think how best it might be implemented.

Mr. Couillard thought that there was a risk in attempting to dispose too easily of the reaction of other countries. The proposed free trade area scheme was one which would have to be especially closely scrutinized for the effect it might have on the Commonwealth as an association. There was a danger in particular in relation to the Asian countries within the Commonwealth. There was the further problem of relationships with the United States, both as far as Canada and as far as the United Kingdom were concerned. In the NATO context, too, it would be unfortunate if there were a further parceling off of relationships within the community. Finally, a Canadian-United Kingdom free trade area had to be viewed in the context of the GATT; while it was true that it might be justifiable in GATT terms, it was bound to have an adverse effect on the whole pattern of multilateral trading relations with the risk that other countries, with the additional encouragement provided by the precedents that were now being created in Europe, would re-orientate their trading policies away from a reliance on the multilateral world of GATT.

Mr. Rasminsky said that a United Kingdom-Canadian free trade area would not only legalize tariff discrimination but the United Kingdom had also suggested that it might result in an earlier ending of discriminatory restrictions against Canadian exports than would otherwise be possible. This was a matter of concern because the Canadian view so far had been that, insofar as quantitative restrictions were concerned, the obligations of individual countries, even within a free trade area, should continue to be governed by their balance of payments position. Any other course would imply a reversal of the Canadian position.

Sir Frank Lee thought that this would have to be accepted as something that the United Kingdom did rather than as something that Canada had asked for.

Mr. Grandy, reverting to the impact of a Canadian-United Kingdom free trade area on the United States, said that the United States tolerated a number of arrangements in Europe for the specific reason that they regarded them as strengthening Europe as a political unit. The same consideration would not apply to a transatlantic arrangement of the kind now being proposed.

Mr. Reisman said that the Royal Commission on the Canadian Economy had done some exploratory work on the possible consequences of changes in the Canadian tariff. He recalled that Canada today gave free entry to many imports from the United Kingdom and that the Canadian tariff for many others was very low. Indeed, the tariff was significant only for that category of goods which involved sectors of Canadian industry that were sensitive to competition.

If Canada were to give complete free entry to the United Kingdom, the result was likely to be more significant in terms of a displacement of Canadian output than as a change in the pattern of Canadian imports. While any quantitative estimates were necessarily of a very broad and tentative order, he thought that United Kingdom exports were unlikely to be capable of expansion by much more than $100 million and that about 2/3 of this figure would probably represent a displacement of Canadian production. Nevertheless the psychological and moral impact of a move in the direction of free entry on United Kingdom exporters might well be more significant than this statistical extrapolation suggested.

Mr. Heathcoat Amory thanked the Minister of Finance for the very fully opportunity that had been given to him and Sir Frank Lee of explaining the United Kingdom proposals. He thought that he should reiterate the point made at the outset, namely, that the United Kingdom were concerned merely to find a way of bringing about a switch in the Canadian pattern of imports of the kind of order which the Canadian Prime Minister appeared to have had in mind.

Mr. Fleming said that the discussion had been extremely refreshing and that the frankness which had characterized the discussion gave a good indication of the very close affinity between Canada and the United Kingdom. He thought that the proposal for a free trade area between Canada and the United Kingdom was a bold and dramatic one and he wanted it understood that the comments made on the proposal had been frank and unprepared. In conclusion he expressed the hope that Mr. Heathcoat Amory and Sir Frank Lee would regard the discussion as having been worthwhile and well-intentioned and that they would not interpret the Canadian comments as being unduly cold or intransigent. There would, in any case, be an opportunity of looking further into all these matters at the next stage of Canadian-United Kingdom talks.

PROPOSAL FOR CANADA-U.K. FREE TRADE AREA

I have just learned from Sir Saville Garner that the U.K. are pressing for an immediate "preliminary reaction" from the Canadian Government to the proposal made only yesterday by Colonel Heathcoat Amory that Canada and the United Kingdom should form a Free Trade Area.

Personally I regard this request for a snap reply on a question affecting the whole economic and political future of this country to be absolutely outrageous.

The U.K. is sufficiently experienced in these matters to realize how outrageous their request for a snap judgment really is. This tends to confirm my suspicion that the U.K. is really involved in a political manoeuvre. Any sort of reply which is given now by the Canadian Government will be used either as a basis for a statement in the House of Commons, probably in reply to a planted question, or the basis of an official press leak. In either case the U.K. will be trying to get off a rather embarrassing domestic hook at the expense of Canada.

Sir Saville tells me that "all" the U.K. wants is a preliminary reaction indicating one of three possibilities:

- (a) that the proposal is not a starter;
- (b) that the proposal is welcome but will have to be considered carefully;
- (c) that the proposal will be considered carefully.

If we felt we had to give a snap reply I would hope that the reply would be (a). I am sure that it was clear to you from the discussions in the East Block yesterday that every one of our officials would support the view of the Prime Minister who said in effect, at the end of the brief discussion with Colonel Heathcoat Amory in the Rideau Club:

"If you were making a proposition which was weighted something like 60:40 in favour of the United Kingdom we would want to look at it sympathetically because we realize that under existing circumstances we cannot make an exactly balanced bargain, but as far as I can see the proposal you are making offers no reasonable quid pro quo to Canada."

1. I accompanied Mr. Macdonnell to No. 10 Downing Street this morning, and the Prime Minister discussed with us very freely the attitude of his government in regard to the present discussions taking place in Ottawa, as well as the attitude of his government toward relations between Canada and the UK. He did not specifically mention the proposals put forward by Mr. Heathcoat Amory and in fact his reference to the discussions in Ottawa left the impression that he might be unaware of what the discussions had been and the attitude of the Canadian Government. I made no reference to my knowledge of the attitude of the Canadian Government contained in your telegram E-1364 September 10,† which states that Mr. Heathcoat Amory has been told that the proposal is too extreme to be entertained by the Canadian Government. As the conversation progressed he did speak of the desire of his government to take full advantage of the new atmosphere which exists, and expressed the hope that something definite might emerge from the present meetings. He repeated more than once that we must move step by step and that this is a continuing relationship which will be built by dealing with various subjects as they arise. He did not repeat the expression which has been used on earlier occasions that it is hoped that some dramatic statement may be made at the coming meeting this month, but his whole attitude and his obvious enthusiasm makes it clear that this is his hope. However, this is subject to the reservation that he is thinking in long terms. He spoke of the fact that Britain has been powerful and while not so powerful now may have great power in the years ahead, and he also spoke of our increasing power. He referred specifically to the possibility of bilateral agreements, although emphasizing his desire to build the strength of the Commonwealth as a whole. My own impression, however, is that their attention is mainly directed on what can be achieved in agreement with Canada, and that it is upon that basis that they would proceed to examine the broader picture. Referring to the spirit which has been stimulated by your statements here and in Canada, he said that having reached some starting point we must continue the spirit of enthusiasm which has been established and constantly seek new grounds of agreement. He emphasized that they have committed themselves to no one particular solution, and although he refrained from referring to the discussions in Ottawa yesterday his remarks were open to the interpretation that he was reassuring us that if any present proposal were not acceptable, we certainly should proceed to explore others in an effort to achieve something definite when the meeting takes place. Referring to the fact that in his opinion the relationship between the governments of the UK and the USA had not been closer for many years, I think he left no doubt that he would be quite prepared to follow the course he thinks is right and to the mutual advantage of Canada and the UK, believing that we would gain respect from the USA by the strength we showed in following this course.

2. I think the long and satisfactory conversation could best be summed up by saying that while he showed great enthusiasm about the prospects of closer ties between Canada and the UK in trade relations and while it is their hope to be able to put forward some definite result from the meeting in Canada this month, they are looking at the picture from a long-term point of view and would hope that this might merely be the beginning of a gradual and progressive expansion of agreements to our common advantage.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

From our farewell meetings with UK officials (who will be going to Washington and Mont Tremblant) we have gained the distinct impression that at the official level at least UK interest in a free trade area remains lively. There seems to be hope that despite the categorical rejection which the proposal met in Ottawa initially, a seed has been sown which may yet bear fruit. This does not mean, of course, that UK Ministers will press their suggestion in Ottawa. But the proposal remains on the table. In any event if it does seem that the UK officials believe that it will be essential to work out jointly an appropriate means of informing other Commonwealth governments (and perhaps the public as well) that the suggestion has been made in order to ensure that a distorted version does not reach them through other channels. Moreover, their desire is that public criticism of the UK suggestion or the reception it received be avoided at all costs.

2. In our informal discussions UK officials have been quite prepared to admit that the free trade area proposal is much more advantageous to the UK than to Canada. But they have stressed that the advantages are by no means one-sided and suitable escapes could be incorporated into it to meet particular Canadian problems. On the positive side they claim that it would prevent a more rapid dismantling of UK quantitative restrictions (on a discriminatory basis of course) and prevent the imposition of additional quantitative restrictions against Canadian imports should the re-emergence of the dollar gap prove to be critical for the UK. While officials are fully sympathetic with our decision to reject such a radical approach (incidentally we are told that even a more radical proposal would have been put forward if the reaction to the free trade area had been positive) the hard fact seems to be that officials have not been able to put forward the UK Ministers alternatives which would have any hope of bringing about a substantial diversion of Canadian imports and it may be for this reason that it is not now planned to send a large number of UK officials from Mont Tremblant to Ottawa.

3. UK officials have gone out of their way to tell us that the UK is determined to support the calling of a further Commonwealth conference. If, however, other Commonwealth governments are opposed the UK will make every effort to work out an acceptable compromise. For political reasons alone, the present UK Government could not contemplate the failure to share the Canadian initiative.

4. Incidentally, in groping for a way to expand trade with Canada on a bilateral basis, UK officials admit that they often collide with the principles of Commonwealth multilateralism which the conference is designed to promote. An increase in trade between Canada and the UK or an increase in UK investment in Canada might well affect in some measure the level of UK trade with other Commonwealth countries (and other traditional suppliers or customers) or the availability of UK funds for investment in other parts of the Commonwealth. Moreover, the credit squeeze which inflationary pressures here have made necessary will less be a factor limiting the availability of funds to invest abroad. On the other hand, the rather one-sided flirtation by Australia and NZ with the European Common Market/Free Trade Area, does not, in the view of UK officials, augur well for the success of efforts to increase economic cooperation on a Commonwealth basis.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE U.K. MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE; REPORT
 BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

24. The Minister of Finance said that the Canadian suggestion to divert 15 per cent of her imports from the United States to the United Kingdom had aroused great interest in the U.K. The U.K. authorities had examined the implications of it and Mr. Heathcoat Amory, the U.K. Minister of Agriculture, had been authorized to put forward a proposal that Canada and the U.K. enter a free trade area. The U.K. would reduce as soon as possible its present quotas on Canadian products and manufactured goods but beyond that had nothing to offer. In exchange, British manufacturers would have free entry into the Canadian market. The suggestion had been thoroughly examined and before Mr. Heathcoat Amory returned to London he had been informed that it was too radical and one-sided to be acceptable. This reply might have an effect on the U.K. attitude towards the larger conference but he was sure that U.K. would agree that one should be held. Before the approach had been made, the U.K. had asked for bilateral talks with Canada during the Mont Tremblant Conference. At Canada's suggestion, these had been deferred until the day after the meeting because it might appear to the others present that special arrangements were being made between the two and such an appearance might impair the possibility of holding the larger meeting.

The U.K. had been especially shrewd in this matter and hard bargaining with them would be expected at the forthcoming discussions in Mont Tremblant and Ottawa.

26. During the discussion, the very slight advantages and the positive disadvantages to Canada in a free trade area with the U.K. were mentioned. Canada simply could not be led into a position which had the appearance of subservience to the U.K. No doubt, however, the U.K. government was under heavy pressure to show the British public that they regarded the 15 per cent diversion suggestion seriously and had, therefore, made the proposal they had.

27. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Finance on the recent discussions with the United Kingdom Minister of Agriculture concerning the U.K. proposal for a Canada-U.K. free trade area.

My immediately following en clair telegram† contains CP summary of remarks made to press at Tremblant last evening by Mr. Fleming and UK Chancellor of the Exchequer on report, which as appeared in press both here and in London, that UK and Canada were proposing to consider formation of free trade area between them.

2. For your own strictly confidential information informal proposal in these terms was made to us by UK and has been rejected by government as too extreme to be entertained.

3. Meeting yesterday morning was taken up by usual review of position of sterling area. In the afternoon, Conference discussed Common Market and Free Trade Area. Discussion did not carry problem very much beyond position as you know it. All Commonwealth representatives, while agreeing with broad political and economic objectives of European initiatives, stressed as they had at Commonwealth Finance Ministers Meeting danger to their export interests particularly in the field of agriculture. They also expressed desire to be kept as closely and continuously informed as possible and it was agreed that adequate procedures to ensure this would be devised.

CANADA'S ELECTION TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL; DECISION TO HOLD
COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

15. The Prime Minister reported that he had just been informed that Canada had been elected to the Security Council.²⁹

He also reported that the Minister of Finance had succeeded in getting agreement for the holding next year of a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. He had apparently been able to do this without making any bargains with the British or others in order to get their agreement. Sir Arthur Fadden of Australia had enthusiastically supported Mr. Fleming's proposal. The U.K. and others had supported Mr. Fleming as a matter of policy while India had supported the proposal but with less enthusiasm. It appeared likely that the conference would take place around this time next year, in Ottawa. A preparatory committee of officials would probably meet in London in January, although it was not certain that this matter would be agreed before the end of the present conference. A communiqué would be ready at noon to-day.

16. The Prime Minister considered that Mr. Fleming had done a splendid job in securing the agreement of the Finance Ministers' Conference for the holding next year of a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

17. The Cabinet noted with approbation the Prime Minister's report on Canada's appointment to the Security Council and on the results of the Mont Tremblant meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, which had recommended the holding of a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference in 1958.

SUMMARY NOTES ON THE MEETING BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM MINISTERS AND ADVISERS*PresentUnited Kingdom*

Mr. Peter Thorneycroft, Chancellor of the Exchequer
Sir David Eccles, President of the Board of Trade

Canada

Mr. Donald Fleming, Minister of Finance
Mr. Gordon Churchill, Minister of Trade and Commerce

The Finance Minister: Welcomed the United Kingdom visitors to Ottawa. The purpose of the meeting was to find reasonable means to further the joint purpose of increasing the two-way flow of trade. Certain avenues of approach could be explored in a preliminary way, and perhaps be followed up at the official level.

One such matter was procurement. The policy of the Canadian Government was quite clear. Preference is given first of all to Canadian supplying firms, and then to the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries generally. Canadian procurement, however, is mainly of interest to the United Kingdom among the Commonwealth countries. Policy is the same, whether military or civilian procurement is being considered. It is necessary, however, to note that some at least of the federal Crown Corporation operate within areas where they compete with private firms on a business basis. It should also be noted that the expenditures of the provinces, the municipalities, and their agents are not the responsibility of the Federal Government. The Provinces are responsible within their boundaries for such large expenditure areas as roads, and resources development. The best means of persuading the Provinces to turn their eyes as much as possible towards United Kingdom sources of supply would need to be considered. Active consideration would be given to this matter. He would call on Mr. Golden to make a brief statement on considerations affecting military procurement.

Mr. Golden: One of the main considerations affecting procurement is that Canadian-based capacity to produce a substantial range of military equipment is now in excess of the money available to make purchases in relevant fields, such as in aircraft and electronic equipment.

Another consideration is the matter of logistics. For strategic and logistical reasons, there is a high degree of standardization on what might be termed "North American lines." Partly for these reasons, there has been a rough dollar balance between the value of Canadian procurement in the United States, and the value of United States procurement in Canada. On the other hand, procurement as between the United Kingdom and Canada is mainly a one-way street. A great deal had been done in recent years in the way of United Kingdom firms establishing plants in Canada, for example Hawker-Siddeley one of the very large industrial complexes in Canada is owned in the United Kingdom. A number of other Canadian located defence firms are in a similar position. For logistical reasons it is desirable to have plants located in Canada, but this does not mean that United Kingdom ownership and participation is debarred. A good deal of the procurement which is called "Canadian" actually has a substantial United Kingdom, or United States, content. Fundamentally, the problem being discussed is a matter of requirements, since at the stage of procurement the objectives and thus the scope for manoeuvre had to a large extent already been determined. For example, when requirements called for fire control systems available only in the United States, there is little scope for directing procurements to the United Kingdom. The fact that direct procurement in overseas countries is at a low level is mainly attributable to the circumstances that the forces are not expanding, and there is excess capacity in Canadian located defence industry. In 1956 direct expenditures in the United States were some $40 million, and in the United Kingdom some $24 million. Expenditures in the United States were largely for specialized equipment.

The Chancellor: Asked how one would go about shifting, say, 24 per cent of procurement to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Golden: It would be necessary to move Canada further away from the United States. The forces of the two countries are closely linked and, for example, the United States undertakes a large part of the joint role in the air. There may, however, be opportunities in the development field, if the United Kingdom produced the required equipment better than other suppliers. After the research stage, it is important to develop equipment suited to the special conditions of North America. In the field of what might be termed "hardware," procurement is at a low level because the forces are not expanding. Perhaps there are opportunities for eg. scout cars, and motorcycles, but such opportunities are not large. Lines of communication with the United Kingdom are very good; we know what the United Kingdom can supply; they know what our problems are.

The Chancellor: Asked whether fear that the United Kingdom might be cut off in wartime is a major factor.

Mr. Golden: Replied that this does not fit the new NATO concept. The problem really is a matter of the country with which we are co-ordinating our major forces. In reply to a question about helicopters, Mr. Golden pointed out that Sikorski is pre-eminent in this field and indeed, makes helicopters in the United Kingdom under licence. There are Canadian firms interested in making helicopters.

The President: Referred to the Farnborough Air Show, and the quality of products shown there.

Sir Frank Lee: Said that the salient fact is that the forces are not expanding. All that could be asked is that Canada have a renewed, hard look at the opportunities for buying British, and that this consideration be extended to the Crown Corporations. He cited the case of Ontario Hydroelectric which has a list of products obtainable in the United Kingdom. It might be useful to examine whether all federal agencies followed a similar procedure.

Mr. Golden: Replied to questions about naval procurement. He pointed to the purchase of the Bonaventure. Destroyer escorts are built in Canada, but have a high United Kingdom content. Naval aircraft are made in Canada by a United Kingdom firm. Some armament is produced in the United Kingdom.

The Chancellor: Assumed that every effort would be made to exploit whatever opportunities exist.

The Minister of Finance: Stated that procurement policy in the civilian field is the same as that in the military field. The matter of civilian procurement was the next item for discussion.

Mr. Plumptre: Said that some years ago general rules had been made respecting the origin of goods procured by civilian Departments. These rules remain in effect. They give the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries an informal 10 per cent advantage over suppliers from other countries, such as the United States. There are two points which need clarification.

(a) There is apparently no comprehensive United Kingdom statement of what the United Kingdom feel they are missing.

(b) There is also no comprehensive analysis on the Canadian side of how the rules work at the operating level.

Mr. Plumptre: Hoped that the two points could be pursued.

Sir Frank Lee: Thought that the first approach would be as broad in scope as the field of United Kingdom industry as a whole. He referred again to lists prepared Department by Department, and agency by agency, of the Canadian Government.

The Minister of Finance: Pointed out that many purchases are made by tender. Unless agents of United Kingdom firms are in a position to tender, it is difficult to do anything.

The President: Said the key to the matter lies in the provision of quick commercial intelligence. If the United Kingdom suppliers do not have rapid intelligence respecting tender conditions, they are handicapped. In the United States, British businessmen have formed regional committees, often chaired by a United Kingdom trade official. Experience indicates that what is required are regular meetings between people of high status who are in one another's confidence. He wondered whether the provision of advance economic intelligence could be improved.

The Finance Minister: Said that tenders are, of course, advertised. The position could be explored, however. Perhaps the Trade Mission to the United Kingdom could explore this matter.

Sir Frank Lee: Said that many United Kingdom firms obtain tender data as rapidly as Canadian firms. However, there is a feeling that not enough time is available in some cases to consider tenders. It would be useful if consultation took place in advance. He agreed with Mr. Rasminsky that detailed consideration of the budget estimates after these came out would be useful in providing guidance.

Mr. Plumptre: Said that the rules re giving of a preference to United Kingdom sources of supply do not apply formally to Crown Corporations, because of possible United States reactions. Informal pressure, however, is maintained on the Crown Corporations.

The Chancellor: Said he does not wish to plead for non-competitive products. It is a matter of promoting more East-West trade, rather than North-South trade. Machinery for providing advance intelligence, for example to United Kingdom Trade Commissioners, might make it possible to increase sales of competitive United Kingdom products.

Mr. Sharp: Asked if there are any serious complaints about procurement at the operating level.

Sir Frank Lee: Said that there is a great deal of co-operation freely given. The best help the procurement officer can give is to devote sufficient time to the agents of British firms who wish to acquire background knowledge.

The Chancellor: Asked if the general policy of buy British if possible could be impressed on the Provinces. Perhaps something could be done at the forthcoming Federal-Provincial Conference. It would be useful if the Federal Government could give the Provinces a lead which United Kingdom traders could follow up.

The Finance Minister: Said the Canadian Government is willing to give a lead, but the problem is the best means of going about it. This would be considered. Speaking of Crown Corporations, he noted that some of them at least are operating in competition with private business and are impelled to direct their purchases to the cheapest source of supplies.

The Chancellor: Noted that there are private Canadian firms which have switched purchases to the United Kingdom, for example the west coast fishing industry.

The Finance Minister: Said that if agreeable the matter of tourist purchases could be considered next. There is an exemption of $100 for purchases carried in the luggage of returning Canadians who have been out of the country for 48 hours. There is a lot of Canadian money spent in the United States in this way, and a lesser amount spent in the United Kingdom. The Canadian Government would welcome further suggestions from the United Kingdom.

Sir Frank Lee: Noted that the United Kingdom had proposed this matter before. There seems to be a problem of discrimination. The object, of course, is to stimulate purchases in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Plumpton: Said that it might well be possible to meet the United Kingdom view without formal or explicit discrimination. A number of formulae are being explored in this connection.

Mr. Rasminsky: Noted that a change in the tourist exemption would also encourage more Canadians to travel to the United Kingdom.

The Trade and Commerce Minister: Said that a measure of this kind would have a certain popularity with Canadians travelling abroad.

The Finance Minister: Agreed with the Chancellor that this matter should be pursued at the official level. He noted that the next item concerned the Trade Mission to the United Kingdom. The Mission was shaping up well. The private people concerned wanted a Minister to lead the Mission, but this decision would have to wait upon events.

Mr. Sharp: Supported a suggestion by Sir Frank Lee that preparations for the Mission should not be rushed.

The Finance Minister: Noted that the United Kingdom had some comments to make on tariff matters.

Sir Frank Lee: Said that the United Kingdom was not putting forward a formal request list. He noted that there are three areas in which action might have a good psychological effect. These are:

(1) The possibility, consistently with GATT, of restoring the 1947 levels of preferences. An informal list of items had already been submitted for study.

(2) The possibility of binding existing preferences over the whole field, or over a range of goods.

(3) The possibility of binding the preferential rate on a number of items.

Sir Frank Lee: Also noted the importance of the Canadian sugar preference. This is a generous preference. He would like to urge that the position be placed beyond doubt. With the British West Indies becoming a nation, a statement that the preference will remain bound would be of very great importance. There had been some threats to this preference in the recent past (e.g. Cuban sugar). A better form of binding than under the present "rickety" British West Indies-Canada Agreement would be important.

The Finance Minister: Noted that much of the problem in the Canadian market results from competition with United States products. In this connection, would it be helpful from the United Kingdom point of view if Canadian valuation were changed to a cost-of-production basis?

The Chancellor: Said that, tentatively, he would think not. The matter could be studied. It was agreed that officials would meet next day to draft a press communiqué.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING AT MONT TREMBLANT; REPORT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

36. The Prime Minister said the main achievements of the Mont Tremblant meeting, the agreement to hold a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, had to some extent been obscured by the accounts in the press of the United Kingdom proposal for a free trade area with Canada, about which there had been a "leak" some weeks before. Notwithstanding this, the work at Mont Tremblant had been most successful. Since the meeting he had heard that the able and persuasive presentation by the Minister of Finance had convinced the doubters of the desirability of holding the larger conference.

37. The Minister of Finance said he and the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been gratified by the unanimous recommendation of the meeting to hold the Trade and Economic Conference. If the South African Minister of Finance had not had to leave early, there would probably also have been unanimous agreement to hold the conference in Canada. Eventually he was sure that this would be agreed to, by all Commonwealth countries. The date had not yet been settled but he hoped it would be held some time next summer. The necessity of adequate preparations had been stressed, and officials would meet in London in January to consider procedures and prepare the agenda.

The Canadian proposals were still secret, although the communiqué described in general terms several of the items Canada would wish to discuss.³⁰ He had submitted fourteen items at Mont Tremblant — seven relating to trade and seven to other economic matters.

He felt the meeting had done much to bring about warmer and more cordial relations between Commonwealth countries.

As regards the emergence of the free trade area proposal during the conference, he had informed the other delegations that it did not constitute a formal proposal and had nothing to do with the Mont Tremblant meeting. Subsequently, however, he and the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer were asked about the matter by the press. The Chancellor was less inhibited than he was and had elaborated on it at some length; he had confined himself to saying that such a proposal would present formidable difficulties to the Canadian government.

38. The Cabinet noted with approval the reports of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance on the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' meeting at Mont Tremblant.

CANADIAN-U.K. TRADE DISCUSSIONS; COMMUNIQUÉ

39. The Minister of Finance reported that a communiqué would be issued the following day at the conclusion of the trade discussions. The first part had been drafted by the U.K. and Canadian Ministers while their officials had prepared the draft of the second part. He read the draft communiqué and asked for comments.

40. During the discussion of the text and intent of the communiqué the following points were raised:

(a) Despite the government's unfavourable reaction to the United Kingdom's proposal for free trade, it would not be feasible to reject this proposal out of hand. It was recognized that the manner in which the British proposal had been presented, particularly at the press conference in Mont Tremblant, had not pleased the Canadian delegation. The British proposal could be considered as an attempt to answer the Prime Minister's earlier proposal of diverting some of Canada's imports from the United States to the United Kingdom. The U.K. ministers would return to their country and face criticism within their own party and from the opposition parties unless they could confirm that the free trade area proposal had been put forward seriously.

(b) It would be politically wise to avoid leaving an impression in the minds of the public of Canada that the free trade proposals were to be "considered" or even "reviewed" before or after the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference scheduled for next year, otherwise any unemployment in Canadian industries might be attributed by the public to the uncertainty of the outlook in regard to this vital matter of policy.

(c) The communiqué should leave no doubt that the free trade area proposals raised serious and complex problems and difficulties. It would be best if the expressions "free trade" were not used in the communiqué. Expansion of trade should be declared the objective of both governments.

(d) The communiqué should contain a reference to the government's declared objective to shift 15 per cent of Canada's imports from the United States to the United Kingdom.

³⁰ Voir Canada, ministère des Affaires extérieures, Affaires Extérieures, vol. 9, N° 10, octobre 1957, pp. 291 à 292.

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 9, No. 10, October 1957, pp. 291-292.

(e) The communiqué should not indicate only the benefits which the U.K. would get out of the current talks but be so drafted as to leave no impression that eventual benefits would be one-sided only.

(f) The communiqué should not be a source of embarrassment to the Minister of Finance at his forthcoming meeting with U.S. government trade officials. Reference to purchases from countries "outside the Commonwealth" should be tactfully phrased.

(g) Reference should be made to the visit by a high level trade delegation from Canada to the United Kingdom. This reference might even be given more prominence by placing it ahead of any reference to free trade proposals.

(h) Any reference in the communiqué to the strengthening by Canada of the preferential tariff arrangements applying to U.K. trade should be removed. It was realized that this would remove much of the meat from the conclusions of the discussion.

(i) The U.K. were going ahead with its proposals for a European Free Trade Area but had said that these would exclude foodstuffs, drink, and tobacco.

41. The Cabinet, after a long discussion, agreed:

(a) that it would not be feasible to indicate in the communiqué that the United Kingdom's free trade area proposals had been rejected;

(b) that the Prime Minister, the Ministers of Finance, Agriculture, Justice, Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs meet the U.K. ministers during that evening to review the communiqué and its implications; and,

(c) that the Cabinet meet the following day to consider further amendments to the communiqué.³¹

I attach for your signature, if you agree, a memorandum to the Prime Minister concerning the preparatory meeting of Commonwealth officials that is to be held in London on February 11. I suggest that, in present circumstances, it would be satisfactory to have the approval of the Prime Minister and the Ministers directly concerned in a matter of this kind. The memorandum has already been shown to Mr. Fleming and Mr. Churchill and carries their concurrence.³²

2. As you will note, it is anticipated that this first meeting of officials will be called upon to decide on matters of substance. What we envisage is that officials will put in hand the preparation of material on the basis of which an agenda for the Conference can in due course be formulated.

3. A general framework for such an agenda was, of course, agreed upon by Commonwealth Finance Ministers at Mont Tremblant last autumn. On the other hand, it has always been understood that, as Mr. Fleming put it in the House on January 4, "any proposal that any Commonwealth country wishes to bring forward in relation to trade within the Commonwealth, or to economic questions arising within the Commonwealth, or economic policies, will have full opportunity of putting them before the Trade and Economic Conference."

4. Because this has been the position from the outset and because any meaningful review of Commonwealth relations in the economic field will necessarily have to take account of the interests of all participating Governments, the attached memorandum recommends that our delegation be authorized to consider any proposals put forward by other Commonwealth Governments for discussion at the proposed Conference. You will note that some of these proposals — and particularly those put forward by the under-developed members of the Commonwealth — may be fairly ambitious in scope. Nevertheless, it is our feeling that due weight should be given to all such proposals even though there can, of course, be no commitment before the Conference itself regarding action based on proposals submitted by individual Commonwealth countries.

³² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Memo sent to P.M. 6.2.58 [H.B. Robinson]

5. You will note that, in the attached memorandum, the view is also put forward that it may not be expedient for us to seek the inclusion in the final Conference agenda of all of the fourteen points proposed by Mr. Fleming at Mont Tremblant. Our reservations, which are shared by other departments, relate among others to the subject of communications. If this were taken to include civil aviation it would almost certainly raise difficult issues for the United Kingdom and others; if it were extended to cover telecommunications, there might be a tendency to duplicate the work of the Commonwealth Telecommunications Network Conference that it is proposed to hold in London at the end of May. Reservations also attach to the subject of uranium for which a Commonwealth Conference is not considered to be the most appropriate forum and which, indeed, might give rise to some bitterness as between India on the one hand and Canada and the United Kingdom on the other.

6. There is one broader consideration of which, I think, you would wish to be aware. This is that there has over the years been some loosening of the economic ties linking Commonwealth countries. Partly this is due to the emergence of new Commonwealth countries in Asia and Africa, partly to the increasing extent to which industrialization has spread in Commonwealth countries other than the United Kingdom, and partly to the very great change in the economic position of the United Kingdom itself. No doubt, recent moves toward closer economic integration in Western Europe and the need of Commonwealth countries to take account of these developments have served to reinforce this general trend.

7. Most of the under-developed Commonwealth countries of Asia and Africa depend heavily on world market prices for one or two primarily commodities. There is not much that can be done by the Commonwealth alone to prevent severe fluctuations in these prices and thus to assure some degree of stability to the export incomes of the under-developed members of the Commonwealth. These countries have also found that the United Kingdom is no longer able to supply all the external capital which they require to expand their economies.

8. Australia and New Zealand are in a not dissimilar position. They have in the past relied upon the United Kingdom for investment capital and upon the United Kingdom market to absorb the exportable surpluses of their primary commodities. These surpluses have grown while the United Kingdom market for them has contracted, largely owing to domestic subsidization of agricultural production in the United Kingdom. These developments have compelled Australia and New Zealand to look for alternative markets in Europe and in the Far East. To negotiate their way into these markets, Australia has sought and New Zealand is about to seek releases from their preferential commitments in favour of the United Kingdom. Moreover, both countries — and possibly other Commonwealth countries in a similar position — may well wish eventually to negotiate some form of association with or limited participation in the proposed European free trade area if this were the only way of safeguarding access for their primary commodities to the markets of Europe.

9. The United Kingdom continues, of course, to be committed to the closest possible economic co-operation with the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, a realistic assessment over recent years has made it clear to the United Kingdom that the prospect of expanding export opportunities lies pre-eminently in Europe and North America and that the United Kingdom could not, therefore, afford to allow European economic integration to go forward without their participation. It is fair to say that, in their negotiations with Europe, the United Kingdom have throughout laid stress on their determination that nothing would be done to impair Commonwealth interests. The possibility is not to be excluded, however, that the United Kingdom may yet be compelled to modify their position (e.g. with respect to agriculture) if the coming into being of a European free trade area hinged on such a concession on their part.

10. In these circumstances, it was perhaps inevitable that some skepticism should have developed with respect to the Commonwealth as an economic framework. And it is because this skepticism does exist and because it does have a basis in fact that Commonwealth Governments regard it as all the more important that any Conference along the lines proposed by us at Mont Tremblant should be such as to yield results. This is a matter of particular relevance to the position of Commonwealth Governments in Asia, some of which are under continuing pressure to justify the Commonwealth association in terms of national self-interest.

11. It is difficult, of course, to be sure what different Commonwealth Governments have in mind when they speak of a Conference that will yield results. Presumably, however, they are thinking in terms of a Conference that would not merely discuss Commonwealth trade and economic relations as they are and as they are developing but would consider some new initiatives. These might be initiatives designed to strengthen economic relations within the Commonwealth. They might also be initiatives which, like the Colombo Plan, would be formulated in a Commonwealth context but capable of extension over a wider area.

11. We have touched upon these matters in the memorandum to the Prime Minister. No doubt, some of the points at issue will require to be developed further as the shape of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference emerges more clearly and in the light of developments generally over the next few months.

The Finance Ministers of the Commonwealth who met at Mont Tremblant in the autumn of 1957 approved the proposal of the Canadian Government that a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference be held at a convenient place and time in 1958 and agreed to recommend the proposal to their Governments.

On the basis of the indications which we have already received from Commonwealth Governments it can be assumed that the Conference will be held and that, in response to the invitation of the Canadian Government, it will be held in Canada. There has been some difficulty in securing agreement on a date that would suit the convenience of all concerned. In an effort to take into account the difficulties of individual Commonwealth Governments it has now been proposed that the Conference should open on September 15, 1958, and it is hoped that Commonwealth Governments will see their way clear to accepting this compromise proposal.

In the meantime Commonwealth officials are due to meet for a few days in London beginning on February 11 to set in train the preparatory work for the Conference. This will be the first such meeting and it is unlikely to involve the consideration of substantive issues. A second meeting of officials is projected for May at which time the shape of an agenda for the Conference will probably be determined. It is possible that officials may have to meet again immediately before the Conference to make a final review of the material which is to be put before Ministers.

It is clear that all Commonwealth Governments attach importance to the success of the forthcoming Conference. This is one of the reasons why considerable stress was laid at Mont Tremblant on the need for adequate and careful preparation. Public opinion in the Commonwealth will likewise look to the Conference to produce results that go beyond a mere review of Commonwealth trade and economic relations. To the extent that the Conference flows from a Canadian initiative it may be assumed that other Commonwealth Governments will expect Canada to take an active part in the preparatory work with a view to ensuring that the Conference will serve to strengthen the existing framework of economic relations within the Commonwealth and thereby the Commonwealth association as such.

At Mont Tremblant the Minister of Finance put forward fourteen points in the field of Commonwealth trade and economic relations generally that might be suitable for discussion at a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference (attached as Appendix "A"). While the fourteen points will continue to represent the basic Canadian proposals, it is not considered that Canadian representatives at the preparatory meeting of officials need to regard themselves as committed to the inclusion of all the fourteen points in a draft agenda for the Conference. Indeed, it has already become clear that some of the points in question may raise difficult issues for other Commonwealth countries.

It was understood from the outset that the proposals put forward by Canada as a basis for discussion at a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference were not to be regarded as exhaustive and that other Commonwealth Governments would be free to propose for inclusion in the agenda for the Conference any issues to which they attached importance and which they regarded as suitable for consideration in a Commonwealth forum of this kind. It is, therefore, probable that additional proposals will be put forward between now and the drawing up of a final agenda. This might include proposals on such matters as the creation of a Commonwealth investment bank and a possible Commonwealth initiative designed to stabilize prices of primary commodities. Whatever the nature of the proposals that may emerge in this way, there is much to be said at this stage for encouraging other Commonwealth countries to participate actively in the preparatory work for the Conference and for making it clear that any points to which they attach importance will receive due consideration when the time comes to formulate a Conference agenda. The broad general framework of an agenda was agreed to by Commonwealth

Finance Ministers and was set out in the final communiqué issued at Mont Tremblant (relevant extract attached as Appendix "B"†).³⁴

In the light of these considerations and with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I would propose for your approval:

(a) that Canada be represented at the preparatory meeting of officials that is due to open in London on February 11 by a delegation headed by Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance, and including the following members:

M. Schwarzmann, Department of Trade and Commerce

J.F. Grandy, Canada House, London

K. Goldschlag, Department of External Affairs

G.S. Watts, Bank of Canada

J.M. Harrington, Canada House, London;

(b) that the delegation be empowered to discuss administrative issues relating to the holding of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference on the assumption that the Conference will be held in Canada in response to the invitation of the Canadian Government and that the Canadian Government will be prepared to meet the cost of the Conference, including that of visiting delegations;

(c) that the delegation be authorized to participate in a preliminary consideration of a Conference agenda in terms of the general framework agreed to at Mont Tremblant and including

(i) the fourteen points proposed by the Minister of Finance on the understanding that, on further examination, it may not prove expedient to seek the inclusion of each and every one of these points in the final Conference agenda; and

(ii) proposals put forward by other Commonwealth countries on the understanding that the final Conference agenda will remain to be determined by reference to the views of Governments;

(d) that the delegation seek further instructions in the event that any unforeseen issues requiring immediate decisions should arise at the preparatory meeting of officials.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE
PREPARATORY MEETING OF OFFICIALS

Meeting ended yesterday afternoon. As a result partly of advance consultation between Canadian and UK delegations and partly of Makins' firm but sympathetic chairmanship, meeting developed very much along lines anticipated in Ottawa.

2. A provisional agenda was adopted on understanding that it was not to be regarded as immutable but should serve as a reasonably firm basis on which to set in train preparatory work in form of background papers. There was also agreement that agenda itself should not be overloaded or made unduly specific (if only to provide against possibility of leakage) but that it would be useful to annotate agenda in such a way as to take into account suggestions of certain delegations and to spell out in somewhat greater detail items on which background papers would have to be prepared. Allocation of preparatory work was generally satisfactory from our point of view.

3. After reviewing problems of timing and location of final Conference we invited agreement that Conference should open on September 15 at Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal; also that Pierce, who had been selected by Canadian Ministers, should supervise all Conference arrangements. Proposals made by Canadian Government for holding Conference and selection of Pierce were warmly received and accepted, subject to formal confirmation by NZ Government that September 15 was acceptable to them. In these circumstances it did not prove possible to arrange for Canadian Government announcement of date and place of Conference to coincide with conclusion of officials' meeting.

4. In commenting on Pierce's selection, Chairman used term "General Secretary" rather than "Secretary General". On reflection Pierce considers and we agree that "General Secretary" is less pretentious designation which might be adopted.

5. Officials agreed that their second preparatory meeting would be held in London on June 2. That meeting would provide for full and thorough discussion of points of substance arising out of agenda with a view to assisting ministers to take decisions in September. It was also agreed that background papers should be circulated to Commonwealth Governments by those preparing them no later than May 1. June meeting of officials would then endeavour to reconcile views on agenda items or, where this did not prove possible, identify points of disagreement. Meeting would also wish to consider whether there was some kind of central theme for Ministerial Conference. Meeting would endeavour to complete its work within fortnight.

6. Other arrangements agreed upon are set out in confidential agreed minute of further action which is going forward to you as telegram No. 313.† In addition telegrams 314† and 315† will contain, respectively, provisional agenda adopted by officials and text of press statement released yesterday with 12:30 a.m. GMT embargo.

I thought that you might find it useful to have the attached summary of our discussion on February 24. I am sorry that it has taken us so long to prepare these notes. It was agreed, I think, that what we would want at this stage would be a general summary of the points that were raised in the course of the discussion. Accordingly, no attempt has been made to attribute the points included in the summary to individual participants in the discussion.

It is for consideration whether we shall want an agreed document on which to base our further discussion of Canadian initiatives at the forthcoming Conference. For the time being, I shall assume that you will bring to my attention any points that obviously require revision as well as points that should have been included in the summary but, for one reason or another, have not been covered. You might also wish to let me know whether, in your view, we might in due course make copies of the summary available to a wider circle. For the moment I propose to confine the circulation of the summary to those who participated in the meeting on February 24. At a later stage, however, I think that it might be useful to elicit the views of others who may be in a position to contribute to our thinking.

The following is a summary of a discussion held on February 24, 1958, at 8:30 p.m., at 85 Lakeway Drive, Ottawa.

Those present were:

Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre (Host)
Mr. R.B. Bryce
Mr. K.W. Taylor
Mr. M.W. Sharp
Mr. L. Rasminsky
Mr. D.V. LePan
Mr. S.D. Peirce
Mr. R.A. Farquharson
Mr. L.E. Couillard
Mr. S.S. Reisman
Mr. K. Goldschlag.

Background of Conference

It was recognized that the Commonwealth involved a clash between form and substance. As an institution it was generally regarded by people as a good thing. In particular, its function as a bridge between the West and the newly emergent countries of Asia and Africa was held to be valuable. In economic terms there appeared to be little of real substance in the Commonwealth relationship and the trend was for member countries to back away from such economic links as had at one time existed. Still, the fact was that there was a good deal of Commonwealth activity on the economic side and it might well be a part of the function of the forthcoming Conference to bring these various activities into focus.

Trade

It was generally agreed that there appeared to be little by way of fresh initiatives in the field of trade that was likely to be of general interest to the countries participating in the Conference. As far as Canada was concerned, it might be possible to seek expanded markets for Canadian exports in Commonwealth countries. This would depend in part on continued economic stability and progress in the Sterling area and in part on the management of the import restrictions operated by Commonwealth countries. Any effort in the direction of expanding Canadian markets in the Commonwealth would have to be based on an assessment of the prospects for our exports in the countries of the old and the new Commonwealth. If on examination these prospects proved to be real, there was still the question of whether or not Canada could buy relief from the discriminatory management of the present restrictions.

On broader grounds one had to look at the general economic situation that was likely to prevail at the time when the Conference was being held next September. If by that time the United States economy had not shown very clear signs of recovery, and if, possibly, there had been a reversal of the net outflow of dollars, the Conference might very well be faced with an attempt at organized discrimination against the United States. The pressure for such a move would be even greater if the United Kingdom were encountering further difficulties in their free trade area negotiations. In such an event, Canada would have the choice of either participating in or staying out of a collective Commonwealth exercise aimed against the United States. Indeed, it was not inconceivable that the United Kingdom might think of asking Canada to join the Sterling area if the position had deteriorated both in relation to the United States and in relation to Europe.

These prospects underlined the need for Canada to have a policy for trade at the Conference. This should probably be aimed at the disappearance of the existing trade restrictions in the Commonwealth. There was also a need to bear in mind the serious risks which might be involved if, in the period between now and the time of the Conference, Canada were to institute new restrictions against the United States. In all these circumstances, there was something to be said for thinking in terms of a collective Commonwealth approach to the United States rather than against the United States. Such an approach would be designed to exercise some degree of influence on United States trade and general economic policies. On the other hand, it would have to be remembered that any Commonwealth proposal would ipso facto be suspect in the eyes of the United States Congress.

Apart from these broader issues relating to trade, it was suggested that Canada in common with other Commonwealth countries might seek to exert influence on the United Kingdom in relation to the free trade area proposals. It was also thought possible that Canada might be able to reach agreement with Australia and New Zealand in the matter of dairy products, but it was doubtful whether and to what extent this type of discussion could be fitted into the broader framework of the Conference.

Aid

There was general agreement that the majority of Commonwealth countries were primarily interested in economic development and that this was an interest of which the Conference would have to take account. Indeed, there was a good deal to be said for focussing the attention of the Conference on the theme of "the expanding Commonwealth" in both its geographical and economic connotations. In this context a mere summary, for presentational purposes, of what the Commonwealth was already doing was unlikely to be adequate. What was required would almost certainly involve some new commitments.

Subject to budgetary limitations, which would be more clearly apparent as the time of the Conference drew closer, it was suggested that there might be an extension of the Colombo Plan type of aid. Specifically, it might be in the Canadian interest to see the Colombo Plan broadened to include Ghana and the West Indies. Neither country was likely to be in a position to absorb very much aid so that only a modest commitment would be involved at the outset. In relation to the West Indies, it was recognized that there would be a danger in Canada's being involved in aid to that country on an increasing scale, somewhat on the analogy of the United States involvement in Latin America. On the other hand, it was agreed that the Colombo Plan was the best framework within which to make available additional Canadian aid to other Commonwealth countries in that it would enable us to discriminate in favour of those for whom we feel a special concern. Mention was also made of the possibility of drawing South Africa into the Colombo Plan as a donor country especially if African countries like Ghana were to benefit from the Plan as recipients of economic and technical aid.

Apart from any extension of the Colombo Plan to provide aid to the West Indies and Ghana, it was recognized that India and Pakistan were the really crucial countries of whose requirements Canada and others would have to take account. If they were to leave the Commonwealth, it was almost certain that the rest of the Commonwealth would be in jeopardy. It was true that any additional aid that Canada could make available to them would mean relatively little in comparison with their prospective earnings from commodity exports and with the amounts of capital that they might secure from the United States, Germany, the Soviet Union and international institutions. On the other hand, Canadian aid might — in addition to its direct benefits — help these countries to improve their position in attracting investment.

A second proposal which was explored was the creation of a new source of capital in the form of an Export-Import Bank type of scheme. In this connection, preference was expressed for an export credit scheme which would be operated on a Government-to-Government basis rather than to have an official body making credit available to exporting firms. The question remained, of course, what types of goods and commodities Canada had to export on a competitive basis. It was agreed that if genuine commercial transactions could be financed through the type of scheme that had been proposed, this would be acceptable. Indeed, it was likely that some elaboration of Canada's present export credits structure was in prospect quite independently of any fresh initiatives that might be taken in this direction at the forthcoming Conference.

Reference was also made in the course of the discussion to the matter of trade between the under-developed countries of the Commonwealth and the Soviet bloc and to Soviet aid to these countries. It was realized that the older countries of the Commonwealth had no alternative but to adopt a realistic approach to these developments which had figured prominently in the brief of the Ceylonese representative at the preparatory meeting of Commonwealth officials earlier in the month.

Commodity Arrangements

It was recognized that fluctuations in commodity prices represented the root of the difficulties experienced by most of the underdeveloped countries. In addition there was the new threat of firm Soviet purchases of these commodities which might result in increasing economic dependence on the part of the primary producing countries on the Soviet Union. On both these grounds it was in the interest of the Western countries to be more positive in their approach to commodity problems. Essentially the importance of any commodity scheme to the primary producing countries was twofold: it would serve to maintain the incomes of producers (although this is something which could be achieved by governmental stabilization schemes) and it would serve to maintain foreign exchange earnings.

There was general agreement that nothing substantial could be done in this field without some form of United States participation. It might be possible to present a new initiative on commodity problems as a form of giving assistance to the under-developed countries and as an answer to Soviet economic penetration of these countries. This type of approach would have considerable attractions from the point of view of enlisting public support in the United States. It was to be assumed, in any case, that a new Commonwealth initiative on commodity problems would have some leverage, not necessarily on the Republicans but on the Democratic Party which might be expected to return to power in 1960.

It was unlikely that the problem in terms of the number of commodities of direct interest to Commonwealth countries would prove to be unmanageable. Tin, sugar, cocoa, tea, rubber and jute seemed to be the main commodities involved. It was generally agreed that the pattern at which to aim would be the pattern of the International Tin Agreement which involved a buffer stock scheme and avoided recourse to state trading. The real question to which an answer was required was how much hard cash Canada and the United States and others would be prepared to put into a buffer stock type of scheme.

There was some discussion about the possibility of bringing the United Kingdom back into the International Wheat Agreement. It was suggested, however, that in present circumstances the International Wheat Agreement was of negligible value to Canada and that, provided the two major exporters were prepared to hold stocks, there was little difficulty in maintaining reasonable stability of wheat prices.

Commonwealth Organs

It was thought that one of the matters to be pursued at the Conference was the extent to which there should be increased facilities for Commonwealth consultation. There had been suggestions in certain quarters that it might be possible to transfer the headquarters of certain Commonwealth organs from London to Ottawa as being a more acceptable locale and the transfer of the headquarters of the Boy Scouts Association had been mentioned as a case in point. However, it was difficult at this stage to envisage Canada as a Commonwealth centre and further consideration would no doubt have to be given to the question of whether Canada had an interest in seeing the centre of Commonwealth gravity move across the Atlantic, even if it is assumed that the present and succeeding Canadian Governments will continue to follow an active Commonwealth policy.

Immigration

It was recalled that the establishment of quotas in Canada for immigrants from India, Pakistan and Ceylon had been warmly welcomed by these countries. It was for consideration whether a further initiative in this direction might be suitable at the forthcoming Conference.

General Conclusions

It was clear that other Commonwealth countries would be speculating about the substantial objectives Canada had in mind in proposing a Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. As had been made clear at Mont Tremblant they will themselves find it politically necessary to pursue substantial objectives at such a Conference. In all probability they would expect Canada to be thinking in terms of:

- (a) joining the sterling area;
- (b) reviving the preferential system;
- (c) committing additional resources to economic development in the Commonwealth.

It was axiomatic that (a) and (b) would be impracticable but that (c) was feasible.

An approach to the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference which would put the accent firmly on economic development was one which, it was thought, Ministers would be prepared to consider. This would be particularly so if it appeared that the alternative approach, namely to seek an expansion of Commonwealth trade and an extension of the preferential system, was likely to founder on the lack of interest in such an approach on the part of the older Commonwealth countries. Consideration would, of course, have to be given in due course to the budgetary implications of any additional Canadian commitments to Commonwealth development. In this connection the extension of loans, if these could be kept technically outside the budget, was likely to be easier than any substantial increase by way of grant aid.

Concern was expressed that an approach along these lines might put the United Kingdom in a difficult position in that they were already doing about as much as they could do and that prospective drawings by other Commonwealth countries on their sterling balances would add to the strain on the United Kingdom position. It might be possible, however, in the context of the Conference to formulate a broad statement which would relate aid to national income. Such a statement would be likely to show that the United Kingdom were doing proportionately more than other Commonwealth countries in contributing to Commonwealth development.

1. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance (Mr. Plumptre) circulated an Agenda, as follows:

- (a) General report on meetings of Commonwealth Officials in London in June.
- (b) Trade matters arising out of June meetings.
 - (i) Bilateral discussions.
 - (ii) Elimination of discriminatory restrictions.
 - (iii) Convertibility of Sterling.
- (c) Commonwealth institutions.

ITEM 1 — GENERAL REPORT ON MEETINGS OF COMMONWEALTH OFFICIALS IN LONDON IN JUNE

2. Mr. Plumptre said that the organizational pattern of the London meeting of officials, which had consisted of a Committee of Trade, a Committee on Finance and Development, a plenary, or steering, committee and a sub-committee on gold, might prove to be the pattern for the organization of the September meeting. The agenda which had emerged from the officials' meeting was the same in substance as had been previously discussed, but went back to the Mont Tremblant wording.

3. Mr. Plumptre made the following points with respect to trade.

(a) The Canadian Delegation had emphasized the desirability of the expansion of Commonwealth trade through bilateral discussions and also generally. They had also stressed the necessity for eliminating discriminatory restrictions. Expansion might be piecemeal or general, as the circumstances warranted. Many Commonwealth countries admitted that discriminatory restrictions were contrary to their own interests.

(b) As regards currency convertibility, the Canadian delegation had urged that consideration be given to convertibility of sterling, having in mind that as long as it was inconvertible, countries had a formalistic basis for discrimination.

United Kingdom officials had been very cautious indeed about these two points. They had acknowledged them as long term objectives but mentioned the difficulties. They had made it clear that the U.K. reviewed its trade and convertibility objectives every so often. Indeed a review had occurred just before the June meetings but U.K. Ministers had felt the time was not ripe to move forward, certainly at least until the results of the second half of the year were apparent. Canadian officials had urged that there might be an opportunity before the end of the year for progress. All governments undertook to review their positions on these two matters during the summer.

(c) The interests of various countries in the stabilization of commodity prices was quite apparent. The British said they intended to send a representative to preparatory meetings in September on a new International Wheat Agreement. As far as agreements in general were concerned it was recognized that both producers and consumers had to belong and this pointed to the crucial position of the United States.

(d) In the field of commodities, New Zealand and Australia had emphasized the effects of protectionist agricultural policies in Canada, the U.K., Europe, and elsewhere. The hope was expressed that the Commonwealth would show leadership in this field.

(e) On tariff preferences, no interest was shown to enlarge or extend such preferences. It was recognized that this would be contrary to GATT obligations and the opposite of self interest. In fact, some countries were now in the process of "eroding" preferences.

(f) All agreed that trade should be expanded on a general basis.

(g) On liquidity, the U.K. had taken the position that trade was hampered by a lack of reserves. No detailed attempt had been made to examine the basis of U.K. thinking that the world was short of reserves. On gold the Commonwealth had "rung the changes" on the rigid U.S. position. It had been easy to agree that the International Monetary Fund had a bigger job to do than when it had been originally established. One or two of the poorer countries were not sure that they would be able to make increased contributions to the Fund's resources, if called upon to do so.

DEVELOPMENT

4. Mr. Plumpton said that there had been general acceptance of the view that the world was short of capital. This applied not only to underdeveloped countries but to developed countries in which technological changes were occurring. The Commonwealth therefore looked to all sources for capital. Sources had been reviewed, including loans from private markets and the Colombo Plan. There had been unanimous agreement on enlarging the powers of the International Bank. Everyone agreed that increasing the individual guarantee would be desirable, though here again one or two of the poorer countries were not sure about increasing their own cash subscriptions or their 18 per cent in national currencies. There had been some discussion of the Commonwealth Development Finance Corporation and it was recognized that this was not a popular or terribly useful institution. Our High Commissioner in London had just recently informed us that the U.K. proposed to withdraw its proposals for a Commonwealth Bank. Technical assistance had been inadequately covered.

A wide diversity of views was apparent on methods for improving machinery for consultation and cooperation. They ranged from those of Ghana and Malaya, who would like to see the establishment of a Commonwealth Secretariat and Commonwealth Council to discuss practical issues, to those of South Africa, who felt that anything new or additional would be suspect, if not undesirable. India was only slightly less forthcoming than South Africa. In the end, officials concluded that it would be useful for senior officials to meet in the spring of each year as well as at the usual autumn meetings.

The U.K. had reiterated its views, already before us, on the European Economic Community. In view of the situation in France and the uncertainty on the E.E.C. and the Free Trade Area, there had been no effective discussions.

5. Mr. Plumptre had, at another meeting, indicated to the Prime Minister, and other Ministers and officials, the assumptions with regard to the United States which underlay the discussions in London.

The U.K. proposal for scholarships and the Shawcross convention on foreign investments had not been discussed. There were brief but unproductive discussions on freight rates, shipping, and some other matters.

At the same time as the meeting of the officials was being held the Commonwealth Communications Board had been in session and something might emerge which would be useful for the Conference. Officials had agreed that it would be useful to meet for a few days before the opening of the main Conference in Montreal, the date proposed being September 10th.

6. The Secretary General of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference (Mr. Pierce) said that the U.K. scholarship proposal had not been raised in London because its practicalities had not then been studied by U.K. authorities. He thought more would be heard of the investment code because of its wide backing in various quarters. The Commonwealth Communications Board had come up with a project involving a telephone line around the world through Commonwealth countries, but it had been felt that, if the plan was acceptable, it should not emerge from a technical conference but be saved for September. Sir Roger Makins and Mr. Drew were to consult on this and try to reserve an announcement for approval at the Conference.

7. Mr. Couillard added that he had been impressed by the fact that technical assistance had not been given a full airing, due to deficiencies in the organization of the June meetings.

8. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Isbister) added three points. He had been impressed about the worries of the Ghanaian representative on the prejudice of the rest of the world against coloured people. As regards bilateral negotiations to remove restrictions he felt there were not many large concessions to be made. The bigger issues were the important ones. Finally he noted that the organization of the secretariat in London had been bad and had resulted in incorrect and inadequate minutes.

9. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) reported on conversations held with the Prime Minister of the U.K. when officials were in London. Mr. Macmillan had doused cold water on any hopes that steps towards convertibility might be announced at the time of the conference. He acknowledged that the position of sterling was favourable at the moment but the U.K. was worried about the out-turn in the second half of the year. Mr. Macmillan had said that the only ground which might be given in the E.E.C. on agriculture would have to do with products of little or no concern to Canada. Mr. Macmillan had mentioned wool.

10. Mr. Fleming said that Mr. Macmillan had expressed gratitude and appreciation to us for keeping the U.S. informed of the plans for the Conference and allaying U.S. suspicions. Mr. Macmillan had said the United Kingdom would consider seriously a new International Wheat Agreement. Finally, Mr. Macmillan had expressed the hope again the something really concrete respecting Commonwealth institutions might emerge from the Conference. Mr. Fleming added that he had today held discussions with the U.K. High Commissioner in Ottawa regarding the Conference which were not altogether reassuring. Sir Saville Garner told him that U.K. Ministers were disappointed with the results of the officials' discussions because no theme had been developed for the plenary meeting, Canada had tended to focus too much attention on the removal of restrictions by the U.K. and not much had been said about institutions. Sir Saville had continued that the Conference should consider the financing of development. It should also give thought to making the Commonwealth Development Finance Corporation more effective. The U.K. was concerned about the inadequacy of the discussion on technical assistance and training of students.

11. Mr. Fleming went on to give a brief report on the talks which had been held with Mr. Dulles that afternoon respecting, in particular, the Conference, the possibility of enlarging the resources of the I.M.F. and the I.B.R.D., the U.S. proposal for a meeting on August 4th of the Continuing Committee of Ministers and Secretaries on Trade and Economic Affairs, and the concern of the U.S. over the creation of organizations which might duplicate the work of existing international financial institutions.

12. The Canadian Ambassador to the United States (Mr. Robertson) thought it might be of some help if the Canada-U.S. Committee met before September 15th depending on what could be expected to emerge from such a meeting. We might find that some lines of advance would be blocked if we did not take the opportunity for a frank discussion with U.S. secretaries before the Conference started.

13. The Committee noted a suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) that a decision on a meeting of the Committee could be deferred until the end of the week, after the talks of the President and Mr. Dulles had been concluded.³⁵

14. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada (Mr. Rasminsky) reported on the discussions held by officials in London on the price of gold. The lead in this matter had been taken by South Africa, whose representative had spoiled a good case by pushing it too far. Mr. Rasminsky reviewed the points he had made at these discussions and the points made by others. A report was prepared at South African insistence. He mentioned briefly the conclusions which had been recorded in the report.

ITEM 2 — TRADE MATTERS ARISING OUT OF JUNE MEETINGS

15. Mr. Isbister said that in accordance with instructions, bilateral discussions had been held with as many countries as possible, including Australia, New Zealand, India, West Indies, South Africa, and the United Kingdom.

The fourth meeting of the Joint Canada-United States Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs did not occur until January 1959. For documents relating to the visit of President Eisenhower and Secretary of States Dulles to Ottawa in July 1958, see Volume 25, Chapter I.

Australia

We had registered with the Australians our desire for the abolition of trade discrimination and the removal of restrictions, our wish to reach agreements with Australia, arising out of their agreement with the U.K., which had the effect of reducing preferences affecting Canadian trade and we drew to the Australians' attention the bad effects on Canada of their procedure of waiving preferences for commodities, in short supply, which they wished to import. Before leaving London the Australians had registered the points they wished to discuss with Canada. These included some preferential rates bound to Australia, quantitative restrictions on dairy products, alleged competition in the U.K. in U.S. fruit, canned in Canada, and exported to the U.K., Canadian restrictions on wine and the question of consultation on surplus disposals. The Australians had been asked if they could come to Canada in advance of the Conference to discuss these matters, in the hope of reaching agreements. At first, the Australian delegation had been disposed to do this, but after having had discussions with their home government had said this would not be possible, and had suggested that if Canada wanted to pursue negotiations Canadian officials might go to Australia. Mr. Isbister thought this impracticable and suggested that something might be achieved by written exchanges. The important things from the Australian point of view were obviously Canadian restrictions on dairy products and the disposal of agricultural surpluses. Results in other fields would hinge on progress in these two subjects of major interest to Australia.

New Zealand

The discussions with New Zealand were a small edition of the discussions with Australia. New Zealand was in extreme financial difficulties so it would be unreasonable for Canada to expect concessions of any account. The main New Zealand complaint was over Canadian import restrictions on the principal products they had to sell. Unless we were able to give some satisfaction on this matter, a New Zealand assault could be expected in September.

16. Mr. Isbister said that both Australia and New Zealand indicated great interest in the abandonment of restrictions against dollar goods, and were almost begging the U.K. for a lead. Australia had said that the dollar restrictions were actually weakening the sterling area. Sir Leslie Rowan had indicated a slightly different view than that brought forward by the U.K. previously on this subject. Instead of emphasizing common action, he had indicated that it was up to Commonwealth countries concerned to make their own decisions, but, went on to say that such countries would have to bear in mind the effects of their decisions on sterling reserves. Mr. Isbister felt that the Australians would, from this, report to their Ministers that Australia was free to consider its problems by itself.

South Africa

17. Mr. Isbister said there were not many common problems between South Africa and Canada. The South Africans were interested in sales of wine to Canada but this was largely in the provincial area of responsibility. Mr. Isbister said he had been struck by the remarks of South Africans that Canadian business men were not taking advantage of the opportunities in South Africa to increase sales.

Conference Arrangements

18. The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Bryce) raised the question of what hospitality the Governor General might provide to Commonwealth visitors to Montreal. It was agreed that Mr. Bryce and Mr. Pierce would discuss this matter further.

19. The Committee agreed that officials consider immediately, and make recommendations on,

(a) proposals to be put to the United Kingdom for the removal of discriminatory import restrictions and with respect to convertibility; and,

(b) Commonwealth institutions for any possible field of activity.

on Commonwealth Conference*

[Ottawa], August 8, 1958

Present

The Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fleming), (Chairman)
The Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Churchill),
The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith).

Also Present

Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, (Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance),
Mr. D. LePan, (Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs),
Mr. C.M. Isbister, (Assistant Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce),
Mr. L. Rasminsky, (Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada),
Mr. J.R. Downs, Mr. R.E. Latimer, (Department of Trade and Commerce),
Mr. R. Grey, Mr. K. Goldschlag, (Department of External Affairs)
Mr. M. Sakellaropoulo (Bank of Canada)
Mr. S.D. Pierce (Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference)
Mr. F.A. Farquharson (Canadian Embassy, Washington).
Mr. J. Fournier, Mr. D. Morley (Acting Secretary), (Privy Council Office).

1. The Minister of Finance invited Mr. Plumptre to report on the meetings which officials had attended in London.³⁶

2. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance said that the Canadian delegation had had five meetings with U.K. officials and one with U.K. Ministers. The last meeting had been most helpful in getting U.K. ministerial views on certain points. Although the results of the visit could not be considered very encouraging from a substantive or presentational point of view, it had been extremely useful to compare Canadian and U.K. thinking where our views diverged. We now knew the U.K. position and could govern ourselves accordingly. The matters discussed at London could be considered under nine headings.

I. REPORT ON CANADIAN CONTACTS WITH THE U.S.A.

Officials had reported on the visit of Mr. Eisenhower and on meetings with Mr. Dulles. Mr. Rasminsky had told U.K. officials of his talks in Washington with Mr. Anderson, Secretary of the Treasury, and had said that a U.S. statement concerning the Bank and Fund would probably be forthcoming in August. U.K. officials had been glad to hear of these latest developments on a matter on which they had previously had discussions with the Americans.

Canadian officials went to London for a third time to discuss conference preparations with their British counterparts beginning on July 31, 1958.

II. AID PROGRAMMES AND THEIR HARMONIZATION

Officials had reported the Canadian position as discussed with Ministers on the following lines:

- (a) A proposed technical assistance programme for those underdeveloped countries of the Commonwealth which (except for Ghana) are not now in receipt of such assistance;
- (b) A proposed $10 million aid programme to the West Indies;
- (c) A proposed enlargement in Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan or, alternatively the setting up of a Commonwealth Fund to which Canada would contribute.

Before officials had left London they had received the reaction of U.K. Ministers to the Commonwealth Fund proposals. Ministers had said they appreciated the Canadian proposal but that they were not in a position to make a 3-year commitment. Considering the present and possible future demands on U.K. resources, they had to maintain what they termed "infinite flexibility." They could not afford to make grants and felt that once the Fund was exhausted there would be additional demands on donor countries. The "soft loan" principle had also been questioned by Ministers on the grounds that they did not want to commit themselves to a scheme similar to the Monroney Plan.³⁷

U.K. officials had then reported on their own proposals for aid to the Commonwealth:

- (a) Scholarship Programme. This programme would be available to all Commonwealth countries at both graduate and undergraduate levels. It would not be limited to the technical field and there would be a return flow of teachers and instructors to Commonwealth countries. At present students from Commonwealth countries represented between 7 and 8% of those attending U.K. universities. It was intended to maintain this high proportion of Commonwealth student enrolment.

Canadian officials had said they had not been thinking strictly in these terms but that for presentational purposes, it might be possible to relate the schemes that we both had in mind.

- (b) Enlargement of Commonwealth Development Finance Company. U.K. officials had confirmed Mr. Rasminsky's report that this semi-private organization was seeking a line of credit from the World Bank. They would also be seeking the participation of other Commonwealth countries. It was noted that some Commonwealth countries, such as India, had similar organizations.

Canadian officials had passed on ministerial comments on this proposal. They had said that Canadian Ministers did not favour contribution to the resource of the Commonwealth Development Finance Company. If there was a strong positive response to the message the U.K. was sending to other Commonwealth countries proposing the enlargement of the C.D.F.C. resources, officials had said that Canadian Ministers might be prepared to review their position.

(c) Long-Term Development Loans. These loans would be tied to U.K. exports and would be made under Section I of the Exports Credit Guarantee Act; they would be available only to Commonwealth countries. This was to be the main additional source of U.K. aid to the Commonwealth. It was emphasized that the loans were to be selective and purposeful and were intended to give help primarily to emergent Commonwealth countries. U.K. officials had expressed the hope that Canada and Australia might follow something like the U.K. plan on a regional basis. In this context they had noted with pleasure Canada's intention of assisting the West Indies though this would be in the form of a grant rather than a loan. Canadian officials had explained that a study was being made on proposals for expanding export credit facilities. Officials had pointed out, however, that the real pressure for a move in this direction arose in connection with Canadian exports to Latin America and not the Commonwealth. There appeared to be, therefore, as a Commonwealth initiative, little point in adopting the U.K. idea.

(d) Commonwealth Advisory Development Board. This Board would serve to maintain contact between Commonwealth countries in their development programmes. A parallel with the O.E.E.C. had been cited but was not really relevant. Canadian officials had given no encouragement to this proposal. They had, however, expressed the hope that at the Conference we could harmonize our announcements respecting additional assistance to Commonwealth countries.

III. INDIAN SITUATION

The U.K. was much preoccupied with the Indian financial crisis which had been caused by the over purchase of capital goods and military supplies. It was planned to extend the short-term credit granted to India under Sections 2 and 3 of the Exports Credit Guarantee Act, to a long-term basis by using Section I of the Act. It appears to be their intention to apply the Act retroactively to goods already exported. It was thus in essence a refinancing operation. The U.K. had wondered how easy they should make things for India. India had been warned that they were overextending themselves in the formulation of their 5-year plan. However, they had gone ahead and were now waiting to be bailed out. If substantial aid was extended to India other countries might assume that imprudence paid off. It was likely that the U.K. would have to give financial assistance to a greater extent than Indian commitments to the U.K., which had been quoted around $300 million or 40% of total Indian commitments.

There had been a discussion about the rescue operation for India to which consideration was to be given under the auspices of the World Bank. Canadian officials had avoided giving any commitment as to the Canadian position. There was clearly some doubt if this would be a genuine rescue operation for India or if it was largely a matter of concern to the creditor countries. Canada's policy, particularly under the Colombo Plan, had been one to avoid becoming a creditor of India. Mr. Isbister had remarked that the assistance to India envisaged by the U.K. as a main instrument of their aid, was not encouraging from the broader point of view of a new Commonwealth initiative in the aid field.

IV. COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIONS

The U.K. had proposed to consolidate the main existing Commonwealth bodies under the title of the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council and to provide a building or headquarters for this body when it met in London. The following existing bodies and forums of Commonwealth Consultation would be integrated in the proposed body:

- Commonwealth Ministers of Finance Meeting
- Spring Meetings of Senior Commonwealth Officials
- Meetings of Commonwealth Statisticians
- Commonwealth Liaison Committee
- Commonwealth Economic Committee.

Canadian officials said that they had no instructions concerning this proposal but undertook to explore the idea with Ministers.

V. REVIEW OF WORLD ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Officials had covered the following areas in their discussions:

(a) The Middle East Situation. U.K. officials had been surprisingly sanguine concerning these developments and did not appear alarmed at possible adverse economic effects.

(b) European Developments. European countries had shown some misgivings at possible delayed reactions from the U.S. recession and from the unfavourable position of primary producers. The U.K. was encouraging European countries to be expansive in their economic policies.

(c) The U.S. Recession. The U.K. was now more optimistic on the prospects of recovery.

(d) F.T.A. Officials had said that negotiations were now moving forward and that the French were willing to discuss the situation but were continuing to show an inward-looking approach. Mr. Maulding had told Mr. LePan that General de Gaulle was not interested in the problems of the F.T.A. but had told officials to go ahead with the discussions and to avoid open controversy with the British.

VI. CONVERTIBILITY AND NON-DISCRIMINATION

Canadian officials had not gone over to push this matter and had only raised it briefly. They had emphasized that this problem was to the fore in Canadian Ministers' minds and that Ministers had appreciated the U.K. action on fruit and chemicals.³⁸ The Chancellor of the Exchequer remarked that this subject would have to wait and the U.K. could move forward only as fast as they judged progress to be possible. The impression gained by Canadian officials was that we could not expect further progress in this field by September.

VII.

(a) Commonwealth Cable Network. The Telecommunication Conference held in London during June had agreed in principle to a Commonwealth network. The U.K. had not considered the matter since then but agreed to formulate some ideas before September.

(b) World Food Bank. The U.K. had thought that a Food Bank in a Commonwealth context raised a number of problems. There was little enthusiasm in other Commonwealth countries and the U.K. wondered whether it would be appropriate to pursue this matter at the Conference. Officials had the impression that Mr. Diefenbaker was more concerned with NATO concept of a food bank.

(c) Uranium. U.K. officials felt that any discussions on uranium would tend to be divisive because of conflicting views and sensitivities. It therefore might be considered more appropriately at the Commonwealth Conference of Nuclear Scientists to be held in London from September 15th to 20th.

VIII. ORGANIZATIONAL MATTERS

U.K. officials thought that the Conference should be run as a single forum. Sub-groups could be split off as required to study particular problems, such as gold and the F.T.A. There had been several reasons why the Conference of 1952 had been split into two committees. U.K. officials also suggested that it would cause fewer rather than more problems if chairmanships were retained in Canadian hands. Canadian officials were also advised that U.K. Ministers would not be accompanied by their wives at Montreal.

IX. THEME

The theme "an expanding Commonwealth in an expanding world" seemed to be acceptable as far as U.K. officials were concerned.

3. Mr. Plumptre felt that there were five questions requiring further attention.

(i) Harmonization of Aid Programmes. Ministers might invite officials to see how far harmonization could be carried and possibly submit a report for ministerial consideration. Should the idea of the Commonwealth Fund be considered as dead?

(ii) India. Should Canada be represented at the Bank meeting in Washington at the end of August?

(iii) Australia. Ministers might like to consult Australia and outline Canadian and U.K. views on aid.

(iv) Conference Organization. If it was decided that the Conference structure should be monolithic, it might be advisable to send a message to other Commonwealth countries to let them know of the proposed change in organization.

(v) Commonwealth Trade. While no single Conference decision was likely to stand out and be remembered as a Conference achievement, when the whole aid programme was considered as one package, it would not be a negligible contribution to Commonwealth development. There was, however, little prospect of achievement on the trade side of the Conference. It was desirable from the Canadian point of view that the U.K. should be forthcoming on this question, but in view of the recent announcement on fruit and chemicals it was doubtful if further progress could be expected in September.

4. In reply to a question by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Plumptre said that as far as he knew nobody had known that Canadian officials had been in London. It had not been considered necessary to inform other Commonwealth countries of the meetings. U.K. officials had, however, undertaken to inform Australia after Canadian officials had left London.

5. In reply to a question by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Isbister said that there had been no mention of the proposal of a group of U.K. Members of Parliament that U.K. imports from non-Commonwealth countries should be diverted to the Commonwealth.

6. Mr. Fleming thanked Mr. Plumptre for his comprehensive summary of the London discussions. While the U.K. attitude to the idea of a Commonwealth Fund was disappointing the discussions had yielded a clearer understanding of where we and the U.K. stood.

7. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce thought that one reason why the U.K. had announced trade concessions on fruit and chemicals before the Conference was because they were reluctant to have the U.S. benefit from what was ostensibly a Conference initiative. The announcement on fruit could not in any case have been delayed until September if it was to apply to the current year's crop. He felt that there would be little purpose in seeking merely a reaffirmation in principle concerning non-discrimination and convertibility at the Conference because this had been done many times before and the U.K. were clearly not prepared to commit themselves to a timetable. The position on trade vis-à-vis the U.K. was thus not encouraging, though the Acting Trade Commissioner in London had thought it possible that the U.K. might enlarge their token imports schemes if they were pressed hard enough. Such a move would have presentational value. However, the subject had not been discussed during the London meetings.

8. Mr. Fleming thought it might be worthwhile to pursue this point.

9. Mr. Isbister said that because of their position on aid, the U.K. were not asking us to do anything that would involve large capital outlays. If they had, we might have been better able to press for non-discrimination. It looked as if we would have to settle for something relatively small as far as trade was concerned.

10. The Secretary-General of the Conference felt that the importance of the U.S. role should not be minimized in any assessment of the probable results of the Conference. The U.S. attitude was all-important. The U.K. initiative in removing restrictions on chemicals might have been intended to assist a U.S. initiative in proposing increases in the resources of the Fund and Bank. Mr. Pierce thought it would be difficult to take exception to this move at this time.

The U.K. had accepted as reasonable our explanation concerning India. However, the Indian problem was serious and careful consideration would clearly have to be given to our position in this matter.

11. Mr. Pierce said he had been surprised at the U.K. suggestion of having only one main committee. The idea had appeal as far as the secretariat was concerned. It would also make press relations more manageable. The U.K. had produced several arguments in favour of a monolithic structure. First, Ministers would not be disposed to spend too much time discussing subjects that had been covered by officials and there might not therefore be enough work for two committees for a fortnight. Second, the Conference might lose cohesion if there were two committees. Discussions on trade and on development and finance were interrelated and there was a risk of duplication in a two-committee structure. Mr. Pierce said that he favoured the idea of one main committee with working groups to be set up as required.

12. The Assistant Secretary of State for External Affairs said he was concerned with the presentational aspects of the Conference. The final communiqué should include all items and should be made to look like an impressive package. There would be a serious public relations problem to see that this was done.

13. Mr. Plumpton, commenting on the presentational and publicity aspects of the Conference, felt that it might be wise to think less in terms of an impressive final communiqué and more in terms of day-to-day announcements that might in fact be presentationally more effective. If day-to-day press releases were made, the problem of the final communiqué was likely to be more manageable.

14. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada wondered whether the final package would be concrete enough to be impressive. It would be impossible to put a figure to U.K. credits. Any subscription to the Commonwealth Development Finance Company would not be impressive and there would be difficulty in bringing together a series of disparate proposals. The problem was how to make the combination of proposals appear as good as they actually were. In relation to what had been done in the past these proposals were not unimpressive.

He felt that one aspect of the recent meetings was to change the posture of the Canadian Government in relation to the Conference. Until the proposal for the Commonwealth Fund had been put forward, the onus for taking some sort of major initiative had been assumed to be upon us. This proposal had been bigger than the idea of a Commonwealth Bank and better as far as the recipient countries were concerned. We were now no longer in a defensive position.

15. Mr. Rasminsky agreed with Mr. Pierce that we should not be worried about the timing of U.K. concessions. It would, however, cause a presentational problem. It would seem to be perfectly legitimate to say that these concessions reflected the process of preparation for the Conference, and [words missing] in the final communiqué to the removal of these restrictions.

16. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he was not too encouraged by the officials' report. If the U.K. could not go along with the idea of a Commonwealth Fund, discussions would be limited to smaller items. There appeared to be little to discuss as far as trade was concerned.

17. Mr. Fleming agreed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On the other hand, the meetings had been well justified since there was a risk in our going forward without consulting U.K. views. While at Mont Tremblant a series of disparate proposals had amounted to something, he was not sure whether this would be the case at the Montreal Conference. There seemed to be need for concrete and more impressive proposals than were at present before the Committee.

18. Mr. Farquharson agreed with Mr. Plumtre that daily press release were preferable to the issue of one final communiqué. He thought it might be wise to let the public know before the Conference started that trade questions were going to figure less prominently than it might be assumed on the basis of the title of the Conference. This would avoid disappointment if proposals affecting trade were not forthcoming.

19. The Committee agreed that it was too late to suppress the term "Trade" from the Conference title.

20. Mr. Fleming, in reverting to the Committee structure, said that the suggestion of unifying proceedings into one main committee seemed sensible; sub-groups could be set up on an ad hoc basis. This would simplify the problem of manning the Conference, especially as it now appeared unlikely that the Secretary of State for External Affairs could be present.

21. Mr. Pierce said that there would most probably be plenary sessions every day. Ad hoc meetings could be arranged, say in the afternoons, and evenings had been left generally free if this proved necessary. It was difficult at this stage to decide how much time would be required for each agenda item.

22. Mr. Fleming wondered whether the Conference would occupy two weeks if there was so little to discuss in the trade field. He thought that in our preparation we should develop ideas on the problem of continuing consultations. In referring to the U.K. suggestion that Commonwealth countries accept special responsibilities for aid to the regions closest to them, Mr. Fleming thought two points needed clarifying. First, would Canada have responsibilities elsewhere than in the West Indies? Second, if the U.K. was disposed to make itself responsible for the emerging African countries, was this being arranged with a view to preserving close trading relations with these nations?

23. The Committee felt that the idea of regional responsibilities was proposed in the U.K. mainly to get the Australians to take an interest in Malaya and elsewhere in that area. The U.K. had in no way suggested that Canadian assistance should be confined to a specific area. The example of the West Indies was primarily illustrative since it was understood in the U.K. that the West Indies had particularly close ties with Canada. It was agreed that the U.K. had no ulterior motive in proposing that she should undertake to give more aid to the emergent African countries.

24. Mr. Fleming thought that in terms of a Commonwealth approach to the total Commonwealth requirements for assistance, regional responsibilities were poor substitutes for the larger idea of a Commonwealth Fund. He felt that enlarging facilities of the Commonwealth Development Finance Company would not commend itself to Ministers. He wondered if there was any point in pressing the U.K. to reconsider the idea of a Commonwealth Fund.

25. Mr. Plumptre said the U.K. had decisively rejected the idea of a Commonwealth Fund. When officials were leaving London, the U.K. were on the point of sending three telegrams to Commonwealth countries. The first two, proposing the scholarship fund and the increase in the resources of the Commonwealth Development Finance Company, would be sent to all Commonwealth countries. The third telegram would be sent only to Canada and Australia, asking if we could do anything in the aid field comparable to the U.K. export credit scheme. Mr. Plumptre agreed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the U.K. proposals were based on the assumption that there would be an increase in the resources of the Fund and Bank.

26. Mr. Rasminsky felt that three elements had tempered the U.K. decision on the Commonwealth Fund:

(a) The U.K. was concerned about the balance of payments implications. Drawings on sterling balances were already taxing the U.K. external assets; there was an expectation of additional capital contributions to the Fund and Bank, and possible capital subscriptions to a European Monetary Fund. All this had to be set against a background of limited external assets. In the U.K. view, therefore, it seemed desirable that they should not over-extend themselves. The main reason why a Commonwealth Bank had been favoured over the proposed Fund was that under the former scheme the capital contribution would be regarded as an asset and loans would be repayable in currencies originally advanced; contributions to the Fund would be virtually a gift.

(b) There was also a budgetary problem. The bulk of Commonwealth development was financed by private companies. The Commonwealth Development Finance Company and a $60 million annual contribution to Colonial Welfare and Development Funds were about the only budgetary items of U.K. aid.

(c) The U.K. did not favour the idea of giving soft loans on easy terms. They felt that the governments of underdeveloped countries should adjust their internal policies so as to attract more private investment. The easier the donor countries' credit terms, the less the incentive for recipient countries to adjust their policies.

27. Mr. Rasminsky said that the Indian situation was causing considerable worry amongst U.K. Ministers. Sir David Eccles had said that the most important question facing the Commonwealth today was whether India could be saved from bankruptcy.

28. The Minister of External Affairs noted the serious political implications of India's situation. If India was to become bankrupt it was possible that the whole country might in time go communist. This would have a multiplier effect on other smaller south-east Asian countries who were watching India's efforts to develop her economy largely by her own efforts.

29. Mr. Fleming said that he had been talking to Dr. Rauf, the High Commissioner for India, who had raised the question of Canada's attendance at the meeting that would be held later this month under the auspices of the International Bank. Mr. Fleming had said that Canada was very sympathetic to the Indian problem but that since Canada was not a creditor of India, it seemed inappropriate for us to take part in these particular discussions. Mr. Fleming said that he had not closed the door on further consultations about India's financial crisis but had added that the subject might be more appropriately raised at the Montreal Conference or during the Bank and Fund meetings in New Delhi early in October.

30. Mr. Smith said that he had received a letter from Mr. Escott Reid, the former High Commissioner to India, who reported a conversation he had had in Bonn with Mr. B.K. Nehru. Nehru had told him that India wanted us to sit in at the meetings not because they were necessarily looking for a contribution from Canada, but because they were counting on us to be helpful in arriving at assessment of the Indian situation.

31. Mr. Rasminsky felt that it would be unwise to attend the meeting unless we were prepared to make a financial contribution; more was likely to be expected of us than helpful advice.

32. Mr. Fleming asked if at the London meeting there had been any discussion of the Communist bloc trade offensive.

33. Mr. Isbister said that there seemed to be a difference of opinion between officials and Ministers on this question. Lord Home had made a public statement which suggested that the Commonwealth Conference would be a meeting of "worried people" to examine the difficult world trade and economic problems. However, apart from the Indian financial crisis, U.K. officials had appeared to be comparatively sanguine about world economic conditions.

34. Mr. Churchill wondered whether India was likely to contribute much to the Conference in the light of her present difficulties. Would it be possible to give some assistance to India before the Conference?

35. Mr. Isbister said that the major Commonwealth countries should be warned against focussing all their attention on India. Otherwise some of the smaller countries might assume that they would get little benefit from the Conference.

36. Mr. Pierce said that Mr. Drew was in favour of asking the British to reconsider the Commonwealth Fund proposal. He had definitely liked the idea.

37. In reply to a question by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Plumptre said that all the main points discussed at the Cabinet Committee meeting of July 28th outlining the proposed structure of the Commonwealth Fund, had been reported to U.K. officials.

38. Mr. Fleming was discouraged by the lack of sympathy on the part of the U.K. for the idea of a Commonwealth Fund and also because of the contraction of trade possibilities that could be discussed at the Conference. There was little time between now and the Conference, and he wondered whether papers could be prepared for Ministers that would survey the current position of the various proposals that had emerged.

39. Mr. Plumptre said that the final report of the June meetings was intended to serve as a guide to the Conference discussions. A paper outlining the position of the Canadian delegation would, of course, have to be prepared for the Cabinet. However, in view of the exhaustive discussions at the meetings of the present Committee, he wondered to what extent a comprehensive paper would be required. In his experience there had never been closer liaison between Ministers and officials in preparation for a Conference.

40. Mr. Fleming was gratified to hear that this form of meeting between Ministers and officials had been useful. However, he felt that he should have a brief, outlining the position on the various proposals. He had found this type of brief most useful and worthwhile in his preparation for the Mont Tremblant Conference.

41. Mr. Fleming, in referring to the day-to-day conduct of the proceedings, wondered whether we could now start thinking in more precise terms, such as what subject should be considered first, and in what order? He suggested that the Conference might start on an item on which agreement could readily be reached so that the press could have something positive to write about.

42. Mr. Pierce agreed that it would be helpful to have some idea of the order of proceedings but, from U.K. experience, an inflexible agenda had proved to be unsatisfactory. He would, however, try his hand at a tentative timetable for the Conference discussions.

43. Mr. Plumptre said that it might be possible to prepare an order of business from the brief to be submitted to Ministers.

44. Mr. Isbister, in reverting to the question of the Commonwealth Fund, wondered whether Ministers would wish to try to influence U.K. Ministers to change their position. A month ago, Mr. Macmillan had said he was anxious that the Commonwealth should give leadership. This leadership had been expressed in the idea of a Commonwealth Bank. One element that was lacking at the London talks was that Canadian officials had learned nothing of Mr. Macmillan's views. He felt that there was still room to make a vigorous approach to Mr. Macmillan on the grounds that we were disappointed by their limited approach to trade problems, notably non-discrimination and convertibility, and their negative attitude to our idea for a Commonwealth Fund. As Mr. Rasminsky had suggested earlier, the shoe was now on the other foot.

45. Mr. Fleming thought that this would be an unfavourable time to approach Mr. Macmillan because of the Middle East situation, the possibility of a summit conference and the forthcoming August vacations. Mr. Fleming referred to the telegram describing a conversation Mr. Wilgress had had with Sir David Eccles and wondered whether we should encourage Sir David to come to Canada. He might be in a position to give us Mr. Macmillan's views on the Commonwealth Fund.

46. Mr. Plumptre said he was not impressed by the idea of a declaration of principles as proposed by Sir David. If we did invite Sir David over, it might give the impression that we supported the ideas he had put forward.

47. Mr. LePan felt that there would not be enough to talk about if Sir David came over. If we felt that there was any prospect of the U.K. being induced to take more concrete action in the trade field, it might be better if the Prime Minister called on Mr. Macmillan as part of his proposed trip to Europe.

48. Mr. Fleming said that he would talk to the Prime Minister about this proposal and in the meantime, officials might review the position in anticipation of a meeting next week.

NEW ZEALAND REPRESENTATION ON TRADE

49. Mr. Fleming said that at the last Cabinet Committee meeting, it had been agreed that the Ministers concerned would have a word about the paper reviewing our trade position with respect to New Zealand which had been prepared by officials. He had had a preliminary discussion with the Minister of Agriculture who had not been optimistic about the prospects of relaxing import restrictions against dairy products at this time.

50. Mr. Fleming, in summing up, said that he was grateful to the officials who had gone to London. The trip had been both valuable and constructive. In particular, credit was due to Mr. Pierce for suggesting the idea.

51. The Committee agreed to meet in the Privy Council Chamber on Wednesday, August 13th, 1958, at 8:15 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH CABLE NETWORK

7. The Minister of Finance recalled that, at the Mont Tremblant meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers a year ago, he had referred to the question of communication links between countries of the Commonwealth and of including on the agenda of the proposed Montreal conference the question of extending the telephone cable between Canada and the United Kingdom into a Commonwealth-wide network. This subject had not figured prominently in the preparations for the forthcoming meeting but, in the meantime, a Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference had been held and a report on the matter was now before governments for consideration. This report concluded that the construction of a round-the-world telephone cable network was technically feasible and likely to be self-supporting. The Cabinet Committee on the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference felt that, if agreement could be reached to construct such a system, it would be an important achievement of the conference.

The Minister outlined the conclusions of the Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference including, particularly, the cost and revenue aspects of the various sections of the proposed new network. He described the attitudes to be expected from Commonwealth countries at the Montreal meeting. The most that might emerge would be agreement, in principle, to construct the network, leaving details to be settled by the governments concerned at a later date. The main hurdle at Montreal would be to convince the U.K. to agree to the proposal and, in this connection, a Canadian offer of assistance, in the form of loans or grants to the less developed countries of the Commonwealth to finance their share of the capital cost, would make it more attractive to the U.K.

He recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of Transport, that the Canadian delegation of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference be authorized to seek approval for a round-the-world Commonwealth cable network, and, if necessary, to offer to assist the less developed countries to finance their share of the cable.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Aug. 24, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 248-58†).

8. During the discussion it was said it was doubtful that Canadian contractors could have a very large share in the construction of the project, as the type of cable required for such a project was not made in Canada.

9. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Canadian delegation to the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference be authorized to take the initiative in seeking approval in principle for the construction of the round-the-world Commonwealth cable network; and,

(b) that the delegation, if necessary, could offer the assistance of Canada to less developed countries either by way of loans or grants to cover their share of the cable, but that such an offer would be subject to the considerations set out in the circulated memorandum (Cab. Doc. 248-58).

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

This memorandum reviews the arrangements and agenda for the coming Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. It invites Cabinet approval for the composition of the Canadian Delegation and the position it should take on the various agenda items. Since some subjects to be considered at the Commonwealth Conference will also be considered immediately afterwards at the Annual Meeting of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, Cabinet approval is also invited for the position to be taken by Canada at those meetings.

Administrative Arrangements

2. The Commonwealth Conference is to be held in The Queen Elizabeth Hotel, Montreal, from Monday, September 15 to Friday, September 26. Following the normal Commonwealth custom, it is to be anticipated that the leader of the host delegation (Canadian) will be elected chairman. The agenda, which is reviewed in detail below, is a heavy one. Social arrangements, which are being kept to a minimum, are as follows: the Government is to give a reception the first evening; the Prime Minister is to attend and address a formal dinner the following Thursday; a visit to the St. Lawrence Seaway is being arranged on Saturday; the City of Montreal will provide a reception the following Tuesday. All administrative arrangements are in the hands of Mr. S.D. Pierce, our Deputy High Commissioner at Canada House, London, who has been chosen as Secretary-General of the Conference.

3. The opening and closing ceremonies will be open to the press, radio and television; otherwise meetings of the Conference will be in private. Special arrangements for publicity and public information are in the hands of Mr. R.A. Farquharson, who is temporarily released for this purpose from his duties at our Embassy in Washington.

Attendance

4. Delegations, led by senior Ministers, are coming from all Commonwealth countries. The Delegation from the United Kingdom will be led by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and will include the President of the Board of Trade, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and the Paymaster General (who is to report on his negotiations for the European Free Trade Area).

5. The Colonies will be represented in the United Kingdom Delegation by the Minister of State for Colonial Affairs. Ministers will also come from a number of Colonial territories, including the West Indies.

6. Total attendance, including Delegations and also the Conference Staff and Secretariat (who will all be Canadians), will be about 300. Detailed arrangements regarding costs have been approved by Treasury Board.

Canadian Delegation

7. It is proposed that the Ministers on the Canadian Delegation should be the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Honourable J.M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio). A list of the proposed Delegation is attached.

The Agenda

8. A list of subjects to be considered at the Conference was agreed by Commonwealth Ministers at Mont Tremblant last October. At subsequent meetings of Commonwealth officials this list, with some minor changes, has been agreed upon as the proposed agenda for the Conference. These agenda items are set out individually below. In relation to each there are some comments on its substance and, where appropriate, proposals regarding the positions to be taken by Canada.

9. Opening Statements; The Significance for Commonwealth Countries of Changes Taking Place in World Trade; Sterling Area Prospects. In their opening statements Delegations may be expected to cover three areas. First, they will no doubt set forth the particular interests of their Governments in the Conference; in this connection the Canadian delegation should emphasize the desire of the Canadian Government to expand trade. Second, each Delegation may be expected to describe the economic position and prospects of their country pointing out the main economic developments in the rest of the world that are of special significance for their trade and development. Third, the position and prospects of the Sterling Area as a whole will be reviewed.

10. In Commonwealth gatherings, other Commonwealth countries are accustomed to look to Canada for information and observations on economic developments in the United States. On this occasion it will be satisfactory to be able to report that the U.S. recession seems to have halted, that recovery seems to be gathering momentum, and that the rest of the world is continuing to add substantially to reserves of gold and U.S. dollars.

11. An encouraging statement of this sort regarding U.S. prospects is, of course, of more than academic interest. The prosperity and overseas earnings of all Commonwealth countries depend heavily upon the prosperity and purchasing power of the United States. The more confident they feel that their earnings of U.S. dollars will be rising rather than falling, the more possible it is for them to move forward with their own development plans and to consider relaxations in their restrictions against imports.

12. Progress towards the Common Objective of Freer Trade and Payments. To judge from previous experience, discussion under this item will relate to world-wide issues; a later item relates specifically to intra-Commonwealth trade.

13. It is under this item that two inter-related matters of great interest to Canada should be considered: the convertibility of sterling and the elimination by other Commonwealth countries of the remaining special restrictions against "dollar" goods — restrictions which have, continuously since the war, kept Canadian exporters from competing on a basis of equality with others in Sterling Area markets. When sterling is made convertible into dollars, any semblance of justification for discriminating against dollar imports, and in favour of sterling imports, will disappear.

14. The Canadian Delegation should urge upon the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries the desirability of eliminating special "dollar" trade restrictions and making sterling convertible. Fortunately, all Commonwealth countries are fully committed to these policies in principle; indeed several Commonwealth countries (e.g. Australia) are finding it increasingly irksome and costly to cut themselves off from dollar sources of supply when these are cheaper.

15. On the vital matter of timing, it can be pointed out that, in the United States, both economic developments and policy developments give grounds for reasonable confidence in the outlook. The United Kingdom itself is probably in a stronger position, as regards external finance, than it has been at any time since the war; and its strength and its gold reserves are at present growing. There is a danger that the United Kingdom will become increasingly enmeshed in European economic arrangements and engagements. The adoption of convertibility of sterling, which would probably be followed by similar action on the part of other European countries, would deter regionalist developments in Europe.

16. The United Kingdom has emphasized, in preliminary discussions, that the responsibility for actions in regard to sterling must lie with them. In the light of their premature and unsuccessful attempt to attain convertibility in 1947, under the obligation of an international agreement with the U.S.A., they are understandably cautious about attempting more than they feel sure they can achieve and maintain.

17. One amongst the several factors that has been causing concern and hesitation in the United Kingdom, in relation to possible relaxation of restrictions on trade and currency, has been a doubt whether there is not, in some sense, a world shortage of liquid reserves which impedes progress towards freer trade and payments. This has attracted attention to the adequacy of the resources of the International Monetary Fund.

18. Whether or not there exists in fact a world shortage of liquid reserves, it may be readily agreed that the resources of the Fund should be increased. Since its establishment in 1945, world trade has grown greatly and world prices have increased substantially. The day might come when Canada would be glad of an enlarged "quota" under which to borrow; but our main and immediate interest in the proposed enlargement would relate to the ability of other countries to maintain stability in their imports, including imports from Canada, on the basis of temporary accommodation from the Fund. Our present quota is $300 million. Proposals for general enlargement run from 50% to 100%. We would have to put up $37.5 to $75 million in gold and $112.5 to $225 million in interest-free demand notes of the Canadian Government. It seems desirable that the Canadian Delegation to the Commonwealth Conference should support the general move; and that the Canadian Governor at the subsequent meeting of the Fund in New Delhi should do likewise.

19. Much the most important contributor to the Fund is, of course, the United States. The President, on August 26, announced his interest in the Fund's enlargement and instructed the Secretary of the Treasury to propose, at the New Delhi meeting next month, "that prompt consideration be given to the advisability of a general increase in the quotas assigned to member governments."

20. Another approach to enlarging the world's liquid reserves will be proposed by South Africa: i.e. a world-wide increase in the price of gold. While such an increase would be welcomed in various Commonwealth countries, including Canada, there is no likelihood that it could take place in the near future. The United States, which holds a key position, is not willing to contemplate an increase at this time. Indeed public discussion of this subject might delay rather than hasten possible U.S. action. The U.K. is most anxious that any discussion of this matter should be kept strictly secret because it might cause speculation on the value of sterling.

21. The Progress and Direction of Economic Expansion in the Less-Developed Countries of the Commonwealth and the Sources of Capital and Technical Assistance that may Aid in their Further Development. This item is of great interest to the "underdeveloped countries" of the Commonwealth and, of course, to the Colonies. It is interesting to note that, represented in Montreal, there will be six members of the Commonwealth in this category: India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Ghana and Malaya. There are only five other members of the Commonwealth. Thus the majority will have as their main preoccupation the possibility of obtaining more help for their economic development.

22. It is desirable and appropriate that Canada, at the Conference, should show, in a tangible form, its interest in the economic expansion and development of the less developed areas of the Commonwealth. An expansion of Canadian economic aid to the Commonwealth can be supported, not merely by reference to the Conference, but also in relation to the long run political stability and economic stability of both Asia and Africa. It is proposed that the Canadian Delegation should be empowered to announce, at the Conference, that the Government will recommend to Parliament:

(a) An increase in annual Colombo Plan aid from the present $35 million to $50 million for three years beginning in the coming fiscal year;

(b) A special programme of grant aid to the Federation of the West Indies amounting in all to $10 million to be spread over five years beginning in the current fiscal year (an initial item has been included in the Estimates) and to include (i) the cost of the inter-island ship already announced, (ii) a sister-ship as requested by the West Indies, (iii) technical assistance, and (iv) other forms of aid to be agreed with the Federal Government;

(c) Collaboration in a proposed Commonwealth educational exchange programme, described below, the Canadian commitment to be of the order of $1 million a year for five years and to begin in the coming fiscal year;

(d) Extension of our technical assistance programme to include areas of the Commonwealth not covered by the Colombo Plan, the West Indies programme, and the proposed educational exchange programme; these areas are chiefly in Africa and, while the cost is difficult to estimate, it is not likely to exceed half a million dollars a year for the next several years.

23. In regard to the Commonwealth educational exchange programme — 22(c) above — our present suggestions are in harmony with certain proposals from the United Kingdom but go somewhat farther. According to our ideas the programme would cover both students and teachers and, while most of the students would go from the underdeveloped countries to educational institutions in the more developed countries, there would be provision for some movement in the opposite direction (e.g. a Canadian intern might work at the excellent hospital in Jamaica). The emphasis would no doubt be on technical subjects, but other subjects including the humanities would not be ruled out. The choice of candidates would lie with educational authorities; under present technical assistance arrangements this choice lies with governments.

24. One of the chief reasons for proposing and supporting a broad educational exchange of this sort lies in the fact that the strength and cohesion of the Commonwealth are drawn from its common political and educational heritage. Many leaders, in underdeveloped Commonwealth countries, have received education in England. As these countries improve their own educational systems, the common heritage and the cohesion may be lost unless steps are taken to preserve them. If the proposal, or something like it, commends itself to other Commonwealth Governments it will be necessary to convene, after the Montreal Conference, a meeting of Commonwealth educational authorities to work out procedures and administration.

25. Canada should also support, at the Montreal Conference and at New Delhi, proposals for increasing the capital of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The President of the United States has instructed the Secretary of the Treasury to propose at New Delhi that prompt consideration be given to this matter. The Bank has been a major source of development capital for Commonwealth countries who stand to derive substantial benefits from the strengthening of its resources. The proposals would involve an increase of up to 100 per cent in each country's capital subscription. The Canadian subscription might be increased by as much as $325 million, none of which however would have to be put up in cash.

26. During the preparatory work for the Conference consideration was given to setting up some sort of Commonwealth financial institution to foster Commonwealth development — a Commonwealth Bank or Loan Fund. The United Kingdom, which made the first of these proposals, has since decided against them. It is possible, however, that proposals of this sort may be reviewed at Montreal, particularly in the light of recent announcements that regional financial institutions are to be set up for the benefit of the Middle East and Latin America. If it develops, at Montreal, that there is an active Commonwealth interest in some new Commonwealth financial institution, and that the United Kingdom is likely to take part in it, the Canadian Delegation should discuss and consider any proposal on its merits. If the Delegation should consider it desirable to do so it should seek further instructions, on the assumption that Canadian participation in a Commonwealth financial institution would be alternative, not additional, to the proposed increase of the Colombo Plan from $35 million to $50 million (paragraph 22 (a) above).

27. After deciding against a new Commonwealth financial institution, the United Kingdom invited other Commonwealth countries to contribute to the capital of the Commonwealth Development Finance Company — a semi-public body, operating on business principles, established in London after the Commonwealth Conference of 1952. It would seem that a Canadian Government subscription to the capital of CDFC would not be of great interest to the Canadian public, nor to the underdeveloped areas of the Commonwealth. The reply of the Canadian Delegation to this invitation should be negative unless, unexpectedly, there is a generally favourable response amongst the other Delegations in which case a modest capital subscription might be considered (e.g. $1 million).

28. Economic and Trade Problems in Regard to Agriculture and Other Primary Production. All Commonwealth countries, other than the U.K., are heavily dependent on the production and export of primary products, including farm products; some of them are almost completely dependent on such exports. The U.K., on behalf of the Colonies, also has a special interest in these problems.

29. In the preparations for the Conference a number of countries have expressed concern, and some acute concern, regarding the following developments in the field of agriculture:

(a) There appears to be a strong and widespread trend towards agricultural protectionism, inside as well as outside the Commonwealth: tariffs, quotas, price-supports, and other special incentives to expand production in protected markets.

(b) This is accompanied by unfair competition in third markets in the form of subsidized sales of agricultural products. It is noted that while the U.S.A. may be the chief, it is by no means the only country whose domestic support prices stimulate surpluses which have to be "dumped" abroad.

30. In response to views of this sort it would seem that Canada should, in conformity with existing obligations under FAO and GATT, reiterate its readiness to consult fully with Commonwealth Governments affected before making concessional sales of Canadian agricultural surpluses. In this connection it may be noted that the Australians have expressed great appreciation of the care we took to consult them before concluding our recent flour-loan to Ceylon.

31. Canadian policy with respect to dairy products has given rise to serious problems in our trade relations with New Zealand. We have had strong representations from New Zealand in recent months protesting the import ban on butter, cheese and skim milk powder, and also objecting to disposal of our surplus milk powder at subsidized prices in their traditional markets in Europe and elsewhere. It is quite clear from the exchanges with New Zealand on this subject that unless we are prepared to recognize New Zealand's claims, based on a past pattern of exports supplying a small share of the Canadian market for dairy products, there can be no hope of expanding our export outlets in that country. Indeed, New Zealand has let it be known that if Canada persists in these measures New Zealand may be forced to "embark on a policy of excluding Canadian products." Agricultural protectionism in general, with Canadian import restrictions as a prime example, will be among New Zealand's main preoccupations at the Montreal Conference. A negative attitude on our part to permitting the entry of moderate quantities of New Zealand dairy products is certain to affect New Zealand's attitude in Montreal, and may give rise to unfortunate publicity, thereby prejudicing the success of the Conference as a whole.

32. During the preparations for the Conference a number of Commonwealth countries, led by Australia, have drawn attention to the economic instability, and hence the political instability, that results from wide fluctuations in prices of primary products entering into international trade. This has led to extensive discussion of ways and means of moderating such fluctuations. Proposals run all the way from tightly-drawn international agreements, complete with formal obligations involving control over exports and imports together with financial provisions for "buffer-stock" operations, down to informal exchanges of statistics and other information.

33. Experience shows that formal international commodity agreements are exceedingly difficult to work out, because of the widely divergent interests involved, that they are almost equally difficult to implement for the same reason, and that they may be costly in terms both of buffer-stock losses and uneconomic production. The subject is clearly one that must be approached with caution. Accordingly the Canadian Delegation should attempt to inject into the discussion an element of practical realism as well as a spirit of constructive sympathy.

34. It is unlikely that any positive action or programme of action in this field could emerge from the Conference. Commodity agreements should include all major producing and consuming countries, and the Commonwealth does not embrace Europe, U.S.A., or South America. Hence, the most that might be expected to emerge would be some statement, in rather general terms, calling attention to the problems of instability in this field and agreeing, in somewhat guarded terms, that Commonwealth countries should be willing to join in any apparently constructive attempts to mitigate it. There can be no objection to the Canadian Delegation supporting such a statement.

35. Nor can there be any objection to a statement which invites the cooperation of non-Commonwealth countries. If, however, the resolution were so cast as to state or infer criticism of non-Commonwealth countries, e.g., of the United States, it might actually retard the attainment of its own objective. The United States Administration, after years of adamant opposition to any sort of commodity stabilization agreement, is at last (since Mr. Nixon's experiences in South America) relaxing its position to some extent.

36. While on this topic, it may be noted that Canada has a very active interest in the renewal next year of the International Wheat Agreement. The Delegation should take advantage of any opportunity to further this objective.

37. It may also be noted that Canada is a member of all existing international commodity agreements — wheat, tin and sugar. In addition representatives of Canada participate actively in many international study groups and working groups concerned with particular commodities. A newly-organized group concerned with base metals will be meeting in London at the time of the Conference.

38. The wheat agreement provides for sales of assured quantities by exporting countries at minimum prices and for assured purchases by importers at maximum prices. The present agreement expires July, 1959. Australia and the United States are members, as are most major producers and consumers, but the United Kingdom is not. The tin agreement provides for a buffer stock involving purchases when prices reach a minimum and sales at a maximum price. The present agreement is in force until July, 1961. Membership in the agreement includes Australia, United Kingdom, Malaya and Nigeria, but not the United States, Germany nor Japan. Under the sugar agreement exporters agree to limit exports and control production and stocks. Importers undertake to limit purchases from non-participants. The agreement is up for renewal this year.³⁹ Most important producers and consumers are members. The United Kingdom has recently expressed serious concern that the tin agreement, together with the market for tin, is being upset by Russian sales.

39. Measures to Expand Trade Between Commonwealth Countries. Measures to expand Commonwealth trade may be classified under three headings: tariffs; import quotas; and other measures.

³⁹ Voir/See Document 180.

40. (i) Tariffs. Traditionally Commonwealth trade has been encouraged by tariff preferences. Many people, recalling the Imperial Conference of 1932, still expect tariffs to be the focus of the Montreal Conference. But this is a mistake. The type of tariff action undertaken by British countries in Ottawa in 1932 reflected the fact that the world was experiencing an unprecedented depression and the U.S.A., in a mood of extreme isolationism, had just raised its own tariff barriers to unprecedented heights. Today the situation is entirely different, on both counts, and in fact no Commonwealth country has shown any interest in enlarging the British preferential system.

41. We did indeed make an offer, a year ago, before Mont Tremblant:

“The Canadian Government is not now proposing a new system of tariff preferences, or of restrictions against trade with non-Commonwealth countries. On the other hand, if fellow members of the Commonwealth could reciprocate, and if it seemed that Commonwealth trade could be promoted on a mutually advantageous basis, we would be glad to engage in discussions relating to tariff adjustments.”

The only response has been a suggestion from the United Kingdom that Canada might unilaterally restore in favour of the U.K. about a score of tariff preferences that had been reduced during GATT negotiations of the past decade. Accordingly, there seems to be very little likelihood of any tariff negotiations at the Conference.

42. There are, however, three Canadian agreements with Commonwealth countries on tariffs that need to be overhauled. The Agreements with Australia (1931) and New Zealand (1932) are out of date, partly because the balance of these agreements is being disturbed as a result of negotiations between those countries and the United Kingdom leading to substantial reductions in preference margins enjoyed not only by the United Kingdom but also by Canada. On the other side of the ledger is to be counted the Canadian action regarding imports of dairy products. It might be desirable to announce at the Conference that these Agreements were being reviewed and revised.

43. The third Agreement in need of revision is that with the British West Indies dating back to 1927. The new West Indies Federation, comprising most of the territories covered by this Agreement will be developing a customs union with a single tariff over the next few years. For this reason alone it will be necessary in due course to renegotiate our trade arrangements with them. There is also the pressing problem of our trade relations with other Caribbean countries which turns on the Canadian market for raw sugar and a solution to this problem will require close consultation with the West Indies. Apart from these considerations, the emergence of the West Indies Federation would seem to offer a good opportunity to explore with them the prospect for expanding our mutual trade. Our exports to the West Indies now at a level of over $50 million are historically of importance to all regions of Canada, but particularly to the Atlantic provinces.

44. A recent report by Canada's Commissioner to the West Indies Federation indicated that there was a strong desire in the Islands for closer trade ties with Canada which might go as far as a Canada-West Indies Free Trade Area. A trade initiative of this magnitude would have obvious attractions in the context of the Montreal Conference. Accordingly, an interim study was made of how such a Free Trade Area would affect Canada. This study suggested that the economic advantages for Canada in terms of substantially greater export markets would clearly outweigh any disadvantages which might result from increased import competition for certain secondary industries. The main export gains would occur over a broad range of manufactured goods but would also extend to our traditional exports of foodstuffs and raw materials. Increased import competition could be expected in the long run as the West Indies became industrialized but this would probably be confined to a few labour-intensive, low-capital industries producing certain consumer goods; it would not likely have a serious impact on the Canadian sugar industry. Apart from the trade aspects it seemed clear, however, that a free trade area with the West Indies would bring with it increased pressures for easier immigration, larger economic aid, and eventually for closer political ties. These broad social and political questions would of course have to be taken into account in any final judgment and a much closer study would seem to be required before any commitments could be made with respect to a free trade area with the Federation.

45. In the light of the foregoing considerations it is proposed that the Canadian Delegation should be authorized to explore informally with the United Kingdom and West Indies representatives the prospects for closer trade ties between Canada and the Federation including the possibility of free trade. Should their response be favourable it is proposed that an announcement should be made at the Conference that Canada and the West Indies Federation had agreed to examine jointly trade relations between them with a view to strengthening their trade ties; and that this review would cover all possible aspects of the matter including the implications of free trade.

46. (ii) Import Quotas. All Commonwealth countries other than Canada have a general system of import licenses in effect. These systems are, at least in principle, designed to conserve their reserves of gold and foreign exchange and, some years ago, all of them contained a large element of discrimination against "dollar" goods and in favour of "sterling" and European goods. Whatever the situation may have been then, today there is little or no justification for such discrimination. It is reasonable to expect that "dollar" goods should be treated on no worse basis than imports from elsewhere.

47. A careful review, in the last few weeks, of our exports to Commonwealth countries and bilateral discussions with a number of them, has revealed that Canada is not suffering from actual discrimination in the licensing systems of the following: South Africa, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon. Moreover some of these countries (e.g., Ceylon) have virtually no effective restrictions left; while the others (e.g., India) have a very real need of the system to protect their reserves. Accordingly, discussions with these countries regarding their quota systems are unlikely to lead to any adjustments that will benefit Canadian exports.

48. Quota discrimination against dollar goods continues to be practiced by the United Kingdom, the Colonies (including the West Indies), Australia, New Zealand and Malaya. All these countries, along with the rest mentioned in the preceding paragraph, accept in principle the undesirability of discrimination, but for one reason or another continue to practice it. The Canadian Delegation, following up on preparatory work already done, should press for at least relaxation, and if possible complete elimination, of the discriminatory elements in the quota systems of those countries.

49. It should, perhaps, be added that, in the last few weeks, the United Kingdom and Australia have both taken significant steps to relax their restrictions affecting Canadian imports; how much further they can be persuaded to go in the near future remains to be seen. New Zealand is experiencing a period of severe fiscal and commercial difficulties so that little or nothing is to be expected for the time being from that quarter.

50. (iii) Other Measures. Other means of encouraging intra-Commonwealth trade that have been reviewed during the preparatory work relate to the activities of trade missions (official or private), government trade and tourist services, trade fairs, and government purchases. There was also discussion of the role of shipping rates and double taxation agreements. It is to be expected that there will be further consideration of all these matters at Montreal. In addition, it is anticipated that references will be made to the conference of nuclear scientists of the Commonwealth who will be meeting in the United Kingdom at the same time.

51. A matter of considerable interest that might best be raised under the item relating to Commonwealth trade is the proposal for a Commonwealth round-the-world cable network. A separate memorandum on this subject was approved by Cabinet on August 28.

52. The Prospects and Implications, Especially for Commonwealth Countries, of the European Economic Community and the Proposed Free Trade Area. The United Kingdom Delegation will be giving an up-to-date report on the Free Trade Area negotiations in Europe. All other Commonwealth countries view these negotiations with some concern, especially those with substantial agricultural exports and with important markets in Europe.

53. The United Kingdom authorities have recently given broad undertakings to the effect that she will not permit Commonwealth agricultural interests to be injured as a result of the negotiations. Their earlier undertakings, completely to exclude food, drink and tobacco from the negotiations, had to be abandoned. In this situation the Canadian Delegation should attempt to protect the position of Canadian agricultural and other exports to the United Kingdom by resisting any further erosion of the United Kingdom position.

54. In regard to the European Economic Community (Common Market) there is a danger that Commonwealth producers may find their export interests seriously threatened by raised tariffs, reduced quotas, and other devices. There have been indications that Australia and New Zealand may be seeking separate bilateral arrangements to protect their interests. The Canadian Delegation should not support such tendencies but should seek to maintain a common front in GATT to curtail protectionist influences in Europe.

55. Arrangements for Continuing Commonwealth Consultation on Economic Matters. In the preparatory work for the Conference there has been evidence of some desire, either to have rather more standing machinery for Commonwealth economic consultation, or else (for purposes of presentation and publicity) to dress up the existing machinery rather more formally and attractively. Some countries like these ideas (Ghana and Malaya); others dislike them strongly (South Africa).

56. The United Kingdom has very recently put forward a compromise proposal which may mobilize a fair measure of support. She is offering to supply a building, or part of a building, to house under one roof various Commonwealth activities now scattered over London. Meetings of various Commonwealth bodies would be held there and the Secretariat of the Commonwealth Economic Committee would work there. In addition they propose that there should be a regular meeting of senior Commonwealth officials in the spring of each year. And finally, all these more-or-less related activities, as well as the annual meetings of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, would go under the general title of "The Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council."

57. If there seems to be general support for these proposals, the Canadian Delegation could support them. It is not desirable, however, that any body with executive functions should be set up.

58. In July 1957 Commonwealth Prime Ministers directed the Commonwealth Economic Committee to review its activities. Its report will be before the Conference.

Conclusion

59. Three points may be made in conclusion. First, there is no disposition whatever amongst Commonwealth governments today to form a separate or regional bloc for trade, for development, or for any other purpose. On an economic basis, most of their external problems are worldwide problems; these problems are not soluble on a Commonwealth basis although discussion in the Commonwealth may lead towards common and constructive attitudes. By the same token, no Commonwealth country wishes to take steps to cut itself off or estrange itself from the United States, at once the greatest market and the richest source of capital in the world. This is particularly evident in relation to tariff preferences and quota discrimination. In short the Commonwealth countries are not looking towards economic expansion at the expense of other countries, but together with them. To quote from the Report by Commonwealth Officials to the Conference, Commonwealth countries seek

60. Second, in regard to trade, the chief preoccupation of many Delegations seems likely to be with commodity arrangements or with agricultural protectionism or both. As far as we know at present, not one Commonwealth country other than Canada has, within the context of the coming Conference, approached another with proposals or requests for expanding intra-Commonwealth trade. In regard to our own bilateral trade initiatives, the prospects of achieving immediate results at the Conference are much less bright than we might have hoped. On the other hand the improvement in the trading position of the United Kingdom, and the gradual strengthening of the economic position and purchasing power of the less developed members, should mean that the longer term prospects for expansion of Commonwealth trade are encouraging.

61. Third, there will be strong emphasis at the Conference on economic development, particularly in underdeveloped countries, and in the financial measures needed to sustain world-wide expansion of both development and trade. There will be active interest both in world-wide measures (e.g., expansion of the International Bank and Fund) and bilateral arrangements (e.g., the Colombo Plan).

Recommendation

62. We recommend that this memorandum be adopted by Cabinet to serve as instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the Conference.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

We have gained some impressions from UK officials about the general lines of the brief their delegation will take to Montreal. These impressions are however based upon the work of the Ministerial Committee on this subject which still has to be approved by the full Cabinet.

2. On the general question of removing discrimination we gather that the delegation will be given flexibility but will have authority if it wishes to remove discrimination on machinery (other than machinery for the oil industry) and to put canned salmon on O[pen]G[eneral]L[ist]. It will also have authority to give increased flexibility and scope to colonial administrations in respect of discrimination. We were unable to get any more precise idea of what is envisaged with regard to, for example, the West Indies. It is not envisaged that there will be a complete elimination of UK discriminatory restrictions nor for example the elimination at this stage of discrimination on manufactured consumer goods. On the other hand we gather that the departments here have mapped out a stage by stage programme for getting rid of discrimination over the next year or two except on some sensitive hard core items. Of course each stage in such a programme would have to be considered by the government when the time came for it to be implemented. It would be best not to let UK officials know that you have the foregoing information for the present. These plans are in any case subject to Cabinet approval as indicated above.

3. In general the UK welcome our proposals about scholarships and fellowships, although they will not wish to commit themselves to any particular number until they have had an opportunity after the Conference to consult local education authorities and others concerned in view of the strain on existing capacity of educational institutions here. In any case they would hope that the later conference on scholarships and fellowships may cover a wider field than we contemplated. They would like to extend it to discuss the whole range of problems associated with educational and technical exchange programmes. For the programme of scholarships and fellowships they envisage that post-graduate scholarships would be of most use to people going from one old Commonwealth country to another, under-graduate scholarships would be of most value to newer Commonwealth countries, while teaching fellowships might be a particularly suitable thing for newer Commonwealth countries to offer as their contribution, since at the same time they would meet a need in those countries.

4. We expect that the UK will be agreeable to a general declaration in favour of the Commonwealth cable network provided this does not go into the question of how the cost will be shared or when each stage will be built.

5. The UK position on economic aid remains about the same as described to Canadian official last month. The Australians however have made it pretty clear that they regard themselves as over-committed already and are unlikely to be willing to take on any new responsibilities in economic assistance.

6. The UK position on Commonwealth consultative machinery is also unchanged. They have not heard anything from the South Africans in answer to the representations they made to try to overcome South African objections. The UK can be expected to support the Commonwealth Economic Committee's proposals for expanding its activities. They may also raise, although not necessarily as a question to be decided at the Conference, their earlier proposal about providing a non-rotational chairman for the Commonwealth Economic Committee. They do not now envisage that he should be a full-time chairman since he would not have enough work to do; instead they would like to find someone who had other activities but could give a fair amount of his time to the committee and remain in office for say three years. There might be a rotational vice-chairman.

 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE JULY 26)

37. The Minister of Finance submitted a memorandum from the committee on preparations for the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. The memorandum reviewed the arrangements and agenda for the conference and sought approval for the composition of the Canadian delegation and the position it should take on the various items on the agenda. Some of the subjects to be considered at the conference would also be taken up immediately afterwards at the annual meeting of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund. Therefore approval was also sought for the position Canada might take at those meetings.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Memorandum, Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce, Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell), Secretary of State for External Affairs, Sept. 4, 1958—Cab. Doc. 255-58).

38. The Prime Minister said it would be highly desirable to have some sort of Commonwealth financial institution whose facilities would be available only to the newer members of the Commonwealth, starting, say, with Ghana. Something had to be done for the newer coloured peoples in the Commonwealth. He could understand the attitude of the International Bank towards a Commonwealth institution which might provide loans or grants to all members of the Commonwealth. However, the bank might not be inclined to restrict its lending to Commonwealth countries if the kind of institution he had in mind were established.

39. Mr. Fleming explained that the proposal for a Commonwealth Development Fund had been carefully considered by ministers and officials but several difficult problems had been encountered. There were difficult questions which had arisen and for which it was hard to find appropriate answers. Officials had gone to London to canvass the proposal but the United Kingdom was not interested. This was not the last word, however, and the matter would be pursued at the conference.

40. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was suggested that Commonwealth preferences be restored. In reply to this it was pointed out that such a step would be a violation of Canada's obligations under the G.A.T.T. and that, in any event, no other Commonwealth countries were interested in new preferences.

(b) Establishing closer trade links with the West Indies might lead in time to immigration problems. However, Canada would not be committed to anything along this line. What was intended was discussion on prospects for increasing Canadian trade in fish and manufactured goods.

(c) The report on the prospects for the conference was somewhat depressing, certainly on the trade side, and in some other respects as well. But there was no point in being unrealistic.

(d) On the other hand, there were possibilities for progress. The prospects for reaching agreement, in principle, on a round-the-world Commonwealth telephone cable were hopeful. Canada would have something to say about government purchasing. In the absence of other arrangements, Canada would be offering to increase Colombo Plan aid and technical assistance. Then there was the proposal for educational exchanges.

(e) Perhaps the best hope for success lay on the financial side. If the United Kingdom could be persuaded to change its attitude on a Commonwealth institution, this would be a real step forward. It would not matter what the institution was called. A letter to Mr. Macmillan on the matter might be helpful at this stage, as he himself had been a strong proponent of the idea.

(f) A Commonwealth Development Fund under which loans would be made on favourable terms to the newer Commonwealth countries and guaranteed by members of the fund, would have many attractions. It should not be confused with the Commonwealth Development Finance Company, which was a semi-private organization, nor should it be regarded as a substitute for the Colombo Plan. The Colombo Plan was charity. A fund would be a lending organization and would have more appeal to the republican, independence-minded, new and emerging members of the Commonwealth. A proposal of this kind was one which Canada could more readily initiate than the United Kingdom or Australia. It would be desirable to put it forward even if the United Kingdom did not agree.

(g) The Colombo Plan had been very successful and increases in the Canadian contribution were being recommended. If there appeared to be any chance of success with a new fund, then the money envisaged for the Colombo Plan increase should be put into the fund instead.

(h) Some thought that increases in the Colombo Plan and funds for the British West Indies should not be made unless they were tied to the disposal of some agricultural surpluses. However, this would not necessarily assist development in the recipient countries which was the essential concern of those countries.

41. The Cabinet approved the instructions for the delegation to the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference as contained in the circulated memorandum (Cab. Doc. 255-58), subject to,

- (a) the inclusion of the Minister of Defence Production as a member of the delegation;
- (b) an effort being made to interest others at the conference in the possibility of establishing a Commonwealth financial institution to assist in financing the development of the new and emerging members of the Commonwealth; and,
- (c) the understanding that there would be reasonable consultation with Commonwealth governments affected before concessional sales of agricultural surpluses were made.

[Ottawa], September 19, 1958

SECRET

1. During the Canada-United Kingdom bilateral trade talks which were held in Ottawa last October following the Mont Tremblant Conference, United Kingdom Ministers urged that Canada could help the United Kingdom by taking action in the field of tariffs and preferences under the following three heads:

- (a) the restoration of certain preference margins reduced since 1947,
- (b) the binding of some existing preference margins, and
- (c) the binding of British preferential rates of duty on certain goods.

2. In a letter handed to me at Montreal on September 16th Sir David Eccles pressed for some action at this time on the above suggestions. He requested also that we confirm that Canada is initiating the necessary action to restore the former preference margins on wool textiles. A copy of Sir David's letter is attached to this memorandum.†

3. United Kingdom officials indicated informally that the United Kingdom is particularly hopeful that it will be possible for Canada to agree to and announce in the context of the Montreal Conference the binding of the present British Preferential rates of duty on a list of items of particular interest to them (heading (c) above). They emphasized moreover that they will continue to hope that we will also find it possible to restore margins of preference to the pre-1947 level on a select list of items (heading (a) above).

4. In my view it would be contrary to the best interests of Canada to try to meet them on their requests relating to the restoration or the binding of margins of preference, although we may be able to go some distance to meeting them on the binding of preferential rates.

5. In this connection it should be pointed out that there is no obligation on Canada to compensate the United Kingdom for the steps they have announced in Montreal with respect to the relaxation of import controls. It has been our view that such relaxations were overdue in the light of the improved United Kingdom balance of payments position.

6. At the same time, having regard to our desire to promote increased trade with the Commonwealth and in the context of the Conference, it seems advisable for the Canadian Government to go as far to meet the United Kingdom wishes in this matter as is possible without prejudice to our own interests.

7. Referring first to the British proposal that certain margins of preference be restored to the pre-1947 level, it is my view that no action should be taken. The following considerations are relevant: the preferences in question were reduced by multilateral negotiations under the GATT and if we attempted to restore them serious difficulties would arise in our trade relations with the United States and other third countries; in view of the symbolic importance attached in the United States to the reduction or removal of discrimination and preferences these unfavourable consequences might be out of proportion to the action which gave rise to them and could adversely affect the United Kingdom as well as ourselves; in so far as restrictive measures introduced by the United States, e.g., on lead and zinc, may provide scope for compensatory tariff adjustments on our part we must keep in mind our own immediate needs in respect of the renegotiation of fruit and vegetable tariffs and the possible renegotiation at a later stage of a broad range of textiles and chemicals which are now before the Tariff Board.

8. The second United Kingdom request that existing margins of preference be bound also presents difficult problems and no action is being proposed with respect to it. From the Canadian point of view binding margins of preference could severely limit our freedom to make tariff changes either up or down that might be necessary as a result of negotiations with third countries or for domestic reasons. A practical illustration of this is provided by the recent changes in the tariff schedule on iron and steel. In the negotiations on iron and steel the modification of margins of preference enjoyed by the United Kingdom was an essential feature of the agreement reached with the United States and other countries. It would have been much more difficult, if not impossible to reach agreement if United Kingdom consent had to be obtained in advance. Similarly, our freedom of action to assist Canadian industry by reducing or removing tariffs on materials and components would be seriously impaired if the permission of the United Kingdom were required before we were free to act.

9. The third heading relates to the binding of existing British Preferential tariff rates. In this connection the United Kingdom has indicated particular interest in cotton fabrics, rubber footwear, titanium oxide, fancy biscuits, knitted clothing, floor coverings, steel wire for rope, diesel engines, machinery, aluminum sheets, radio apparatus n.o.p. and the iron and steel items.

10. The effect of binding British Preferential rates on these products would be to commit ourselves not to raise rates beyond the bound level without first negotiating such changes with the United Kingdom. This is the position which now prevails with respect to those British Preferential tariff items bound in Part II of our present GATT tariff schedule; and is also the position which prevails with respect to M.F.N. rates bound in Part I of our present GATT schedule.

11. It should also be noted that under the 1947 exchange of notes with the United Kingdom we are committed not to raise British Preferential rates on any item bound in Part I of our GATT schedule so long as it remains in Part I. The significance of specifically binding the British Preferential rates would be that if we wanted to raise a rate so bound we would be required to negotiate not only with the M.F.N. country or countries, but also with the United Kingdom. In other words where the British Preferential rate is specifically bound, the United Kingdom would be entitled to seek compensation in its own right.

12. It follows that the binding of additional British Preferential rates would raise a problem should we at a later date wish to raise tariffs on these products. In selecting the list described below this important factor has been taken into account.

13. In my view the binding of certain British Preferential rates of duty, including a good many (but by no means all) of those specifically mentioned by the British, would not be as difficult from the Canadian point of view as would action on the other British requests. If the Government wishes to meet the British requests, at least in part, it would be possible to bind a substantial list of items without causing hardship to any Canadian industry. This list would include a good many of the items on the British list — indeed most of those items which are not included in reference now before the Tariff Board — and it would include also some very large items which are not on the British list, but which the British would undoubtedly welcome. Some of these items would be of widespread interest in the United Kingdom and therefore have considerable presentational value.

14. If the Government wishes, as a matter of policy, to take a bold step in this matter, and is prepared to meet criticisms from some Canadian industries for so doing, I would suggest that we agree to bind, in favour of the United Kingdom, under Part II of our GATT schedule, a selected list of existing British Preferential rates.

15. A list of items for consideration in this regard is appended. In broad outline it would include the following commodities or groups of items:

- Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds
- Aircraft and aircraft engines of all kinds
- Primary iron and steel
- Pipes and tubes
- Diesel engines
- Tractors
- Textile machinery
- Printing machinery
- Aluminum sheet
- Fancy biscuits
- Chinaware
- Books

Recommendations

16. The undersigned recommends that:

(1) The Government agree to bind the present British Preferential rates of duty on the attached list of tariff items in the manner provided by the G.A.T.T.

(2) This decision be made public in the communiqué to be issued at the close of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

(3) Alternatively, if the Government should decide that the recommendation contained in (1) above should be adopted in principle, but that the specific list of items to be bound should receive detailed consideration by Cabinet at a later date, the Delegation to the Montreal Conference be authorized to have included in the final communiqué of the Conference, a statement along the following lines:

“As a means of encouraging trade with the United Kingdom, the Canadian Government stated that it would be prepared to examine its Customs Tariff with a view to binding a selected list of British Preferential tariff rates, in the manner provided by the G.A.T.T., of special importance to the United Kingdom.”

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE; PROGRESS REPORT AND BINDING OF RATES OF DUTY

40. The Minister of Finance reported verbally on the proceedings of the first week of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. After paying tribute to those working on the Canadian delegation and the secretariat, he reviewed the main issues that had arisen. The largest was the question of convertibility or some long stride toward it. He had had an early conversation with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this matter and had not derived too much hope from it. As a result, he had made a strong statement on the second day of the conference, emphasizing the importance of some move in this direction. The following day the United Kingdom had submitted their announcement of the removal of restrictions on machinery, canned salmon, and certain other items and their invitation to the colonial authorities to take similar action. Moreover, they had indicated they intended to follow this action with further removal of restrictions during the next year. This announcement had greatly improved the tone of the conference, relieved Canada of many anxieties about it, and ensured that it would be a political success.

41. Mr. Fleming went on to report on the difficulties over agricultural protection and the representations by the Minister of Finance of New Zealand on this subject, particularly in regard to dairy products. He noted, however, that the U.K. representatives had taken a strong stand in defence of their agricultural policy which had made the situation easier for the Canadian representatives.

He also indicated that there was a considerable consensus of view in favour of agreements to stabilize prices of major commodities in international trade. In this connection, the United Kingdom had indicated their readiness to attend the preparatory meetings on the Wheat Agreement.

Another major subject on which progress had been made was the educational programme on which both Lord Home and Mr. Sidney Smith had spoken so enthusiastically that, as Minister of Finance, he came to wonder whether the Canadian proposal was perhaps too modest. He noted in connection with the educational proposals that a number of the under-developed members of the Commonwealth were now somewhat reluctant to send their young people abroad for training, and preferred to have suitable teachers sent to their own countries.

One major question remained of course, the suggested Commonwealth institution to assist in the financing of development. There had been considerable discussion of this within the Canadian delegation and in private discussions with U.K. representatives, as well as the reference to it in the Prime Minister's speech on the Thursday evening. The United Kingdom had come to the conference clearly troubled about this suggestion, feeling it could not go forward on it now but not wishing to close the door. The U.K. Prime Minister (Mr. Macmillan) had been in favour of it originally but had been talked out of it largely by the Bank of England and by the President of the International Bank. There would be support at the conference in Montreal for expansion of the resources of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund as well as proposals and support for increasing the size of contributions made under the Colombo Plan and similar aid programmes such as those which Canada was proposing in respect of the West Indies and Africa. It seemed, however, that there would not be much additional capital to be obtained from Commonwealth sources for transmission through a Commonwealth financial institution. Sir Henry Lee of Malaya, who had been in favour of this proposal, had said now that it should not be considered until after the financial discussions at New Delhi in October and that appeared to be the best prospect. There might then be a reference of the subject to a suitable Commonwealth group for further study.

42. The Prime Minister following Mr. Fleming's review, enquired what action Canada should now take toward the United Kingdom as a quid pro quo for the help they had provided and in order to make clear that Canada has not lost its position of leadership in the Commonwealth.

43. Mr. Fleming, in reply, noted the various things Canada had already proposed in regard to expansion of the Colombo Plan, technical assistance for Ghana, and the aid to the West Indies shortly to be announced as well as the proposals about education. He agreed, however, that something should be done in the field of trade.

44. Mr. Fleming then went on to outline the proposal that he wished to say before the Cabinet in regard to the binding of British preferential rates of duty on certain classes of goods. He had prepared a memorandum to be circulated to the Cabinet on this matter. This memorandum noted that the U.K. Ministers, following the Mont Tremblant Conference in October 1957, had urged Canada to help the United Kingdom by action in the field of tariffs and preferences. The United Kingdom would prefer the restoration of certain margins of preferences which had been reduced since 1947. If that could not be achieved, they would then hope that existing margins of preferences could be bound on a list of U.K. products. As a third alternative, they would wish Canada to bind the rates of duty under the British preferential tariff on various U.K. exports to Canada.

In a letter handed to Mr. Fleming at the conference in Montreal on September 16th, the President of the Board of Trade had pressed for some action at this time on these suggestions and requested also confirmation that Canada was initiating the necessary action to restore the former margins of preference on wool textiles.

The Minister's memorandum indicated various arguments for and against the several types of action requested by the United Kingdom. He suggested action to bind the British preferential rates of duty on a list of items appended to the memorandum. He pointed out that this did not include any cotton textiles.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 19, — Cab. Doc. 270-58).

45. There was some discussion on this proposal but the opinion was expressed that the Ministers present should have an opportunity to consider it overnight and other ministers who were not then present at the meeting should also have an opportunity to consider it.

46. The Cabinet noted with approval the progress report of the Minister of Finance on the first week of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference and deferred until a meeting on the following day action on his recommendation concerning the binding of rates of duty under the British preferential tariff.⁴⁰

The central theme of the Conference was "an expanding Commonwealth in an expanding world." As a corollary of this theme, the Conference recognized that the achievement of its objectives would require the co-operation of other countries, notably the United States. The following is a summary of the detailed decisions and understandings reached at Montreal.⁴¹

Trade

The Conference re-affirmed the common objective of freer trade and payments. It agreed on the value of the preference system and the importance of maintaining it. It looked forward to the ending of dollar discrimination as soon as possible and also agreed that discrimination between Commonwealth sources of supply by means of quantitative restrictions should be avoided. The Conference recognized that it was important for the under-developed countries of the Commonwealth to have unobstructed goods. Agreement was also reached that Commonwealth countries would examine cases where it was alleged that dumped or subsidized goods were damaging the interests of other Commonwealth suppliers.

In the discussion the Canadian delegation placed special emphasis on the early removal of discrimination. We said that the conditions which had at one time made this necessary no longer applied and that the continuance of discrimination did not seem to us to be in the interests of the sterling area countries themselves. In this connection we welcomed, in particular, the United Kingdom announcement that they were removing import restrictions on canned salmon, newsprint and most machinery, that they were proposing to make a start next year on the removal of all remaining restrictions, and that Colonial Governments were being invited to relax their restrictions on dollar imports. For its part, Canada undertook to bind the British preferential rates on an important list of goods of interest to the United Kingdom. It also undertook to bind against increase the special low rate of duty on mutton and lamb accorded to New Zealand and Australia.

There was a valuable exchange of views on the new situation created by the more active participation of Communist countries in world trade. The Canadian position at the Conference was that there was a case for expanding normal commercial trade with these countries and involving them in sound and stable trading relationships. Where Sino-Soviet competition in world markets was deliberately disruptive, Canada would be prepared to join others in mitigating situations where the interests of Commonwealth countries could be safeguarded by co-operative action. Canada expressed the hope that others would be prepared to do likewise where Canadian interests were involved.

The Conference re-affirmed the need for outward-looking arrangements in Europe in the interests of expanding world trade. In subscribing to this objective, Canada made it clear that we supported the broad aims of the European countries and that we hoped these would result in greater trading opportunities. We also underlined the great importance we attached to the undertakings given by the United Kingdom that the agricultural interests of Commonwealth countries in the United Kingdom market would be fully safeguarded.

Commodity Problems and Agriculture

On the subject of commodity price stabilization, the Conference recognized the serious problems caused by wide fluctuations in commodity prices and the need for remedial action. Accordingly Commonwealth countries agreed to participate in a commodity by commodity examination of the problems. Specifically the Conference agreed on an early examination of the problems relating to lead and zinc and on the need to strengthen the International Tin Agreement. Canada undertook to play its full part in achieving these objectives. It agreed that the Commonwealth might be able to take useful initiatives in this field although effective solutions to the problem would probably have to be taken in a context wider than that of the Commonwealth. In common with Australia, Canada welcomed the intention of the United Kingdom to participate in the preparatory discussions for a new International Wheat Agreement.

With respect to agriculture, the Conference recognized the obligations each country had as a producer. Subject to these, it agreed on the need to limit and progressively to reduce the level of effective protection. It also agreed that care must be taken in the disposal of surpluses not to cause harm to the legitimate interests of traditional suppliers.

Canada said that it was generally recognized that there were special problems inherent in agricultural trade. Canada's own sales of agricultural products had been affected by restrictions in other markets and by surplus disposals. We realized the dangers of excessive protection but the problem was clearly world-wide and there appeared to be a need for a collective and comprehensive review of the problem to see if policies could not be harmonized and acceptable rules formulated. Canada would be prepared to join others in such a review in the GATT.

Finance

The Conference underlined the importance Commonwealth countries attach to the strength of sterling and re-affirmed the agreed objective that it should be made convertible as soon as the necessary conditions had been achieved. The Conference also endorsed the proposals that have been made for expanding the resources of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund and welcomed the support that had been given to these proposals by President Eisenhower.

Canada said that there were a number of factors which suggested that the time had come to make sterling formally convertible: there had been a recovery in the economic situation in the United States; the world dollar position had continued to improve; and there was now a prospect of substantial additional resources becoming available to support convertibility. For our part, we would be prepared to double our subscription to the International Bank and increase by 50 per cent our quota in the International Monetary Fund.

Development

The Conference stressed the great importance of more rapid economic progress in the less developed countries and the need for all Commonwealth countries to co-operate in this urgent task. This would require more capital, both public and private, more technical assistance, better opportunities for education, and increased opportunities for trade. The Conference recognized the part which had been played in this field by the Colombo Plan. It also agreed that all possible steps should be taken to encourage the participation of private capital in economic development in the under-developed countries. With respect to the creation of a new Commonwealth financial institution, it was agreed that further joint studies should be undertaken to explore methods of mobilizing additional resources for development.

Canada stated that the need for development in the underdeveloped countries transcended economic considerations. The countries concerned had carried and would continue to have to carry the main burden but external help was necessary. While this would have to come mainly from Governments and international institutions, the role private capital could play should not be discounted. We announced an increase in our Colombo Plan contribution from $35 to $50 million a year over the next three years; a $10 million programme of aid to The West Indies over the next five years; and a technical assistance programme for Africa absorbing an initial $500,000 a year. In addition to our normal aid programmes we said that we would continue to provide food on a grant or loan basis to under-developed countries. With respect to a Commonwealth financial institution, we said that this would symbolize the willingness of the Commonwealth to work in partnership. We agreed that more time be required to examine the idea, particularly in the light of other decisions that might be taken to expand the resources available for development.

Education

The Conference agreed in principle on the initiation of a new scheme of Commonwealth scholarships and fellowships under which 1,000 Commonwealth candidates would be studying in other Commonwealth countries at any one time. The details of the scheme (to which Canada agreed to contribute 100 places a year at a cost of about $1 million) remain to be worked out at a special conference to be held in London next year. This conference will also look into other ways in which Commonwealth countries might expand and improve their help to one another in this field.

Telecommunications

On the initiative of Canada, Commonwealth countries agreed in principle on the construction of a Commonwealth system of co-axial cables to provide the first round-the-world telephone service.

Consultation

The Conference endorsed the importance of the existing arrangements for Commonwealth consultation on economic matters. It agreed to co-ordinate these arrangements under the name of "Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council." It also welcomed the United Kingdom offer to make available a "Commonwealth House" in London to serve as a headquarters for the Council and its constituent bodies.

[Ottawa], July 30, 1958

EXTENSION OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE TO THE FULL COMMONWEALTH

The purpose of this memorandum is to examine the proposal to extend the present Canadian technical assistance arrangements to all the "underdeveloped" areas of the Commonwealth whether dependent or independent. This broadening of the geographical coverage and of the scope of our technical assistance scheme should be the subject of consultation with other Commonwealth governments to the end that it may be agreed that a general extension of these programs by a number of Commonwealth governments might be decided upon at the Montreal Conference. The proposal should be examined with four aspects of the problem in mind:

- (a) What is now being done by Canada and other Commonwealth countries?
- (b) How would any expansion of the Canadian program be integrated with the present Canadian arrangements for the Colombo Plan, the West Indies, and Ghana?
- (c) What form might the new arrangements take? Suggested for consideration are two related schemes:
 - (i) a Commonwealth scholarship scheme to be operated in close consultation with other Commonwealth governments; and
 - (ii) technical assistance on the present pattern.
- (d) What institutional machinery would be required?

1. The Present Technical Assistance Arrangements

Most of the more well-developed countries of the Commonwealth contribute to the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance program and would presumably play some part in any new United Nations arrangements that may be made such as the Special Fund. The present Canadian contribution to UNETAP is $2 million a year. In addition to this the United Nations Specialized Agencies provide some technical assistance from their regular budgets, to which Canada and of course other Commonwealth countries contribute.

In addition, the United Kingdom makes substantial contributions of a technical assistance character to the Commonwealth through the Colonial Development and Welfare Funds and other programs such as the technical scholarships offered by the U.K. Board of Trade. Other Commonwealth countries have similar arrangements; for example, Australia provides a good deal of help for Papua which it administers as a trusteeship territory. The most important form of such assistance offered by Commonwealth countries (except South Africa) is through their Colombo Plan programs.

The present Canadian arrangements within the Commonwealth may be summarized as follows:

(a) Colombo Plan	New Appointments in Calendar 1957	Expenditure Fiscal 1957-8
Trainees	119	560,000
Experts	17	363,000
Total Expenditure 1957-8		923,000

(Note: Activities in non-commonwealth countries are excluded from these figures.)

(b) West Indies, present fiscal year:

Experts abroad (to September 1)	7
Funds available	$215,000

(c) Ghana, present fiscal year:

Experts abroad (to September 1)	2
Funds available	$135,000

(d) Canada Council (Calendar 1958)

Scholarships and fellowships awarded or planned for nationals of underdeveloped Commonwealth countries	7
Approximate expenditure	$23,500

(e) National Research Council (1957-8)

Scholarships and fellowships awarded or planned for nationals of underdeveloped Commonwealth countries	43
Approximate expenditure	$300,000

Most of the Canadian contribution at least at the Federal level, in what might be called the international exchange of persons has been arranged through the Colombo Plan and through Canadian aid programmes to the West Indies and Ghana. This is technical assistance in the narrow sense of the term, and differs from broader international exchange programs in that it must meet the following criteria:

(a) the object of the exchanges must be associated with the economic development of the country assisted; work in the humanities or other non-economic fields is thus not included.

(b) the candidates must be nominated formally by their own governments. In practice, this means that most of them are in government service and return to fill government jobs.

Consideration should be given to extending Canadian programmes beyond technical assistance thus defined, for the following reasons:

(a) The underdeveloped countries of the Commonwealth have in the past drawn on the West for a great many of their trained people in the humanities and other non-economic fields, and this has given the Western viewpoint strong spokesmen. Independence in much of the Commonwealth and the limitations of present technical assistance arrangements together make it likely that in many countries this group of western trained leaders may not be replaced, except to the extent that existing scholarships, most of them from University endowments or private funds, are providing some opportunity for replacement.

(b) The prime need in many of the underdeveloped countries is not so much for technicians and engineers (of which there may be too many) but for administrators, political leaders, teachers and other people who must have broad education and background rather than narrowly specialized training. Present technical assistance arrangements do not meet this need; and may well be one of the reasons why the existing stock of technical personnel in underdeveloped countries is not being better used.

(c) Training in the humanities and other non-technical fields would be popular and welcome both in recipient countries and also among certain groups in Canada, who feel that the present Canadian programs are unreasonably biased.

The expanded program of assistance could therefore be adjusted to meet their changing needs and demands.

2. Relationship of New Scheme to Colombo Plan Programmes and Other Canadian Technical Assistance Arrangements

There may be problems in fitting a new Commonwealth Scheme into the technical assistance which countries in Asia now take for granted through the Colombo Plan. The problem arises because the Colombo Plan is not primarily a Commonwealth scheme, although it was of Commonwealth origin. The criterion for membership is nominally geographical rather than political. Countries like Burma and Indonesia, which are not Commonwealth members, are full participants in the Colombo Plan. At the same time it would be unfortunate and undesirable to exclude the Commonwealth countries of South-East Asia from the workings of any new Commonwealth scheme. It is suggested that one approach to this problem might be to divide the new scheme into two programs, one to be Commonwealth wide and the other to apply only to Commonwealth countries not now receiving Canadian technical assistance. Suggested programs are discussed in the following section. No significant problems are foreseen in the West Indies and Ghana, or in coordination with the United Nations or other international programs.

3. Commonwealth Scholarship Scheme

Consideration might be given to establishing a Scheme of Commonwealth Scholarships to which the countries and dependent territories of the Commonwealth might contribute (approximately in proportion to the facilities which they can make available) and within which the nations of each country or territory might secure awards.

If Canada were to offer (as suggested below) about 100 scholarships, then the total scheme might be from five to ten times as great, or even larger. Aside from awards granted by the "developed" Commonwealth countries (U.K., Australia, and so forth) it might well be that India, Pakistan, Malaya, Ceylon, and others would also wish to contribute. These countries are now providing worthwhile technical assistance to others through the Colombo Plan, and feel strongly about their position as donors as well as recipients.

Awards might be limited to "underdeveloped" countries or extended to the full Commonwealth; the broad political attractions of the latter alternative are obvious. In line with the views set-out above, it is suggested that these scholarships not be limited to "technical assistance" in the restricted sense, but rather the awards should be open to the best candidates in each country, regardless of their proposed field of study. The awards offered by any country might therefore be open for study in every field in which suitable facilities are available. Candidates would not have to be sponsored by their own governments, but would apply in their own right; intellectual and personal qualities would be the sole criteria for selection.

Canadian Participation

A possible Canadian contribution to such a Commonwealth Scholarship scheme is outlined below merely as a basis for consideration. It is possible, of course, to adjust the calculations to fit any desired scale of operations. It is suggested that Canada might offer one scholarship for every two million people in each "underdeveloped" territory, of the Commonwealth, with a maximum of ten a year for any one country and a minimum for each country of one in four years. This would mean approximately 70 Canadian scholarships a year according to the attached (Annex A).† If the awards were tenable for a maximum of four years, with an average duration of three years, then the cost (on present Canadian Colombo Plan rates) would be about $260,000 for the first year, $420,000 for the second year and $580,000 for the third and succeeding years.

The scheme would apply both to present Commonwealth Colombo Plan countries as well as to Commonwealth countries and territories not in the Colombo Plan area. For the Colombo Plan countries, the money could be found from the Canadian Colombo Plan vote; this would cut the need for new money almost in half. (It might be desirable to allocate rather more of Canadian Colombo Plan funds to technical assistance so that present activities would not have to be unduly curtailed.) If "developed" countries were to be included in the scheme, the number of scholarships would rise by 29 as outlined in the attached Annex B.† An estimate of all the costs involved is summarized in Annex C.

If some such scheme as this were undertaken, the first awards could not take effect before September 1959 and would be possible only if arrangements are put in hand urgently next autumn.

These awards should be invested with as much academic distinction and prestige as possible. This is partly at least a public relations assignment, although the scholarships themselves should be sufficiently attractive financially to secure application from the best available candidates in each country.

To this end it is suggested that selection of scholars be made in each country by local committees which would include representatives of each donor country as well as nominees of the candidate's own Government. These committees should be established at the highest possible level, although in practice most of the work might be done by alternates. The object should be that the people who are successful in securing these scholarships should gain wide recognition by so doing.

The field of study in which Canadian scholarships might be offered would have to be examined in some detail. In principle there should be no restriction except that imposed by academic facilities available here. It is suggested however that in setting up the awards the Canadian Governments should specify for most countries how many of the scholarships would be for under-graduate and how many for graduate study. In many of the more under-developed countries it is difficult to find candidates of ability to undertake graduate work; in other countries (e.g. India) both the candidates available and administrative considerations would indicate limiting the awards to graduates.

Placement in Canadian universities of candidates of the calibre expected is unlikely to present a serious problem. The undergraduates could be fitted into the appropriate faculties across the country without causing noticeable extra pressure, while graduates, considering their calibre, may be expected to know what they wish to study and where. Anyone successful in getting one of these awards is likely to be sufficiently strong academically to secure admission to any faculty of his choice.

4. Expansion of Technical Assistance (in the narrow sense)

It is suggested that while the proposed Commonwealth Scholarship scheme extend to the whole Commonwealth, it be supplemented by a technical assistance program for Commonwealth countries not now receiving Canadian Technical Assistance. This program would be similar in principle to the existing Canadian arrangements and would be limited by the same criteria. Assistance both in experts' services and by the grant of fellowships and scholarships would be made available only for purposes which contribute to the economic development of the country concerned, and would be limited to specific requests by governments.

Assuming that about one million dollars additional is available in the expansion and that the contemplated Scholarship arrangements as outlined above are acceptable, the balance for technical assistance for the countries not now covered would be about half a million dollars. This would be sufficient in the early stages of the expansion of the programme (assuming the present arrangements for Ghana are to be subsumed under the new Scheme, but the West Indies to be dealt with separately.) However, unlike the scholarship scheme the technical assistance program might well grow so that more money could be used effectively in later years. If any significant amounts of equipment and supplies were to be provided these funds would have to be increased materially.

However, since realistic requests for assistance are likely to be lower than available funds for the first few years, it is suggested that no formal public allocation of funds between countries be made at the beginning, at least. Undue concentration on any one area or country can be avoided by informal negotiation and administrative control. This approach has proved satisfactory, simple, and acceptable by recipient countries under the Colombo Plan Technical Assistance Scheme.

Administration

It is suggested that administrative arrangements be similar to those which have been developed in dealing with the Colombo Plan and the West Indies and Ghana. The Canadian Government would receive applications from the governments of the Commonwealth countries and territories, would examine them to ensure that they fall within the terms of reference of the program, that they were likely to be possible and practical of execution, and that they fall in a field where assistance from Canada could be effective. If they met those criteria, then the assistance would be provided according to the procedures already being applied.

It is suggested that while both experts' services and training facilities might be provided, the bias should be in favour of the former because:

1. Experts probably provide more value for money, both in promoting economic development and in political impact;
2. In most of the underdeveloped territories, there is an acute shortage of people with the basic education which is needed to take advantage of training abroad. The trained people in many areas already have scholarship programs open to them under other schemes;
3. The Commonwealth Scholarship Scheme outlined above would provide training opportunities for the best available local people.

In summary, and as a very general rule, experts probably provide better value and meet higher priority needs than trainees.

5. Institutional Arrangements

In Canada, it would probably be most reasonable to administer the new programs through the Technical Co-Operation Service of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which has been established to look after Colombo Plan, United Nations, and other technical assistance for which Canada has taken some responsibility. Experience available there in detailed administration of technical assistance will be valuable, since many of the same problems will be encountered in the new operation. In placing scholarship holders the Service would have the advice of its own university advisers, and of the Canada Council and National Research Council where the field of study is within the orbit of these organizations.

