OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 28, 1943

FOURTH SESSION—NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-seventh day of January, 1943, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker the Honourable James Allison Glen, in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

As you enter upon your duties at the beginning of this new year, you will be heartened by the improved position of the united nations.

In the first year of war, most of the countries of Europe lost their freedom and became the victims of nazi occupation and oppression. In the second year, Italy, already at war, joined her power with that of Germany in an effort to seize new territories in Africa, as well as in Europe. In the third year, Japan entered the world conflict in the expectation of becoming the master of the orient. These actions disclosed the pre-arranged schedule of world domination planned by the axis powers. Each, at the appointed time, sprang upon its unoffending neighbours.

During these years, the nations which were attacked, and others still enjoying freedom, were necessarily on the defensive. For three years, the free nations continued to gather strength, at the same time affording such mutual aid, one to the other, as opportunity permitted.

In their attempt at world conquest, the forces of aggression still continue their campaigns of terror and violence. The world scene, however, has vastly changed from what it was a year ago. Enemy forces, everywhere, have been halted by stubborn and successful resistance. In many parts of the world, the allied powers have taken the offensive.

At Casablanca, in North Africa, a meeting, unprecedented in history, has just been concluded between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States. During their conference, they were in communication with the Premier of the Soviet Union and the Generalissimo of China. At the conference, the leaders of Great Britain and the United States, both military and civil, agreed on a war plan for 1943 designed to maintain the initiative in every theatre of war.

In the western hemisphere, the peoples now present a virtually united front against the axis powers.

The government has maintained close relations with the nations with which Canada is united in the common struggle. Direct diplomatic representation has strengthened our relations with China and the Soviet Union, and with the several allied governments now temporarily resident in the United Kingdom. The establishment of diplomatic missions to nations of the Americas is broadening the friendly relations between those countries and Canada.

Our armed forces are on active service in all parts of the world. Their strength has been steadily increased. They are equipped with the most modern and efficient weapons of war. In actual combat, they have served with distinction and gallantry.

In the present year, the progressive expansion of the navy will be continued. The army program will include the maintenance and reinforcement of the overseas army of two corps, and the maintenance of units and formations required for the territorial and coastal defence of Canada and other areas in the western hemisphere. The air force will continue its three-fold activities of air training, patrolling our coasts and coastal waters, and sharing in aerial combat overseas. Increased responsibilities will be assumed for the maintenance of Canadian airmen and Canadian squadrons serving abroad.

As an integral part of Canada's total war effort, ships, aircraft, weapons, munitions and other supplies will continue to be provided, not only for Canada's forces, but in vast quantities as well for the forces of our fighting allies. In order to provide for the financing and for the allocation to the united nations of Canadian war production, a measure which will make provision for the establishment of a Canadian war supplies allocation board will be submitted for your approval.

A joint committee representative of the Departments of Agriculture of Canada and the United States has been agreed upon to coordinate the efforts of the two countries in the production of food for the united nations.

The immediate object of the united nations is the defeat of the axis powers. Joint planning of operations on a world scale has accompanied preparations for intensive warfare. The united nations also aim at rendering aggression impossible in the future. Their governments, in addition to planning jointly for the prosecution of the war, have already entered into consultation regarding post-war problems. Achievement of their aims requires the establishment of conditions under which all peoples may enjoy equality of opportunity and a sense of security.

Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities, the establishment, in useful and remunerative employment, of the men and women in our armed forces and in war industries. My ministers have already begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war. With your approval, the select committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, appointed at the last session, will be reconstituted.

It is in the general interest that freedom from fear and from want should be the assured possession of all. A nation-wide plan which would provide insurance against the inevitable consequences of major economic and social hazards is essential if this objective is to be attained.

In Canada, a considerable measure of social security has already been provided through federal enactments establishing annuities, unemployment insurance, and pensions for the aged, the blind and for disabled veterans; and through provincial enactments related to accidents, sickness and hospitalization, widows' and mothers' allowances and maternity benefits. There is, however, no approach to a nation-wide plan of social security.

My ministers believe that a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance should be worked out at once which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada.

The government accordingly proposes to recommend the early appointment of a select committee to examine and report on the most practicable measures of social insurance, and the steps which will be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan. Among matters which will be referred to this committee for study and consideration will be the establishment of a national system of health insurance.

In accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act you will be invited to consider a bill for the redistribution of representation in the House of Commons.

You will be asked to make provision for the appointment of parliamentary assistants to those of my ministers whose duties have become particularly onerous because of the demands of war.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to vote the necessary grants to enable our country to make its utmost contribution to the winning of the war.

Your attention will be invited at the earliest convenient date to the government's financial proposals. These will include the further development of the method of payment of the personal income tax in the year in which income is received, thus carrying to its logical conclusion the approach made last year to the collection of taxes on a current basis.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

We have reason to be profoundly grateful for the improved position of the united nations. We must be careful, however, not to be misled by recent successes. The submarine menace has been growing, not diminishing. Decisive battles have still to be fought and won. For some time past, the movement of munitions and supplies overseas has been seriously restricted because of submarine activities. Until that grave menace is effectively controlled there is always the danger that reinforcements and supplies in sufficient volume may not reach the battle zones. As areas of conflict close in, fighting will increase in intensity and ferocity. The hardest battles, the heaviest sacrifices, may be in the future. Only the utmost sustained effort on the part of all the united nations will ensure the defeat of the axis powers.

In again inviting your careful consideration to the all important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, government notices of motion and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

THE OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

RESIGNATION OF MR. HANSON AS LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AND APPOINTMENT OF MR. GRAYDON—CHANGES IN PARTY LEADERSHIP

before concluding the business of the late session, in accordance with parliamentary procedure I announced to the house certain changes which had taken place in the ministry since this house had adjourned some six months earlier. To-day I take it as a part of my duty as leader of the house to draw attention, not to changes in the ministry, but to changes which have taken place in the opposition, in particular in the position of leader of the opposition.

May I say that had my hon. friend the former leader of the opposition, the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), not told me personally on Tuesday evening last that he had definitely made up his mind that he would insist upon asking his followers in this house to relieve him immediately of the duty of leadership of the opposition and that his followers were meeting the day following to consider the situation, I certainly would have been very greatly surprised at the announcement which came over the radio last night and which also must have surprised all hon. members of this house. However, as we now know, the members of the official opposition met yesterday and, very reluctantly I am sure, accepted the resignation of the then leader of the opposition and later on selected for appointment as leader of the official opposition in this house my hon. friend the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I should like, therefore, immediately to extend to the new leader of the opposition my warmest personal congratulations and to extend to him in equal measure the heartiest congratulations not only of all members on this side of the house but, may I say, of all hon. members of this House of Commons. My hon. friend is to be greatly congratulated on the expression of confidence which the members of his party have given him in the choice which they have made. May I say I think the choice is one which members of the House of Commons of all parties will greatly welcome.

The hon. member for Peel has been in parliament now for some seven years, if I am not mistaken. He came into the house in 1935 and has been here continuously ever since. He has been a whip of his party. He has also been the chairman of the national committee of his party. He has a wide experience not only in political life generally but particularly in this house, and he brings to his position as leader of the opposition exceptional qualifications. He has—perhaps he will allow me to say it—great charm of manner, a pleasing disposition, also fine intellectual attainments. He has participated in the debates freely and always in a manner which I think has met with the general approval of the house. I can say to him with very great confidence that I am sure he will do honour to himself in the position which he is now holding.

I must say to him that I wonder now that, when the convention of his party was held at Winnipeg recently, he was not made the choice of his party at once, instead of the party taking two or three bites of the cherry —in this case it might perhaps be called a plum. For its own reasons the party thought best to make other arrangements.

My hon. friend has this also certainly to his credit, that he is neither too young nor too old for the position. May I say to him that I can speak with some degree of authority as to the position of leader of the opposition, because I held the post which he now occupies, for a period of some seven years and the experience which I had at that time gave me a very full understanding not only of the great responsibilities of the position but of its anxieties as well. I say to him immediately that I shall welcome opportunities of conference with him concerning matters which pertain to the business of the house. I hope in that connection he will not hesitate to make any demands upon me which at any time he may find advisable.

While I am speaking of the change of position in the leadership of the opposition of this house I think it might not be inappropriate for me also to make reference to the change in the leadership of the party of which my hon. friend is a member. When we met in this house at the beginning of a new session a little over a year ago the party of which my hon. friend is so distinguished a member, had just chosen a leader who, however, never made an appearance in the House of Commons, and for a year my hon. friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was in the position of having to lead the opposition and his party in the House of Commons but of not being the leader of the party in the larger sense of the word. I notice that at the convention of the party in Winnipeg that same procedure has been repeated. As a result we have to-day my hon. friend the member for Peel leading the opposition in this house while the chosen leader of the party is without a seat in the house. I mention this because in connection with our parliamentary institutions I hope that such a practice is not going to be permitted to grow into a custom. I take no exception to the compliment which the party of my hon. friend pays us on this side of the house, in having two or three leaders.

I do believe that the British parliamentary system more or less demands that a political head of a party which occupies the position of an official opposition, should be occupying a seat in parliament. Although I do not wish to have my hon. friend believe that we are anxious to see him leave the position he now occupies, I hope that in the interests of parliamentary practice the chosen leader of the opposition will seek a seat in the house at an early date.

In speaking of changes, I should perhaps mention also the change that has been made in the name of the party opposite. However, I have been long enough in this parliament to see six changes in the name of the party, so evidently change of name so far as it is concerned has grown into a custom. I shall not say more on that at the present moment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say a word in reference to my friend the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who has held the position of Leader of the Opposition in this house since the early spring of 1940. When Mr. Hanson undertook to accept the position of Leader of the Opposition in this house he did so, I know, only because of the highest sense of public duty. At that time, he told me personally, and I know as well from his intimate friends, that he was not feeling any too strong physically and had reason to know that he must take particular care of his health if he were to be able to carry on for any length of time in public life. I know too that, after having been in the position of leader for a year or more, my hon. friend was anxious then to give up the leadership of the opposition because of the strain which that position involves; and now, in the third year, he has found it imperative to ask that he should be relieved of its duties.

As I have said, I know something of the anxieties and the responsibilities of a leader of the opposition as well as of a leader of the government. I must say frankly to my hon. friend that I have been amazed at the successful manner in which he has carried on his duties in this House of Commons over a period of three years, for I know something of the strain that he was undergoing all the time. However much any of us may have differed in our political views, I believe the entire membership of this House of Commons has had the greatest admiration for my hon. friend in the sense of duty he has shown. He has been an example to us all in the manner of his fulfilment of the duties of his high office and for the way in which he has carried on from day to day, month to month, and now as it has become from year to year. I think his performance all circumstances considered has been simply wonderful, and I am glad to have this opportunity to tell him so. Many times from this side of the house my colleagues and myself have marvelled how he found it possible to be in his seat the moment the house opened and to be there throughout the sessions, afternoons and evenings, almost without exception. I think it is true that no other member of this House of Commons has been as continuously in his seat during the past three years as the former leader of the opposition.

May I also say to him that I think this house and the country are alike indebted to him for what he has contributed in that time to the discussions and to the carrying on of the business of parliament. He came into the leadership of the opposition with an experience almost second to none of the members on his side of the house. He brought not only his wide business and legal experience but also a knowledge of parliamentary affairs gained over a long period as a member of parliament. For some fourteen years my hon. friend had been a member of this house before he became leader of the opposition; since that time there have been added three more years. He had served as a minister of the crown; as we all know, he is one who is widely read in matters of government and well informed on the questions of the day; and he has greatly contributed to the work of this house. May I say that I thank him warmly for the manner in which he has cooperated with myself and my colleagues in the business of the house during this period of war. There has been no period of history comparable to the present; there has been no time in the affairs of the world when there have been so many problems of the gravest nature, and the business of this house could not be carried on at all at a time such as the present if there were not a spirit of real cooperation between the government, the opposition and other members in parliament. Now I want to say quite frankly, while not taking exception to much in the way of criticism, that the criticism which the government has met with from outside of parliament, where persons are not as well informed on the public questions of the day as are most hon. members of the house, has been much more severe than the criticism in relation to the management of affairs in these years of war which has come from the members of this house, regardless of the party to which they belong. I put that down to the sense of real responsibility which my hon. friend himself has had, and which has been shared by other members in the house.

I do hope that, in giving up the position which he has held with such distinction, my hon. friend will find in the relief from the heavy burdens of that office an opportunity to gain full restoration of his health and that he will be spared many years to enjoy some of the rewards of the service which he has given to this parliament and our country.

In the name of parliament and of the country I take great pleasure in saying to my hon. friend that I think he has merited the thanks of both.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): There are a few rare occasions in this house when the measure of a man can be taken and when tribute can be paid to a person apart altogether from the views which he may hold. I am glad, therefore, this afternoon that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has paid tribute to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). We have disagreed sharply in principle and on policy from time to time, but I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury has won the respect of all members of the house regardless of our political opinions and other affiliations.

The Prime Minister has eulogized his faithfulness to duty, which he has performed so well, and I am not going to enter into any details of that description. All I wish to say to the hon. member is this, that we join in wishing him many years of life in which he may look back upon this occasion, which I think must be to him a source of real personal gratification.

The leadership of the opposition is a very important position in our British and Canadian parliamentary institutions. Upon the shoulders of the leader of the opposition there devolves a responsibility which is perhaps exceeded only by that of the Prime Minister himself, and I am quite sure we all feel that the hon. member for York-Sunbury has fulfilled that high office ably and well.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) upon having been selected to act in the capacity of house leader in the absence of the leader who was chosen at Winnipeg. The hon. member has been here for the same length of time as I have been myself, and during the seven years we have grown to know him, we have grown to like him. Although I disagree sharply with the point of view of the Conservative party, nevertheless I appreciate the fact that to-day the party itself has chosen, to lead it in this house, a young man who has a great deal of charm of manner and who has always shown to all of us a keen sense of fair play. I wish him a long tenure of his office.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing in this country which we can very well afford to get along without from this time forward it is playing politics. I have been favourably impressed, since the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) assumed the responsibility of leader of the opposition, with the degree to which it seems to me he was free from ulterior political motive in the things he said. I desire to congratulate him upon that fact. Many times he was frank and sincere in his expressions to the point at which, perhaps, from a political point of view, he may have been described as indiscreet; but anything which he might have lost through any apparent indiscretion as a result of frankness was more than made up, I think, by the respect which was engendered, at least so far as I was concerned, by his frankness, his sincerity, and his sense of honour in carrying out his duties in this house. Everything else that I should like to say in this regard has already been said, and I therefore simply associate myself with those who have already spoken.

May I also congratulate the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) upon the assumption of duties which he will find anything but pleasant as the days go by. I have no doubt he is public spirited enough to exert himself to the very limit in the discharge of his responsibilities. I doubt that in the whole history of the Anglo-Saxon race there has ever been a time when we needed more than we do to-day men of vision, men of open mind and men of honour, men who are capable of learning new things and learning from the old where that is found necessary. I wish to congratulate the hon. member upon the degree to which I believe he possesses the qualifications which are necessary to enable him to come under the classification which I have indicated. I may say, as I remarked to him this afternoon when I congratulated him personally, I shall be listening most attentively to all that he says.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should be a little less than human and have an entire absence of pride and vanity in my make-up were I not deeply touched by the kind expressions with respect to myself to which utterance has been given here this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the leaders of the two groups to my left.

My first words to you, sir, and to the Prime Minister are, many thanks but not good-bye. If I have contributed in any measure to the government of this country and to the national effort during this trying time of crisis, I shall feel amply repaid. I unbosomed my soul to the members of this house on May 16, 1940, when I said that in accepting this position even temporarily I did not intend to engage in a day-to-day dog-fight over political subject matters. I have tried to keep to that path. How far I have succeeded in aiding the government in its war effort, in a constructive manner, and at the same time tempered by criticism which may have been sharp at times, I shall leave you to judge.

I should like to extend my personal thanks to the members of this house and to you, sir, for the courtesy which has been extended to me at all times. One of the efforts which I made was to maintain and, if possible, to enhance the dignity of parliament. Parliament is a great institution and, if it is allowed to degenerate, it will but deserve the condemnation of the people who have sent us here. It is one of the fundamental duties of members, and those of us who are entrusted for the time being with the responsibility of leadership, to make parliament not only the vital thing it ought to be, but an institution which will command the respect of the whole country. That is one of the very bases of our democratic institutions, and I hope, indeed I am sure, that my worthy and able young successor will make that one of his main objectives.

I am not here to-day to pronounce any swan-song. I am not leaving the precincts of this house. But I felt that I could not carry on the responsibilities of leadership of the opposition for any further period. I hope to make some contribution to the discussions and to the work of the committees of the house as long as I am a member. In leaving the official position which I have held I trust I shall carry with me the respect and friendship of every individual member of this house, and I shall value that more than the applause of the multitude.

I have lived now a fairly long life. I have had my full share of the ups and downs of public life and of political battle, and I may say to you, sir, that in the declining years of my life the thing that I crave most is the respect and regard of my fellow citizens, which I have had in such full measure from the people who sent me here. I thank you.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my first word as leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the House of Commons perhaps should be a word of appreciation of the help and guidance that my predecessor, whom you have just honoured by expressions of appreciation, has given me from time to time. I share fully the sentiments which have been voiced in that regard this afternoon. I am perhaps not able to express them as well as some who have spoken before me; but from the bottom of my heart I say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who retired yesterday from the onerous duties of the office of leader of the opposition, that I join in the hope that he may be spared to enjoy a long and happy life as a private member of this house—at least until such time, if I may say so to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) without discouraging him—until such time in the very near future as we on this side of the house shall form the government.

At this time of course I did not intend to enter into any matters of controversy. But the Prime Minister was of a somewhat different mind, and for that reason I want to express one or two opinions before I proceed to what in the first instance I had intended to say.

The Prime Minister has a great and natural charm in dealing with young men like myself. I fancy that I should be careful and beware of the blandishments of the Prime Minister, lest I fall into some trap, which I know he would not purposely lay for me. But let me say this to the Prime Minister, with the courtesy that I learn from him—because of that he is a master. He spoke about the absence from the house of leaders of the opposition who are really leaders, as compared to acting leaders such as I—temporary leaders, if you like. Well, even those of us who are rather young can remember the days when the present Prime Minister was himself in similar situations. I remember very well, when I was younger and perhaps more impressionable than I am now, feeling that on two occasions at least the position in which the present Prime Minister found himself was a very difficult one. Sir, I take heart from what the Prime Minister has said this afternoon with respect to our outside leadership and inside leadership more perhaps than from anything else he could have said; because if we have the same success with ours that he had with his, I warn him to beware in the years to come.

The Prime Minister made some complaint about the custom or practice that had grown up. I take it he saw the growth of that practice beginning in the South York election. There are those in the country—certainly I would not want to subscribe to this view myself—who then felt that at that time the Prime Minister himself contributed in no small measure to the growth of that custom and practice. In calling that to his attention may I assure him at once that it never was my view.

However, I wish also to say this—and with it I shall have finished with these perhaps facetious observations. We have had such a rush of progressive legislation since December 11 last that many persons across Canada are calling for an annual convention of the Progressive Conservative party. They feel that that is the way to cause progressive legislation to be brought forward by the present government. The Prime Minister may perhaps say that we have been having almost annual conventions. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that if I thought another convention would help to prod the government into greater action, such as was so greatly needed, we would always be glad indeed to assist and cooperate in any way we could.

Seriously, sir, I do deeply appreciate and have been greatly moved by the kind words of the Prime Minister. Sitting in this House for seven years I think I have learned to sift the wheat from the chaff, and I believe there was a good deal of the wheat of sincerity in what the Prime Minister said this afternoon with respect to myself. I want him to know how very deeply I appreciate it, and what a great comfort and help his words are to me as I assume this exacting office.

To the leaders of the other groups I wish to say a similar word of appreciation. One of the things that I think a man treasures and prizes most highly in public life is the friendship he succeeds in building up not only among those of his own party but among hon. members all over the chamber. One of the things I value most highly is that I believe I have as many friends throughout this chamber as perhaps any other hon. member in the house —at least I like to think I have. For this reason I particularly like the tone of the utterances of those who spoke this afternoon. I did note in the remarks of one of the speakers an expression of the hope that I should have a long tenure of office as leader of the opposition. Perhaps it was a veiled but pointed hint that someone in any event was hoping Mr. Bracken would not find a seat in this house too soon. I always remember a close personal friend who sat where the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) now sits, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. For him I had an exceedingly high regard. When I was appointed national chairman of the then Conservative party, he came over to my seat and, calling me by my first name, as he did on all occasions outside of the house, said: "I have been thinking what I should say to you. It has taken me some time to make up my mind. But, Gordon, I have this to say to you now: in your new job as national chairman I wish you success, but not too much!" I think perhaps that sums up pretty well what many hon. members in the house might like to say to me.

While in times of peace one might regard elevation to the high office of leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition as a great personal honour, and even to-day one cannot overlook that aspect of it, I regard my appointment at this time not as a personal honour but rather as a widened and extended opportunity for service at a critical time in Canada's history. It seems to me that transcends all matters of personal honour. May I go further and say that when one talks of service, and the opportunities for service, I think one is saddened and sobered by the realization of how little we actually do in this chamber as compared with the members of our armed forces who, in zones much more dangerous than this, are rendering service of a kind that we cannot approach here. Therefore this afternoon, when I think of the honours that may come to any civilian and the opportunities for service which may present themselves to any of us from time to time, my thoughts go back to those other services being rendered.

This afternoon I feel very humble as I undertake this responsibility. You, Mr. Speaker, will understand the reasons underlying that humility, because this position carries with it no small responsibility. Particularly is that so for one who has been in the House of Commons for only seven years and who has never occupied a position in the cabinet or government of this country. I am, however, at least fortified by my resolve to give to the extent of my capacity, my ability and my energy, limited though they may be, in the interests of our dominion and of the war effort generally. May I add that I hope I may have the health and strength to lead this party, temporary though that leadership may be, in such a way that we as a party may be able, without taking anything away from any other classes in this country, to do something worth while for the armed forces, for labour and for agriculture. For them, I hope I may be a spokesman.

With those objectives clearly in mind, I am now dedicating this Progressive Conservative party to these and such other aims as we may feel would make for a greater contribution by this country in perhaps the greatest time of stress through which this nation has had to pass.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence this afternoon. It has not been easy for me to make my maiden speech as leader of the opposition, but my task has been made much easier by my feeling that this house has given me an indication of a confidence which I shall not lightly forget in the days that lie ahead.

Ilsley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. E. Michaud, Minister of Transport and the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5 p.m.

Friday, January 29, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

EXTRADITION TREATY

ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES GOVERNING EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the concluding day of the last session the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), asked me a question with respect to the treaty between Canada and the United States governing the extradition of criminals. I said I would give my hon. friend the information at an early day this session. The fact is that the treaty, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury mentioned at the time, was signed on April 29 of last year. It was tabled in this house by my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), August 1 last. The treaty has been approved by the senate of the United States but it has not yet been ratified. It will be presented to this house for approval before it is ratified.

I might give the house this additional information with regard to the present position. Following the publication of the provisions of the treaty, the government received representations from many organizations in Canada who are interested in the marketing of securities. Extensive briefs were filed asking among other things for a modification of the provisions in so far as they might touch upon matters which could properly be regarded as legitimate Canadian business. These briefs and other representations, some of which have been recently received, have been the subject of careful study by the interested departments of the government. These studies are continuing. It is not possible at present to state the position which has been reached in this matter. Before ratification, the treaty will, as I have said, be submitted to parliament for approval, but it is unlikely that it will be possible to present it to parliament at an early stage of the session.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STANDING AND SELECT COMMITTEES—REVISION OF RULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government will take appropriate action to expedite the establishment of the various standing and select committees of the house.

I recognize that the rule has been that these committees are not officially constituted until the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been concluded. However, at this first opportunity I should like to indicate that it is the desire of the opposition members to have all the committees formally constituted so as to begin work this session with a minimum of delay. Too frequently in the past there appears to have been a great time lag between the formal constitution of the committees of the house and the actual commencement of their work. Indeed, some standing committees, having within their jurisdiction very important subject matters, have failed on some occasions to hold more than simply pro forma organization meetings. Last session standing committees were formally constituted on February 19. The first committee to meet was the committee on printing, on March 4. The committee on agriculture and colonization met first on March 17; the committee on standing orders on April 30. The committee on banking and commerce did not meet until May 13; the committee on miscellaneous private bills did not meet until June 5; and the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines held its first meeting on July 8. Six standing committees, namely, those on privileges and elections, public accounts, marine and fisheries, mines, forests and waters, industrial and international relations, and the debates committee did not meet at all during last session.

On March 2 of last year I asked for the appointment of a select committee on radio broadcasting. The committee was appointed on March 13, and did not hold its first meeting until almost two months later, on May 6. The first evidence was taken in that committee on May 14, and considerable criticism of the delay in this instance was voiced in the committee itself when it met. While I am on this point I wish to urge upon the government the acceptance of the recommendation of the last radio broadcasting committee's report, that a committee of the house review the policies and operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation annually from now on, and particularly as soon as possible this session.

The fact that six of the committees did not meet last session and that other committees held very few meetings indicates the urgent need for some better plan of enlisting the services of members generally in the work of the committees of the house. The need is more apparent than ever in a war-time session of parliament, and I ask the government to take immediate steps in this direction.

Some early consideration, in my opinion, should also be given to reviewing and modernizing the whole of our parliamentary procedure. The war is bringing many changes in the lives of our people and in our entire national structure. Parliament, therefore, in my opinion should not only bring itself abreast of these changes but should show that it is not afraid to give leadership to them in its own internal conduct.

I ask the Prime Minister if he will give sympathetic and careful attention to the points which I have raised.

Right. Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am pleased to say to my hon. friend that I heartily approve the suggestions which he has made. Indeed, the government itself has felt that it was most desirable to have committees meet at an early day, and care will be taken to see that they are constituted as soon as the debate on the address is concluded, if not, by arrangement with my hon. friends opposite, before that time.

As to some of the committees not having met last session, that in no sense is a reflection on the government. As my hon. friend is aware, any member of the house has a right to ask that certain matters should be referred to the appropriate committees. If no request is made for a committee to meet, and matters are not thereby referred, there is obviously no need of calling a committee together.

My hon. friend has spoken about some delay in constituting the committees. I am quite prepared that we on this side should take our share of the blame, if such is to be given, for any delay; but I wish to point out to him that time and again the appointment of committees has been delayed because of the inability to get from my hon. friend and his supporters opposite the names of the members of his party whom they desired to have serve on committees. However, he no doubt intends to see that they act promptly in these matters and we may be spared that delay on this occasion.

As to the number of committees that are to meet, I imagine that a good deal of the time of members of the house this session will be taken up by service on the different committees, because there are some committees the work of which will require considerable time. I do not think the business of the house is expedited at all by having a very large number of committees, with members serving on two or three committees at one and the same time. Rather, I should think it would expedite matters to have the committees properly attended by limiting their number. I might mention immediately the committees which this year will be of special importance.

My hon. friend has asked that the committee on radio broadcasting should be appointed again this year. The government fully intends to see that it is reconstituted. The speech from the throne has mentioned the reconstitution of the committee on rehabilitation and reconstruction. It also indicates another committee, a very important committee, on social security. The committee on war expenditures will also be reconstituted, as well as the committee on the Defence of Canada regulations. In addition to these there will be the committee on railways and shipping. It is possible there may be a committee on canteen funds. I do not think it will be necessary this year to have a special committee on land settlement, or one on vocational training, nor will there be the necessity of a special committee on the plebiscite. My hon. friend will recollect that that subject took up a large amount of time last year, and it accounted in very large part for the delay in constituting some of the other committees.

While I am speaking on the question of committees, I may say that the government has had under consideration the appointment of a committee on estimates, but before making any final decision in the matter I should like to have a word with the leader of the opposition and the other leaders in conference together.

There is one other committee to which reference has been made: a committee to revise the rules of the house. We have, as I stated on a former occasion, thought that a time of war was not the best time to revise the rules of the house. The rules of the house are designed to apply in ordinary times; in a time of war they have to be modified considerably. We hope the war is not going to continue for so many years that the house will be embarrassed in any way by having its rules remain as they are for the present, modified by agreement to such extent as has been the case in previous sessions. However, I do not wish to say a final word on that just now. But it is the present view of the administration that this is not the best time to have a committee consider the rules of the house.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

QUESTION AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a further question to the Prime Minister? In the press of January 25 of this year there appeared a report with regard to the settlement reached in the steel strike, and one of the points mentioned was the appointment of a new chairman of the national war labour board. I was wondering if the Prime Minister would acquaint the house with the progress that has been made in that regard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the government is in communication with a gentleman who I hope will find it possible to accept the position. I hope to be able to make an announcement of his name to the house on Monday.

FUEL

SHORTAGE IN WESTERN CANADA—DELIVERIES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister in regard to the serious fuel shortage, particularly in the prairie provinces. What steps are being taken by the government to relieve that situation and to ensure that adequate deliveries, or at least some deliveries, are made to cities and towns in Saskatchewan that are almost out of fuel?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Ontario also.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend will be agreeable to having his question stand as a notice. A committee was appointed by the cabinet some little time ago to deal with the problem just referred to. Steps have already been taken to meet the situation, but I should prefer not to make a statement offhand as to what those steps are.

GRAIN POLICY

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO CROP YEAR BEGINNING AUGUST 1, 1943

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement with respect to the government grain policy for 1943-44—that is, with reference to the crop year commencing August 1, 1943.

This policy relates, in part, to the marketing problem and programme and, in part, to the production programme already announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

I shall deal first with the marketing aspects. Later, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, I shall refer to phases of grain policy for the coming year that have to do especially with production.

My purpose in making a statement on this subject at this early date—so far in advance of the actual commencement of the next crop year—is to assist producers, as far as possible, to plan their 1943 crops. The government has arrived at its 1943-44 grain programme after very careful consideration on its own part; after full discussion with the Canadian wheat board; after having received the recommendations of the advisory committee to the Canadian wheat board; after a conference between federal agricultural officials and provincial agricultural officials and the Canadian federation of agriculture; and after consultations between the United States and Canadian agricultural authorities.

The 1943-44 programme involved some important adjustments as compared with the 1942-43 programme, but retains the same general objectives. The marketing policy is definitely related to the general farm production programme announced by the Department of Agriculture.

1. The fixed initial price of wheat under the Canadian Wheat Board Act will remain at 90 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver.

2. Marketings of wheat in western Canada in 1943-44 will be restricted to 14 bushels per authorized acre. The limitation of marketings to 14 bushels per authorized acre, instead of using a total marketable quantity, will greatly simplify administration and each producer will know exactly how much wheat he can market.

3. The most important change in policy is in connection with wheat deliverable in 1943-44. Under the present regulations only wheat grown in 1942 may be delivered against the 1942-43 quota of 280 million bushels. Under the new programme any wheat which the farmer has on hand produced in 1943 or in any previous year will be deliverable within the quotas fixed for the crop year 1943-44. The government feels that this feature of its 1943-44 policy will result in a further reduction in wheat acreage and will enable producers to devote more of their land to the production of other crops which are required. Most producers in the west will have wheat on their farms at the end of the crop year, and consequently will be able to further reduce their wheat acreage in 1943 and still fill their 1943-44 delivery quotas. The general farm production programme contemplates a reduction of at least three million acres in the area sown to wheat in 1943 as compared with 1942.

4. Minimum prices for oats and barley in 1943-44 will be continued at 45 cents a bushel for No. 2 C.W. oats, basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur, and 60 cents a bushel for Nos. 1 and 2 C.W. barley, basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur, with lower grades in their proper relationship. Old crop as well as 1943 production of oats and barley may be delivered during the coming crop year.

5. The fixed price for flaxseed in 1943-44 will be continued at $2.25 a bushel basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur.

6. In connection with its policies in respect to delivery quotas, the use of available storage space and shipping facilities, the Canadian wheat board will give first consideration to the movement of those grains or grades of grain which are most in demand in 1943-44.

May I now turn to those aspects of the grain policy for 1943-44, which relate primarily to production and in regard to which, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to state the main decisions that have been reached.

The agricultural programme for 1943 announced following the conference held in Ottawa on December 8 and 9, 1942, required that there be an increased production of hog, cattle and poultry products in 1943 which should be continued into 1944.

The considered opinion of those best informed in the United States and Canada is that if we are to reach our objectives in live stock production in 1943 and 1944 there must be an increased acreage of coarse grains in Canada in 1943.

We are asking a 12 per cent increase in oat acreage and an 11 per cent increase in barley acreage. This is being encouraged by guaranteed minimum prices on barley and oats as last year.

In order to make provision for the required acreage we are asking farmers to reduce their wheat acreage by not less than 3,000,000 acres. To encourage this, the Minister of Agriculture will submit amendments to the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act, 1942, to provide payment of $2 an acre on each acre by which land seeded to wheat in 1943 is less than land seeded to wheat in 1940 based on the same acreage. If there is new breaking involved, 80 per cent of it will be counted as wheat and 20 per cent as coarse grains. No payment will be made in respect of abandoned land.

There is no assurance that flaxseed from an additional acreage can be disposed of in 1943. We are, therefore, not asking farmers to increase flax acreage over 1942. If there is any change in the requirements of flaxseed, farmers will be notified later.

Some difficulty is experienced in disposing of rye. We are, therefore, suggesting that rye acreage be reduced by 31 per cent.

Finally I wish to make a statement on the question of wheat farm storage payments, from this crop year of 1942-43. Due to altered circumstances affecting the marketing of this year's crops, it has been decided on the strong advice of the Canadian wheat board not to make payments for the farm storage of wheat.