Experience with the Colombo Plan has been that the most effective technical assistance can be arranged bilaterally. It is most important in practice to bring the professional people concerned in donor and recipient countries into close contact so that the assistance provided will fit and reflect the actual problems to be faced. A standing international secretariat serves only to introduce a complicating factor in the Scheme. This has been the experience with the Colombo Plan Bureau, which now contributes very little to the operation of the Colombo Plan Technical Assistance Program. It was of some use at the beginning of the Scheme, but as the program developed participating countries found it desirable to by-pass the secretariat in the interests of speed and efficiency.

The Bureau now has only three functions of any real significance. First, it collects statistics of the operation of the Colombo Plan Scheme. These are useful but not essential. It is suggested that this function might be performed for the new Program, as well as for existing Commonwealth Schemes by the Commonwealth Economic Committee. The Colombo Bureau also has an Information Unit. For the new schemes this function could be performed by national information agencies, as happens in practice for the Colombo Plan. Visits by the Director of the Colombo Bureau to participating countries can be useful, but probably do not in themselves justify the existence of the Bureau. It is suggested that for the new program this function could be performed more cheaply and effectively by arranging for occasional visits to recipient countries by Canadian officials concerned with the Program and by officials from recipient countries visiting Canada. Experience has demonstrated that such visits are necessary, in any event.

The Colombo Bureau continues to exist for historical reasons and it is not the purpose of this paper to suggest that it should be abolished. However, Canadian experience with it indicates that there is no need to set up a similar organization for a new Program. It is significant that the West Indies and Ghana programs have started to operate without a separate intermediary body, and with no obvious need for one. It is relevant to point out that technical assistance was a new idea when the Bureau was established. National administrations, in both donor and recipient countries were feeling their way. Most countries now have a good deal of experience in working in this field with the United Nations, the Commonwealth Development and Welfare Program, the Specialized Agencies, the United States I.C.A. Program, and so forth. The principles of operation of all of these agencies are essentially similar and are well understood by the officials throughout the world who have to deal with technical assistance.

The detailed arrangements in the programme could probably best be established at a conference where officials could come together to work out the administrative arrangements and to exchange views on the fields of activity in which they are most concerned. Beyond this the need for continuity would adequately be met through tours by individuals as mentioned above, and by occasional (perhaps annual) meetings of senior operating officials from participating countries.

In short, the cost of a continuing secretariat might better be spent on providing more technical assistance.

Summary and Conclusions

(a) Given funds, a Canadian technical assistance program for the underdeveloped areas of the Commonwealth not now receiving Canadian aid is perfectly practical. As far as Canada is concerned it could be handled largely by machinery and procedures developed to deal with the Colombo Plan, West Indies, and Ghana Programs. More people would of course be required, but the basic structure exists.

(b) A program of Commonwealth Scholarships is equally feasible as far as the Canadian portion of the Scheme is concerned, and would fill a gap existing in the present Canadian programs. Machinery for the administration of the Scheme in Canada exists, not only in the Technical Cooperation Service, but also in the National Research Council and the Canada Council. Co-ordination and co-operation between these agencies would be required, but should cause no difficulty.

(c) Experience with the Colombo Plan provides a valuable guide in establishing the new program. Most of the procedures and criteria developed through the Colombo Plan can be applied with only minor changes. There seems little need, for administrative purposes at least, to establish a Secretariat as was done at the beginning of the Colombo Plan. The Commonwealth Economic Committee might collect such common statistics as are required.

[Ottawa], August 13, 1958

EXTENSION OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

In their memorandum of July 30, 1958, Messrs. Bartlett and Grey propose the extension of our technical assistance programme in two directions:

- (a) geographically, to include all Commonwealth countries including the colonies;
- (b) academically, to cover areas of study not eligible under technical assistance "narrowly interpreted", i.e. the humanities.

2. The geographical extension has been approved in principle by Ministers. It does not raise any particularly difficult problems. The administrative machinery already exists. The U.K. would have to act on our behalf in those countries where we do not have diplomatic or commercial representatives.

3. The presentation of the second feature of the Bartlett-Grey proposal is, in my opinion, somewhat confused; furthermore, the reasons advanced in support are not equally valid; and finally, I would question some of the suggested organizational arrangements.

4. The memorandum states that under our technical assistance programme exchanges must be associated with the economic development of the country assisted. In my own interpretation of technical assistance, I have placed the main emphasis on the word "technical," the association with economic development being a secondary consideration. This interpretation conforms to the facts. Our technical assistance programme extends into fields which are only more or less indirectly associated with economic development, such as medicine, public health, nursing, security, the social sciences.

5. The residual area referred to in the memorandum as the "humanities" and to be covered by the proposed "Commonwealth Scholarship Scheme" is thus a very narrow one. It would include areas such as literature, languages, history, and the fine arts.

6. Without wishing to denigrate these fields of study, I question seriously the need for a scholarship programme limited to or including these fields. Technical assistance, as it now operates, yields most of the benefits outlined at the bottom of page 3 and the top of page 4 and advanced in justification for the establishment of the special scholarship programme. The Commonwealth Conference is a trade and economic conference and the main problem facing the Commonwealth is the economic development of its poorer members. It seems to me that any proposals which we put forward at the Conference in the field of economic and technical assistance, given the limited resources available, should address themselves to this problem rather than to one of its tangential elements.

7. The idea of a special scholarship programme should, in my opinion, be retained, but in a slightly modified form. The distinctive element of these scholarships would be that candidates would not, as is the case of technical assistance scholarships, be sponsored by their governments, but would apply on the basis of their academic or other achievements. The scholarships would be limited to graduate students and to certain fields of study related to economic development in general, e.g. the social sciences, rather than specific aspects of economic development, e.g. transportation. There would be a minimum of one scholarship per year per underdeveloped country (and colony?), the other scholarships being awarded purely on the basis of merit.

8. With regard to organization I agree with the Bartlett-Grey memorandum that no new international organization is needed to deal with the geographically extended technical assistance programme. The creation of such machinery has only some short-lived publicity value.

9. In the case of the special scholarship programme, I would like to put forward for your consideration a suggestion, which I agree involves some difficulties, for the creation of a scholarship fund to which each Commonwealth country would contribute, each country receiving a number of scholars proportionate to its contribution. The selection of scholars from among the applicants would be made by a panel of distinguished Commonwealth citizens. Some new machinery would be needed. Such a fund might be called the Commonwealth Scholarship Fund for Economic Development.

10. If the fund were to be an essentially Canadian affair, the Colombo Plan Administration might be asked to do the secretarial work. The selection of scholars, however, should be made by a body such as the Canada Council, the interdepartmental scholarship panel, or a specially created panel outside the Government.

11. I am not convinced that a special scholarship programme should be financed by earmarking funds voted for the Colombo Plan or for technical assistance. In my opinion, any real or alleged deficiencies in the technical assistance programme are not in themselves sufficient to justify a special scholarship programme. The justification for such a programme rests in its prestige value, in the publicity which it attracts, and in the interest in Commonwealth development which it will foster. As such, it should, I think, be kept quite separate and built up independently from anything else that we may be doing.

CONFIDENTIAL

COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIP AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROPOSALS

The purpose of this memorandum is to examine proposals, first, that the Canadian Delegation to the Montreal Conference should, in concert with the United Kingdom Delegation, urge the establishment of a broad and reciprocal plan of Commonwealth scholarships and second to authorize the Canadian Delegation to offer an extension of the present Canadian technical assistance arrangements to all the underdeveloped areas of the Commonwealth, whether dependent or independent, if such an extension is considered desirable as the Conference develops.

The original of this document was not located. The document printed here is taken from the briefing material for the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

The extension of inter-Commonwealth contacts is important at this time to strengthen the bond between Western institutions and administrators and similar personnel and institutions in Commonwealth countries who may be expected in time to influence public attitudes and in many cases to provide the governing elite in these countries. In the past there have been basic arrangements which have ensured the development of Western-educated and Western-trained personnel who developed a natural sympathy and understanding of Western ideas and institutions. These bonds are not being maintained as countries achieve political independence. Already the present leaders of Commonwealth countries in Asia and Africa are called upon to justify the Commonwealth association in terms of national self-interest. The coming generation of leaders in these countries may no longer be able to do so in clear conscience unless they too can be given some experience of the Commonwealth association in personal terms.

Apart from the question of improving contacts it is also evident that there is a particular need for administrators, political leaders, teachers and business executives who can participate in the formulation and management of more effective and dynamic programmes and thereby ensure productive employment of the growing reservoir of technically skilled personnel and other resources. "Unless economic development can go forward effectively on sound lines in the underdeveloped areas of the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth is not likely to survive." Indeed, it is in recognition of this problem that the United Kingdom has been giving attention to widening the scope and amount of technical training to be extended to the under-developed countries of the Commonwealth, although, as yet, the U.K. has placed rather more emphasis on technical training.

The present technical assistance arrangements do not meet this range of needs fully. Of course, most of the more well developed countries of the Commonwealth contribute to the U.N. technical assistance programme and will no doubt contribute to any new arrangements, such as the Special Projects Fund. Canada's contribution to UNETAP is $2 million a year; Canada is committed to a contribution to the Special Fund. Further, the United Nations Specialized Agencies provide some technical assistance from their regular budgets, to which Canada and, of course, other Commonwealth countries contribute. The United Kingdom makes substantial contributions of a technical assistance character to the Commonwealth on a bilateral basis as do other Commonwealth countries. There are a number of other minor technical assistance arrangements within the Commonwealth but by far the most important assistance offered by Commonwealth countries is through the Colombo Plan.

The Canadian Colombo Plan programme which is, of course, the most important Canadian programme is governed by the following criteria: first, the exchanges must be related in some way to economic development; thus the exchange of personnel in certain fields of critical importance to the underdeveloped countries is not included. Second, trainees must be nominated formally by their own governments and experts must be formally accepted by governments. Trainees are usually from government service and return to fill government jobs; intellectual competence above a certain minimum level has little bearing on selection.

Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Programme

At Montreal, the Canadian Delegation should take the initiative in seeking an agreement in principle for the establishment of a broad and reciprocal Commonwealth programme of scholarships and teaching fellowships as an instrument to strengthen the intellectual resources of the Commonwealth. Both the developed and the underdeveloped countries and dependent territories of the Commonwealth would contribute to this scheme so as to secure a substantial exchange of the ablest men and women, both to study and to teach, between the Western Commonwealth and the Asian and new African countries. The Delegation might propose the programme be established for an initial period of five years, after which there would be a comprehensive review.

A very important aspect of the proposal is that the Asian and African members would be encouraged to make some contribution. A reciprocal programme would emphasize that the western Commonwealth countries recognize that we need to know more about the new countries of the Commonwealth and that we recognize that they have much to contribute and the scholarships and fellowships would be open to the best candidates in each country, regardless of their fields of competence. The awards offered by any country should be open in every discipline in which suitable facilities are available. Candidates would not have to be sponsored by their own governments but would apply in their own right. This exchange of persons should be designed to develop the aptitude and knowledge of promising candidates in fields deemed most useful to future advancement of the countries concerned and to strengthening Commonwealth ties.

It is difficult to say at this time just how large such a programme would be. If there was general participation by all Commonwealth governments an annual exchange of one thousand or more individuals might be possible.

It is important that these awards be invested with as much distinction and prestige as possible. To this end, the awards should be made in each country by a committee established at the highest possible level. Such a committee would include representatives of each donor country in the programme as well as nominees of the national government and of the major universities. People who are successful in securing such awards must be of the highest calibre and they must gain wide recognition by so doing.

If some such programme as this were undertaken, the first awards could not take effect before September 1959 and would be possible only if arrangements are put in hand immediately after the Montreal Conference. To that end, the Canadian Delegation might propose a meeting of key Commonwealth educational leaders and government officials, to work out the details of such a programme promptly.

As for Canadian participation, the Canadian Government would specify for each country how many of the scholarships would be for under-graduate and how many for graduate study and in what fields we wish to receive teaching fellows. In many of the more under-developed countries, it is difficult to find candidates of ability to undertake graduate work; in other countries (e.g., India) both the candidates available and administrative considerations make it desirable to limit the awards to graduates and to look for senior personnel who would teach as well as study. Candidates who have already studied abroad in other Commonwealth countries, would, as a general rule, not be accepted.

Geographical Expansion of Technical Assistance

The Commonwealth Scholarship Scheme would extend to all the underdeveloped countries and areas of the Commonwealth. Consideration should be given also to the extension of technical assistance to Commonwealth countries not now receiving Canadian technical assistance (e.g. the emerging African territories). Such a programme would be similar to the existing Canadian arrangements under the Colombo Plan and for Ghana and the West Indies and would be limited by the same criteria.

There are a number of considerations which argue for or against extending the geographical scope of Canadian technical assistance now. On the one hand, there is an acute need to help countries before they emerge, when people can be freed for training, rather than after independence. There are, too, Canadian interests in territories such as Nigeria which would be furthered by extending help now. In broad political terms, the emerging African countries have a role to play in the settlement of international issues only less important than the role of the Asian countries of the Commonwealth.

We are already receiving hints that aid would be welcome from some of these countries, and some definite requests. There are not likely to be many such requests but our reasons for not meeting such requests are not very clear to the countries concerned. They are very much aware of Canada's ability to help other Commonwealth countries (Ghana, West Indies, etc.). In part, the need may be met by the Scholarship and Fellowship Programme. On the other hand, it may be desirable to hold back Canadian aid to emerging countries until they are fully independent.

In the light of these considerations, it is suggested that the Canadian Delegation should be authorized to indicate at the Conference that Canada is prepared to extend technical assistance to the Commonwealth countries not now receiving such aid if, in the judgment of the Delegation, such an offer is desirable, in view of the response of other countries to the Scholarship proposal, but in the light of such views on these matters as may be put forward by other delegations.

Financial and Administrative Considerations

Consideration would be given after Montreal, in the light of the response of other Commonwealth countries, to what sort of committee or agency would be necessary in Canada to administer the Canadian portion of scholarship and fellowship programmes. In the Canada Council, the National Research Council and in the Colombo Plan Administration we have of course considerable experience and a good deal of machinery which should be used in any new programme. As for setting up some form of Commonwealth mechanism, this matter should be one subject to be considered by the proposed conference of educators and Commonwealth officials. However, it should be borne in mind that experience with the Colombo Plan has been that the most effective exchanges of personnel can be arranged bilaterally. It is most important in practice to bring the professional people concerned in donor and recipient countries into close contact. A standing international secretariat serves only to introduce a complicating factor. This has been the experience with the Colombo Plan Bureau, which now contributes very little, if anything, to the Colombo Plan.

As for the extension of technical assistance to new areas the same administrative arrangements similar to those which have been developed in dealing with the Colombo Plan and the West Indies and Ghana would be appropriate.

As for the financial implications of these proposals, precise figures cannot be established until much more detailed study has been given to the scholarship programme, in particular. A Canadian programme of one hundred awards per year for an average duration of three years might involve expenditures of about three-quarters of a million dollars annually. It might be necessary for the developed countries to underwrite some of the costs of the under-developed countries' share — which would call for further Canadian expenditures. The technical assistance programme for countries not now covered (and subsuming the interim arrangements for Ghana) might involve, after an initial period of low expenditure, annual charges of the order of half-a-million dollars. These proposals involve Canadian charges, therefore, of the order of one to one-and-a-half million dollars.

Summary and Conclusions

(a) A programme of Commonwealth scholarships and senior teaching fellowships should be proposed by the Canadian Delegation to the Montreal Conference; the Delegation should seek agreement in principle to the setting up of such a programme and the convening of a conference of educationalists and officials to draw up detailed proposals for the programme to be initiated as soon as possible.

(b) The extension of Canada's technical assistance programme to under-developed countries of the Commonwealth not now receiving Canadian aid might be put forward by the Canadian Delegation at Montreal, if it is apparent that this would be needed and welcomed by Commonwealth countries.

Item II: COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIP SCHEME

38. Mr. LePan regretted that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not present to introduce the paper or comment on the New Zealand trade representations. The paper before the Ministers was the result of inter-departmental discussions; many of the ideas were attributable to Mr. Plumptre. Four considerations had been kept in mind in the drafting of this memorandum:

(i) Though the Commonwealth countries were not a source of surplus capital, they did have a surplus of educational and technical training facilities.

(ii) One important cohesive element in Commonwealth relations has been the similarity of educational background.

(iii) The scarcity of appropriate personnel in emerging countries limited proper use being made of the technical assistance that was available.

(iv) In modern circumstances one of the important ways that central governments can assist economic development is by providing training facilities

These thoughts had been in the minds of officials when they had learnt of the U.K. ideas on this matter. The paper should be regarded as an effort to accept and adopt Canadian thinking to the ideas current in Whitehall.

39. Mr. LePan said that the programme as outlined in the paper would differ from what had been done under technical assistance schemes now in operation in the following respects:

(i) Candidates would apply on their own responsibilities rather than being put forward by a Government body.

(ii) In selecting candidates, recipient countries would rely on their educational authorities.

(iii) The programme would aim at a high standard of intellectual promise and attainment.

(iv) The programme would have a broader scope than technical assistance programmes.

The scheme would be operated on a bilateral basis, though some minimal organization might have to be set up to establish connections between those seeking schooling and the donor countries providing the education.

The programme would be envisaged as a reciprocal scheme in which all Commonwealth countries contributed as well as received educational opportunities. If one hundred scholarships were offered per annum by Canada the annual cost to Canada at the end of the third year would be approximately $750,000.

Consideration should also be given to a geographical expansion of Canadian technical assistance to those Commonwealth countries not at present in receipt of such aid. At present, Canada was providing technical assistance to the Colombo Plan countries and to The West Indies and Ghana. Officials had thought that this assistance might now be extended to countries such as Nigeria and other territories in Africa and elsewhere. However, it might be advisable at the Conference to withhold announcement of the proposal until we had a better idea of what forms of technical assistance Commonwealth countries felt they needed and until we could assess the response of other Commonwealth countries to our scholarship proposal. If the two schemes were implemented, it would involve charges to Canada of about $1-$1 ½ million per annum.

40. Mr. Fleming wondered, now that this paper had been prepared, what would be the next step?

41. Mr. Plumpton thought that our scholarship programme had some affinity to U.K. ideas. The U.K. did not intend by September to reach finality as to the type of programme they could support. What was wanted at the Conference was an agreement in principle. Canadian officials had broached the subject of technical assistance at the June meetings in London, and U.K. officials had made few general remarks about a scholarship fund. The paper now before the Committee implied letting the U.K. propose their scheme first. If the U.K. scheme was found to lack substance, we could then put forward our proposals for a somewhat broader programme as comments on the U.K. ideas.

42. Mr. Plumpton said that he wanted to re-emphasize the presentational value of this programme. This would be a reciprocal scheme. Canadians would go to India, The West Indies, as well as persons from those countries coming to Canada. There might also be an exchange of prominent teachers and educators between the various Commonwealth countries. The technical assistance proposal of the U.K. presupposed that Canada and the U.K. and possibly Australia would be the only sources of such assistance.

43. Mr. LePan thought that if the broad outline of the scheme could be agreed on, then government officials, members of the Canada Council, the National Research Board and universities, could consider the details at a later date.

44. Mr. Fleming hoped that something fairly definite would emerge from the Montreal Conference. This paper had two conclusions that he hoped would be adopted. Would it be best to communicate our ideas to the U.K. and then, at the Conference, aim at arriving at some firm conclusions?

45. Mr. Churchill thought that the proposals should be put into final form and put forward at the Conference. It should not be difficult to work out the details from our previous experiences in this field.

46. In reply to a question by the Minister without Portfolio, Mr. Plumtre said that since the selection of personnel would, in part, be up to national authorities, there would be a tendency for students coming to Canada from underdeveloped countries to concentrate on technical subjects rather than the humanities. Mr. Plumtre wondered whether we should send our thoughts on this matter to the U.K. before we received their telegram on the proposals for a scholarship fund.

47. The Committee agreed that these proposals should be discussed with other countries after consultation with the U.K. A memorandum might then be prepared for presentation to the Cabinet.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE: COMMONWEALTH
SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS PROPOSAL

Cabinet Committee on Conference has considered proposals that Canada and the United Kingdom should urge agreement in principle by Commonwealth countries at Conference to a broad and reciprocal programme of Commonwealth scholarships and senior teaching fellowships. They envisage a plan under which all Commonwealth countries would both offer awards and receive these awards which might total a thousand a year or more and to which Canada might contribute 100 a year. These awards would not be limited to technical subjects and would carry considerable prestige; candidates would not be nominated by governments but would apply in their own right to national committees comprised of leading educationalists and other prominent citizens. Ministers attach very great importance to reaching agreement at the Conference that such a programme will be put in hand and to this end reaching agreement at Montreal to convening of a conference of educationalists and officials to work out the full details of a programme for submission to governments.

2. One reason Ministers wish to pursue this matter is that they know UK Ministers have been thinking along the lines of an expanded scheme of educational training in the UK for personnel from under-developed Commonwealth countries. They wish to advise other Commonwealth governments of Canadian views on proposal but they would not wish to appear to be attempting to pre-empt a field in which the UK has clearly had proposals in mind. They would therefore hope that warning telegram on UK proposals in this field will be received shortly. We do not have any detailed information on UK scheme but would hope that it would not be incompatible with Canadian proposals. We would prefer that Canadian views can be put forward as comments on UK telegram and thus make logical and feasible a joint UK-Canada initiative at the Conference in this important field to Commonwealth endeavour.

3. Please speak to UK authorities in the sense of the above and let us have their views urgently.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE — SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS

We have spoken to UK officials about your ideas concerning a programme of Commonwealth scholarships and fellowships. Their initial reaction was that these ideas are not incompatible with their own thinking although they were approaching the problem more from the point of view of reserving places in universities for Commonwealth students. Their own ideas are not yet very precise. Officials are working on proposals this week which would be considered by ministers next Monday (September 1). Unfortunately this means that their telegram will not be sent before September 1. Nevertheless I think they would prefer us to hold our message until theirs has gone forward.⁴³

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE — SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS

We have had further talks with UK officials. They have now decided that they can send out a telegram in very general terms to the effect that the UK government wishes to raise this question at the Conference. COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE —
COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS PROPOSAL

Canadian Ministers have welcomed proposals to initiate discussion in Montreal of scope for co-operative action to improve existing facilities for the higher training of Commonwealth students in other Commonwealth countries. Canadian Ministers have also been giving consideration to such a programme. The purpose of this message is to indicate our present thinking on these matters so that Commonwealth governments in considering UK suggestion can take our views into account.

2. Canadian Ministers have considered how best Commonwealth resources might be used to meet Commonwealth needs for broad and general training at the highest levels. They have envisaged a programme with perhaps less emphasis on technology than the UK appears to have in mind, which would provide for exchange of teachers as well as students and which would not be limited to purely academic disciplines. To this end it is proposed that Canadian delegation should urge agreement in principle at Conference of a broad and reciprocal programme of Commonwealth scholarships and senior teaching fellowships. All Commonwealth countries would both offer awards and receive awards, which might total a thousand a year or more. These awards would not repeat not be limited to technical subjects and would carry considerable prestige: candidates would not repeat not be nominated by governments but would apply in their own right to national committees comprised of leading educationalists and other prominent citizens. COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS

Discussed Canadian proposals with Moore, Assistant Under Secretary concerned, Department of External Affairs, and outlined them to the Departments of Trade and Prime Minister which latter deals with Commonwealth Office of Education and Commonwealth Granting Commissions. To date there appears to have been little consultation between departments concerned and Australian policy is still in the formative stage. Details of training in Australia under the Colombo Plan have been cabled to Mr. Casey in Washington who is expected to brief Mr. McEwen on Australian position.

2. Speaking on official level Moore said Canadian proposals seem to be more flexible and offer greater scope than the original UK suggestions. He emphasized however that Australia had just increased its scholarships under Colombo Plan from 800 to 950 at any one time and that there would be difficulties financially and with regard to university accommodation for any extension of present scholarships. Since June Australia has trained 1274 students and fellows from Commonwealth or Crown Territories under the Colombo Plan.

3. It is not repeat not in question whether Australia will have very firm views about proposals at Trade and Economic Conference but will probably point out that it is achieving some at least of the objectives already through its Colombo Plan training scheme.

MONTREAL CONFERENCE
COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS PROPOSAL

NZ Delegation to Montreal Conference has been instructed to support in principle the idea of a Commonwealth fellowship programme. They consider the concept has real merit and that such culture conscious nations (as?) India will welcome reciprocal nature of proposal. However, the New Zealanders are anxious to avoid making a firm commitment regarding the proposal at Montreal and would like a special conference of experts convened to thrash out the details.

1. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT: EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGES

Mr. Fleming (Canada) proposed that consideration of this item be limited at the current stage to one aspect of the problem of economic development, namely educational exchanges and particularly the provision of scholarships on a Commonwealth basis. The United Kingdom and Canada had shown a special interest in this matter which had also formed the subject of exchanges of messages prior to the opening of the Conference.

Lord Home (United Kingdom) said it was logical that the subject of technical assistance and scholarship training should precede the consideration of means of mobilizing more capital for development. It was clear that full advantage could not be taken of the opportunities for economic progress unless there was full recognition of the importance of the human factor in economic development. Professional and craft skills were the product of long and costly training and there was a shortage of technicians which was not confined to the less developed countries. Apart from the role which human resources played in economic development it was important to bear in mind that democracy could survive only in an educated society. However different the methods adopted by the communists might be, it was a fact that, at least in the field of technology, they had based their development plans on trained manpower.

The United Kingdom Delegation had circulated a paper outlining the assistance given by the United Kingdom in the training of students from the Commonwealth. The meeting might also be interested, however, in the general lines along which an expansion of educational opportunities in the United Kingdom was envisaged. They were aiming to double the output of qualified scientists and technicians between 1955 and 1970. They were also aiming to increase university places from 90,000 to over 130,000 within 10 years and the output of technical colleges from 9,500 to 15,000. In these plans the objective was to preserve versatility as a basic aim of education and not to put the emphasis too narrowly on technical education. Only in this way could the needs of a modern community be adequately served. The United Kingdom had been and continued to be ready to welcome students from overseas and especially from the Commonwealth and the Colonies. It was their hope that the expansion of educational opportunities in the United Kingdom would benefit the Commonwealth. There had already been an increase in overseas students from 10,000 in 1951 to 38,000 at the present time and two-thirds of these came from the Commonwealth. Between ten and twelve per cent of the places available at technical colleges and universities were thus held by overseas students. These facilities could be sustained only by a heavy subsidy; some three-quarters of the recurrent income of the universities derived from public funds. In addition a great many overseas students were completely financed by the United Kingdom. The university authorities had warned that if students from overseas were to derive full advantage from the facilities available to them in the United Kingdom a better knowledge of English was essential. English was already the international language of science and it was in the interest of the Commonwealth that it should be widely taught in all Commonwealth countries. Another aspect of this picture which should be considered was the training of teachers for service in other countries. There had been an almost insatiable demand for teachers in the Commonwealth. Their training could take place either in the United Kingdom or in the country where they were eventually to teach. The United Kingdom Government had made considerable efforts to attract teachers for service overseas because they attached the greatest value to the exchange of qualified teachers and had themselves benefited from such exchanges with Commonwealth countries.

The Canadian Government had given notice that they wished to put forward a proposal for Commonwealth scholarships. The United Kingdom would be eager to examine it. Whatever the outcome of that proposal, however, the United Kingdom delegation felt there should be a joint study with the object of improving reciprocal educational facilities that existed in the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom wished to consult the universities and other educational authorities with respect to these matters in advance of any Commonwealth meeting on this subject. It seemed appropriate, however, that such a meeting should not only examine whatever proposals might emerge from the Conference but it should also survey the whole field to assess the needs of the Commonwealth and the resources available to meet those needs. In this endeavour the United Kingdom Government would be ready to play their full part and they would also be prepared to bear their full share of the cost of any expansion of existing facilities. In opening the Conference, Mr. Fleming had said that the Commonwealth spoke with many voices but could in many matters speak with one voice. It was the hope of the United Kingdom that this would be one such matter and that the proposals formulated by the Conference would hold out to the youth of the Commonwealth a vision of the fuller life that could be the reward of Commonwealth citizenship.

Mr. Fleming, inviting Mr. Smith to present the Canadian proposals noted Mr. Smith's special interest in this subject since he had been President of the University of Toronto for a decade and had also served as President of the National Conference of Canadian Universities.

Mr. Smith (Canada) said that he shared fully the enthusiasm of his colleagues for the Commonwealth association and that he had already had ample opportunity of becoming aware of the importance of trade and economic matters generally in the conduct of international affairs. He was particularly glad to participate in the discussion of a subject of such far-reaching importance. He shared the view already expressed that this subject was closely related to economic development in that the policies that emerged from the present Conference would require human skill and human energy for their implementation.

Before outlining the proposals that had been formulated by the Canadian Government, he wished to make it clear that these proposals did not imply any weakening in Canadian support for the existing programmes of capital or technical assistance. On the contrary, the Canadian Government had decided on a substantially increased level of assistance which it was prepared to make available. Canada was acutely aware of the needs of under-developed countries for external capital if their economic development was not to be stultified and was prepared to do its part in helping to provide the required assistance. In considering the broad requirements of the less developed Commonwealth countries, Canada had come to the conclusion that there was a further way in which assistance might be afforded. Despite the capital assistance now being provided and the additions to this assistance that were contemplated, it remained a fact that the Commonwealth, as such, would not be able to generate large surpluses of capital for investment in economic development. On the other hand, Commonwealth countries were in a position to provide a surplus of educational opportunities and the Canadian proposals were designed to exploit this surplus in the interests of Commonwealth development. The present Conference was concerned with trade and economic development. It seemed to the Canadian Government that there were few things that central Governments could do to encourage economic growth that would be more useful than to assist in the expansion of educational opportunities. A growing economy inevitably tended towards greater complexity and this process of increasing differentiation and specialization clearly called for an increasing number of special skills. The object of the technical assistance schemes had been to train and provide specialists. On the other hand, an increasingly complex economic and social organism called for trained people of more general skills and aptitudes to exercise the qualities of judgment, insight, sympathy and intelligent synthesis that were clearly required in the process of economic growth.

The Canadian proposals had been formulated against this general background. Canada envisaged that the fellowships available would cover a broader range of subjects than those existing under the technical assistance programmes and would include the humanities and the social sciences as well as the physical sciences. Intellectual excellence would be one of the main criteria for the selection of candidates and, for this reason, Canada had in mind that candidates would apply on their own initiative and responsibility rather than be recommended by Governments. The process of selection might be carried out in each Commonwealth country by a committee on which universities and other learned institutions as well as Governments would be represented. While the size and scope of the scheme remained to be worked out, the Canadian Government would be prepared to offer 100 additional places a year at an estimated cost of approximately $1 million annually. If the scheme commended itself to other Commonwealth countries, the aggregate number of scholarships available at any one time might reach as high as 1,000. It was the hope of the Canadian Government that the scheme might be operated on a reciprocal basis although Commonwealth countries would inevitably share unevenly in the responsibility for providing scholarships and making available teachers for service abroad. In this connection he wished to pay particular tribute to the continued generosity of the United Kingdom for the opportunities it was providing for Commonwealth students. Canada was only too ready to acknowledge the debt it owed to the United Kingdom in this respect and he imagined that other Commonwealth countries were in a similar position. No doubt the United Kingdom would also be the most important partner in the scheme he was proposing, but Canada was anxious to play its full part. Without any thought of mathematical equivalence, Canada was anxious that it should also be established, as far as possible, on a reciprocal basis, and to have the privilege of sending some Canadian scholars to universities in the Asian and African countries of the Commonwealth as well as to the United Kingdom and others. The programme would have to be worked out with the leaders of universities and other learned institutions. He had taken the liberty of giving a very general outline of these ideas to the Congress of the Association of Universities of the British Commonwealth earlier this month. The reaction at that time suggested that they would have enthusiastic support from the learned communities in Commonwealth countries. In due course their co-operation would no doubt be necessary in working out the details of a Commonwealth scholarship scheme. In the meantime the Conference should be in a position to agree on the principle of establishing such a scheme and to set in train arrangements for the convening of a meeting at which more specific form could be given to the proposals that had been put forward.

The educational opportunities which so many members of the Commonwealth had enjoyed in the United Kingdom had provided a cohesive factor in terms of a common recognition of certain ideas and goals. At the same time the tradition of British universities had been to encourage individuality of thought and it was this blend of unity and diversity that was such a distinctive feature of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Fleming added that as Canada would be willing to make 100 scholarships available each year this would mean, on the assumption that most courses would last approximately three years, that at any one time between 250 and 300 such students would be studying in Canada.

Mr. Mustapha (Sierra Leone) observed that the question of development in the under-developed countries often seemed to be divided into two main compartments — economic development and development of basic social services. Although this distinction might have some validity in advanced countries, it was not one that could safely be employed in framing policy. Sierra Leone was amongst the most needy of those under-developed countries competing for the inadequate resources available for development. It had at present primary school places for only about 6 per cent of those of school age. The Government were convinced that in any country in that condition, more education was an integral part of economic development. They had been disappointed when the move to establish a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development fell through. It had been hoped that such a fund might have provided money for technical and even primary education schemes as well as for teacher training. But they appreciated that there had been cogent reasons for the failure of this scheme and were aware of more recent developments in this field. Sierra Leone was grateful for the help received from the United Kingdom for the expansion of education. However, much remained to be done. Sierra Leone had given education a very high priority in its development programme, as had other Colonial Territories. He earnestly hoped that the Conference would reach agreement for concrete and early action resulting in some significant increase in the resources available to such countries for their more urgent needs.

Mr. Amjad Ali (Pakistan) welcomed the proposals of Lord Home and Mr. Smith. Any scheme to encourage the pursuit of knowledge would have the wholehearted support of Pakistan, whose government would participate in it to the best of their ability. Lord Home had rightly emphasized the importance of an educated society to a healthy democracy. This was borne out by Pakistan's experience. The members of the Commonwealth owed a great debt to the United Kingdom for having given them two things of immense value; the parliamentary system of government and contact with the English language. The latter had opened the door for the accumulated knowledge of great writers, scientists and philosophers.

Pakistan was not yet able to provide even primary education on a universal basis. The demands for education were much greater than they were even 20 years ago. It was now necessary for example to provide schooling for girls.

Problems sometimes arose when students were sent abroad to more advanced countries to study. It took them some time to reorient themselves when they returned home and they were therefore not able to contribute effectively for one or two years after their return. There was also a wastage of foreign exchange when about 10 per cent of the total number of Pakistani students who went to the United States stayed in that country. As Mr. Desai pointed out technical assistance was not adequate in itself. People who had been trained to use advanced techniques needed modern equipment and facilities if they were to use the knowledge they had acquired. Moreover the techniques of the highly developed countries were not all equally useful to the under-developed countries. For example, many modern drugs were too expensive to enjoy widespread use.

Despite these problems, Pakistan still believed that it was vital to send students abroad and spent about $4 million a year to make this possible. Exchanges of students were also valuable, but even more necessary to Pakistan was the strengthening of training institutions in the country. Institutions within the country could provide facilities for a much higher percentage of the population than could go abroad. Some institutions had been established in the last few years, with external assistance, for example a business administration school and an institute of home economics. Mr. Amjad Ali agreed that a meeting of educational officials of the Commonwealth should be held to discuss the problems and proposals in this field, and emphasized that careful preparations should be made before it took place.

Chief Festus S. Okotie-Eboh (Nigeria) said that this subject was close to the hearts of the Colonial peoples. The efforts of the United Kingdom to develop the emerging countries so that they would be able to take their full place among the nations of the world was warmly appreciated. In considering development there was the problem of which should come first, education or capital. In the Nigerian view, education should come first. Lord Home's paper, describing United Kingdom efforts in this regard, was quite true to Nigerian experience, and he took pleasure in endorsing it to the Conference. He also endorsed the proposal for a Commonwealth conference on education. Such a conference had to include representatives from all countries so as to reflect the divergent needs of the Commonwealth peoples. As Mr. Amjad Ali said, it was essential that adequate preparatory work be done before the conference. Nigeria also welcomed the proposals of the Canadian Governments as outlined by Mr. Smith. He hoped the allocation of scholarships would be on the basis of need. Nigeria was a country of forty million people with only one university college and two or three other colleges of arts, sciences and technology. The teachers for these colleges were provided by the United Kingdom, but the Nigerian people would welcome Canadian teachers as well. The exchange of teachers and lecturers would also be very useful. One aspect of education of particular importance to Nigeria was the need of education for citizenship. Too often scientific and technological education tended to overshadow moral and religious teaching. The Nigerians wanted to emphasize such teaching, however, so that their people would be able to manage the affairs of their country efficiently and honestly. Teachers' training programmes would also be most helpful to a country like Nigeria which could not train teachers at home at a sufficiently rapid rate to meet its needs as it approached independence. He also thought it would benefit the whole Commonwealth if members of the various governments could visit each others' countries more often.

Dr. van Rhijn (South Africa) said that he had listened with great interest to the imaginative proposals which had been made for helping to meet one of the most urgent needs of the modern world. Through the United Nations programmes South Africa had played its part in contributing technical assistance but the need had continued to outstrip the available resources and South Africa had to decide which of the various claimants for assistance should have priority. Since the War, South Africa had had very extensive developmental needs at home, particularly in social and educational expenditure. This had left South Africa with little spare cash to aid in development outside its borders. Similarly, the country's own needs in the way of trained manpower put the utmost strain on the available supply. South Africa was grateful to certain Commonwealth countries for making training facilities available in their institutions to South Africans, a privilege which they hoped would continue. In considering how best to apply its scarce resources, South Africa thought that its prime concern should be with the area adjoining its own country. Mutual aid on a regional basis was not a new concept. One such helpful scheme which had been started in the post-war period was the Colombo Plan. The main new contribution of South Africa had, therefore, been through its more modest African counterpart, the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa south of the Sahara (CCTA). Present membership in this organization included Belgium, France, Portugal, Liberia, and four Commonwealth countries, the United Kingdom, Ghana, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and South Africa. For nearly a decade now there had been close co-operation in the scientific and technical field throughout the territories of southern Africa embraced by this membership. Within the region, too, there was a desperate need for more and more technical assistance, which the C.C.T.A. had attempted to meet by the establishment of the Foundation for Mutual Assistance in Africa south of the Sahara (F.A.M.A.). The aid envisaged in this scheme was in terms of technical training, the lending of experts, and the provision of equipment. The scheme was not limited to the members of the C.C.T.A. and other countries within the area could derive benefit from it if they wished. Similarly, other non-member countries could make useful contributions. However, the value of F.A.M.A. would no doubt mainly depend on the contributions of the members of the C.C.T.A. Apart from an initial payment to the working capital of F.A.M.A., South Africa had also pledged itself to make a substantial contribution by way of technical assistance itself. South African universities were experiencing acute pressure on their available space, and for this reason it was not possible for South Africa to match the generous offer of training facilities made by Canada and the United Kingdom. It had been possible in the past for South Africa occasionally to make arrangements for students from other countries to train in South Africa, and it was hoped that this could continue to be done. In the distant future South Africa might be able to provide other facilities for higher education. He was particularly interested in Mr. Smith's proposal and saw great merit in it. This proposal would be carefully considered in consultation with the South African university authorities. It appeared to offer a promising method of partly bridging the gap between the less and the more developed members of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Shah (India) welcomed the United Kingdom and Canadian proposals for greater training facilities and educational exchanges among the Commonwealth countries. India had, for a long time, stressed the importance of education and had done everything in its power to develop the various fields of education in its country. It was planned that by the end of 1966 compulsory primary education would be available to all children. Not only was the life of a technologist or a teacher longer than the life of most capital goods; these trained people also had a social and spiritual significance in the community. He paid tribute to the assistance which the more advanced countries had given to India, particularly through the Colombo Plan, the U.N. Technical Assistance Programme, United States Technical Co-operation Programme and the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations. He expressed special appreciation to Canada, Australia, and New Zealand for the training and facilities they had provided. India itself had also been able to make a contribution in this field. Since the beginning of the Colombo Plan in 1951 India had provided 885 places in schools and universities to people from other countries.

The problem of under-developed countries was to develop as quickly as possible. Countries like India needed accelerated training courses aimed at providing skilled workers as quickly as possible. One of the greatest needs for India was the development of a middle class in industry with technical training that could operate at floor and shop management levels. A successful scheme of this kind for the rapid training of technical people had been set up by the late Ernest Bevin during the last war. Mr. Shah thought the selection of scholars under the Canadian proposal should be made by an association consisting of the representatives of the Governments concerned. Such a Board would be in a better position to select the right kind of people. He was glad to see the very significant role that teacher training would play in the United Kingdom and Canadian proposals.

One other aspect of the problem of developing educational facilities in the Commonwealth deserved particular attention: the need of expanding educational institutions themselves. He hoped that the plans envisaged might include the expansion of existing institutions and the building of new ones within the Commonwealth countries themselves. He stressed the importance of having such institutions localized so as to provide the maximum facilities for the people of that country. India would be glad to participate in the proposed discussions and in preparations for them. To the extent that its resources permitted; India would be happy to make its own contribution to the scheme.

Mr. Macintyre (Rhodesia and Nyasaland) commented on the overwhelming importance of education to the Federation. He expressed appreciation to the United Kingdom and Canada for their proposals. The Federation had only limited facilities to offer in higher education. Two years ago a multiracial university had been opened and his country was grateful for the gift of £1 1/4 million which the United Kingdom had made to this institution. A substantial need remained for honours courses and medical training which it was hoped could be met soon. At present, scholarships covering first-degree courses were available and the Federation was anxious to see these extended since it was heavily dependent on educational facilities in the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa. Teacher exchanges with the United Kingdom had been undertaken and might usefully be expanded. In addition, the Federation subscribed to the organizations mentioned by Mr. van Rhijn. He welcomed the proposals which had been advanced and the Federation would do all it could to co-operate, given its limited facilities. In the immediate future, however, the Federation would no doubt be more on the receiving than on the donor side but would hope that its contributions could eventually be more substantial.

Lord Home felt that the discussion had indicated substantial agreement on aims and first steps. In making arrangements for the conference proposed in London, the views which had been expressed should be taken fully into account. On the Canadian scholarship proposal, he noted that although the total number remained to be fixed he saw some advantage in aiming at one thousand. The United Kingdom was prepared to provide half the places of the number finally decided upon, it being understood that these would include both scholarships and teaching fellowships at universities and professional and technical schools. The magnitude of the task faced in education was clearly very great but its value was fundamental. The Commonwealth should not rest content with this scheme alone. The suggestion made by Mr. Amjad Ali that educational institutions within countries should be strengthened was particularly useful and he hoped the meeting would give it favourable consideration. Lord Home suggested that consideration should be given to how the proposals which had emerged could be best highlighted and projected in the communiqué for public attention.

Mr. Coomaraswamy (Ceylon) said that education commanded special attention in Ceylon. Since education was free to all in Ceylon and the population was increasing rapidly, it was essential that further educational facilities be developed. He thought it important that such facilities in under-developed countries should be especially geared to employment opportunities. At present technical assistance usually went to people already employed in their field. The special virtue of the present proposal was that it would provide pre-employment training. Ceylon welcomed the proposal and would participate in future discussions on it. He assumed that the Canadian proposal would provide for the training of school teachers as well as for scholarships at the university level.

Mr. Vasey (Kenya) stated that the rate at which the East African territories developed toward their ultimate goal of self-government depended on their administrative and economic capacity which, in turn, was vitally dependent on education. The territories were making a great effort to increase their educational facilities. In Kenya, for example, 15 per cent of the central budget was allocated to education. It was especially important that the territories should be able to provide their own educated personnel without having to incur the heavy cost of importing them from abroad. In these territories it was not so much a question of expanding education as of laying the foundation for a sound system. For that reason the suggestions made by the United Kingdom and Canada were very welcome. He also wished to acknowledge the help which had already been received from the United Kingdom, the United States and India. Past experience with a programme in Kenya in which India had co-operated led him to support the Indian view that governments should have an important say in the appointment of students.

He supported Lord Home's point that there was a need to improve basic educational standards (including the teaching of English) so that existing schemes could be used more effectively. At present there was a dearth of qualified students for training overseas. This reflected the need for better teachers in the schools. Kenya could not afford to import teachers at present and he hoped the teachers' training side of Lord Home's proposal could be developed. A Commonwealth teachers' training college would be especially helpful to Kenya not only in improving education but also in bringing home the significance of the Commonwealth concept.

Mr. McEwen had found the discussion very heartening. A precondition for the objective of equality of opportunity for all men was equality of educational opportunity. The value placed on things of the spirit was one of the distinguishing features of the free world. Democracy could not survive unless it was based on educated populations. The Commonwealth could have no more effective cement than a sharing of experience in education.

Australia had been active in the field of education, although being a new country, it still lacked an adequate supply of institutions and teaching staffs. Australian capacity to give higher education was now under some strain. Indeed pressure on facilities for higher education had become so great that a restrictive quota had been applied to Australians seeking admission to some university faculties. However, Australia was trying to expand its facilities for higher education, and, as this expansion took place, the increased facilities would be shared with other countries.

Australian universities and technical schools now accommodated some 6,000 overseas students predominantly from Commonwealth countries in Asia, all of whom enjoyed some degree of subsidy. Since 1950, 2,300 students had been received under the Colombo Plan. Of these, 1,300 were from Commonwealth countries. In 1957-58 there had been a little over 800 Colombo Plan students in Australia. The Australian Government had now decided to increase that number to 950 in the present financial year. About 100 of these additional places would be taken by Commonwealth students. Australia hoped to be able to provide a progressive increase in the number of places available, more especially under the Colombo Plan.

Mr. Nordmeyer (New Zealand) said his country wholeheartedly supported the Canadian proposal in principle. It was natural that in the early stages the emphasis had been on technical and scientific training but he was pleased to hear that it was intended to broaden the facilities to incorporate the humanities and social sciences as well. Future discussions should not lose sight of Mr. Amjad Ali's emphasis on the need for great care in selecting candidates because of the danger of beneficiaries failing to recognize their obligations to their own country. In the past New Zealand had had many students from Southeast Asia in its universities and schools. Although the countries from which these students had come had benefited, New Zealand had also benefited greatly from the contacts which had resulted. New Zealand would do everything within its resources to expand and extend educational facilities.

Mr. Gbedemah (Ghana) welcomed the United Kingdom and Canadian statements. Ghana had been doing all it could to foster education at all levels since it considered education one of the most profitable investments it could make. Large numbers of private and scholarship students were studying abroad and Ghana was grateful for these opportunities. He wished to reiterate Lord Home's suggestion that teaching fellowships be considered in future discussions. One of the best ways of training university personnel was to have them serve as tutors for limited periods in first-class institutions. It would be useful if scholars from under-developed countries could have two or three years in senior Commonwealth universities as tutors before returning to their countries to teach. It was also important that teachers in developed countries should visit under-developed countries so that they would be familiar with conditions in the latter. The provisions to be worked out at the London meeting should allow flexibility so that adjustments could be made to meet the special needs of individual countries.

Sir Henry Lee (Malaya) also welcomed the proposals. Malaya had done much in the field of education and had especially emphasized teacher training. Its educational system was under considerable pressure because of a rapidly rising population and any scheme for extra facilities was welcome.

Mr. Fleming stated that the Conference had had a very useful discussion and that there seemed to be an impressive degree of unanimity of opinion. Proposals had taken fairly clear shape and efforts should be made to bring them to fruition as soon as possible. He had been especially impressed by the United Kingdom's concrete response to the Canadian proposal. In view of this, Canada had decided, on the assumption that there would be about 1,000 scholarships, to offer to contribute one-quarter of the cost of the programme. He suggested that a working party be appointed to explore the proposals which had been made. As Lord Home had stressed, the subject was important and should be well presented to the public. The working party might be mainly concerned with drafting a statement.

It was agreed that a working group of officials should be convened by Mr. LePan (Canada).⁴⁴

The meeting adjourned at 1:35 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIP SCHEME

I had a word about United Kingdom intentions in this matter with Mr. H.E. Davies of Earncliffe at lunch today. He told me that the following recommendations were currently under consideration in London:

(i) The Conference should be at official level, with advisers from Universities and other unofficial bodies.

(ii) The Conference be planned for 200-250 persons including delegates and advisers, and that their expenses during the period of the conference and any associated tour should be borne by the United Kingdom Government.

(iii) It should be held during two weeks in July with a tour of educational establishments during the previous week.

(iv) It should be held preferably in Cambridge, or failing this in Oxford; or failing this in Leeds or London.

(v) A distinguished academic figure should be invited to take the Chair.

2. I told Davies that I would be glad to discuss these recommendations with you after your return to Ottawa later this week. On a purely personal basis I told him that we had been thinking of a date somewhat earlier than July. In this connection it had occurred to us that the final two weeks of the Easter recess might afford us an adequate opportunity for whatever advance preparations remained to be made. I also said that I thought the prospective composition of the meeting to be numerically rather on the high side. In any case it seemed to me that, in accordance with the practice on which agreement had been reached, there would be no need for the United Kingdom to assume financial responsibility for the expenses incurred by visiting delegations.⁴⁵

3. Davies had little to add to the terms of the foregoing recommendations. He did tell me, however, that in thinking of an official rather than a ministerial conference the United Kingdom had very much had in mind the Canadian Government's position in respect of a conference dealing with education. The only other comment he made was that the authorities in London were actively exploring the possibility of holding the conference in Cambridge and they were thinking in that case of asking Lord Adrian, the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, to serve as chairman. Needless to say this was on the assumption that the conference would look to the United Kingdom to provide a chairman.

COMMONWEALTH SCHOLARSHIP SCHEME

As you will recall, it was decided at Montreal that a conference would be held in the United Kingdom early in 1959 to consider the Canadian proposals for a Commonwealth scholarship scheme and to review the existing co-operation between Commonwealth countries in the educational field.

2. Sir Saville Garner wrote to you on December 8† to let you know that the United Kingdom authorities were planning to hold the proposed conference at the official level with university and other educational advisers and that arrangements were being made for the conference to take place at Oxford from July 15 to 29. The preceding week is being set aside for Commonwealth delegates and advisers to make a tour of various educational establishments of particular interest in the United Kingdom. I understand that you had an opportunity of seeing Sir Saville's letter before your departure for the NATO meetings in Paris.

3. An interdepartmental meeting was held on December 23 to consider the terms of the United Kingdom invitation. Although, it had been our hope that the proposed conference might be held early enough in 1959 to enable the Commonwealth scholarship scheme to come into operation in the 1959-60 academic year, the meeting agreed that this might have proved impossible in any case and that there was a real advantage in moving forward on as broad a Commonwealth front as possible. Accordingly, it was agreed that we should concur in the United Kingdom proposal for a July date which clearly suits the convenience of the university advisers who are likely to be attached to the various Commonwealth delegations. A short reply to Sir Saville's letter accepting the July date is attached† for your signature,⁴⁶ if you agree.⁴⁷

4. The United Kingdom Government have expressed their hope that Commonwealth delegates and advisers could be their guests during the whole period of three weeks covering the conference and the preliminary tour. It was agreed interdepartmentally that this matter might be reviewed by Commonwealth officials who are due to meet in London some time in the spring under the aegis of the newly established Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council. As you know we have gradually been moving away from the practice where the host government covered the expenses of visiting Commonwealth delegations. The exception made in the case of the Montreal Conference was based on special factors which we do not think should necessarily apply to the proposed conference at Oxford. On the other hand, it may well be that the United Kingdom offer of hospitality was made to enable the under-developed countries of the Commonwealth to send adequate and representative delegations to the conference. In our further consideration of this matter we shall, of course, be guided by any factors that are likely to be relevant to the success of the conference.

5. You might like to know that an interdepartmental group has now been set up to deal with the Commonwealth scholarship scheme. The group has been charged with working out proposals for a pattern of co-operation with outside bodies like the N.C.C.U., the Canada Council and the National Research Council, formulating the elements of a Canadian position at Oxford, and looking into the administrative arrangements we may need on our side to implement the scholarship scheme. I shall, of course, be keeping you informed of the progress of the group's enquiry into these aspects of the Commonwealth scholarship proposals.

This is to confirm that on Saturday, August 9, the Prime Minister requested the Department to provide him with a tentative plan for a Commonwealth tour between approximately November 1 and December 15.

2. The Prime Minister would propose to begin the tour with a visit to London where he has certain engagements in the first week of November. He would then proceed by air to Karachi, going on to visit New Delhi, Colombo, Saigon, Kuala Lumpur, possibly Singapore, and Australia and New Zealand, returning via the Pacific to Canada.

3. The present status of this plan is preliminary in the extreme. I think the Prime Minister merely wishes to be advised whether a tour such as he has in mind could be accomplished in six weeks and approximately what proportion of the total time we would recommend be spent in the various countries visited. I do not think we have yet reached the stage where our Missions should be consulted.⁴⁸

PRIME MINISTER'S COMMONWEALTH TOUR — PUBLICITY THEMES

From discussions with Commonwealth Division, we understand that the Prime Minister's view of his tour is that its main purpose is to promote Commonwealth friendship and solidarity and not to discuss specific issues or to attempt to promote definite points of view on Commonwealth problems. A single theme for publicity emphasis would probably not, therefore, be appropriate.

2. Our information efforts in countries to be visited might be designed to focus attention on the following points:

(1) From the time he assumed office, the Prime Minister has continually spoken of the value of the Commonwealth association and has sought to strengthen its ties and to improve relations between its members.

(2) By means of the tour, the Prime Minister wishes to become familiar with the other Commonwealth countries and to renew and establish friendships with their leaders and top officials.

(3) Canada's desire to expand opportunities for mutually profitable trade among Commonwealth countries, as illustrated by its initiative in sponsoring the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

(4) Canada's interest in the fostering of industrial development in several of the Commonwealth countries.

⁴⁸ Les plans en vue d'un tour du monde ont été achevés par le ministère des Affaires extérieures et approuvés par le premier ministre Diefenbaker, le 19 août 1958. Entre le 29 octobre et le 14 décembre, il était prévu que le premier ministre, après avoir quitté l'Amérique du Nord à partir de New York, se rende au Royaume-Uni, en France, en Allemagne, en Italie, au Saint-Siège, au Pakistan, à Ceylan, en Malaisie, à Singapour, en Australie et en Nouvelle-Zélande. On a ajouté au tour un bref arrêt en Indonésie à une date ultérieure, et la visite en Nouvelle-Zélande a finalement été écourtée de trois jours à la suite d'un rapport sur la maladie de la mère du premier ministre Diefenbaker. Voir Robinson à Smith, le 19 août 1958, MAE/12687-40.

Plans for a world tour were completed by the Department of External Affairs and approved by Prime Minister Diefenbaker by August 19, 1958. Between October 29 and December 14, the Prime Minister, after leaving North America from New York, was scheduled to visit the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, the Holy See, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya, Singapore, Australia and New Zealand. A brief stop in Indonesia was added to the tour at a later date and the New Zealand visit was ultimately shortened by three days as a result of a report of the illness of Prime Minister Diefenbaker's mother. (5) Canada's role as a leading middle power which has advanced from colonial status to a constructive position in world affairs.

(6) The importance of strengthening the Commonwealth idea through political and economic action as a bulwark against the threat of Communist imperialism.

3. In the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, points 1, 2, 3 and 6 might be stressed, with greater emphasis on points 1, 2, 4 and 5 in the Asian countries, but the general information programme in all countries should take all six points into account.

4. Information efforts in the Commonwealth countries not to be visited should also be built around the suggested general programme and aimed at pointing up Canada's firm adherence to the Commonwealth idea and its desire for more points of contact with all members.

5. In West European countries, the Prime Minister's tour might be presented as further evidence of Canada's role as a leading middle power in world affairs, with the Commonwealth emphasis placed in the context of the other international organizations in which Canada is active — particularly NATO and the United Nations.

6. In the United States and in Latin America, the occasion of the visit provides a new opportunity to explain Canada's relationships with the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries. Points 5 and 6 might also be emphasized.

7. Following the lines of our memorandum of September 3† (on the method of publicizing the visit), these themes would each be supported by suitable reference material which could be used by each mission according to its own estimate of the effectiveness of each available item. Missions would be encouraged to use or rewrite the material as they saw fit, to ensure its maximum effectiveness, following the themes outlined.

8. Commonwealth Division has concurred in these recommendations. Your approval of these lines of approach is now sought, in order that we can prepare the appropriate material and send it out to our posts at an early date.⁵⁰

PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH THE SECRETARY GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The Prime Minister's meeting with the Secretary-General on October 29 lasted for 45 minutes. The conversation covered the Mideast, disarmament, China and the UN peace

⁵⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

We are sending a copy to Mr. Robinson for his comments M. C[adieux] forces. The Secretary-General was alone; the Prime Minister was accompanied by the Honorable W.J. Browne and Robinson.

2. Mideast. In reply to the Prime Minister's request for comments on the situation in the Mideast, the Secretary-General said that in general it was surprisingly stable, subject however to two important qualifications: the internal situation in Jordan and the delicate balance of political forces in Cairo. The Secretary-General spoke about the precarious health of the régime in Jordan, both from the point of view of internal security and of the uncertainty of what might happen from outside should the present leadership be overthrown. He thought it was just possible that Hussein and Samir might manoeuvre into more liberal channels, thus taking some of the steam out of latent revolutionary pressures.

3. Speaking of Egypt, the Secretary-General said that — as of this moment — he was "very uncertain" about the political balance in Cairo. Without mentioning names, he implied that Fawzi's position was disturbingly weak, and that the helpful influence which he had been exerting might be in serious danger of being submerged. He thought that this could have most unfortunate repercussions since Nasser was apt to reach conclusions more as a result of pressures and counter-pressures on him rather than on the basis of his own independent political thinking.

4. The Secretary-General did not repeat not think that the Western countries had irrevocably lost the opportunity to improve their standing in Egypt by means of economic or financial assistance, although he fully acknowledged the propaganda success which the Soviet Government had recently achieved over the Aswan Dam Project. He thought that the best hope of making progress with the Egyptians and in the Mideast generally lay through exploitation of the material and mediatory resources of organizations such as the International Bank.

5. Disarmament. In reply to the Prime Minister's question, the Secretary-General said that he was frankly pessimistic about the forthcoming round of talks in Geneva. The Russians' aim was to achieve a ban on tests while giving no concessions on production and as little as possible on control. They apparently hoped that they might, assisted by divisions in the Western position and by pressures of public opinion, force the West into accepting cessation rather than the mere suspension of tests. He thought that since the West would not repeat not be prepared to make an unrequited concession of this scope there was little hope of anything more than minor technical agreements related to the control of test suspension.

6. The Secretary-General said that in view of the dim prospects for the success of the Geneva talks it was important to try to foresee the next step. He thought that the most likely Soviet move after Geneva would be to revive the idea of a Summit meeting, this time with the stress on disarmament. If this happened we might easily be catapulted into a Summit meeting in the spring. It was, therefore, very important that as soon as it became clear that the Geneva talks were not repeat not likely to be successful some means be found for the West to take the initiative in establishing contact with Khrushchev. He did not repeat not know how this could be achieved without going through the paraphernalia of a Summit Conference, but he was sure that such a move from the West would be valuable in forestalling a Soviet campaign for a spring Summit meeting. He seemed to be open to such an initiative being channeled through the UN.

7. The Prime Minister asked whether any of these discussions on disarmament were meaningful without the participation of China, and the Secretary-General readily rejoined that Soviet policy was heavily influenced by consideration of China's interests. He thought that this had been the main factor in the change in the Soviet position on the Summit meeting earlier this year and he thought it likely that if some approach were made to Khrushchev about disarmament, Khrushchev would feel himself in the position of having not repeat not only to consult Mao but to urge Peking's participation in any high-level talks that might be arranged.

8. The Secretary-General's remarks about an approach to Khrushchev were couched in the most oblique language and permitted no clear inference as to the procedural steps which he had in mind. The only conclusion we can draw is that he was telling the Prime Minister that in his view existing machinery for the discussion of disarmament does not repeat not correspond to the requirements of the moment.

9. China. On being asked for his views on the recognition issue, the Secretary-General said that as he saw it, the Western world would sooner or later have to accept Communist China; there was no prospect of its de-communization. As the recognition issue came to be "a stronger negative influence" in international affairs, so it became for the USA more and more a question of face. He had no repeat no doubt that it would have been better to recognize Peking three years ago than to do it now; similarly, it would be better to do it now than three years from now. He thought we should get what advantages there were from prompt recognition, while accepting and doing our best to minimize the disadvantages.

10. In response to the Prime Minister's enquiry, the Secretary-General said that there were two sides to the argument about the effect which recognition of Peking would have in Southeast Asia. He was sure that in the majority of cases (excepting the Philippines, South Vietnam and the Chinese Nationalists) Asian Governments would be relieved if recognition of Peking became more widespread. In 1955, the then President of Burma had reacted very strongly when the Secretary-General had suggested to him that Chou En-Lai's talk about recognition and representation in the UN was mainly for propaganda effect. The President had said that the Secretary-General was quite wrong if he thought this; that Chou was extremely sensitive to being regarded and treated as a pariah, and that Burma would sleep more soundly the moment Peking was admitted to the UN. The Secretary-General thought that this was a significant illustration, coming as it did from an Asian source friendly to the West.

11. The Secretary-General gave it as his opinion that this will probably be the last year in which the USA Government manages to keep Peking out of the UN. He thought it was only due to very heavy pressure exerted on the Latin American delegations that the moratorium resolution succeeded at the beginning of the current Assembly.

12. The Prime Minister asked the Secretary-General what solution he saw for the position of Formosa in the event that the Chinese seat in the UN were to be assumed by the Peking Government. The Secretary-General said that if Peking took over the Chinese seat there was a clear-cut moral obligation to do something about Formosa (the "loose piece"). He spoke of a possible referendum leading perhaps to a State called Formosa, but he freely acknowledged that he had no idea of how this procedural problem vis à vis the UN might be solved.

13. Peace Force. The Prime Minister enquired about the current discussions in the UN on the peace force. The Secretary-General ran over the reasons why it was necessary to move slowly. He said that in his last talk with Fawzi he had discussed the form of resolution which should be aimed at. Fawzi had said that the Secretary-General must choose between a suit and a straitjacket. Better ask for a suit, or even just a loose shirt this year in anticipation of adding the pants next year. Fawzi had asked the Secretary-General if it was correct that nothing would stop the Secretary-General from pursuing his studies except a resolution telling him to stop. Hammarskjöld had answered affirmatively and, he said to the Prime Minister, would be perfectly content with a very vague formula which allowed him discretion to pursue his examination with member governments. It was far too much to hope at this time for a formal recognition of the principles in his report.

14. This message has been approved by the Prime Minister.

PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH MR. MACMILLAN

At Mr. Macmillan's suggestion the two Prime Ministers met for one hour in private on October 31 at 10 Downing Street. The following notes are based on Mr. Diefenbaker's account immediately following the meeting.

2. De Gaulle and NATO. Mr. Macmillan explained that there had been delay in informing the Canadian Government of de Gaulle's letter because in its original form it was a private message which Mr. Macmillan had not at first felt free to communicate to others.⁵¹ The message had consisted, Mr. Macmillan said, of personal observations and should not be construed as a concrete proposal. Mr. Macmillan was uncertain in his mind as to exactly what objective de Gaulle had had in mind in sending the message as he must have been aware that it would arouse strong misgivings in many quarters. The element of prestige was doubtless prominent and if only for this reason it was important that the reaction of France's allies should be tactfully expressed. Mr. Macmillan thought that by placing the emphasis on the desirability of improved methods of political consultation among NATO members it should be possible to smooth over the situation arising from de Gaulle's initiative. Mr. Diefenbaker indicated his intention of raising the matter in his forthcoming talks with de Gaulle.

3. China. There was a general discussion of the current situation.⁵² Mr. Macmillan remarked on the growing problem of countries divided by de facto boundary lines. He speculated on the advantages of accepting these divisions. Some such solution was essential if the anomaly of the exclusion of, for example, West Germany or mainland China from the UN was to be removed.

4. The Prime Minister gave Mr. Macmillan an account of his discussion with Mr. Hammarskjöld (London telegram 4104 of October 30). Mr. Macmillan said that whatever might be the other arguments regarding recognition the UK's experience indicated that the mere act of recognition was not necessarily a point of departure for increased trade with the mainland.

⁵² Voir le Volume 25, chapitre III./See Volume 25, Chapter III.

5. Pakistan. The Prime Minister stated his intention to proceed with his visit to Pakistan as scheduled. Mr. Macmillan admitted uncertainty as to the significance of Mirza's replacement by Ayub Khan. The latter's early background suggested an affinity to the West but the real circumstances of his accession to power and the character of his support in the country could not easily be assessed.⁵³ Mr. Macmillan thought that the possibility of a settlement on Kashmir depended largely on a successful solution of the canal waters problem.

6. Guinea. The Prime Minister confirmed to Mr. Macmillan that the Canadian Government had taken the decision to recognize subject only on the point of timing to similar action by the UK and the USA. Mr. Macmillan explained that the UK's position, although not in doubt on the principle of recognition, had been complicated by procedural problems which he expected would be solved very shortly. The exact terms and timing of UK recognition were thus undecided.

7. Cyprus. Mr. Macmillan said he was quite satisfied at the prospect of a debate in the General Assembly on the Cyprus question.⁵⁴ An appropriate Assembly resolution might help to bring about a conference on Cyprus.

8. Royal Visit to Canada 1959. Although the Prime Minister's main discussion will be with Sir Michael Adeane, he informed Mr. Macmillan in general terms of the plans for the visit, confirming the Canadian Government's approval of a side visit by the Queen to Chicago. (At the Pilgrim's dinner on October 28⁵⁵ the Prime Minister spoke similarly to Mr. Dulles, adding that he hoped that the Queen would not be invited to go elsewhere in the USA). The Prime Minister also informed Mr. Macmillan of the proposal that some fifty ratings and two or three officers from the RCN should form part of the crew of the Royal yacht during the tour in Canadian and American waters.

PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN, NOVEMBER 3

Following is the agreed record of Prime Minister's conversation with Prime Minister Macmillan on November 3, 1958. This record was prepared by the UK side and has been approved by Mr. Diefenbaker. Supplementary notes on some topics may be forwarded when there has been an opportunity to compare the agreed record with our own notes taken at the time. Mr. Diefenbaker was accompanied by Mr. Drew and Robinson. Mr. Macmillan had with him Lord Home and Messrs. Orme of the Cabinet Office and de Zulueta. The conversation lasted one hour and a quarter.

Text Begins:

Mr. Macmillan, welcoming Mr. Diefenbaker, said that he was sure that the present meeting, at the beginning of Mr. Diefenbaker's tour to many other Commonwealth and foreign countries, would provide a valuable exchange of views on matters of common interest to the Canadian and UK Governments.

1. Mr. Diefenbaker's Visit to Paris

(i) General de Gaulle's NATO Proposals

Mr. Macmillan said that he felt that General de Gaulle, when he saw Mr. Diefenbaker on November 5, while not repeat not perhaps insisting on proposals in the form he had originally outlined, would probably stress the importance which he attached to increased recognition of the part which France, as a world power, should play in the affairs of the free world. The emphasis which General de Gaulle had originally placed on institutional reforms was foreign to the Anglo Saxon mentality, and he felt that there was a danger that, if the original suggestions were pressed, they could have a serious effect on the attitude of several other countries towards NATO. He was increasingly concerned, following the information he had received from the Pay Master General on the recent meetings of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation in Paris, at the prospect that the attitude which the French were now adopting on the FTA might be a least partly due to the idea that this would eventually enable them to drive a bargain on their NATO proposals.⁵⁶ No repeat no doubt General de Gaulle was also influenced by a desire to maintain a firm position pending the forthcoming French elections. However, there was a real danger that if the claim for a special French position in NATO were pressed too far it could have a most serious effect on the Alliance. Without suggesting that it would be desirable, at this stage, to make substantive criticisms of the French proposals, (the exact nature of which was not repeat not clear), he felt that it would be most helpful if Mr. Diefenbaker, when he was in Paris, could endeavour to find out more precisely what was in the General's mind on this important subject. Any such information would be particularly valuable, in view of the visit of M. Couve de Murville, the French Foreign Secretary, to London November 6.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he would be glad to make soundings on the lines suggested by Mr. Macmillan. Should General de Gaulle refer specifically to proposals for a special French position in NATO, he would be obliged to indicate his objections. Public opinion in Canada would be specially critical on this point, since the Canadian Government had throughout kept all its NATO undertakings, whereas it was felt that the French had withdrawn forces which were committed to the Alliance.

Negotiations concerning the establishment of a Free Trade Area in Europe had broken down in the autumn of 1958. See Chapter IV, Part 1.

(ii) Algeria

Mr. Macmillan said that he thought it was probable that, if General de Gaulle were asked about the adverse effect on NATO of the removal of large numbers of French forces to Algeria, he would say that French forces in Algeria were undertaking a role, on the African flank of NATO, that was essential to the security of the Alliance. He might also refer [to] the importance of consolidating the unity and economic strength of the French empire; General de Gaulle was understandably impressed, in his attitude to Algerian problems, by the economic importance of obtaining oil from the Sahara.

2. The Middle East

(i) Armament Supplies to Israel

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the Israeli Government had recently requested the supply of some aerial torpedoes from Canada and he would be grateful to know, in the present circumstance of the Middle East and in view of the supplies which the UK Government had recently made to Israel, Mr. Macmillan's views on the desirability of these weapons being supplied by Canada.

Mr. Macmillan said that in the changed conditions of the Middle East the UK had felt it desirable, in order to assist in maintaining a balance of armaments in the area, to allow the Israeli Government to take delivery of two submarines which they had ordered some time previously. Certain other small items had been supplied and the Canadian Government would also be aware that an agreement in principle (which was as yet secret) had been reached to supply a regiment of centurion tanks. The view of the UK was that it was preferable for the provision of arms supplies to Israel to be shared as widely as possible amongst friendly governments. He thought that it would be helpful for the Canadian Government to authorize the supply of aerial torpedoes which were probably wanted as equipment for fighter-bombers recently obtained from France.

It would be helpful if the governments concerned could arrange for closer exchanges of information, and for consultation, on future Israeli requests for armament supplies. The Commonwealth Relations Office would consider this with the other departments concerned and would in due course discuss with the Canadian authorities whether any improvements could be made in existing procedures.

(ii) Pakistan

Lord Home said it was possible that Pakistan, Iran and Turkey were considering the development of closer relations between their three countries, within the framework of the Baghdad Pact. The UK Government would be grateful for any further information about this possibility which Mr. Diefenbaker might be able to obtain when he met General Ayub Khan in Karachi.

Mr. Macmillan said that the new Iraqi Government had come into power on the strength of revolutionary influences which were nationalist, but not repeat not such as to subordinate its policy either to President Nasser or to Russia. The influence of Pakistan, combined with that of Iran and Turkey, might have a beneficial effect in encouraging the Iraqi Government to maintain an independent position.

(iii) Jordan

In reply to a question by Mr. Diefenbaker on possible future developments in Jordan, Mr. Macmillan said that it would have been impossible to leave British troops indefinitely in Jordan without increasing their numbers and laying open the UK to damaging criticisms in the UN and elsewhere. He hoped that an element of stability had been provided as a result of the difficult and delicate operations undertaken by British forces.

Some safeguard was provided by the UN "presence" in Jordan and it was possible that at present the other Arab countries in the Mideast would be unwilling to provoke the risk of intervention by Israel which might follow any attack on Jordan. In the longer term, however, the future of the country seemed problematic, since its economy could not repeat not be sustained without external assistance which the USA and UK were at present providing.

3. The Situation in the Far East

Macmillan said that, at the time when USA forces landed in Lebanon and British forces in Jordan, it seemed that the Russian Government had been alarmed at the prospect that these operations were the first stage in an attempt to obtain Anglo-UN military control in the Mideast area generally. This appreciation had probably led the Russians initially to attempt to cause a diversion by encouraging the Chinese Communists in the dispute in the Far East over the offshore islands and Formosa. However, subsequent developments in the Mideast, in particular the withdrawal of British and American forces from Jordan and Lebanon, had probably led the Russians to revise their appreciation and they might wish to exercise a restraining influence on the Chinese Communists; on the other hand, the apparent refusal of the Chinese Communists to consider the possibility of a solution to the problem of the off-shore islands, separately from the question of the future of Formosa, suggested that they had no repeat no particular wish to obtain an early settlement.

4. Cyprus

Mr. Macmillan welcomed the suggestion of Mr. Diefenbaker that the Canadian and the UK delegations to the UN should maintain close consultation with regard to the forthcoming discussion of Cyprus in the General Assembly.

5. Law of the Sea

Mr. Macmillan said that he hoped that the two governments in co-operation would be able to obtain agreement at the UN to the holding at an early date of a further specialist Conference on the Law of the Sea.

Mr. Diefenbaker agreed. He said that the Canadian Government hoped that it would be possible for the next conference to begin in February or March 1959 and that the Canadian delegations to the UN would continue to do everything possible to assist in obtaining the agreement of the General Assembly to this proposal at an early date.

6. Civil Aviation BOAC Traffic Rights at Toronto

Mr. Macmillan said that while Trans-Canada Airlines (TCA) had access to both Prestwick and London, the British Overseas Airways Corporation (BOAC) could at present only serve Montreal and not repeat not Toronto. The UK Government were anxious that negotiations about traffic rights for the corporation at Toronto should be initiated at an early date. In the negotiations, the Minister of Transport would be prepared to consider offering certain extra facilities in the UK to TCA in compensation for granting traffic rights to Toronto to BOAC; details of what might be offered could be given in advance to the High Commissioner's Office. The Minister of Transport felt that delay might make it necessary for the UK to suggest a review of the existing bilateral agreement.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the Canadian Air Transport Board were at present considering a submission for Canadian Pacific Airlines (CPA) to undertake operations across Canada which would be competitive with the services of TCA. He hoped that it would be possible to reach a decision on this submission before the end of December 1958, and the Canadian Government would then be able to consider the application for BOAC to have traffic rights at Toronto.

7. Trade

Mr. Macmillan said that he welcomed the progress that had been achieved in the direction of more liberal trade policies. Public opinion in the UK was not repeat not yet fully aware of all that had been accomplished, but the UK Government were most grateful for the assistance which the Canadian Government has given. He hoped that further progress could be made. In general it was essential that trade should increase; this was not repeat not easy in times of adversity, but efforts to capture the imagination, and support, of the uncommitted countries largely depended on the success of economic co-operation between the countries of the free world.

Mr. Diefenbaker warmly welcomed the successful outcome of the Commonwealth Economic Conference at Montreal. He said that up to date during 1958, Canadian imports from the UK had risen by two and one half per cent while their imports from the USA had declined by 14.9 per cent. This trend improved Canada's relationship with both the USA and the UK. In certain respects he knew that recent measures which the Canadian Government had been obliged to take had, at present, adversely affected imports from the UK, but the general aim of his government would be to increase trade with the UK.

A development of considerable significance at the recent Commonwealth Economic Conference was the general recognition of the true nature and dangers of the economic threat to independence posed by Russian aid. As a result there was evidence of a considerable increase of sympathy towards the Commonwealth idea on the part of several member countries.

8. World Food Bank

Mr. Diefenbaker said the Canadian Government felt that a World Food Bank might assist in making arrangements for the constructive use of food surpluses to benefit countries in need of them and that the USA Government was showing an increased interest in obtaining agreement on the disposal of surpluses in certain commodities. They recognized that it might not repeat not be a simple matter to obtain agreement on the functions of a World Food Bank and that recipient countries, in which surpluses could be used to raise a low standard of living, were not repeat not always prepared to welcome even unconditional offers of assistance. The Canadian Government were considering what specific proposals they might put forward and he would arrange for the UK Government to have detailed information, with an indication of the commodity which might be involved, as soon as possible.

Publicity

It was agreed that no repeat no communiqué should be issued at the end of the present meeting, but that the official press advisers would be instructed to say that informal discussions had taken place in a friendly spirit covering matters of common interest to the two governments. There should be no repeat no mention of the subjects which had been discussed.

PRIME MINISTER'S TALKS WITH GENERAL DE GAULLE

Prime Minister met with General de Gaulle for an hour and a quarter at Hotel Matignon with following present: M. Couve de Murville, M. Lacoste, M. Boegner, M. Lebel (interpreter), M. Dupuy, Mr. Crean and Mr. Robinson. General de Gaulle also had a tête-à-tête with Prime Minister for 35 minutes after luncheon. Following record of pre-lunch talks has been approved by Prime Minister.

1. After welcoming Prime Minister, General de Gaulle asked if he would care to start discussion. After saying how pleased he was to be in France again Prime Minister said he felt that there were few things that made difficult relations between France and Canada. There was however one particular matter which he wished to raise with the General. This particular matter concerned NATO and the memorandum which he understood the General had sent to President Eisenhower and Mr. Macmillan. While he had not repeat not seen this memorandum he gathered from various press reports that the General wished to have closer consultation with his allies rather than that he wished to propose a triumvirate. If this was a correct understanding of [the] General's proposals, Prime Minister was in entire agreement. He referred in passing to a remark made to Gladstone on a visit to the Pope in the 1880's when he had enquired how it was that the Church had survived over the centuries. He had been told that the Church had survived for three reasons. The first was consultation, the second was consultation and the final reason was consultation.

2. If on the other hand the General had in mind a triumvirate which would take decisions without consultation with members of the Alliance, and under which members of Alliance would behave like automatons, Canada could not repeat not accept his proposal. Such a proposal would be very hard to sell to the Canadian people. Moreover it would turn the Alliance virtually into an apparent military alliance which would have a bad effect on uncommitted countries and would present dangers to the West in facing communism.

3. General de Gaulle replied by first reviewing briefly the history of NATO. In 1947 there was a direct military threat posed by USSR as demonstrated by the coup d'état in Prague. It was therefore natural that NATO should have been formed in the way it was, and on basis upon which it was in fact founded. The threat at that time seemed primarily confined to Europe. Referring to present day, General de Gaulle said that NATO must remain as an alliance and be ready to defend common interests of its members. There were however particular problems, which faced France today and other countries, and which had not repeat not existed in 1948. In his opinion we must face the following realities: the political decisions were in fact taken by USA; the strategic plans of NATO were carried out by an Anglo-American High Command; the West was in the process of being integrated under USA leadership. General de Gaulle recognized and did not repeat not distrust USA leadership but he did not repeat not consider that the present methods corresponded to today's requirements. In 1947 it was not repeat not certain whether USSR intended to go to war or not. At present time however we were sure that neither USA nor USSR intended to go to war deliberately against each other. In these circumstances it was necessary to reach a modus vivendi between East and West, e.g., in Mideast and in the Far East. What in fact happened however was that problems of East-West relations were broached as though they were USA/USSR problems only e.g. the Mideast and more recently the problem of the offshore islands. He did not repeat not believe that this method of attacking problems could bring useful results. First he felt that France and perhaps other countries had a role to play in East-West relations. Secondly he felt that France's position had changed since 1947; he was hopeful that solutions would be reached of their problems in North Africa and he felt that unity had been re-established internally in France. The referendum held recently was evidence of this. In these circumstances he felt that France had a useful role to play in East-West relations without resulting in breaking-up of NATO. How then could one maintain the present particular working of NATO?

4. General de Gaulle referred to his talks with Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Dulles in Paris early in the summer when both Mr. Dulles and Mr. Macmillan had told him that neither country intended to land troops in Mideast. Troops were landed in Mideast however and France was not repeat not consulted. It was quite inconceivable that France or perhaps other countries could be committed to war without consultation and yet this was the position, when UK and USA took the action they did last summer in Mideast. He felt that the situation in the Far East might equally result in a commitment to war without consultation with USA's allies. It was for these reasons that he had written as he had to the President and Mr. Macmillan.

5. Prime Minister replied that we would certainly encourage better consultation but that he would like to make it clear beyond doubt that Canada could not repeat not accept (if General de Gaulle's proposals meant that) a decision given out by one, two or three powers, without any consultation. What plan did the General have in mind?

6. General de Gaulle rejoined that, so far as Canada was concerned, was it not repeat not true that we accepted decisions of the Great Powers with respect to Mideast, Far East and on disarmament? Was Canada prepared to accept such decisions? France was not repeat not prepared to do so. He said that he had proposed "conversations" to consider how consultations might be best organized. He had not repeat not put forward any detailed programme to the President or Mr. Macmillan. He was aiming to have talks to see how a new system could be organized.

7. Referring to NATO the General stated that it comprised a system of military integration which depended directly on SHAPE, which was in effect an Anglo-American organization. There were two drawbacks from France's point of view to integrated forces and an integrated command system. The first was psychological. The French people did not repeat not realize that they must defend themselves. The present psychology was not repeat not satisfactory. People had to be ready to defend themselves and not repeat not merely think that somebody else would do it for them. The second point was that the integration of France's armed forces in NATO was unsatisfactory, because of France's defence commitments outside NATO area. France had responsibilities in North Africa, the Far East and the Mideast. It was therefore impossible that France's defence policy should be based solely on integration of its forces with her NATO allies in Europe (which is its present policy) and that it should hence not repeat not have a separate national defence policy in collaboration with other powers which had responsibilities outside NATO area. NATO did not repeat not in the General's opinion fit the present requirement and France could not repeat not continue to accept such a system; some transformation must take place.

8. Prime Minister replied that so far as the psychology of the French people was concerned that was of course an internal problem for the French and one which however he fully appreciated. To extend the geographical area of responsibility of NATO would not repeat not however be acceptable to the Canadian Government or to the Canadian people. Such a development might call in question the continuation of Canadian military contribution in Europe which in present circumstances would certainly be maintained. Extension of the treaty area would in his opinion lead to the breakdown of NATO itself. He would go along with the General on question of consultation but was it not repeat not true that there were French commanders and integrated officers at all levels of the command?

9. The General rejoined "It is possible that NATO will not repeat not resist its own integration" (laughter). In a more serious vein, however, the General said what was important for France was that the NATO Alliance had been originally based on USA atomic capability which had subsequently been augmented by a British capability. The French now had all the means leading to an atomic capability, although he recognized that this would not repeat not remotely match USA capability. In light of this the question of consultation should be re-examined. This was one of the chief reasons why he had sent a memorandum to the President and Mr. Macmillan. He had not made specific proposals as to a plan but he had proposed talks and for the French it was the outcome of these talks which were the essential thing. He felt that the President and Mr. Macmillan accepted in principle the proposal for talks.

10. The General said that he had not repeat not given a copy of his memorandum to any other power but had given a copy personally to M. Spaak. It seemed however that everybody had read the memorandum now and that neither the addressees nor M. Spaak had kept the secret very well. In fact Mr. Macmillan had asked General de Gaulle if he could discuss it with Mr. Adenauer and General de Gaulle had agreed. French Government did not repeat not however propose to publish the memorandum nor to give it to other governments but he felt that pretty well everyone knew what was in it.

11. Prime Minister said that we only knew what had been discussed amongst the delegations of NATO. He hoped however that the proposals as he understood them would not repeat not be brought officially to NATO Council when it met in December, since he felt this would have the most adverse effect on the Alliance. General de Gaulle agreed and said that French Government had no repeat no intention of submitting them to NATO officially either now or at December meeting.

12. The General then said he wished to ask a question on quite another matter namely he would like to have Mr. Diefenbaker's views on the Common Market and FTA negotiations. What did the Prime Minister think about them first of all in general terms and second so far as they affected Canada.

13. Prime Minister replied that Canada was glad to see any action taken to draw Europe closer together both economically and politically but that Canada hoped that it would not repeat not be drawn together behind a protective tariff barrier. For our part we did not repeat not want to be denied traditional markets in Europe and we hoped that any arrangements that might be made under Common Market would not repeat not exclude agricultural products. Canada in general was in favour of greater trade amongst countries and while welcoming any action which drew European countries together he hoped it would not repeat not in any way impede the expansion of markets which was vital to the West especially in face of the USSR. He then asked what were the General's hopes with respect to the inauguration of the Common Market on January 1.

14. General de Gaulle rejoined by saying that so far as question of Canadian Government pursuing freer trade was concerned, what had Prime Minister to say about trade restrictions established by Commonwealth at its recent conference? Prime Minister replied that the preferences were not repeat not in fact of great importance. In 1932 the restrictions had been made at a time when we were facing a depression but most of the restrictions in 1932 agreements were now gone. The most important element was more of a sentimental character.

15. General de Gaulle replied by saying that "We are still back in 1932. We do not repeat not move as fast as your new country but perhaps in 26 years we will reach the point you are at now." Mr. Lacoste intervened by referring to the fact that there were still duties on French cars entering Canadian market whereas British cars entered duty-free. Prime Minister rejoined by saying that he realized there might still be matters for discussion such as entry of French cars but that we also could not repeat not disregard the fact that the French had a history of restrictive practices (e.g. import quotas) which we were not repeat not always happy about. He suggested however that we might usefully have talks about these matters.

16. General de Gaulle said that he hoped we would not repeat not forget that some of France's restrictive practices resulted from the exigencies of the economy as had ours in the early 30's.

17. The General then proposed that the meeting adjourn for lunch and that he should continue the talks after lunch if Prime Minister wished. Prime Minister said he would be delighted to continued the talks and that he had found it most useful to have this exchange directly with General de Gaulle in this atmosphere of complete frankness.

18. In Prime Minister's opinion talks went exceedingly well and ended on a very warm note.

19. It is perhaps important to note that nothing the General said could be taken as meaning that he had linked in his own mind his NATO proposals with FTA negotiations as suggested by Mr. Macmillan (see London telegram 4171 November 4).

20. For London — Prime Minister is arranging to inform Mr. Macmillan of general sense of discussion and in particular of the foregoing paragraph.

Dear Mr. Robertson:

THE PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH MR. MACMILLAN,
NOVEMBER 3, 1958

You have already received the agreed record of the Prime Minister's conversation on November 3 with Mr. Macmillan. The draft of that record was prepared in the United Kingdom Cabinet Office and, although in general it was a reliable account, I thought it might be of use to you and to the interested divisions in the Department to see an account based on the notes which I took at the time. My account does not cover all the subjects which were raised; I have omitted reference to those on which my notes add nothing to the agreed record.

I am sending copies of this letter and its enclosure to the Heads of the European, Economic, Middle Eastern, Legal and Commonwealth Divisions, and I would be grateful if they could be read in relation to London telegram No. 4171 of November 4. I am also sending copies to the High Commissioner in London and to Messrs. Léger, Dupuy, Reid, Mayrand, C.S.A. Ritchie and E.A. Ritchie.

[London], November 3, 1958

CONVERSATION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER DIEFENBAKER AND PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN,
10 DOWNING STREET, LONDON, NOVEMBER 3, 1958

The conversation began at 11 a.m. and lasted for one hour and ten minutes. Mr. Macmillan was accompanied by Lord Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and by Messrs. Orme, of the Cabinet Office, and de Zulueta, Assistant Private Secretary. With Mr. Diefenbaker were the High Commissioner, Mr. Drew, and Mr. Robinson.

De Gaulle's Letter on NATO in Relation to the Free Trade Area

Mr. Macmillan said that there were some indications that de Gaulle intended to use the contents of his letter as a bargaining counter. He thought it possible that on Couve de Murville's visit to London later this week (November 6), the French might offer to take a less rigid position on the Free Trade Area negotiations if the United Kingdom would make some concession in relation to NATO. He did not believe that de Gaulle would insist on an institutional reorganization within NATO, but thought that he would emphasize the global nature of France's overseas commitments with a view perhaps to securing some preferential role for France in the affairs of the free world. The United Kingdom Government were seriously worried about developments in the Free Trade Area and were naturally concerned to find out exactly what type of bargain, if any, the French might have in mind.

Mr. Macmillan, who said he had discussed the Free Trade Area with Maudling the night before, spoke in very critical terms of the French performance in the Free Trade Area negotiations and said that on his last visit to Adenauer he had found the Germans intensely irritated with the French. He went on to say that if the Common Market system, as seemed likely, came into effect on January 1, the United Kingdom Government might have to call a meeting with the Six and with Commonwealth countries, and subsequently Mr. Macmillan himself might have to have meetings with Adenauer and de Gaulle. He recognized, however, that the French position might be to a large extent explained by preoccupation with the forthcoming elections and added that the United Kingdom would await the elections in France before taking any further action.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that in talking to de Gaulle he would have to take a strong stand against any French attempt to achieve a reorganization of NATO. The reaction in Canada would be highly unfavourable to any such outcome, particularly in view of the diminution in the French military contribution to NATO forces in Europe. Mr. Macmillan again made it clear that the United Kingdom was equally opposed to any idea of a political directorate. He asked Mr. Diefenbaker whether, in view of the impending conversations in London with Couve de Murville, Mr. Diefenbaker would probe de Gaulle's intentions. Mr. Diefenbaker undertook to try to find out what de Gaulle had in mind and said he would let the United Kingdom authorities know the result.

*Export of Arms to Israel*⁵⁷

Mr. Diefenbaker referred to the representations which had been made by the Israeli Foreign Minister recently in Ottawa and to the pressure from Zionist organizations in Canada regarding Israel's application for aerial torpedoes. Mr. Macmillan sent out for advice and then gave a list of the military equipment which the United Kingdom had agreed to make available to Israel. In reply to Mr. Diefenbaker's enquiry about the most suitable course of action for the Canadian Government on the aerial torpedoes, Mr. Macmillan said that the Foreign Office saw no objection to this order being met. Mr. Macmillan remarked that the more the burden of supplying Israel was shared the better. He also said that the Foreign Office believed that the aerial torpedoes requested by Israel were probably required for use on fighter bombers recently supplied by France.

There was some discussion of the desirability of consultation between the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments on arms applications and Lord Home suggested that the objective might be to see that Israel was not supplied with too much equipment at any one time.

Both Mr. Macmillan and Lord Home spoke as if the recent United Kingdom releases had been approved in the interest of keeping the Israelis happy, bearing in mind Egypt's recent acquisition of two Soviet submarines and what they described as a marked increase in arms holdings by the principal Arab states. Mr. Diefenbaker gave no indication of what course of action the Canadian Government would follow.

Algeria

Mr. Diefenbaker's enquiry about the position in Algeria did not elicit a United Kingdom estimate of the prospects for a settlement. Mr. Macmillan said that on the basis of his last talk with de Gaulle the latter would be cold to any suggestion that the French were falling down on their NATO commitments by maintaining a large military force in Algeria. De Gaulle's argument would be that Algeria is an important flank of NATO and that in view of the Soviet challenge in Africa, France was serving NATO by not capitulating to the rebels. Mr. Macmillan also said that de Gaulle could be expected to express full confidence that with the triumph of the referendum behind him, he could settle the Algerian problem.

Guinea

The latest developments have been reported in a separate telegram, No. 4141 of November 3 from London. The only separate point worth recording is Mr. Macmillan's endorsement of the view that despite recognition by the United States, United Kingdom and other countries, it would be unwise to encourage Guinea's candidature in the United Nations at this time. Lord Home remarked in this connection that Guinea "may collapse."

⁵⁷ Voir volume 25, chapitre II./See Volume 25, Chapter II.

Law of the Sea

Mr. Macmillan expressed the United Kingdom Government's desire for a conference as soon as possible in 1959, preferably in February or March. Mr. Diefenbaker confirmed that this was also the objective of the Canadian Government. Mr. Macmillan agreed with Mr. Drew that preparations for fixing the date of the conference ought to be pressed forward. It was understood that consultations on the official level were being undertaken to this end.

Pakistan

Mr. Macmillan referred to the possibility of some closer arrangements being made among Pakistan, Iran and Turkey within the Baghdad Pact, and Lord Home wondered if Mr. Diefenbaker might explore the prospect of such arrangements on his visit to Pakistan. The implication of his remarks was that the United Kingdom Government were not sure of Ayub Khan's attitude towards such arrangements.

Iraq

Lord Home said that the situation in Iraq looked better from the Western point of view. He did not suggest that the Iraqi Government would align itself with any special relationship which might be worked out with Iran, Turkey and Pakistan, but drew comfort from the impression that the Government of Iraq was "nationalist, not Nasser."

Cyprus

Mr. Diefenbaker agreed to the desirability of working in the General Assembly for a resolution which would facilitate the holding of a conference on Cyprus.

BOAC Landing Rights in Toronto

Mr. Macmillan, after reviewing some of the background, said that the United Kingdom Government hoped that negotiations between the United Kingdom and Canada on BOAC landing rights in Toronto could be begun in December or January. Mr. Diefenbaker referred to the current hearings before the Air Transport Board on the application by CPA to compete with TCA on trans-Canada routes. He said that there would be no possibility of negotiations until after these hearings had been concluded. He added that the effect of granting landing rights in Toronto to BOAC would be to place a serious drain on TCA revenues. He said that the question would have to remain in abeyance for the moment. When the current hearings were completed, "we would be in a better position to consider the United Kingdom representations" and to discuss the matter. Lord Home wondered how long the hearings would last and Mr. Diefenbaker said he expected that they would be completed before the beginning of 1959. Lord Home emphasized the hope of the United Kingdom Government that negotiations could be initiated at the beginning of the year. The United Kingdom Government were "prepared to explore compensations in the form of extra facilities for Canada in the United Kingdom." He reported the view of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Watkinson, that the bilateral agreement would have to be "looked at again" unless negotiations could be started very soon.

Trade

Mr. Macmillan reviewed the state of Anglo-Canadian trade relations. He referred to the various measures taken by the Canadian Government in the past year. These were small but significant, and the United Kingdom Government were grateful for them, although their presentation to the public had perhaps not been impressive. He wondered if there were not further steps which could be taken such as "getting out of United States specifications as much as possible" (presumably with respect to defence purchasing). It was too soon to tell how much more could be done in the way of removing discrimination until the obscurity regarding the Free Trade Area was removed.

Mr. Diefenbaker referred appreciatively to the trade concessions by the United Kingdom and assured Mr. Macmillan that the action taken on valuation was an ad hoc measure and did not signify a trend in government policy. Mr. Macmillan said that the next year or two would be decisive. It was easy to go forward in boom conditions, but the effect of a recession was to encourage protectionism, and he was afraid that this in turn would seriously prejudice the efforts now being made by the free world to counter the Soviet trade and aid campaign among the uncommitted countries.

Soest, November 10, 1958

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Mr. Dupuy has already reported in his telegram No. 1245 of November 6 that the Prime Minister's discussion after lunch on November 5 with General de Gaulle was concerned with Algeria.

During the flight from Paris to Gros Tanquin on November 6, the Prime Minister gave me some details of this discussion and a note based on the Prime Minister's account is attached.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the heads of the European, Commonwealth and Defence Liaison (1) Divisions. I am also sending copies to Messrs. Dupuy, Léger, Drew, Mayrand, Reid, C.S.A. Ritchie and E.A. Ritchie.

Yours sincerely,

BASIL ROBINSON

THE PRIME MINISTER'S ACCOUNT OF HIS PRIVATE CONVERSATION
WITH GENERAL DE GAULLE, NOVEMBER 5, 1958

The Prime Minister met privately with General de Gaulle after lunch for 35 minutes.

The Prime Minister found the General heavily preoccupied with the problem of Algeria, and the General spoke, according to the Prime Minister, as if he was beset with worries and as if he was answering his own worries in talking about the various aspects of the Algerian problem. There was none of the calm confidence which the General is reported sometimes to feel about his capacity to secure a solution. Repeatedly he said that at least ten years would be required before real order could be established, and he was too old to see it through.

The Prime Minister was impressed with the General's profound sense of mission and with the fullness of his dedication to the service of France.

Although there is nothing specially new about them, it may be worth recording a few of the particular points which the General made in speaking to the Prime Minister about Algeria.

(a) It was a relatively straightforward transition from dependent status to independence in Tunisia and Morocco owing to the existence of an indigenous class of people to run the country. It was not the same in Algeria.

(b) The Arab peoples lack a genuine creative ability (in the sense of national development and organization) and accordingly French assistance in these fields will continue to be required in Algeria no matter what political changes take place.

(c) There was a special position in Algeria related to the presence of more than one million colons.

(d) The nominations from Moslem candidates for the elections in Algeria had not been received, but he was not worried about this because there was still some time to go before the closing date and one could not expect the Moslem candidates to offer themselves for election long in advance. It took great courage to accept such a nomination.

(e) There was a danger of spreading Communist influence if Algeria were torn away from France.

(f) Algeria was the southern flank of the NATO defences. French forces in North Africa were performing a vital service to NATO.

The Prime Minister did not extend an invitation to General de Gaulle to visit Canada. He said "When are you going to come to Canada?" The General said he was afraid it would be a long time; he had so many problems.

General de Gaulle told the Prime Minister that as a result of his first meeting recently with Chancellor Adenauer, he not only admired but liked him. There was no indication, in the General's conversation with the Prime Minister, that he was embarrassed by the fact that he had not informed Chancellor Adenauer at the time of their meeting of his intention to send letters about NATO reorganization to Mr. Macmillan and President Eisenhower. All that the General said was that Adenauer's reaction had been nothing like as strong as that of Fanfani.

The Prime Minister said that the General had often been referred to as cold and arrogant. These descriptions might once have been apt, but neither of them fitted the General now, in Mr. Diefenbaker's estimate.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIAL CONVERSATION WITH CHANCELLOR ADENAUER

Following from Prime Minister's party.

The Prime Minister has approved the following record which was prepared by the Embassy in Bonn and checked with the notes of the German interpreter of the official conversation on November 7. We hope to send some supplementary notes† on a private talk between the Chancellor and the Prime Minister.

Herewith repetition of Bonn telegram 545 November 11. Text Begins:

The Prime Minister's conversation with Chancellor Adenauer on the afternoon of November 7 lasted for two hours. With the Chancellor were Dr. Von Brentano, Dr. Globke (State Secretary to the Chancellor), Dr. Van Scherpenberg (State Secretary in Foreign Office), Professor Hallstein (part time), Chairman of the European Economic Commission, Herr Von Etdorf (part time) and the Official Interpreter Weber. With the Prime Minister were Messrs. Reid, Robinson and Stephens.

2. The meeting began with a short exchange of courtesies after which the Chancellor explained that Professor Hallstein happened to be in Bonn and he had thought that it would be useful both for the Prime Minister and himself to hear directly from the Chairman of the European Economic Commission something of the recent developments and prospects for the Free Trade Area. As Hallstein's time was limited, the Chancellor suggested the conversation begin with this subject. Dr. Van Scherpenberg who had attended recent sessions of the Maudling Committee might wish to add something to Professor Hallstein's exposition.

3. The Prime Minister greeted the opportunity to hear Professor Hallstein's comments and views and said he was conscious of the great importance of the crisis which had arisen from the unsatisfactory results of the negotiations in Paris.

4. Professor Hallstein said that he could not repeat not add anything substantially new about the FTA. A very acute situation had developed in the meetings last week. The European Economic Commission had been giving active support to the FTA negotiations and he would try to indicate how the Commission saw the situation, particularly the apparent Anglo-French impasse. The Prime Minister welcomed this proposal. Dr. Hallstein said that the difficulties which had been encountered were not repeat not unexpected. It had become obvious last March that it would be practically impossible to achieve an FTA treaty by January 1, 1959. He had discussed this probability very frankly with the British and had sought to devise some interim solution, such as providing that the same tariffs would govern for the FTA as for the European Economic Community.

5. At this point Chancellor Adenauer interjected that Mr. Macmillan had told him recently that if the EEC came into effect on January 1 without having made an interim agreement with the UK there was real danger that Europe would be divided into two camps in the economic sphere.

6. Professor Hallstein said that he wished strongly to avoid the necessity after January 1 of treating the imports of the OEEC countries outside the Common Market differently from those of the Six. He thought therefore that there was no repeat no basic difference between the attitude of the UK in this regard and that of the EEC Commission. Professor Hallstein then said that some distinction had to be made between the basic causes of the difficulties which had arisen and the concrete form in which the difficulties had appeared. He recalled that the essential difference between the Common Market and the FTA is that the Six have a unified outside tariff while the FTA countries would be free to maintain their individual national outside tariffs. This difficulty had existed and had been recognized from the start. But latterly there had been a sharpening of the division as the French had stated that FTA countries would be able to change their tariffs capriciously to the detriment of the Common Market countries. An extreme example of the French apprehension, Professor Hallstein said, was that one of the FTA countries could open its tariff walls to Japanese competition and flood the Common Market area with cheap goods. Therefore the French and others of the Six wanted to check the complete liberty of FTA countries to set their outside tariffs and to subject these to some form of prior control or at least to a system of effective objection after the event.

7. Leaving the concrete and more technical problems, Professor Hallstein turned to the basic difficulty underlying the situation which he considered to be political rather than economic or technical. Favourable feeling for the FTA in France, he said, was extraordinarily slight (a vast understatement, Dr. Hallstein added) and it seemed only too likely that the next French Parliament would be even less favourably inclined toward the FTA. Even the Common Market had had great trouble in being accepted in France but it had been carried through by the devoted advocacy of a group of persons who believed in the political integration of Europe. This group of course did not repeat not advocate a European government but felt that the life of the six countries should be closely bound up together in a common future. This essentially political motivation was not repeat not at hand to assist advocates of the FTA to carry conviction in France. Those who had been the greatest proponents of the EEC did not repeat not support the FTA but even opposed it since they considered that its development might threaten the EEC with dilution or even dissolution. The sober fact was that the "Europeanists" in France were far from a help in developing French public opinion to support the FTA. Dr. Hallstein said that basically most French politicians and bureaucrats were economically illiberal and protectionist and their opposition in the case of the Common Market had only been overcome by those Frenchmen who believed in political integration. Dr. Hallstein said that there had been some serious efforts in France to negotiate for a FTA. The Gaillard Government had certainly negotiated with the intention of reaching positive results but they had been forced, because of the domestic situation, to play for time and the opportunity had been missed. Subsequently a political vacuum in France had made it impossible for the French negotiators to make any real progress. Even since the formation of the de Gaulle Government something of this political vacuum persisted and would persist until General de Gaulle took his decision. The situation had now become critical and it seemed clear that a firm decision by the French Government on the FTA was inevitable and could be expected within a fortnight or so. Dr. Hallstein said that this prediction was the view of the EEC Commission.

8. Dr. Adenauer intervened to ask what the decision of General de Gaulle would be; Dr. Hallstein said that this was really too speculative for a serious opinion but he would nevertheless give his personal views. He said that after the elections de Gaulle would probably find that the rightist parties with their traditional protectionist attitude would be strengthened and this would not repeat not make his task easier. However, Dr. Hallstein was convinced that General de Gaulle was quite aware of the dangers of the situation and would make a real effort to avoid a breakdown of the FTA negotiations. The General certainly had no repeat no wish to increase tension with the UK and the other FTA countries, not repeat not to mention those partners among the Six who are keen that the FTA should come into existence. He thought that the tactics of the French would be to seek changes in the procedures of the FTA negotiations and they would try to proceed by the sector approach, product by product, and would suggest preferential tariffs be extended to the eleven countries, perhaps one at a time, and the eventual attachment of these other European countries to the EEC. Dr. Hallstein thought that these French tactics had become clear at Venice. If the French were successful in this approach a general FTA, of course, would be given up in favour of a series of bilateral agreements with the EEC.

9. At this point, Dr. Adenauer asked whether the French thought that the UK might turn away from negotiations with the Six and carry on separate negotiations with the eleven. Dr. Hallstein said it was perhaps a mistake to speak of the eleven as if they formed an entity similar to the six countries of the Common Market. The eleven OEEC countries were not repeat not a group with common interests. For example, the Turks and Greeks and Portuguese were not repeat not really interested in tariff structure; they wanted money. The eleven countries were not repeat not really equal partners and the less developed of them wanted to form part of the larger economic community to gain the benefit of [corrupt] and subventions. In a sense no repeat no real negotiations had gone on between the Six and the eleven as two separate sides. Most matters under negotiation were not repeat not discussed with all of the eleven of the OEEC countries. For example, the Six were negotiating now on agriculture with the UK and Denmark. The French would almost certainly want to strengthen this tendency to negotiate in small groups.

10. The Chancellor said that he took it from Dr. Hallstein's comments that he thought that the general prospects were bad. Dr. Hallstein said he would not repeat not like to leave that impression. He thought it would take time but it was obvious that a solution had to be found.

11. The Prime Minister at this point said that he had been unable to form any precise conclusions in France on this subject but in the UK he had felt a widespread concern that the FTA agreement was not repeat not likely to be achieved, at least until next April or May. He said that the British were feeling impatient and rather frustrated and that they thought that dialectic exercises and technical excuses had prevented the attainment in Paris of real progress.

12. Professor Hallstein went on to give some reasons for his "non-pessimism." He said that Europe in the long run could not repeat not have a protectionist or autarchic economy. The vital economic interest of Europe lay in a liberal import policy. He thought that the economic situation of the EEC would be comparably on a larger scale to that of the Federal Republic which had benefited greatly by its relatively liberal economic policy. It would take time for the French to realize this but when they did they would take consequent action and would seek a liberal solution.

13. Chancellor Adenauer commented on the very unfortunate political effects which economic rivalry in Europe would cause. He said that already within NATO there was a dispute between the UK and Iceland, a three-way dispute between the UK, Greece and Turkey and that the addition of economic tensions within the alliance might be more than it could bear.

14. Dr. Van Scherpenberg expressed general agreement with what Professor Hallstein had said. He stated with some assurance that the purely technical problem of whether or not repeat not the FTA nations should have tariff autonomy was soluble without damage to the French economy. The political problem in France was basic and more difficult. As Professor Hallstein had said some of the most enlightened French politicians feared the dissolution of EEC if the FTA came into being. Domestic opposition to the FTA could only be overcome by the firmest decision of the French Government. If Monsieur de Gaulle were convinced of the value of the FTA he could certainly carry French public opinion. Bureaucracy in France stood opposed to a positive solution, however. Dr. Van Scherpenberg was convinced that de Gaulle did not repeat not want a rupture of negotiations or conflict with the UK. Dr. Van Scherpenberg gave his opinion that, if a basic decision in principle on the establishment of a FTA could be taken before the end of the year, then practical measures could be postponed for six months without danger of real discrimination or economic harm to the eleven countries.

15. Chancellor Adenauer said that he was casting around for ideas which might help avoid a particularly dangerous situation. He pointed out that Mr. Macmillan and Monsieur de Gaulle were warm friends. In the next months France would be experiencing serious economic trouble. He wondered if it might not repeat not be wise for Mr. Macmillan to write a personal letter to Monsieur de Gaulle explaining the advantages for Europe, for NATO and for France of the development of an FTA. Both Professor Hallstein and Dr. Van Scherpenberg thought there might indeed be some advantage in this, but they considered that it would be better to wait until after the elections in France. In the meantime the negotiations could continue and at least some technical solutions could be found.

16. Dr. Adenauer wondered whether the right people were negotiating for the various countries involved, including the Federal Republic, and both Dr. Hallstein and Dr. Van Scherpenberg thought that the composition of the delegations did not repeat not lie at the root of the difficulties which had been encountered.

17. Referring to the Chancellor's suggestion, the Prime Minister said that the question of a letter to General de Gaulle would be a rather personal one for Mr. Macmillan and that he could make no repeat no confident suggestion on that score. He spoke of Canadian concern that Europe should not repeat not become inward-looking and exclusive and that Canadian exports should not repeat not be denied access to the European Market. He would not repeat not wish to see European arrangements for economic integration turn into a sort of Zollverein. He wondered rather whether Mr. Macmillan would wish to write a letter at this time. The British leaders were concerned and impatient with the negotiations on the FTA which they considered to be dilatory and overly concerned with technical problems. The Prime Minister thought that the current meeting between Mr. Selwyn Lloyd and Monsieur Couve de Murville would take up the problem of the FTA. The Prime Minister mentioned then that, at an earlier stage, the British had been wondering, as a result of the experience in the FTA negotiations, whether the French might not repeat not be thinking in terms of a horse trade, i.e. if the British would agree to a three-power directorate in NATO, the French would accept the substance of a FTA. The Prime Minister thought that perhaps the British no repeat no longer harboured this suspicion and the Chancellor had told him earlier in the day that he thought there was no repeat no truth in this idea. Professor Hallstein thought it unlikely that the French had this in mind.

18. At this point Professor Hallstein left the meeting and Herr Von Etzdorf joined it.

19. The Prime Minister put the question to the Chancellor as to what approach should be made by friendly countries to the proposals which General de Gaulle had made to Mr. Macmillan and President Eisenhower.

20. The Chancellor said that he would like first to say a few general words about Europe and about NATO. He said that since he and Mr. Diefenbaker had talked together in Paris last December⁵⁸ great changes had taken place. If the free peoples of the world remained united and firm, he was not repeat not unoptimistic. He pointed out that the USSR had great inner tensions and difficulties and that Sino-Russian relations were growing worse as China grew stronger. The Chancellor revealed that when he was in Moscow in 1955, Mr. Khrushchev had expressed great and apparently genuine concern about the rise and development of Red China. However the free West, given concrete form in NATO, had had some bad defeats recently. He mentioned the UK-Iceland dispute and said that Iceland was becoming more communistic but that it was absolutely essential to maintain Iceland in the Western Alliance. The Chancellor spoke of the "absolute folly" of this dispute and said that although we obviously could not repeat not recognize the twelve-mile zone claimed by Iceland, a solution had to be found quickly. Perhaps some measure of economic assistance might be the way. The Chancellor went on to mention Cyprus as another sore spot in the Western Alliance. He said that the governments in Greece and in Turkey were so weak that for their political survival they found it impossible to withdraw from the positions they had taken. The Chancellor saw only one solution for Cyprus, which was to preserve the status quo for ten years or so and to compensate Greece and Turkey "with money." At this point the Prime Minister asked whether the Chancellor by status quo meant the restoration of the Crown Colony. The Chancellor replied "yes," but that there should be provision for a reasonable measure of local autonomy on the Island.

⁵⁸ Au mois de décembre 1957, les dirigeants des pays de l'OTAN se sont réunis à Paris. Voir chapitre II, 4^e partie.

In December 1957, leaders of NATO countries had met in Paris. See Chapter II, Part 4.

21. Chancellor Adenauer went on to discuss the Mideast. He said that in this area the Western powers in recent years had made serious mistakes, one after another. One example was the decision, and the method of announcing it, not repeat not to carry through with the financing of the Aswan Dam. Another was the British decision to leave the canal zone ten years before the treaty requirement to do so and to leave their military equipment behind. Yet another was the interference by the French and British at Suez with the military action undertaken by Israel. A great mistake was not repeat not to have informed the USA in advance of the action intended at Suez and yet a further mistake was the decision by the USA to oppose the British and French action after it had happened. Last summer had been a very critical time and he hoped it was now accepted that the Arabs be left to share their own destiny. Although the Lebanon itself was not repeat not very important, it was a good thing that the USA had demonstrated by landing troops that it held to its pledged word. At this point the Chancellor referred with some amusement to the comic opera appointment of Colonel Aref as Iraqi Ambassador to Bonn and explained that Colonel Aref had arrived at Munich but had apparently then departed for Brussels, had returned to Baghdad and arrest but had never shown his face in Bonn. The Chancellor said that he had some evidence that Colonel Aref had planned a revolt against the Kassem Government with Communist and Nasser support. The Chancellor said that things were relatively quiet in Iran. He had received a few days ago a personal confidential report from a Court Minister of Iran who assured him that the government was firmly in the saddle and that the free western countries could rely on Iran.

22. The Prime Minister pointed out that he would soon be visiting Pakistan and that he would be interested to have any recent information on developments there which the Chancellor might have. The Chancellor said that Professor Erhard was coming back from Pakistan on the weekend and he thought he had better wait until then to get the latest information but he did emphasize the extraordinary importance of Pakistan for the West.

23. Returning to the European scene: the Chancellor mentioned briefly the concern he had felt earlier at the internal division in France which had seemed to him to offer the threat even of civil war. The solution of the Algerian problem was still very difficult and preoccupying for France. It was a blessing for France and for Europe that de Gaulle had taken over and he hoped he would be fully successful in restoring order.

24. Referring to the USA: the Chancellor gave great emphasis to the importance of continued USA leadership and cooperation; without the USA, Europe, including the UK, would soon be lost to the USSR. The Chancellor thought that the democratic landslide in the congressional and gubernatorial elections might presage difficulties in the long run.

He said that he considered that the Democrats criticized Mr. Dulles unjustly. He thought that Mr. Dulles was a man of high principle who acted consistently on principle, although he was not repeat not always wise in the phrasing or tone of his remarks, but in general it was a good thing for all of us that Mr. Dulles was there. For Europeans it was an uncomfortable situation that their fate was dependent on elections in the USA which demonstrated political instability. No repeat no one knew who would gain the presidency in 1960 or 1964 or what foreign policy the USA would pursue. The Chancellor recalled that the North Atlantic Treaty was up for review and renewal or termination in 1967 and that notice of termination would have to be given a year in advance. Unless it were made clear in the several years preceding 1967 that NATO was to be continued, disaster was ahead. The Russians must be saying that the West was not repeat not showing solidarity, (although General de Gaulle's attitude after he assumed power had disappointed them) and the Russians had some right to think that time was working for them. One could make a sad comparison of Western disarray with the fanatical unity and single-minded determination of the USSR and the nations associated with it. Therefore, we would have to strengthen NATO considerably as soon as possible and we must begin work as early as 1960 on plans for the extension and continuance of NATO beyond 1967. Moreover there must be enhanced NATO unity in the propagation of the ideals to which it is dedicated.

25. The only answer to the problem of a world in which East was pitted against West was general controlled disarmament of both nuclear and conventional weapons. Because he believed this, the Chancellor was against the Rapacki plan or various other schemes which were limited in scope and area. He said that the real rivalry and conflict is between the USSR and the free world and that there was no repeat no danger of a war between Poland or Czechoslovakia and Germany. He said with some vigour that the many lengthy comments in various countries on the Rapacki plan or other such plans had had a bad and disunifying effect on Western public opinion.

26. The Prime Minister broke into the translation of the Chancellor's remarks for a moment to refer to the dispute between the UK and Iceland and told the Chancellor that Canada was pressing for the reconvening of the Conference on the Law of the Sea and that the British Government agreed with this proposal. With reference to the Chancellor's suggestion about a solution for Cyprus, the Prime Minister said that it was interesting to note that a very similar suggestion had been made privately to him by the Greeks themselves.

27. After the Chancellor had completed his comments the Prime Minister said that he would not repeat not attempt to review Dr. Adenauer's exposition. He was very strongly in agreement with what the Chancellor had said about the need for NATO unity and thought that we sometimes had only a facade of unity. He said that we sometimes did not repeat not realize that our actions might have adverse effects on our partners in the free world. He assured the Chancellor that he had found no repeat no weakening of Canadian support for NATO and he referred to the very considerable exertions that were being made for the air defence of North America pointing out that this was properly part of the NATO concept. The Prime Minister said that he was not repeat not disturbed by the election results in the USA and that he did not repeat not envisage that there would be any significant change in American foreign policy. As President Eisenhower had taken part rather actively in the latter part of the election campaign it might be expected that he would be subjected to some adverse congressional comment but that he had seen absolutely no repeat no sign that the views of the American people on world issues had altered. The Prime Minister said that he was not repeat not going to comment on the foreign minister of another friendly state, that he recognized Mr. Dulles' sincerity and principle but, however sincere Mr. Dulles was, it did seem that some of his statements had had a bad effect on NATO unity. (This comment was not repeat not fully translated into German and the interpreter at this point merely said that although Mr. Dulles was sincere the tone of his remarks was sometimes unfortunate.) The Prime Minister said that he had seen Mr. Dulles recently and that he considered that the Secretary of State's visit to Chiang Kai-Shek had been useful. As a result Chiang had given up his plans to reconquer the mainland of China and had decided to withdraw some troops from Quemoy.

28. Chancellor Adenauer made the clarification that he was not repeat not concerned about the result of the recent congressional elections or about the presidential election in 1960 but that he did not repeat not know what might happen in 1964 and he felt concerned that before that time the USA must be bound most firmly to NATO and that the North Atlantic Treaty must be perpetuated. The Chancellor stated with obvious sincerity that Canada was a model NATO partner and was a great influence for good on general world policy. He was most happy that Canadian policy was "so good and straight." The Chancellor urged the Prime Minister to use his considerable influence and Canadian efforts toward the extension of NATO.

29. In conclusion the Prime Minister told the Chancellor how attracted he was by the way the Chancellor was able to take account not repeat not only of the present but to look far into the future. The Prime Minister again assured the Chancellor that there would be no repeat no slackening of Canadian readiness to support NATO. He added that we were all greatly dependent on the USA and must make every effort to prevent that nation from slipping back into semi-isolationism. Text Ends.

PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT AYUB KHAN, KARACHI,
NOVEMBER 15, 1958

1. The Prime Minister met with President Ayub Khan for two hours on November 15. The first hour and a half the President had with him the Foreign Minister, Mr. Manzur Qadir, the Secretary General, Mr. Aziz Ahmed, the Foreign Secretary, Mr. M.S.A. Baig, the Secretary of the Ministry of Works, Irrigation and Power, Mr. Mueenuddin, the Secretary of the Ministry of Finance, Mr. Mumtaz Hasan, the Secretary of Economic Affairs, Mr. Hasnie, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, Dr. Nazir Ahmed. For the last thirty minutes of the conversation the President asked all the Pakistani members to withdraw except the Foreign Minister and the Secretary General. The High Commissioner and Mr. Robinson accompanied the Prime Minister.

2. The President began by expressing his pleasure at Mr. Diefenbaker's visit. Pakistan had some reservations about the Commonwealth but it had a deep regard for Canada, particularly in view of the assistance which Canada was giving in helping Pakistan to make progress towards the solution of its economic problems. So great were these problems and so serious the military and strategic challenge that it was hard for the Government of Pakistan to know where to start.

Economic

3. The President then said that there were certain of these problems which he would like to review with the Prime Minister. A few weeks ago Mr. Fleming had been given a full outline of Pakistan's economic needs with particular reference to projects which it might be possible for Canada to assist with. He would not, therefore, go over all this ground again but there were certain requirements which had priority in his mind. First among these was Pakistan's need for alternative sources of water.

4. Referring to the forthcoming resumption of talks on the Canal Waters problem, the President was pessimistic about the likelihood of a solution being found through the International Bank. At the request of the President, Mr. Mueenuddin explained the conflicting positions of Pakistan and India on this problem. Pakistan estimated that a sum of $700 million would be required to undertake the necessary replacement projects. The Indian plan envisaged a figure as low as $120 million and it was, of course, in the Indian interest to set the replacement cost at as low a figure as possible so as to keep to a minimum the financial responsibility which India would have in the event of an agreement. Pakistan was concerned that in formulating its own plan the International Bank would be influenced by the Indian proposal and that the resultant diversion of water to Pakistan would fall far short of Pakistan's needs. The President said that, in this situation, Pakistan had no choice but to look around for a new source of capital, perhaps in the form of loans, so that work could be started on certain projects which could be undertaken now without prejudice to the outcome of the Canal Waters dispute with India.

5. The Prime Minister then spoke of the serious problem which the Canadian Government faces in finding means of disposing of its surpluses of food products. The effect of these surpluses on the Canadian economy was very much greater than was the case with the United States which was not so dependent on agricultural exports for its economic well being. In considering its programmes of assistance to other countries, the Canadian Government could not disregard this problem of food surpluses. The position was further complicated by the effect of the provisions of P.L. 480 by which the United States disposed of its surpluses on terms very much more favourable to recipient countries. The Canadian Government was gratified that Pakistan had agreed to take wheat to the value of $2 million under the Colombo Plan and realized that Pakistan had need of other kinds of economic assistance. He strongly urged that the Government of Pakistan consider whether it could not reassess its requirements so that a larger proportion of the Canadian contribution under the Colombo Plan might be in food products. This applied particularly to the additional $15 million which the Canadian Government had undertaken to make available in the next Colombo Plan year. People in Canada were, he thought, attracted by the concept of Commonwealth cooperation in economic matters but the Government would have difficulty in having this concept accepted if the recipient countries such as Pakistan turned to the United States for wheat and other agricultural supplies. The extent to which Canada could provide other forms of aid would, therefore, depend to a larger extent on the willingness and capacity of the recipient countries to increase the proportion of agricultural products which they accepted under Canadian aid programmes. The Prime Minister also mentioned the heavy surplus of skimmed milk which the Government had on hand as a further illustration of its problem of food surpluses.

6. The President asked Mr. Hasnie to respond to the Prime Minister's remarks. Mr. Hasnie referred to the recent resolution of the Economic and Social Council providing for the establishment of national reserves of food grains. He said that Pakistan was thinking in terms of the eventual creation of such a reserve. He felt obliged, however, to point out that Pakistan could obtain American wheat over and above the normal U.S. aid programme whereas for every ton of Canadian wheat accepted there was a corresponding reduction in the amount of Canadian Colombo Plan funds available for other economic purposes. Thus the wheat which Pakistan took from the United States did not affect this country's overall development plan.

7. The Prime Minister intervened to say that, while he appreciated these considerations, the Government of Canada was faced with a growing public feeling that Canada should not be placed in a position of spending money on other forms of external aid when the United States was getting rid of its wheat surpluses. This led Mr. Hasnie to speculate on the possibility of establishing what he called a wheat bank in Pakistan whereby Canadian wheat would be accepted and Pakistan would bear the cost of transport and storage.

8. Mr. Hasnie then recalled the consideration given in the FAO and UNICEF of the establishment of milk centres. The Surplus Commodity Committee of FAO had been cold to the milk centre projects which Pakistan had hoped to undertake. Pakistan still hoped to install in Karachi, Lahore and Dacca, milk processing plants on the model of that established in Calcutta. If these machines could be provided Pakistan could probably accept quantities of Canadian skimmed milk.

9. The Prime Minister then said that the Canadian Government wished to assist Pakistan but that it had to take account of its economic limitations as well as of the state of public opinion. He appealed to the Government of Pakistan to have regard for these limitations and to recognize that the full benefits of the Commonwealth relationship could not be realized unless recipient countries took account of the peculiar circumstances of those countries offering assistance. He urged the President to reconsider the possibility of taking a larger proportion of Canadian agricultural products to which the President rejoined good naturedly that this might be easier for Pakistan to consider if Canada would give capital assistance for plants such as milk centres over and above the aid programmes already contemplated.

10. The Prime Minister then said that he thought that the idea of a wheat bank for Pakistan ought to be considered by the experts, and the President said that it should be possible for the officials to work out such a scheme.

Kashmir

11. The President called on Mr. Baig to introduce the discussion on Kashmir. Mr. Baig recalled the history of the problem briefly concluding that Pakistan and India were as far from agreement as they had been ten years ago. The President said that opinion in Pakistan was "really burning" over the unreasonableness of the Indian attitude. The conflict between Pakistan and India over Kashmir would benefit only Communism which Pakistan was determined to resist. If war came, he could say as a soldier who had been intimately concerned with Pakistan's military planning that Pakistan would either "destroy India or destroy ourselves." A war between India and Pakistan would open the door to Communism with incalculable consequences in Asia, Africa and the Middle East. He spoke of the dangers of the present situation which, unless some progress were made, might make it difficult for the Government to hold the people of Pakistan in check. In his remarks, there was a tone not of threat but of anxious concern lest a failure to move towards a solution might bring on an outbreak of violence.

12. Speaking of the Indian attitude, the President expressed the view that as soon as Nehru's hold was loosened, it was not impossible that India might "break up." In response to the Prime Minister's question on this point, the President professed to believe that India's problems with the caste system and with regional rivalries were such as to threaten India's survival as a unified state. He complained about the size of India's defence budget, contending that there were no external restraints on India's defence preparations. He concluded his remarks by saying that the Prime Minister would understand that "the Commonwealth does not mean all that [much] to us unless it helps in solving our basic problems; unless it does that, it is a very defective organization."

13. The Prime Minister then asked, making it clear that he was enquiring only for information, what the Commonwealth might do to assist in finding a solution. The recently appointed Foreign Minister, Mr. Qadir, said he was not competent to outline the procedural steps which might be taken by other Commonwealth countries, but what was needed first and foremost was "normal pressure on India to honour its commitment" regarding demilitarization and a plebiscite. The President said he thought that Commonwealth countries should say to Nehru: "You are playing with fire" and that this kind of pressure should be kept up.

Atomic Energy

14. The President asked Dr. Ahmed, the Head of the Pakistan Atomic Energy Commission, to speak. Dr. Ahmed referred to Pakistan's need for an experimental atomic reactor. The United States was offering an old fashioned reactor which was inadequate to Pakistani needs. The Government of Pakistan, after considering the various types of reactors, had decided to try to obtain a CP5 and to place the emphasis in its atomic energy programme on the development of additional reactors not only to train additional personnel, but also as a means of economizing on the transmission of power. (Details of Dr. Ahmed's exposition are not given here in detail since they are contained in material already available in Ottawa.)

15. The Prime Minister said that he would take this matter up with officials and see what they had to say about it. He speculated on the possibility of establishing a connection between the provision of assistance for the construction of a reactor and the willingness of the Pakistani Government to rearrange its requirements so as to accept a larger proportion of Canadian agricultural products.

Change of Régime in Pakistan

16. In the restricted session which followed the main meeting, the President said that he wished to say a few words about the change of régime in Pakistan. He said that for some years it had been clear that the politicians who had been running the affairs of the country were failing to make democracy work. The required standards of integrity and leadership had not been forthcoming, and Pakistan, surrounded as it was by enemies and plagued by economic weakness, had declined to a desperate state of demoralization. The army itself had been affected and it had become essential for a completely new start to be made. In response to the Prime Minister's question as to what had provoked the decision to act on October 7, the President said that the action had not been in response to a particular provocation, but rather as a means of forestalling bloodshed. There had been growing signs of disintegration: violence in the Parliament of East Pakistan, openness and prevalence of corruption, the increasing clamour of the neutralists led by Bashani and Qayyam's talk of bloody revolution. All these factors had had their place as the climax was reached.

17. The President spoke as if he himself had been from the beginning the effective force behind the plan to put an end to the old régime. He spoke in regretfully critical terms of Mirza. He had hoped that Mirza would rise to the real requirements of the presidency (he seemed here to be looking back to the time of Mirza's original appointment), but he had not. When the time came for action to be taken, he (Ayub Khan) had gone against the view of many loyal Pakistanis — he pointed to the Foreign Minister — in undertaking the assumption of power with Mirza as Head of State. He had hoped that Mirza would collaborate with him in putting an end to the iniquities of the old régime. Unfortunately Mirza had very soon shown that he was not prepared to restrict himself to the duties of the Head of State and that he could not refrain from political manipulation. At the outset of their brief partnership in power, he had told Mirza that it was essential that they speak with one voice so that there would be no doubt in the country or in political circles as to their joint objectives. Mirza agreed to this but it had soon come to President Ayub's attention that Mirza was up to his old tricks, obstructing Government orders against corruption and even interfering in the military services. The President had thus been obliged to take the supreme power himself although, as the High Commissioner has already reported, he made it clear that he had done this only with reluctance and as a last resort.

18. Speaking of the martial law administration the President described it as "the alternative to the sovereign power" and as "existing to support the civil power." He said that martial law had been instituted as a precaution but in fact no military action except for the presence of troops in key centres for a few days had been necessary. Now military force has been virtually withdrawn although some of his advisers, including the Foreign Minister, were not sure that it had been wise to effect the withdrawal with such speed. In any case, the President felt encouraged by the smoothness of the transition and by the fact that some hard decisions in the economic and commercial sphere were being cheerfully accepted by the people.

19. The President and the Foreign Minister emphasized repeatedly both in this conversation and in private conversations at other times that the new Government is determined with the least possible delay to rebuild the constitution on democratic lines. The Foreign Minister, who is a constitutional and criminal lawyer of distinction, is personally engaged in this task and he said that he hoped that within a few months it might be possible to create the beginnings of representative political institutions.

PRIME MINISTER'S TOUR — DISCUSSIONS WITH MR. NEHRU⁵⁹

I am attaching two copies of a record of the conversation between Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Nehru on November 19th, 1958. Mr. Robinson and I were present at this meeting and

⁵⁹ Une note jointe à ce document contenait ce qui suit :/A note attached to this document contained the following:

Note for file: changes in record of Nov. 19 inserted on instructions of Prime Minister H.B. R[obinson]. Robinson a modifié à neuf endroits l'enregistrement de la conversation du 19 novembre 1958 entre Diefenbaker et Nehru. Les modifications ne sont pas importantes, et l'enregistrement de la conversation imprimé ici incorpore les corrections de Robinson.

Robinson amended the record of the November 19, 1958 conversation between Diefenbaker and Nehru in nine places. The alterations are not significant, and the record of the conversation printed here incorporates Robinson's corrections.

Mr. Robinson prepared the record, in which I have made only one or two minor changes. On the Indian side there were present the Foreign Secretary, Mr. Dutt, the Chief of Protocol, Mr. Tandon, and Mr. S. Sen, Joint Secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs.

Also attached is a brief note on a conversation between Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Nehru at dinner at my residence on November 23, 1958. Present at this dinner, in addition to Mr. Nehru and my wife and I, were Mr. Elmer Diefenbaker, the Secretary-General and Mrs. Pillai, the Mayoress of Delhi and Mr. Carter, Counsellor of this mission.

These two memoranda provide a record of all the significant discussion that took place, as far as I am aware, between Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Nehru on world affairs. The two Prime Ministers were, of course, together on many other occasions during Mr. Diefenbaker's five-day stay in India. Most of these were public functions where extended conversation was not possible but where the time spent in one another's company all went to foster that greater degree of intimacy between Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Nehru which was one of the objectives of the visit. The small informal luncheon which Mr. Nehru gave for Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker on November 23rd was a friendly social affair at which no serious matters were discussed.

One occasion when Mr. Nehru took the opportunity to talk about India's domestic problems to Mr. Diefenbaker was during an unscheduled visit to the "India 1958" Exhibition on the evening of November 18th. Within an hour of the Prime Minister's arrival Mr. Nehru suggested that they pay a visit to the Exhibition and Mr. Diefenbaker willingly agreed. Mr. Nehru gave a brief, lucid account of India's problems, plans and accomplishments during the time it took to drive to the Exhibition and look at one or two displays and Mr. Diefenbaker showed much interest in what the Indian Prime Minister had to say.

As I said in my telegram No. 658 of November 25th,† I believe Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Nehru hit it off very well together. Mr. Nehru was at his friendly and charming best and there is no doubt that he was taking pains to establish a good personal relationship with Mr. Diefenbaker. In their conversation on November 19th Mr. Nehru took a reasonable, moderate attitude on the various questions that came up and made no attempt to press a particular viewpoint on Mr. Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker adopted much the same course and, as a result, the conversation proceeded very amicably without approaching anything that could be called disagreement. Some difference of approach to world problems is discernible in the record of the conversation but it was muted. I thought this was a most useful discussion.

RECORD OF PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH MR. NEHRU,
NEW DELHI, NOVEMBER 19, 1958

The Prime Minister's conversation on November 19 with Mr. Nehru occupied one hour and a half, including a few opening minutes for photographs and five minutes at the close for inspection of objets d'art in Mr. Nehru's sitting room. The atmosphere was relaxed and informal. Mr. Nehru was accompanied by Messrs. Dutt, Sen and Tandon (Chief of Protocol). The Prime Minister was accompanied by the High Commissioner and Mr. Robinson.

When Mr. Diefenbaker opened the conversation by remarking on the coup d'état in the Sudan, which had had a prominent place in the morning newspapers, Mr. Nehru disclaimed any detailed understanding of the circumstances. All he knew was that the coup had taken the Egyptian Government by surprise. It was too early to comment on its significance.

Pakistan

Mr. Nehru was clearly more interested in securing Mr. Diefenbaker's view on the new régime in Pakistan. The gossip he had heard, which of course he should not pass on, was that people were speculating on who had put Ayub Khan up to it. Ayub, he said, had never been accused of too much intelligence and there must have been someone behind it. Everyone knew that conditions had been deteriorating in Pakistan, but it was not clear how the revolution itself had actually come about. He did not know if it was an army coup, but the sudden and efficiently conducted banishment of Mirza suggested careful planning and organization.

When Mr. Diefenbaker referred to the recent announcement by the Pakistan Government of the return of martial law administration to the civil power, Mr. Nehru rejoined that, nevertheless, the sanction of martial law remained. He admitted, however, that the original coup of October 7 had been "in a sense popular." Mr. Diefenbaker said that on the basis of his talks in Pakistan, he had the impression that the need for a change was very widely felt.

Returning to the theme of the hidden hand, Mr. Nehru said that in the period immediately after the coup, the press which had been critical of Mirza, changed its tune but had reverted to open criticism again on the eve of Mirza's removal. These changes of line suggested to him that there had been control of the press.

Mr. Nehru did not see how the new Government of Pakistan would lift themselves out of the emergency. They were faced with almost insuperable economic problems and, from a constitutional point of view, he could see no hope of elections taking place. Mr. Diefenbaker did not offer a view on these points.

Soviet Intentions and Sino-Soviet Relations

Mr. Diefenbaker turned the conversation to Khrushchev's recent speech about Berlin, and wondered about its significance. Mr. Nehru said that he was sure that Khrushchev did not want big trouble, but he liked taking initiatives and putting other people off balance. Khrushchev's speech about Berlin, Mr. Nehru thought, was part of this pattern and he did not think it was related to, for example, the Far East.

Mr. Diefenbaker inquired to what extent Khrushchev and his Government were in fear or under the influence of the Peking régime. He noted that there was evidence to show that Khrushchev had been privately expressing concern about Communist China's policy. Mr. Nehru agreed that Khrushchev had "a certain apprehension" — not now but applied to the more distant future — about the intentions of the communist Chinese. He referred to population pressure and industrial advancement as factors in Khrushchev's thinking, added to which he remarked that no country likes an ally to become stronger than itself. Nevertheless, Khrushchev was bound to help China, even though with mixed feelings. He agreed with Mr. Diefenbaker that Soviet policy had been influenced in recent months by the Communist Chinese. This was, he said, "perhaps responsible" for the switch of Soviet policy with regard to a summit meeting earlier this year. He did not think that this was the whole story, however. There was always a tussle going on in the Soviet hierarchy with different interests competing for influence on Khrushchev. At the same time, he had no doubt that Khrushchev was by far the most popular man in the Soviet Union; he was a real politician — bluff, capable, and always meeting the people. Mr. Nehru concluded by repeating that, in his view, Khrushchev did have “certain apprehensions” about the Communist Chinese. Mr. Ronning observed that the Russians had not given the Peking Government unreserved support for a period after Stalin’s death when they had suffered a lack of confidence in their own internal situation.

Questions Relating to China

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he could understand the Communist Chinese making an all-out attack from the mainland on Quemoy and Matsu, but that he was at a loss to understand what their purpose was in such tactics as shelling the islands every other day. This led Mr. Nehru to recall a statement by Sir Anthony Eden in 1955 that Quemoy and Matsu should go to the mainland.⁶⁰ Mr. Diefenbaker said that he believed that Sir Anthony had added “providing that no force was used.” Mr. Nehru continued that if Sir Anthony Eden’s opinion had been carried out, Formosa would have become a more distant issue. The Chinese would have gone on talking about it, but in effect you could have put Formosa in cold storage. As things had turned out, however, the Americans had simply played into the hands of the Communist Chinese. He did not think that they were too keen now on taking Quemoy and Matsu; they would rather have the issue hanging there all the time. Otherwise, they would be under a certain popular pressure to prepare to tackle Formosa.

Mr. Diefenbaker, referring to the United States position, underlined how strongly the United States administration would resent it if Canada were to take a stand against the American position, either by publicly favouring a Chinese Nationalist withdrawal from the islands or by advocating recognition of the Peking régime. He did not think that the United States view regarding Quemoy and Matsu was as strong as it was three months ago but on recognition the United States feeling was unyielding, and he was afraid that if countries such as Canada exerted pressure there might be a strong current of isolationism. The problem was to discover a means of saving face.

Mr. Nehru agreed that in a situation of this kind someone would have to lose face. He returned to the point that the Dulles policy suited the Communist Chinese perfectly. He was sure that the Peking Government attached more value to building up an inner strength within the country than to taking Quemoy and Matsu or even Formosa. American policy enabled them to push people to work harder.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he was sure that the United States would welcome some solution. Speaking of Canadian opinion, he said that the feeling in favour of recognition was stronger than at any time.

Mr. Nehru concluded the discussion on China by saying that the Communist Chinese, in the near future, would not dream of attacking Formosa and thereby precipitating a war with the United States. The Chinese had an infinite capacity for patience. The Peking Government expected that Formosa would fall into their hands eventually.

Relations with the United States

Mr. Diefenbaker, recalling the course of Canadian-American relations, said that there had been times in the past when disputes could have led to United States aggression against Canada. In the past 60 years, however, relations had steadily improved and any thought of United States territorial expansion at Canada's expense was of course out of the question. He had been on occasion critical of United States policy towards Canada, but his experience since coming into office had been that the Americans were going out of their way to remove unreasonable causes of friction. He mentioned, as an example, the understanding arrived at in July during the Eisenhower-Dulles visit to Ottawa regarding exports to mainland China by Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms.

⁶⁰ Voir volume 21, chapitre VII, 3^e partie.

Mr. Nehru said that he presumed that any policy for Canada must be based on "friendly approaches to the United States." Mr. Diefenbaker remarked on the extent of American generosity, and this led Mr. Nehru to observe that two years ago he had frankly told President Eisenhower that the effect of pouring out American treasure was not what the United States intended it to be. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed and said that the attachment of strings to aid was suspect. Mr. Nehru said that it was more than that. Too frequently, help failed to reach the people in any significant degree. A United States committee sent to investigate aid programmes in Pakistan had found a great deal of waste connected with the administration of aid programmes; it had also been true that there had been profiteering by Pakistanis. An equally important failing in aid programmes — and this applied to the United Kingdom as well as to the United States — was that help was given to the government of the day, so that if that government happened to be unpopular or reactionary, the donor country inevitably lost credit.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he had spoken in similar terms to President Eisenhower last July. In particular, he had commended the idea of creating greater liquidity through the International Bank. He had suggested that this was the sort of channel through which the Americans might give aid without strings. To this Mr. Nehru rejoined that people don't like to be bossed by large numbers of foreigners, no matter how generous.

There was a short discussion about the balance which had to be observed in the implementation of economic aid projects between the use on the one hand of indigenous employees and on the other of experts from outside. Mr. Nehru said that at the Bhakra Dam some 2000 to 3000 Indian engineers were employed against only 15 Americans.

Middle East

In response to Mr. Diefenbaker's invitation, Mr. Nehru reviewed the situation in the Middle East. Things were relatively quiet at present but this might be misleading. In Iraq, the aftermath of revolution revealed that there was still inner conflicts. Lebanon was slowly finding an equilibrium. In Iran, the Shah was fairly capable and much more liberal, i.e. in land reform than his ministers. The idea of a monarchy was fairly well accepted and, in the short run, the Shah's position seemed safe. The U.A.R. was the most stable of all the Middle Eastern governments. Nasser had enormous prestige, largely because he had come to represent Arab nationalism. The best formula for these countries was to leave them to themselves as much as possible, since interference aroused antagonism and extreme nationalist feeling. If he might say so, the United Kingdom had a habit of dealing with the wrong kind of people. They never got beyond the landlords who now had no influence. Their sources were less reliable for this reason, although he was not sure if this was still true today.

Mr. Nehru asked himself if Iraq would join the U.A.R. For all its friendship with the U.S.S.R., the U.A.R. had no intention of allowing communism to creep in. "(There is no doubt about that.)" He thought that some of those in Iraq who opposed Iraqi-U.A.R. union did so because they thought communist or extreme left-wing parties in Iraq would be banned as they were in the U.A.R.

When Mr. Diefenbaker asked if Mr. Nasser could keep communism out of the U.A.R., Mr. Nehru said that, strictly speaking, the conditions in which communism would thrive were not present in the relatively backward agrarian societies of the Middle East. Communism in countries not industrially advanced was not really communism. The agrarian masses could be brought to revolt, but this was not communism. It was possible for a government to be favourable to communism but even such a government could not impose communism if the conditions were not ready.

Mr. Diefenbaker asked how it was that there was a not inconsiderable communist minority element in the Indian Parliament. Mr. Nehru said that this was chiefly attributable to local causes. He did not fear expansion of communist representation on the national level, but would not exclude the possibility of such expansion in state legislatures. Communist representatives in the National Parliament did not stand for the communist order as such, but were opportunists, exploiting local grievances and complaining against the system.

Disarmament

Mr. Nehru asked whether Mr. Diefenbaker saw much hope of progress on disarmament, referring, in particular, to Mr. Dulles' recent statement that the position of the technical talks on test suspension in Geneva was a little better now.⁶¹ What he was worried about was that disarmament talks always seemed to lag behind developments in armament. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed and cited the Government's decision on the AVRO "Arrow" as a case in point. Mr. Nehru said that he had been reading Walter Lippman's articles on his talks with Khrushchev.⁶² He thought that the stress laid on the Soviet Union's possession of short- and middle-range missiles illustrated the change in the nature of the disarmament problem. It was important to avoid a disarmament agreement which was bogus in that it involved meaningless concessions by one side or the other, i.e. agreement to give up weapons which nobody wanted.

France

Mr. Diefenbaker referred to the French position with regard to the production of atomic weapons and said that he was sure that the French Government was not so much interested in owning nuclear weapons for military use as for their prestige value to France. Mr. Nehru said: "Let them send a rocket to the moon."

Talking more generally of France, Mr. Diefenbaker said that his meeting with General de Gaulle had given a favourable impression somewhat different from an earlier reaction he had formed to the general. He had not found him truculent, petulant or arrogant. He was convinced of the General's ardent desire for peace and particularly of his dedication to the solution of the Algerian problem. Mr. Diefenbaker spoke of Chancellor Adenauer's relations with General de Gaulle, indicating that de Gaulle had convinced Adenauer of his sincerity, and that Adenauer was not unduly disturbed by de Gaulle's private letters to Eisenhower and Macmillan.

Mr. Nehru returned to the importance of a new psychological approach to the problem of disarmament. The basis of the arms race — the urge to arm — was the fear of others. If we could lessen that fear, the urge to arm would itself lessen. No country could afford to take a major risk (it would be politically foolish), but today it is a major risk that the arms race is going on. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed that this was a fundamental dilemma, and

⁶² Voir/See Walter Lippmann, The Communist World and Ours, Boston: Little, Brown, 1959.

Mr. Nehru asked how it could be circumvented and whether a continuing hostile attitude was a necessary concomitant of a strong military position. He instanced Khrushchev's unpleasant remarks regarding the United Kingdom in Burma and said that he had asked Khrushchev, in reply to the latter's question as to how he could improve the Soviet Union's relations with the United States and the United Kingdom, why he spoke in these hostile terms. Khrushchev had admitted that there was something in what Mr. Nehru had said but justified himself by adding that the Soviet Union had lived for forty years in a state of siege and encirclement, and that this caused Russians, including himself, to react rapidly to what they believed to be interference.

Thus it was, Mr. Nehru said, that statements made in the United States created anger and fear in the U.S.S.R. At this stage, Mr. Nehru added that in his opinion the Soviet people were more afraid of Germany's rearmament than of the United States. He said that if, while holding on to their armaments, nations could make a deliberate attempt not to curse each other, this would perhaps have a psychological impact on the disarmament problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker then asked Mr. Nehru about the size of India's defence budget. Mr. Nehru said that he thought it was some 22% to 23% of the national budget. In relation to revenue, this was not a very big figure, especially when one considered the size of the country and the length of the frontier. India's whole policy was a policy of defence. It could not afford the latest types of arms; it relied on second-rate arms that could be made in India. It did not attempt to get long-distance offensive weapons such as bombers.

PRIME MINISTER DIEFENBAKER'S CONVERSATION WITH MR. NEHRU
ON OFFSHORE ISLANDS, NEW DELHI, NOVEMBER 23, 1958

At dinner on November 23 at Canada House Mr. Diefenbaker reverted to the subject of Communist China and the offshore islands. He suggested to Mr. Nehru that if the United States were forced to lose face in the Pacific the results could be disastrous. He thought there was a danger that, unless there was some understanding of the United States position in the Pacific, people in the United States who were advocating the complete withdrawal of the United States from the Pacific "back to California" might gain sufficient influence to bring about the results they hoped to achieve. If the United States withdrew, Mr. Diefenbaker said, American aid to all of the countries in the area would cease. Without American support it would probably not be long before Japan would fall to the Communists. The same thing could happen in Indochina, Indonesia and Burma. Mr. Diefenbaker implied that he hoped India might use its influence with China to adopt a less aggressive and more conciliatory attitude calculated to ease tensions and prevent the situation from worsening.

Mr. Nehru agreed that if such a development occurred it would "upset" the whole situation, and that it was important to avoid a situation of this type developing. He then said that surely it was not necessary for the United States, in reverting from its present inflexible and rigid policy, to go to the other extreme of complete withdrawal. He felt that there must be some satisfactory compromise between these two extreme positions. Some sort of modus vivendi would be advisable which would be satisfactory to both the United States and Communist China, and which would enable the United States to continue giving support to the countries in Asia whose economic development was still dependent upon receiving such aid.

RELATIONS WITH COMMUNIST CHINA

There has been considerable public and diplomatic interest in the position of the Canadian Government on the question of recognition of Communist China because of various statements which have been made on this subject recently. Enquiries have been made as to whether a change of Canadian policy on recognition is imminent. We have been informed that you will be questioned on this matter at your forthcoming press conference.

Interest has been stimulated by Mr. Fleming's observation in Tokyo on November 7, that the Canadian Government has not given any indication of recognizing Communist China; your own remarks on the subject at Seattle; and statements made by the Prime Minister at Karachi, New Delhi and Kuala Lumpur.

The texts of the Prime Minister's statements on the question were forwarded to the posts which you visited on your South American tour. They are also attached† to this memorandum in case you may wish to refer to them. These statements make the following points:

- (a) China is a country of 600,000,000 people which cannot be ignored.
- (b) Canada in the past has had a long and friendly relationship with the Chinese people and our interest in them has been demonstrated by the Canadian names associated with religious, educational, commercial and other activities in China.
- (c) We should like a proper relationship to be restored. Trade and other contacts should be encouraged.
- (d) The normal legal requirements for recognition, the most important of which is effective control of the country, are complicated in this case by other factors. Because of the impact of the Korean War, the danger has to be taken into consideration that recognition might be regarded as an approval of communism rather than a purely legalistic act, which could have harmful political and psychological effects in the area.
- (e) The Canadian Government is keeping the question under constant review; "it is not inflexible in its stand but no finality of decision has been made."

LETTER NO. 856

Canberra, December 23, 1958

RESTRICTED

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER DIEFENBAKER — DECEMBER 3-8

Prime Minister Diefenbaker and his party arrived in Canberra as scheduled Wednesday morning, December 3 and departed from Sydney for New Zealand Monday morning, December 8. While here he visited Melbourne and Sydney as planned. Just prior to Mr. Diefenbaker's arrival Prime Minister Menzies informed us that he and Dame Pattie planned to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker at Kirribilli House in Sydney on the weekend of December 6/7. This did not seriously affect the proposed itinerary and in fact provided additional time for informal discussions between the two Prime Ministers.

2. I think it is safe to say that the visit went without incident. Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker met with a warm and sincere welcome that was reflected in the attempts of all concerned, political leaders and government officials alike, to ensure that everything possible was done to make their stay in Australia an enjoyable and interesting one.

Official Programme

3. The official programme, agreed to in its broad outline by the Department, was carefully adhered to throughout. Two copies of a handsome booklet, issued by the Prime Minister's Department here, outlining it in detail are attached for your records. There were several minor additions that Mr. Diefenbaker agreed to after arrival. As provisionally planned he and Mrs. Diefenbaker visited the Mission Wednesday afternoon December 3 and afterwards went on an informal tour of Canberra including a brief stop at the official residence. In Melbourne Mr. Diefenbaker met a small group of influential members of the press at Government House immediately on arrival and in the afternoon laid a wreath at the War Memorial and planted a tree in the Botanical gardens. In Sydney he and Mrs. Diefenbaker attended a church service at the Central Baptist Church on Sunday morning and also went on several informal sightseeing tours of the city.

4. You will recall that one of the principal difficulties in formulating a mutually acceptable programme was the inclination of the Australians to overload what already appeared to be a busy schedule. I think however, that the final programme as eventually agreed upon provided as much opportunity for relaxation and rest as possible under the circumstances. Coming at the end of the more arduous Asian part of their tour, at least from the climatic point of view, I think that Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker both felt that they had an opportunity to catch their breath here and relax, particularly over the weekend at Kirribilli House. Australians generally realized that the Prime Minister must be fatigued after his long trip and acted accordingly. A number of special invitations to him were disposed of without difficulty, on this account.

5. The administrative arrangements for the visit, which were in the hands of the Prime Minister's Department, can only be described as excellent. Mr. Scholtens, the Ceremonial and Hospitality Officer accompanied the official party throughout the visit. In Melbourne and Sydney he was ably assisted by the State Government Hospitality Officers who were primarily responsible for the detailed programmes in those two cities. I was most impressed, as I believe also were members of Mr. Diefenbaker's party, with the close planning and foresight that obviously went into the programme. Little, if anything, was left to chance, and I have made a special point of thanking Mr. Menzies for all this and complimenting his officers.

Press Conference and Public Addresses

6. Copies of the transcript of the press conference on December 3 have already been sent to you.† It was decided after consultation with Mr. Robinson that as there did not appear to be anything unduly contentious in the questions and answers it was not necessary to send a telegraphic summary to you.

7. One of the main interests of the press was in a report that Mr. Diefenbaker intended to approach Mr. Menzies concerning the Governor-Generalship of Canada. Mr. Diefenbaker explained of course that this was based only on conjecture. There were also questions concerning recognition of Communist China, in reply to which Mr. Diefenbaker repeated the statement he had made in Kuala Lumpur. Other questions concerned West New Guinea and Indonesia; the disposal of surplus agricultural products; the future of the Commonwealth; racial policies such as those in South Africa; the impact of Australia on Asian members of the Commonwealth; and the effects on Canada of the United States' recession.

8. There were also two questions on the situation in Pakistan. We only learned after Mr. Diefenbaker had left that these were asked by a Mr. Watt, who apparently is a Public Relations Officer attached to the Pakistan High Commissioner's Office in Australia. He had inadvertently been admitted to the press conference as a bona fide journalist. No harm appears to have been done but needless to say it is the general impression here that Mr. Watt had not acted with "propriety."

9. Immediately after the press conference Mr. Diefenbaker granted a short interview to a representative from one of the commercial radio stations. This request was completely unanticipated and no provision had been made for it at the press conference. Mr. Diefenbaker did not appear to have any objections, however, to it, though the intruder had to be choked off before he liked it.

10. The major speech as planned was in Melbourne on Thursday, December 4, at the business men's luncheon given by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Trade, Mr. McEwen. Copies of the transcript are being sent to you under separate cover.† This address was particularly well received as it dealt with a number of subjects of current interest to Australians, such as Canadian policy concerning the disposal of surplus agricultural products and the proposed trade negotiations between Australia and Canada.

11. Of almost equal importance was Mr. Diefenbaker's address at Prime Minister Menzies' Parliamentary luncheon in Canberra on December 4. Copies of this have been sent to you. At one time this had been planned as an "en famille" luncheon at which the press in general would be excluded. Just prior to Mr. Diefenbaker's arrival, however, Mr. Menzies decided that the press should be invited. There were many favourable comments concerning Mr. Diefenbaker's remarks on the Commonwealth.

12. Mr. Diefenbaker also made short addresses at the State Government reception in Melbourne on December 5 and the State Government luncheon, Sydney on December 6. Transcripts of these are being forwarded under separate cover.† I think that possibly the one in Sydney struck the most responsive chord of all. Although this was not scheduled as a major speech it rivalled that in Melbourne (to the delight of the Sydney audience.) The response was most gratifying.