In the past two crop seasons, farm storage payments were made because of congestion of country elevator space early in the crop year. At the beginning of this crop year, there were about 170 million bushels of empty storage space, less working space, in western country elevators for the receipt of the new crop. Apart from a few persistently troublesome districts, it has been possible to advance quotas rapidly. Over one-third of the western delivery points now have their full wheat delivery quota of 14 bushels per authorized acre. Only 154 out of 2,149 points remain on an 8-bushel basis. In addition to wheat deliveries of 152 million bushels, western farmers have been able to sell 10 million bushels of flax and 100 million bushels of other grains. These alternative and additional revenues and the advance in the price of wheat have helped the farmers' position so that the conditions of 1940-41 were not applicable.

If farm storage had been paid this crop year, serious difficulty in accepting deliveries of 280 million bushels was anticipated. In all probability, the payments would have had to be accompanied by a required delivery date on certain percentages of the farmer's quota and this feature, in turn, would have been a considerable offset to the scheme. It has already been necessary for the Canadian wheat board to urge producers to deliver grain within their existing delivery quotas wherever there is available space at their local delivery points.

Prompt filling of available storage space has two important advantages. It brings forward more of the kinds of grain and grades which can be quickly disposed of in domestic and export markets, and thereby serves to increase the total sales of grain by having them on hand for shipment forward when required. It also helps the Canadian wheat board in making it possible for producers to deliver 280 million bushels of wheat in the 1942-43 season. This cannot be accomplished if producers withhold a substantial volume for delivery in June and July.

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): There is one point on which I am not clear. Do I understand that there is to be a bonus of $2 an acre on any increased acreage of spring grains, that is coarse grains; and will that apply only west of the great lakes or throughout Canada?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The statement made on behalf of the Department of Agriculture was that legislation will be introduced in the house to provide for the payment of $2 an acre. There will be an amendment to the present act, which provides for payment only in the western provinces on the reduced wheat acreage.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am sure this house, the west and the country generally will appreciate getting this statement from the minister at such an early stage of the session. On no previous occasion has it been brought down so early, and I think it is a fine thing. I am sure, however, the minister could not expect us to follow the lengthy statement closely enough to ask questions on it now, but in one or two points I think it will be very disappointing to western Canada. I should like to ask a question or two. Did I understand the minister to say that about one-third of the delivery points have received the full 14-bushel quota that they were to receive on the seeded acreage of last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I did not say that. I said that over one-third of the western delivery points now have their full wheat delivery quota of fourteen bushels per authorized acre. In other words, the quota is there for the farmers to deliver.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister state when it would be possible for the other points to take the full fourteen bushels? There is a serious situation in certain districts, where the quota is only eight bushels.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that this is a statement by the minister, and there should be no debate in connection with it.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): There is one question which I believe is of vital interest to a number of farmers in western Canada who, because of weather and labour conditions, have not been able to get their 1942 crop threshed. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) if he will not immediately bring in an amendment to the wheat board act permitting farmers to deliver, on their 1942 quota, any grain they may have in their bins, whether grown in 1940, 1941 or 1942.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question which should be placed upon the order paper.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. W. E. HARRIS AND SECONDED BY MR. MAURICE HALLÉ

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Major-General the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, one of His Majesty's Personal Aides-de-Camp, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

I should like first to express my thanks to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the great kindness he has shown in asking me to speak to this motion. It is an honour which he has conferred upon the constituency of Grey-Bruce; but I know that every elector in that constituency will join with me when I say that the honour was actually conferred upon the armed forces of the dominion, for in all probability, as the Prime Minister has said, in 1943 all our armed forces will be in action, and for that reason this will be perhaps the most memorable year in the history of the dominion.

Up to the present time the Canadian army has not taken a prominent part in the war, but this year it will reach the peak of its strength, when it will be composed of two army corps. When it goes into battle it will have more tanks and more mechanized equipment than any other army of like size in the world, and in most instances, if not in all, the equipment which it will take into battle will have been made in Canada. It will be led by young officers, most of them younger than I am, who, along with their troops, have been trained for that day by one of the greatest soldiers of the British empire. More than that, our army has been planned and equipped by one of the ministers of this government who knows what an army ought to be, and who has created it accordingly.

The admiration and respect for the Canadian army which I met on all sides in Great Britain were based to some extent, it is true, on the reputation made by the Canadian corps in the last war, and I must say that every member of the Canadian army hopes that he will measure up to that standard. If he does, the Canadian army will take a leading part in the effort of the empire in this war.

While I was overseas I had the pleasure of being principally with English army units and in English schools, but I did get around to the Canadian army at various times. If I were to mention only one incident in particular it would be the three delightful weeks I spent with the regiment from the home town of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Ryan). That regiment was placed under, I suppose, rather strange circumstances. The boys were keen for battle and were prepared for it. Their morale was exceptionally high. May I state generally that the morale of the Canadian army was high when I went over there, and it was much higher when I came back, a condition I believe entirely due to the Dieppe raid. In that battle we found that the heroism of the Canadian soldier under the most trying circumstances is equal to any task he may be given. If there is one thing which does depress a soldier it is to find, after he has been completely trained, that he must spend a period of inactivity, during which time he is not being used in battle. Nevertheless when I say this, I am not saying that the Canadian soldiers in Great Britain are dissatisfied with the present condition. Each one, without exception, appreciates the great honour the war office has conferred upon him in saving him to act as the spearhead of the attack when we seek to liberate the peoples of Europe from German domination. That understanding of his ultimate goal and ultimate honour has made the Canadian soldier curb his impatience, and eager to train against that day.

Naturally when overseas I took the opportunity to compare the three armies, that of Great Britain, the United States troops which were present, and our own. I also had some time to see what the civilian population was doing, and if the house would permit I should like to tell briefly what I saw. The male civilian in Great Britain is either in war industry or medically unfit for that work, and is carrying on an essential civilian occupation. He is a member of the home guard and takes his turn at fire watching, checking blackouts and performing similar duties. As a member of the home guard he drills on at least one and sometimes two nights a week, and in the summer months from Saturday afternoon until Monday morning he is in the field with the active army receiving instruction in further defensive tactics. That is a weekly programme sufficient to test the strength of many people listed as category A in the active army. His duties, however, are increasing rather than diminishing, because each member of the home guard in Great Britain realizes that in a short time nearly all the armed forces of Great Britain and her allies will leave those islands, and that they will then have to defend themselves against possible German invasion.

The women of Great Britain are in war industries. They have replaced the men in civilian occupations, particularly those in the transportation systems. They belong to Red Cross organizations and more particularly to organizations distributing food and clothing sent from this country and the United States. So perfect is their organization that when a family is bombed out, but is fortunate enough to survive, although deprived of all their belongings, with the possible exception of the few clothes they may be standing in, within an hour or so, no matter what time of the day or night the bombing may have taken place, the family is placed in new quarters and supplied with a variety of clothing of the correct sizes and provisions for the coming day. This is done by married women who probably in the day time have looked after the children of other married women in war industry, have done some Red Cross work and have managed to keep their own households going. I can think of no contribution being made in this time of war equal to that of the married woman of Great Britain who not only works the hardest and is the lowest paid, but who is doing her work cheerfully, and in full realization of the dangers just across the channel. Therefore, if this afternoon I make some comparisons, I do so with a full knowledge of the great efforts being made not only by the civilian population but by the three armies of which I have spoken.

Having all that in mind, I should like to tell the house that from what I have seen the Dominion of Canada can be justly proud of her civilian war work as well as of the fighting qualities and numbers of her troops. We have overseas over 200,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen, and we shall have more shortly. We have another 200,000 under arms in Canada either in training for overseas service or on active service defending our country. To the very last day of the war we shall require a considerable number of them, to defend our coasts from Alaska to British Columbia and from the maritimes to Newfoundland, and shall have to keep troops in those localities. That is essential, and the duty they are performing is equal to any contribution that will be made.

I understand that last year our enlistments exceeded those of 1941. What is even more important is the fact that the enlistments of the last half of 1942 exceeded those of the first half. That is a record which this country did not have toward the end of the last war, and one of which we may be exceptionally proud.

It does not seem long ago that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) announced in the house his programme for the expansion of the Royal Canadian Navy. We now have 46,000 men and over 500 ships in the Royal Canadian Navy. The duty they are performing, if not greatly publicized in this country, is one which the people of Great Britain fully realize. They have a great appreciation of the protection afforded the transportation of food which has maintained that country. I do not know of any person engaged in war who undergoes a strain equal to that of the man serving in the navy. Those of us in the other services undoubtedly have moments of danger; but for long continued danger there seems to be none equal to that of the man who goes to sea over long periods of time and under a constant submarine menace.

In the Royal Canadian Air Force we have 150,000 men, a force which I believe fully justifies the planning in the fall of 1939 and justifies the hope of the Prime Minister expressed at that time that the training programme would expand and might very well be the largest single contribution of this country to the war effort. The Royal Canadian Air Force is now growing in the number of squadrons under its command, and in addition to that we have a great many men in the Royal Air Force. There is something exceptionally comforting in the knowledge of a fighting man that he has friends overhead in time of danger.

I understand the Royal Canadian Air Force has served on every front and at all times, and has performed the perhaps less glorious but nevertheless essential and important duty of going far out to sea in the protection of our coasts.

I understand that we have enlisted and enrolled over 700,000 people for military service in this country. On any basis of population we may wish to take, that is a record which will compare most favourably with that of any of our allies. In addition to this I believe we have over 900,000 people directly engaged in the war effort through the manufacture of munitions, and the like. Another 150,000 are engaged indirectly in the services essential to these manufacturing concerns. This makes a grand total of people directly engaged in the war effort in the Dominion of Canada of well over a million and a half. That again is a record of which we need not be ashamed. On the contrary, while pride is not expected of our own efforts, I assure you, sir, that all this is appreciated in Great Britain and by everyone there to whom I have spoken.

The speech from the throne indicates that this will be a session of post-war planning along with the maintenance of our present war effort, and in this connection I should like to say that one of the greatest things that we can do is to continue the close relationship that we have with the United States. We are greatly indebted to the United States for the efforts she has made in this war, and we shall be more indebted as time goes on. At the same time the United States is indebted to us for having maintained Great Britain with food and supplies from the fall of France to the end of 1941. In this mutual respect for each other's contribution lies the greatest hope for our future relationship, in particular in connection with our trade arrangements with the United States.

Some three years ago the people of this dominion were called upon to choose a leader for the coming four or five years. At that time many reasons entered into the choice, but I think there was one on which we all agreed, that is, that at that critical time in our history it was essential that we should have as a leader of this country some one who was well known and whose talents and honour were respected in the United States and in Great Britain. If that were true then, as it undoubtedly was, it is equally true at the present time, because in the post-war period, being among the united nations which will plan the future, Canada will need someone with experience and who is held in the same high regard by the nations which will make the decisions.

There has been some undue optimism about the duration of the war. There has been some quite sound optimism over the conclusion of the war, but it is unfortunate that many people, some of whom have the public confidence, have been making guesses as to the duration. This past summer the German army launched one of the greatest offensives in military history and caused grievous loss to our Russian allies and made great gains. If at the present time the German army is retreating and forfeiting most of those gains it is not due to the cracking of that army; it is due to the heroism and military wisdom of our allies and the material support which this country, Great Britain and the United States have given to Russia. There is no sign in my opinion of the German army cracking permanently, nor is there yet any sign of the morale of the German people cracking. We should carry on the war on that basis and with that belief.

As the war proceeds it will be inevitable that along with our allies we shall redeem certain lands now occupied by Germany. The north African campaign demonstrated that along with carrying on military efforts it is necessary to supply food for the civilian population, and this will be necessary with other civilian populations that we temporarily take under our control. Only the United States and Canada have the means to do this. It is fortunate that we have set up a joint committee of our agricultural departments so that we may work in conjunction with the United States.

It seems to me that despite the discussion this afternoon about our surplus of wheat, it is essential that we produce more food in this country, perhaps of other kinds, in 1943 and 1944. To do this it is necessary that the farmer obtain more labour than he has at the present time. I am sorry to say that in my own constituency the production of food fell off slightly during the past year. It would have fallen off more had it not been for the extra efforts of the farmers themselves. I know that this is a great problem, but I know that the government realizes its importance. It is a man-sized job, and I notice a man-sized man is taking care of it. But if my own riding is to be taken as a sample of rural Ontario, I assure the government that they cannot expect increased production unless some labour is provided for the farmers.

I do not presume to make suggestions to the committee on post-war planning, but I should like to refer to the great numbers of people in Europe who undoubtedly will want to come to this country when the war is over. Many look back upon the period of 1900-1910 as the period of greatest progress in the dominion, but many people said that we could not assimilate the people who came here at that time. After the last war there was a similar opinion that the large numbers of people who entered the United States could not be properly assimilated into their population. The test of both these worries has come during this war. Many of the people who came to this country from Europe and many of their descendants are in our armed forces, as great a percentage as the percentage of those who came from the British isles. The same condition obtains in the United States. I do not think we need to fear the coming to this country after the war of the people of various races. As has been said many times, we have exceptionally large quantities of raw materials which are awaiting manufacture and export. It seems to me that these can be turned to profit by creating a population here much larger than we have at the present time.

If I may, I should like to say what I think the Canadian soldier expects when the war is over, and I intend to give the thoughts of soldiers with whom I have been in contact for the past thirty months. He is fully aware that at the present time his pay and dependents' allowances is on as high a level, if not higher than that of the soldier of any other country. He knows the standard of living in this country is as high, if not higher than that of any other country. Therefore he expects that the income to himself and to his dependents will be on a like level. I know the government is well aware of this. I suggest, too, that pensions might be reconsidered because it may be that the present pension level does not bear the ratio it should to the pay and allowances.

However, when the Canadian soldier returns—I include also the Canadian sailor, the Canadian airman and all the women who have joined the auxiliary services—he will naturally expect his old employment back. We have provided for that by statute. But the house will understand that few soldiers who come back after three years of war will want to reengage in the employment they left. Their horizons have widened, and their ambitions are greater. They would like better employment and, without resentment, they hope they will get it. That is all that the Canadian soldier expects. His own talents are sufficient to do the rest.

I am very glad to see that social insurance occupies a prominent place in the government's programme. Our soldiers in Great Britain have learned that in Great Britain milk and fresh fruits are rationed to hospitals and children, and as a result the health of the children in Great Britain has shown a decided improvement. I suggest to this house that it should be our purpose to see that all children born in Canada have a sufficient supply of these foods at least so that the health of this nation will improve greatly within the next twenty years. It is surprising that with our good climate our health standard was not so very much higher than that of other armies of the world. It is a first essential that the health of this country should be improved, and may I make bold to say that if it requires the expenditure of public money, whether by way of subsidy to maintain the production of domestic foods or to purchase foodstuffs from abroad, it is our duty to provide the money.

[Mr. W. E. Harris.]

Mr. Speaker, we have demonstrated in this country that two great races can live side by side and progress so long as the minority respects the majority and so long as the majority is zealous to maintain the rights of the minority. That is a lesson which has yet to be learned in Europe, and it is a lesson which we should try to teach many peoples. Along with the United States we have shown that political differences do not need to interfere with mutual trade and mutual respect, and I am sure that our two countries can show that we have a higher standard of living on this continent and that we have also the proper approach to post-war planning.

In connection with many of the speeches one hears about democracy I suggest to the house what I said last year, that we represent democracy as it is known in Canada, and in our name there are going to be many sacrifices made this year. I hope, indeed I am sure from the past record of this house, that its deliberations and the decisions made at this session will be on a sufficiently high plane to justify the sacrifices which are going to be made this year, and those decisions I am sure will be directed to making a greater Canada, not for the sake of greatness, but because we can contribute something to the welfare of humanity.

Mr. MAURICE HALLE (Brome-Missisquoi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that, on the occasion of my maiden speech in this house, I second the motion which the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), my brother in arms, has just made with such ability and eloquence.

I believe the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. King), when he charged me with this pleasant task, intended first to pay a tribute to the electors of Brome-Missisquoi, who, in this war, as in the 1914-18 conflict, elected to this house a member of His Majesty's armed forces. In both cases, the people of my constituency, willingly forsaking their immediate interests, knew that by returning a soldier they would in all probability have to do without the services of their representative for an indefinite period of time.

Only a few hon. members of this house have been personally acquainted with the valiant representative of my constituency in 1914; but I am sure that every one of us has had the opportunity of admiring the splendid bronze monument erected near the entrance to this house to the memory of Lieutenant-Colonel George Harold Baker, member for Brome, commanding officer of the 5th C.M.R., fallen on the field of honour on June 2, 1916. On behalf of all my constituents, I have to-day the honour of publicly rendering to his memory the homage of our admiration, and his name will ever remain for us a symbol of patriotism and devotion to duty.

May I be permitted to add, on behalf of all the sailors, soldiers and airmen hailing from the picturesque valleys and mountains of Brome and the fertile plains of Missisquoi, that we shall have no rest in the present conflict, until the enemy has been vanquished again and we hope, rendered powerless to start another war.

The people I represent do not differ from the population of any other agricultural constituency; they are peaceful, industrious, frugal, loyal, slow to enthusiasm and anger; however, once they realize that they have to deal with a cruel and ruthless enemy, bent on systematically destroying all the free institutions which they respect and consider as being essential to life and happiness, this same people suddenly become warlike and thirst for vengeance and, for them, peace would henceforth be but an empty word, unless it were brought about by a victory as complete, as total, as the war itself.

Personally, I aspire to one thing only, the privilege and honour of being worthy of such electors and of such a predecessor as Colonel Baker.

Mr. Speaker, on many occasions since the outbreak of war I have had the privilege of meeting my electors, publicly and privately, in their homes or on my own farm, in workshops, in army camps, in places of amusement, at exhibitions and on the street. I have always made it a point to discuss with them the serious problems which confront us at this time and I am sure that I understand quite well their reactions.

I have had lengthy conversations with people who own prosperous farms and large herds of cattle, whose sons are in the army and who often must, together with their wives, their younger sons and their daughters, and with what little farm help is available, toil from five o'clock in the morning to eight o'clock at night in order to maintain their normal production or reach the output which is so earnestly requested of them by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Transportation facilities are very much curtailed, spare machinery parts are almost impossible to obtain, feed is expensive and scarce, amusements are non-existent, expenses are high while income is low, but nevertheless those farmers and their families have told me that they considered themselves fortunate to be able to make at least some contribution to victory.

I have talked with railroad men, who are numerous in my constituency, men who, night and day, on Sundays or week days, in fair or foul weather, and under conditions which are sometimes almost intolerable, are endeavouring to cope as efficiently as possible with the tremendous task of transporting the army, the civilian population, the war material and the ordinary trade goods, and they have assured me that, in their opinion, no sacrifice will be too great for the triumph of our cause.

On various occasions I have endeavoured to ascertain the opinion of the workers in factories and workshops, of merchants, civil servants, clergymen, barristers and physicians, and from all of them I have had the same reply: "We will do whatever is necessary to win this war—we will do our utmost."

A deep significance underlies those outspoken and gratifying utterances, for our people are not unlike others, and if they accept all the sacrifices requested of them, it is because they are firmly convinced that such sacrifices are absolutely necessary. Mr. Speaker, I wish to convey to this house the inner thoughts of my constituents, so that my fellow members may compare them with the feelings of their own electors, for provided a spirit of self-sacrifice in the face of the dire needs of war is shown from the Yukon to Nova Scotia, among French- and English-speaking Canadians and in the various classes of people, we shall then be able to assert unhestitatingly that such a population is united and shall never be vanquished.

The nefarious work of the axis powers has been described as follows by one of our church leaders, His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve:

> An attempt at world-wide destruction, morals of barbarous ferocity, a philosophy substituting greed for judgment, a despotic enslavement of all liberty by fire and sword, an atheistic cult glorifying brutal force and selfishness.

The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, realize more and more how this description carries no exaggeration with it and has now come to appreciate the fact that the future existence of our free institutions both Christian and democratic are at stake, perhaps for centuries to come. Surely, in such great peril, any thought of personal ambition and professional gain does seem futile and despicable. One thing now matters: national welfare—and I mean national as opposed to sectional interests.

Such is the first of the motives I had referred to, motives which prompt our people willingly to accept all sacrifices required of them by our leaders.

Such success as the leaders of enemy countries have attained until now they owe to their diabolical ability to instil into the minds of the unfortunate people under their domination a boundless faith in their nefarious doctrines. Against this powerful and fertile root of evil works, against this faith, if we want to win, we must set up a faith that is stronger still—a faith in liberty: political liberty, liberty of conscience, liberty of thought and action, all liberties which appear so natural to us nowadays that it took a long time and irreparable catastrophes for a great number of people to realize that civilized nations such as Germany, Italy and Japan had deliberately planned their destruction. Such is the faith in liberty which dwells in the hearts of our people.

War has taught us a great lesson in solidarity—that is to say that liberty is the common good of all peoples—and that should one nation have its liberty taken away we are immediately threatened with the loss of our very own. Without liberty for every people on earth, peace is unthinkable, and without peace can there be no question of true liberty? If we would continue to enjoy peace and liberty we must suppress once and for all time every source of aggression and domination. We must immediately devote all our efforts to that one end. We must cease right now wasting our vital energies in futile and dangerous demands for advantages which in final analysis are but the normal consequence of the liberties enjoyed in common by all Canadians.

Such are the principles which inspired our gallant Canadians at Dieppe with the courage and heroism which they so brilliantly displayed. The opposite principles are those which inspire certain exponents of theories having nothing whatever in common with the successful pursuit of the war. Fortunately, their subversive ideas find no adepts among us, for the people I was referring to a moment ago and who, in their humble sphere, endeavour to cooperate to the best of their ability in the common enterprise, who willingly accept more and more sacrifices for the sake of victory and who were telling me there was nothing they would not do, are quite convinced that the present struggle is directed against principles which are destructive of all freedom, against totalitarianism, that is, against the absolute negation of what we claim to be our rights as free men, as free partners in the task of establishing a Canadian nation.

[Mr. Hallé.]

Such is the deep conviction which makes it possible for them to carry stoically the growing burden of taxation, the material restrictions in ever increasing numbers and the prolonged absence, sometimes without hope of return, of some members of their family.

Those who see in the present conflict nothing but a struggle for commercial or territorial gains are greatly mistaken. Our foes' ambition shall not be so easily satisfied. They aim at something far more dangerous to our national life, for there is no secret about the axis plans and they are in every way opposed to our national aspirations.

A new order would be established all over the world, in Canada as elsewhere, an order wherein there exists no room for liberty as we understand it. When liberty is mentioned before us, we immediately visualize a sacred and fundamental privilege which the Canadian people have cherished above all else ever since the beginning of their eventful existence and even before ever having set foot and settled in the New World. It has been said, as a matter of fact, that the vast majority of settlers who left France for Quebec in the 17th century did it from a love and spirit of freedom and to escape the growing encroachments of an absolute government. They loved freedom and liberty more than riches, more than security, more than life itself.

Ever since they settled in Canada, there followed a ceaseless struggle for self-government and a minimum of interference from Metropolitan France and the Sovereign Council. One need but read the history of Canada under the French regime to realize the marked difference already existing at the time as between Frenchmen and Canadians. The French considered Canada as a crown property and meant to be its undisputed masters. The Canadians claimed that this was their homeland and in their non-cooperation policy they went as far as to refuse to wear the king's uniform. The government authorities had even found themselves compelled to describe the Canadians under the name of "habitants" instead of "subjects," the latter term applying only to Frenchmen temporarily residing in the colony. When they waged war, and they were efficient soldiers, they did so alongside France and as Canadians, not as Frenchmen. That struggle was still going on in 1759. I believe that my English speaking fellow-citizens should ponder the fact that even under the French rule, we were inclined to have our own way.

The English rule which prevailed at the end of the 18th century and the political evolution of the 19th century did not bring about any change and to-day a similar touchiness is evidenced among the various classes of our population. That is why, at the beginning of this war, and probably on account of the fact that it seemed impossible, nowadays, to witness the disappearance of freedoms we had gained through the course of time and by dint of hard struggles, it has seemed that the French-speaking population considered the present conflict as just another imperial venture conducing solely to more favourable geographical arrangements and to trade adjustments.

However, our church, government and military leaders; I mean our real leaders, Lapointe, Godbout, Power, Cardinal Villeneuve, Mgr. Charbonneau, Vanier, Leclerc, Panet, LaFlèche, to mention only those that readily come to my mind, those leaders, I say, were quick to tell our people that the present conflict is a total war threatening the political, social and moral institutions of all countries of the world, without excepting Canada or the province of Quebec; a war which is the most serious challenge to our civilization based on human freedom.

Our population then realized that it had the same reasons to oppose Hitler as had heroic Russia who now amazes the world by its marvellous courage, its incredible tenacity, its military prowess and its victories. The time had come for the axis countries to meet on their destructive march another people prizing freedom above life itself. My constituents greatly admire the Russians and the same feeling is noticeable in the ranks of every unit of the Canadian army.

The history of the world shows very clearly that American countries are privileged. All but a very few were founded and have lived in freedom. They have not, as Russia, been forced to tear down before rebuilding. To them freedom comes as naturally as the air they breathe or the rays of the sun that give them light and comfort. If they are generous at heart, and who would claim they are not, they should lead the fight for the rights of a free and Christian world. That is exactly what our town and country people understand and which gives them the courage to face the difficulties of the hour.

In October, 1942, I was permitted, as an observer, to be present at the American army manoeuvres in the state of Tennessee. In a few weeks, I soon learned the extent of the common aspirations and convictions of the nations of America, how well the gigantic and planned effort of Canada in this war was valued and admired, and also what the Americans will expect from us when our troops finally come into contact with the common enemy. I also became gradually aware of the real meaning of the expression: brotherhood of nations, for the American is truly the brother of his Canadian neighbour.

I was very much impressed by the rapidity with which that great nation built its military and economic organizations, but what impressed me most was the following opinion expressed by a sergeant of the American army:

> When every free man will understand that his mind be in unison with the mind of those who give their lives for liberty on the battle fields, when every free man will understand that the main goal of all free men calls for the same fervour, the same perseverance, the same firmness and the same toughness that we find in our armed forces, it will then be the beginning of the end of the war, not before.

I sincerely think, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people have reached that stage and when the moment is ripe for action, nothing will stand before them. Speaking for my comrades overseas and myself, as I shall be with them in a few days, may I express the wish to witness that hour very soon.

The French speaking Canadians of my riding have gone through the same evolutions of thoughts and sentiments as their English speaking neighbours, and it is with joy and pride that they have learned of the steps personally taken by the Minister for National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to give them, in the conduct of the armed forces of our country, a share proportionate to the increasing number and experience of our French speaking soldiers. Accordingly, we have witnessed the creation of infantry brigades, artillery regiments, and I am proud to be in command of one of them, battalions of engineers, tank regiments, army service corps and signals, hospital and field ambulances, of one bomber squadron, also of camps, naval stations and training schools for sailors, soldiers and airmen of French language, in command of French speaking officers. This task is carried on every day; but for its final achievement we still need the unanimous and unreserved support of all my French speaking fellow-countrymen, including those who are at present more worried about post-war conditions than about the efficient pursuit of the war itself.

I can only mention here the complete co-operation existing between the officers of the two great races of this country. Indeed, this valuable cooperation is maintained between all the races found in the armed forces. I want to mention this fact because it seems to be ignored by some of my compatriots. In my estimation, it is no overstatement to say that owing to the direct influence of the Minister of National Defence, the problem of the French-speaking minority has become practically non-existent in the Canadian army. I wish to thank him therefor publicly. He may be assured that this new measure of unity will have a strengthening influence upon our army.

I have spoken so far on behalf of my electors, who, I know, share the views of Canadian citizens in every other section of Canada. I have also spoken as a soldier—and here again I am convinced that both the soldier and the civilian have but one object in view —victory. Before bringing my remarks to a close, I wish to say how gratified we felt upon hearing that immediate provision is to be made, in order that the post-war period may be one of well-controlled readjustment, because both the members of our armed forces and the civilian population are somewhat apprehensive, and justly so, at the thought of the difficulties they will have to face.

We do not need any inside information, Mr. Speaker, since the Casablanca meeting, to realize that the war is coming to a climax. Our Russian allies are hurling back to the border the German armoured legions. Rommel has been driven out of Egypt and Libya. Tunisia has become one of the world's most important battlefields. Japan is ready to pounce again in the Pacific. In western Europe the rumble of approaching battle is in the air. The Dieppe raid was a double warning, a warning not only to the enemy but also to us; for the breaking into the occupied continent will exact a heavy price from us, no less than it will inflict punishment on them. In Great Britain our Canadians who have until now been playing a defensive role are being transformed rapidly into an army of assault. In Canada the people are being told to brace themselves for less food and more work. I have shown that they are ready for this. On every side and in every way we are turning out for the fight to a finish. As this climax draws nearer it is well to ask ourselves this most important question: Is our present leadership equal to the task? Speaking for my constituents and for myself, speaking as a soldier in the Canadian army, I say to the government: Go on with the good work. We feel that every single minister in the cabinet is doing a great job and doing it in the right way.

I have only this to add. Many of us in Canada and overseas have as yet done little or nothing for victory. Some of us are better off than we were before; some of us are even working less than we used to and being better paid for it. It is unlikely that we shall be lucky enough to get off, in the end, as lightly as we have done so far. We have a lot of slack to take up, not only in rations and privileges and money, but in physical sacrifice as well.

It is well to remind ourselves, as the climax of the battle of freedom approaches, that this government will demand from us greater endurances and sacrifices than most of us have hitherto suffered, or even contemplated. Unless we count that cost, we are paying less than our share of the heavy price of victory. But we are all ready to accept it. All we need is for this government to go on telling us what to do.

On motion of Mr. Graydon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

JOINT DEFENCE PROJECTS

EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES AS TO POST-WAR DISPOSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in English and French, an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States, dated January 27, 1943, relating to the post-war disposition of certain defence projects, installations and facilities constructed in Canada by the United States.

To carry out joint plans for the defence of this continent, and to facilitate the transportation of war materials to fighting fronts, the Canadian government has agreed to the stationing of United States military units at certain places on Canadian territory. This is part of the same programme of war-time co-operation which has resulted in units of the Royal Canadian Air Force operating from Alaskan bases.

In carrying out the defence programme, moreover, arrangements have been made whereby the United States government has supplied materials for, or has defrayed the cost of, the construction of a number of projects, installations or facilities on Canadian soil.

The arrangement under which this programme has been effected is of a purely wartime character. It is not contemplated that the contribution which the United States is thus making to the common defence will give that country any continuing rights in Canada after the conclusion of war. Indeed, with regard to most of the projects that have been undertaken in this country by the United States, agreements have already been made which make the post-war position completely clear. An example with which hon. members will be familiar is to be found in the text of the exchange of notes providing for the construction of the Alaska highway.

In order that there may be no possible doubt as to the principles to be followed in the post-war disposition of the various defence projects to which the United States has contributed, the permanent joint board on defence recently recommended that the two governments approve a formula which would state these principles in clear terms. The formula which was proposed by the defence board was examined by the two governments and was approved by both. It has now been embodied in the exchange of notes I am about to table.

An examination of the notes will make it apparent that the agreements with the United States do not prejudice in any way Canadian post-war liberty of action. I ought to add that I am informed by those most directly connected that with respect to these projects, not only is Canada free from any post-war commitments, but that we have not at any time been asked by the United States to enter into such commitments.

The terms of the exchange of notes will make it clear that should Canada undertake to contribute to the joint defence by constructing installations or facilities in Alaska or elsewhere on United States territory, the same principles would reciprocally apply.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if he intends to have these notes printed? How will they be distributed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be advisable to have the exchange of notes printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day. A similar statement is being made at Washington this afternoon. That was my reason for being anxious to make to the house to-day the statement which I have just made.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the Prime Minister if what he has said in reference to the Alaska highway applies also to the roadway being built from Peace River to Providence? The United States at the moment are building a roadway north of the Peace river through a place called Notikewin to Providence, on the Mackenzie river. Does the same agreement apply? When the war is over will they retire from there also?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It applies to all projects, which relate to the war, which the United States installs or constructs in Canada during the period of the war.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF CANADA

EXTENSION OF TERM OF OFFICE FOR FOUR YEARS FROM JANUARY 7, 1940

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend an act respecting the Chief Justice of Canada.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to extend for four years from January 7, 1940, instead of for three years, as had been provided, the term of office of the chief justice.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1930—JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMEN'S DOMICILE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

He said: This bill has been on the order paper now for two sessions under public bills, and as public bills have not been dealt with for the past two sessions it remained as it was. Before introducing it two sessions ago I discussed the bill with the late minister of justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and after considering it he pronounced it proper legislation and legislation that should be passed.

As the Divorce Jurisdiction Act stands now, an applicant for divorce must bring the action in the province in which desertion takes place. For instance, if a British Columbia man marries a girl in Ontario, takes her back to British Columbia, and there deserts her, she may be obliged to return to her home in Ontario. She has the evidence which would entitle her to a divorce but she must go back to the province in which she was deserted in order to bring action. The proposed amendment will enable the applicant to bring action in the court of the province in which she is domiciled, provided that she has lived in that province for two years or more.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

VISIT TO OTTAWA OF REPRESENTATIVES OF MONTREAL DISTRICT AIRCRAFT WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to make an inquiry of the Prime Minister with respect to a matter that has come to my attention this afternoon. Some thirty representatives of Montreal Aircraft Lodge No. 712, covering a jurisdiction of about twenty thousand aircraft workers in four plants in the Montreal district, are in Ottawa, and from conversations I have had with them I rather think the situation there has deteriorated to such an extent that I am compelled to ask the right hon. gentleman if he will be good enough to make some intervention in the matter so that in the national interests the position will not become worse. I make this request in all sincerity of purpose because in my opinion it is greatly in the national interest that the Prime Minister should see these men and perhaps intervene so that the situation will not develop into something which will be detrimental to our war production. I wonder if he would give consideration to this suggestion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend and to hon. members of the house that at this time of war there is of course no more important service, next to that performed by our armed forces, than the continuous production of war industries in this country, and wherever it has been possible to do so, I have done my utmost to help to further both these large objectives. With respect to the specific request of my hon. friend, that I should of my own initiative, I take it, see some members of the aircraft industry, employees who are in the city at the present time, I would say to him that, as I am sure he will understand, in matters of this kind I have to consider not merely the immediate situation but what may come to be looked upon as the course of procedure which is to be the regularly recognized and adopted one. The Department of Labour is the department of government which primarily has to do with industrial disputes. I am aware that some members representing employees of the aircraft industry were in the city on Saturday of last week and that others were here to-day. On Saturday I communicated with the Department of Labour to ascertain what steps were being taken towards conferring with these representatives. I was told at the time I communicated that three or four of the representatives were then in conference in the Department of Labour with one or more officers of the department and that consideration was being given to their representations. I believe it is also true that the matter to which my hon. friend has referred is one which comes in part at least within the jurisdiction of the regional board which is located at Quebec, and I understand that an officer of the Department of Labour has been in Quebec, and possibly is there to-day, looking into the situation.