13. The Guest of Honour broadcast was recorded as planned and broadcast on Sunday evening December 7. A copy of the tape recording is being sent to Mr. Diefenbaker at his request and we are also forwarding copies of the transcript under separate cover.†

14. All of Mr. Diefenbaker's addresses as well as the press conference were widely reported in the local press. A large part of the press conference was also televised as well as his speech in Melbourne. The Australian Broadcasting Corporation carried excerpts from his speeches.

Discussions with Prime Minister Menzies and Others

15. A short summary of the principal items discussed at Mr. Diefenbaker's meeting with Mr. Menzies and his Cabinet colleagues on Thursday morning, December 4, was sent in our telegram #179 of December 6.† Mr. Robinson was present at these discussions and I understand will provide you with a full record of the meeting.† Apart from the specific items mentioned in the above telegram — the desirability of discussions in Ottawa prior to the review of the International Wheat Agreement in February; further discussions on lead and zinc before the meeting of the study group in January; and the urgency which Australia attaches to attempting to find a mutually acceptable Western formula concerning the Law of the Sea before the conference is called — the discussions tended to be confined to a wide exchange of views on matters of mutual interest to Australia and Canada, such as the Colombo Plan, the Commonwealth, the problem of commodity prices and related matters. Following the meeting a joint communiqué was issued by the two Prime Ministers. Copies in duplicate are attached.†

16. I have already reported (my despatch #825 of December 10†) on Mr. Diefenbaker's discussions with the Leader of the Opposition, Dr. Evatt, and his colleagues.

17. The two Prime Ministers, of course, had ample opportunity for discussions at Kirribilli House in Sydney over the weekend December 6/7. As far as I know, however, no detailed problems were discussed except that Mr. Diefenbaker at our request briefly raised the matter of Canadian/Australian Trans-Pacific Air Services. Mr. Menzies, I am told by his closest advisers, was primarily concerned in getting to know Mr. Diefenbaker personally rather than embarking on serious national or international problems. The talks, therefore, could probably be described more as social than political and more as a "meeting of minds" than as an exchange of views.

18. I did not have any opportunity of discussing the trend of the conversations with Mr. Diefenbaker and must rely therefore in this report on what I have been able to find out from Mr. Menzies and his advisers. The general consensus seems to be that no important decisions were taken or discussed and that the value of the interchange was more the opportunity provided for the two Prime Ministers to meet each other informally on common ground than an attempt to reach agreement on current problems and possible courses of action.

19. I might mention here that a number of senior members of the government and officials remarked to me after the visit that they regretted more ample opportunities had not existed for an exchange of views between members of the official party and the Australian Government departments concerned. They thought that a unique opportunity existed for this during a visit of this nature. They had in mind their experience with Prime Minister Macmillan who was accompanied by a number of senior officials including Sir Norman Brooks, Secretary to the Cabinet, and senior officials in the Commonwealth Relations

Office. It was obviously impossible, of course, for Mr. Robinson with his other multitudinous duties to embark on discussions of the type desired.

Publicity

20. We are forwarding a selection of representative press clippings under separate cover along with a summary of editorial opinion.† As far as is possible the suggestions contained in your Circular Document No. R23/58 of September 25† were followed in arranging the public programme. A press release with background material was issued just prior to Mr. Diefenbaker's arrival.† This was carried extensively in the local press.

21. The Australian press, of course, normally tends to be concerned more with the spectacular and the unusual than with the details of the itineraries of visiting dignitaries. Nevertheless details of Mr. Diefenbaker's programme and excerpts from his speeches were carried extensively in the press. There were several front page headlines and photographs. We have discussed publicity accorded to the visit with some of our closer press contacts and they assured us that on the whole the results should be regarded as gratifying.

22. Mention should be made of the co-operation of the Australian Broadcasting Commission and its television outlets. I understand that the Australian Broadcasting Commission television shot a number of sequences that are to be made available to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Also at the request of the National Film Board the Film Division of the Australian Department of the Interior undertook to provide coverage of the Prime Minister's visit primarily for domestic use in Canada. Cinesound News Reel, a commercial firm, also covered the Prime Minister's visit. I understand that this coverage was offered on a world wide basis.

23. There were of course, as you are aware, several offers for Mr. Diefenbaker to appear on TV and also for him to grant individual press interviews. In accordance with your instructions all of these were firmly resisted.

24. We have had very little experience with TV at this Mission and therefore are not in a good position to judge whether or not undue demands were made on Mr. Diefenbaker. Nevertheless I was concerned at the press conference in Canberra and at the speech in Melbourne at the insistence of the TV operators in attempting to record the full conference and address. This was contrary to their original undertaking and I am afraid this must have resulted in some undue strain on Mr. Diefenbaker. In future consideration might be given therefore to the drawing up of detailed instructions for Missions on this type of thing that can be used for their guidance.

Conclusions

25. There is no doubt that the visit was a very useful one. Mr. Diefenbaker's comments on the Commonwealth in general and in particular on the role of the Asian members were well received here. On the whole Australians, realizing that the visit to Australia came at the end of a long and arduous Asian trip, were not unduly demanding on Mr. Diefenbaker's time and energies. As the first Prime Minister of Canada to visit Australia he obtained probably better press coverage than would normally be expected. The value of his contacts with the members of the government was probably not so much in the fields of problems discussed or solved as in the close personal relationship that developed.

26. In conclusion I should like to mention how pleased all of us at the Mission were to meet Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker and their party and how gratified we are that they took opportunity, despite a very busy schedule, to the visit the Mission and meet all members of the staff.

REPORT BY PRIME MINISTER ON HIS WORLD TOUR

2. The Prime Minister reported on the highlights of his world tour, particularly on the impressions he had gained in Asia concerning the Colombo Plan and recognition of Communist China, and on his conversations with leaders in Europe.

In Ceylon, he felt that Colombo Plan aid had been of little advantage. The people of Ceylon were, of course, happy to receive aid and Canada was held in high regard for what had been done. But the Prime Minister, Mr. Bandaranaike, had told him that he did not care from where assistance came as long as it arrived. At the moment they looked to the United States for what they needed most and were inclined to treat offers of Canadian help airily. However, Mr. Bandaranaike had said that if Ceylon could not get what it wanted from the West they would turn to the U.S.S.R. There seemed to be a complete lack of principle in Ceylon not only in public, but also in private affairs.

Mr. Bandaranaike had abandoned Christianity to become a Buddhist because this appeared to be politically advantageous. The riots of last March were rooted in religious differences between the Buddhists and Hindus and most of those killed had been Hindus. The Buddhists wanted to eliminate the Hindus and many more would have been killed had not the police stepped in. Now Mr. Bandaranaike was trying to undermine the police. As a result, if there were further riots, killing might be on a much larger scale.

The Sinhalese authorities thought Canada and the United States should recognize Communist China.

In Pakistan he had found the President General Ayoub Khan, an affable and charming man. General Khan had told him that he had had to abolish the constitution because the Cabinet was corrupt. Unfortunately this seemed to be true. Most of those who sought office apparently did so to increase their personal fortunes. Contracts were let in a way which would never be allowed for a moment in western democracies. Some ministers had controlled food stocks and had let prices rise to their own advantage; prices were very high. Once this corruption had started to undermine the Army, General Khan, who had been Commander-in-Chief, decided to make President Mirza abolish the constitution to preserve the integrity of the Army, whose morale and condition it was necessary to maintain in the event of war with India over Kashmir. Subsequently, he ordered Mirza to resign and took over the Presidency himself. Khan had given instructions that martial law should be applied only where it was absolutely necessary. He said he would re-establish constitutional government just as soon as public morality had been restored. Meanwhile, food prices had come down and a large housing plan had been started. The Pakistanis were against the U.S. and Canada giving any form of recognition to Communist China.

In India there were strong feelings over Kashmir. Another vivid impression he had gained was the unifying force and contribution to stability provided by British law and of the use of the English language. The Montreal Trade and Economic Conference had done much to strengthen the Commonwealth connection in India. The difference in Mr. Nehru's attitude towards the Commonwealth between the Prime Ministers' Conference of eighteen months ago and now was quite marked. He realized more than before the value of the Commonwealth in maintaining freedom and in providing security for the individual. The Colombo Plan had bolstered the position of those, both in India and Pakistan, who were trying to withstand the incursions of communism. As regards mainland China, Mr. Nehru felt that the U.S. and Canada should have granted recognition years ago anyway, and that the longer this was delayed the worse the situation became. In fact, they felt in India that Mao didn't want recognition now. However, Nehru seemed to understand the U.S. position better now than he did before. Nehru's main concern over Communist China was not in regard to propaganda but with its trade offensive, which was definitely hurting India. It was difficult to point to the virtues of democracy when prices of Communist Chinese goods were far below those of U.K. or Japanese goods in the South Asian area. If the government excluded Chinese imports, the people complained that their standard of living was being maintained at an artificially low level. If they were allowed in, it was immediately said that communism, with its low prices, was a better way of life than democracy whose cost of living was so high.

In Malaya, the terrorists had been all but eliminated. Like Mr. Nehru, the Malayan authorities were very concerned about the Communist Chinese trade offensive which was having a real effect, particularly on the Malayan Chinese. No Chinese commercial representatives were allowed in Malaya and trading was done on the basis of a few bulk transactions. In order to prevent the Chinese from gaining control of their banks, Malaya required 50 per cent of a bank's directors to be Malaysians and a significant portion of the capital to be Malayan. This had been patterned after Canadian legislation. The Sun Life and Metropolitan Life did a lot of insurance business in Malaya but they refused to invest in the country. The Prime Minister had told him this was not a nice attitude and he intended to restrict these companies from doing business if they did not change their ways. As regards Colombo Plan aid, Mr. Rahman said that it seemed that the wheel that growled got the most grease. Finally, he was strongly of the view that Canada and the U.S. should not recognize Communist China.

In Singapore, the communists were in a strong position. Now they only had four members in a fifty-member legislature but they would be the next ruling party. Colombo Plan aid was of no use and was just a waste. The present administration felt China should be recognized.

Turning to Europe, Mr. Diefenbaker said that the U.K. Prime Minister had asked him to find out from M. de Gaulle what the latter had in mind when he had suggested a kind of governing board for N.A.T.O. composed of France, the U.S., and the U.K. M. de Gaulle had changed greatly since 1944. He seemed reasonable and friendly and he certainly was a dedicated man — thinking of himself as a modern Joan of Arc. Mr. Diefenbaker told him that Canada would not remain a member of N.A.T.O. if three of its nations became the alliance's ruling group. M. de Gaulle said he had no such triumvirate in mind and his letter had been misinterpreted. What he was concerned about were such incidents as the U.K. acting in Jordan without consultation and the U.S. moving into Lebanon and giving its allies only two hours notice. De Gaulle hoped his letter would not be raised at the N.A.T.O. Council meeting, and he had said that Mr. Diefenbaker was free to tell Chancellor Adenauer and Premier Fanfani what he had said about this matter.

Algeria was naturally de Gaulle's main concern. He would never agree to self-government there for at least ten years, and until the Algerians were able to apply democratic government and not go the way of Pakistan and other new eastern countries.

In Germany, Mr. Adenauer had told him how much he liked de Gaulle, who had launched their acquaintanceship in a frank way by saying unequivocally that he had been wrong to suggest the dismemberment of Germany after the war and in advocating an alliance between France and Russia to contain Germany. Mr. Adenauer was worried about the possibility of the U.S. withdrawing from Europe, as the U.S. public became more and more annoyed at the lack of appreciation for their generosity over so many years.

3. Mr. Diefenbaker said Mr. Khrushchev had certainly impressed Mr. Adenauer. Khrushchev had emphasized to Adenauer in their Moscow meeting that the logical area for Chinese expansion was northeast into the U.S.S.R. and had asked more than once what he could do "to trim Mao's wings." It was Mr. Adenauer's feeling that Khrushchev did not want the U.S. to recognize China because, in non-recognition, China was bound more closely to the U.S.S.R. but, once recognized, China would be more independent. By 1980, China would have a population of 800 million and be much stronger industrially. This was Khrushchev's worry. Adenauer said Khrushchev was one of the ablest men he had ever met. It was true he had an uncouth exterior but he was brilliant and a man of considerable humanity. Adenauer had met no one to compare with him in intelligence except Seyss-Inquart. The very nature of the Soviet system made it necessary for him to be stirring up something all the time.

He said he had noted that the Russian ambassadors in the Colombo Plan countries were first class men, extroverts and back slappers, who entertained a great deal and drank freely, but were great workers.

In Australia, and more particularly in New Zealand, Mr. Diefenbaker said it was quite noticeable how much importance the leaders of the two governments attached to maintaining good relations with the U.S.A. The New Zealand authorities now spoke of the U.S. as their saviour and New Zealand was leaning more now on the U.S. than it ever did on the U.K. Mr. Menzies had told him that he had opposed the idea of the Commonwealth Trade Conference originally, because he had feared it might alienate the U.S. In the end, he was pleased and relieved with the outcome of the Montreal meeting.

4. The Cabinet noted the report of the Prime Minister on some highlights of his recent world tour.

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN NEW ZEALAND AND CANADIAN PRIME MINISTERS

1. The Right Hon. J.D. Diefenbaker was, during his visit here, closeted for approximately four hours with Mr. Nash, but as there were no officials present, I can give only the following general account of these discussions. The points mentioned below were picked up by the High Commissioner in conversation with various New Zealand Ministers who were called in from time to time and are therefore third hand.

2. Reportedly, Mr. Diefenbaker asked Mr. Nash if the New Zealand Government would be interested in discussions leading towards a bilateral Trade Agreement (presumably this would be a review of the present Trade Agreement which covers tariffs and would not take the form of a barter agreement). Mr. Nash replied that the New Zealand Government would, indeed, be interested but as officials concerned were committed to discussions with various other countries, those with Canada would take rather a low priority.

3. Mr. Diefenbaker then asked the Prime Minister what Canadian commodities New Zealand would be interested in discussing and the reply was wallpaper, cedar and canned salmon, all of which could be sold in much greater quantities here and would not be competitive with New Zealand products.

4. Mr. Nash then said that New Zealand would naturally be interested in selling dairy products to Canada, but our Prime Minister is reported to have replied that it was politically impossible at the present time to allow even limited imports of butter, cheese or condensed milk.⁶³ He then went on to remind Mr. Nash that Canada had bound the duty on New Zealand lamb and mutton. Mr. Nash asked for an assurance that no quota would be placed on imports of mutton and lamb and Mr. Diefenbaker is reported to have assured him that the Canadian Government would not limit the imports of these meats from New Zealand.

5. As Mr. Diefenbaker's visit to this country was cut short by the news of his Mother's illness, no one here has had an opportunity of querying either him or members of his party about discussions with the New Zealanders. Presumably in due course you may receive some account of these talks and I do hope that you will be able to inform us of any interesting conclusions that were reached.

PRIME MINISTER'S TOUR — SOME THOUGHTS ON ADMINISTRATIVE ARRANGEMENTS, BRIEFING, ETC.

Preparations

Considering the short time which the Department had to make preparations for the tour, the administrative arrangements went remarkably smoothly. Much of the credit for this must go to the Commonwealth Division, which carried out a difficult coordinating role under extremely heavy pressure. The performance of missions in the early planning was uneven but improved as the preparations progressed. The advance party did its work very well.

2. Mr. Glazebrook has been good enough to show me his memorandum of January 13[†] on this subject and I am in agreement with all his main points. In particular, I agree with him that if and when the Prime Minister undertakes another extended tour, (and he has given notice of his intention to visit Africa), the preparations should be placed from the beginning under the direction of an Assistant Under-Secretary. Such an arrangement was not possible prior to the recent tour owing to Mr. Holmes' absence at the United Nations and to Mr. Léger's impending departure. Direction from the Under-Secretarial level in future, however, would avoid the difficulties of coordination which were experienced on this occasion and which placed a disproportionate share of the preparatory work on the Commonwealth Division.

3. I also believe that since extended tours by Ministers seem likely to become more rather than less frequent, it will be necessary for the Department as a whole to give a higher priority to the work, not only of administrative preparation, but also to briefing and speech drafting.

Scope of Tour

4. On the basis of the recent tour, I would be inclined to suggest that future ministerial journeys might better be confined to one major area. The decision to include the United Kingdom, Germany, France and Italy was admittedly taken by the Prime Minister himself. He might have been better advised however to have deferred these visits, and to have begun the tour, say, at Karachi. This would have enabled him to see more of the Asian countries and to be exposed more than he was to the real problems they are facing. As it was, the psychological impact of Asia was not really felt since, in the short time available, it was not possible to free the Prime Minister and his party from the luxury of presidential palaces and all the pomp associated with brief official visits. Apart from a visit to Warsak, the Prime Minister saw virtually nothing of the operation of the Colombo Plan and he had only the briefest glimpse of such Asian realities as refugee camps, villages, and slums. It is the natural desire of Asian governments, when time is short, to put on as brave a front as possible, and only a longer visit would encourage them to give a visitor a glimpse of the seamy side. I am very much afraid that the educative value of the Asian part of the tour was largely lost because of the short duration and formal nature of each visit.

5. To have omitted Europe would also have avoided the slights which I believe both the French and Italian authorities felt at the ricochet visits paid to Paris and Rome.

6. Finally, there was the problem of the refuelling stop at Djakarta. In the end, this worked out pretty well but only at the cost of much anguish to our Mission, which found the Indonesians highly sensitive at the Prime Minister's inability to pay a longer visit. There was no logic in this since the Indonesian Embassy here had themselves suggested a refuelling stop, but if we had it to do again, it might not be worth risking a misunderstanding.

Advance Run

7. Much credit for the preparatory work is due to Messrs. Barker, McWilliam and Sweeny, who represented External Affairs, the RCAF and the RCMP respectively on the advance run. From beginning to end of the tour itself there was no major administrative mistake attributable to faulty planning, and there is no doubt that this degree of administrative efficiency could not have been achieved without the preparatory work done on the advance run.

8. Of the three members of the advance party, the External Affairs representative had by far the biggest load to carry, and this will certainly be the case in any future extended tours of this kind. We should, I believe, regard it as an essential element in our preparation for such tours that the officer selected from External Affairs for the advance run should also be a member of the main touring party. The personal acquaintance which Barker had with local conditions and officials was invaluable.

9. I also believe that in future tours the RCAF and RCMP should be represented on the advance party, even although their work at each stop can be completed in very much less time than that of the External Affairs representative. So far as I could judge, G/C McWilliam and Inspector Sweeny had both prepared the ground efficiently.

10. The police aspect was somewhat overdone in certain places, notably in Pakistan. The reception which Mr. and Mrs. Moran held in the gardens of their residence was marred by the presence in the surrounding bushes of what must have been between fifty and one hundred uniformed policemen who kept moving soundlessly about in the half light. The whole effect was unfortunate and I doubt very much, even though martial law was in force, that it was justified by existing conditions. Although Pakistan was conspicuous in this respect, I think the security escort was overdone in some other places. We cannot of course control the security precautions of host countries, which is strictly their own affair, but a word from us might avoid an exaggerated outlay of protective power.

Composition of the Party

11. I believe that the main criticism which can be made of the conduct of the tour lay in the composition of the party. The manpower was very badly balanced. It is true, of course, that to a large extent this was beyond the Department's control. Leaving aside the Prime Minister's wife and brother and Dr. Rynard, there were eleven members in the party. Two of these were journalists, one a photographer, one an RCAF Conducting Officer, one an RCMP Security Officer, one an External Affairs adviser, one an External Affairs Administrative Officer, one a Private Secretary, one a Press Secretary, one a personal stenographer and one a personal steward.

12. Before we left, it was strongly urged that the party should include a senior External Affairs officer of the rank of Assistant Under-Secretary. I have no doubt that if representation on such a level had been feasible, and if one additional External Affairs adviser had been included (plus the Administrative Officer), the problem of advising the Prime Minister and preparing his speeches would have been met much more satisfactorily. The main External Affairs jobs to be done were: briefing the Prime Minister for his talks, attending the talks, recording them, doing any necessary reporting to Ottawa, preparing him for press conferences and drafting speeches. If these various tasks are to be adequately done on tour, the full time attention of two experienced officers is required. A further point is that there are a number of important peripheral benefits to be derived from these tours. In particular, talks with ministers and senior officials of other governments could easily be arranged independent of the Prime Minister's schedule. It was seldom possible on the recent tour to find time to exploit these excellent opportunities.

13. It is worth considering whether any of the officials attached to the Prime Minister's party could have been left out. Much depends on the abilities and personalities of individuals, but on the experience of this tour it was not essential to have an RCAF Conducting Officer. His functions could readily have been discharged by the Captain of the aircraft in cooperation with either the Private Secretary or the Administrative Officer. There may be some justification for a Conducting Officer if the Prime Minister or Minister in question wishes to have a Military Aide to accompany him on inspections, etc., but this is an expensive use of space on the aircraft.

14. I also doubt the necessity of taking a Security Officer when space is limited. On this tour Inspector Sweeny's sole function (although at first we sought to assign other duties to him, such as the security of documents) was to look after the personal protection of the Prime Minister. In fact, Inspector Sweeny was seldom able to perform this task since security precautions were very efficiently undertaken by local authorities and since it was on nearly all occasions not possible to arrange for the RCMP Officer to ride in the same car or in that following the Prime Minister.

15. These remarks concerning the Conducting Officer and the Security Officer do not prejudice the point made earlier that these officials have a place on the advance party. There is, however, little justification in my view for their inclusion in the main tour party, although it is conceivable that a case could be made for a Security Officer if the Prime Minister went behind the Iron Curtain or to some difficult area elsewhere. It is also true that there are now strong precedents for taking a Conducting Officer and a Security Officer and we might encounter resistance if in future we sought to dispense with them.

16. The exclusion of these officials, if it were feasible, would free two places, one of which might be given to the second External Affairs adviser and the other to an additional stenographer. We had not been twenty-four hours away from Ottawa before it became clear that we could not possibly operate without at least two full-time stenographers. We had good help from stenographers assigned on a temporary basis from missions abroad and perhaps this formula could be adopted in future so long as the individuals in question were assigned to the party for a substantial period. Continuity is, however, all-important since a touring party develops its own methods of production and since the conditions under which stenographers must work frequently involve some discomfort and adjustment.

17. One further point which bears keeping in mind concerns the relative position of the Prime Minister's Private Secretary and the senior External Affairs adviser. On this trip there was a minimum of difficulty over such questions of precedence and access to the Prime Minister. There were, however, situations in which minor friction might have occurred. There were other occasions when the presence of an official of unquestioned seniority would have been desirable. I would therefore recommend that in future tours of such scope the Department should be represented, if not by the Under-Secretary himself, at least by an Assistant Under-Secretary. I have no doubt that this would greatly increase the cohesion and efficiency of the touring party. Moreover, it should mean that contrary advice could more easily be offered to the Prime Minister.

18. Finally, I would emphasize the importance of selecting people who are likely to wear well under the stress of travel, changes of climate, a heavy social programme, and pressure of work. Despite advice from others who had experienced these tours in previous years, I had not fully realized the physical and psychological strains involved. This factor is all-important.

Briefing

19. The briefing supplied to the Prime Minister took the form of a series of "country chapters," supplemented by short papers on special subjects. This book was supplied to the Prime Minister some two weeks before the tour began and it was, I think, as good a method of briefing him as could have been devised. I do not think that the Prime Minister found time to read his book before the tour began. Even during the tour he tended to rely on having particular sections fed to him from the duplicate copy with which I was supplied. I was also provided with a considerable quantity of supplementary material organized by country and by subject, with a set of J.I.B. papers and a collection of maps.

20. For future reference, I am inclined to think that it might be better for the External Affairs advisers to be supplied with a series of files, country by country, each one to contain not only material relating to the country concerned but also containing copies of any supplementary material which could conceivably be required. The advantage of this would be that at stops along the route briefing material could be jettisoned by sea or air bag to Ottawa. The problem of organizing papers and disposing of what was no longer needed took up a lot of valuable time.

21. I had not realized how little time there would be for the Prime Minister to be briefed in the course of the tour. The best opportunity usually arose in flight, prior to arrival in a new country. Sometimes there was as much as half an hour and sometimes not more than fifteen minutes owing to the Prime Minister's habit of sleeping through as many flights as possible. This meant that one was obliged to select and place in order of priority the most important papers, including any recent telegrams received. It also meant that the Prime Minister was not always fully briefed before arrival in each country despite the remarkable capacity he has for quick reading and absorbing of written material. Once the party had arrived in a new capital, the pace of official functions was such that there was seldom time for further briefing although the practice grew up of a short meeting of some 15 or 20 minutes where possible immediately prior to conversations and press conferences. In addition, I supplied the Prime Minister before each conversation and press conference with a short outline of the topics which would probably arise and brief suggestions as to the line he might take.

22. In general, the Prime Minister showed appreciation of the briefs prepared in the Department. They had the merit of brevity and with only a few exceptions they told what he needed to know. Physically, they were also satisfactory, being done neatly and in double space with a suitable number of sub-titles.

Press Conferences

23. The press conferences proved to be somewhat more exacting than I had foreseen. This was true particularly in Karachi, New Delhi, Colombo and Canberra, where the level of questioning was remarkably high and where no effort was made to accommodate the visitor by the avoidance of loaded questions. The draft notes† prepared in the Department proved to be very valuable indeed since they provided a base from which to operate. There would not have been time to prepare such notes in advance of each press conference had they not been supplied from Ottawa. The missions were of course very helpful in providing up-to-date advice on questions likely to be asked.

24. One peculiarity of the press conferences which gave rise to some comment was that the Prime Minister was frequently unable to hear the questions directed at him, especially by Asian questioners. As a result, he asked either the Head of Mission or myself to repeat the questions to him and on occasion he sought advice in the process. Experience showed that the best means of assisting the Prime Minister was to have ready the draft notes on any subject that might arise and slip them to him as the question was asked.

25. One further point regarding press conferences is that it would be advisable in future to arrange them for the later part of the programme in each country rather than as soon as possible after arrival. Our experience was that the Prime Minister was too frequently pitchforked into a press conference before he had had time to sniff the atmosphere and become familiar with the problems which preoccupied the press.

Arrival Statements

26. The arrival statements prepared in the Department were by and large used by the Prime Minister as the basis for his tarmac utterances. On nearly every occasion he preferred not to speak from notes and my impression was that his opening remarks generally hit the right note and were well received. We should, I think, continue in future tours to prepare arrival drafts.

Speeches

27. Unfortunately it was the speeches which gave rise to the greatest difficulty, mainly because it was seldom if ever possible to look at drafts sufficiently in advance to present them in a form which would be acceptable to the Prime Minister. This is not to say that the drafts prepared in the Department were in themselves inadequate; rather, it was that there was never time to incorporate in those drafts new points which deserved inclusion either by reason of new developments or because of some indication one might have had of the Prime Minister's views. Frequently we were obliged to hand the Prime Minister the speech draft prepared in Ottawa with little or no attempt to bring it up to date or to fashion it to his special needs or inclinations.

28. The result of this was that the Prime Minister several times expressed impatience with speech drafts submitted to him and could not understand why it was that they failed to fit the occasion. At various times he asked other members of the party (notably Mr. Guest) to improve the Department's drafts, but more often he took them himself, gleaned an idea or two and then discarded them in favour of material he had accumulated himself.

29. I am afraid that because we were unable to make a better show on the speeches, the Department's reputation suffered considerably. It is of course true that we have not managed in the Department to attune ourselves to the Prime Minister's wave length for speeches, but it should not be beyond our capacity to find a way of satisfying his requirements.

30. As a general rule, we must, I think, accept the fact that the Prime Minister's habit with speeches is to produce his own out of raw material supplied from as many sources as will produce. He does not like to feel tied to someone else's plan or wording. Nor is it his normal habit to give anything more than the most general indication of what each speech is to contain. Efforts to draw him out have been unsuccessful, I think, because the subject matter and structure of his speeches do not crystallize in his mind until a very late stage in the preparation.

31. The requirements for speeches on tour will of course always vary with the Minister concerned and one hesitates, therefore, to be categorical in suggesting a general formula. The first thing which seems to me clear, however, is that with Mr. Diefenbaker, public statements deserve a very high priority, certainly as high as the briefs to which we have normally devoted our main attention. On this tour Mr. Diefenbaker went from major speech to major speech rather than from one official conversation to another and I sometimes had the feeling that he could not understand why so much trouble had been gone to in telling him what to say to other Prime Ministers when what he really needed was some meat to put into his speeches. This seems to suggest therefore (and it applies as well to our operations in Ottawa) that the Department might consider devoting much greater attention to the preparation of speeches for the Prime Minister even though this may require some considerable re-allocation of Departmental priorities.

32. So far as future tours are concerned, we should, I think, avoid repeating the experience of last October when three officers of the Commonwealth Division were assigned the task of producing some fifteen or twenty speeches, most of them major, in two weeks. It seems to me that a greater part of the burden of speech preparation for tours might well be placed on the missions, who should be informed of their obligation at the earliest possible moment and told to submit texts to Ottawa in time for consideration and any necessary amendment here. I also believe that having once submitted speeches to Ottawa, missions should be instructed to keep thinking about them and submitting new material as often as appropriate so that the speech can be gradually built up as the time for it approaches. We had some help in this regard from the missions in New Delhi, Kuala Lumpur, Canberra and Wellington, but their suggestions came rather late in the day and were in many cases unrelated to the drafts which we had brought with us from Ottawa.

33. Another point which should be borne in mind in preparing material for Mr. Diefenbaker is that he does not normally accept and use other people's high-flown or even artistic language. He prefers a text to a series of headings (although a combination of the two is often useful to him) and the language of the text is often more acceptable if it is straightforward. In other words, he is more interested in substance and ideas than in the wrapping. He has his own very personal style of composition and delivery and to succeed in equipping him we should, I think, not hope to change these.

While Mr. Diefenbaker is not given to the detailed use of statistics in speeches, he often likes to see some broad figures on trade, population, economic growth, etc., included in speech drafts. He also likes references to distinguished figures of the past where these are appropriate. Apt quotations are appreciated. One thing he cannot abide is reference to Canada's cold climate, a point which irritated him more than once in the departmental drafts for the tour.

Note du ministre des Finances pour le CabinetMemorandum from Minister of Finance to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 239-58

[Ottawa], August 15, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY

On May 22nd Cabinet had before it a memorandum from the Minister of Finance dealing with Government Purchasing Policy. Among other things this memorandum drew attention to the fact that in the communiqué⁶⁵ issued after the U.K.-Canada economic talks in October, 1957 Canadian Ministers had undertaken "to call for a review of the purchasing arrangements of Crown Corporations and other Government agencies with a view to encouraging purchases from the United Kingdom whenever this is practical and economical of goods imported from non-Commonwealth sources." After considering this memorandum Cabinet agreed that the Department of Finance be directed:

(1) to prepare, as quickly as possible, in consultation with other departments concerned, a redraft of the directive of 1950 on Government Purchasing Policy with recommendations as to its effective implementation; and

(2) to advise, with respect to Crown corporations, on ways and means of giving emphasis, short of direction, to the desirability of purchasing goods produced in Canada, the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries.

2. Pursuant to these instructions, meetings were held on May 27th and June 25th, attended by officials of the Departments of Public Works, Defence Production, Trade and Commerce, Transport, External Affairs, Finance, and the Privy Council Office, to discuss the question of redrafting the 1950 directive. The attached draft was prepared in the light of these discussions. Copy of the 1950 directive is also attached.

3. The revisions which have been made to the previous directive are designed to:

(1) make the intent of the directive as clear and precise as possible;

(2) classify countries as "Commonwealth" and "non-Commonwealth" rather than "soft currency" and "hard currency";

(3) establish a clear preference in favour of Commonwealth as against non-Commonwealth countries;

(4) reduce, as much as possible, the disadvantages in matters related to tendering which are experienced by overseas Commonwealth suppliers because of the fact that they are not as conveniently located as their competitors in North America;

⁶⁵ Voir/See Document 361.

(5) include Crown Corporations within the terms of the directive, with the exception of those engaged in competitive activities;

(6) recognize that with respect to purchases made for the defence programme other directives based on strategic considerations may take precedence over this directive;

(7) include Korean war veterans within the terms of the standard clause applicable to government contracts.

4. Under the terms of the 1950 directive (see Appendix I) Canadian suppliers were given a 10 per cent preference over suppliers from "hard currency" countries, e.g., United States, but were put on a basis of equality with suppliers from "soft currency," countries, e.g., United Kingdom, European countries and Japan. In redrafting the directive it was generally agreed that the "soft currency," "hard currency" classification which had been introduced as a means of helping to alleviate the serious exchange crisis which had arisen in 1949 was now more or less obsolete. It seemed appropriate, therefore, in view of the Government's policy of encouraging the expansion of trade within the Commonwealth to have the preference apply in favour of "Commonwealth" countries rather than "soft currency" countries and against "non-Commonwealth" countries rather than "hard currency" countries.

5. In short, the directive has been redrafted so as to put Canadian and Commonwealth suppliers on a basis of equality; all others would be at a 10 per cent discount. As compared with the intent of the 1950 directive this would improve the position of Canadian and Commonwealth suppliers vis-à-vis the soft currency countries outside the Commonwealth and demote the latter into a position of equality with the United States. It leaves Canada-U.K.-U.S. relationships unchanged. The draft new directive appears as Appendix II.

6. During the discussions which preceded the redrafting of the directive it has been apparent that, in addition to the percentage preference, there are a number of other factors which exert an influence on government purchasing policy. For example, delivery problems, specification differences, etc. affect adversely the ability of U.K. suppliers to tender successfully in competition with American. Other circumstances, such as Canadian-U.S. joint defence strategy, the general convenience of doing business in North America rather than overseas, and domestic unemployment problems also affect purchasing policies and often produce a situation in which U.K. suppliers although formally on an equal footing with Canadian (and with a 10 per cent preference over American) are in reality at a substantial disadvantage. While it was recognized that many of these factors are outside the range of influence of a government directive it was felt that in some respects, particularly on matters related to tendering, the position of U.K. suppliers might be improved. A paragraph to this effect has, therefore, been included in the draft of the new directive.

7. It does not appear that the 1950 directive was intended to apply to Crown Corporations. With a few exceptions, however, there would seem to be no good reason for not having the terms of a government directive on purchasing policy encompass the operations of these corporations. Even in the case of such proprietary corporations as C.N.R., T.C.A., Polymer and possibly one or two others it would be appropriate for the Ministers concerned to point out to them that the directive represents government policy with respect to purchasing and that in so far as it is commercially practicable they should take it into consideration in making purchases.

8. In connection with purchases for the defence programme it is apparent that in certain cases there must be taken into account strategic considerations which do not come within the scope of this directive. The concept of continental defence has, for example, necessitated the adoption of many United States type weapons for the Canadian armed forces and as a result almost three-quarters of all defence procurement abroad since April 1, 1951 —

some $600 million — has been in the United States. It is, of course, not the intention of the revised directive to interfere with a pattern of government defence purchasing based upon strategic considerations. This fact is made clear by the last sentence of the directive which recognizes the priority of these factors.

9. Finally, it is proposed that the new directive, as did the former one, carry a confidential classification and be given a very limited circulation. The chief reason for this is the fact that the policy involves discrimination against the United States, and publication of it might involve undesirable reactions in Washington. It is probable that the United States authorities are aware that some discrimination exists; but it seems undesirable to give the matter unnecessary publicity.

10. In conclusion, I recommend

(1) that the new directive (Appendix II) be accepted in place of the earlier one (Appendix I);

(2) that Ministers chiefly concerned should bring the new directive to the attention of senior officials in the departments and Crown Corporations for which they are responsible.

Appendice I/Appendix I

CIRCULAR NO. 16

[Ottawa] May 20, 1950

CABINET DIRECTIVE
CANADIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS; CONDITIONS REQUIRING THE USE OF CANADIAN MATERIALS

The Cabinet on May 18th, 1950 agreed that the following be adopted as a standard clause in general conditions applicable to government contracts and specifications issued in future:

“Canadian Labour and Materials. To the full extent to which the same are procurable, consistent with proper economy and the expeditious carrying out of this contract, Canadian labour, parts and materials shall be used in the work. In the execution of the work, the Contractor shall employ reasonable proportions of men who have been demobilized or honourably discharged from the fighting services (Navy, Army and Air Force) of the war of 1914-1918 and the second world war, where such men are available and competent;”

In interpreting this clause the Cabinet agreed that, at present, it was not deemed to be consistent with proper economy for government departments or agencies:

(i) to pay for Canadian goods any premium whatsoever over the laid-down, duty-paid cost of similar goods imported from the United Kingdom or other soft currency country;

(ii) to pay for goods produced in Canada a premium exceeding 10 per cent of the laid-down duty-paid cost of similar goods imported from the United States or other hard-currency country (in making a choice between items of which one or both has Canadian content and United States dollar content, preference should be given to the one with higher Canadian content, but any premium which is paid should not exceed 10 per cent of the difference in United States dollar content).

N.A. ROBERTSON
Secretary to Cabinet

[PIÈCE JOINTE 2/ENCLOSURE 2]

Appendice II/Appendix II

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], August 1, 1958

CABINET DIRECTIVE
CANADIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS; CONDITIONS REGARDING THE USE OF CANADIAN MATERIALS

Cabinet has agreed that the standard clause applicable to government contracts and specifications should be modified so as to include Korean war veterans within its terms as well as veterans from the war of 1914-1918 and the Second World War. The standard clause, therefore, should read as follows:

“Canadian Labour and Materials. To the full extent to which the same are procurable, consistent with proper economy and the expeditious carrying out of this contract, Canadian labour, parts and materials shall be used in the work. In the execution of the work, the Contractor shall employ reasonable proportions of men who have been demobilized or honourably discharged from the fighting services (Navy, Army and Air Force) of the war of 1914-1918, the second world war and the Korean theatre of operations, where such men are available and competent;”

It is the general intent of government purchasing policy to encourage departments and agencies to purchase goods produced in Canada and other Commonwealth countries rather than elsewhere. At the same time, regard for proper economy requires that government purchasing should be guided by the following conditions relating to price.

1. The price paid for Canadian produced goods should include no premium whatsoever over the laid down, duty paid cost in Canada of similar goods produced in other Commonwealth countries.
2. The price paid for Canadian produced goods should include no more than a 10 per cent premium over the laid down, duty paid cost in Canada of similar goods produced in countries outside of the Commonwealth.
3. In the event that paragraphs 1 and 2 above are not applicable because Canadian produced goods are not available, the price paid for goods produced in other Commonwealth countries should include no more than a 10 per cent premium over goods produced in countries outside the Commonwealth.

Government departments and agencies are requested to render every assistance to United Kingdom and other Commonwealth suppliers on matters related to tendering with a view to removing where possible the disadvantages in this respect which overseas suppliers may experience in competition with those who are more conveniently located.

This directive shall apply to all government departments and agencies, including Crown Corporations with the exception of those proprietary corporations having a commercial character and operating under competitive conditions, e.g., C.N.R., T.C.A., and Polymer. Furthermore, in connection with goods for the defence programme, Ministerial directions issued from time to time affecting their purchase and relating to strategic considerations shall take precedence over the requirements of this directive.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE MAY 22†)

11. The Minister of Finance said that, following instructions, officials had now redrafted the 1950 directive on government purchasing policy. The revisions proposed were designed to make the new directive as clear as possible, to classify countries as "Commonwealth" and "non-Commonwealth" rather than "soft currency" and "hard currency," to establish a clear preference in favour of Commonwealth countries as against non-Commonwealth countries, to reduce the disadvantages in tendering experienced by overseas Commonwealth suppliers, to include crown corporations within the terms of the directive, except for those engaged in competitive activities, to recognize that, in defence purchases, other directives based on strategic considerations might take precedence over this directive, and to include Korean war veterans within the terms of the standard clause applicable to government contracts.

The directive had been redrafted so as to put Canadian and Commonwealth suppliers on a basis of equality; all others would be at a 10 per cent discount. Canada-U.K.-U.S. relationships would be unchanged. In addition to the percentage preference there were a number of other factors which exerted an influence on government purchasing policy. For example, delivery problems, specification differences, etc., affected the ability of U.K. suppliers to tender successfully. Other circumstances, such as Canadian-U.S. joint defence strategy, the convenience of doing business in North America, and domestic employment problems also affected purchasing and often placed U.K. suppliers at a substantial disadvantage. A paragraph has been included in the redraft with a view to improving their position. Although the new directive would not apply to such proprietary corporations as the C.N.R., T.C.A., or Polymer, it would be appropriate for ministers to point out to them that, so far as possible, they should take it into consideration in making their purchases. The new directive, as in the case of the former one, should be classified as confidential and given only a limited circulation.

The Minister submitted the revised directive and recommended that it be accepted in place of the earlier one. He also proposed that ministers chiefly concerned bring the new directive to the attention of senior officials and crown corporations for which they were responsible.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Aug. 15, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 239-58).

12. Mr. Fleming added that the policy now being applied was the same as that of the previous administration. Although the outstanding directive placed Canadian and U.K. suppliers on an even footing, in fact Canadian suppliers enjoyed the same preference as they did over U.S. suppliers. A number of combinations of premiums had been considered but they appeared to be unworkable because most involved raising the premium against non-Commonwealth sources of supply, and this was bound to bring an adverse reaction from the U.S.

13. During the discussion it was suggested that, if the Cabinet agreed, the new directive might be put to good use at the forthcoming Commonwealth Conference in Montreal. It should be remembered, however, that the government, as long ago as last autumn, had told the U.K. that it would reconsider its purchasing policies and that this was only the result of that study. The problem was an exceedingly difficult one. To put U.K. suppliers on the same basis as Canadians might be going too far, despite what had been said to U.K. ministers. Perhaps the matter might best be settled by giving Canadians a 10 per cent premium over everyone abroad and Commonwealth suppliers 10 per cent over all others.

14. The Cabinet deferred decision on a new directive on government purchasing policy as submitted by the Minister of Finance.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUGUST 29)

13. The Minister of Finance said that, in accordance with the previous decision, a revision of conditions 1 and 2 of the draft Cabinet Directive on Canadian government contracts had been prepared. This revision provided that the price paid for Canadian produced goods should include no more than a 10 per cent premium over the laid down, duty paid cost in Canada of similar goods produced elsewhere and that, in the event that this was not applicable either because Canadian produced goods did not qualify under its terms or because Canadian produced goods were not available, the price paid for goods produced in other Commonwealth countries should include no more than a 10 per cent premium over goods produced in countries outside the Commonwealth.

(Revisions, directive on government purchasing policy, Sept. 7, 1958)†

14. During the discussion it was indicated that the degree of Canadian content in any goods to qualify them for the premium was a matter that could not be specified precisely and would have to be settled in important cases by the Treasury Board. It was considered, however, that there should be substantial Canadian content to qualify.

15. The Cabinet agreed that a Cabinet Directive, regarding the use of Canadian materials for Canadian government contracts, as attached to the memorandum of the Minister of Finance which had been circulated (Cab. Doc. 239-58), and as revised for conditions 1 and 2 in accordance with the wording submitted by the Minister be approved, and be circulated, on a confidential basis, to departments, agencies, and to crown corporations not engaged in commercial activities.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY; PURCHASE FOR DEFENCE PROGRAMME
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE SEPTEMBER 7)

6. The Minister of Finance said he had now had a chance to discuss the implications of the new government purchasing policy directive, which had been approved by Cabinet, with the Minister of Defence Production who had not been able to be present when it was considered. The Deputy Minister of Defence Production would be in Washington shortly to carry out negotiations and it would be desirable that he be in a position to explain that the new directive did not affect the pattern of government defence purchases based upon strategic consideration.⁶⁶

He hoped to be able to say something on this subject privately to the United Kingdom and to ask them not to press the Canadian government on this matter. The British had expressed some concern about the "buy in America" policy of the United States. He thought it preferable to soft-pedal the purchasing directive rather than jeopardize negotiations with the United States. Mr. O'Hurley was also of this opinion.

7. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Finance on the recent government purchasing policy directive and agreed that it be withheld for some time.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY;
 STEEL TOWERS FOR NEW BRUNSWICK POWER COMMISSION
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE OCTOBER 29†)

7. The Minister of Labour said he had raised the question of the purchase of steel towers for the New Brunswick Power Commission because a Canadian firm in Niagara Falls might have to close down if it did not obtain the business. Departments should use their discretion in purchasing matters. Even though equipment might cost more if purchased in Canada, the government would save money in the long run because unemployment insurance benefits would be less.

8. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said that the Italian firm which had obtained the last contract for steel towers was sound and reliable. Its quotation had been over 18 per cent lower than any other bid and the government purchasing directive, which had been approved but not yet issued, proposed only a 10 per cent preference for Canadian goods. If the order had been placed with the Niagara Falls company the extra cost, which ultimately would have to be borne by New Brunswick, would have been $85,000. The purpose of federal participation in the maritime power programme was to reduce power costs. For these reasons the contract had been given to the Italian firm. The Niagara Falls company seemed to have understood the situation once it was explained to them and had also been told that its bids on future contracts would be given every possible consideration.

9. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Department of Public Works had recently given an order for steel to the United Kingdom in preference to a Belgian company which had resulted in a Belgian note of protest. The National Harbours Board had received bids on conveyor belting from Canadian and British firms, with the British price being 6 per cent lower than the Canadian. These and other cases like them were always giving rise to trouble and the sooner a clear understanding on government purchasing policy could be reached the better.

(b) Purchases of equipment for the Colombo Plan should normally be made in Canada. If, however, this were to be government policy, some of Canada's best customers were bound to be antagonized at losing business. Colombo Plan equipment items were relatively insignificant compared to the amount of wheat sold to the United Kingdom or Belgium, for example. Even so, in the past some Colombo items and defence orders had been placed in Canada regardless of the difference in cost.

(c) The Department of Defence Production had recently recommended that generators be purchased in Canada notwithstanding a bid some 14 per cent lower from the United Kingdom, but the Treasury Board had ruled that the purchase must be made in the U.K.

10. The Cabinet deferred further consideration of government purchasing policy to a meeting at which the Minister of Finance was present.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASING POLICY;
 RELATION TO U.S. DEFENCE PRODUCTION NEGOTIATIONS
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE SEPTEMBER 7)

21. The Minister of Defence Production said negotiations with the United States on production sharing were going well. Senior U.S. authorities had given the assurance that Canadian representations would be sympathetically considered. To come out now with a directive discriminating against the U.S. could only jeopardize discussions which seemed to hold out a good deal of promise. Perhaps defence procurement should be exempted from the directive.

22. The Minister of Finance added that he had spoken quietly to U.K. ministers who understood the situation and would not press for a preferred position at this time.

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE COLOMBO PLAN
 FOR THE FINANCIAL YEAR 1958-1959

The annual meeting of Ministers from Colombo Plan countries will take place in Saigon, Vietnam, beginning October 21. The Canadian Delegation is to be led by the Honourable W.J. Browne, Minister without Portfolio. At the Saigon meeting the representatives of participating countries will be expected to indicate their support for the continuation of the Colombo Plan. To the best of our knowledge, the donor countries of the Plan intend to continue their assistance to the under-developed countries of the Plan on at least the present scale. In line with practice in past years it would be expected that the Canadian representative at the Conference would be able to indicate the size of Canada's contribution for the next financial year in the course of his major statement to the Conference. A Cabinet decision is also required on this matter so that an item may be included in the Main Estimates for 1958-1959.

In the light of the present political situation in South and Southeast Asia, the Colombo Plan has taken on considerable significance as a means of preserving the ties of friendship and mutual interest, not only among Commonwealth countries, but also among the Asian and Western members of the Plan generally. The Colombo Plan presents to the world at large an example of successful co-operation in the field of economic development, despite recurring political strains. There is no question that if economic development is to continue at a pace which will offer some hope to the people of South and Southeast Asia, the countries of the area will need continuing outside assistance. There is no question, too, that there are worthwhile development projects in all of the Colombo Plan countries to which Canada can make an effective contribution.

The Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan financial year 1956-1957 was $34.4 million. This was an increase over the amounts previously voted, the additional money being provided to meet expenditures in connection with the Warsak project in Pakistan, the Canada-India atomic reactor near Bombay, and for the beginning of a modest programme of assistance to the non-Commonwealth countries of Southeast Asia. At the Colombo Plan Conference last year the Leader of the Canadian Delegation stated that for 1957-1958 Canada would again contribute $34.4 million.

It is proposed, therefore, that, in line with the suggestion above that the Canadian contribution for 1958-1959 should not be reduced, the Leader of the Canadian Delegation to the Saigon Conference should be authorized to say that the Canadian Government will be prepared, subject to Parliamentary approval, to contribute $35 million to development programmes under the Colombo Plan.

It would be difficult at this early stage to attempt to make a precise division of the $35 million among the various countries receiving Canadian assistance. A precise division of such an appropriation should be made only after proposed projects in the various countries have been examined in considerable detail. It seems desirable to avoid giving the impression to any country in the region that it is entitled to a specified scale of Canadian aid, whether or not it puts forward projects appropriate for Canadian assistance. Cabinet approval will, as in the past, be sought for the expenditure of this sum in terms of allocations to particular projects in particular countries, as these projects are investigated and firm proposals developed.

However, in giving authority to the leader of the Canadian Delegation to state that $35 million could be made available, Cabinet might wish to consider at this time the following broad allocation of funds amongst recipient countries so that officials may have some guidance in considering the number and type of projects which might be put forward before Cabinet in due course.

Capital Aid

India: In 1956-1957 slightly over $18 million was made available to India; in 1957-1958 over $16 million was made available to India. It is suggested that $16 million of the $35 million should be tentatively allocated to India.

Pakistan: In 1956-1957 slightly over $11 million was made available to Pakistan; in 1957-1958 the figure was slightly over $15 million. It is suggested that $11 million should be tentatively allocated to Pakistan.

Ceylon: For the past several years $2 million has been made available to Ceylon annually. In terms of Ceylon's economic development and need for foreign assistance this is a rather more generous scale of aid than that made available to India and Pakistan. However, it would seem undesirable at this time to make any reduction in the scale of aid to Ceylon and, therefore, $2 million might be tentatively allocated for aid to that country.

Other Countries in South and Southeast Asia: In the past there has been no separate allocation by Cabinet to the individual countries of the Plan other than to India, Pakistan and Ceylon. The scale of Canadian aid to other countries, such as Burma, Malaya, Indonesia, Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, is too small to make annual programming feasible. It is suggested that this year a specific sum should again be set aside for capital aid to the countries of Southeast Asia as a group but that of that sum a certain amount should be tentatively allotted to the new Federation of Malaya. In view of its new independence, it would be desirable for Canada to set up an annual programme of this sort in the same fashion as for India, Ceylon, and Pakistan. It is suggested that $3.5 million should be allotted to capital aid to the countries of the Plan other than India, Ceylon, Pakistan, and that of this sum one-half million dollars should be tentatively allocated for capital aid to Malaya.

Technical Assistance: The above allocations refer to capital aid only. Experts and trainee programmes have been financed out of one lump sum for the whole of the Colombo Plan region. It would be well nigh impossible to work out a detailed budget for such technical assistance to each country in the region. Therefore, the practice of maintaining a global figure for technical assistance should be continued. In 1957-1958 it is anticipated that technical assistance will use about $2 million of the total of $2.4 million made available for this purpose. Technical assistance expenditures tend to increase about ten per cent per year. Therefore, it is proposed that $2.5 (the balance of the proposed $35 million) should be set aside for technical assistance for the whole of the Colombo Plan area.

While, as suggested above, detailed recommendations will be put before Cabinet as to the allocation of these sums to particular projects, it may be useful to indicate some of the proposals which may emerge after discussion with the Asian countries. One allocation which can be foreseen for India is a sum of possibly $1 million to meet the further costs of the Canada-India Reactor; at present it is known that at least between $500,000 and $600,000 will be required to meet additional costs which Canada agreed to undertake at the time the project was approved. The bulk of the sum made available for Pakistan will be required to meet the costs of the Warsak project. In Ceylon it is anticipated that a number of small projects in the educational field and in the development of new agricultural settlement areas will be proposed, some of which may involve the establishment of counterpart funds through the provision of Canadian flour. In Malaya preliminary consideration is being given to the provision of a refrigeration plant like the one already provided for Ceylon. In Burma and Indonesia there are a variety of projects under consideration by the authorities of those two countries involving the supply of Canadian-made equipment.

I recommend⁶⁷ that:

(a) Parliament be asked to approved a contribution in 1958-1959 to the Colombo Plan of $35 million; and

(b) The Canadian representative at the Colombo Plan meeting in Saigon be authorized to announce that, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament, Canada will make a contribution of this amount.

COLOMBO PLAN PROJECTS

This memorandum recommends for approval Canadian aid projects under the regular Colombo Plan in India, Pakistan and Ceylon. These projects will be financed from funds already voted by Parliament or provided for in the Main Estimates for the current financial year.

⁶⁷ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 12 octobre 1957./Approved by Cabinet on October 12, 1957.

INDIA

Discussions have been under way since January last between Canadian and Indian officials as to the allocation of $21 million earmarked by Cabinet for Colombo Plan capital assistance in India. This $21 million is made up as follows: $6,000,000 remaining from the funds made available for 1956-1957; $13,000,000 from the Main Estimates for 1957-1958; and an additional $2,000,000 from the Main Estimates for 1957-1958 earmarked for the further costs of the Canada-India Reactor.

Canadian and Indian officials have now examined together an extensive number of development projects in various parts of India with a view to finding out what India needs most and what Canada could most effectively supply. The Indian Government has the ablest Civil Service in South and South-East Asia; they have been able to put before Canadian officials a number of detailed and well-thought-out proposals. Of course they know more about their own needs and priorities than anyone else; there has been the fullest and frankest review with the Indians of their development plans and their particular proposals for the use of Canadian aid.

These discussions have now been concluded; as has been the practice under the Colombo Plan, the programme formally proposed by India and approved by Indian Ministers has been transmitted to us through our High Commissioner. The projects proposed by the Indian Government for the Indian programme are as set out below; the great bulk of these goods would, of course, come from Canadian sources.

(a) Canada-India Reactor — It is proposed that of the $21 million now available, $2 million should be set aside to meet further costs of this Reactor. When the Canadian-Indian Reactor agreement was signed two years ago, it was stated that the external costs of the reactor would be approximately $7,544,000, and it was agreed between Governments that the bulk of these costs which were to be financed by Canada would be met without affecting the regular Canadian aid programme in India. $5 million of these external costs were met out of 1956-1957 funds. In order to keep pace with the project a further $2 million should now be made available; an additional sum to complete the Reactor should be a priority charge on any sums made available for India in 1958-1959.

(b) Kundah-Madras Transmission Line — The Kundah Project is a substantial hydro-electric development in Madras State in South India. It is designed to bring power to a rapidly developing industrial area around the major seaport of Madras.

Canadian participation up to $20 million for engineering services and electric generating equipment and auxiliary equipment was approved by Cabinet on March 21, 1956. $13 million was allocated for this project out of money made available in 1955-1956. The balance of $7 million was provided out of sums made available in 1956-1957. It is now proposed that Canada should undertake to meet up to $5 million out of the external costs of the transmission line which will link this hydro-electric project with the electricity distribution system of Madras State. The Indian view, as put forward by the Minister of Finance, is that unless Canada is prepared to take on this project it may well be that the Kundah scheme will be completed without there being any way of getting the power to the industrialized area where it is needed. The fact that India finds itself unable to build the transmission line is a measure of India's present foreign exchange difficulty.

A firm of Canadian consulting engineers has investigated the project and states that the foreign exchange costs of the transmission line will be $5 million. It should be noted that the agreement covering this project between Canada and India had envisaged that any money that Canada could make available for this project which was not required for the generating plant and engineering services would be allocated to the transmission lines; it was foreseen that the Indians might find it difficult to make sufficient funds available to have the line constructed as soon as desirable. Material for the transmission line would come almost completely from Canadian manufacturers.

(c) Railway Ties — There is general agreement that one of the basic economic problems of India is the lack of transportation facilities. Goods are available in one part of India which cannot be transported to places where they are needed. The World Bank Mission, which visited India, put the highest priority on expansion and modernization of the railway system. The Indians are in full agreement with the World Bank's recommendations and have, therefore, asked Canada to give aid to the Indian railway system in the quickest way possible, this is by the provision of treated wooden railway ties which are available immediately from Canadian suppliers. They suggest that $3 million should be allocated to this project. It will be recalled that Canada has already given some assistance to the Indian railway system by providing locomotives and boilers. There is no doubt that aid given to the railways is one of the most effective ways of giving assistance to India.

(d) Cobalt Beam Therapy Units — There has been prolonged discussions with the Indian authorities by Colombo Plan officials and by representatives of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited as to the possibility of the Indians establishing certain cancer treatment centres at which Canadian cobalt beam therapy units could be used. The Indians originally asked Canada for five of these units but in view of the critical foreign exchange situation they would prefer to have only three. They would be used at Calcutta, Bombay and Ludhiana. These would cost $120,000.

(e) On September 24 Cabinet approved the provision of up to $65,000 worth of audio visual equipment and educational material for co-operative training centres in India; this would be a charge on the $21 million available.

(f) The Indians would like to have the balance of the $21 million available spent on metals for their industrial system: aluminum, copper and nickel. The Indians have told us that their foreign exchange situation is so critical that if they cannot get metals some Indian factories will have to close and that their metal-working industries would be cut back to about seventy per cent of normal output. This would be a dramatic and public setback to India's development plans, which place great emphasis on the development and modernization of industry, particularly the metal-working factories; indeed, in political terms it might be one of the most serious reversals suffered by the Second Five Year Plan so far. The Indians have commented to us that in India's current foreign exchange situation there were "priorities higher than the full satisfaction of the demands for food."

Canada has been supplying metals to India for some time out of funds previously allocated; the last shipment of aluminum which could be provided out of funds already allocated by Cabinet was despatched to India in June. For the reasons stated above, it is now a matter of urgency that a decision be taken as to whether or not Canada is prepared to continue with this metal programme. $10,815,000 is available for this programme. The Indians are fully aware that in asking for such a substantial portion of their programme to be met in the form of metals that they are making a somewhat unusual request.

If Cabinet approves this proposal officials would discuss with the Indians the use of the rupees resulting from the sale by the Indian Government of the aluminum, copper and nickel for various development projects in India. Cabinet would be asked in due course to consider recommendations for the use of such counterpart funds.

The six items above total $21 million; this is the amount of money earmarked by Cabinet for India out of 1956-1957 and 1957-1958 funds. However, it is considered that only $18 million of this sum may actually be required during the current financial year; if Cabinet agreed to this programme, actual commitments by the Colombo Plan Administration would not be allowed to exceed $18 million until further sums have been made available by Parliament for the financial year 1958-1959. The additional $3 million which would thus, in a sense, be available, might be used to finance wheat shipments as discussed below.

PAKISTAN

Bheramara-Kushtia Power Transmission Line

The Ganges-Kobadak irrigation scheme is the first of seven components of a multi-purpose project for the irrigation and development of the Brahmaputra-Ganges delta in East Pakistan. The project was first proposed by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations; it is the only large project which we have undertaken in which the coordinating role has been taken on by a United Nations agency. Under the F.A.O. scheme, Canada was to provide a power station, Pakistan a pumphouse and irrigation works, and the United States the pumps. This project would provide for the irrigation of a substantial area now arid by pumping water from the River Ganges into certain drying rivers of the delta which are to become irrigation canals.

On April 29, 1954, Cabinet authorized the allocation of $1.8 million for the provision of a steam power plant at Bheramara as a part of the scheme. A suitable plant has been purchased and erected. Although Canada's contribution has thus been completed, progress on some other aspects of the scheme has been rather slow — the pumphouse which East Pakistan undertook to provide has not yet been erected and thus the pumps, which have been provided by the United States and which are to be driven by power from the Canadian powerhouse, cannot be installed for the present. The United States is now considering financing the pumphouse; though if they decide to do so, it will be some time before the pumphouse is complete, the pumps installed, and power required from the Bheramara plant. In the interim, since there is an acute need for power in the Kushtia area, about twenty miles from Bheramara, Pakistan has suggested that Canada help in building a transmission line between these points. It is estimated that the foreign exchange costs would be $1 million. To finance this there is $500,000 remaining from funds previously allocated for the purchase and installation of the Bheramara power plant; a further $500,000 is available from funds already voted and earmarked for Pakistan. This money would be spent almost entirely on goods made in Canada.

Dacca-Chittagong Power Transmission Line

On April 29, 1954, Cabinet authorized the allocation of $4 million to provide equipment and engineering services for the construction of an electricity transmission line between Dacca and Chittagong in East Pakistan. The line was designed to carry power from Dacca, where a steam plant is under construction, to Chittagong some 153 miles away and where there is an urgent need for power.

At the time of the Cabinet decision it was appreciated that a surplus of power would be created in the Chittagong area when the Karnafuli hydro-electric plant near Chittagong was completed by the United States. The Canadian transmission towers were therefore designed to carry two circuits, with a view to the ultimate reversal of flow from Chittagong to Dacca and an increase in the amount of power transmitted, but Canada did not undertake to supply the second circuit. It did not appear likely at that time that the Karnafuli scheme would be undertaken in the near future. However, the United States is now proceeding to construct the hydro-electric plant at Karnafuli and it is apparent that a second circuit will soon be required. The Government of Pakistan has proposed that Canada provide a second circuit; there is no doubt that this would be a valuable and efficient contribution to the economic advancement of East Pakistan. The cost of this second circuit is estimated at $1,600,000 providing it is erected at the same time as the first circuit; funds are available from sums already voted by Parliament and earmarked for Pakistan.

The equipment for this project, as for the one above, would come almost completely from Canadian sources.

CEYLON

Discussions have recently taken place in Ottawa between representatives of the Government of Ceylon and officials from the various Departments concerned as to the allocation of $2 million earmarked by Cabinet for the 1957-1958 Canadian Colombo Plan capital aid programme in Ceylon. At that meeting the Ceylon representative proposed that $1 million of this programme be supplied in flour. This was brought to Cabinet attention and Cabinet gave authority for provision of such flour on October 4. Under the terms of the Colombo Plan Vote, the funds resulting from the sale by Ceylon of this flour will have to be used for development projects. To this end, the Ceylonese Government has voluntarily undertaken to purchase two diesel locomotives worth $370,000, one Cobalt beam therapy unit valued at $50,000 and certain port equipment from Canada. $100,000 of the funds to be generated by the sale of flour would be allocated to meet the local costs of building a technical institute to which Canada has already given support, and the balance would be spent on port equipment from the United Kingdom.

The Ceylon authorities have now put forward proposals for the use of the other $1 million made available by Cabinet. These are set out below:

A crane to assist in the erection of harbour cranes supplied by Canada — $13,000. This was approved as a matter of urgency by Cabinet on September 24 last.

Further Transmission Lines in the Gal Oya Valley — $200,000. This is the third stage in the provision of an electric power transmission system for the multi-purpose river development scheme in eastern Ceylon. Last year $400,000 was made available to connect an irrigation system distribution station and other units with the existing lines. Further extensions of the transmission system are now proposed. The work is under the immediate direction of a Canadian engineering company and Canadian supplies are used almost exclusively. The additional sum here proposed would enable the distribution system in the Gal Oya Valley to be connected with the steam power plant at the paper mill at Valaichenai.

Remedial Equipment for the Rehabilitation Centre at the University of Ceylon — The physical education and health programme at the University of Ceylon is under the direction of a Canadian, a Mr. Bryant Little. He has persuaded the Ceylonese Government to give him an airplane hangar which he has erected on the campus and made into a modern gymnasium. However, he lacks equipment for this gymnasium and has sought our help. Officials have made it plain that the Colombo Plan could hardly be expected to provide sports equipment. However, there is a more pressing need for equipment to help in training workers who deal with the rehabilitation of crippled and deformed people. Mr. Little hopes that the University could, if it had some such equipment, do a good deal to make Ceylon university graduates familiar with what can be done in this field. It is proposed that $12,500 be made available for remedial equipment for this purpose.

Continuation of Aerial Survey — One of the major Canadian projects in Ceylon is the carrying out of an aerial photographic survey. A good deal of Ceylon's development programme rests on the development of more accurate information as to land use and distribution of resources which can be most cheaply provided by aerial survey techniques. It is now proposed that this aerial survey should be carried a stage further by beginning a geophysical programme to investigate land and water resources. The geophysical programme would be completely carried out by Canada. Ceylon would carry out $126,000 of the land and water resources programme.

The American aid programme in Ceylon is in part now premised on the possibility that Canada will continue the aerial survey programme; the Americans elaborating the details of development programmes for the Walawe Ganga and the Mahaweli Ganga bases on the assumption that certain detailed information will be made available by a Canadian survey programme. It is estimated that at current prices about $750,000 would be required to complete the Canadian operation of the programme. It is suggested that $640,000 might be set aside this year and the balance next year.

Pest Control Units — A number of pest control units have already been supplied to Ceylon by Canada, initially as a pilot project, and then as a continuing project. These units are thoroughly successful. The Ceylonese authorities request that an additional four be provided this year, at a cost of $14,000.

Standby Radio Unit for Colombo Airport — In 1954 Cabinet approved of the provision of $205,000 worth of telecommunication equipment for use at the Colombo Airport. This equipment, largely of Canadian manufacture, is being installed under the direction of a Canadian telecommunications firm. The Ceylonese Government has accepted the recommendation of this firm that there should be a standby radio unit for use at the airport and has asked that Canada provide this unit at a cost of $17,500.

X-ray Maintenance Equipment — A Canadian Colombo Plan expert on Ceylon, Mr. Hopps, is teaching the use and maintenance of x-ray equipment in Colombo. He needs certain maintenance equipment which is not obtainable in Ceylon; in order to get full value from this expert the necessary equipment should be provided as soon as possible. $3,000 worth of equipment is needed.

Equipment for Technical Institute — A Canadian Colombo Plan expert has made detailed proposals as to the final instalment of training equipment needed by the Technical Institute which is being built in the main through the use of counterpart funds generated by the sale of Canadian flour and being equipped almost completely by Canada. The Institute, when completed, will be virtually an entirely Canadian project, and a monument to Canadian support for technical education in the Colombo Plan area. An additional $100,000 is required for equipment, about 40% of which will have to be spent offshore; however, about 80 per cent of the total equipment being provided will have come from Canadian suppliers.

Financing Programming of Wheat Already Authorized

On October 4 Cabinet approved the provision of certain amounts of wheat and flour under the Colombo Plan.⁶⁸ Recommendations (d) (f) and (g) are merely designed to formalize the decisions already taken, in line with statutory requirements. In regard to the financing of these wheat shipments, it should be noted that there is a total of $38 million in the Colombo Plan Fund to finance the projects proposed above, to meet existing commitments, and other anticipated expenditures during the current financial year, and to finance wheat shipments as authorized by Cabinet. The total of these calls on the Colombo Plan Fund would exceed funds in hand; however, it can be assumed that only $18 million cash will be required to finance the $21 million Indian programme before additional monies are paid into the Fund when interim supply is voted for 1958-1959. Thus, in effect, there is $10,386,000 available to finance $9 million wheat purchases leaving a reserve of $1,386,000. For a programme running at an annual level of $34.4 million, a reserve of this size would be inadequate. The reserve against unforeseen contingencies should be at least 10 per cent of the annual programme — that is, between $3 million and $4 million. It is, therefore, proposed that $2 million should be repaid to the reserve when funds are voted next year.

Recommendations

I recommend:⁶⁹

(a) that $500,000 out of the sums already made available for the Ganges-Kobadak project and $500,000 of money already voted by Parliament should be allotted to the construction of a transmission line from Bheramara to Kushtia in East Pakistan, subject to a suitable agreement being reached with the Government of Pakistan, the additional $500,000 to be a charge against the 1957-1958 programme for Pakistan;

(b) that $1,600,000 be made available for the doubling of the circuit on the transmission line being built by Canada from Dacca to Chittagong, in East Pakistan, subject to a suitable agreement being reached with the Government of Pakistan; the $1,600,000 to be a charge against the 1957-1958 programme for Pakistan;

(c) that the following projects be approved for Ceylon: for additional transmission lines in the Gal Oya Valley—$200,000; for remedial equipment for the University of Ceylon—$12,500; for the continuation of the aerial survey project—$640,000; for pest control units—$14,000; for a standby radio link for Colombo Airport—$17,500; for equipment for the Technical Institute — $100,000; for x-ray maintenance equipment—$3,000; these sums to be a charge against the 1957-1958 programme for Ceylon;

(d) that the Government of Ceylon be asked to agree that the proceeds of the sale of the $1 million worth of flour previously authorized by Cabinet be used for economic development purposes;

(e) that the following projects be approved for India — for the Canada-India Reactor—$2 million; for transmission lines in connection with the Kundah Project—$5,000,000 subject to a suitable agreement being reached with the Government of India; for railway ties—$3 million; for three cobalt beam therapy units—$120,000; for aluminum, copper and nickel—$10,815,000; the use of the resulting counterpart funds from the sale of these commodities to be considered later. All the above sums are to be a charge against the balance of funds made available for the 1956-1957 programme for India and against the 1957-1958 programme for India;

(f) that the $2 million worth of wheat which Cabinet agreed be offered to Pakistan be a charge against the balances of the 1956-1957 programme and the 1957-1958 programme for Pakistan, and that the Government of Pakistan be asked to agree that the proceeds of the sale of such wheat be spent for agreed economic development purposes;

(g) that the $7 million worth of wheat which Cabinet agreed be made available to India be subject to the Indian Government agreeing that a first charge on the 1958-1959 programme shall be $5 million for such wheat, and that the proceeds of the sale of such wheat shall be spent on agreed economic development purposes.

COLOMBO PLAN PROGRAMME; ADDITIONAL PROJECTS
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE DECEMBER 5, 1957)†

22. The Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that a further allocation of available funds to various development projects under the Canadian Colombo Plan programme was needed. All the proposals had been discussed with the beneficiaries. Allocations recommended were:

A. Burma

- | | |
|--|-----------|
| 1. A survey of the highway system | $160,000 |
| 2. Provision for purchase, in Canada, of 10 Geiger counters for prospecting for uranium and other radioactive minerals | 7,000 |

B. Cambodia

Partial costs of a fish drier unit and auxiliary cooling room	50,000
---	--------

C. Ceylon

Provision of funds from the allocation to the fisheries development project for the Colombo Harbour crane project to send Canadian engineers to Colombo to complete the erection of the harbour cranes	40,000
--	--------

D. Indonesia

Provision of airport telecommunications equipment for Djakarta Airport, provided the Secretary of State for External Affairs was satisfied the equipment would be installed and used for the purpose intended without delay 275,000

E. India

1. Provision of a stronger source for the cobalt beam therapy unit purchased by the Cancer Institute in Madras from Atomic Energy of Canada 8,000
2. Reimbursement to cover the balance of cost of the Biological Control Station in Bangalore 7,668

F. Pakistan

1. Additional amount for the Shadiwal Hydro-electric project $1,000,000
2. Additional amount to complete the aerial resources survey in West Pakistan 155,000
3. Provision of equipment and material for establishment of a subcritical atomic reactor in Pakistan 100,000
4. Reimbursement to cover the balance of cost of the Biological Control Station at Rawalpindi 9,228

The Minister explained that, in respect of the Shadiwal hydro-electric project, the Canadian engineering company working on the project had put forward estimates of additional amounts that would be needed to meet the cost of equipment and engineering supervision which Canada had undertaken to provide. In the main, this resulted from a rise in prices since the original estimates were prepared and a more precise assessment of the total cost. These estimates had been considered by the Colombo Plan Administration and by Defence Construction Limited, and it was considered that $1 million would be required.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, April 28, 1958-Cab. Doc. 123-58)†

23. The Prime Minister questioned the necessity of assistance to countries outside the Commonwealth. In the case of Indonesia, substantial assistance was being proposed to a country where the chances of turning to communism seemed a possibility. It would be hard to justify politically, when so much needed to be done in Canada at this time. This question should be discussed at some length at a later date.

24. Mr. Smith said he had reservations himself on the Indonesian project and that was why the proviso had been put in that he be satisfied the material was used for the purpose intended. However, it was felt that Canadian action might help to further what appeared to be a stabilizing situation there with the Central government gaining control. If this was not accomplished, it was feared President Sukarno might take steps to seize the Dutch possession of West New Guinea.

25. During the discussion the following points arose:

(a) It was highly desirable to do something for Pakistan. The new Prime Minister there had indicated that he did not feel his country was getting much support from the western nations.

(b) Canada's name stood high with all those countries, with the possible exception of Indonesia which had shown an intransigent attitude at the last Colombo Plan conference. There had been quite a change in the position of Burma, who wished to be recognized as friendly to the west.

26. The Cabinet noted the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for additional allocation of funds to various development projects under the Colombo Plan, as set out in the circulated document (Cab. Doc. 123-58) and,

(a) approved the proposals in so far as the Commonwealth countries were concerned; and,

(b) reserved any decision on the non-Commonwealth countries for further discussion at a later date.

ALLOCATION OF COLOMBO PLAN FUNDS

Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a Memorandum to the Cabinet concerning the allocation of 1958-59 Colombo Plan funds. This has become a matter of considerable urgency, in view of the critical financial situation in India and of the long delay in getting the few small projects in non-Commonwealth countries underway. There is the further point that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Churchill should be in a position to advise representatives of the recipient countries at the Montreal Conference as to the Colombo Plan aid which will be made available to them this year.

2. There are some important questions in connections with this Memorandum on which I should comment. First, the allocation to India: the $17 million figure for which formal Cabinet approval is now sought, is, of course, the amount which Mr. Plumptre indicated he would recommend to the Canadian Government, during the meetings in Washington which considered the Indian financial crisis. On the basis of the approval given by Ministers concerned to this figure, we have re-opened discussions with India on the ways in which this sum might be used. I would hope we could put proposals before you within the next few weeks as to the various commodities and projects requested by Indian Ministers.

3. Second, this Memorandum proposes that our small economic aid programme in the non-Commonwealth countries should no longer be deferred. In the past, with full Cabinet authority, we have given these countries to understand that a certain amount of Canadian aid would be forthcoming. We must now honour these commitments or run the risk of a very serious loss of goodwill. That Canada should allocate a small amount of capital aid to the non-Commonwealth countries is, in my view, very much in Canada's broad interest. There is, of course, a significant Canadian interest in the non-Commonwealth states. These countries play an increasingly important role in world politics. All of them are in varying degrees subject to both internal and external pressures designed to draw them more and more into the Communist orbit. The absence of Western assistance increases the likelihood that their Governments may consider themselves forced, however unwillingly, to seek help from the Soviet Bloc. On the other hand, carefully selected projects designed to strengthen their economies and administration contribute to the strength of existing régimes and give tangible evidence of the interest of the Western world in their well-being. This has been recognized from the beginning of their association with the Colombo Plan, and indeed recognition of these facts lay behind the positive affirmation of Canada's willingness to give help by Canadian Ministers visiting these countries and by Canadian Ministers at annual Colombo Plan Conferences.

4. Third, there is the question of whether all or any of the Colombo Plan Vote should be used permanently or temporarily for wheat. I would very strongly recommend that the regular Colombo Plan Vote should be used only for our regular Colombo Plan programme, that is, for technical assistance, economic development projects and such commodities as the recipient countries ask us to provide. The recipient countries have made it clear that they do not want wheat as part of the Colombo Plan programme; they attach higher priorities to industrial metals for their factories and to basic development projects. The fund of goodwill which our Colombo Plan operations has built up will be very rapidly dissipated if we force these countries to accept aid they do not want. Any gifts of wheat should be provided for out of new funds made available for that purpose. As you know, Mr. Churchill shares this view very strongly.

5. As for financing wheat exports to these countries temporarily from the Colombo Plan Fund, there is first the very serious problem of doing this without having to hold back on other forms of aid. In the case of India, this would not be in line with the pledge given by Mr. Fleming in the House recently that we would help that country by accelerating the flow of Canadian aid;⁷⁰ the Indian Government have asked us urgently to agree to a substantial increase in the rate of shipment of such goods, industrial metals and railroad ties, all of which we are now supplying. To increase our rate of supply of these goods will require most of the cash available for our Indian programme. As for Pakistan, we need to keep in hand all the funds we can make available for that country in case it becomes clear that we should build a transmission line to carry power from our Warsak Dam to the consuming areas. It is very important that we should keep our freedom of manoeuvre in these matters. Even if these considerations did not apply, there is the practical problem that the Auditor-General has formally censured the previous administration for using Colombo Plan funds in this temporary fashion. The Auditor-General's criticism appears to me to be well founded. In any case the Wheat Board would be prepared to finance substantial shipments of wheat against reimbursement in the future; I understand that Mr. Churchill's Memorandum to Cabinet will recommend this course of action.

[Ottawa], September 3, 1958

ALLOCATION OF 1958-59 COLOMBO PLAN FUNDS

The purpose of this Memorandum is to seek Cabinet authority for the allocation of the 1958-59 Colombo Plan Vote between various recipient countries and between the economic development programme and the technical assistance programme. Discussions are now underway with the recipient countries as to particular projects which might be put before governments for the use of 1958-59 funds. These discussions have now reached the stage at which authority is required from Cabinet as to the amounts to be made available for each country and for the two programmes so that the recommendations as to projects can be guided by Cabinet authority as to allocations.

This matter is now of some urgency; first, the needs of recipient countries, particularly India, are acute and they would welcome early decisions so that they can take Canadian aid into account in their planning and allow it to move to projects as rapidly as possible; second, because at the Commonwealth Conference and at the Colombo Plan Conference, Ministers should be able to assure their Malayan, Ceylonese, Pakistani and Indian colleagues as to the scale of Canadian aid to those countries for the current year.

TOTAL SUM AVAILABLE

The Main Estimates provide for a contribution this year to the Canadian Colombo Plan Fund of $35 million. In addition, sums previously authorized for projects which are now completed or nearly completed have been or will shortly be returned to the Colombo Plan Fund and become available for re-allocation. Taking these unspent balances into account, a sum of $43,368,854 would be available for allocation this year. However, an amount of $5 million is required for wheat shipments to India which Cabinet authorized last year as part of this year's programme.⁷¹ The total sum available this year for allocation is thus $38,368,854.

PROPOSED ALLOCATION

Technical Assistance (programme for whole Colombo Plan area)		$2,000,000.
Economic Assistance
India	$17,000,000.
Pakistan	13,000,000.
Ceylon	2,000,000.
Malaya	500,000.
Non-Commonwealth countries, i.e. Burma, Indonesia, Indochina, etc.	2,000,000.
Reserve against contingencies	868,854.
Total Economic Programme		$35,368,854.
		$37,368,854.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Expenditures under the Canadian Colombo Plan technical assistance programme are limited by Canada's capacity to provide experts or to provide training places in Canada, and by the ability of the recipient country to use experts or to nominate acceptable trainees. No worthwhile requests from the recipient countries have been rejected because of lack of money. During 1957-58, total technical assistance expenditures for the whole of the Colombo Plan area by Canada were approximately $1,700,000. The technical assistance programme has been increasing at a rate of ten per cent each year; it would, therefore, be appropriate to set aside approximately $2,000,000 for this purpose. Considering the number of small countries in the area, and the variation from year to year in their requests for technical assistance, it would be quite impractical to budget for each individual recipient country.

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

India

From the beginning of the Canadian Colombo Plan, about half of the sums made available for the total economic programme has been allocated to India. It is my view that, given the critical political and economic importance of India's development programme, we should continue to make available to India as large a proportion as realistically possible of our Colombo Plan aid. Excluding $5 million worth of wheat authorized last year against this year's programme, an allocation of $17 million seems appropriate.

The Indian Government has emphasized that India wants practically all of Canada's aid for this year in the forms of industrial metals, railway ties and fertilizers, which give immediate relief to India's foreign exchange position and enables its factories to keep in production. Discussions are now underway between India and Canadian officials and as soon as possible a detailed Indian programme will be put before Cabinet for consideration.

Pakistan

The suggested provision of $13 million of economic assistance for 1958-59 for Pakistan, is much more generous on a per capita basis than $16 million for India. However, since the beginning of the Colombo Plan, Canada has provided about two-thirds as much aid to Pakistan as to India. It would be difficult to depart substantially from this pattern.

The first charge against the $13 million allocation should be such additional monies as are required to complete the Warsak project. A detailed memorandum on the Warsak project, which is now proceeding very satisfactorily, will be put to Cabinet shortly.

Our High Commissioner in Pakistan suggests that one new project to which we should give early consideration is the building of a transmission line from the American hydro-electric project at Karnaphuli to the port of Chittagong in East Pakistan. This project is of considerable economic importance; the power to be produced by the American dam would be useless unless a transmission line is constructed. However, the project should be investigated by a firm of consulting engineers before any detailed recommendations are submitted to Cabinet.

This project is not likely to use all of the money available to Pakistan this year. Other projects will, therefore, be investigated by officials with a view to preparing recommendations as soon as possible for Ministers. The possibility of undertaking further projects will be determined as soon as we know whether the United States and Pakistan have agreed to build sufficient transmission lines in West Pakistan to make possible effective use of the power from the Warsak project. Until we are certain that satisfactory arrangements have been made between the U.S. and Pakistan it would be wise to retain funds in case Canada is called upon to assist in providing some portion of this transmission system.

Ceylon

The usual Canadian annual allocation of economic aid to Ceylon has been $2 million. Ceylon is the wealthiest country in the area and has a very small population. Although this sum is out of proportion to Ceylon's needs relative to the needs of other countries, it would be undesirable to cut back the Ceylon programme at present. There is, perhaps, more to be said for giving Ceylon only a nominal share of any future increase in the Colombo Plan programme.

One commitment against the suggested allocation of $2 million has already been approved by Cabinet, i.e., the provision of $110 thousand for the Ceylon aerial survey.⁷²

Detailed proposals have not yet been put forward by Ceylon for further projects this year, although it can be anticipated that the financing for further stages in the aerial survey will be requested.

It has been the usual practice to supply about one-half of the Ceylon programme in the form of Canadian flour, which generates counterpart funds for projects which require local expenditures. However, during the course of the recent negotiations between Ceylon and Canada, which resulted in agreement for the provision by Canada of $2 million worth of flour on a loan basis, and $400 thousand on a grant basis, it became apparent that Canada could not provide Ceylon with flour over and above these amounts without very seriously affecting Australia's interests. Officials will, therefore, explore with Ceylon the possibility of using this sum for the provision of other Canadian goods and services.

It is suggested that the $400 thousand grant of flour, which Cabinet approved as a result of the recent negotiation,⁷³ should be met out of the reserve against contingencies in order to emphasize that it was offered to Ceylon as a grant over and above the regular Canadian aid programme to Ceylon.

Malaya

Now that Malaya has become a full member of the Colombo Plan and an independent member of the Commonwealth, it would be desirable to establish a regular annual programme for Malaya. Canadian assistance under the Plan has, of course, been going to Malaya in the form of technical assistance, and there has been one capital project, an aerial survey, to which Canada contributed $200 thousand. Malaya is, by Colombo Plan standards, a relatively wealthy country, with a good foreign exchange position. While a programme of only $1/2 million seems meagre as compared to what Canada is doing for other Colombo Plan countries, it would be prudent to start at the relatively low level and to inaugurate a few worthwhile small projects before we contemplate any large expenditures.

Non-Commonwealth Countries

It will be recalled that on May 22 Cabinet deferred consideration of a number of small capital projects in the non-Commonwealth countries, members of the Colombo Plan — Burma, Cambodia, Indonesia — until further consideration had been given to the question of the allocation of Canadian aid funds to Commonwealth, as against non-Commonwealth countries. It is now urgent to consider and decide the scale of Canadian aid to the non-Commonwealth countries, and to authorize appropriate projects.

⁷² Approuvé par le Cabinet le 1^{er} août 1958./Approved by Cabinet on August 1, 1958.

⁷³ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 15 juillet 1958./Approved by Cabinet on July 15, 1958.

Since the beginning of the Colombo Plan, only about three-quarters of one per cent of Canadian Colombo Plan aid has been given to the non-Commonwealth countries. There is no doubt that Commonwealth countries should receive the bulk of Canadian aid under the Colombo Plan. However, this low percentage does not seem to give adequate weight to Canadian interest in the non-Commonwealth countries; nor, indeed, to the broader interest of the West, and of other Commonwealth countries.

For several years Cabinet has made annual allocations of small sums for assistance to the non-Commonwealth countries. This sum was used for a number of quite small projects, particularly in Burma. Eighteen months ago, the position of the Colombo Plan Fund was reviewed and it was established that, of the sums allocated by Cabinet to the non-Commonwealth countries, $1.4 million remained available for projects. Officials, therefore, informed certain non-Commonwealth countries that the Canadian Government had authorized the use of a sum of this magnitude for projects in non-Commonwealth countries. A preliminary allocation was made between the countries concerned. It would, therefore, be consistent with positions taken in the past to set aside for the non-Commonwealth countries a small portion of the accumulated sums available in the Colombo Plan Fund and to charge against these the cost of projects which Cabinet deferred, and to make the balance available for such projects as Cabinet may later approve.

I would, therefore, propose that the projects recommended for the non-Commonwealth countries in my Memorandum of April 28[†] should now be approved (for Burma, $7 thousand for Geiger Counters and $160 thousand for a highway survey team; for Cambodia, $50 thousand for a fish dryer; for Indonesia, $275 thousand for telecommunications equipment for the ICAO project of Djakarta Airport). These projects, if now undertaken, together with the provision of $60 thousand for wheat for Nepal agreed to by Cabinet on August 8,⁷⁴ will give modest but tangible evidence of Canada's interest in the non-Commonwealth members of the Colombo Plan. (The scale of aid contemplated is, of course, much smaller than that given to our Commonwealth partners, e.g., the Kundah project in South India, to which Canada has contributed $23.5 million, and the Warsak project in Pakistan to which Canada has contributed $36.6 million. If these projects (in non-Commonwealth countries) recommended above are approved, a balance of approximately one and one half million dollars would remain available for other projects in 1958-59 in these countries; officials would investigate such projects with a view to submitting proposals to Ministers. I have in mind that Canada may be asked to undertake a survey of the Mekong River Valley in Indochina, as planned by the United Nations, which might cost about $750 thousand, and a second highway survey and demonstration project in Burma, which may cost upwards of $300 thousand. By retaining this amount suggested it would be possible to undertake these two projects or others of comparable magnitude; these, with projects already recommended, would constitute an adequate Canadian aid programme in these countries.

⁷⁴ Voir/See Document 420.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In the light of the above consideration, I recommend

(1) that the Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan Fund for 1958-59, together with the sums available or which can be made available from the Colombo Plan Fund, should be allocated in the following fashion:

Technical Assistance (programme for whole Colombo Plan area)		$2,000,000
Economic Assistance
India	$17,000,000
Pakistan	13,000,000
Ceylon	2,000,000
Malaya	500,000
Non-Commonwealth countries, i.e. Burma, Indonesia, Indochina, etc.	2,000,000
Balance against contingencies	868,854
Total Economic Programme		$35,368,854 $37,368,854

and that officials be authorized to enter into discussions with the countries concerned to prepare recommendations for projects in these countries for the use of these sums;

(2) that the projects for the non-Commonwealth countries, as set out in the Memorandum to Cabinet on the Colombo Plan of April 28† last, should now be authorized.

1958-59 COLOMBO PLAN FUNDS; ALLOCATION

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said authority was sought for the allocation of the 1958-59 Colombo Plan Vote between the various recipient countries and between the economic development and the technical assistance programmes. It was not a question of allocating funds for specific projects on which recommendations would be made later.

The main estimates provided for a contribution of $35 million, which, with unspent balances, came to around $42 million. Of this, $5 million was required for wheat shipments to India, leaving a total of $37,368,854. The proposed allocation was:

Technical Assistance (for whole Colombo Plan area)	$2,000,000
Economic Assistance
India	$17,000,000
Pakistan	13,000,000
Ceylon	2,000,000
Malaya	500,000
Non-Commonwealth countries, (i.e. Burma, Indonesia, Indochina, etc.)	2,000,000
Reserve	868,854
TOTAL	$37,368,854

Projects for non-Commonwealth countries, decision on which had been deferred previously were $7,000 on Geiger counters for Burma; $160,000 for a highway survey team for Burma; $50,000 for a fish dryer for Cambodia, and $275,000 for telecommunication equipment for the I.C.A.O. project at Djakarta Airport, Indonesia. Together with $60,000 for wheat for Nepal, this would give a modest but tangible evidence of Canada's interest in the non-Commonwealth members. Since the plan was started, the scale of this aid had been very much smaller than with Commonwealth countries, in fact, about 3/4 of 1 per cent.

From the beginning of the plan about half of the sums available had been allocated to India. Excluding the $5 million worth of wheat authorized last year against this year's programme, an allocation of $17 million seemed appropriate.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 3, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 257-58).

2. Mr. Smith added that the telecommunications equipment for Djakarta Airport was not military in nature but was to enable planes to land easily. As for the Geiger counters for Burma, if Canada did not supply them, the U.K. would.

3. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It would seem difficult to justify this type of aid to Indonesia where there was a government likely to go over to the communist side and, even though it was said the equipment was non-military in nature, it could be used just as well by military aircraft. In fact, it was reported that Indonesia was "loaded up" with Russian planes. Why should Indonesia be provided with equipment which could be used against the west? The External Affairs Minister of Australia, on his recent visit to Ottawa, had been most concerned about events in Indonesia and their possible repercussions on New Guinea. The Dutch had asked for assurances that there would be immediate military action by Australia should that large island be invaded by forces from Indonesia. Australia was very worried by the military aid the United States was giving Indonesia. On the other hand, a Canadian contribution of substantially non-military equipment might be helpful in keeping Indonesia away from communism.

(b) It seemed unrealistic to provide aid of the above nature when the basic problem facing Canada was to dispose of surplus agricultural products. It was said that the non-Commonwealth countries within the Colombo Plan were badly in need of flour and dried milk. Surely efforts should be made to try to give assistance first in the form of food products.

(c) The proposed allocations for Pakistan looked very high in relation to India, taking into account the relative magnitudes of the two countries and their needs, but this pattern was traditional and to cut back now on the share for Pakistan whose government was so weak would be a political error. When the total was increased this imbalance would be corrected.

4. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the allocation between countries of the Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan, as outlined in the circulated document (Cab. Doc. 257-58); it being understood, however, that full consideration would be given to the possibility of providing aid in a form that would reduce the surplus of Canada's agricultural products, and in particular that the aid to the group of non-Commonwealth countries would be mainly in the form of such foodstuffs.⁷⁵

Commonwealth Countries in South East Asia

1. India and Pakistan would welcome surplus wheat because there is in both countries a shortage of food grains and an understandable reluctance to utilize their very limited foreign exchange resources to pay for imported grain. There is relatively little hunger in Ceylon, which grows most of its own food, usually has a favourable balance of trade, and is in a relatively better economic position than India or Pakistan to purchase its own needs. Ceylon imports flour rather than wheat and lacks handling facilities for wheat. Malaya is a cash importer of wheat and although we have sold small amounts in the Malayan market, most of it is supplied by the Australians. It might well be disadvantageous to our own interests, and to those of the Australians particularly, to dispose of surplus wheat in Malaya.

2. In India and Pakistan there is always an actual need for food grains. There have been constant shortages of grain in India and Pakistan and substantial emergency shipments of wheat to avert famine have been made to both countries by Canada, Australia and the United States. Both countries suffer from chronic shortages of foreign exchange with which to buy commodities like wheat so that any shipment of surplus Canadian wheat would tend to ease their foreign exchange position. Agricultural production has been declining in India and Pakistan for the past two or three years. This lag in agricultural production has had, and is having, a critical impact upon industrial development planning in both countries. Crop failures and poor harvests have often made it necessary to divert badly needed funds from important development projects to purchase from abroad large supplies of food grains to feed people in famine-stricken areas.

3. For India any shipment of surplus wheat this year would be a very timely gift. The economic situation has been slowly worsening for the past year and one of the reasons behind this deterioration has been the failure of agricultural production to increase. The less India has to spend on food imports, the more will be available for projects of the Second Five Year Plan, upon the success of which may hinge the future of India as a democratic state. If the Indians should become convinced that democratic government cannot provide quickly enough the vital economic development to raise the standard of living, they may move toward the totalitarian experiment of nearby Communist China. It is in our interest that the Indian leaders should not lose heart and that they realize they can expect from the Western democracies sympathetic understanding of their enormous economic problems. Indian leaders are becoming very concerned about the economic situation (and with good reason), when the pace of their industrial development seems to be threatened and would welcome any foreign aid which comes without strings, particularly if it should come unsolicited.

4. In recent years there has been an almost constant shortage of wheat in Pakistan so that Canadian surplus wheat would always be very useful. Pakistan's foreign policy has always called for firm friendship with the Western nations despite the difficulty of elucidating this policy in poverty-stricken East Pakistan where many people have strong neutralist sentiments. The very slow rise in the standard of living has made the position of the Pakistani Government increasingly difficult. It is in our interests to do what we can to bolster up the Pakistani economy so that the neutralist forces of disunity in the country will find the economic climate less propitious for the growth of their organizations.

5. Our conclusion would be that, because of the serious economic crisis it is passing through, India should have the major share of the surplus wheat disposed of in the area, that Pakistan should have a substantial share. Ceylon has no requirement for wheat. We think Malaya would benefit most from other forms of aid, but if it were decided to dispose of some of the surplus wheat in Malaya then we might find it useful to consult first with the Australians.

Eastern European Countries

(1) Poland

There are important political advantages to be gained from offering some surplus Canadian wheat to Poland. Though Poland remains under Communist leadership, political changes have taken place there since last October which justify Western support. These changes have resulted in greater liberty of personal opinion, in the exercise of religion and to travel abroad. There has also been an effort to achieve a significant increase in the standard of living. Internationally, the changes have ended the Soviet Union's complete domination of the country.

2. While these changes, both domestic and international, do not fully satisfy either the Polish people or the Western nations, it is in our interest to encourage such developments. This is especially true of Poland's new measure of independence from the Soviet Union. This independence is probably more significant than the break between the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia in 1948. Poland, since it remains within the Communist bloc, is forcing the Soviet Union to modify its conduct, i.e. not to treat Poland simply as a dependency. When Yugoslavia broke with the Soviet Union, the Soviet leaders were able to cut all contact and treat Yugoslavia as an outcast. Poland's independence is also important because it is a path which could become attractive to Communist leaders in other satellites.

3. The Gomulka régime cannot be regarded as stable. The immediate danger of Soviet intervention appears to be over. Both sides have made adjustments and have reached a temporary modus vivendi. But Poland's economic problems, which are still increasing, constitute a major threat to the Gomulka régime. These difficulties might lead to trouble through a strike getting out of control, which would give the U.S.S.R. an opportunity for intervention on the Hungarian model. Alternatively Gomulka might be forced to turn to the Soviet Union for additional economic aid. The Soviet Union would only provide such aid if Gomulka were to undertake to modify the present régime. This would mean the end of the Gomulka experiment of a freer communism and of the most hopeful heresy which has occurred in the communist bloc.

4. Although Poland is a country with considerable potential wealth, Communist mismanagement and Soviet exploitation have caused distortions in the economy and left the standard of living at a desperately low level. The reforms of the present government will not have any significant effect for a couple of years. Indeed the freeing of the economy has led to an immediate worsening of the situation owing to inflation, absenteeism, speculation and general disorganization. In the interval before the Polish people get used to exercising economic self-discipline and the reforms take effect, Poland must look to the West for aid to fill the gap and prevent economic collapse.

5. Poland has already received some aid from the United States and other Western countries, but it has hoped for more. At the time it was argued in the West that the Western countries should be cautious in extending aid, for fear that it might provoke the U.S.S.R. It now appears that the Poles have correctly decided that they can safely accept considerably more Western aid than has been offered.

(2) Yugoslavia

6. Yugoslavia is the only other country in Eastern Europe to which it might be politically desirable to offer surplus Canadian wheat. Her position is quite different from Poland's. The domestic policy of the régime is probably less worthy of Western support than Poland's, and it is a fully independent state without the same divisive effect on the Soviet bloc. The major reason for giving aid to Poland, therefore, does not apply in the Yugoslav case.

7. An additional reason is the present orientation of the Yugoslav Government which is now responding to Soviet overtures for better relations. Yugoslavia over the past few years has followed a pattern of oscillating from appealing to the East to appealing to the West. As soon as one side has confirmed its friendship, Yugoslavia has immediately concentrated on appealing to the other, to make sure it would not become dependent. In the present circumstance, it would seem unnecessary for Western nations to go out of their way to give exceptional assistance to the Yugoslav Government.

8. A further argument against granting wheat to Yugoslavia is that this year she has had a first class crop.

9. The conclusion of this section is that Poland should have absolute priority over Yugoslavia if there is a question of offering surplus grain to Eastern Europe.

Conclusion

It would be almost impossible, and perhaps unsatisfactory as well, to try to make a definitive reply to this question without relating it specifically to the amount of surplus wheat which will be available for disposal. We suggest, therefore, that the problem might be broken up into three parts as follows:

A. 5-10 Million Dollars Worth of Surplus Wheat

This amount of wheat would not go very far if divided between India and Pakistan. Both countries would welcome such a shipment and would find it useful but it would be too small a quantity to lessen their foreign exchange difficulties very much or to make the kind of favourable impression we might wish to create. In contrast this quantity of surplus wheat would be a very valuable contribution to the Polish economy during this critical period.

We suggest that the entire quantity, if this amount of wheat is being disposed of, might be offered to Poland.

B. 10-20 Million Dollars Worth of Surplus Wheat

This amount of wheat is large enough to make a valuable contribution to the economies of India and Pakistan. It would be desirable, in view of its larger size and its economic difficulties that India should, at this time, have the larger portion of such a shipment.

In weighing the claims of India and Pakistan against those of Poland we have been swayed principally by the fact that India's and Pakistan's size, importance in Asia and membership in the Commonwealth make it necessary that our contribution be a significant one. We suggest, therefore, that this amount of surplus wheat could best be disposed in the Commonwealth countries of South East Asia.

This would not leave sufficient wheat to make a substantial contribution to Poland as well. Nevertheless, it would be beneficial if a million dollars worth could be allocated to Poland. This would have a valuable psychological effect, indicating Western interest in Poland, and should also have the advantage of attracting Polish commercial purchases of Canadian wheat.

C. More than 20 Million Dollars Worth of Surplus Wheat

If this amount of wheat is to be made available, it would be desirable to allot the greater part to India and Pakistan, but to offer about five million dollars worth to Poland.

WHEAT AS COLOMBO PLAN AID

14. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recalled that the government had indicated it was prepared to consider the use of a portion of the present wheat surplus to make contributions to Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan. He was now seeking authority to negotiate with India and Pakistan in this matter. There was $9 million available for allocation under the plan ($7 million for India, $2 million for Pakistan). This money had been tentatively intended for other forms of assistance, but India and Pakistan had had short wheat crops this year. He was hoping that it would be possible to increase the total Canadian allocation to the Colombo Plan but, pending a decision on this, he recommended that the $9 million be utilized to purchase wheat (6 million bushels) to be shipped at the expense of India and Pakistan via the St. Lawrence River. A prompt decision was necessary since navigation would close probably around the 15th of December.

15. The Prime Minister stated that when he had suggested to Pakistan that they accept wheat as Colombo Plan aid they had replied that they could get wheat elsewhere. They had been reasonable, however, and had understood Canada's problem in connection with the wheat surplus. He thought, that Pakistan would have no objection to a $2 million allocation of wheat. The situation, however, was different with India, whose Minister of Finance had not received the suggestion of a wheat allocation with much enthusiasm. However, Mr. Diefenbaker had the impression that, after he had explained the Canadian situation, the Minister had expressed general approval for an allocation of Canadian wheat.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept 13, 1957 - Cab. Doc. 209-57)†

16. During the discussion it was pointed out that:

(a) The recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not conflict with the purposes of the Colombo Plan. Substitution of wheat would not seriously dislocate actual arrangements for the construction of projects. Adequate funds would be available next year for projects now in mind if the Canadian contribution were increased.

(b) There was antagonism in some parts of the country to giving too much to Asiatic countries. The donor country should have some say in what its contribution should be.

(c) India had been able to raise its food production 20 per cent and its government had plainly stated that it did not want food assistance.

17. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that sums available under the Colombo Plan appropriation for the current year might be used for the purchase of wheat, and that detailed negotiations should be undertaken immediately with India and Pakistan to arrange that they take wheat as part of the Colombo Plan programme this year.

WHEAT POSITION; SPECIAL COLOMBO PLAN ARRANGEMENTS FOR WHEAT AND OTHER SURPLUS COMMODITIES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE, NOVEMBER 21†)

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce in reviewing the wheat situation, reported that, before the 1957 wheat crop came in, there was a carry over of 700 million bushels. The 1957 crop had been 350 million bushels. Internal consumption at 150 million bushels and export transactions of 300 million bushels would account for the disposal of 450 million bushels during the period 1st August 1956 to 31st July 1958. The carry over to next year would be 600 million bushels, of which 380 were in good storage. If the amount of the 1958 crop were the same as in 1957, there would be a further reduction of 100 million bushels and, provided there was no surplus crop within the next five years, the wheat surplus could be disposed of. Bumper crops, of course, were always a possibility. His present plans call for an increase in the storage capacity for 50 million bushels. These storage facilities would be ready in a few months. This would leave 430 million bushels in storage and 170 million bushels on farms. It was important to get the wheat off the farms to storage places in order to avoid pressure from farmers for cash advances and deliveries. When in England recently, he had discussed with Mr. Heathcoat Amory and Sir David Eccles the possibility of stockpiling 50 million bushels of wheat in England. This would bring down to 120 million bushels the wheat on farms. It was essential to protect Canada's cash markets in Germany, Japan, and the United Kingdom. Any requests of long term credit would have to be considered with care in order that no discrimination be exercised against cash customers.

The decision taken the preceding day on the sales of wheat to Roumania, Egypt, Israel, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Spain, if brought to a successful conclusion would mean a further disposal of 45 million bushels.

Among the proposals which he was considering was that of disposing of wheat to India, Pakistan, and Ceylon in large quantities through a loan system incorporated in some way into the Colombo Plan. This would avoid objections on the part of cash customers and prospective credit buyers outside the Commonwealth. The problem was whether Canada could undertake to lend money for this purpose up to an amount of $75 million. An early agreement in this matter would mean the immediate disposal of 50 million bushels through Atlantic and Pacific ports. He thought that, in fact, Canada could get rid of all the surplus over the years to India.

During recent conversations in Rome between himself and the Minister of Agriculture of India, the latter had been disposed to purchase a considerable amount of wheat from Canada, preferably on a 10-year credit term. Canada, however, had indicated that it preferred a 5-year credit term. The matter had been referred to Cabinet and it had not been possible to give the Indians an immediate answer. Satisfactory negotiations were, of course, impossible if reference had to be made continuously to Cabinet as a whole. Negotiators had to be in a position to give immediate answers. He had proposed a revolving fund a few weeks ago and the matter had not been discussed since.

In so far as India was concerned there would be a gap in the U.S. deliveries of wheat there in the early spring of 1958. Australia had had a short crop in 1957, and could not supply wheat to India. There was, therefore, an opportunity for Canada to sell wheat by a loan to India. This would be in a good cause since India, in order to avoid starvation, would require 2 million tons of cereal grains.

He thought that, if Cabinet gave approval in principle to a long term loan up to the amount of $75 million, officials could then start negotiations and get wheat moving. The question was whether Canada wanted to enter into any loans on a government to government basis.

It should be pointed out that storage costs could mount up rapidly and that storage charges in Canada last year had been in the vicinity of $30 million. There was no reason why the approval in principle could not be extended to cover other agricultural surplus commodities (skim milk, etc.).

His other plans included additional storage capacity built over the next two years providing for an additional 50 million bushels. There should be some protection against a 1958 bumper crop. There was really no objection to carrying over a surplus providing it was well stored. Difficulties came from farm stored wheat, and any help to the farmers in this respect would tie in well with the government's overall agricultural policy.

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs urged that every possible help should be extended to India for international political reasons. As long as Nehru was in power, it could be expected that India could resist communist influences, otherwise, it could easily become a seed bed for local communism. It seemed to him that the Departments of Transport, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, and External Affairs had a direct interest in the proposals for long term sales to India, Ceylon, and Pakistan.

6. The Minister of Finance reiterated his misgivings about long term loans. He was opposed to the government committing itself to a sum of $75 million and suggested that the negotiators refer the result of their negotiations to Cabinet before any final decision were taken. The control of any such sums would have to be held in the Cabinet. He was in favour, however, with the proposal of tying in wheat sales with the Colombo Plan.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Any shipment of wheat to India, Ceylon, and Pakistan was bound to have incidental benefits. Freight traffic of the railways had been falling off because of the reduction in grain shipments. Accelerated grain shipments would provide employment on the railways and in the ports.

(b) The High Commissioner for India, in his conversations with the Minister of Agriculture, had indicated that India would be willing to purchase immediately 215 tons of Manitoba grade 4 wheat to be paid for in seven equal installments. The first payment would be made at the end of two years. He had more or less indicated that India would get its wheat elsewhere if Canada was unwilling to proceed with this transaction, which would in fact amount to a 7-year loan.

(c) Sale of wheat to India, Ceylon, and Pakistan would have strong appeal in some sections of the public in that it would be a way of providing assistance for the Commonwealth. Canada should sell its wheat for what it could get. The United States had refused to do this and had had to give it away.

8. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning special Colombo Plan arrangements for disposal of wheat and, possibly, other agricultural surplus commodities and agreed,

(a) that in principle the Minister be authorized to negotiate for long term sales of wheat and other surplus agricultural commodities to India, Pakistan, and Ceylon; and,

(b) that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance discuss together the details of proposed negotiations.

WHEAT FOR INDIA AND PAKISTAN
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE DECEMBER 21†)

12. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recalled that his recommendation to provide $15 million worth of wheat to Colombo Plan countries during the present and forthcoming fiscal years, in addition to the annual $35 million in general aid, had not been acted upon. Negotiations for the sale of 400,000 tons to India on a long term credit basis had been completed and final arrangements were now being made for delivery. Pakistan had been told that the same terms would be available up to an amount of about $5 million. The necessary legislation was in the course of preparation.

The United States had been informed of the negotiations in order to avoid conflict with the U.S. aid programme to India under Public Law 480. The U.S. had pointed out that when they had agreed to co-operate in co-ordinating the supply of wheat to India, which was apparently in desperate need of food, they had been under the impression that Canada was providing wheat as a gift to India and Pakistan and not selling on deferred payment terms.

India could be expected to seek more wheat from the U.S. for local currency and the U.S. would no doubt endeavour to supply some of her needs. Prospects for further Canadian sales were therefore not good. Accordingly, he recommended that $15 million be added to the Colombo Plan vote this fiscal year for the supply of wheat and flour. Apart from the inherent worth of this plan, the shipments of wheat would help to attain a reasonable level of total wheat exports without having to entertain proposals from various European countries which, if accepted, would undermine Canada's position in commercial markets.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Jan. 6, 1958-Cab. Doc. 4-58)†

13. Mr. Churchill reviewed again the stock position. He pointed out that crop prospects for winter wheat in the U.S. were good. If these continued to be good the U.S. crop would be 200 million more bushels than they had last year and the pressure for increased disposal would be intensified. This reinforced the case for giving $15 million worth of Canadian wheat to the Colombo Plan countries. It was intended that this would be divided between India, Pakistan and Ceylon.

Final approval for the 400,000 ton sale was required immediately to get the wheat moving. Shipments would start from Atlantic ports but later they would be made from Vancouver.

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs added that Ceylon had now said that flour was probably the best form of aid Canada could provide in the long term for flood relief. He was glad to note, therefore, that the Minister's proposal included Ceylon. As regards the Colombo Plan aspects, it would be desirable to indicate that the additional $15 million was for relief and not for economic development purposes.

15. The Minister of Finance recalled his concern over the risks attached to making 400,000 tons of wheat available on such favourable terms. The new proposal was, of course, an outright gift. He questioned whether it was desirable to attempt a solution to the wheat surplus problem by transferring it from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Finance.

16. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Originally it had been proposed that wheat and flour be disposed of to Colombo Plan countries both as a gift and on long term credit. This present submission was therefore not new.

(b) This year the objective had been set of disposing of 300 million bushels in Canada's export markets, which was approximately the traditional 30 per cent of the world trade in wheat which Canada had enjoyed in the past. At the moment, it appeared as if the objective could be attained. The long term prospects for markets abroad were good. But over the next five years or so, until tastes for wheat had been developed in new markets, the position was not very bright. The important point, domestically was to get the wheat off the farms and into terminal and country elevators.

(c) The political and humanitarian arguments for making gifts were unanswerable. Every bushel that reached India helped to keep her uncommitted. India had not as yet been informed that she might receive an outright gift of wheat.

(d) In order to avoid undermining Canada's cash market, it should be made clear that the special terms now offered to India would be available only to countries in receipt of assistance under the Colombo Plan and that the additional gift of $15 million was for famine relief. This fact might be emphasized if both the special credit terms and gift were provided through the Department of External Affairs and if the announcement were made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

(e) Any proposal to sell the surplus wheat on the open market would not be worthy of consideration. A possible barter deal with India with the eventual result that the government would find itself in the position of selling whatever goods were received from India in exchange for Canadian wheat, should also be discounted.

(f) The Wheat Board could start the wheat moving as soon as an announcement had been made in the House. This announcement could appropriately be made on the following day.

17. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the sale of wheat to India, Pakistan and Ceylon and agreed,

(a) that 400,000 tons of wheat be sold to India subject to the conclusion of financial arrangements between the two governments to provide for the payment being made in seven equal annual instalments, beginning three years after shipment; the interest being payable annually at a rate equal to the borrowing cost to the Canadian government plus a small charge for overhead;

(b) that a sum of $15 million be added to the Colombo Plan vote this fiscal year, specifically for the supply, as an outright gift, of wheat or wheat flour for India, Pakistan and Ceylon; and,

(c) that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce prepare, in consultation, an announcement to be made in the House on the following day.⁷⁶

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 13-58

[Ottawa], January 13, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

ALLOCATION OF WHEAT AND FLOUR TO INDIA, CEYLON AND PAKISTAN

On January 7 Cabinet approved a proposal to seek Parliamentary authority for $15 million worth of wheat and flour to be used to meet acute food shortages in Ceylon, India and Pakistan. On January 8 this decision was announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He indicated that a part of this $15 million would be used to meet Ceylon's request for flood relief. On January 10 Cabinet authorized the provision of 38,000 tons of flour (worth $3 million) to Ceylon.

The following allocation of the remaining $12 million might be considered:

for India	$8 million
for Pakistan	$4 million

The allocation of the $15 million would thus differ from the usual allocation under the regular Canadian Colombo Plan programme — $13 million to India, $9 million to Pakistan and $2 million to Ceylon. However, the proposed allocation is intended to reflect a number of varied considerations, such as the fact that though India will be purchasing a substantial quantity of Canadian wheat on special credit terms, and may be asking for additional credit, there is a continuing and critical food shortage in India which India cannot meet from her own resources; that Pakistan had serious floods a few months ago and has asked Canada for free wheat over and above the wheat made available under the Colombo Plan; and that in view of the extent of the recent floods a substantial amount of relief is being offered Ceylon, even though that country is, of course, much smaller than India or Pakistan.

The setting up of counterpart funds should also be considered. Ceylon officials have suggested that counterpart funds be set up equal to the value of relief flour to be used to finance reconstruction works. It would be useful to make similar arrangements with India and Pakistan, as was done in 1956 when Canada supplied relief wheat to Pakistan, as the use of counterpart funds not only enables Canadian aid to be turned into permanent works, which give permanent evidence of Canadian interest and support for these Asian countries, but also makes it possible to proceed somewhat more quickly with joint Colombo Plan projects in these countries, which may otherwise be held back for lack of local finance.

I recommend:⁷⁷

(a) that the $12 million worth of wheat which it was decided would be available for India and Pakistan, subject to Parliament voting the necessary funds, be allocated as follows:

$8 million for India

$4 million for Pakistan

(b) that the governments of India, Pakistan and Ceylon be asked to set up counterpart funds to the value of the wheat and flour provided, to be used for purposes to be agreed between each of these countries and Canada.

(c) that India and Pakistan not be advised of the allocations to them until the wheat loan negotiations are further advanced.

SALE OF WHEAT TO INDIA; AUTHORIZATION FOR AGREEMENT
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JANUARY 7)

5. The Minister of Finance reported that the form of the agreement for the sale of wheat to India had been settled between the Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa and the Canadian ministers concerned. By its terms, the government of India would be advanced a sum not exceeding $25 million for the purpose of purchasing Canadian wheat and flour. These advances would be repayable to Canada by March 31st, 1967, together with interest at 4 1/4 per cent per annum. There would be seven annual payments, the first on March 31st, 1961. The advances to be made had been authorized in the Governor General's Warrant issued on February 7th, 1958.

Mr. Fleming recommended that he be authorized to enter, on behalf of the government of Canada, into the agreement with the government of India. Such an agreement would be substantially in the form of the draft submitted.

6. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of Finance that he be authorized to enter into an agreement on behalf of Canada with the government of India, to lend India $25 million for the purchase of wheat, on the terms and conditions outlined.⁷⁸

COLOMBO PLAN; GRANT OF WHEAT TO NEPAL

28. The Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that Nepal had asked Canada some months ago to supply wheat to help relieve a food shortage resulting from last year's crop failure. Although Nepal had been a member of the Colombo Plan for many years, Canada, as yet, had given no technical or capital aid to the country. He felt that a small amount of Canadian aid would be useful in resisting Chinese penetration. A figure of $60,000 had been used in discussions and it was understood that wheat from Canada to this value would be welcomed by the Nepalese. India was prepared to take care of the shipment and he recommended that arrangements be made to add 1,000 tons of wheat for Nepal to the last shipment of wheat to India which was expected to take place in the next few days.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, August 1, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 230-58).†

29. The Cabinet agreed that $60,000 worth of wheat be made available to Nepal, to be financed from monies already voted for the Colombo Plan and that in conformity with the terms of the vote, Nepal be asked to set aside local currency equal to the value of the wheat, for use in economic development purposes as agreed between the two countries.

WHEAT DISPOSAL

We have learned from officials of Trade and Commerce that their Minister will present a memorandum to Cabinet proposing that approval be given to gifts of wheat (and flour?) to Colombo Plan countries to the amount of $25 million. Funds would not be provided for this current session of Parliament but the Wheat Board would be given a Cabinet undertaking that funds in that amount would be voted at the next session of Parliament and authority to proceed immediately with gifts of up to $10 million, in anticipation of payment by the Government in the early months of next year. Quite apart from the fact that a Cabinet undertaking of this kind has certain disadvantages, there are other considerations which weigh against the proposal.

The proposal appears to be based on the argument that wheat exports should be maintained at something approaching the 300 million bushel mark and is precipitated by information from the United States advising us that they are now making their plans for wheat disposal to India for the next 18 months and asking us if we have any plans for wheat disposal in that area. Trade and Commerce will argue that unless we act now American surplus disposal will fill the entire Indian requirements and that we will have no possibility of disposal there during the present crop year.

The much lighter wheat crop this year — now estimated at 338 million bushels — means that our wheat carry-over will be reduced by 75 to 100 million bushels during the coming year even if our exports drop from last year's 315 million bushels to little more than 250 million bushels. This reduction in carry-over will naturally greatly reduce the farm storage problem and hence the agitation for wheat disposal. On this basis our carry-over at the end of the crop year next July 31st would be down to something more than 500 million bushels — a reduction of 200 million bushels from the peak of 729 million bushels reached July 31st, 1957. Not more than 100 million bushels of this carry-over will be on farms — and less than one-quarter of the farms will have any carry-over. This is not intended to suggest that a carry-over of 500 million bushels is small or that our carry-over problem is solved. But the wheat carry-over problem in this country is less acute than it has been for three years and although a large crop next year would again place us in a difficult position, another small crop would further reduce the carry-over and could result in the complete disappearance of the farm storage problem.

In view of the above, I do not think it necessary at this time to make arrangements for further gifts of wheat to Colombo Plan countries during the next few months. The Wheat Board must, of course, use every effort to maintain commercial sales of wheat and we must be vigilant in protecting our access to commercial markets since, whatever the extent of wheat stocks in Canada, there can be little doubt that the general problem of world wheat surplus will be with us for some years to come.

If, in the context of the Commonwealth Conference, you felt you could and should provide funds for additional exports of wheat and flour to the amount of $10 or even $25 millions I would suggest that this could be announced at the Conference but that the actual exports be delayed until Parliament has voted the funds in the normal way. I do not like the expedient of forcing the Wheat Board to provide temporary financing. Further, may I reiterate my own grave doubts about the desirability of trying to dispose of wheat to needy countries on a loan basis? Long term loans are really not appropriate in relation to consumable goods; the U.S. is willing to supply wheat on what amounts to a gift basis; and I could not help but be impressed by the fact that, in the meetings on India in Washington last week, the U.S. stated its intention to postpone for nine years interest and principal payments on their 1950 wheat-loan to India.⁷⁹

WHEAT GRANTS

Attached is a copy of the Memorandum to Cabinet which Mr. Churchill is putting forward seeking authority for $20 million this year for wheat grants to Commonwealth countries in the Colombo Plan. It proposes that the Wheat Board be directed to arrange such interim finance as may be required, and that India be offered up to 15 million bushels.

These proposals are fully in line with the views put before you in my memorandum on the allocation of Colombo Plan funds, which was sent to you this morning.⁸⁰ I am somewhat concerned, however, that Mr. Churchill's memorandum does not make reference to the need to consult with Australia, whose interests could well be adversely affected by the wheat grants contemplated. You may wish to consider mentioning this problem to your Colleagues in Cabinet. I feel sure that it would be in our interests to consult Australia on the terms of any offer of wheat or flour to Colombo Plan countries.

[Ottawa], September 4, 1958

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE — WHEAT EXPORT PROGRAMME 1958-59

1. The Prime Minister in his statement on Government Policy pertaining to agriculture on Saturday, August 30, 1958, stated:

“The government proposes, subject to approval by parliament at the next session, to continue the fund to assist in the export of surplus wheat stocks to non-commercial markets under the Colombo Plan so as to assure the continuance of the full scale sales promotion and market development programme which has been in effect during the past year.”

2. Although Canadian wheat and flour exports for the crop year 1957-58 were 317 million bushels, of which 285 million bushels were bona fide commercial sales and 32 million were gifts or on special credit terms, there is reason to believe that commercial wheat exports may not exceed 250 million bushels in 1958-59 and may be still further reduced in 1959-60.

3. Factors contributing to a decrease in exports are:

(a) Increasing European wheat production resulting in declining imports of wheat and increased exports of flour;

(b) Increased wheat production in Russia and Eastern European countries with possible increased exports from Russia to Western Europe and Japan;

(c) Favourable crop prospects in Australia will remove the possibility of export outlets in that country and increase export competition;

(d) Record crop in United States will increase competition for exports;

(e) Possibility that agreements calling for export of 400,000 tons of wheat to Russia and 150,000 tons to Poland may not be renewed following their expiration during the current year.

4. Commercial exports of 250 million bushels and domestic requirements of 160 million bushels against an estimated production of 338 million bushels for 1958 would have the effect of reducing Canada's wheat stocks by about 70 million bushels between August 1, 1958 and August 1, 1959, as compared with 115 million bushels between 1957 and 1958.

5. Although Canada's current and projected wheat stocks reflect a substantial improvement as compared with the all-time high of 729 million bushels at July 31, 1957, this improvement can be completely wiped out by one large crop. Furthermore, the imbalance between world production and consumption is likely to continue, with the result that we shall have a chronic surplus situation for some time in the future. It is, therefore, important, in line with the Prime Minister's statement, that provision be made for assisted exports on a continuing basis in order that Canada's exports of wheat may be programmed effectively and that stocks may be reduced in an orderly manner to manageable proportions. This may be done most effectively by establishing a fund to which contributions may be made annually by the Government and from which funds may be drawn to pay for regular gifts of wheat and flour in accordance with the Canadian stock situation and the needs in recipient countries. Such a measure would go a long way in giving effect to the principle of a "Food Bank," to which the Government has given support, and would provide a basis for the development of a co-ordinated approach to surplus disposal with the United States. It can also provide some assurance that Canada may secure a proper share of the potential market for wheat which will result from the use of surpluses in promoting economic development of underdeveloped areas.

6. An announcement of a "third tier" covering food products, to Canada's Colombo Plan contribution, in addition to the established tiers covering capital and technical assistance, at the Commonwealth Economic Conference would be opportune and bring credit and prestige to Canada.

7. An enquiry has been received through the Canadian Embassy in Washington from the United States Government asking Canada what part, if any, of the 3.5 million tons of wheat requested by India from the United States under P.L. 480 Canada wishes to have reserved for her. It would seem that this quantity would cover India's import needs over an 18-month period.

I, therefore, recommend:

(i) That, at the next session, Parliament be asked to provide funds to supplement the capital and technical assistance being made available to Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan to establish a continuing Fund for the purpose of providing gifts of wheat and flour to such countries in the following amounts:

- (a) 1958-59 fiscal year - $20,000,000.
- (b) 1959-60 fiscal year - $50,000,000.

(ii) That, pending the above funds becoming available, the Canadian Wheat Board be authorized to finance shipments of wheat which may be arranged to India and Pakistan to the amount of $10 million, such sum, together with carrying charges, to be reimbursed following the approval of the above sum by Parliament.

(iii) That the United States Government be advised that Canada may supply 15 million bushels of wheat to India up to July 31, 1959.

WHEAT EXPORT PROGRAMME, 1958-59
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUGUST 29)†

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the statement by the Prime Minister on the agricultural policy of the government, in which was indicated the intention of the government, subject to approval by Parliament at the next session, to continue to assist in financing the export of surplus wheat stocks to non-commercial markets under the Colombo Plan. Before the statement had been finally settled, the Cabinet had approved a sum of $75 million for this export assistance but, after consultation with finance officials, it was found that a vote for a "loans and investments" item, as decided by Cabinet, could not serve the purpose intended. The vote had therefore been dropped at the eleventh hour. Consequently there were no funds available for any further disposal of the surplus wheat stocks.

However, in order to assist wheat exports on a continuing basis and work out a programme to reduce stocks in an orderly manner to manageable proportions, a suggestion had been made which might enable further movement to take place in 1958-59. This was to establish a fund to which contributions would be made annually by the government and from which monies might be drawn to pay for regular gifts of wheat and flour, in accordance with the Canadian stock situation and needs of recipient countries. This would go a long way in giving effect to the principle of a "Food Bank" to which the government had given support, and would provide a basis for the development of a co-ordinated approach to surplus disposal with the United States. It would also provide some assurance that Canada might secure a proper share of the potential market for wheat from the use of surpluses in promoting economic development of underdeveloped areas. The Minister recommended:

(a) That, at the next session, Parliament be asked to provide funds to supplement the capital and technical assistance being made available to Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan to establish a continuing fund for the purpose of providing gifts of wheat and flour to such countries in the following amounts:

- (i) 1958-59 fiscal year - $20,000,000
- (ii) 1959-60 fiscal year - $50,000,000

(b) That, pending the above funds becoming available, the Canadian Wheat Board be authorized to finance shipments of wheat which may be arranged to India and Pakistan to the amount of $10 million, such sum, together with carrying charges, to be reimbursed following the approval of the above sum by Parliament.

(c) That the United States government be advised that Canada might supply 15 million bushels of wheat to India up to July 31st, 1959.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 4 — Cab. Doc. 256-58).

5. Mr. Churchill said he hoped agreement could be reached on this proposal so that it could be used at the coming Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, as it was the beginning of the food bank principle and might persuade other countries to take similar action. It would enable the Wheat Board to plan for a continuing programme in the summer of 1959. The need of India was very strong. It had been indicated in Parliament in Delhi that India would need to import at least 5 million tons of food grains and that the U.S. would give substantial aid.

The surplus disposal programme had already got rid of 32 million bushels and cash sales had been good. It must be continued, as there was too great a danger from the expanding production of wheat in Europe under subsidization. Canada's exports to Europe were likely to fall off by 20 million bushels this year. France was the largest producer and insisted that French millers use wheat grown in France or Algeria. So did the Belgians. Immediate funds were needed for shipment of wheat this fall which could be moved out of the St. Lawrence. The $10 million was required for this purpose. If it were not directly available, the Wheat Board could be authorized to advance the amount, or non-committed funds under the Colombo Plan might be used temporarily.

6. The Minister of Finance pointed out that the problem was not clearly defined. What was wanted was the right to make gifts or failing that, terms that would be the equivalent, that is, acceptance of local currency in making loans. This brought up the question of parliamentary authority. The government had no power to make gifts unless the amounts were approved specifically by Parliament. A grant was a budgetary expenditure item but a loan was different as it created an asset. If any gifts were to be made to India they should be approved by Parliament.

There was a question if the surplus problem was really as acute as suggested. There had been a substantial reduction, there might be a small crop next year, and was there a need to look so far ahead? When export assistance had been discussed previously, considerably more attention had been given than warranted to the U.S. consulting Canada about disposal to India. This was nothing new. It was improper to direct the Canadian Wheat Board to make payments for which the government undertook to ask Parliament's approval later. The Conservatives in opposition had criticized the previous government for doing this.

However, there were some funds available this year under which aid could be given. Parliament had approved the amount of $35 million for assistance under the Colombo Plan and there was still $10 million left for gifts of wheat as Pakistan had not taken up its share. Subject to the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this could be used.

Certainly no steps should be taken now on any approval of expenditures in 1959-60. The whole question should be studied in four or five months. As far as 1958-59 was concerned, there was no power to establish a continuing fund, but the money could be included in the final supplementary estimates for that year. To obtain funds for further movements later in the fiscal year, it might be possible to divert Colombo Plan votes already approved as contributions to specific projects and get the money replaced in the final supplementaries. India would have to agree, however, to hold back Colombo Plan aid on capital projects and take it now in the form of wheat. Actually she was in the greatest need for capital goods to bolster the second 5-year plan and would need the $17 million allotted.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Although by the end of next July all the wheat surplus would be off the farms, the elevators would be crammed and while the carry-over would be down by 200 million bushels, there would still be a stockpile of more than 500 million bushels before the addition of the 1959 crop. It was most essential to get the wheat surplus down to 200 million bushels and the present proposition allowed for long range planning and room to manoeuvre. It was a question of either paying storage, on which $100 million had been spent in the last three years, or getting the wheat out.

(b) It was impossible to commit a specific amount of $50 million in gifts. The whole question must be looked at carefully and there must be no tying of hands. On the other hand, what could be done in 1958-59 could be used at the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference and discussions initiated with India.

8. The Cabinet approved in principle the recommendations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to assistance for the export of wheat to Commonwealth countries under the Colombo Plan by some form of grants or gifts and agreed that,

(a) the sum of $10 million be made available immediately from unused appropriations for assisting wheat export under the Colombo Plan;

(b) that, if possible, another $10 million be made available in 1958-59, by arrangement with Commonwealth countries in the plan to hold back expenditures on capital projects and use the amounts for gifts of wheat;

(c) that authority from Parliament for reimbursement of the second $10 million be sought in the Final Supplementary Estimates, 1958-59;

(d) that no commitments be made at this time as to the degree of any aid of this nature in 1959-60, but that talks could be instituted with the Commonwealth countries concerned as to the possible programme; and,

(e) that the whole matter be reviewed early in the coming year.

Ottawa, September 15, 1958

My dear Colleague,

After the discussions in Cabinet on Sunday and Monday last on the allocation of existing Colombo Plan funds, and on the desirability of making wheat available as aid to the Commonwealth countries in the Colombo Plan, I asked my officials to review these questions and to prepare proposals after consultation with officials in your Department.

I have now had an opportunity to consider these matters further, and I would propose that Cabinet's decisions be implemented in the following fashion. As far as the provision of wheat under the regular Colombo Plan programme, the only possibility is the programme for Pakistan. Out of the $13 million allocated by Cabinet for Pakistan from the Colombo Plan Fund this year (1957-58), as much as $8 million is available for purposes other than for existing projects to which Canada is already committed. I would, therefore, be prepared to recommend to Cabinet that a portion of this $8 million be used to finance shipments of wheat to Pakistan, as part of our Colombo Plan programme in that country in the current fiscal year. Pakistan would, of course, be asked to set up counterpart funds equal to the value of the wheat, and subsequently to use these funds for mutually agreed development projects; as you know, the establishment of counterpart funds is required in order to meet the requirements of the Colombo Plan vote. We lack up-to-date information on the needs in the next six months of Pakistan for wheat. As I understand our position, it is over this period that our need to move wheat out of the St. Lawrence is most critical. In the light of past experience, however, I would doubt that it would be practical for Pakistan to accept more than about $4 million worth of wheat over the next few months; Pakistan has limited storage and docking facilities, and, again in the light of past experience, is unlikely to be able to make shipping arrangements expeditiously. It would be my view, therefore, that although we should try to move as much wheat as possible, we would be unwise to press Pakistan to take more wheat at this time than they are willing and able to accept in the near future.

As for India, I believe it would be very much against our interests to ask the Indians to use for wheat any of the $17 million, which Cabinet has now allocated to them under the Colombo Plan this year. The Indian Government had made it emphatically clear that India strongly desires, in pursuance of their carefully considered development plans, to use these funds for imports from Canada of non-ferrous metals, fertilizers, and wooden railway ties. They attach the highest priority to obtaining these commodities from Canada. I am sure you will agree that normally, and as a general rule, we should continue to adhere to the long-standing policy of being guided by the requests of the recipient countries in the Colombo Plan. Furthermore, we have given pretty firm assurances to the Indians that we will meet their priorities. We should, therefore, as we have already agreed, press on with purchasing and shipping these materials which the Indian Government considers essential.

As for Ceylon, there seems to me to be no possibility of the provision of Canadian flour over the 30,000 tons recently agreed to for shipment before March 31, 1959. That amount of flour was intended to be all that Ceylon could absorb from Canada prior to that date without adversely affecting Australia's interest. I would think that the Australians would be most disturbed if we even suggested that this matter be re-opened. It is quite possible, of course, that some flour can be shipped to Ceylon in the next fiscal year, but within the current crop year. This question, I think, should be re-examined with Ceylon and with Australia early in 1959.

As for the provision of wheat over and above the Colombo Plan programme, it might be possible to make available some money on a temporary basis from our Colombo Plan Fund for such a purpose, if no other source of funds exists.

I believe that up to $10 million would be available from the Fund, subject to reimbursement by mid-February at the latest. A certain amount of cash from the Indian allocation will not be required until that time, and there will be uncommitted funds allocated to Pakistan, the non-Commonwealth countries, and Ceylon, which are not as yet required to meet commitments.

As you know, there has been an enquiry from the Indian authorities about the amount which might still be available for a wheat loan to India. This enquiry will be followed up, but India's needs are certainly in excess of the $8 million available under the loan vote. I would propose that, in view of the food situation in India and in view of India's financial crisis, we might consider using the $10 million which could be temporarily borrowed from the Colombo Plan Fund for the provision of wheat to India.

This proposal depends, as I have emphasized above, on the decision being taken that at least this amount of money would be sought from Parliament as a matter of priority early in the next session. There is, of course, the additional point that the Auditor-General has commented on the propriety of borrowing from the Colombo Plan Fund and seeking reimbursement subsequently from Parliament under a different Vote. The question of whether or not the Government should proceed with this device, or whether the Auditor-General's comment is conclusive, is, in my view, primarily a matter for the your consideration. However, I would point out that the Auditor-General could have no objection to Parliament being asked to make an equivalent additional contribution to the Colombo Plan Fund. This would raise none of the difficulties to which he has drawn attention. An alternate method of finance would be to instruct the Canadian Wheat Board to borrow whatever amount it is decided to give India, subject to later reimbursement by a vote of Parliament. I recognize that this also raises some questions of financial policy, which again seem to me to be primarily matters for the your consideration. However, if we decide to use Colombo Plan funds for the provision of wheat to India, we should be able to assure the Indians that there will be no resulting delay in the provision of those goods to which they attach a higher priority. For that reason I would not think that the temporary diversion to wheat purchases of more than $10 million could be contemplated.

I should be grateful for your comments on these proposals. If you agree with these suggestions, they might be discussed with representatives of the two countries concerned at the Montreal Conference, and at the same time our Missions in Karachi and New Delhi advised. Depending upon the outcome of discussions with these countries, we would put firm proposals before Cabinet, which would enable us to give precise form to the directions given by Cabinet during the discussions last week. In view of the fact that talks are now underway between India and the United States for the provision of wheat for the next twelve months, I feel that we should treat the Indian case, at least, as a matter of urgency.

I am writing in similar terms to our Colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Yours faithfully,

SIDNEY SMITH

My dear Colleague:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 15th instant concerning the desirability of making wheat available as aid to the Commonwealth countries in the Colombo Plan.

I enclose herewith a copy of a memorandum prepared for me on this subject by Mr. Plumptre which closely parallels the views expressed in your letter. With the concurrence of our colleague Mr. Churchill I have approved the course of action proposed in this memorandum, and Mr. Plumptre is now engaged in negotiations with the officials of the Government of India on the subject. It seems likely that India will take up the remaining $8.8 million for purchase of wheat on loan. It is my hope that these negotiations will be concluded next week.⁸¹ They are proceeding simultaneously in Washington.

Concerning further gifts of wheat to India, I enclose herewith a copy of a letter dated the 18th instant which I have written to our colleague Mr. Churchill confirming certain understandings arrived at between us in conference earlier this week.

Yours sincerely,

WHEAT DISPOSAL

1. I understand that in the course of meetings last week Cabinet decided:

(i) to make wheat available as aid to Colombo Plan countries during the current year;
(ii) to aim at a target of special wheat disposal up to $20 million, although no firm figure was decided;

(iii) to explore methods for financing such wheat disposal within the framework of the Colombo Plan programme or other funds authorized by Parliament for wheat.

2. Officials of the various Departments concerned have reviewed this matter for the past week and have developed a number of possibilities. The Department of External Affairs has been particularly active and Mr. Sidney Smith will shortly be putting forward proposals for implementing the Cabinet decision. Meanwhile the discussions which I have had with Indian officials in the past few days have uncovered several important new considerations which bear directly on the choice of methods which may be used for financing wheat disposal.

⁸¹ Cet accord entre le Canada et l'Inde a été signé le 22 octobre 1958. Voir Canada, Recueil des Traités, 1958, N° 24, 22 octobre 1958.

This agreement between Canada and India was signed on October 22, 1958. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1958, No. 24, October 22, 1958.

3. India's position is central to the problem since that country will be expected to take a large proportion of any wheat made available. As you know, Cabinet has allocated to India $17 million of this year's $35 million Colombo Vote. The Indian Government has made it clear to us that India wants to use the whole of this amount to finance certain essential commodities required for her development programme and definitely does not want any part of this $17 million in the form of wheat. I understand that Cabinet has agreed not to allow the problem of wheat disposal to disturb in any way the normal Indian programme under the Colombo Plan.

4. Leaving aside the normal Colombo Plan allocation, India is interested in getting some wheat from Canada this year. I have had exploratory conversations with B.K. Nehru to see whether India is interested in taking up the balance of the loan fund which we have available to finance wheat sales to Colombo countries ($8.8 million available). Without any pressure whatever on my part, Nehru indicated that India was definitely interested in a loan for wheat this year. The main reason for this renewed interest in a loan stems from the terms of the United States very large wheat grant which requires India to purchase certain quantities in the commercial market. Wheat purchases from Canada would apparently qualify under the terms and fortunately for us India would like to buy some wheat from Canada in these circumstances.

5. If agreement can be reached of making the $8.8 million loan fund available to India it will probably be necessary to extend the terms of payment beyond the 9-year schedule under the wheat loan negotiated last February. The present financial crisis in India and the likelihood of continued balance of payments difficulties for some years to come would seem to make a longer term loan desirable from India's point of view as well as from our own. The details of a wheat loan to India would, of course, have to be negotiated, keeping in mind the terms imposed on India by the United States disposal programme. I would like to suggest a schedule of payments under any loan whereby the annual payments would be of the same order of magnitude as under the present loan and running on after the present 9-year loan. The question of rates of interest and whether interest charges might be waived for the 9-year interval would also have to be considered.

6. The position of Pakistan is quite different from that of India. Of the $13 million allocated by Cabinet for Pakistan out of this year's Colombo Fund, $8 million is available for purposes other than existing projects to which Canada is already committed. Part of this $8 million can be used to finance wheat shipments to Pakistan but it is unlikely that it would be practical for Pakistan to take more than $4 million in the form of wheat. We have not yet explored this possibility with Pakistan. Clearly, if they were, themselves, willing to take $4 million in the form of wheat, no problem would arise. On the other hand, should Pakistan show reluctance I would have grave doubts as to the desirability of pressing wheat on Pakistan under the normal Colombo Plan programme this year. Their balance of payments position is also very difficult and the Pakistani are especially sensitive about getting treatment from Canada no less favourable than we give India. In this connection I should remind you that Mr. Moran, our High Commissioner in Pakistan, explored with Amjad Ali the possibility of Pakistan taking up part of our wheat loan fund but they were not interested.

[7]. I will not go into the question of other Colombo Plan countries because the figures involved are small and could not make a significant difference to the problem.

[8]. The possibility has also been raised of making wheat grants to Colombo countries over and above the normal Colombo Plan programme. Parliament has not voted funds for this purpose but a number of alternative methods of financing grant wheat have been explored. One possible method would be to borrow some money from the Colombo Plan fund on a temporary basis. It is estimated that about $10 million of Colombo funds will not be needed for actual payments during the next few months. If this were done it would be absolutely essential, however, to replace such funds by mid-February at the latest, if normal Colombo shipments, particularly to India, are not to be interfered with. If it is decided to proceed in this way it will be necessary to ask Parliament to replenish the Colombo funds early in the next Session. This raises the question of the reimbursement under a new Vote. You know, of course, that the Auditor General has been critical of such a procedure on several past occasions and you will no doubt want to take this factor into account in reaching a decision.

[9]. It has been suggested that a further possible method for financing grant wheat would be to instruct the Canadian Wheat Board to borrow whatever amount it may be decided to give India, subject to later reimbursement by Parliamentary Vote. The Wheat Board would, of course, need to be assured that such reimbursement would be forthcoming. Such an assurance, I expect would have to take the form of a letter from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that Parliament would be requested to vote the necessary funds at the next Session. Since a Minister does not have the power to authorize expenditures which have not been approved by Parliament, such a procedure would likely be open to the same kind of criticism that was made by the Auditor General in connection with the use of Colombo Plan funds for financing gifts of wheat for relief. For these reasons neither Mr. Taylor nor I is enamoured of this method of financing wheat gifts.

Summary

[10]. It would appear that there are the following possible methods for implementing the Cabinet decision to make wheat available to Colombo countries this year:

- (i) a wheat loan to India financed under the existing loan fund of $8.8 million;
- (ii) shipments to Pakistan in the amount of $4 million under the normal Colombo Plan programme;
- (iii) grant aid for wheat gifts over and above the normal Colombo Plan programme by borrowing temporarily from the Colombo Fund (maximum $10 million to be replenished no later than mid-February 1959) or by asking the Wheat Board to borrow from the banks, in some appropriate amount, to be reimbursed subsequently by a separate Vote of Parliament.

Conclusion

[11]. I am not entirely clear on the precise nature of the Cabinet decision. However, if there is flexibility on the amount of wheat to be made available it would seem to me that the prospect of India taking up an $8.8 million loan, and Pakistan taking $4 million in wheat under the normal Colombo programme, would together make up adequate wheat disposal for this year. In taking this view I have in mind the points I made to you some weeks ago about the present wheat situation in Canada. The carryover has been reduced significantly during the past year and there is every prospect that with a short crop the carry-over will be reduced further during the coming year. Given the present outlook for normal commercial sales, a declining carryover is likely even without special disposal measures. It is also relevant that the problem of wheat stored on the farm, which was so troublesome a year or so ago, is now a much less serious matter.

My dear Colleague:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 13th instant. I was glad we had an opportunity of discussing at last evening's meeting of the Canadian delegation the subject of provision of wheat to India and Pakistan on a loan and grant basis.

As I understand it, we reached agreement last night on the following three points:

1. Officials should negotiate immediately with the Indian Delegation a loan up to $8.8 million to finance the purchase of wheat by India. This loan would be financed from the balance of the $25 million loan fund authorized by Parliament for this purpose. The wheat to be purchased under this loan is to be shipped out of Montreal before the freeze-up.

2. Officials should endeavour to reach agreement with Pakistan on the provision of $4 million worth of wheat to be financed out of Pakistan's allocation from the Colombo Plan Fund. This wheat is also to be shipped out of Montreal before the freeze-up.

3. In the course of discussions with the United States authorities on wheat for India, officials are authorized to indicate that Canada would be prepared to provide, on a grant basis, 250,000 tons of wheat to India between January 1, 1959 and July 31, 1959. It will be necessary to finance payment for this wheat out of a new special parliamentary vote or votes. I wish to reserve as much freedom as possible to decide whether this financing should be done in the fiscal year 1958-1959 or the fiscal year 1959-1960, or both.

I would appreciate it if you would confirm that the foregoing accurately reflects the decisions reached last night.

Yours sincerely,

DONALD M. FLEMING

WHEAT; DONATION TO INDIA

17. The Prime Minister said that all of the funds provided by Parliament for assisting Colombo Plan countries to finance purchases of wheat or flour had been committed. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was anxious to move more wheat as soon as possible and had suggested that the Wheat Board be directed to make shipments to India, on the understanding that Parliament would be asked to provide the authority and the money to pay for such shipments at its next session.

18. During the discussion it was pointed out that the action proposed was identical with a similar move by the previous government, which the Conservative Party had vehemently criticized. The present government was in power more for its attitude towards Parliament than for any other reason. To agree to the proposal would mean the loss of a lot of support. Moreover, the Prime Minister on August 31st, in Parliament had stated that funds were available to finance what would be shipped before the next session began.

19. The Cabinet decided not to make a donation of wheat to India, the authority and appropriation for which would have been sought at the next session of Parliament.

COLOMBO PLAN; WHEAT FOR PAKISTAN
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE SEPTEMBER 7⁺)

27. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that Cabinet had approved a total appropriation of $37,356,000 for the operation of the Canadian Colombo Plan programme in the fiscal year 1958. It had also been agreed that, wherever possible, aid should be provided in the form that would help reduce the surplus of Canada's agricultural products.

Within the total, $2 million was to be allocated to the Canadian Colombo Plan technical assistance, leaving a balance of $35.3 million to be divided among various countries to finance capital aid projects to be undertaken by Canada. Of this sum, an allocation of $13 million was approved for Pakistan. Some of this amount would be required to finance capital development projects. The balance would be available for purchases of Canadian industrial raw materials and of wheat.

Canada had now been formally requested by Pakistan to make available the sum of $2 million from Colombo Plan funds to finance the purchase of wheat required as a matter of urgency to meet various food shortages. In accordance with the normal practice, the government of Pakistan had agreed to meet the shipping charges and to establish local counterpart funds equivalent to $2 million to be used for economic development purposes agreed upon by the two governments.

There was some urgency in reaching a decision on this matter since the government of Pakistan had expressed the hope that the wheat could be shipped from Montreal before the St. Lawrence freeze-up. The Department of Finance had indicated its approval for this allocation.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Oct. 31 — Cab. Doc. 313-58)†

28. During the brief discussion it was stated that possibly the Minister of Finance, on his return, might know whether Pakistan would be prepared to purchase a larger quantity of wheat. It was also thought that publicity should be given to this allocation of wheat and that this would have beneficial effects within Canada and also with regard to the existing domestic situation in Pakistan.

29. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that $2 million of the funds allocated to Pakistan under the Colombo Plan be made available for the purchase of wheat, and that Pakistan be requested to establish counterpart funds equivalent to this amount to be used for economic development projects agreed on by the two governments.

[Ottawa], December 10, 1958

RESTRICTED

ALLOCATION OF A FURTHER $2 MILLION TO PAKISTAN
FOR THE PROVISION OF WHEAT UNDER THE COLOMBO PLAN

At its meeting of September 7, 1958, Cabinet approved the allocation of a total of $37,368,854 for the operation of the Canadian Colombo Plan programme in the fiscal year 1958-59. It was further agreed that, in working out the detailed programmes for each country, full consideration should be given to the possibility of providing aid in a form that would help to reduce the surplus of Canada's agricultural products.

Within the total of $37.3 million appropriation, the sum of $2 million was to be allocated to the Canadian Colombo Plan Technical Assistance Programme and the balance of $35.3 million was to be divided among various countries to finance capital aid projects to be undertaken by Canada. Of this sum an allocation of $13 million was approved for Pakistan.

In a memorandum dated October 31, 1958, which Cabinet considered on November 5, it was noted that some of this $13 million allocation to Pakistan will be required to finance capital development projects, and that the balance would be available for the purchase of Canadian industrial raw materials and of wheat. As an initial and urgent request, the Memorandum recommended, and Cabinet approved, an immediate allocation of $2 million from these funds for the purchase of wheat.

During the Prime Minister's recent visit to Karachi, the President of Pakistan agreed that a further $2 million out of the Canadian allocation to Pakistan for 1958-59 be used for the purchase of Canadian wheat. A formal request in this sense has now been submitted to us. In their submission the Government of Pakistan asked that the wheat be shipped as soon as possible in order to meet food shortages which it is anticipated may occur in Pakistan next February.

At the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference Canada reiterated its undertaking that, in providing aid in the form of food to the less-developed countries, the legitimate trading interests of third countries would be taken into account. In accordance with this undertaking and with previous practice, the Australian authorities have been informed of Pakistan's request for a further $2 million worth of wheat as part of the Canadian Colombo Plan programme for 1958-59. In passing this information to the Australian authorities it was pointed out that Pakistan had recently committed itself under a PL480 agreement with the United States to import at least 75,000 tons of wheat on a commercial basis in each of the U.S. fiscal years 1959 and 1960. This commitment had been arrived at on the basis of consultations in which Canada and Australia had been closely involved and it appeared to leave adequate room for such commercial imports as Pakistan was likely to make in a period when its foreign exchange position continued to be under strain.

In the light of these considerations I recommend⁸² that approval be given to the allocation of a further $2 million worth of wheat to Pakistan to be charged against the Colombo Plan appropriation for 1958-59, and that the Government of Pakistan be requested to establish counterpart funds equivalent to this amount to be used for economic development purposes agreed upon by the two Governments.

[Ottawa], October 9, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE COLOMBO PLAN
CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETING, SAIGON, 1957

General Guidance

The Canadian Delegation to the Colombo Plan Conference should be guided by two general considerations:

(1) that the Colombo Plan is a co-operative effort to improve the well-being of South and Southeast Asia; the main effort is being put forward by the countries of that region themselves. In general the Delegation should try to ensure that initiatives have broad backing from the major Asian delegations. It is not appropriate for the countries outside the region who contribute to this co-operative economic effort to describe themselves as "donor" countries and to speak of others as "recipients."

⁸² Approuvé par le Cabinet le 16 décembre 1958./Approved by Cabinet on December 16, 1958.

(2) It is undesirable to make any reference to the fact that one of the reasons for Canada participating in the Colombo Plan is our wish to help counter the threat of Communist subversion. Two of the most important countries of the Plan are avowedly neutral in this struggle — India and Indonesia — and it has, therefore, become an almost unwritten rule at the meeting that no reference be made to this issue.

Item 1 of the Agenda — Speeches by Leaders of the Delegation

As will be apparent from the comments against Item 5 below, the nature of the opening speech to be made by the Leader of the Canadian Delegation is not yet clear. It may or may not be the occasion for the major speech by the Leader of the Delegation; it may be merely an occasion to make a general statement expressing our thanks to the host government. However, the major speech should cover

(a) What Canada is accomplishing under the Colombo Plan and how much it will contribute next year. It is hoped that a memorandum on this latter point will be put before Ministers⁸³ and a decision from Cabinet obtained in time to advise the Delegation before the Ministerial Meeting beginning October 21. Canada's willingness to work with and along side our Asian friends should be emphasized. Any Canadian statement should, of course, be moderate in tone and underline humanitarian rather than political considerations for our participation in the Colombo Plan. It might also indicate the benefit of a broader international understanding which we derive from our participation.

Item 2 of the Agenda — Presentation of the Draft of the Annual Report

The Canadian Delegation should seek to ensure that the report is an objective and analytical in tone as possible under the circumstances. (It has been customary for the major Canadian statement to be made when the Contributions Chapter is being considered under this item).

Item 3 of the Agenda — Technical Assistance

Canada may be elected a member of the Subcommittee on Technical Assistance of the Officials Meeting. It would be expected that Mr. Mills, our Colombo Plan Attaché in Karachi, would be the Canadian representative. There are a number of points of detail on which it may be appropriate for our representative to comment, as set out in the detailed commentary on this item prepared by the Technical Co-operation Service. The Delegation should make it clear that in the Canadian view the technical assistance scheme is working well and that we continue to find it an effective and useful means of giving aid and of making the best use of the resources that are available in the Colombo Plan area.

Item 4 of the Agenda — Colombo Plan Information Unit

Mr. Mills or Mr. Nutting might be the Canadian representative on the Subcommittee on Information at the Officials Meeting. (Mr. Mills attended the last policy meeting of the Council for Technical Co-operation in Colombo which considered information matters.) In the event that Canada is elected to this Committee it would be appropriate for the Canadian representative to make any points of detail suggested in the commentary on this item prepared by the Information Division of the Department of External Affairs. The Canadian ⁸³ Voir/See Document 409.

Delegation should be aware that some of Canada's information objectives are served by the Information Unit and we should approve any modest expansion of its activities; however, the Delegation should resist any undue expansion of the work of the Unit, particularly if such expansion would call for an increased contribution from Canada. Though no doubt additional information activity is required about the Colombo Plan in South and Southeast Asia, this task can best be served by national governments rather than by the Colombo Plan Information Unit which is better adapted to give assistance to national information organizations.

Item 5 of the Agenda — Arrangements Relating to the Next Meeting

The Leader of the Canadian Delegation at last year's meeting expressed the view that the Colombo Plan Conference should be held less frequently and should deal with more matters of substance. This view is widely shared, and, therefore, the Canadian Delegation should give support to any initiative by Asian countries to hold these meetings less frequently. The Delegation should not, however, take any initiative in this matter. As to the detailed conduct of meetings, the Delegation should give support, along the lines indicated in the commentary articles, to proposals to improve the organization of the Meeting of Ministers and to streamline the work of the various committees and working groups. The Delegation should give support to any initiative by the Asian Governments in this direction if it is in line with the detailed suggestions in the commentary, but should not take the lead in pressing for changes at this stage.

Item 6 of the Agenda — Other Business

There may be a number of topics raised in the meeting or brought up informally between delegations. A list of such possible topics is set out below with brief indications of what attitude the Delegation should adopt.

(a) Asian Nuclear Centre—The Delegation should be guided by paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of telegram E-926 of June 25[†] to Washington which contained instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the Working Group which considered the United States proposals. Canadian attitudes to this proposal have not altered significantly since that time.

(b) Asian Development Fund—The preliminary views of Departments on the Japanese proposal (as contained in the attached papers)[†] is that it is most unlikely that Canada would ever be prepared to participate in such a fund. The Japanese proposal conflicts with the basic Canadian policy of handling Colombo Plan capital aid bilaterally.

(c) Possible Membership of Afghanistan—The Delegation should be prepared to agree to the membership of Afghanistan if it is sponsored by Pakistan or if Pakistan approves. The Delegation may find it necessary to make clear that for the present, Canada will find it possible to offer only limited technical assistance to Afghanistan.

(d) Possible Membership of Korea—The Delegation should be guided by the attitudes of the major Asian countries in the Plan. In any event, the possibility of Canada offering assistance would be limited to technical assistance.

(e) Membership of Federation of Malaya—The Canadian Delegation should welcome the Federation of Malaya as a full member of the Plan.