I should like to have it understood and known that if it is necessary for me personally to intervene in industrial disputes it must be only after the matter has been carefully considered by the cabinet as a whole. I cannot as Prime Minister, with the obligations I have to meet, much as I should like to be able to be of assistance, undertake to meet delegations that come to the city to discuss industrial disputes. Moreover, there is, I think, reason why the greatest possible caution should be exercised in having the government as a government intervene in any dispute which it is possible to have settled between the parties themselves, or under the machinery which is provided by the government.

I will carefully consider my hon. friend's request, but I have to make it clear that all these matters should follow a line of procedure which is definitely known and which has been framed with a view to facilitating adjustments.

Mr. GRAYDON: My information is that this suggestion is made only after other avenues of approach have been thoroughly explored. May I also point out, in case the Prime Minister is under any misapprehension as to the basis of the dispute that in this instance it is not a dispute between employers and employees. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is possible for him to give any undertaking that the question will come before the cabinet, if he is not able personally to intervene.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have pleasure in saying that I shall see that the matter is considered immediately by the government. As a matter of fact, it has been before the government already.

REPORTS AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if his attention has been called to the reports of large numbers of persons unemployed in the city of Winnipeg, many of whom have been laid off from plants engaged on war work. What steps are being taken by his department to deal with this serious situation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter for the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest that to these eight thousand people who are reported unemployed in Winnipeg the matter is urgent?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The subject matter of my hon. friend's question has received the consideration of the Department of labour for some time. It is true there are registered in Winnipeg some eight thousand unemployed men and women—I speak from memory—of whom five thousand are women, largely made up, I am informed as a result of the registration, of married women. It is also a fact that work has been continuously available in the Winnipeg district for able-bodied men, in the bush, in the mines and on the farms. Only this morning the regional superintendents of the unemployment insurance commission were in my department when the whole matter was discussed, and we are rapidly working out a solution. Since we tackled the problem, fifteen hundred women have been transferred to the east, and we expect to be able to transfer some of the men. My hon. friend, who comes from the city of Winnipeg, cannot but know of the difficult times we have had there in the past, particularly with single men. I think it is fair to say that many of these unemployed men are of a kind that you get in every country in the world, many of them near the unemployable class, which in itself presents a difficult problem.

With respect to the women, for some months past the armed forces have been recruiting many women for the navy, the army and the air force. That is an avenue of approach to employment at this time.

Not only in Winnipeg but in other large centres of population in this dominion, by the very nature of things there are the seasonal conditions with which we are confronted at the moment, causing what might be called pockets of unemployment. The Department of Labour is working in close cooperation with the Department of Munitions and Supply in an effort to place these people where they can be most useful.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS

CONSTITUENCY OF STANSTEAD—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): I should like to direct a question to the government. In consequence of a motion moved by the Prime Minister on July 30 last, the committee on privileges and elections was asked to fix a date for the election in the constituency of Stanstead, Quebec. Has this committee reported on the matter, and if not, will the next committee be compelled to do so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The committee to which the Stanstead election was referred did not make a report before the conclusion of the last session. The committee on privileges and elections will be reconstituted as soon as the debate on the address is concluded, and I purpose, as soon as it is reconstituted, to move to refer to it the matter of the Stanstead election, which comes under controverted elections.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I shall have the sympathy of most hon. members of this house when they realize the trepidation with which the average member of parliament first of all makes his maiden speech in this house, and then—which does not happen to so many—makes his first speech as leader of the opposition. As I said on Friday, I approach this undertaking with great humility. It marks the commencement of a new task, in a new field, and under almost entirely new auspices.

In opening my remarks I shall do something which I had intended not to do, namely, extend congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Halle) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Lest this should be taken as a precedent, may I say at once that having sat in the house for seven years, I think I can conscientiously condemn the practice of filling Hansard over a period of some two months, with congratulatory remarks to the two hon. members who have made their contribution in moving and seconding the address in reply. But I should like to make an exception on this occasion, because we had as mover and seconder two members of the armed forces, and I want not so much to congratulate them as to pay tribute to what they represent in our national life and what they mean to every one of us.

I have also a personal note to sound with respect to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), who was an old school chum of mine. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I approach more mature years, we like to recall those who were our friends in the past.

I am sure I echo the thoughts of hon. members generally, when I say that there is another very good reason why I should mention these two hon. members. I should like to associate myself with the principle that we cannot do too much in these times to create and foster unity between the great French-speaking and English-speaking sections of our population. I have been as fortunate, I believe, as most hon. members throughout these years in having had many close friends in both groups in this house. I wish to pay tribute to both of them, and I do so on this occasion by saying a word of congratulation to the mover and seconder, although otherwise I would not have followed the practice which has been traditional.

I think if we are to add to the prestige of this chamber, a number of things similar to the customary congratulatory remarks which are merely traditional, which mean very little and which sometimes embarrass those to whom they are addressed, might very well be dispensed with. There is no better time than the present to start to sweep away some of the cobwebs of the past and clear out some of the underbrush, particularly in a war-time session of parliament.

The Prime Minister and members of the house generally will I think be interested to hear some declaration from me as temporary leader of this party in the house as to the policy of the official opposition in the house during this session. If I may say so, I do not think any hon. member will deny that throughout the years in which I have occupied a seat as a private member here I have always avoided narrow, old-fashioned, mean and petty partisan politics. At least I have tried to do so. And I have no desire on this occasion or on any other to depart from that well-established personal principle. Today, when Canada is fighting for her very life, is no time for stress to be laid upon any artificial divisions. Surely that is fundamental. Our duty, I think—certainly I conceive it to be mine—is to treat every man, whatever his political views may be, as a Canadian first, last and always. For I say to the Prime Minister in all sincerity: we must not forget that this government is our government, the government of the Canadian people, and that it is charged with exceptionally heavy and exacting responsibilities, particularly in time of war. The new Progressive Conservative party, which at the moment I am leading, will try earnestly during this session to avoid unnecessarily dogging the heels of the present incumbents of office while those incumbents are engaged in the serious business of winning the war. This nation and this empire have too much at stake for us to play any little games while the enemy threatens us all.

Lest anyone mistake declaration of our intentions for a blanket approval of misconceived policy, misguided administration, or inefficiency and waste in the carrying on of the war effort, I desire to make it clear that where we feel it is in the national interest to do so, and for that reason and on no lesser grounds, we shall criticize constructively and meet the policies of the administration in head-on collision. Of scarcely less importance than the government itself, is His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. My conception of the duty of that opposition during a time of war centres in an insistence upon clear and practical principles, effective and adequate measures designed to bring about a full-out effort to win the war, and a meticulous audit of governmental expenditures. If there be one thing above all others an opposition should endeavour to do, either in peace or in war, it is to ensure that every dollar collected from the taxpayers of Canada is expended without waste. That, we as an opposition shall try to do this session.

I have tried, as I am sure all other hon. members in the chamber have tried, to maintain some ideals in public life. There may be some who will joke about ideals. There may be some who will lightly spurn the idea of men in public life having principles. Sometimes our ideals and principles may become clouded by the issues which confront us, but I really believe that every public man must have ideals and that they must be high ideals. One of the ideals which I think must permeate all of us, every man in public life and every party, is complete willingness to render service to our country and our people. Once the ideal is accepted, the opportunity to render the service will come just as surely as night follows day. I do not apologize for having some ideals in public life. If we are to have an effective democracy, one that is worth fighting for, we should not be ashamed to proclaim certain high ideals to the men and women throughout the country who are asking us to give leadership.

For a good many months in Canada, a new progressive and aggressive movement has been growing among the common or garden variety of people, like those of us here in this House of Commons. I do not want the Prime Minister to misunderstand any expressions I may use, but it is obvious that for some considerable time there has been in this country a lively dissatisfaction with certain aspects of the present administration. In all fairness to the Prime Minister and to the government I may go further and say that very often in war time a government may be condemned as much for its good deeds as for its bad deeds. Nevertheless the fact remains that the masses of our people have been trying to find a voice to express their protest against the present administration, other than through that which sponsors a socialistic state in Canada. I say that with no desire to reflect upon the personalities of those who sit to my left. In a young nation like this, where people desire to retain initiative and individuality, and crave freedom from too stringent government controls, it will be readily seen why a new movement should have taken root somewhere between the dissatisfaction that exists with respect to the government on the one hand, and the failure to act on the part of those who have been most vocal in their protests. The new Progressive Conservative movement, which began many months before Port Hope, found its voice at that conference last September. No doubt the proposals adopted at Port Hope were startling to many people in Canada holding old ideas. But they formed the basis of a new charter for the common people of the dominion. It was no old-line party manifesto. It was no ivy-covered political structure. Rather it was a spearhead, giving expression to a rapidly-growing public sentiment not confined to any single political party but drawing its adherents from all.

The choice of Hon. John Bracken, then premier of Manitoba, at the Winnipeg convention, was the natural result of this people's movement. The policy laid down by that convention at Winnipeg further exemplified the extent to which the demands of the common people were being appropriately met. The new movement led by Hon. John Bracken represents an honest attempt to find a satisfactory solution of the major problems which face this country in a war-time period, and which will require solution when the war draws to its close. If there is one thought above another I should like to leave with the house this afternoon, it is this. Whether or not hon. members agree with the programme and policy which was approved at the Winnipeg convention, there can be no doubt of the sincerity of purpose of those who advance that programme at this time. We may be proved wrong; we may be proved right. But those considerations do not matter quite so much as the fact of our honesty in advancing and promoting this programme.

There will be some who will think in terms of political yesterdays, and who will facetiously raise some question respecting the double name of our party. We are not ashamed of the alliance indicated by our party name between the Progressives and Conservatives. More than that, may I say that for a long time I have not been interested personally, nor do I think the people throughout the country are greatly interested, in artificial party labels. In the final analysis the new Progressive Conservative movement will be accepted or rejected by the people of Canada, not on the basis of the label it wears on the sleeve of its coat, but on the basis of the service it gives to the dominion and the ultimate results achieved.

It has long been advocated that a strong opposition makes for a stronger government. Most people in Canada believe that the unmistakable strengthening of our party throughout the dominion has already achieved results which in extent are almost amazing. Within the period of a few days after the close of the Winnipeg convention, which called for better financial treatment of members of our armed forces and their dependents, the government effected changes which in the main were a reflection of the policy our party adopted—and I congratulate the government upon that action. The call by our new leader, Mr. Bracken, for the adoption of a system of parliamentary under-secretaryships has met with some results, as indicated in the speech from the throne. It may be, of course, that the Prime Minister's answer will be that great minds think alike. But it is good to be the first great mind, the one that begins thinking ahead of the other one.

The emphasis laid in Winnipeg upon active social pioneering in Canada has also met with some response in the speech from the throne. That response may be feeble, but at least we have the honour of recognition. Measured from every other angle the Winnipeg convention was a successful war-time achievement, and one which has been beneficial to the whole of Canada.

I come now to another subject which is of grave importance to all of us. Since the last meeting of parliament the Canadian troops have gone into action in the much discussed Dieppe raid. Having no reason to constitute myself an arm-chair critic with respect to army strategy and tactics, I shall leave for others the privilege of discussing those matters. But this afternoon on behalf of the party I lead in the house I do wish to pay tribute to the courage, the valour and the bravery of our men under what to many of us, who perhaps do not understand military tactics, seemed almost insuperable difficulties.

Canada emerged from the last war heaped with honours won on the field of battle. Her first contest with the foe on land in this war has brought to one of our greatest Canadian soldiers, Lieutenant-Colonel Merritt of Vancouver, no less an award than the Victoria Cross itself. Many other officers and men received high awards and decorations for valour on that occasion. Dieppe at least displayed to the world that the same quality of Canadian soldiering abroad which added so much to the prestige and reputation of Canada in the last war, has been well maintained, preserved and promoted in this one. I pay that tribute to Canada and to her fighting men.

In recent days the news has come of the momentous meeting at Casablanca of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt. I should like the Prime Minister in his address to make clear several important points arising from the Casablanca meeting. Perhaps if he has time this afternoon he will be good enough to answer these questions, because to my mind it is of the utmost importance that the public should know the answers. The questions are these:

(1) Was the Canadian government kept fully informed of the course of the discussions, and consulted with respect to the decisions reached?

(2) Is the Canadian government a party to the decisions arrived at, and does the government fully concur in those decisions?

(3) Was an invitation extended to the Prime Minister to attend this conference?

(4) Has the government advocated to any or all of the united nations the setting up of a supreme war council, in which all the allied nations shall be represented, so that there may be coordination of the efforts being put forth in this common cause?

[Mr. Graydon.]

I believe the Prime Minister will at once agree upon the necessity for such a council; or, if such a council is not possible—and there may be many reasons which it may not be proper to state as to why it is not possible—would the Prime Minister indicate whether there is any prospect of the setting up of an empire or imperial war council, so that a closer liaison may be maintained between the various members of the British commonwealth of nations?

It would seem to the public generally that closer coordination of the war effort throughout the world must be achieved by the united nations. It is a necessity which becomes more apparent every day. Such a supreme war council, or a master plan for the defeat of our enemies, would instil into and induce a great measure of courage among our people. And, Mr. Speaker, unity in war time would be followed by unity in peace time, a consideration which I suggest is of grave importance at this moment.

What is the position with respect to our own armed forces overseas? I would ask the Prime Minister to give an answer this afternoon to this question. I am going to warn the government at this stage that only in the rarest circumstances during this session, and only when we are dealing with the most confidential matters will the official opposition stand idly by and allow the government to hide behind five words which are well known throughout the country—"not in the public interest". I know that certain information the government has cannot be divulged because it might give comfort to the enemy. But in many instances where no comfort would have been given to the enemy by disclosure of the information sought, the government has nevertheless hidden behind those five words.

I know the Prime Minister will not feel badly if I say that throughout the country the words "not in the public interest" have become almost a joke. I heard a story the other day and I think perhaps it is true. A lady was giving evidence in one of our Ontario courts. When the crown attorney asked her how old she was—I am sure the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) would have known better than to do that—she replied, "I am just thirty years of age." He said, "You gave evidence in this court five years ago, and I have it on record you said then you were thirty years of age." She replied, "There is nothing wrong about that, because I am not one of those who say one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow." When he pressed the question and asked her point blank just what her age was, she replied—evidently she was an omnivorous reader of Hansard—"It is not in the public interest to give the information."

We must be given all information that is not of a strictly confidential character. Let us understand that it is the public of Canada who are paying the shot, and they have a right to know what is going on and how their money is being spent. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister in his address this afternoon to give the public full information as to how our present military requirements are being met. Has our army sufficient men overseas, and have we sufficient reinforcements to maintain our military strength at what it should be? I want him to give the facts and the figures on that point. As the session progresses we shall expect to have unfolded a further man-power plan. The whole problem of man-power—I say this guardedly and advisedly—has never been tackled courageously by this administration since the war began. The Prime Minister has been good enough to accept many of our policies; he should not be disturbed if I ask him to accept another. Here is the policy that was adopted by the Progressive Conservative party at its convention in Winnipeg on December 11:

> Recognizing that the world struggle in which Canada is engaged requires a total war effort, we believe in compulsory national selective service, and that all those selected to serve in the armed forces should be available for service wherever required. We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance,—

I ask some of my friends to my left to listen to that last word.

> —as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about so far as human means can achieve it, an equality in sacrifice.

Others of our party will perhaps deal more fully with the question of man-power and our armed forces than I intend to do on this particular occasion. It can scarcely be gainsaid that the government's policy on man-power has failed. There has been no courageous, no determined and no effective plan for a complete and scientific utilization of our man- and woman-power since the war started. There has been no master plan. There has been no coordination. Indeed, it seems to me from watching affairs in the house that industry, agriculture and the armed forces, instead of working in coordination, have actually been in competition with each other for the man- and woman-power available in Canada.

The selective service policy, while it was pretty long in promises, has been pretty short in performance. Its enforcement, especially in recent days, has been weak and timorous. The lack of a master man-power plan in Canada has had a disastrous effect, and has contributed in no small degree—this is the sad part of it—to the weakening of our general war effort. The haphazard, hit-or-miss system which has been followed throughout these critical years has resulted in a drift from agriculture into war work, and enlistment in the armed forces, thus creating one of the most dangerous problems in connection with food with which Canada has ever been faced.