(f) Mekong River Project—The Delegation should hold informal discussions with the other Delegations concerned as to the suitability of this project for Canadian aid, without making any commitment on behalf of Canada.

(g) University of Dalat—The Delegation should hold informal conversations on this subject with Vietnamese representatives, without making any commitment on Canada's behalf.

(h) Programme of Aid for Malaya—The Canadian Delegation should indicate to the Delegation of Malaya, if appropriate, that Canada has under study the possibility of a somewhat expanded programme of aid to that country.

(i) Other Questions of Aid to Indo-Chinese States—The Delegation should indicate, if required, that as far as further technical assistance to the Indo-Chinese states is concerned our limitations are physical, rather than financial; they should bear in mind that the institutional and administrative arrangements affecting technical assistance in Indo-China are not as effective as in areas in which we have missions, or in which the local administrations are more highly organized. As to capital aid for Indo-China, the only projects which are under consideration at present are covered in [f] and [g] above.⁸⁴

Colombo, October 31, 1957

My Dear Colleague:

COLOMBO PLAN CONFERENCE, SAIGON — 21-24 OCTOBER 1957

I am attaching a report on the Ninth Meeting of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee held in Saïgon from October 21-24, 1957. This report is sent in amplification of the telegraphic report† which I sent from Saïgon. I hope that it will give you and the officials who are dealing with Colombo Plan matters some further impression of the Conference and the principal items dealt with there.

I should like to take this occasion to tell you that on arrival in Saïgon I found that, in fact, a fine job of preparation had been completed by our Canadian officials who had gone ahead to the Meeting of the Preparatory Group and the Meeting of Officials. The leader at the Meeting of Officials was Mr. D. Cornett, who came up from our High Commissioner's Office in Canberra, Australia, for the meeting. He was assisted by Mr. Denis Hudon of the Department of Finance, Ottawa, Mr. W. Mills of the Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in Pakistan, and Mr. C. Nutting of the Commonwealth Division of your Department. These four officials carried the main part of the drafting work and in addition held a number of useful exploratory discussions with other Delegations there.

⁸⁴ Il n'y a pas de référence directe à ce document dans les conclusions du Cabinet. Le 12 octobre 1957, le Cabinet a noté que le ministre sans portefeuille, W.J. Browne, dirigerait la délégation canadienne à la réunion de Saïgon, au lieu du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures récemment nommé, Sidney Smith, qui se préparait à disputer des élections partielles dans la circonscription de Hastings-Frontenac, en Ontario. Le Cabinet a autorisé M. Browne à annoncer que le Canada, en attente de l'approbation du Parlement, apporterait une contribution de 35 millions $ au Plan Colombo en 1958-1959.

There is no direct reference to this document in the Cabinet Conclusions. On October 12, 1957, Cabinet noted that the Minister without Portfolio, W.J. Browne, would lead the Canadian delegation to the Saïgon meeting in place of the newly-appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs, Sidney Smith, who was preparing to contest a by-election in the Ontario riding of Hastings-Frontenac. Cabinet authorized Browne to announce that Canada, pending the approval of Parliament, would contribute 35 million dollars to the Colombo Plan in 1958-1959.

I should also like to mention here that Mr. H.O. Moran, our newly appointed High Commissioner to Pakistan, arrived in Saigon a few days before we did, and because he is a senior and experienced member of your Department was able to advise me helpfully in connection with the Meeting of Ministers. Mr. Menzies, who accompanied me from Ottawa, also sat in on the meetings.

While members of the Canadian Delegation on the International Supervisory Commission in Vietnam did not form part of the Canadian Delegation to the Colombo Plan Conference, they were of considerable assistance in making arrangements. I am particularly indebted to Mr. T.L. Carter, our Commissioner in Vietnam, for the hospitality which he enabled me to extend to the leaders of the various Delegations at two luncheons given at the Canadian villa.

When I return to Ottawa I shall look forward to some occasion when we may be able to have a chat about the Conference and when I may be able to add some personal impressions.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BROWNE

CONFIDENTIAL

[Colombo], October 27, 1957

NINTH MEETING OF COLOMBO PLAN CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE, SAIGON
OCTOBER 21-24, 1957

1. The ninth meeting of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee took place in the usual atmosphere of co-operation, goodwill and friendly interest in the programmes of national economic development of the countries of South and Southeast Asia. The Government of the Republic of Vietnam made a great effort to provide an attractive and effective setting for the first full-scale international conference to be held in its territory. It was my impression that the air-conditioned Conference Hall in what was formerly the French Chamber of Commerce building and the other arrangements for the meeting exceeded the expectation of most delegations and reflected credit on the Vietnamese Government. Vietnam's determination to do a good job in the right way was also shown by the manner in which the Government and the police handled an attempt by subversive elements to cause trouble on the morning of October 23. There were three bombing attacks on American personnel and buildings including one against U.S. MAAG personnel outside the Metropole Hotel in which some delegates and two of our stenographers were staying. Apart from some strengthening of police forces in the environs of the Conference Hall and rerouting of traffic away from hotels housing delegates, both of which were handled unobtrusively, the Vietnamese officials took these disorders in their stride and the Conference continued without interruption.

2. A good deal of the success of the Conference was due to the effective teamwork displayed by the Secretariat to which many member Governments contributed personnel.

The five Canadian bilingual translators were kept busy serving committees during the meetings of officials but were not so busy during the Ministerial sessions.

3. The predominant atmosphere at the Conference was that of friendliness and informality. It was clear from the outset that a good many delegations, notably the Americans and Indians, were anxious to avoid controversial issues which might disrupt the smooth course of the proceedings. In a large measure this attitude contributed to the general atmosphere of sweetness and light, but it also made the meetings somewhat uninspired. In the main, issues of substance were avoided and the few occasions on which the Conference was fired by a spark of enthusiasm occurred by accident rather than design.

Preliminary Working Groups

4. Members of our delegation tell me that last year considerable attention was devoted to the organization of the officials meetings and the new arrangements were first tried at this year's Conference. While many ideas have been put forward for improving the drafting of the report, it was the view of most delegations, including our own, that the Preliminary Working Groups meeting this year for a week in advance of the full officials meeting functioned reasonably smoothly and were able to make a real contribution to the orderly conduct of business later in the conference. In fact, the new arrangements worked sufficiently well that New Zealand subsequently withdrew its proposal to amalgamate the Preliminary Working Groups and the Country Chapter Groups. Three weaknesses noted by the Canadian delegation were:

- (a) The failure of two countries (Ceylon and Nepal) to send representatives to the Preliminary Working Groups;
- (b) The inflexibility of some delegations; and
- (c) A lack of understanding by some delegations of the functions of the Preliminary Working Groups.

5. Changes introduced this year are intended to distribute the load more evenly among the member nations and to lay down broad terms of reference for the guidance of officials working in the preliminary stages of the Conference.

Officials Meeting

6. The main work of the Conference was carried on in four Committees, the Drafting Committee chaired by Mr. J.J. Moriarty of New Zealand, the Business Committee comprising heads of delegations chaired by Mr. Hyunh Van Diem of Vietnam, and sub-committees on Technical Assistance and Information. Canada was not this year a member of the Drafting Committee but was represented on the other three committees. Because of the better organization at this year's meeting and also because of Mr. Moriarty's efficient direction, the Drafting Committee was, I understand, able to get through its work without the last minute pressures which have been characteristic of previous conferences. There was a good deal of discussion on substantive issues in the Drafting Committee in which the Indian, Pakistani and Ceylonese delegations played a prominent role.

7. The Business Committee dealt with three substantive issues:

- (a) The United Kingdom proposal to make public the first stages of the Ministerial Meeting during which the major speeches would be made;
- (b) The New Zealand proposal to amalgamate the Preliminary Working Groups and the Country Chapter working groups;
- (c) The question of getting more publicity for the Conference.

8. The United Kingdom proposal which was designed to give greater publicity to the Conference called for an initial public session during which Ministers might cover whatever ground they wished within the scope of the Colombo Plan followed by private sessions during which the usual items of business would be considered and discussions could be held on special agreed topics. Opinion was about equally divided on the merits of this suggestion. On one hand increased publicity, more orderly conduct of business, and more enthusiastic discussions would result: on the other hand, some delegations feared that it would detract from the friendly informality of the present system and might result in the introduction of controversial topics. Because agreement could not be reached, a report setting out the arguments for and against was prepared and noted by Ministers.

9. The first meeting of the Business Committee was enlivened by a proposal from the Pakistan leader that at the 1958 meeting the Committee might consider the impact on the countries of the Colombo Plan area of the European Common Market and the proposed free trade area. He suggested a group of experts should be set up to observe discussions on these matters at GATT and other organizations and to report to the Committee next year. This suggestion was not well received because the Colombo Plan has no permanent Secretariat to undertake studies of this kind, and there are opportunities for members to keep in touch with European developments through their membership in other international organizations.

Technical Assistance

10. The United Kingdom chaired the Sub-Committee on Technical Assistance and it was agreed to recommend to the Ministers that the integration of the Bureau and Information Unit as proposed by the Council be approved. The Sub-Committee considered an Australian proposal that the Ministers should discuss the desirability of undertaking a survey of the growth and extent of training facilities in South and Southeast Asia and likely future demands for training facilities in the donor countries. There was a good deal of discussion of the overall benefits of a survey of this kind and the Sub-Committee recommended that the Colombo Plan Bureau be asked to provide data on training facilities offered by countries in the area and ascertain from them what further facilities they could offer in the next year or two. I am informed that the meetings of the Sub-Committee were on the whole rather perfunctory and the discussions uninspired. The meetings were not productive of any new ideas or any spontaneous exchange of views. The Asian countries had very little to say. Most of the member countries seem to share our view that the Technical Assistance Programme is going very well and that no major changes in policy or procedures are necessary. Our delegation got the impression that if the Chairman had not been so strict and formal in the conduct of the meetings more exchanges of views and active discussion might have taken place. Our delegation was able to make reference in the report to most of the points it was instructed to raise.

Ministerial Meetings

11. Most of the major set speeches made by Ministers were concentrated in the first two days of the Conference. President Diem's opening address was an impressive 'tour de force' delivered in the English language, which he does not use conversationally. He spoke of the great need for Colombo Plan aid in Southeast Asia and of the friendly co-operative spirit in which it was administered.

12. The speeches given in reply to the President's address were confined to broad general statements on the value of the Colombo Plan and the acknowledgments suitable to such occasions. The main policy speeches dealt in detail with the activities in the Colombo Plan of each member nation and I was particularly impressed with the able speech given by the Indian leader, Mr. Bhagat.

13. As to the personalities involved, the Australian leader, Mr. Casey, who took a very active part in the Conference, Lord Reading, the United Kingdom leader, and Mr. Macdonald, the New Zealand leader, all played important roles. The United States delegation purposely played a quiet part in the Conference.

14. The discussion in the meetings was devoted largely to the advisability of having a survey of technical assistance training facilities in South and Southeast Asia and to the press arrangements at this, and the next Colombo Plan Conference. The leader of the Pakistani Delegation suggested that as the Conference provided the best opportunity for Colombo Plan publicity, the press should be given much more material, including copies of the report. Several delegates opposed this suggestion on the grounds that the report was a restricted document and its contents should not be disclosed until it had been received by the various member governments. It was also pointed out that the press did receive the most important sections of the report, including chapter 2 and were able to attend the public sessions at the beginning and end of the Conference. In addition to this delegation leaders could and usually did make available to the press the contents of their major policy speeches.

15. I was called upon to make the second reply to President Diem's opening address. I tried in a short speech to touch on basic values of the Plan as a unique co-operative enterprise. On October 22 I delivered our major policy speech in which I emphasized that our attitude toward the Colombo Plan remained unchanged, made the announcements about our future projects contained in the Ottawa draft of the speech and reviewed the Canadian Colombo Plan programme. Copies of both speeches are attached.†

Other Business

16. (a) New Members. Nearly every delegation welcomed Malaya as a full member of the Plan. No reference was made in any of the meetings to the entry of either South Korea or Afghanistan.

(b) Asian Nuclear Centre. The only reference to this subject was made by the United States leader who mentioned that, as a result of the July meetings in Washington, his Government was re-examining the proposal because most countries were not prepared to give substantive support to the Centre. The United States is now considering to what extent a Centre based on more limited co-operation would be feasible and will communicate its views to member governments through diplomatic channels.

(c) Asian Development Fund. The Japanese Delegate referred to the proposed fund briefly in his main speech, emphasizing its importance and suggesting that contributions should be made by countries both in and outside South and Southeast Asia. The fund would be complementary to the Colombo Plan and United Nations aid programme. Rumour has it that West Germany is so far the only other nation prepared to contribute to the fund. There was no further reference to this proposal.

(d) Burmese Proposal. The Burmese leader attempted to make a formal motion that the agenda for next year's meeting should include two special items, the co-ordination of development plans within the area and inflationary trends and their control. The business committee pointed out that it is not usual to put a formal motion to the Committee and in any event, without a permanent secretariat, it would be difficult to prepare the necessary studies. It was agreed that the host government for next year's conference should enquire whether member governments wished to have these items on next year's agenda.

Discussions with other Delegations

17. Discussions were held during the officials meetings with the delegations from Indonesia, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, Thailand, Sarawak, North Borneo and Singapore. During the Ministerial Meeting I met with the leaders of the Indonesian, Burmese and Nepalese delegations. In addition to these discussions (which I thought useful), I discussed the Mekong River Project with the officials of ECAFE. You will be interested to know that one of the delegation members paid a visit to the project suggested by the Vietnamese at the proposed site of Dalat University. I also visited this place and was impressed by its potentialities.

Information Report

18. The report of the Sub-Committee on Information did not contain any proposals which recommended additional expenditure by the Unit nor did it recommend any substantive changes. There was virtually no discussion of the report at the Ministerial Meeting. I understand the general attitude of most member countries was that the Unit was now doing a competent job and should this year consolidate its achievements before embarking on any "significant expansion or reorientation." In compliance with your wishes in this matter, I announced that our Government was again prepared to produce for member countries a French language version of the report of the Consultative Committee.

Arrangements for Next Year's Meeting

19. Members of our delegation tell me that during most of the Conference it was feared by some delegations that Tokyo would be the site of the next Colombo Plan Conference. I understand the Japanese delegation was authorized to invite the member nations to Japan for the 1958 meeting and in fact lobbied with a number of delegations. Two days before the Conference closed the United States delegation was authorized by its Government to say that if the member nations wished the next meeting to be held in the United States it would be glad to extend invitations. The Japanese and United States delegations then met together and the United States delegate persuaded the Japanese that after only two years of membership it was premature for Japan to invite members to Japan, and on October 24 the United States leader issued the invitation. Most delegates with whom I spoke seemed to regard favourably the prospect of a Conference in the United States. It is still unknown whether the Conference will be held in Washington; San Francisco had been mentioned as a possible alternative.

20. The Report is to be released in national capitals on December 3, 1957.⁸⁵ One copy of the draft report and the principal conference documents are being sent under separate cover. Copies of the report will be forwarded to Colombo Plan countries by the Canadian Delegation to the ICSC, Saigon.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SEATTLE COLOMBO PLAN CONFERENCE

I attach for your approval a memorandum of instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming meeting of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee. The purpose of the memorandum is to summarize in convenient form the more detailed conclusions set out in a series of commentary articles.†⁸⁶

The instructions cover not only subjects included in the formal agenda for the meeting but also a number of issues that may be raised either in the context of the meeting or in informal discussions with other delegations.

Many of these issues are less substantial than they are sensitive, stemming as they do from the nature of the Colombo Plan as an association between donor and recipient countries from different areas (i.e. the admission of potential new members, the appointment of a Director of the Colombo Plan Bureau, and the venue of the next Consultative Committee meeting). The only issue affecting Canada's programme directly arises from the decisions taken by Ministers last month concerning the nature of our aid to non-Commonwealth members of the Colombo Plan.⁸⁷ This is the subject of a separate commentary article, a copy of which is also attached.†

The Canadian Delegation to the Colombo Plan Conference should be guided by two general considerations:

(1) The Colombo Plan is a co-operative effort to improve the well-being of South and South-east Asia. The main effort is being put forward by the countries of that region themselves. It is not desirable, therefore, for the countries outside the region who contribute to this co-operative economic effort to describe themselves as “donor” countries and to speak of others as “recipients.” It also follows that any initiatives put forward in the Colombo Plan context should have broad backing from the major Asian delegations.

(2) It would be undesirable to make any reference to the fact that one of the reasons for Canada participating in the Colombo Plan is our wish to help counter the threat of Communist subversion. A number of important members of the Plan, such as India and Indonesia, are avowedly neutral in this struggle, and it has, therefore, become an almost unwritten rule at meetings of the Consultative Committee that no reference is made to this issue. Moreover, the extent to which rising standards of living consequent upon economic development hinder or help Communist efforts in these countries has never been clearly determined.

Item 1 of the Agenda — Speeches by Leaders of Delegations

Depending on the order of business agreed upon by Ministers, it is possible that leaders of delegations will address the Conference twice. The opening speech would normally be the major one; observations on the special theme selected for this year’s Conference, “Regional Impact of National Development Programmes; Experience and Problems,” may either be part of it or may have to be made the subject of a separate speech. Speeches by Ministers representing donor countries invariably incorporate some record of the contributions made by the country concerned over the preceding year, coupled with some reference to the prospects and scope of further contributions to be made in the year to come. This portion of the Minister’s speech at Seattle might with advantage be expanded to include some reference to the very important developments that have taken place this year in the general realm of economic assistance to under-developed countries, notably the results of the Montreal Conference, the decisions taken at New Delhi⁸⁸ and the creation of the new Special Fund by a resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Thought is being given to developing two themes in the context of the opening speech. One of these would revolve around the mutual benefit which both donor and recipient countries derive from the operation of the Colombo Plan. The second theme would relate to the impact on the South and Southeast Asian region as a whole of national development

The International Monetary Fund held its annual meeting in New Delhi in 1958 and member nations resolved to increase their contributions to the Fund. See Document 175.

programmes in the area. This is a matter of interest to several member countries and has been placed on the agenda as a separate item. Other themes may emerge in the course of the preliminary discussions at the official level. Canadian officials attending these meetings should take on the responsibility of preparing final drafts for one or two speeches, as the case may be.

Item 2 of the Agenda — Presentation of the Draft of the Annual Report

The Canadian Delegation should seek to ensure that the report is as objective and analytical in tone as possible.

Item 3 of the Agenda — Regional Impact of National Development Programmes; Experience and Problems

This is a theme which might be developed in the Canadian speech to the Conference. The fact is that resources available for economic development are limited and this suggests the desirability of using such resources as are available to maximum advantage. So far many countries in South and Southeast Asia have evolved development programmes largely in the context of their own national economies. There may be a case, therefore, for having a look at the development of the region as a whole to see whether there are instances where closer co-operation between countries in their national planning would serve the interests of some overall economy in the commitment of resources for economic development. Indeed, some aspects of this problem are already under consideration in ECAFE.

Item 4 of the Agenda — Technical Assistance; Report of the Sub-Committee on Technical Assistance

As far as Canada is concerned, the Technical Co-operation scheme is operating reasonably well, principles and procedures are basically satisfactory and generally understood, and no major changes are contemplated. We are, of course, prepared to accommodate, as far as possible, minor procedural changes generally agreed by other participants in the Technical Assistance Programme.

It seems likely that funds will be available over the next year or two to finance our Technical Co-operation Programme on the current scale, and probably to provide for some modest expansion. While avoiding commitments, the Delegation can, therefore, feel reasonably free in encouraging representatives of other countries to put forward sound, practicable requests for technical assistance from Canada.

Item 5 of the Agenda — Colombo Plan Information Unit; Report of the Sub-Committee on Information

We are satisfied with the work of the Colombo Plan Information Unit as reflected in its 1957-58 report. We are also prepared to endorse the conclusions and recommendations agreed upon at the Conference of Information Officers which was held in Singapore from September 9-12 to review Colombo Plan publicity. These recommendations are set out in the attached report of the Conference† and will be presented to the Seattle Consultative Committee meeting for approval.

Item 6 of the Agenda — Arrangements Relating to the Next Meeting

Malaya has indicated its intention of issuing an invitation to hold the 1959 Colombo Plan Conference in Kuala Lumpur. It seems likely that Indonesia also will make a bid for the Conference. There are substantial reasons for supporting both Indonesia and Malaya and either country would appear to be suitable. The Delegation should not take the initiative in discussions on this matter (particularly as the 1959 host probably will be a recipient country) and in the final analysis, the Canadian Delegation should fall in line with the wishes of the majority of the Asian nations.

Item 7 of the Agenda — Other Business

There may be a number of topics raised at the meetings or brought up informally between delegations. A list of such possible topics is set out below, with brief indications as to what attitude the Canadian Delegation should adopt:

(i) Canadian Capital Aid Programmes for 1958-59. The 1958-59 capital aid programmes have not as yet been agreed upon. Two memoranda, dealing with Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries respectively, are included† in this briefing; they describe the progress which has been made to date in working out programmes for each country, and suggest the line which should be adopted by the Delegation in informal conversations at Seattle.

(ii) Scholarship Programme in India, Pakistan and Ceylon. In the light of developments that have taken place at the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, it would seem desirable to delay taking any further action on the scheme which Canada had earlier proposed to India, Pakistan and Ceylon until such time as the broader Commonwealth programme has been established. Although it is perhaps too early to say definitely, there appears to be no reason why it should not incorporate some of the features we had envisaged in the more limited scheme for India, Pakistan and Ceylon. These views may be used in any discussions you may have with members of other delegations.

(iii) Asian Nuclear Centre. The United States have informed us that their Delegation does not intend to raise this matter at the Seattle meeting. Notes have been prepared and are attached‡ for your information.

(iv) Asian Development Fund. Japan proposed last year the establishment of a $700 million Southeast Asian development [fund] intended to harness substantial amounts of United States, and possibly Canadian, foreign aid to a Japanese programme for assisting Southeast Asian countries. In order to keep the idea alive, a modified plan may be proposed by Japan this year. These Japanese proposals are clearly not the type of proposals which Canada could support and, in response to any inquiries, the Delegation should hold out no hope of Canadian participation.

(v) Mekong River Project. If your views are sought on possible Canadian participation in the Mekong survey, you should indicate that we expect to receive shortly the final report of the Canadian expert who visited the Mekong Basin during the summer and that his report will be given careful consideration. You should be careful to avoid giving the impression that Canada is committed to participate in any phase of this project.

(vi) Colombo Plan Bureau Director. This question is likely to come up for discussion during the Conference, although elections for the new Director will be held by the Council only at the beginning of 1959. In informal discussions, you should oppose the nomination of a Japanese Director, for the reasons given in the attached memorandum,† unless there is a fairly strong move on the part of the Asian delegations for such an election. If the Asians were to argue that the Directorship should be open to nominations on the basis of merit, regardless of recipient or donor status, we should accept a suitable candidate put forward by them.

(vii) Possible New Western European Members. If the question of the accession of Germany, France, the Netherlands or Italy to the Colombo Plan were to be discussed at Seattle, the Delegation should point out that enlargement of the Colombo Plan membership by accession of members outside the area has traditionally been regarded as a matter for the Asian members themselves to decide. Would-be members might discuss the subject first directly with the Asians. We would welcome the accession of any of these countries to the Plan if they secured the unanimous support of the Asian members, and if their membership held out the prospect of additional resources becoming available for economic development in the area. We would not consider it appropriate for us, however, to take the initiative in proposing new members nor to solicit support for them from the Asians.

(viii) In the event that the Soviet Union were to apply for membership in the Colombo Plan or seek any other form of association with the Plan, the Delegation should sound out the views of other member countries at Seattle (in particular the views of delegations representing the Asian countries) and seek further instructions from Ottawa.

(ix) Possible Membership of Afghanistan. On balance, we would welcome the entry of Afghanistan into the Colombo Plan. Because of our traditional attitude concerning the accession of new Asian members and because of the limit to a potential contribution by Canada to Afghanistan under the Colombo Plan, the Delegation should, however, refrain from playing a leading part in discussions of this matter.

(x) Possible Membership of Korea. If the question of Korean membership should arise, the attitude of the Canadian Delegation should be one of reserve. Its official attitude should be that it will be happy to accept the decision of the Asian recipient participants in the Plan. If its informal opinions are sought by other member countries, however, the Delegation might point out some of the drawbacks outlined in the attached brief,[†] while making it plain that it is lobbying neither for nor against Korean participation.

Extrait du rapport de la dixième réunion du Comité consultatif du Plan de Colombo à Seattle, 10-13 novembre 1958

Extract from Report on Tenth Meeting of Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan, Seattle, November 10-13, 1958

The tenth meeting of the Consultative Committee on Economic Development in South and Southeast Asia was held at Seattle, Washington, from November 10 to 13, 1958. It was attended by Ministerial representatives of the eighteen member countries and three dependent territories, as well as by observers from the United Nations Technical Assistance Board, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, and the Colombo Plan Bureau. The Canadian representative was Mr. Sidney Smith, Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. In accordance with the normal procedure at these Colombo Plan annual conferences, the Consultative Committee devoted most of its time and attention to a consideration of its Annual Report, which had been drafted at a preparatory meeting of officials from October 20 to November 7.⁸⁹ This provided an opportunity for judging the progress in economic development and assessing the tasks ahead. The Consultative Committee also considered matters relating to technical assistance and information activities under the Colombo Plan. In a departure from the normal procedure, it devoted one session to the discussion of a special topic, the regional impact of national development programmes. All the discussions of the Committee were conducted in the informal and friendly atmosphere and with the avoidance of sharp controversy which have become characteristic of Colombo Plan meetings.

3. This was the first Colombo Plan conference to be held in the United States. Perhaps the chief political interest of the conference was in whether the United States government would seek to take advantage of this fact to associate its own substantial aid programmes in South and Southeast Asia more closely with the consultative and advisory procedures of the Colombo Plan. The impression of most delegations was that there was a distinct trend in this direction, and that the flexibility and informality of Colombo Plan procedures, as well as the political advantages of such association in many countries of the area, were inclining the United States to take a more active interest in the Colombo Plan than it had taken in the past. This impression was no doubt largely based on the presence of President Eisenhower at the inaugural session of the Consultative Committee and on the statements made by him⁹⁰ and by Mr. Dulles,⁹¹ who acted as chairman; but it seemed to be borne out by the active and purposeful part played by the United States official delegation, as well as by the efforts which were made to publicize the conference in a manner calculated to appeal to the Congress and to public opinion in the United States.

4. Strong national positions are not generally adopted during the drafting and consideration of the Annual Report. A marked difference of approach was apparent at the officials' meeting in Seattle, however, between the United States delegation, which sought to emphasize in the report the forward movement of economic development as a whole, and the Asian (particularly the Indian) delegates, who wished to draw attention to the serious difficulties encountered by many countries of the region during the period under review. These differences of emphasis were again evident in the Consultative Committee's discussion of commodity problems and financing, although the five-point programme outlined by President Eisenhower in his inaugural speech was generally welcomed by the Asian representatives.

5. In looking to the tasks ahead, the Annual Report placed emphasis on an increase in agricultural output, flexibility in planning, the development of technical and managerial skills, internal financial stability, the continued need for external financial assistance from both public and private sources, greater efforts to promote export earnings, and the encouragement of private initiative in the countries of the region.

6. There had been some expectation before the conference that the question of accession by Germany, France, the Netherlands and Italy might be discussed at Seattle. This question did not arise, however, nor was there any discussion of possible Soviet or Korean applications for membership. The chairman was able to announce that all member governments had agreed to a representative of Afghanistan attending the meetings of the Consultative Committee as an observer. An invitation was sent and accepted, but no Afghan representative appeared.

7. The Consultative Committee agreed that, as a result of improvements in the quality of national contributions to the Annual Report, the length of the preparatory meeting of officials could in future be reduced from three weeks to two weeks. It agreed to hold the next conference in Indonesia in 1959.

⁹¹ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXIX, No. 1014, December 1, 1958, pp. 857-858.

8. Mr. Dulles was chairman of the Consultative Committee and presided over all its sessions. The leader of the United States officials delegation, Mr. Charles W. Adair (Director, Office of International Financial and Development Affairs, Department of State) was an able and tactful chairman of the preparatory meeting of officials. As host government, the United States also provided secretarial and technical services for the conference.

9. The balance of this report reviews the work of the conference in more detail under the following heads:

The Annual Report	paras. 10-31
Technical Assistance	32-40
Information Activities	41-43
Regional Impact of National Programmes	44-48
Organization and Working Arrangements	49-69

Appended to the report are the texts of Mr. Smith's speech in reply to President Eisenhower's inaugural address (annex A),[†] of his main speech on consideration of the Annual Report (annex B),⁹² and of the communiqué issued at the close of the conference by the Consultative Committee (annex C).[†]

THE ANNUAL REPORT

10. The focal point for discussions at the Colombo Plan conferences, both in the ministerial meetings and in the preparatory meetings of officials, is the Annual Report of the Consultative Committee. The drafting and consideration of this report provide ample opportunities for an informal and frank exchange of views about the course of economic development in South and Southeast Asia, the progress made and the difficulties encountered during the year, and the directions in which effort needs to be intensified. Fuller advantage is taken of these opportunities than might be suggested by a text which, in its final form, must carry the assent of all eighteen member countries.

Drafting of the Annual Report

(a) Preliminary Working Groups

11. The Preliminary Working Groups met for one week before the full Meeting of Officials, in order to undertake a first revision of the country chapters submitted to the conference by governments. Each group revises the chapters of its own members. Again this year there was some difficulty owing to tardy submission of chapters. Canada was represented on Group B. Other members of this group were Ceylon (which, with Nepal, was not represented at this stage of the conference), Indonesia, Japan, Malaya and Vietnam. The group went through its work more easily and rapidly than last year. This improvement was possible because the addition of Malaya to Group B strengthened it considerably and because the submissions were of better quality.

12. In reporting to the Officials Meeting on the Preliminary Working Groups, the Secretary General of the conference noted that as the country chapters improve in quality there is correspondingly less need to provide for the initial review and editing of the original submissions.

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 11, Nos. 1-2, January-February 1959, pp. 20-23.

(b) Formal Presentation of Chapters

13. Each delegation then formally presents its chapter, as revised by the Preliminary Working Groups, to the plenary Officials Meeting. This is a time-consuming exercise — it took one day and a half — and not a very useful one. The Business Committee considered an Australian proposal to do away with these formal presentations entirely, but the Indian and several other Asian delegates opposed this on the ground that the speeches were useful for drawing attention to points which each government might wish to emphasize in its chapter. As a compromise, the Business Committee agreed that leaders of delegations, when presenting their country chapters to the Officials Meeting, would be restricted to five minutes. Under this ruling the formal presentations should not take more than one half day.

(c) Country Chapter Working Groups

14. These are groups, each representing three countries, set up to review the country chapters as revised by the Preliminary Working Groups. Our delegation was a member of the Indian and Laotian Chapter Groups and chaired the Singapore, Sarawak and North Borneo Chapter Group. The Laotian chapter required extensive revisions; the other two were approved by the working groups almost in the form in which they were presented.

(d) Drafting Committee

15. Most of the work of the Officials Meeting is done in the Drafting Committee. It has ten members. In 1958 these included five from the region (Burma, Ceylon, India, Indonesia and Pakistan) and five from outside the region (Australia, Canada, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States). It considers the country chapters submitted to it by the Country Chapter Working Groups and the chapter on technical assistance submitted by the Subcommittee on Technical Assistance; it is also responsible for the preparation of Chapter I (“Review of Economic Progress”) and Chapter II (“The Task Ahead”). Chapters which have been approved by this committee are almost never questioned in the plenary Officials Meeting.

16. We have an informal agreement with Australia and New Zealand under which each country foregoes representation on the Drafting Committee every third year. Last year we were not on the committee, and this year New Zealand was not a member. The purpose of this arrangements is to limit the membership of the committee to ten and at the same time to ensure a reasonable balance between countries of the region and countries outside the region.

17. Under this arrangement, the United States, the United Kingdom and Japan have permanent seats on the Drafting Committee. This is reasonable enough in the case of the United States and probably the United Kingdom, but not in the case of Japan. The Canadian contribution under the Colombo Plan is greater than Japan’s. At Seattle the Japanese delegate on the Drafting Committee (and on the Preliminary Working Group) contributed little, if anything, to the work of the conference. Our delegation therefore recommends that Japan should be brought in under the arrangement that we have with Australia and New Zealand. There is good reason to believe that both these countries would be in favour of such an arrangement.

18. The Drafting Committee was presided over by the leader of the Indian delegation to the Meeting of Officials, Mr. N.C. Sen Gupta, (Joint Secretary, Economic Affairs Department, Finance Ministry). Mr. Sen Gupta was an efficient and genial chairman. He was inclined at times to impose his way on the Committee, but did so in such a manner as to retain the goodwill of the committee and to preserve an atmosphere of friendliness and informality throughout the meetings.

19. The United States delegation was the most active one on the committee. It had definite objectives: these appeared to be to understate in the Annual Report the substantial difficulties encountered by the countries of South and Southeast Asia during the period under review, while stressing the achievements, and to emphasize wherever possible the importance of encouraging private investment, both domestic and foreign. Two reasons appeared to underlie this approach. In the first place, the conference was being held in the United States. Consequently the Report would be more widely publicized than in the past. It was important, therefore, from the point of view of continued Congressional and public support of United States aid programmes, that the Report should show that encouraging progress had been made and that government policies in the region were soundly based. Secondly, there was doubtless a realization that the admission of major difficulties would almost inevitably lead to demands for more aid and hence further pressures on the United States Treasury.

20. The United States approach, particularly as put forward during the early meetings of the committee, encountered considerable resistance, notably from the chairman and the Indian delegate. The committee did not gloss over the difficulties to quite the extent the United States delegation might have liked; but on the whole the United States view prevailed, and both the Report and the communiqué reflect this fact.

21. In general, however, the Drafting Committee is not one where strong national positions are taken and held. The countries of the region, with the exception of India and to some extent Pakistan, did not as a rule take an active part in the proceedings except when their own chapters were being considered. Among the countries outside the region, Japan contributed virtually nothing; the United Kingdom changed its representation on the committee too often to make a consistently effective contribution; the Australians and ourselves were able at times to help in bridging some of the differences arising between the United States delegation and the Asians.

(e) Working Groups on Chapters I and II

22. The first two chapters of the Annual Report, which review progress in the region as a whole and indicate the tasks ahead, were, as usual, the most contentious and difficult to draft. Their preparation was assigned by the Drafting Committee to two working groups of its own members. The chairman of these two working groups were the leaders of the United Kingdom delegation and of our delegation. Observers from the International Bank and ECAFE made a major contribution to the drafting of Chapter I. The Drafting Committee spent more time on it than on any other chapter. The working group on Chapter II included delegates from Ceylon, Indonesia and the United States as well as from Canada. It was clear that the United States delegation had come to the conference with definite instructions as to what this chapter should contain.

Discussion of the Report in the Consultative Committee

23. In his inaugural address to the Consultative Committee, President Eisenhower said that the United States expected "to take increasing advantage of your cooperative activities in shaping its own financing of development programmes" in the area. He then referred to five measures which the United States would press energetically. Three of these measures — for the expansion of international trade, the increase of technical assistance, and the provision of public loans on normal bankable terms — were, he said, already charted or underway. Two vital measures, however, remained to be carried out: the stimulation of private investment and the expansion of development financing on flexible terms of repayment. These themes of trade, training and capital dominated the discussion of the Annual Report which followed. There were also references to the desirability of a degree of regional coordination.

(a) Trade Problems

24. The very heavy trade deficits incurred in 1957-58 by most countries of the region were mentioned in many speeches. The Asian representatives were particularly anxious to draw attention to the adverse shift in their terms of trade, which, as the Report noted, was as much as 9 percent in 1957 for the region as a whole. Several speakers pointed out that a shift of this magnitude neutralizes the value of practically all the aid given by outside countries. There were repeated references to the desirability of limiting fluctuations in the prices of particular primary commodities.

25. A number of the Asians welcomed the agreement of Commonwealth countries at the Montreal conference — to which Mr. Smith and several other speakers referred — to take part in whatever commodity-by-commodity examination of price fluctuations might be required. They also expressed appreciation of President Eisenhower's cautious assurance that, where special difficulties might arise with respect to particular primary commodities, the United States was prepared to join in a discussion of such problems "to see whether or not a solution can promptly be found." But there was no disposition by anyone to minimize the difficulties of securing effective international action; and the Malayan representative, with the experience of the International Tin Agreement in mind, referred pointedly to the vital importance of cooperation by the major consuming countries.

(b) Technical Training

26. The emphasis in the Report on the urgency of giving greater attention to the development of technical and managerial skills was reflected in several speeches. The Burmese representative, U Win, laid particular stress on the importance of bringing in foreign teachers to train nationals at national or regional centres of training, a method he considered superior to either bringing in experts or sending out trainees. Prince Wan of Thailand said that hitherto technical assistance had been for the public sector; in his view insufficient attention had been given by recipient and donor countries alike to this problem in the private sector.

(c) External Finance

27. It was, however, the problems of investment and external capital to which most speakers devoted their principal attention. The Report had noted the increasingly important role of public investment in almost all countries of the region, the heavy budgetary deficits owing mainly to the acceleration of development programmes, and the high level of deficit financing despite considerably enlarged foreign assistance. It recognized that some of the difficulties of the past year were outside the control of the countries concerned, but commented that the adverse effects would probably have been mitigated further had some of the countries reacted more rapidly and more strongly to adjust their monetary, fiscal and development policies to the changed circumstances.

28. While not contesting the validity of this comment, almost all the Asian representatives laid great stress on the long-term need for additional capital. About 80 percent of all development expenditures in the region was being financed internally, they said, but without a substantial inflow of investable resources it would be virtually impossible for many of the countries to reach a rate of development which would be more or less self-sustaining. The Ceylonese representative said that grants had made and were making a useful contribution, but that what was urgently needed now was for the more developed countries to facilitate the raising of loans in their money markets, to provide for government-to-government loans on comparatively easy terms, and to encourage and induce private capital in their countries to flow into the underdeveloped ones.

29. The Asian representatives generally welcomed both the steps which had been taken towards augmenting the resources of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund and the hope expressed by President Eisenhower that additional funds would be provided by the United States Congress for the Development Loan Fund. Dr. Soebandrio of Indonesia stressed the particular importance of ability to borrow on flexible terms of repayment, and expressed the hope that this initiative by the United States would be strengthened by other countries. Mr. Mohammed Ali of Pakistan said that the faculty of repaying loans from the Development Loan Fund in local currency was of great value to all countries in the area. Mr. Vu Van Mau of Vietnam said that there was no doubt that the formula of long-term loans repayable in local currency met with unanimous approval. The Ceylonese representative and several others also referred to the United States suggestion that an International Development Association be established as an affiliate of the International Bank. No specific reference was made, even by the Japanese representative, to the proposal for an Asian development fund.

30. The Report had noted that the net inflow of foreign private investment to the countries of the region continued to be relatively small, but that it could resume or take on a more important role if afforded greater opportunities and attracted in sufficient volume. Mr. Dillon's statement that the United States government was intensifying its search for ways and means by which it could facilitate and encourage United States private investment in the less developed areas was welcomed by several speakers. For the United Kingdom, Commander Noble said that his country was once more in a better position to lend; it was not yet able, however, to commit its resources too far in advance. He added that sound financial standards should be applied in making capital available, and that private capital could only be expected to flow at an adequate rate in a context of relative stability. Dr. Soebandrio and several other Asian representatives referred to the inducements to foreign investors offered by their governments. Dr. Soebandrio said that this had not been easy in Indonesia since suspicion was rampant that foreign investment meant a drain on the national wealth.

(d) Regional Considerations

31. U Win of Burma was the first to speak of the need for regional coordination of national plans in order to avoid dislocations. The Ceylonese representative spoke of each country reappraising its own development plans and programmes in the light of others as outlined at meetings of the Consultative Committee. Dr. Sinco of the Philippines referred to the urgency of "planning on somewhat regional lines." Prince Wan of Thailand drew attention to the regional aspect of many projects and the need for coordinating these projects. Mr. Vu Van Mau of Vietnam spoke of concerted action by the countries of the region "to harmonize production plans and stabilize the prices of raw materials," and said that no international institution was better qualified for this task than the Colombo Plan. Other representatives reserved their comments about regional coordination for the special item on this subject (paras. 40-44).

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

32. The Technical Cooperation Scheme received more emphasis and attention at the Seattle meetings than was apparently usual at earlier Colombo Plan conferences. Evidence of this is the importance attached to training in several country chapters of the Annual Report, in the chapter on "The Task Ahead" and in the remarks of Ministers and official delegates. This emphasis was also reflected in the discussions of the Subcommittee on Technical Assistance, which were apparently broader and more active than in previous years.

Subcommittee on Technical Assistance

33. The Subcommittee on Technical Assistance, set up by the Officials Meeting, included delegates from ten countries. Four were from countries of the Colombo Plan region (Cambodia, India, Indonesia and Pakistan) and six were from outside countries (Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States). It prepared a draft chapter on technical assistance for the Annual Report, reviewed the working of the Technical Cooperation Scheme and submitted a report on the working of the Scheme and related matters.

34. The chairman of the subcommittee (Mr. Shepherd of New Zealand) tried with considerable success to make the discussions as broad and useful as possible. All delegations were invited to send observers to its meetings; almost all took advantage of this invitation and participated fully in the discussions. Since most countries had included in their delegations one or more members with direct experience and interest in the operations of the Technical Cooperation Scheme, an informed exchange of views was possible which probably had considerably more value for the persons participating than the report and chapter prepared by the subcommittee would, in themselves, indicate. The value of the discussions was less in restating principles and policies than in explaining and resolving practical administrative and programming difficulties in the operation of the Scheme.

35. It appeared to be the feeling of most delegations that this way of dealing with technical assistance at the annual meetings was more satisfactory than the earlier and more limited discussions, and it seems likely that the procedure adopted in 1958 will be followed in future years. The subcommittee did indeed agree to recommend that, in view of the interest in technical assistance at this year's meetings and the useful contributions made by those delegates who were nominally observers, future discussions should be in a committee of the whole. This recommendation was not accepted by the Business Committee for reasons indicated in paragraphs 68-69.

Report of the Subcommittee

36. No wide divergence of opinion on the principles of the Scheme were apparent in the subcommittee's discussions. Canadian views on the matters discussed were on the whole consistent with those held by the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australian representatives, and were acceptable to the Asian members. As a result, the conclusions and recommendations of the subcommittee reflected our delegation's instructions and should not give rise to any serious difficulties in practice.

37. The report recommended inter alia:

(a) that member governments requiring technical assistance might periodically submit information about their requirements to the Council for Technical Cooperation, for circulation to other governments, without the Council attempting however to draw up a balance sheet of needs and availabilities;

(b) that the trend toward providing more training facilities within the area should be encouraged, and that the survey of such facilities should be completed as soon as possible;

(c) that member governments might initiate requests, whenever appropriate and practicable, for the services of experts already in the area, or for their trainees to observe the operation of projects in other member countries.

Discussions in the Consultative Committee

38. Seven Ministerial representatives spoke in the Consultative Committee on the technical assistance item. Four were representatives of countries outside the region (Australia, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and the United States); and each of these took the opportunity to announce a substantial increase in his country's technical assistance programme. Mr. Dillon, speaking for the United States, also said that his government intended to apply in the very near future for full membership in the Council for Technical Cooperation. Our delegation had thought of announcing the medical book scheme, but information that it had been approved by Cabinet arrived too late to be used.

39. Only three representatives of countries in the area (Malaya, Pakistan and Cambodia) participated in the discussion on this item. Mr. Mohammed Ali of Pakistan stressed the need for greater coordination of the various agencies' programmes and suggested that a regional centre for advanced studies in irrigation and flood control would be of general benefit. Another specific suggestion (made by Mr. Jumabhoy of Singapore on an earlier item) was that member countries might consider giving some training in the field of tourism.

40. All those who spoke on technical assistance — including the Director of the Colombo Plan Bureau and the Executive Chairman of the United Nations Technical Assistance Board, who spoke as observers — endorsed the view expressed in the Annual Report that the need for technical assistance in the region is greater than ever. The Consultative Committee concluded its discussion of the subject by noting the report of the Subcommittee on Technical Assistance and commending its recommendations to member governments and to the Council for Technical Cooperation.

REGIONAL IMPACT OF NATIONAL PROGRAMMES

44. This special item appeared on the agenda as a result of a suggestion at the 1957 meeting by the representative of Burma. Some aspects of regional coordination had been discussed at the annual working parties on economic development and planning, convened by ECAFE since 1955. These were reviewed by ECAFE in a paper circulated to the Consultative Committee. It concluded that the general tendency appeared to be to favour coordination in respect of specific projects or programmes rather than to embark on more ambitious regional coordination of plans; so far there had not even been discussion about coordination with a view to ensuring that industries are selected, priorities determined and targets fixed in the most economical manner, although coordination in these wider fields could, in the opinion of the ECAFE secretariat, be profitable.

45. Mr. Michael Hoffman (Director, Economic Development Institute, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development), who had been invited by the host government to introduce the discussion, took a more critical view of the possibilities. He thought that economic relationships within a region become less predictable and more complicated as a result of national economic programming, and that it would be futile, probably undesirable and even dangerous to attempt regional planning of industry, for example. However, he agreed with ECAFE that there was likely to be increasing advantage for the countries of the area in undertaking regional programmes of trade liberalization. Within certain limited fields, moreover, (such as the control of waterways, technical education, scientific research and health), the creation and growth of regional institutions was, in his opinion, desirable and probably inevitable. At a later stage, he thought it possible that regional financial institutions could serve a useful purpose.

46. Seven Ministerial representatives spoke on this item. (As indicates in para. 31, a number had referred to regional problems when discussing the Annual Report). U Win of Burma said that the countries of the region must plan together to avoid dislocations and waste; he did not agree that regional planning was more difficult or complex than national planning. Mr. Bhagat of India, on the other hand, doubted whether discussion of these problems was realistic at the present tempo of development, or whether the Consultative Committee was the most suitable forum. The Vietnamese representative was in favour of proceeding by stages, beginning with the exchange of information about national development plans, commodity markets, and the national resources in particular products. For Pakistan, Mr. Mohammed Ali emphasized the basic diversity of the region, and said that coordinated planning must necessarily be restricted in scope and limited in its possibilities. The Singapore representative thought that something along the lines of the European common market should be attempted in South and Southeast Asia.

47. Only two representatives of countries outside the region participated in this discussion. Mr. Nash of New Zealand referred to the "magnificent concept" of the Mekong river scheme as an example of what could be done through regional cooperation. Mr. Dillon, for the United States, stressed the importance of avoiding regional restrictions on trade, and said that great mutual benefit could result from step by step cooperation in specific fields.

48. Finally, Mr. C.V. Narasimhan, Executive Secretary of ECAFE, said that the thinking of some member governments had advanced to the point where it might be possible to develop common markets in the region for particular products. There was also some reason to hope that greater exchange of information, in ECAFE and in the Colombo Plan, would enable governments to take the industrialization plans of other countries into account when deciding on their own plans.

OTHER BUSINESS

Site of 1959 Conference

70. When the conference opened in Seattle, both Indonesia and Malaya had made it known that they were willing to act as hosts for the 1959 conference. The Indonesian delegation lost no time in emphasizing to other delegations the importance which its government attached to this matter. The Malaysians, on the other hand, apparently concluded within two or three days, from such informal discussions as they had or as the United Kingdom delegation had on their behalf, that their offer was perhaps premature and had less support than the Indonesian offer. The general expectation that Malaya would withdraw its bid was not confirmed, however, until the second last day of the conference, when the Malayan delegate told the Business Committee that, in view of Indonesia's intention to offer Indonesia as the site, and the fact that Indonesia had indicated its desires in this respect two years ago, Malaya had decided not to extend an offer from the next conference. The formal offer was then made in and accepted by the Consultative Committee. No attempt was made to reach an understanding, either formal or informal, about the site for 1961, when the host will again be a country of the region.

The Communiqué

71. The Business Committee assigned the drafting of the communiqué to a subcommittee of its members, comprising delegates from five countries of the region (Ceylon, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and Vietnam) and four outside countries (Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States). In its final form the communiqué represented a compromise between the desire of the United States delegation for a short and "not too gloomy" text, frankly directed at Congressional and public opinion in the United States, and the Indian insistence that it must not fail to recognize that the year had been a difficult one for the region as a whole.

72. After some further discussion on whether to append Chapter I as well as Chapter II of the Annual Report to the communiqué, the subcommittee agreed to an Indian suggestion that the first eleven paragraphs of Chapter I (essentially a summary of the review) be appended. In doing so it agreed also, at the insistence of the United States delegation, to a last-minute revision of the first paragraph of the Report in order to correct what they regarded as its excessively gloomy character. The compromise text was then approved by the Consultative Committee without substantive change.

Director of the Colombo Plan Bureau

73. There was some informal discussion between delegations on the question of a successor to Mr. R.H. Wade as Director of the Colombo Plan Bureau. The Japanese had been expected to press a claim, but the Japanese delegation gave no indication of any special interest in the matter. It was the impression of our delegation that the election of a Japanese to the post of Director at this time would be unwelcome to a number of delegations, including some Asians; certainly there was no indication of a strong move on the part of the Asian delegation for such an election. In these circumstances it appeared that the United Kingdom might consider nominating one of its nationals, thus starting the cycle anew. Our delegation, in accordance with its instructions, indicated informally that we would probably be prepared to agree to any good and generally acceptable candidate, regardless of origin, but that we thought it was still too soon for a Japanese to take over the Directorship.

Previous Proposals

74. No direct reference was made during the conference by any delegation to the earlier Japanese proposal for an Asian Development Fund. When speaking on the Annual Report, Mr. Ikeda said only that his government had recently set aside a sum of 5,000 million yen "to be put into such channel as to further promote our economic assistance to those countries."

75. Nothing was said by the United States delegation or by any other delegation about the earlier United States proposal for an Asian nuclear centre. Mr. Dillon and several other speakers referred in a general way to the benefits to be derived from cooperation in scientific research.

76. The Mekong River project was mentioned in several speeches to the Consultative Committee. The Canadian representative did not refer to it publicly. Mr. Narasimhan (Executive Director of ECAFE) expressed to Mr. Smith privately his strong hope that Canada would find it possible to participate. Mr. Smith told him that it was one of a number of possibilities that would be given careful consideration.

Discussions with Other Delegations

77. Mr. Smith had private discussions at Seattle with the Foreign Ministers of Vietnam, Indonesia and Nepal regarding our Colombo Plan programmes and other matters. Members of our delegation had discussions during the Officials Meeting with delegates of Indonesia, Malaya, Vietnam, Burma, North Borneo and Sarawak, Cambodia, Laos, Nepal and Singapore. These discussions were mainly concerned with technical assistance.

THE PURPOSE AND OBJECTIVES OF THE CANADIAN TRADE MISSION TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

The official statement issued in Ottawa on October 4, 1957,⁹³ at the conclusion of the bilateral talks between Canadian and United Kingdom Ministers, records that an expansion in Anglo-Canadian trade is a primary object of policy of both Governments.

It was agreed that one way to encourage the desired expansion was to arrange a visit of a high-level trade delegation from Canada to the United Kingdom with the purpose of stimulating purchases, from United Kingdom sources, of goods now imported from non-Commonwealth countries.

Accordingly, the Canadian Trade Mission to the United Kingdom has been organized.

Its immediate objectives are to provide a favourable climate, and to seek specific opportunities, for the expansion of British exports to Canada so that Canada may take full advantage of sources of supply in the United Kingdom and British exporters may participate increasingly in Canada's growing import requirements.

In particular, the aims are:

1. To demonstrate to Canadian industrialists, importers and others, the great ability and potentialities of the United Kingdom to meet to a greater extent the import requirements of Canada;
2. To make British industrialists more aware of Canada's growing and diversified market, and to encourage them to sell more in Canada and to provide the services which are so necessary in the Canadian market;

⁹³ Voir/See Document 361.

3. To develop further friendly and close cooperation between British and Canadian businessmen and government representatives.⁹⁴

CANADIAN MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM; REPORT BY THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

1. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported on the Canadian mission to the United Kingdom and stated that it was an unqualified success. There was now no reason to believe that the purposes of the mission could not be entirely fulfilled. The reception by the people of the British Isles, according to members of the British press, had surpassed anything since World War II, except perhaps a Royal visit. Canada had received the greatest publicity and the best advertising from this mission. So much interest had been created that 700 British firms, other than those which the mission was visiting, had asked for an opportunity to meet the members of the Canadian delegation. Arrangements had been made for ⁹⁴ Entre le 21 novembre et le 18 décembre 1957, le ministre du Commerce, M. Gordon Churchill, et M. James S. Duncan, président de l'Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, ont pris la tête d'une délégation commerciale de 57 personnes au Royaume-Uni. La délégation a visité plus de 100 sociétés individuelles dans l'ensemble du pays, et a tenu de larges consultations avec les gens d'affaires et les hauts fonctionnaires britanniques.

Between November 21 and December 18, 1957, Minister of Trade and Commerce Gordon Churchill and James S. Duncan, Chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, led a 57 person trade delegation to the United Kingdom. The delegation visited more than 100 individual firms located throughout the country and consulted widely with British businessmen and government officials.

members of the delegation to meet representatives of these firms during the last three days in London. Misunderstandings relating to delivery and sales programmes had been ironed out. The British had been found open to suggestions. They were now in a position to enter into the export market with vigour. The President of the Board of Trade, Sir David Eccles, and Sir William Rootes of the Dollar Exports Council were responsible for the excellent preparations made in the United Kingdom for the mission.

He had stressed that the two main purposes of the mission were — one, to assess the productivity, efficiency, and progress of the British industry and two, to inform the British businessmen of the great opportunities awaiting them in Canada. The British had assured the Canadian delegation that their advertising and sales promotion would be improved. Since British goods were now less in short supply than they were in recent years, they would be in a better position to meet delivery dates.

The Minister said that, whereas diversion of 15 per cent of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom might have appeared impossible at times, he now felt more confident that this could ultimately be achieved. The mission in the United Kingdom had been more than a trade mission and should influence the relations between Great Britain and Canada and also strengthen the Commonwealth.

He had been able to visit a number of industrial plants and had been impressed by the progress which had been made in British industry. It appeared that a full recovery had been achieved in England from the war damage and from the difficulties of the early post war years. Factories were in full production, were efficient and well managed; considerable amount of automation had been introduced. Members of the Canadian mission had been most impressed by the housekeeping of the British factories.

He thought that the mission might also result in the establishment of British branch plants in Canada and would also create more immigration for Canada. When the mission arrived in Glasgow, they were met at the station by a pipe-band and 500 people who had not been invited but who knew about the mission through the publicity given it by the press, radio and television. He would propose to make a brief statement that afternoon in the House along the above lines.

2. The Cabinet noted with satisfaction the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom and his intention to make a brief statement about it to the House of Commons that day.⁹⁵

There is no question but that the Trade Mission to the United Kingdom was a tremendous success. From a purely trade point of view, it created the interest amongst British producers in the Canadian market which in the past has been so sadly lacking. The extensive favourable press coverage in both the United Kingdom and Canada is evidence of this as are the hundreds of enquiries from British and Canadian firms which have followed. The meeting which is to be held on January 20th between members of the Mission and the principal British Trade Commissioners in Canada, coupled with the issuance of the Mission's report, will be the culminating stage of this successful project.

It is evident from dispatches from London that, in certain sections at least, further action is expected by the Canadian Government as a follow-up to the Trade Mission. It is important therefore that careful consideration be given to the next stage in order to avoid anything resembling an anti-climax.

In this there seem to be several important considerations. In the first place, it is essential that the Canadian Government undertake some measure of follow-up to the work that has already been done. There are two distinct fields of action open. The Canadian Government, if it desired, could set up a sales promotion organization in Canada for the purpose of promoting the export and sale of British products to Canada and the processing of numerous enquiries which will arise as a direct result of the Mission's visit to the United Kingdom. There would be three dangers in following such an approach. In the first place, by long custom and practice, responsibility for promoting British sales in this country rests on the very extensive Trade Commissioner service which the British Government maintains in Canada — some 24 officers. It would be undesirable for a Canadian Government agency to assume the responsibilities which properly belong to this organization. In the same way, it would be inconceivable for the British Government to set up an organization in the United Kingdom to take over from our own Trade Commissioners in that country responsibility for the promotion and sale of Canadian products in the United Kingdom.

Perhaps even more important would be the reaction of other foreign governments such as Germany, France, Japan, etc., each of which is an important market for Canadian products and, in turn, an important supplier of goods and materials to Canada. While these countries would not be expected to object to a limited amount of discrimination in favour of the United Kingdom in the Canadian market, they certainly would view with concern any steps taken by the Canadian Government in the direct promotion of British sales in Canada which would adversely affect their own business. In other words, if the Canadian Government established a branch for the promotion of imports from the United Kingdom, then other countries which have equally important balance of trade problems with Canada would properly expect the same measure of assistance for their own products on the Canadian market.

Finally, with the levelling off in the Canadian economy, there is real danger that Canadian manufacturers and producers, who are at the same time large tax payers, would be certain to resent Canadian money being used to create more competition from imports on their own market and would demand similar efforts on their behalf to sell in the Canadian market. There has already been an indication of criticism in this respect and it is feared that this would grow appreciably if the Canadian Government entered into the active promotion of British imports into Canada.

It is essential, therefore, that a good deal of care be exercised in deciding what further should be done to ensure a satisfactory follow-up of the work of the Trade Mission and, at the same time, avoiding any situation which might prove embarrassing to the Government.

Within this framework, there are several steps which could be usefully taken which would be helpful to British trade and which would be unlikely to cause any resentment either by Canadian manufacturers or by our other good customers abroad:

(1) Meeting between the Trade Mission Members and the British Trade Commissioners. This has already been decided on for January 20th and it will provide an opportunity for the presentation of the Mission's report and for additional desirable publicity in Canada and the United Kingdom.

(2) The Dollar Sterling Board in Toronto. This body should be revitalized by adding to it some members of the Trade Mission to the United Kingdom; by arranging regular and more frequent meetings with adequate publicity; and, most important, by the appointment of a press or publicity relations officer with adequate Canadian experience. The main function of the Board as well as of the British Trade Centre should be the creation and maintenance of favourable trade publicity rather than the processing of individual trade enquiries. For this purpose, an outstanding public relations officer of Canadian experience is essential.

(3) The Magazine "Canadian Trends". This should be revived and enlivened as it could serve a useful purpose in the field of British publicity.

(4) Local Advisory Committees. In each centre where a British Trade Commissioner is located in Canada, a local advisory committee should be set up comprising such members of the Trade Mission who live in that area. It would be the purpose of this advisory committee to keep alive the interest in British trade and assist the British Trade Commissioner by their sound business advice.

(5) "Board of Trade Journal". As many British manufacturers and exporters seem to be unaware of the existence of a British Trade Commissioner service in Canada, the Board of Trade Journal should be brightened up and made more attractive so that it would be read far more widely by British industrialists. This is important because the Journal should carry reports from British Trade Commissioners abroad as well as the names of all British trade representatives overseas. To brighten the Journal, it should have a more attractive format, use better paper, and perhaps an attractive cover.

(6) Positive Action by the Canadian Government. The following matters, each of which has its importance in British trade with Canada, should be enquired into:

- (a) tourist exemptions
- (b) Standards Association procedures
- (c) dumping
- (d) samples
- (e) government purchase⁹⁶
- (f) D.B.S. statistics.

Memoranda on each of these items are being prepared and will be sent to you as quickly as possible. Most of these items require a good deal of investigation by departments other than Trade and Commerce. Steps should be taken to have a Cabinet directive issued with respect to each.

This has been discussed with Mr. Sharp, the Deputy Minister, and he concurs.

Note pour le ministre du Commerce
Memorandum for Minister of Trade and Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, June 16, 1958

Following the successful visits of the Dollar Exports Council delegation to Canada and the Canadian Trade Mission to the United Kingdom, the question arises as to what sort of continuing endeavour there should be?

It is generally agreed that it would be a pity if the great efforts put forward up to now should simply "fizzle out"; yet, there is a danger of that happening.

The general public would seem to have accepted the need for a greater diversification of imports in order to realize a better balance of trade (see editorial attached),[†] and many Canadians assume that the government, as a matter of policy, is actively promoting such a change. During the recent DEC delegation tour of Canada, suggestions were made as to how the government might realize its objective. These varied from a public relations campaign of personal contacts with businessmen to direct action by the use of discriminatory tariffs. I.H. Macdonald, the general manager of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Proprietors Association, advocated a large scale government advertising campaign to acquaint people with the serious situation arising from the imbalance of trade.

While the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned primarily with exports, it is, as Hon. J.M. Macdonnell told the DEC delegation, "conscious of the importance to Canada's trade of assisting the U.K. to supply a larger share of our import requirements." Just after the war, an import division was set up and performed a valuable function in helping Canadian industry find sources of supply abroad. The department's 1947 annual report says that the division received 3,251 inquiries, and "through its efforts 963 Canadian firms were able to enter into direct negotiation with foreign suppliers." The division provided information and liaison for Canadian industry and tried to solve some of the difficult post-war problems of shortages and government restrictions. It compiled and kept up to date a list of Canadian importers and a handbook of commercial information.

In 1948, the Dollar Exports Board (fore-runner of the DEC) was formed in the United Kingdom, and shortly afterwards James Duncan was persuaded to head the Dollar Sterling Trade Board which the Government of that time sponsored and actively supported. An Ottawa office for the DSTB, manned by a government official as secretary-liaison officer was opened. It is generally acknowledged that this body did an effective job during the period of direct government aid.

Within time, the British established a strong trade commissioner service in Canada, and the work of the import division declined and was finally suspended. The DSTB as the Dollar Sterling Trade Council remained in existence but was a Council largely in name.

The situation has changed considerably since then, and it could be said that a NEW PHASE IN CANADA'S TRADE RELATIONS BEGAN LAST YEAR. The government then expressed grave concern over the serious trade deficit with the United States which had reached the proportions of a billion dollars a year, and announced its intention of righting this. The Canadian Trade Mission to the United Kingdom was the first step in a long range program to bring about a greater diversification of imports.

At the Mission's final conference in Ottawa on January 21 and 22 of this year, an attempt was made to revitalize the DSTC. However, a government offer to aid this body and provide it with an office and a secretariat, as had been done in 1948, was turned down.

There is general regret now, among those concerned with increasing Anglo-Canadian trade, that this move failed. Sir William Rootes would have much preferred to see the Canadian Government closely associated with DSTC as the British Government is with the DEC. The Dollar Sterling Trade Council has been reorganized and has acquired a full time secretary, but the question is whether it will be truly effective without government collaboration. The Regional Committees have been formed and acted as hosts to the DEC delegation; they are new and their contribution will depend on the guidance and leadership they receive.

There would seem to be no doubt that the DSTC represents the best means for continuing the efforts to increase Anglo-Canadian trade — that is the opinion of almost everyone concerned.

A return to the direct government action of the immediate post-war period might produce quicker results. Perhaps an import division would not be necessary, but an assistant director for imports in the Commodity division might be appointed. Officially, the functions of such an officer would be non-discriminatory — he would be concerned with imports from anywhere — but actually the main emphasis of his work would be on Anglo-Canadian trade. However, any suggestion that the government was encouraging imports, even though these imports were not competing against goods produced in Canada, might not be wise politically at a time of unemployment and recession.

On the other hand, a liaison officer, who would work closely with the DSTC and serve as a link between it and the government, should not arouse any criticism. Such a person would be concerned with the whole broad subject of imports and would keep the Minister informed on any trends and developments. There would be a public relations side to this job as he would be expected to advise on any statements or information furthering the government's efforts to bring about a better balance of trade. He would keep in touch with the large purchasing agents in the country, but his main task would be to cooperate with the DSTC. He should try to obtain from this body a monthly report on its activities. Another duty would be liaison with the DEC in the U.K. (for instance, he might well find out from the DEC how many of the hundreds of firms whose representatives saw the Canadian Trade Mission have followed up these interviews with action).

While the DSTC may insist on its independence, it must work closely with the government as it is engaged in the same endeavour. In any case, the government is going to be held responsible for any failure on the part of the DSTC to produce results. No tangible signs of increased imports from the U.K. could eventually prove to be embarrassing.

It has been said that "for an effective balance against the weight of the U.S. we need an enlarged counterweight across the Atlantic." An attempt is being made to bring this about with the efforts to increase trade with the United Kingdom. These are surely of the greatest importance and cannot be allowed to lapse.⁹⁷

U.K.-U.S.A. CONVERSATIONS

The United Kingdom Prime Minister, Foreign Secretary and the officials who accompanied them to Washington visited Ottawa from the evening of October 24 to the afternoon of October 26. The following is an account of a meeting held of U.K. and Canadian Prime Ministers, Ministers, and senior officials on October 26. Essentially the meeting was occupied with a description of the Washington conversations.

2. Macmillan began with a general account of the conditions governing the Washington talks. They were not intended to pursue details or reach specific agreements. The object was to arrive at a general understanding between the two governments on the central issue. That issue was to coordinate the strength of western countries as security against the growing Russian strength, particularly in the scientific field; and to counteract Soviet influence in uncommitted countries.

⁹⁷ Aucune réponse officielle à ce mémoire n'a été trouvée. Le Dollar Sterling Trade Council a reçu 7 000 $ du ministère du Commerce pour couvrir quelques-uns des frais encourus à la suite de la mission du Dollar Export Council au Canada, au mois de mai 1958, et de la publication du rapport de la mission commerciale par le Dollar Sterling Trade Council. À l'exception de ce paiement, toutefois, il semble que les hauts fonctionnaires du ministère du Commerce, sous la pression de nombreux gens d'affaires canadiens, aient refusé de soutenir des initiatives gouvernementales additionnelles visant à promouvoir et à faciliter l'importation de produits britanniques.

No official response to this memorandum was located. The Dollar Sterling Trade Council received $7,000 from the Department of Trade and Commerce to cover some of the costs incurred as a result of the Dollar Export Council mission to Canada in May 1958 and the publication of the trade mission report by the Dollar Sterling Trade Council. With the exception of this payment, however, it appears that Trade and Commerce officials, under pressure from many Canadian businesses, refused to support additional government initiatives designed to promote and facilitate the import of British products.

3. The time was opportune for such a conversation. There had been a degree of American complacency and consequent unreadiness for full cooperation; but this atmosphere had been changed materially by recent Russian successes. American dependence on their own resources had been accompanied by rigidity on secrecy. Such a view had never been shared by the President but at Washington — in contrast with his attitude at Bermuda⁹⁸ — Dulles threw his powerful influence toward a changed relationship.

4. Opportunity existed therefore to carry forward the process begun at Bermuda and to produce results more tangible than at that meeting.

5. The mood now was one of inter-dependence, not construed as exclusive bilateral relations between the two countries but broadened to include partners in NATO, the Bagdad Treaty, etc. Close if private cooperation between London and Washington could only be helpful, but the policies contemplated in general terms were to apply to wider groupings.

6. Such was the psychological base for action. The essential character of the meeting is reflected in the communiqué issued in Washington on October 24.⁹⁹

7. We shall now describe the substance of the meeting under the main headings:

(a) Cooperation in Scientific Research and Development. Macmillan said that the United States now accepted in full the principle of cooperation between allies in relation to the combination and sharing of resources in the scientific field. (Communiqué, Section II, paragraphs 1, 2 and 3). No attempt had been made to work out arrangements in detail before the Congress had approved the executive action proposed. Macmillan stated that what they had sought to avoid was a situation in which only a few privileged members of the Alliance would possess atomic weapons. Such a situation would have a damaging effect on the Alliance. The importance of the December NATO Council Meeting was stressed and the desirability of Heads of Government being present.¹⁰⁰ No detailed schemes had been examined for the purpose of extending scientific cooperation to the production and development fields.

(b) The "Fourth Power" Problem. Macmillan reported a change in the U.S.A.'s approach toward the availability to Allies of atomic weapons. Not only has Russia broken the U.S.A. monopoly but scientific advances necessitated a reassessment of earlier concepts. Nuclear weapons are no longer only for massive destruction; a wide range of nuclear weapons has become available and these increasingly resemble conventional ones. The best guarantee that these weapons will remain in responsible hands lies in some plan of joint partnership. Selwyn Lloyd thought that the French would welcome any proposal which would avoid their having to produce nuclear weapons. He added that the U.S.A. are still opposed to the development of nuclear weapons by fourth countries.

(c) United Kingdom Cooperation with Europe. Arising out of a question by a Canadian Minister on possible misunderstanding of a sentence in paragraph 8 of the communiqué (the one concerning the relation of the European free trade area and the European Common Market), the U.K. Ministers made a positive statement. They denied any validity in the rumours that they were weakening in their decision to exclude agriculture from the proposed free trade area agreement. Following on this remark they spoke of the impossible position which would arise for the United Kingdom if an "industrial union" of the Six Powers (with possible additions) were not accompanied by a wider free trade area. The U.K. Government could not go on maintaining four divisions on the continent if at the same time France and Germany, in concert with their partners, were seeking to destroy U.K. industry. Under such a situation NATO would collapse and a great victory would be achieved by Russia.

(d) Middle East. Reference to the Middle East was incidental. The U.K. Ministers reported that they and the Americans discounted the possibility of unilateral action on the part of Turkey without consultation.

(e) Nuclear Tests. It was learned that the policy aspects of nuclear tests had not been examined in Washington but experts had had some discussion on possible joint facilities. Macmillan pointed out to us that a wider exchange of information would make it unnecessary for the U.K., for example, to continue its tests if the data sought was made available from U.S.A. tests.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN, JUNE 11-12-13

The discussion which we had with Mr. Macmillan last week was most informative. During our conversations Mr. Macmillan reviewed the problems of present international importance in considerable detail.

Mr. Macmillan told us that the President and Mr. Dulles were endeavouring to be as helpful as possible to their friends in the Commonwealth. However, Mr. Macmillan felt that the leadership which President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles would give the free world might not be as great as could be hoped for. At present, the United States Administration was particularly concerned with the amendments to the McMahon Act, which involves the exchange of information about atomic developments, the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and the passing of the Mutual Aid Bill.

We were told by Mr. Macmillan that the amendments to the McMahon Act were very important to the United Kingdom since they would authorize the United States to provide the United Kingdom with information about certain aspects of atomic developments of considerable value to the United Kingdom. With this information the United Kingdom would be in a better position to consider the question of the suspension of nuclear tests possibly early next year. Mr. Macmillan related this problem to the technical discussions which will commence at Geneva in July on atomic inspection and on the detection of nuclear explosions.

Mr. Macmillan mentioned that the United Kingdom wanted the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Germany to be equipped with atomic weapons. Among other reasons was the fact that the burden of defense expenditures should be shared more equally among Western Europeans.

Mr. Macmillan said that the United States had agreed to the British view that no atomic weapons now held by the Strategic Air Command in the United Kingdom would be used without the explicit permission of the United Kingdom Government. This provision also applied to American I.R.B.M.'s eventually to be located in the United Kingdom. However, the United States had no veto on the activities of the United Kingdom Bomber Command equipped with atomic warheads of United Kingdom manufacture.

Mr. Macmillan had found President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles still lukewarm about a summit conference. The Americans were very reluctant to expose President Eisenhower to the type of rugged negotiation which could be expected at a summit conference with Khrushchev and the other Russian leaders. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom told us that the British public favoured a summit conference. It was considered essential in view of the heavy burden of taxation for defence, apart from any other important considerations, that all possible avenues of approach for reaching some understanding with the U.S.S.R. must be explored. Mr. Macmillan was, however, not very hopeful about the progress towards understanding with the U.S.S.R. which might result from a summit meeting. However, he was confident that the U.S.S.R. did not want to start a general war in the next few years, although he thought that the cold war on the economic and political fronts would continue for a long time to come, and the U.S.S.R. would be pressing the West in economic and political warfare amongst the uncommitted nations.

Mr. Dulles, we were informed, placed great emphasis on the technical discussions which are to take place at Geneva next month. If any progress were made there this would facilitate a favourable decision by the United States.

We gathered from Mr. Macmillan that he felt that a summit conference would also be desirable from the aspect of forestalling any intentions which General de Gaulle might have for bilateral discussions with the Soviet Union. If General de Gaulle were to do this, there might be some risk of disruption to some extent of the relations of France with its NATO partners. Mr. Macmillan has so far not been able to fathom what the French under General de Gaulle plan to do. Mr. Macmillan therefore felt it would be much better to have a summit meeting with General de Gaulle in attendance, rather than giving the General a chance to move ahead on his own.

Developments in the Middle East in recent weeks were also discussed. Mr. Macmillan told us that the guarantee of the United States and the United Kingdom to the present Government of Lebanon still stood. He said that Mr. Dulles had been very firm when they had discussed it in Washington. Intervention would only be made at the request of the Lebanese Government and in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. Mr. Macmillan said that the presence of "the watch-dog commission" in Lebanon would certainly have a bearing on what the United States and the United Kingdom did. However, the success of the Commission depended on the adequacy of its deployment of observers in the mountainous and inhospitable frontier terrain with Syria. Mr. Macmillan thought that if the United States had not proposed the guarantee to Lebanon and if the United Kingdom had not consented to it, that country might have fallen to Nasser. Public knowledge of the intention of the United States and the United Kingdom had probably impressed the Soviet Government which in turn had impressed Nasser and its wish to avoid a major international crisis. As a result of Khrushchev's advice Nasser may have sought through the United Nations ways of reducing his country's intervention in Lebanon without loss of face in the area. Mr. Macmillan thought that Nasser would probably renew his pressure on Lebanon later on, unless, of course, he was prevented from doing so by the United Nations Commission.

The Suez Canal was discussed briefly. We understood that the United Kingdom thinks that the United Arab Republic is being cooperative in the negotiations about surcharges for shipping in the Suez Canal as it wishes to obtain a loan for further development.

Mr. Macmillan told us that the United Kingdom intended to press forward with its plans of promoting local self-government for the Turkish and Greek communities in Cyprus.¹⁰¹ Foreign affairs and national defence would, however, remain as a prerogative of the United Kingdom. Mr. Macmillan showed his understanding of the feelings of the Turks.

In the discussion of economic matters, Mr. Macmillan expressed disquiet about the slackening in the rate of economic growth that had been experienced in many parts of the free world. This was particularly disturbing in view of the continuance of rapid rates of economic growth within the Communist bloc. During his visit to Washington, Mr. Macmillan had discussed with the United States authorities the probable course of the present recession there and, as a result of the conversations he had had on this subject, he was fearful that the Administration might not take such early and substantial action as the situation seemed to require. In the United Kingdom, too, there had been some slackening in the rate of economic growth. The brakes had been applied deliberately in order to curb inflationary tendencies and to safeguard the reserves. Before long, however, Mr. Macmillan thought that circumstances would permit a further expansion of the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Macmillan was confident that the Commonwealth Conference would be a notable success. But if success were to be achieved, the temptation of using the Conference as an opportunity for intensifying restrictions against non-Commonwealth countries must be resisted. It was important that whatever was done at the Montreal Conference should facilitate, and not hinder, economic cooperation with the United States. It must also be borne in mind that the meetings in New Delhi of the International Bank and of the International Monetary Fund would follow hard on the heels of the meetings in Montreal, and careful attention must be paid to making the two sets of discussions mesh as well as possible.

There was at present throughout the world a relative scarcity of working capital with which international trade could be financed. The United States authorities now recognized this problem and were moving with increasing firmness to try to meet it. Mr. Macmillan had been given to understand in Washington that at the meetings in New Delhi the United States in all probability would be willing to participate in some appropriate initiative to increase world liquidity. For the moment, however, while Congress was still in session, there was some nervousness about any possible public discussion of these issues. It must also be recognized that neither Congress nor the Administration would find much appeal in a financial operation designed merely to rescue sterling.

No doubt the Montreal Conference would be distinguished by some agreements on matters which the public might consider to be of only technical interest. In addition, ¹⁰¹ Pour un compte rendu élargi des discussions avec le premier ministre Macmillan sur la question de Chypre, voir le document 272.

For an expanded account of the talks with Prime Minister Macmillan on the Cyprus question, see Document 272.

Mr. Macmillan hoped that the Conference would result in some achievement which would impress ordinary people throughout the Commonwealth as justifying it and sealing it with success. The proposal that, in Mr. Macmillan's opinion, was most likely to meet this requirement was the proposal for a Commonwealth bank. He was aware that it could be argued that a Commonwealth bank was unlikely to mobilize additional savings, either within the Commonwealth or from other sources, and that in practice the existence of such a Commonwealth institution might lead to a reduction of lending to Commonwealth countries by the International Bank. But none of these possible objections to the proposal should be regarded as insuperable. In particular, he was not convinced that a Commonwealth bank would fail to secure for investment purposes additional savings within the Commonwealth. The Indian maharajahs and the merchants in Hong Kong had savings which were not now making any contribution towards the economic development of Commonwealth countries. To mobilize these savings, it might also be necessary to mobilize a Commonwealth mystique. It was on grounds such as these that Mr. Macmillan advanced his case for a Commonwealth bank.

In reply to questioning, Mr. Macmillan agreed that a dismantling of discriminatory import restrictions would be in the United Kingdom's own interest and, indeed, that it was the policy of the United Kingdom Government to move towards complete non-discrimination as quickly as possible. However, he did not think that it would be possible to make a decisive announcement on this subject at the Commonwealth Conference. More precisely, he stated that he did not think the United Kingdom would be in a position by September to announce either the complete removal of discrimination or its disappearance over a short period of time. Mr. Macmillan gave a number of reasons for this view. In the first place, it would be necessary before taking decisive action of that kind to see more clearly what the probable course of the United States recession would be. Secondly, it would be necessary to await the outcome of the meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank in New Delhi. Finally, he argued that a further element of uncertainty was introduced into the situation by the possibility — perhaps it should even be called the probability — that there would be a financial crisis in France within the next two or three months.

When it was suggested that a wide initiative might profitably be taken by the forthcoming Commonwealth Conference in an attempt to make commodity prices more stable, Mr. Macmillan, without dealing with that possibility directly, expressed the personal view that it was more important to increase effective demand for primary products than to maintain their price. In this field the United States had a unique responsibility since any efforts that it might make to expand the purchasing power of its consumers would not be hampered by a shortage of exchange reserves. When it was suggested that it would have a good affect on the world trade in wheat if the United Kingdom were to rejoin the International Wheat Agreement, Mr. Macmillan said that the United Kingdom Government had already taken a decision to be represented at the conference that would be meeting this fall to consider the re-negotiation of the Agreement. The United Kingdom would examine with an open mind any new agreement that might be formulated.

In the course of his remarks about the current negotiations for a European free trade area, Mr. Macmillan gave an assurance that the United Kingdom would continue to pay close attention to the interests of Canadian agricultural producers in the United Kingdom market and would ensure that their interests were not adversely affected. If it proved necessary to make some concessions concerning agriculture, they would have to be borne by domestic producers in the United Kingdom. What would be involved, in other words, would be horticultural products; and if easier access to the United Kingdom market for such products were granted to continental suppliers, those who would suffer would be United Kingdom growers of fruits and vegetables. No agreement would be entered into by the United Kingdom which would worsen in any way the competitive position of Canada's agricultural exports in the United Kingdom market. In the negotiations, the United Kingdom would also bear in mind that in the past Canada had shipped to the United Kingdom a wider range of agricultural commodities than at present, including particularly cheese and pork products, and that it was the wish of the Canadian Government that Canadian producers should have an opportunity in future to export such commodities to the British market, if the prices of such Canadian commodities could be made competitive.

Referring to the recent report of the Canadian Tariff Board on wool fabrics, Mr. Macmillan inquired whether, in the view of the Canadian Government, it was necessary to follow the Board's recommendation and increase the preferential rates of duty. After listening to a description of the difficulties which the Canadian woollen industry had been experiencing and to a statement stressing the modest nature of the tariff increases that had been proposed, Mr. Macmillan seemed to acquiesce, although reluctantly, in the proposed increases in the preferential rates of duty.

NEW ZEALAND DAIRY PRODUCTS

I should be grateful if you would prepare a memorandum on this subject for the Minister to send to the Prime Minister.

2. You will be aware that the Minister of Agriculture, in a letter to Mr. Smith of the 6th of August,† rejected out-of-hand a proposal that Canada give New Zealand a very modest quota of cheese imports, and Mr. Fleming subsequently reported at a meeting of the Cabinet Committee on the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference that neither he nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce felt in a position to pursue this matter further with Mr. Harkness. I have been very disturbed by the possibility that the mild, but obviously seriously considered, representations received from the New Zealand Government on this matter may be met with a flat negative. The consequences of such action on our relations with New Zealand, in my opinion, are bound to be serious. Of more immediate importance is the probable consequence for the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. If we are unable to give the New Zealanders any satisfaction whatsoever on the issues they have raised with us, not only is it impossible that we should expect any trade concessions from them, but they may well be in such a mood as to take a very disruptive stand at the Conference.

3. This is a matter of such importance that I think it must be brought to the Prime Minister's attention. In many ways, it would be best, I think, if Mr. Fleming were to raise it with the Prime Minister; but we know from Mr. Plumptre that such action is, unfortunately, out of the question. I doubt, however, whether our Minister need feel under the same inhibition. We in this Department also have the advantage of having brought the New Zealand representations to the attention of the Prime Minister and of having been informed that he wishes to be kept up-to-date on this matter (see the note on Mr. Smith's memorandum to him of the 30th of June†). I have discussed with Mr. Plumptre the possibility of Mr. Smith re-opening with the Prime Minister the decision taken by Mr. Harkness, and Mr. Plumptre very much hopes that it may be possible for our Minister to do so. Accordingly, as I stated at the outset, I should be glad if you would prepare for me a memorandum for Mr. Smith to send to Mr. Diefenbaker. It should be in strong terms and should describe fairly bluntly the consequences as we see them for our relations with New Zealand and for the success of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, if Mr. Harkness's present attitude is allowed to prevail. I think it would not be amiss either to refer in the memorandum to Mr. Diefenbaker's forthcoming Commonwealth tour and to the representations he will certainly receive in Wellington on this subject, if the Canadian Government continues to exclude from the Canadian market New Zealand's principal export commodities.¹⁰²

CANADIAN RESTRICTIONS AGAINST NEW ZEALAND DAIRY PRODUCTS

You will recall the representations that have been made to us in this matter by New Zealand in June and July. As a result of these representations you and your colleagues agreed that officials should look into the position to see what it might be possible for Canada to do for New Zealand within the framework of our existing price support policy for dairy products.

2. The paper prepared by officials was discussed briefly at a meeting of the Cabinet Committee on the Commonwealth Conference and it was agreed that Mr. Fleming would have a word with Mr. Harkness with respect to the next step in this matter. Mr. Harkness subsequently wrote to you on August 6† to confirm what he had earlier told Mr. Fleming, ¹⁰² Le 28 mai 1957, le Cabinet a ordonné que le fromage cheddar soit placé sur la liste de marchandises d'importation contrôlées jusqu'au 31 mai 1958. Le 29 mai 1958, les contrôles des importations sur le fromage cheddar ont été prolongés pour une autre année.

On May 28, 1957, Cabinet directed that cheddar cheese be placed on the import control list until May 31, 1958. On May 29, 1958, the import controls on cheddar cheese were extended for an additional year.

namely that there was no room at the present time for doing anything to meet the New Zealand representations. Mr. Harkness' letter is attached for your information.

3. As you will appreciate, our evident intransigence in this matter has serious implications for our relations with New Zealand and for the outcome of the forthcoming Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference. In these circumstances, I thought that you would wish to avail yourself of the Prime Minister's expressed desire to be kept up to date on this matter (as noted on the attached memorandum of June 30†) to put the issues frankly before him. A memorandum in this sense is attached for your signature.¹⁰³

4. From the discussions we have had in the Cabinet Committee in recent weeks about the Canadian position in relation to New Zealand I am reasonably confident that the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance would be glad to see this Department take the initiative in bringing this matter to the Prime Minister's attention.

CANADIAN RESTRICTIONS AGAINST NEW ZEALAND DAIRY PRODUCTS

I am very much concerned about the consequences of our position in this matter on Canadian relations with New Zealand. I am particularly concerned about the extent to which the New Zealand grievance against us could vitiate the atmosphere at the forthcoming Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference.

You will recall that we have now had formal representations from New Zealand on two occasions. I brought these representations to your attention at the time and you indicated that this was a matter on which you wished to be kept up to date. I am now sending you this further memorandum because of the position that has been taken by the Minister of Agriculture that nothing at all can be done to meet the New Zealand representations.

I regard the New Zealand case against us as one of substance. They are in serious balance of payments difficulties. They depend on dairy products for just under a quarter of their total export earnings. They have a record of having co-operated with us over a very long period of time in voluntarily limiting shipments of dairy products to the Canadian market. (In the case of butter, this co-operation goes back to 1938.) They are at present in a position where they are being denied access to the Canadian market for virtually all their dairy products. They are not asking us for the impossible; as they themselves put it to us, what they want is "an indication of Canada's willingness to recognize New Zealand's claim to a share in the Canadian market."

¹⁰³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Signed & sent Aug. 24 [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

There is a closely related matter about which New Zealand has voiced its concern. They argue that apart from the direct effect which the Canadian price support system has of closing the Canadian market to imports, it is also bound to lead to the accumulation of surpluses which must in due course be sold abroad at concessional prices. They claim that our disposals of surplus dairy products in certain markets have had the effect of displacing their normal commercial sales and have helped to depress still further world market prices for these commodities.

This is clearly one of the major issues in our relations with New Zealand. It is also an issue which New Zealand will wish the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference to consider in its wider implications for the interests of primary producing countries. If New Zealand is given no satisfaction whatsoever on this issue we are not only in no position to expect trade concessions from them but they may well be in such a mood as to take a very disruptive stand at the Conference. I would also expect that strong representations would be made to you about our restrictions when you visit Wellington on your proposed tour of Commonwealth countries.

There are, of course, wider issues involved in our position in this matter. It is a matter involving commitments we have assumed under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and specifically under our bilateral trade agreement with New Zealand. It is also a matter involving — admittedly to a lesser extent — the interests of Australia which has just liberalized its restrictions on trade with the dollar area, at least partly at our urging. It is perhaps not a matter of coincidence that both New Zealand and Australia have shown a disposition to buy their way into whatever agricultural arrangements may emerge from the current European initiatives directed towards freer trade. You will appreciate our interest in ensuring that a firm line is taken by third countries collectively in holding the Europeans to their existing commitments in respect of trade in agricultural products. Finally, it seems to me that our position in this matter of dairy products as it affects New Zealand is one which, if adopted with similar rigour by the United States, would be bound to do Canadian interests very serious injury.

At Mont Tremblant last autumn we assured New Zealand (and Australia) that Canada did not intend to continue its restrictions on dairy products indefinitely and that we would hope in the coming months to find common ground for agreement at the Montreal Conference. It was partly on these assurances that the New Zealand representations to us in June and July of this year were based. At the request of the Ministers primarily concerned officials here prepared a paper setting out the nature and scope of the problem and possible courses of action that could be taken by us to meet the New Zealand position. Mr. Harkness has now indicated, however, that "under the situation which exists at the present time any imports of New Zealand cheese or skim milk powder are out of the question."

In the light of the background which I have tried to outline, I would be seriously concerned if the case the New Zealand Government has put to us were met with a flat negative. New Zealand has traditionally been a firm supporter of the Commonwealth link. They are at present in a very difficult foreign exchange position to the point where they have sought and obtained a loan from the Government of Australia. I think that they have a right to expect from other Commonwealth countries a more forthcoming attitude than we have so far adopted towards them, particularly in the light of the initiative we have taken to put new meaning into the Commonwealth concept in economic terms.

(c) Imports of New Zealand Cheese

15. The Minister of Agriculture said the government was holding some 12 million pounds of surplus cheddar cheese from the 1957 and 1958 production. It was thought that some 6 million pounds could be sold to the United Kingdom. Ontario wanted the government to sell the cheese back to the co-operatives at around a 4 cents a pound loss so they could export it. If this were taken, all the surplus cheese might be got out of the way.

An embargo on imports of cheddar cheese had been imposed as part of the Canadian price support programme, but not on specialty cheese. New Zealand was putting on increasing pressure to have some of their cheddar cheese admitted to Canada. Any imports would add to the present surplus, and be politically bad. However, a scheme had been worked out which allowed imports of 1,124,000 pounds of cheddar cheese and at the same time reduced the import of all cheese by nearly a million pounds. This could be done by putting into effect an import quota system on both cheddar and specialty cheeses. This would be similar to action taken by the United States. The basis recommended was a quota related to the pattern of trades during the previous five years; the total cheddar quota would be 1,250,000 pounds of which New Zealand would be allocated 1,124,000 pounds and the U.S.A. 123,000, being 100 per cent of the five-year average imports (1953-1957). For specialty cheese the total quota would be 7,209,000 pounds, equal to the average of imports in the last five years, but a reduction from imports of the last two years.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 3, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 254-58).†

16. Mr. Harkness pointed out that the import of specialty cheeses would be down by close to one million pounds. The action could be defended on this ground. There had been substantial increases in these imports in the last three years and the countries that would suffer from the reduction would be Denmark, Italy, Switzerland, and to some extent the U.S.

17. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There had been increasing pressure from New Zealand. There seemed no possible way for it to increase trade with Canada; in fact there might be curtailment, unless some cheese was let in. Dairy products there represented 40 per cent of the money value of exports and 60 per cent labourwise. Unless something were done, the Commonwealth discussion might be prejudiced. The proposed quotas on specialty cheese, however, would only make trouble in Europe and seriously affect Canada's position under the G.A.T.T. It would be better to authorize the delegation to the Commonwealth Conference to say Canada was prepared to negotiate with New Zealand on a modest import quota and leave the actual amounts for trade talks in later months. The balance of trade with New Zealand was in Canada's favour but the New Zealand financial position was weak and the economy shaky. She was merely protecting her exchange position. Canada should not go out of her way to multiply trade restrictions.

(b) Increasing the cheese surplus would create great difficulties. There was already a clogging up of meat disposal channels by the importation of frozen New Zealand lamb. The quota proposal seemed the only way to reach a compromise.

(c) It would seem that Canada was caught both ways. This was no time to take any firm decision that might imperil the success of the Commonwealth Conference. The best course was to wait and see what developed there.

18. The Cabinet after further discussion, deferred a decision on the various proposals regarding dairy products put forward by the Minister of Agriculture.

RE: COMMONWEALTH TRADE CONFERENCE

I was at the Conference for Mr. Fleming's meeting on Saturday night and had some discussions with him and the various officials following the meeting of the officials from various Commonwealth countries last week. I am going back again this afternoon and will return to see you on Wednesday.

In the meantime you will have noticed the unfortunate story that came out indicating a number of things that Canada was going to propose but exaggerating and dramatizing the "give-aways" so that whatever is finally done is apt to be a disappointment. You will find the story on the front page of Saturday's Journal and I am having a clipping of it attached hereto.^{†104}

The one thing I would suggest you might give some thought to immediately about the Conference, based on what I have heard and on some reflection, is a willingness next Sunday at the Cabinet meeting if it appears expedient, to reverse the decision taken earlier on the admission of some imports of New Zealand dairy produce. I think that New Zealand could well put us in a very embarrassing position indeed at this Conference if it chooses to try to do so. I believe myself that the political dangers of a modest quota for New Zealand dairy products here are probably exaggerated now that we have such a firmly established set of price supports in this field. On the other hand, I would think that some cost to the Treasury in additional stocks of these dairy products would be a reasonable burden to accept as the price of avoiding what could be a serious and very embarrassing crisis over trade policy at this Conference.

I have not spoken to other Ministers about this matter and what I have mentioned here has not been done at the request of any of them, but simply as a result of my sizing up of the situation in my first visit to Montreal.

R.B. B[RYCE]

P.S. In the light of the discussions on Monday and Tuesday, I would only add that New Zealand has in the confidential discussions reiterated its point but rather indicated that it would not be satisfied with a token quota. However, I think some quota would still be helpful to them in their present troubles. There is also another matter relating to this about which I will be speaking to you.

NEW ZEALAND 1959 LICENSING SCHEDULE — EFFECTS ON CANADIAN TRADE

In various communications dating back to last April, I have drawn the Department's attention to New Zealand's economic difficulties. I have also stressed the desirability of Canada exploring ways and means of offering assistance to New Zealand at this time. The New Zealand Minister of Finance, Mr. Nordmeyer, spoke in strong terms at the Montreal Conference about (a) the restrictions which have been placed on the few commodities New Zealand has available for export to Canada and (b) the undesirable practice of dumping surplus agricultural products abroad. The reports on the Montreal Conference which we have received to date do not indicate that Canada held out any hope of assistance, although we have heard rumours that discussions have been proceeding on one or two commodities which, if successful, might be of some assistance to New Zealand's dairy industry. I am sure that our comments, as detailed in our letters under reference, have received due consideration and that all concerned in Ottawa have now had the benefit of a frank exchange of views with the members of the New Zealand Delegation to the Montreal Conference. We should be very grateful to receive any information which the Department may be able to supply on any of the behind-the-scene discussions which have been or are taking place.

2. I have mentioned from time to time that we are in danger of losing a large portion of our $16,000,000 market in New Zealand. (In this connection, please see paragraph 4 of our Letter No. 399 of August 1st, as well as paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 of our Letter No. 434 of August 14 and, finally, paragraph 6 of our Letter No. 568 of October 3, and other letters and enclosures from the Acting Commercial Secretary to the Department of Trade and Commerce.) The general level of imports into New Zealand will be lower in 1959 for balance-of-payment reasons (as predicted in our Letter No. 568 of October 3, 1958) and this will apply to imports from a number of countries. However, I am primarily concerned with seeing that imports of commodities from Canada are not, relatively speaking, lower than those from other countries, owing to discrimination in favour of other countries. I base this possibility on the announcement made on October 7 by the Minister of Customs, Mr. R. Boord, in which he outlined the policy to be following in making import licences available for 1959. I enclose,† for ready reference, the full Schedule of Import Licences, a statement by the Minister of Customs on the Import Licensing Schedule for 1959 and a Customs Department Circular Memorandum 1958/64.

3. In our Letter No. 568 of October 3, 1958, we reported that a certain amount of "dollar liberalization" had been decided upon by the New Zealand Government. This was confirmed by talks which we have had with officials of the Department of External Affairs. They have told us that, in the memorandum sent up to Cabinet concerning the 1959 imports, two points were stressed, namely:

(a) dollar discrimination for other than balance-of-payments and dollar conservation reasons was wrong in principle, and

(b) New Zealand should adopt, as its guiding principle regarding imports, a policy of purchasing goods in the cheapest markets.

This recommendation was endorsed without reservation by the New Zealand Government.

4. It is difficult, however, to see how this principle has been applied in the Schedule of Import Licences for 1959 which was released to the public on October 7. You will note from the attached Schedule that most items have now been placed on a global quota, with the exception of a limited list, designed as "M" items, for which individual licences will be required. While it is true that there are only about 40 main commodity groups included on this "M" list (about 72 individual commodities altogether), the items mentioned constituted about 45% of the total value of Canadian exports to New Zealand in 1957. This could have a disastrous effect upon the level of Canadian exports to New Zealand, if the introductory notes are correct. In this connection paragraphs 2 and 8 of the introductory notes are drawn to your attention. For ease of reference, they are quoted below (with the underlining as contained in the original):

"2. Item other than those designated "M". Licences issued for items not designated "M" are available for the importation of goods from any source.

Items designated "M": Licences issued for items designated "M" are available only for the importation of goods being the produce or manufacture of other than scheduled countries.

"8. In cases where application is made for licences for amounts in excess of the basic allocation (if any) as provided under the Schedule or for licences for goods included in items, applications concerning which are considered individually, the applicant must furnish supporting evidence to establish:

- (1) That the goods are actually required by him for the purpose of his business during the period mentioned; and
- (2) That, in respect of goods to be imported from a scheduled country and designated "M", the goods cannot be obtained from a country other than a scheduled country."

Certainly paragraph 2, which states quite baldly that "licences issued for items designated "M" are available only for the importation of goods being the produce or manufacture of other than scheduled countries" (Canada is a scheduled country), would seem to exclude the total range of goods in the 45% category mentioned above.

5. Nevertheless, in conversations that officers of this mission have had with officials of the Departments of Industries and Commerce, Customs, and External Affairs, it would appear that the situation is not as alarming as it would appear from the terminology of the schedule. External Affairs officials estimate that the overall reduction of imports in 1959 will amount to about 20% across the board and will be applied on a non-discriminatory basis. In other words, although Canada can expect to have a 20% cut in its exports to New Zealand in principle it will be no worse off, relatively speaking, than other suppliers. However, within the general lower level of imports Canada's share could be proportionately greater than it has been. For instance, 50-55% of the value of Canada's exports to New Zealand in 1957 are in the category now placed under global quota. This means that Canada will be competing on an equal basis with other suppliers around the world. However, this concession is more apparent than real since it would appear that those items which are now eligible for a global licence but which did not appear on the dollar list for 1958 are in categories for which the market is limited at any rate or in categories in which Canada is not particularly competitive. (The items on the global list which are important commercially for Canada and are not on the "M" list were on open licensing before.) In addition to this, it must be recognized that many of these global items are entitled to limited allocation. In summary, therefore, only a comparatively small number of relatively minor items would appear to have been opened for bids by Canadian exporters.

6. As for the so-called "M" list, although it is probable that some importers will apply for goods from dollar countries, under the conditions mentioned in paragraph 8 of the introductory notes to the Schedule (quoted above), the whole "M" category lends itself very easily to administrative manipulation. For instance, in the statement by the Minister of Customs on Import Licensing, page 3, he repeats "that items designated "M" will be available only for imports from non-scheduled countries" but then he adds "or from the scheduled countries specifically stated on it." This provision is intended to ensure that licences are not used at the discretion of the importer and provides the Minister with an effective instrument of control. What is disturbing is to note that it is normal practice for the Government to consider favourably an application by an importer to transfer a licence which he may hold on a scheduled country to a non-scheduled source. In this same paragraph, the Minister goes out of his way to remind importers that, as a result of the recent trade agreement, Japan is no longer a scheduled country.

7. This year Canada has had a heavy salmon catch and salmon is one of the imports in which we are particularly interested. On page 3 of the Schedule you will note that, after the item EX.33(3) ... fish, potted and preserved, n.e.i. etc., there is the letter "M". If we take this import licensing schedule as it stands, it means that Canada is precluded from any salmon licences during 1959 unless the Minister should choose to exercise his apparent authority to grant such a licence. As the situation stands at present, there is only one possible interpretation — salmon imports from Japan up to 75% of the base year but none from Canada except at the discretion of the Minister. There are, of course, other items in the schedule marked "M". Although the list is described in the Minister's statement as being "comparatively small," it is strange that so many of the items in the "small number designated "M" are of special interest to Canada and include motor cars, timber, asbestos and newsprint (see items marked with red in booklet). However, from discussions with local officials we have reason to believe that licences will be granted for those items on the "M" list from dollar countries.

8. The Minister also mentions that "at present there are serious obstacles to the entry of some of our products into those markets. We hope that we shall see a progressive reduction or removal of these obstacles to such extent that we shall be able to maintain and even increase the liberalization of dollar imports into New Zealand."

9. The fact that 45% of Canada's exports are in the "M" list almost certainly is not accidental, (although officials in the Department of Industries and Commerce and Customs expressed surprise at this figure when it was pointed out to them by our Acting Commercial Secretary.) There is little doubt that the authorities were selective in choosing the items for the "M" list and that the latter is obviously intended to be a bargaining instrument. External Affairs officials inadvertently acknowledged that this new schedule, as far as Canada is concerned, had been planned with a certain amount of flexibility in mind so that if Canada made some concessions regarding New Zealand dairy exports then Customs Department administrators could make more liberal rulings about applications for imports from Canada under the "M" category. That this "M" list is intended as a bargaining factor is not entirely confidential information as we know of at least one importer who was told at the counter of the Customs Department that imports of these items have been suspended pending knowledge of the results of the Montreal Conference. In other words, as we have often stressed in the last few months, a few minor concessions by the Canadian Government regarding New Zealand's primary products will go a long way in maintaining and even expanding Canada's present market in New Zealand.

10. The possibility of expanding Canadian trade to New Zealand, as mentioned in paragraph 9 above, should not be overlooked. As reported in paragraph 3 above, it now is definite New Zealand Government policy to encourage a measure of "dollar liberalization." It is probable that private importers will shift some of their import orders (for items on the global list) from sterling to dollar countries. In other words, assuming that the general level of Canadian exports to New Zealand will be cut 20% because of general tightening of import restrictions, it is not impossible that, say, 5% of this will be regained by the diversion of trade from non-scheduled to scheduled countries — provided, of course, the governmental administrators are disposed to issue the necessary permits.

11. As far as Canada is concerned, the immediate effect of this so-called dollar liberalization could be felt in the government sector first. Government purchases will be able to reflect immediately the new Government policies of dollar liberalization and buying in the cheapest market. For instance, the New Zealand Railway System is now planning to modernize its transport fleet. This will be a £3,000,000 order and Canada might be able to secure some of this business by exporting railway car chassis to New Zealand as the bases for the car bodies which will be assembled here. As private business firms already have long established contracts with suppliers in sterling countries, it could take about two years for private importers to take advantage of the new dollar liberalization scheme and establish new contacts in dollar countries. That is why this new concept will probably be reflected in the government sector first.

12. In one of our letters to the Department we mentioned that some New Zealand officials had the impression that, because our imports of meat from New Zealand had been increasing, Canada might now consider placing limitations on the importation of meat. If this were to happen it would be the last straw. I may be taking too pessimistic a view of what is likely to happen but, certainly on the basis of information we have to date, the New Zealand authorities seem to have placed themselves in a position to discriminate against key Canadian exports to this country if they should wish to do so.

13. This letter has been prepared with the close co-operation of Mr. J. MacNaught, Acting Commercial Secretary, and a copy of his letter of October 9 on this same subject to the Acting Director, Trade Commissioner Service, is attached.†

CANADA-NEW ZEALAND TRADE

We greatly appreciated your letter under reference and your earlier letters on this important subject.

2. At the end of your first paragraph you expressed an interest in having some information on behind-the-scene discussions with the New Zealand Delegation to the Montreal Conference last September. You might find the following brief summary helpful.

3. As you know, the Office of the High Commissioner for New Zealand kept up pretty steady pressure on us for some time before the Conference with a view to obtaining some concessions on cheese and other dairy products. I think we have sent to you copies of all the relevant papers, on this subject and specifically the letter to our Minister from Mr. T.P. Davin, dated July 14,† as well as a later one dated September 5† from Mr. Fese Shanahan, the High Commissioner. Both of these were considered very carefully by Ministers, and before the replies were sent the Prime Minister was consulted.

4. Unfortunately, as you probably know, we were unexpectedly overtaken by events on the eve of the Conference itself when on September 10 the Chairman of the Agricultural Price Stabilization Board offered Board holdings of 1958 cheese to the trade for domestic distribution at 36¢ a pound, F.O.D. warehouse. The Board also advised purchasers that it was prepared to allow a rebate of 7¢ a pound on exports to the United Kingdom. There was a leak to the press from the Ontario Board which made it impossible to keep the plans confidential. As a result, the news of this offer became public that afternoon and our Delegation in Montreal only just had time to forewarn the New Zealand Representatives. The Chairman of the Board had just been instructed to take urgent action to get the Ontario Board out of its difficulties which involved large holdings that were being offered for sale in the United Kingdom.

5. As far as this Department is aware there have been no consultations since the Conference ended on this subject with the New Zealand Representatives here.

AID TO THE WEST INDIES

On January 27 Cabinet approved an interim technical assistance programme for the West Indies under which immediate requests by the federal authorities in the West Indies for Canadian experts and for training programmes in Canada were to be met. Consideration was to be given to more long-term measures of Canadian assistance to the federation. With the authority of the Ministers concerned, officials had held informal discussions with representatives of the West Indies to review their needs and resources and to explore ways in which Canada could be of assistance.

2. From these discussions two conclusions emerged: first, that any Canadian aid should be directed to helping the federation as such; and second, that the top priority need of the federation at this stage was for an inter-island shipping service. The West Indian authorities have stated emphatically that this is their greatest need; and undoubtedly, as a form of aid, it would have the widest popular appeal. In this connection a copy of a senior Canadian official's report, with which I am in full agreement, is attached as an annex.† This report emphasizes the high importance attached by the West Indies to an immediate Canadian announcement before their election on March 24.

3. It is proposed that we should decide now to give the West Indies a ship for the inter-island service and that an announcement to this effect should be made well before the election in the West Indies which is to take place on March 24. This announcement would leave open the possibility of giving a second similar ship. Canadian shipping experts agree with the West Indian view that the inter-island service requires two vessels. If built in Canada, these would cost about $2 ½ million each. Because of the time required for the preparation of plans and specifications construction could start approximately eight to ten months after a decision is made to proceed. It should be noted that if a formal decision to provide the second vessel is deferred, no time will be lost in the planning of this vessel because it would be similar to the first vessel.

4. Officials have been guided in their discussions by the views of Ministers concerned, to the effect that expenditures for aid to the West Indies of approximately $10 million over five years would be appropriate. If it were agreed that two ships might be provided as the major item of capital aid, half this sum would remain to be spent over the next five years. This would be used to continue and to expand the technical assistance programme which has already been started and to support it with equipment and contributions to building costs, etc., where appropriate.

5. I recommend,¹⁰⁵ with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the Canadian Government announce immediately

(1) that, in response to a request from the West Indies and as the first major project in the Canadian programme of aid to the new federation, the Government has decided to give a ship to be used in the inter-island shipping service; and

(2) that discussions regarding further capital and technical assistance under the Canada-West Indies aid programme are expected to take place with representatives of the West Indies who are being invited to be present at the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference in Montreal in September, 1958.

Approved by Cabinet on March 4, 1958. For the text of the letter sent on March 10, 1958, from Prime Minister Diefenbaker to Lord Hailes, the Governor-General of the West Indies, announcing the Canadian aid plans, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 10, No. 3, March 1958, p. 71.

DEVELOPMENT — CANADIAN AID PROGRAMME

On 27th June I was asked if I would attend a meeting under the Chairmanship of the Hon. R.L. Bradshaw, Minister of Finance for the Federal Government, in order to discuss the development of the Canadian Economic and Technical Aid Programme for The West Indies. Apparently when Mr. Maynier, Permanent Secretary to the Minister of Trade & Industries, was in London during the preliminary talks for the Commonwealth Economic Conference, he had talks with Messrs. Plumtre, Isbister and Couillard concerning the further development of the Canadian Aid Programme. According to Maynier, he was asked by the Canadian officials to provide as soon as possible a list of priorities for economic and technical aid. It was in order that I should be informed of the West Indies position concerning their needs for aid that the meeting was called.

2. For some time we have felt here that there may have been developing some misunderstanding concerning procedure in the development of the Canadian Aid Programme. That is to say, we were somewhat uneasy lest the Canadian side was waiting for The West Indies to take the initiative in furthering development of the Plan and that The West Indies on the other hand were waiting for further advice from Canada. In fact in the lack of any word from you and on the assumption that you might wish to have from Parliament a vote of a certain sum of money to be expended on Aid, we had not been too concerned at the apparent hiatus on the development of our Economic Aid Programme. It now seems, however, if Maynier's report is accurate, that you have been waiting for The West Indies to come forward with suggestions for further aid.

3. The result of this request has been that the officials here have been suddenly galvanized into furious action and requests have been made to all departments to submit within a few hours their ideas on aid that should form the basis for a comprehensive programme which can be considered by Canada, the United States and Great Britain.

4. It is clear that as the United States is organizing its I.C.A. team for the conduct of its aid policies in this area, The West Indies Government is most anxious that before they enter into detailed discussions with the United States they should have discussions with Canada. So far, however, no decision has been made here concerning timing but there is no doubt that they would like to have some guidance from us concerning our own views on timing. They appreciate that because of the forthcoming Commonwealth Economic Conference we may find it difficult to meet with them before that Conference or to undertake the necessary preliminary studies that would make such a meeting decisive. However, clearly they would prefer to meet before the Economic Conference although they fully understand that the Conference itself will not deal with Aid and there will be no relationship between the subjects discussed at the Economic Conference and the questions dealing with the formulation of a Canadian Aid Programme.

5. In so far as a meeting is concerned therefore, the initiative really lies with us. Specifically they would like to know when we would like to meet with their officials or Ministers in order to further discuss projects or plans. They are quite prepared to fall in with any Canadian proposals in this respect. If, for example, you would wish to have a meeting of officials first they would be quite agreeable. Subsequently if we would then wish for our Ministers to meet in order to conclude any agreement they would be glad to make this possible. They are also quite willing to meet wherever you find it most desirable, either in Ottawa or in Port-of-Spain.

6. The West Indian Government is, as I have said, feverishly trying to work out their own requirements for aid and they should have sorted out the various possibilities in the very near future, even if they will have difficulty in arriving at a firm list of priorities.

7. Nevertheless, in the question of timing and the sort and place of meeting, the initiative rests with us. On the other hand ostensibly the selection of the way in which economic and technical aid will be used is a matter for West Indian initiative. However, I say ostensibly because I am sure that it is in both our interests that we should try to give The West Indies as much help as possible in sorting out the confusion that exists because of the number of projects that need or seem to need doing. Thus I hope that we will not give too much stress on neat "priorities." If we wait for The West Indies to come up with a precise list of priorities, of projects, then I am afraid that we will have to wait a very long time because we are asking them to accomplish an almost impossible task.

8. There are a great many things needing doing and the main thing is to make sure that whatever is done is in fact useful and necessary to the economic development of these islands. To attempt to assign to each project a relative degree of importance is neither practical nor, I suggest, necessary.

9. I am enclosing a list of projects and a supplementary list that officials have drawn up for general discussion. These lists must not under any circumstances be considered as firm requests by The West Indies for aid. They are merely a compilation of ideas which have been put forward by different departments of Government. Many of these ideas will be eliminated before the story is complete and of course there will be additions to these lists. I forward them, however, simply as an indication of how officials are thinking, and to give you some indication of how we might start directing our thoughts in relation to an Aid Programme. The subjects suggested are those for possible consideration for aid from all sources, and not necessarily for Canadian participation. You will note that the lists do not contain any reference to the forestry school proposed by Mr. Barnes, the formation of the statistical office proposed by Mr. Herbert Marshall, nor to the proposal for a guarantee of a housing loan suggested by Mr. Gold which we mentioned in the despatch under reference. This is because neither one of these offices thought it advisable to submit these proposals without having an indication from the Canadian Government of our reaction. Since, however, these Canadian officials are being asked to submit ideas for aid from all sources I have suggested that they should go ahead with their proposals but without suggesting that the Canadian Government would or would not be interested in supporting those particular suggestions. Thus the fact that these proposals are not on these lists should not under any circumstances be construed to mean that they are not likely to be included, or that they would not be regarded as important.

10. In order that we can help at this end, I hope you will let us know as quickly as possible how you visualize the development of our programme. Presumably before we can seriously discuss a comprehensive programme or before we can enter into any further sizable commitments we shall have to have a vote from Parliament. I think it is important that we know the order of magnitude of our aid as quickly as possible. There is a danger that The West Indies — not the responsible officials but the West Indian public in general, and even some unthinking officials or politicians — may be developing a somewhat exaggerated idea of the amount that they may expect from Canada. I made this point at the meeting and said that I hoped that all concerned would realize that Canadian aid is not unlimited and that we wished to avoid at all costs any feeling of letdown, if eventually the Aid Programme does not come up to the more exaggerated expectations. I know that the officials at the meeting understood this position, but they would find their task easier if they were to have some indication of the order of magnitude of our Aid Programme.

11. Coming back to the question of priorities, here again I am sure that we can help The West Indies immensely if we can give some indication of the sort of projects that we would be most likely to consider. In previous despatches we have expressed some concern lest our Aid Programme should develop too much along the technical aid side without giving sufficient regard to how the technical aiders' recommendations might be carried out.

12. It would help The West Indies, for example, if we were to use these preliminary lists as a basis from which to indicate those projects that we might think we would be best able to develop. It seems to me that the most logical approach would be to tie in our economic aid to our technical aid, although of course the second ship for inter-regional trade is clearly one project that is a natural further development for us. I know that it is our eventual intention to provide a second ship and I do not think that we need be too concerned about hastening our announcement of that decision if we wish to delay it for a more suitable time — that is to say, more suitable from our point of view. On the other hand when we enter into discussions about the design of the ship I assume we will make it clear that in designing the ship we are doing so on the assumption that there will be two similar ships operating. It would certainly capture the imagination of the West Indians if following our discussions for the design of the ship we could announce that we were going to “up the ante” by another ship. However, I do not think this is by any means essential and we could hold over the announcement if we so desire without any particular loss of effect.

13. I should like to think that, following the general idea that we should back stop our technical aiders, it might be possible to indicate to The West Indies that we would be particularly interested in the following items contained in their list:

Page 1 of main list: Items 2 and 5 possibly in conjunction with 17. Item 4 would also come within this proposed criterion, but I suggest that it would be more satisfactory to offer to guarantee a loan rather than the provision of the funds.

On page 2 of the main paper: Item 3 has been taken almost verbatim from the recommendations of Mr. Gold.

The supplementary list: Expert Personnel: Items 2, 3, 4 and 5, and possibly 6 and 7 have come from the reports of Messrs. Leahey and Harrison. Item 12 would seem a logical project for us to consider and items 11 and 13 on the list presumably can be taken care of under our existing offer to train West Indian officials in Canada. In addition, if Mr. Monture (reference correspondence Dr. Isbister) is seriously interested in taking on a job in The West Indies he would appear to expertly cover off Item 1 — that is to say Mineral Resources Adviser.

14. During the meeting it was also suggested that we might be particularly useful in covering off Item 1 on page 2 of the main paper — an expert to undertake a study of Income Tax Legislation. Apparently the organization of our Income Tax has made a most favourable impression on the financial officials in the Federation. They pointed out that at the present time each island has established its income tax system on the British system. They have not, however, developed in a uniform manner and there is a grave need for co-ordination in this field. At the moment the Federal Government has no income tax powers but at the end of 5 years (or sooner if some politicians have their way), the Federal Government will have to be prepared with a scheme for a Federal income tax system. It was suggested, for example, that possibly Mr. J. Harvey Kelly, Canadian Tax Foundation, or some other equally qualified Canadian with a knowledge of Federal and Provincial taxation problems, would be of great value to them.

15. In making these suggestions I do not wish to indicate that we should refuse to entertain any other proposals that might be put forward by The West Indies. I believe, however, that if we were to take on these projects we will probably find that they will more than use up whatever funds we are likely to have for aid to The West Indies. It is not necessary in my view to worry any further about priorities. The fact that we have agreed to send technical aiders in certain fields is sufficient evidence that these subjects are regarded as of supreme importance. Firm suggestions from us along these lines I am sure would greatly help The West Indies in formulating their plans for a comprehensive Aid Programme. We should be flattered that they have given these lists to us first so that we may in a sense have first picking. Again I must caution you that these lists are not by any means exclusive and in any event we should be free to consider proposals for the support in establishing a statistical service, for a forestry school, and for the guarantee of a housing loan since I am sure that these proposals will be forthcoming in due course from The West Indies.

16. I hope that this despatch will help you to bring forward our planning in this aid field. From my trips through the islands I am convinced that there is a great deal more good work being done in many of them than we generally assume to be the case. It seems to me that there is a danger that the West Indian authorities, in thinking in terms of aid, may tend to embark on a number of new schemes without giving sufficient regard to existing projects which are of the utmost importance but which may be starved through insufficiency of funds. Perhaps in the excitement of the prospect of new aid from Canada and the United States there may be a tendency to "start all over again" and to ignore the very excellent work that is being done in many fields by Colonial Development and Welfare or by the island governments on their own using grant aid funds. This applies particularly in the agricultural field. In other words there is a need for the greatest possible co-ordination of effort and for a critical examination of any firm request that is eventually made to us for help.

PROJECTS PROPOSED FOR CONSIDERATION FOR AID

The following projects to be considered for Aid have been put forward by departments, including the applications received from Unit Territories for the help of Advisers and expert assistance. They are not in any order of priority.

1. The provision of a second ship for inter-regional trade.
2. The development and improvement of ports and harbour facilities, including light-houses and cold storage.
3. The establishment of an Engineering Faculty at U.C.W.I. — subject to any recommendations of the Cato Committee.
4. The provision of funds to establish a House Mortgage Fund.
5. The building, equipping and staffing of a Technical School and a Teachers' Training College in -
 - (a) the Leeward Islands, and
 - (b) the Windward Islands.

6. Film Unit. A production unit, plus equipment for editing and processing films produced by other units in the region; technical staff capable of running such a unit and to train local personnel. Mobile projecting units for showing films in villages and rural areas.

7. Broadcasting. Transmitting equipment for sending programmes from, say Trinidad to Grenada and Barbados. Tape recording equipment and supplies of tapes for production of Federal programmes.

8. Receiving sets for schools in the West Indies to enable them to receive specially produced programmes.

9. Equipment for visual aids for use in individual territories.

10. Navigational equipment for airfields.

11. Equipment for hospitals.

12. Assistance for road building and maintenance programme, including equipment and technical staff.

13. Assistance in the development of Water resources, Electricity, and Telephones, including equipment and technical personnel.

14. The provision of Books for school libraries.

15. Reference material on the Americas suitable for inclusion in a Reference Library.

16. The setting up of a communications net-work to link the territories bearing in mind the requirements of ordinary tele-communication traffic, inter-island and international telephone links, radio and television link-up, news services, etc.

17. Meteorological equipment and facilities for training of personnel.

Expert Personnel

1. Expert to undertake a study of Income Tax Legislation (including Pioneer Industries) aimed at the preparation of long-term scheme for a unified tax system.

2. Public Health Education Adviser.

3. (a) A building Research Expert from the Division of Building Research, National Research Council of Canada, for a period of three months to advise the Federal Government on:

(i) The collation and co-ordination of research activities in the West Indies.

(ii) The establishment of a Building Research Centre.

(iii) The role it should play in Building Research Work.

(b) A training expert for two years to conduct classes on property management.

4. Medical Specialists in a variety of fields.

5. Engineer specialists in Roads, Water, Construction, Agriculture and Designs.

6. Quantity Surveyor.

7. An Adviser on Social Welfare with specialist qualifications for operation in under-developed territories for a period of 18—24 months.

8. Person to carry out a survey of Tourist potential.

9. Adviser on Telecommunications Development.

10. Person to promote Industrial Development.

11. Expert to advise on Social Security.

12. Expert on the development of Labour Statistics.

13. Expert to advise on the standardisation of Labour Legislation throughout the West Indies.

14. A Regional Adviser on Home Economics and Women's Welfare.

15. The provision of an expert on Mass Education and on the eradication of illiteracy.

16. Agricultural Statistics. Two officers with training in Agriculture and Statistics to plan and supervise:

(i) Collection of statistical material required in connection with the proposed 1961 Agricultural Census.

(ii) Extension of Surveys on Price, Supply and Marketing.

17. Training of Civil Aviation personnel, Pilots and Engineers if a scheme can be arranged in co-operation with B.W.I.A.

18. Adviser on Civil Aviation.

19. Adviser on Postal Services.

Seminars

1. Funds to meet the cost of a Seminar on Forensic Medicine to be held in Jamaica.

2. Funds to meet special seminar course in ophthalmology and psychiatry.

3. Funds to enable expert seminars to be held on:

(i) Public Health Administration.

(ii) Environmental Sanitation.

(iii) Social Medicine.

(iv) Mental Health.

(v) Health Statistics.

(vi) Industrial Health

with the major object of promoting preventive measures against disease.

SUPPLEMENTARY LIST OF PROJECTS PROPOSED FOR CONSIDERATION FOR AID

1. Erection of new public market and improvement of existing markets. Construction and equipping of new abattoirs and development of Marketing Organisation.

2. Mechanisation of inshore fishing.

Expert Personnel

1. Mineral Resources Advisers.

2. Expert to carry out ground water surveys.

3. Assistance in the production of geological maps for the Region.

4. Lecturer to provide a course in geology at U.C.W.I.

5. Soil Surveys

(a) Two Soil Surveyors to help to complete Windward and Leeward Surveys in conjunction with the Regional Research Council.

(b) One Agronomist for follow-up work of survey.

6. Irrigation Engineer with specific reference to small-scale projects.

7. Expert on small earth dams for water conservation in particular in the drier areas of the region.

8. Agronomist for Corn breeding — project for breeding of hybrid corns.

9. Hide improvement officer for limited period.

10. Personnel to undertake initial management of Marketing Organisation and to train local personnel to take over.
11. Training in Forestry of technical officers below university level.
12. Expert for a survey of fishing banks.
13. Post-graduate training of technical officers.

Ottawa, July 22, 1958

Dear Rod [Grey]:

LETTER 140 OF JUNE 30, 1958 FROM PORT OF SPAIN
WEST INDIES - CANADIAN AID PROGRAM

We are most interested in the letter under reference which gives an indication of thinking in the West Indies about the direction that our Canadian aid program might take over the next year or so. You will recall that last October Mr. Mordecai and Sir Stephen Luke visited Ottawa and outlined to us the assistance which they thought would be most desirable as the first phase of the program. These discussions were subsequently confirmed when we received a group of formal requests for senior advisors for the new Federation Government. We have now worked through this list and the one or two minor later additions which were made to it; seven experts have gone to the West Indies or will be leaving within the next month or so. Accordingly, we are anxious about the planning for the next phase of the program.

Many of the activities which have been tentatively suggested for future Canadian support in the letter under reference involve capital assistance. Before this could be considered the present governing policy would have to be modified and extended, and no useful purpose would be served now by detailed comments from us. As you know, the funds at present available or in prospect provide for the ship, for some assistance in paying for a film, and for technical co-operation. The latter item was established at $215,000; of this about $61,000 is spent or committed for experts (including Hess and Mitchell) so the balance of $154,000 is available for further assistance. It seems to me most desirable that this money be reserved largely for the supply of more experts and the provision of some training facilities in Canada. The supply of equipment should be limited to any small items directly required by the experts in their work. The thinking here is that we can make a worthwhile contribution with this money in terms of people; however, if we started meeting requests for goods or paying overhead costs in the West Indies, the available funds would disappear very quickly and with little visible effect.

It seems likely that the West Indies Delegation to the forthcoming Economic Conference may wish to discuss arrangements for aid on a larger scale. In the meantime, we might most usefully limit our detailed planning to the technical assistance which can be supplied with available funds.

We agree largely with Mr. Smith's feeling that a strict priority list is neither necessary nor practicable. However, I am sure that he would concur that any assistance from Canada should be in a high priority category. In other words, we need not be concerned with ordinal numbers as long as everyone is satisfied that the requests that we meet fill recognized, important needs.

We agree also with Mr. Smith that, generally speaking, it is desirable that our program for the future follow on the work which has been done in the past. There are obviously advantages in having the specialized advice of Canadian experts who are in the field or who have returned from the West Indies. It seems likely however that funds will also be available for us to enter new fields of assistance if the West Indies wish us to do so.

It might be helpful if I were to give some very preliminary comments on the "projects proposed for consideration for aid" and the "supplementary list of projects," which were attached to the letter under reference. On the first list, all the items except 3, 12, 13, and 17 seem to involve largely or exclusively capital assistance. Item 3 — establishment of an engineering faculty at the University College of the West Indies — is one in which I feel we might take considerable interest if the West Indies authorities wished us to do so. This is the sort of assistance which we have always considered particularly appropriate for support under our technical co-operation arrangements, and we would be very happy to consider any suggestions for the provision of teaching staff or the training of West Indians to join the faculty. It might well be that co-operative arrangements could be established with a Canadian university if this seemed desirable and consistent with the present relationship between U.C.W.I. and the University of London.

Technical personnel for road building and maintenance, and for the development of water resources, electricity and telephones, (items 12 and 13) would also fall within our general terms of reference. There is not enough information available to comment in any detail. We might also provide facilities for training personnel in meteorology (item 17); here again we would need to know more about what is required.

As far as I can tell from the very skimpy information supplied we would have no reason in principle to discourage requests for any of the expert personnel listed on page 2 of the "Projects proposed for consideration" except for the medical specialists (item 3). It seems to me that except for teaching personnel we would be wise to stay out of this latter field, in the beginning at least. However, it would clearly not be possible for us to provide experts in all of the fields listed and it would be up to the West Indies authorities to decide on the ones that they think are most important, keeping in mind the limited funds which we have available. There are a few fields in which it might be difficult for us to find suitable personnel in Canada; this consideration probably applies most strongly to items 7, 10, 13, 14, and 15. Any detailed assessment of the availability of people would of course depend on fuller information about what is required; if the West Indies decides to enlarge on some of these proposals, we will be glad to give a more detailed account as quickly as we can.

We have some doubts also about item 17 — Training of Civil Aviation personnel. While this might be arranged, we understand that BWIA has some sort of working relationship with BOAC and it would seem reasonable that this organization provide the training required.

We think that for the time being it would be desirable not to become involved in seminars. With the funds available we can probably accomplish more through provision of experts' services and training facilities.

The requests for expert personnel on the "Supplementary List of Projects" are of particular interest since several of these arise from the suggestions which have already been made by our experts. We have discussed items 1 to 5 in general terms with Dr. Leahey and Dr. Harrison who returned a month or so ago. We see no difficulty in principle in supplying a mineral resources advisor (item 1) if the West Indies asked us to do so. Finding a suitable person for an assignment like this is always difficult but it should not be impossible. Dr. Leahey seemed to feel that the expert to carry out ground water surveys (item 2) could be borrowed from British Guiana. This possibility might be followed up. We are not quite sure how item 3 — assistance in the production of geological maps — would involve expert personnel. From Dr. Harrison's comment it seemed that this was at least partly a mechanical problem; some arrangements might possibly be made with our Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for use of their facilities here. We would certainly be prepared to provide a lecturer in geology at U.C.W.I. if we were asked to do so; as a matter of fact we know of a good candidate who might be available for this appointment in a year or so. We have been informed by the Department of Agriculture that personnel could be made available for Soils Surveys (item 5) if the West Indies asked us to go ahead with this.

Items 6 and 7 involve an irrigation engineer and an expert on small earth dams. Before commenting, we would need more details. Are funds available to finance the projects on which they would work? We have no special comments on items 8, 9, 10, and 12, since we have no knowledge at all of the programs involved. Item 11 seems quite reasonable as long as the training can be provided through technical assistance procedures, and item 13 clearly falls in principle within our terms of reference.

In summary, most of the tentative suggestions seem, from our point of view, to be worth consideration. The prime limiting factor will be money. Mr. Smith might tell the West Indian authorities the approximate amount of money that we have to spend on technical assistance for the balance of this fiscal year. It is up to them to indicate how they wish it spent. As a very rough rule of thumb it probably costs us about $1,000 a month to send an expert to the West Indies and maintain him there. This figure takes account of transportation costs and shipping of personal effects as well as the expert's fee. It costs roughly one-third as much to bring a trainee to Canada and maintain him here.

We would be very pleased to receive and comment in detail on any firm requests that the West Indian authorities may wish to make following their consideration of the tentative proposals outlined.

Yours very truly,

D.W. BARTLETT

Ottawa, July 28, 1958

I have to report that on leaving Ottawa for Montreal and Port of Spain, Trinidad, the morning of Saturday, July 12th, I spent Saturday and Sunday going over the Labrador, lining up the C.N.S. vessels as a result of the examination which was made of the operations in Newfoundland by Captain Oldford and Mr. Gordon German and also getting a tentative plan and picture of the West Indies vessel for Monday morning.

I met Captain Kelly of the C.N.S. and also Mr. Geo. Scott before boarding the plane on Monday morning at Montreal for Port of Spain. We arrived at Port of Spain 11 p.m. the same day and were greeted there by The Hon. W. Andrew Rose, Minister of Communications in the Federal Government, Mr. Eastham, Assistant Trade Commissioner and several others.

Arrangements were made for a meeting with Mr. Smith, Trade Commissioner for the West Indies and at 10 o'clock, Tuesday morning, a meeting was held in the Chamber of Commerce. This meeting was headed by Governor General Hailes and a large number of members from the Federal House of Representatives. We then adjourned to deal with a Committee which had been established under the Chairmanship of Mr. R.C. Duff Urquhart to deal with the Canadian delegation on the ship. Attached are the names of the members of the Committee.†

This Committee had never met before and I may say that nobody on the Committee, outside of Mr. Duff Urquhart, knew anything about shipping. They did, however, know something of the requirements of the various Islands with regard to ports, stevedoring and desirable times of departure and arrival from the various Islands and they had knowledge concerning the ship to shore operations as they are now carried out.

The operations of the two ships, the Olaf Sven and the Herman Langrader which have been chartered by Furness Withy & Co. from Danish and German owners, were discussed. Both ships to my way of thinking are very unsatisfactory for the purpose intended. Their cargo and refrigeration capacity is small. The Langrader has no passenger accommodation at all and the Sven has had a section of the hull partitioned off and has had some seats and tables installed to carry deck passengers. The trip under present scheduled conditions from Trinidad, Georgetown, British Guiana to Kingston, Jamaica takes 19 days northbound and 12 days southbound from Kingston to British Guiana. The southbound traffic is very light, generally speaking, but the northbound cargo, principally from Trinidad, is quite heavy. The existing schedules give the ship speed of approximately 7 ½ knots while at sea and the schedules are laid down to suit arrival and working condition time in port. It was pointed out that the new ship would be more costly to operate than the existing ships because the ship would have a greater capacity for passengers and cargo and would require to be operated under conditions which would require larger crews than those presently manned by the German owned and Danish owned ships.

The importance of keeping such a ship moving and spending as little time as possible in port was pointed out and discussed very fully. It appears, however, there were many things which would require to be overcome before time in port will be brought down in proportion to the passengers and cargo being dealt with at the various islands. The set up between island and island at the present time is very insular. Each island from the standpoint of customs duties, etc., is almost a little kingdom of its own and the control of labour and the established facilities and operations are in many ways beset with unusually strong labour control and restrictions regarding the time the ship can be worked at and the hour of the day in which passengers come ashore, etc. The landing equipment, what I have seen of it, is awkward and constitutes a bottleneck even with the existing ships and which will be much worse when the larger and more expensive ship goes into service.

As I see it, these things can only be changed gradually but nonetheless unless an effort is made to improve the handling of cargo and the cutting down of the time in port, this operation will never be efficient. Some of the people on the Committee seemed to be of the opinion that no progress whatever can be made but on the other hand there are quite a few who felt that unless they make some progress they will not be able to establish any worthwhile improvement. This matter is of considerable significance because they will require to find money to pay for the loss in operation which will be greater if the service is carried out inefficiently.

There are several significant angles to this matter which require to be considered:

(1) The operating loss of the vessel may be $400,000 (W.I.) annually, which is equivalent to approximately $240,000 Canadian money. I do not think their figures are far out.

(2) The time in port should be curtailed by a better understanding with labour and with improved landing equipment.

(3) The rates for both passengers and cargo should be set at a reasonable level considering the nature of the country and the standards of the people; and

(4) A positive and reasonably fast service should be established.

The Hon. W. Andrew Rose seems to reason along sound lines, although he claims he is not a technician and knows nothing about ships. As a politician he considers it absolutely essential that a dependable ship service be established and carried out by the Federal Government and it seems to me that this is one of the positive things the new Government has to work on. There are so many other things which appear to be out of their reach that I feel they are most intensely interested in this matter.

The only dependable transportation between the Islands is that provided by planes which, of course, only takes the cream of the traffic and is beyond reach of many people and will not handle commodities of any consequence. The two ships operated by the Federal Government are very poor ships for the purpose intended and a considerable amount of fill-in of Inter Island work is being carried out by large ocean-going ships which take cargoes to Jamaica, Barbados, Trinidad or British Guiana or some other foreign port and in the process of carrying out the return voyage either pick up or drop cargo at the Islands. This, of course, is not dependable and is not the sort of thing business people can plan on.

There appear to be many different conceptions with regard to the type of ship which was considered best for the service intended and after discussions lasting two days, we did not appear to be any nearer fundamental requirements. I then tabled the plans taken with me from Montreal and I may say that these plans were very well received by Mr. Duff Urquhart and the others. The plans were deliberated on. In view of the information regarding the Islands and the operating conditions, the following main changes were proposed:

- (1) Increase the cube capacity of the cargo holds from 45,000 to 80,000 feet,
- (2) In order to endeavour to improve the loading time, fit two hatches on the forward deck,
- (3) Increase the refrigeration capacity from 3,000 tons to 4,000, and
- (4) Increase the number of deck passengers from 100 to 200 and increase the number of cabin passengers from 46 to 52 with six cabins set aside for what we decided to call "Deluxe Cabin Passengers."

I did some work on this matter and came to the conclusion that in order to satisfy these conditions even in a limited measure, it would be necessary to increase the length of the vessel by 24 feet. This would give us two hatches. This would also involve changes in the lifting gear. A great many other items of a less costly nature were also gone into, such as dual communication that is radio-telegraph and radio-telephone, special arrangements regarding additional gangways, special arrangements regarding public room and the supplying of food and drink for deck passengers, the supplying of dormitory space for deck passengers, special anchoring arrangements, facilities for stevedores, etc., etc.

The result of all this would be to increase the price of the vessel by approximately $300,000 and I do not think the ship as it is now laid down will be much under the $3,000,000 mark.

I promised that the question of increasing the size of the vessel would be taken up by me with you immediately on my return and that if you approved the increased size a layout plan indicating the set up which had been pointed out desirable would be ready in about three weeks and would be sent down to them by you through External Affairs. Apparently Mr. Smith of External Affairs wishes to have the matter handled this way although I think somewhere along the line we will later require to get down to direct technical contact.

In order to make some endeavour to improve the ship to shore equipment, I thought it would be a good plan to fit two of our smaller barges to the ship. At the present time the ship to shore set up is quite inadequate and if the cargo is to increase the delay would be much greater than it is now. All in all we pointed out very clearly that we were only talking about one ship but the schedule which has been laid down will not provide satisfactory transportation unless they have two ships. I further pointed out that the matter of setting down a schedule and the frequency of the service was a matter for the Federal Government and not for us and no commitment or implication which could be construed as a promise of a second ship entered into the discussions and was clearly understood on that basis by the Federal Government of W.I.

We visited both the Sven and the Langrader which are presently under charter in the port of Trinidad and watched the loading operation. We also on Saturday morning left Trinidad for Antigua to go over the harbour and the landing facilities there. Antigua is a very nice island but the port is indeed very poor. The wharves, such as they are, are right in the middle of the town but the harbour is very shallow and ships have to anchor 2 ½ miles off.

We went from Antigua to Montserrat. There is no harbour in Montserrat, simply a small wooden wharf extending seawards. The water at Montserrat is very deep. This island would, I feel, benefit greatly from a regular shipping service. Their economy at the present time depends upon cotton and tomatoes but they hope to grow bananas in quantity. They are very concerned about getting a reliable ship service.

We came down en route at Grenada, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Antigua and Montserrat and a delegation met us at each island. They all stressed the importance of dependable water transportation and gave us a great deal of useful information. We left Port of Spain on Tuesday morning, July 22nd, via the return TCA flight and arrived in Montreal 11 p.m. that same evening.

The people of the Islands generally appeared to be intensely interested in Canada and we were very well received everywhere. There are, of course, a great many white people on the island who have been there for a long, long time carrying out various operations, some of which could be changed if the Federal Government ever becomes really powerful. At the moment it almost looks as if the Federal Government does not know where to begin. They have no authority for raising money. Revenue at the present time mostly comes from excise duties imposed on each island as each island has its own administrators or Government and a special set up. There are a very large number of ruling people and I understand the Federal revenue has to be provided quarterly by the various islands. Organized labour seems to be established in a big way and Trinidad as a transfer point for bauxite and with its oil is well off, also Barbados with its sugar is well off and Jamaica on account of its bauxite, sugar, etc., is fairly well off. Nonetheless the economy of the Islands appears to be in quite a precarious position as they depend upon the British market for 75% of their sugar exports. The set up in many ways is very English and the general feeling seems to be that if they can only get more money everything would be alright. If they are in earnest about building a new nation, I am sure the ship which Canada is to offer them will at least provide an opportunity for those who are in earnest to establish something concrete in the way of progress to help those who are in earnest in building up industry and in general break down the wall which is presently erected between one island and another.

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

AID PROGRAMME

Consideration is being given to nature of announcement to be made during Montreal Conference on Canadian aid programme for West Indies. It is planned to announce that, subject to the approval of Parliament, $10 million will be available for the programme over five years, including the sums already made available. It has also been decided to announce Canada's intention to make a second ship available for inter-island service. For the present, the above is for your own information only.

2. Please advise West Indian authorities that it is likely that an announcement of the scale and duration of the Canadian aid programme will be made at Montreal. It is essential, therefore, that we have a formal request before the conference takes place from West Indies for a second ship for the inter-island service and that this has the highest priority. You may indicate that Canadian officials have good reason to expect that such a formal request will be met. Further, we would welcome an assurance that if funds were available for technical assistance, over and above funds for ships, that the West Indies would be in a position to put forward useful high priority projects for assistance from Canada which they would like to discuss with Canadian representatives. The projects listed in your despatch 140 suggest that there will be a number of useful schemes which we might assist over the next few years.

3. In London Maynier was told that the time had come when the Federation might put forward a list of priorities; we asked whether talks might be held here before Montreal Conference. This would have been desirable, though not essential. However, it now seems impractical to hold any detailed discussions between ourselves and the West Indians on aid until after the Montreal meetings. At Montreal, we would therefore expect that little more would take place than the announcement of the extension of the Canadian programme as indicated above and an appropriate response from the West Indians. Meetings in late October or November at the official level (at least in the first instance) could talk realistically about various aid projects in the light of the announcements made in Montreal. It is not clear to us that meeting of ministers on the Canada-West Indies Programme would be necessary in October. A comprehensive review at the official level would seem to be called for first.

4. We see no reason for West Indians not to welcome the I.C.A. experts in September in view of the fact that the West Indies obviously have extensive needs for aid. This is, of course, a matter for the West Indians to decide, but we see no reason to fear that Canadian and USA aid programmes will compete or overlap.

5. In a number of despatches recently you have discussed in some detail particular proposals for Canadian aid. Before considering these matters further, we would prefer to have the benefit of discussions with you when you visit Ottawa. However, an indication of our views may be useful to you in any discussions you have with the West Indians before your departure.

6. As for Mr. Gold's proposal to underwrite West Indian mortgage guarantees, we feel this proposal lies considerably outside our terms of reference and is most unlikely to be acceptable to ministers. As for the proposals put forward by Barnes and Marshall, there are significant elements in both schemes which we would be prepared to consider further after Montreal. As for aid to British Guiana, this also lies outside our terms of reference. Not only does the vote for aid to the West Indies preclude assistance to British Guiana but any such project would run counter to one of the major aims of our West Indian programmes to strengthen the Federation. For your own information, we are giving some consideration to the extension of technical assistance to Commonwealth territories not now in receipt of Canadian assistance and, if it is decided to implement such proposals, we would be in a position to extend a modest amount of technical assistance to British Guiana. Until that time, we are not in a position to consider any recommendations for aid to that territory.

7. For your visit to Ottawa, it would be useful for you to have some informal and tentative views from the West Indians as to the different priorities they would assign to the various projects listed in your despatch under reference. We can then give some thought to the nature of the meeting in October or November to consider these various projects.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER OF THE WEST INDIES

You will recall that, while the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference was in progress in Montreal, there was an exchange of letters between yourself and the Prime Minister of The West Indies. The purpose of this exchange was to set out the intention of the Government of Canada to seek parliamentary approval for a sum of $10 million to be spent over a period of five years for assistance in the economic development of The West Indies.

In your letter to the Prime Minister of The West Indies you also sought his views as to the advisability of a general agreement between Canada and The West Indies which would set out the broad principles by which the two countries would be guided in the implementation of the Canada-West Indies aid programme. Such an agreement has now been drawn up and we understand that, subject to minor modifications, the attached text† is acceptable to the authorities of The West Indies. The text of Sir Grantley Adams' reply has not yet been conveyed to us but we have no reason to think that it will be other than a formal acceptance of the arrangements proposed in your letter.

As you know, the basic purpose of Sir Grantley's visit to Canada at this time is to strengthen his own position in The West Indies and the position of the Federal Government in relation to the constituent islands. However, the immediate occasion around which Sir Grantley's visit is being organized is the exchange of letters covering the statement of principles governing the Canada-West Indies aid programme. This has been arranged for 11 o'clock on Saturday, October 18, in the Large Conference Room of the East Block.¹⁰⁷

DESPATCH NO. 363

Port-of-Spain, November 25, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: My telegram No. 109 of 25th November 1958.†

DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING CANADA-WEST INDIES AID PROGRAMME

Your telegram suggesting the possible change of date for the Canadian aid delegation arrived when we had been giving considerable thought to the development of the aid programme in The West Indies. We wrote to Rosenthal on the 10th November with copies to Goldschlag and Pollock commenting on certain projects which The West Indies have put to us for possible consideration during these discussions. Since then I have been having talks with Mr. Laidig, the I.C.A. representative here, and others concerned with this programme, in order to ensure that whatever we do is in full co-operation with other agencies and will result in the maximum use of the funds which we have voted for aid to The West Indies.

2. For some time we, in this office, have been growing increasingly concerned at the apparent lack of overall directions to a general aid programme. This has been reflected by a certain amount of indecision on behalf of the Federal authorities in asking us for technical aid and in subsequently withdrawing the requests. It is also reflected in the fact that the technical aid people that we have sent here have not been and are not fully employed. To some extent this is because there has been no clear cut directive to the officers as to what they should do, which in turn is a result of the inexperience of the Ministers to whom they have been assigned. The Ministers who have been charged with organizing their departments following the inauguration have had difficulty in assembling their staffs and in developing policy. It is not surprising that under these circumstances they have not been particularly clear in determining just what the various officers should do or how they should help in achieving the objectives of their Ministry. The problem varies considerably depending on the Minister that administers the different officers but in general it is a malady that is fairly common among the five officers who are here. Admittedly the problem is in part due to a lack of funds, but basically the real problem stems from the lack of any centralised direction or firm objectives.

3. The Americans are particularly conscious of this defect and have proposed that what should be done is to create a central planning unit, a sort of development bank, through which their aid in the form of loans would be parcelled out to the different territories and projects. They did hope that we would participate in such an organization by adding our money to the resources of the organization. The advantage of such a plan, as they see it, is that the Federal Government would be able to escape from the embarrassment and difficulty of having to decide from among the number of projects put to them by the unit territories which ones would be most essential and suitable for aid treatment.

4. In discussing this with the Americans I made it quite clear that we could not enter into such a project, however logical the plan might be. On paper it is probable that some such an organization would be desirable in producing better co-ordination and better overall results, particularly if C.D. & W. would join (which we doubt). However, in practice, and

I have made this reservation to Laidig, there is a danger that another organization would simply proliferate staff and use up much of our very limited funds in the internal administration of the organization. Apart altogether from the fact that we would not join such an operation, I do not think that in practice it is the best solution for The West Indies aid problems. On the other hand there is clearly need for a central direction of the aid programme, a direction that is not subject to petty political motives or pressures, or to the incompetence or inexperience of individual Ministers. It seems to us that what is really needed is a director or administrator of aid who would be responsible to the Prime Minister and who would direct the activities of the technical aid officers assigned to The West Indies from whatever source. Such a director would be responsible for working out a centralised and co-ordinated aid plan for the use of all existing aid funds from whatever source. We would anticipate that we, or the Americans, or the British should find such a director and that he would be provided under one or other of the aid programmes. Clearly the scheme would only succeed if the right sort of person can be found to undertake this difficult assignment but we would hope that this would not be an impossible task provided The West Indies would agree that it is desirable.

5. For example, we have talked a great deal about the need for improving port facilities in order to increase inter-island trade and also in order to reduce the operating costs of inter-island ships. The key to this general plan is Antigua where the harbour facilities are completely inadequate and expensive. Nobody knows just how that situation should be tackled. I now understand that the harbour basin of St. John's, which is a shallow stretch of water, is so shallow that it would be impractical to think in terms of dredging the channel and building a satisfactory dock inside that basin. Moreover, apparently the currents are such that even if money could be found to dredge a channel the cost of keeping it clear would be high. It may well be therefore that the Antigua problem would have to be solved by seeking a port development elsewhere and this would mean considerable cost in access road construction, power lines and entirely new warehousing facilities. A decision would also have to be made as to just what kind of dock would need to be built, that is to say, whether it should be for large sugar freighters or if it would be sufficient to build docks to accommodate inter-island shipping. This in turn would require a decision as to whether Antigua should continue to be principally based on sugar and cotton. It is a marginal sugar producer that cannot provide sufficient labour to bring in all its cane. At the same time it is probable that it could become a major and economic meat producer to provide the Windwards and Trinidad with a source of meat without having to rely to the same extent as they do now on imports from Australia and New Zealand. So far this problem has not been approached in any co-ordinated way with the result that nobody is clear how to proceed and there is a danger that by attacking any one facet of the problem in isolation, we may be perpetuating an economic pattern that will not lead to the maximum use of resources in the future.

6. Apart from the question of the harbour, this also raises the question concerning the ships that we are committed to provide and that are under design consideration at the present time. As you know, we have been very much concerned at the size of these vessels and at the prospect that their operating costs would place a heavy strain on the Federal finances. There has been no unanimity here between the Financial watch dogs and the Minister of Communications but nevertheless it has been difficult for the experts to devise smaller ships that could meet the general requirements, both economic and political. However, all of the thinking so far has been based on a two-ship concept whereas it is possible that the solution lies in an entirely different type of shipping set-up. The fact that we have offered two ships has probably tended to narrow the consideration down to this two-ship concept.

7. The difficulty with trying to devise ships to fill the requirements for the traditional type of shipping service — that is to say linking British Guiana, Trinidad, Windwards, Leewards and Jamaica in a single run — is that this requires the linking of two totally different specifications, i.e., the Windwards and Leewards need frequent service of very small cargo vessels equipped with refrigerated space and little or no cabin accommodation. The Jamaica-Antigua link, on the other hand, requires less frequent service and it could be argued that it has little real economic justification. At the same time, in order to strengthen the Federation, there is clearly a political requirement for a direct link and it may well be that some cabin passenger accommodation is necessary for the same purpose.

8. Probably the ideal solution for the shipping and economic problems of the Federation would be two small ships running up and down the Leewards and Windwards and using Antigua as a collection and distribution point for linking the area with Jamaica (through the service of a third small ship of somewhat different specifications) and with Puerto Rico and the American Virgin Islands for the supply of fresh fruit and vegetables.

9. I do not know if it is too late to raise this question now or if in fact we would like to re-open the subject. I raise it, however, because there does seem to me to be a very real question of whether or not what we are doing in providing two relatively large and “complicated” ships is going to be in the best interest of The West Indies in the long run. A more co-ordinated look at the overall problem might suggest that a better solution might well be along the lines suggested above using three ships. We might well object on the grounds that three ships would cost much more than two and that for this reason alone such a change of plans would be unacceptable. I am not sure, however, if we would be wise in pushing ahead with our present plans without sounding out The West Indies to see if they would not wish to have a more comprehensive look at the position. It is possible, it seems to me, that we might find that we could build two smaller ships with no, or practically no, cabin accommodation at a very considerable saving in dollars. The Jamaica link possibly could be handled by the Federation through a charter vessel, or perhaps some second hand ship could be found to provide the Jamaica-Antigua link so that the cost of the three ships would work out to be considerably less than the anticipated $6,000,000. Moreover, it is just possible that the loss on the operation of the two vessels for the Leeward and Windward route would be so small that the whole co-ordinated project would look much more effective to The West Indies. The extent to which the operating deficit would be reduced would depend on the success that the aid projects would have in bringing about improved production in the Leewards and possibly in switching over existing production there to other products such as meat.

10. All of the foregoing is of course purely conjectural at the present time. The West Indies have no intention of asking us to do any such thing, nor have they proposed the establishment of an aid director who would be responsible for the developing of all of the aid programmes. I put it to you, however, to have your reaction on its merits. I propose sounding out The West Indies discreetly and making it clear that we are in no way trying to force them to change their present organization or plans but simply as what might be called a technical proposal they might like to consider it to see if it has any appeal to them. I would make it plain of course that such proposals have not come from the Canadian Government and that they are simply personal observations that arise from our brief experience in trying to operate under the present system.

11. Whatever we do with the ships does not necessarily have a bearing on the general direction of aid. On that question there is little doubt in our minds that there is a desperate need for a better method of co-ordination and utilization of the resources that are available.

12. In a despatch† that you shall be receiving shortly I am reporting an observation made by Mr. Lightbourne of Jamaica in attacking the Government over the Prime Minister's recent announcement concerning taxation in Jamaica, when he referred to Canadian aid as being welcome but not of such a magnitude as the Prime Minister would have The West Indies believe. It is important, I think, that we should not overplay our aid participation. The Prime Minister has gone out of his way to express his gratitude and in so doing he has made it somewhat embarrassing for us since it is clearly not of such a magnitude (it is not suggested that it should be) that it will cure all of the economic problems of the Federation. I suggest therefore that in so far as we are concerned we should now adopt a cooling off period and in our public announcements to The West Indies we should lay little, if any, emphasis on our aid programme. During the visit of the Chamber of Commerce and the two Trade Fairs there will be many occasions when Canadians will be talking to the West Indians, both privately and in public speeches. I suggest that as far as possible we should avoid reference to our aid programme. Already the over emphasis on the programme has probably raised the hopes of the West Indians to an unfortunate degree and I think it is important that we should not build up to a point where disillusionment or disappointment will be interpolated into a reaction against Canada.

Ottawa, December 9, 1958

Dear Sir:

SHIPS FOR THE WEST INDIES

I have read, with interest, the communication from the Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in Trinidad, dated November 25th, dealing with the general question of aid and, among other things, commenting upon the high costs of the larger-type ships suggested by the Federation government and the alternative possibility of considering something smaller and less expensive.

This reached us when we were considering the earlier request we had received regarding detailed information on the estimated costs of the new ships which the Federation would wish to have, taking into account additions which they have suggested.

To give a reasonably accurate cost figure will require us to make a detailed costs survey at an expense of perhaps between five to ten thousand dollars. This we are prepared to undertake and could complete quickly if so desired, but before doing so, I felt that the following should be mentioned.

We have been concerned over the fact that the West Indian comments on our original proposal had led to a substantial enlargement and increase in cost of the ship project; and equally concerned as to whether the West Indian approach was fully realistic, taking into account the needs of inter-island traffic, the revenues that may be received and the fact that more expensive ships will also be more expensive to operate. Moreover, with a rapidly growing inter-island aviation traffic, we have wondered, for example, whether it is really necessary to count as heavily on ship passenger accommodation of a rather extensive nature, including facilities which, if not luxurious, are at least very comfortable.

It is scarcely our role in the Department of Transport to question the West Indian concept, but we do believe there may be a good case for at least raising the point with the West Indies government at senior, presumably Ministerial, level, along the lines that Mr. Smith has indicated.

Our original expectation with regard to the type of ship which might serve the West Indian need was for a vessel that would cost around 2 1/2 millions to build in Canada. When we elaborated the detailed plans to show to the West Indian officials, it became apparent that the type of thing we had in mind would run something higher, perhaps up to $2 3/4 millions. As indicated above, we hesitate to give too firm a figure on the present costs as a result of the further requests received, but I do not think I would be too far out in saying that the changes requested by the West Indies authorities have increased the cost of the vessel to $3 1/4 millions and possibly a little higher. To each of these figures must be added a percentage figure which may not be identical in each case but might run from 10% to 12%, to cover provisioning, trials, transportation and training of crew, delivery, etc. Thus, what originally started out as a project of from $5 millions to $5 1/2 millions for two ships, now may run pretty close to $8 millions, leaving relatively little out of the $10 millions total gift.