Actually there are many to-day in rural districts who believe that we will face an agricultural production crisis in Canada in the months that lie ahead. In war time the necessity becomes apparent of every man and woman in the dominion doing the job which will enable him or her to make the maximum contribution toward the winning of the war. In this connection the responsibility of leadership rests very largely upon the government of the day. The failure of the government to adopt and to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man and woman power stands as a serious obstacle to a full national effort at this time. It is late, and much of the damage has been done, but there is still time to retrieve some of the losses. I plead earnestly with the government to deal with this matter immediately and with determination. The omission from the speech from the throne of any measures to meet this urgent national problem is hard to understand, because the crisis is here.

I should like to preface my remarks on the subject of labour with a strictly personal note. Labour and agriculture have been responsible for my election to the House of Commons on two successive occasions. I have, I believe, a clear perspective of the problems of the working man and his family. I believe it is essential to have a personal understanding of those who comprise that great section of our population. I have been fortunate in having lived in a working man's district in my home town, and I still continue to do so. So that when I speak of labour I speak of it not in theoretical terms; I speak of the working man as a neighbour of mine. The working man is a loyal and constant friend of those whom he trusts, and he realizes very quickly and very well those he can trust. His lot has not been what it should have been through these years, and in my opinion he has not enlisted the degree of sympathy and understanding in public men and the public at large to which he is justly entitled. Those of us who have pleaded his cause through the years in parliament have done so in the full knowledge that if ever a section of our population needed active champions in the legislative halls of Canada, it was the working man. Far too often his efforts to band together with his fellows for the purpose of seeking justice for himself and his family have been misrepresented and misunderstood. Never let me hear any intelligent body of public opinion say that labour in Canada is dangerous. I deny that. Labour has never been dangerous to any true democratic principles, and if I know labour it never will be.

Leading the opposition for the first time, it gives me no small amount of satisfaction to raise my voice in the House of Commons as a champion of labour; and more than that, it is not a new experience for me to do so. Nothing pleased me more than to see the stand taken by the Progressive Conservative party at the Winnipeg convention. If I may refer again to that—in the hope that the Prime Minister will be listening—this is what it says:

In order that free enterprise may be retained as the economic system best calculated to provide stability, prosperity and security and as a necessary part of that system that freedom of association and organization may be guaranteed to workers and in order that confidence may be restored between industry and labour and that sound labour relations may be established, this convention recommends:

I think I had better call this to the attention of my friends to the left.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which ones?

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, as far as I know, all of you had better get under this umbrella. I want to point this out particularly to those who sometimes suggest that they are—which I deny—the special champions of labour:

1. Uniform labour relations shall be established throughout the dominion by dominion-provincial agreements, appropriate legislation, or by vesting jurisdiction in industrial labour matters in the dominion.

2. Collective bargaining is desirable and necessary in the interests of labour, industry and the social welfare of the people.

3. Workers shall have full freedom of association, organization and designation of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment and, when requested, employers shall be required to bargain collectively with their employees.

4. Well-defined machinery shall be established for the election and certification of the agency which is to be entitled to represent employees in collective bargaining negotiations, where there is a dispute as to the collective bargaining agency.

5. Discrimination against any employee or prospective employee on account of his activities in respect of any labour organization shall be prohibited.

[Mr. Graydon.]

6. The Department of Labour shall establish a comprehensive conciliation service for the prompt conciliation of disputes.

7. A national labour relations board with equal employer and employee representation and with a chairman appointed to represent the public interest shall be created, such board to be judicial in its functions and leading to the establishment of a well recognized labour jurisprudence.

8. Industrial disputes which cannot be conciliated or otherwise settled, shall be referred for decision and report to the national labour relations board whose hearings shall be public.

9. The national labour relations board upon complaint received or on its own volition shall have power to investigate any labour organization or employers' organization to ensure that its activities are not prejudicial to the interests of its members and do not interfere with the democratic right of men to work, and that they are not prejudicial to the national interest, and that coercion or domination of any labour organization or its members does not exist.

10. Labour shall be accorded representation upon governmental boards and commissions—

I shall say something further about that in a moment.

—which deal directly or indirectly with matters concerning the interests or welfare of workers.

11. Governmental encouragement and assistance should be given to the establishment of labour-management production committees in the interests of maximum war production and permanently sound labour relations.

12. Adequate holidays with pay shall be granted to employees where applicable.

The people of Canada of course have become uneasy over the restlessness of labour in certain industries; but too many of them are anxious to lay all the blame on labour. Let us be fair about that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Hear, Hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad I have one supporter, at any rate, in that quarter of the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are all here, not over there.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then they had better speak up now. In any freezing arrangement, injustices and inequalities may readily be extended rather than adjusted. It is the duty of this government—and with great deference I suggest that that duty is not being discharged—to see to it that the causes of restlessness, sometimes ending in concerted action, shall not be allowed to exist or continue. I call upon the government to alter its policy with regard to labour, and to adopt and carry through a rational labour policy which will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful position as one of the major partners in Canadian democracy.

I come now, sir, to another of our very important national activities, one which presents many of our thorniest problems. There are many in rural Canada to-day who feel that Canadian agriculture is actually one of our war casualties. The surplus products, excluding wheat, which were so widely heralded in peace time have now become a thing of the past in many sections of rural Canada. Is it not, Mr. Speaker, a shocking thing to contemplate that in one of the world's greatest agricultural producing areas, ration cards should be used for butter, with some hint that rationing of beef is to follow? I think I need do no more than simply point out the fact. Is it not a shocking condition of affairs? Every butter ration coupon that is handed to a grocer to-day is mute but irrefutable evidence of faulty planning by our agricultural and our war-time prices boards. I suggest to the Prime Minister—I hope I am not making too many suggestions to him—that he drop into a few rural homes in Canada, talk to some of the farmers' wives and see what they say of a plan which requires not only consumers to have ration coupons before they can get their butter, but the farmers' wives as well. I ask the Prime Minister to get the right point of view with respect to that. I am sure it must have escaped his attention; otherwise he would not have allowed a thing of this kind to be done. It is one of the most monumental examples of lack of government foresight that we have had in Canada for many a long day.

Someone has said that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel, but certainly rationing is the last refuge of governmental inefficiency. I should have thought that the conditions existing in agriculture to-day would have so greatly concerned the government that the speech from the throne would at least have mentioned it. Apparently, however, his excellency has been wrongly advised in the only advice which his ministers have given him. They have told him—and this is our plan for agriculture; this is what we are going to do for the farmers—that they have begun to explore the situation. Well, exploration is a good thing, but you have to have something more than exploration for agriculture just now. The speech says that the government—> —have already begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war.

It will not be very good news to the farmers of Canada if this means that the war must cease before these injustices are remedied. The farmer has felt, at any rate a good many of them have told me, as they have told other members of this house, that he is the forgotten man in Canada's economy. I am sorry that we are not remembering the farmer, more particularly in the speech from the throne.

When prices were frozen for the purpose of avoiding a spiral of inflation in Canada during this war-time period, that policy actually froze, so far as agriculture is concerned, an inequality in national income, in a way which left agriculture no longer in a position to make its proper contribution to our war effort. We should regard the production of food in much the same way as we regard any other sort of production of war materials. If it has been so regarded by the government, then agriculture has been treated differently from other types of war industries. From the beginning of the war until now, experienced labour on farms has gradually but surely disappeared. It is almost a thing of the past to get an experienced man for farm work. I do not know where you will find such a man; certainly you will not find him where I come from, and I do not think you will find him in any other area in Canada. The ceiling price on wholesale farm products has operated in many instances towards a reduction in the production of necessary agricultural commodities in Canada. I do not think hon. members, particularly those who come from rural sections, need to look into dry statistics, to establish the fact that farmers in the aggregate are receiving a ridiculously low and inadequate share of the national income. As a matter of fact, over thirty per cent of the population—for that is what agriculture represents—has less than fifteen per cent of the national income diverted to it.

It is, I think, a mild statement that there is grave dissatisfaction in rural Canada at the moment. It is all very well to say that the prices of farm products have gone up. Of course they have gone up in some instances. But I say to the Prime Minister that it is not a healthy thing for the Canadian farmer to pick up his newspaper and see the striking difference between the price he receives for his cattle and his hogs and that which his American farmer cousin across the border is receiving in the Chicago and Buffalo markets.

Right now the government's programme is of course for greater production in some lines of agricultural commodities, but the farmer looks with grave concern upon that appeal. Last year we were unable to meet our agreement with Britain, in certain periods in any event, so far as bacon and eggs were concerned; and meat and butter are now providing a serious shortage problem in the domestic field. The farmers, through their organizations and individually, have from time to time, since the war began, called for a reasonably long-term agricultural production policy. How many times must it be pointed out to this government that the farmer cannot plan for to-morrow with only a policy laid down for to-day? That is putting it in bold terms.

Subsidies have been paid; but in many instances they have not been paid in time or they have been too small. Because of that, pressure has been put upon the ceiling from time to time, and encouragement has almost been given to a black market.

Without making a blanket criticism of the wartime prices and trade board, which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) champions—he is watching me carefully and is noting every word I am saying on this subject—I think it is fair to say that its operations, so far as they affect farm products, have fallen far short of success. While the price ceiling programme has its advantages, a method of price control which results in shortages otherwise avoidable, endangers in my opinion the whole principle of the programme itself. The bald fact is that the farmers are belligerently dissatisfied with the present administration of the programme by the wartime prices and trade board. Having this well in mind, the government, in my opinion, would be well advised, and I strongly urge them, to set up without delay a food ministry in Canada. It would appear that only by this change of policy, for which there are examples in Great Britain and the United States, can there be any hope for a coordinated plan of production and distribution of farm products.

The wartime prices and trade board is not adequately equipped in its membership to handle efficiently these two problems, which automatically, if not officially, come within their jurisdiction—that is, production and distribution. It could never have been intended that the operation of the wartime prices and trade board should reach so far into the realm of production and distribution of the products of the farm. In my opinion, time must not be wasted in making this change if an abundance of food is to be produced for the varied requirements of a country at war. Looking further ahead, it seems to me that unless this problem of agricultural production is tackled now we are going to be faced with an even more serious problem than that of wartime shortages itself.

Our great leaders have said that when this war is over, we, with the other great producing countries of the world, will be under obligation to feed a war-torn hungry world to which peace will have come. If we do not develop our agricultural economy and production in such a manner as to enable us to do that, are we playing fair with the countries to whom we have given that guarantee? We must have some plan for agriculture, and prepare it at once, which will meet the conditions which lie ahead. I believe I voice the opinion of a great majority of the farmers of Canada when I say that the government has failed to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

Before leaving agriculture I want to make another suggestion. I shall not enter into any extended discussion this afternoon with respect to wheat; that can come later. But I do wish to mention a significant Canadian press dispatch which was carried in many of the papers this morning, emanating from the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at Calgary on Saturday last. It indicates that some improvement in the liaison between the agricultural organizations and the government is required. For that reason and for no other I read the following item:

Farm federation protests Ottawa's 1943 grain policy

Calgary, January 31.—Delegates to the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture observed one minute's silence at their closing session Saturday in protest against the federal government's action in announcing its 1943 grain policy before consulting representatives of organized agriculture.

Main point of the announced wheat policy provides for the maximum delivery of fourteen bushels per authorized acre for the 1943-44 crop at a basic price of ninety cents a bushel.

The convention also sent protest telegrams to Prime Minister Mackenzie King, Agriculture Minister Gardiner and Mr. MacKinnon.

The wire said delegates regarded the action "as an indication of the government's intention completely to disregard the viewpoint of organized farm producers of Canada."

It said further that for the past two years directors and officers of the C.F.A. had met with the Prime Minister and government members immediately following their annual meeting. "This has provided an opportunity for farm representatives to bring before the government the considered opinion of organized agriculture from coast to coast dealing with its problems."

The telegram added:

"On previous occasions the Prime Minister and members of the government have stated that they welcome the presentation of our views. . . . We believe that at no time in the country's history has the need been greater for the closest possible cooperation between government and people.

"This will be impossible to attain if government creates impression that it proposes to ignore reasonable representations of organized producers.

"If the 1943 food goals as recently announced by Canadian government are to be met, some upward revision of the income from grain should be considered."

Without going into the policy in detail or expressing an opinion on it at the moment, I raise the point for the purpose of showing what organized agriculture seems to think about the necessity for a closer liaison between the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the organized activities of agriculture itself.

In dealing with the reference in the speech from the throne to national social insurance, I shall not have much to say at present except this: I was surprised to note that the policy with respect to national social insurance, one of the most important problems injected into the dominion political arena for many a day, has been given to a select committee of the house to determine. Perhaps the Prime Minister will be able to explain it—I know he will be able to explain it; whether successfully or not is the only question—but I should have thought the necessary legislation would be brought down in the form of bills, as has been done in the past, the bills, fitting as they would into a national plan, then to be referred to a select committee for review and report back to this house. I think the government should have presented to the house and to the country a policy of national social insurance, rather than leaving it to a committee of the house. I may be wrong in the assumption, but I know there will be a great many people in Canada who think the way I do. This would not by any chance be the answer, would it?—that there was no time after the adoption of the social security programme at the Winnipeg convention for legislation to be drafted for submission to the house? I leave the question with the Prime Minister, because it naturally arises and perhaps offers the explanation of the existing situation.

Having regard to the situation that has arisen out of this reference in the speech from the throne I think a great national plan for Canada is essential, a plan which will guarantee to all our citizens freedom from fear and from want. The less time we take to reach that objective the better for all of us. Right now democracy is going through a severe testing time. Democracy must show that it can meet modern conditions by the use of modern remedies. There is no reason under the sun why this democratic state cannot be in the forefront of world reform, and show the other systems, sometimes so highly praised, not only that they are not as good as ours but that they fall far behind the results that democracy can and will produce. We shall not be satisfied in Canada until we have worked out, not merely as good a plan of social insurance for our people as exists elsewhere, but the best there is in the whole world. Our citizens deserve it, and the government must recognize their deserts.

The Progressive Conservative party has taken a definite stand with respect to several points in connection with national social insurance. I should like to take a moment to read one or two of those points:

1. Every person able and willing to work must be assured of gainful occupation with sufficient means to maintain a home and family. The objective is full employment at fair wages under progressively improving standards. We oppose relief as a substitute for work.

2. For the achievement of that objective—full employment at fair wages under progressively improving standards—and for the welfare and development of society, we strongly advocate the strengthening of the basic Canadian tradition of individual initiative and individual enterprise and opportunity, and the freeing of economic activities from bureaucratic controls. Government authority, however, should be maintained and exercised wherever necessary to protect primary producers, workers and consumers from exploitation through such abuses as price-fixing combines, monopolies and patent cartels.

To those ends we believe that government should seek to create conditions under which the maximum volume of employment and the maximum national income may be assured through the initiative and enterprise of the people themselves.

3. It is the duty of the state:

(a) to maintain at high level the income and standard of living of the individual citizen, whose interests must always be paramount.

(b) to maintain the principle of private initiative and enterprise.

(c) to initiate, undertake and control projects of public and national benefit in those fields in which private enterprise is precluded from serving or is unable to serve the public interest.

4. Consideration should be given to the problems of the workers-on-their-own who comprise a large percentage of the people of this country and who lack the benefit of organization to protect their interests—the small retail merchant, the man or woman in services of various kinds, such as the carter, truck-driver and taximan, the odd-jobber, the handyman and the salesman on commission. Recognition must be given to their enterprise and initiative and to their threatened security and a way found by properly constituted authority to protect their interests as essential workers, consumers and taxpayers.

5. (a) Youth should be educated, trained and given equal opportunity to equip themselves for life.

(b) Those of working age should be provided with ample opportunity for adult education.

6. We believe that the reconstruction of post-war Canadian economy must be based upon the following principle set forth in section 5 of the Atlantic Charter:

> "Fifth: They desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security."

A social security programme, the adoption of which we advocated, would include in a unified system:

(a) Unemployment insurance;

(b) Adequate payments for the maintenance of unemployables;

(c) Retirement insurance;

(d) The payment of increased old age pensions, at a reduced age, until such time as the retirement insurance scheme becomes fully operative;

(e) Adequate pensions for the blind;

(f) Adequate mothers' and widows' allowances.

7. We advocate the appointment of a Minister of Social Security and Reconstruction, charged with the administration of social security in this country.

8. The state's share of the cost of the social security system should be borne by the dominion.

9. We recognize the obligation of government to make available to every citizen adequate medical, dental, nursing, hospital and pre-natal care, and to further advance public health and nutritional principles so that health may be safeguarded and preserved. This programme is to be financed under a contributory system supplemented by government assistance.