While we have not made any detailed study, I do feel that it would be possible to design a ship of, say, 200 feet in length, which would be adequate to do the type of work envisaged by our Commissioner and at a much lower cost than the present project, — probably even lower than our own original estimates of the present project. Needless to say, the size of ship as well as the equipment in it will have a very definite bearing upon the operating cost, and a vessel of this smaller sort, constructed on an economy basis, would be very much cheaper to operate than would the much more expensive vessel that is now being considered.

In view of the foregoing, for the moment we will suspend any further action until we hear from you as to whether we should proceed on the basis of the more expensive type of ship which will incorporate all the modifications suggested by the West Indian authorities; or whether a fresh approach is likely to be considered.

Yours sincerely,

J.R. BALDWIN

CANADA-WEST INDIES AID PROGRAMME

You will recall that on September 23, at the time of the Montreal Conference, there was an exchange of letters between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of The West Indies embodying an undertaking by the Canadian Government to seek parliamentary approval for a total of $10 million, over a period of five years, for aid in the economic development of The West Indies. In the same context it was agreed that the provision of two ships for The West Indies inter-island shipping service would form a major part of our aid programme for The West Indies.

2. In the intervening months discussions have been held between ourselves and the Federal authorities of The West Indies concerning the most appropriate design for these two ships. As a result of successive modifications which The West Indies side have suggested in the design of these ships, their cost is now likely to run pretty close to $8 million.

3. It has seemed to us that we ought to review this matter with The West Indies in the light of the following factors:

(a) the more expensive the ships are the more expensive they are likely to be to operate; this would place a serious strain on the very limited budgetary resources of The West Indies Federal Government;

(b) it would be unfortunate if the two ships were to absorb so large a proportion of our $10 million programme that relatively little would be left for other projects; (from our point of view we also have an interest in ensuring that the $10 million programme is reasonably spread over the five-year period);

(c) the reports from our Commissioner in Port-of-Spain suggest that the latest design which The West Indians have recommended to us might not be the design best adapted to meet the economic requirements of inter-island service in The West Indies.

4. A group of Canadian officials, including Dr. Ault, the Colombo Plan Administrator, Mr. Pollock, of the Department of Finance, and Mr. Goldschlag of this Department, will be going to Port-of-Spain next week for discussions with The West Indies authorities on the shape of our aid programme. It is clear that the scope of these discussions will depend on the funds likely to be available after provision has been made for the construction of the two ships.

5. Meanwhile, The West Indies authorities have expressed some disappointment over the prospective cost of the ships and the possibility that we may ask them to look into alternative designs. They have suggested that one way of meeting their problem and ours might be to have at least one of the two ships built in British Guiana if it were found that this would result in substantial savings.

6. In replying to this approach, we have asked our Commissioner to remind The West Indian authorities of the emphasis we have placed in all our discussions with them on Canadian aid being provided in the form of Canadian goods and services. We have given it as the official view, which we thought would be shared by Ministers, that this was the best way of ensuring continued public support in Canada for our West Indies aid programme. Nevertheless, we indicated that, if enquiries showed that there was a very significant spread in construction costs between Canada and British Guiana and that the British Guiana shipyards were, in fact, capable of constructing ships of this kind, officials would be prepared to put this matter to Ministers if this proved to be necessary as a last resort to reach agreement on a mutually acceptable aid programme.

7. I thought that you would wish to have this background information available in case it proved necessary for our aid mission to seek Ministerial views on this matter in the course of their discussions in Port-of-Spain.

QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS IN THE WEST INDIES¹⁰⁸

You are aware from discussions in Montreal¹⁰⁹ that relaxation of import restrictions is to be introduced in the colonies. So far as The West Indies are concerned these changes will affect the Open General Licence System and the Trade Liberalization Plan. Since the UK proposes that changes should become effective on January 1/59 it is a matter of urgency to obtain their agreement with our wishes regarding any changes in the licencing system as quickly as possible. These changes will affect a wide range of Canadian exporters as well as the success of The West Indies Trade Fair Project.

2. We have discussed with Maynier the UK proposals as they affect the West Indies. We understand that all products under Open General Licence in the UK may be extended the same licencing treatment in the West Indies. This will greatly increase the number of products under OGL but many of those on the UK list are not repeat not important in The West Indies trade. The total dollars available for other products which would be subject to individual licencing would be the same as in 1957 and would include expenditures under the liberalization plan and under the special dollar schemes minus the value of imports of products to be placed under OGL. The proposal involves as you are aware changing the administration of the Trade Liberalization Plan.

3. We were hoping for liberalization on a wider scale than is provided for under the UK proposals. We would wish you to make some counterproposals to the West Indies which would serve to broaden the liberalization and to provide reasonable assurances that Canadian trade will not repeat not suffer as a result of these new arrangements.

4. Regarding the proposed transfers to Open General Licence we have a number of comments. Firstly the UK list does not repeat not contain a number of products which are already under OGL in most West Indian Territories. Among these are salted, dried, pickled and smoked fish, potatoes, onions, butter, cheese, milk, meat, apples, calcium carbide and unmanufactured tobacco. We would assume, of course, that all these products would continue to be subject to OGL treatment but we would wish to assure that this was the case. Secondly you will recall that we requested OGL treatment for a number of products at the meetings of officials in London in June. We understand that a number of these are on the UK OGL list including copper wire and cable, primary steel electrical equipment, outboard motors, files and rasps, building boards and papers, plastic film and tubing, malt flour and most pharmaceutical products in bulk. Although this is welcome progress we were hoping that more products than these would be placed under OGL and in particular we would wish to have this treatment extended to fresh and frozen fish, eggs, leather, fents, paints, varnishes, enamels and lacquers and all pharmaceutical preparations whether in bulk or not repeat not. We would wish you to press for OGL treatment for these products as well. The savingram from the UK which Maynier let us see indicated that they are prepared to have fish and eggs liberalized at this time.

5. In making these comparisons regarding Open General Licence treatment we are using the existing UK list. The UK savingram included a list of products. We are arranging to obtain a copy of this through Canada House. When we have had a chance to check the authoritative list we will advise you as necessary regarding further details.

6. Regarding individual licencing we would wish to obtain assurances on some important points. Firstly we are concerned about the possibility of import restrictions being used for protective purposes in the West Indies, particularly in Jamaica. Secondly some Canadian exporters who have benefitted under the token import scheme may well find themselves suddenly excluded from these markets following transfer of administration of the plan. Now that so much progress has been made in reducing discrimination and in view of the early prospect of further liberalization of consumer goods, it would give cause for the strongest criticism from Canadian exporters if changes in administrative arrangements lead to disruption of commercial connections when the very purpose of the token import scheme is so near to fulfilment. On the other hand we recognize the strong desire on the part of the West Indies for transfer of administration of the plan and accept the timeliness of achieving this in conjunction with the steps towards liberalization now in prospect.

7. In order to achieve a smooth transfer we would propose that import controllers in each of the islands should be provided by this department with a tabulation showing the individual West Indian importers, their Canadian suppliers, the merchandise moved (under broad classifications) and the corresponding dollar quota used in 1957 under the plan. This would serve as a guide for the import controllers to distribute quotas in 1959. This tabulation could be prepared in the department in about one month.

8. It is not repeat not proposed in this connection that West Indian importers should be restricted as to commodity or as between supplier in the use of these quotas in importing from Canada. Administration of these quotas would be on the same basis as the American section of the plan. The proposed arrangement would simply give an importer the right to quotas based upon the business conducted under the token import scheme in 1957 but it would also give the Canadian exporter the advantage of knowing from the start who holds quotas for imports of his products and in what amount. Thus uncertainties in the minds of both importers and exporters would be removed at the time of change over in administration. The later distribution of unused balances would be at the discretion of the local authorities as would be other future changes in the administration of the new system.

9. We would propose also that all these various changes including the assurances which we are seeking would be embodied into a press release issued jointly by Canada and The West Indies.

10. We would of course appreciate having your views on these suggestions. We informed Mr. Maynier that we would be giving you our views of this matter and we would wish you to inform him immediately of our position unless you see reason to delay. On the occasion your forthcoming visit to Ottawa there may be an opportunity for discussion to finalize matters. You will appreciate that if we are to accept the responsibility of preparing these quota statements for their supply to import controllers before January 1 a decision needs to be reached before November 1.

Port-of-Spain, October 13, 1958

Dear Mr. Schwarzmann,

LIBERALIZATION OF DOLLAR IMPORTS — WEST INDIES

1. We were delighted to have your telegram TC.2477 of October 8th and as soon as we had it deciphered we arranged for a conference with Maynier in order that we could determine the best manner of proceeding to implement the British offer of greater liberalization made in Montreal.

2. There are two general comments concerning your message which it is important to make at the start. The first point is that the original British proposal that was outlined in the restricted savingram sent from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, which Earl Maynier showed you, does not contemplate any retention of the Trade Liberalization Plan although it admits that the Canadian Government might not consider the amount of liberalization sufficiently attractive and might therefore wish to retain the present token import scheme. The savingram does not, however, make any reference to changing the administration of the scheme if there is to be any remnant. The second point that we should emphasize is that there is little that can be done in the West Indies in regard to the extension of the O.G.L. list in the first instance. This must be negotiated in London.

3. We are of course aware of the short time at our disposal in order to re-arrange these matters and it was in the hope of saving a few days that we sent off yesterday to External Affairs our en clair telegram No. 96.† Our thought was that you could immediately start discussing possibilities of the extension of the O.G.L. list with the British as a first step in bringing forward a general movement for liberalization. This letter will attempt to give you our ideas on how we might proceed and we are sending it by safe hand of T.C.A. so that you will have it a day or so before I reach Ottawa. I believe that Williams will stay on in Ottawa for Monday or Tuesday or for as long as necessary. Although he is not the official immediately concerned, he has a watching brief over all of these matters and is deeply interested in them.

4. Earl Maynier was kind enough to let me borrow the copy of the savingram and we are enclosing a copy of it.† Maynier did not suggest that I make a copy although I imagine he is sufficiently intelligent to believe that I would do so. The point is that the British will not know we have a copy of the savingram and, while I see no reason why they should object to our having it, we should be very careful not to let them know that it is actually in our possession. Unfortunately we have had no time to copy the lists which are extensive, but since you are getting a copy from London I hope that this will not be too serious an omission.

5. We think that you may be under a wrong impression when you say in paragraph 2 of your telegram that the United Kingdom proposals involve a change in the administration of the Plan. They suggest an abolition of the Plan as the first objective. Nor are we satisfied that the West Indies have a strong desire for the transfer of administration of the Plan into their own hands as you suggest in paragraph 6. This was a proposal made by Jamaica some time ago but we are not aware that the Jamaicans have pushed this question recently and certainly there has been no suggestion in Trinidad or in the other islands that they would like to take over the administration of the Plan. We would make a mistake therefore, I think, if we conclude that the West Indies would place heavy emphasis on taking over control if we ended up by having any Plan left to play with.

6. It seems to us that our first step in this problem is to decide just what we want to do. Clearly we are not going to reach all at one jump a complete abolition of exchange control or of dollar discrimination. The next objective presumably is to extend the O.G.L. list as far as possible. Until we know how far we can go in that respect it would be difficult to make decisions concerning what we should do with the Plan or how far we can push for a greater exchange availability on the commodities not freed.

7. As far as the abolition of the Plan is concerned, as you point out in your paragraph 6, this will depend on the extent to which we can obtain guarantees that commodities previously shipped under the Plan and not liberalized would continue to have access to these markets to a degree not smaller than that which they have at the present time. If the West Indies do raise the question of administering a remnant of the Plan then we must similarly exact some kind of guarantees, again as you suggest in your paragraph 6, that exchange control will not be used for protection purposes. Even without a Plan we will need to have some kind of general statement guaranteeing that the iniquitous habit which seems to commend itself to Jamaica will not be pursued.

8. Insofar as the retention of the Plan is concerned, it seems to us that we should aim towards its abolition. As you say in your paragraph 6, such a move might run into considerable opposition by certain companies who have benefitted greatly by the Plan. In some cases at least the benefits have not been confined to giving the companies access to exchange but they have in recent years given such companies protection in the market considerably beyond that provided in the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement. Sooner or later these companies are going to have to come out into the open and to meet competition without protection provided by the token import scheme. Provided, therefore, that we can succeed in extending the O.G.L. list and obtaining suitable guarantees concerning the treatment of the remaining non-freed items, then it is our view that we should agree with the British and abolish the Plan. We acknowledge, however, that the provisions just stated may not be easy to achieve.

9. Concerning the possibility of extending the list of items on O.G.L. you may recall that, during our conversations with Sir Hilton Poynton in Montreal, we raised the question of where we would stand in the event that an examination was made of the lists of goods liberalized for the United Kingdom (and therefore offered for liberalization in the Colonies). We asked him specifically if it were to be found that the lists benefitted the United States more than us whether we would have the opportunity of negotiating with the British to add more of our commodities that had been specified in London to the O.G.L. List for the West Indies. He stated that most certainly the question would be subject to further discussion. The way is therefore open to us to go to the British to negotiate an extended list. You say in your paragraph 3 that we should make some counter proposals to the West Indies. The West Indies cannot at this stage come into the question. They can only operate within the limits established from London. It is true that the savingram does give the West Indies the authority to add fresh and frozen fish and eggs to the list but beyond that they cannot go without authority from London. You ask us in paragraph 4 to press for O.G.L. treatment for a number of items specified in your paragraph. Unfortunately, while we have no doubt that the West Indies would give us full support, the first step must be taken in London.

10. As far as our original list submitted to the British in London is concerned, there seems to be some confusion between the interpretation of the new liberalized list as far as its coverage of our list is concerned. You will note that paragraph 14 in the savingram includes malt, non-insulated copper wire and cable, building board, paper board, pharmaceutical products except for certain anti-biotics, etc., primary steel, flour and polyethylene film and tubing. In your telegram you say that in addition to the above mentioned items you think that outboard motors, files and rasps and electrical equipment are also on the free list. We think that there is no doubt that outboard motors and power lawn mowers are included. Outboard motors are listed in paragraph 71.105 and power lawn mowers under 71.202, both items being clearly free in the list attached to the savingram. Similarly files and rasps are included under paragraph 69.912.

11. On the other hand electric meters, etc. seem to be excluded since these come under tariff paragraph 72.101 and it is only items specifically mentioned in that item that are to be liberalized. These items do not include the electric meters or other items included in our list except for generators and transformers.

12. We should, we think, request London to add the items included in your paragraph 4 to the lists of O.G.L. for the West Indies. We think, however, that permission has already been given for fish and eggs and we suggest that we should add to our demands electric meters, communications equipment, and the anti-biotics, etc., provided that Canadian companies think they can compete. These items so nearly complete the list of our demands that we wonder why you have left out macaroni and spaghetti, roofing papers, tires and tubes. We assume that it will not be possible to obtain all our requirements and the fact that the British have specifically exempted certain pharmaceuticals might suggest that it might be particularly difficult to have such items included. There is also the small matter of malt extract which we have already suggested to the Canadian suppliers we should negotiate with the British when this matter comes up for consideration. It is such a small item that there would seem to be no reason why we should not push for its inclusion, particularly since the Barbadian officials seem quite content to include it if the British would agree.

13. By way of argument for an extension to the lists we would think that you could make quite a strong case on the grounds that the present lists do in fact help the United States considerably more than Canada. We have not had the time to make a detailed study of the new lists and to analyse the recently freed items in relation to imports from Canada or the United States. A quick survey of the lists, however, and we have not the full S.I.T.C. list to enable us to check on each item, does seem to suggest that the United States is going to benefit from this move more than are we. Since we are all agreed that it is desirable to increase Commonwealth trade we would imagine that this argument would carry considerable weight.

14. In your paragraph 4 you point out that the U.K. list does not contain a number of products that are now on most West Indian O.G.L. lists. This was a point which we cleared repeatedly with the British in Montreal and they quite categorically assured us that any items now on the free list would continue to be so regarded.

15. While you are making your approaches to the British we should at the same time set out for the Federal Government the kind of guarantees that we would hope they could give us concerning the treatment of the commodities that remain off the O.G.L. list, whether or not there is to be a continuing token import scheme. If we will do this the Federal Government will undertake to send such criteria to the different island governments and ask them to comment on them, at the same time giving our proposals their blessing — provided of course that they are in agreement with them. Assuming first of all that we agree to abolish the scheme then we suggest that we should propose that we should obtain written assurances that (a) the administration of future dollar allocations should not be designed to provide protection to local industry but should be on the basis of need and that items should be discriminated against only for balance of payments reasons. (b) we should ask that items which were previously on the token import scheme should not be denied access to the allocations by virtue of any decision that they are not considered essential, or for any other reason. It should be understood that in giving up the token import scheme we do so with the undertaking that the unit governments will set aside a quota at least equal to the dollar exchange expended on imports of those commodities in 1957, as long as the importers of those commodities are interested in continuing to import the commodities in question.

16. On the other hand if it is agreed that the Plan must be continued in truncated form, then we do not think we should raise the question of handing the scheme over for the administration by unit territories. If the islands or the Federation press us on that point we should give way, but until they do we think we should assume that we will continue to administer any remaining scheme. Doing so, however, we should insist that the eligible list should be abolished. We might also ask for a slight increase in the total amount of exchange available for the goods remaining on the scheme. We say a small amount simply because we do not think an outright increase in the total amount has any chance of being accepted and we are not at all sure that it would be desirable since we might have trouble in using up all of the exchange.

17. If we are forced to hand over the scheme for local administration then we must do so with even firmer guarantees. However, we are somewhat afraid that if we were to follow the proposals contained in your paragraph 8 without any quotas for commodities, Canadian companies might find themselves in the position of being unable to ship because their importers or agents might prefer to use their exchange for other commodities with a higher profit margin. Let us hope, however, that this question will not arise and that first the schemes will be done away with, or, failing that, that we will continue to administer a very much truncated remnant with complete freedom of action as to commodities.

18. It is going to be difficult to endeavour to tie up all these loose ends in time to have this new régime in operation by the first of next year. Nevertheless, provided we can talk to the British at once, we think that it could be done. Clearly it is most desirable that it should be done. It should tend to increase the interest in our Trade Fairs, but the main point is that it would give concrete evidence that we are pushing ahead with the results of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference and also add stature to the Federal Government.

19. You will understand, of course, that in sending these lists to the Colonies the United Kingdom is not imposing its will on local government, all they are doing is seeing that the Colonies may liberalize to the extent indicated. We think that insofar as the West Indies are concerned there will be very little problem in having practically all of the items included in a wider O.G.L. list. Jamaica is perhaps the only Colony that will give trouble.

20. I hope that this letter will reach you before I arrive but mails being such as they are I may find myself talking to you about these things without giving you an opportunity to digest all of this spinach. I thought you might also like to have a copy of the note which Sir Hilton Poynton sent to me in Montreal before I left. It is his interpretation of the message that they received from London dealing with the liberalization programme and which is spelled out in more detail in the savingram.

Yours sincerely,

R.G.C. SMITH

P.S. You will observe that throughout this we have used a small "the" in writing about the Federation of The West Indies. There is some confusion here arising from the fact that an announcement has just been made that the official title is now to be West Indies.

CONFIDENTIAL

Montreal, September 24, 1958

Dear Guy [Smith],

As promised at our discussion this morning, I send you herewith the gist of the telegram from London about our dollar liberalization proposals as regards the Colonial territories:

(a) All goods on U.K. Dollar O.G.L. list (including additions of machinery items) could be put on O.G.L. in the Colonies. The broad effect would be to put on dollar O.G.L. almost all items other than consumer goods, certain food stuffs and certain special items.

(b) Colonies would be free to spend outside their dollar allocation any dollars required for (a) above.

(c) Dollar allocations for 1959 would be at rate of 1957 expenditure on items other than (a) above, plus provision for items at (d) below in the case of Caribbean Territories only.

(d) On token imports scheme some items would be absorbed by (a) above. This should represent a clear gain for Canada. We are proposing to the Caribbean Territories that 1957 expenditure on remaining items should be added to dollar allocations under (c) above and token imports scheme as such wound up.

(e) Not all the items proposed by the Canadians for liberalization are included in (a) above, but our hope is that benefit to the Canadians arising out of (a) will more than make up for any expectations they may have had in the more limited field of token imports, which in any case apply only to the Caribbean Territories.

(f) Full circular with our proposals is not likely to be despatched to Colonial Governments before Wednesday (24th). Proposed liberalization date is 1st January, 1959.

(g) We must await views of Colonial Governments before announcing publicly what liberalization they each propose to adopt, but Canadians may be informed of the full details of our proposals including full liberalization list, subject to "Restricted" security classification treatment.

Yours

A.H. POYNTON

BRITISH WEST INDIES — TRADE LIBERALIZATION

I received your telexes TC-2565† and 2566† asking that we urgently approach the Colonial Office and the Board of Trade regarding additional items to be included under Open General Licence in the West Indies area. I immediately got in touch with the Board of Trade, requesting a meeting as soon as possible at which, if possible, the Colonial Office should be represented. I advised you by telex on November 4 that a meeting had been arranged for this morning which was the earliest possible.

2. This meeting was held in the office of Mr. W. Hughes who has replaced Mr. A.E. Percival in charge of commercial relations with Canada and the Sterling Commonwealth. Present were Mr. Kelvin Stark, who is concerned with import licences in the Colonial Office, Mr. Christopher Lucas from the Treasury, Miss Joy Brewster in charge of, in particular, Board of Trade Relations with Canada, and Mrs. Wright, also of the Commercial Relations and Exports Division, connected with Colonial questions. I was accompanied by Mr. J.F. Grandy, Counsellor (Finance), Canada House.

3. I expressed again Canada's pleasure at the placing of industrial chemicals and articles in the machinery field under Open General Licence in the UK and the request to Colonies to follow suit. I explained that we had obtained from the Colonial Office a copy of those items which it had requested the Colonies, including the British West Indies, to place under World Open General Licence and ventured the view that in many cases Open General Licence treatment for these products in the West Indies would be of more assistance to the USA than to ourselves. I then reminded those present of the proposals that had been made by Canada last June here in London, notably for the placing of some items additional to those on the UK OGL list under OGL in the British West Indies.

4. We went through the list proposed by Canada in June item by item and, as I anticipated, the UK does not wish to suggest to colonies that articles should be placed under Open General Licence by them if they have not yet been so treated here in the UK itself. Moreover they feel they cannot suggest a wider list to the West Indies colonies than to any other colonies, although we emphasized the special position historically and economically of the BWI to Canada. Possible exceptions to the foregoing are fresh and frozen fish and eggs. In respect of these two categories, the Colonial Office has asked the Colonies in the West Indies area for their views. Replies have not yet been received. They believe that fish is already liberalised for entry into certain of the colonies in the West Indies.

5. Flour has not been proposed for WOGL in the BWI. All I could obtain was a statement that the Colonial Office thought this question could be resolved administratively.

6. Further details emerged as follows:

(i) Paper board which is printed or embossed is not being placed under OGL in the West Indies because of local production.

(ii) In the case of roofing papers, they would like more precision as to what is involved.

(iii) Pharmaceutical preparations: some are permitted even when packed for retail sale but sulphonamides, vitamins, hormones and antibiotics are excluded from OGL for the West Indies.

(iv) Polyethylene film and tubing is placed under OGL unless it is "surface worked" which in effect means is intended for retail sale to the public.

7. We were told that cables had been sent last week hastening the colonies to reply to the "strongly worded request" that OGL be granted to the products which had been proposed. The new OGL's are to be brought into effect on January 1 next.

8. The thinking here, as stated in the second paragraph of your TC-2566, is that the trade liberalization plan might well be terminated and a global dollar amount, equivalent to that which had been expended under it, for goods still not entitled to OGL, be added to the free dollars (described here as "allocation") amount already at the disposal of the individual Colonies for use at their discretion. This is quite apart of course from any necessary funds required to permit implementation of OGL treatment.

9. In view of the wish here to see the TLP terminated as far as possible, there is not much sympathy with Canada's suggestion in June that certain products be added to those eligible under the plan. Nor was there any favourable response to our suggestion last June that foreign exchange allocated for products remaining under the plan be doubled.

10. I made clear that Ottawa would like an opportunity for careful study of what is involved before agreeing to a termination of the plan. I mentioned that there was a tendency in certain Colonies to use a high proportion of their free dollars for the import of frivolous articles, such as costume jewellery, carrying a high profit margin and susceptible to quick turnover. If this pattern spread to the use of exchange formerly earmarked for the TLP existing exports could be prejudiced.

11. I emphasized that the application of World Open General Licence throughout the Caribbean had been quite variable from colony to colony, particularly in the category of wood products.

12. The British assured us that their OGL proposals had been sent to all those colonies at present operating under the plan and that they expected they would be favourably received throughout the area.

13. I left with them an aide mémoire† listing those products which we would now like to see placed under World Open General Licence in the West Indies, the Bahamas, British Guiana and British Honduras, in addition to those already proposed by the UK to these Colonies.

14. The British promised to go over this list carefully and urgently and give us their comments. Their first reaction was that they thought several of those listed are already proposed for OGL in the island. When we have their reactions, I propose to point out which items we would wish given priority.

15. Finally I pointed out why it was urgent to clarify this whole question, since Ottawa must be able to advise the exporters what the procedures would be under what is left of the Trade Liberalization Plan.

16. While the British persisted in their feeling that it would be desirable to simplify matters and terminate the plan, they suggested that if Canada had not time to examine their proposals and come to agreement before the end of the year, they would probably be quite prepared to renew the plan, at least for some further period. Six months was suggested tentatively.

BRITISH WEST INDIES TRADE LIBERALIZATION

The Board of Trade now advise that following items were indeed already proposed to BWI (including British Guiana, Bahamas and British Honduras) to be placed under OGL: copper and copper alloy tubing, sheet, strip, rod and wire; nickel anodes; castings, forg-ings, and samplings of iron and steel, whether stainless, alloy or any other forms; bars and rods of iron and steel, whether stainless, alloy or any other form.

2. As regards cellulose film, base only has been proposed.

3. Electric wires, cables, switch boards and switch gear have already been proposed to BWI. This meets in part our request regarding electrical wiring devices including controls.

4. As intimated in paragraph 4 TC-307 it now seems even clearer that we are highly unlikely to get all our proposals for additional OGL recommended by London to the BWI. Accordingly I am now advising Board of Trade which additional OGL items we wish given prior consideration. Please advise whether we should press for cellulose film other than base and also for remained of "electrical wiring devices including controls."

5. British fear that if "orderly" advance is not made they will have trouble justifying their position to importers in BWI.

6. Board of Trade states some replies have come in from the colonies regarding proposed OGL's but they are beginning to doubt that they will be able by year end to make a tidy announcement.

7. We would welcome early comments regarding TC-307.

WEST INDIES TRADE LIBERALIZATION PLAN

1. My immediately following message contains the text of a memorandum on the above subject which has been approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. You should now approach the UK on the basis of this memorandum. The following outlines additional points for use in making your approach.

2. In agreeing to the abolition of the Trade Liberalization Plan we are surrendering a position of considerable advantage to Canadian exporters. The plan has ensured a continuity of trade for traditional Canadian exporters and the Department of Trade and Commerce has been able to meet the changing needs of particular exporters. With the abolition of the plan these advantages would be lost and there is a real possibility that a number of individual Canadian firms will be adversely affected. In addition, there is the danger that a larger proportion of the dollar exchange would be taken up by high profit and quick turnover goods at the expense of trade in the more staple items.

3. On the basis of these considerations and in order to have an arrangement which could be reasonably defended in Canada it would be necessary to obtain a substantial increase in the dollar allocation for products remaining under restriction. As a minimum we believe that an increase of twenty five percent in the total dollar allocation would be reasonable.

We would estimate that this would involve a possible additional dollar expenditure by the West Indies of some five dollars to ten dollars million yearly.

4. We also propose certain assurances regarding the continuity of Canadian export trade to the West Indies. We attach considerable importance to obtaining the assurances outlined in paragraph ten of our immediately following message. As you know, some West Indian territories, particularly Jamaica have imposed import restrictions designed to protect local industries. We are anxious that the adverse effects of any restrictions upon Canadian trade should be minimized.

5. Presumably the undertakings we seek would have to be obtained directly from the West Indies authorities but you should explore this matter with the UK and seek their support. Such assurances are an essential part of our agreement to new arrangements.

6. To the Canadian Commissioner to the West Indies; please discuss this matter with the West Indies authorities and advise them of the nature of our approach to the UK. You should emphasize the confidential nature of these discussions. We would leave it to you to decide whether it would be appropriate to raise the question of assurances with West Indies authorities before we have obtained a reaction from the UK. We are not repeat not sending you now the memorandum to the Minister referred to in paragraph one because this was sent to you in Jamaica on December 3.

WEST INDIES TRADE LIBERALIZATION PLAN

The following memorandum dealing with the Trade Liberalization Plan has been approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

1. The UK has proposed to the West Indies that the Canadian and USA Trade Liberalization Plans should be terminated on January 1, 1959 and replaced by a single dollar allocation for all restricted imports from the USA, Canada and other dollar countries. A decision with regard to the Canadian reaction to this proposal is now required.

2. Background. At the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference the UK advised that all colonies including the West Indies are being invited to free from restriction on January 1, 1959 all dollar goods which have been freed in the UK. This list consists of raw materials, basic foodstuffs, chemicals and machinery. We have requested the UK to authorize the removal of dollar restrictions in the West Indies on a number of additional products of particular interest to Canada. However, even if these additional items are added a broad range of manufactured items would continue to be subject to restrictions on their importation into the West Indies from Canada. Under the UK proposal the total amount of exchange for restricted imports would be limited to the combined value of such imports from dollar sources in the base period 1957.

3. The Trade Liberalization Plan was commenced in 1951 in a period of severe dollar restrictions in order to provide for token imports from individual Canadian exporters who had established business in the West Indies markets. The plan has been administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce. In 1958, some 700 Canadian firms participated in the plan and the total value of shipments under it in 1958 will be about dollars ten million. This compares with total Canadian exports to the area of about dollars 44 million.

4. Present Situation. The plan has been reasonably satisfactory from the Canadian point of view for the limited purpose of maintaining Canadian brands in the West Indies markets but this token import character has largely disappeared. As restrictions have been removed for various items the credits available for reallocation to the remaining restricted items have increased substantially in relation to the actual demand. However, there have, of necessity, been limitations in affecting adjustments and while in some cases the present volume of business is probably close to that which could be expected to be obtained under normal trade conditions, in other cases the plan involves a restraint where there is a real possibility of trade expansion.

5. In terms of administration the operation of the plan has involved a burden on this department. While initially this was perhaps essential it is inappropriate that the department should continue this burden, more particularly since it has created the misunderstanding that the department is responsible in a sense for West Indian import restrictions.

6. A further disadvantage of the plan has been that amongst West Indian importers there has been a tendency to confine their trade with Canada within the limitations of the exchange available under the Canadian section of the plan and to use the dollars available outside of the scheme largely for purchases in the USA. This has been represented to us as one of the reasons why imports from the USA have increased more rapidly than from Canada.

7. Thought has been given from time to time to the desirability of terminating the Trade Liberalization Plan if appropriate alternative arrangements could be made. There would seem to be real advantages to new arrangements which would encourage a more competitive approach to Canada-West Indies trade both on the part of Canadian exporters and West Indian importers. It would be desirable to open up a wider field of competition and exchange availability in which competitive Canadian exporters would have an opportunity to increase their trade. While a certain number of Canadian exporters may not repeat not be competitive and may be squeezed out of the market, generally Canadian exporters have a special advantage over their USA competitors because of the existing widespread system of tariff preferences and could be expected to benefit from a more competitive situation in the exchange field.

8. In considering the UK proposal for a single dollar allocation thought has been given to possible alternative arrangements which might perhaps facilitate adjustments by Canadian exporters to a new trading situation. In this connection the possibility of asking for a separate dollar quota in the West Indies for Canada and the USA has been considered. On balance, however it is felt that the advantage for Canada lies in the opening for competition the whole of the dollar exchange available for restricted imports. Moreover, in any such division of available dollars we could expect that the USA would strongly press for more favourable treatment than they now receive.

9. Recommendations. It is recommended that Canadian trade representatives in London and the West Indies be authorized to advise the UK and the West Indian authorities that as part of a broad programme for the removal of dollar restrictions in the West Indies Canada is prepared to agree to the early abolition of the liberalization plan. At the same time in order further to improve the opportunities for Canadian exporters they should be instructed to seek to obtain a substantial increase in the total amount of dollars to be allocated for imports which continue for the time being to remain restricted.

10. In agreeing to the new arrangements and in order to protect the existing access of Canadian exporters to the market, our representatives should also be instructed to seek an understanding that all of the products which may now be imported into the West Indies under the Trade Liberalization Plans will continue to be permitted entry under the new arrangement. They should also seek to arrange for consultations with a view to ensuring that minimum damage is done to Canadian trade interests should any new restrictions become necessary in the West Indies.

11. As regards timing, the UK has suggested that the abolition of the plan could be deferred for six months from January 1. Since we are now into December there would be insufficient time to work out the details of the changes and, in any event, it is desirable to give notice of any changes well in advance. It is recommended that our representatives request that the plan be continued in operation for the first six months of 1959 and that the new arrangements take effect on July 1, 1959.

12. As a means of giving Canadian exporters and West Indian importers sufficient advance notice of the changes and as an instrument of agreement, it is recommended that the Canadian representatives should seek as soon as possible a joint press release with the West Indies and the UK announcing the changes and specifying the assurances given regarding expanded dollar availabilities and continued access for those goods still restricted and previously covered by the plan.

BRITISH WEST INDIES TRADE LIBERALIZATION PLAN

On receipt of your messages TC-2753 and TC-2754 I arranged further meeting at Board of Trade for late yesterday chaired by Doctor Budd who has replaced Levine and with much the same people present.

2. We told British Canada was willing to agree to termination of plan on July 1 next but with some reluctance in view of strong tendency for free dollar allocations to be spent by British West Indies in US. No repeat no immediate decision could be obtained regarding increase in free dollar allocation which would replace funds expanded under plan. This in spite fact I had already revealed verbally last week that Canada would be making a proviso that some thirty percent increase be made. Impression gained that they might possibly agree to some such figure although Lucas of Treasury saw fit to warn that if granted this might mean less progress possible in the next step of liberalization dollar imports of consumer goods next year. We did not repeat not comment on this warning but emphasized that you had indicated an increase in free dollars would be "necessary."

3. British agreeable to tripartite press release probably around March. I emphasized that as an essential part of our agreement it is important to Canada that all goods at present moving to BWI from Canada under plan could continue to move in future and that Canada would expect to be consulted should any new restrictions be contemplated. British are in sympathy but not repeat not too clear what they can do in support. They therefore request that you now forward draft wording of this proviso for their consideration. British enquired if we were requesting assurance that equal quantities of individual commodities could continue to be admitted BWI from Canada. We said we thought no repeat no such rigidities were contemplated and we hope this reflects your thinking accurately.

4. As regards the imminent announcement which will be necessary at year end to explain that plan is to continue, British are anxious that no repeat no intimation be given at that time that plan will only go on for six months as they fear possible abnormally high demand for utilization of plan during those six months. Accordingly they wish year-end announcement to appear routine. If you plan altering that announcement from previous years wording they would like to examine it beforehand. They also requested assurance in general terms that in administration of plan during first six months of next year no repeat no abnormally large funds would be expended. We divulged rough level to which shipments under plan had risen and no repeat no comment was made.

CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIPS; DISPOSAL OF SHIPS
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE DECEMBER 21, 1957†)

7. The Minister of Transport said that since the ships of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships had been out of service,¹¹⁰ a number of other Canadian companies, operating under foreign flag, had inaugurated new services to various parts of the West Indies formerly served by the C.N. (W.I.)S. and that, as a result, the essential needs of Canada-West Indies trade were being met. The cost of the C.N.(W.I.)S. in 1957 was approximately $650,000. Expenses of the ships lying at anchor was $145,000 per month, and at the moment the company had only $110,000 cash on hand. A cargo of sugar valued at $521,000 was still on board one of the vessels and unless discharged soon, it would spoil and the company would be faced with a damage claim. As regards the sale value of the fleet, the market had weakened recently and a possible price of $8,250,000, estimated some months ago, should be reduced by 30 to 40 per cent.

In the circumstances, he agreed with the view of the management that there was no point in attempting to re-establish services by the company and that the ships should be disposed of as quickly as possible. The matter could best be dealt with by an immediate "as is" sale, particularly in view of the extremely contentious labour-railway problems which would arise shortly.

¹¹⁰ Les membres du Seafarers' International Union qui travaillaient sur ces bateaux étaient en grève depuis le 4 juillet 1957.

Members of the Seafarers' International Union who staffed these ships had been on strike since July 4, 1957.

To return the ships to Canadian registry before offering them for sale might alleviate some criticism from organized labour.¹¹¹ However, re-transfer would take about a month. Inevitably, this plan would become known and intensified efforts could be expected, particularly from the Seafarers International Union, to force concessions from the government or the C.N.R. Charges would also be made that the government was admitting a mistake in its previous tactics.

When the ships were sold no restriction as to registry could be made. But it might be possible to impose a condition, for a reasonable period, that the ships be used in trade between Canada and the West Indies. On the other hand, it might not be necessary to do this because it was likely that they would be used in this trade in any event. Sale would be by tender, in which a preference could be given to companies of Canadian origin or established Canadian connections.

The Minister recommended that the C.N.R. be authorized to dispose of these ships in the manner and along the lines that he had outlined.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, April 14, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 67-58).†

8. The Minister of Labour felt strongly that the ships should be transferred back to Canadian registry before being sold. As regards the sugar, other cargoes had been off-loaded from these ships while they had been at anchor in the last several months and it would probably be possible to make arrangements with labour to do the same thing in this instance.

9. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Unloading the sugar might lead to incidents at the dockside but one could not be certain of this until the attempt was made.

(b) The possibility of operating the ships on Canadian registry was reviewed again but the costs and the labour problem involved made such a course impossible. There was no alternative but to sell.

(c) The Minister of Labour should get in touch with the President of the Canadian Labour Congress with regard to unloading the sugar cargo. Beyond attempting to make such arrangements it would be inadvisable to give any indication at this time of what the government had in mind for the future of the ships.

10. The Cabinet noted the recommendation of the Minister of Transport for the sale of the vessels of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and agreed,

(a) that they be re-transferred to Canadian registry and arrangements then made for their sale; and,

(b) that, meanwhile, the Minister of Labour get in touch with the President of the Canadian Labour Congress to arrange for the off-loading of a sugar cargo, on the understanding that nothing be said at this time on the government's intentions with regard to the sale of the ships.

SALE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL WEST INDIES VESSELS

25. The Minister of Transport reported that a number of bids had been received, of which the three best were as follows:

- (1) Banco Cubano—$2,800,000, with ships to be taken “as is where is.”
- (2) North America Shipping Agency—$2,606,000, less full cost of reconditioning to first class condition, which was estimated at $250,000 or possibly higher, for a maximum net of $2,350,000 or less.
- (3) Allan Green, Halifax—on behalf of local syndicate—$2,500,000.

The Banco Cubano proposal was based upon 20 per cent cash, with the balance payable at 5 per cent over five years, guaranteed by the Cuban Bank and the Bank of America. All eight ships were to be operated in trade to Canada from Cuba and the West Indies, with service to be started within thirty days of takeover. This was the highest offer, the soundest in financial terms and security, and the only one involving the use of all the vessels in the trade between Canada and the West Indies. The price offered was considered to be exceptionally favourable and, in fact, higher than the going market price for vessels of this type and condition.

The North America offer was based upon 10 per cent cash, the balance payable over twenty years, with no offer of security, and eighteen months to elapse in connection with the takeover period. Two of the vessels would be operated in service between the West Indies and Canada, and the other six elsewhere. There was a statement of intent to use

Canadian registry. This proposal was weak financially, in that there was no security offered, and the twenty-year term of payment was unrealistic since the ships would be completely obsolete and scrapped, in some cases, long before that. A check on the background of the Company indicated a weak financial position and a shaky credit position in the marine field, with a predecessor related company having recently gone into liquidation with unfulfilled commitments. A Baltic Conference marine circular gave it an unreliable listing. Its most attractive feature, its intent to operate on Canadian registry, was considered unrealistic by both C.N. and governmental and marine officials, since there was every proof that not only in the West Indies trade particularly, but in the world trade generally, the costs of Canadian registry were too high to allow economical operation.

The Allan Green offer was not really a purchase offer but rather a request to lease for five years with a right to purchase at the end of that time, and was based upon C.N. financing of the deal, including possibly working capital, etc. An attempt would be made to operate in the West Indies trade, but it was expected that sooner or later the ships would have to be taken off the Canadian registry.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, August 7, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 234-58).†

26. Mr. Hees pointed out that, had it been known that the government was prepared to consider this type of offer which involved government-C.N. financing of a leasing arrangement, it was felt that many other groups might have made proposals based upon leasing. Lack of certainty based upon the outcome made it difficult to consider this offer.

In regard to the Cuban offer, the ships would probably have to be reconditioned in Canada and efforts would be made to see that they were. Some of the crew involved might be absorbed in Department of Transport ships. It would be difficult to enforce a provision that Canada-West Indies service be continued by these ships, but the chances were good. The price seemed very favourable and the sale could probably be completed at once. It should be noted that the bidder that promised to keep the ships on Canadian registry proposed to cut down on the size of the crews. This would be opposed by the unions and, in addition, the operator would probably run afoul of Shipping Act regulations.

27. The Cabinet agreed to the sale of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship vessels to the Banco Cubano at a price of $2,800,000 on the terms and conditions set out in the circulated document (Cab. Doc. 234-58).

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 237-58

CONFIDENTIAL

IMMIGRATION POLICIES AND PROCEDURES
(IMMIGRATION FROM INDIA, PAKISTAN AND CEYLON)

The Cabinet Committee on Immigration met on August 9th, 1958, and considered the problem of immigration from India, Pakistan and Ceylon as set out in Part VII of Cabinet Document No. 142-58† and in Appendix "N" of the same document.

2. Generally speaking, no difficulties have been experienced insofar as immigration from Pakistan and Ceylon is concerned. However, the East Indian community in Canada has made numerous representations asking that the regulations governing immigration from India be made less rigid.

3. Immigration from India is at present governed by a quota, set under an agreement with the Government of India. There are not enough quota numbers to satisfy the desires of Canadians of East Indian origin who wish to bring their relatives to Canada. Their criticisms are difficult to answer when they point out that they come from a Commonwealth country, and yet have more difficulty getting their relatives into Canada than do people who come from non-Commonwealth countries.

4. It is considered, therefore, that a decision is necessary in order to bring about a more satisfactory situation and to eliminate the current backlog of cases of relatives who cannot be brought in because of lack of space on the quota, cases which in some instances have been outstanding for as much as eight years.

5. In view of this situation, and after study of alternate ways of dealing with the problem, the Cabinet Committee on Immigration submits the following proposals for Cabinet approval:¹¹²

(a) that the quota set under the agreement with the Government of India continue as at present;

(b) that the 398 relatives of East Indian Canadian citizens and residents, applications for the admission of whom have been made to November 30, 1957, and whose applications could not be accepted for the 1958 quota, be allowed admission by Order in Council, subject to the usual immigration requirements;

(c) that at the same time notice be given to the East Indian community that in future the quota agreement with India would be administered rigidly.

THE FOREIGN EXCHANGE CRISIS

In recent weeks it has become increasingly evident that last winter's hopes for an alleviation of the Foreign Exchange Crisis have proved false. Since April 1, 1958, the reserves have declined at an average rate of approximately $10 million a week, and with the sterling balance now totalling a scant $400 million, the Reserve Bank's treasury of foreign assets promises to be well nigh empty before the year is out. It is now officially estimated that the over-all foreign exchange deficit for the Second Plan period will be approximately $3400 million — as compared with the $2200 million deficit originally anticipated — and, therefore, that additional foreign exchange resources totalling at least $1000 million (over and above foreign assistance already agreed to) must be obtained by 1961. In the longer term, say for the next decade, the shortage of foreign exchange promises to be almost equally serious. With the completion of the steel projects in 1960 a considerable saving will be effected, but some of the other heavy industrial projects now under way will not be earning or conserving foreign exchange until well into the Third Plan period. Furthermore, it is probable that heavy industrial and transportation projects with a high import content will again be emphasized in the Third Five Year Plan and that an effort will be made to increase overall investment by at least 24 per cent. In addition to these factors, repayments due during the Third Plan period on loans and credits already extended now exceed $600 million.

2. In these circumstances it is not surprising that the Government is concerned lest there be a general loss of confidence in the country's financial stability and broad economic prospects, and official spokesmen are losing no opportunity to emphasize that the level of foreign exchange reserves is but one aspect of a country's economic health, that the present decline in reserves has long been foreseen, and that the situation, however disturbing, need not prove critical if all concerned will buckle down to their allotted tasks. The crisis is, after all, one of development rather than stagnation, they assert. No doubt it is proper that these facts should be emphasized, especially in view of the national tendency towards what the Governor of the Reserve Bank recently described as "unwarranted oscillations ... between optimism and apprehension," though there is an abundant evidence that the immediate crisis is more severe and has developed at an earlier date than the Government anticipated, and a disinterested observer might perhaps speak less confidently of ultimate success than Government spokesmen.

3. The broad explanation of India's foreign exchange shortage — that the Government has embarked upon an ambitious programme of economic development which it would be most difficult to finance through domestic savings or exports — is of course well known to you and we need not discuss it here. As to the factors which have contributed to the immediate crisis there is substantial agreement among observers, despite differences of emphasis and occasional barbs from critics who explain the crisis principally in terms of Government bungling and ineptitude. Imports, it is clear, have been considerably greater in cost and volume than was anticipated by planners. The import costs of the Plan's industrial projects, for instance, were greatly underestimated and food imports exceeded two million tons in 1956-57 and 3 ½ million tons in 1957-58 in contrast with the Plan estimate of an annual importation of 400,000 tons. While the issuance of licences during the past fifteen months for even essential imports has been controlled with increasing strictness, the actual flow of imports — and of course corresponding decline of exchange reserves — has continued with little abatement owing in part to vast import commitments entered into prior to the tightening of the regulations. (Outstanding import commitments were officially estimated to have totalled $2,000 million last October, and Lokanathan of the National Council of Applied Economic Research recently estimated that commitments totalled $1,500 million in June 1958.) Declining exports, too, are known to have contributed in no small measure to the shortage. Foreign exchange receipts from this source in 1957-58 appear to have fallen $50 million short of the relatively modest Plan estimates, while receipts are believed to have declined yet more seriously during the first quarter of 1958. The "tying" of foreign loans and credits, especially from the United States, has been a further factor in the continued decline of exchange reserves for such funds have perforce been utilized in projects which, while valuable in themselves, frequently constituted an addition to the Plan's core. As a Finance Ministry official recently expressed it when writing to us concerning Colombo Plan aid for the current year:

"Our situation now is that we must find from current earnings exchange required to pay for the capital goods we have already ordered. It is causing an extreme shortage of exchange to finance imports required to maintain the economy. Any current imports we get under aid programmes help in releasing an equivalent amount of exchange for the payment of capital goods already ordered. Aid tied to the purchase of capital goods only enlarges our development programme but does not relieve our exchange shortage."

4. A variety of suggestions have been advanced as to how the exchange crisis is to be alleviated. Government spokesmen and most private observers are agreed that every effort must be made to reduce the flow of imports further, but there is less agreement as to how this is to be achieved. Non-essential imports have already been reduced to a trickle and any further exclusion will seriously affect the economy unless great care is exercised. While it may be possible to cancel or postpone plans for the importation of some capital goods, in most instances projects have reached a stage where it would be highly uneconomic to postpone completion. Furthermore, many of the Plan's industrial and transportation projects are closely interrelated and failure to complete any of them would tend to create bottlenecks making the completion of other projects difficult. Quite apart from such considerations, the Government is of course aware that any appreciable curtailment of the Plan's core would seriously affect their political standing in the country, and they have hitherto firmly rejected such measures.

5. As to the possibility of further curtailing the entry of raw materials, there is already abundant evidence that this cannot easily be accomplished if the economy and employment levels are to be maintained. The Government has been seriously considering the cancellation or withholding of import licences for raw materials for the third quarter of 1958-59, but such a measure, while calculated to conserve foreign exchange in the short run, would inevitably cause much distress and havoc. As the Times of India recently expressed it, "it will be a pity if in wielding the axe the Government damages the very sinews of industrial production on which the success of the Plan depends." The Government is apparently aware of this danger and press reports which have appeared within the past ten days indicate that they have now rejected the idea of a blanket cancellation of licences.

6. Similarly, it might well prove difficult to conserve any large amount of foreign exchange through the reduction of food imports. As you are aware, the volume of India's domestic food production is still primarily governed by the generosity of the monsoon, agricultural campaigns notwithstanding. If, as during the past two years, the monsoon is inadequate, extensive food imports are unavoidable. A considerable part of these food imports have been provided by the United States under Public Law 480 and have thus (apart from transportation costs) not involved expenditure of foreign exchange, but normal commercial suppliers would no doubt object strongly if this type of assistance were increased, or if overall food imports were decreased, at the expense of traditional cash purchases.

7. There remains, however, at least one type of import which could be considerably reduced without adversely affecting the Plan and the economy: defence equipment. The exact amount of defence imports has not been revealed by the Government, but it is widely assumed to be substantial. The Eastern Economist in a recent critical article maintained that "total defence expenditure has inflated our import bill by about Rs.75 to Rs.80 crores over three years." The Government and much of the Press has hitherto taken the stand that however unfortunate such imports may be they are unavoidable in the present circumstances. There are, however, some signs of a growing realization that India must to some extent choose between economic development and such security as defence equipment can bring, a realization that she cannot have, in the words of the weekly Thought, "both guns and butter." Since the introduction of the budget the Government is thought to have reduced defence expenditures somewhat, and there are known to be some, particularly amongst those responsible for the Plan, who are pressing for more drastic reductions.

8. Whereas for over a year now attention has been focussed on the need to reduce imports, it is only within the past few months that sustained consideration and determined Government action has been directed to the alleviation of the exchange shortage through the promotion of exports. A variety of appropriate measures have been suggested — tax incentives, rebate of import duties on essential raw materials, reduction of excise duties, liberalization of export quotas, assisted transport, subsidization, compulsory export — and in some instances the necessary Government action has already been taken. Export duties for certain edible oils, the sale of which has fallen ominously, have been abolished. While the rate of export duty on teas is to be unchanged, duty will henceforth be calculated on a lower price. The drawback of excise duties on sugar and margarine used in the preparation of certain exports is now to be granted. A Government ordinance during the latter part of June directed all sugar mills to deliver a part of their production for export, the target for the current year being fixed at 50,000 tons. Preliminary discussions with the Railway Board for decreased freight rates are said to have begun. Above all, there appears to be a new and long-overdue awareness in Government circles, and it is hoped among private exporters, that more vigorous selling tactics must be adopted in foreign markets and that the quality of exports must be improved. Since May the Press has repeatedly emphasized the importance of this new awareness, and like the Hindustan Times, has cautioned readers that "gone are the days when India was in a position to have a trade surplus without much effort."

9. It remains to be seen how sustained this determination to increase exports will prove, and in the short run there are, we think, at least two major obstacles to the success of the campaign. The first of these is, of course, that world markets are depressed at this time and the terms of trade are unfavourable to many Indian products. Indeed, unless world markets recover quickly, it may prove difficult to prevent export earnings from declining further. The second obstacle is that many potentially exportable goods and materials are already in short supply in India and significant exports are likely to increase prices and inflationary pressures generally. Already there are ominous reports of prices rising in anticipation of shortages and while Press and Government have joined in denouncing such profiteering, mere exhortation promises to be ineffective if unaccompanied by determined restraints and controls.

10. Yet another means of relieving the foreign exchange shortage has evoked growing interest within recent months: the mobilization of private gold and silver hoards. It has of course long been known that there were large amounts of these precious metals in India, apart from Government holdings, but it is only recently that an authoritative and relatively precise estimate of the amount has been generally available. This estimate, which appeared in the April edition of the Reserve Bank of India Bulletin, placed the international value of private gold stocks at $3500 million (the domestic value was placed at $6070 million) and private silver stocks at $4150 million; it is hardly surprising that these figures should have aroused the interest of planners. Unfortunately, however, it will prove no easy task for the Government to mobilize more than a small amount of this treasure. A considerable part of it is known to be in the form of ornaments and personal jewellery which, as some have hastened to remind the Government, few would willingly part with. Much of it, too, is believed to be cached away as a hedge against inflation or in order to escape the taxation on wealth. Furthermore, millions of humble folk, and indeed many who are moderately well off, harbour a traditional and sometimes justified distrust of banks and other financial institutions and prefer to entrust whatever treasure they may have accumulated to a private hiding place. Despite considerable press speculation and occasional official reference to the desirability of surmounting these obstacles to the productive use of gold and silver, there is as yet no indication that the Government has decided upon specific measures.

11. During the past two or three months a few economists have suggested that the shortage of foreign exchange could be lessened through the devaluation of the Rupee. You will recall, however, that in our letter No. 587 dated July 10, 1958, we informed you that these suggestions had aroused vigorous opposition in Government and Press circles, and we suggested that in the present circumstances devaluation was unlikely to prove beneficial.

12. Whatever the success of the Government's own measures to relieve the foreign exchange crisis there can be little doubt that extensive foreign aid will be required within the next few months if the economy is to be maintained and if the Plan is to have a reasonable prospect of success. Furthermore, even if the immediate crisis is surmounted, foreign aid will in our view be crucial to the success of economic development for at least the next ten years. There is we think a growing recognition of these facts and Government spokesmen appear determined to convince the public that it is neither undesirable nor abnormal for a country to facilitate industrialization through foreign investment and other forms of foreign assistance. There are, of course, still occasions when it is evident that the Government has not entirely mastered the art of accepting assistance graciously, but on the whole attitudes have improved markedly. Much of the responsible press, as you know, has generously recognized the contribution which foreign aid has made to the Plans, and at least one leading Socialist economist, Mr. Ashoke Mehta, has recently urged the Government to create a more favourable climate for foreign assistance.

13. Inevitably, many are looking to the United States in the hope of prompt and substantial assistance, the more so in view of the Senate's recent agreement that India's needs are of particular importance. Not all appreciate that it may prove difficult for the United States administration to provide extensive and "united" assistance from funds approved by Congress so far, and that whatever the ultimate prospects for a specific "Aid to India" bill it is most unlikely to be approved this year. Many are now looking to the United Kingdom in the hope that an overdraft can be promptly arranged for India's sterling account. The Press has been quick to note improvements in the United Kingdom's balance of payments, and some observers have concluded that she will be more ready to extend credits than she was a year ago. Within the last week reports have appeared in at least two leading newspapers that a sterling credit of £75 million may have been tentatively agreed to during Mr. B.K. Nehru's recent visit in London. Nor are other sources of foreign assistance being overlooked. Some are hopefully speculating that India's creditors in Germany and Japan will agree to accept payment in Rupees, for the time being at least. Others are hopeful that the forthcoming meetings of the Fund and the World Bank in New Delhi may assist the free world, in the words of The Statesman, "to recover the inspiration of the latter '40's, with their hope of joint international endeavour to maintain an expanding volume of both trade and investment." Within the last two or three days several newspapers have given prominence to reports that a high-level conference, with representatives from the World Bank, the Fund, the United States, the United Kingdom, West Germany and Canada, will be held in Washington next month to consider India's plight. As the Hindustan Times sees it "if all goes well, a combined loan underwriting a major part of India's present outstandings as also a fair proportion of future requirements of the second plan." No doubt, too, India is prepared to accept any additional assistance which may be offered by the Soviet bloc, although it is perhaps significant that this possibility has received little attention since the widely publicized cancellation of Russia's programme of assistance in Yugoslavia.

14. It will, we trust, be apparent from the foregoing paragraphs that there is no easy solution for India's foreign exchange difficulties. It is, however, to be hoped that the exchange shortage can be reduced to manageable proportions through a combination of determined domestic measures and generous foreign assistance, for it is manifestly in the interests of neither India nor the West that the pace of economic development should be markedly slackened or that it should prove impossible for India to honour her foreign commitments.

INDIA, FINANCIAL PROBLEMS; MEETING IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

16. The Prime Minister said that the United Kingdom ministers were very concerned over the financial position of India. They thought that a small meeting of representatives of the major countries with a positive interest in India's economic problems, as suggested by the International Bank, would be helpful. The meeting might have representatives from the United States, Germany, Canada, Japan, and the United Kingdom, and would be held under the bank's auspices in Washington on August 25th. Measures to co-ordinate aid for India would be discussed. The U.K. government would welcome Canadian participation and feared that India would misunderstand any decision not to participate.

17. The Minister of Finance said the representative of the Bank of Canada who had attended meetings of the International Bank earlier in the month had been asked to attend this meeting but said he could not do so until he had instructions. It seemed that India was over-extended and in trouble with her five-year plan. She faced serious financial difficulties and was looking for help. The Acting U.K. High Commissioner had asked him if Canada would agree to be represented. He, personally, had favoured conferring under Commonwealth auspices but India was insistent about Canada. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was very much in favour of the meeting. There was political worry about the repercussions of India's financial troubles which might open a way for communists to gain power.

18. During the discussion it was considered that Canada was giving away too much already. However, as long as it was understood there would be no commitments, sending a representative was satisfactory.

19. The Cabinet agreed that a representative from Canada should attend the meeting to be held under International Bank auspices later this month to review the Indian financial situation; it being understood that the representative would have no authority to make any commitment of any kind whatsoever.

ITEM II: WASHINGTON MEETINGS ON INDIA

30. Mr. Plumptre said that Ministers were well acquainted with the background leading up to these talks. An analysis of the Indian financial situation had been prepared by the World Bank and, with the approval of the Indian delegate, had been placed before the meeting. It had been explained that over the last 3 years of the second 5-year plan, India had incurred $1 billion of obligations in connection with purchases of capital goods and, to a certain extent, military supplies. There was particular urgency during the next six months as $350 million of the $1 billion was due for payment and no arrangements had been made for long-term credits. By September, Indian reserves would have fallen to $500 million; half would be in sterling and the rest in gold. The meeting had been called to transmute India's short-term obligations into long-term credits. There were two problems; the first long-term, the second immediate. With regard to the long-term problem, the group decided that they could not come to a decision but would keep the Indian position under review. However, agreement had been reached on how the immediate situation would be handled.

(i) The World Bank would lend India $100 million over the next six-month period.

(ii) The U.K. would extend $108 million of credits under its Export Credits Guarantees Act. Three-quarters of the total was expected to be provided on a 20-year loan. The rest would involve a 5 to 6 year loan.

(iii) The U.S. would loan India $75 million from the Development Loan Fund. A small amount would also be given by waiver of interest and principle on its 1951 wheat loan.

(iv) It was not clear what Germany planned to do.

(v) It had been agreed that Canada would accelerate her grants under the Colombo Plan to meet India's need for non-ferrous metals, railway ties and fertilizers. It had been made clear that Canada's place at this meeting differed from the other countries present in that Canada was not a creditor of India.

(vi) Japan planned to extend $10 million of credits from its export-import bank.

DESPATCH NO. 1020

Karachi, December 19, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

THE NEW RÉGIME IN PAKISTAN

It is now over two months since the proclamation of martial law by former President Mirza on October 7, and seven weeks have elapsed since the second phase of the peaceful revolution occurred on October 27 with the "resignation" of Mirza and the assumption of office as President by General Mohammad Ayub Khan. In the interval, and particularly since October 27, the new administration has been vigorously tackling some of the country's basic problems. At this stage, it may be worthwhile to review broadly the form and direction the new régime's efforts are taking.

2. The military, never at any time dominant in running the country's affairs, have been largely withdrawn from civilian duties and have returned to their normal occupations. The military courts set up to enforce the martial law regulations during the early days of the régime have been abolished over large sections of the country, although still retained in a few trouble spots like the East Pakistan border areas to deal with smugglers. The martial law regulations still continue but over most of the country are now enforced by the ordinary civil courts. Senior army officers still function as martial law administrators with the primary task of enforcing the martial law regulations, but with the exception of East Pakistan, their role is less prominent and the handling of day to day affairs rests almost entirely with civilian officials. In the final analysis, authority rests with those administering martial law backed by the army which can always be called in again if the need should arise, but there is little evidence of interference by the military in ordinary day to day administration. For the most part, the military have concentrated on reinforcing the police in the suppression of smuggling, black marketing and hoarding, in the investigation of alleged profiteering, and in the enforcement of order and discipline among the populace. A number of improvements are already evident; rubbish and filth has disappeared from the streets in urban centres; stalls and booths no longer clutter the public sidewalks; people are queuing in a more or less orderly fashion for buses, ration shops and theaters and are standing at attention during the playing of the national anthem; beggars and panhandlers have largely disappeared from the cities; and both motor and pedestrian traffic proceeds in a more orderly manner although the standard still leaves a good deal to be desired.

3. On the constitutional side, there are a few indications of a gradual movement towards a more centralized unitary form of government. President Ayub now functions as Head of State and chief executive and normally presides over the 12-man Presidential Cabinet. From this body, decisions on policy matters flow to the central ministries and to the Provincial authorities, occasionally in the form of Presidential directives to the Governors of East and West Pakistan, or more normally direct to the appropriate government departments through the responsible Minister. Some thought has been given to a redistribution of functions between the centre and the provinces in order to streamline and simplify administration and to eliminate duplication and overlapping, but so far few substantive changes have been made. However, a high level Administrative Reorganization Committee has been set up to review and to recommend improvements in the organizational structure, functions and procedures of government departments and agencies, to review the staff position, and to recommend measures for close liaison between the central and provincial administrations.

4. During a visit to East Pakistan early in November, President Ayub emphasized in public statements the importance of developing a feeling of national consciousness and cohesion within the country. While there was no harm in developing local culture and language, the President stressed the importance of preserving national unity, and doing nothing to damage the nation's security. He took pains to explain that his régime represented no threat of domination by the west wing or the centre. This theme of a united Pakistan was repeated in a slightly different context by Finance Minister Shoaib who at a press conference in Dacca on December 8 firmly rejected the theory that each wing had its own economy which should be developed separately in its own way. Mr. Shoaib emphasized the importance of considering the economy and resources of the country as a whole and went on to state bluntly that "Pakistan is going to be a one economy state under the new régime."

5. Recently the government has announced a review of import licensing procedures in order to effect more direct control by the centre and to bring import policy into line with the desperate foreign exchange position. Henceforth, there will be reduced emphasis on the regional allocation of import licences. Again, in line with its policy to assert central control over all matters relating to national development, the centre has taken over from the West Pakistan government the Mineral Development Corporation, a quasi-government body responsible for the planning, surveying, prospecting and industrial exploitation of minerals.

6. The Presidential Cabinet is comprised of men of good character and honest purpose who are clearly putting national interest above self-interest. All of them are spending long hours at their desks when in Karachi and are also travelling extensively throughout the country to acquire a first hand knowledge of the problems with which they are faced. The fact that they have been given wide authority in their respective fields is evidenced by the numerous statements and comments they are making to the press which obviously could not have been cleared in advance by the President or by the Cabinet as a whole.

7. The most active Minister is Lt. Gen. Azam Khan, Minister for Rehabilitation who has attacked the refugee problem with energy and vigour. A forceful man of tremendous drive and outstanding determination, General Azam has succeeded in putting new life into the somewhat moribund refugee administration and bids fair to uphold his reputation as a man who will brook no obstacle in getting things done quickly. Already he has gone a good way in sorting out the tangled problem of evacuee property. He has launched the construction of a new satellite town in the Karachi area for 40,000 refugees and is actively planning a second to provide for 50,000. In several tours around the country, General Azam has attracted the headlines by statements that refugees are the number one problem which must be solved quickly and on humanitarian lines.

8. On the economic side, Mr. A.K. Khan at Industries, Works, Irrigation and Power, and Mr. Shoaib at Finance, have already shown their mettle. The former has been indefatigable in touring the country, particularly East Pakistan, and in helping to formulate economic policies. Mr. Shoaib got off to a late start when his departure from Washington where he was a senior executive of the I.B.R.D. was delayed by the death of his wife, but since his arrival has wasted no time in grappling with the problem of putting the country's finances on a sound footing. When I talked with him recently, he stressed the need to reduce expenditures to bare essentials as a first step in combating the serious inflation which threatens Pakistan. Foreign Minister Manzoor Qadir, a brilliant constitutional lawyer with an untarnished reputation, is shy but unquestionably able. Notably articulate, he has the skill to marshal his thoughts in a logical way and he presents his arguments with quiet persuasiveness. Mr. Qadir does not pretend to be an expert on foreign affairs; for the present he is spending a good deal of time working behind the scenes on proposals for a new constitution. Apart from his position as the second man in the Cabinet, and the top civilian, there is a good deal of evidence that President Ayub relies on him for advice on matters beyond the scope of his Foreign Affairs portfolio.

9. I have some reservations about a few of the other Ministers. The Minister for Commerce, for example, is only 30 and is without much practical experience in business affairs. He comes from a wealthy landed family in Upper Sind with a largely academic background in political science and constitutional law. Mr. Hafizir Rahman, Minister for Food and Agriculture, is an elderly retired civil servant who has yet to demonstrate the energy or capacity to handle the country's food problem on a realistic basis. Although technically well qualified by virtue of long service with the railways, the Minister for Communications, Mr. F.M. Khan, seems to have adopted a more casual approach to his job and is the only Minister who had close associations with ex-President Mirza. In the public mind, he may therefore be suspect as a hangover from the old régime. Not much has been heard of Mr. Mohammed Ibrahim, the Minister for Law and former Vice-Chancellor of Dacca University, who has so far shown little grasp of government problems and may have been included simply to fill up the quota from East Pakistan.

10. During its first six weeks in office the government has marked out a number of fields in which reforms or development are urgently needed. The rehabilitation of refugees is one of the tasks given top priority. Another is land reform. At an early stage ex-President Mirza appointed a Land Reforms Commission, "to consider problems relating to the ownership and tenancy of agricultural land and to recommend measures for ensuring better production and social justice as well as security of tenure for those engaged in cultivation." Following the second stage of the revolution, one of President Ayub's first acts was to direct the Commission "to propose a comprehensive scheme for effective land reforms" as soon as possible. Subsequently, General Ayub has spoken of the need for "sensible land reforms" and "a scientific solution to our land problem — one that is just and fair, and does not lead to class war." He has on occasion described himself as "the landlord's friend," has stressed the desirability of limits for the smallest as well as the largest holdings, and of the need for changes in the inheritance laws to prevent uneconomic fragmentation. Because of the power, position and privilege of the landowning class, which over much of West Pakistan still operates on quasi-feudal lines, a good deal of interest attaches to this subject and in many quarters it is regarded as the new régime's first big test. Certainly, if the problem is approached on the basis of widespread redistribution to tenant farmers with firm and low ceilings for large estates, the effect will be to bring about a social and political as well as an economic revolution with far-reaching consequences on the social structure of the western wing. The Commission, which has been meeting periodically in Karachi and Lahore, hopes to have its report ready for submission to the government before the end of the year.

11. In the economic sphere, it can be said that the new régime got off to a slow and somewhat uncertain start but is now showing signs of settling down for the long haul. The immediate effect of lower prices which followed the proclamation of martial law, and firm action against the profiteers, the smugglers and black market operators was a wave of panic buying which threatened for a time to drive some goods off the market entirely. In a number of centres, the authorities were forced to take urgent measures to restrain would-be purchasers and rough and ready rationing devices were enforced for certain types of goods. Within a matter of days a few shortages began to appear; although fruit and vegetables were now cheaper, the quality was poor and supplies were short; eggs, although available at a lower controlled price, were hard to get; and milk, no longer watered, was insufficient to go round. Recently there has been some improvement in the supply situation though occasional shortages still occur.

12. On the national scale, the régime has done a number of things in an attempt to persuade trade and industry to "function in a normal healthy manner while at the same time keeping national interests above personal gain." Profiteering and black marketing have been defined by martial law regulation and a number of offenders have been tried before military courts and punished. Improper declaration of income has been made a martial law offense and firms as well as individuals have been given a deadline before which to make new and more honest declarations dating back to 1953-54, with the promise that action will not be taken against them. Firms and individuals have been directed to declare and turn over to the State Bank of Pakistan their holdings of foreign currency both at home and abroad. By far the most far-reaching measure has been a comprehensive set of price control regulations which aimed initially at limiting profit to a certain percentage of capital at each stage of manufacture and distribution. On the whole, the reaction of the business community was unfavourable; the scheme was rigid and inflexible and involved computations based on information not always available. While more or less satisfactory for firms with a large capital investment, it was considered unworkable for small businesses with limited capital, of which there are a great many in Pakistan. After representations from the business community, the government modified the price control regulations, limiting profit at each stage to a percentage of production costs. The new regulations are to come into force from the beginning of the new year and seem likely to prove more satisfactory.

13. There is little doubt that the new régime's initial impact on business was disquieting. In the early stages, traders found it difficult to know what government policy was since many regulations drafted in haste were ambiguous or obscure. This state of affairs, combined with sharp attacks on business ethics, produced a state of uneasiness and fear among the commercial community and resulted in loss of confidence and a good deal of confusion and stagnation. During the latter half of November, the Minister of Commerce found it necessary to tour commercial centres in West Pakistan to urge that normal trade be resumed, to explain the government's policy and to listen to representations. More recently, there has been some return of confidence as the government has shown its willingness to listen to the commercial community and to modify its policies in certain directions.

14. The controversy between the advocates of an active agricultural policy and those who favoured rapid large-scale industrialization has been resolved, for the time being, in favour of the former. In several pronouncements, the government has declared the production of more food a priority objective and has taken a number of steps in furtherance of this aim. In a recent statement, the energetic and able Minister for Industries made it clear that in the industrial field the emphasis in the immediate future would be placed on the development of medium, small-scale and cottage industries throughout the rural areas using local raw materials. Significantly, Mr. Ghulam Faruque, an ardent advocate of rapid large-scale industrialization and former head of the PIDC, has been transferred to Lahore where he will head the Water and Power Development Authority under the West Pakistan Government.

15. Other objectives announced during the early stages of the revolution have been dealt with by appointing commissions to study the subject and report back. For example, a Law Reforms Commission has been appointed to look into the administration of justice and to make recommendations for the speeding up of judicial procedures. Another commission with very broad terms of reference has just been established to study the type of education required in Pakistan and to formulate proposals for overhauling the educational system. New studies are under way by the Planning Commission to draw up an interim plan for achieving certain economic objectives, and the whole field of trade policy is under review by a top level interdepartmental committee under the direction of the Minister for Commerce.

16. Having so much to do at home, the new régime has shown relatively little interest in foreign affairs. The tone was set at General Ayub's first press conference as Chief Martial Law Administrator when, in reply to a question about possible changes in foreign policy, he countered somewhat tartly "What's wrong with Pakistan's foreign policy?"

17. Relations with India, however, are an integral part of Pakistan's life and are never long out of the headlines. Within days of taking office as President, General Ayub was proclaiming, "We must have a satisfactory solution in Kashmir as it affects our security and our whole existence. Should we be forced to adopt extreme measures, even war, the responsibility will be that of India." On canal waters, he said "Unless we get the water we used to get, our land will go barren and we will have no recourse but to take any measure open to us."

18. For more than five weeks, statements by Indian leaders at press conferences and in Parliament that democracy in Pakistan had been replaced by "naked military dictatorship," that this state of affairs was incompatible with continued membership in the Commonwealth, as well as allegations of aggression in border incidents were ignored by government spokesmen. However, at Lahore on December 12, the President returned to the charge, accusing India of deliberately organizing a campaign of vilification in an attempt to render Pakistan friendless and defenceless. He warned that Pakistan knew to deal with border clashes and encroachments which were "nuisances and the sooner stopped the better." Kashmir and Canal Waters are questions of "life and death constituting a challenge to humanity and international morality." Pakistanis would never fail to accept this challenge boldly and courageously. President Ayub denied Indian allegations that Pakistan had been rendered bold by "massive U.S. military aid," pointing out that Indian military strength was three times Pakistan's even after U.S. assistance. He accused India of harbouring aggressive designs against this country and engaging in an aggressive military build up at the expense of national development. Unfortunately, it cannot be said that Indo-Pakistan relations show promise of any improvement.

19. The only other discernible trend in foreign policy seems to be a possible shift towards closer relations with the U.A.R. and increased support for Arab causes. Early in November, without apparent cause, Foreign Minister Qadir warned Israel that any attempt to occupy the west bank of the Jordan would have grave repercussions throughout the Middle East; ten days later, the Pakistani representative at the U.N., in a particularly spirited plea, criticized Israeli proposals to compensate the Arab refugees and urged that Israel permit them to return to their homes instead. And in the debate on Algeria this year, Pakistan seems to have come out more strongly in favour of the nationalists than in former years.

20. The possible rapprochement with the U.A.R. stems from a visit to Cairo by the Minister for Education, Information and Broadcasting, Mr. Habibur Rahman, who stopped over on the way back from Brussels where he had gone to say his farewells as Pakistan's Ambassador to Belgium. The visit is described by Foreign Secretary Baig as "unplanned but fortuitous." In Cairo Mr. Rahman had talks with the U.A.R. Ministers for Education and Culture and National Guidance, and had a 90-minute interview with Colonel Nasser whom he found "extremely amicable and full of friendly sentiments towards Pakistan." In a broadcast over Cairo Radio, Mr. Rahman referred to the importance of clearing the political atmosphere on a number of problems and said that the "hopes and aspirations of the Arabs are very close to our hearts; Pakistan has steadfastly supported and will always support their rightful cause." Subsequently, there have been rumours that the Egyptian Minister for Education might visit Pakistan to offer advice on educational problems here but nothing definite has emerged. However, at a press conference in Rawalpindi recently, President Ayub remarked that relations with the U.A.R. were now very good and added that President Nasser would be received with open arms if he wished to visit Pakistan.

21. By far the most outstanding achievement of the new régime is the extent to which President Ayub has succeeded in identifying himself and his government with the aspirations of the people. Travelling about the country, one senses a feeling of purpose, an air of confidence, a return almost to the patriotic fervour which gripped Pakistan in 1947 and 1948, and a conviction that having got rid of corrupting influences, the nation can now get down to work and show what it can accomplish. There is no doubt that the government, at the present time, enjoys widespread and genuine support and that most of the people are prepared to accept hard work and a good deal of austerity in the expectation of achieving a better future.

22. As was to be expected, the achievements on the practical side are not yet great. While starts have been made on reforms in several directions, most projects of this kind are still in the planning and study stage and some time must yet elapse before the results become apparent. In the meantime, the new feeling of confidence, of purpose, and of discipline which is taking hold offers hope that President Ayub may achieve some success in the tremendous task of reforming the character and way of life of a considerable proportion of the population.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL.

Accra, May 2, 1958

Dear George [Glazebrook],

I am still awaiting word from the Department before opening discussions with the Prime Minister and his staff on the programme for his Canadian visit. However there are one or two matters which I would like to discuss with you in a personal letter because they might have some bearing on the planning.

In general I hope it will be borne in mind that we are being hosts for the first time to an African leader of a Commonwealth country. Because he is an African he is likely to be impressed by different things from those which might impress Europeans. The Africans like ceremony and they would be quick to notice it if our reception falls short of what they themselves would do for a visiting dignitary. There should, in my view, be plenty of red carpet, a good deal of sabre rattling (parade ground variety) and the wailing of sirens. There are other factors which you may wish to take into account in arranging the programme. There has emerged from the recent Conference of Independent African States a surge of African nationalism and the visit to Canada might be something which could help to adjust the perspective. I believe that for the usual reasons, the opportunities open to us in performing this function are greater than those open to the United States or the United Kingdom. We are not suspect from either the standpoint of colonial imperialism or economic domination.

As to the subjects he may wish to discuss, I can say very little at this time but I can mention one or two things that he will not wish to discuss. He will not be going to Canada or the U.S. with his hat in hand asking for aid. Ghana with its large reserves does not need aid per se or by itself, but it does of course want investment capital and technical "know how." I would expect that in view of the newspaper publicity which describes the purpose of his visit as seeking aid, he will wish to set the record straight in his first statement to the Canadian press.

According to Sir Robert Jackson he is unlikely to want to discuss the Volta River Project and if he does, it will be only in very general terms because the Volta River Project ball is in the U.S. court. Here again if he does raise the subject, it might only be to indicate that at a later date he might ask the Canadian Government to consider the question of a loan of modest proportions if conditions for starting the project become more auspicious. It is most unlikely that he will be in a position to make any concrete request since he will not have discussed the project with interested parties in the U.S.A.

There is one other matter which I raise reluctantly because it affects me but I am able to overcome my natural shyness. I have been asked by numerous officials whether I am likely to be called home in connection with the Prime Minister's visit. This question might be inspired by the fact that Bill Flake, the United States Ambassador, will be in Washington to receive the Prime Minister there. Following his official duties in connection with the Prime Minister's visit he will proceed on leave.

Robert Jackson has been the most persistent in his enquiries as he thinks that my presence in Ottawa would be welcomed by the visitors and that it would stand me in good stead in my future relations with the Prime Minister and others here. If you think it worthwhile to raise the question with the Under-Secretary please do so. I am quite content to leave the matter in your hands.

Marion MacPherson and I hope in the course of the next few weeks to get off a few background reports on the current political situation here which might be of some use to your Division in preparing briefs for the Minister on the Prime Minister's visit.

This is sketchy but I feel you might be reassured by some of these observations and I hope if there is any uneasiness about the Prime Minister's visit this will help to dissipate it.

Yours sincerely,
EVAN [GILL]

DESPATCH NO. 273

Accra, June 2, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

GHANA'S FIRST YEAR: EXTERNAL POLICY¹¹⁴

Introduction

The guiding principles of Ghana's foreign policy were stated by the Prime Minister on the eve of independence:

"As Ghana achieves independence, it observes a world torn and divided in its political relationships. The Government of Ghana therefore feels that at this stage it should not be committed in any aspect of its foreign policy and that it should not be aligned with any particular group of powers or political bloc. The Government of Ghana does not intend to follow a neutralist policy in its foreign relations, but it does intend to preserve its independence to act as it seems best at any particular time. ... In pursuing its independent policy, the Government of Ghana will have regard, first and foremost, for the interests of the people of Ghana; in particular, their continued economic and social progress."

2. After one year it can be said that Ghana has been successful so far in pursuing its policy of non-alignment. There is no doubt that Dr. Nkrumah and Ghana are orientated to the west and endorse western ideas of social progress and democratic liberties, although there are among his followers those who favour strict neutrality and those who lean towards the Soviet orbit. In these circumstances it can hardly be expected that Dr. Nkrumah would wish publicly to support western actions in international affairs. Such a stand would not only be inconsistent with his political philosophy as leader of an anti-colonial revolutionary party which has many times found fault with western practices, particularly in Africa, but it might have the effect of generating opposition within his own ranks. Moreover, I would judge that the majority of Ghanaians find the present policy of detachment to be satisfactory and would be reluctant to take a definite stand of alliance with the west, although the opposition party would not feel the same reserve. In addition, Dr. Nkrumah has ambitions to become a leader in Africa and would like political parties in dependent territories whose goal is independence to look to Ghana for guidance. He therefore feels it important to avoid overt alignments which might compromise his prospects of influencing these socialistically-inclined African leaders. For these reasons I would not foresee any early change in the announced policy of non-commitment and we can expect that the underlying friendship to the west will continue, but will not be voiced at international forums such as Commonwealth and United Nations meetings or on other occasions when Ghana is called upon to express her views on international problems.

3. Since independence Ghana has eagerly seized opportunities to establish friendly relations with other countries. There are now twelve foreign missions here and Ghana has eight missions abroad. Ghanaian delegates have now attended a General Assembly session and other United Nations conferences, as well as international meetings in the technical and economic spheres; the government has sent goodwill and trade missions to Israel, Egypt, India, Ceylon and Burma and to western Europe, and there have been numerous special visits to other countries, e.g. attendance at the Ceylon anniversary, the Malayan and West Indian celebrations. A number of international conferences have been held in Accra, the most important being the conference of independent African states. All this has been good experience for Ghanaian representatives who are gradually learning the benefits of consultation. This we regard as a constructive feature of the first year in which Ghana has appeared in international circles.

The Commonwealth Connection

4. While Ghana has moved rapidly to extend its foreign horizons and wishes to be friendly with all countries, some relationships are of course more important than others and there are a few noticeable trends. The Prime Minister has on several occasions stressed the Commonwealth attachment and Ghanaians have some appreciation of the uniqueness of this association. The Prime Minister has described it as being able to become

“a pilot scheme for developing the most effective methods by which colonialism can be ended without revolution or violence and under conditions in which the former colonial territory still retains a close and friendly association with the former imperial power.”

He also said after the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference in 1957:

“The family relationship between members which we experienced in this conference and which brings together countries poles apart in race, religion, social background and domestic and foreign policy is an example of international association which should be supported for as long as it lives up to the standards of sound democratic principles and respect for the sovereignty of member nations.”

5. Ghana appears to be quite anxious to participate in the various official and unofficial Commonwealth activities and I would consider that the Commonwealth connection is valued here, not only for the reasons given by the Prime Minister, but also because his basic western orientation can be expressed in the Commonwealth context without leaving him open to accusations that he is too involved with the west.

Other International Organizations

6. Very shortly after independence, Ghana became a member of the United Nations. There is great respect for the work of that organization in the social and economic fields and much idealism concerning its political possibilities. If an African grouping at the United Nations is effectively organized, it will be largely owing to Ghana's initiative and, as I have previously reported, I would expect that such a grouping would have a discernable western orientation in contrast with the Afro-Asian group as a whole. Ghanaians, of course, take a lively interest in non-self governing and trust territories and there are indications that the political force which was organized to win independence for Ghana will now be directed to bring about political changes in dependent territories. There is evidence of a sense of mission about this. Their participation in the debates on these questions at the last Assembly showed up their inexperience; I am hopeful that more experience and the habit of consultation will lead to more constructive participation. Ghanaians are also interested in disarmament and the Prime Minister has spoken on a number of occasions of the benefits to Africa which could be achieved if money now being spent on defence could be channelled into economic development. There was a strong reaction here against the suggestion of using the Sahara for nuclear tests. The attitude to nuclear tests and disarmament, while strong, is not informed; Ghanaians do not fully grasp the fact that unilateral action to cease tests or reduce armaments is no substitute for international agreement. Soviet propaganda has had its effect in this part of the world.

7. Ghana is a member of most of the specialized agencies and in addition participates in the work of C.C.T.A. and F.A.M.A.

8. The attitude to regional defence organizations is governed by the basic policy of non-alignment. There is no praise for NATO nor any desire to understand why such an alliance is necessary. Nor is there realization that the existence of NATO has contributed to Ghana's security. This insularity was revealingly expressed by the Prime Minister in his opening statement to the conference of independent African states — in speaking of the Great Powers he said

“In any case we appeal to them to live in tolerant and peaceful co-existence and to leave us to live our own lives.”

Relations with the Great Powers

9. Although expressing disinterest in great power differences, Ghana is anxious to pursue bilateral relationships with them. Ghana, of course, still depends very much on the United Kingdom's cooperation in various fields and this special relationship can be expected to continue. The United States looms large as a source of investment capital and technical aid and the influence of the United States which has launched a large technical assistance programme has extended rapidly during the first year. At the same time Ghana is making efforts to avoid over commitment with the United Kingdom, both in order to emphasize her status of independence and also in pursuance of the policy of non-alignment. Conscious efforts are also made to try to ensure that in diversification they will not become too dependent on the United States and the large size of the U.S. mission here has been the subject of some comment. On certain projects where outside help is needed and which the United States could easily and willingly supply the authorities tend to look first to such other countries as Canada, Germany, Israel or India. France, whose territory surrounds Ghana, is an important customer and source of supply, and one of the first countries with which Ghana exchanged diplomatic missions.

10. The result is that Ghana is historically and economically involved with three of the Great Powers and, in view of her desire for non-commitment, the Prime Minister has decided that Ghana and the U.S.S.R. should cultivate normal diplomatic relations. He is in fact not entirely comfortable at the prospect. I would expect that the U.S.S.R. considers that this is the first real opportunity of extending influence in "black Africa" that has come its way. Thus, though before independence contacts were almost non-existent, during the last year the U.S.S.R. has taken advantage of Nkrumah's stated desire to be friendly and are trying hard to develop political, commercial and cultural relations. The U.S.S.R. officials in London have been very attentive to official Ghanaian representatives and to students in the United Kingdom. The U.S.S.R. was of course represented at the independence celebrations; later a trade mission spent some time in Ghana, a visiting professor lectured at the university and two Russian ships called briefly at Takoradi. The opening of a U.S.S.R. mission is now expected to take place before the end of the current year. Thus the testing time for Ghana's diplomacy is still ahead. To a certain extent Communist China has also made overtures and the Prime Minister has stated that he wishes to have friendly relations with it too. As I have said earlier, some followers here dislike too friendly an association with the west while others are more anxious further to cultivate relations with the communist powers.

India and Israel

11. Other than the United Kingdom and the United States, the two countries which exercise an important influence are India and Israel. Indian political development has been an important example for Nkrumah who has a high opinion of Nehru as the leader of newly-independent under-developed countries, and of India as the most powerful coloured member of the Commonwealth and as the chief exponent of non-involvement with power blocs. The Indian Government has always taken a special interest in Ghana; an Indian Commissioner was here for some years before independence. The growth of Israeli influence results from the determined efforts of that country to strengthen its position with the Afro-Asian group. It has been extremely active in offering assistance to Ghana and its representatives here are assiduous in promoting Israeli interests. So far, Ghana has been able to take advantage of Israel's willingness to help without compromising its friendship with Arab states, of which its relations with the U.A.R. are the closest. It recognized Egypt and later the U.A.R. and has established a mission in Cairo. The Prime Minister will shortly visit Cairo as part of his tour of independent African states.

Pan-Africanism

12. While Ghanaians are pleased with the progress they have made in extending their interests outside Africa, the most important aspect of foreign policy from the point of view of the Prime Minister and the country has been the trend in relations with other African states; a trend largely fostered by Dr. Nkrumah. The conference of independent African states was a singular achievement and his initiative in arranging it may be said to have enhanced his prestige in Africa, although not without some reservations on the part of the political leaders in the other countries. It is still too early to know whether the resolutions of the conference will be translated into action, but we expect that Ghana will continue to encourage the development of an African personality and the political emancipation of Africans in colonial territories, and to take the lead in arranging consultations between African members at the United Nations. The problems which will concern these states as a group are precisely those on which they have differences of opinion with the western powers.

13. One factor in Nkrumah's desire to go ahead quickly on Pan-Africanism is the future threat to his leadership posed by an independent Nigeria which will be potentially more influential in the Commonwealth and Africa and which will not be ready to follow Nkrumah. Nigerians are inclined to look down on Ghana and there is not much 'good neighbourliness' on either side. There is here the seed of future embarrassment and both sides should be urged to compose their differences before they become intractable. There has been no discussion of the possibility of a West African federation; Nkrumah's expansionist tendencies are for the moment more modest and relate to French Togoland on the east, a small section of the Ivory Coast on the West and the Upper Volta in the north.

Canada and Ghana

14. The Ghanaian authorities are extremely friendly towards and interested in Canada. They have appreciated the cooperation which we have extended whether directly or through the United Nations and Canadian influence could be expanded without arousing distrust. As I have said in other reports, Ghanaian policy is inclined to be unpredictable and easily influenced. It is in our interest to ensure that the strongest influences from the outside are good ones and I believe that we are in a good position to act. I was interested to hear from Mr. Bing that with the Prime Minister's approval he proposes to consult with the Canadian and Indian delegations on outstanding questions concerning the Law of the Sea. This is based on Ghana's experience at Geneva; Mr. Bing was impressed with the work of the Canadian delegation there and regarded as fruitful the collaboration between the two delegations. In my opinion, Ghana would be ready to consider the practice of close consultation with India and Canada on many international questions if we encouraged them to do so. (This is something which the Prime Minister may wish to explore during his forthcoming conversations with Dr. Nkrumah.)

General Assessment

15. The first year has thus seen the continuation of close relationships with the United Kingdom; a rapid development of United States influence; and a strengthening of ties with India, Israel and Canada. These relationships are important for Ghana for it is through them that she hopes to attract capital and technical assistance which are essential for the country's development. A pan-African policy has been launched with some success and is the Prime Minister's overriding concern in foreign policy.

16. In general, Ghana's external policy during its first year has followed with minor fluctuations the line announced by the Prime Minister. Signs of inexperience and naivety showed from time to time but by and large the course of events was reassuring. The basic idea of non-commitment contains elements of unreality and insularity but the fundamental orientation is western. I would suggest that at this stage, any more pronounced signs of sympathy for western causes would not serve our best interests since they might tend to reduce Ghana's influence with other African states and political parties which so far is a moderating one quite alive to the dangers of communist offers of assistance. Such an orientation might also provide a political issue internally which at this stage might do more harm than good. (This is a question on which a departmental view would be welcomed.) Finally, Ghana's external policy is Nkrumah's and is subject to his strengths and weaknesses. As in internal affairs — the testing years are still ahead.

CONFIDENTIAL

DR. NKRUMAH'S VISIT TO CANADA

We find it difficult to estimate the success from our standpoint of Dr. Nkrumah's visit to Canada, but we had a number of indications that the Ghanaian Prime Minister and his colleagues were pleased with their visit here when they left for the United States.

2. The visit began slowly with a civic luncheon and Government dinner in Montreal on Saturday, July 19. Mr. Balcer, Solicitor-General, who greeted the Ghanaian Ministers on their arrival, was host at the dinner. The Sunday trip through the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Development was of interest to Dr. Nkrumah and his party, and both the small dinner at the Prime Minister's residence on Sunday evening and the larger dinner at the Country Club the following evening went off well.

3. Dr. Nkrumah's address to Parliament on the morning of Monday, July 21, was very well received, as was his speech before the Canadian Club in Ottawa the following day. In his address to Parliament, Dr. Nkrumah made reference to the Accra Conference and spoke of its aim to help emancipate "those of our brethren who are still under colonial rule." He did not, however, dwell on the Accra Conference or on African affairs. Referring to Ghana's foreign policy, he stated:

"Basically the policy of our Government is one of non-alignment and positive neutrality. I have emphasized on several occasions, however, that this should not be interpreted as a purely negative neutralism. On the contrary, we will always adopt whatever positive policy will do most to safeguard our independence. We have a vested interest in peace, and we will do everything in our power to support the United Nations."

The members of the House and the Senators applauded this last remark regarding the United Nations.

4. Dr. Nkrumah also referred to Ghana's development plans in a general way, and, in connection with remarks on the forthcoming Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, appealed to the Commonwealth to pay greater attention to the "political aspects of economic development."

5. Dr. Nkrumah's speech to the Canadian Club followed the same lines as his address to Parliament, with remarks of a general nature about Ghana's place in the Commonwealth, its development plans and foreign policy.

6. At his press conference on the afternoon of July 21, Dr. Nkrumah clearly won the admiration of the Press Gallery. All the questions directed at the Prime Minister were of a friendly nature. His remark at the conference that he was a "personal friend of President Nasser" won headlines in some newspapers, while his remark that he was also a friend of Ben-Gurion was in most cases ignored in the press.

7. At his press conference Dr. Nkrumah indicated that he was amused, but not offended by the fact that Canadian crowds had not turned out to greet him. He joked about the "undemonstrative character" of Canadians. If there was not much public curiosity about the Ghanaian Prime Minister, he nevertheless seemed pleased with the friendly reception given to him by Canadian Parliamentarians and the press.

8. If Dr. Nkrumah appeared to be happy with the reception he received in Canada, he may have been disappointed at the lack of opportunity for private conversation with Canadian Ministers. We had arranged for him to meet on the afternoon of Monday, July 21, first with the Prime Minister and then with Mr. Smith, who was to be joined by officials of the Department. Unfortunately, the Middle East crisis required that the Minister fly to New York that morning,¹¹⁵ and the Prime Minister's time was also severely restricted by the turn of events.

9. In addition to meeting socially on three occasions, the two Prime Ministers met for a private conversation of some forty minutes on the Monday afternoon. There were no officials present at the meeting, but it is understood that much of the conversation dealt with the Middle East crisis. The other principal subject discussed was economic development in Ghana and assistance needed in that connection. To our knowledge no specific requests were made of the Canadian Government by Dr. Nkrumah.

10. Mr. Botsio had a full schedule when in Ottawa, meeting with officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, that Department's Minister, Mr. Churchill, and with Mr. Fleming, Minister of Finance. Mr. Botsio also met with the Presidents of Maple Leaf Milling Company and of Ogilvie Flour Company to discuss his Government's plans to build a flour mill in Ghana. He also met with representatives of the March Shipping Company of Montreal to discuss a direct shipping service between Ghana and Canada, and with officials of the Ford Motor Company. All these meetings but the last were attended by officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that Department is informing your mission of the substance of these discussions.

11. Mr. Baako had a more leisurely schedule. In Montreal he visited the studios of the C.B.C. and met officials of the C.B.C. International Service. In Ottawa he toured the newspaper offices and plant of the Ottawa Journal, and visited the plant of the Eddy Company in Hull.

12. Mr. Adu called on various officials of the Department to discuss, in particular, administrative and protocol problems which his Ministry is facing. Mr. Adu's request for the assistance of an administrative officer from this Department and for certain material dealing with Departmental administrative procedures and with the arrangements for the Queen's visit to Canada last year, are being given immediate attention.

13. We are enclosing a number of clippings† of news items and editorials on Dr. Nkrumah's visit from Canadian newspapers. The press was very friendly, and in every case welcomed Dr. Nkrumah's visit. Many editorials expressed the hope that Canada could give economic or technical aid to Ghana. The Peterborough Examiner was one of the few newspapers to make some adverse criticism of Dr. Nkrumah's political performance at home. The Edmonton Journal appreciated, however, that "democracy as it is understood and practised in Britain and Canada, cannot be applied to the letter in the Ghana of today." The Kingston Whig Standard pointed out that "it was unfortunate that (Dr. Nkrumah's visit) should coincide with the Middle East crisis, since the attention which he might otherwise have received was not accorded to him."

¹¹⁵ Voir le volume 25, chapitre III./See Volume 25, Chapter III.

14. We are also enclosing a copy of the memoranda† which were prepared for the Prime Minister in connection with the visit. The memoranda were prepared primarily on the basis of your despatches, for which we were very grateful.

15. We should be pleased to have some assessment of Dr. Nkrumah's visit from you, once he and his party have returned to Ghana and you have had an opportunity to sound out officials. We should also be interested to learn how the visit was treated in the Ghana press.

FREE TRADE AREA — TO BE OR NOT TO BE?

At the end of 1956 Working Party 17 of the O.E.E.C., which had been set up to determine whether it would be technically possible to operate a free trade area in Europe which would include the common market of the Six, came to an affirmative conclusion. In March 1957 the Ministers of OEEC countries agreed to explore the possibilities of concluding an agreement and the project of a European Free Trade Area, not without many hesitations and reservations, was launched on the seas of preliminary negotiation. In the months that ensued three crews (Working Parties 21, 22 and 23) did what they could to manoeuvre through the cross-currents of European political and economic interests and to steer a forward course between the narrow United Kingdom concept of a Free Trade Area involving little more than the progressive removal of quantitative restrictions and tariffs for industrial products and the more ambitious ideas of the Six, particularly France, whereby a Free Trade Area would be expected to go a long way down the road to Rome. By the end of July the Free Trade Area had by no means foundered but the vessel lay barnacled and becalmed, no firm hand held the wheel, the way ahead seemed uncharted, and the prospects for successful and speedy completion of the voyage seemed slim indeed.

2. Now, as 1957 draws to a close, the breeze, if not set fair, is at least blowing and the Free Trade Area has regained momentum. Of course, difficult water lies ahead and many dangerous shoals remain to be navigated, especially around the French coast. But the new crew, under [Reginald] Maudling's command, are not without skill, and it seems possible that in the end harbour will be made and agreement reached on a Free Trade Area Convention representing a not too unhappy compromise between the divergent approaches of the prospective members.

3. A number of factors account for the changed atmosphere in which the Free Trade Area negotiations are now being conducted. We would be inclined to give first place to the success which attended British efforts, prior to the informal October Ministerial meeting, to convince Continental European countries that a Common Market not complemented by a Free Trade Area would act as a divisive economic and political force in Europe and would strike at the root of the cherished structure of European economic co-operation so laboriously built over the years since 1948. When Ministers came together in October there was no dissent from this United Kingdom argument and even Faure spoke of the desirability of a Free Trade Area (subject of course to the Free Trade Area being of a kind acceptable to France). The outcome of the discussions was a firm expression of determination to secure the establishment of a Free Trade Area to take effect in parallel with the Treaty of Rome. This was a decision of principle which had eluded the British at the March meeting and it is having its effect.

4. A second important factor in getting the negotiations under way again was the more forthcoming United Kingdom attitude, particularly in regard to agriculture, but also on a number of other subjects to be dealt with in a Free Trade Area Convention. To what extent the U.K. readiness to do something more in the field of agriculture will meet the desires of the Six and of OEEC agricultural exporters remains to be seen, but the gesture was made in October and without it the affirmative decision on the desirability of establishing the Free Trade Area would not have been obtained.

5. Mention should also be made of the less inflexible attitude of the Six. It would appear that, with the French ratification out of the way and every prospect of the Treaty of Rome entering in force at the end of the year, the member countries, with the exception perhaps of France, find it possible now to approach the Free Trade Area negotiations in a less defensive and more relaxed and business-like way. The passage of time would also seem to have resulted in some regaining of perspective which has brought with it renewed recognition of the desirability of achieving free trade throughout the whole of western Europe rather than in the Common Market alone.

6. Another significant reason for the improved climate of the negotiations is the fact that they have been entrusted to a Ministerial group of very high calibre and apparent sincerity of purpose. Maudling is an outstanding and skillful Chairman with the happy faculty of extracting the maximum measure of agreement from his colleagues; but the Ministers whom the other countries have named to the Committee (Erhard, Skaug, Faure, Carli, Fayat, van der Reugel) are also very talented men with an impressive grasp of their subject. To hear them in debate and to see the cross-fertilization of their ideas narrowing differences and producing agreements has been a rewarding experience.

7. The press reports on the Ministerial meetings have not reflected the positive and constructive tone of the discussions to date in the Ministerial Committee and to this extent have given a somewhat misleading impression. It is true that the French have been, are, and no doubt will continue to be very difficult. But our feeling, for what it may be worth, is that the problems of French intransigence have been overstated. There is still a long way to go to bring the French and British positions together but the movement has started and, despite some of Faure's more extreme statements, the general atmosphere of the meetings seems now to reflect a collective will to bring about a mutually satisfactory Free Trade Area arrangement.

8. It is not only the better spirit now inspiring the negotiations which leads us to believe that the odds are now in favour of eventual agreement on a Free Trade Area Convention. While this is a very relevant consideration, we have been more impressed by the fact that in certain fields agreements are being reached and by the evidence that Ministers are beginning to abandon initial positions and shift towards middle ground.

9. We would first note the greater flexibility of the U.K. approach relative to the British attitude in the earlier part of the year. We have already mentioned their revised position on agriculture, but this is not the only example.

10. Indeed on numerous occasions in the current negotiations Maudling has expressed readiness to take the provisions of the Treaty of Rome as the starting point for dealing with similar problems in the Free Trade Area. The United Kingdom is of course a long way from accepting the French thesis that a Free Trade Area has, in effect, to be a customs cum economic union to operate successfully and fairly. But it is clear that the United Kingdom is now prepared to have quite a range of subjects covered in a Free Trade Area Convention which are not directly or intimately related to the freeing of trade through the removal of tariffs and quantitative restrictions. The British have thus moved some way to meet the position taken by the Six. Similarly the United Kingdom is also now prepared to accept that for a number of questions the Institutions of the Area should be given a deciding rôle and has recognized that in certain cases unanimity would have to give way to majority rule. The United Kingdom has also accepted that the less developed European countries must be members of the Free Trade Area, must be given derogations from the general rules and, although no decision has as yet been taken, it seems evident from the discussions that the United Kingdom, in the final analysis, would not rule out some special assistance to such countries to help them more quickly to assume the full responsibilities of Free Trade Area membership.

11. The attitude being taken in the Committee by the Six other than France and Italy is also encouraging. The interventions of the German, Dutch and Belgian Ministers have been particularly constructive and to the point, and suggest that there is a general desire on their part to achieve a Free Trade Area in Europe. Admittedly they are anxious to find solutions which would be compatible with those of the Treaty of Rome and which will keep their French partner in the fold. But in the circumstance this is not an unhelpful rôle. Our telegram No. 2150 of December 2† will have shown, for example, how, when Faure on the one hand and the liberally minded Ministers from Norway and Switzerland on the other were bitterly divided on the principle and philosophy of harmonization of internal policies, Hallstein and van der Beugel intervened to bring the debate back to a practical plane and to focus attention on the rather narrow range of questions on which specific satisfaction had been given to France in the Rome Treaty. Again German willingness, announced by Erhard, to provide some financial assistance to the less developed countries of Europe was doubtless an important factor in the agreement to give new instructions to Working Party 23 which go some distance to meet the Greek, Turkish and Irish points of view. Moreover, it was Hallstein who first came out formally against Faure's proposal that an interim arrangement for the Free Trade Area might be worked out in the first stage after which there should be a stocktaking to see whether or not it would be possible to move forward. This point of view was shared by the Committee and Faure then agreed that his idea was a non-starter and that some degree of irreversibility had to be provided in the Free Trade Area Convention. Finally, the solidarity of the Six has not been maintained on the vital question of origin. The extreme position of France has not recommended itself to the majority of its Rome Treaty partners. Theirs is a much more pragmatic approach. They accept that there may, in certain sectors and for certain products, be worrying problems of trade deflection which will have to be dealt with (possibly by some tariff harmonization) but they doubt whether these will be numerous and important, and do not think that the general rules need be tailored to such exceptional cases. Since the British are also now prepared to look at and try to devise solutions for special problems of trade deflection which might arise in a Free Trade Area in which liberal origin rules in general applied an area of understanding and agreement is being built up between the great majority of the negotiating parties from which it may be difficult for the French and Italians in the end to stand apart.

12. The various points we have mentioned, taken individually, would not warrant any particular optimism about the negotiations, particularly when the stubbornness of the French position is borne in mind, but taken as a whole we think there is enough evidence to suggest that the outlook is, presently at least, for a successful outcome.

13. The answer to whether or not there is to be a Free Trade Area Convention will no doubt turn in the end, as it did in the Treaty of Rome, on the French position. In this volatile country with its rather particular political system it would be foolish to try to forecast how the die will be cast, and the current French economic situation is certainly not such as to encourage the belief that acceptance of the obligations of a Free Trade Area (or of the Treaty of Rome) will be easy for this country.

14. The present position of the French negotiators is that France must be given even more safeguards and guarantees in a Free Trade Area than in the E.E.C., since a Free Trade Area, being a less well knit and integrated arrangement, would increase the risks arising from free trade. They also contend, and this may prove to be the most difficult point of all, that a Free Trade Area must provide for some co-ordination of tariff and commercial policy vis-à-vis third countries. Otherwise, they argue, the United Kingdom giving and receiving Imperial Preferences and having freedom to negotiate special arrangements with outside countries (the example of a free trade area with Canada is frequently cited) would enjoy an unfair and intolerable advantage over the countries of the Six operating behind the common tariff. Since the United Kingdom and a number of other countries outside the Six are not prepared to integrate their economic life to an extent which would give France the kind of guarantees and safeguards she thinks she has secured under the Rome Treaty and since these countries are, in general, not prepared to sacrifice their freedom in tariff and policy matters vis-à-vis the outside world, it might not seem illogical to conclude that the Free Trade Area is a forlorn hope.

15. A closer examination of the positions of the protagonists suggests, however, that some of the fundamental problems may loom larger than they really are and may prove susceptible to compromise solutions. Indeed the possible shape of some of these compromises is beginning to emerge.

16. Concerning the difficult question of the schedule for achieving a Free Trade Area there now seems to be a general disposition to keep in step with the Common Market timetable and to adapt to the Free Trade Area the rather involved solutions of the Treaty of Rome for moving from Stage One to Stage Two. The French, as noted above, have already abandoned their suggestion that commitments should be limited to a first stage trial period. It is also interesting that as regards the Third Stage Ministers have agreed at least to examine whether more precise obligations could be worked out than those provided for in the Rome Treaty. On internal harmonization no decisions have been taken, but some compromise solution such as that in the Protocol on France in the Treaty of Rome, whereby the non-fulfilment of certain minimum conditions of harmonization would entitle an aggrieved country to take measures of safeguard with the approval of the institutions, is actively being explored. As regards the harmonization of external policies, the depths of French insistence have yet to be sounded and they may prove very deep indeed. But even in this critical field Faure has not insisted on pushing the general argument to the breaking point and has indicated willingness to await the reports of the Trade Experts who have been charged with the responsibility of ascertaining the extent and nature of the real dangers of trade deflection in the various commodity sectors and the kinds of techniques which might be used to deal with damaging deflections. It is notable also that the United Kingdom and the other non-Six countries in the negotiations have not entirely ruled out some degree of tariff harmonization for potentially sensitive items in certain of the trading sectors. A relatively new and encouraging development was the recent French announcement that they were abandoning their tariff harmonization proposals as regards non-ferrous metals, timber, pulp, paper and machinery.

17. If there is to be a Free Trade Area, M. Faure, and he has made this very clear, must be able to go to the French Assembly and say that the position of France is as well safeguarded in a Free Trade Area as in the Treaty of Rome. We now think there is a possibility that just enough satisfaction could be given to the French on subjects where they are particularly concerned to permit such a statement to be made without going so far to meet their point of view as to vitiate the main advantages of a Free Trade Area.

18. In this somewhat impressionistic account of the Free Trade Area negotiations we have tended to highlight the positions taken by the United Kingdom and by the Six, particularly France. In so doing the problem has been oversimplified and it is worth remembering that seventeen countries with varying interests in the different subjects under discussion must be reasonably satisfied with the proposed arrangements if the negotiations are to succeed. This sets some limit to what can be agreed. On the other hand the large number of the negotiating countries makes it difficult for any one of them to gain acceptance for extreme proposals. In any event it would seem that if agreement can be obtained between the main protagonists the particular difficulties of the other prospective members could also be dealt with. Of course the process of translating the desires of Ministers and their broad agreements of principle into specific satisfactory treaty terms will be a long and difficult process. But given continuance of the kind of drive at the political level which has characterized the first two meetings of the Ministerial Negotiating Committee the obstacles to agreement which might arise at the technical level should not prove insurmountable.

19. The possibility of the negotiating countries working out a mutually satisfactory Free Trade Area is one thing — its acceptability to outside countries quite another. It is clear that the European Free Trade Area which may emerge will be a far cry from the kind of arrangement envisaged in Article XXIV of the GATT. The inclusion of a less rigorous régime for the relatively under-developed European countries, the special treatment for, or the exclusion of, agriculture, and the sort of techniques which may be agreed to deal with serious trade deflection, such as limited tariff harmonization and compensatory charges, make this evident enough. And there may be many other departures from virtue through escape clauses and special exceptions.

20. We in Canada will have to examine any Convention from the point of view of the GATT and, more importantly, from the point of view of our trade. As to the GATT, the recent experience in Geneva does not suggest that the Contracting Parties, faced with an agreed position of seventeen European countries and a benign United States, will be able to do much more than register their concerns about certain features of the arrangement, agree to keep the development of the Area under review and in the end provide the necessary waivers.

21. As to Canadian trade, our capacity to participate in the hoped for growth of the European market under conditions of free trade will depend to a considerable extent for our most important non-agricultural exports on the agreed definition of origin (assuming that these exports are otherwise competitive). It seems evident, given the French attitude and the concern of most of the negotiating countries to protect one or other sector of their industry to some extent from overseas competition, that we shall not get everything that we would like in the definition of origin eventually accepted. On the other hand the French have not carried their partners with them in demanding general tariff harmonization and/or narrowly restrictive origin definitions. Moreover Europe does have a real interest in obtaining raw materials for its industry from the most advantageous source and this is appreciated and has been reflected in the negotiations. Accordingly it seems not unlikely that in the outcome the development of our export trade in raw materials should not be generally hampered by the origin rules.

22. As to highly manufactured goods, free trade among the Seventeen will undoubtedly make it pretty difficult for us to compete in the European market, except for specialized products with respect to which we may enjoy particular production advantages.

23. The question of the outlook for our wheat and other agricultural exports raises more difficult questions. If the Rome Treaty arrangements were to be carried over to the Free Trade Area more or less in their entirety, our exports or potential exports would undoubtedly suffer. But this is not to be the case. Nevertheless the approach of the Six in the agricultural field seems likely to have some reflection in what is to be agreed for agriculture in the context of a Free Trade Area. The detailed United Kingdom proposals in the agricultural field have not yet been considered and it is much too early to suggest what the end result may be. Perhaps all that can be said at the moment is that it should be possible to safeguard and, with the later removal of dollar quantitative restrictions, somewhat enhance our position in the United Kingdom market. As for the rest, it is to be hoped, although there is no way of being certain, that the arrangements for agriculture worked out between the Seventeen will be of looser weave and less potentially restrictive than those under the Treaty of Rome.

24. In this letter we have attempted to supplement our series of factual reports by some indication of the tone of the present discussions and to give our assessment of the outlook for success of the negotiations and, in a very general way, of the implications for Canadian trade of the kind of Convention which may emerge. We hope that our year end musings will be of some value in your consideration of Canadian interest in the proposed European Free Trade area and trust that any excess of optimism of which we may have been guilty concerning the outlook for agreement on a Convention will be corrected by your comments and those of our colleagues in other European capitals. — Merry Christmas.

FREE TRADE AREA NEGOTIATIONS

Subsequent to a Cabinet meeting on the ninth, the press was informed that the French Government has decided to prepare a memorandum on the Free Trade Area in which a counter proposal to the original British plan will be made. We have not yet been able to learn whether the French actually will suggest something completely different in substance or whether they intend simply to suggest a modification of the British plan. A French memorandum will be prepared during the next month by the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Finance; it will not be considered at the OEEC Ministerial Meeting scheduled for January 14. In principle according to French spokesmen the memorandum will not differ from the pronouncement made by Faure at the last ministerial meeting and for this reason it is suggested the process of FTA negotiations should not effectively be hindered by the announcement of this unexpected stand which has been greeted with some sensation here. The press description of the ministerial statement Thursday states that the government intends to display a "positive" attitude at next week's meetings, by which apparently it is meant that the plan France will elaborate later will be based on the earlier French thesis that the FTA, like the Common Market, must offer guarantees proportional to the risks which will be encountered. The professed intention in this latest step is not to halt existing negotiations. In the explanation to the press it was noted that the meeting next week will be devoted essentially to the problem of agriculture and a discussion of the UK memorandum. It is suggested that when the French memorandum is completed, it will be submitted to the other Common Market countries in order that a common policy can be worked out.

2. While we have not yet been able to learn from officials the history or importance of this move it undoubtedly reflects in part the growing number of statements made by industry, labour, and agricultural spokesmen opposing the FTA project. With the coming into being of the Common Market January 1, there has been a steady focus of attention upon the European Economic Community resulting in greater resistance to any other form of cooperation which might dilute the advantages to France of the Common Market. Within the past two weeks a series of emphatic objections have been announced against the FTA by important organizations which the French government will not find it possible to ignore. Moreover, the Independent Party, controlling one sixth of the seats in the Assembly, has formally taken a stand against the FTA. This means that the subject has now been put openly on a political plane, whereas previously it had been discussed in a non-political atmosphere. As we have indicated during the past six months, there can be no doubt that the French who support a FTA will have a difficult job selling the concept to the rest of the country. While it is not easy to assess whether the current reticence is comparable to or greater than that which existed when the Common Market was being discussed, it is our impression that the FTA will meet considerably greater opposition within the country and we think that for this reason the proposed French memorandum should not be considered lightly; although without the benefit of discussions with French officials, we doubt that it is merely a counter proposal for internal political purposes. Instead it seems likely that the memorandum will be designed to provide a more limited basis for negotiations which will take into account known French thinking on the FTA concept.

3. It is much too soon to speculate on how restrictive the tone of the French memorandum may prove to be, especially when so much discussion of detailed procedure has already taken place within the OEEC indicating both areas of agreement and areas in which there are clear-cut opposing views. Without attempting to draw too many conclusions from the present situation, however it is our initial view that this French action has been taken because the meetings thus far have failed to remove the essential differences which separate France from the UK. In detail, this means that the initiative of the UK on agriculture at the last Ministerial Meeting was not sufficient in the eyes of the French. What they wanted was not a statement to the effect that compromise would now be possible when what was intended was largely a continuation of existing policies; in France the UK action on agriculture, for example, has been interpreted not as it has by US (because the possibility of the UK accepting compromises at the expense of the Commonwealth cannot be excluded) but rather as a display of words which means little in the final analysis for it does not define precisely the nature of the ultimate relationship intended. Thus the answer by the UK to this secondary question of agriculture is not the one the French wanted and they doubt whether they have received any real satisfaction on their primary concern — the problem of origin and trade deflection.

4. When we have had an opportunity to discuss this initiative with French officials we will know better how to assess its impact if any upon French foreign economic policy generally. For the moment it appears to us not as a new departure but rather as a measure taken to emphasize the importance and the validity of the stand already taken by them. Certainly it would be unwise to underestimate the degree of opposition within the country to a FTA which could undermine the Common Market; there is a widely held suspicion that the UK proposition is intended to do just this. The French are not against FTA as such but they believe a FTA as proposed is designed primarily (although not exclusively) to give the UK benefit at the expense of the Six. To the French, free trade is a concept which entails both advantages and obligations and there is no guarantee that the advantages will automatically surpass the disadvantages. Therefore, their intention, we suggest, is to balance these factors in the OEEC negotiations.

CONFIDENTIAL

FREE TRADE AREA NEGOTIATIONS AND THE COMMONWEALTH

I received a visit yesterday from Mr. J.F. Cahan, Deputy Secretary-General of OEEC, who is the official of that Organization most concerned with the Free Trade Area negotiations.

2. Mr. Cahan told me that a copy of the French Memorandum had surreptitiously come into his possession. He had been struck with two things: (1) the extreme protectionist and therefore completely unacceptable attitude of the French which the Memorandum disclosed and (2) the extent to which Commonwealth preferences had dominated their thinking.

3. After he returned to his office Mr. Cahan dictated a personal and confidential letter to me dealing more particularly with the second of the two above points. Since this letter will be of interest to you, I am enclosing a copy herewith.

4. I have today received a further letter from Mr. Cahan which is a sort of foot-note to his previous letter and in which he writes as follows:

“Further conversations with the French have clarified somewhat their demand for “equality of access” to raw materials. It is clear that this demand is, as I suggested in my conversation with you, an attempt to re-open the arguments which the French have previously advanced through the N.A.T.O.”¹

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL.

Paris, March 24, 1958

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

It may be helpful to you if I indicate more precisely than perhaps I did in our conversation this afternoon, how the present French proposals affect the relations between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth.

2. Apart from agriculture, on which the French Memorandum is deliberately vague, because I suppose they expect that their view-point will be adequately covered in the Memorandum which the Six are already preparing on this subject, the French refer to Commonwealth relations under three points.

3. Their first point is that Member countries of the Free Trade Area should have “harmonised” external commercial policy. This means that the institutions of the Area should be able to influence the commercial policies of the Members, and in particular, that any major change in policy on the part of any Member, should require the prior approval of the other Members of the Area. The French Memorandum cites as an example of a major change of policy, proposals for the institution of a Free Trade Area between the United Kingdom and Canada.

4. Secondly, the French demand that there should be “equality of access” for all Members of the Free Trade Area to markets outside Europe. This appears to mean that any preferences extended by Commonwealth countries to United Kingdom (or Irish) goods — at least in certain sectors of particular concern to the French — must be extended equally to all Members of the Union. I am not very clear as to what the exact meaning of this is intended to be. Clearly, the French do not ask to have equal access to colonies, because they are not prepared to reciprocate. Nor are the sectors in which they are particularly interested very clearly defined. They do mention, however, textiles, chemical products, all of which are of some importance in trade between Canada and the United Kingdom.

5. Thirdly, the French ask that there should be “equality of access” for all Members of the Free Trade Area to extra-European raw materials. I am not sure quite what this means either, but I feel sure that it does not mean that everybody should be allowed to search for oil in the Sahara. It does, however, I think mean more than that there should be purely formal equality of access as far as Governmental intervention is concerned. I believe that the French would try to go so far as to say that inequalities in this matter, resulting from private arrangements between suppliers outside Europe and consumers in Europe, should be subject to review by the Institutions of the Free Trade Area. This would mean, for example, that British manufacturers would not be able to make discriminatory long-term contracts without the intervention of the Institutions of the Free Trade Area.

(Does para. 4 re NATO ring any bell?) [K. Goldschlag]

No! [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

6. You will see from this that the French go pretty far and that if, as the result of the pruning of their proposals by the Six, anything approaching their present demands remains when the matter is finally presented to the Maudling Committee, the British may find themselves in the position of having either to reject the whole thing, or to go to the Commonwealth countries with suggestions that there might be some negotiations on this point.

7. Personally, the French Memorandum as a whole, seems to me to be so unacceptable to so many people, that I do not expect that it will get very far. However, you should, I feel, be aware that the problem of the special relations between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth is one which seems to preoccupy the French very much indeed, and that in my own opinion, a Free Trade Area in which the French participate, which does not seek in some way to appease French fears in this matter, is quite inconceivable.

Yours sincerely,

J.F. CAHAN

FREE TRADE AREA PROSPECTS

Over the past few weeks as more and more has become known about the French memorandum, there has been a wave of pessimism in the UK about the likelihood of achieving a Free Trade Area. In the press this pessimism reached its peak last week. In official circles hopes were at their lowest just before the last Ministerial Meeting in Paris, and were boosted a little by the atmosphere in that meeting as well as by private talks with the French and others. Even most officials would not rate the chances of success higher than fifty-fifty, and we have heard that Mr. Maudling is depressed about the prospects.

2. Several weeks ago in Rome M. Faure told Mr. Selwyn Lloyd that the French plan would not be very different in substance from the proposals under discussion in the Inter-governmental Committee. He said their main aim was to alter the presentation of the scheme so as to make it more acceptable to French opinion. (This of course considerably understated the differences.) However Mr. Duncan Burn of The Times who had read the French memorandum told us last week that it did not differ in any important respects from the attitude the French had been putting forward ever since last September. Burn also told us the sector-by-sector element in the French plan had been considerably exaggerated in press reports. The plan did not seem to him to envisage giving off more sectors than agriculture, iron and steel and probably textiles. (However the outline of the French plan that appeared in L'usine nouvelle of March 6 which we are told is pretty accurate envisages a sector-by-sector list of processes for origin purposes.)

3. In any case there are enough aspects of this plan which are quite unacceptable to the UK as they stand. This is particularly true of the Commonwealth preferences point. Crawley told us that whether or not the French would concede any favours in the Common Market to Commonwealth countries willing to negotiate, "we really will pack our bags" if the French insist on pressing this point. UK officials keep saying the French do not envisage any concessions on their part and think the overseas Commonwealth constitutionally is rather like Algeria. Burn, on the other hand, who had toured the capitals of the Six and had also talked to the Australians and New Zealanders, thought there would probably be scope for negotiation. He recognized that the erosion of preferences in overseas Commonwealth countries would in any case be likely to follow naturally from the creation of a European FTA. Otto Clarke was not prepared to rule this out completely although he was pretty sceptical about the scope for concession by the Six of interest to Australia and NZ. The subtle thing about the French proposal was that any such concessions would really have to come from France's partners unless one could imagine the French giving up the guaranteed market for their surplus wheat. The UK objections to negotiations of this kind are probably partly economic and partly political. They would be reluctant to give up too much of their special tariff advantages in Australia and other Commonwealth countries. Moreover, they probably expect that in some pro-Commonwealth quarters here the loss of any tariff preferences would be regarded as a weakening of the Commonwealth fabric.

4. On origin and tariff harmonization the UK officials are awaiting the forthcoming discussion of the Carli proposals² in the light of the report to be made by the Steering Board. They look upon these proposals as offering a little hope but they would not yet put very much faith in them.

5. The reactions of some of the Six to the French plan have been moderately encouraging; e.g. the Dutch have said publicly that these proposals are unacceptable. Belgian officials told Burn the EEC countries were all unhappy about the French memorandum but were not too clear that they could succeed in altering it very substantially. And if they did, of course, the danger of the French Assembly rejecting the scheme would be very real. Clarke is still toying with the idea of special exceptions for France alone but recognizes such an invidious solution would be very difficult for the French to accept.

6. In spite of the prevailing pessimism everyone here is agreed that it is too early to write off the FTA. The revision of the French plan by the Six next month has to be seen first. It is interesting that on March 19 The Times, Manchester Guardian and Financial Times all carried stories by their political correspondents to the effect that the UK Government will lose much of its interest in the FTA if substantial agreement is not reached by July. These stories were presumably inspired in order to put a little pressure on those in France and elsewhere who are conscious of the political dangers of failure. Otto Clarke pointed out to us that the UK Government was engaged in what was for the UK a somewhat unnatural exercise — attempting to create much closer ties with Europe. Their enthusiasm for this was partly attributable to the fact that Mr. Macmillan had always been very much a European, and partly to the disenchantment with the USA which arose out of the Mideast crisis in 1956. If the government was thwarted in this endeavour by the Europeans it might react rather violently against European entanglements. The idea put forward in these press reports that the government might lose its patience therefore had some real substance.

The Carli proposals, formulated by the Italian Minister for Foreign Trade, Guido Carli, concerned tariff harmonization plans for foreign commodities that might enter the Common Market and the proposed Free Trade Area. Common Market members sought to prevent goods from entering a Free Trade Area country at a lower tariff rate prior to the same goods being transferred to a Common Market country without being subject to import duties.

7. Officials in Whitehall are studying alternatives but are not publicizing this, partly because they do not think veiled threats would be helpful at this stage, and partly because the alternatives they are examining are not too promising. Clarke suggested that the best alternative would be a FTA between the UK and Canada (which he estimated would be of more commercial value to the UK than a European FTA) but he realized this was not practicable at the moment if ever. A special arrangement with the Scandinavian countries (and possibly Switzerland) is being examined but Clarke does not see a great deal of merit in it. A natural reaction if the government was thwarted in Europe would be to look to the Commonwealth. Clarke recognizes the possibility of such a reaction but does not see sufficient commercial scope in it for this to become a true alternative. The “alternative” he himself would prefer if the present negotiations broke down would be a decision to drop the whole thing for a year or so in the hope that the outside world and the Six would come to see the overwhelming need for a FTA. This idea seems to us to have a good deal of merit, although it involves some risks.

8. There are of course some ways in which the UK could retaliate against the Six. Sir David Eccles mentioned chemicals to us as one field in which the Six could be hurt. He also said the UK agricultural market could be closed to Europe (and largely reserved for Commonwealth suppliers). Duncan Burn told us that the French were worried about the possibility of the UK promoting some other bloc if the FTA failed. Valéry had told him the obvious UK riposte would be a Colombo Plan for Africa (sic). By that he evidently did not mean what we would understand as a Colombo Plan but rather a Commonwealth-African bloc based upon tied loans and preferential trading arrangements.

9. While the possibilities of retaliation give a little strength to the UK bargaining position, the chances of success depend in the end on the French Assembly and French opinion. We do not pretend to know whether it would be possible for the French Government to educate French opinion on the basis of the dangers failure would involve for NATO and Western European solidarity or even on the basis that the UK and other countries could retaliate in ways harmful to France. But it is clear that any educational campaign would have to be gradual and would take a long time. At the beginning of February, Sir Gladwyn Jebb reported to London that the French felt they were being rushed. He suggested that the negotiations should proceed as slowly as the UK thought practicable. But it may be that a kind of sabbatical year would be better still.

FREE TRADE AREA — SEVENTH MEETING OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE: FUTURE WORK

At the end of the meeting Maudling enquired when the Committee could expect to receive the memorandum which the Six are preparing in the light of their examination of the French proposals. Fayat replied that the Six had set themselves a deadline of April 22, but that time would have to be allowed for circulation of the document and its consideration in capitals. He thought therefore that April 28, which the chairman had mentioned as a possible date for the next meeting, would be too soon for the Intergovernmental Committee to resume. After some discussion it was agreed that the next meeting would be held on May 2 and 3.

2. The discussion of the date and the agenda for the next meeting gave rise to a very interesting exchange between Maudling and the Six. Maudling noted that ministers had now completed their tour d'horizon and suggested that it would be desirable to inform public opinion of the very considerable progress which had been made. Accordingly he proposed that the Secretariat should be asked to prepare for the next meeting a first rough draft of a FTA convention. Such a draft would obviously have gaps at certain points and would contain alternative propositions. On the other hand for many subjects it would be possible for the Secretariat to include draft articles based on agreements already reached. As regards the committee's future deliberations Maudling suggested that ministers might be prepared to drop the general reserve which had up to now made acceptance of solutions on particular matters conditional upon satisfactory treatment of related problems, and might proceed to agree on separate articles subject only to the acceptability of the conventions as a whole.

3. Maudling's ideas were supported by Lange of Sweden, but Fayat and Wormser immediately spotted the real intent of the Chairman's suggestion, which clearly was to have available for the next meeting a draft convention to serve as a counterweight to the proposals coming from the Six. Fayat resisted the idea of a draft convention, but said there would be no objection to a progress report bringing together in one paper and in readable form the agreements which had been reached and the main points on which there was still disagreement. Wormser was much more definite. He said that the course proposed by the Chairman was fraught with danger for the negotiations. In recent weeks some measure of success had attended the efforts of French ministers and officials to modify the violent opposition to the FTA concept which had characterized public comment in France. If a draft convention were tabled (and news of such a development could not be (kept?) secret) before consideration had been given to the counter-proposals of the Six it would probably kill the prospects of acceptance of a FTA by France. Any merits of the Chairman's proposals would be far outweighed by the disastrous psychological results in France. He made an earnest plea that Maudling withdraw his suggestion and said that if the Committee were working under normal OEEC rules he would have no hesitation in vetoing the Chairman's suggestion. Maudling held out for some time, resting his argument mainly on the need to inform public opinion of the considerable extent of the agreements which ministers had reached. Wormser replied that all agreements, so far as France had been concerned, had been specifically made subject to their general reserve. In the end Maudling recognized that he was beaten and accepted Fayat's compromise proposal that the Secretariat should be authorized to prepare a simple progress report.

4. Our feeling was that Wormser was right about the effects on French public opinion and that Maudling's initiative was tactically ill advised. In general his touch at this week's meeting seemed rather less sure than on previous occasions and we had the impression that he was tired and not a little discouraged by the obstacles which remained to be overcome. The negotiations are now in a state of suspended animation waiting for the Six to bring forward their plan. Until their paper is tabled it is difficult to forecast whether the exercise can be brought to a positive conclusion. In speaking to us yesterday, Cahan characterized the negotiations as "hanging by a thread." He said that the Six had already sounded the British on some agricultural counter proposals which the UK regarded as unacceptable. They would have safeguarded the position of Danish agricultural exports into the Common Market countries but would have given no similar assurance regarding the future of Commonwealth agricultural exports in the area.

EEC AND FREE TRADE AREA

The State Department has had for a few days a copy of a draft memorandum to the EEC Council of Ministers setting forth the proposed common policy of the Six for FTA negotiations. This draft memorandum had been made available by the EEC Commission to Butterworth who referred it to the State Department. It was shown to us in the strictest confidence over the weekend.

2. Although this memorandum is an early draft of the 58 page document which has been submitted to the EEC Council of Ministers, a good deal of it is likely to have found its way into the final version. In any event, it should be of interest to compare the proposals it contains with the final proposals which the Six will eventually submit to the Maudling Committee, since this might possibly give some indication of the direction in which discussions between themselves have progressed.

3. The draft memorandum first states the basic principles which should govern the Six' approach to FTA negotiations:

- (1) The Six should work out common views;
- (2) They should not repeat not be drawn into any agreement which would imperil the EEC;
- (3) They should not, repeat not, on the other hand, adopt autarchic policies but rather show a real understanding of the apprehensions of third countries;
- (4) The Six should help create and join a FTA but,
- (5) They should only accept a FTA agreement which would provide for a common FTA discipline requiring:
 - (a) the inclusion of agriculture,
 - (b) the adoption of common rules of competition (export and production subsidies would be prohibited),
 - (c) the harmonization of external tariff, and commercial policies.
- (6) To the extent that their FTA partners only accepted part of the Six' obligations, these partners should only be given part of the advantages of the Rome Treaty. Thus, if they did not repeat not agree to harmonize tariffs and commercial policies, a system of compensatory adjustments ought to be set up.

4. The memorandum then points out that a FTA provides no repeat no assurance of establishing economic equilibrium between partners and recommends that the Six should seek agreement with other OEEC countries along the following lines:

- (1) While the harmonization of external tariffs appears necessary, especially for primary products, a list of processes plus compensatory charges could be an acceptable solution to the problem of origin;
- (2) The FTA should not repeat not be brought about by a series of specific agreements covering each sector separately. On the other hand, those sectors where difficulties would seem likely to arise could be examined one by one in order to ascertain which rules would best be suited to each (in particular those "not repeat not too frequent sectors where inequality due to imperial preference arise");
- (3) Commercial policies should be compared in a FTA context in an effort to coordinate them;
- (4) Financial policies should also be compared in order to anticipate serious balance of payments difficulties;
- (5) Agriculture should be included, but given special treatment. (The FTA agreement should not repeat not encourage autarchic policies between FTA partners and between the FTA and third countries by "tariff quotas, the lowering of very high tariffs and subsidies and concessions on the imperial preference system");
- (6) ECSC products should be included in the FTA on special terms;
- (7) The EEC rules of competition would have to apply to the FTA;
- (8) Social conditions would have to be harmonized;
- (9) The FTA agreement should not repeat not be riddled with escape clauses. The Six would resort to FTA clauses collectively;

(10) The FTA institutions would not repeat not have to be similar to EEC institutions, but could be developed from those of the OEEC.

5. The memorandum concludes that the Six should undertake a joint and thorough study of all the questions raised by the formation of a FTA, that such a study would take a good deal of time, and that, in these circumstances, the timetable proposed by the UK is somewhat unrealistic. It is recognized that, on the other hand, delays in the formation of a FTA would cause a decalage in the implementation of the Rome Treaty and that of the proposed FTA agreement. The memorandum suggests that a decalage would not repeat not be a satisfactory solution to the timing problem and recommends that serious consideration be given by the Six to a 10 percent all round tariff reduction between OEEC countries. According to the memorandum, this would provide the Six with a breathing spell of about two years during which they could see more clearly how successfully they dealt with their own Common Market problems and also could more fully explore, in the light of their experience, the implications of the FTA for the EEC.

6. Since this draft memorandum has been shown to us in the strictest confidence and on a personal basis, we should be grateful if you would closely protect the source of our information and refrain from discussing it with USA officials in Paris or elsewhere.

Dear Secretary of State for External Affairs,

The United Kingdom Government have recently had under consideration the present position in relation to the proposed European Free Trade Area and I have been asked to pass to you the enclosed two messages from Mr. Maudling, the Paymaster General, dealing with commodity coverage and Commonwealth preference. In considering these you may find it helpful to refer to the following messages† which have already been sent to your officials:

(a) On Commonwealth Preference.

(i) Two messages sent to Mr. Couillard under cover of Mr. Cruickshank's letter of 19th March, 1958.

(ii) Message sent to Mr. Couillard under cover of Mr. Cruickshank's letter of 28th April.

(iii) Message sent to Mr. Couillard under cover of Mr. Cruickshank's letter of 20th May, 1958.

(b) On Commodity Coverage.

(i) Message sent to Mr. Couillard under cover of Mr. Bowen's letter of 28th November.

(ii) Message sent to Mr. Couillard under cover of Mr. Bowen's letter of 21st February.

(iii) Message to the effect that a meeting of the Six proposed to the Paymaster General on 30th March that the commodities to be covered by the agreement for agriculture should be the same as those subject to the agricultural provisions of the Treaty of Rome, which was conveyed orally by Mr. Bowen to Mr. Couillard.

I have been asked to emphasize that my Government do not intend to start any discussion in Europe on the subject matter of either of the two enclosed messages until they have been able to have full consultation with Commonwealth officials at the beginning of June.

I am also asked to emphasize with regard to Message B that should you wish to consult any industries concerned on the question of commodity coverage my Government earnestly request that this should be done in such a way as to avoid any danger of a leak.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, May 20, 1958

TEXT OF MESSAGE FROM PAYMASTER GENERAL ABOUT
EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA
17TH MAY, 1958

There have been three recent developments in our negotiations for a European Free Trade Area which have implications for Commonwealth trade.

2. The first is the request of the "Six" that the commodities to be covered by the special agreement on agriculture should be those in Annex II of the Treaty of Rome,³ and not as we had previously suggested, broadly those covered by Articles 1 to 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature.⁴ The attached message (Message "B") deals with this.

3. The second development is more important. There has been a growing tendency among the Six to press for the harmonization of external tariffs in the Free Trade Area ostensibly as a means of getting over the difficulties of origin; in other words to turn the Free Trade Area into a sort of customs union. This has taken shape in the so-called "Carli Proposals" which would in effect give each country a choice of harmonizing its tariffs with that of the Six or if its tariff remains lower accepting the charge of a compensatory tax on its exports equivalent to the difference.

4. There can be no question of accepting the principle of harmonization as such if only because we are determined not to undertake obligations which limit our freedom to admit Commonwealth goods free of duty.

5. But there is one field where a form of harmonization might be acceptable, namely that of basic materials, always provided that the harmonized tariff was nil or extremely low and Commonwealth free entry maintained. This would go far to solving the "origin" question by preventing deflections of trade to the advantage of those countries which had the lowest tariffs on their basic materials. It may however present some difficulties and we should like to discuss it with you.

⁴ La nomenclature de Bruxelles était un système normalisé de classification des produits à des fins douanières qui avait été accepté à un congrès international tenu dans cette ville en 1950.

The Brussels nomenclature was a standardized system of classifying commodities for customs purposes that was agreed to at an international convention held in Brussels in 1950.

6. So far as manufactured goods are concerned, we have clearly in mind that even if we prefer to accept compensatory taxes rather than raise our duties there will be pressure to harmonize from traders who will find the tax system cumbersome and damaging to their export trade. If this occurred on any large scale our freedom of manoeuvre in tariff policy would be seriously prejudiced and the existence of free entry for Commonwealth goods would be highlighted as a special exception. On the other hand we feel that we ought to be prepared to show ourselves ready to discuss the limited move referred to in the preceding paragraph and perhaps to contemplate agreement to the use of compensatory taxes in a limited number of cases where significant deflections of trade were found to be otherwise unavoidable, or where the normal rules cannot be satisfactorily applied. In this way we should derive some political advantage by taking a leaf out of Carli's book.

7. However this may be, we still consider that over the whole field simple origin rules are essential and that these should suffice during the first four years during which period there would be time to negotiate arrangements for specific deflections of trade.

8. These questions, as you will see, are of considerable importance and should, I suggest, be thoroughly discussed at the meeting of Commonwealth officials in June. I hope this general account will help in the preparation of your officials for the Conference.

9. The third development is that the Six have, as you know, been contemplating proposals for some kind of sharing of United Kingdom preferences in the Commonwealth or alternatively that there should be no free trade in items where we enjoy such preferences. So far no proposals have been made to us but we intend to take a firm line against anything of the kind.

Message "B"

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, May 20, 1958

TEXT OF MESSAGE FROM PAYMASTER GENERAL ABOUT
EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA
17TH MAY, 1958

We have now considered the suggestion of the Six Customs Union countries and Denmark, that the commodities to be covered by an agreement for agriculture should be the same as those listed in Annex II of the Treaty of Rome. This was the contingency we envisaged when last autumn we suggested to Commonwealth Governments that they should examine their interests in each item in Chapters 1 - 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature, which is not in Annex II of the Treaty of Rome.

2. When our proposals for an industrial Free Trade Area were published in February 1957, we defined the items to be excluded as "broadly the items in Chapters 1 - 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature." We used this definition because it was the best ready-made definition of the approximate scope of the products which we should wish to exclude in the general interest of Commonwealth countries. We used the word "broadly" because these chapters include some items which are not food, drink or tobacco and there are some difficult borderline cases. Indeed we have always foreseen difficulty in finding a clear-cut definition covering all items of food, drink and tobacco and nothing else. At that time moreover, we were not contemplating any agreement on agriculture, nor did we know to what products the special agricultural provisions of the Treaty of Rome would apply.

Subsequently the Six, after lengthy and difficult negotiations to reconcile differences of opinion, agreed on Annex II of the Treaty of Rome.

3. The difference between our definition and Annex II of the Treaty of Rome is that the latter includes three items (cork, flax and hemp) which are not in Chapters 1 - 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature, and does not include sixty items which are in those chapters. The inclusion of the three additional items referred to is of no great significance. Of the sixty which are in Chapters 1 - 24 but not in Annex II, about half are foodstuffs and the rest are products primarily used in non-food industry such as feathers, kapok, etc. In respect of these latter items it would in any case be very difficult to argue that special agricultural arrangements were appropriate for them in the context of the Free Trade Area.

4. A clear-cut definition of commodities to be covered by the agricultural agreement is essential. United Kingdom and Commonwealth interests would almost certainly suffer from an item-by-item negotiation. The negotiations would also drag on interminably.

5. Bearing this in mind, we have looked at the problem with three main considerations before us:

(1) The assurances which the United Kingdom Government has given to other Commonwealth Governments about the preservation of Commonwealth interests in the export of food, drink and tobacco to the United Kingdom.

(2) The interest of our own industry, both as agricultural producers and as exporters of processed foodstuffs.

(3) The obvious negotiating advantages in Paris of agreeing to Annex II, and the general interest of Commonwealth countries in the successful conclusion of a Free Trade Area.

6. Our imports from Commonwealth countries and the Colonies of the sixty items I mentioned in paragraph 3 amounted to some £14 million in 1956, out of total imports of £841 million from the Commonwealth of all the items in Chapters 1 - 24. Of this £14 million, under £6 million were imports of the thirty items of food, drink and tobacco, including mainly processed food and drink. We recognize that most Commonwealth countries export some of these thirty items to the United Kingdom or have a potential interest in developing trade in them to the United Kingdom, and that they would in some cases lose the benefit of existing preferences on them against continental competition. So far as we can judge here however, we believe that in most of these cases the effect of the inclusion of the items in the industrial Free Trade Area upon Commonwealth exports to the United Kingdom would not be serious. In our view exports from Europe to the United Kingdom would not greatly add to the existing competition for United Kingdom manufactured foodstuffs which Commonwealth exports have to face.

7. Where Commonwealth countries hold guaranteed preferences on any of these items, it would of course be necessary to agree appropriate modifications of the agreements with the countries concerned.

8. The adoption of Annex II, so far as it would bring into the industrial Free Trade Area a number of important items of processed food and drink would be of advantage to the United Kingdom as our manufacturers would have considerably better export opportunities in this sector if all tariffs and quantitative restrictions on trade with Europe were removed. This should lead to increased imports by the United Kingdom from Commonwealth countries of the raw materials required.

9. There are obvious great negotiating advantages in agreeing to Annex II of the Treaty of Rome. It would dispose conclusively of the question of the items to be covered by the Free Trade Area, thus removing the risk of item-by-item negotiation in this context. To press for chapters 1 - 24 would add to all the other battles we have to fight to secure a satisfactory Free Trade Area, one which we do not believe we could win because we would have no allies.

10. From the outset of the Free Trade Area negotiations, we have thought that one of the crucial problems would be the treatment of agriculture. It now appears that agriculture may not be so formidable a problem as it once seemed, and our acceptance of Annex II would materially help us to secure a satisfactory agreement.

11. After balancing these considerations, Ministers here are of the opinion that, subject to the views of other Commonwealth Governments, we ought to accept Annex II of the Treaty of Rome, instead of chapters 1 - 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature. In reaching this view, we are greatly influenced by the negotiating advantage of this course. Moreover, it seems to us likely that the effect on Commonwealth interest would be small. We are anxious to reply to the Six fairly soon, but would first wish to have the views of Commonwealth Governments.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

UNITED KINGDOM POSITION ON THE FREE TRADE AREA

I am giving below a brief outline of the contents of the two messages recently from Mr. Maudling, and am also making some preliminary comments as to the significance of these messages from our point of view.

The messages from Mr. Maudling cover three separate issues arising in the Free Trade Area negotiations, i.e. agriculture, tariff harmonization and preferences. On the first two issues the U.K. is considering modifying its position in an attempt to meet some of the demands being made on it by the European countries. The U.K. would like to discuss these points with the Commonwealth in June. Following is a summary of these messages:

Summary of Mr. Maudling's Messages1. Agriculture

The U.K. indicates that it is actively negotiating an agricultural agreement within the Free Trade Area with the other European countries. With a view to facilitating these negotiations, the U.K. would like to adopt the same definition of agriculture as is used by the Six for the Common Market agricultural arrangements. This would mean shifting from the present definition based on chapters 1 to 24 of the Brussels Nomenclature to the list of agricultural and fisheries items in Annex II of the Rome Treaty. If this were done, a small number of agricultural items would be brought fully into the Free Trade Area and would thus become duty-free when imported from Europe. The U.K. states that these items are of marginal importance for the Commonwealth and hope there will be no objection to narrowing the scope of their assurances on agriculture to this extent.

2. Tariff Harmonization

A number of European countries claim that the Free Trade Area concept in which each member country maintains its own external tariff, gives undue advantages to those countries having low external tariffs, and, in particular, to the U.K. which has duty-free entry for most Commonwealth goods. It is therefore being proposed that the Free Trade Area should adopt the principle of tariff harmonization to overcome this problem. This would mean that the Free Trade Area countries would all establish roughly the same tariff levels towards third countries. The U.K. states that while they cannot accept this principle, they might be prepared to accept a form of tariff harmonization for basic materials only, as long as the harmonized tariffs were nil or very low, and as long as Commonwealth free entry into the U.K. was maintained. The fact that the U.K. would maintain Commonwealth free entry and would thus not fully harmonize its tariffs on basic materials, might mean that the other European countries would insist on levying compensating taxes on U.K. manufactured goods sold in Europe. The U.K. states that they are prepared to accept this in a limited number of cases.

3. Preferences

European countries are contemplating proposals for some kind of sharing of preferences extended by the Commonwealth to the U.K., or, alternatively, that there should be no free trade in items where the U.K. enjoys such preferences. This would be intended to equalize the competitive position in the Free Trade Area of the U.K. and other European countries. The U.K. states that they intend to take a firm line against any such proposals.

Our Preliminary Comments

Mr. Maudling's messages raise issues which are complex and important from our point of view but they do not fully reveal what the final position may be as far as the U.K. is concerned. While we should be prepared to discuss these issues carefully and in detail, our own position in these discussions should be fully reserved until we are able to see more clearly what is involved. On the basis of a review of Mr. Maudling's messages the following preliminary comments may be relevant:

1. Agriculture

(a) The U.K. has raised with us the question of definition of agriculture as if this were the main issue. However, Mr. Maudling's message indicates that the U.K. is contemplating a special agreement on agriculture within the Free Trade Area. This means that the exclusion of agriculture from the Free Trade Area, which had been mentioned in the original assurances given by U.K. Ministers, is no longer being envisaged. Mr. Maudling's message does state, however, that the assurance given about the preservation of Commonwealth agricultural interests in the U.K. is a major consideration. Nothing is said in these messages about the substance of the proposed agreement on agriculture, although it is implied that it would not affect U.K. tariffs. However, now that an agricultural agreement is being negotiated it is likely that pressures will grow for the Free Trade Area to adopt the techniques of managed markets for agriculture which apply within the Common Market, involving minimum prices, quotas and other measures to allocate agricultural imports in Europe. If the U.K. were to agree to such arrangements, the terms of access for Commonwealth agricultural exports to the U.K. might be impaired even though the tariff preferences as such were not affected.

(b) As far as the question of the definition of agriculture is concerned, the difference between Annex II and the Brussels list is relatively small. Adoption of Annex II as proposed by the U.K. would mean that some 60 agricultural items would become subject to duty-free entry when imported from Europe. These 60 items include only 4 or 5 in which Canada has any appreciable or potential trade interest. They are whisky (where the preference is of marginal importance) macaroni and prepared cereal foods, boiled linseed oil (most of our exports are of crude linseed oil), and two or three marginal items. Some of the other products that would be affected, such as wool grease, cocoa paste and cocoa butter, hemp and vegetable waxes, might be of interest to other Commonwealth countries.

(c) The U.K. says that the adoption of Annex II would meet the request of the Six and would avoid the possibility of their being forced into an item-by-item examination of agriculture. Even if this is the case, there is no assurance that this U.K. compromise would meet the wishes of European countries other than the Six, some of whom, such as Norway, are pressing for inclusion of fish in the Free Trade Area. There is the obvious danger that this shift in the U.K. position may set in motion a process of further erosion of the agricultural list.

(d) Canadian agricultural and fisheries exports to the U.K. cover a fairly wide range of products, and, in the absence of dollar restrictions, would be even more diversified. Agricultural exports to the U.K. in 1957 totalled some $260 million with the main items being wheat, $130 million; barley, $20 million; flour, $20 million; flaxseed, $22 million; soyabean oil cake and meal, $18 million and tobacco, $16 million. In addition, there is a range of smaller agricultural and fisheries exports such as cheese, apples, tallow and canned salmon. Moreover, there is a possibility that with further relaxation of dollar restrictions Canada might be able to re-enter the U.K. market from time to time with respect to bacon, eggs, canned foods, cereal foods and frozen fish. Thus, any disposition on the part of the U.K. to adopt managed market techniques along the lines of the agricultural arrangements relating to Annex II in the Common Market could well prejudice our position on a number of items. It should be noted that a number of European countries, such as France, Sweden, Turkey (as producers) and Germany (as importer) would be anxious to see the U.K. undertake to buy more European wheat and other grains.

2. Tariff Harmonization

(a) It has been hoped that one of the main benefits accruing from the Free Trade Area for countries such as Canada would be the possibility of increased exports of basic materials duty-free to the U.K. for further processing and re-export to an expanding European market. For these benefits to be realized, it is necessary that the Free Trade Area should adopt moderate rules of origin which would not unduly penalize U.K. manufactured goods incorporating raw materials from the outside world. The proposals for tariff harmonization as an alternative to rules of origin are essentially of a protectionist nature since they are intended to remove the competitive advantage of the U.K. and other low tariff countries in Europe. Acceptance by the U.K. of a modified form of tariff harmonization for basic materials in which Commonwealth free entry would be maintained would almost certainly lead to the use of compensating taxes on some U.K. manufactures entering Europe. The application of compensating taxes to U.K. manufactures, because they incorporate materials imported duty-free, could have certain disadvantages for outside exporters such as Canada. For example, if the compensating taxes were to apply only to manufactured goods containing basic materials from outside the Free Trade Area, U.K. manufacturers would have an incentive to obtain their basic materials from within the Free Trade Area rather than from countries such as Canada. If, however, the compensating taxes were to apply to manufactured goods regardless of the source of the component materials, no special incentive would be created to use Free Trade Area materials, but there would be increasing pressures from U.K. manufacturers to fully harmonize U.K. tariffs so as to avoid the compensating taxes in their sales to Europe. In either case, duty-free entry for basic materials in the U.K. might no longer constitute our open door to a share of the expanding European market.

(b) A further disadvantage to accepting the concept of tariff harmonization, even in a limited way, lies in the fact that European countries, other than the U.K. and the Six E.E.C. countries, would have an incentive to raise tariffs on imports of basic materials from outside sources, so as to avoid the imposition of compensating charges on their manufactured goods incorporating the materials in question, when imported into other Free Trade Area countries. The more important of this "other" group are Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland, countries which by and large maintain low tariffs on imports of basic materials at the present time.

(c) The U.K. has hitherto pressed for outward-looking rules of origin, under which "Free Trade Area products" would be defined for the purpose of duty-free trade within the Area. The origin rules originally proposed by the U.K. in large measure took account of the interests of outside exporters to Free Trade Area countries. The contemplated acceptance of some limited tariff harmonization — which the U.K. would not apply in its own tariff — represents a modification of the former approach. It is difficult to say how far the U.K. may be induced to carry this modification under pressure from Europe for a compromise.

(d) Manufactured products for which compensating charges have been proposed in current F.T.A. negotiations include those incorporating aluminum and chemicals. Our exports of primary aluminum to the U.K. in 1957 were valued at about $79 million, and to other F.T.A. countries at about $23 million. Exports of chemicals and allied products (e.g. synthetic rubber) to the U.K. in 1957 were valued at about $195 million, while exports of these items to other prospective E.F.T.A. members are also large, e.g. about $30 million to the E.E.C. countries in 1957, about $1 million each to Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland. It should be noted that the countries that have been pressing for restrictive origin rules for aluminum and chemicals, (e.g. France and Italy) are also the countries most interested in tariff harmonization.

[Ottawa], June 3, 1958

The Prime Minister yesterday, after examining the messages from the Right Honourable Mr. Maudling transmitted by the U.K. High Commissioner here with his note of May 21st and the memorandum thereon by Mr. Isbister, told me that I should inform Sir Saville Garner that Mr. Diefenbaker would like to discuss this question of the treatment of agriculture under the European Free Trade Area proposals with Mr. Macmillan when he is here.⁶

⁵ Note marginale :/ Marginal note:

Mr. Léger: I am despatching a suitable telegram to London and am sending a memorandum to our Minister. D.V. LeP[an] 4 June '58

⁶ Voir/See Document 438.

I therefore spoke to Sir Saville on the telephone late yesterday and gave him this message. In answer to his questions, I said that I thought it was primarily this special agreement concerning agriculture that was in Mr. Diefenbaker's mind and not the other two points raised in the Maudling messages, i.e. the harmonization of tariffs or the sharing of U.K. preferences in the Commonwealth. Sir Saville wondered whether it was the difference between the list in the Brussels nomenclature and Annex II of the Treaty of Rome that was bothering us in connection with agriculture and I said I thought it was not that but rather the nature of the agricultural agreement now contemplated as part of the Free Trade Area arrangements. I said that we here had taken Mr. Maudling's message on the agriculture items to imply that there would be an agreement of some importance on this matter which would involve changes not contemplated in the assurances given us and other members of the Commonwealth concerning the exclusion of agricultural items from the Free Trade arrangements. Sir Saville said he would see that this message was conveyed to Mr. Macmillan as early as possible so that he would have an opportunity to consider it before he left on Friday of this week for Washington.

I would appreciate it if you would inform your Minister of this action by the Prime Minister which was, of course, in accordance with the decisions of the Committee of Ministers dealing with these trade questions last week. I am not sure whether any of the Ministers have discussed this matter with the Prime Minister. I rather gathered not from the way the latter spoke.

I think it highly desirable that our officers engaged in discussions in London should send us back all that they can about the course of those discussions this week and on Monday and Tuesday as well. Naturally the Prime Minister would welcome particularly any clarification they can obtain, either in the meetings generally on this subject or by direct discussion with the U.K. officials concerned on the nature of the agriculture agreement that is now contemplated under the Free Trade Area arrangements and its implications for Anglo-Canadian and other Commonwealth trade.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

The Prime Minister has now had an opportunity to examine the messages from Mr. Maudling on the Free Trade Area negotiations which were transmitted to us by the United Kingdom High Commissioner on the 21st of May. As a result, he has asked the Secretary of the Cabinet to inform Earnscliffe that Mr. Diefenbaker would like to discuss with Mr. Macmillan, while he is in Ottawa, the treatment to be given to agricultural products under the Free Trade Area proposals.