I think it would be of interest to the house and to the country also to have repeated here a paragraph from the nation-wide address of our leader, Hon. John Bracken, delivered on December 21, 1942; it is pertinent to the subject under discussion. Mr. Bracken said:

Every human being that is born into our society has a right to feel that he is welcome in it; that he has a share in Canada; that he is a member of the Canadian team, with a part to play in it, as a citizen in his Canada; that he will be expected to make the most he can of his own life and to make the maximum contribution he can to society; that he is entitled to a job and will receive a reward in relation to his enterprise, and that, in the event of old age, ill-health or other misfortune overtaking him, he will have the assurance of a reasonable standard of social and economic security.

All these minimum standards, however, guaranteed as they may be, are not sufficient. I believe on this occasion I should raise my voice on behalf of the industrial workers across Canada who have one thing very clearly in mind, and justly, I think; that is, if we as a country are able to keep the wheels of industry turning in order to destroy people and property, we must see to it that we keep the wheels of industry turning to provide goods which are not destructive in character, for the peace-time happiness of the people of the world. No matter who may be administering the government at the time, one thing is abundantly clear, namely, that the worker who is now employed must be kept employed when this war is over, making consumer goods instead of the destructive goods of war. Such work will be just as necessary and just as urgent then as the work in which these men are now engaged. The worker must have the guarantee that the days of the dole, of relief and of national charity for him are over; that in a new plan our people will have work and will have wages, with good standards of living and happiness, under a democratic system, so that the war shall not have been fought in vain.

Something else must not be forgotten. There are hundreds of thousands of men and women in the armed forces of our dominion, both overseas and at home. Are we thinking of them? To-day these men and women are inarticulate so far as our public affairs are concerned. We do not hear much from the man who has donned a uniform, for very good reasons; but what is he thinking? When the war is over, his thoughts are going to crystallize into one or two very pertinent questions which will be asked of all of us. One of the questions he will ask when he takes off his uniform will be this: "While I was prepared to sacrifice life and limb if necessary for the maintenance and preservation of a democratic system which I thought worth while, what did you do at home which would measure up to a reasonable approach to equality of sacrifice?" Our plans must be so comprehensive and far-reaching that not one of these men, by virtue of having worn a uniform, shall, when he comes back, be in an inferior position, either financially or as to opportunity, than he would have been had he continued in civilian life. Rather he should be in a preferred position, and that must be part and parcel of our plan. If these objectives and many others are not attained, we may yet win the war and fail to win the peace. In the interests of a civilized state and in the interests of democracy it is important that the serious thought and consideration of the government, and of every person in this country, should be directed to what I think is this most worthy and most essential end.

I come now to a matter which has to do with those of us in this chamber; that is, the question of the position of parliament. The War Measures Act gives a somewhat new complexion in a war-time period to our parliamentary procedure. The enabling powers which the act confers upon the cabinet are, I take it, primarily intended for the purpose of meeting emergencies which may arise in the course of the war. Once the government has these powers, I fancy the temptation is great to use them more abundantly and more frequently than was originally contemplated. The result has been that while, theoretically, parliament is still in control—and I think no one will argue against that—for all practical purposes the position of parliament has deteriorated considerably from its peace-time position with respect to legislation. Few will argue against the enactment of the War Measures Act. I have heard no one question its enactment, but I have heard many question the use to which the measure has been put.

It has been my opinion that it is right and proper that the government should have extraordinary powers in an extraordinary period. But let us examine the manner in which legislation is to-day enacted. Only a comparatively small trickle is ever offered for the attention of parliament. Practically all of the major legislative changes in the past three and a half years have been brought about by order in council, sometimes when parliament was sitting, and sometimes when parliament was adjourned or prorogued.

The cabinet, however, has gone much further. It has allowed its boards, controllers and administrators to do a little legislating on their own, as well. With the situation we have to-day where, I ask, is the boasted supremacy of parliament? Theoretically, it is supreme, yes; but is it in practice? I ask every hon. member to examine the position. As a private member I had difficulty myself in trying to keep up with the legislation. How many hon. members have the time either to read or to digest the great numbers of books and gazettes containing war orders and regulations? I venture to say that if I were to take a poll of the cabinet I would find that even they are not entirely conversant with all the legislation that has gone through. How then do they expect private members in parliament to be in a superior position?

We must watch most carefully that this trend does not increase. I know the Prime Minister has been most anxious to avoid the growth of certain customs and practices throughout Canada, but this is one custom or practice on which he had better keep an eye, himself. While perhaps in some instances there may be justification for a situation of this kind, we must watch that it does not get out of hand.

If legislation is to be passed by other than the people's representatives in parliament, then it seems only fair that great sections of our population—groups, if you like—should have adequate representation upon these new boards and new bodies which are to pass our laws.

Let us look at the cabinet. I draw the attention of the house to its personnel. Let us look them over. We find that nineteen men hold portfolios. Bearing in mind that labour and agriculture are two of our most important classes of citizens, let us see how they are represented in the cabinet which sits across the way. Well, the closest approach to a farmer among these nineteen men is, of course, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have heard it said that he was a much better school-teacher and politician than he was a farmer, even in his palmiest days. I hasten to add that I cannot subscribe to that extreme view.

Then, turning to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who, by the way, laughs at the moment at my reference to the Minister of Agriculture, we can say that the only representative of labour among the nineteen members of the cabinet is a man who was once closely identified with labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: And still is.

Mr. GRAYDON: It appears there is one man in the house who says he is—and that happens to be the Minister of Labour himself. We know that in recent years he was an employee of the present government and, if one were to listen to at least some branches of organized labour, it would seem that he does not voice the views of labour quite as accurately as perhaps he should. I have such high personal regard for both of the gentlemen I have mentioned that I hesitate to go further in my criticism. I call the attention of the house to this condition only to emphasize the fact that in war time and through the medium of the War Measures Act we have here a group of men who are doing much of our legislating. They are doing extensive legislating for farmers and working men across Canada. Is it any wonder there is much restlessness among these two groups, when they see the inadequate representation in the cabinet, or representation much less than that to which they are entitled? I do not make these observations with the thought of casting any reflection upon other members of the cabinet. This is entirely a question of occupational differences. I must point out, however, that unless this condition is changed, unless more responsibility is given to those who actually represent the people, and so long as this inadequate representation of these two great sections in our community continues, we are going to pay a big price, a dear one, in the days ahead.

I shall not discuss in detail the various boards and public corporations, but I might be permitted to refer to two examples in order to show what is happening. Since the wartime prices and trade board is perhaps best known, I shall deal first with it. This board functions actively under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). It is a board consisting of ten members, including a chairman. Occupationally they run all the way from a leading banker to a former university professor who, I might add, is perhaps the nearest approach to an agricultural representative on the board. So far as I can see, however, labour is not represented. I ask this question: who comprise the great consumer population in Canada if it is not the working men and their families? Because production, distribution and consumption are to a great extent controlled by the board in a fashion which affects the everyday lives of these two great classes in the community, surely from an occupational point of view there should be a different set-up on the war-time prices and trade board. There are some excellent men on the board; I shall not make a single comment about any one of them. But I do urge that from the occupational point of view much is left to be desired, if the board is to hold the confidence of the producers—yes, and of the consumers in our country.

I now come to an organization which is the subject of discussion of people throughout the country and sometimes of hon. members. I refer to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Here is a body which ministers, or should minister, to the needs of the people I have mentioned. The majority of its listeners are to be found in those areas where working men and their families abound, and in the rural areas of the dominion. It is controlled by a board of governors, the personnel of which includes, first of all, its chairman who is a trust officer. Its vice-chairman is a motion-picture man. There are on the board two men of the church as well as an authoress and, I believe, three lawyers. During last session the radio broadcasting committee brought down a report to this house, in which report the board of governors was censured. I believe the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) will corroborate me in this. They were not censured as much as I should have liked to see them censured. I think they should have been asked to resign. However, everyone did not see as I did, and the result was that they were not specifically asked to resign. Even at that, I think the hint should have been good enough.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not with salaries like that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to say that they get high salaries, because I do not think they do. That was not the point I was trying to make. When they came to appoint a new general manager, these nine members of the board of governors could not find anybody in the whole eleven and one-half million people in Canada to appoint except one of their own members. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) can now make his interjection about the high salary paid to that official.

The report of the committee went further and asked that on the board there should be adequate representation of farm and labour. Where is it? When Doctor Thompson left the board a vacancy was created which has remained ever since. No working man has been appointed to the board. When great authority is placed in the hands of government owned corporations, the government should be particularly careful about the composition of the boards from occupational and other points of view. This care has not always been exercised.

I ask the government to give consideration to a policy which will bring back the supremacy of parliament once more, not just in theory but in practice, in order that some abuses which apparently have grown up shall not be allowed to continue and to extend. For quite a long time a clamour has arisen from all parts of this house for a better distribution of work. That clamour has not arisen just from one or two members on a certain side of the house. It has not been confined to any one political party. It echoes pretty generally the feeling all over the house that appropriate use should be made of the membership of the House of Commons, to say nothing of the embarrassing position in which the members of another chamber find themselves during this time. If the government's policy for the efficient use of man-power is demonstrated by the way in which it uses the man-power in this and in another chamber, then I think some criticism must be offered of this master man-power plan.

There is another matter which has been in my thoughts for a long time. As members of the house we have a responsibility which perhaps we do not always shoulder, which perhaps we do not always realize. With every ounce of emphasis at my command I say that we should try to elevate the prestige of this chamber to a point higher than it is to-day. If we are to be proper instruments of democracy, we should so conduct ourselves in this chamber—we are all sinners in this regard and what I am saying applies to myself as well as to other members, but that should not stop me—that the men and women who fill these galleries, whether they be from the farming sections, whether they represent labour, or more particularly whether they represent the branches of our armed forces, may be proud of the proceedings of the chamber. This is more important now than it has ever been.

I have a feeling that in many instances people do not go away with that thought in their minds. If democracy is to approach perfection, I think we must go a long way yet. There never was a time in the history of Canada when the people watched this chamber more carefully and with more interest. Everything we do, everything we say is recorded in the minds and in the thoughts of great sections of our people. I ask the Prime Minister and you, Mr. Speaker: Can this chamber meet that test at the present time? If it cannot, then we must see that it does meet that test no matter what reorientation or changes may be necessary. It is essential for the strengthening of the democratic state in this dominion.

There are many reforms which members of this house could suggest. I cannot agree with the answer given to me last Friday by the Prime Minister when I asked for a modernization of the rules and procedure of the house. He said that we should not do it in time of war; but it does not make any difference whether we are at war or at peace, the obligation faces us. We cannot delay in bringing this chamber to the point where it will be an exact and perfect reflection of the men and women across Canada whom we represent. I am so completely convinced of this that I hope you will accept my apologies for being so vehemently insistent. This chamber should be the reflection of a great dominion, but is it the true reflection that we would want it to be? That is a challenge which we have to meet. We are anxious to contribute wherever we can to creating a condition whereby this chamber will be a more exact reflection of what the ordinary man and woman across Canada expect in their representative body. Therefore I say to the Prime Minister and the government, let us be very careful how we conduct ourselves in this house. All of us make mistakes. Perhaps, being an amateur as leader of the opposition, I shall make more mistakes than a good many others. But whatever mistakes we make, let them be honest mistakes. The people of this country do not mind mistakes, but they want to know that when they are made, they are made with good intentions.

In Great Britain the prestige of parliament is high, because the leaders have kept it high. Perhaps there is no closer relationship anywhere in the world between parliament and people than in Britain to-day. I do not wish to make comparisons between our own house and the British House of Commons, but we have an example over there which we should try to emulate. I should like to see the Prime Minister and all members of this house make every possible effort to measure up to what is expected of the parliaments of the British commonwealth of nations.

I like to think of that peerless leader of Britain in this period of war. I like to think of the prestige he has given to the British house, and of what he has done for public morale in his own country and others which are fighting along with it. I recall the closing words of the British Prime Minister's speech in the spring of 1940 when he assumed the leadership of that great nation, at a time when it looked as though the whole world were collapsing, when it seemed as though democracy were about to perish from the face of the earth, when Britain seemed in imminent danger of invasion. With the thunder of battle overhead, without a shudder, without a shiver, with the grim determination and courgae for which he is noted, he lifted the British people, yes, he lifted the world, and he uttered a challenge which will go down through the halls of time and should, I believe, find an echo here:

> We shall defend our island, whatever the cost may be. . . . We shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and streets and in the hills. . . . We shall never surrender, and even if, which I do not for a moment believe, this island, or even part of it, is subjugated and starving, then our empire across the seas, armed and guarded by the British fleet, will carry on the struggle, until in God's good time, the new world, in all its strength and might, sets forth to the rescue and liberation of the old. . . .

That, Mr. Speaker, is the challenge I leave with this parliament—with the Prime Minister and all of us—to see to it that the kind of leadership which produced that statement and built the morale of Britain shall be given by members and leaders alike in this House of Commons. I ask every hon. member to think carefully and seriously of our duty and our obligation as the people's representatives.

I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, that the following words be added to the address:

> "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (a) to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man and woman power:
> (b) to adopt and carry through a rational labour policy which will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful position as one of the major partners in our Canadian democracy: and
> (c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the new leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), at the outset of his remarks, stated that he thought he would have to ask hon. members for their sympathy because this was the first occasion on which he has addressed the house as leader of the opposition. May I say to my hon. friend that I think all members of the house will agree with me when I say that they envied him his facility of utterance and of constructive criticism rather than of feeling that he was in need of any sympathy.

As one who has gone through the experience which my hon. friend is having to-day, I have quietly been recalling some of the sensations which I experienced at the time; and I must say that I should feel happy indeed if I thought I had made as good a presentation in my first effort as leader of the opposition as he has made to-day.

However, I do think he has fallen into one or two of the errors which I myself fell into at the time—no doubt, due to a certain immaturity and lack of experience of the way in which parliament views some things. One of those mistakes, I would say, was that my hon. friend had far too many grievances in his first presentation to the house. He rather spoiled his address by seeking to cover all the ground at once. And may I say that I think he devoted far too much of his time to the Winnipeg convention. I believe the country is still much more interested in the war, and the effective prosecution of the war, and more concerned that parliament should devote its time mainly to those considerations which are vital as respects the war, than it is in the platform which was drawn up by my hon. friend and his friends at Winnipeg and its presentation in this house. However, I do recall that when I was leader of the opposition, I had a feeling that it was part of the duty one owed to one's party to see that its platform was spread out on Hansard in as extensive a manner as possible, since that was one way in which it was easy for members of a party to see that all parts of the country were supplied with copies of the platform at the country's expense. I imagine my hon. friend has had that consideration in mind himself to-day.

Mr. HOMUTH: A part of our platform is now in the speech from the throne.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my hon. friends have taken about twenty-five years to catch up with the party on this side of the house in some of the policies which they are advocating to-day, and they are quite welcome to any satisfaction it may give them in seeing some things which they have been recently advocating set forth in the speech from the throne.

In that connection, may I say that I do not regard it as an entire misfortune that all the parties in the house to-day should be taking a more profound interest in questions of social security than some of them have in the past. If that were not so, I should think that some of us at least had failed entirely to appreciate what is really fundamental in the great struggle which is taking place in the world to-day. It is a struggle which, above all, so far as the allied forces are concerned, aims at the preservation of freedom and, along with that, at a social revolution which will see that more in the way of equality of opportunity and more in the way of freedom from want and from fear shall become the lot of the great mass of mankind.

I appreciate very much my hon. friend's reference to the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He said that he did not altogether like the fulsome praise that is indulged in at the beginning of sessions with reference to speeches made by mover and seconder, and he thought it was just as well to get rid of some of these traditions that have grown up. I am quite in agreement with him on the question of fulsome praise; but though I may be Liberal and not Tory in my sympathies, I am not prepared to say that I should like to get rid of all tradition. I think tradition has its place, particularly in the affairs of parliament, and I believe that the tradition which permits to members on one side of the house an occasional opportunity to say something that is pleasant to those opposite is a very good one. I do agree with my hon. friend, however, that the speeches which were delivered by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Hallé) were exceptional in many particulars. They were exceptionally well delivered, and they were exceptional also in what they contained. I have read through both speeches since we heard them in the house; and I believe that, considered from the point of view of what, in a time of war, it is appropriate and most helpful for a member of parliament to say in the House of Commons, it would be impossible to find their equal in any speeches delivered on the address at any previous time.

I believe that this House of Commons was particularly proud to see two of its members wearing His Majesty's uniform, one coming from the old province of Ontario and the other from the old province of Quebec, addressing the house at this time of war, at the opening of the session, using the words which they addressed to all who were here assembled. My hon. friends were right when they said that their selection was not a compliment merely to themselves, though it might well have been so merited, nor merely a compliment to their constituencies, which they were kind enough to suggest that it also might have been, but that it was first and foremost intended as a recognition of the service the armed forces of our country are rendering to Canada and the cause of freedom to-day. Not only that, it was also a recognition of the number of the members of the house who to-day are serving in the armed forces of Canada. We may all be proud that so large a percentage of the membership of this house is composed of men on active service at the present time.