2. When this word was passed to the High Commissioner on Monday, Mr. Bryce indicated in answer to a question that it was primarily the special agreement regarding agriculture that was in Mr. Diefenbaker's mind and not the other two points raised in the messages from Mr. Maudling, i.e. tariff harmonization or the sharing of the preferences that the United Kingdom now enjoys in Commonwealth Markets. When Garner also enquired whether it was the difference between the lists of items covered by the Brussels nomenclature and the list covered by Annex 2 of the Treaty of Rome that was giving us concern, he was told that our worry was rather over the nature of the agricultural agreement that now seemed to be contemplated as part of the Free Trade Area arrangements. Bryce explained that that part of Mr. Maudling's message which related to agricultural items had been taken here to imply that there would be an agreement of some importance on agriculture between the members of the Free Trade Area, which would involve changes not contemplated in the assurances given us and other members of the Commonwealth concerning the exclusion of agricultural items from the proposed arrangements.

3. The United Kingdom High Commissioner promised to see that the message from Mr. Diefenbaker was conveyed to Mr. Macmillan as quickly as possible, so that he would have an opportunity of considering it before leaving London for Washington.

4. In view of the discussion on this subject that will take place during Mr. Macmillan's forthcoming visit to Ottawa, we should be glad to receive full reports of what transpires at the meetings of officials before Mr. Macmillan arrives here. As you know, he is now scheduled to be in Ottawa from the 11th to the 13th of this month. In particular, Mr. Diefenbaker would welcome any clarification that you may be able to obtain, either in the course of the meetings or through direct conversations with the United Kingdom authorities, concerning the nature of the agricultural agreement that is now apparently contemplated under the Free Trade Area proposals, and its implications for Anglo-Canadian and other Commonwealth trade.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE: FREE TRADE AREA
From the Canadian Delegation.

At the outset of our present meetings,⁷ the UK made a statement to the effect that the FTA negotiations had been suspended as a result of the crisis in France⁸ and that it was not clear when they would resume. This would depend upon when the new French Government could turn their attention to this matter and what their attitude would be. We gathered that the UK had no clear idea of de Gaulle's views on the FTA.

2. As a result, there has not been any discussion in our meetings on the substantial issues involved. What has been said in the UK statement and in a private meeting with us has all been designed to reassure us that there would be no commitments in the proposed agreement on agriculture which would affect Commonwealth countries' interests adversely.

3. The UK Delegation has made a statement on the history and present state of the negotiations. The portion of this statement that concerned agriculture said that it had become necessary for the UK to show its readiness to enter into some arrangement which, while involving no new UK commitments, would be attractive to continental food exporting countries. A draft agreement on agriculture had been prepared on these lines which would rewrite and strengthen the existing OEEC procedures in such matters as consultation about domestic agricultural policies and the trade in agricultural products and which would also embody arrangements for the removal of quotas on agricultural products. It would also attempt to give to the FTA members outside the Common Market access on equivalent terms to such commodity arrangements as the Six undertook among themselves, adding the proviso that these must be consistent with other international obligations. The draft agreement that had been put forward for discussion in Paris was substantially the same as a draft that had been circulated informally to Commonwealth officials some months ago. The UK statement went on to say that, provided an acceptable formula could be found for assuring Denmark and other European agricultural exporters continuing markets for their produce, the agricultural problem no longer appeared likely to be one of the most difficult issues in the negotiations.

4. Since there has not yet been an opportunity to discuss this statement in the meetings, we arranged to meet the competent UK officials to question them about the ideas and intentions of the UK Government in this field.

5. We recalled the very strong assurance that Mr. Macmillan had given the Prime Minister and the similar assurance Mr. Thorneycroft had given us earlier. We pointed out that Mr. Maudling's recent message about the lists was leading us to enquire about the agreement and any related understandings to which these lists might relate. We wanted to know whether the agreement merely involved consultation with European countries or whether it would contain more specific commitments affecting the trade in agricultural products.

6. The UK officials said that apart from the question of which list should be adopted for exclusion from the industrial field, in their opinion the draft agreement on agriculture faithfully reflected the approach described by Mr. Maudling at Mt. Tremblant and was entirely consistent with the UK government's assurances to us and other Commonwealth governments. They assured us that it would not in any way impair Canadian agricultural interests in the UK market. They recognized that Canadian agricultural exports to the Continent might be damaged by the "managed market" contemplated by the Six Rome Treaty countries. In their view, this agreement, however, would not increase that damage. They said it might indeed reduce it since the proposed article on commodity arrangements was in their view so drafted as to afford some real protection to the interests of outside countries which was not found in the Rome Treaty.

7. The rest of the draft agreement, we were told, was simply a rewriting of the existing OEEC commitments in relation to agriculture. These included the commitment on the part of each member to submit to questioning and criticism by the other members in respect of its domestic agricultural price support policies. The UK officials maintained that the main impact of the proposed agreement on the UK would be to put the UK under greater pressure to reduce its agricultural subsidies, which would be an advantage for Canada and other Commonwealth countries.

8. Finally, we were assured that the UK had made no proposals (and had no ideas in mind) which would go beyond the content of this draft agreement.

9. In the foregoing paragraphs we have endeavoured to give a faithful account of the assurances and information we were given. We are very much aware, however, of the fact that in the negotiations on this draft agreement and in the actual operation of such an agreement the UK may be heavily pressed by its partners to adopt commitments or policies which could affect our interests. At the end of our discussion with the UK officials, we warned them that we would continue to be concerned about such possibilities.

FREE TRADE AREA — GOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE: ASSESSMENT OF JULY MEETING

In weighing the results of last week's meeting of the Maudling Committee it is useful to recall the atmosphere of pessimism and uncertainty about the future of the negotiations which prevailed until just before ministers came together. The Committee had not repeat not met since early spring and since then the negotiations had been all but suspended. Mainly because of the unwillingness of the French to address themselves seriously to the decisions involved it had proved impossible for the Six to define a common position or present an agreed paper. According to Maudling's original schedule, which had provided as a minimum for agreement on all the main points by mid-summer, time was running out. UK impatience was growing and some UK officials were talking about the need for a show-down. Early in July it looked as though once again there might be nothing for the Maudling Committee to discuss. At that time in order to prevent the appearance of complete failure Sir Hugh Ellis-Rees was thinking in terms of a meeting of the OEEC Ministerial Council which would do little more than re-endorse the political desirability of an FTA and restate the determination of the negotiating countries to reach agreement; he was unsure that the French would be prepared to go even that far. The British drew some encouragement from Maudling's meeting in Bonn, but there was general scepticism whether the Germans would be prepared to use the spur if the French refused the jump.

2. By the time the Committee met it was known that some progress had been made by the Six ministers on July 23 and the atmosphere was one of cautious anticipation. As the discussion proceeded in the Committee the earlier pessimism began to dissipate and at the end there was a feeling that there might after all be a FTA which, although far removed from the classical concept, would provide for the substantial removal of barriers to trade between the member countries.

3. The improved atmosphere reflected no repeat no dramatic change in the basic French position on specific FTA matters but rather relief that the French authorities had at last been brought to face up to the issues involved in an FTA and to commence defining their position on certain of them.

4. As the Embassy has reported, French willingness to re-enter the troubled waters reflects a political acceptance of the FTA concept, rather than any belief in the economic benefits which such an arrangement might bring for Europe or, more particularly, for France. Accordingly, we may expect that the French will continue to press for the kind of provisions which will adequately safeguard French economic interests as they see them.

5. The politically more constructive attitude now visible on the French side undoubtedly reflects the thinking of the new French Government. We understand that de Gaulle, while accepting the Treaty of Rome, has made it clear to his officials that his acceptance is conditional on the understanding that it not repeat not lead to further political integration of the Six, that he would have preferred a politically looser association and that from this point of view and from the point of view of achieving a counter balance to German influence the FTA concept was acceptable. We have also heard from British sources that at a time when he has so many problems to deal with, de Gaulle has told his officials that he is not repeat not prepared to risk a serious break with UK on economic issues.

6. While, from the political point of view, the prospects for agreement on a FTA have thus improved the main economic hurdles to the achievement of a satisfactory agreement remain to be overcome.

7. On origin the Steering Board's report has been accepted but the mandate given meets French wishes and in essence the whole problem has been turned over to the Board without any real rapprochement having been reached between the UK and French points of view. Indeed acceptance of the sector by sector approach could be regarded as a French victory. In fact, however, the potential needs for different rules in different sectors has long been recognized and indeed was reflected in the trade experts' report last January. From the point of view of the progress of the negotiations it is encouraging that the Steering Board is required to make positive proposals in advance of the October meeting of the Maudling Committee and this will be a considerable task. From one point of view, however, it should be that the need to meet this deadline and to reconcile the divergent interests at play may lead to compromise solutions in which little account is taken of third country interests.

8. On agriculture the working paper introduced by the Commission represents a positive step but the proposals leave many important questions unanswered particularly concerning the degree of UK involvement which the Community would regard as essential. The suggestions made for the second and third stages are very general including the proposals for tariff elimination. The specific first stage provisions concerning the use of quantitative restrictions and long-term agreements would appear to give us cause for concern. We understand, however, that from the UK point of view the draft put forward at the meeting is an improvement on earlier versions produced by the Ockrent Committee.

9. Some progress has been made as regards the arrangements for membership of the less developed countries but the critical question of the amount of financial assistance and the ways in which it might be provided remains outstanding.

10. The failure of Hallstein and Rey to put forward specific proposals for an interim or provisional agreement at the year end reflects the failure of the Six to agree amongst themselves on the provision which such an agreement should contain (although they have accepted the desirability of an interim arrangement). We understand that at this stage the French would rather have a 10 percent tariff cut extended on a most-favoured nation basis than an OEEC-wide reduction which would involve a commitment to follow through to the full-fledged FTA. There is also the important question of the voting procedure to be followed in moving to the second stage of the FTA. This matter was not repeat not discussed at last week's meeting but the French are known to be pressing within the Six for the rule of unanimity not repeat not only as regards the stage by stage achievement of the area but also as regards all decisions of real importance. If this position is maintained each country would enjoy a veto and it would be very difficult to contend that the arrangement embodied a satisfactory plan or schedule likely to result in the achievement of an FTA within a reasonable time.

11. Talking to the press after the meetings Maudling permitted himself some guarded optimism in reporting the more constructive attitude which had characterized the discussions and the press has gone rather further than we would think justifiable in suggesting that the "log jam has been broken." The atmosphere is now better but this is relative to the deep pessimism of a few weeks ago. From the point of view of an eventual positive outcome it is encouraging that for political reasons and under pressure from the Five as well as the Eleven the French have been brought to take positions on certain issues and will be developing their stand on others in negotiations within the Community prior to the next meeting of the Committee. There is now in the Inter-governmental Committee an attitude of purposefulness and it would seem that the negotiations have taken on a certain momentum of their own and that the forces are moving in the direction of compromise and agreement. Against this must be placed the major unresolved issues of origin passage from stage to stage, agriculture and institutional procedure which could again bring the negotiations to an impasse.

12. If, when the Council of Ministers of the Six meet in the first half of September, a common position is reached on the major outstanding issues of substance, then a basis will have been laid for real negotiations both in private and when the Maudling Committee meets in October. There can however be no repeat no guarantee that what will emerge from the Six will be acceptable to the UK and the other negotiating countries. In the final analysis success may well depend on whether the political considerations which have led the French to resume the negotiations will be sufficiently strong to induce some retreat from the extreme positions which have been taken on the economic issues. In turn this may depend on the willingness and ability of the French leaders to win public opinion in this country to a more favourable attitude to the concept of an FTA.

13. Incidentally the FTA is now referred to by the Six in their papers and statements as the "European Economic Association," and the new name is catching on.

FREE TRADE AREA — MEMORANDUM OF THE SIX ON THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC ASSOCIATION

When we were given a copy of the memorandum yesterday by Mrs. Peolmans, the Officer in Charge of FTA questions at the FO, she made a few general comments about the document and the conditions under which it was prepared. We have also discussed the memorandum briefly with the Economic Counsellor at the Netherlands Embassy and with a member of the Secretariat of the Permanent Representatives. From these discussions some tentative conclusions have emerged in our mind which may be of interest to officials in Ottawa. While far more information will be available in Paris when the Maudling Committee meets, some of these observations may also be helpful to our OEEC Delegation in assessing the climate under which this document has been prepared.

2. All of the officials with whom we spoke were agreed that the memorandum was likely to make more of a contribution to the tactics of the Six than to the substance of discussions at the forthcoming meeting of the Maudling Committee. Many sections of the memorandum are undoubtedly vague by intent. But this also reflects the hurried nature of the preparation of the document despite the fact that the Six have been discussing continuously over the past months in both Brussels and Paris most of the questions involved.

3. There are rumours that a wide divergence of views still exists amongst the Six. There is fairly clear evidence in Brussels that the major Benelux partners are far from sharing a common outlook. The Belgians apparently have once again given greater comfort to French views than their Dutch partners consider desirable. Our colleague at the Netherlands Embassy said that the present document was somewhat unpalatable to his government not repeat not only because it enshrined the French viewpoint consistently but also because it was unlikely to serve as a genuine basis for the negotiation of a liberally inclined FTA — an objective to which the Dutch attach great importance.

4. The tactics which have inspired this memorandum may not repeat not be related exclusively to negotiations in the Maudling Committee. From views expressed to us it would seem that some sections of the memorandum have been written with an eye to future bargaining over the Rome Treaty in GATT and perhaps also to the eventual renegotiation of EPU arrangements. The following examples have been brought to our attention as illustrating that the Six may have rather broad tactical considerations in mind.

5. In section 8 "general considerations" the inviolability of the Rome Treaty and the primacy of the European Economic Community is enunciated. We have been told that in the drafting of this section the viewpoint prevailed of those who would prefer to see the European Economic Association concluded through a series of individual negotiations between the Commission (or at least a single spokesman from the Six) and other interested countries. This view, which has been flitting back and forth in the wings for some time, was publicly supported recently in the declaration of the Monnet Committee.

6. It has also been suggested to us that section IV "imperial preferences" and section VII(1) "access to raw materials" have been written in such a way as not repeat not only to strengthen the hand of the French in their struggle over imperial preferences with the UK in the Maudling Committee, but also to give the Six another talking point for the Article XXII consultations at GATT. When the Rome Treaty was drafted the Six attached great importance to the treatment of overseas territories but their political objectives are perhaps more clearly apparent now as a result of recent developments in Africa. The Belgians, for example, may be forced to grant a more liberal political régime in the Congo as an earnest of gradual evolution towards separate statehood. The strong community of interests which the Belgians share with the French in Africa has brought these two countries into agreement on the importance of ensuring that the associated overseas territories have access on a highly preferential basis to the markets of EEC and that this economic link will be translated into strong political ties. The defence by the Six of the Rome Treaty provisions concerning overseas territories on such grounds may therefore, tend to complicate even further the discussion of imperial preferences in the Maudling Committee.

7. At the Montreal Conference the memorandum of the Six on agriculture was sharply criticized but comments concerning the proposed industrial FTA were more restrained, partially at least, because the memorandum of the Six was not repeat not available at that time. If the UK had an inkling of what the present memorandum would contain (as they must have had) they were undoubtedly quite happy that it was not repeat not available for discussion in the Commonwealth forum. There are few observers even in Brussels, who would claim that the present memorandum now opens the door to serious and rapid negotiation of a FTA. The only note of optimism voiced by those to whom we spoke was that the discussion of the document may lead to the creation of a more effective method of negotiation than the 17-nation Maudling Committee.

8. From these observations the following conclusions might be justified:

(a) Apart from the Netherlands there is little sense of urgency on the part of the Six about signing a FTA treaty although it is still recognized as a desirable objective.

(b) Support is growing for a new method of negotiation in which the Six would seek to reach agreement separately with interested countries.

(c) The political importance of the association of overseas territories has been emphasized by recent developments in Africa and the Six under Belgian and French pressure may be expected to resist strongly any arrangements which would tend to reduce the preferred treatment the AOT's will be granted in Western European Markets.

FREE TRADE AREA ASSESSMENT

No one could claim that substantial progress had been made during the recent series of meetings of the Maudling Committee. By pressing their own and quite distinct points of view, both the British and French seemed prepared to risk a complete collapse of the negotiations; in the end both withdrew slightly without appearing to have done so. But there are now grave doubts that under present circumstances the French are in fact prepared to negotiate. For their part the British, far from isolated in the debates, will doubtless be undertaking a more realistic re-appraisal of the chances of success and the alternatives which may be necessary.

2. Towards the end of the meetings Maudling called a restricted session of all heads of delegations to express his deep disappointment and to record his government's view that a failure of the negotiations would be catastrophic for Europe. In the full and frank debate which followed, similar sentiments were expressed by most of the other delegates. Members of the EEC with the exception of France spoke of the need for negotiation in smaller groups in an attempt to find basic compromises and the Belgian delegation went so far as to say that if British and French differences could be overcome there would be no difficulty among the other 15 in reaching agreement. The Icelandic delegation spoke of the political necessity for a FTA and urged the great powers to find a solution which would serve free and democratic forces in Iceland and in Europe as a whole. A number of representatives, including the Scandinavian countries, Switzerland and Ireland, spoke of the difficulty in developing their own policies in view of the uncertainties as to whether there would be a FTA or not, and they admitted that in the circumstances a provisional agreement might be required. The Italian delegation referring to the Ockrent Report said that the Six had already made certain concessions and suggested that it was now up to the UK to modify its position.

3. The French delegation (Wormser), who spoke last, in a frank exposé of his government's position held out little hope for those who had advocated accelerated progress. He said that the discussions to date had served a very useful purpose in that they had uncovered many complications and difficulties. He referred to the grave problems which had confronted the French Government in the last six months and questioned whether other governments, had they found themselves in similar circumstances, would have been willing to carry on with FTA discussions. He said that he knew of no other country in history which had demonstrated a willingness to participate in negotiations the object of which had been so violently opposed at home. The French Government had been successful, but only after great difficulty, in securing parliamentary agreement for the Rome treaties. The FTA Treaty would call upon France, which had a basically protectionist philosophy, to open its frontiers to an additional eleven countries. As such it would not be approved by the French parliament at the present time. For France, the Rome Treaty was a political fact and care must be exercised not to place it in jeopardy. France, he said, could not agree that politically necessity demanded the conclusion of an FTA Treaty whatever its content. The Free Trade Area project contained many technical problems for which technical solutions must be found.

4. Turning to the possibility of differentiation or discrimination on January 1 when the Six took the first steps to reduce tariffs and enlarge quotas Wormser said the practical effects of this had been exaggerated. Germany had already reduced its tariffs and a 10 percent of the reductions of the Benelux countries was not likely to create measurable distortions. With the French economy protected largely by quantitative restrictions the 10 percent tariff reductions would have virtually no effect. On quotas he referred to the French Government's announcement on October 30 that it would honour its EEC obligations for enlarging quotas and he hinted that something might be done for other OEEC countries as well. Summing up he said that the discussions should continue but that concessions would have to be made. The UK point of view, he emphasized, was not consistent with the provisions of the EEC as the French Government intend to carry them out.

5. In his rebuttal, Maudling said that of course the UK recognized that the Treaty of Rome was a political fact but this did not impair the right of the UK to criticize the treaty's defects. Referring to the French difficulties in carrying on the negotiations, Maudling concluded by saying if these difficulties were too great to carry on, we should honestly face this fact.

6. At the beginning of the meetings, Maudling had argued for the adoption of "Spaakian" techniques to give further political impetus to the negotiations. Instead he may find himself presiding over groups of experts and the pace of any subsequent negotiations will depend on progress in the councils of the Six. Future procedures are not very clear. The Intergovernmental Committee is to meet again on November 13 and 14 and committees and working parties have been given accelerated schedules. What is not clear is whether negotiations will take place to resolve outstanding issues. The French have put the British squarely on notice that they expect compromises to be made and that in view of the unpopularity in France of even the conception of a Free Trade Area, few concessions (and perhaps none on fundamental issues) can be expected of them. The agreement of the French that technical studies may go forward may in part reflect the French hope that this will result in a prolonged postponement in the resumption of the negotiations as such and decalage in practice if not in theory will have been achieved. In fact the French emphasis on technical studies may be an attempt to ensure such an exhaustive analysis of the problems that they will be certain of having written into any treaty provisions to meet every conceivable French parliamentary and public objection to it. There was a time when great store was placed on the ability and willingness of the Germans (and others) to exercise a liberalizing influence on the French. This has proven to be illusory. The other 5 will not likely be prepared to press the French to a point which would place the Treaty of Rome itself in jeopardy. The Six must move together or not at all. As to the future, until the dust has settled somewhat, it would be hazardous to risk anything but the most tentative forecast. Certainly the prospects for a FTA Treaty have faded somewhat and our provisional view is that the prospects at the moment for a treaty acceptable from our own point of view are dim.

7. It remains to be seen if, failing agreement on the main substantial issues by the end of the year, a provisional agreement would be attempted; at the moment, borrowing a phrase from Muller-Armack of Germany, Maudling speaks of the possibility of an agreement on principle in principle as a last resort before December 31. However, this formula, as presently conceived, would not apparently involve provisional arrangements of a substantial nature.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE FREE TRADE AREA NEGOTIATIONS

You may find useful the following summary of developments in the FTA negotiations as reported in a number of recent telegrams.

2. On November 14, the second day of a fruitless meeting of the Maudling Committee the French Minister of Information, Soustelle, held a press conference at which he announced that a Free Trade Area on the British Plan was "not possible." France, he said, was actively seeking a solution capable of satisfying both the Six and the other Western European countries. This announcement was made on behalf of France and not of the Six as a whole. It appears to have come as a surprise to France's partners, even Italy.

3. Maudling has suspended meetings of the Intergovernmental Committee and its working groups and there is to be an early meeting of the heads of the non-Six delegations to discuss what can be done. At a ministerial meeting of the Six scheduled for December 3, the French may advance their proposals; the Benelux countries have already jointly proposed to the other EEC members an interim arrangement for the avoidance of discrimination to become effective on January 1, 1959. This would provide that the EEC members would unilaterally extend the 10% tariff cut to all GATT members on an MFN basis. The 20% increase in quotas would be extended "in whole or in part" to all seventeen members of the OEEC. Arrangements for agricultural products would be left in abeyance for one year, during which period efforts would be made to negotiate an agricultural agreement satisfactory to all members of the OEEC.

4. Reports from London suggest that the United Kingdom, though it is of course exploring all possible alternatives (retaliation; a grouping of Scandinavia, Switzerland and perhaps Austria; increased support for the multilateral approach in the GATT, etc.) would be inclined to accept some interim arrangement provided it included quotas. It is thought that this would give time for pressures against France to build up within the Six. It is also pointed out that the importance of the EEC market to the United Kingdom has declined during the past year. The Financial Times has commented that "with the possible advent of convertibility the great new trading opportunity for next year could be a trans-Atlantic one. If that were so, then the Common Market could well be left for a few "sanitary months to moulder in its French sulks." One long-term possibility the United Kingdom still entertains is that of giving France a special status (this does not seem to me to be really a starter, since it discounts both French amour propre and the integration mystique).

5. Such Canadian press comment as there has been has tended, rather unexpectedly, to stress the difficulties that would be caused for Canadian trade by a breakdown of the FTA negotiations. I understand that Sir Saville Garner has discussed the present position in the FTA negotiations with the Under-Secretary.

EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA: PROPOSED INTERIM ARRANGEMENTS

1. We are grateful for the many useful reports which have been sent on the suspension of the Free Trade Area negotiations and on consequential developments. This message is intended for your background information and guidance in any discussions you may have on this subject and particularly on the proposals which are being made for interim arrangements.

2. We understand and share the political concern which has arisen in Europe following the breakdown in the Free Trade Area talks. It would be most undesirable if the present situation were to result in an economic split between European countries. Quite apart from its economic consequences, such a split would have most adverse effects on the Alliance. However, we are also concerned with the prospect that interim arrangements or longer term alternative to a broad Free Trade Area may be considered which would fail to take account of the legitimate interests of outside countries and which might serve to separate the OEEC countries from their allies and trading partners in North America and elsewhere. The suspension of the Free Trade Area negotiations heightens our fear that regional or bilateral arrangements in Europe may take an exclusive and restrictive turn and that this example may be followed in other regions to the detriment of the development of international trade and healthy political relationships.

3. As a practical matter we have recognized the determination of European countries to give priority to more intimate economic relations amongst themselves and we are sensible of the political advantages which could flow from closer European economic cooperation. On the other hand, we continue to believe that the main avenue which should be followed to build up the strength and cohesion of the free world lies, so far as commercial policy is concerned, in the multilateral removal of restrictions to mutually beneficial trade. We consider that any regional arrangements should be consistent with this broad objective and are not willing to concede that Europe or other areas should have a free hand to establish arrangements inconsistent with the reasonable interests of their other trade partners. We are particularly conscious of the political dangers which would be present if Europe and the rest of the free world were to be further separated one from the other in their economic life and philosophy.

4. Although we have had to live with it, we have never accepted OEEC regional trade liberalization as a desirable end in itself. We have refrained from pressing our objections to the discrimination involved on the understanding that the OEEC countries would proceed to dismantle their quota restrictions on a non-discriminatory basis as soon as their individual payments positions permitted and that the freeing of trade on a multilateral basis remained the objective. Recent experience, particularly but not exclusively with Germany makes it clear that we have been overly sanguine in these expectations.

5. We have not accepted that the commercial arrangements proposed under the Treaty of Rome are consistent with the requirements of the General Agreement and we fear that implementation of the Treaty may damage the trade of Canada and many other countries.

6. We, of course, remain prepared to examine proposals for a European Free Trade Area in the light of our trade interests and of the requirements of the GATT, but have become increasingly less hopeful with the passage of time that the arrangements likely to emerge would be fully compatible with the interests and rights of outside countries.

7. The continental countries and the United Kingdom are not unexpectedly concentrating their immediate attention on schemes of various kinds to avoid the onset of tariff and quota discrimination between themselves as from January 1st. It is important that in discussing these possibilities the impression should not be left that Canadian interest in this matter is necessarily similar to that of any or all the OEEC member countries.

8. It now seems that Canada will shortly be faced with proposals for an interim arrangement involving the intensification of European discrimination so far as quotas are concerned. This seems the most probable result of any offer by the Six to negotiate quota increases with the non-Six. As regards tariffs, the situation is more obscure. A unilateral MFN reduction of tariffs by the Six alone would not have any substantial effects on Canadian trade and of itself would not be of great significance. However, if the cuts were limited to the Eleven, new tariff discrimination would be involved. If as part of an interim arrangement the non-Six were also required to reduce their tariffs, our preferential position in the United Kingdom market could be seriously impaired. In considering our attitude to proposed interim arrangements it should be remembered that at the moment we do not know what is to follow and there is no guarantee whatsoever that any interim arrangements would lead to a European Free Trade Area, much less to one that would be acceptable to Canada and other outside countries or consistent with the criteria laid down in the General Agreement.

9. It is clear that all the so-called interim arrangements of the kind presently being discussed in Europe would pose serious problems of commercial policy for Canada and other outside countries. It seems to us most important therefore that officials who may be called upon to discuss the different proposals for avoiding intra-European discrimination from January 1st be careful to act with considerable reserve and discretion. It is necessary to avoid compromising the attitude we may wish to adopt when any such arrangements are formally proposed; the impression should certainly not be left that the Canadian attitude will be uncritical. Officials should also have in mind the serious dangers for Canada which could be involved in possible alternatives to a Free Trade Area. We would be particularly concerned if a trend were to develop for individual countries to enter into bilateral arrangements with the Six. Any such move would inevitably set a precedent and would prejudice, if not preclude, the eventual attainment of a genuine Free Trade Area, or the dismantling of restrictions on a non-discriminatory basis.

10. It seems evident that if the course of events shaping in Europe is to be changed, a substantial move by the United States will be required. It would seem useful at this stage to inform U.S. officials of the nature of our concerns about the implications of the present situation and to learn if the U.S. authorities share our views.

11. Washington: Please discuss our views with U.S. officials concerned.

12. European Addressees: You may feel free to discuss our thinking with appropriate U.S. officials on a confidential basis.

CANADA AND FREE TRADE

Substance of this telegram was drafted before breakdown of free trade negotiations and before receipt of your reference telegram. While current emphasis is upon finding a short-term interim solution, undoubtedly from our viewpoint the longer-term implications of free trade are worth examining especially in light of this recent failure. I think therefore that there remains some point in putting forth my earlier views in a slightly amended form with the hope that they may be useful in your continuing consideration of this complex problem.

2. The French now are aware of potential political threat of a sharply divided Europe if a Free Trade Agreement is not repeat not concluded but in consequence they have changed only their tactics, not their intentions. I doubt whether any real compromise towards the UK position is to be expected from France because of the underlying French intentions which I appraise as follows:

(a) Even before Soustelle's statement French officials told us that successive Cabinet meetings during that same week had simply reaffirmed what the Foreign Minister had told Mr. Lloyd in London — under no repeat no circumstances is France prepared to agree to the sort of FTA the UK proposed. This is not repeat not surprising — it is the French line of many months but perhaps more bluntly put. The French continued to negotiate in OEEC presumably with some recognition in mind of the political danger which failure would pose but they were seeking an agreement with a basis much closer to their own terms;

(b) Before the breakdown the French obviously had been doing some preliminary thinking on possible long-term technical alternatives to UK-initiated proposal. The prevailing French attitude was then and remains today that a political decision is required. OEEC discussions had been construed here as technical talks on a UK proposal (admittedly with some modification) which has always been unacceptable to France. Such discussions have thrown light on practical problems of free trade, according to the French, but what is needed is political agreement on nature of a free trade plan acceptable to all;

(c) The long-term technical solution which French were considering and which they intended to frame in a wider political context apparently involved the use of tariff quotas. Thus the French alternative would involve rather complicated mechanisms but would be less ambitious in scope. In fact it seems likely that what France would have proposed (and may yet) would be simply a measure for temporary association between the Common Market and the FTA which could be amended subsequently as necessary.

(d) Prior to cessation of talks the French felt much less isolated than before and the intensive Cabinet action prior to Maulding's decision seems to have been motivated principally by the desire to appear forthcoming. The Six rallied rather strongly behind France in recent months in contrast with the almost unanimous support enjoyed by UK earlier (it is rather interesting to speculate on whether this new bargaining strength may have had something to do with UK's decision to break off talks);

(e) Finally, we know that French at this moment are seeking only an interim arrangement to take effect January 1 which will not repeat not be binding in long-term future. Their purpose is to produce a less tense atmosphere in which full negotiations may be resumed, and there is no repeat no doubt that they intend these shall be along lines which would fully satisfy France.

3. Hence it is not repeat not easy to foretell what form a final agreement may take, if one is reached. If UK under pressure is forced to accept a compromise on free trade much more restrictive than Canada has thought possible heretofore, our own trade could well be jeopardized. The strong bargaining position of French within the Six to which I have referred and the deliberate tactics which they are employing suggest to me that if agreement is to be reached the UK will have to accept a compromise despite the strong free trade support found in many Western European countries. Whether UK would threaten to make sterling convertible if no repeat no agreement is reached, I do not repeat not know. This is a possibility much feared in France. Short of this I see little the UK can do to impress the French sufficiently to make them budge from what they feel is a satisfactory position receiving rather extensive support from their Common Market partners. I think that French will become increasingly difficult as free trade discussions finally focus upon the essence of the problem: namely the watering down of Common Market's basic protective devices in order to satisfy other Western Europeans. After all it has been their suspicion that UK wished to dilute or destroy Common Market which has been at base of French objections to FTA since the beginning.

4. The true perspective in which free trade is viewed by other European countries is as significant as their approach to the specific European free trade problem. I am impressed by Luebke's argument to the Prime Minister (Rome telegram 395 November 12+) "that by pursuing the theoretical objective of free multilateral trade too quickly under GATT, we run the risk of causing serious economic disturbance in Europe and an unfortunate division in GATT between European and non-European members." Again Zanetti, Attaché at Austrian Embassy here, deplored to us the French free trade attitude and attempted to explode all French objections to free trade as being unfounded; a moment later however he invoked identical arguments in explaining why Austria could not repeat not pursue free trade under GATT but could not repeat not then demonstrate their greater validity in the case of his own country. A French official in explaining the need for practical alternatives to recent free trade proposal, stated that any solution, even Carli Plan, will pose a problem in that it will constitute a deviation from GATT; he concluded by stating this would not repeat not be too serious since GATT is now somewhat outdated and should not repeat not be permitted to stand in the way (of "progress").

5. These three views have one common element: free trade is a matter of degree; and the extent to which nations are prepared to accept it depends very much on their political intentions as well as upon their capacity to withstand or sustain it. What concerns me, as I am sure it does you, is that a Free Trade Agreement bought largely on French terms could affect us greatly and would likely be even more difficult to sell to GATT than the Common Market. It could be even more divisive in GATT, I think, than is the Common Market. Since we have placed much faith in GATT as an instrument for promotion of multilateral trade, a restrictive Free Trade Agreement is a real danger to exposed position of non-European GATT members such as ourselves. I have not repeat not seen a departmental analysis of FTA's implications for our own trade but I suspect that the danger could be greater than that from Common Market because of vital importance to us of the UK. The real difficulty for Canada and other non-Europeans that I see is in knowing what encouragement we should give to the general concept of FTA when it is increasingly apparent that the zone could, on balance, be much more detrimental than beneficial to us. In same way, it is hard to know how far it is advisable to go in supporting those who want to continue to negotiate and to hold the line against the French, if this will only lead ultimately to a breakdown. A prolonged bitter debate can only make the final split more emphatic and more damaging.

6. I am in complete harmony with the view in your telegram to London (E-2212⁺) concerning the probable way in which the French would construe an approach from us at this time. In view of direction in which free trade negotiations seem to be heading, I am heartened also to note from your reference telegram that you are already preparing for the threat which our trade may encounter from alternative free trade proposals. As matters now stand, it is my opinion that any FTA which is now likely to emerge will not repeat not assist Canada or other non-European members of GATT in alleviating any unjustifiable discriminatory impact of the Common Market and I doubt more and more if it will truly aid the prospective free trade members in such an endeavour. If it succeeds only in depreciating whatever justifiable economic benefits to the Six there may be from their customs union, the FTA will not repeat not likely attain its own avowed goal of an expansion of World Trade. It is more likely to succeed only by causing a transfer to FTA of Common Market imports currently coming from non-European GATT countries.

7. The French have told us, genuinely enough it seems, that their purpose in free trade negotiations is to meet specific problems which the Common Market will cause to two countries — UK and Denmark. Working from this premise, and knowing the "amour-propre" of the French at this particular time, I cannot imagine that they will accept a variation of the original free trade proposal which would include a specific clause or clauses to meet the particular needs of France only. Bearing this in mind, the most likely solution to the present impasse would seem capable of causing extensive damage to our own interests.

FREE TRADE AREA

The substance of your views on the situation have been made known to various USA officials, all of whom were grateful to have this indication of present Canadian thinking.

2. Isaiah Frank, the Director of the Office of International Trade in the State Department, was particularly interested. He told us confidentially of some of the difficulties which he foresaw in any USA intervention, even at a later stage when attention shifts from the problem of a temporary arrangement to the longer term question of the type of European trading system which should be created if the UK conception of a FTA is definitely ruled out. He noted that many influential persons both in Europe and in Washington will be much concerned at the possibility of a division of Europe into two or more camps and will be inclined to accept any system that would avoid such a split. He thought personally that the changes of any constructive initiative by the USA would depend very largely on what kinds of initiatives seemed feasible. It was, therefore, most important in his view that senior officials here at the political level should be presented with some pretty concrete proposals for initiatives which would counteract the divisive tendencies within Europe and at the same time produce a trading system which could be reconciled with some sensible pattern of world trade. If these officials were merely urged to take an initiative, without any indication of the form of such an initiative, Frank was doubtful that they would agree to do anything since they would be inhibited by the delicate nature of the European political relationships involved. He was, therefore, anxious that USA officials should have the benefit of any precise suggestions for solving the longer term problem which might occur to Canadian officials.

FREE TRADE AREA¹⁰

I am attaching a copy of Miss Burwash's memorandum of November [21] prepared for the last Interdepartmental Meeting on the Free Trade Area, which seems to me a useful summary of how matters then stood. I am also attaching a copy of our telegram E-2211 of November 27 in which views of the Departments concerned were formulated for the benefit of all missions who are following the Free Trade Area discussions. Attached also are telegrams 540 of December 5† from Brussels, 2891 of December 5† from NATO, Paris, and 1139 of December 8† from Geneva. The telegram from Brussels is the most comprehensive report we have of the interim measures proposed by the Six. The telegram from NATO, Paris gives some additional information from French sources on these interim proposals. The telegram from Geneva reports a conversation with Wyndham White in which he makes some speculative comments on convertibility. These seems to me the most useful telegrams on the Free Trade Area discussions.

2. There is still a good deal of ambiguity and confusion about the proposals the Six are now putting before the governments of the non-Six. The precise nature of these arrangements is not perhaps a matter with which you will wish to concern yourself too much in Paris; it is clear that they all involve some intensification of discrimination against Canada and the USA. However, for the record, I have set out below what seem to be the main features of what appear to be suggested by the Six in the way of interim arrangements.

Tariffs. The Six will grant a 10% reduction of tariffs on all industrial products and tariffs on agricultural goods which are not under quota. We assume this will be extended to all GATT members on an MFN basis as a unilateral gesture by the Six (in one press release, at least, it was suggested that this might be limited to OEEC countries). This would be a provisional measure but without a fixed terminal date. It seems likely that tariff reductions extended to the non-Six will be only on those goods for which existing tariff are above the Common Market tariff. This means that there will be, as the telegram from NATO Paris points out, no appreciable reduction in German or Benelux tariffs. There will thus be an element of tariff discrimination against the non-Six, including Canada. Presumably, the Six will be expected to receive some credit for these reductions, if they are still in effect, when the tariff negotiations proposed by the USA (under the Trade Agreements Extensions Act) get underway in, say, eighteen months time.

Sharing of 20% Increase in Quotas. Under the Rome Treaty, the Six are bound to increase the value of their bilateral quotas by 20% and to convert them to "EEC global" quotas. These apparently will now be shared out amongst OEEC member countries, not including Canada and the USA, of course. Whether or not any or all of this increase will have to be paid for by the non-Six is a matter of considerable concern. One press report has suggested that one-half of this increase of quota would be negotiated by the Six with the supplying countries most concerned, perhaps disguised as an extension of OEEC liberalization.

¹⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

3% Quotas. In more recent reports on the interim arrangements, the problem of the 3% quotas has come to the fore. The Rome Treaty provides that no quota by a member country of the Six shall be less than 3% of national production. Apparently the French at least are not prepared to extend these quotas to the non-Six as they are, of course, for many products of much greater commercial significance than the 20% increase mentioned above.

3. The Maudling Committee. The Maudling Committee was to meet on December 3, but this meeting has now been deferred to about December 15, when it will gather to formulate a report to the OEEC Council of Ministers on the status of the Free Trade Area discussions. The Council is to meet some time before Christmas. As paragraph 4 of the telegram 540 from Brussels points out, the Six now seem determined to finish off the Maudling Committee. When I was in Geneva at the GATT meetings, I heard a great deal about the antipathy of the Six to the Committee, and particularly to its Chairman. While the British, amongst others, have argued that the Maudling Committee should have an opportunity to consider the present state of affairs before January 1st, the Six have directed Hallstein, who has been given a roving commission to explore these interim arrangements with the non-Six, to report not later than March 1st.

4. While there have been some suggestions that proposals formulated by the Six are considered by them to be firm and not negotiable, it has also been suggested that Hallstein does not have authority to do anything more than informally explore a range of proposals with the non-Six and that the final position of the Six will not be taken until he reports in the New Year.

5. In these circumstances, how the European non-Six conduct themselves is of critical importance. I gather that one of the main purposes of the meeting in Geneva last week of the six non-Six, (Austria, Switzerland, Scandinavia, United Kingdom, with Portugal as an observer) was to try to strengthen the resistance of the Scandinavian countries against coming to terms on a bilateral basis with the Six. You will notice the comment in paragraph 6 of telegram 540 from Brussels, that the general view in Brussels is that the Six feel that their proposals are likely to be accepted by the other OEEC countries and that the UK might find itself without significant support from her European friends.

6. There is the further point as to whether or not there might be any substantial debate at the NATO Ministerial Meeting on this subject. Mr. Léger expressed his view in a recent telegram† that if the problem of the Free Trade Area is not raised by other Ministers, we should not seek to do so ourselves. It seems to me pretty clear that any discussion in NATO should take place informally. You will have noticed the report from Brussels that the EEC Commission believe that the USA would oppose any substantial debate on the Free Trade Area in NATO.

FREE TRADE AREA — OEEC MINISTERIAL MEETING

After almost 13 hours of difficult deliberations yesterday, OEEC ministers dealt with 2 agenda items which they had met to discuss. First item revolved around Maudling's report on failure of Intergovernmental Committee to reach agreement and prospects for future. Second and more contentious item related to proposals of the Six for interim arrangements.

2. At the morning session, first item was quickly disposed of in what later proved to be a superficial atmosphere of good will. All ministers (including French Foreign Minister Couve de Murville) agreed that work which had been done under aegis of Maudling Committee would serve as a useful basis for resumed negotiations. Ministers reaffirmed their determination of seeking ways and means of establishing an association between member states of EEC and other member countries of OEEC and agreed that Council should meet again at ministerial level before April 1 to review progress made. Rey, speaking for Commission, stressed that March 1 deadline for Commission, to report to Council of Ministers was one which would be adhered to. Toward end of January, he said, Commission would be holding conversations with individual OEEC countries designed to facilitate working out of multilateral association which had been agreed upon.

3. At end of morning session, Professor Erhard introduced proposals of interim arrangements. He stressed that these arrangements should not be regarded as forming a basis for a multilateral association; they were independent decisions arrived at by community in an effort to improve atmosphere within which multilateral association would have to be negotiated.

4. Supplementing Erhard's statement, Couve de Murville referred to interim arrangements as providing necessary breathing space (a year or a year and a half) during which both a better understanding of the problems and basis of a new start could be developed. In interim, France was prepared to institute a degree of re-liberation commensurate with the slight improvement in its still difficult overall balance of payments situation. On January 1 France, while it could not meet in full its OEEC obligations, was prepared to liberalize 40 percent of its trade vis à vis its OEEC partners. In addition, as part of its contribution to interim arrangements France would increase its quotas by 20 percent on a non-reciprocal basis with respect to 43 percent of its non-liberalized trade, i.e. up to 83 percent level previously liberalized. For remaining 17 percent of its trade, 20 percent increases in quotas could be contemplated only on basis of reciprocity. Rome Treaty requirement that quotas must represent at least 3 percent of national production would not be extended to non-Six. Products in this category would be found in 90 percent to 100 percent range of trade which Couve de Murville stressed had not repeat not been made subject to OEEC code of liberalization.

5. Only contentious note introduced into morning session (and one which was not repeat not sounded again) was a reference by Turkish Delegate to importance of interim arrangements dealing also with exports in underdeveloped countries. Such exports, he argued, should be subject to increased Q[uantitative] R[estrictions] and reduced tariffs and specific contracts should be agreed. He also argued that "interim financial assistance" for underdeveloped countries should be considered as a part of provisional arrangements.

6. At afternoon session, Sir David Eccles led off with a reasoned criticism of interim arrangement proposed by the Six. Tariff reductions, he said, would be helpful but they would leave untouched all tariffs which were now below or only slightly above those of projected common tariff. Taking into account list "G" items and other obscurities in proposals of the Six, UK had estimated that about 50 percent of tariffs of the Six would be unaffected. Community's suggestion for quota enlargements would, Eccles said, lead to a tangle of bilateral negotiations at end of which there would still be discrimination, particularly in case of France. According to UK calculations, value of French imports in OEEC countries from non-liberalized sector was approximately 100 million pounds, 50 million of which represented imports from other five. 20 percent quota enlargements would result in an additional 10 million pounds from the eleven other OEEC countries. Obligation to establish quotas of at least 3 percent of national production would, however, be reserved for Community alone and would result in an additional 30 million pounds in French imports. This degree of discrimination was unacceptable and UK would propose that in quota field the 17 (or the other eleven) should do precisely what the Six were obligated to do under Rome Treaty. UK was prepared to increase (the?) OEEC quotas by 20 percent and to increase quotas for each product by not less than 10 percent. It was also prepared, except in perhaps one or two cases, to agree to quotas of not repeat not less than 3 percent of national output. If the Six increased agricultural quotas as well, UK would be prepared to consider similar action. When Mueller Armack, speaking for the Six, asked for time to study UK proposals, Eccles reminded ministers that it was his government's view that a country which had not repeat not liberalized to 90 percent under OEEC code was not repeat not entitled to discriminate. If action by any OEEC country on January 1 produced discrimination, UK Government would feel obliged to make necessary corresponding adjustments against that country to protect its own trade.

7. UK proposal and Eccles explanation of it drew a sharp retort from Couve de Murville. French Government could not repeat not negotiate under a threat and therefore refused to examine UK proposals. French Foreign Minister also withdrew French support for the resolution adopted at morning session, reaffirming desirability of multilateral association. At this point Erhard intervened to point out that European cooperation was at stake and that at all costs reactions of sentiment and sensitivity should be avoided. Decisions, he said, could not repeat not be taken under such pressure and at his suggestion meeting adjourned until 10 o'clock same evening.

8. During recess, UK, who were fielding an exceptionally strong team, were not repeat not inactive and when meeting reconvened, they seemed satisfied that they had secured a large measure of agreement for their proposal. Chairman (Heathcoat Armory) immediately introduced a resolution which would call upon Council to instruct Steering Board for Trade to examine proposals of both EEC and UK and to report to Council in time for a new session of ministers January 15. Until January 15, he said UK would take no repeat not action, i.e. it would not repeat not retaliate.

9. When Erhard found that Couve de Murville was not repeat not prepared to accept this proposal, German Minister, in a voice shaking with emotion, said it was not repeat not possible for anyone to reject out of hand UK offer. The Six must study UK proposals. European Economic Cooperation simulated by generous USA financial assistance achieved through OEEC had brought about European economic recovery and he called repeatedly upon USA delegate for an expression of USA position (McCarthy, whose instructions we gather, described proposals of the Six as an acceptable basis for settlement, was unfortunately not repeat not prepared to rise to the challenge). In ensuing discussion, when all ministers had spoken in favour of UK proposals, Couve de Murville felt it necessary again to intervene. He pointed out that French delegate was isolated because retaliation, if it took place, would affect France only. If there were to be discrimination or retaliation, Couve de Murville said, it should not repeat not be directed against France alone. This brought an even more spirited intervention from Professor Erhard to obvious embarrassment of his advisers. Couve de Murville's point of view he said, did not repeat not correspond with that of EEC. The community did not repeat not wish to state that it does not repeat not agree to consider UK proposals. If the French persisted, he would be obliged to announced this fact to the press of the world. Other members of the Six followed with similar though considerably more moderate interventions.

10. In the end, Couve de Murville was obliged to accept, though not repeat not too gracefully, a proposal that ministers should adjourn deliberations until January 15. In interim, it was agreed that Permanent Council would make preliminary arrangements necessary for an appropriate study of the proposals of UK and the Six for interim arrangements.

FREE TRADE AREA — OEEC MINISTERIAL MEETING

In the view of the most seasoned observers yesterday's meeting of OEEC ministers, which has now adjourned until January 15, was the most difficult and critical in the organization's history. Not repeat not only did the prospects for an FTA seem at times virtually eliminated, but the future of European economic cooperation within the broader framework of OEEC was itself placed in jeopardy. Indeed it would not repeat not be going too far to say that French intransigence which resulted in a deep split in the Six seemed to come close to wrecking the Common Market itself.

2. I am afraid that it is too early for me to attempt a reasoned assessment of the meeting. I shall try to do this in a few days when the smoke has cleared somewhat. In the meantime, it might be helpful if I were to send off a few provisional comments.

3. There is no repeat no doubt that the British came in strength prepared for a showdown; and it is possible that the crisis in the meeting might have been avoided if they had chosen to present their alternative proposals for interim arrangements in a more conciliatory manner and unaccompanied by the threat of retaliation against France. On the other hand, they now seem convinced that the only way to move French industry and hence the French government is through the threat of retaliation or by retaliation itself. It is clear that the British succeeded in what many consider to have been their long term aim of isolating the French. Whether this will prove advantageous to them in arriving at satisfactory interim arrangements and the eventual multilateral association of other OEEC countries with the community is however an open question.

4. The French refusal even to consider the UK proposals because they said they were accompanied by the threat of retaliation, revealed the depth of their revulsion to further OEEC liberalization and the strength of their attachment to a restricted common market. Couve de Murville's stubbornness, however, has probably weakened support and sympathy for the French position and unless the French attitude is substantially modified there may well be a subsequent showdown within the councils of the EEC. As might be expected, the German officials, following Erhard's lead, now appear quite exasperated with the French and at the same time a good deal less hopeful that satisfactory compromises can be reached.

5. In summary the French entered the discussion with the firm belief that it was essential on political grounds to preserve an obvious element of discrimination as between treatment within the Six and that within the broader OEEC group. The British held views which were diametrically opposed. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the meeting was the fact that the five seem to move closer to, if not repeat not into, the British camp.

6. OEEC is now to study in a manner yet to be determined both the British proposals and those of the Six for interim arrangements before ministers meet again on January 15. In the interim, while the MFN tariff reductions may be carried out, there seems to be little likelihood that the Six will enter into bilateral discussions leading to a reciprocal enlargement of quotas.

7. It seems surprising that the British did not repeat not feel it necessary or desirable to inform us in advance of their proposed interim arrangements and it was only five minutes before the meeting opened that Sir Paul Gore-Booth sought us out to explain them. We have no repeat no doubt that Canadian authorities will wish to study them and their effects on our own trade and trade objectives. We confess to some doubt, however, that our views will be given the weight they deserve by the British.

8. Incidentally, Professor Erhard was visibly annoyed at the failure of the USA delegate to intervene and we would guess that vigorous representations will be made in Washington in an effort to have the USA play a more active role.

FRENCH POLITICAL SITUATION

France and Algeria have been experiencing since May 12 a series of dramatic and confused events coming as a challenge to the unity of the French nation and the very existence of the French Republic. These events have been regarded as the long overdue climax of a mounting tension in France's political situation in recent years, the chief underlying causes of which have been the built-in instability of successive French governments, France's continued inability to solve its overseas problems, more recently Algeria, and the accompanying economic difficulties for the nation.

2. The immediate cause precipitating the crisis was the violent reaction of the French population in Algeria to the prospect of a new French government about to be formed (after 28 days of cabinet crises) by the head of the M.R.P., Mr. Pflimlin, who proposed to pursue a relatively liberal policy in Algeria, possibly including a negotiated peace there. The Algiers coup was followed by several riots and demonstrations and by the formation of local "committees of public safety" (headed by members of the military forces, French settlers and rightist elements) that seized power from civil authorities and appealed for the formation of a French "government of national safety" under General de Gaulle.

3. The reaction in France to these events was swift. Mr. Pflimlin, having obtained the investiture vote for his new government, received from Parliament, through two impressive majority votes, 90-day special powers to take all necessary security measures in France, and subsequently the renewal of emergency powers to deal with the rebellion in Algeria. By taking various police measures against possible rightist agitation, the government was thus able to maintain its firm control over the situation in France, where conditions generally have remained calm and orderly.

4. Throughout the crisis, however, the chief enigma has been the role that General de Gaulle might suddenly or eventually play, particularly if the Pflimlin government were to fall or to be faced by active opposition from the armed forces in France and in Algeria. An ambiguous situation persisted as a result of the part played in Algeria by General Salan to whom the French government delegated its powers and authority to maintain order over the territory, but who apparently divided his loyalty paradoxically between the Paris government and the local dissident "committees of public safety." The government appeared, however, anxious to restore normal contacts with Algeria by maintaining an appearance of legality in its relations with General Salan. It also announced its intention to seek parliamentary authority to strengthen the executive branch of government, a reform long advocated by de Gaulle himself.

5. While the situation in France and Algeria is still subject to unpredictable developments, it appears that the Pflimlin government, through a series of courageous decisions, has been able — at least for the time being — to avoid what several observers feared: civil war in France, the fall of the Fourth Republic, and the formation of a new type of government, presumably under de Gaulle, with unknown consequences both from the point of view of France's internal affairs (including the possible formation of a Popular Front Government as a counter-action from the Left) and from that of France's relations with the rest of the free world. Nevertheless, the failure of the Government in Paris to assert effectively its civil authority in Algeria is already a matter of some consequence.

6. While watching these developments with great concern, the United States, United Kingdom and other Western governments generally have been careful to abstain from any public judgment or intervention, lest they might thus play into the hands of extremists and compromise Mr. Pflimlin's chances. While a serious crisis for NATO is by no means impossible if the French situation were to deteriorate further, such a development is generally considered unlikely at this stage and would in any case not develop very suddenly. Military adventures inside Tunisia on the part of French armed forces — though not immediate or likely — are another possibility that should not be overlooked.

CRISIS IN FRANCE¹¹

Following the three impressive votes by the French Parliament supporting the Pflimlin Government and a relative stabilization of the situation in Algeria, it seemed by the middle of last week that the newly re-informed French Government might perhaps succeed in restoring legality in its relations with the dissident group in Algeria, and might thus avert the threat of civil war. Similarly, it then appeared that the French armed forces in metropolitan France were remaining loyal to the Government (although their position was far from clear), and that the possibility of a forceful or illegal seizure of power by civilian Rightist elements or by General de Gaulle had abated for the time being.

Determined to strengthen his Government and to preserve the republican institutions, Mr. Pflimlin announced by the end of last week his intention to re-inforce without delay the executive branch of Government by submitting to Parliament on May 27 a series of constitutional reforms. The effect of these reforms would be to reduce the length of parliamentary sessions, for Parliament to delegate only by a motion of lack of confidence or of censure which would carry with it the investiture of a successor Prime Minister.

During the weekend, however, grave developments took place which threatened the already precarious position of the Government. In Algeria, the three-man directorate under General Salan adopted a more and more rigid stand and announced that it would take orders from no French Government, unless headed by de Gaulle. In Corsica, as a result of an insurrection organized from Algiers, civil and military authority over at least a substantial part of the island passed to the hands of a "local committee of public safety." Unconfirmed reports have also been received indicating that similar developments may now be taking place in several French overseas territories, notably in French Equatorial and West

¹¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Africa, Tahiti, and New Caledonia. Nothing has been heard, however, about French territories in the Americas. In addition, as a result of a number of clashes between French and Tunisian forces, a new North African crisis threatens, especially if President Bourguiba carries through his announced intention to bring this matter to the United Nations. The United States Government has been discreetly counselling caution to the French, Tunisian and Moroccan Governments.

In France, while the general situation remains orderly on the surface, opinion has been growing that it is only a matter of time, and probably a short time, until de Gaulle takes over and that he may be the only man to retrieve the situation. In fact, not only is the Government's authority shrinking over French overseas territories and being put to a hard test in France itself, but it is not absolutely certain that the Pflimlin Government will be able to secure a majority vote on the constitutional reforms. Even if it were, it could nevertheless fall within a few days for other reasons. While it is generally expected that de Gaulle would then be invited to form the next government as a last resort, it remains to be seen whether he could obtain sufficient support from the Assembly to meet his own terms. A government of national unity under de Gaulle would, if formed through legal means, no doubt diminish the threat of a Communist counter-coup and of civil war. The danger remains, however, that members of the armed forces or Rightist elements, getting impatient, may try to precipitate events and impose de Gaulle by force, in which case the reaction from the Left could well develop into civil war. The Communist dominated labour unions have already announced that they will strike tomorrow afternoon as a warning of their intentions in this respect.

While little is known about de Gaulle's intentions or possible policies, it would not be completely fair to attribute dictatorial ambitions to him. Rather, it would seem, on the basis of his past experience in government, that serious doubts could be cast on the wisdom of his policies and tactics or methods of government, despite the General's sincere devotion to his country. It has been reported that the General has no intention of a sudden break with the Atlantic Alliance, but would expect help and understanding from France's allies. While the General's past attitude on colonial problems might suggest on his part a fairly liberal policy on Algeria, de Gaulle might well, once in power, be faced with the same dilemma that has plagued previous governments in their effort to solve the Algerian problem, especially in view of the extreme position on Algeria of some of his supporters.

Since completing this, it has been reported that the Pflimlin Government has received this afternoon two impressive votes of 395 against 150 and 428 against 119, during an emergency session of the Assembly, when legislation was adopted to remove the parliamentary immunity of any member "who tries to separate a part of the national territory from the authority of the Government of the Republic."

CRISIS IN FRANCE

During his conversation yesterday afternoon with Pinay, Mollet and Teitgen, Coty took the decision to open direct discussion with de Gaulle. At midnight the President of the two Assemblies were instructed to confer with de Gaulle to study "the conditions in which the Government of the Republic could be constituted."

2. Today Parliament was called to hear (an extreme step indicative of the gravity of the situation) a message from Coty. Coty said that the danger of civil war existed and that he could therefore go through the usual procedure for designating potential prime ministers. He was going to call on de Gaulle to form a "government of national safety" but it was, of course, up to the Assembly to accept or reject his designation of Prime Minister. If, however, the Assembly refused to accept de Gaulle, Coty himself would resign and hand over his powers to the President of the Assembly.

3. The Communists refused to remain standing for the latter part of the message and when they broke into The Marseillaise at the end of it, they were joined by what appeared to be a majority of the socialists and a smattering of left and centre deputies.

4. The chips are now down. The parties are meeting to decide their stand and the Assembly session is supposed to be resumed later this afternoon to decide, in effect, whether there is a sufficient majority for de Gaulle. The Communists are resolutely against, the independents and other right-wing groups resolutely for. The MRP, the Radicals and the other centre parties are divided, but the real decision rests with the Socialists. Last night the majority of the Socialists were still determined to maintain their intransigent stand against de Gaulle, but it is impossible to predict whether this attitude will change because of Coty's message.

5. Up till now it has seemed quite clear that de Gaulle would present himself only if there was a strong majority for him among the non-Communist parties but in view of Coty's courageous stand he might accept something a good deal less than a clear call. If a sufficient majority does not emerge to persuade him to present himself for investiture and even more so if the left should call strikes or demonstrations to back its stand, it is more than likely that the extremists and the army will try to bring de Gaulle to power by force, or alternatively may act independent of him. Massu is reported by the London Times to have said that it is up to de Gaulle to decide whether the army must bring him to power but I see no reason at this stage to think that, regardless of what de Gaulle said, the army would remain passive if the Assembly refuses to have him. Indeed de Gaulle is said to have remarked yesterday that he could only hold the army in check for three days.

CRISIS IN FRANCE

Last evening, Coty formally asked de Gaulle to form a government and de Gaulle accepted. Though party consultations continued after the President's message to Parliament earlier in the day, Assembly did not repeat not meet again. Today Coty is consulting leaders of the parties, presumably to discuss with them support which they can give to de Gaulle's investiture on basis of such details of his proposed programme as de Gaulle has given Coty.

2. Socialist attitude remains critical one. They approved a letter to de Gaulle from Vincent Auriol which, while conceding that he was the man to restore unity, attempted to pin General down on his attitude toward the factious elements involved in Algerian and Corsican affairs and those military who acted against orders, and on the means he would accept to come to power. De Gaulle's reply gave renewed assurance that he would only accept power legally; said that launching and development of Algerian events were carried out in his name without his being in any way involved in them; stated his intention to form a government to remake unity and restore discipline, notably on military side; and expressed his incomprehension of those who, for sectarian reasons, might make impossible his task of getting the Republic out of its difficulties "while there was still time." In a statement issued after he had agreed to form a government, de Gaulle said his government would have to have full powers for a specified time to cope with present serious situation. It would also have to have a mandate to submit to the country by referendum constitutional changes on separation and balance of powers and on relations between Republic and peoples associated with it. Socialists met again this morning to consider their position in light of these clarifications. They have decided not repeat not to adopt a final position until de Gaulle presents himself for investiture (itself probably a sign of a weakening of their former intransigence), but according to Le Monde sources the current in favour of de Gaulle is making some headway.

3. The fact that de Gaulle has been asked to form a government and has accepted should, at least temporarily, restrain temptations to impetuous action from Algiers or the army. Algerian Committee of Public Safety has warned Parliament, however, against "any manoeuvres attempting to prolong a now condemned system." They want de Gaulle, they want him quickly, and they do not repeat not want the politicians to try to enmesh him in "the system."

4. Already there are signs that, as de Gaulle's accession seems more assured, European Algerians are beginning to have sober second thoughts about what his policy for Algeria will be and about the things they have committed themselves to in the enthusiasm of the moment. Will he favour a federal solution rather than the full integration which they have demanded? Is there now any turning back from full equality of Muslims and Europeans which their demands for integration, and the fraternization of the mass demonstrations, clearly imply? De Gaulle, no repeat no less than any other Prime Minister, will have to reckon with the Algerian lobby. His great advantage, though, is the support and obedience which he should be able to command in the army. Not repeat not all the problems are by any means removed by the advent of de Gaulle, by the procedure presently being followed, but at least the immediate threat of civil strife would recede.

5. Texts of Coty's message, Auriol's letter, de Gaulle's reply and de Gaulle's press communiqué are being sent by today's bag.

INVESTITURE OF DE GAULLE

General de Gaulle was invested as Prime Minister yesterday afternoon by a vote of 329 to 224. Those who voted against him were Communists and Progressistes, 49 Socialists, Mendésiste Radicals, Mitterand's followers in UDSR, and a smattering of MRP and Independents. Majority which he obtained is less than he had hoped for because of large number of Socialists opposed.

2. De Gaulle's government consists partly of politicians, partly of "technicians" from outside Parliament. De Gaulle himself retains National Defence. Four ministers of state without specific portfolio represent four major non-communist groupings in Assembly: Mollet (Socialist), Houphouët-Boigny (African Parties), Pflimlin (MRP), Jacquinot (Independents). Finance goes to Pinay (Independents), Foreign Affairs to Couve de Murville (Ambassador to Bonn), Interior to Pelletier (Prefect of the Seine), Algeria to Lejeune (Socialist), Labour to Bacon (MRP), Overseas Territories to Cornut-Gentille (Ambassador to Buenos Aires), Justice to Senator Debre (Social Republican), Assistant Defence Minister to Guillaumat (Atomic Energy Commission). None of the politicians directly involved in Algerian movement has been given a portfolio.

3. De Gaulle's investiture speech was brief. Opening with a reference to the "degradation of the state," he said essentially that there were only two points to his programme. First was to grant full powers to the government for six months to re-establish order and unity. Second was a mandate from parliament to government to elaborate, and refer directly to the country by referendum, a radical constitutional reform. Internal reform concerned the republican régime and would be based on three principles: (1) universal suffrage is source of all power (2) executive and legislature must be effectively separated (3) government must be responsible to parliament. External reform would relate to relations between French Republic and "peoples associated with it." As soon as Parliament had voted full powers and opened the way for constitutional reform, it would go on holiday until October sitting.

4. There was in de Gaulle's statement no mention of "Algérie française" nor of full integration which Algerian movement has so vigorously demanded. Repeated reference to "associated peoples" in his recent declarations seems to confirm general speculation that de Gaulle favours a liberal solution in Algeria within some kind of federal framework. He apparently intends to visit Algeria in next few days and his thoughts on the subject may then become known. It is not repeat not unlikely that right-wing settlers who have been clamouring for his return to power may be in for a rude shock, particularly as de Gaulle is in an excellent position to rally the army to him and to disengage interests of army from political interests of the "ultras" in Algeria. It will take a firm hand, however, on de Gaulle's part not to be made the prisoner of the Algerian lobby which recent French governments have been.

5. There was no mention in de Gaulle's speech of Atlantic Alliance, European integration or East-West relations. Socialist and MRP leaders in recent conversations with him, seem to have come away satisfied that he has no intention of making any sudden break in either the Atlantic or the European directions of French policy,¹² nor of reverting to a narrow nationalism. Indeed the appointment of Couve de Murville to Foreign Affairs Ministry appears to confirm this. De Gaulle may well be, however, an exigent head of government in both fields and demand substantial modifications in both. It is still too soon to predict what these may be.

6. De Gaulle should have no trouble today obtaining his full powers for six months, as this requires only simple majority. He may, however, run into difficulty over proposal on constitutional reform, which requires a 2/3 majority in the Assembly or a 3/5 majority in both houses.

7. With investiture of de Gaulle, danger of civil strife has receded, but it remains to be seen, with the many and difficult problems demanding solution, whether the dangers of strife have been eliminated.

SPECIAL POWERS FOR DE GAULLE

Yesterday the Assembly gave de Gaulle three votes which have consolidated his political position and which will make it possible for Parliament to go on holiday until October.

2. Extension of special powers for Algeria, which must be voted within ten days of a new government taking office but which raised no new principles, was obtained by 337 votes to 199.

3. Next, full powers for the government were voted by 322 votes to 232 for a period of six months. Specifically excluded from the full powers are civil liberties, established trade union rights, substantive criminal law and procedure and electoral legislation. The heavy press censorship which has existed for the past week has now been abolished.

4. Finally, the bill proposing revision of the method of amending the constitution (Article 90) was passed by 350 votes to 163, an unexpectedly large majority which resulted, after certain explanations by de Gaulle, from the decision of many of those who had voted against his investiture to abstain this time to mark their willingness to see the constitution reformed. As this vote is sufficiently large to carry revision of Article 90 without referring the issue to referendum, the government can now proceed with revision of the constitution proper. The text of the proposals for constitutional reform will be elaborated by the government in the coming months, in collaboration with the members of a consultative committee composed of representatives of the relevant Assembly commissions. The proposals will not be submitted to the Assembly as a whole, but will, probably early in the autumn, be presented for approval to the country by means of referendum. The guiding principles will be those given in paragraph 3 of my reference telegram. De Gaulle made it clear that the Head of State and the Head of Government would be two separate functions. He therefore appears to have in mind something lying between the USA presidential system and the present French parliamentary system.

5. Having with these three votes consolidated his position in Paris, de Gaulle will leave, probably tomorrow, for Algeria to take matters in hand there. Quick action is necessary if he is to reestablish the government's authority in Algeria, especially as there are already signs of open dissatisfaction with the governmental team de Gaulle has chosen. In the opinion of some civilians in Algeria it is too heavily weighted with men of "the system." His first task will no doubt be to establish his clear control of the army in Algeria. The Algerian movement could not have had the success it has had without army support, and it was indeed his lack of control of the army, which left Pflimlin impotent to deal with the Algerian and Corsican problems. If he gets the army on his side, de Gaulle can move on with more authority to the elaboration of a policy for Algeria itself.

ALGERIA — THE ARMY IN CONTROL

The attached telegram 648 of June 18† from the Embassy, Paris, focuses attention on a development in the administration of Algeria which has some disturbing aspects. General Salan, who under a new title has been given the responsibilities of the Resident-General for the administration of the territory, is appointing army officers to carry out the functions of the Prefects. There was some question about the legality of this but it is now stated that authority exists under the emergency powers granted to de Gaulle, but that the appointments are only temporary. Snatches of information which have come out show that the idea originated in Algiers rather than in Paris, and it seems to be a pretty clear indication of the determination of the army in Algeria to put its hand firmly on all aspects of French administration in the territory.

The Prefects, who were charged, as in Metropolitan France, with the administration of the territory, were originally responsible to the Ministry of the Interior but during the Mollet régime the Algerian section of the Ministry was attached to the new Ministry of Algeria, which Lacoste headed. The Prefects then became directly responsible to the member of the government conducting Algerian affairs. In the present situation, General de Gaulle himself is that Minister. The decision, therefore, to supplant the Prefects suggests that the army in Algiers wishes to make sure that the administration is controlled from Algiers, and thus by them rather than to have it come under the civilian headquarters of the department in Paris. It is notable that of the old team Salan has retained as Secretary-General of the Administration of Algiers the former Super-Préfet of Algiers, M. Baret, who was relieved of his post by Pflimlin for his collaboration in the insurrection of May 13.

The implications which this development could have for the elaboration of a new and more liberal régime, for example the implementation of a programme of elections, are obvious. The army, who have shown themselves through the statements of the Committees of Public Safety to be hostile to the idea of early elections, would now be in a position to frustrate them without difficulty.

This move suggests, as our Embassy in Paris observes, that de Gaulle's prestige is not sufficient at this time to risk an outright imposition of his will on the army authorities in Algeria. Certainly the step which Salan has taken is not in the direction of strengthening the authority of Paris over Algiers. The actual consequences of the recent appointments will depend on the extent to which Salan will be willing and able to carry out de Gaulle's instructions, particularly in civilian matters.

SUDANESE APPROACH FOR VISIT OF MISSION TO CANADA ON ALGERIAN QUESTION

The Sudanese Ambassador called on me today. He began by explaining that at the Accra Conference of African States, a broad resolution was adopted under which it was agreed that state members of the conference would, from time to time, send missions abroad to explain problems relating to Africa.

2. The Ambassador said that in conformity with this resolution, it was now intended to send three missions to explain the point of view of the "Algerian front" with special reference to the discussion of Algeria in the forthcoming General Assembly. All of these missions would proceed to Latin America; one composed of representatives of Ghana, Sudan and Morocco proposed to visit the Scandinavian countries, Iceland, the USA and Canada. They hope to come to Ottawa on August 24 and to remain there for two days. The mission would be composed "for the most part" of Foreign Office officials of the three participating governments. The Sudanese government had not repeat not yet determined its representative; the senior Moroccan representative would be the Moroccan Ambassador in London. The composition of the Ghana delegation would be decided by Mr. Nkrumah within the next few days. It might be headed by the Ghana Minister of Finance.

3. As the Ambassador had referred at one moment to the mission making contact with the Canadian authorities and other Canadian personalities, I pressed him for an explanation. He said that no repeat no attempt would be made to make contact with groups or private individuals in Canada except through the Canadian government.

4. The Ambassador said that he was, on this occasion, speaking on behalf of the Sudanese, Moroccan and Ghana governments and that this was the first approach to Canada on the proposed mission. I told him that I would report his proposal to you and obtain your reactions in due course.

5. There are obvious obscurities involved in this somewhat peculiar proposal, but I was unable to obtain any further clarification from the Ambassador. No repeat no doubt our mission in Accra can throw further light on the background of this initiative.

ALGERIAN QUESTION — PROPOSED MISSION TO CANADA

Following for the Minister:

You will recall that when the Tunisian Ambassador was in Ottawa in July, he mentioned that a mission composed of representatives of the African states would probably be visiting Ottawa to put forward views on the Algerian problem. Permis telegram under reference describes an approach to Mr. Ritchie designed to find out whether we would be willing to receive a mission composed of representatives of Ghana, Sudan and Morocco on August 24.

2. It is not too clear what the level of representation will be in this mission and there is no indication at what level the mission wishes to make contact with the Canadian government, i.e. whether with ministers or with officials. We do not know whether it is intended simply to explain the position of the African states in regard to Algeria or whether commitments for support at the next UNGA will be sought. Despite these obscurities I do not think we can very well refuse to receive these representatives since the visit would provide

(1) an indication of the line which will be taken by the Afro-Asian group at the Thirteenth Session,

(2) an occasion to counsel moderation pending clearer indication of French intentions and

(3) confirmation of Canada's interest in the newly created African state.

If you agree with this conclusion I would suggest the following:

(a) that Mr. Ritchie inform the Sudanese Ambassador that we agree in principle to the mission coming to Ottawa on August 24;

(b) that, since a meeting at the official level might be less inclined to compromise the Canadian position, it be ensured that you or other ministers are in no way committed to meet with the mission. In this connection I would suggest that we avoid making suggestions for contacts but attempt rather to prompt a definite request in this regard. It could also be made clear to the Sudanese Ambassador that we are prepared to listen but not necessarily to enter into a discussion of the pros and cons.

Concurrently I would propose that we should from Ottawa:

(a) seek the reaction and views of other friendly governments which we know are being approached;

(b) inform the French that we have agreed in principle to receiving this mission.

Note to information addressees only: Please take no action on this telegram until further notification.

ALGERIAN QUESTION — PROPOSED MISSION TO CANADA

Grateful if you would inform the Quai d'Orsay that we have agreed in principle to receive the mission. You might wish to make clear to the French that we are not of course as a result committed in any way in regard to our position at the Assembly which we feel will in any event depend to a large extent on the situation existing at the time the Algerian item is considered. We think it will be useful to meet with the mission, not only to find out about the probable Afro-Asian line at the forthcoming Assembly, but also to put across our view that precipitate action in the Assembly before de Gaulle's plans have had a chance to be developed would be unwise.

ALGERIAN QUESTION AND UN: PROPOSED MISSION TO CANADA

I informed Daridan this morning of your decision to receive a mission from the African states to discuss Algeria as a UN agenda item. Since I realized this would probably be a delicate subject and since I wished there to be no misunderstanding, I put the various points you had made in your telegram in the form of an unofficial memorandum, which I gave to Daridan.

2. Daridan reacted very sharply and clearly did not consider that he needed any instructions from his government to convey its views to me. He said first that any solution to the Algerian problem was an internal matter for the French government. While the French government would be pleased to have us urge moderation on any of the African states, he considered the mere official recognition given to such a mission by our willingness to receive them in Ottawa would publicly recognize the fact that the future of Algeria was a matter for discussion with other governments. He stressed how difficult the Algerian problem remained for the present government and he accordingly considered our willingness to receive the mission as distinctly unhelpful.

3. I argued that, while fully recognizing the difficulties of the French government in Algeria, the fact remained that there would almost inevitably be an item on Algeria introduced at the next session of the Assembly. Surely it was better to hear what these people had to say outside the UN and attempt to persuade them to a course of moderation than merely to refuse to receive them. I assumed that he (Daridan) would agree that the Canadian attitude in the Assembly had been helpful in the past. Our move in receiving the mission was only designed to be helpful, and to exercise restraint.

4. While Daridan conceded that we had been helpful in the past he felt that our willingness to discuss in Ottawa with such a mission the future of part of France (and he stressed that this is what it would be, despite my protestation to the contrary) would be similar to the French government receiving a delegate to discuss the future of part of Canada.

5. I said I could not accept this argument. There was no item in the UN on the future of any part of Canada. Was it not better that Canadian officials receive such a mission in an effort to persuade moderation, especially since they would be visiting countries which were perhaps less sympathetic to the French point of view? I mentioned parenthetically that surely he would not assume that the Ghanaians for example were committed to a policy of independence for Algeria. Daridan said "of course they were," and pointed to the influence of Ghana on the equatorial French colonies. He said he was glad to have us try to persuade representatives of particular countries in New York to take a moderate view, but he reiterated the point he made in the first place, namely that to receive the mission gave them the kind of recognition to discuss the future of Algeria which these countries were seeking.

6. Since I could get no further in my discussion with Daridan, I told him that I would convey the view he had expressed to my government.

7. This is the first subject upon which I have had a really sharp reaction from Daridan. While he was reasonably polite and conceded that we wished to be helpful, it is clear that the French are even more than usually sensitive on the subject of Algeria. I would be the last to say that they had behaved sensibly over this problem during the past decade; at the same time I am not surprised that they should show particular irritation when de Gaulle is in the middle of trying to decide what sort of policy to formulate for the area. No doubt the reaction of the French would have been the same had we told them of our intention of receiving the mission prior to actually accepting. But I believe it would have been wise tactics to discuss the matter with them beforehand. I think it is unfortunate if the sole subject which the mission is coming to Ottawa to discuss is Algeria. Surely these countries have other interests in the UN besides Algeria? If this is the sole topic of discussion, it will only serve to stress that we are receiving this mission for purposes of discussing this item only. I can also see some difficulty in trying to make the public distinction between discussing a UN item on Algeria and discussing substantive questions relating to the future of Algeria. It is obviously this kind of distinction which Daridan found difficult to accept.

8. In these circumstances might it not be possible to have our discussions with the mission conducted by our delegate in New York rather than in Ottawa, especially if the mission will not be received by Canadian ministers? Presumably such discussion could be just as effective from the point of view of persuading the mission to be moderate, and would avoid the kind of recognition which worries Daridan.

9. With exception of the point made by Daridan about the effect of accepting a mission for the sole purpose of discussing Algeria, I would of course understand if you considered the French view unreasonable. I think, however, it would be unwise to treat this particular item in isolation from the question of our general relations with the French government. It seems to me that recently we have been delivering consciously or unconsciously one or two pin-pricks to the French in sensitive spots. I believe there are greater matters at stake for the future relations not only between Canada and France but between France and the NATO powers than for example a question of receiving three representatives of African states for the avowed purpose of discussing only a possible UN item on Algeria. I would hope, therefore, that we could avoid putting these greater matters in jeopardy by decisions on matters, which while important in themselves, are not perhaps of primary importance in relation to the broad aims of our foreign policy.

VISIT AFRICAN DELEGATES TO OTTAWA

I would have much preferred my first telegram to you to be on a more gratifying subject.

2. In course of my official call to hand copy of my letters of credence Joxe referred to embarrassment which would be caused in French press and public opinion, and more so in official circles, by visit of African delegates to Ottawa.

3. At a time when General de Gaulle is making perhaps a final effort to save Algeria from herself not repeat not only for benefit of France but also of Western world, it would appear at least inopportune for a friendly country like Canada to show any sign that might be interpreted as though we were taking sides at this stage.

4. I think suggestion made by Crean that contacts take place between African and Canadian delegates in New York is excellent and, should you consider yourself too committed to change your decision at this hour, I would recommend that they be postponed to a later date in autumn.

5. I consider it my duty to draw your attention to seriousness of this matter, because of over-sensitiveness of General de Gaulle and his followers. It would be unreasonable for us to lose part of wonderful credit we enjoy in France¹³ without any real chance of improving conditions in Algiers. Finally, it would handicap my mission to Paris at its very beginning.

ALGERIA IN THE UNITED NATIONS

French Reaction to the Proposed Visit by the African Delegation

I thought you might like to have a review of the developments which followed the request from a delegation representing the countries of the Accra Conference to be received in Canada to explain their position in regard to the Algerian item in the United

¹³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Polymer [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

Nations and the subsequent unfavourable reaction of the French to the information we gave them that we would be prepared to receive the delegation.

In July, during his visit here, the Tunisian Ambassador had mentioned a plan for the delegation to visit Canada as well as other countries before the General Assembly of the United Nations. The request to be received was later made to our delegation in New York by the delegation of Sudan. We replied agreeing in principle to seeing them but did not undertake that they should be received by yourself or other Ministers and made it clear that we were not prepared to discuss the pros and cons, but simply undertook to listen to a description of their intentions. We also instructed the Embassy in Paris to inform the French of this decision. (see telegram S-294 of August 13 attached.)

We were aware of the sensitivities of the French which we took fully into account. However, we did not think that we could decline to receive the delegation to listen to their case without adversely affecting our reputation for objectivity on the Algerian issue in the United Nations, or the belief in our willingness to contribute to devising an acceptable formula for handling the item in the General Assembly. Our relations with the countries represented in the group were also taken into account — Ghana, Morocco, Sudan.

In regard to the French position, we saw two possible benefits in receiving the mission: We might get some early indication of the tactics of the Afro-Asian group and we would also have an opportunity to urge moderation in pressing for United Nations action at the very time when de Gaulle is planning to take France's last chance to find a solution for the Algerian problem.

When the Embassy in Paris carried out the instructions to inform the Quai, Daridan, the Director General of Political Affairs, reacted very sharply and critically to our decision to receive the delegation. The day we received the report of this interview the Counsellor at the French Embassy called on the European division by prior appointment and carried out instructions, sent before the French had been informed of our decision, to let us know that they would view with disfavour a decision to receive this delegation. We took the occasion at that interview to review the basis for our stand, and to express disappointment that the French had not been able to appreciate the extent to which their interests had been taken into account. (Telegram S-306 of August 20† to Paris).

Since deciding to receive the delegation we have been informed that its tour is postponed. Should a later date be suggested, we will propose that the meetings take place in New York, since the opening of the General Assembly is now so close. We have told the Embassy in Paris that they may pass this information on to the French.

Mr. Dupuy, who has just presented his credentials and taken over the Embassy, has now cabled his concern. A copy of his cable (No. 914 of August 20) and our reply (S-307 of August 21†) are attached.

Conclusion

The question which gave rise to this exchange is now virtually settled by the fact that the visit is postponed and if it is proposed for a later date, we will see that the exchange takes place in New York, which should fully meet the apprehensions of the French.¹⁴ I think this incident should be considered closed.

The incident has, however, served to bring out a feature of our relations with France which merits serious examination. It is notable that France is the only one of our closest allies to whom we cannot speak frankly without being accused of abandoning their cause. Our relations with the United Kingdom and the United States have developed to the point where we can have objective private discussions of our differences of view. This is unfortunately not the case with the French, who seem to consider that our traditional ties of friendship and sympathy which are so precious to us require our unswerving support of the French position. This is true of other issues as well as the Algerian one where French emotions are so deeply engaged. One has the impression that there is a lingering colonialism in French relations with us, and that they have failed to recognize the extent to which Canada and other middle powers are now legitimately, and to some extent independently, involved in international issues. The French concept of international affairs still concentrates on the idea of direction by "the Great Powers" with whom the French are trying to re-establish their entitlement to equality. This leads them to ignore that our national interests can be directly involved in matters which they have regarded as exclusively French. As a consequence, the French tend to discourage or distrust efforts by countries such as Canada to help to find a common solution.

In fairness to their attitude, we must accept some responsibility for not having done all we could to keep them abreast of our evolving position, by developing the practice of close consultation at a high level. Traditional ties of history and sympathy to which we refer so often and so proudly have, unfortunately, less meaning than they should in the realm of political consultation. Indeed, to judge by French reaction, it seems that these ties of sympathy are sometimes used as puppet strings to command our support for French policy, without appreciating that we have interests of our own which may not always coincide with those of the French. National sympathy is a valuable asset in this situation and can facilitate mutual understanding, but it should not be used as an instrument of coercion.

As our performance clearly shows, it is no more in our interests than it is in our hearts to do anything which would unnecessarily offend the French or damage our relations. On the other hand, if the "credit we enjoy in France," to which our Ambassador refers, means anything, it should mean that the French are confident that we would not adopt an attitude in the United Nations or elsewhere where we are directly involved which would prejudice or aggravate a French problem. It should also mean an understanding of issues which are directly Canadian. I have in mind that we were not able to call upon this "credit" of goodwill to modify the French position on imports of synthetic rubber which is so important to Polymer's trade with France.

If you agree, I will have a study of this general question prepared for the guidance of our Ambassador, so that from the very beginning of his embassy he will be able to take the opportunity to develop our relations in a more realistic way and to give some substance in the political sphere to the closeness of our historical and emotional ties. When they have

FRENCH POLITICAL SITUATION

The attached telegram No. 984 of September 9† from the Embassy in Paris gives a valuable appreciation and forecast of the French political situation now that de Gaulle has presented his draft Constitution to the nation.

Approval of the Constitution is virtually assured and hence even those politicians who would wish to campaign against it are turning their attention more to the coming elections which are expected in November. According to present estimates, the next Assembly will be oriented further to the right than that elected in 1956 and it continues to be assumed that General de Gaulle will become the First President of the Fifth Republic in elections in January. It is too early, however, to make any predictions about the Prime Minister.

There has been much speculation about the effect of the new Constitution in increasing stability of the French Government at the expense, some fear, of a risk of an authoritarian régime. The Ambassador points out, however, that such a development would flow less from the text of the Constitution than from the President and, he adds, from the political facts and mores of the French. The Government's stability cannot be guaranteed by the text of the new Constitution, for instability is a factor of French political philosophy and habit.

The Ambassador has also accented the continuing importance of a solution for the Algerian problem which is closely related to the position of the army. No policy declarations are expected before the November elections. For similar reasons we suspect that de Gaulle might wish to delay announcement of his Algerian policy until after the Presidential election in January. This timetable is significant in the effect it will have on the French attitude to the Algerian debate at the General Assembly. According to Press reports the French Government has already decided not to participate on the Algerian item.

In seeking a solution to the Algerian problem, de Gaulle is still subject to pressures from the Algerian lobby and in fact is less able now than he was immediately on assuming authority to propose any radical imaginative solution. There is no indication that the army is ready to abandon its political role and its concern with preserving its honour when the future of Algeria is decided imposes limits on the Government's freedom of action. The Ambassador concludes with the estimate that six months hence the French political scene

FRENCH REFERENDUM: CBC COVERAGE: RENÉ LÉVESQUE

As you may be aware, René Lévesque intends to visit France and Algeria to cover the referendum for Canadian radio and television networks. We assume that he is coming under contract for CBC rather than free-lancing. We have heard that he will arrive in Paris Sunday September 21. Lévesque's letter to a member of embassy suggests that he intends to spend a full week in France and to go to Algeria after referendum has taken place; but from information obtained from the Quai, through their embassy in Ottawa, it may be that Lévesque intends to cover referendum in Algeria itself.

2. We were called to Quai this a.m. by Langlais to be shown an article which appeared recently in the Journal des vedettes Montreal. It reads as follows: "Headline: Lévesque prendra le maquis pour mieux voir le référendum." "Les généraux d'Alger seront sans doute très mécontents mais les téléspectateurs canadiens y gagneront: ils seront peut être les seuls au monde, le 28 septembre, à assister au référendum constitutionnel français de l'autre côté, c'est-à-dire du côté des rebelles. Ils n'auront peut-être qu'une vue fragmentaire de cet événement considerable, mais ils seront mieux partagés que les français qui, désormais, doivent se contenter des images et des commentaires fabriqués à leur intention par une diligente propagande. Lévesque et son réalisateur Claude Sylvestre, accompagnés d'un cameraman et d'un technicien du son, partiront, le 15 septembre. Ils passeront une semaine en France, puis, à la veille du référendum, disparaîtront pour se retrouver deux jours plus tard dans les maquis algériens. Après quoi, le plus rapidement possible, ils regagneront Montréal ou les attend, dès la première semaine d'octobre, la nouvelle série de "Point de mire"."

Langlais also told us that Lévesque applied for permission to visit Algeria at French Consulate in Montreal and when told that his request would have to be referred to appropriate authorities in Paris said that the matter could easily be arranged through the Canadian Embassy in Paris.

3. Langlais said that if the report in the Journal des vedettes was correct and that Lévesque indeed intended to operate from FLN side during referendum, it would be extremely difficult for the French to give him permission to visit Algeria. They were in a quandary as to how to treat his request and would welcome our suggestions. If they refused him permission they knew that he could go to Tunisia and without too much difficulty slip across the frontier with assistance of FLN and prepare his material there. The result would be that Canadian radio and television networks would have essentially a FLN view of referendum, which would not repeat not be at all satisfactory to the French. (You will recall that ten months ago Lévesque was involved in the interview granted an FLN member over CBC, to the annoyance of the French — your telegram S-368 November 8, 1957†). The other possibility was to give Lévesque permission to visit Algeria but to keep him under fairly close surveillance there “for his own security.” Authorities in Algeria would be quite willing to let him see and film referendum in action (voters, polling booths, counting of ballots etc) and would probably be able to let him visit a number of places both in Algiers itself and in the country. If however he expressed the desire to move into an FLN-controlled area, the French could certainly not repeat not give their agreement and would probably stop him from doing so. We said that such treatment would probably lead to diatribes about lack of freedom of the press and the guided nature of the referendum.

4. It seems to us that Lévesque’s strong and well known bias against French policy in Algeria and his expressed sympathy for the FLN make him a poor choice to cover referendum in France and in Algeria. There is also the consideration that, if our memory is correct, Lévesque, if not an actual member of the Communist Party, is at least a sympathizer. We believe that a special note to this effect was prepared for the previous Secretary of State for External Affairs and his party when Lévesque accompanied them on a trip to Moscow in 1955.

5. Lévesque has indicated to us by letter that while in Paris he would like to have interviews with a number of political figures including Cabinet ministers and that he would like our assistance in this regard. In view of the report which was reached French about Lévesque’s Algerian intentions, we would find it extremely difficult to sponsor his request to visit Algeria and even difficult to try to arrange interviews with French political figures. We have no doubt that he could arrange interviews with those who are opposed to the new constitution such as Mendès-France, but we are not at all sure that we would be successful in arranging interviews with leading politicians who are in favour of the constitution, ranging from Soustelle to Pflimlin and Mollet.

6. We realize and we have already explained to Langlais that the independent status of CBC makes it a very difficult and delicate matter for the government to intervene even unofficially on matters which are the concern of CBC. While we realize that there can be no repeat no question of our trying to censor the coverage which Lévesque might eventually prepare, it is another matter, for the embassy representing Canadian government to be asked to assist him in France where he is ‘persona non grata’. Our own feeling is that, if this is still possible, someone other than Lévesque should be asked to cover the referendum in France and Algeria on behalf of CBC. Although this is not repeat not really our business, we fear, from what we know of Lévesque’s views, that CBC coverage of referendum both in France and in Algeria may be distinctly one-sided if Lévesque is responsible for it.

7. We hope you will be able to instruct us by Saturday (Lévesque is due on Sunday) exactly how we should proceed. If CBC persists in sending him, we hope you will instruct us to merely go through the motions of assisting him and permit us to inform him that in the present situation he will have to make his own arrangements with the French, after we have instructed him whom to apply to.

FRENCH REFERENDUM: CBC COVERAGE: LÉVESQUE

We were preparing this report on the Ottawa side of this story when your telegram was received. A following message will give you specific instructions on what your action should be.

2. The French Ambassador approached us about the plans of René Lévesque to report on the referendum in Algeria "from the side of the Maquis." He sought the government's assistance in preventing this television report which he believed would be most unfavourably regarded in French circles. While making it clear that he was not acting on instructions, he based his request on the fact that the CBC was government financed and that the government should therefore prevent the transmission of programmes which would be harmful to the government's policy of maintaining good relations with France, an old friend and NATO ally.

3. We explained to Mr. Lacoste that the government decision not to make use of the financial link in order to exert editorial control was absolute and that in the circumstances it was not possible to take official action on his request at any level. On the other hand, the possibility that a broadcast from the rebel side critical of French action would have an undesirable effect on Franco-Canadian relations was fully understood in the department and regretted. Therefore we would consider it entirely appropriate should the French Ambassador decide to take private steps at which he had hinted to dissuade the CBC from going ahead with this project. Lacoste has now told us that he has taken up the matter with a high official of the CBC and is encouraged by his understanding of the French position.

4. We also told the Ambassador that no special facilities would be afforded to Lévesque in carrying out his advertised project. Our reply† to your telegram contains detailed guidance how to handle this.

5. As well as giving us the information about Lévesque's visit to the Consulate General in Montreal, the French Ambassador also told us that he had information that Lévesque might seek a Tunisian visa with the intention of trying to reach Algeria from that side. We observed that if Lévesque were contemplating entering Algeria illegally, we would consider that he was freely exposing himself to whatever penalties he might thereby incur. We were also concerned about the risks to Lévesque's personal safety to which his plan might expose him. However, we conclude that this must be left to his own judgment and that official Canadian action would be inappropriate.

FRENCH REFERENDUM — CBC COVERAGE

Thank you for your timely telegrams of instructions. We have advised Langlais that it is impossible for us to intervene unofficially with the CBC on this matter but that we shall not repeat not attempt to assist Lévesque in obtaining either permission to visit Algeria or interviews with political figures.

2. Langlais said that the visa for Algeria would probably be refused and we have since learned from Lévesque that this is the case. We shall not repeat not of course question this decision. Lévesque has now requested our assistance in arranging some interviews but we shall limit ourselves to giving him appropriate names and addresses which he can approach on his own if he wishes to.

3. We might add that for the most part we have been dealing with Lévesque not repeat not directly but through Beaudet, the CBC permanent representative here. The Beaudet buffer has undoubtedly eased our task somewhat.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF ALGERIAN REPUBLIC

The announcement of the formation of a provisional Algerian government by the FLN came as no repeat no surprise to the French. This eventuality has been rumoured frequently over the past few months and the rumours had become more insistent in the few days before the announcement was actually made.

2. We spoke briefly today with Langlais at the Quai to get the first reaction. Langlais said that he did not repeat not think this would change the situation substantially either at the UN or in Algeria itself with the referendum approaching. For the UN side, the formation of an Algerian government would not repeat not change the line-up of those voting for or against France on the Algerian item. The French delegation has asked Hammarskjöld to refuse FLN representatives admission even to the corridors of the UN, and if this request is accepted (Langlais seemed sceptical of success) the FLN would actually lose ground at New York.

3. In Algeria itself Langlais thought that the formation of the Algerian government would have little influence on the vote cast in the referendum. Almost all the Muslim population eligible to vote were inscribed on the electoral lists and the French expected that 60 to 70 percent of them would vote. The French expect a sharp increase in FLN terrorism in Algeria this week in an attempt to stop the Muslims from taking part in the vote, but the announcement of the formation of a government would not repeat not in itself keep people away from the polls nor lead them to vote "no".

4. Contrary to what Basdevant told us would be the case a few months ago, France does not repeat not for the present at least intend to break diplomatic relations with those countries which recognize the new Algerian government, though instructions have been sent to all French embassies abroad telling them to make it clear to the governments to which they are accredited that recognition would be taken as an unfriendly act. So far only six countries have recognized. France has no repeat no diplomatic relations with the UAR, Iraq and Yemen, so that no repeat no practical problems were posed. (Though Langlais did not repeat not refer to it we think that Cairo's recognition will have a bad effect on the current financial and economic negotiations and will certainly postpone the renewal of diplomatic relations between Paris and Cairo). As for Lybian recognition, Langlais merely shrugged his shoulders and said "Oh, Lybia."

5. Most serious of course is the recognition granted by Tunisia and Morocco and here the French are prepared and in a position to put on some pressure. They will not repeat not ask these two countries to withdraw recognition but will insist strongly that the new provisional government not repeat not establish itself in either Tunis or Rabat. If Tunis or Rabat should accede to such a FLN request, the French are prepared to take retaliatory action such as withdrawing the substantial administrative assistance which these two countries receive from France. Langlais said they were thinking particularly of refusing to let go to Tunisia and Morocco the several thousands of French school teachers who are urgently needed in both countries for the reopening of the school year one week hence.

6. The French are not repeat not impressed by the fact that Ferhat Abbas, considered one of the more moderate FLN leaders, is titular head of the new government. He has had very little influence in FLN circles for some time. The real leaders are Krim Belkacem as Minister of War and Lamine Debaghine as Minister of Foreign Affairs.

7. We hope to obtain tomorrow a higher level appreciations of this latest development in the Algerian affair when we see Daridan and Basdevant.

CONSIDÉRATIONS RELATIVES À LA FORMATION AU CAIRE D'UN
GOUVERNEMENT LIBRE PROVISOIRE ALGÉRIEN

1) La formation de ce pseudo gouvernement purement factice, constitue une manoeuvre destinée à troubler les esprits en Algérie et en France, à la veille du référendum sur la nouvelle constitution, qui doit avoir lieu le 28 septembre, et à alimenter les débats de l'Assemblée générale des Nations-Unies, actuellement en session, lorsque celle-ci abordera la question algérienne.

2) Ce soi-disant gouvernement ne possède, ni en droit, ni en fait, aucune des qualifications indispensables pour justifier sa formation et ses prétentions.

3) Il s'est constitué lui-même; il n'est issu ni d'un processus démocratique normal (aucune consultation régulière n'a eu lieu), ni de manifestations convaincantes de l'assentiment des populations qu'il prétend représenter.

4) Il ne possède pas la réalité du pouvoir, au sens juridique généralement admis.

Il n'est en mesure, ni de s'établir sur un point quelconque du territoire algérien, ni de contrôler tout ou partie de ce territoire.

5) Il est hors d'état d'assurer, sur ce territoire, l'ordre et la sécurité.

Les bandes armées qui se réclament de lui ne commettent que des actions destructives et sanglantes, des pillages, des incendies, des assassinats et des massacres collectifs, sans distinction de race ni d'origine. En fait, les victimes de race arabe ou berbère et de religion musulmane ont été, depuis le début des troubles, environ dix fois plus nombreuses que les victimes de race européenne, et de religion chrétienne.

6) N'ayant ni caractère représentatif, ni pouvoir réel, ce pseudo gouvernement ne peut donner aucune garantie matérielle ni morale de l'exécution des obligations qui incomberaient à un vrai gouvernement, non plus que des engagements qu'il contracterait.

7) Le gouvernement français considère que la reconnaissance de l'organisme créé au Caire constituerait une immixtion dans les affaires intérieures françaises, et un acte grave-ment inamical.

Il serait obligé de considérer un tel geste comme une approbation de la campagne de violence et de terrorisme ordonnée par les dirigeants de ce pseudo gouvernement algérien, et poursuivie sur l'ensemble du territoire de la République française.

[Ottawa], September 24, 1958

RECOGNITION OF THE F.L.N. GOVERNMENT IN EXILE

On a number of counts the F.L.N.'s claim to represent the Algerian people, entitling it to recognition as an independent government, is unacceptable at the present time under international law. In the case of an F.L.N. Government in exile the prime factor upon which recognition, either de jure or de facto, depends, is missing. The control which that government has over the territory it purports to govern is insufficient for it even to establish itself there (as the Foreign Office INTEL No. 73 of April 18, 1958† points out this situation would be quite different from that of the Allied Governments in exile during World War II — in those cases the question was the continuance of recognition of de jure Governments which had been deprived of control over their territories by acts which we regarded as a legal nullity). Effective authority implies that the government is functioning in the territory and enjoys the habitual obedience of the bulk of the population. Again, to be entitled to recognition this authority should be exercised with a reasonable prospect of permanency over the whole or practically the whole territory of the State. None of these conditions are met in the case of the F.L.N.

International law in this issue is clear: it is universally admitted that in the case of a civil war or a war of secession the recognition of the insurgents as a de jure Government, as long as the issue has not been definitely decided in their favour, is contrary to international law. Premature recognition of the F.L.N. may be said to amount to a wrong done to the parent state, and France would be entitled to regard de jure recognition of the F.L.N. as an unlawful act of intervention by any country granting it.

The de facto position is also reasonably clear. The F.L.N. do not control any defined portions of Algerian territory. Hence it would not be appropriate, in the existing circumstances, for any country to extend de facto recognition to the F.L.N. as a government exercising de facto control over a considerable portion of Algerian territory. De facto recognition is often resorted to as a sort of compromise when conditions of recognition other than the principal condition, i.e. effectiveness of control, are absent. This might occur when the recognizing State has doubts as to the willingness of the new government to fulfil international obligations; equally when effectiveness is not accompanied by a reasonable assurance of permanency. But when effectiveness itself is lacking there is no justification for even considering the [de] facto recognition. An example of when de facto recognition of an insurgent government is appropriate is offered by British practice in the Spanish Civil War. In 1938, when the insurgent Nationalist government had gained control of the greater portion of Spain, the U.K. recognized the Nationalists as "a government which at present exercises de facto administrative control over the larger portion of Spain." At the same time the U.K. continued to recognize the Republican Government as the de jure government of Spain. The de facto recognition thus accorded to the insurgents was very limited in its effects and did not transform the Nationalists into an independent government of a sovereign State. De jure recognition of the Nationalists was only given in early 1939 when the defeat of the Republican Government became certain.

¹⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
(in New York) [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

For these reasons recognition of the F.L.N. Government in exile as the de jure or de facto government of Algeria at the present time can be regarded as premature and a breach of international law. It should be appreciated that the direct result of de jure recognition would be to reduce the established French government to the status of a rebellious group and to raise the F.L.N. to the position of the legitimate government to which support and encouragement may lawfully be given. De facto recognition must also be described as premature and an unfriendly act when the F.L.N. can have no valid claim to exercise effective control over the greater part of Algerian territory.

NON-RECOGNITION OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF ALGERIA

Just at the time when General de Gaulle may be in a position to carry forward his plans for a settlement in Algeria, we are concerned about the complications which could result from a wider recognition of the "provisional government" which has been established in exile by the leaders of the FLN. In our judgment, which agrees with the UK and US assessment, the provisional government does not meet the minimum requirements necessary in international law to entitle it to recognition. It can make no valid claim to territorial control and it has not demonstrated that it represents the majority of the population. It is not in a position to secure law and order in the country nor to assume international obligations. On legal grounds alone, therefore, there is no entitlement to recognition.

2. There have been indications from some sources that some Commonwealth countries, notably Ghana and Pakistan, may be considering recognition. The French have drawn this to our attention and ask whether we would be prepared to intervene to attempt to dissuade them from this course. We have not undertaken to go that far but we have said that we will, as a matter of urgency, inform Commonwealth governments of our own attitude and also explain the basis for it. Would you, therefore, as soon as possible explain our position to the Foreign Office at a high official level. While you should not urge any particular course of action on them you might, after explaining our position as set out in paragraph one, draw attention to the disturbing consequences that would follow from the precedent of capricious recognition for political reasons of a government which does not meet the legal requirements. One has only to think of the chaotic situation which could develop from the abandonment of the traditionally accepted measures, in such areas as Central and South America, the Middle East and elsewhere, if refugee political groups were able to gain recognition from their political sympathizers.

NON-RECOGNITION OF PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF ALGERIA

At lunch today, before we had an opportunity to raise the matter with him, Daridan thanked us in glowing terms for the action which the Canadian government had taken vis-à-vis Commonwealth governments. Since we wanted to be sure that Daridan understood the precise terms in which we were putting our views before Commonwealth governments, we showed him the text of your instructions to our missions, and he again expressed the most sincere thanks of the French government. We then went on to say that perhaps the results of the referendum would have a salutary effect on those countries which were now considering recognition. He hoped this might be so but expressed no repeat no real conviction.

2. In answer to a question he said they had not repeat not yet heard from the Moroccan or Tunisian governments concerning the French request that they refuse to have the FLN government on their territory. He was aware, however, that the Tunisians were more than ever unhappy at the result of the referendum. Whatever other deductions might be made from the vote in Algeria it seemed to be a pretty conclusive rejection of the FLN; this, at a moment when Tunisia and Morocco had moved closer to Cairo and the provisional government.

[Ottawa], September 30, 1958

In telegram 1061 of September 29† the Ambassador in Paris makes a few preliminary comments on the results of Sunday's referendum in which 79% of those who voted supported the new Constitution. He draws attention to the significance of the fact that the "no" vote, which was largely communist but which included the supporters of the dissident Radical Socialists, the socialist minority and others who were against the Constitution, fell about 5% short of what has been the normal communist percentage in general elections. This gives some weight to the repeated contention of French commentators that the 25% vote for communist deputies includes many Frenchmen who are not really communists. It is difficult to make an estimate of the actual communist content of the "no" vote but it would probably not exceed 18%. This is particularly significant in view of the fact that since mid-September the Soviet have maintained a particularly virulent attack against de Gaulle which was highlighted by an extremely critical statement by Khrushchev in a formal interview for Pravda.

In Algeria, the massive vote of 95% in favour of the new Constitution will probably attract criticism from those who think it is too good to be true but it is nevertheless a serious blow to the FLN. As the Ambassador points out, the political issues were much too complex for the majority of the Moslem voters, many going to the polls for the first time, to have formed any real judgement but it seems correct to assume that they were voting for the best chance to bring an end to the war and to the terrorism against Moslems by Moslems, and that they have not been convinced that this can best be brought about by supporting the FLN claim for immediate independence.

Of the overseas territories, only one voted "no" — Guinea, which is under the strong control of Sekou Touré. This was expected. But possibilities that Niger and Madagascar might also vote "no" have been proved unfounded by a strong majority in favour. Thus the General's offer of independence which frightened some into believing that the referendum would dissolve what remains of the French Empire has been demonstrated to be an astute political move which is bound to strengthen the French contention that association with France is what the territories want.

POLITICAL TIMETABLE

The new constitution will be promulgated on October 5 after the complete referendum results are available. For up to 4 months from that date, the government will have, under the transitional provisions, full powers to put the new institutions into place and to fix by decree any matter having to do with public authority, including those normally reserved to the legislature. De Gaulle's legal investiture on June 1 has now been legitimized by a popular mandate which gives him a virtual blank cheque until the new institutions are functioning.

2. On October 2 and 3, de Gaulle will visit Algeria for the fourth time since coming to power. Whether or not repeat not he will on this visit make important announcements on the future status of Algeria is a matter for speculation (my despatch 806 September 26†). His full powers and the suspension of the old Assembly will, however, give him greater freedom to act than any other Prime Minister has had since the Algerian rebellion broke out.

3. An announcement is expected shortly on the electoral system for the forthcoming elections. The transitional provisions empower the government to decide on that system. General elections for the Assembly are expected to take place November 16 or 23. Thereafter there will be new municipal elections from the results of which will come in large part the electoral college for the presidential election. Election of the President of the Republic will take place either in December or early January, after which only will it be possible for a Prime Minister to be named by the President and to present himself for approval by the Assembly.

4. The institutions of the community must be in place within six months from promulgation of the constitution. A conference with representatives of the territories which have voted yes will be held to work out (a) their status within the community and (b) the setting up of the community institutions.

5. There is speculation that the government will take advantage of the full powers it enjoys to effect a number of reforms (in the fiscal system, in the administration system, in the educational system) which are in draft form but which have not repeat not been put forward to parliament or have not repeat not secured parliamentary approval. Whether or not repeat not it does so will depend primarily on how much time the government has left to devote to these reforms after discussion of its other preoccupations, including international ones. It will also have to set by decree at least the main outlines of the 1959 budget. Depending upon how the foreign exchange reserves hold out, the present government might have to tackle the problem of a new foreign loan.

6. I shall be reporting on these several subjects as they develop but I thought you would find it useful to have at least the outline of the major items on the political agenda for the next few months.

ELECTORAL REFORM

Following yesterday's Cabinet Meeting, Soustelle announced that government has decided upon electoral system to be used November 23 and 30 when French population elects first legislature under Fifth Republic. The "scrutin uninominal de circonscription à deux tours" will replace the "scrutin de liste départementale majoritaire à un tour avec apparentements." This means a reversion to system used widely between 1875 and 1939, and represents a victory for de Gaulle over some of his doubting ministers. Though no repeat no texts have been made public, from the announcement it appears that new system will apply throughout metropolitan France. (Since 1951, the two large departments of Seine and Seine-et-Oise have had slightly different systems from rest of the country.) In Algeria, elections will be based upon departmental lists rather than straight single member constituency vote as in metropolitan France. In overseas departments, existing procedures remain unchanged.

2. Elections for Assembly on November 23 and 30 will be followed by constitution of electoral college on December 7 which will elect new President of the Republic on December 14 (and 21 if a second round is necessary).

3. Most press and political comment indicates a rallying behind reform although earlier proponents of various alternatives opposed principle of single seat constituency which de Gaulle wants in order to make deputies more responsible to electorate and to reduce influence of the parties in France. The use under the Fourth Republic of party lists in multi-seat constituencies and apparentements (pooling of votes by several parties) was only partly and temporarily successful in circumscribing the Communist vote and it did lead to important party manoeuvring.

4. Impact of new system on composition of new assembly will not repeat not be clear until new constituencies are drawn up. Metropolitan France will have 465 seats in Assembly, a reduction from 544 under previous system. No repeat no indication has been given yet on whether Algerian and overseas representation will approximate that in metropolitan France which is roughly one seat per 100,000 people.

5. New system will place emphasis upon candidates, not repeat not the party, and could damage parties with widespread but thin support while favouring those with perhaps only regional but strong backing. Mayors and other local notables presenting themselves as candidates will likely benefit from smaller constituency size. Most observers expect Communists to suffer from new electoral scheme while Socialists should gain. Until more precise details are public such speculation is probably premature.

6. Other changes in the systems are expected to increase candidates deposits, prevent entry of new candidates between first and second rounds, and require candidates in advance of first round to announce if they will step down in favour of other candidates before second.

7. Although much will depend upon way in which constituency boundaries are set, announced electoral reform clearly reflects de Gaulle's wishes to reduce importance of the party, increase importance of the candidate and his contact with the people, and incidentally in this way to diminish the influence of Communist Party in France.

GENERAL ELECTIONS IN FRANCE

With first round of voting less than a week away, there is a notable lack of political activity. Provinces are reportedly a little more lively than Paris area, but such political meetings as are taking place are on the whole poorly attended and rather spiritless. Situation is in marked contrast with feverish activity which preceded last general elections in January 1956.

2. Politically, France is still suffering from shock of May events. Inability of parliament and politicians to cope with crisis and the appeal to de Gaulle to take over undoubtedly accounts in large measure for apparent political lassitude at present time. Referendum gave blank cheque to de Gaulle and electorate seems little interested in complexion of National Assembly, which it considers will play secondary role. It looks to de Gaulle rather than to the politicians to find the answers to political problems. New electoral system, strange to both electorate and candidates, emphasizes local individuals and parish pump politics rather than parties and national issues.

3. This general atmosphere continues to make predictions hazardous, even after detailed examination of situation in individual constituencies. Lack of interest and of issues may result in high percentage of abstentions, perhaps as high as 30 percent as opposed to usual 20 percent (approximately) in post-war general elections. Strong Gaullist current obviously exists. It may lead to a heavy swing in favour of most clearly Gaullist party, Union pour la Nouvelle République (UNR), which hopes to emerge as new centre force controlling parliament by drawing support alternatively from left and right wings. On the other hand, the fact that all major parties except Communists claim to hold, in words of caption to recent express cartoon, "a portion of the true cross of Lorraine," may scatter effect of de Gaulle's prestige, especially as he has not repeat not given his blessing to any party. While there is a desire for a change from the discredited Fourth Republic conditions, new men of the new parties labour under the disadvantage of not repeat not being as well-established locally as are many Socialist, Radical, MRP and Independent candidates.

4. There are approximately 2,800 candidates for the 465 metropolitan seats (not repeat not over 3,000 as expected when I wrote my reference despatch), or an average of 6 per constituency. Only after the sifting of the first round and the decisions on withdrawals for the second round will it be possible to see something of the shape of the Assembly to come. Unless during the next few days some clarity emerges in the confused pre-electoral situation, I shall not repeat not attempt to report further until after the first round on November 23.

5. As for the elections in Algeria, I see no repeat no reason to revise the initial analysis made in my telegram 1257 November 10.† Complete absence of moderate nationalist candidates and small number who might possibly be classed as liberals means that there is no repeat no cross-section of Algerian opinion. It is difficult to see how de Gaulle could discuss future of Algeria with those representatives who will be elected, and interest in election results is therefore minimal. Statements made by respected liberals of French origin who changed their original intention to run in Algeria suggest that lack of representative Algerian candidates is due not repeat not only to FLN intransigence toward elections but also to continuing pressures from the army despite de Gaulle's clear instructions to Salan. If these allegations are true, the elections are of even less interest, and, more important, the question of the army's obedience to the civil power in Paris is again to the fore.

6. In brief, I see nothing yet to suggest that the rehabilitation of political life in France is being assisted by the electoral campaign. The predominance of de Gaulle's prestige and the necessity of trying to benefit from that prestige have clouded discussion of important issues, on which de Gaulle has not repeat not yet pronounced. If this atmosphere persists, the first Assembly of the Fifth Republic may not repeat not be ungovernable, as were those of the Fourth Republic, but all too governable.

GENERAL ELECTIONS: FIRST ROUND

According to figures so far available, only 39 candidates have been elected on the first round, so that for the remainder of the 465 metropolitan seats a further ballot will be necessary on November 30. Predictions as to the final distribution of seats are difficult without detailed analysis of the situation in all constituencies and, even moreso, without knowing the withdrawals which take place between the first and second rounds. Nevertheless, some comments can be made on the basis of the distribution of votes by percentages among the various parties.

2. The most notable feature is the success which has accrued to the neo-Gaullist Party, Union pour la Nouvelle République (UNR), of which Soustelle is the best-known leader, which has benefitted from the pro-Gaullist sentiment in the country beyond all predictions. It polled over 17 per cent of the vote, compared to some 4 per cent for its predecessor the RPF in 1956, thus reaching toward the RPF's figure of 20 per cent in 1951. Although this is not repeat not a landslide, the UNR emerges as a major party many of whose candidates, even though little known, threaten well-known political figures in the second round. Mendès-France and Laniel have been defeated by Gaullists, while Gaullists may well defeat Teitgen, Bourges-Maunoury, Mitterand, Edgar Faure, Baylet, Le Troquer, Daladier and Pineau. The UNR may get 120-130 seats in the Assembly.

3. Communist losses exceed predictions also. The Communists obtained only 19 per cent of the vote as opposed to the post-war average of 24 per cent, which implies that there were even more Communist defections than there were for the referendum. They won only one seat in the first round. Because of the electoral system, their representation in the Assembly will be very small, probably no repeat no more than 30.

4. Socialists have increased slightly their percentage (15.5 per cent) over 1956 but less than was expected. Independents have increased their percentage, and now exceed the Socialist vote by several percent. The Poujadistes have all but been wiped off the political map. The MRP have suffered slighter losses than were expected. The radicals have incurred the greatest percentage of losses, falling from 13 per cent to 5 per cent. The small groups of the left and centre-left have had very little success.

5. Of the members of the present government, Soustelle, Pflimlin, Jacquinet, Pinay, Lejeune and Buron have been elected on the first round, while Mollet and Cornut-Gentille are in a good position for the second round.

6. Abstentions in yesterday's vote were some 23 per cent, the highest in any general election since the war (average about 20 per cent) but lower than was predicted.

7. The new Assembly will certainly be oriented further to the right than the old one, with the UNR playing the role of the major centre to centre-right party. Under these circumstances, the SFIO could well form the nucleus of a loyal opposition rather than sharing in the responsibilities of government. If this happens, it will be against de Gaulle's hopes that the balance between left, centre and right would be such as to make a "national" government, from Socialists to Independents, the most practical. He may therefore have to be a more active arbiter than he hoped to be.

GENERAL ELECTIONS: SECOND ROUND

The second round of voting which took place yesterday has given strong amplification to the trends noted in first round. The strength of the trends has substantially exceeded predictions. According to present statistics the following will be distribution of seats for First Assembly of Fifth Republic: Communists 10; various left 2; SFIO 40; Orthodox Radicals 13; UDSR-RGR and Dissident (right-wing) Radicals 22; UNR 188; MRP 44 and Christian Democracy (Bidault followers) 13; CNI (Independent) 120 and other Conservatives 13; Poujadistes 0. If, as is likely at least at the beginning, most of Algerian deputies line up with UNR (though probably to its right), that party will have an absolute majority in the new Assembly.

2. Abstentions in the second round were approximate 24 percent compared with 23 percent in first round and a postwar average of 20 percent for general elections.

3. The most striking features of election results are:

(a) the strong swing in favour of the party, the UNR, thought to be most clearly Gaullist (with 26 percent of popular vote) and to the traditional right (with 24 percent of popular vote) a swing which has produced an Assembly which is probably somewhat to the right of de Gaulle, at least on Algerian policy;

(b) the virtual elimination of Communists as a political force, in spite of fact that they obtained over 20 percent of the vote in second round;

(c) the heavy losses inflicted on the parties most involved in government during the last legislature (Socialists and Radicals), on the well-known political figures of Fourth Republic (only 150 of the 475 deputies who stood for re-election were successful), and on the parties and individuals who were opposed to or even reticent toward de Gaulle and the new constitution.

4. The electorate wanted to make a clear break with the discredited Fourth Republic and to continue to entrust matters to de Gaulle. The people accepted with relief the politicians' abdication in favour of de Gaulle on June 1, confirmed their faith in the General with the referendum vote on September 28, and have now voted for the party most easily identifiable with de Gaulle. The UNR no doubt picked up most of the floating vote which in 1946 went MRP, in 1951 RPF, and in 1956 Poujadiste or Mendèsiste, as well as some from the traditional right, the centre, the left and even the extreme left. So strong was the Gaullist sentiment that it overcame the predicted effect of single-member constituency, which was expected to favour well-known local individuals rather than broad currents of opinion. In many cases, relative unknowns bearing UNR label have overcome established figures of other parties. Casualties include former Premiers Daladier, Ramadier, Edgar Faure, Laniel, Mendès-France and Bourges-Manoury; three Ministers of de Gaulle's government, Bacon, Thomas and Ramonet; former Ministers Cot (Progressiste) Lacoste, Gazier, Pineau, Defferre, Depreux, Jaquet, Moch, Naegelen (all Socialist), Mitterand, Morice, Lafay, Teitgen, Barrachin and others; and such personalities as Vigier, Le Troquer, Baylet, Duclos, Mme Vermeersch, Dides, Tixier-Vignancourt, Isorni and Clostermann. There is dramatic irony in the fact that the two parties most in favour of present electoral system, the Socialists and Radicals, suffered heavily while amongst those opposed, the MRP did better than it expected to do, thanks to careful local organization, and the UNR groundswell overcame any local disadvantages.

5. The complete change in political complexion of Assembly, the large number of novices and a new constitution which has reduced the importance of the Assembly vis-à-vis the executive make it risky to predict its political behaviour. UNR hoped to play the role of the hinge between a fairly evenly balanced right and left but the success of conservatives (CNI and others) and the severe reduction in ranks of left and centre-left make this role problematical. Nominally loyal to de Gaulle in large part, the Assembly may well resist his efforts to steer the centre-left course which is thought to be his personal preference. This resistance could apply particularly to a bold liberal Algerian policy for the Assembly will be tilted toward a conservative and integrationist policy.

6. Complete election results for Algeria are not repeat not yet known but in any event they are of limited interest because of the small range of choice offered the voter. The "spirit of May 13" and "integration" figure in varying degrees in all the lists which have been elected or are in the lead. The proportion of voters was approximately 70 percent compared with some 80 percent in the referendum.

7. The choice of Prime Minister and subsequent formation of a new government will not repeat not take place until after the election of the President of the Republic on December 21 (and December 28 if a second round is necessary). The government will have a free hand at least until Assembly meets in April and may face a fairly docile Assembly then, at least to begin with. It is generally expected that the first Prime Minister will be from the UNR, especially in view of results of second round. The names of Soustelle and Debre are still those most frequently mentioned. Even before the elections certain parliamentarians expressed the wish that de Gaulle remain as Prime Minister until the end of President Coty's term in 1960, particularly so that de Gaulle could retain firm and direct control of Algerian policy. Quite apart from the constitutional difficulties this would pose however I think it is a most unlikely possibility.

DESPATCH NO. 978

Paris, December 15, 1958

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

Reference: Our Tel. 1357 of November 28, 1958.†

VISIT TO ALGERIA BY MR. CREAN — NOVEMBER 26 - DECEMBER 4, 1958

In accordance with the notification contained in our Tel. 1341 of November 24,† Mr. Crean visited Algeria during the recent campaign for the election of the Algerian members to the National Assembly. I enclose two copies of a chronological report† prepared by Mr. Crean of his visit. I propose in this despatch to draw a few general conclusions on the Algerian problem.

2. As a result of the elections, a highly conservative group of members will sit in the National Assembly. Although they are not all technically supporters of the Committees of Public Safety, they are nonetheless highly conservative and represent a victory for the notion of "integration" with France. It would seem possible however that four or five of the Muslim members may in fact turn out to have rather independent views.

3. There can be no doubt that General Salan and his officers failed to carry out General de Gaulle's directive calling on the authorities to ensure that all shades of opinion be represented in the lists of candidates presented. Liberal Algerian opinion, whether French or Muslim, was not therefore represented during the election campaign and their voice will not be heard in the new Assembly. The main reason why representatives like Chevallier, and certain Muslim liberals, did not stand, is because they were convinced that the voting would be arranged against them, and that in such an event they would be discredited in the eyes of the Muslim population. In the upshot their suspicions were confirmed. Although the evidence as to the methods used either to influence Muslim voters or to pack the ballot boxes is variable and even conflicting on certain points, there have been quite enough complaints lodged by conservative candidates presenting themselves at the election to satisfy me that a good many improper measures were applied in different parts of the country. The overall turn-out of 65%, which appears moderately good at first sight, is a somewhat misleading figure, for in the towns the abstentions were much higher, e.g. 40% in the town of Algiers and 50% in Philippeville. If you add the 10% figure of blank ballots deposited in the ballot boxes (a normal method of expressing opposition to the lists presented) it leaves you with very few Arabs voting in Algiers-town itself. 127,151 people voted out of a total of 230,930 inscribed voters. Of the latter approximately 100,000 are Muslims. In Algiers-town, therefore, it seems that only a fraction of Muslims voted at all. If the vote in the country districts was higher, the army was also in a position more readily to turn out the voters, to tell them how to vote or alternatively to indulge in outright padding of the ballot boxes, using the undistributed voting cards unquestionably held in their possession in substantial numbers.

4. If the army used these methods a good deal less in the towns it is probably because they would have been too obvious. Indeed to have achieved the percentage obtained at the referendum would have appeared phoney on the internal evidence alone. However that may be, it is perhaps only fair to say that no election at all could have been held two years ago.

5. Although therefore the country was under sufficient control to hold the election without incident, and although the FLN did not apparently attempt to intervene, the unpleasant fact remains that the election has not produced genuine representatives of Muslim opinion. I can only conclude that the search for a liberal solution in Algeria has been made more difficult by the election results.

6. It is of course difficult to analyze Muslim opinion in a population of which perhaps as high as 85% is illiterate. Germaine Tillion in her book L'Algérie en 1957 suggests that there are about two million Muslims whose cultural and economic standard of life is in any way comparable to that in metropolitan France. Whether one accepts the figure of 15 or 20%, it means that the bulk of the Muslim population will be led by the strongest elements in the literate community. Of that percentage perhaps two or three percent of the literate population are "plus français que les Français," and the balance are highly francisé, an inevitable result of a policy of using in the schools only a standard French curriculum in the French language. Except for the few FLN extremists, most of these people appear to belong to a liberal group, in the Algerian sense of the word; and they would see their future lying with the French, with a large measure of local autonomy.

7. The war has of course been nourished by the population especially by the teenagers who can get neither work nor schooling. The liberal elements feel that if a liberal solution is not imposed soon, their influence on the young will disappear. They are worried that a race element may be introduced into the conflict which, they maintain, has not been so up to now despite the propaganda of Nasser and the FLN to the contrary.

8. These liberal elements, French and Muslim alike, seem to be almost unanimous in their belief that the war can only be ended satisfactorily by negotiating with the FLN. They maintain this in the belief that if negotiations are conducted in secret the French Government will be able to settle with Ferhat Abbas and the moderates in the FLN. The extremists in the FLN would not matter because they would have no support in the country, and their military operations would accordingly fade away. The liberal elements, however, would not favour any negotiation which would lead to independence, or which would recognize the FLN as the Government of Algeria.

9. Although it is difficult to judge whether this analysis of the course negotiations would take is sound, it is worth remembering that Chevallier and a number of Muslim liberals were at university in Algiers with most of the present FLN leaders. Their interpretation of FLN psychology should, therefore, be taken into consideration. But even if they are right, they admit that this situation will not continue indefinitely, and the longer the situation is allowed to drift the more difficult negotiations on the lines they propose will become.

10. I would not care to pass a final judgment on the foregoing views. They may well be over-optimistic about a situation on which nearly all judgments have become charged with emotion.

11. On the other hand the Army High Command believe that the war can be brought to a close, and that it has almost been brought to a close, by military means, so long as no outside aid is provided. The barrage, they maintain, has been fairly effective in preventing outside aid, and the population is fed up with the war. The latter point is of course true; just as it is true that the petit bourgeois liberal Muslim has been paying caution money to the FLN. The answer here however seems to lie more in what happens to the young, for it is they who take to the hills, not the butcher and the baker. Theoretically, and even practically, a war of this type can go on indefinitely. For even if many of the young are not fighting for a cause, they are carrying on a strong tradition of brigandage in the Kabyle mountains and elsewhere.

12. However the war may be terminated, whether on the terms the army believe will occur or whether by negotiation with the FLN, the liberal elements in the Muslim population will have to be reckoned with if Algeria is not to be merely retained by force of arms and the Gestapo methods that have undoubtedly been used both by the police and the army.

13. In my opinion General de Gaulle faces a more difficult problem in Algeria after the election than before it. He has had his vote; it has not produced the so-called "interlocuteurs valables;" he does not have unquestioned control of the army in Algeria; and with a right-wing Assembly a liberal solution would have to be imposed on a potentially authoritarian Assembly and an undoubtedly authoritarian local régime. Amongst the liberal Algerians with whom Mr. Crean talked during his visit, (and one heard of it in other quarters as well), there still remains an almost child-like faith in the ability of General de Gaulle to produce a solution. But no solution will be satisfactory if its terms are not genuinely carried out by the administration in Algeria. The appointment of Mr. Delouvrier, as the representative of the government in Algeria, is a step in the right direction. Unless, however, he is able to remove most of the military from their present civil functions, and replaces them with civilians who are capable and incorruptible, a liberal solution will not work. The moderate Muslim has already seen and knows what happened to the reform measures of 1947; even the illiterate has enough savoir-faire to understand that much. But it is at least encouraging that Mr. Delouvrier was sent by General de Gaulle on a special mission before his appointment and that he had discussions with the same representatives of liberal opinion, as Mr. Crean.

14. In the circumstances, the French Government cannot but remain a prisoner of Algerian politics for some time to come, and to that extent the hands of General de Gaulle will be tied.

15. Mr. Crean's report on his visit has been marked: "Canadian Eyes Only," because a number of those with whom he talked are regarded by the extremists in the army as virtually subversive, and they might, therefore, be in some personal danger in the future if the local authorities were aware that they had talked in this way to the representative of another power.

POLITICAL SITUATION: DE GAULLE'S ELECTION AS PRESIDENT

De Gaulle's election on December 21 as First President of Fifth Republic was a foregone conclusion once he had formally presented his candidacy on December 13. He polled 78.5 percent of the vote in first round of voting by Presidential Electoral College. College numbers some 81,000 electors of metropolitan France (parliamentarians and local elected representatives), Algeria (senators and new deputies) and overseas France (parliamentarians and members of local assemblies) as set forth in Article 6 of the Constitution. De Gaulle's only opponents were the Communist candidate Marrane who polled 13 percent and Chatelet, Honorary Dean of Faculty of Science of Paris University, who stood on behalf of non-Communist "no" forces in the referendum vote and who polled 8.5 percent. That the percentage of votes contained by de Gaulle's opponents exceeds the 15 percent of "no" votes in referendum is in part attributable to fact that Electoral College has only been renewed insofar as deputies are concerned and is therefore not repeat not a full reflection of strong Gaullist sentiment in the country.

2. By this election de Gaulle becomes not repeat not only President of Republic but President of the Community as well. In Overseas States Members of Community he carried 98 percent of the poll. He will play a principal role in setting up of Community institutions which will begin to take form in January.

3. For another few weeks de Gaulle will remain head of government. He will be officially installed as President on January 8 when he will take over from President Coty. One of his first acts will be to name a Prime Minister. At the moment odds are strong in favour of Michel Debre present Minister of Justice and a faithful Gaullist of long standing, though Jacquinet's name is also mentioned. There is a possibility, however, that de Gaulle will choose someone from outside political circles (e.g. name of Armand, President of Euratom and onetime Director of French State Railways has been suggested to us privately by a member of Le monde), thus leaning toward a managerial-type or "technical" government. It is expected to be a Cabinet with a fairly small number of Ministers supplemented by Secretaries and Under-Secretaries of State. Cabinet may well include such members of present government as Soustelle, Pinay and Couve de Murville.

4. New National Assembly met in formal session on December 9 and elected as its speaker for duration of legislature Chaban-Delmas, a Gaullist who was Minister of Defence in Gaillard Government. He was elected on second round over Socialist Candidate Lejeune when Paul Reynaud of Independents withdrew after the first round. New government will present itself to Assembly in another short formal session about January 15 but will not repeat not have to be invested by Assembly. Thereafter the government will have a free hand until parliament meets for its first regular session toward the end of April.

[Ottawa], September 15, 1958

CANADIAN ACCESSION TO THE AUSTRIAN STATE TREATY

The Austrian Embassy have recently renewed the request that Canada accede to the State Treaty which ended the four-power occupation of Austria. We have reviewed the situation and I think that we should now accede to the Treaty.

2. The Austrian State Treaty was negotiated between Austria, the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and France. Other countries were not consulted. Provision was made, however, for the accession of others and since the Treaty is the foundation for the re-establishment of Austria as a sovereign state, Austria has been anxious for friendly countries to accede. So far, only Poland, Roumania, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia of the Eastern Bloc and Mexico and Brazil from the West have done so. The Austrians feel embarrassed by the failure of other Western countries to accede and thus at least to balance the adherence of the Eastern European governments.

3. Apart from the right to take part in any negotiations to alter the Treaty, countries which accede do not acquire any particular privileges. On the other hand, accession would not increase our obligations to Austria. Under Article 2 we would be required to respect the independence and territorial integrity of Austria but would have no obligation exceeding that which flows from common membership in the United Nations. Austrian neutrality was established by Austrian national action subsequent to, and admittedly as a condition of, the re-establishment of Austrian independence. It is not a provision of the Treaty and therefore accession does not create any obligation in regard to its preservation.

4. Our accession would therefore be primarily a gesture of friendship and sympathy for Austria. It should establish a better basis for Canadian-Austrian relations and especially if our action were followed by other Western countries, as would seem quite possible, it would tend to strengthen the Austrian sentiment of belonging with the West. While scrupulously adhering to its undertaking to be militarily neutral, Austria has demonstrated its adherence to Western ideals as, for example, in giving assistance to Hungarian refugees in the face of Soviet threats.

5. When Canadian accession was last considered in 1956, our decision was to take action as soon as Belgium and at least one other Western European country was ready to accede. We have now consulted with the governments of Belgium, the Netherlands and Norway to determine their present positions. All three are prepared in principle to accede at a time appropriate to their national interests and believe accession to be desirable on political grounds. However, each of the three is delaying its accession pending satisfactory conclusion of bilateral discussions with Austria on financial claims. All three governments have stated specifically that Canadian accession at this time would not prejudice their negotiations with Austria. These negotiations, which appear to be proceeding at a leisurely pace, are exclusively in the domain of the national interests of the countries concerned and do not affect Austro-Canadian affairs nor the international position of Austria.

6. Austro-Canadian relations are established on a regular and friendly basis and we maintain our contacts through our respective Ambassadors and in the United Nations. There is therefore no valid argument for withholding accession to the Treaty, which is the foundation for Austria's existence which we have thus recognized.

7. The Canadian constitutional requirements are under study. A preliminary view is that accession can be legally accomplished by executive act and precedents suggest a reference to Parliament by presenting a resolution to support the government's decision to accede or by tabling the Instrument of Accession. Legislation is not believed to be necessary. The Department of Justice is being asked to confirm.

8. I should like to propose that the government decide in principle to accede and when the opinion of the Department of Justice is available, determine the method by which this would be accomplished. The matter is not one of great public interest and you may feel that it would suffice to table the Instrument when Parliament next meets. On the other hand, a parliamentary resolution might enhance the value of our action as a public gesture of friendship and solidarity with Austria.

9. The Austrian Foreign Minister, who mentioned this question to you last year in New York, is likely to raise it again when he sees you at the time of the General Assembly. You might therefore like to be in a position to tell him that the question is under active study and that, subject to the determination of the constitutional requirements, you hope shortly to recommend to the government immediate accession. You might wish to say that you do not contemplate that Canadian action would be conditional on similar action by other Western powers (the Austrians are aware that this was a condition of the previous decision) but would be decided on the basis of the Canadian considerations involved.

10. If you agree that a decision in principle to accede should now be taken, I suggest that, before the formal act is carried out, we inform Australia, New Zealand and South Africa of our intention, to give them the opportunity of taking similar action if they so wish. These countries were consulted at the official level in 1956 and expressed an interest in the opportunity to co-ordinate their action on accession with ours. I would not suggest, however, that Canadian accession be conditional on a positive decision by these countries.¹⁷

Since receiving your approval to proceed with preparations for Canadian accession to the Austrian State Treaty, we have consulted with the other interested departments and, informally, with the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India. None of the departments have raised objections and the Department of Justice has advised that accession would not require legislation and could be accomplished by executive action. I attach a copy of a submission to Cabinet† which, if you agree, will be distributed at once.

The New Zealand Government has decided to accede and would like to do so simultaneously with Canada. If we are to proceed by parliamentary resolution, this might be difficult to arrange. In any case, it would seem more important that the two Governments announce their intentions at the same time. We have made this suggestion to the New Zealand authorities and indicated that the Canadian intentions to accede might be mentioned in the throne speech of January 15. I consider that this would be appropriate in view of the importance of accession in Austro-Canadian relations. If Cabinet agrees to Canadian accession, and if you agree that this decision should be mentioned in the throne speech, it might be done in the following terms: "My Government will ask Parliament to approve the 'State Treaty for the Re-Establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria', which was signed in Vienna on May 15, 1955, and thus bring about Canadian accession to this ¹⁹ M. Theodor Heuss, président de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, et M. Heinrich von Brentano, ministre allemand des Affaires étrangères, sont venus au Canada, entre le 28 mai et le 4 juin 1958. Ils se sont rendus à Québec, à Montréal, à Niagara Falls et à Toronto avant de passer les quatre dernières journées de leur visite à Ottawa.

Theodor Heuss, President of the Federal Republic of Germany, and Heinrich von Brentano, the Republic's Foreign Minister, visited Canada between May 28 and June 4, 1958. They toured Quebec City, Montreal, Niagara Falls, and Toronto before spending the final four days of the visit in Ottawa.

France

2. The focus of discussions on this subject was the attitude which de Gaulle would take in the direction of French foreign policy.²⁰ Mr. Smith expressed the fear that de Gaulle might not hesitate to present U.S. policies unfavourably, exploiting French public opinion in this regard and driving France further away from one of its major allies. In this connection he also spoke to Mr. Brentano about the role which the U.K. could play in helping to prevent France being driven into international isolation. In general Mr. Smith thought that the U.K. might be expected to show a greater degree of sympathy and understanding towards present French difficulties than the U.S. and as a result the U.K. could well become the most influential channel to the new French government. As for NATO Mr. Smith mentioned that Mr. Spaak, while he could not be certain of what attitude de Gaulle would take in this matter, expressed the opinion when he was here in Ottawa that as a loyal Frenchman de Gaulle could not let the Organization drop.

3. Mr. Brentano declared his full agreement with Minister's assessment and said that everything must be done to prevent France under a new government from being driven into isolation. If nationalism were aroused with France in an isolated position it would go along with Communism and France would then thrash about like a drowning man.

4. Recognizing the interest which the Federal German Republic had shown in promoting economic cooperation in Europe, Mr. Smith wondered what de Gaulle's attitude in this matter would be and whether he would "think as a European." Mr. Brentano replied he believed he could say that de Gaulle does not want European integration. His often declared opinion is for cooperation perhaps in the form of an alliance with strong emphasis on unrestricted sovereignty. De Gaulle does not agree with everything that is designated as European integration. Mr. Brentano then stated that he would not at first like to assume that a government under de Gaulle's premiership would withdraw from its treaty obligations. He thought, however, that France would display less fervour in fulfilling these treaties and would assume an even more negative attitude towards the Free Trade Area than before. He felt that the European Community will sometime have to consider whether a certain special status with additional advantages in the Common Market should not be granted to France, in order to prevent France from putting any more difficulties in the way of the Free Trade Area. He believed that the Free Trade Area at the present time is economically and, above all, politically of even greater importance than ever before.

Foreign Aid Programmes

5. When asked by Mr. Smith for an expression of the Federal German Government's attitude towards aid for underdeveloped countries, in particular India, Mr. Brentano replied that relations between the Federal Republic and the African countries are very good. The Federal Republic has also reached an agreement with the United Arab Republic, he said. He felt it right to follow an elastic policy here. He was convinced that Tunisia and Morocco are absolutely and consciously anti-Communist. He also has the impression that influential political circles in Cairo are anti-Communist. They naturally tried to obtain support from both sides and to play one against the other. The West has also made it easy for these countries, as it has not yet succeeded in reaching a common policy for the near East. The right hand never knew what the left was doing. The attitude of the U.S. has also not been very clear. He thought it NATO's task to reach a common policy in the near East. This will not be easy, as the views of the allies are not identical. But these countries must not be excluded.

6. Mr. Brentano went on to state that what he had said also applied to the relations of the Federal Republic with the countries of Southeast Asia. The Federal Government has always tried to pry these countries loose from the Communist sphere of influence. He has the impression that Prime Minister Nehru is much more critical of the Soviet Union today than he was before. Here too it should be the task of NATO to coordinate the economic policies of its member countries. It must be recognized, however, that one can only talk to these countries if no political conditions are attached to an offer. If this is not done, there is a danger of losing both the near East and Southeast Asia.

*Summit Meeting*²¹

7. When asked by Mr. Smith whether the Federal German Government was of the opinion that reunification need not necessarily be placed on the agenda of the first summit conference, Mr. Brentano replied that he could answer this question in the same way he had done in Copenhagen. Reunification continues to be one of the most important problems for German policy, not only from the point of view of German interest, but from the conviction that continued division of Germany is like a mortgage encumbering peace. Statements made by the Federal Chancellor and himself might perhaps have been misunderstood. It is not the intention of the Federal Government, by insisting on first priority treatment of reunification in international discussions, to create the impression that the Federal Government is sabotaging a promising summit conference. Mr. Brentano believed, however, that any discussion on disarmament must inevitably lead to the German question once conversations took place as to how this disarmament should be carried out and who shall participate. In the same way, every conversation on European security leads to the German problem, if the question is asked who should participate in an agreement on German security, and what status the participating powers should be given. For this reason, the Federal Government is of the opinion that the German question cannot be excluded from this discussion. If the Soviet Union vetoes this, she herself is sabotaging the summit conference. If, however, the agenda were so arranged as to allow discussion of all political problems, the German Government would be satisfied, because this would mean that the German problem would have to be discussed. It could then be seen what constructive contribution the Soviet Union would make in this connection. The Federal Government would never agree to an exclusion of the German question from international discussions, but would agree to an agenda on which the German question was not expressly mentioned, if it can be certain that this question will be discussed, under whatever heading, at the meeting.

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Ottawa, June 6, 1958

Dear Lynn [Stephens],

Since I will be seeing you for only a day between my visit to Canada and my tour to Hamburg and Bremen, I will probably not have time to tell you much about the Heuss visit to Canada. For this reason, I am dictating in some haste just before leaving Ottawa an informal report which will supplement the more formal reports²² you will receive from the Department on the visit. I know that you will realize that these are not considered comments on the visit but hasty impressions.

To my mind, the principal benefit which we may expect to flow from the visit is that it may do something to correct the error which it seems to me so many Germans make in under-estimating Canada.

Perhaps I may be wrong on this but my impression from my three or four months in Bonn is that the Germans do seriously under-estimate the power of Canada, its influence and the independence of its judgment and actions. In India, the Indians tend to exaggerate our power and influence and independence. They rank us among the first six countries in importance. My guess is that the Germans rank us among the second dozen.

My hope is that the visit of Heuss and Brentano has impressed the Germans with our wealth and economic development. They saw the St. Lawrence Seaway, the great power development at Niagara and — what may have been even more impressive to them — the way in which the new highway is being slashed across the countryside from the United States border to Toronto.

I did with the Germans what I never would have done with the Indians and that is to draw attention to the way in which we throw money around. Thus, at the lunch given in Ottawa by Mr. Fulton, I was sitting opposite Mr. Pearkes and Brentano. I got the two of them in conversation and then asked Mr. Pearkes about “having spent” our $300 million in developing the Arrow plane. Pearkes first of all said that it was only $220 million but then said that you could really add another $180 million, making a total of $400 million for the development cost of the Arrow and a number of other planes. Brentano seemed impressed.

Heuss, as you can well understand, charmed everyone he met. How far his charm got over on television and radio I do not know.

The newspaper editorials on him were extremely friendly. I think that the German Embassy here had done a good job in sending out information about him. One of the best of the editorials was that in the Toronto Telegram. He was certainly a good advertisement of a new Germany since he gave the impression of being everything which the Nazis were not.

²² Non localisé./Not located.

His interpreter, Weber, was excellent, and Heuss' lack of knowledge of English did not make impossible his conducting eloquent conversations with the people he sat beside at official luncheons and dinners.

Brentano, as you know, is shy and nervous and capable at times of those unintentional rudenesses in conversation which perhaps Germans are more subject to than many other people. The only one rudeness I actually heard was in the discussion in the Under-Secretary's Office. Mr. Léger brought the conversation around to disengagement and made some very gentle remarks about our studies of disengagement. Brentano said that someone had recently said to him that it seemed that everybody in the world thought they ought to draw up their own private plan of disengagement.

I was present at only two of Brentano's private talks. The one with the Minister in Toronto and the one in the Under-Secretary's Office here. You will have received a fairly full report of the talk in Toronto. Brentano was at his best in that talk. His exposition was clear and logical.

I have not yet heard how far the Prime Minister and the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce were impressed by their talks with Brentano. I shall try to find out.

Because of the delicacy of the situation in France, Brentano was extraordinarily cautious in his references during these conversations to the situation in France — so cautious that he may have been somewhat misleading. He at no time talked as frankly in Ottawa as he had talked to me on the trip. During our private conversations, he displayed the most profound pessimism about what was likely to happen in France. On three separate occasions, he talked of civil war as an imminent possibility — on the day we left Germany, on the Monday after our arrival in Ottawa, and on one day between. He referred to the outburst of xenophobia in France. The outcome might be national bolshevism. He also referred earlier in our trip to the danger of a war in North Africa.

Whether he has anything more to go on than the report which he no doubt received from Carlo Schmidt, he is certainly apprehensive about de Gaulle doing a deal with the Soviet Union.

He is also apprehensive that de Gaulle may not be able to hold the line against the extremists who helped to put him in power. He thinks it possible that they may sooner or later force de Gaulle out and put one of their own men in. As the Italian Ambassador in Bonn put it "We know who the French Neuguib is — we do not yet know who is the French Nasser."

He emphasized, both in his talks with me and in his talks with the Minister and the Under-Secretary, the special position of Germany in relation to France because the xenophobia in France is directed against Great Britain and the United States and not against Germany. This creates for Germany an opportunity and an obligation.

To me, it seemed that the implication of this kind of remark and of his reiteration of the necessity of real discussion in NATO is that Germany may from now on pursue a more active foreign policy especially in NATO.

You remember that shortly before I left Bonn, Echart spoke to me about his worry that Germany may be forced to leave the back seat in international discussions which it has deliberately been occupying. Brentano may not be as apprehensive about this premature development as I think Echart and probably Chancellor Adenauer are.

Where I think we will find that the German views will differ from ours on questions which affect France is that they will be willing to pay a higher price than we to reduce the risk of France isolating itself and of its xenophobia increasing.

All these comments on Brentano's views should be taken with a large grain of salt, particularly since I am sure that the Germans will fit their views to the views which they find to exist in Washington.

On the whole, the tour went off well. I know that the Germans found the dinner at the Lieutenant-Governor's residence in Quebec City to be most pleasant. They liked the surroundings at Bois de Coulonge. One of the other places that they found extremely pleasant was the Forest and Stream Club which is right on the waterfront near Ste-Anne-de-Bellevue. It was raining when we arrived in Ottawa but for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, the morning of their departure, the weather was perfect for an official visit, bright, sunny and crisp.

Above all, Heuss and Brentano liked Government House in Ottawa. They found it most pleasant and restful.

I would not be surprised if the high point in the trip for Heuss was the reception which the German Club in Toronto gave to him. I was present at it and I could see that the audience was greatly moved and that he too was greatly moved. I think, also, he liked the simplicity of the Convocation at Laval University.

Heuss' own speeches and statements were very good. I think his best was the impromptu one which he gave at the luncheon which the Prime Minister gave for him on his last day here.

With any such visits there are bound to be some unfortunate incidents. Perhaps we had a little over our fair share on this visit. The excellent formal reception at Quebec with a Guard of Honor from the Royal 22nd was spoiled by three TCA Viscounts which made so much noise that nothing could be heard. We arrived at the Brock Hotel in Niagara on a Friday which turned out to be one of the great American holidays and the hotel was like an ant hill with tremendous confusion. The confusion was so great that it did not seem to be possible to get proper dinner service. The worst incident was of course the slim attendance of Members for the President's speech to Parliament. When I entered with the official party, I heard a gasp from someone in front and I imagine I also gasped. Apart from the Senators who were sitting in the gangway, the rest of the House seemed virtually deserted. I think less than one-sixth of the seats were occupied. If I had been a German, I might have thought that this was a calculated insult.

Fortunately, by the time the Prime Minister had finished his introduction and the President rose to speak, there were a respectable number of people in the House. About half of the Members may have been there.

The main reason for what happened was that the Members, especially the new ones, expected to be summoned to the meeting by a division bell. The division bell is not, however, rung except for formal meetings of the House. There was another reason, that is that it was Monday morning and many members do not get back to Ottawa until Monday afternoon.

I am sure that Heuss has accepted fully the explanation of the scant attendance when he entered the House with the Prime Minister. Some of the other members of the President's party may not be so willing to accept the explanation as sufficient.

They may think that the slight attendance demonstrated a lack of interest in the visit of Heuss or a lack of respect for the President of Germany.

They may be encouraged in their suspicions that there was a lack of interest by the rather inadequate newspaper coverage of Brentano's press conference. The Toronto Globe gave it about 10" of space but the Montreal Gazette gave it not more than about 1".

When I get back, you must ask me about the wine that was served for the President at most of the meals. I think this helped to persuade some of the Germans that we are not very sophisticated.

The term "not very sophisticated" was mentioned to me by Echardt about the questions which were put to Brentano at his press conference.

Etdorf, when speaking to me at the end of the President's reception about the President's impressions of the visit to Canada, said that the President had been so very pleased by the atmosphere which he said was so gemütlich.

* * * * *

As you know, I have been determined to stick to my decision not to generalize about Germany until August when I will have been in Germany for six months. Under questioning here, I have found it difficult not to make some generalizations. I have even, you will be amused to know, been developing some principles of German foreign policy. I have developed three main principles. The first two are Franco-German reconciliation and Western European Unity. The third is their firm intention to persuade the United States that Germany is their strongest and most loyal partner. I have said that these seem to be the three principles of their foreign policy and that the motto of their diplomacy is patience, modesty and humility and that in pursuing this diplomacy, they do their best to remain in the back seat.

I have also repeated here my specious generalization that on such issues as disarmament, disengagement, European security, the foreign policy of the German Government equals the foreign policy of Washington and the foreign policy of the Socialists equals the foreign policy of the British Labour Party so that on these matters, there is no point in our Embassy in Bonn reporting.

Finally, I have said that it seems to me that perhaps the principal task of the Embassy in Bonn, in addition to reporting on economic matters and trying to influence the Germans to be more liberal in their international economic policy, is to try to persuade the Germans that they are under-estimating Canada.

Perhaps we could have a talk about this when I return. It seems to me that we might be able to use my article on Canadian foreign policy as one small opening gun since the argument in this article is that Canadian influence was decisive in certain matters in the negotiations on the North Atlantic Treaty.²³ It may be that we can keep pressing the kind of argument made in my article on Canada and Canadians about the wealth and rate of economic development of Canada and I hope the kind of speech which I am to give in Hamburg may also be helpful.

I am not alone in gaining the impression from Brentano's discussion in the Under-Secretary Office that he was not really interested in Canadian views. One of my colleagues here would add that this lack of interest in Canadian views on such matters is a Western European phenomenon not just a German phenomenon.

Yours ever,

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 179-57

[Ottawa], August 15, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

CONTINUED CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE
FOR EUROPEAN MIGRATION (ICEM)

Canada has been a member of the Committee, and twenty-seven states now have membership on it since its establishment in December 1951. The functions of ICEM are to make arrangements for the transport of migrants from Europe who could not otherwise be moved, and to promote the increase of the volume of migration from Europe by providing training for migrants and migration services (including processing, reception and placement) which some member governments and other international organizations are unable to supply.

On June 15, 1955, Cabinet agreed that Canadian "membership in the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration be continued until the end of 1957" and "that the position be reviewed in ample time for Canada to give formal notice of its intention to withdraw at the end of 1957, and in the meantime, the Organization be advised that Canada planned to withdraw at that time and considered that the Organization could and should be wound up then."

Under the ICEM Constitution, four months' notice of withdrawal must be given; Canada would therefore need to notify ICEM of its intention to terminate its membership by September 1, 1957, for withdrawal to take effect at the end of 1957.

It would appear that the Cabinet decision of June 15, 1955, envisaged the early dissolution of ICEM on the assumption that the Committee had to a large extent completed its work. An important factor in the decision may have been that the scarcity of shipping facilities which had prompted Canada to join the Committee in 1951 appeared by 1955 to have been resolved, to the point where the services of the Committee were thought no longer essential to the Canadian immigration programme.

However, it has since become apparent that, whether or not Canada withdraws from ICEM, the Organization is likely to carry on its activities with the support of the U.S. Government. In the circumstances, Canadian withdrawal might affect the goodwill of other nations towards Canada, inasmuch as these nations are convinced that participation in such a committee is essential to them and a matter of international co-operation on the part of other nations.

Besides, since the decision was taken by Cabinet, certain significant developments have occurred which have led Canada to resort again to the Committee's assistance. Mainly, the Committee has acted as Canada's agent for the operation of the airbridge to Canada when transportation facilities from the United Kingdom appeared again to be insufficient to meet the requirements of the Canadian programme. Also, following the Hungarian uprising, the Committee played a major role in organizing transportation of refugees to Canada. Actually, the Committee has pretty much acted as the transportation agent for the whole Hungarian lift, in close co-operation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Apart from the payments it makes to the Committee for services rendered to Canada, the Canadian Government shares in the administrative overhead costs of the Organization. The administrative assessment for 1957 is approximately $200,000.

It should not be anticipated that ICEM can continue to give Canada assistance of the order of magnitude which it has been able to provide the past eighteen months. That assistance arose out of special circumstances which are not experienced in dealing with the normal pattern of migration. Nevertheless it would be necessary to evaluate these events to see whether they introduce new factors which might be of sufficient importance to Canada to justify continued participation. Participation may also be justified for the political reason which has been mentioned earlier in this Memorandum. It would be prudent to allow more time to evaluate properly these considerations. As a consequence it would seem desirable to take an interim decision to continue participation till the end of 1958 and in the meantime to re-examine thoroughly the whole matter of Canada's interest in ICEM.

The Undersigned Recommend²⁴ therefore

THAT, Canada continue its membership in ICEM for another year. Further consideration will be given to all aspects of the matter in 1958 so that a final recommendation can be made in the early summer of 1958 about retaining or withdrawing from membership at the end of 1958.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE FOR EUROPEAN MIGRATION

11. The Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration stated that it would be necessary to settle the policy to be adopted on Canadian participation in the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration. The constitution of the Committee, which had been drafted in 1943, had been ratified by the Canadian I.C.E.M. as a booking agent for migrants coming forward from Germany under Canada's Assisted Passage Loan Scheme, and in 1957 I.C.E.M. moved, or participated in the movement of, more than 25,000 Hungarian refugees to Canada in addition to operating the air bridge to Canada for migrants from the United Kingdom. The purposes and functions of the committee were to make arrangements for the transport of migrants, for whom existing facilities were inadequate, and who could not otherwise be moved, from European countries having surplus population to countries overseas which offered opportunities for orderly immigration. The committee also promoted the increase of the volume of migration from Europe by providing, at the request of and in agreement with the governments concerned, services in the processing, reception, first placement, and settlement of migrants which other international organizations were not in a position to supply. These latter services, of course, were considered by Canada as essentially national in character and would be provided by the countries concerned. Canada's main interest in I.C.E.M. activities, therefore, had been related principally to the committee's ability to provide transport.

Since 1953, some doubt had been expressed as to whether Canada actually required membership in I.C.E.M. in order to maintain immigration programmes. A certain amount of friction was bound to arise in Australian-Canadian relationships, because of Australia's contention that I.C.E.M. should underwrite the cost of emigration from Europe to Australia. There had also been some feeling that the organization was inclined to expand its activities beyond the original intent, particularly in the field of migration services. Because of the foregoing considerations, the previous government had decided that Canada's membership in I.C.E.M. could not be continued beyond 1957, and the organizations had been advised informally of Canada's intention to withdraw. In August 1957, however, it was decided that membership should be continued for 1958 and that, in the meantime, a complete review should be made of Canada's position in relation to I.C.E.M. Since the inauguration of I.C.E.M., Canada's membership had only been on a year to year basis. There was little doubt that the transient nature of our membership had resulted in a tendency to adopt a somewhat negative attitude towards the committee and its activities.

The Minister said a complete review had now been made of Canada's interests in the migration field in relation to I.C.E.M. and he, with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, considered that it would be in Canada's interest to remain a member of the committee on a continuing rather than a year to year basis, and to adopt a more positive attitude towards the activities of the organization.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated. (Joint Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs and Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Jan. 15, 1958; Cab. Doc. 35-58†)

12. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning Canadian participation in the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration and approved the joint recommendation of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs,

(a) that, subject to an annual review, Canada's membership in the I.C.E.M. be continued on an indefinite rather than a year to year basis and that this decision be made known to the I.C.E.M. administration and member governments of the organization;

(b) that Canada utilize such I.C.E.M. services as were available and useful to Canada's immigration programmes;

(c) that Canadian delegates to the I.C.E.M. exhibit a positive approach towards the organization, and endeavour to assist in the achievement of I.C.E.M. objectives within the framework of the committee's constitution;

(d) that Canada endeavour to influence the termination of I.C.E.M. activities in the direct provision of migration services within a reasonable period, with the progressive transfer of I.C.E.M.'s responsibilities in this field to member governments as soon as possible; and

(e) that Canada participate fully in the deliberations of the I.C.E.M. with a view to establishing equitable methods of financing and a sound basis of operations.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE FOR EUROPEAN MIGRATION; CONTRIBUTION TO 1958 FAR EASTERN PROGRAMME; MOVEMENT OF EUROPEAN REFUGEES OUT OF CHINA

5. Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that a contribution of $60,000 be made to the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration for moving European refugees out of China. Since 1952, I.C.E.M. had moved approximately 10,000 refugees, mostly White Russians from the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, or their children, to overseas destinations. Since August 1957, the flow of refugees has been restricted for lack of funds to meet transportation costs. There were an estimated 10,000 European refugees still in China, of which 6,000 already had visa assurances to countries of permanent settlement. There were some 850 in Hong Kong with visas for other countries.

I.C.E.M. plans for the first six months of 1958, providing for a movement of 1,300, would exhaust available funds. For the second half, a move of a further 2,300 was planned if additional contributions of $1.2 million could be obtained. The United States had pledged up to $450,000 on a 45 per cent matching basis so that a Canadian contribution of $60,000 would make a further $49,000 available from U.S. funds.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, July 22 — Cab. Doc. 224-58†).

6. Mr. Smith pointed out that the Minister of Finance concurred in this recommendation.

7. The Cabinet agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to announce the intention of the Canadian government to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $60,000 to the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, and that these figures be included in the final supplementary estimates for 1958-59.

EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

I. URANIUM SUPPLY AND MARKETS

Under existing contracts it is estimated that Canada will produce 81,303 tons of uranium in the period from July 1, 1955 to March 31, 1963. This production will have a gross value of approximately $1,662,000,000. It is expected that production by mid-1958 will be at the annual rate of 15,700 tons with a gross value of some $325,000,000. Under existing arrangements this production will be sold, apart from Canada's small domestic requirements, to the United States and the United Kingdom under contracts extending in some cases to 1962 and in others to 1963. Of the total production scheduled some 85% is for the United States and 13% for the United Kingdom.

At least the great bulk of the United States requirement is for the atomic weapons programme, and it must be recognized that this requirement may not continue at the present level after the completion of existing contracts. Military requirements might decrease as a result of an international agreement to limit or cease the production of atomic weapons, or merely because the quantities of fissionable material stockpiled by 1962 might appear sufficient to meet any expected need. Preliminary estimates indicate that uranium production in western countries will be more than sufficient to meet the requirements for uranium for civil purposes during the mid-1960's, and that civil use of atomic energy will not reach a level sufficient to take up the available supply until a date in the neighbourhood of 1970. Accordingly there may be keen competition for markets among uranium producing countries and difficulty in disposing of our full uranium output in the years following 1962.

At present there is no problem, as the existing contracts cover our entire output and in addition a number of other friendly countries are seeking uranium from Canada for peaceful use. The present requirements of these countries are small, as their programmes are just beginning, but at least some of them (such as Germany and Japan) will want significant quantities by the mid-1960's. In order to protect our access to those markets in a period when we may be very glad to have them, it appears desirable to do what we can to meet their present needs. In addition, of course, this is desirable on general political grounds.

The United States has agreed to permit the diversion of up to 200 tons per year from deliveries scheduled under the present contracts to meet requirements of other countries. On the basis of present information, moreover, it is probable that certain of the mines under contract will be able to produce at rates higher than those specified in their contracts. The United States Atomic Energy Commission and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority have indicated no interest in accepting deliveries at an accelerated rate. Accordingly any production in excess of the amounts scheduled would be available for sale to other countries and would produce an increase in the figure of 200 tons per year now available for such sales. It is anticipated that this excess would begin to be available in the period after July 1, 1959.

It was with these considerations in mind that the Government announced in the House on February 18, 1957,¹ that it was prepared to negotiate bilateral agreements with friendly governments covering cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy and, in particular, the supply of natural uranium for such uses. While the amounts of uranium which could be made available under such agreements at present were not large because of existing contractual commitments, the view was expressed that these quantities would be sufficient to meet the current requirements of those governments which had indicated an interest in obtaining uranium from Canada.

It has become a matter of some urgency to determine the detailed position to be taken in negotiation of such bilateral agreements, as there are six governments now awaiting our proposals in order to enter into negotiations. These six are Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland; at one time France also was interested, but this interest has fallen off partly because of improvement in the prospects for French domestic production of uranium and partly for a reason to be mentioned below.

II. THE PROBLEMS OF CONTROLS

It has for some years been an objective which Canada has shared with the United Kingdom and the United States that the production of atomic weapons by "fourth powers" (i.e. countries other than the U.K., the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. which are already producing them) should be discouraged.² It has been considered that such "fourth power" production would involve grave risks to peace and security, in particular by increasing the possibility of irresponsible use of atomic weapons. The problem of "fourth power" production is complicated, having implications for our policies on disarmament and on NATO's defence programme, but for purposes of this paper it is sufficient to recognize a particular consequence of this general policy, upon which the three governments have been similarly in agreement, namely that uranium and other items essential to an atomic programme should be supplied to other countries only for civil use, and under conditions ensuring that they will not be used to assist the production of atomic weapons.

At least in the case of some prospective recipient countries such conditions would require the application of actual physical controls against diversion to military use; assurances alone might be sufficient in the case of some countries, but not of all. It can be demonstrated that adequate controls against diversion of any uranium supplied by Canada would in practice be sufficient for the foreseeable future to guard against the possibility that a country might employ Canadian uranium for peaceful purposes while using uranium available from domestic or other foreign sources for a military programme. It is assumed that, in accord with the general policy referred to above, Canada would be unwilling to provide uranium to a country conducting an atomic weapons programme even if that programme were not directly dependent on the Canadian supply. Fortunately, therefore, this situation can be prevented without resorting to the politically difficult course of imposing conditions upon the use which a recipient country might make of uranium from a source other than Canada, merely by requiring adequate controls against diversion of uranium of Canadian origin.

These various points lead to the conclusion that uranium should be supplied from Canada to countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom only under inter-governmental agreements containing provision for adequate controls (which might be applied either by Canada or by a suitable international authority; the International Atomic Energy Agency is the most obvious but not the only possible agent) to ensure that none of the uranium supplied is diverted to any military use. It was in accordance with these considerations that the announcement of February 18, 1957, specified that our bilateral agreements would contain control provisions similar to those in the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some countries have indicated a wish to negotiate with us on this basis, others have indicated a greater or lesser reluctance to agree to controls. France, in particular, which is seeking to produce atomic weapons, is unwilling to accept such controls; this is the second reason (referred to above) for the decline in France's interest in obtaining uranium from Canada.

There is attached as Appendix A a draft bilateral agreement designed to serve as a basis of negotiation with interested governments. This agreement provides a permissive umbrella, under which various forms of cooperation on a mutual basis may be arranged and which in particular envisages the conclusion of contracts for the supply of uranium and other materials and equipment from one party to the other on a commercial basis. The control provisions, modelled on those in the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, include inspection and other appropriate forms of control at all relevant stages. In negotiation we should adhere firmly to these provisions so that the necessary legal powers may be fully established in our bilateral agreements; the rigour with which these powers will be exercised in particular cases could be determined on a practical basis in the light of the individual circumstances. There is not yet sufficient experience to determine, for example, the circumstances in which resident inspectors would be required and when periodic visits by inspectors might be sufficient, but such questions are being examined both by our own officials concerned and by those who are planning the safeguards system to be operated by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The draft agreement spells out all the powers which it might be necessary in extreme cases to invoke, but specifies that they may be exercised only to ensure that the items subject to control are not diverted to military use.

It should be recognized that our requirement for controls will remain tenable only if other major uranium producing countries follow a similar policy, and if through their failure to do so we appear likely to lose markets for uranium to them it might in the future become expedient to relax our conditions. For the present, however, virtually no free supplies are available from other sources and it would seem very much in our interest, as the world's largest supplier, to get the highest practicable standards of behaviour established from the outset among user countries. To this end we should take a firm line ourselves, and seek to enlist the support of other potential suppliers, particularly Australia, South Africa and Belgium; none of these has yet made known its policy on this question, but there is reason to hope that all might follow a vigorous lead by Canada to require adequate controls on exports of natural uranium.

III. CONCLUSIONS

In summary, therefore, we must recognize that while there are satisfactory markets for our uranium at present there may be difficulty in disposing of our full output in the mid-1960's. A number of countries, however, now want from us small quantities of uranium which we could supply and the provision of which would help us to sell larger quantities in that later period. For these reasons, and for political reasons also, it is in our interest to meet these requests.

Because we oppose the production of atomic weapons by "fourth powers," however, we would wish to ensure that uranium which we supply will not be diverted from peaceful uses. To achieve this purpose we should be prepared to supply uranium for peaceful use (i.e. to countries other than the U.K. and the U.S., whose atomic weapons programmes we support) only under intergovernmental agreements similar to the attached draft and in particular containing provisions for adequate controls. We know that the United States and the United Kingdom will support us in this policy, and from its behaviour in discussions relating to disarmament and to the International Atomic Energy Agency there is reason to hope that the U.S.S.R., at least tacitly, may follow a similar line.

With the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I recommend that:

(a) The export of uranium from Canada for civil use (elsewhere than in the U.K. and the U.S.) be arranged under intergovernmental agreements providing for adequate controls against military use of the uranium so supplied;

(b) We now make available to interested governments (and at this time these include the governments of Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland) the draft bilateral agreement attached;

(c) Officials negotiate with representatives of those governments on the basis of the attached draft with a view to the conclusion of bilateral agreements conforming as closely as possible to that pattern;

(d) We be prepared to consider approving such agreements individually as they are negotiated.

(e) We seek the early establishment by the International Atomic Energy Agency of the control machinery envisaged in its Statute, in order to provide an alternative to the application of controls by Canada.

PREAMBLE

The Government of Canada and the Government of _____,

Conscious of the many benefits, including the increase of energy supplies, the raising of agricultural and industrial production, the wider availability of knowledge and means to combat disease, and the assistance of research directed to wholesome and fruitful purposes, which the application of atomic energy to peaceful uses may be expected to provide,

Desiring to accelerate and enlarge the contribution which the development of atomic energy can make to the welfare and prosperity of their peoples,

Recognizing the advantages to them both of effective cooperation in the promotion and development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy,

Intending, therefore, to cooperate with one another to these ends,

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

SCOPE OF THE AGREEMENT

1. The cooperation intended by this Agreement may include

(a) the supply of information relating to peaceful uses of atomic energy and, in particular, to

- (i) research and development,
- (ii) problems of health and safety,
- (iii) equipment and facilities (including the supply of designs, drawings and specifications), and
- (iv) uses of equipment, facilities, materials, source material, special nuclear material and fuel;

(b) the supply of equipment, facilities, materials, source material, special nuclear material and fuel;

- (c) transfer of patent rights;
 - (d) access to and use of equipment and facilities.
2. The cooperation provided for in this Article shall be effected on terms and conditions to be agreed.

ARTICLE II

PARTICIPANTS

1. Governmental enterprises of either Contracting Party may
- (a) deal directly with or perform services for the other Contracting Party, governmental enterprises of the other Contracting Party or authorized persons under the jurisdiction of the other Contracting Party in matters within the scope of this Agreement;
 - (b) acquire from the said Contracting Party information, equipment, facilities and materials obtained pursuant to this Agreement, and identified material.
2. Persons under the jurisdiction of either Contracting Party may,
- (a) with the general or specific authorization of their Government, deal directly with or perform services for persons under the jurisdiction of the other Contracting Party as authorized by the latter, or the other Contracting Party or governmental enterprises of the latter, in matters within the scope of this Agreement;
 - (b) unless otherwise specified by the other Contracting Party at or before the time of transmission, acquire from their Government information, equipment, facilities and materials obtained pursuant to this Agreement, and identified material.
3. Either Contracting Party may transfer to international organizations, or to third Governments, or to enterprises or individuals under the jurisdiction of third Governments,
- (a) information, equipment (other than nuclear reactors), facilities and materials obtained pursuant to this Agreement, unless otherwise specified by the other Contracting Party;
 - (b) identified material after irradiation, for chemical processing or storage, subject however to the terms of a written authorization of the supplying Contracting Party.
4. Each Contracting Party shall be responsible towards the other for ensuring that the provisions of this Agreement are accepted and complied with by all of its governmental enterprises, and by all persons under its jurisdiction, to which authorization has been granted by or pursuant to this Agreement.

ARTICLE III

CONDITIONS OF SUPPLY

Any supply pursuant to this Agreement shall be subject to the provisions of this Agreement and, in particular, to the following conditions:

- (a) Information, equipment, facilities and materials obtained pursuant to this Agreement, and identified material, shall not be transferred unless such transfer is authorized by or pursuant to the provisions of Article II of this Agreement;
- (b) Source material, special nuclear material and fuel shall not be supplied in quantities exceeding those actually needed for research and development purposes or for the efficient and continuous operation of specified nuclear reactors;
- (c) source material, special nuclear material or fuel shall be supplied subject to the granting of an option to the supplying Contracting Party to acquire any quantity of special nuclear material derived from the use of identified material as may be in excess of the quantities needed by the recipient Contracting Party for its own use and by persons under its jurisdiction for their own use;

(d) source material, special nuclear material and fuel obtained pursuant to this Agreement shall not be processed or altered in form or content after irradiation except as authorized in writing by the supplying Contracting Party, and processing and alteration so authorized shall be effected in facilities approved by the supplying Contracting Party;

(e) identified material shall be secured with precautions acceptable to the supplying Contracting Party.

ARTICLE IV

SAFEGUARDS

1. Each supplying Contracting Party shall be permitted to assure itself that the provisions of this Agreement are complied with and, in particular, that identified material is being used for peaceful purposes only, and to that end the supplying Contracting Party shall have the right

(a) to examine the design of equipment (including nuclear reactors) or facilities in which identified material is to be used or stored, with a view to ensuring that such identified material will not further any military purpose and that effective application of the safeguards provided for in this Agreement shall be feasible;

(b) to require the maintenance and production of adequate records to assist in ensuring accountability for identified material;

(c) to call for and receive progress reports;

(d) to approve the means to be used for the chemical processing of identified material after irradiation, with a view to ensuring that such processing will not lend itself to diversion of identified material to military use;

(e) to send representatives, designated by it after consultation with the other Contracting Party, into the territory of the latter, which representatives shall have access at all times to all places, equipment and facilities where identified material is used, stored or located, to all data relating to such identified material, and to all persons who by reason of their occupation deal with such identified material or such data, as may be necessary to account for all identified material and to determine whether such identified material is being used for peaceful purposes only. Such representatives, provided they shall not thereby be delayed or otherwise impeded in the exercise of their functions, shall be accompanied by representatives of the other Contracting Party if the latter so requests.

2. At or after the time the International Atomic Energy Agency is in a position to carry out the safeguards functions provided for in its Statute, the Contracting Parties will consult together to determine whether and to what extent they may wish to modify the safeguards provisions set out in this Agreement so that they may conform more closely with those of the said Statute, and to have the application of safeguards carried out by the said Agency.

3. Each Contracting Party, if it has determined that identified material is furthering a military purpose, shall have the right to suspend or cancel scheduled delivery of source material, special nuclear material, and fuel, and to require the return of all identified material under the control of the other Contracting Party.

ARTICLE V

EXCEPTIONS

1. There shall be excluded from the scope of this Agreement:

(a) the supply of information, equipment, facilities or materials, and access to equipment or facilities considered by a Contracting Party as primarily of military significance, and the employment for any military purpose of information, equipment, facilities or materials obtained pursuant to this Agreement or identified material;

(b) the supply of information and the transfer of proprietary patent rights received from another government under terms preventing such supply or transfer;

(c) the supply of information developed or owned by, and the transfer of proprietary or patent rights owned by, persons under the jurisdiction of the supplying Contracting Party unless with the consent of and under terms to be specified by such persons;

(d) the supply of information regarded by a supplying Contracting Party as being of commercial value unless under terms specified by the said Contracting Party.

2. This Agreement shall have effect subject to the laws, regulations and licensing requirements of each Contracting Party.

3. Unless otherwise specified at the time of transmission nothing in this Agreement shall be interpreted as imposing any responsibility with regard to the accuracy of any information supplied pursuant to this Agreement, or with regard to the suitability for any particular use or to the accuracy of specifications of equipment, facilities, materials, source material, special nuclear material or fuel supplied pursuant to this Agreement.

ARTICLE VI

DEFINITIONS

For the purpose of this Agreement, except as otherwise specified therein,

(a) "Equipment" means any apparatus, device, or machine of particular utility in research, development, use, processing, or storage relating to atomic energy activities;

(b) "Facilities" means all plants, buildings or structures containing or incorporating equipment as defined in Paragraph (a) of this Paragraph, or otherwise particularly suited or used for atomic energy activities;

(c) "Materials" means all radioactive substances, all other substances of special applicability to or importance in atomic energy activities (such as heavy water and zirconium), and such other substances as may be agreed between the Contracting Parties; but materials shall not include identified material as defined in Paragraph (g) of this Article;

(d) "Source material" means uranium containing the mixture of isotopes occurring in nature; uranium depleted in the isotope 235; thorium; any of the foregoing in the form of metal, alloy, chemical compound, or concentrate; any other material containing one or more of the foregoing in such concentration as may be agreed between the Contracting Parties; and such other material as may be agreed between the Contracting Parties;

(e) "Special nuclear material" means plutonium; uranium-233; uranium-235; uranium enriched in the isotopes 233 or 235; any material containing one or more of the foregoing; and such other material as may be agreed between the Contracting Parties; but the term "special nuclear material" shall not include source material;

(f) "Fuel" means source material or special nuclear material or both when intended or suitable in form and quantity for introduction into a nuclear reactor to assist in producing or maintaining a nuclear chain reaction;

(g) "Identified material" means source material, special nuclear material or fuel obtained pursuant to this Agreement, or special nuclear material derived from the use of source material, special nuclear material or fuel obtained pursuant to this Agreement or produced in a nuclear reactor obtained pursuant to this Agreement;

(h) "Governmental enterprises" means Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited as for the Government of Canada, _____ as for the Government of _____, and such other enterprises as may be agreed between the Contracting Parties.

(i) "Persons" means individuals, firms, corporations, companies, partnerships, associations and other entities private or governmental, and their respective agents and local representatives; but the term "persons" shall not include governmental enterprises as defined in paragraph (h) of this Article.

ARTICLE VII

COMMENCEMENT AND TERMINATION

1. The present Agreement shall be ratified and the exchange of the instruments of ratification shall be held at _____ as soon as possible.
2. The present Agreement shall come into force upon the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.
3. It shall remain in force for a minimum period of [ten] years, and thereafter until [six] months after notice of termination has been given by either Contracting Party to the other, unless such notice has been given [six] months prior to the expiry of the said period of [ten] years.

In witness whereof the undersigned, duly authorized for this purpose by their respective governments, have signed the present Agreement and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done at _____ this _____ day of _____ in the English [and _____] language[s], both texts being equally authentic].

URANIUM; EXPORT FROM CANADA

21. The Prime Minister submitted a draft bilateral agreement to provide for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and said the agreement was designed in particular to provide for the export of uranium from Canada for peaceful uses under adequate controls against the diversion of fissile material produced from it into military use.

He explained that, between July 1st, 1955 and March 31st, 1963, Canada had contracted to produce some 81,300 tons of uranium with a gross value of approximately $1,662 million. Of this total production, 85 per cent would go under agreements to the United States, largely for atomic weapons, and 13 per cent to the United Kingdom. However, military requirements might decrease after 1962 and the demand for uranium for civil purposes would not equal the output until about 1970.

Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland now required small amounts of uranium which could be provided out of a diversion from the U.S. contracts, agreed to by the U.S. government, of 200 tons, and out of any excess Canadian production. It was important to enter these markets immediately in order to protect Canada's future interests. It was for this reason that the previous government had announced Canada's intention in principle to enter into bilateral agreements with interested countries.

The draft bilateral agreement gave full force to Canada's objective, shared with the U.K. and the U.S., that uranium and other items essential to an atomic programme should be supplied to "fourth powers" (i.e. countries other than the U.K., the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R.) only for civil use and under conditions preventing their use for atomic weapons.

Thus the draft agreement, under which Canadian uranium and other materials and equipment would be supplied, made firm provision for inspection and other controls to be applied either by Canadian representatives or by a suitable international authority, within the borders of the other contracting party. In practise, the powers thus provided could be applied with more or less vigour as circumstances required.

Should other uranium-producing countries fail to follow a similar policy, with the result that Canada might lose markets to them, it might become necessary to relax the controls set forth in the draft agreement. For the present, however, Canada should attempt to ensure the highest practicable standards of behaviour among user countries. For this purpose it would be necessary to enlist the support of Australia, South Africa, and Belgium, the other potential suppliers.

These proposals had been concurred in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Aug. 15, 1957, Cab. Doc. 177-57).

22. Mr. Diefenbaker emphasized that, at the recent conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, considerable thought had been given to the problem of reconciling the need for the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes with the danger that fissile material could be diverted to atomic weapons. It had been estimated that some twenty countries would have atomic programmes within ten years; and, therefore, as an important supplier of uranium it was essential for Canada to attempt to impose upon customers a complete and thorough control system requiring the production of records, progress reports, and the admission of inspectors. He was satisfied that such a system would provide all assurance possible against diversion to weapons of material supplied by Canada.

The problem needed to be considered in the light of present disarmament proposals which the western powers were planning to put forward in the U.N. Sub-Committee on Disarmament.

23. During the course of discussion the following points arose:

(a) An experiment in the U.K. had shown that detailed inspection could prevent any serious diversion of fissile material. The controls, however, were more difficult to maintain adequately in larger plants.

(b) There was little likelihood that any international organization in the immediate future would be able to impose adequate controls on all uses of atomic energy. Such general control as might be possible would most likely result from the provisions of a disarmament agreement; there was, however, no present cause for optimism in this respect.

(c) In bilateral agreements on exchange of information and materials, the United States required controls similar to those envisaged by Canada. It was expected that the United Kingdom would follow a similar policy.

(d) Canada's assumption of moral leadership in exercising control of uranium exported to other countries would be more effective if Canada herself did not intend to manufacture atomic weapons. In this respect it could be said that Canada did not intend to make such weapons for the time being, but might at some time find it necessary to obtain small atomic weapons for defence. There was the possibility that Canada might acquire small "tactical" weapons as a part of her N.A.T.O. commitments.

(e) There could be no assurance that the Soviet Union might not supply atomic materials to fourth powers without the imposition of controls. There was, however, some evidence that the Soviet Union did not wish to see atomic weapons in the possession of fourth powers.

(f) It was most important that Canada should make every effort to gain support for the proposed policy from other uranium suppliers, such as South Africa, Australia, and Belgium; in this way it would be possible to preserve both Canada's economic interests and her responsibilities towards the preservation of peace.

(g) In view of widespread public concern over the testing of atomic weapons, it was important that the government should avoid provoking any ill-informed criticism that it was contributing, through the sale of uranium, to the uncontrolled development of atomic weapons. For this reason, any publicity should be delayed, and should eventually be related to Canada's policy on disarmament.

24. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Prime Minister that,

(a) the export of uranium from Canada for civil use (other than in the U.K. and the U.S.) be arranged under intergovernmental agreements providing for adequate controls against military use of the uranium so supplied or the fissile products derived from it;

(b) Canada now make available to interested governments at this time, (including the governments of Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden, and Switzerland) a draft bilateral agreement substantially in the form proposed;

(c) officials negotiate with representatives of those governments on the basis of the draft agreement with a view to the conclusion of bilateral agreements conforming as closely as possible to that pattern;

(d) the government consider approving such agreements individually as they were negotiated;

(e) Canada seek the early establishment by the International Atomic Energy Agency of the control machinery envisaged in its statute, in order to provide an alternative to the application of controls by Canada; and decided that the draft bilateral agreement should not be made public at present, and when publicity became necessary, care should be taken to ensure that the public fully appreciated the safeguards which had been included.

[Ottawa], August 30, 1957

EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

I attach for your information a copy of the memorandum on the export of uranium from Canada which was considered by Cabinet on August 22. Cabinet approved the recommendations on the condition that no public announcement be made at present. In accordance with this decision we have this week given the draft bilateral in confidence to the representatives in Ottawa of the U.K., the U.S.A., Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland.

We have not yet given the text to Australia and South Africa, because the State Department last week called in the U.K. and Canadian Embassies in Washington to say that the U.S.A. proposed to approach these two governments on the subject of controls for exports of natural uranium. This action was considered desirable because several prospective purchasers had approached these governments, and they in turn had approached the Combined Development Agency (the Canada-USA-UK joint purchasing agency) to seek approval for small diversions from existing contracts. This approval the U.S.A. would not wish to give without assurance from South Africa and Australia that controls would be imposed on such exports. I attach the two relevant telegrams† from Washington, the reply which we sent yesterday, and two telegrams which Earnscliffe subsequently gave us containing U.K. views on the question. You will notice that our reply accepts the U.S.A. position in substance but puts forward the thought that an approach to Australia and South Africa by Canada as a fellow exporter might receive more favourable consideration.

A further thought, which we tried out informally on Earnscliffe, is that the U.K.'s unwillingness to request controls on its exports (especially of reactors) to "Old Commonwealth" countries is likely to make the collective policy of requiring controls more difficult to enforce in other cases. While we can well understand the reasons why the U.K. is unwilling to suggest to "Old Commonwealth" countries that they accept controls on atomic imports from the U.K., there would nevertheless be advantage for all in applying the control policy to outsiders if we were to make a point of applying controls on peaceful transactions among ourselves.³ If the initial approach to South Africa and Australia were favourably received, therefore, Canada might consider proposing such a self denying ordinance within the group of five. The controls would no doubt be more a matter of form than substance, and of course would not apply to exports known to be intended for military use (i.e., uranium shipments to the U.K. and the U.S.A.). Earnscliffe have undertaken to let us know London's reaction to this thought as soon as it is received.

CONTROLS FOR BILATERAL EXPORTS OF URANIUM

In discussion with Earnscliffe some days ago of the USA proposals reported in your telegrams nos. 1805 and 1806 of August 21,† we raised informally a point which we have not so far submitted to you. This is because we have not yet considered it here in any detail and have not decided whether it is one which we would wish to follow up; it was put to Earnscliffe on a personal basis only, Earnscliffe apparently reported it to London, however,

³Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I don't understand this: what is there to be controlled in Australia, South Africa, & Canada if those countries continue to sell the bulk of their uranium for military purposes to U.K. & U.S.? J. L[éger] in terms which led the CRO to regard it as a formal Canadian proposal. The CRO has reacted unfavourably, has asked us not to propose our idea to the USA, Australia or South Africa, and has warned that if we do it may not be possible for them to follow suit.

2. In essence the tripartite policy has been that exports of uranium or other items essential to an atomic programme should be exported, for peaceful uses, only under safeguards. We have told several governments (e.g. India and France) that we are not prepared to make exceptions to this policy because once we agreed to an exception for any one government it would become difficult or impossible to refuse similar concessions to others. When they ask how we reconcile this position with our willingness to export uranium without controls to the United Kingdom and the United States, we have replied that those two countries are conducting atomic weapons programmes, within the NATO framework and with our support; we export uranium to those countries knowing that it may be used for the production of atomic weapons, and in such circumstances controls would be pointless. In these cases we are willing to export uranium without controls but only because we know it may be used for military purposes and are prepared to allow such use. It is in this sense that we have interpreted the agreed tripartite policy of requiring controls on atomic exports intended for peaceful use.

3. In recent months, however, we have been given indications that the UK approach has been somewhat more empirical. Specifically, the UK is supplying a reactor to Australia, and is apparently prepared to do the same for South Africa and New Zealand, without raising any question of controls.

4. It was our informal suggestion to Earnscliffe that when such exceptions to the general rule became known to other governments, as they are bound to do, it will increase the difficulty (already considerable) in inducing such governments to agree to controls on deliveries to them. While we could well understand that the UK would for obvious political reasons be reluctant to press Australia, New Zealand or South Africa to accept controls on deliveries from the UK, there would after all be some advantage to South Africa and Australia as well as to us in avoiding a situation which would contribute to the difficulty of following the policy which we hope to induce them to adopt. In these circumstances, it might be useful after there has been agreement reached on requiring controls for peaceful atomic exports to other countries to discuss on a five-power basis (i.e., U.K., U.S.A., Canada, Australia and South Africa) the pros and cons of applying among ourselves the policy which we expect to apply towards others. Agreement to apply such a self-denying ordinance would not, of course, affect uranium deliveries from the three exporters to the UK or the USA for reasons given in my paragraph 2. It would, on the other hand, call for the application of at least nominal controls upon atomic items supplied to the three (Canada, Australia and South Africa) which have only peaceful programmes.

5. We have now been given (possibly inadvertently) the text of the CRO telegram to Earnscliffe setting out London's objections to this approach. We are repeating the text to you,† but would not wish you to reveal even to UK representatives that you have it. In the light of the UK objections, and in any case because we have not ourselves decided as yet that the idea is worth pursuing, you should of course not mention the matter to USA, Australian or South African representatives, nor take any initiative to discuss it with UK representatives.

6. The terms of the UK objections, however, have a bearing on your presentation of our own position concerning sales of uranium to outside countries. We should not make absolute commitments in a tripartite discussion for which the UK brief concludes with the following passage:

7. "But we should maintain that the question of applying safeguards as between Commonwealth countries is one on which we would wish to preserve complete freedom of movement and are not prepared at this stage to take a hard and fast line. None of this means that we do not understand and sympathize with the Canadians' difficulties with India, in fact we fully agree with the line they are taking with the Indians. But we do not think that this alone should lead us into changing our policy towards the more reliable members of the Commonwealth, nor do we think that it would make any significant difference to the Indian problem were we to do so."

8. In explaining in the tripartite meeting our present policy as recently approved by ministers, therefore, you should take care to preserve our freedom of manoeuvre for the future. This might be done by referring to the fact that such a policy is tenable, of course, only so long as it is paralleled by other principal supplying governments, and that while we shall pursue this line vigorously as long as it appears practical we shall keep developments elsewhere under review in order to determine whether at any time some modification might become necessary.

CONTROLS FOR BILATERAL EXPORTS OF URANIUM ETC.

On September 10 representatives of the State Department, the AEC and the British and Canadian Embassies, met informally to discuss how and in what terms the approach to the South Africans and the Australians should be made. It was agreed that in order to take advantage of a gap in Van Rhijn's timetable yesterday morning the first approach should be made to the South Africans and that the Australians should be approached later in the week. Both approaches would be made along similar lines. (In point of fact, the approach to the Australians will be made today.)

2. Accordingly, we met yesterday with Van Rhijn at the Atomic Energy Commission. The principal spokesmen for the USA were Farley and John Hall. Wiggin represented the British Embassy. Van Rhijn was accompanied by Osborne and Stewart, the new counselor of the South African Embassy. Ritchie represented the Canadian Embassy.

3. Hall introduced the subject in general terms to which Van Rhijn replied that as a producer, South Africa had to adapt its policies to the wishes of its customers, and the growing uranium industry in South Africa and, for this reason, had tended to look upon each request sympathetically. Even so, practically all South Africa's production was taken up by the C[ombined] D[evelopment] A[gency], leaving very little for outside sales. He nevertheless welcomed the opportunity to hear the views of the USA, UK and Canada on the need for safeguards and on the methods by which bilateral sales could be controlled.

4. Farley said that the three countries were becoming increasingly concerned with the need to work out an effective and practicable arrangement to assure that quantities marketed would be used for peaceful purposes only and that potential purchasers would not be able to play one producer off against another on the controls aspect. Inevitably, this meant an agreed understanding on safeguards. If policies on control requirements were followed by each supplier, matters could speedily get out of hand. There was an opportunity for the question to be looked at now but in four or five years time the situation might make it almost impossible to do so. The USA had always included in its bilateral arrangements clauses dealing with safeguards governing any sale of natural uranium and the same is true for enriched uranium. It was their view that if it should prove feasible to work out a common policy on sales a useful step forward will have been taken. At this point, Farley mentioned to the Minister that the three countries would be speaking to the Australians later this week in similar terms. The three countries were considering the possibility of setting up a five-country working group in Washington which would look in somewhat greater detail into the question of what type of controls would be required. For this reason he asked the Minister if he would consider the problem "as among friends" and enable South African representatives to take part in the projected working group discussions.

5. In reply to a question from Osborne, Hall said that outside Combined Development Agency he envisaged safeguards on all essential reactor materials would be included, not merely natural uranium, but also heavy water, enriched uranium, plutonium and reactor components. Hall thought some progress could be made on a bilateral basis but any action taken now by the five countries primarily concerned could not but fail to strengthen the agency. Any arrangements agreed to conceivably would be on only an interim basis if the parties so wished. It was difficult to tell at this stage what the future might require as the field was full of unknowns.

6. In answer to a further question, Farley said that the controls envisaged were generally those contained in Article 12 of the Statute and in bilateral agreements negotiated by the USA. He also made it clear that any producing country would not have to ask the permission of the other four to undertake a sale.

7. At this point, Ritchie outlined the Canadian views in general terms. Along with the USA and the UK we held the view that it was in our common interest to see that sales of source material were subject to safeguards. This objective could only be pursued effectively if all main producers were pressing purchasers to accept similar controls. He gave the Minister a copy of the draft Canadian bilateral agreement pointing out that he would, of course, have an opportunity to discuss this in greater detail while in Ottawa. Wiggin then outlined the UK views skirting, however, the question of preferential treatment for members of the Commonwealth.

8. When Van Rhijn asked whether the USA authorities considered that there was any danger of countries other than France and Germany (and of course Soviet Bloc countries) manufacturing atomic weapons, Hall replied in the affirmative, adding, however, that this was not an immediate possibility. He mentioned the obvious danger of countries in sensitive areas such as the Mideast coming into possession of nuclear weapons by one means or another, or developing their own, as might be done by the Argentine. Hall admitted that purchasers might object to safeguards and particularly inspection as an infringement on their national sovereignty. He thought it would be easier to deal with the problem if all producers are known to require safeguards and if the purchasers develop closer contacts with, and more confidence in, the technical personnel of supplying countries. This was already the experience of the USA with Japan and The Netherlands. He looked forward to the day when the irritations connected with inspection would be removed as inspection came to be regarded more as "technical consultation."

9. Van Rhijn said that he had been turning over in his mind the idea that some of the technical and psychological difficulties connected with inspection could be overcome to a large extent by limiting quantities which can be purchased. (We pointed out that besides the other safeguards, the draft Canadian agreement provided for a check on quantities.) In any event, he agreed that "something must be done" as the problem was real and present. While he could not, of course, bind his government, he could personally see no reason why South Africa should "stay outside." He expressed the hope that any safeguards agreed upon would not be too "irksome" (a word previously used by Hall). He promised to consult with his government on the principle of collective agreement to control purchases and personally hoped that his government would agree. To avoid delay, the Minister also agreed that a South African representative sit in on the proposed working group talks. Information obtained in this way would be of material assistance in determining the final position of his government. Farley promised the Minister that a "piece of paper" would be given to the South African Embassy to facilitate the South African government's consideration of the matter. We assume this piece of paper will be similar to the aide mémoire given us on August 21.

10. We might add that the Minister asked us the direct question whether Canada was very much in favour of the trilateral proposal. We assured him that we were. We venture to believe that this assurance from a competitive supplier carried considerable weight with him and may have influenced his response as outlined above.

CONTROL OF BILATERAL EXPORTS OF URANIUM

The trilateral approach to the Australians was made yesterday afternoon at the State Department with Booker, the Counsellor of the Australian Embassy, representing the ambassador. Farley, who made the presentation, spoke along the same lines as he and Hall had spoken to the South African Minister of Mines the previous day (our reference telegram). Farley also promised the Australians a "piece of paper." Booker could only promise that he would consult his government right away and he hoped to have an answer next week. In spite of gentle pressure applied by Farley he was not prepared to agree to an Australian sitting in on an early meeting of the proposed working group without authority from his government. As a consequence we do not expect that the working group will get under way until later next week at the earliest.

FIVE-POWER WORKING GROUP — CONTROLS FOR EXPORT OF URANIUM

Winfree phoned us this morning to say that Booker, the Counsellor of the Australian Embassy, had just called at the State Department to say that the Australian government agreed in principle to participation in the 5-Power working group. At the same time, the Australians asked the State Department whether the other members of the group would be agreeable to holding the group's meetings in Vienna rather than Washington. The reason given for this suggestion was that the Australian technical experts, such as Hood, best qualified to discuss controls, will be in Vienna in connection with the meeting of the Agency and they assume that this would also be the case with most of the countries represented on the working group. Winfree added that the State Department have no objection to this suggestion; the British Embassy are ascertaining London's views and he would be speaking with the South Africans later in the day.

CONTROLS ON THE EXPORT OF URANIUM

On the receipt on October 5th of a copy of telegram 2041 from Washington and of External Affairs' reply E-1539,† we thought it would be desirable to have a joint preliminary discussion with the U.K. and the U.S. before having a five power talk. Accordingly, Pollock and Watson had an evening session with Breithut and Kirk (U.S.) and Michaels and Cape (U.K.) on October 7. External Affairs' telegram AE-6† arrived just in time: the copy of the letter from the U.S. to the Australian and South African Governments will not arrive here until Monday, October 14th.

2. At the meeting none of us were quite clear on what we were to discuss. The presence of technical staff in Vienna suggested that the intention might have been to limit the discussion to the technical involved in the implementation of safeguards. On the other hand the policy question of encouraging the South Africans and the Australians to recommend to their Governments the adoption of common safeguards provisions seemed to be an essential prior step.

3. Both the U.S. and the U.K. began the discussions by staunchly stating that they intended to transfer to the Agency as soon as possible the carrying out of the safeguards provisions in their bilaterals. They assumed that this was the Canadian position too. Fortunately, they did not ask about the text of our proposed German bilateral Agreement. The U.S. went so far as to say that if in due course a country would not accept Agency safeguards rather than U.S. ones they would terminate their agreement.

4. The U.K., on their own volition, mentioned that they intended to have special control-free relationships with Australia and South Africa. This came as a shock to Breithut and Kirk, though Michaels said he had mentioned it when he was last in Washington. We made no comment except that we knew of the position.

5. Later in the evening, the U.K. admitted that as a member of O.E.E.C., they would no doubt have to accept O.E.E.C. controls rather than Agency controls on reactors and materials they supplied to the Western Europe countries. Also, when we asked the U.S. what they would really do when they had supplied a reactor to a country under U.S. controls and the country subsequently refused to accept Agency controls, they were at a loss for an answer. It would appear that the positions of the U.K. and the U.S. will not be as firm in practice as they now declare them to be.

6. A five power meeting was held on October 10. Baxter and Hood (Australia); Sole and Shuttleworth (South Africa); Breithut and Kirk (U.S.); Michaels and Cape (U.K.) and Barton, Pollock and Watson were present. Watson was put in the chair.

7. He began by pointing out that the U.S., U.K. and Canadian Governments had publicly taken the position that they would not export reactors, uranium or other special atomic energy materials and equipment without first having concluded a Governmental bilateral agreement with the recipient country concerned which included safeguards provisions. The existing U.S. and bilateral agreements contained language on safeguards similar to that in the International Atomic Energy Agency Statute. The draft Canadian bilateral also contained similar language.

8. Several interested purchasers of uranium had recently been shopping around enquiring about terms and conditions of supply. If a major producer of uranium were willing to sell uranium without the application of safeguards then the whole safeguards concept would be seriously impaired. It would only be a short time before other suppliers would follow suit and the safeguard protection would then collapse. On the other hand, if the major uranium producing countries together stood firm on safeguards then there was a real chance that safeguards could be effective for some years. Reference was made to the statements made at the Conference on the Agency Statute held in New York last October.

9. Baxter stated that Australia was not at present contemplating the sale of uranium to any country other than the U.K. and the U.S. He went on to say that Australian uranium cannot compete with Canadian prices. While it might be argued that Australia should not mine uranium if it cannot be done competitively, nevertheless they now had a uranium mining industry, and it was a powerful group. Australia would have to continue to sell uranium. In these circumstances he was sure that no government of Australia would ever be able to reach an understanding with other governments which might restrict the sale of uranium beyond that which Australia would itself approve. This was not to say that they would not apply safeguards. What he felt his Government would do would be to supply uranium without controls to special friendly countries and to supply with controls to others. He went on to say that if the "big countries" wanted Australia to apply controls universally then they would have to agree to a fixed price for uranium which was either high enough to allow an adequate profit for the Australian mines or make a suitable financial contribution to Australia if the fixed price decided upon was lower than this.

10. Sole of South Africa said that Dr. Van Rhijn (South African Minister of Mines and Economic Affairs) would be putting this question of controls to his Government. In the meantime the Minister had agreed to them taking part in a working group. In order to help them in their thinking he would appreciate receiving on a confidential basis some details of the control mechanism which the U.S., U.K. and Canada had in mind. He was particularly interested in the case of the supply by Canada to India of the C.I.R. reactor.⁴ When the Indians make their own fuel elements for this reactor, this will then be an early example of a reactor which has been supplied without controls, and in his view it will make nonsense of the watertight control ideal being advocated.

11. During the discussion, the urgent need for the Agency to develop, at the scientific working level, a suitable system of controls was generally accepted. This could then be the pattern to be adopted in bilateral agreements. The controls on reactors and fuel in themselves would not be too arduous but the technical problems would become much more complex when countries begin their own chemical processing of irradiated fuel. In most cases this might be 5 - 10 years away. By then countries such as France and Germany would also be in a position to export reactors and other atomic energy equipment and would no doubt do so without controls to many countries if not to all. As a result, the chances of effective universal controls being in existence after a few years from now appeared most unlikely.

12. Both the South Africans and the Australians promised without reservation that they would not make any sales of uranium without controls without first getting in touch with the other Combined Development Agency powers. They suggested that during the next few months a detailed proposal be forwarded to their Governments for their study and consideration.

FIVE-POWER WORKING GROUP — CONTROLS ON EXPORT OF URANIUM

Winfree phoned us today to suggest an informal meeting with ourselves and the UK Embassy to discuss what steps ought to be taken to advance the discussions with the Australians and the South Africans on this question. Winfree said that the line taken by the Australians and the South Africans at the one meeting which was held in Vienna indicated that the State Department's earlier optimism that the South Africans and the Australians would be willing to join the USA the UK and ourselves in a system of safeguards governing sales of uranium and atomic energy materials had perhaps not been justified. He, therefore, thought that it would be useful if we could explore the situation together to see what further steps might be advisable. Such a meeting has been tentatively set for November 28.

2. This afternoon, Winfree read to us portions of a report received from the two USA officials who attended the one meeting held in Vienna. This report was very much along the lines of letter 6 October 11 from the Canadian delegation to the IAEA. One or two additional facts emerged, however. The Australian representative appeared to stress the internal political problems faced by the Australian government on this problem whereas the South African representative stressed the external. Both, it seems, have been under a good deal of pressure from the French. The Australians are particularly conscious of a small but vocal uranium mining group which, as production expenses are high, cannot sell natural uranium for less than 13 dollars a pound. Winfree said that it seemed clear that the Australians were attempting to put a price on their cooperation, a position he found difficult to understand as Canada, for example, could undersell Australia at any time, which would leave matters where they are now. Almost all South Africa's production at the present rate is committed to the CDA, a situation which is likely to continue for some ten years. The representatives of both countries seem to give the impression that they would prefer to work through the Agency, seemingly forgetting, Winfree noted, that the Agency would not be in a position to cope with the question of safeguards on sales for some three or five years.

3. We should be grateful for any comments and suggestions you would wish us to put forward at the proposed meeting.

CONTROLS ON EXPORT OF URANIUM

We were told today by one of the fairly senior officers on the atomic energy side of the State Department that they are currently having another look at certain aspects of their position on the question of safeguards. They have apparently been much impressed recently by the problems involved in making EURATOM the kind of organization which they would wish it to be and by the difficulties standing in the way of a satisfactory relationship between the USA and that organization.⁵ At least some of the senior officials concerned in the State Department do not see any likelihood of the European countries accepting the kinds of restrictions previously contemplated, particularly if the USA itself is not subject to any restraints. They have also been somewhat troubled by the position taken by Australia and South Africa in the Vienna talks on safeguards. They understand that the attitude of these two countries has been influenced in part by the difficulty which they anticipate in getting customers to accept the proposed safeguards, and partly also by the considerable costs (both in money and personnel) which such safeguards would involve for both importing and exporting countries.

2. In the light of these tendencies some of the senior officials in the State Department have been considering whether the situation might be improved if:

(a) the USA authorities were to offer to bring the civil element of their programme under agency-type controls or safeguards; and

(b) the range of items subject to control were to be reduced.

3. The official with whom we talked emphasized that although a good deal of support was developing in the State Department for such changes in the USA position, the Atomic Energy Commission had not yet been persuaded.

4. It is appreciated in the State Department that even a largely formal separation of the civilian and military elements of the USA programme would present certain technical difficulties and entail considerable additional expenditures for the USA. It appeared, however, that such a segregation of the civilian part of the programme was feasible and that the extra ⁵ Pour une discussion sur la position du Canada au sujet de l'EURATOM, voir la 3^e partie de ce chapitre.

For a discussion of the Canadian position towards EURATOM, see Part 3 of this chapter.

expense was not too high a price to pay if such a gesture by the USA (and presumably the UK) would increase the acceptability of controls to countries importing atomic materials and make the Australians and South Africans more willing to insist on the acceptance of safeguards by their prospective customers.

5. Concerning the scope of the controls to be imposed on other countries, State Department officials are wondering whether it is really necessary to have safeguards apply to all of the items which might be regarded as having even a remote connection with atomic activity. Could not the catalogue of such items be considerably shortened without lessening effective control over potentially mischievous or dangerous activities? Might it not be sufficient to limit control to a minimum number of key items? In the view of this State Department official it was doubtful that even heavy water needed to be kept under strict control. If the list could be shortened, the costs of any control system might be substantially reduced.

6. We were told that such ideas as these might be thrown into the tripartite discussions scheduled for November 29 even if complete agreement on them has not been reached on the USA side by that time. We were given the impression that the comments which we or the UK representatives might make on the value of these ideas in helping to overcome the present difficulties could conceivably influence the attitude of those members of the USA side who may not by then have accepted them. We should be grateful, therefore, for even your preliminary views. We did not, of course, make any substantial comments during this conversation. We did remark, however, that if a particular item (e.g. natural uranium) were to be retained on the control list, presumably other items which might be directly competitive (e.g. enriched uranium) would also continue to be subject to control.

7. We also gathered that at the meeting a week from Friday the USA side will propose that some communication be sent to the Australians and South Africans recording the willingness which those countries expressed in Vienna to consult the other countries in the group in advance of the completion of any sale of uranium. USA officials consider it important to have this undertaking recorded. They do not, however, regard such prior consultation as an adequate substitute for an eventual agreement on safeguards. They also do not think that it will for long be found practicable to carry out such advance consultations on individual transactions. They will therefore probably propose that the communication to the Australians and South Africans should observe that, while the assurances about consultations are welcomed as a provisional arrangement, there would still seem to be merit in attempting to reach agreement among the five countries on safeguards. We should appreciate your views on this suggested communication.

CONTROL OF URANIUM EXPORTS

In preparation for the proposed discussion with USA and UK officials here (which has now been postponed until December 3) we should be grateful to have, for our own information, an up-to-date report on arrangements which have been negotiated, or may be under negotiation, with various foreign countries. In particular we should be interested in knowing the extent to which the kinds of safeguards included in our draft bilaterals are proving acceptable to such other governments. You might also let us know whether there have been any recent significant developments in arrangements for fuelling the Canadian-Indian reactor.

2. We would of course be very discrete in using any of this information in the tripartite discussions. Even in those where it would not be desirable to pass such information on to the USA or UK it would nevertheless be helpful for us to have as much background as possible in order to be able to deal appropriately with such questions as may be raised concerning Canada's current activities.

CONTROLS ON EXPORTS OF URANIUM⁶

Dear Sir,

You may have seen three recent telegrams on this subject from Washington (Nos 2426, 2466 and 2479 — copies attached). These report that an informal meeting of Canada, the U.K. and the U.S.A. will take place on December 3 to consider the next steps to be taken to bring about the type of control régime the three governments consider desirable.

I am outlining below some points arising from these telegrams which we would propose to incorporate in instructions to be sent to the Embassy late on Monday. Unless we hear from you (or Mr. Bennett or Mr. Plumptre, to whom I am sending copies of this letter) to the contrary by 5 p.m. Monday we shall assume that you agree.

In telegram No. 2426 the attitudes of Australia and South Africa are examined. We agree that if one or more established producers should decide to sell uranium without controls others will probably be forced to do the same, and hence there is little likelihood that any one exporter could gain a favoured competitive position (which might offset the disadvantage of higher costs of production) by refusing to join with others in requiring controls. Indeed such lack of cooperation would merely increase the likelihood that the other producers would exploit without restraint any competitive advantages they may have such as lower costs, without regard to the consequent injury to the non-cooperating country. This point could be made (somewhat more diplomatically, no doubt) to Australia and South Africa.

⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Dwyer: see p. 4 [voir note 7/see footnote 7] — call Couillard & do note for me to J. L[éger] confirming. Speak to Watson at AE of C as to their line. R.B. B[ryce]

An additional point is that Germany and Switzerland have already agreed in negotiations to accept the control provisions in our standard agreement, and several other countries have declared themselves willing to negotiate agreements on the basis of that draft. (Japan, incidentally, has been bargaining vigorously for more liberal control provisions in its negotiations with the U.K. and the U.S.A., and has put off sending a negotiating team to Canada until next year in spite of earlier expressions of concern that delivery of uranium from Canada should begin soon; perhaps Japan has had second thoughts about accepting our control pattern). In the light of these facts the point could be made to Australia and South Africa that we have found several prospective purchasers already willing (if not eager) to accept controls; matters are probably far enough advanced so that we could safely refer to the expected signature of the agreements with Germany and Switzerland, and we could express some expectation that when the fact of their acceptance becomes known it may lead others to fall in line. We could express the view that insistence on controls will not prevent sales, and while it may make negotiation of individual agreements somewhat more difficult it does have the advantage of enlarging substantially the list of countries that we and other like-minded governments would consider acceptable customers.

Telegram No. 2466 outlines some interesting new developments in U.S.A. thinking about controls. We might in general and non-committal terms express agreement with the two main ideas. The first is that the application of controls (even if only in form) to the U.S.A. and other atomic exporters should facilitate their acceptance by importers; our representatives could express a personal expectation that the Government would probably agree to some form of control of the Canadian programme if similar arrangements were accepted by the U.K. and the U.S.A. The second idea is that controls might appear less formidable to importers if the range of things to be controlled could be reduced to a small list of specific and essential items (e.g. reactors, reactor fuel, fuel fabricating or processing plant, etc.). This we could support in principle, and indeed with some advantage in that already our standard agreement has control provisions which inadvertently are somewhat less comprehensive in this respect than those of the U.K. and the U.S.A. (In negotiation with the U.K. the Japanese have pointed out that our controls focus upon fuel which we may supply, or fuel used in or produced by reactors which we may supply; the U.K. requirement covers equipment in general rather than merely reactors, and the Japanese asked for the more limited language of our draft.).

While we might cautiously approve in general terms these new departures in U.S.A. thinking about controls, our representatives should not themselves get into details at the December 3 meeting. Rather they should seek as full information as possible on U.S.A. thinking and on the U.K. reaction, leaving the statement of a specific or authoritative Canadian response until a later occasion.

I have in mind that the control picture has become somewhat blurred and shaken up recently, and it is by no means clear that matters are developing in a manner consistent with our objectives. Hence it would probably be desirable for us to hold a meeting fairly soon to review developments. If you agree, I would suggest that the meeting might usefully take place after receipt of a report from Washington on the December 3 meeting. In the light of U.S.A. and U.K. views as expressed at that meeting I would hope that we could reach some useful conclusions as to points we should pursue in further discussions in Washington.⁷

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

INFORMAL TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM, ETC.

1. There are various developments of recent weeks on the subject of atomic controls which have not yet been discussed in any detail by the senior officials concerned here in Ottawa. Upon receiving word of to-morrow's meeting we at first thought of arranging such a discussion prior to the meeting. This would have been difficult, however, and in any case such a discussion may well prove more useful after we receive your report of the meeting. Hence we have no major point to make or initiative to propose at this time, and our various points below are put forward on the understanding that your primary role at the meeting will be to receive current USA views and to note UK reactions to them. Your report, however, might usefully contain as well any general thoughts on the subject, not necessarily arising from the discussion; your ideas will be valuable for the meeting of senior officials which we would hope to arrange here soon.

2. On points raised in your telegram No. 2426, we agree with the view that if one or more established producers should decide to sell uranium without controls others will probably be forced to do the same, and hence there is little likelihood that any one exporter could gain a favoured competitive position (which might offset the disadvantage of higher costs of production) by refusing to join with others in requiring controls. Indeed such lack of cooperation would merely increase the likelihood that the other producers would exploit without restraint any competitive advantages they may have such as lower costs, without regard to the consequent injury to the non-cooperating country. This point could be made (somewhat more diplomatically, no doubt) to Australia and South Africa; if they reply that they would propose to apply controls for "unreliable" importers but not for their friends, it could be pointed out that sale without controls to "friends" would make it difficult or impossible to require them for others. The diplomatic task of informing a government with

⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I think this general line is OK and we should not neglect the possibility of appeal to Australia at a higher Ministerial level in due course if that appears necessary. We should persevere with this policy while it is still primarily a matter of principle and relatively small sales. The Australians are not in a strong position & S[outh] Af[ricans] not really interested in general exports for years. R.B. B[ryce] which relations were maintained (e.g. India) that it was not regarded as friendly would be formidable.

3. An additional point is that Germany and Switzerland have already agreed in negotiations to accept the control provisions in our standard agreement, and several other countries have declared themselves willing to negotiate agreements on the basis of that draft. (Japan, incidentally, has been bargaining vigorously for more liberal control provisions in its negotiations with the UK and the USA, and has put off sending a negotiating team to Canada until next year in spite of earlier expressions of concern that delivery of uranium from Canada should begin soon; perhaps Japan has had second thoughts about accepting our control pattern.) In the light of these facts the point could be made to Australia and South Africa that we have found several prospective purchasers already willing (if not eager) containing our standard control provisions will be signed in the near future, and that when these agreements become known the acceptance of controls by these two countries may lead others to fall in line. Our experience to date suggests that insistence on controls will not prevent sales, and while it may make negotiation of individual agreements somewhat more difficult it does have the advantage of enlarging substantially the list of countries that we and other like-minded governments would consider acceptable customers.

4. Your telegram No. 2466 outlines interesting new developments in USA thinking about controls. You may in general terms express agreement with the two main ideas. The first (one which you may wish to point out, Canada put forward two years ago in the tripartite forum) is that the acceptance of controls, even if only in form, by the USA and other atomic exporters should facilitate their acceptance by importers. It might be appropriate for you to express as a personal view the expectation that the government would probably agree to some form of control for the Canadian programme if similar arrangements were accepted by the UK and the USA. Indeed if this concept is being applied to the USA and others as importers we have already accepted the principle of application of controls to Canadian imports through the reciprocal features of our draft bilateral agreement.

5. The second new USA idea is that controls might appear less formidable to importers if the range of things to be controlled could be reduced to a small list of specific and essential items (e.g. reactors, reactor fuel, fuel fabricating or processing plant, etc.). This we can agree with in principle, and indeed our own control provisions relate specifically to fuel or reactors only. We regard the provision that items or commodities shall be supplied "on terms and conditions to be agreed" as giving us the means to require controls on other important items (e.g. fabricating or processing plant) if we should at some time contemplate (as we have not yet done) their export. (The UK have informed us that the Japanese in their bilateral negotiation referred to our standard draft and wished to replace the UK control provision relating to "equipment" with the more restricted reference to "reactors"). However, we would not wish to see the range reduced to the point where "hardware" was largely uncontrolled and the main emphasis laid on fuel; this would unfairly fasten the odium of insisting on controls upon fuel suppliers while leaving exporters of reactors, etc., to seek markets without on the one hand inhibitions or on the other the handicap of requiring a commercially unattractive condition. Equally, as you have already pointed out, we wish to ensure that our exports within the general field of fuel will not compete on disadvantageous terms with those of other exporters.

6. You will probably not wish yourself to go into details at to-morrow's meeting, but we shall of course be interested in details of UK and USA attitudes if they are available. At your discretion you may say that we have not yet given the Yugoslavs an answer on their request of this last summer for assistance in setting up a uranium treatment plant, a request which we understand was also put to the UK, the USA and one or two others. This would appear to raise questions of direct concern to the meeting, and we should be interested to learn the views of the UK and the USA as well as the reactions (if they are known) of the other countries to which the request was directed. (Incidentally, we find it a little surprising that this particular case has not previously been raised in the group).

INFORMAL TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM, ETC.

The discussion yesterday morning was rather rambling and inconclusive. We had the impression that the main purpose served by the meeting was to enable State Department officials to put some of their ideas to their colleagues from the Atomic Energy Commission in the presence of UK and Canadian representatives. The intention is that another discussion will be held in about a week or ten days' time. Meanwhile there will undoubtedly be further exchanges between the State Department and the AEC. The interval will also provide an opportunity for the UK and Canadian authorities to consider what, if any, additional comments they might wish to make at the next meeting, pending clarification of USA views.

2. The principal concrete suggestion made by the State Department officials at the meeting was that consideration might now be given to the desirability of another approach to the Soviets on the question of safeguards, in advance of the discussion which must take place on this subject at an early stage in the International Atomic Energy Agency. There was some speculation about the Soviet attitude towards controls and about their probable reaction to the suggested approach. The impression of USA officials from such evidence as they had seen was that the Soviets were not taking many risks in their atomic relations with other countries. They had been quite cautious in the arrangements which they had made with Burma, Egypt and Yugoslavia and apparently in the proposal which they had made to Norway. While there were no provisions in these arrangements for formal safeguards or controls, the programmes appeared to be of such a modest size, and involved material of such low enrichment, that there was little chance of the recipient countries doing any damage with the product (most of which would in any event have to be processed in the USSR because of the lack of facilities in the other countries concerned). The general view was that by the nature of these programmes the Russians had been able so far to get much the same effect as would be envisaged under a control system without having to impose safeguards formally on the recipients or extract formal undertakings from them. They were probably quite happy to see the Western countries take the blame for advocating onerous controls while they themselves received the credit for respecting the sovereignty and sensibilities of the countries with which they were dealing. They might well consider that they could safely proceed in this manner for some five or six years since the programmes of the countries with which they are mainly concerned will probably continue for that length of time to be limited in size and complexity and since none of those countries is likely to reach the stage of carrying out chemical processing for several years. The Soviets might feel quite differently if it appeared that the main Western suppliers were relaxing their insistence on safeguards or that the acceptance of controls by some of the more industrialized countries in the West was being endangered by the absence of international agreement and by the lack of progress in working out detailed arrangements through the Agency. Generally, therefore, it was considered that something might come from a further approach to the Russians since the balance of the evidence did not suggest they had lost interest in some kind of safeguards against possible misuse of atomic materials. In any event, the making of a further effort to reach an understanding with the Soviets might have political advantages for the West and, in particular, might put the USA, UK and Canada in a better position to urge other Western supplying countries to insist on safeguards since this action would show that the possibility of the Soviet nullifying any control arrangements was not being entirely overlooked.

3. There was some discussion on the form which a new approach to the Soviets might take. It was observed that the previous exchange of notes had been in rather general terms. The view was expressed that any further communication (which presumably would be made by the USA on behalf of the main Western suppliers) should probably be somewhat more specific and detailed if it was not desired to invite a repetition of the earlier Soviet doubts about the practicability of implementing any general principles that might be stated. For this purpose it would be necessary for the Western countries to have a clearer understanding than exists at present about some of the definitions and control techniques involved.

4. It was agreed to discuss these matters again at the next meeting. In the meantime the AEC would see what might be done to make the various definitions more precise and to describe more exactly the kinds of control arrangements (including numbers of personnel) now envisaged. We should be grateful for your comments and particularly for your own ideas on the detailed control arrangements contemplated under the recently negotiated Canadian bilateral agreements which presumably may go into effect fairly soon.

5. At yesterday's meeting the State Department representatives also tried out rather tentatively on their AEC colleagues (and, incidentally, on the UK representative) the idea of offering to open up the non-military sector of their atomic programme for international inspection, particularly if the USSR would do likewise. They recognized that this move might be quite expensive but they thought it could have a salutary effect on the attitudes of others (including not only the Soviets but also Western or neutral countries which were troubled by the thought of having to accept controls which were irksome and which were not applicable in any degree to some of the larger and wealthier countries). As they expressed it, this gesture might not be too meaningful but could "take at least some of the curse off the present double standard." They considered that most of the changes which had taken place during the past several months in the international situation and in the market for uranium had worsened rather than improved the prospects for effective controls. Without some new initiative the acceptance of safeguards by supplying and importing countries generally was becoming more and more difficult. The State Department officials suggested that if such an inspection offer were made and failed to produce a response from the Soviets, the USA might then even consider unilaterally volunteering to have certain selected plants subjected to international inspection. We welcomed these suggestions and expressed the hope that they might be developed further. The AEC representatives showed some willingness to have these ideas examined. It did not appear that such suggestions could be fully considered in time to permit of their possible inclusion in the proposed early approach to the Soviets referred to above.

6. Concerning the rest of the discussion at yesterday's meeting, the following information may be of some interest:

(a) According to the USA and UK representatives, discussions with the Japanese are proceeding very slowly. The principal negotiations at the moment are apparently taking place with the UK. The Japanese are continuing to argue that the safeguards in Article XII of the Agency's statute are applicable only to first generation products and are not intended to apply to second and subsequent generations. They have apparently pressed for the transfer of the exact language of Article XII into the bilateral, leaving the subsequent interpretation of these provisions to the Agency. An alternative suggestion which the Japanese have apparently made is that there should be an exchange of notes interpreting Article XII and the comparable language of the bilateral in an agreed manner, but the UK have objected to this on the ground that it would be improper for two countries to prejudice the interpretation which the Agency may eventually give to these provisions. We gathered from the discussion yesterday morning that there may be some inclination (particularly on the USA side) to reconsider this idea of an interpretative note since they are apparently coming around to the view that if a reasonable interpretation could be agreed upon the Japanese might find it awkward to press for a looser interpretation subsequently in the Agency. The State Department officials concerned are wondering if anything would really be lost by accepting the best interpretation that can be secured now, particularly as it would undoubtedly be a good deal tighter than the kind of interpretation which can be expected to emerge from later discussions among the full membership of the Agency. The Japanese have also made a suggestion to the UK that the bilateral should include a provision for the more or less automatic turning over of control responsibility to the Agency even though the Agency might not be capable of exercising control effectively at the time. This suggestion has apparently been rejected.

(b) Both the USA and UK representatives referred to the requests which they had received from Yugoslavia for assistance in setting up a uranium metal plant. They reported that the Yugoslavs had also put this request to the Soviets but had not received much encouragement. The Russians are alleged to have replied that far from merely assisting with the construction of such a plant, they would themselves set it up for the Yugoslavs. This degree of Soviet involvement was apparently not welcomed by the Yugoslavs. In any event the Yugoslavs have indicated that nothing more has been heard from the Russians recently. The UK and USA are considering the request quite cautiously and appear to have no intention of giving a definite answer to the Yugoslavs in the near future.

(c) The Australians have apparently made a good deal out of the lack of federal authority over the states and have given this (along with the pressure of uranium mining interests) as the reason why it would be difficult for Australia to apply export controls. They have apparently indicated that the cooperation of the local interests concerned would probably be forthcoming only if a market were assured for the bulk of the country's uranium production and if a floor price of something like 13 dollars a pound could be guaranteed (presumably by the USA). The State Department officials wondered whether the Canadian authorities might consider themselves in a position to warn the Australian (and also the South African) government of the risks not only to their security but also to their commercial marketing prospects if the main supplying countries indulge in reckless competition.

They felt that the producers in those countries might be most impressed by such a warning from us in view of our strong competitive position.

ATOMIC ENERGY; BILATERAL AGREEMENTS WITH GERMANY AND SWITZERLAND
 (PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUGUST 22)

12. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted agreements with Germany and Switzerland for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. These had been negotiated in accordance with the principles established by the Cabinet, when it had last considered the matter, and conformed in all major respects, including the control provisions, to the original Canadian draft.

It was proposed that the German agreement be signed and subsequently brought into force through an exchange of notes. The Germans were anxious that this be done before January 1st. As for Switzerland, it was provided, that, after signature, the agreement be ratified and brought into force upon the exchange of instruments of ratification.

The Minister recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that these agreements be approved and signed.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Dec. 3, 1957 - Cab. Doc. 315-57†)

13. During the discussion it was said that there was no danger in approving the agreements provided there were adequate controls to ensure that the uranium to be sold by Canada would be used for peaceful purposes. This seemed to be assured. Worry was expressed about the position into which the agreement would put Germany. However, the present German government had indicated it did not intend to manufacture nuclear weapons. If the worst came to the worst, uranium shipments could be suspended. An announcement on these arrangements, stressing the safeguards, should be made soon.

14. The Cabinet,

(a) approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he be authorized to sign agreements with Germany and Switzerland for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy,⁸ and that he be authorized to take such steps as were necessary to bring them into force; and,

(b) agreed that an appropriate announcement be made in Parliament which would mention in particular the provision of controls against military use of the uranium supplied by Canada.⁹

(An order in council with respect to (a) above was passed accordingly; P.C. 1957-1631, Dec. 9)

INFORMAL TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM ETC.

The discussions Tuesday morning centered on two topics; how to deal with South Africa and Australia and how to spell out more exactly how controls might be applied. Throughout the discussions there was a greater feeling of urgency, that time was beginning to run out. There also seemed to be an unexpressed foreboding that safeguards might prove too complex and costly to be practical.

2. The discussions on how to deal with South Africa and Australia considered two problems; how to induce them to incorporate safeguard clauses into their agreements and how to deal with the request from South Africa to the CDA for permission to sell eight tons of natural uranium to Japan.

3. Roper from the UK Embassy stated that South Africa had already been informed by the CDA that the two governments were prepared to discuss the sale of eight tons of uranium to Japan. No one present however was aware that any decision had been reached on how to handle the situation. As South Africa would likely seek this discussion rather soon a formula had to be evolved quickly.

4. Roper proposed personally that the sale be agreed to on an ad hoc basis requiring from Japan only an undertaking not to use the uranium for military purposes and setting forth in legal terms that this sale would not constitute a precedent. There was unanimous feeling that this would be interpreted as a softening attitude towards safeguards and would seriously undermine the entire control concept. It was felt that the problem of this particular sale had to be solved within the general framework of convincing South Africa and Australia that safeguard clauses should be included in their agreements.

5. It was agreed that it was useless to go back again to these two countries on the basis only of the principle of safeguards; it was obvious that they wanted safeguards defined in more practical terms.

6. After discussions Schaezel of the State Department agreed to produce within a week a document that might be submitted to South Africa in connection with the possible Japanese transaction (and possibly also to Australia) that would set forth the type of language on safeguards which the USA, the UK and Canada would like to see incorporated in any early agreements which South Africa (or Australia) might make and suggest that these safeguards might be reserved for implementation by IAEA or by some friendly technologically advanced country that was naturally involved in the matter by the provision of materials or equipment for the same project (e.g. heavy water, reactors etc.).

7. On the matter of the practical implementation of inspection and safeguards Roper indicated that the UK had established a working group to grapple with this problem. The group contains both scientists and political people to maintain a balance between what the scientists might desire and what might be politically negotiable and financially tolerable. The group does not anticipate that they can prepare a report before April.

8. The USA indicated that they were working on the problem and might be in position to discuss the matter by April. It was agreed to aim at a meeting in April to compare ideas and seek general agreement on the methods to be applied.

9. It came out that the UK had already done useful work on the definition of components to be controlled and that the USA had worked on manpower and budgetary requirements and had developed ideas on the controls for some of the more straightforward installations. It was agreed to foster, between now and April, an informal exchange at the working level as discussions within each of the three governments progressed. These exchanges might relate to problems encountered or anticipated and to any tentative solutions under even preliminary study.

10. Roper enquired if the idea was to have a small inspection team on the various sites to throw up a warning if anything seemed amiss, and larger roving teams to move in when warned and pinpoint the trouble. Kirk claimed the difficulty with this idea was statistical; because of the complication of natural losses and fluctuations it would take three months for the site team to establish a statistical trend and another three months for the roving team to come up with statistically acceptable proof.

11. Kirk postulated a number of control problems some of which seemed to have an aspect of unreality. What margin of error is permissible and in what terms should it be stated. One percent error? One bomb every ten years? How is this idea affected if the country has a separate uncontrolled military atomic programme? Does one simply approve a reactor plan and assume it will be built according to plan or does one need an inspector on the site to ensure that a secret by-pass is not built into the reactor? He also postulated that employees might move around an installation carrying bottles of water but occasionally a bottle might contain product that they are diverting. Kirk mentioned that losses inherent in a system complicated control and cited a case in one of their processing plants where 15 kg of materials disappeared and it required five or six consecutive washdowns of the plant to account for the supposedly lost material.

12. As Canada will be faced with the necessity of implementing safeguards under her own bilaterals it would seem desirable for Canada to plan to participate actively in the proposed April meeting and the interim informal exchange of ideas. Presumably Canada's immediate interest is in the control of source materials and in this field she has more at stake and more to contribute than either the USA or the UK. In addition, Canada might be interested in influencing decisions in fields that she might reasonably enter at some future date. It would seem then that you might wish to consider establishing a Canadian working group on this matter at an early date.

TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM ETC.

A meeting was held Friday morning at the State Department to discuss Schaezel's draft document mention in paragraph 6 of our reference telegram. The text of this draft document as revised at our meeting will be despatched as soon as available.

2. The original document sought to advance the current situation by

(a) Recording in writing that South Africa and Australia agreed in Vienna to consult the other three governments prior to completing negotiations on agreements or contracts.

(b) explaining that although the USA, UK and Canadian governments were giving active technical consideration to the practical aspects of safeguards these studies had not reached a point where answers could be given to the practical questions raised by Australia and South Africa.

(c) Recommending that South Africa include in any bilateral agreement or contract provision that the IAEA would administer the safeguards.

(d) Suggesting that in the interim before the Agency can administer these safeguards the USA and the UK would be willing to consider arrangements with South Africa, if the need arose, to undertake the inspection functions on behalf of South Africa.

3. Roper of the UK Embassy flatly rejected the substance of subpara (d) saying it would undoubtedly be unacceptable to the UK, South Africa and any second party to a South African bilateral. This idea, therefore, was struck from the document.

4. The discussion on the matter in subpara (c) above pivoted on the knowledge that the South Africans appear reluctant to require safeguards that other countries know they do not have the technical competence to administer. The UK discussions with the Japanese have indicated also that the latter are resistant to the extensive listing of safeguards item by item. To accommodate both these matters Roper roughed out the following wording "with respect to any Japanese project employing material supplied by the Union of South Africa under this agreement, the Union shall have the same safeguard rights as are conferred upon the International Atomic Energy Agency by Article XII of its statute with regard to any Agency project." A companion clause would reserve the right of the Union to turn over the safeguards to the International Agency for administration. It is not intended that these or similar wordings be incorporated in the document but that they be suggested to the South Africans informally.

5. It was visualized that the document would be drafted as an aide mémoire from the State Department and the wording would show clearly that it reflected the opinions of all three governments.

6. It is also intended to see if South Africa will concur in a copy of the document being passed to Australia. If they balk at this it is intended that a suitably modified but similar document be prepared for presentation to Australia.

7. During the meeting it became evident that the USA and the UK feel that a uranium exporting country, if it is competent to do so, is obligated to follow its uranium through fabricating plants, reactors, chemical processing plants etc to ensure that it is not diverted to non-peaceful uses. Is Canada prepared to subscribe to this at the present moment? Undoubtedly, since future situations are unpredictable, Canada would want to reserve, and is reserving, a full complement of safeguard rights but does Canada visualize becoming involved at a relatively early stage in policing advanced installations? Might not a country that is involved in exporting only source materials argue that its responsibility is finished when it has seen its exports safely into use in a plant built (or equipped) and safeguarded by a competent and friendly nation? If Canada wishes to distinguish between the safeguards it will require in agreements and the safeguards it will actually implement at present this distinction should soon be made clear.

INFORMAL TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM, ETC.

Following for your comments as soon as possible is the text of the proposed aide mémoire to South Africa as revised by State Department officials after the December 20 meeting and mentioned in our reference telegram:

"At meetings in Washington in late summer, followed by discussions in October in Vienna among representatives of the British, Canadian, South African, Australian and American delegations, consideration was given to common action with respect to the development of a system which would safeguard atomic energy materials against diversion to military uses. It will be recalled that on February 6 the Canadian government circulated to various interested governments suggestions as to the manner in which like-minded countries might handle this problem. A problem of immediate concern in this field has been to insure that bilateral agreements in the atomic energy field contained safeguard provisions consistent with Article XII of the International Atomic Energy Agency Statute. The British Canadian and USA governments welcomed the intention expressed by the South African and Australian representatives at Vienna that the two governments would consult with the other three governments prior to the consummation of agreements or contracts South Africa or Australia had under negotiation. In this connection it is gratifying that South Africa has now advised the Combined Development Agency of the interest of the Japanese in acquiring eight tons of natural uranium from South African producers.

"These governments assume that particularly the countries which were represented at the informal discussions in Vienna last October have a common interest in the development of an effective safeguard system. This interest is reinforced by our adherence to the Statute of the IAEA and particularly to Article XII. It is the conviction of these governments, the countries which have heretofore been most directly concerned with this problem due to the steps they have already taken to make available internationally nuclear materials, that it is most important during this formative period that action be avoided which would tend to prejudice the potential activity of the IAEA in the safeguards field.

"We have under active consideration by technical experts the practical aspects of a safeguard system — the degree and precision of accountability to be sought, the role to be played by instrumentation, the need to locate experts near facilities, the actual financial cost of this function, and the personnel requirements. We are not yet at the point where it has been possible to reach conclusions on these difficult questions. As a consequence, it has not been possible to answer the inquiries made by either the South African or the Australian governments as to what is involved in the practical application of the safeguard provisions presently contained in British Canadian and American bilateral agreements.

"Despite our inability to provide for some months detailed information which your government understandably desires, we earnestly hope that both the South African and the Australian governments will be prepared to include in any bilateral agreements or contracts negotiated in the meantime language which would maintain safeguard rights in order that a common front may be maintained by the principal supplying nations.

"Bearing in mind that the International Agency is now in existence, the problem of the exercise of this right might be met by the inclusion in any bilateral agreement or contract of provisions to the effect that the International Agency would administer the safeguard provisions. In view of the time required for the actual shipment of natural uranium, the constructing of facilities, and the necessary interval of exposure of such material in a reactor, it would seem entirely reasonable to assume that the new agency would be in a position to exercise the safeguard functions when the occasion for this action arose.

"In conclusion, it should be emphasized that we are at a critical stage in the evolution of an international safeguard and accountability system, the long-range importance of which can hardly be overestimated. We fear that any breach in the ranks of governments that have traditionally worked together in this and related fields may very well cast in doubt the development by the Agency of an effective safeguard system."

2. The Canadian document referred to in the first paragraph is the aide mémoire transmitted to this embassy under your telegram E-175 February 1.† The appropriateness of referring to it in the South African aide mémoire would seem questionable. If it were desired to omit this reference neither the USA nor the UK would object.

3. For your information, Roper of the UK Embassy has read the text repeated above and has stated his personal satisfaction with the document as it now stands.

4. Roper's rough draft contained in paragraph 4 of our reference telegram has been examined by an AEC lawyer who prepared the following version.

"With respect to any Japanese project employing source materials supplied under this agreement by the government of South Africa or persons under its jurisdiction, the government of the Union of South Africa shall have the same rights with regard to the safeguarding of such material as are conferred upon the IAEA by Article XII-A of its statute if this transaction were an Agency project subject to safeguards."

TRIPARTITE MEETING ON CONTROL OF URANIUM

Yesterday afternoon Stewart, Counsellor of the South African Embassy, and Booker, Counsellor of the Australian Embassy, were given separately copies of the aide mémoire which had been agreed upon by the three governments in whose name the document was presented.

2. The final version of this aide mémoire reads as follows: Begins:

"At meetings in Washington in the late summer, followed by discussions in October in Vienna among representatives of the Australian, Canadian, South African, USA and UK delegations, consideration was given to common action with respect to the development of a system which would safeguard atomic energy materials and equipment supplied for peaceful purposes against diversion to military uses. A problem of immediate concern in this field has been to insure that bilateral agreements in the atomic energy field contained safeguard provisions consistent with Article XII of the International Atomic Energy Agency Statute. The governments of Canada, the USA and the UK have welcomed the statement of the South African and Australian representatives at Vienna that the two governments would consult with them prior to the consummation of agreements or contracts for the supply of uranium by Australia or South Africa to other governments. In this connection it is understood that the South African Atomic Energy Board has advised the Combined Development Agency of the interest of the Japanese in acquiring eight tons of natural uranium from South Africa.

It is clear that the countries which were represented at the informal discussions in Vienna last October have a common interest in the development of an effective safeguard system. All of them took an active part in insuring the incorporation in the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency of the safeguard provision, notably Article XII. It is the conviction of the governments of Canada, the USA, and the UK that it is most important during this formative period that action be avoided which would tend to prejudice the potential activity of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the safeguards field.

The three governments have under active consideration by technical experts the scope and practical means of implementing a safeguard system, whether under the auspices of the International Atomic Energy Agency or under the provisions of bilateral agreements. They are not yet in a position to formulate detailed proposals on these difficult questions. As a consequence, it is not yet possible to answer the inquiries of the Australian and South African governments as to what would be involved in the practical application of such safeguards.

Despite their inability to provide for some months the detailed information which your government desires, the three governments trust that the South African government will be prepared in bilateral agreements or contracts negotiated in the meanwhile to include language which would maintain safeguard rights in order that a common front may be maintained by the principal supplying nations.

Bearing in mind that the International Agency is now in existence, the problem of the exercise of this right might be met by the inclusion in any bilateral agreement or contract of provisions to the effect that the International Agency would administer the safeguard provisions in view of the time required for the actual delivery of natural uranium, the constructing of facilities, and the necessary interval of exposure of such material in a reactor, it would seem entirely reasonable to assume that the new Agency would be in a position to exercise the safeguard functions at the time when the uranium could be used for the production of plutonium and more extensive procedures would be required, and such implementation was therefore a practical necessity." Ends.

3. The foregoing is the text of the aide mémoire given the South Africans. The aide mémoire given the Australians omitted the last sentence of paragraph one and substituted "Australian government" for "South African government" in paragraph 4. You will note the redundancy at the conclusion at the end of the final paragraph. This was the result of a misunderstanding between the State Department and the British Embassy, the former believing that both phrases ("more extensive procedures will be required" and "such implementation was therefore a practical necessity") were to be included rather than only the latter. The inclusion of both phrases does not make for good English but does not alter the sense of the paragraph.

4. Stewart accepted the aide mémoire and promised to forward it to the South African government as quickly as possible. He asked a few questions, principally in order to clarify his own understanding of the situation, and also referred briefly to the political and economic pressures faced by his government, but his attitude was generally non committal.

5. Booker, on the other hand, gave the impression of being much better briefed and asked some searching questions. It was his impression (and he made it clear that he might not be wholly up to date on the thinking of the Australian Atomic Energy Commission) that the Australian approach to the general questions of sales of natural uranium was not so widely different from that of the UK, USA, and ourselves. His government wholeheartedly supported the concept of a safeguards system and as far as he was aware the Australians intend to make certain that the Agency assume responsibility for implementing the safeguards procedures set out in Article XII of its Statute. He was doubtful, however, whether the Agency would be an effective body for this purpose because of Soviet participation. Principally for this reason he was not too attracted to the proposal in the aide mémoire that the "Agency would administer the safeguard provisions" (last paragraph). He felt certain that his government would not wish as a matter of principle to assume responsibility for safeguards in the absence of detailed knowledge of techniques, requirements and costs involved in implementing a safeguards system which details he had hoped to receive from us as he knew his government was awaiting them. He believed that Australia would prefer simply to reserve the safeguards rights with the proviso that the Australian government might at some future date transfer the responsibility of implementing the safeguards to the Agency. Like Stewart, Booker referred to the domestic problems faced by his government. Finally, he undertook to communicate with the Australian government and to let us have their reactions as soon as possible.

6. As stated above, Booker said that he was not wholly clear as to the present thinking of the interested Australian authorities on this general question. It is therefore difficult to say whether the views he expressed would be concurred in by his government. If this should prove to be the case, then clearly the Australians are closer to our thinking than we realized.

URANIUM; SALE OF SURPLUS

62. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited has been the sole purchaser of uranium from the mines in Canada. The uranium was then sold under contract to the United States Atomic Energy Commission and to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority. In some cases the contracts called for deliveries to be completed by March 31st, 1962, in others by March 31st, 1963.

Recently, it had become apparent that certain of the mines would be able to produce more than required by their contracts with Eldorado. Both the U.K. and the U.S. atomic energy authorities had stated they were not prepared to accept any more uranium than the overall amount they had originally undertaken to buy. In these circumstances, consideration had been given to the best way of disposing of uranium that would become surplus. Although requirements of friendly countries other than the U.S. and the U.K. would not be large over the next few years, it would be desirable to establish trading relations with them soon with a view to opening up new markets for the future. The U.S. authorities were now considering an arrangement which would permit U.S. producers to sell abroad.

Because price might well be a decisive factor in capturing limited markets, it would be impossible for Eldorado to act as sales agent for competing Canadian producers. Accordingly, Eldorado recommended that producers be permitted to make their own arrangements for the sale of uranium surplus to contract requirement, subject to obtaining an export permit. Permits should only be granted for export to a country with which Canada had a bilateral agreement for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. When sales were only for small quantities for testing and research, permits might be granted for exports to a friendly country without a bilateral agreement for a sale up to 100 kilos; the aggregate sales to any such country should not exceed 1,000 kilos.

It was very much in Canada's interest that the uranium be in as finished a form as possible. Facilities for the production of uranium oxide and metal existed and could be made available to the producers on a custom basis.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated. (Memorandum, undated and unsigned, Cab. Doc. 96-58†)

63. Mr. Churchill concurred in the proposal and recommended it for approval. Indeed, he saw it as the only course open in the circumstances.

64. During the discussion it was pointed out that uranium exports were now running at the rate of about $200 million a year. There would be a serious marketing problem when the contracts with the U.K. and the U.S. expired. If Canada did not take steps to meet the needs of potential purchasers they would buy elsewhere.

65. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the potential surplus of uranium, and agreed that individual producers be authorized to make their own arrangements for the sale of any uranium surplus to contract requirements with Eldorado Mining and Refining, Limited, subject to obtaining an export permit under the conditions proposed by the Minister.

CONTROL OF ATOMIC EXPORTS

At the conclusion of the USA-Canada-UK discussions on recent USA developments with Euratom (our telegram 1035 May 13†) Schaetzel raised the question of our tripartite approach to South Africa and Australia last fall on the control of atomic exports. None of the three countries was able to report any response. It was felt that in view of the recent USA and Canadian announcements concerning private sales of uranium and the USA-Euratom discussions and in view of the length of time that has elapsed that it would be appropriate to talk to Australia and South Africa again.

2. Roper of the UK Embassy expressed the opinion that both countries had been disturbed last fall to be called in to the State Department to find themselves confronted not repeat not by State alone, but by the three countries in a somewhat formal fashion. It was not repeat not felt that this reaction was justified but nevertheless it was agreed that on this occasion State alone would sound them out and in a more informal manner.

3. After Roper left we raised with Breithut and Schaetzel the question of Van Rhijn's alleged proposal for a price stabilization board for uranium. They were not repeat not aware of any such proposal and State Department was not repeat not considering the idea. They had gathered in a general way while Van Rhijn was here that South Africa wished there were a floor price for uranium but the subject was never advanced in a direct or serious manner and it had been paid scant attention. They expressed dissatisfaction with Van Rhijn and implied that he had returned to South Africa with a number of vague misconceptions. Jesse Johnson who heads AEC's Division of Raw Materials has just returned from South Africa and State Department plans to see if he can throw any light on the matter. As we might get more information via State than directly we left the matter at this stage.

4. The working parties on controls in both the UK and the USA have been working actively but Roper says it will be July before the UK group has its paper ready. Vander Weyden of AEC tells us that they completed their paper three months ago but other work has prevented the commission from reviewing it. There was disagreement among the staff and the report incorporates both majority and minority views. Vander Weyden thought that they would be ready by July also. The original idea that in the interim the working parties would keep in touch with each other informally appears to have gone by default.

EXPORT OF URANIUM¹⁰

Although the new uranium sales policy announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on May 7 permits private producers to make their own arrangements for the sale of uranium surplus to their contractual commitments to Eldorado, and also provides that small research quantities of uranium may be exported to countries with which Canada has not concluded an agreement for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the Government's policy continues to be that more substantial quantities of uranium may only be exported to countries with which we have such an agreement. The conclusion of a bilateral agreement of this kind is therefore antecedent to the sale of uranium abroad and it is clearly desirable for this reason (as well as for many others) that we conclude bilateral agreements with as many friendly countries as possible. Following the announcement of the new sales policy, we have received letters from uranium producers indicating their concern and interest in this matter, and we must assume that Mr. Pearson's question to the Minister on Wednesday about "negotiations for the sale of uranium" was prompted by similar feelings. It is the primary responsibility of this Department to undertake negotiations for such bilateral agreements and we have already done so in a number of cases. The purpose of this memorandum is to relate our responsibilities in this respect to the problem of the sale of uranium abroad in a realistic way, to describe what we have done to initiate negotiations with interested countries and to suggest what further action might be taken.

2. It has been clear for some time that Canadian uranium producers would be developing productive capacity in excess of that necessary to meet their contractual commitments to Eldorado. It has also been clear that, with the expiry of the U.S. contracts for the purchase of Canadian uranium (the expiry dates for the various contracts fall between March 31, 1962 and March 31, 1963), Canadian producers might face an extremely difficult marketing problem, the gravity of which would, of course, depend on the extent to which the U.S. exercises its options to purchase Canadian uranium after the expiry of the present contracts and on the development of other markets abroad. It was, in part, to enable producers to begin making their own efforts to meet these problems that the Minister of Trade & Commerce on May 7 announced the new sales policy.

¹⁰ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

This seems to me a conspicuously clear and sensible memorandum. The recommendations in para. 10 have my full support. D.V. LeP[an]

This is a very good memorandum. I agree with the recommendations in para. 10. J. L[éger]

See note p. 6. [voir note 14/see footnote 14] Mr. Crowe: Altho[ugh] this is somewhat out of date, please see together with note. J. L[angle]y] 4/6

3. The extent of the marketing problem after 1962 cannot yet be estimated even approximately. We have, however, some data on the situation which faces the industry in the immediate future. Two Canadian uranium mines, Algom and Bicroft, have developed excess capacity for which no market exists after July 1, the date from which Eldorado will not accept uranium deliveries in excess of contractual commitments (the fact that the operations of some uranium mines have been behind schedule has, up to the present, permitted Eldorado to accept deliveries in excess of contractual commitments from the mines capable of making these deliveries.) We do not know precisely what the excess capacity of Bicroft will be but we understand that Algom can produce 500 tons a year above its contractual commitments. Even considering the capacity of the Canadian industry (15,000 tons per year) this is a substantial quantity.

4. As is natural, Canadian producers have been showing signs of concern at the marketing problems, both short and long term, with which they are faced. Before the announcement of the Government's new policy, the Rio Tinto group and Bicroft Uranium Mines both wrote on this subject to us. Since the announcement of the policy, uranium producers, who have formed a Uranium Producers Association affiliated with the Canadian Metal Mining Association, have sent Mr. V.C. Wansbrough, Managing Director of the CMMA to Ottawa to seek the views of the interested Departments on this general problem. Mr. Wansbrough called on us and a copy of a memorandum which he prepared, for the benefit of the members of the UPA as a result of his visit, is attached.†

5. In the potentially difficult situation which faces the uranium industry there has been a tendency to regard the conclusion of bilateral agreements between Canada and other countries as a critical element in the immediate solution of marketing problems. As we pointed out to Mr. Wansbrough, the relationship between these agreements and uranium sales is double-edged. While it is true that they are a sine qua non of the export of Canadian uranium, it is equally true that successful efforts by Canadian producers to market their product abroad will give the foreign governments concerned an added incentive for entering negotiations with us for the conclusion of agreements which they may not otherwise feel are very urgent.

6. In any case, a realistic appraisal of the relationship between bilaterals and sales must take account of the market outlook for uranium over the next few years. While very little definite data is available, it is clear that markets will only develop as the countries concerned get their power programmes under way. Outside of the U.K. there is only one full scale power reactor in operation (the Shippingport reactor in the United States) and studies by AECL indicate that a market for only minimal quantities of Canadian uranium will be available for the next few years. Last year, before the announcement of the Government's new policy and before it was realized that the Canadian industry would be developing excess capacity, Eldorado made arrangements with USAEC to withhold from delivery to the United States a quantity of uranium estimated as being sufficient to meet the requirements of all the countries who might wish to purchase this material in Canada during the next five years. The figure, which is strictly confidential, was 200 tons per year for five years and of this 100 tons per year has been earmarked for delivery to Germany. It will therefore be seen that Eldorado estimated the total requirements for Canadian uranium, apart from contracts at that time in effect, at a figure which we must regard as almost negligible in relation to total Canadian production. The situation with regard to Japan, which we regard as one of our better customers, will serve as an example. Our Ambassador in Tokyo has reported that Japanese requirements for uranium for the current year are less than eight tons and that "Japanese demand for uranium from us seems unlikely to exceed relatively small amounts for research purposes until Japan produces her own power reactors." It is, of course, possible that Canadian producers may be able to find markets on their own abroad but it would seem that the main value of their efforts will lie less in immediate sales than in establishing contacts for the future.

7. Faced with these difficulties, there may well continue to be a tendency on the part of producers, who find themselves with excess capacity, to argue that they are at a disadvantage vis-à-vis their U.S. competitors in their search for foreign markets because Canada has, at the present time, bilateral agreements or arrangements only with the U.K., the U.S., Germany and Switzerland, whereas the U.S. has comprehensive bilateral agreements with fourteen countries. However unjustified, this argument has popular appeal, is not easy to counter effectively and is politically tricky. It also contains a grain of truth which will become increasingly significant as we move towards the early 1960's. Essentially, the fact is, of course, that the Canadian Government is anxious to enter into agreements for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy with other friendly countries and has taken active steps to do so, including the circulation of our draft standard bilateral agreement to interested countries and follow-ups to this, both formal and informal.

8. The United States is making a very large effort in international cooperation in this field. For example, it has a standing offer to supply half the cost of research reactors in friendly foreign countries (within a ceiling of $350,000) and it has concluded some fifty research agreements with such countries. These agreements are not relevant in the present context, since they do not provide for the export of nuclear materials apart from a few pounds of enriched uranium, but there will in future be a tendency for the countries concerned to look to the United States for cooperation in their power programmes and as a supplier of materials. Incidentally, the U.S. is the only country now in a position to sell enriched uranium abroad and is, with the United Kingdom, the only experienced supplier of nuclear plant in the Western World.

9. Apart from its research agreements, the U.S. has comprehensive agreements with the following countries: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, Peru, South Africa, Spain, Switzerland and the U.K., in addition of course to its agreement with Canada. We already have agreements with three of these countries and are engaged in negotiations with one other (Australia). In addition we have sent a copy of our draft standard bilateral agreement to four of the other countries (Belgium, France, Italy and South Africa). There remain Brazil, The Netherlands, Norway, Peru and Spain, with whom we have not been in touch since they had not, at the time our standard agreement was being prepared, expressed any interest in cooperating with us in this field or in purchasing our uranium. On the other hand, we have passed our bilateral agreement to a number of other countries which have expressed such an interest (namely, India, Sweden, Pakistan, Denmark and Japan). We have reason to believe that negotiations with Japan for the conclusion of an agreement will open this summer but none of the remaining countries have shown an inclination to pursue the matter. Indeed, the Swedes have informed us that they are not ready, at this time, to open negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement although they hope that the informal cooperation which has taken place between our two countries in this field for a number of years will continue and expand.

10. This brings us to the core of the political problem involved. We can only negotiate agreements for cooperation in this field with countries who are prepared to cooperate with us on a mutually acceptable basis and there is clearly a limit to the approaches which we can appropriately and with dignity make to them on this subject. I think, however, that we have not yet exhausted these possibilities and would suggest that we should:

(a) Send copies of our draft standard bilateral agreement, under cover of an appropriate Note, to the countries which might be interested but have not yet received a copy. (The Netherlands,¹¹ Norway, Spain, Finland and certain Latin American countries, perhaps including Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba and Peru.)

(b) Again formally approach any country which has shown a definite and precise interest in entering negotiations with us. At the moment I think that only Pakistan falls into this category.¹²

(c) Ask our missions abroad to seek an opportunity of asking other countries to whom we have passed a copy of our draft standard bilateral agreement informally whether they would be interested in entering negotiations.

(d) Consider, in due course, whether any further approach to the French may be desirable.¹³

It would be unprofitable to regard ourselves as being in competition with the United States for the conclusion of bilateral agreements. The interest of many foreign countries in entering such agreements with the U.S. is immediate and material (for the reasons given in paragraph 8). On the other hand, we must seek to expand our own cooperative relations as rapidly as possible and the foregoing suggestions provide one way of doing so. Although we cannot offer the same facilities or financial inducements as the United States, I think that cooperation with Canada has much to offer the countries concerned in the future: to mention but a few, we are a leading atomic power, foreign scientists seem anxious to visit Chalk River and exchange information with us, we propose to establish a reactor school there shortly and the Universities are also developing training facilities and we do offer a stable and assured source of natural uranium.

11. It must be recognized that the present uncertainty with regard to arrangements for safeguards against the diversion of uranium to military uses may well be a factor in determining the attitude of foreign countries to any proposal on our part that we enter negotiations for a bilateral agreement. We have inferred from our talks with Swedish officials that this was one reason they do not wish to negotiate an agreement with us at this time and the U.S. negotiations with EURATOM, which have further confused the situation regarding safeguards, will not have passed unnoticed abroad. It is possible that other countries will follow the Swedish lead and that the response to the démarches suggested in the preceding paragraph will be disappointing. I would not suggest that this should lead us to recommend a change in Canadian Government policy on safeguards at this time but I think that we should continue to press for progress in the work on this subject which we have undertaken jointly with the USA and UK and that we should reconsider our position if it seems unlikely that a workable cooperative safeguards system can be evolved. We must also keep the EURATOM situation under review since it is not certain at this time in what way the safeguards (which have still to be agreed upon in detail) will operate in practice and we cannot afford to apply more stringent conditions than those of the U.S. and other leading countries. In this connection, we have sent Roger Smith, the AECL official most intimately connected with Chalk River's safeguards system, to Washington to review technical progress of the Working Parties considering this question and his preliminary report is encouraging in some respects. We should be in a position to meet with British and U.S. officials soon. If the general approach suggested in this memorandum seems sensible, we must recognize that a delay in beginning negotiations for bilateral agreements with some foreign countries may be the price which we have to pay for our willingness to pursue further the attempt to set up a safeguards system in cooperation with other friendly countries.¹⁴

THE APPLICATION OF SAFEGUARDS TO NUCLEAR EXPORTS

PART I — GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

It is the policy of the Canadian Government that safeguards against diversion to military use should be applied to nuclear materials exported from Canada for peaceful use. A similar policy is pursued by the United States and United Kingdom Governments in respect of such exports from their countries and the bilateral agreements of all three countries with other countries or regional organizations provide for the application of safeguards.

The Standard Safeguards Article in Canadian bilaterals, which is reproduced as Appendix B of this report, provides for the application of safeguards to identified material only (i.e. as defined in the Agreement, this means, broadly speaking, uranium and derived substances). Other nuclear materials, such as heavy water, reactors, etc., serve an essential role in the production processes by which nuclear source materials are converted into fissile materials usable for military purposes. These items must therefore be controlled in any comprehensive safeguards system. However, since it will be several years before Canada is in a position to export such items, we will have neither the right nor opportunity to exercise safeguards over them during this period. The remainder of this paper will therefore address itself to the problem of applying safeguards to nuclear source and fissile materials. It must, however, be recognized that nuclear plant is as essential to the production of fissile material as are nuclear source materials, that safeguards during the process of production of fissile materials must be applied in the nuclear plant itself and that it would be inequitable to expect the producers of source materials alone to bear both the burden and possible commercial disadvantage of applying a safeguards system.

Objectives of a Safeguards System

3. While nuclear energy has a variety of military applications, including propulsion, power supply and materials' irradiation, the essential object of a safeguards system from Canada's point of view is to prevent the diversion of uranium supplied for peaceful uses to the manufacture of atomic weapons.

4. Natural uranium cannot itself be used for this purpose since the concentration of the fissile isotope (U 235) is far too low. Atomic weapons can, however, be made from uranium in which the content of the fissile isotope has been increased from the natural concentration of 0.7% to something over 20% or from plutonium, which is created by the irradiation of natural uranium in a reactor. [Atomic weapons can, incidentally, also be made from another fissile isotope of uranium, U 233, which is created by the irradiation of thorium in a reactor.]

5. The isolation of plutonium and of the fissile isotopes of uranium in quantities which would serve a weapons programme requires treatment of the source materials in a processing plant. By passage through an isotope separation plant, natural uranium can be processed to yield a high concentration of U 235. Similarly, plutonium formed in natural uranium which has been irradiated in a reactor can be isolated in a chemical processing plant.

6. Since isotope separation plants are extremely expensive to build and operate, it is doubtful whether any country other than the USA, UK and USSR (which at present process such plants) and France (which is considering building a plant) would contemplate their construction in the near future and it is even more doubtful whether, if they should decide to do so, the construction and operation of such a plant could be kept secret. This is not, however, true of a chemical processing plant which would be substantially cheaper and might be clandestinely constructed and operated.

7. In view of the foregoing, it is considered that for the next few years the main problem facing Canada will be to apply safeguards against the diversion of natural uranium to the manufacture of atomic weapons via the plutonium cycle. Natural uranium might be diverted with a view to its irradiation and processing in clandestine plants or the plutonium might be diverted either before or after chemical processing. It is therefore necessary to contemplate the application of safeguards to natural uranium in all of the forms in which it may be supplied by this country and at all stages in its processing and use abroad: during refining, during fabrication into metal and fuel elements, during irradiation and subsequent storage, during chemical processing and, finally, safeguards will also be required over the plutonium produced and over the further uses of this plutonium.

Note: The foregoing does not cover the possible uses of the thorium - U 233 cycle for military purposes but similar considerations arise.

Some Limitations of the Safeguards Concept

8. For both technical and practical reasons, no safeguards system can completely prevent wilful diversion of uranium and plutonium. Except for uranium metal it is not possible, even for those responsible for operating nuclear plants, to make completely accurate inventory reports of these items. For example, plutonium formation in a given quantity of uranium irradiated at a known power output level for a given time in a reactor of known characteristics, can often not be predicted within 5%. There is thus a margin of error in all such reports and, in addition, operating staff could wilfully falsify records, instruments, etc. to provide a much larger margin for diversion. A safeguards system can limit the amount of diversion possible but the narrower these limits are to be, the more elaborate, costly and onerous the system required. It has been suggested that a simple audit of operating records might detect 25% diversion from a reactor complex, while the best figures which can be achieved by a full time resident staff of inspectors in such a complex might be about 2%.

9. Assuming that the "recipient" country has access to an "uncontrolled" reactor and chemical processing plant, any safeguards system would be ineffective and would give endless opportunity for evasion and deception, if the major uranium producing countries did not subscribe to it. An effective safeguards system would require the closest collaboration between producing countries in order to permit strict accounting of materials supplies to each "recipient" country. The chances of achieving agreement of this kind on a safeguards system are highly uncertain. Among the major producing countries are some which may seek a commercial advantage by offering "uncontrolled" uranium (Australia and South Africa may fall in this group), others which are in principle opposed to safeguards and do not think that they will work (France and India) and still others whose position is as yet undefined but probably opposed to safeguards (USSR).

10. The views of "recipient" countries are equally important. Probably no such country would voluntarily submit to safeguards as a matter of principle under present circumstances. Some countries have accepted them, lacking any alternative means of obtaining nuclear materials, but other countries (India, Sweden and France, for example) have curtailed their nuclear programmes or embarked on high-cost production of their own rather than purchase available material which entailed safeguards. A number of recipient countries are probably at present withholding judgment on this issue pending the establishment of a working safeguards system. From this point of view, it is desirable that such a system be put into effect as soon as possible, that it be adopted as widely as possible and, in consequence, be no more onerous than absolutely necessary and fully protect the amour propre and sovereignty of recipient governments.

Some Methods of Applying Safeguards

11. The most effective means of preventing the diversion of fissile materials is by the international ownership of isotope separation and chemical processing plants, combined with a small staff of inspectors to detect the construction and operation of clandestine plants. Since plutonium is the main object of concern during the next few years, the international ownership of chemical processing plants could suffice during this period. There are, however, grave difficulties in the way of this solution. Not least among these is the fact that, since the three most advanced atomic powers would probably not consider accepting such a system themselves, national pride would certainly lead some other countries to a similar refusal.

12. The most effective safeguards system which could be established on the basis of inspection rather than ownership, would demand a fairly large resident inspection staff in each reactor complex. The Working Group understands that the US AEC has been working on the details of such a system and it has, therefore, not duplicated this work. From the information available, however, it would seem that the costs and staff required for such a system are substantial. One estimate suggests that an inspection staff of 111 persons would be required, at an annual cost of about $1 million, for the application of safeguards to a complex of ten reactors with a total electrical output of 250 mw. This may well be an extreme case, but it indicates the order of magnitude of the effort required. It should also be borne in mind that such a system might well give rise to friction with the recipient country and that diversion could only with certainty be restricted to 2% - 3%.

13. A third alternative would be a system based on a regular periodic audit of nuclear materials supplied to a recipient country, supplemented by spot checks by traveling inspectors. These checks would be designed to verify the accuracy of the audit reports. Such a system could probably not with certainty detect diversion of below 5% - 10%.

14. The Working Group considered whether it would be possible to make a choice between the foregoing alternatives on the basis of a mathematical calculation. For example, the NRX and projected CANDU reactors may be taken as typical of a large research and of a large power reactor respectively. Their thermal outputs are 40 mw and 800 mw and their annual plutonium production 9 kg and 185 kg respectively. On the assumption that 10 kg is the quantity of fissile material required for an atomic weapon, it would follow that diversion at the rate of 5% would lead to the accumulation of enough diverted plutonium from NRX for the fabrication of one such weapon every 20 years or so and from CANDU for one every year. Thus if a country had only one power reactor of the CANDU type, and if it were considered that the acceptable level of possible clandestine production of atomic weapons was less than one per year, then it would be necessary to put into effect the more rigorous safeguards system aimed at restricting possible diversion to 2%, and even this would permit the production of one illicit weapon every 2 ½ years.

Conclusions

15. However, the Working Group concluded that calculations of this kind are not particularly meaningful, except possibly in the very short run, since the most important factors for consideration are not mathematical ones. In the first place, the Working Group does not believe that the clandestine fabrication of even one atomic weapon from materials intended for peaceful use can be accepted with equanimity. Since diversion cannot, for technical reasons, be completely ruled out by any safeguards system, the Working Group was driven to the conclusion that the objective of such a system should be to reinforce the moral and legal obligations undertaken by recipient countries in bilateral agreements, by making it unlikely that detection could be evaded in the long run. The corollary of this would appear to be that, so long as possible misuse of nuclear materials remains a cause for concern, Canada should refuse to supply materials to any country if there appeared to be serious doubt as to that country's good faith and willingness to carry out its obligations scrupulously.

16. The foregoing conclusion is reinforced by the fact that no safeguards system can prevent the forcible seizure by a country of the atomic installations within its borders and of the fissile material contained in them. In view of the difficulty of hiding a clandestine atomic programme and of the political opprobrium which the discovery of attempted diversion would entail, it seems more likely that a country determined on a weapons programme, but without its own uncontrolled means of carrying one out, would rely on seizure rather than on diversion.

17. The Working Group, suggests that:

(a) despite the difficulties involved, the system outlined in paragraph 11 above deserves the most careful consideration. It offers the most secure system and would probably avoid many of the undesirable features of the bilateral application of safeguards. Its attractiveness is increased by the fact that there is unlikely to be an economic justification for the establishment of national chemical processing plants in most countries during the next decade or more, and by the ENEA precedent in setting up Eurochemic as an international institution;

(b) if the United States and the United Kingdom are determined to establish a rigorous full-time resident inspection system, Canada should participate to the extent that its exports of nuclear materials require. This course would seem to be dictated partly by considerations of international responsibility and morality, and partly by the fact that safeguards, to be effective, must be applied on a uniform basis and with the closest collaboration between all participants (perhaps even to the extent of joint application of the system);

(c) Canada should take the initiative in advocating a simple audit and spot check system. Details of such a system are given in Part II of this paper.

18. It is, of course, recognized that recipient countries might take advantage of the margin of uncertainty inherent in an audit system to divert quantities of fissile material less than the measurement and accounting error. On the other hand, the Working Group considers that a simple audit and spot check would fulfill the practical objectives of a safeguards system as outlined above. It also considers that the positive advantages of adopting this safeguards method are overwhelming. It would be relatively inexpensive, even if introduced to cover large-scale operations, and it would be relatively inoffensive to recipient countries. In the Working Group's opinion this last may well prove to be a critical argument in its favour. While many countries are at present prepared to accept bilateral safeguards, at least in principle, in order to get their atomic programmes under way, they will certainly seek to free themselves of these safeguards if they prove onerous. As time passes, alternative "uncontrolled" sources of nuclear materials will become available and all producing countries will find themselves under increasing commercial and political pressure to relax the conditions they impose on the supply of materials. In these circumstances, it would seem that the only certain way in which to ensure that the bulk of the world's peaceful uses of atomic energy are subject to safeguards in the medium to long run is by the widespread acceptance of the idea that safeguards are desirable as a matter of principle. If this approach is to succeed, the safeguards system now advocated must be the least onerous one compatible with security (on the criteria developed in this paper).

19. It is generally accepted that the International Atomic Energy Agency is the appropriate forum in which to promote this idea and that through it a genuine multilateral safeguards system might be developed and applied. For practical reasons, however, the first steps towards such a system are likely to be taken on a bilateral basis. It would, therefore, seem important that Canada and other countries which share our concern in this matter, should not now advocate a system which is likely to prove unacceptable to the majority at a later stage. To do so would be to invite the premature demise of the multilateral safeguards concept, involving a very embarrassing situation in respect of the more rigorous safeguards system which we might in the meantime have imposed bilaterally on some countries (among which will be some of our closest friends). The audit and spot system would seem to offer the best chances of gaining acceptance for multilateral safeguards and would, in the Working Group's opinion, also meet Canada's immediate needs arising out of the safeguards provisions of our bilateral agreements.

PART II — PROPOSED PROCEDURE FOR AUDIT AND INSPECTION OF SOURCE AND SPECIAL NUCLEAR MATERIAL SUPPLIED BY CANADA UNDER BILATERAL AGREEMENTS FOR CO-OPERATION IN THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Introduction

20. This proposed procedure covers the materials which might be supplied by Canada under bilateral agreements within the next three or four years. It assumes that no recipient country will have an isotope separation plant (e.g. diffusion plant) within that time. In particular, the procedure will cover

(a) Uranium salts — such as mine concentrates and uranium oxide whether of reactor grade or not,

(b) Uranium metal in bulk form — normally this would be in the form of metal dingots or pieces,

(c) Unirradiated uranium metal or salts as fabricated units — these would normally be fuel elements and would have identifying numbers of markings,

(d) Irradiated uranium metal or salts — these would contain plutonium produced from the neutron irradiation,

(e) Separated plutonium as metal or salts — this material could either have been supplied by Canada or could have been produced from uranium supplied by Canada.

21. The procedure does not cover items such as enriched uranium, heavy water or reactors, or major reactor components.

Accounting Records to be Maintained by the Receiving Country

22. Any country receiving material from Canada subject to inspection would be required to set up a system of accounts for this material so that a record was kept of the quantity and location of all stocks. No specific method of accounting need be followed by the country but the procedure should be such that the information required for the reports described below could be obtained from these records.

23. The receiving country would be required to give a distinctive serial number of each fuel element made from Canadian uranium supplied. The accounting records should show the location of each fuel element up to the point where it loses its identity. (This would occur should it be dissolved).

24. The receiving country would prepare a report which would answer the questions listed in Appendix A as often as may prove necessary in order to meet the purposes of control. This might vary from once every two months to once every six months. Copies of each report would be sent to the Canadian Government (or, if it were agreed, to an outside organization designed by the Canadian Government).

Audit and Inspection by the Canadian Government

25. The Canadian Government would assign to a committee or group (or, if agreed, to some outside organization) the responsibility for checking the accuracy of the reports submitted. Each report would be examined to determine whether or not there were any apparent inconsistencies and this would be followed by spot-checks in the country concerned by representatives of the designated inspection organization. The extent of such inspection would depend upon the amount of material held by the country concerned, the complexity of the processes containing the plutonium and uranium and on the general integrity of the country being inspected. For example, should a country only have fabricated natural uranium fuel elements, inspection would largely consist of a physical inventory check. It must be expected, however, that in most cases competent scientists or engineers will be needed for this work. They must be alert to detect any possible flaws in the answers given to their questions. They will be at a great disadvantage if they are not good linguists. It is believed that they will be most successful if they are technical experts who would be welcomed by the organizations in the country concerned on this account.

26. The "inspector(s)" would select at random information listed in the reports received and perform such examination of the country's own records and of the actual material as may be required to check the accuracy of the submitted reports. If these random selected items were found to be correct, the whole report would be assumed to be accurate.

27. The physical check might in some cases be a direct count or measurement of the physical inventory. In other cases it might be an indirect check on the accuracy of the data. Examples of such indirect checks might be

(a) An isotopic measurement of the uranium in irradiated fuel elements or in the solution formed on dissolving these elements to determine if the isotopic composition was in accord with the reported power output.

(b) An isotopic analysis of plutonium in solution to determine if the plutonium composition agreed with the reported irradiation of the uranium from which the plutonium was formed.

(c) Radiation measurements of monitors placed in the reactor to determine total power production.

28. After each report had been found to contain no errors, the receiving country would be notified that the report was accepted by the Government of Canada. The receiving country might well wish to publicize this acceptance as evidence that its atomic energy activities were entirely peaceful.

Personnel and Costs Involved

29. The routine reports on the receipt and disposition of uranium and fissile material will require analysis by experts. This might be done by a committee or similar body consisting of personnel drawn from a number of departments and agencies in Ottawa who would do this work as part of their regular duties. The subsequent inspections will almost always have to be carried out by experts drawn from the Atomic Energy Control Board, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and perhaps Mines and Technical Surveys. It is thought that the work might be carried out by such officials without significant interference with their present duties. The precise number of experts required can only be determined on an ad hoc basis at the time and in the light of the particular purposes for which the materials in question are being used.

30. It is unlikely that in the next few years the cost of carrying out control activities of this type will be significant. The main additional expense will be the cost of traveling, and this could be in the region of $10,000 to $20,000 per annum. It would appear difficult and undesirable to seek to charge control costs to the receiving organization. It is suggested that such costs as there may be should in principle be met by the Canadian Government and it would not appear necessary at this stage to consider precisely how this should be done.

In this report weight should be given in metric units as accurately as are known. When weights are not known, approximate weights should be given, together with an estimate of probable error.

I. Unirradiated Uranium

- (a) Quantity of uranium that is not in form of numbered fuel elements
 - (i) received since last report
 - (ii) transferred from this category since last report
 - (iii) quantity and location of material in stock at time of report
 - (b) Quantity and serial number of fuel elements
 - (i) received as finished fuel elements since last report
 - (ii) produced in country from material in category I(a) since last report
 - (iii) added to reactors since last report
 - (iv) removed from stock for reasons other than adding to reactors since last report
 - (v) quantity, location and serial numbers of elements in stock at time of report.
- II. Uranium undergoing Irradiation* — A separate report should be made for each reactor
- (a) Quantity and serial number of fuel elements added to each reactor since last report.
 - (b) Quantity, serial number and location in reactor of fuel elements in each reactor at time of report.
 - (c) Power generated since last report by each element in the reactors.

- (d) Calculated plutonium content of each element in the reactor.
 - (e) Quantity, serial number, power generated during period irradiated and calculated plutonium content at time of removal of elements removed from reactors since last report.
- III. Irradiated Uranium — A separate report should be submitted for each storage area.
- (a) Quantity, serial number, and plutonium content and source of elements placed in storage since last report.
 - (b) Quantity, serial number and plutonium content of elements removed from storage, and explanation of what has been done with these elements since last report.
 - (c) Quantity, location, serial number and plutonium content of elements in stock at time of report.
- IV. Chemical Processing of Uranium Procured from Canada — A separate report should be submitted for each chemical processing installation.
- (a) Quantity, serial number and plutonium content of irradiated elements removed from storage for which processing has commenced since last report.
 - (b) Quantity, serial number and measured plutonium content of irradiated elements for which chemical processing has been completed since last report.
 - (c) Quantity and location of material separated in chemical processing installation since last report.
 - (i) Plutonium
 - (ii) Depleted uranium
 - (d) Estimated losses in chemical processing installation since last report
 - (i) Plutonium

SAFEGUARDS ARTICLE FROM CANADIAN STANDARD DRAFT OF A BILATERAL AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION IN THE PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Each supplying Contracting Party shall be permitted to assure itself that the provisions of this Agreement are complied with and, in particular, that identified material is being used for peaceful purposes only, and to that end the supplying Contracting Party shall have the right

(a) to examine the design of equipment (including nuclear reactors) or facilities in which identified material is to be used or stored, with a view to ensuring that such identified material will not further any military purpose and that effective application of the safeguards provided for in this Agreement shall be feasible;

(b) to require the maintenance and production of adequate records to assist in ensuring accountability for identified material;

(c) to call for and receive progress reports;

(d) to approve the means to be used for the chemical processing of identified material after irradiation, with a view to ensuring that such processing will not lend itself to diversion of identified material to military use;

(e) to send representatives, designated by it after consultation with the other Contracting Party, into the territory of the latter, which representatives shall have access at all times to all places, equipment and facilities where identified material is used, stored or located, to all data relating to such identified material, and to all persons who by reason of their occupation deal with such identified material or such data, as may be necessary to account for all identified material and to determine whether such identified material is being used for peaceful purposes only. Such representatives, provided they shall not thereby be delayed or otherwise impeded in the exercise of their functions, shall be accompanied by representatives of the other Contracting Party if the latter so requests.

2. At or after the time the International Atomic Energy Agency is in a position to carry out the safeguards functions provided for in its Statute, the Contracting Parties will consult together to determine whether and to what extent they may wish to modify the safeguards provisions set out in this Agreement so that they may conform more closely with those of the said Statute, and to have the application of safeguards carried out by the said Agency.

3. Each Contracting Party, if it has determined that identified material is furthering a military purpose, shall have the right to suspend or cancel scheduled delivery of source material, special nuclear material, and fuel, and to require the return of all identified material under the control of the other Contracting Party.

II. THE APPLICATION OF SAFEGUARDS TO NUCLEAR EXPORTS

9. The Chairman recalled that at the last Panel meeting in February, the Secretary to the Cabinet had requested that a paper be prepared outlining the Canadian attitude to a safeguards system. A working group had been set up and the paper now before the Panel was the end product of their studies. He invited Mr. Gray to comment on their proposals before the Panel.

10. Mr. Gray said that he concurred with the proposal for a system of audit. The proposed U.S. and U.K. systems were not acceptable solutions to this problem and were far too costly to operate. However, it would be difficult to convince the U.S. that our system would establish an acceptable standard of protection. It would be our intention, if the Panel approved the memorandum, to put forward this system during the forthcoming tripartite discussions with the U.K. and the U.S. If an acceptable system was agreed on at these discussions, it would be proposed to the I.A.E.A. as the basis for an international safeguards system.

11. Mr. Langley, in commenting on the paper, said that there was an obligation under bilateral agreements to apply a safeguards system. The paper before the Committee was an attempt to outline such a system which would be both inexpensive and politically acceptable to both parties to our bilateral agreements. In addition, it had a further purpose. At the tripartite discussions last fall, Canada, the U.S.A. and the U.K. had agreed to work towards a uniform safeguards system and, for this purpose, to produce proposals for discussion at a reconvened tripartite meeting this summer. We had received a U.K. paper and understood that a U.S. paper was now being prepared. The working group had thought that the paper now under discussion might, with suitable amendment, be sent as a Canadian contribution for the tripartite meeting. In this connection, there seemed to be little sense of urgency on the part of the U.K. or the U.S. and it would seem therefore to be in Canada's interest to press for tripartite meetings this fall, and thus try and clear up the many uncertainties in respect to safeguards and their application. This was important to Canada both commercially and politically. In our relations with countries with which we have or wish to have bilateral agreements, there were also broader implications since I.A.E.A. was unlikely to establish a safeguards system until some bilateral precedent had been established.

12. Mr. Gray, in commenting on the U.S.A. - Euratom agreement, said that the U.S. officials argued adamantly that they had control over the safeguards aspect of the agreement. They said that Euratom had to satisfy the U.S. that the inspection system agreed on had been carried out, otherwise the agreement would be automatically negated.

13. Mr. Langley said that the safeguards agreement between U.S.A. and Euratom was not the type of system that had been envisaged during the tripartite discussions last fall. He felt that it had been a concession to Euratom to allow them to apply their own safeguards.

14. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance felt that the main trouble was in the precedent that this agreement would set.

15. Dr. Mackenzie said that the main purpose of the safeguards system was to prevent other countries from making atomic bombs. He felt that European countries, France excluded, had little desire to make atomic weapons and therefore any system would have limited preventative application. He thought that the only hope for effective implementation of a safeguards system would be under the auspices of the I.A.E.C.

16. Mr. Gray said that one of the troubles was that the Indians were now saying that as a concession had been made there was no legitimate or practical purpose for applying a safeguards system.

17. In commenting on the proposed Canadian system of audit, Mr. Gray said that we could not absolutely control diversion of plutonium and would have to rely to a certain extent on the goodwill of the nations subjected to inspection. He felt that under the proposed U.S. system it would be unlikely that we would sell much uranium.

18. Dr. Mackenzie favoured Mr. Langley's suggestion that we should show our paper to the U.K. before the forthcoming tripartite discussions. He felt that if these discussions were unforthcoming as far as agreement was concerned, that we should adopt our own safeguards until agreement was reached. Dr. Mackenzie noted that the Atomic Energy Control Board would be legally responsible for carrying out this safeguards system and for issuing permits to export uranium, but that the system would most probably be operated by the A.E.C.L. He hoped that the system of policing would eventually be taken over by the I.A.E.A.

19. The Panel invited Mr. Langley to redraft Paragraph 17 and dispatch copies of the paper to the U.K. and the U.S. The position of the Canadian representatives at the renewed tripartite meetings should be that this paper represented the safeguards system which Canada intended to put into effect failing or pending agreement on a tripartite or broader basis.

URANIUM

We have heard a rumour through commercial channels that Mitsubishi Company, acting as agent of Japan Atomic Fuel Corporation, has practically concluded agreement for purchase of eight tons of uranium oxide from South Africa, allegedly without conditions as to safeguards.

2. We are treating this rumour with some reserve, both because of information contained in your telegram under reference and because we understand that South Africa has informed State Department, in response to an inquiry about an earlier similar rumour, that if a sale were concluded it would be subject to adequate safeguards concerning end use and resale. In view, however, of the implications which any such sale would have, both commercially and for efforts to establish a multilateral safeguards system, please approach South African authorities again informally with a view to establishing the facts.

3. In your conversation you might mention that our attitude on the question of safeguards remains as outlined during our discussions with them in Vienna last October, and in the aide mémoire delivered to them on behalf of ourselves, the UK and the USA by the State Department on January 22 (Washington telegram 143 of January 21 refers) work on the formulation of detailed proposals for safeguards has been proceeding and we would hope shortly to be able to renew contact with other interested countries on this matter. Since our previous discussions, the Canadian Government has announced that small research quantities of uranium may be exported to friendly countries without a bilateral agreement but the total quantity permitted (2500 lbs for any one country) is not considered significant from the safeguards point of view. The export of more substantial quantities without safeguards would, in our view, call in question the whole concept of a multilateral safeguards system.

4. State Department has asked us not to reveal source of information included in paragraph 2 above.

We informed Winfree today of the contents of your telegram E-1398 and in doing so emphasized that we had no repeat no intention of departing from the tripartite approach to the problem of establishing a safeguards system.

2. Winfree's reaction to our proposed approach to the South Africans was most favourable. Coming two months after the USA approach on the same subject, he thought that our discussion with the South Africans would help to impress upon them the need for a safeguards system and that the problems involved are shared by all the producing countries. Winfree expressed the hope that we would inform the State Department of the South Africans' reaction to our approach.

3. Winfree indicated today that the USA thinking with respect to informal tripartite discussions of the safeguards problem was not repeat not as definite as he had suggested last week. He said there were still differences to be ironed out between the State Department and the AEC and he doubted whether discussions with the UK and ourselves would be possible before late September or October.

I saw Secretary of State for External Affairs on August 20 to enquire about South African uranium to Japan. He denied that any deals have been concluded either with Japanese or others stating that External Affairs had delayed approval until they were satisfied that their policy on sales was in line with that of other Western producers. He promised fuller information soon and said he would then put some questions to us concerning safeguards.

2. Later on August 20 Minister of Economic Affairs spoke on second reading of atomic energy amendment bill which provides reconstitution and expansion of Atomic Energy Board. He referred briefly to uranium marketing saying without amplification that Japan and Israel wanted to buy.

SAFEGUARDS FOR EXPORTS OF NUCLEAR MATERIALS

The possibility that uranium and other nuclear materials, supplied to foreign countries for peaceful uses, might be diverted to the manufacture of atomic weapons has been of concern for some years to Canada and other Western countries advanced in atomic science.

The problem is, essentially, that most countries which do not already possess atomic weapons could not fabricate them during the next few years from their own resources but would have to utilize nuclear plant and materials purchased from more advanced nations. It has been the policy of Canada, as of the United States and the United Kingdom, to discourage the acquisition of atomic weapons by these other countries and it is for this reason that we have been concerned to prevent the diversion of nuclear materials and have included provision for the application of safeguards in our bilateral agreements for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. This safeguards article grants wide powers to the supplying country to satisfy itself that no diversion takes place but it does not specify in detail how these safeguards should be applied.

Since it is desirable, for both commercial and practical reasons, that any safeguards system which we put into effect is similar to that of other friendly countries, we have consulted closely on this matter with the United States and the United Kingdom and have had some contacts with the South Africans and Australians. Tripartite discussions with the first two countries took place throughout last fall and resulted in the establishment of Working Groups by each of us to study and make recommendations on the way in which safeguards might be applied. It was agreed that, when these Working Groups had completed their work, the tripartite discussions would be resumed.

I now attach a copy of a paper entitled "The Application of Safeguards to Nuclear Exports" which has been prepared by our Working Group¹⁶ (on which this Department, the Department of Finance and AECL were represented). This paper has two objectives:

- (a) to serve as an expression of Canadian views (at the official level) at the tripartite discussions which we expect to resume in a few weeks;
- (b) to outline the way in which Canada might apply safeguards under the terms of our bilateral agreements.

To take these objectives in reverse order, you will recall that we have signed bilaterals with Germany and Switzerland. About 12 tons of uranium have already been exported to the former and AECL is now negotiating a contract for the sale of fuel elements to the latter. We will, therefore, soon have to consider how to implement the safeguards article of our bilaterals and, after consideration by the various Departments concerned, we think that the "audit and spot check" system outlined in the attached paper is the best system for this purpose. I will not repeat the arguments outlined in the paper, but would only say that, in view of our close consultations with other interested countries in the past and our undertaking to resume the tripartite discussions, no firm decision on Canadian action in this field should probably be taken until after further consultation with these countries.

The other purpose of the attached paper is to accelerate progress in such consultations. Our past experience has been that these consultations tend to drag on without constructive results, mainly because they are breaking new ground. However, it would seem to be very much in Canada's interest to press for definite and rapid conclusions, not only because of our obligations under our bilateral agreements, but because the present uncertainty may have detrimental effects on the negotiation of further bilateral agreements and on commercial sales. The main obstacle to progress would seem to be a difference of opinion among

United States officials as to the type of safeguards they should apply, USAEC apparently being in favour of a rigorous system which we would consider impractical, unpolitic and expensive. We have already received a British Working Group paper which tends to support the conclusions reached in the attached paper and I think that the presentation of the latter to the United States and United Kingdom authorities, with the suggestion that the tripartite talks be resumed as soon as convenient, would act as a catalyst and might well produce rapid progress towards an agreed safeguards system.

The attached paper does not deal with several important but less immediate issues, notably the implications for safeguards of progress towards a general disarmament agreement and of the recently concluded U.S.A.-Euratom agreement which grants the latter the right of "self-inspection" of nuclear facilities instead of external inspection of the kind we are advocating. We are bearing these issues in mind but the first essential would seem to be to resume the tripartite discussions on a constructive basis. I therefore recommend that the attached paper be passed to the United States and United Kingdom authorities as an expression of our views, at the official level, on the type of safeguards system we consider most suitable for application in discharge of our obligations under our bilateral agreements and, more generally, as an international system. I also recommend that we should seek a resumption of the tripartite talks and that, at these talks, we should forcefully press for agreement on a safeguards system based, if possible, on the principles outlined in the attached paper.¹⁷

The Atomic Energy Advisory Panel has approved the attached paper and concurs in the foregoing recommendations. This paper is also being submitted to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for his consideration. In view of the urgency of the matter, we have not thought it desirable to hold up its submission to you pending an expression of Mr. Churchill's views but I will inform you immediately if he should comment on it.¹⁸

PART I — GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

It is the policy of the Canadian Government that safeguards against diversion to military use should be applied to nuclear materials exported from Canada for peaceful use. A similar policy is pursued by the United States and United Kingdom Governments in respect of such exports from their countries and the bilateral agreements of all three countries with other countries or regional organizations provide for the application of safeguards.

2. The standard Safeguards article in Canadian bilaterals, which is reproduced as Appendix B of this report, provides for the application of safeguards to identified material only (i.e. as defined in our Agreements, this means, broadly speaking, uranium and thorium and derived substances). Other nuclear materials, such as heavy water, reactors, etc., serve an essential role in the production processes by which nuclear source materials are converted into fissile materials usable for military purposes. These items must therefore be controlled in any comprehensive safeguards system. However, since it will be several years before Canada is in a position to export such items, we will have neither the right nor opportunity to exercise safeguards over them during this period. The remainder of this paper will therefore address itself to the problem of applying safeguards to nuclear source and fissile materials. It must, however, be recognized that nuclear plant is as essential to the production of fissile material as are nuclear source materials, that safeguards during the process of production of fissile materials must be applied in the nuclear plant itself and that it would be inequitable to expect the producers of source materials alone to bear both the burden and possible commercial disadvantage of applying a safeguards system.

Objectives of a Safeguards System

3. While nuclear energy has a variety of military applications, including propulsion, power supply and materials' irradiation, the essential object of a safeguards system from Canada's point of view is to prevent the diversion of uranium supplied for peaceful uses to the manufacture of atomic weapons. Natural uranium cannot be used directly for this purpose but fissile materials, notably the isotope U235 and plutonium, can be derived from it respectively by passage through an isotope separation plant and by the treatment of irradiated natural uranium in a chemical processing plant.

4. Since isotope separation plants are extremely expensive to build and operate, it is doubtful whether any country other than the USA, UK and USSR (which at present have such plants) and France (which is considering building a plant) would contemplate their construction in the near future and it is even more doubtful whether, if they should decide to do so, the construction and operation of such a plant could be kept secret. This is not, however, true of a chemical processing plant which would be substantially cheaper and might be clandestinely constructed and operated.

5. In view of the foregoing, it is considered that for the next few years the main problem facing Canada will be to apply safeguards against the diversion of natural uranium to the manufacture of atomic weapons via the plutonium cycle. Natural uranium might be diverted with a view to its irradiation and processing in clandestine plants or the plutonium might be diverted either before or after chemical processing. It is therefore necessary to contemplate the application of safeguards to natural uranium in all of the forms in which it may be supplied by this country and at all stages in its processing and use abroad: during refining, during fabrication into metal and fuel elements, during irradiation and subsequent storage, during chemical processing and, finally, safeguards will also be required over the plutonium produced and over the further uses of this plutonium.

Some Limitations of the Safeguards Concept

6. For both technical and practical reasons, no safeguards system can completely prevent wilful diversion of uranium and plutonium. Except for uranium metal it is not possible, even for those responsible for operating nuclear plants, to make completely accurate inventory reports of these items. For example, plutonium formation in a given quantity of uranium irradiated at a known power output level for a given time in a reactor of known characteristics, can often not be predicted within 5%. There is thus a margin of error in all such reports and, in addition, operating staff could wilfully falsify records, instruments, etc. to provide a much larger margin for diversion. A safeguards system can limit the amount of diversion possible but the narrower these limits are to be, the more elaborate, costly and onerous the system required. It has been suggested that a simple audit of operating records might detect 25% diversion from a reactor complex, while the best figures which can be achieved by a full time resident staff of inspectors in such a complex might be about 2%.

7. The effectiveness of a safeguards system will depend very largely on the support of all the main countries producing nuclear plant and uranium. If, as must be anticipated, "recipient" countries develop their own "uncontrolled" reactors and other nuclear plant, acceptance of the principle of safeguards by uranium producing and fabricating countries will be all the more important, since the availability of substantial quantities of "uncontrolled" uranium on the world market would mean that countries with such plant could conduct nuclear programmes free of all safeguards. Moreover, producing countries would have to collaborate closely in the application of the safeguards system in order to permit strict accounting of materials and prevent evasion and deception. The chances of achieving agreement of this kind on a safeguards system among producing countries are highly uncertain. Quite apart from the commercial incentive to offering "uncontrolled" uranium for sale, there are some producing countries which are in principle opposed to safeguards and do not think that they will work and others whose position is as yet undefined but probably opposed to safeguards.

8. The views of "recipient" countries are equally important. Probably no such country would voluntarily submit to safeguards as a matter of principle under present circumstances. Some countries have accepted them, lacking any alternative means of obtaining nuclear materials, but other countries (India, Sweden and France, for example) have curtailed their nuclear programmes or embarked on high-cost production of their own rather than purchase available material which entailed safeguards. A number of recipient countries are probably at present withholding judgment on this issue pending the establishment of a working safeguards system. From this point of view, it is desirable that such a system be put into effect as soon as possible, that it be adopted as widely as possible and, in consequence, be no more onerous than absolutely necessary and fully protect the amour propre and sovereignty of recipient governments.

Some Methods of Applying Safeguards

9. The most effective means of preventing the diversion of fissile materials is by the international ownership of isotope separation and chemical processing plants, combined with a small staff of inspectors to detect the construction and operation of clandestine plants. Since plutonium is the main object of concern during the next few years, the international ownership of chemical processing plants could suffice during this period. There are, however, grave difficulties in the way of this solution. Not least among these is the fact that, since the three most advanced atomic powers would probably not consider accepting such a system themselves, national pride would certainly lead some other countries to a similar refusal.

10. The most effective safeguards system which could be established on the basis of inspection rather than ownership, would demand a fairly large resident inspection staff in each reactor complex. While we have not worked out the cost or other implications of such a system in detail, it is clear that the financial burden would be heavy and the system might well give rise to friction with the recipient country; diversion could only with certainty be restricted to 2% - 3%.

11. A third alternative would be a system based on a regular periodic audit of nuclear materials supplied to a recipient country, supplemented by spot checks by traveling inspectors. These checks would be designed to verify the accuracy of the audit reports. Such a system could probably not with certainty detect diversion of below 5% - 10%.

12. We have considered whether it would be possible to make a choice between the foregoing alternatives on the basis of a mathematical calculation. For example, the NRX and projected CANDU reactors may be taken as typical of a large research and of a large power reactor respectively. Their thermal outputs are 40 mw and 800 mw and their annual plutonium production 9 kg is the quantity of fissile material required for an atomic weapon, it would follow that diversion at the rate of 5% would lead to the accumulation of enough diverted plutonium from NRX for the fabrication of one such weapon every 20 years or so and from CANDU for one every year. Thus if a country had only one power reactor of the CANDU type, and if it were considered that the acceptable level of possible clandestine production of atomic weapons was less than one per year, then it would be necessary to put into effect the more rigorous safeguards system aimed at restricting possible diversion to 2%, and even this would permit the production of one illicit weapon every 2 ½ years.

Conclusions

13. However, calculations of this kind are not particularly meaningful, except possibly in the very short run, since the most important factors for consideration are not mathematical ones. In the first place, the clandestine fabrication of even one atomic weapon from materials intended for peaceful use can not be accepted with equanimity. Since diversion cannot, for technical reasons, be completely ruled out by any safeguards system, the conclusion would seem to be that the objective of such a system should be to reinforce the moral and legal obligations undertaken by recipient countries in bilateral agreements, by making it unlikely that detection could be evaded in the long run. The corollary of this is that, so long as possible misuse of nuclear materials remains a cause for concern, the supply of materials to any country should be refused if there appeared to be serious doubt as to that country's good faith and willingness to carry out its obligations scrupulously.

14. The foregoing conclusion is reinforced by the fact that no safeguards system can prevent the forcible seizure by a country of the atomic installations within its borders and of the fissile material contained in them. In view of the difficulty of hiding a clandestine atomic programme and of the political opprobrium which the discovery of attempted diversion would entail, it seems more likely that a country determined on a weapons programme, but without its own uncontrolled means of carrying one out, would rely on seizure rather than on diversion.

15. On the basis of the foregoing, it is the Canadian view that a simple audit and spot check system would, in the circumstances, provide the most satisfactory means of discharging the obligations incurred in the safeguards article of its bilateral agreements. Details of such a system, which is also recommended for the consideration of other interested countries, are given in Part II of this paper.

16. It is, of course, recognized that recipient countries might take advantage of the margin of uncertainty inherent in an audit system to divert quantities of fissile material less than the measurement and accounting error. On the other hand, a simple audit and spot check would fulfill the practical objectives of a safeguards system as outlined above, the positive advantages of which would seem overwhelming. It would be relatively inexpensive, even if introduced to cover large-scale operations, and it would be relatively inoffensive to recipient countries. This last may well prove to be a critical argument in its favour. While many countries are at present prepared to accept bilateral safeguards, at least in principle, in order to get their atomic programmes under way, they will certainly seek to free themselves of these safeguards if they prove onerous. As time passes, alternative "uncontrolled" sources of nuclear materials will become available and all producing countries will find themselves under increasing commercial and political pressure to relax the conditions they impose on the supply of materials. In these circumstances, it would seem that the only certain way in which to ensure that the bulk of the world's peaceful uses of atomic energy are subject to safeguards in the medium to long run is by the widespread acceptance of the idea that safeguards are desirable as a matter of principle. If this approach is to succeed, the safeguards system now advocated must be the least onerous one compatible with security (on the criteria developed in this paper).

17. It is generally accepted that the International Atomic Energy Agency is the appropriate forum in which to promote this idea and that through it a genuine multilateral safeguards system might be developed and applied. For practical reasons, however, the first steps towards such a system are likely to be taken on a bilateral basis. It would, therefore, seem important that Canada and other countries which share our concern in this matter, should not now advocate a system which is likely to prove unacceptable to the majority at a later stage. To do so would be to invite the premature demise of the multilateral safeguards concept, involving a very embarrassing situation in respect of the more rigorous safeguards system which we might in the meantime have imposed bilaterally on some countries (among which will be some of our closest friends). The audit and spot system would seem to offer the best chances of gaining acceptance for multilateral safeguards and would also meet our immediate needs arising out of the safeguards provisions of our bilateral agreements.

URANIUM

I reminded Acting Secretary of External Affairs September 9 of my early enquiry on uranium. Naude stated that South African officials have given serious consideration to the problem and have decided in the absence of defined safeguards by USA, UK and Canada to conclude deal with Japan specifying only that material is not repeat not to be used for military purposes. South African representatives in Washington, London and Ottawa will be so informing the three governments in a few days and concurrently will request details of defined safeguards by them.

URANIUM SAFEGUARDS

For Couillard

1. This question was discussed this morning at meeting with Pollock, Watson and officials of AECB and Eldorado.

2. Meeting began by reviewing recent developments of which, broadly speaking, there have been two:

(a) We have given our safeguards paper to UK and USA authorities as "an expression of our views, at the official level only, on the type of safeguards system we consider most suitable ... as an international system," urging an early resumption of tripartite talks on the subject. According to Watson, our paper has been well received by UK authorities and by Schaetzel. State Department, however, faces the difficulty that the USAEC approach to safeguards is very much more rigorous than ours. State Department thinks it is unrealistic but needs time to work out an agreed position with USAEC. Schaetzel and Vander Weyden were called unexpectedly from Europe to Washington last week, possibly for consultations on this.

(b) There have been clear indications that South Africans and Australians (who were included in 5-party consultations on safeguards briefly last fall, and without whose participation a safeguards system applied to uranium could never be effective) are contemplating the possibility of uranium sales without safeguards.

3. Regarding this latter point, we have not yet established the truth of rumours that a contract for the sale of about 6 tons of South African uranium to Japan has been signed but it seems certain that there have been negotiations on this. If the South Africans have actually signed a contract, this would be contrary to the understanding implicit in the discussions with them last fall and would not seem to be consistent with the assurances given our High Commissioner in Capetown by Dr. Van Rhijn in July.

4. While we are inclined to believe that a contract has probably been concluded, there are indications that the South Africans may have left themselves some room for manoeuvre in their negotiations with Japan. Watson reports that the South Africans approached UK AEA several weeks ago to ask what they considered to be "small" quantities of uranium, for exports of which no safeguards would be required. Fincham, of South Africa's High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa, made a similar approach to us last week. This suggests that the South Africans may be thinking of establishing their own limit for uncontrolled uranium exports and that this limit might cover the prospective sale to Japan. During our conversation with Fincham last week we reminded him of the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of May 7, saying that we thought limit of 2500 lbs was about the maximum which Western producing countries could export without incurring danger that importing countries might be able to accumulate significant quantities of uncontrolled uranium.

5. At our meeting, Watson reported one other item of interest. As you know, Rio Tinto has approached us informally about a prospective Indian order for 10 tons of uranium and Watson spoke to his Indian colleagues at the Commonwealth nuclear meeting about this. They told him that they were not interested in the negotiation of a bilateral agreement with us and that, in any case, they had been informed at Geneva by both USA and Canadian uranium producers that sales of uranium would shortly be permitted without any strings and that they need not worry about bilaterals or safeguards. Indians also told Watson that USAEC had agreed to sell them 10 tons of heavy water without safeguards, which it had previously refused even to contemplate.

6. In the light of the foregoing, the consensus of this morning's meeting might be summarized as follows:

(a) As long as there is a reasonable chance of a successful outcome, it is desirable to work with other countries concerned for agreement on a safeguards system. This means the establishment of a set of rules which will be honoured by all countries (and particularly, in the present context, by uranium producing countries). Deviations from what we have understood to be the common approach to safeguards (of the 5 countries which have discussed the matter) have occurred and make it essential that consultations on this subject be resumed as soon as possible. The deviations we have in mind are the concessions which the USA has granted Euratom on safeguards, the alleged sale by the USA of heavy water to India without safeguards and the rumoured sale of uranium by South Africa to Japan;

(b) A further approach to Van Rhijn at this time would probably be useful and tactically sound. The South Africans have a talking point when they say that they have not been kept informed of the progress of our work on a safeguards system. We therefore think Van Rhijn might be given a copy of our safeguards paper, with the explanation that it is a Canadian working paper only, is intended to apply to all exports of uranium greater than the 2500 pound limit we have established and is passed to him as a basis for future discussion;

(c) If you agree with the foregoing we would suggest that the approach to Van Rhijn be made in as simple terms as possible. It would be useful to determine, if possible, whether the South African-Japanese contract has definitely been signed and, if so, whether this represents a new South African policy or is a once-only arrangement. Apart from this Van Rhijn might be told that we attach the greatest importance to the South African decision on this matter as it may well set a pattern and would certainly not be overlooked by other uranium producing countries in the determination of their policies;

(d) We would be inclined to follow up such an approach by giving a copy of our safeguards paper to Fincham here, taking the opportunity to describe our position more fully and in greater technical detail. We might also tell Fincham that the Japanese are obviously shopping around for uranium without safeguards, that an important principle is at stake and that it would, in our view, be regrettable to prejudice this for a few tons of uranium, particularly when no lasting commercial advantage would be likely to result;

(e) If our safeguards paper is given to the South Africans on this basis, we think it might also be passed to the Australians. You will have received a copy of Canberra letter no. 619 of September 2† which indicates that the Australians are now considering this question, with half an eye on the possible commercial advantages to a high cost producer (such as they are) of offering to sell without safeguards.

7. If you are with the foregoing, we would propose informing the USA and UK authorities of the action we have taken, saying that we consider it desirable to resume discussions on a 5-party basis as soon as possible. If necessary, a tripartite meeting could be held first to resolve any differences there may be in our approach to the problem. In this way we think we would exert some pressure on USA to formulate their own position and agree to an early meeting with us and the United Kingdom.

8. Finally, we anticipate that Canadian uranium producers may seek actively to bring about a change in Canadian policy in this matter, especially if the rumour of a South African sale to Japan is confirmed and if India places a firm order for uranium with Rio Tinto. Would it, therefore, not be wise to advise ministers of recent developments.

9. Pollock asks that this message be shown to Plumptre.

SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS

Early in September the Minister approved your recommendation that our "Safeguards" paper be passed to the United Kingdom and United States authorities as a contribution to our tripartite discussions on the subject and he also agreed that we should seek an early resumption of these discussions and should press forcefully for agreement on a safeguards' system based, if possible, on the principles outlined in our paper.

2. On September 9 we wrote to the U.S. Embassy and the U.K. High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa, enclosing copies of our paper and suggesting that the tripartite discussions be resumed about the middle of October at any convenient location. Since then we have, as you know, had indications that our paper has been well received by the U.K. authorities and by the State Department. (We have no information on the USAEC's views but they are likely to regard it as insufficiently rigorous.) No definite reaction has been forthcoming to our suggestion for resumption of the talks, although the State Department is reported to think that mid-October might be too early. Canada House reports the suggestion from the Foreign Office that "the U.K. and Canada might confront the U.S.A. with a jointly agreed date for the resumption of the talks in an attempt to induce them to expedite the formulation of their position on safeguards."

3. More recently there have been the further developments reported in our telegram No. E-1764 of September 24 (a copy of which is attached) and we have now also handed over our safeguards paper to officials of the Australian and South African High Commissioners' Offices in Ottawa.

4. In view of all the foregoing developments, it would seem to be advisable to inform the Foreign Office and State Department of the action we have taken with regard to the Australians and South Africans and to make a further and more precise proposal for the resumption of the safeguards talks. I also think that it would be in our interests to propose that these talks be resumed on a five-party rather than on a tripartite basis, since I do not think that we stand to benefit at all from the exclusion of Australia and South Africa (quite the contrary, in fact).

5. The attached telegram to Washington, London and a number of other interested missions, is designed to fulfill these purposes and is submitted for your signature, if you agree.¹⁹

6. If the meetings are to be resumed,²⁰ we will have to give some thought to the composition of the Canadian Delegation. We understand that Michaels, the United Kingdom member of the Board of Governors of IAEA, would attend on behalf of the United Kingdom. May we assume that you would wish to participate, other demands on your time permitting this?²¹

1. The crowded programme of the Montreal Conference did not offer an opportunity for any extended discussion of safeguards with Dr. Van Rhijn. Officials had, however, one informal talk with him on this subject.

2. Dr. Van Rhijn did not state categorically whether or not a contract for the sale of uranium to Japan had been concluded. He did, however, confirm that negotiations had taken place and he also stated that the matter had been discussed with members of the combined development agency. Dr. Van Rhijn expressed impatience at delays in coming to grips with the problem of safeguards, saying that this matter had been in the air for several years but that nothing definite had yet been proposed particularly on the nature, scope and application of safeguards. We told him of Canadian studies on this subject and promised to let him have copies of our safeguards paper as soon as we could. We also informed him of our deep concern that the whole concept of safeguards might be prejudiced, before the possibility of developing an international system had been fully explored, if any producing country were to permit substantial sales of uranium without safeguards.

3. These discussions may have been useful because we have heard that at his final press conference in Montreal, when asked what South Africa's intentions were with regard to uranium sales, Dr. Van Rhijn replied that South Africa was consulting with, and intended to cooperate closely with, Canada on this matter.

4. Since USA officials did not categorically oppose our suggestion that we might give copies of our safeguards paper to the Australians and South Africans, and UK officials were in favour (London telegram 3735 September 18†), we have now handed the paper to the officers of the two High Commissioners in Ottawa. In doing so we explained that the paper was a working document, representing the views of Canadian officials and prepared as a basis for discussion in the context of the consultations on safeguards which we had previously had with other interested countries. We also said that the system outlined in the paper was intended to apply to all exports of uranium in excess of small research quantities, the limit for the export of which from Canada to any one country had been set by the government at 2500 lbs.

5. We would be grateful if you would pass the foregoing information to the State Department. Please also propose that consultation on safeguards be resumed, advancing the following considerations:

(a) Recent developments suggest that delay in clarifying our ideas on safeguards may seriously prejudice the chances of securing wide support for a safeguards system. Not only are precedents for the supply of nuclear materials without safeguards being established, but commercial pressures are building up for "uncontrolled" uranium sales. Also we think that the chances of IAEA developing and obtaining approval for a multilateral safeguards system will depend in large measure on the progress made by ourselves in this matter;

(b) We therefore favour a resumption of talks on a 5 party basis i.e. including South Africa and Australia. We recognize that there were arguments in favour of developing a common tripartite position at an earlier stage in our consultations. However, we now think that the disadvantages of excluding other major uranium producers from these consultations and the risk of seriously offending them if they are faced with a "fait accompli" far outweigh the advantages;

(c) We are anxious to resume talks at the earliest possible time and not later than the end of this month, if this can be arranged. Dr. J.P. Baxter, Chairman of the Australian Atomic Energy Commission, will be in Canada during the first week of November and, if it is agreed that the talks should be resumed on a 5 party basis, the Australians might possibly wish to take advantage of his presence in North America to have him participate, as he did at Vienna last fall;

(d) We would be glad to meet at any convenient location. While we would prefer London or Washington we would certainly be prepared to have Ottawa as the venue of the meetings if the other participants wish this.

6. London. Please speak to Foreign Office along foregoing lines. We agree that it might be useful to confront USA authorities with a jointly agreed date for resumption of talks, if they prove reluctant to fix a date on the basis of our present approach. This can be discussed further in the light of their reaction.

7. Capetown. Foregoing is for your information. However, please try and determine exact status of South Africa-Japan uranium contract and South African intentions in this regard.

SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS

The response of both United Kingdom and United States officials to our suggestion that discussions on this subject should be resumed as soon as possible on a five-party basis has been generally favourable. I enclose copies of Canada House telegram No. 3933 of October 14[†] and of Washington telegram No. 2557 of October 21,[†] for your information.

2. You will note from Washington's telegram that United States officials have not yet determined their national position on safeguards. However, USAEC has withdrawn its paper, recommending a very vigorous safeguards system, and this is probably a step towards agreement within United States circles on a reasonable system. State Department officials suggested to our Embassy that, while their failure to develop a national position meant that they would not be able to meet with other interested countries in high level talks, they thought that a meeting at the working level would be useful and might help expedite matters in the United States; they wondered if Canada would take the initiative in proposing such a meeting.

3. In view of the foregoing, I think it would be appropriate and in our own best interests to ask our missions in London, Washington, Canberra and Capetown to suggest to the local Foreign Ministries that a meeting of officials at the working level be held in Ottawa on November 5 to discuss safeguards. A self-explanatory telegram to this effect is attached,[†] for your signature if you agree. We have discussed this telegram with officials of the Department of Finance and of AECL, and they agree to it. We have also mentioned it to Morley, of the Privy Council Office, and understand that Mr. Bryce has been informed.²²

4. If you approve the attached telegram, would you agree that we should also advise the Offices of the High Commissioners concerned in Ottawa of the proposed meeting?

SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS

We expect that the line which the Canadian representatives should take at the five-party discussions on "Safeguards" on November 5 will be discussed by Mr. Bryce's committee tomorrow afternoon.

2. When he approved the Canadian "Safeguards" paper, the Minister also approved a recommendation that "we should seek a resumption of the tripartite talks and that we should forcefully press for agreement on a safeguards system based, if possible, on the principles outlined in the paper." However, circumstances are such that we cannot expect to achieve this purpose at the forthcoming meetings. First, the United States has not yet developed a national position on safeguards; second, the Australians and South Africans are participating in these discussions fully for the first time. (There were some five-party talks last fall but, in essence, the participation of these two countries was limited to receiving proposals developed on a tripartite basis.) Therefore, it would be unrealistic to expect that we can do more this week than set the stage for future agreement.

3. The problems that the meeting faces might be divided into three parts:

- (a) Is agreement on a multilateral safeguards system feasible?
- (b) If so, what kind of system should we attempt to develop?
- (c) How should we go about securing international agreement for it?

4. We believe that it is extremely important for Canada that we come out of the forthcoming meetings with a fairly clear idea of the probable answers to these questions. Although the market for uranium (outside the U.S.A. and U.K.) is almost negligible at the present time, Canadian producers are anxious to sell even small quantities of uranium wherever they can in order to establish themselves in potential markets. They suspect that the government's policy on safeguards is hindering such sales and they have been very sensitive to indications that producers in other countries may not be subject to the same limitations that they are. We may therefore expect the government's policy to come under increasing pressure from this source unless we can demonstrate that all major producing countries are operating under the same rules and restrictions. We also hope that agreement on a safeguards system would have definite advantages for our producers in that it would clear up the present uncertainty which may well be discouraging some countries from concluding bilateral agreements with us and from buying our uranium.

5. Another reason why the forthcoming talks are of particular importance to Canada is that our stake in knowing where we stand is probably greater than that of the other participants. The U.K. and U.S.A. each has a near monopoly for the time being in the nuclear materials which they sell (reactor components and enriched fuel respectively) and they both have substantial domestic markets; Australia and South Africa both sell most of their uranium under substantially longer contracts than ours and are, in any case, probably less reluctant than we would be to sell without safeguards. We have therefore had the impression that these other countries have been content to let matters ride without pressing for rapid progress towards a decision on safeguards. Hence the initiative we are taking.

6. Equally, it is probably important for us to make an objective assessment of the chances of reaching international agreement on safeguards. The political and, to a lesser extent, commercial objectives of safeguards are so important that there may be reluctance to face up realistically to the formidable difficulties in putting a multilateral safeguards system into effect, with the result that international discussions on the subject might drag on for several years only to prove abortive in the end. Even if we foresaw this end result it might, of course, still be considered advisable as a matter of policy to continue safeguards discussions merely so as to postpone for a time the development of a pattern of "uncontrolled" trading in nuclear materials. The situation to guard against would seem to be one in which we had continued to pursue our safeguards policy to a point where it was truly detrimental from a commercial point of view only to find that other producing countries then declared a safeguards system to be impracticable.

7. The difficulties in developing a multilateral safeguards system are outlined in our safeguards paper (copy attached). Briefly, they are that, with the continuing discovery of uranium resources and development of scientific and industrial techniques, the near monopoly of nuclear materials now possessed by a few advanced countries will gradually be lost. Already several countries are developing uneconomic resources rather than submit to safeguards. While a safeguards system imposed by the more advanced countries can certainly inhibit the development of nuclear weapons by others for a number of years, many countries will be developing access to uncontrolled nuclear facilities and resources and, in the long run, a safeguards system can probably only be effective if it is voluntarily accepted by most countries (at least in respect of internationally traded materials) on a self-denying basis. It follows that no one country can alone develop its own safeguards system and that the goal should be a system commanding as widespread agreement as possible. We know that the United Kingdom is somewhat sceptical about the possibilities and this view is likely to be shared by the Australians and South Africans. The first purpose of the meetings will therefore be to see whether there is general agreement that the goal is worth pursuing.

8. The Canadian paper proposes a system which we regard as the best compromise between two conflicting objectives: first, that it should give reasonable assurance against the diversion of nuclear materials to military uses; second, that it should be as acceptable as possible to "recipient countries." Since our main interest is uranium, our paper deals specifically with this. We believe that it can be applied equally to other nuclear materials and facilities, although many complicated technical questions (with which we have not dealt) will arise. In a sense, the British paper (copy also attached) is complementary to ours in that it reviews some of these questions. Problems with which neither paper deals are:

(a) Whether we should all aim at a uniform system or permit variations for both producing and "recipient" countries;

(b) How the system should be applied. Whether individually by producing countries; jointly by them; by regional organizations (this raises the question of Euratom and self-inspection); by an international organization such as IAEA;

(c) To what materials should the system apply? Technical meetings will probably be required to draw up lists of materials. We should, perhaps, bear in mind that, in view of the great amounts of source materials available all over the world, a case could be made for excluding thorium, natural uranium, etc. from a safeguard system which would then be confined to enriched uranium, fissile materials and facilities for its production;

(d) Should small research quantities of uranium be excluded from the safeguards system? Canada now permits uncontrolled exports of up to 2,500 pounds of uranium to any one country; the United States limit is one ton; the United Kingdom earlier suggested that three tons might be a reasonable figure.

9. Assuming that the meeting on November 5 decides that it is worth continuing to work for a safeguards system, and that some of the foregoing questions have been answered, it would seem to be essential to reach agreement on our future course of joint action. This might mean deciding:

(a) On a programme of future meetings and a deadline for an agreement;

(b) What type of agreement we are aiming at, e.g. one embodied in a formal document among the five countries concerned; or one to be put as a proposal to IAEA; or one to be proposed bilaterally to those countries to which we supply nuclear materials;

(c) Whether, and in what way, other countries might be approached on this matter. The attitude of the U.S.S.R. will ultimately be decisive; other countries are also now developing an export potential in nuclear materials, e.g. France and Germany; finally, there are the countries to which nuclear materials are supplied;

(d) At what stage might publicity be given to this matter? Our own uranium producers will be naturally interested in it and we will also wish to discuss it in due course with the Germans and Swiss (to whom we have supplied nuclear materials requiring the application of safeguards) and with countries such as India to whom we hope to supply uranium.

ITEM II: SAFEGUARDS

19. Mr. LePan said that the reason for including this item on the agenda was not to discuss the various papers that had been put forward on this matter but to formulate the objectives that should be kept in mind during the discussions scheduled for November 5. As it would be desirable to reach firm conclusions as a result of these meetings, three main factors would need to be considered: first, the feasibility of having a multilateral safeguards system should be examined; second, if it was agreed that such a system would be feasible conclusions should be reached as to what type of system should be implemented; third, if agreement was reached on the first two problems, conclusions should be reached on how progress could be made with regard to an international solution to the problem of safeguards. He noted that the Canadian paper on safeguards had been approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Secretary of State for External Affairs.

20. Mr. Gray thought that the Canadian, U.S. and U.K. systems should be similar. He disagreed with the U.S. procedure and noted that they were coming round to Canadian thinking with regard to natural uranium, but not for U235, which they had said would need rigid control. Mr. Gray could not understand the U.S. insistence on this point as enough plutonium could be produced in two or three years from natural uranium to make a bomb. However, as far as Canada was concerned, as long as stringent controls were not applied to natural uranium, we could go along with the U.S. insistence that they be applied to U235.

21. Mr. Langley said that Michaels, U.K. Governor to the I.A.E.A., had told him that under the 1954 U.S. Atomic Energy Act, U.S. exports of fissionable materials had to be certified that they would not be used for military purposes. Michaels had said that the U.K. would not compete under conditions other than those used by the United States. The type of safeguards system proposed by Canada was satisfactory with the U.K. on technical terms and, politically, was all that was likely to be obtained. If agreement could be reached on the type of paper that was acceptable to all five parties participating in the Ottawa discussions, the details might be leaked to Roger Smith, who was in charge of organizing an Agency safeguards system. Mr. Langley thought it more desirable that the safeguards system should be proposed by the Agency rather than the western bloc, as, in the latter case, it would be almost certain to receive unfavourable comment from the other members of the I.A.E.A. At present, it was thought that after the Ottawa discussions, a meeting might be convened in Vienna around January 7th, when final agreement might be reached on the technical details of the safeguards system. If agreement were reached at these later discussions, Smith might be able to produce an Agency safeguards system by the spring.

22. Mr. Bryce, in referring to the U.K. bilateral agreement to sell a reactor to the Japanese, said that the U.S.S.R. was reassured that the Japanese - U.K. agreement contained a clause allowing the safeguards aspect of the agreement to be taken over by the Agency. The Soviets agreed fundamentally that a system of safeguards was desirable and were as anxious as Canada that the Chinese and Nasser should not get hold of large quantities of uranium. It might be a good idea to take up this problem bilaterally with the Russians rather than work through the Agency. It was in their interests as much as ours that a safeguards system should be implemented, and he thought that by being frank, positive action might result. In the case of South Africa and Australia, it might be impressed on them that it was in the southern hemispherical interests to have an effective safeguards arrangement.

23. Mr. Robertson wondered if decisions on policy in the case of South Africa and Australia had [been] taken at the Cabinet level. He would have thought that if it had, these governments could but go along with the principles envisaged in the safeguards proposals.

24. Mr. LePan doubted if Australian Ministers had given the matter much thought. In South Africa there was political support of safeguards, but industry pressure was great.

25. Mr. Watson said that Dr. Baxter, Chairman of the Australian Atomic Energy Commission, had been in favour of safeguards. However, he had wanted to be able to reserve

Australia's position and retain the right, at Ministerial level, to sell in special cases without safeguards. He had not been in favour of a blanket agreement.

26. Mr. Robertson thought that there was danger in allowing the seriousness of this problem to be diminished in the public eye. This apparent complacency added a sense of urgency to the forthcoming talks.

27. Mr. Gilchrist, in referring to the case of a South African sale of uranium to Japan, said that South Africa was not against safeguards but wanted the whole position clarified.

28. Mr. Bryce was worried that South Africans might bring pressure on other producers to form a cartel. There would be a real danger if the Russians were allowed to claim that western producers were keeping the price high through cartel arrangements. He thought in the forthcoming talks it would be a mistake to discuss cartels without first talking safeguards with the Russians.

In referring to the relationship between the C.O.C.O.M. and safeguards, Mr. Bryce thought that Canada might sell uranium to no one in the Communistic bloc except Russia.

29. The Panel agreed:

that it was practical to seek a safeguards system, and invited Mr. Gray to speak on the Canadian paper at the forthcoming talks.

THE APPLICATION OF SAFEGUARDS TO NUCLEAR EXPORTS

The Chairman welcomed the participants to Ottawa. He regretted the short notice at which the meeting had been called but hoped that all would agree that there was some urgency in seeking to reach a meeting of minds on the subject to be discussed. Not only were some countries faced with the problem of deciding what type of safeguards system they wish to apply in fulfilment of the obligations incurred under their bilateral agreements, but a number of developments, such as the establishment of precedents for uncontrolled exports of nuclear materials and increasing commercial pressures for the latter, were also occurring which would make it increasingly difficult as time passed to secure international agreement for a satisfactory safeguards system. In his view, the chances of doing so were greatest before atomic energy became commonplace in the public mind. He suggested that the meeting might discuss the subject in three phases:

(a) what were the prospects for an agreement on safeguards?

(b) what sort of safeguards system might be appropriate, workable and acceptable under present circumstances?

(c) what further action would be required to promote such a system?

2. Several delegations expressed appreciation that the meeting had been called. The South African representative explained that the South African authorities were most interested in the subject and welcomed the opportunity to take part in the meeting; however, the time factor had not permitted them to make adequate arrangements for representation or for the preparation of instructions, and his participation would therefore be as an observer.

Prospects for Agreement

3. The Australian representative stated that, while he had no definite instructions, he knew that the Australian authorities were in favour of a safeguards system if one could be devised. The question had been academic for Australia until recently, since the Combined Development Agency had been purchasing the entire Australian uranium output. CDA had, however, recently indicated a wish to terminate its contract and this would create an Australian uranium surplus and consequent domestic problems. In his view, it would be difficult to devise a safeguards scheme which would work for a country which really wished to divert materials, particularly since the advance of technology and the wide availability of uranium meant that many countries could now put together a crude bomb. A safeguards system posed many technical problems (such as those outlined in the U.K. paper) which would require careful thought.

4. The U.S. representative said that his country had done a good deal of work on these technical problems, on which he might be able to circulate some information shortly. His attitude was one of cautious optimism and he considered that the issues at stake were so important that the United States and friendly countries had no alternative but to work towards an agreement on safeguards. Mr. Schaezel added that this could be regarded as part of the effort to bring modern implements of war under some kind of control. The United States considered that this was the psychological moment for seeking agreement in respect of the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

5. The Canadian representative thought that it would not be too difficult, from a technical point of view, to devise a system which would enable one at least to detect the diversion of materials; the Canadian paper outlined one system which would meet this requirement.

6. The United Kingdom representative said that his country was publicly committed to the concept of safeguards but that he was frankly sceptical about the chances of devising a completely satisfactory system and of securing its adoption internationally. The first three papers circulated by the United Kingdom were designed to define the difficulties as the United Kingdom authorities saw them. Essentially, the view expressed was that it was technically impossible to devise a 100 percent watertight safeguards system and that even with a number of resident inspectors (which were politically out of the question) diversion could not be reduced below about 2 percent. Since it was considered impossible to discriminate between potential customers, the problem was to devise a system which would create a moral climate that would discourage a country from misconduct and would also be acceptable both domestically and in "recipient" countries. This might appear a modest objective but, as the U.S. representative had said, such a system might later fit into a more general scheme for disarmament. He wondered to what extent the United States Atomic Energy Act of 1954 laid down conditions on the type of safeguards system which the U.S. Government might adopt.

7. The United States representative replied that the Act laid down no explicit requirements with regard to a safeguards system, apart from calling for certain guarantees which are embodied in U.S. bilateral agreements. Congress would, however, certainly expect the Administration to develop a suitably careful system. Similar considerations would apply in connection with the safeguards called for in IAEA's statute.

8. The United Kingdom representative suggested that this raised a point of major significance. He thought that all the participants in the meeting would agree that they should work towards a common safeguards system, since it would be impracticable for each of several countries, supplying a "recipient" country with different materials "triggering" safeguards, to apply its own system. It appeared to him that the simplest and most workable common system would be one applied by IAEA, and that this would also avoid the odium which would fall on individual countries if they were to apply their own safeguards. Since the U.S. had offered 5,000 kg. of U235 to IAEA and Congress would have to be satisfied that the Agency's safeguards system was satisfactory before this offer was fulfilled, the United States view on what type of Agency system was acceptable would be decisive.

9. The Chairman wondered whether the safeguards embodied in the U.S.A.-Euratom agreement would throw any light on this.

10. Mr. Schaetzel replied that the safeguards problem had given rise to some difficulty during the negotiations with Euratom. The European Atomic Community had all-encompassing rights under the Euratom treaty and, as a sovereign authority, had refused to accept an externally administered safeguards system as this would have been more restrictive than the arrangements which the U.S. had with the U.K. and Canada. It had seemed to the United States that, by making a concession to Euratom, they would be able to contain a large part of the French atomic energy programme within the larger Euratom scheme and that this would be a net gain. The United States had therefore agreed with Euratom on a system (the details of which were subject to U.S. approval) involving the continuing right of mutual audit and embodying the ultimate sanction that the U.S. could terminate the co-operative programme if it were not satisfied that the system was being properly executed. Both parties had also agreed to consider transferring responsibility to an international system at an appropriate time if one should be put into effect.

11. The United Kingdom representative had no difficulty in accepting the objectives of the United States in reaching agreement with Euratom on the safeguards system in question. He asserted, however, that by choosing to foster European supranational institutions, the United States had lost something in respect of another objective, the development of an international safeguards system. He was not worried about the effectiveness of the Euratom safeguards system in practical terms. Nevertheless the de jure position was serious since the right of self-inspection had been granted to Euratom and, by thus contracting a Western European group of nations out of a larger international scheme, the chances of achieving the latter had been reduced; countries which proposed the adoption of an international scheme through IAEA were also open to attack on the grounds that they were using the Agency only to retain a measure of control over under-developed countries.

12. Mr. Pollock suggested that if groups of member countries of IAEA were to organize themselves on a basis similar to Euratom, it would be difficult to discriminate against them by denying them the rights now accorded to Euratom. He wondered what the reaction of the United States would be if it were suggested that IAEA introduce a system of regional self-inspection.

13. The United States representative thought that this would depend on the type of regional group involved. Some might be acceptable, others not. In any case it was difficult to foresee any genuine regional group similar to Euratom apart, perhaps, from OAS. The idea, however, should not be dismissed out of hand.

14. The United Kingdom representative agreed that inspection by regional bodies within an IAEA system might offer possibilities. He cautioned, however, that the image of Euratom as a quasi-military group was a political reality and that this was liable to cause trouble and must be reckoned with.

Elements of a safeguards system

15. At the request of the United States representative, Mr. Kratzer gave an indication of United States thinking on this aspect of the problem. He agreed that a 100 percent effective system was not possible. A good deal of work, however, had been done on estimating the degree of effectiveness of safeguards systems in various circumstances and it had been found that the effectiveness of safeguards was closely correlated with the cost of the system. This relationship could be represented graphically by a curve approaching 100 percent effectiveness at the high rates of expenditure which a full-time residential inspection system would involve. The advantage of an inspection system falling on this part of the curve was that its effectiveness could be accurately predicted. At lower levels of expenditure where effectiveness fell off, so did the accuracy of predicting effectiveness. Audit systems of safeguards suffered particularly from this disadvantage and, on the basis of U.S. studies, it was thought that the probability of detecting a one percent diversion of material under a simple audit system was only 4 percent.

16. The United Kingdom representative agreed that an audit system by itself was not adequate since there was nothing to prevent a dishonest management from maintaining two sets of books. Audit must therefore be supplemented by sampling and inspection. The essential choice was between a 24-hour resident inspection system and an audit/spot check system. He believed that the effectiveness of the former was largely illusory as compared with the type of system proposed in the Canadian paper and that it was politically out of the question as well as being impossibly expensive in terms of scientific manpower. He illustrated the sort of difficulties which would be encountered in securing international agreement for any type of safeguards system by citing the United Kingdom's negotiations for an Atomic Energy agreement with Brazil which were being held up on this very issue: the Brazilians had taken the line that theirs was a friendly nation and that it would be difficult to secure parliamentary approval for an agreement containing safeguards. He concluded that something along the lines of the Canadian proposal, perhaps somewhat elaborated and graduated in the rigour of its application according to the technical nature of the situation to which it was being applied, would meet the requirements we had in mind.

17. The Canadian representative agreed with much of the foregoing. He suggested that the cost of a safeguards system on the basis proposed in the Canadian paper would be minimal in terms of both money and manpower. He also maintained that it was futile to aim at a completely watertight safeguards system since extensive United States-Canadian experience in accounting for plutonium in fuel rods irradiated in Canada indicated that it was impossible to predict plutonium formation within a margin of error of less than 5%.

18. The Australian representative suggested that it might be fruitful to consider a different approach. Why not classify countries according to the likelihood of their diverting materials? Many countries were not interested in large scale nuclear development, while others had ample nuclear technology and resources of their own. This left a few countries, such as Japan and India, which would be acquiring large research or power reactors within the next few years and which would only then have the technological resources to fabricate nuclear weapons. Instead therefore of trying to devise a rigorous universal system, one might aim at a minimal universal system and make special, more comprehensive, arrangements for the real problem countries. One might also overcome their objections to safeguards by including some of their nationals as inspectors.

19. Mr. Kratzer suggested that there were three objections to this approach. First, that Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States had sought uniform rights regarding safeguards in all their bilaterals; second, that this approach would involve discrimination in the implementation of safeguards; third, that it would make it much more difficult for IAEA to apply safeguards.

20. The United Kingdom representative agreed that discrimination as between countries was not possible since it would be regarded as an Anglo-Saxon conspiracy. In his opinion, the most practicable way to go forward was through IAEA, with perhaps some arrangement for inspection on a regional or group basis, as had been suggested earlier in the meeting. The Japanese request that the Agency apply the safeguards embodied in the Japan/U.S.A. agreement, and U.S. acceptance of this expressed at the last General Conference of the Agency, meant that IAEA must quickly develop a safeguards system. It would be little short of catastrophic if the Agency were to present a system unacceptable to the United States, in particular, since this would mean that the latter would be unable to fulfill its pledge of fissile material. The Soviet bloc already maintained that the United States offer was a propaganda gesture devoid of content and the United States would be open to sharper criticism of this kind if it should even appear unwilling to fulfill its pledge, however justifiable the reasons. It therefore appeared to him that there was urgent need to clarify the ideas of those present on what would constitute an acceptable Agency system and then to pass this information in a discreet way to Roger Smith, Head of the Safeguards Division. The United Kingdom was assigning a man to the Division in December and would like to brief him in advance if a decision could now be reached on what constituted an acceptable system. In view of the Japanese request to the Agency, it would be difficult for the U.S.S.R. or other countries to oppose a reasonable Agency system and there was therefore a real chance of securing the Board's approval. If this was to be done, however, it was essential that Western countries should not announce their own intentions and ideas on safeguards, and should not give cause for suspicion that they were seeking to influence the Agency, until after it had produced its own scheme.

21. The United States representative agreed that the essential point was to determine what type of Agency system would be acceptable to the countries represented at this meeting. The United States authorities were aware of the urgency in reaching decisions on this matter and this sense of urgency had been reinforced by some of the new arguments which had been advanced. Mr. Kratzer added that the U.K. paper presented a fine analysis of the problem. He nevertheless thought that safeguards offered a real hope of buying time during which an agreement on disarmament or test cessation might be negotiated; he also thought that, having regard to the limited nuclear power likely to be produced over the next few years, the degree of efficiency and rigour of the safeguards system would have a significant effect upon the length of this interim period.

22. The United Kingdom representative could not agree. Quoting the case of Japan, he said that if the Japanese now purchased a power reactor, it could not be in operation before 1963; allowing one year for the irradiation of fuel elements and another year for cooling off, they would have little plutonium before 1965. There was therefore ample time to develop a nuclear disarmament scheme and the extra time which the most rigorous safeguards system would add to the interim period was almost insignificant from this point of view.

23. The Australian representative added that by exercising control over the fuel available to the Japanese, it would be possible to detect if they were misusing their nuclear resources since, to obtain plutonium quickly, they would have to use short irradiation periods and would require fuel at up to five times the normal rate.

24. The United Kingdom representative stated that this raised another problem, namely whether U.S. and U.K. chemical processing plants should be open for inspection under a safeguards system. For the time being spent rods from Japan and other countries would probably be returned to the U.S. or the U.K. for processing and it might be difficult to deny access for inspectors to verify the treatment and disposal of plutonium. This problem had been previously discussed and the United Kingdom had at one time offered to permit inspection. This offer had, however, since been withdrawn.

25. The United States representative stated that his country only had joint military/civil plants. Plants designed exclusively for civil purposes might later be established and this might make it easier to permit inspection. In the meantime, one might consider the possibility of hypothecating the appropriate quantities of plutonium to the custody of IAEA whenever fuel rods were returned from countries abroad for processing.

26. The Australian representative had understood the United Kingdom representative to suggest that no safeguards be applied until the Agency had produced its scheme. He wondered whether Canada intended to put its proposed system into effect before this and whether the meeting should not try and decide whether its collective goal was an acceptable and compatible IAEA system or one which producing countries could put into effect before IAEA announced its system or if it failed to do so.

27. The Canadian representative said that it was unlikely that Canada would apply safeguards within the next year or so. Canada had nevertheless been disturbed by reports of a South African sale of uranium to Japan without provision for the application of safeguards, and considered that it was important that all producing countries continued to establish their rights in this matter in agreements and sales contracts with other countries.

28. Mr. Schaetzel thought that this touched on a real problem: if the countries present at the meeting did not present a common front in insisting upon establishing their right to apply safeguards, efforts to develop a safeguards system would collapse. It was clearly also necessary to reach agreement on the substance of a safeguards system among countries participating in the meeting and other friendly countries if an international system was to be sold in the international forum.

Future Course of Action

29. The United Kingdom representative suggested that, if progress was to be made, the countries represented at the meeting must agree among themselves on a safeguards system and then try and secure international approval for it through IAEA, in the meantime maintaining a discreet silence on their plans.

30. The Australian representative agreed and wondered whether IAEA's Board might not ask the Director-General to put forward an Agency system by a given deadline. He also thought that it might be useful if specific proposals for a safeguards system acceptable to the five participating countries were drafted on the basis of the present meeting.

31. The Chairman thought that it might be somewhat precipitate to undertake drafting at this stage. It was his impression that another meeting might be required in order to reach definite agreement prior to drafting.

32. The United States representative agreed, saying that his country still had to present its analysis. In response to a query, he added that it might be possible to do so by early December.

33. The Chairman proposed that a meeting of officials (perhaps drawn from the Embassies concerned) should be held in Washington about December 15, 1958, to receive the U.S. paper and to exchange any additional information which might be available.

34. The United Kingdom representative suggested that, if possible, the United States paper should include a list of items of equipment which would be covered by a safeguards system. He also suggested that a later meeting, which should aim at reaching definite agreement on a safeguards system should be held in Vienna following the meeting of the Agency's Board of Governors in January, 1959, pointing out that many of the persons concerned would already be in Vienna at that time and that this location would permit an informal and unobtrusive briefing of Roger Smith on the type of Agency safeguards which would be acceptable to the five countries present.

35. It was agreed that:

(a) the United States representatives would circulate certain technical papers to other participating countries as soon as possible;

(b) that a meeting would be held in Washington about December 15, 1958, to receive the U.S. analytical paper;

(c) that a meeting would be held in Vienna about January 20, 1959, with the object of reaching agreement on a safeguards system;

(d) that, in the meantime, no publicity should be given to the intentions or plans of participating countries with regard to safeguards.

36. During the concluding exchanges at the meeting, the following additional points were mentioned:

(a) when the question of safeguards arises in IAEA the best tactics might be for the United States and United Kingdom to favour a rather rigorous system while the other three countries advocate a system which would in fact be acceptable to all five countries. The U.S. and U.K. could then appear to compromise and thus increase the chances of gaining general acceptance for a reasonable system;

(b) the United States is considering the possibility of permitting the export of sample quantities of natural uranium, greater than the present limit of 1,000 kg. for uncontrolled exports to any one country, subject to limited safeguards of the kind provided in its research bilaterals (periodic reports, periodic inspection and the return of spent fuel to the U.S.A. for reprocessing);

(c) the United Kingdom representative reminded the meeting that his country had always taken the position that it would not seek to apply safeguards to materials exported to Australia and South Africa. He wondered whether others had considered the possibility of extending similar special treatment to members of the new Commonwealth, such as India. The U.S. and Canadian representatives replied that neither of their countries was considering any form of special treatment for India. The United States has recently agreed to lease some heavy water to India, and the lease agreement provides for safeguards. Canada has consistently refused to supply uranium to India without safeguards;

(d) it was generally agreed that it would be useful if the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs were to explore the Russian attitude towards safeguards with the new U.S.S.R. Ambassador to Canada should the opportunity arise. The U.S. authorities had discussed this question with the Russians on several occasions at the time of the first Geneva Conference, without any useful result. The U.K. representative had more recently spoken to the Russian member of the Agency's Board of Governors and had formed the opinion that the U.S.S.R. would be inclined to agree privately with the application of safeguards to countries such as Japan, but would continue to take the position in public that safeguards were a Western device to keep control over under-developed countries.

LIABILITY ARISING OUT OF THE SUPPLY OF CANADIAN NUCLEAR MATERIALS ABROAD

Experience has shown that many nuclear materials, including some used in nuclear reactors, involve a substantial risk of accident and radioactive contamination, with subsequent danger to life and property. This raises the problem of the liability of the manufacturer and supplier for damages in the case of such accidents.

In the summer of 1957, Cabinet approved a draft standard bilateral agreement for co-ordination in the peaceful uses of atomic energy; this draft was to serve as a basis for the negotiation of atomic energy agreements with other friendly countries. Neither the standard draft, nor the agreements we have since negotiated with West Germany and Switzerland, cover the problem of liability in the case of accidents involving nuclear materials. The reason for this is partly that international precedents on this subject have been slow to develop and partly that we did not anticipate that Canada would be exporting materials involving a substantial risk of nuclear accidents. (For example, natural uranium ores and oxides do not, in themselves, raise this danger.)

During the past year, both the United Kingdom and the United States have adopted the practice of including, in their bilateral agreements, clauses providing that they are to be held harmless against all liability from any cause connected with nuclear materials which they have supplied to other countries. We have also found that Canada may supply materials liable to dangerous accident and, in a contract negotiated this summer for the supply of reactor fuel elements to Switzerland, AECL included an indemnity clause.

Officials have since considered whether a similar clause should be included in our draft standard bilateral and in the bilateral agreements which we negotiate with other countries in the future, and have concluded that it would be desirable to do so. A suggested standard clause, based on the clauses used by the United Kingdom and the United States and similar in substance to the clause included in the AECL-Swiss contract, is attached. I recommend that this be included in our standard draft.

We have consulted the Department of Justice and other interested Departments and Agencies and they have signified their approval. The clause has since been submitted to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and has been agreed by him.²³

SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS

Please seek State Department's views on the following questions which arise out of November 5 meeting:

(a) Relationship between USA-Euratom agreement and USA bilateral agreements with individual Euratom countries. Early this summer it was suggested by USA officials that

²³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Approved for insertion in appropriate agreements. 28/11/58. E.D. F[ulton]

when the USA-Euratom agreement had been concluded it might supercede USA bilateral agreements as the instrument governing USA relations with individual Euratom countries in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Paragraph 5 of Brussels telegram 547 December 9† suggests that Euratom may be thinking along similar lines, although it apparently considers that some aspects of the relations of Euratom countries with third parties will continue to be governed by bilateral agreements. We have been doubtful of the view earlier expressed by USA officials: Euratom's jurisdiction does not cover the entire peaceful atomic energy programmes and its member countries and it has therefore seemed to us that, even if we were to conclude an agreement for cooperation with Euratom, there would continue to be a need for bilateral agreements with individual countries. We recognize that some clauses of our present standard draft bilateral agreement might become redundant and that others might require amendment, particularly with the creation of the Euratom Supply Agency. For example, the Supply Agency has a virtual monopoly over the conclusion of contracts for the supply of raw and fissile materials from outside the community; this may lead member countries to argue that safeguards should be applied by Euratom itself to all such materials and not only to those destined for use in Euratom projects, as envisaged in the USA-Euratom agreements. During our negotiations with West Germany last fall, the Germans proposed that Euratom apply the safeguards contained in Article IV of our Bilateral Atomic Energy Agreement but we were not prepared to agree. Current USA thinking on these problems would be of great interest to us

(b) Uranium exports subject to limited safeguards. The idea mentioned in paragraph 36(b) of the enclosure to my letter under reference has some attraction from the commercial point of view. However, we are doubtful whether it could be implemented without endangering the safeguards concept. Presumably this question will be further discussed at a future 5-party meeting but we would be glad to know if USA officials have carried their thinking any further on it and also to have their views on the quantities of uranium which each producing country might export under such an arrangement, if it were to prove practicable

(c) Future 5-party meetings on safeguards. USA Embassy here has just informed us that USA safeguards paper will not be available by December 15 and that USA officials doubt whether it will prove practicable to hold meeting in Vienna scheduled for mid January. They apparently hope to indicate by the end of this month when they expect to be able to resume meetings. We expressed great disappointment at this delay, referring to the importance all participants in the November 5 meeting had attached to early resumption of joint discussions on this subject. We stressed particularly the point made in paragraph 20 (repeat) 20 of enclosure to my letter under reference, saying that our offer to donate three tons of uranium to the agency for resale to Japan (Vienna telegram 101 December 12† refers) had been made conditional on the application of safeguards by the Agency. It had thus been designed to accelerate progress by the Agency in developing its safeguards system and would, we thought, have this effect. In our opinion this substantially increased the urgency of clarifying our ideas on safeguards on a five-party basis, in order to ensure that the Agency did not get too far ahead of us in developing its own system. All present at the November 5 meeting recognized the advantages of meeting in Vienna and we feared that if we missed the opportunity of a January meeting, another convenient date for assembling officials concerned there might not occur for several months. We would be grateful if you would repeat these arguments to the State Department.

SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS²⁴

We had an extensive discussion with Schaetzel of state on the contents of your reference telegram.

(a) Relationship between USA-Euratom Agreement and USA Bilateral Agreements with Individual Euratom Countries.

Schaetzel maintained that the only points that really needed to be included under the USA/Euratom agreement were those concerning nuclear materials and hardware, that all other items, third party liability, patents, etc. could have been left for inclusion in contracts. He repeated that it was the intent of the State Department to negotiate out of existence the individual bilaterals and in essence transfer to Euratom all nuclear materials and hardware connected with peaceful uses (and, in consequence, their safeguarding). He pointed to Section 14 of the memorandum of understanding concerning the USA/Euratom agreement which says "existing agreements ... will be subject to appropriate negotiations pursuant to Article 106 of the (Euratom) Treaty."

Having made this emphatic statement Schaetzel then somewhat moderated it. He said that one could assume that Euratom and the individual countries would not always hold identical views. He visualized therefore that in some cases Euratom countries might press the USA, as a political requirement, to continue the existence of an individual bilateral even though in a greatly watered-down form.

(b) Natural Uranium Exports Subject to Limited Safeguards.

Both Schaetzel and Jesse Johnson, Head of AEC's Raw Material Division, say that paragraph 36(b) is a misstatement of fact and that the USA is not considering any such action.

We got in touch with Myron Kratzer whom we recall as the originator of the statement. Kratzer said that 36(b) was too compact and precise to be clear but if one read it as precisely as it was written it was a true statement. He said that this was not a 'hot' topic nor a major topic and had been kicking around the staff for over a year. Schaetzel and Johnson would not know about it as it was only a procedural matter and not a policy matter.

²⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

Mr. Langley: Please see my note on p. 3. R. G[rey] [Voir la note suivante/See following footnote]. Mr. Dulles did not attend mtg and Mr. LePan decided it would not be helpful to raise this matter with other U.S. Ministers. J. L[anglely] 14/1 [1959]

Kratzer offered to put a clarification of paragraph 36(b) in writing which we accepted. Meanwhile his rather rambling and unorganized explanation appeared to boil down to the following: in USA research bilaterals specified ceilings are placed on enriched uranium but in these same bilaterals when natural uranium is mentioned no ceilings are stated. Thus there never has been an expressed limit on the amount of natural uranium to be exported under limited safeguards. Limited safeguards are all that are required to ensure security where natural uranium is used in discrete quantities in small research reactors, subcritical assemblies, etc where it is not exposed to a high neutron flux and the material is returned to the USA for processing. In the absence of a bilateral these limited safeguards could be incorporated in a contract. The contract would presumably stipulate the amount of natural uranium to be exported and where the conditions of use were satisfactory one might feel that amounts in excess of 1,000 kg were still reasonable and safe.

We raised several times the question of the quantities of uranium which each producing country might export under such an arrangement but Kratzer would not commit himself.

(c) Future 5-Party Meetings on Safeguards

As you know State Department thinking on safeguards is very close to our own. We put forward your arguments "in fairly emphatic terms" as directed but there was little satisfaction in this exercise as Schaetzel concurred completely and even added to the emphasis.

Schaetzel states that the situation in AEC remains unchanged. A group headed by Kirk, Kratzer, English and Fine maintain that the only acceptable basis for safeguards is completely independent and meticulous checking and accounting down to the last detail. They have sufficient influence to frustrate the advancement of ideas similar to our own and yet not sufficient influence to get their own ideas accepted. The result is a stalemate within the AEC staff. As there is no indication that this situation is due for a change there is little likelihood of the USA being prepared for a 5-party meeting, in the near future. We asked how long an important question like this was going to be left at the level of a staff squabble; could not John Hall or Algie Wells knock a few heads together and resolve the conflict. Schaetzel observed sourly that it was not the nature of either one to resolve conflicts.

We enquired what interest and attitude the AEC Commissioners had in the problem. Schaetzel believed they were uninterested or indifferent to the matter except possibly Folger whose views were similar to those of Kirk, Kratzer and company.

Schaetzel doubted that McCone was aware of the situation and felt that if only he could be got to, as a hard headed businessman he could be brought to see the light. Schaetzel asked if Gray of AECL could take up the situation by phone with McCone. We replied that to the best of our knowledge Gray had not yet had an opportunity to meet McCone personally and therefore a phone call would be of doubtful effectiveness.

Only Farley and Schaetzel have been handling this safeguards matter in the State Department. As they are getting nowhere with it they plan to draw the matter to the attention of Herter or Murphy. Schaetzel wondered if on the occasion of the meeting of the Joint Committee on Economic Affairs in January Mr. Robertson or the Minister might not be able to say a few words on the subject to Mr. Dulles.²⁵

2. Schaetzel threw out a suggestion which he said he would not care to have attributed to him. He suggested that in the face of USA lack of action the other four countries might

²⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

[texte détruit/text destroyed] ... quite possibly at US Embassy lunch. Will you bear in mind need to brief Minister. R. G[rey] proceed to reach agreement on a safeguards procedure based on the Canadian paper. The production of a tangible procedure agreeable to the other four might force the USA to resolve its position and move more closely into line.

FIRST GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The First General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency will open in Vienna on October 1 and last some three or four weeks. The Conference as its first task will elect ten members to the Board of Governors of the Agency, to join the thirteen countries already designated for membership by the Agency's preparatory Commission as provided in the Agency's statute. (Canada by reason of its extensive atomic programme and its major production of uranium, has already been designated for the first category of membership on the Board of Governors of the Agency as one of the five most advanced atomic powers.) The Conference will then determine, on the basis of recommendations from the Preparatory Commission and the Board of Governors, the programme, budget, and establishment of the Agency for its first year's operations. It will also be asked to confirm the nomination to be submitted by the Board of Governors for the first Director General of the Agency.

I wish to recommend²⁶ that the points set out below should serve as the general directive for the Canadian delegation to the Conference. They are based on what has been the Canadian position throughout, namely that the Agency is an important and can be a useful organization. The assistance it will provide will be financed by charges against the recipients, except to the extent that member governments may decide to make voluntary contributions to its programme. As a point of direct interest to Canada, it is likely to facilitate the development of markets for uranium and assist in ensuring that our uranium exports will not be diverted to clandestine military uses. These general instructions proposed below would of course be supplemented by more detailed guidance from Ottawa on particular points as they arise.

I—The delegation should support the adoption of an imaginative, vigorous and realistic initial programme for the Agency.

II—It should support arrangements which will ensure that adequate funds will be available to permit the Agency to take effective initiatives, while providing for sound and responsible management of these resources.

²⁶ Le 1^{er} octobre 1957, le Cabinet « noted with approval » ces instructions.
On October 1, 1957, Cabinet "noted with approval" these instructions.

III—It should endeavour to arrange that the Agency will promptly establish on an effective basis the machinery, for which provision is made in its statute, for ensuring against diversion of Agency assistance to military use.

IV—The Canadian delegation should make known Canada's readiness to make uranium available to the Agency in substantial quantities, subject of course to the Agency's safeguards and on terms and at dates to be agreed. This statement should be prudent as far as precise commitments are concerned, but should be sufficiently specific to make it clear to the Agency that Canada is in the uranium export business on a serious and substantial commercial basis.

V—The delegation should declare Canada's willingness, to the extent her facilities and her own requirements permit, to allot places to students from other countries for training in the various institutions concerned with studies on the peaceful uses of atomic energy. While specific reference to financing of such training should be avoided, the delegation should indicate that Canada will deal sympathetically with this question. (Ministers should be aware that there is being considered, for possible use at the Mont Tremblant Conference of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, a somewhat more specific and generous statement on provision of training than that suggested above.)

VI—The delegation should seek to ensure that places on the staff of the Agency commensurate in number and status with Canada's relatively advanced position in atomic energy shall be available to qualified Canadian candidates.

VII—The delegation, to the extent that it may find itself involved in negotiations concerning the selection of the personnel to fill important posts (e.g. the most senior officials of the Agency's staff and the officers of its Board of Governors) should seek to ensure that the policy interests of the western powers are adequately protected and that the individuals chosen are well qualified personally for their positions.

VIII—In all of these various matters the delegation should maintain close contact with friendly delegations and particularly those of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, and other countries of the Commonwealth, with a view to harmonizing their various positions to the maximum extent consistent with Canadian interests. In general, the delegation should join with other western countries in opposing undesirable or obstructive initiatives by the Soviet bloc if these should appear, while encouraging as much real co-operation as possible among all participating countries in support of the Agency's objectives.

DESPATCH NO. 746

Vienna, November 18, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

SOME INITIAL IMPRESSIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The Canadian Delegation has already submitted reports describing in some detail the accomplishments of the first sessions of the General Conference and Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency.²⁷ In this despatch I wish to give some of the initial impressions I (and Mr. Barton) have gained on various aspects of the Agency's activities and the probable development of events in the coming months.

The Spirit of the Conference

2. The General Conference opened with a sense of foreboding that there would be an open clash between the United States and the Soviet Union over the important issue of the appointment of the Director General. However, due in no small measure to the missionary work of Dr. Bunche of the United Nations Secretariat, the Soviet Delegation adopted a conciliatory attitude and acquiesced in the appointment of Sterling Cole. The good spirit which this created was enhanced by the action of the Western nations in supporting the election of a Czech, Pavel Winkler, as Chairman of the Board of Governors, and by the general agreement reached on the slate of officers for the Conference.

3. I think that for those delegations not represented on the Board of Governors the spirit of the Conference must be described as a mixture of hope and frustration — hope in the future of the Agency and frustration that on this occasion they did not have a more useful job to do. Most of the documentation the Conference had to deal with was concerned with the organizational and procedural framework of the Agency and the programme of work for the first year was of necessity couched in such generalities that it was difficult to come to grips with it. Because these delegates were not very busy and because of the active social programme, many humorous references were made to “the second Congress of Vienna.”

The Director General

4. The individual who more than any other person will be responsible for the measure of success achieved by the Agency is the Director General. Mr. Cole impressed me as being an articulate and forthright individual, but obviously quite unaware of the facts of life so far as concerns dealing with a governing body made up of the representatives of twenty-three sovereign nations. I hope and trust that with his political experience he will prove to be a fast learner, but at the same time I am afraid that during the next few months there are likely to be a succession of incidents which will exacerbate his relations with the Board.

5. Mr. Cole, I am sure, believes that the Board should devote its attention to matters of major importance and leave him free to settle “administrative details” as he sees fit. On the other hand, a number of the Governors, particularly those from the Communist countries, and Egypt and India, have made it plain that they have accepted the appointment of an American Director General strictly on sufferance and will do all within their power to keep a close rein on his activities. I expect that the first test of strength will come when Cole comes up with his slate of appointments to senior positions.

The Board of Governors

6. As expected, the 23-man Board of Governors is proving to be unwieldy. As time goes on those members who did not serve on the Preparatory Commission will learn more about the background and underlying issues of the matters under discussion and, it is to be hoped, will become less vocal. At present, however, it seems to be impossible to deal with even the simplest and least contentious items in less than half a day. For these reasons, and ²⁷ Pour le rapport complet de la délégation canadienne, se reporter à la lettre n° 33 de M. Barton au SSEAE, du 6 novembre 1957, MAE/14001-3-3-40.

For the full report of the Canadian delegation, see Barton to USSEA, Letter No. 33, November 6, 1957, DEA/14001-3-3-40.

because of the number of relatively important matters requiring the attention of the Board during the next few months, it is evident that it will be meeting frequently and at length between now and the next General Conference (to be held in September 1958).

7. Dr. Pavel Winkler, the Chairman of the Board, is a very able man and on the whole carries out his duties reasonably satisfactorily. However, when he deems it advisable, he can be quite unscrupulous in making use of his position to seek to present the consensus of the Board in a manner most favourable to the Communist view.

8. I think it is fair to say on the basis of what has happened so far that the pattern of "alliances" that was evident in the Washington conference two years ago, and in the Preparatory Commission, is repeating itself. On almost every issue of consequence the Western group of nations is opposed by the USSR, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Egypt and India, usually joined by Indonesia. A number of delegations normally regarded as Western, or at least pro-Western, including Pakistan, Sweden, Italy and the Latin-American countries, have on more than one occasion shown a tendency to abstain when the differences of opinion have been particularly marked. It must be said, therefore, that from our point of view we have by no means a "safe" Board.

9. The representatives of Guatemala and Peru were not present for the final week of the Board's sessions and, so far, have made no arrangements for continued representation in Vienna. However, I understand that the Brazilian and United States delegations are taking steps to put pressure on the truants to mend their ways.

The Agency's Prospects Beyond the First Year

10. Shortly before I returned from Vienna to Geneva, I had a very informal talk with Robert McKinney, the United States representative on the Board of Governors, about the Agency's prospects beyond the first year. I said that I assumed that, since the Agency stemmed from the proposal made by President Eisenhower in 1953 and because the United States Government had taken the principal initiative in its establishment, his Government must have a definite concept of what the role of the Agency should be and what it might accomplish in the years ahead.

11. McKinney's comments in reply to my question were made in complete frankness. He said that he, as a Democrat, had only accepted his appointment because of his conviction that the Agency offered the best prospects of achieving the purposes of his government — that atomic energy should be available on the widest possible basis throughout the world for peaceful purposes with reasonable assurances that it would not be diverted to military ends. He acknowledged that there were a number of Americans, both in the Congress and elsewhere, who favoured a strictly bilateral approach, and that if their views carried the day the Agency's usefulness would be very limited, but he was optimistic that this would prove not to be the case.

12. When I put to him the argument that a good many "receiving countries," particularly the technologically-advanced Western European nations, might prefer bilateral agreements with safeguards administered by the supplying state rather than by the Agency, he conceded that this would make for complications, but he was hopeful that his own country, as well as the other principal suppliers, would exert increasing pressure on would-be purchasers to make use of the Agency. In this connection, he brought up the question of what could be done to make safeguards more palatable and to my surprise asked me whether, in my opinion, even at this late date, it would be helpful if the United States and the other leading atomic powers would agree to accept inspection of their own non-military programmes. Both from the tenor of McKinney's remarks and a separate conversation which Barton had with Richard Kirk of the Atomic Energy Commission on the same point,

I got the impression that this idea was receiving serious consideration, at least at the working level, the more so because of the position taken by the United Kingdom, Australian and South African representatives during the recent informal discussions in Washington and Vienna on the control problem.

13. McKinney concluded by saying that he had been disturbed by the limited concept of the Agency's role which the United Kingdom, South African and Australian Governments seemed to hold. He felt that unless the leading Western powers supported the Agency not only by words but by deeds, there was a serious possibility that the Soviet bloc might run away with it. To support his point he mentioned that the Soviet Permanent Mission to the Agency was going to have on its permanent staff in Vienna nine scientists and engineers specializing in the different aspects of atomic technology. He didn't suggest that Western countries should do the same but he did express the hope that they would be forthcoming in supplying suitable qualified personnel for the Agency staff itself.

The Soviet Union and the Agency

14. It is very evident that the USSR still takes very seriously its position as a leading participant in the Agency. It has no intention, I believe, of allowing its defeats on ideological issues to drive it into a corner which would handicap its role as a would-be major supplier of atomic assistance to under-developed countries once the Agency's programme gets under way. Indeed, there are good grounds for arguing that the USSR takes the Agency even more seriously than do the Western Powers, both by virtue of the fact that Professor Emelyanov (who is reputed to be the "opposite number" of Strauss and Plowden) stayed in Vienna throughout the Conference and attended the meetings of the Board regularly, and because of the size and character of the mission which the USSR is establishing in Vienna.

15. At this stage in the Agency's life one can only speculate on the long-term objectives of the Soviet Union. In my opinion the answer to this question hinges on the Soviet approach to two subsidiary questions. First, does the USSR see some advantage in offering assistance administered by the Agency or will it cling to what is essentially a bilateral approach, and second, is it or is it not seriously interested in the development of a system of safeguards?

16. So far as the first of these questions is concerned, it would not surprise me if the Russians have not yet made up their own minds. Indeed, initially they might well try both approaches.

17. With regard to the question of safeguards, the present indications of the Soviet position can only be described as contradictory. The frequently-reiterated public position of the Soviet Delegation to the Conference was that some measure of control is necessary, but this is qualified by the almost contradictory assertion that the acceptance of control should in no way infringe the sovereign rights of states receiving assistance from the Agency, should not be used for interference in the internal affairs of states, should not hinder countries from developing atomic industry, and should not encroach on the work, discoveries or inventions of experts.

18. So far, the Soviet Union has negotiated bilateral agreements for cooperation with its communist partners, and with Yugoslavia and Egypt. The Egyptian Delegate to the Conference told us that whereas his government had rejected a bilateral agreement with the United States because its conditions constituted an unacceptable infringement of Egyptian sovereignty, the agreement with the Soviet Union had no strings at all. On the other hand, the Yugoslav Delegate told the Americans privately that his country was most unhappy about its agreement with the USSR because all used fuel elements had to be returned to the Soviet Union.

The Western Atomic Powers and the Agency

19. I have chosen to conclude this despatch with some comments on the approach of the Western atomic powers to the Agency because in my opinion it is this approach which will determine the success to be achieved. It is no secret that with the exception of the United States all the members of this group have, in varying degrees, reservations about the usefulness and role of the Agency they have helped to create. Up to now this has not mattered too much, but in the coming months we will be entering a new phase in which we will be faced with demands for contributions from our own limited resources of technically-qualified manpower and training facilities, as well as to projects such as the fellowship programme included in the 1958 operational budget.

20. How will the Western atomic powers respond to this challenge? Can the United States count on the help of the United Kingdom, France, Canada, and to a lesser extent, Australia and South Africa? Here, perhaps, is a situation where the example set by one may have a considerable influence on the others.

21. This leads me to say that, in order to do justice to my duties as Canadian representative on the Board of Governors, I will need during the next few months a more definite understanding than I have at present of (a) what the Canadian Government would like the Agency to accomplish and (b) what Canada may be willing to do for or through the Agency.

General

22. Mr. McKinney's comments, reported in paras 10 to 13, were given on a personal basis and not as United States Government views. I ask therefore that they should not be quoted in any discussion with representatives of the United States Government.

23. Enclosed are three duplicates of this despatch to facilitate references in Ottawa. I am sending copies to Washington and of course to Vienna, leaving it to the Department to send copies to other missions if that is considered useful.

CANADA'S ROLE IN THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

I. Introduction

The world is eagerly awaiting the arrival of the atomic age. The prospect of obtaining virtually unlimited power in a form not tied, as more conventional energy sources tend to be, to a specific locality has an appeal to the imagination which leads to intense public interest in each new development in this field. In more material terms, many of the industrialized countries are already facing serious economic difficulties which will be relieved only through access to a new and versatile energy source which the atom promises to offer; the under-developed countries, also, link their hopes for economic and social progress with industrialization and consequently with the early establishment of ample supplies of energy which for many of them cannot readily be drawn from conventional sources.

2. Whether or not atomic energy will fulfill all of the optimistic predictions made for it, there is no doubt that its application on a significant scale in some countries at least is only a few years away and will have profound effects on many aspects of society. Canada is singularly fortunate in the atomic assets which it possesses, and in the years immediately ahead should utilize these assets to the full. Canada has abundant supplies of uranium, the primary raw material for the atomic industry about to be born; these supplies are far in excess of her prospective domestic requirements, and a substantial export capacity is now in existence. Canada also has an advanced programme of research and development in the application of atomic energy, and in particular has considerable knowledge and experience of the natural uranium heavy water type of reactor, which shows great promise for the economic production of power. Only the United States and the U.S.S.R. apart from Canada have both advanced development programmes and significant supplies of uranium, and at present at least both of these countries are net importers of uranium. Among the countries with advanced atomic power programmes, Canada alone is at present a substantial net exporter of uranium.

3. If these dual assets are to be fully exploited, it is important that Canada should play an active role in international efforts to promote the peaceful use of atomic energy. Such a role is of course necessary in order to establish and expand commercial outlets for uranium and, at a somewhat later date, for reactors of the type in which we have specialized. The development of foreign markets is of importance not only for our uranium but also for reactors, in that Canada's relative abundance of conventional sources of energy will for a few years yet limit the extent to which a domestic market is likely to develop; in the interval foreign sales will be necessary for the maintenance of a vigorous and efficient atomic engineering industry.

II. Canada's International Role in Atomic Affairs

4. It is suggested that we should play an active part in atomic affairs on the international scene, and that our efforts should be directed towards three different targets. In the first place, we should maintain and expand our existing bilateral contacts with other governments. Such contacts have been most intimate with the United States and the United Kingdom for a number of years, and those two countries are at present our chief uranium export markets. More recently, however, we have concluded agreements with Germany and Switzerland for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Japan also has expressed an interest in concluding an agreement of this nature, which will provide (as in the case of Germany and Switzerland) for the export of uranium from Canada. With a number of other countries also we have useful and expanding bilateral contacts, not yet of a nature to require formal intergovernmental agreements. Through such bilateral contacts we must hope to build a broad and diversified market for Canadian uranium and in due course to find outlets for the manufactured products of a Canadian atomic engineering industry.

5. As a second area of activity, we should develop close working relations with certain regional atomic organizations. Of particular interest are Euratom, the six-power agency established by western European countries in the atomic field in parallel with the European Coal and Steel Community and the European common market, and the somewhat broader and looser association formed by the countries of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation to coordinate and reinforce their individual atomic programmes. Through contact with such organizations we can exert a useful influence upon their policies and no doubt can find additional outlets for Canadian exports.

6. Finally and in some respects most important of all, we should play an active role in the International Atomic Energy Agency. This body has developed from President Eisenhower's "Atoms for Peace" proposal presented to the United Nations in 1953. This Agency has world wide membership, and for many countries and peoples is the symbol of the world's hopes for the realization of the benefits which atomic energy can bring. The Agency came into existence only last summer, and is still in the initial stages of developing a programme; for a time at least its direct accomplishments may be modest, but its ultimate potential is very great indeed and even now its appeal to under-developed countries is considerable.

7. Within the Agency Canada has been recognized (as indeed it is in the United Nations Disarmament Commission) as one of the five principal atomic powers; more specifically, Canada along with France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. has been designated for membership of the 23-member Board of Governors as one of "the five most advanced atomic powers," a special category in effect conferring permanent membership on the Board. We must seek to deserve that special status, both because of the direct economic advantages to Canada as suggested in preceding paragraphs and because through it we shall be able to exert a significant influence upon the application of atomic energy throughout the world. In view of the importance of developments undoubtedly about to take place in this field, it is worth a significant effort to ensure as far as possible that they are based on imaginative, constructive and responsible planning; and by accepting the opportunities to exercise leadership, offered to us in the Agency, we may hope to make a worthwhile contribution to this work.

Recommendations

8. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I wish to recommend that:

(a) we should re-affirm the decision which we took at the time of the Agency's first general conference last autumn, to the effect that Canada should seek to play an active and constructive role in the work of the Agency; we should adhere to this policy in the knowledge that it will involve us in contributing to the programmes which the Agency will propose and for which it will seek the support of governments;

(b) we should authorize our representative on the Board of Governors of the Agency to inform the Board at its meeting next week that the Canadian Government will seek Parliamentary authority for a contribution of $25,000 to the Agency's Fellowship Fund for the year 1958/59 (described in the attached Annex†);

(c) we should respond sympathetically to the Agency's appeal for the early provision of expert advisers by those countries having experience in atomic energy matters, to assist less developed countries in planning useful and realistic atomic programmes; specifically, we should be prepared to make available consultants and specialists for limited periods, and under financial arrangements which normally would impose on the Agency or the beneficiary government such extra costs as travel expenses, etc.

(d) we should allow our representative on the Board of Governors to be nominated, as the United States and the United Kingdom wish, to serve as the Chairman of the Board for the coming year (i.e. September 1958 to September 1959).

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY; CANADA'S ROLE

15. The Prime Minister reviewed briefly and in general the position Canada had reached with regard to atomic energy, the international role Canada might play in atomic affairs and, more specifically, the part to be played in the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency. It was recommended that the previous decision to participate actively in these matters be re-affirmed, that parliamentary approval be sought to contribute $25,000 to the Agency's Fellowship Fund for 1958-59, that a sympathetic response be given to requests for expert advisers to assist countries less developed in the field than Canada, and, finally, that the Canadian representative on the Board of Governors of the agency be allowed to serve as Chairman for the coming year.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated. (Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, April 18, 1958—Cab. Doc. 70-58)

16. During the discussion it was pointed out that, although there might be some urgency in the matters referred to, questions of policy were involved and the Cabinet could not be expected to reach decisions on them on such short notice, except perhaps in regard to the chairmanship of the agency.

17. The Cabinet noted the recommendations respecting the role to be played in the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and agreed that the Canadian representative on the Board of Governors be authorized to serve as Chairman of the board for the year September, 1958 to September, 1959, but deferred decision on other questions until a meeting the following week.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY; CANADA'S ROLE
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE APRIL 23)

24. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that the last time this matter had been considered by Cabinet they had reached agreement on one of his recommendations, namely, that the Canadian representative on the Board of Governors be authorized to serve as Chairman on the board for the year September 1958 to September 1959, but had deferred decision on the other recommendations. He now wished to put them forward again and recommend,

(a) that Canada should re-affirm the decision which it had taken at the time of the agency's first general conference last fall, to the effect that Canada should seek to play an active and constructive role in the work of the agency;

(b) that the Canadian representative on the Board of Governors of the agency be authorized to inform the board at its meeting this week that the Canadian government would seek parliamentary authority for a contribution of $25,000 to the agency's Fellowship Fund for the year 1958/59; and,

(c) that Canada respond sympathetically to the agency's appeal for the early provision of expert advisers by those countries having experience in atomic energy matters, to assist less developed countries in planning useful and realistic atomic programmes and specifically, that Canada be prepared to make available consultants and specialists for limited periods, and under financial arrangements which normally would impose on the agency or the beneficiary government such extra costs as "travel expenses," etc.

25. During the discussion it was pointed out that, when the matter had been considered before it had been agreed that the last words in recommendation (c): as “travel expenses, etc.” be replaced by the words “as are not provided for in existing financial provisions.” There was some misgiving that, under the contemplated arrangements, Canada might have little or no voice in the choice of the persons who would benefit from the agency’s Fellowship Fund, and that Canada would thus have little control over the way in which its contribution would be spent. It was explained, however, that the qualifications, etc., of the trainees sent to Canada could be satisfactorily checked in the same manner as for university scholarships.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, April 18, 1958—Cab. Doc. 70-58).

26. The Cabinet approved the recommendation submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the role of Canada in the International Atomic Energy Agency, and agreed,

(a) that the previous decision to participate actively in atomic energy matters be reaffirmed;

(b) that parliamentary approval be sought to contribute $25,000 to the agency’s Fellowship Fund for 1958-59; and,

(c) that a sympathetic response be given to requests for expert advisers to assist countries less developed than Canada in the field of atomic energy.

Mr. Couillard

(1) these are the two letters I mentioned about IAEA and its future.

(2) Max's suggestions amount to:

(a) continuing support for the agency for the time being;

(b) letting US officials know our doubts about Cole's suitability as DG; (This will require top notch diplomacy [L. Couillard])

(c) getting down to a serious appraisal of the Agency and its future with US officials with a view of persuading them to take a more constructive and definite lead on Agency matters.

(3) Would you agree that a personal letter to Ed Ritchie, for either your or Doug's [LePan] signature, might be the best way to get the ball rolling? We might say that possibility of further meeting with R. Grey & Max might be considered if the first approaches make this move useful. (Yes — this has been my thought. Doug will be away next week. L. C[ouillard]) J. [Langley]

Dear Mr. Léger,

RE: INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Since the Agency came into existence last year, Mr. Barton and I have sent to the Department many reports, mostly of a factual character, or requests for instructions. I have not before now attempted a general assessment of the state of affairs in the Agency. During the past few months I have felt a growing uneasiness about those affairs. Unfortunately, I have no remedies to suggest for some of the conditions which seem to me to be wrong, but I think that others might be cured if the governments which are anxious to make the Agency a success would be prepared to take the necessary actions.

The Director General

2. You may recall that the USA insisted on having an American, and Mr. Sterling Cole in particular, chosen for this post. I have since learned that he was the personal choice of Admiral Strauss, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, and that there was little or no consultation with others in the US Government before he was put forward as the candidate.

3. Mr. Cole has some good qualities, such as sincerity, but I have come to the opinion that he has no chance of making the grade as Director General. He has failed to win the respect of the Board of Governors. He shows no signs of talent as an administrator. He lacks understanding of how to handle Governors representing 23 countries. He has committed numerous errors of judgment in his dealings with the Board and, during the present series of meetings, twice came within an inch of ruining himself completely, being saved on both occasions by private advice from the USA Governor and myself to retreat.

4. The prospects for easing him out of office in the immediately foreseeable future without grave loss of face for the United States are not bright. Moreover, I suspect that Mr. McKinney, the US Governor, who is a Democrat, finds it difficult, if not impossible, to report frankly to a Republican Administration on the failure of a prominent Republican politician to make good. Perhaps this is an area in which we and the British could help out by conveying to senior officials of the State Department our concern over the way Mr. Cole is doing his job.

The Secretariat

5. There are many able men in the top ranks of the Secretariat, but the proportion of "duds" is too high. This is not Mr. Cole's fault, except to the extent that he failed to resist the relentless pressures to which he was subjected by numerous governments.

The USA Policy in the Agency

6. Compared with all other members, the USA has offered generous support to the Agency. However, it seems to me that the USA never had and does not now have any clear idea of what the Agency could do to justify its creation. Many of the gifts which the USA has offered have been ill-considered and have found no welcome in the Secretariat or in the Board, e.g. the offer of a big research reactor for the Agency's own use. No one here can see how the Agency would use it or where it would get the money to house and operate it.

Position of Leading Western Countries

7. It was always my impression that the U.K. and France had little or no wish to create the Agency but felt compelled to follow the USA lead. In the Board of Governors we find France, Australia, South Africa and Sweden almost invariably opposed to doing anything that will cost money. The U.K. is not quite as bad. The only countries which have subscribed to the 1958 voluntary fund for a fellowship programme are:

USA	— $125,000 (on a matching basis)
Canada	— $25,000
U.K.	— $25,000 in Sterling
South Africa	— $2,000
Monaco	— $1,000
Turkey	— 10,000 lira.

Not a penny has been offered by such Board members as Australia, France, Sweden, Italy and Portugal. Nor has anything been given by prosperous non-members of the Board, such as Germany, Netherlands and Belgium. The fellowship fund of $250,000 was the only item in the 1958 voluntary operational budget. The 1959 operational budget will probably be $1.5 million.

Position of U.S.S.R.

8. The USSR has given no money to the 1958 operational budget and I shall be astonished if it gives money to the 1959 operational budget (unless the rules yet to be drafted permit the contribution of unusable rubles). I tried as long as possible to believe that the USSR in its own way shared the USA desire to make the Agency a significant organization. I no longer believe this. The USSR is opposed to almost every idea put forward for an Agency activity, especially if it will cost money. Furthermore, the USSR, aided by India, is doing everything possible to prevent the Agency's making even a start in the direction of setting up the safeguards system which is an integral part of the Statute; I believe that they seek to sabotage the safeguards provisions of the Statute.

9. I have speculated on the reasons why the USSR joined the Agency at all and insisted on having a powerful position on the Board of Governors. My feeling is that their actions were and are based on a mixture of the following considerations:

(1) Once they became convinced that the USA was determined to create the Agency even without Soviet participation, they thought it better to be inside and in a position to obstruct whatever the USA might wish to do.

(2) They see some possibility of using the Agency, at little cost to themselves, to send students from other parts of the world to study in the USSR.

(3) They would not mind if the Agency were to be a failure, thereby causing some humiliation to the USA which was its principal founder.

Position of India

10. This has been a surprise to me, and a deep disappointment. The Indian alternate on the Board of Governors is Dr. Rajan, a highly intelligent young diplomat, who takes his orders from Dr. Bhabha. The Indian Department of External Affairs has no influence in the matter. Dr. Rajan almost invariably follows the Communist line in the Board, which is to riddle with criticism any idea which might cost money. Most of Dr. Rajan's positive efforts are devoted to trying to get more senior jobs in the Agency for Indians and others from Asia, Africa and the Middle East. So far as the safeguards provisions of the Statute are concerned, it is clear that India will do all possible to make them a dead-letter. I have heard also from several sources that Dr. Bhabha makes no secret of his dislike for the whole Agency idea.

Conclusions

11. As you will have gathered, I have no suggestions as to what can be done about the problem of the Director General, except to let the State Department, at a sufficiently high level, know of our concern. But I do think something can be done to brighten up the other side of the coin. First, I believe the US Government should engage in an "arm-twisting" operation to make friendly governments who are able to do so, come to the 1958 General Conference in September prepared to pledge to the Agency's 1959 operational budget amounts at least equal to their shares of the Administrative Budget. If we can come close to raising the money required for the 1959 programme, I believe it will help to create an atmosphere of optimism and it will also tend, through the financial commitments of a number of governments who so far have been inclined to snipe from the sidelines, to give them more of a sense of involvement in the successful development of the Agency's programmes.

12. Second, I believe the Canadian Government should try to lead the US Government to face up to the task of evolving a clear concept of what the Agency should and can do to justify its creation. We might urge the convening of a meeting in Washington between senior officials of the two governments, which might last two or three days and would go deeply into the various aspects of the problem in accordance with an agenda carefully prepared in advance. If such a meeting were to be called, I believe that Mr. McKinney, the US Governor, and either Mr. Barton or I should be present so that we could give a frank appraisal of the situation in Vienna. (I could not attend such a meeting until November, but my personal presence is not essential.)

13. If a meeting along the lines I have proposed cannot be arranged, then we might try, at the time of the General Conference when Mr. Gray of AECL is in Vienna, to get together with senior officials of the U.S. delegation for some discussion of the problem. However, this would be a very poor second-best, both because of lack of time for thorough discussion, and because some of the key officials would not be present.

14. Although I am pessimistic about the Agency, I think it is too early for Canada to think of stopping financial support. There will almost certainly be a pledging conference in Vienna at the beginning of October to raise money for the 1959 operational budget. Mr. Barton will be sending a separate communication on this subject. I think that the officials concerned in Ottawa should make every effort to obtain a respectable Canadian pledge. Whether I will make a similar recommendation a year hence in respect of the 1960 budget is another matter. Canada must, I believe, try to give the Agency a fair chance in 1959 and help to set an example of financial support to other western nations who have been lagging behind.²⁹

Yours sincerely,

MAX WERSHOF

P.S. I leave it to you to decide whether to circulate this letter, minus the post-script, to Finance, AECL; Embassy, Washington; and Permanent Mission, N.Y.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, since December 1953, when the President of the United States originated the idea of an international organization devoted to the peaceful uses of atomic energy, Canada had wholeheartedly supported its formation and played a leading role in its subsequent development. When the International Atomic Energy Agency was established in 1957, Canada, because of its leading position in nuclear science and uranium production, had been given one of the five quasi-permanent seats on the agency's Board of Governors, and this year the Canadian member was Vice-Chairman. Part of the agency's activities were financed from its administration budget but there was a wide range which, at least during the initial phase, had to be financed by voluntary contributions. These made up the operational budget, established at $250,000 for 1958 and devoted currently to the agency's fellowship programme. The U.S. had offered half of this on a matching basis and Canada had contributed $25,000. For 1959, the budget was $1.5 million of which it was suggested $1.1 million be devoted to the fellowship programme and economic, technical, and research assistance programmes in less developed countries, and $400,000 to the acquisition by the agency of functional laboratories.

It was in Canada's interest to continue to encourage the agency to develop a vigorous, realistic, and constructive programme. As yet the intentions of the U.S. as to an outright pledge or one on a matching basis were not known, but they had already expressed a hope that Canada would contribute and it was thought a sum of up to $75,000 would not be excessive in relation to a probable U.S. contribution of $750,000. He recommended accordingly, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 3, 1958 - Cab. Doc. 259-58†).

6. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Canadian Delegation to the Second Annual Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency, be authorized to announce at the conference that a Canadian contribution would be made to the 1959 operational budget of the agency, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament; and,

(b) that the amount of the final Canadian pledge would not exceed $75,000; the exact amount to be determined later by the Cabinet after information had been received on pledges by others, particularly the United Kingdom and the United States, and to bear an equitable relationship to those pledges.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY³⁰

The Second General Conference of IAEA opens in Vienna next Monday, September 22. In previous memoranda concerning the Canadian Delegation and a Canadian contribution to the Agency's operational Budget, I mentioned that we would be submitting the instructions for our Delegation to the Conference to you for consideration. These instructions are now attached.

Mr. Wershof, the Canadian Delegate to the General Conference, has been intimately associated with IAEA over the past year as our representative to the Board of Governors, of which he has been Vice Chairman. Since most of the items on the Conference Agenda have previously been considered by the Board, and have been the subject of instructions to Mr. Wershof, it has not appeared necessary to prepare as detailed guidance for our Delegation to the forthcoming meetings as might otherwise have been desirable. The attached instructions, therefore, fall into two parts:

(a) A re-statement of the Canadian attitude towards the Agency designed to enable our Delegation to play a constructive role in efforts to shape the programme and activities of the Agency so as to ensure that it fulfils the objectives for which we supported its creation;³¹

(b) Supplementary guidance on specific Agenda items where this seems to be required.†

³⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Minister: The introductory section was sent to you in Montreal H.B.R.[obinson]

³¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

For HBR I approve SE S[mith] Sept. 21 1958.

The Canadian attitude, as outlined in the attached paper is, of course, in strict conformity with the position endorsed by the Cabinet on several occasions, most notably in connection with your recent recommendation for a Canadian contribution to the Operational Budget of the Agency. The guidance offered on specific items is, broadly speaking, designed to ensure that the position taken by the Canadian Delegation at the General Conference on items such as the credentials of member countries, elections to Agency bodies, budgetary contributions and the technical assistance activities of the Agency is consistent with that of Canada at the United Nations General Assembly and meetings of Specialized Agencies. Cabinet approval having been obtained for the only item on which I think this necessary, namely a Canadian contribution to the Agency's Operational Budget, I recommend the attached instructions for your approval.

The attached paper has been prepared in consultation with the Department of Finance and with AECL, and carries their judgment.³²

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], September 17, 1958

2ND GENERAL CONFERENCE OF IAEA — GUIDANCE FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION

Introduction

Between the end of the war and December 1953, when President Eisenhower proposed the establishment of an international organization within the United Nations family to devote itself to encouraging the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy throughout the world, research and the application of these uses of atomic energy had been almost exclusively a national endeavour. President Eisenhower's proposal was designed as part of an imaginative effort to expand the peaceful uses of atomic energy throughout the world, to bring their benefits particularly to backward countries which could not hope to develop national atomic energy programmes without outside assistance and to provide a vehicle for international consultation and for the channeling of international efforts in this field.

2. Since December 1953, Canada has wholeheartedly supported the formation of the International Atomic Energy Agency. We have participated fully in the discussions which led to the adoption of its statute and we have since played a leading role in its subsequent development. Our position has been based in large measure on our wish to foster the rapid growth of the peaceful uses of atomic energy and the belief that an international agency such as IAEA would make a valuable contribution to this end. This has been considered desirable not only as a contribution to the well being, particularly of the less developed countries, but also with a view to increasing outlets abroad for uranium, a matter of considerable concern to Canadian producers during the next decade or more pending the development of domestic markets. In addition, Canada has hoped that an effective multilateral system of safeguards to prevent the diversion of nuclear materials to military uses might be developed through the Agency.

³² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I approve. Sidney Smith Sept 19th 1958.

3. It is now clear that the use of atomic energy for the production of power on a commercial basis on any significant scale is many years away except in the most advanced industrial countries and that IAEA is not likely to participate directly in a significant way in power reactor programmes during the next few years. This is in large measure due to the fact that most countries of the world lack the technical competence even to begin the establishment of atomic power programmes, while the tendency of the more technically advanced countries has been to turn to bilateral arrangements with the United States, the United Kingdom or the USSR for assistance in implementing their programmes. The role of IAEA in the short run would therefore seem to be to assist the less technically advanced countries to acquire the knowledge and skills which are a first requirement for the later development of their own peaceful atomic energy programmes. This means, broadly speaking, a technical assistance function which the Agency is already implementing through its fellowship programme and the advisory expert teams which it is prepared to make available to less developed countries and regions to assist in ascertaining their atomic energy needs and how these may best be met. In addition, the Agency proposes in 1959 to embark on a programme for the provision of equipment and facilities which the less developed countries will need if their returning trainees are to put their new skills to good use. We do not believe that the Agency should be the main vehicle for the provision of economic aid, which might more suitably be provided under programmes specifically designed for this purpose, such as the Colombo Plan. However, we would not wish, at this early stage, to oppose initiatives of this kind which may be useful and may contribute to the development of IAEA as an effective Agency.

4. Another role which has been envisaged for the Agency is to act as intermediary in the supply of materials. Many member countries have pledged themselves to supply such materials but, in the absence of agreements on the conditions of supply, it is difficult to know how this role of the Agency may develop, particularly as large scale requirements for materials are unlikely to develop until the applications of nuclear energy to the production of power have further advanced. The tendency at the present time is for countries putting a reactor programme into effect to obtain their material requirements from one or other of the more advanced atomic powers through bilateral agreements.

5. The references in the foregoing to the bilateral approach in the international development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy serve to draw attention to one concept of the Agency which appears to have been overlooked during this first year of its existence. We have always considered that the practical advantages of entering bilateral arrangements for the supply of materials and for cooperation in the exchange of information and know-how were so obvious, particularly during the early stages of the Agency's development, that we could not expect multilateral arrangements through IAEA completely to replace them, nor indeed would this seem to be desirable. If, in fact, the organization of power reactor programmes in the less developed countries is carried out primarily through bilateral arrangements, the development by the Agency of a useful role in this field could only take place if it were to adapt its activities and machinery in such a way as to enable it to participate actively in encouraging and facilitating bilateral contacts. What we have in mind is that the Agency having, at its request, assisted a less developed country to define its atomic energy needs, might then bring this country together with a technically advanced country prepared to assist in the realization of its projects by the provision of information, facilities or financial support. This concept is embodied in Article XI of the Statute. A similar intermediary role in the field of health, safety and safeguards is envisaged in Article XII. This role of the Agency has tended to be overlooked during the first year of its existence but would seem to offer scope for constructive developments in the future. More precise guidance on this matter was offered in our telegram No. E-1677 of September 13† to Geneva.

6. The functions of the Agency which have been described in the preceding paragraphs relate to a role through which we believe that it will contribute to increasing the uses of atomic energy in the world. The Agency also has certain other statutory responsibilities. In the first place, we believe that the Agency should take steps to encourage agreement on a mutually acceptable approach to the application of safeguards. It is Canadian policy to apply such safeguards to nuclear materials exported for peaceful use from Canada but we have always recognized that this policy could only be maintained in the long run if it were generally acceptable to both producing and "recipient" countries throughout the world. Our main hope for the development of such a multilateral system must rest upon IAEA, and the Canadian Delegation should encourage it to make progress in this direction. The problems involved are complex but a useful first step might be for the Agency to draw up and seek the agreement of member countries to standard accounting procedures for nuclear materials.

7. A second field of activity upon which the Agency has already embarked is that of Health and Safety. Its role, as stated in the Statute, is to establish or adopt, in collaboration with the United Nations bodies concerned, standards of health and safety. It is also required to apply these to its own projects and to those of any states, at their request. Coming but lately on to the scene, the Agency has been faced with a situation where a number of other international organizations (e.g. NPD, ILO and ICRP) have more or less long standing nuclear programmes intimately related to the other responsibilities they discharge. The problems which this has created are described below in connection with Agenda item 18. Here it suffices to say that, if the Agency is to perform the sort of role which we envisage for it in this field, it and the Specialized Agencies must be encouraged to enter appropriate relationship agreements. The Agency must also be encouraged to keep abreast and to take account of relevant work being done, not only by the Specialized Agencies but by other international organizations and by national bodies. Similar considerations arise in connection with the relationship of IAEA to UNESCO, with its responsibility for education, and many other international organizations.

Ottawa, September 18, 1958

Dear Mr. Wershof,

In preparing the guidance and instructions for our delegation to IAEA's General Conference over the past few weeks, we have had the points made in your personal letter of June 30 very much in mind. I cannot pretend that we have been entirely successful, but the introductory section of these instructions is an attempt to define our attitude towards the Agency, at this stage in its development, and indicate the direction in which it is in Canada's interest to press the Agency to move.

Unfortunately, the preparation of this statement has taken rather longer than we had anticipated and we have therefore not had an opportunity to discuss the future of the Agency with the United States authorities, even in a preliminary way, as we had hoped and had said we intended to do in our telegram No. E-1533 of August 29.† However, it seems that the United States will take a quite positive line at the forthcoming General Conference and it may be just as well to postpone any action until we can assess the trend of the Conference and decide whether a frank discussion in Washington would still serve a useful purpose.

I would be glad to have your opinion on this at the end of the Conference. If we decide that it would be useful to proceed with these talks, I hope that they can be timed to take advantage of your visit to Canada at the end of October.

One other point that I would like to mention concerns the Health and Safety activities of the Agency. We are naturally turning to the Department of Health and Welfare here for advice on technical questions, such as those which arose in connection with the Agency's recent draft of a radiation safety manual. Health and Welfare is interested and helpful but there is none-the-less a conflict of interest in its relations with IAEA, on the one hand, and with WHO, ICRP and the United Nations Scientific Committee on Radiation, on the other. I think, therefore, that it might be useful for us to seek an opportunity to have a member of that Department (such as Dr. Watkinson) attend a future meeting of the Board, at which Health problems are to be discussed, or an appropriate Agency committee. Provided that the discussions were of a really substantial nature, I think that both our own people and the Agency might derive real benefit.

I now intend to send copies of your letter of June 30 and of this reply, to our Embassy in Washington.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 268-58

[Ottawa], September 19, 1958

CONFIDENTIAL

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

On September 7 the Cabinet approved a recommendation that the Canadian Delegation to the Second General Conference of IAEA be authorized to announce that a Canadian contribution would be made to the 1959 Operational Budget of the Agency, subject to the appropriation of funds by parliament. The amount of this contribution was not to exceed $75,000, the exact figure to be determined by the Cabinet after we had received information on the pledges to be offered by others, and particularly the United Kingdom and the United States.

We have now been informed that the United States intends to pledge half of the Agency's Operational Budget. Provided that the General Conference approves the Board of Governors' recommendation for a total Operational Budget of $1,500,000, the United States will contribute $750,000, of which $500,000 will be an unconditional payment while the remaining $250,000 will be paid on a matching basis, depending on the contributions of other member countries.

The United Kingdom authorities have also informed us that they will contribute on "the scale which is usually expected of the United Kingdom" and that they intend to announce a pledge of $150,000 (sterling equivalent). They have been considering whether a portion of this might be given in the form of a tied contribution, for example for fellowships or some kind of technical aid, and have now authorized their representative to the General Conference to reach a decision on allocation in the light of developments at the Conference.

In view of our great interest in, and past support for, the Agency and our desire to encourage other member countries to contribute their fair share to its voluntary programmes, it is in Canada's interest to announce a definite contribution at the forthcoming General Conference, or the Pledging Conference if one is held. As I stated in my previous recommendation, a Canadian contribution of 10 percent of the actual United States contribution would not seem to be excessive in relation to our interest in the Agency, and would also seem to bear a proper relationship to the expected United Kingdom contribution.

Recommendation

I therefore recommend³³ that Mr. Wershof, the Canadian Delegate to the General Conference, be authorized to announce that:

(a) Canada will contribute $50,000 to the Agency's Operational Budget for 1959, provided that the United States announces an unconditional contribution of $500,000. Should the United States make a lower pledge, the Canadian contribution to be announced should be scaled down proportionately;

³³ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 21 septembre 1958.
Approved by Cabinet on September 21, 1958.

(b) Canada will consider contributing up to an additional $25,000 if the response of other member countries to the Agency's appeal for funds is adequate. Our delegate should be informed that Canada is prepared to contribute proportionately (within the overall limit of $75,000 as already approved in principle by Cabinet), provided that the response of other member countries is such as to call forth all or part of the $250,000 which the United States is prepared to contribute on a matching basis. I propose that this additional contribution by Canada be made, if justified on the basis suggested, without further reference to Cabinet but that our Delegate should send to Ottawa the information on the pledges of other member countries which would justify this additional contribution.

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 2, 1958

Dear Ed [Ritchie],

Max Wershof has been very concerned about the future of the International Atomic Energy Agency, in the light of developments during the first year of its existence, and on June 30 he wrote a personal letter to the Under-Secretary expressing some of his misgivings, dwelling particularly on the desirability of trying to lead the United States Government to evolve a clear concept of what the Agency should and could do to justify its creation. I now enclose a copy of that letter, for your information.

We did not circulate this letter at the time of its receipt because we were anxious to clarify our own ideas on the future of the Agency. We had thought that we would then ask you to have preliminary discussions with the State Department in order to see whether it might be useful to hold the kind of meeting of senior officials which Max advocated. The process of working out our position has taken rather longer than we had originally hoped and there would seem to be no point in contemplating any discussions with the United States authorities until after we have had an opportunity to assess the current General Conference of the Agency.

In a letter dated September 18 (a copy of which is also enclosed) to Max, the Under-Secretary has asked for just such an assessment and we would expect to write you again shortly on this matter. In the meantime, I would be happy to have your views on the possible usefulness of discussions with the United States authorities along the lines suggested by Max.

Yours sincerely,

L.E. COUILLARD

IAEA GENERAL PROBLEMS

Although I still think that a thorough USA-Canada discussion of the troubles of the agency should be held in Washington I do not repeat not recommend that it be arranged on relatively short notice i.e. to fit my personal visit to Canada end of October.

2. The kind of meeting I have in mind should be carefully prepared and various senior officials on both sides would need to be briefed. Another reason for not aiming at end of October is that McKinney (USA Governor) has just resigned for personal reasons. I now suggest waiting a few months until new governor has taken over and learned at first hand some of agency's troubles; I could later on propose a target date. General Conference went a little better than I expected and we have a breathing space.³⁴

3. I agree with suggestion that Representative of Department [of] H[ealth] [and] W[elfare] should attend a Board Meeting and will send specific suggestion later this autumn when Board's schedule and future agenda are clearer.

DONATION OF URANIUM METAL TO THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

18. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that Japan had ordered three tons of uranium metal from the International Atomic Energy Agency which in turn had asked members to submit tenders for the supply of this material. The United Kingdom and the United States were, apart from the U.S.S.R., the only sizeable users, and their needs until 1966 had been satisfied by the existing contracts. It was unlikely that demand would be substantial until the middle or late 60's, when requirements were expected to expand rapidly.

Canada had not yet concluded a bilateral atomic energy agreement with Japan and the provision of this uranium through the agency might expedite negotiations. At the moment there was intense competition to supply the relatively small amounts of uranium required outside the U.K. and the U.S. It was possible, therefore, that the successful bidder for the three tons which the agency was asking for would quote a price which bore no relation to cost and thus establish a world price which would be considered too low in the future.

There was very real prestige and advertising value in the transaction and a valuable service could be performed if the government donated the small amount involved. Such a gift would, to some extent, combat the oft made statements that other countries were taking uranium sales away from Canada by giving reactors, long-term credits, etc. The donation would be made on the understanding that the agency would apply safeguards against military use which would strengthen the hand of the head of the agency in developing an international safeguards system. The agency would be expected to re-sell the uranium to Japan and use the funds to cover the cost of safeguards. The cost of the uranium would be approximately $54,000.

He recommended that the donation be made on the understanding that the agency exercised its responsibilities in regard to safeguards and sale, that it was being given to expedite the agency's activities and was not to be regarded as a precedent, and that provision be made in the final supplementary estimates to cover the cost.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Nov. 28 — Cab. Doc. 344-58†).

19. During the discussion it was said that it might be hard to justify such a gift. Moreover, Canada was criticizing the United States for "give-aways". On the other hand, the prospective advantages seemed to be substantial. Provided the government could be assured that the agency would in fact sell the metal at a reasonable price, the transaction should be approved. Further information on this point was needed.

20. The Cabinet deferred decision on the proposal put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to donate three tons of uranium metal to the International Atomic Energy Agency for sale to Japan, pending receipt of information on prices the agency would be expected to charge Japan.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, December 3, 1958

Dear Rod [Grey],

We have read with interest the letter from Max Wershof about the state of the International Atomic Energy Agency and about the desirability of certain actions by Canada, including the undertaking early in the New Year of a review of the situation with United States officials concerned. We shall not, of course, pursue this suggestion formally until we hear from you after the officials in Ottawa have had an opportunity to examine this proposal and the other points in Max's letter. I did, however, have a casual conversation at a reception last evening with Dick Breithut, the official in the State Department who is primarily responsible for IAEA matters. He is obviously aware of the frustrations being experienced by the IAEA. He considers that some of these difficulties result from the excessively high expectations which were built up at an earlier period when it was thought by many that the Agency (and atomic energy itself) would be able to do more wonderful things than now seems practicable. He noted that the IAEA was not the only institution in the atomic energy field which was suffering from disillusionment. He intimated that some domestic United States activities now appeared less enchanting than they had previously, and that Euratom was going through, or might shortly go through, a rather similar process. He did not enlarge upon this latter remark about Euratom.

I am not sure that the rather dyspeptic personal views which Breithut expressed yesterday evening should be taken as typical of U.S. thinking. Such considerations, however, are undoubtedly in some degree present in the U.S. approach to the Agency. There are, of course, other elements in the situation which might counterbalance this pessimism. In particular, it would seem to me that even if one now accepts such limitations on international atomic energy activities, there might still be good reasons for assigning a major role to the Agency in this limited field.

I think that what really should be taken from Breithut's remarks is simply the fact that, whatever the considerations involved, there is not much steam behind U.S. participation in the Agency at the moment. I doubt that merely talking with U.S. officials would generate any significant additional amount of steam. This situation may, of course, change, especially when the new U.S. member of the Agency's Board of Governors is appointed. Breithut hinted that the selection of the new U.S. representative had already been made, but he was obviously not prepared to divulge the name. I rather gathered from the way Breithut talked that the new U.S. Governor was unlikely to be a ball of fire (or an atomic "fireball").

All of this is rather discouraging, but I thought it worth reporting since it pretty well confirms the impression which Harry Williamson and I (and I am sure Max) have had about the current U.S. approach to the affairs of the Agency.

The only optimistic note sounded by Breithut was on the subject of safeguards. On this matter he felt that the Ottawa meeting³⁵ had been extremely useful, and would be helpful here in getting the AEC to make some move. Breithut felt that the chances of progress on this particular subject within the near future were reasonably good. Such an advance by itself would not, however, give enough substance to the Agency to overcome the malaise which is worrying Max.

In brief, it seems to me that consultations with the U.S. would be pretty unproductive unless, of course, we had previously worked up plans for some new initiative which would appeal to the U.S. authorities (and in which we ourselves would be doing something new and significant). I do not think that any such constructive initiative is likely to emerge in the course of a meeting with the U.S. officials in their present state of mind. I think that it would have to be prepared well in advance. If we had some constructive ideas, consultation with the U.S. could be helpful to the Agency. If we had no such constructive thoughts, talk with U.S. officials over the next several months would have little value, since the U.S. side would almost certainly be barren of ideas.

In the unlikely event that we learn of any improvement in U.S. thinking about the future of the Agency, we shall, of course, let you know. Meantime, I fear that any report we might make in response to a formal request from you would hold out little promise of fruitful results from early consultations with the United States.

If, of course, Max is going to be in Ottawa anyway, I would hope that he would find it possible to come to Washington for talks about the Agency. He should not, however, expect too much from such talks unless some unexpected change occurs here in the interim.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter along to Max Wershof in Geneva.

Regards,
Yours sincerely,
A.E. RITCHIE

DONATION OF URANIUM METAL TO THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE DECEMBER 3)

63. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recalled that the Japanese government had placed an order with the International Atomic Energy Agency for approximately three tons of uranium metal and the agency, in turn, had asked its members to submit sealed tenders covering the supply of this material. At a previous meeting, he had recommended that the Canadian tender should offer this uranium at no charge to the agency. The Cabinet had asked for clarification of the conditions for resale by the agency to Japan and on the application of safeguards to the uranium by the agency. He suggested that it would be in the Canadian interest to encourage the agency to resell the uranium to Japan at a price as close to the world market price as possible which was about $18.34 a pound. Furthermore, a successful Canadian tender to the agency involving the condition that the agency apply safeguards to the uranium would significantly increase the chances of securing the adoption of an international safeguards system. There would be a substantial publicity and advertising advantage to Canada in supplying this material to Japan through the agency. It would establish a toe-hold for Canadian uranium in the Japanese market, it would also avoid the premature establishment of an artificially low price for uranium which would be embarrassing for later commercial sales. It might also accelerate the initiation of negotiations with Japan for the conclusion of a bilateral agreement for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. It would provide the agency with additional revenues for its operational programme.

Both the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance were in support of his recommendation.

64. The Cabinet agreed with the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that,

(a) the Canadian representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency be authorized to submit a sealed tender for 3,000 - 3,200 kilograms of natural uranium at the price of nil, f.o.b. Canadian seaboard; paragraph 9 of the tender, which required information on "other conditions of sale," would indicate that this uranium was provided on the understanding that the agency would apply to this material Articles XII and XIV E of the statute which defined the agency's responsibilities for safeguards and sale of uranium to a member;

(b) the agency would be informed that this tender was submitted in order to help expedite its activities and did not constitute a precedent; and,

(c) if the tender were accepted, Parliament would be requested to approve the inclusion of funds in the final supplementary estimates, 1958-59, to meet the cost of this material.

You will remember that when Mr. Wershof was in Ottawa earlier this year you agreed that he should plan on paying us another visit in the course of 1959. The main purpose of his visit would be to hold consultations with the Canadian authorities, and also, it was hoped, with the United States authorities in Washington, about the future of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The tentative proposal was that Mr. Wershof should visit Ottawa in February. During the past few weeks, however, we have learned that the U.S. authorities do not think that fruitful consultations about the future of the Agency could be held at so early a date.

While I was in Paris, I spoke to Mr. Wershof about the best timing for his visit. He said that he would be willing to postpone it; but if it were not to take place in February, it would be difficult for him to fit it in before early May. I promised to let him know which of those times we would prefer. Since returning to Ottawa, I have discussed this matter with those in the Department who are primarily concerned with atomic energy matters and they are in agreement that a visit in May would be much preferable to one in February.

If you have no objections, therefore, I would propose to send the attached brief message† to Mr. Wershof in Geneva to convey that decision to him.³⁶ A copy of his telegram, reminding me of our conversation in Paris and asking for an early decision, is also attached.†

CANADIAN COOPERATION WITH EURATOM

You will recall that at the last meeting on atomic energy matters in Mr. Bryce's office there was some discussion of the possibility of arranging for cooperation with Euratom in the development of atomic power in Western Europe. It was the general view that such cooperation would be useful, both for political reasons of various sorts and as a means of developing commercial outlets for Canadian uranium and reactors or reactor components. Mention was made of two possibilities, one that Canada might undertake some direct arrangement with Euratom and the other that Canada might join with the United Kingdom in a programme of cooperation with Euratom which would presumably focus upon the installation in Western Europe of reactors of the type developed in the U.K. It was left that a paper on this general question would be prepared for consideration at an early meeting.

2. As Mr. Kirkwood told you the other day, Mr. Watson undertook a first draft for such a paper. I attach a copy of the text which he has now sent over on a personal basis to Mr. Kirkwood. In sending it over Mr. Watson explained that he was not entirely satisfied with it, but that he had been inhibited from coming to grips with the important financial considerations involved by his understanding that Mr. Plumtre was reluctant to consider any significant financial contribution in support of a Canadian - Euratom cooperative programme. You asked Mr. Kirkwood to prepare some comments on this aspect of the question, for transmission to you together with Mr. Watson's paper, in order that you might explore the question further with Mr. Plumtre.

3. As Mr. Watson's paper makes clear, there is a powerful incentive in Western Europe for the early establishment of substantial atomic power production facilities. The fulfilment of this objective, however, raises two important questions. It must be decided what type of reactor should be built and suitable arrangements must be made for the substantial capital investment which that construction will involve.

4. Both the United States and the United Kingdom anticipate an important market for power reactors in Western Europe within a few years, and are eagerly competing for as much of this market as they can get. The United Kingdom is able to offer reactors which are fairly close to a normal commercial product, while the United States is as yet only in the development stage on power reactors. This comes about, however, because the United Kingdom with its domestic problem in mind concentrated early in the game on a relatively simple design which has the disadvantage that its ultimate economic potentialities are rather limited. The United Kingdom reactors are based on the natural uranium graphite concept. The United States on the other hand has been influenced by the fact that conventional power in North America is less expensive than in Western Europe and, at the expense of some delay in producing commercial versions, has continued to explore a number of designs offering better long-term prospects for economic power production. As it happens, in spite of the variety of the U.S. projects, all those on which significant progress has so far been made are based on the use of enriched uranium fuel as a result of the ready availability of this material in the United States.

5. Like the United States, Canada has concentrated upon a design likely to lead in due course to power costs comparable to the relatively low cost of conventional power in North America. Lacking facilities for the production of enriched uranium, however, the particular design chosen is the natural uranium heavy water type which has not as yet at least been taken up seriously by any other country.

6. Last year Euratom sent a team of "Three Wise Men" to the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, whose task was to consider what type or types of reactor Euratom might seek to build, and to recommend a particular initial programme.³⁷ Their report proposed an ambitious programme of construction but did not specifically come out in favour of any one type of reactor. It appeared to be their judgment that as yet the design which would prove most satisfactory in the long run could not be determined, and that in the meantime construction of several types might well be the most satisfactory approach. The Canadian authorities consider that our type of reactor when developed to a commercial stage should prove satisfactory and competitive with any other now in sight. In particular, it should be suitable for the production of atomic power to meet domestic requirements in Canada when this becomes economically feasible. It will be a number of years yet however before there will be a market within Canada for reactors of this type and indeed it will probably be a very considerable time before this market is large enough to maintain a vigorous atomic engineering industry. In the meantime, therefore, it would appear important to seek foreign markets for reactors of this type in areas such as Western Europe where they may be competitive in the near future, so that when the time comes, there will be in existence an atomic industry capable of exploiting the excellent research and development work which Canada has so far carried out and of supplying Canada's atomic power requirements from domestic sources. These concepts are elaborated by Mr. Bennett in his attached speech† to the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, a Canadian Press report of which is also attached.†

7. In addition to seeking the early construction in Western Europe of reactors of Canadian design, there is another important consideration before us. Apart from the United Kingdom with which we already have arrangements in the matter, Western Europe would appear to offer the only significant early market for uranium for civil power reactors. It is certainly in our interest to do what we can to encourage Euratom to devote at least a substantial portion if not all of its effort to reactors using natural uranium fuel. The United States has now developed domestic production of uranium to a point where it may well within a few years satisfy U.S. requirements even perhaps including requirements for export purposes. Hence the construction in Western Europe of reactors using enriched fuel to be obtained from the United States might well afford little or no additional outlet for Canadian uranium even on an indirect basis, since the United States might be able to obtain domestically all the natural uranium required to produce the enriched fuel in question.

8. These various considerations, most of which indeed emerge from Mr. Watson's attached paper, suggest that there are two types of project involving cooperation with Euratom which we might consider. One would be a project directed to the construction by Euratom of one or more reactors based on the Canadian natural uranium heavy water design; such a project would tend to provide an outlet for our uranium and would at the same time be of great assistance to us in developing and maintaining an atomic engineering industry which would apply the research and development work so far carried out. An alternative project would be to join with the United Kingdom in cooperation with Euratom in the construction of natural uranium graphite reactors in Western Europe; this approach, as Mr. Watson's paper explains, would probably provide for a larger uranium market but would contribute little or nothing to a Canadian atomic engineering industry. Either of these two approaches to cooperation with Euratom would appear to deserve some serious study.

9. I might now revert to what was originally intended as the subject matter of this memorandum, namely the financial aspects of cooperation with Euratom. The United States has proposed for its part to undertake a programme of cooperation involving the construction of up to six reactors (which would undoubtedly be based on enriched fuel) under which the United States would arrange a long-term low interest loan of $100 million to assist in the construction programme. The United Kingdom has not as yet (at least as far as we know) offered such enticing bait for concentration upon reactors of the United Kingdom type, but there is no doubt that the United Kingdom has been making and will continue to make vigorous efforts to promote their reactors. If we are to work out some programme of cooperation with Euratom along either of the lines suggested, we should consider very seriously what inducement we are prepared to offer. We can of course offer an assured supply of natural uranium fuel, but so can several other countries and in particular South Africa. We can also offer the results of our ten years of experience with natural uranium heavy water reactors. It is difficult to say, however, that these assets in themselves will be sufficient to induce Euratom to look to Canada as an important partner in its programme of atomic construction or to offer us any preferred position either for the supply of fuel or for the development and construction of reactors and reactor components. It would seem to be probable that in order to obtain such a position we would have to offer something more; in effect, we would have to propose an arrangement where Canada had a stake in the project. This might be done by the device which the United States has decided upon, namely a long-term low interest loan of sufficient size to be attractive. I understand however that this particular approach does not appeal to the Department of Finance. It is questionable moreover whether we could effectively compete with the United States or even perhaps the United Kingdom at this particular game. Although the suggestion would obviously require pretty careful study in view of its manifold implications and consequences, I have the impression that a more promising and more constructive approach might be based upon the concept of a joint construction project. We might propose for example to enter into an agreement with Euratom jointly to build a full scale atomic power plant using a natural uranium heavy water reactor, the reactor portion of the plant to be designed and manufactured in Canada, the turbine and generator portion as well as such ancillary elements as buildings, etc. in Europe. Design development and construction costs for the reactor might be paid by Canada, all costs for the generating portion of the plant by Euratom and all local costs such as on site labour, etc., by Euratom.

10. At first glance such an arrangement might appear to involve Canada in assuming a disproportionate share of the costs. It should be recalled, however, that AECL has already budgeted a very substantial sum to cover the cost of design and development work for the construction of a somewhat similar reactor in Canada. I would see no insuperable barrier to a plan under which this design and development work could be lent to the construction of two more or less identical reactors, one in Europe and one in Canada. In that case the costs chargeable specifically to the European reactor as opposed to the one which it is already proposed to build in Canada would be mainly limited to the actual fabrication costs of the reactor components themselves.

11. Mr. Watson suggests by implication that this approach might be possible, with the reactor for Europe where conventional power costs are higher being constructed somewhat earlier and with less refinement of design, but concludes that there would be political difficulties in building such a reactor abroad before it could be done in Canada. I am not myself convinced that this is necessarily the case. There seem to me very practical reasons as outlined above for regarding such a project as advantageous to Canada in practical and commercial terms. If this proves upon expert and more detailed examination to be the case, it should not be impossible to persuade the Canadian Government and public to contemplate such a plan.

12. This memorandum has gone on probably longer than is justified by the very preliminary thinking which we have so far put on these matters. I would not propose to explore these concepts in greater detail at present therefore, but would suggest that if they commend themselves to you they might be discussed at an early meeting at which there could be present officials better qualified than we to comment upon the various factors involved. If you found it convenient, a preliminary discussion might take place at your meeting tentatively scheduled for 2:30 on Tuesday, April 29.

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO EURATOM

The Energy Situation in the Euratom Countries

It is clear that the Euratom countries have a strong and urgent need for atomic power. Their electricity consumption is growing rapidly, doubling every 10 to 12 years. These countries already import 23% of their total energy requirements and even with the maximum development of their indigenous sources of energy they cannot expect to meet in this way more than one-third of the increase of their electricity needs in the next 20 years. Their energy problem is more threatening than the one the United Kingdom faces. In the report "A Target for Euratom" an ambitious target of the installation of 15 million kilowatts of nuclear power by 1967 is proposed. This would allow for the stabilization of fuel imports from 1963 onwards.

The availability of the very large capital investment involved is a major problem. The present rapid growth of electricity demand is already putting a severe strain on the investment resources of the electricity industries in the Euratom countries. The capital investment for a nuclear plant is at least twice that for a conventional generating plant of the same output. The building of nuclear plants instead of conventional ones, therefore, would substantially increase the investment problem.

In order to construct nuclear power plants at an early date Euratom feels it will be necessary to purchase a considerable proportion of the reactor components abroad. This will pose a balance of payments problem in addition.

In summary it would appear that the Euratom countries want:

- (a) technical and manufacturing knowledge and assistance from countries more advanced in nuclear power technology than they are,
- (b) availability of capital with which to construct nuclear power plants,
- (c) a supply of fuel for the reactors built.

Euratom is looking forward to co-operation with Canada and the following quotation from the report "A Target for Euratom" is of interest. It follows paragraphs concerning cooperation with the United Kingdom and the United States.

"Canada is equally prepared to co-operate. It can do so in two important ways. To begin with, it is one of the world's major sources of natural uranium. It would be ready to provide natural uranium to supplement European resources, provided it receives notices several years in advance, and that any agreement with Euratom guarantees the use of the uranium exclusively for peaceful purposes."

"Further, Canada had done important original work on a type of reactor which promises to be particularly well adapted to European requirements, combining as it does many of the advantages of the natural and slightly enriched uranium approaches followed so far by Britain and the United States respectively. This reactor is well into the development stage. We have every reason to believe that Euratom would find the Canadian authorities willing to co-operate on the construction of prototypes."

The Canadian Interest

Canada has two main trading interests in encouraging the rapid installation of nuclear power plants in the Euratom countries. The first is the potential market for the sale of uranium; the second is the supply of nuclear reactors or reactor components.

There is a firm market for Canadian uranium until 1962-63. Beyond that date there is a real possibility that uranium will be in surplus supply and that there will be insufficient markets for the productive capacity of the Canadian uranium mines. Any real or potential increase in the present foreseeable market is, therefore, of considerable interest to Canada.

It is anticipated that nuclear power will begin to replace conventional thermal power stations in Canada within a decade. The Canadian Government has therefore an interest in the establishment of a nuclear manufacturing industry in Canada so that when nuclear power stations are required in Canada, Canadian manufacturers will be in a position to compete competitively for this business.

Canada's greatest concern is to build up a market for Canadian uranium. The United States and Euratom are presently having discussions regarding the ways in which the United States can assist Euratom in building nuclear power plants at an early date. The U.S. have proposed that they should assist both technically and by the provision of a low interest loan in the construction of up to six nuclear power stations with a total capacity of one million kilowatts. It can be assumed that any such reactors constructed will be based on enriched fuel technology and that as a result these reactors will not open up a market for Canadian natural uranium. Furthermore, the introduction into the Euratom countries of this type of technology will undoubtedly influence the choice of other power plants which the Euratom countries will themselves build in later years. This could have a serious long term influence on the demands for Canadian uranium.

Natural uranium will be used in the Canadian type of nuclear power plant and it is also used in the power plants which are now being built in the U.K. for the Central Electricity Authority. These U.K. stations are much further advanced than the one being developed in Canada and in addition they have the advantage, from the uranium producer's standpoint, of requiring much more uranium. The U.K. stations need a much larger initial charge of uranium and as they do not utilize the uranium so efficiently, the continuing replacement quantities of uranium needed are at least twice as much as that of the Canadian counterpart. A 300,000 kilowatt station of the Bradwell type requires 500 tons of uranium as an initial charge and will consume 100 tons of uranium per year. In comparison, the first fuel charge for a 200,000 kilowatt station of Canadian design will only require about 70 tons of uranium and the annual replacement needed will be 30 - 40 tons of uranium. Hence, if only the interests of the Canadian uranium mining industry were considered, the best thing would be to get the U.K. type nuclear power plants built extensively in the Euratom countries. Perhaps the U.K. and Canada should jointly consider the possibility of assisting Euratom by which C.E.A. type stations are built in Europe with a guarantee that the initial and continuing supply of uranium required are purchased from Canada.³⁸

However as Euratom already has a certain supply of natural uranium from its member countries and Canada will not be the only country in the world which will have surplus uranium available, it is not clear why Euratom should tie itself to Canada for the supply of uranium unless there is a financial interest in doing so. The obvious incentive is low price Canadian uranium. If the lowest price the Canadian uranium producers can afford to offer and still stay in business is insufficiently low to bring sales, then this situation will further aggravate the likely position of the uranium mining industry in the post 1962-63 period.

In the interests of the Canadian manufacturer it would be desirable to have nuclear power plants of the Canadian type (heavy water moderated, natural uranium fuelled) built in the Euratom countries. At present a development programme on such a power station has just been started and it is expected to take three to four years to complete. In order to meet the less difficult goal of economic nuclear power in a European country compared with that in Canada, this development period might be shortened to perhaps two years. However, it does not seem realistic to suggest that Canada should participate in the construction of a large Canadian designed nuclear power station abroad before one has been constructed in Canada,³⁹ and there would appear to be no justification in building in Canada a large station before it is competitive in the Canadian context.

As a practical means of collaboration with Euratom on the natural uranium-heavy water type of reactor which the Euratom "Three Wise Men" considered "particularly well adapted to European requirements," some qualified Euratom experts could be attached to the Nuclear Power Plant Division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. There the experience and contributions of these experts would be of value to the NPP Division and at the same time the Euratom experts would gain by having a thorough understanding of the advantages and possibilities of this type of nuclear power station. On the other hand, such an arrangement would be against the interests of the Canadian manufacturers as the consequence would inevitably be that European manufacturers would be put in the position of being able to manufacture components for the reactor and that no orders would be placed for Canadian made equipment.

CANADIAN COOPERATION WITH EURATOM

I am sorry that I have been slow in responding to your memorandum of the 24th of April, which provided a valuable exploration of this subject. I have since discussed it informally with Mr. Bryce and with Mr. Lorne Gray, the newly appointed President of Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited. As a result of that discussion, I should like a new paper to be prepared for consideration at a further meeting to be convened by Mr. Bryce.⁴⁰ You may be interested to know that Mr. Gray told me, among other things, that he had heard a report in Washington that the United States authorities might be willing to cooperate with us in building an atomic reactor in Europe using natural uranium as the fuel and heavy water as the moderator.

2. The new paper that is now required should begin, it seems to me, by listing some of the reasons why it might be in Canada's interest to enter into some form of special association with Euratom. The following considerations, I think, are relevant:

(a) In this way, a new and important export market might be opened up for Canadian uranium, which is already becoming surplus to North American requirements and of which there may be a substantial over-supply after 1962.⁴¹

(b) New opportunities would also be provided for Canada to continue to make advances in reactor technology, for which there may be comparatively little domestic scope over the next ten or fifteen years, although in the long run it is important that we remain in the van[guard] in this realm of research and engineering.⁴²

(c) A special association with Euratom would provide us with a way of showing our support for some forms, at least, of European integration; and this would be particularly important in view of the very reserved attitude that we have been obliged to adopt towards the European Economic Community.

3. The memorandum should then proceed to discuss possible activities that we might undertake in support of Euratom and in cooperation with it. These possibilities, I imagine, would include the following:

- (a) ⁴³ technical cooperation;⁴⁴
 (b) construction in Europe of a reactor fuelled by natural uranium and moderated by heavy water;
 (c) cooperation with the United States in constructing such a reactor in Europe;
 (d) cooperation with the United Kingdom in constructing in Europe a reactor fuelled by natural uranium but moderated by a graphite pile.

4. Finally, the memorandum might list the various possible degrees of financial involvement for Canada. These would form a broad spectrum, ranging all the way from the extension of a fairly substantial loan with low rates of interest on the model of what the United States has undertaken to do, through the possibility (as suggested in your memorandum) that we might be responsible for designing and manufacturing in Canada the reactor portion of the atomic power plant, and including at the other end of the range of possibilities a commitment merely to make our experience and knowhow available. For the time being, I think we might refrain from expressing any views on these various possibilities and merely invite discussion of them at the proposed meeting, to which, of course, representatives of the Department of Finance should be invited.

5. I imagine that the Under-Secretary would be interested in attending such a meeting. In addition, representatives of Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited, and of the Department of Trade and Commerce should also be present.

6. If, in your opinion, there are aspects of this matter that require discussion before such a paper as I have tried to outline can be drafted, I should be glad to be consulted early next week. In spite of any delay in following up the suggestions made in your earlier memorandum to me, I regard this as a matter of very considerable urgency and hope we can now move forward on it rapidly.

CANADIAN CO-OPERATION WITH EURATOM

We thought that the best procedure, in order to relieve you of the necessity of wading through a further draft of our paper on "Canadian Co-operation with Euratom," would be to prepare this paper in final form. It is attached herewith, together with a covering letter to Mr. Gray,† for your signature if you agree.

 Mr. LePan: this is a very good memorandum. Many thanks. J. L[éger]

2. Would you agree that we should now propose a meeting of Mr. Bryce's informal committee, perhaps for the latter part of next week?⁴⁶ I think it desirable that this meeting be held as soon as possible in order to enable consideration of the various outstanding problems mentioned in the following paragraph.⁴⁷ The Euratom question and safeguards are particularly pressing since the presence of many senior scientific personalities in Europe in September for the Second Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy Conference would seem to provide an appropriate occasion for further action on these matters. Although all the papers required for a meeting of Mr. Bryce's committee have not yet been prepared, we are confident that this could be done in time for a meeting next week.

3. Very tentatively, I would suggest that a meeting of the committee might consider the following matters:

(a) Safeguards for nuclear materials. A Working Group report on this matter will be circulated to members of the committee prior to the meeting. In addition, Mr. Léger's letter of July 3† to Mr. Bryce raised the question of safeguards in relation to Euratom;

(b) Canadian co-operation with Euratom.

(c) Canadian participation in the voluntary programmes of the International Atomic Energy Agency, including the question of a Canadian financial contribution.

In addition, a number of other problems loom on the horizon and it might be opportune to mention them at the meeting, if the necessary briefing material can be prepared in time. We are thinking, in particular, of the problem of Canadian co-operation with the European Nuclear Energy Agency (OEEC), the control of exports of nuclear grade calcium and the conclusion of a bilateral agreement for co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy with Australia.

CANADIAN CO-OPERATION WITH EURATOM

The Euratom treaty entered into effect on January 1, 1958, and since then both the United States and the United Kingdom have undertaken negotiations with Euratom, with a view to the conclusion of agreements for co-operation in atomic matters. The purpose of this memorandum is to outline the benefits which might be expected to accrue to Canada as a result of the establishment of some kind of co-operation between Canada and Euratom, and to describe the forms which this co-operation might take.

2. As a major producer of uranium, for which demand after 1962 is uncertain, Canada has an acute interest in the development of new markets for this product. The most likely potential purchasers are the Euratom countries, which have embarked on an ambitious atomic power programme and will probably emerge as substantial consumers of uranium over the next decade or so. However, it is not certain that Canada will have access to this market simply by virtue of the bilateral agreements which we may have concluded individually with the various countries concerned. Section VI of the Euratom Treaty grants the Euratom Supply Agency exclusive rights in respect of the option and supply of nuclear materials and the exclusive right to conclude agreements or conventions relating to the supply of such materials (Article 64). Since there is an exceptions procedure (Articles 73 and 74), which may in practice limit these apparently wide powers of the Supply Agency, it is difficult to say at this stage how these provisions of the Treaty will work out in practice. It is, however, at least possible that some form of agreement between Canada and Euratom may be a precondition for the supply of Canadian nuclear materials to Euratom member countries.

3. Such an agreement would not necessarily entail any substantial degree of co-operation with Euratom, but there would seem to be positive advantages in embarking on a policy of atomic energy co-operation with that body:

(a) For a number of years, during the initial stages of Euratom's power development programme, the market offered for uranium will be quite limited. The opportunities for the sale of Canadian uranium will be further restricted by the fact that two Euratom countries are substantial producers of uranium and by the likelihood that the United States and the United Kingdom agreements with Euratom will give American and British firms a commercial advantage in the Euratom market. The establishment of a form of co-operation between Canada and Euratom which would provide our uranium producers with an entree to the Euratom market might, therefore, be a significant factor in preserving part of this market for Canadian uranium;

(b) Co-operation with Euratom might also take a form which would provide Canada with an opportunity to develop reactor technology at a faster pace than is now envisaged by providing us with access to European technological resources. If the effect of such co-operation were to interest European countries in the specifically Canadian type of reactor (CANDU) this might have the added advantage of creating a market in Europe for fuel elements of a kind for which we would be the natural source of supply and also for reactor components;

(c) Euratom represents a significant step towards European integration and it is in Canada's interest to lend support to this political concept particularly in view of the reserved attitude which we have been forced to take towards the "European Economic Community."

4. Before proceeding to consider the type of co-operation which might be envisaged with Euratom, it might be useful to review the terms of the agreements now proposed between Euratom and the United States and United Kingdom respectively:

(a) The United States is offering financial and technological assistance to Euratom for a joint programme for a total electrical output of 1,000 mw. The estimated capital cost is $350 million, of which the United States will provide $135 million on a long-term loan through the Export-Import Bank at interest rates up to 4 percent. The United States will also supply up to 30,000 kg. of uranium 235 at prevailing domestic prices. The current value would be $480 million. Repayment is being deferred until 1973, at which time the principal will be repaid in ten equal annual instalments; interest is payable at 4 percent (we are not sure whether these payments are also deferred or if payment is to begin at once). In addition there is to be a joint research programme for a period of ten years, with each of the two parties meeting 50 percent of the costs. For the first five years it has been agreed that each party will contribute $50 million.

(b) The United Kingdom, which has been somewhat laggard in establishing any relations with Euratom, announced on May 22 that it was accrediting its representative to E.C.S.C. to Euratom also and that it hoped to negotiate a technical agreement with Euratom providing for co-operation between institutions and individual concerns. Although these negotiations have only recently begun, it is clear that the United Kingdom's interest is mainly commercial. Important political considerations, of course, impel the United Kingdom into entering such an agreement but its main purpose would seem to be to ensure that Britain's access to the European market and to the technological advances which Euratom may make are not blocked by the development of an exclusive association between the United States and Euratom.

5. There are many ways in which Canada might co-operate with Euratom. Among these are:

(a) Technical co-operation.

This might consist merely of the kind of exchanges of information and of scientific visits which now characterize our relations with individual European countries and, to some extent, with ENEA. It might, however, go a good deal further, with provision for an exchange of working scientists, design consultation, work on a contractual basis, etc.;

(b) A joint reactor programme, similar to that on which the United States and Euratom have embarked.

Such a programme might, by pooling Canadian and Euratom technological resources, speed up the development programme for the CANDU reactor and so permit the early construction of such a reactor in Europe where the high costs of conventional power would mean that it was an economic proposition. Access to the European market might follow for Canadian industry. This programme could, however, inevitably be expensive and has one other overwhelming disadvantage, namely that AECL cannot be absolutely sure of the technical and economic feasibility of the CANDU reactor until it has been thoroughly tested in Canada. To undertake its construction in Europe first would be extremely hazardous;

(c) Co-operation with the U.S. in its joint reactor programme with Euratom.

Since the joint Euratom-U.S. programme envisages the construction of boiling water reactors, to which Canada has no real contribution to offer, this possibility would not seem to merit serious considerations;

(d) Co-operation with the U.K. in some form of joint programme with Euratom.

Canada has, of course, co-operated intimately with the U.K. in many aspects of our nuclear programmes. The U.K. does not, however, seem to be particularly interested in embarking on a joint research or reactor programme with European countries except through ENEA and under existing bilateral arrangements and it also appears to be relying mainly on commercial means of interesting foreign countries in its reactors. It would therefore appear that the United Kingdom would prefer that its co-operation with Canada follow the traditional pattern.

(e) A joint programme of research development either with Euratom alone or jointly with the United States.

Such a programme would go a good deal further than the technical co-operation mentioned in subparagraph (a) above since it would involve a joint scientific effort, directed towards agreed objectives and jointly financed. Since the present U.S.A.-Euratom research programme covers the natural uranium/heavy water reactor field, in which Canada has concentrated its own efforts, the most practical and fruitful course would seem to be for Canada to associate itself with this joint research programme, thereby making a valuable contribution to it and, at the same time, gaining access to all the research work undertaken in Euratom countries and in the United States under the programme. During informal conversations between the President of AECL and USAEC officials, the latter indicated that they would be in favour of such a joint programme.

6. The cost to Canada of co-operation with Euratom would vary from virtually nothing, in the case of technical co-operation, to tens of millions of dollars if we embarked on a joint reactor programme. If it were agreed that the association of Canada with the U.S.A. and Euratom in a joint research programme were the most desirable form of co-operation to undertake, it is probable that Canada would be expected by its partners to make a reasonable financial contribution. (Seeing that each of the two present partners is contributing $10 million per annum for the next five years, a Canadian contribution of $2 million might be acceptable.) The President of AECL considers that Canada's participation in such a joint programme might be undertaken with very little extra expenditure of funds, AECL's present power reactor development work being appropriately reoriented.

7. If it is decided to proceed with some form of co-operation with Euratom, the initial negotiation of an agreement might be undertaken by a special mission, consisting in large measure of senior officials from AECL. Since many of these officials will be in Europe in September for the Second International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy, this might provide an appropriate opportunity for such negotiations. Subsequently, it would probably be necessary to make arrangements to maintain contact with Euratom headquarters and this could be done, without formal accreditation, by a conveniently located Canadian Mission in Europe. As relations with Euratom developed and seemed to require more formal arrangements for liaison, the accreditation of one of our Heads of Mission to Euratom might be envisaged, or possibly the creation of a special Canadian mission to Euratom. This kind of formal arrangement would, of course, have implications for Canada's relations with the European Economic Community.

8. It must be recognized that the benefits which would flow to Canada from any form of association with Euratom would probably be long term. One possible disadvantage of participating in a joint research programme should also be considered. At the present time, AECL offers a good deal of contractual work to Canadian manufacturers. Under the terms of a joint programme, such contractual work would probably have to be open to tender to industry throughout the whole area of the participating countries and there is no assurance that Canadian manufacturers would retain their present share of atomic development work. On the other hand, the interests of both uranium producers and of Canadian reactor manufacturers are in the long run linked with the establishment abroad of natural uranium reactors, if possible of a type which will lead foreign producers to turn naturally to Canada as the source of the fuel and of reactor components and there would seem to be no better way of promoting this situation than by associating ourselves with the U.S.A. and with Euratom in a development programme, the objectives of which would be to accelerate the development of the natural uranium heavy water reactor.

I. CANADIAN COOPERATION WITH EURATOM

1. The Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the memorandum on Canadian Cooperation with Euratom was an attempt to list the advantages, financial implications and possible means of cooperation between Canada and Euratom. He invited Mr. Gray to comment on the paper.

2. The President of the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited said that the proposal for a joint programme of research and development with Euratom or, preferably, on a tripartite basis with Euratom and the U.S.A., would appear to be the most satisfactory form of cooperation. Recent talks that he had had with the U.S.A.E.C. officials had shown them to be in favour of a tripartite programme. However, in view of the close relations we have always maintained with the United Kingdom in atomic matters, it might be tactically wise first to canvass the possibility of a form of cooperation in which the British were included. Since they seemed to prefer their present bilateral arrangements to the broader venture of tripartite cooperation, it was doubtful if our approach would be productive and we could then go ahead with our plans for cooperation with Euratom and the U.S.

3. Mr. Gray noted that the most suitable time this subject might be brought up would be during the talks between Canadian officials and Sir Edwin Plowden that were scheduled for October.

4. Mr. LePan asked Mr. Gray to explain the situation regarding U.K. patents on industrial atomic energy equipment.

5. Mr. Gray said that in order to maintain a steady flow of funds for development and research, the U.K. Atomic Energy officials had had to convince the Treasury that the Atomic Energy programme could be made into a profitable venture. The only way this could be achieved would be by receiving royalties from patents. This limitation made it practically impossible for U.K. officials to release any information of potential commercial value. At present, information on the heavy water-gas cooled reactor was for Mr. Lewis' eyes only. Canadian scientists had got good cooperation from Harwell, but information from Risley, the Engineering and Designing Centre, had been considerably less forthcoming.

An interesting problem would shortly arise if the amendments to the U.S. Atomic Energy Act were passed. Under this agreement the U.S. would give information on the nuclear propulsion reactor in exchange for details on the U.K. Calder-Hill Gas Cooled Reactor. The interesting part was that the U.S.A.E.C. might release to U.S. industry free information on the reactor, while British industry would be required to pay royalties for similar information obtained in the U.K. Unless some change in policy was announced shortly, an inequitable situation would arise.

6. The President of the Atomic Energy Control Board agreed with Mr. Gray and added that even though we might initially give more information than we might expect to get in return from Euratom, in the long run this exchange should balance out. He felt that it was a good idea to consult the U.K. before we embarked on a programme of cooperation with Euratom and the U.S.

7. In the subsequent discussions, the following points emerged:

(a) If Canada cooperated with Euratom in a joint research programme it might provide an entrée for Canadian fuel elements to Euratom reactors. The political advantages of this arrangement were obvious, as far as the Canadian uranium industry was concerned.

(b) Cooperation with Euratom would require limited re-orientation of the Canadian research and development programme, but only about $100,000 per annum would be needed for the additional expenses. This money would be used to employ three or four more scientists and their necessary assistants.

(c) As, at present, it was by no means certain which type of reactor would prove to be commercially most satisfactory, Canada, by cooperation with Euratom, would have access to a considerable amount of information that might otherwise be unobtainable and certainly costly to develop on our own initiative.

(d) Cooperation in this programme would not mean that Canadian development contracts would be open to European bids. Apart from the politically undesirable aspect of having foreign contractors build Canadian equipment, the embryonic nature of the development work required day to day contact between scientists and contractors.

8. The Panel invited Mr. Langley to revise the memorandum and agreed: that in the revised memorandum it should be emphasized that cooperation with Euratom might provide Canadian uranium producers with entrée into Euratom markets; that the memorandum should recommend a programme of cooperation, either with Euratom alone or, preferably, on a tripartite basis with Euratom and U.S.; that the memorandum should be signed jointly by the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs; and, that the memorandum should then be submitted for Cabinet approval.

CANADIAN CO-OPERATION WITH EURATOM

Since the Euratom Treaty came into effect on January 1st, both the United States and the United Kingdom have been negotiating agreements for co-operation with this new organization. We have followed the course of these negotiations with interest and, at the suggestion of Mr. Churchill and other Ministers, have been considering whether it might be desirable for Canada to embark on a co-operative programme with Euratom.

I now attach for your signature, if you agree, a self-explanatory Memorandum to the Cabinet recommending that Canada negotiate a bilateral agreement for co-operation with the Euratom Commission, with the object of instituting a joint research development programme on natural uranium/heavy water reactors. The details of this joint programme (in which United States officials have stated that their country would probably participate at a later stage) will have to be worked out with Euratom but we are satisfied that it can be implemented on the Canadian side for several years, at very little cost to the government, by a simple reorientation of the present programmes of AECL.

Officials of all the Departments concerned have been associated in the drafting of the attached memorandum. The memorandum has since been approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and carries the assent of the Minister of Finance.⁴⁹

The Euratom treaty, establishing a European Atomic Energy Community embracing France, Germany, Italy and the Benelux countries, came into effect on January 1st, 1958.⁵⁰ The United States and the United Kingdom have since undertaken negotiations with Euratom for the conclusion of agreements for atomic energy co-operation. The purpose of this memorandum is to outline the benefits which might be expected to accrue to Canada as a result of the establishment of similar co-operative relations between Canada and Euratom, and to recommend the form which this co-operation might take.

2. As a major producer of uranium, for which demand after 1962 is uncertain, Canada has an acute interest in the development of new markets for this product. Among the most likely new potential purchasers are the Euratom countries, which have embarked on an ambitious atomic power programme. However, Canada may not have access to this market simply by virtue of our bilateral agreements with individual Euratom countries. Section VI of the Euratom Treaty grants the Euratom Supply Agency exclusive rights in respect of the option and supply of nuclear materials and the exclusive right to conclude agreements or conventions relating to the supply of such materials (Article 64). It is therefore likely that we will have, in due course, to conclude an agreement with the Supply Agency, covering the conditions for the sale of nuclear materials to Euratom countries.

3. Such an agreement would be primarily commercial in character and would not necessarily entail any substantial degree of co-operation with Euratom. However, there would seem to be positive advantages in embarking on a policy of atomic energy co-operation with that body:

(a) Euratom countries will naturally tend to purchase nuclear materials from countries about whose atomic energy developments they are best informed. A co-operative programme with Euratom would lead to close contacts between our respective atomic energy industries and this might be expected to provide our uranium producers with an entrée to the Euratom market. This is particularly important in view of the fact that during the initial stages of Euratom's power development programme, the market for uranium will be quite limited. The opportunities for the sale of Canadian uranium will be further restricted because two Euratom countries (Belgium and France) are substantial producers of uranium and because the United States and the United Kingdom agreements with Euratom will probably give American and British firms a commercial advantage in the Euratom market.

(b) Co-operation with Euratom might also provide Canada with an opportunity to develop reactor technology at a faster pace than is now envisaged by providing us with access to European technological resources. It might also serve to interest European countries in the specifically Canadian type of reactor (CANDU) and thus create a market in Europe for fuel elements of a kind for which we would be the natural source of supply and also for reactor components.

(c) Euratom represents a significant step towards European integration and it is in Canada's interest to lend support to this political concept particularly in view of the reserved attitude which we have been forced to take towards the "European Economic Community."

4. Annex A to this memorandum describes the agreements now proposed between Euratom and the United States and the United Kingdom respectively. Briefly, the United States is offering generous financial and technological assistance for both a joint reactor construction programme and a joint research and development programme. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, is negotiating an agreement limited to providing the framework for institutional and commercial co-operation.

5. Of the many ways in which Canada might co-operate with Euratom, the most promising would seem to be a joint research and development programme on a natural uranium/heavy water reactor. Not only have we concentrated our efforts on this reactor system, but the report "A Target for Euratom" noted that it promised to be particularly well adapted to European requirements. The main alternative, a reactor construction programme of the kind on which the United States and Euratom have embarked, would appear to be excessively costly for our purposes and also risky since we cannot be certain of the feasibility of our approach to reactor technology until the NPD plant has been completed.

6. The details of a joint research and development programme would have to be worked out with Euratom. Initially it would probably be confined to exchanges of information but might subsequently involve a sharing of development work now being undertaken by the Nuclear Power Plant Division of AECL for the CANDU Reactor, with particular reference to the lattice, the pressure tubes, and the calandria and moderator system; or we could agree to an exchange of information on our experiences in the use of heavy water with its problems of purity, concentration, losses through fittings and equipment, tritium content, etc. The cost to Canada of such a programme for the first year or two would be small since our share in it could be fulfilled by a reorientation of part of AECL's existing programme of work. The cost of the work being done, to which Euratom might be given access, would probably be of the order of one million dollars per annum (out of a planned annual expenditure by the NPP Division of ten million dollars per annum). The only additional expense to Canada therefore would be for two or three technical liaison personnel to co-ordinate the joint programme, and collect and disseminate information.

7. The foregoing has been discussed informally with officials of Euratom and of the United Kingdom and United States. We understand that Euratom would welcome a Canadian approach to this matter and that the United States would subsequently be glad to collaborate in a joint programme. In view of our present programme with the United States, particularly on fuel development work, the expression of United States interest is most welcome. The United Kingdom would not, we understand, be interested in collaborating in a joint programme.

8. A joint programme of the kind outlined above would involve the negotiation of a bilateral agreement with Euratom. This agreement would provide the framework for co-operation and would cover such questions as "Safeguards" for any nuclear materials supplied to Euratom. In this connection, Canada could probably not expect Euratom to accept a safeguards system more rigorous than that upon which the U.S. has insisted, details of which are given in Annex B. It would subsequently be necessary to make arrangements to maintain contact with Euratom headquarters and this could be done, without formal accreditation, by a conveniently located Canadian Mission in Europe. As relations with Euratom developed and seemed to require more formal arrangements for liaison, the accreditation of one of our Heads of Mission to Euratom might be envisaged, or possibly the creation of a special Canadian mission to Euratom. This kind of formal arrangement would, of course, have implications for Canada's relations with the European Economic Community.

Recommendations:

9. In the light of the foregoing considerations I recommend,⁵¹ with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that:

(a) we approach the Euratom Commission with a view to negotiating a bilateral agreement for atomic energy co-operation, with the object of instituting a joint research and development programme on natural uranium/heavy water reactors;

(b) an approach be made subsequently to the United States with a view to their participation in this joint programme;

(c) the Canadian costs of this programme be met initially by a reorientation of AECL's present research programme, except insofar as two or three additional staff may be required for liaison duties.

OUTLINE OF THE TERMS OF PROPOSED AGREEMENTS BETWEEN EURATOM
AND THE UNITED STATES AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

(a) The United States is offering financial and technological assistance to Euratom for a joint programme for a total electrical output of 1,000 mw. The estimated capital cost is $350 million, of which the United States will provide $135 million on a long-term loan through the Export-Import Bank at interest rates up to 4 percent. The United States will also supply up to 30,000 kg. of uranium 235 at prevailing domestic prices. The current value would be $480 million. Repayment is being deferred until 1973, at which time the principal will be repaid in ten equal annual instalments. In addition, there is to be a joint research programme for a period of ten years, with each of the two parties meeting 50 percent of the costs. For the first five years it has been agreed that each party will contribute $50 million.

(b) The United Kingdom has accredited its representative to ECSC to Euratom also and is negotiating a technical agreement with Euratom providing for co-operation between institutions and individual concerns. While important political considerations impel the United Kingdom into entering such an agreement, its main purpose would seem to be commercial: to ensure that Britain's access to the European market and to the technological advances which Euratom may make are not blocked by the development of an exclusive association between the United States and Euratom.

SAFEGUARDS AGAINST DIVERSION OF NUCLEAR MATERIALS TO MILITARY USES

The bilateral agreements for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy which the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada conclude with other countries include provision for the application of safeguards against diversion of nuclear materials to military uses. The United States has already carried out several inspections under the terms of its agreements and discussions are proceeding among officials of the three countries (and of Australia and South Africa) on the possibility of developing a common international safeguards system, perhaps through the International Atomic Energy Agency.

2. The essence of safeguards, as they have so far been conceived, is that they should be applied by the country supplying materials, or by some third party, and not by the country receiving materials. The U.S.A.-Euratom agreements involve a marked departure since they concede the principle of "self-inspection" to Euratom: the Community will establish and implement its own safeguards system.

3. In practical terms, this arrangement probably offers sufficient guarantees that materials supplied to Euratom countries will not be misused, particularly as the United States is to assist Euratom in the establishment of its system, details of which are laid down in the U.S.A.-Euratom agreements, and has also retained certain rights of verification. However, the de jure situation is less satisfactory since, having conceded self-inspection to one group of nations, it may prove difficult to maintain the principle of "external" inspection for others.

4. In view of the precedent which has been established, Euratom would be most unlikely to agree to safeguards provisions, in any Canada-Euratom agreement which may be negotiated, more restrictive than those it has negotiated with the United States. We might perhaps aim for a more definite understanding with Euratom that, if an international system is developed through IAEA, responsibility for safeguards should be transferred to the latter but it may well prove impossible to reach agreement even to this.

EURATOM

1. Cabinet has decided that we should approach Euratom with a view to negotiating a bilateral agreement for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The intention is that this agreement should provide a framework for the development of cooperation between Canada and Euratom and, in particular, for the institution of a joint research and development programme on natural uranium-heavy water reactors.

2. As you know, there have been informal discussions between Canadian and Euratom officials on this matter and we understand that Euratom would welcome this Canadian initiative. Please therefore address a note or letter along the following lines to the President of the Euratom Commission: Begins: "I have been instructed by my government to inform you that Canada would welcome the development of cooperation with the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) in the peaceful uses of atomic energy and to inquire whether Euratom would be prepared to negotiate an agreement with Canada for such cooperation.

"You will be aware that Canada has concentrated its nuclear scientific effort on the development of natural uranium-heavy water reactors and I am authorized to say that the Canadian government would be particularly interested in considering with Euratom the possibility of undertaking a joint programme of research and development on power reactors of this type, in which Euratom is also believed to have an interest.

"If Euratom should wish to develop cooperative relations with Canada in this field and to negotiate an agreement for this purpose, the Canadian authorities would be glad to prepare a draft agreement to serve as a basis for negotiation. The Canadian government hopes that sufficient progress might be made to permit negotiations to take place in Brussels towards the end of January 1959." Ends.

3. Before delivering the foregoing message, please discuss it informally with the appropriate Euratom officials to ensure that it will be acceptable to the Euratom Commission.

4. A working group has been established in Ottawa to consider the type of agreement or agreements to be concluded with Euratom. The following account of our preliminary thinking may be of value to you as background information:

⁵² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Cleared with Mr. Bryce (P.C.O.) And Mr. Gray, AECL, before despatch. J. [Langley]

(a) We envisage the conclusion of an agreement which will provide a general framework for cooperation between Canada and Euratom. Our present inclination is to work from our standard draft bilateral agreement for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, modifying it as necessary; we recognize that substantial changes may be required. This framework agreement would make mention of the joint research and development programme, the broad outlines of which might be set out in an annex. A technical agreement establishing the details of the joint programme would probably have to be negotiated subsequently between AECL and appropriate organs of Euratom. We think that it is neither necessary nor desirable for the United States to be a party to either the framework or the technical agreement, but the latter would be worked out in consultation with USAEC, with a view to USA participation in the joint programme.

(b) The proposed joint research and development programme would not involve any joint construction. (Please make this point clear orally to Euratom.) Initially it would probably be confined to exchanges of information but might subsequently involve a sharing of development work on the full scale power reactor now being undertaken by the Nuclear Power Plant Division of AECL.

(c) We would like to make rapid progress in drafting an agreement, with a view to early negotiations with Euratom. Some of the Canadian officials directly concerned are expected to be in Europe in January and, if matters have advanced sufficiently, we would like to take advantage of their presence to establish a team, including appropriate members of your Embassy, for these negotiations.

5. We intend to consult closely with you and Euratom officials in the drafting of the framework agreement. We have a number of queries which we will raise with you shortly but consider it would be desirable first to complete the formal exchange of letters with the Euratom Commission.

6. London: Please pass a copy of this and subsequent messages on Euratom to Mr. Pierce.

7. Paris Embassy, The Hague, Bonn, Rome: When Brussels has notified you that our formal approach has been made to Euratom, please inform local Foreign Ministry and express the hope that our initiative will receive their support.

EURATOM

1. UK and USA officials will already be aware of our plans for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy with Euratom.

2. When Mr. Gray, President of AECL, was in London in October he spoke informally to Sir Edwin Plowden and the other senior officials of UKAEA on this subject and inquired whether UK would be interested in participating in our proposed joint research and development programme with Euratom. UK officials indicated that their other commitments would not permit such participation.

3. Our Euratom plans have also been discussed informally with officials of USAEC. They have welcomed our proposed joint programme with Euratom and have indicated that USA would probably agree to participate in it, once we have concluded our agreement with Euratom. We welcome these indications of USA interest.

4. We would be grateful if London and Washington would inform Foreign Office and State Department that we now intend to approach Euratom formally on this matter. We do not think it necessary to go into details but we would be glad if London would take this opportunity of seeking an account from UK officials of the difficulties encountered in UK negotiations with Euratom (Brussels telegram 541 December 5† refers). We are particularly interested in the safeguards issue, since we think it important to maintain a common front with UK and USA viz-à-viz Euratom on this. We realize that UK authorities may not feel free to give us a copy of current draft of UK-Euratom agreement, but it would be most helpful to us if they were able to do so. Please reply by telegram, including text of draft, if available.

EURATOM AGREEMENT

Staderini and others responsible for external relations at Euratom Commission are leaving for London today in connection with negotiations for agreement between UK and Euratom. In these circumstances, we will not repeat not be able to discuss text of proposed note to President of Commission before December 17 at earliest. In view of importance which is attached to this agreement by both Canada and Euratom, we fully agree that a draft agreement should be prepared as soon as possible for transmission to the Commission. In this respect it would be most helpful if you could let us have a copy of Canadian standard draft bilateral to which you refer in paragraph 4 of your telegram.

2. In telephone conversation this morning with Staderini, he warned that despite good intentions on both sides, it may be that matters will not repeat not have advanced sufficiently to enable substantive negotiations to take place in January when team of Canadian officials are expected to be in Europe. He explained that although the Commission would be the negotiating unit the draft agreement would have to be cleared with each of the six governments before the Commission would be authorized to negotiate, and on the basis of past experience this procedure was likely to involve some delay. We suggested that contact between the Commission and officials from Ottawa might be desirable in January if only to clarify some aspects of the proposed agreement whether technical or otherwise. Staderini concurred and said that he personally would do everything possible to ensure that commission officials were in a position to discuss agreement effectively when Canadian officials visit Brussels.

3. Provided there are no chances to discuss with you we shall send a letter to the Acting President of the Euratom Commission as soon as we have cleared informally your draft text with Staderini. Other addressees of this telegram will be advised so that they may inform local foreign ministries as instructed in paragraph 7 of your telegram.

AGREEMENT WITH EURATOM

This morning I saw Staderini to discuss text which should be sent to the Euratom Commission proposing that Canada and Euratom enter into negotiations. Staderini suggested this might take the form of a note to the Commission since the President's post had not repeat not been formally filled since resignation of Mr. Armand. He suggested that for presentational reasons it might be desirable to revise slightly the first sentence of the final paragraph to read as follows:

"If Euratom should wish to develop co-operative relations with Canada in this field and to negotiate an agreement for this purpose, the Canadian authorities would be glad to enter into contact as soon as possible with the competent services of Euratom with a view to establishing a draft agreement as a basis for negotiation." Staderini said that if the note was received today there was a good chance that it could be discussed by this week's meeting of the Euratom Commissioners and that we might have the reply of Euratom before Christmas. In these circumstances, and since the drafting changes were of a very minor nature, a note along the following lines incorporating Staderini's suggestion will be sent to the Commission this afternoon.

"The Canadian Embassy has been instructed by its government to inform the Euratom Commission that Canada would welcome the development of cooperation with the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) in the peaceful uses of atomic energy and to inquire whether Euratom would be prepared to negotiate an agreement with Canada for such co-operation. The Commission will be aware that Canada has concentrated its nuclear scientific effort on the development of natural uranium heavy-water reactors and the Embassy is authorized to say that the Canadian government would particularly be interested in considering with Euratom the possibility of undertaking a joint programme of research and development on power reactors of this type, in which Euratom is also believed to have an interest. If Euratom should wish to develop co-operative relations with Canada in this field and to negotiate an agreement for this purpose, the Canadian authorities would be glad to enter into contact as soon as possible with the competent services of Euratom with a view to establish a draft agreement as a basis for negotiation. The Canadian government hopes that sufficient progress might be made to permit negotiations to take place in Brussels towards the end of January 1959."

2. In Staderini's view the outline for negotiations suggested in paragraph 4 of your telegram seemed reasonable. The only point on which he had some doubt was whether it would be more expedient to sketch the broad outlines of the joint research and development programme in an annex or in a separate agreement. He wished to consult other interested services in the Commission before giving a final answer on this point. He agreed, however, that the details of the joint programme could be set out in a technical agreement between AECL and the appropriate services of Euratom. He also did not repeat not foresee any difficulty with our suggestion that the USA government would not repeat not have to be a direct party to any of these agreements. He hoped that things would move rapidly enough to enable effective discussions to take place in Brussels towards the end of January. He suggested that before the technical agreement was completed it might be desirable for Euratom technicians to visit Chalk River to have a first-hand look at the work we were doing in Canada and to have detailed discussions on the spot with our technicians. Incidentally, Staderini volunteered that it would be quite acceptable to the Commission if all negotiations were carried out on the basis of English texts.

3. Staderini suggested that obviously one of the most delicate points in the negotiation would be the selection of a formula for control. A general framework agreement for co-operation along the lines we envisage might involve a different formula from that employed in the USA/Euratom agreement which was a "Programme Agreement."

4. At the conclusion of our talks, Staderini emphasized that he was unable of course, to enter into any commitment until he had consulted the Commission. In turn the powers of the Commission to negotiate agreements were outlined in Article 101 of the Euratom Treaty. That article provides that the Commission has the power to negotiate some types of agreement provided it merely informs the Council but that for other types of agreement it must have the approval of the Council with a qualified majority vote. Since the Commission was in its infancy, it had not repeat not yet established completely with the Council of Ministers the limit of its own responsibilities or an agreed interpretation of Article 101. He mentioned this only so that we might appreciate that any delays would probably be due to procedural aspects rather than to any disagreement in principle. From his own knowledge of the situation however, he could say with confidence that our initiative will be welcomed by the community and that officials in the Commission would make every effort to ensure that negotiations move as quickly as possible. He also suggested as a rough timetable that we should have a formal reply to our note before Christmas and that as soon as the Christmas Holidays were over the Commission would be prepared to give immediate consideration to any draft which we would submit.

5. I will inform the Belgian Foreign Office as soon as possible of the note which we are proposing to send to the Euratom Commission this afternoon.

EURATOM

We arranged to call this morning on Donald Cape of the Atomic Energy and Disarmament Department of the Foreign Office and informed him of your intention to commence negotiation of an agreement with Euratom. He was interested to learn that you were planning an immediate approach to Euratom on this matter but confirmed that the UK would not repeat not be in a position to participate in these arrangements.

2. Cape told us that the UK were now in the final stage of their own negotiations with the Community since at its last meeting the Euratom Council of Ministers had approved the draft agreement both in principle and in substance. The Council had, however, at the instigation of the French, suggested that the safeguards provisions should be re-drafted so as to appear more "balanced." Cape said that the safeguards clauses in the draft agreement are very similar to those in the USA-Euratom agreement in that they provide for a form of self-inspection by the community. The UK had originally hoped that the safeguards system would be based on the OEEC agency, which would have provided complete balance between the parties, but in the event this had not proved possible. After the precedent of the USA agreement the UK felt that self-inspection within the Community did provide reasonable safeguards in that the members were to a degree at least watching one another; the same would not repeat not be true of a bilateral with an individual country. Cape thought the re-drafting of the safeguards clauses to give an appearance of balance would be rather tricky but he emphasized that the difficulty was one of presentation rather than of substance. The UK for their part do not repeat not in the early foreseeable future expect to be on the receiving end of the agreement so that the real question is one of devising a form of words which will protect the amour propre of the Community.

3. Cape told us that apart from these relatively minor difficulties over safeguards the negotiations with Euratom had gone surprisingly well. There had been no serious difficulties and considerable mutual good will so that progress had been steady throughout. You may recall from our conversation with Cape early in the negotiations (our telegram 3162

July 18†) that he was then very much less sanguine about prospects and rather inclined to belittle the activities of the Commission.

4. Cape has promised to let us have the revised text of the draft agreement as soon as it has been approved by the Euratom Council, which should be about December 22. The arrival of another visitor prevented us from suggesting an earlier date but we shall approach him again as soon as the new negotiations with the Commission (which begin tomorrow) are concluded.

AGREEMENT WITH EURATOM

Yesterday the Council of Ministers of the Six met in Brussels and they authorized the Euratom Commission to enter into negotiations with Canada in accordance with suggestions set out in our note of December 16. This morning we received the following note verbale from the Commission which indicates formally the Commission's willingness to begin negotiations in Brussels as soon as possible. Begins

“The Commission of the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) presents its compliments to the Canadian Embassy and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of its note of December 16, 1958, concerning the desire of the Canadian Government to cooperate with Euratom in the development of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy.

The Commission welcomes the proposal of the Canadian government to negotiate a general agreement of cooperation, providing a framework for the subsequent organization of a joint programme of research and development on natural uranium heavy-water reactors.

Therefore, the Commission would be agreeable to enter into contact with the competent Canadian authorities at their earliest convenience, in the course of January, 1959, at Euratom Headquarters in Brussels.” Ends.

THE COMBINED POLICY COMMITTEE

Recently the United States State Department handed to our Embassy in Washington a draft Aide-Mémoire proposing that the Canada-United States-United Kingdom Combined Policy Committee, established in 1943 to further the atomic bomb project, be reactivated with expanded terms of reference.

2. The United States proposals (attached as Appendix A) stem directly from the Declaration of Common Purpose⁵³ signed by President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillan in October of 1957 which emphasized the need for interdependence, particularly in the broad defence field. Revisions to the United States Atomic Energy Act, passed by Congress at its last Session, as noted in the draft Aide-Mémoire, permit more extensive co-operation to be carried out in the nuclear field. Reactivation of the Combined Policy Committee along the lines proposed is considered by the United States and the United Kingdom (which has agreed to the United States proposals) to be a logical next step forward as it would provide an umbrella for practical forms of co-operation in military research and development, in both the nuclear and non-nuclear fields, and appropriate Ministerial machinery through which the various forms of technical co-operation could be guided and stimulated. It would also obviate any difficulties which the setting up of any new machinery would create.

3. The United States Government is now proposing that the revised Combined Policy Committee be given authority to "establish broad policy and procedures for scientific and technical co-operation in research and development for military purposes, both nuclear and non-nuclear." It would operate within the limits of the constitutions and statutes of the Governments represented on it, and would continue the functions at present performed by the Combined Development Agency with regard to procurement and allocation of uranium ore. The more specific responsibilities it would assume are set out in the attachment to the draft Aide-Mémoire.

4. The United States also propose that the membership of the reactivated Committee would be, for the United States, the Secretary of State (who would be chairman of the Committee), the Secretary of Defence, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, or their alternates; for the United Kingdom the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Defence and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Authority, or their alternates; and for Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and the President of the Atomic Energy Control Board, or their alternates.

5. The draft Aide-Mémoire proposes three principal changes in the terms of reference as drawn up in 1943.

(a) Canada, nominally at least, would be a full member of the Committee rather than merely represented on it. Representation for the three countries would be equal both qualitatively and numerically. It should be noted, however, that Canadian representatives would be unable to participate in all of the proposed sub-groups. The revised United States Atomic Energy Act would still restrict certain exchanges with Canada on, for example, matters dealing with atomic warheads. This might also be the case in the field of nuclear propulsion, although it is anticipated that it will be possible to devise flexible procedures to meet the problem.

(b) The Committee would become involved in the non-nuclear as well as the nuclear aspects of scientific and technical weapons research and development.

(c) As the three Governments would each have two Ministers on the Committee, it would be possible to facilitate a higher degree of political supervision and control of matters falling within the Committee's responsibilities.

6. It is believed that Canada should agree to the United States proposals and accept membership on the reconstituted Committee for the following reasons:

(1) The United States proposals clearly reflect recognition on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom of the useful role which Canada can play in the technical aspects of weapons development and of Canada's interests in this field.

(2) Canada would also benefit greatly from the additional information concerning current United States and United Kingdom projects which membership on the reactivated Committee would provide, and which would be of positive benefit in connection with our share in the defence of North America.

(3) Membership would also provide a further channel of influencing thinking, particularly United States thinking, on research and development questions and possibly, eventually, certain defence production questions which might arise, although it is not the present intention of either the United States or the United Kingdom to extend the scope of the Committee's functions to the production field.

7. Accordingly, the Secretary of State for External Affairs recommends⁵⁴ that the Cabinet approve Canadian membership on the Combined Policy Committee reactivated along the lines proposed in the United States draft Aide-Mémoire.

DRAFT AIDE MÉMOIRE

The United States Government believes that in order to advance co-operation among the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada in research and development in military fields where the three countries have mutual defence interests, it would be useful to establish some supervisory institutional arrangement. It is suggested that for this purpose the Combined Policy Committee be reactivated with appropriate new guidelines.

The Combined Policy Committee was established by the agreement of August 19, 1943, in order to facilitate co-operation in atomic matters among the three allies. After the end of World War II such co-operation became much more limited, and the Combined Policy Committee for some years now has functioned only to a small extent and through correspondence. Of two subsidiary organizations which were also established, the Combined Development Agency (originally the Combined Development Trust) and the sub-group of scientific advisers, only the Combined Development Agency has continued actively in its field, the joint procurement of uranium ore.

In the fields of non-atomic weapons research and development various arrangements for co-operation among the three countries have now been established, principally among the military services. Some of the co-operation carried out under these arrangements is quite extensive and it is desired that this shall continue in the fullest possible way. More extensive co-operation in atomic fields may also now be carried out under new United States legislation, and it is believed that it is mutually agreed among the three countries that it is in their common interest to carry this out to the fullest extent possible. Co-operation in both atomic and non-atomic fields, it is believed, would be facilitated by centralized supervision.

It is suggested accordingly, that a feasible and satisfactory means of establishing this supervision would be to reactivate the Combined Policy Committee and assign to it the supervisory responsibility for technical co-operation for military purposes in both atomic and non-atomic fields. An outline of principles for the organization and activity of such a reactivated committee has been worked out informally by representatives of the three Governments and is attached herewith. If such a procedure meets with the approval of the three Governments a meeting of the Combined Policy Committee could be convened at a mutually satisfactory time and the new guidelines for the Committee adopted at the meeting. It is believed that this procedure would have the further advantage of obviating any undue publicity being given to the action, even though the Committee's existence would continue to be an unclassified matter.

⁵⁴ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 9 décembre 1958./Approved by Cabinet on December 9, 1958.

It is understood, of course, that co-operation by each country in various particular projects, would be governed by its relevant laws and agreements with either or both of the other two; and, furthermore, that the supervisory function of the Combined Policy Committee would supplement but not replace nor interfere with existing working arrangements.

The United States Government would be grateful for any comment which the Governments of the United Kingdom and of Canada might wish to make to this suggested procedure and outline.

COMBINED POLICY COMMITTEE

Preamble

The United States-United Kingdom-Canada Combined Policy Committee, which was established by the agreement of August 19, 1943, is reconstituted for the purpose of facilitating and supervising co-operation among the three Governments in military, scientific and technical fields. Its activities henceforth will be governed by the following principles:

Objective

The Combined Policy Committee, operating within the limits of the constitutions and statutes of the Governments represented, will establish broad policy and procedures for scientific and technical co-operation in research and development for military purposes, both nuclear and non-nuclear. In the nuclear energy field the Committee will also continue to supervise procurement and allocation of raw materials for both military and civil purposes.

Responsibilities of the Combined Policy Committee Will Be:

- (1) To review periodically and as appropriate the scientific and technical co-operation being undertaken and planned for the future by the three Governments in military fields.
- (2) To determine or as necessary recommend to member Governments policies and procedures which may be appropriate to make most effective co-operation in these fields for the common defence and security.
- (3) To give policy guidance to subordinate groups as required.
- (4) To supervise the Combined Development Agency in its continuing function of procurement of raw materials for nuclear energy.
- (5) To allocate raw materials procured by the Combined Development Agency.

Membership

Membership of the Combined Policy Committee is as follows:

For the United States: The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, or their alternates.

For the United Kingdom: The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Defence, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Authority, or their alternates.

For Canada: The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence, and the President of the Atomic Energy Control Board, or their alternates.

The Chairman of the Committee is the Secretary of State of the United States.

Organization and Procedures

(1) The Combined Policy Committee, or appropriate members thereof, will meet as is determined to be necessary to discharge its responsibilities.

(2) The Secretariat, consisting of one representative from each country, will continue to assist the Combined Policy Committee in such manner as the latter may direct. Such assistance may include: providing an official record, preparing correspondence, keeping minutes, and making arrangements for meetings.

(3) Subcommittees may be established to render advice and reports to the Combined Policy Committee, to give guidance to the technical sub-groups referred to in (5) below, and to receive reports from the technical sub-groups. Initially, a subcommittee on nuclear aspects and a sub-committee on non-nuclear aspects will be established. The subcommittees may be modified by the Combined Policy Committee as may be found to be desirable. The subcommittees, or appropriate members thereof, will meet as required.

(4) Technical sub-groups may be formed on an ad hoc basis to facilitate the exchange and development of information in assigned areas and report to their supervisory subcommittees on progress achieved and problems encountered. Organization and procedures will be informal, subject to guidance and requirements established by the subcommittees. The initial sub-groups will be in the areas identified in the report of the United States-United Kingdom-Canada technical discussions held in December, 1957.

(5) The subcommittees and technical sub-groups will establish their own organization and rules of procedure as may be required.

(6) Decisions taken by the Combined Policy Committee will reflect approval of each Government participating. In case of disagreement, individual recommendations will be made by the members to their respective Governments.

(7) Participation by each member country in specific areas of co-operation will be governed by its relevant laws and agreements with either or both of the other two member countries.