What I felt most about the speeches of my hon. friends was that each brought us very close to the armed forces and to the services which they are rendering. One hon. member had just returned from England; both are going overseas very shortly. Their addresses brought home to all of us, I think, in a more intimate way than would otherwise have been possible, the magnitude and the perils of war and the service being rendered not to our country only but to the world through Canada's war effort at this time.

Their speeches also, I felt, helped to remind us of the unity which our country has happily preserved through these trying times. Each of these speakers spoke wholly irrespective of the province from which he came, wholly irrespective of the race from which he is descended, wholly irrespective of his own native tongue. They spoke solely as Canadians, and in speaking as Canadians, they reminded us of the spirit which underlies the service of our men abroad, and which was so well expressed by Abbé Sabourin when, in giving an account of the spirit with which the men who served at Dieppe entered upon that great reconnaissance, he said, "We went there not thinking of our faith, not thinking of our tongue, or of tradition; we went there thinking of Canada, our country which we were seeking to defend, and the cause of freedom which we were championing at that time."

Members on all sides of the house will rejoice that that spirit of Canadian unity underlying the services which are being rendered at this time has been made so manifest and clear in the first speeches that have been delivered in this house.

There was one other thought that came to my mind as both hon. members spoke. It was what they felt service in the armed forces had afforded members of those services in terms of a wider outlook. It was apparent from their remarks that, in their opinion, service in the armed forces had an effect upon all who had enlisted, in enlarging their outlook, in giving them a greater appreciation of common human needs and, in association with that, an enlargement of the expectation of what should await them when the war is over. In other words, they made clear to us that, while they are fighting at the front to help to preserve our country and our freedom, they have a right to expect that those in this parliament, those who remain behind in this country, will so conduct its affairs that when they return to Canada they will find a better condition awaiting them than has been possible heretofore at any time. Both have given us in their addresses the keynote for the discussion which we should have in this parliament during the session. If we can follow the example which they have set of avoiding recriminations, of stressing the real significance of this war and also the importance of the post-war period; if we confine our discussions along those lines, our service will be one which will long be remembered and appreciated by the country.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition began and concluded his own remarks by reference to ideals in public life, and maintaining the prestige of parliament. May I say that with all that he said of that as an objective I am in most hearty accord. I think I can say in the presence of all who are here that in the twenty-seven years I have been a member of this parliament I have from the beginning sought, so far as it lay within my power, to maintain the highest traditions with respect to parliament and its proceedings. I think that, in the years when I was the leader of the opposition, some seven in all, and in the years I have been leader of the government, now nearly sixteen, I have throughout done the best I possibly could to maintain a high tradition with respect to public life, both within the halls of parliament, and on the platform in the country.

Perhaps my hon. friend while making that appeal did not altogether consider that in some ways it might have seemed to be a reflection upon the members of this house. The other day my hon. friend the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke of his effort to maintain high traditions in debate and decorum in the house, and I said I thought he had succeeded in setting a good example in that respect, although all of us, as my hon. friend said, are liable at moments to slip a little. But I do maintain that if one contrasts the proceedings in this parliament with those of any other legislative assembly on earth, they will be found to compare favourably with those of other assemblies.

My hon. friend referred to the British House of Commons, a noble institution. It has maintained high standards; but I submit that any one who has followed the discussions in the British House of Commons, even in this time of war, will have observed that, in many particulars, they have been more acrimonious than has been the case with discussions that have taken place here. And as far as comparisons with what takes place in congress or elsewhere are concerned, I think this House of Commons can stand on its own feet without fear. However, I am pleased that my hon. friend is going to do all in his power to see that this high standard is maintained, and I shall certainly do what I can to cooperate with him toward that end.

My hon. friend asked me to speak on a large number of subjects. I had rather made up my mind that I would follow a different course this session if possible; that I would not make speeches that were too long. I have been criticized a great deal on that score, and I must say as I listened to my hon. friend to-day I began to see that such criticism may be very just. Therefore I hope he will not expect me to answer to-day all the questions he has raised. But at the appropriate time during the course of the session I shall do the best I can to give him the information he wishes.

He spoke at considerable length of what he referred to as dissatisfaction with the administration. He spoke more particularly of dissatisfaction with what is sometimes referred to as a growing bureaucracy. My hon. friend referred to it in different connections. He referred to it in speaking of the Winnipeg programme. He referred to it as a departure from responsible government because of the powers given to boards, and the orders passed under the War Measures Act.

No one deplores more than I do, and I am sure hon. members in the house generally do, that, in a time of war, it is necessary to establish boards to do what responsible ministers in time of peace are able to manage without such additions to the administration. But in times of war it is simply impossible for ordinary government departments to hope to administer the different policies that have to be carried out except with the aid of boards of one kind and another to assist the ministers.

My hon. friends opposite have changed their attitude very much toward the government in that particular. I remember in the first year of the war, and even up to late in 1941, we were being told over and over again that what the country wanted was not political control in matters pertaining to the war. What they said was wanted were independent bodies, bodies that would be free of political control altogether. The leader of the opposition of the day was continually saying that the administration was seeking far too much to control matters. Look at the financial papers of the country and see the extent to which they, at that time, were saying that the government was keeping the administration of all these matters far too much in its own hands; that we ought to have experts, leading men in industry and business throughout the country, enlist them in the service of the government, give them a free hand and not interfere with them, allow them to act independently.

But now that the government has enlisted very large numbers of business men and business experts in the administration of war affairs, my hon. friends say, No! no! these gentlemen should not be allowed to administer these things. The government ought to take into its own hands the control through the responsible ministers who are the heads of the different departments; in other words, there should be more in the way of political control. It is easy to criticize, but I ask hon. members to place themselves in the position of the administration in dealing with war affairs. I submit that the only way in which it is possible for the government to carry on in time of war is to have allied with it in matters of administration such organizations as are necessary, organizations improvised in connection with carrying out the affairs of the administration. That does not mean that the government or any minister of the crown ceases to be responsible for the administration of affairs; the responsibility must always rest on the ministry.

In order to bring home more clearly to hon. members what I have in mind, may I say that when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), dealing with the affairs of his department, has made the appointments of the military authorities, which he thinks are necessary and best, the generals and other officers who have command on the military side, he is still finally responsible for any mistakes which they make. The last thing, however, he would be expected to do is to be continually interfering with those who have been given a particular task to perform on the field of battle.

It is exactly the same with respect to the ministry in relation to the other departments which have to do with the administration of war affairs. The government's responsibility lies in appointing men whom it can trust and giving them the authority to carry out their duties with as little interference as possible. If the government were to be continually interfering in the day-to-day administration, it would be impossible to secure men who would be prepared to serve.

I am not trying to excuse the faults that I know exist in human nature. It is impossible to get any organization of men and not find among the number some who will be arrogant, some who will be carried away with an exaggerated sense of their own importance, some who will do most absurd, ridiculous and arbitrary things. As these men are discovered I agree they should be let out of the administration, one by one, as rapidly as may be possible. But looking over the men who to-day are giving their services to this country as experts assisting the government in the administration of our war effort, I do say that it would be very difficult to find in any country a body of men rendering finer service.

The word "bureaucracy" is one that catches the public fancy; it is a word used very freely. But let me ask about the present position. A bureaucracy is usually understood as being a body of public servants who are permanently secure in their positions and therefore able to take an autocratic attitude. Are the men who are administering the war effort of this country confined to the civil service of Canada? As far as the civil service of the country is concerned, I am afraid that it has had far too few additions to its numbers during the course of the war. For the most part the civil servants have simply had to work harder and to work longer hours; and a more devoted body of men than there is in the civil service, particularly among those at the heads of departments, I say cannot be found in any public service. But the men who make up the larger number assisting the government in the war effort are men holding only temporary positions. They are not men who have come into the service of the government of this country, to remain there indefinitely. They are there for the period of the war, or for such time during that period as they may be prepared and free to give to the public service. They cannot be described as a bureaucracy in any true sense of that word.

But is there not another explanation behind everything else? Is not the fault that is being found with those administering the war effort of Canada to-day primarily an objection to the restrictions being placed upon people at this time, the controls which necessarily must be exercised over the public at large in time of war? That is something which cannot possibly be escaped. We in this country have been freer, I suppose, than the people of almost any other country. We have had less in the way of control and more in the way of freedom of enterprise and of individual freedom. But in a time such as this, when a country is engaged in total war, that freedom necessarily must be restricted, and greatly restricted; and it is these restrictions that are causing the irritation.

My hon. friend has been referring to the duties and responsibilities of members of this house. I think there is an obligation upon every member of this house to help interpret that aspect of our war effort to the people of this country, instead of making it more difficult for the government or these administrators in the discharge of their public duties. We have a right to ask that this aspect of the question shall be present at all times in the minds of all in our discussions here.

Just in case I should fail to recall it later on, I should like to say a word at this point about the discussions in parliament during this session, and I do so after having reflected very carefully upon what I consider is likely to be the tendency in the course of this year's discussions. During the recent past we as a government have been told that we must not have anything whatever to do with politics; that this is a time of war and that, therefore, there must be no domestic politics discussed. Recently we had a convention of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, led by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), at which a political programme was brought forward. We have just had the convention at which my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Graydon) was present and which he helped to arrange, and a political platform was drawn up by that party. I do not know whether there have been conventions of some other parties recently formed; but, at any rate, we now have several parties in this house, each having a political platform of its own. There is a general impression in the minds of a good many that this probably will be the last session of this parliament, and consequently that they had better begin to educate the public with respect to the various contributions they hope to make to the public welfare. I suppose that may be an inevitable tendency; but, having regard to the position of the world to-day; having regard to the very critical stage which the war has reached, may I express the hope that we shall not fall into the error of devoting too much time to discussing the merits of respective political platforms instead of keeping our thoughts centred, above everything else, upon the fact that to-day we are in the midst of the greatest struggle for survival with which any people have ever been faced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my right hon. friend will allow me, he will agree that there is one way to avoid that, and he has it within his power to announce that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I thought it would not be long before we would see that we had two leaders opposite. But he and I will have a talk about it, to see if we cannot keep our young friend in order.

I want to emphasize this point, because to-day, with the great successes which fortunately have attended the arms of the allied powers; with what has taken place since the last meeting of this house in the improved position in Russia, in Africa, in the southwest Pacific, and, indeed, wherever the allied powers have been fighting, I think there is in the minds of a great many people the belief that this year is going to see the end of the war. It is not for me to try to discourage optimism in the mind of anyone; I think we need all we can get in the way of support for our continued efforts; but there could be no greater mistake in the world than to believe that we have advanced any further than this, that the allied and the axis powers are a little more evenly matched than they have been at any time heretofore. The power of Germany remains greater, I believe, than anyone in this chamber can begin to comprehend, and that power has to be destroyed before the liberation of the countries that have been oppressed can be brought about. But in addition to the power of Germany there is the might of Japan, which is great indeed; and these powers still have to be overthrown before any of us can begin to concentrate in the main on what is going to come in the post-war period. There was a remark made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce in his address the other day which I thought very sound. He said he did not think there was any reason to fear what the conclusion of this war would be, but that we should take great care in any estimate we might make of its duration. This war may be and probably will be very much longer than any one of us begins to comprehend; and unless we direct our energies primarily to seeing to it that, first and foremost, we do those things necessary to bring it speedily to a conclusion, we are not going to help either ourselves or the allied powers. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I trust that so far as this session is concerned it will not be thought that I am seeking in any way to abridge debate or discussion if, with my responsibility for leadership in the house, I do the best I possibly can to keep the minds of hon. members centred on the winning of the war—and that in as short a time as may be possible.

My hon. friend has asked me to speak about the conference at Casablanca. May I say that in all particulars it was similar to conferences which have taken place between Mr. Churchill and the President on three previous occasions when these two great leaders, one of Great Britain and the other of the United States, met in conference together. As hon. members will recall the first meeting was off the coast of Newfoundland; the second was in Washington in December of 1941 and January of 1942, while the third was in Washington in June of 1942. The recent meeting, as hon. members are aware, took place at Casablanca in North Africa.

As I have said, the meeting at Casablanca was a meeting between these two leaders and their military experts, the civil and military leaders of Great Britain and the civil and military leaders of the United States. I was not invited to be present at the conference—and that, I think, for the best of reasons. My position or rather that of Canada is similar in all particulars, or at least in many particulars, to that of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and some other parts of the British commonwealth. Not only is it similar to the position of other parts of the commonwealth, but in many particulars it is similar to that of other of the united nations. The countries at war to-day are large in number. There are now some thirty countries forming what are known as the united nations. If one of the united nations is to be invited to a conference between two great leaders, there is every reason why other nations should feel that they were entitled to a like invitation.

From the beginning of the war I have had to face this question, and be prepared to make answer to it: As the leader of the government in Canada, am I in a time of war going to make more difficult than it is the situation which exists, or am I going to try to do all I possibly can to be as reasonable as it is possible for a man to be, and thereby make the situation easier than it would otherwise be?

I could this afternoon protest to the house that Canada had not been invited to the conference. Were I to do so, how much would I be helping the war effort of this country or the combined effort of the united nations? In the first place, as I have said, I do not see how it would have been possible to have singled out one country for invitation, and not to have invited others. But more than that, I believe we have to do one of two things, when it comes to the matter of supreme strategy: either we must have confidence in those who are at the head of the united nations' war effort of to-day, do all we can to let the world see that we have that confidence, and assist them in every way we can, or we must take a different attitude, one which to my mind could only result in disaster.

But when I say that countries other than Great Britain and the United States were not represented at the Casablanca conference, it does not mean that the governments of those countries were not fully aware of the discussions that were going to take place there, and that they have not been informed with respect to discussions that have taken place. In connection with all matters pertaining to the war there is a certain procedure that has been built up—improvised, if you like. It has had to be improvised, because the war is something new, and the situation changes from day to day. And in that improvisation of the war effort of so many nations, tacitly if you like—and I think more than tacitly; I could say openly—there has been a recognition of the fact that the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States were the two men around whom all could rally in support of any policies concerning which they might give the final word. In the shaping of that policy every part of the British empire and all of the united nations, in so far as it is possible for them to be consulted and informed in the matter, have a part.

Our chiefs of staff in this city are in constant touch with the combined chiefs of staff having their headquarters at Washington. The war committee of the cabinet is informed of the discussions taking place there from day to day. We have a permanent liaison officer, an official of the government, who is there at the present time, and is there also throughout the year. We are entitled to follow discussions and to be heard respecting any aspect of the war situation we may wish to present. Canada's interests in these matters are placed fully before the boards that are continuously sitting and dealing with these matters.

A decision reached at Casablanca is not a decision come to suddenly by the President and the Prime Minister. Such decision is the outcome of discussions which have extended over many months, and which are finally crystallized in a formal way by the heads of these two great countries. So far as Canada is concerned, there is no man in any part of the world who has had more intimate and close association with the British staff than has General McNaughton, the head of the Canadian forces. On military matters, General McNaughton, I venture to say, knows the mind of the staff in Great Britain as well as any member of the staff knows his own mind. And they know General McNaughton's mind. And when British staff officers go to Casablanca they do not go to support a policy which they believe is superior to the views of General McNaughton; they go to support a policy which they know has been fully considered before the matter ever came up in conference there.

I do not think I need go into detail in connection with that matter. However, expecting that the question would be raised this afternoon, I thought it best not to trust myself to express myself extemporaneously on the point, and prepared some notes which I intend to place on Hansard.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at six o'clock I was speaking of the conference at Casablanca, and had just stated that having regard to the care with which any statement on a matter so all-important as that of the conference at Casablanca should be prepared, I preferred to read from notes which I had prepared rather than to trust to the expression at the moment of what I might say. Naturally this house will realize that anything that is said in any part of the British commonwealth, if it comes from the lips of the leader of a government in any of those parts, will be taken in all other parts of the world, including enemy countries, as something which is expressive of the policy of the united nations as a whole. I make that statement because there are many questions I should like to answer, many questions that I am in position to answer but am not free to answer. I am not free to answer for the simple reason that they affect all the governments to which I have referred. Without the opportunity of conferring with them and obtaining their consent I would be venturing beyond what I think would be proper to attempt to answer in their name as well as in my own. For the present, therefore, with respect to Casablanca I shall content myself with the following statement.

The talks in Casablanca were discussions between the heads of the United Kingdom and United States governments and their principal military advisers, in direct continuation of arrangements made during Mr. Churchill's first visit to Washington for the establishment of combined United Kingdom-United States machinery for cooperation in various phases of the war effort. These combined arrangements were designed to effect closer coordination between these two countries, with each of which Canada maintains especially close and intimate relations. There has not yet been developed out of the combined United Kingdom-United States organizations the more comprehensive institutional organization which a total war effort of all the united nations probably requires. The difficulties in the way which will have to be overcome should be obvious to everybody. Nobody would wish to sacrifice the speed and efficiency which effective strategy demands to the formal exigencies of international representative institutions.

To wage war effectively, all our governments have had to assume unprecedented powers and responsibilities and have had to delegate unprecedented powers and responsibilities. There is constantly room for improvement in the plans by which we are mobilizing our own war effort and integrating it with the war effort of our allies. There has been a good deal of pretty successful improvisation to meet the means of war conditions. New types of joint arrangements, new agencies for mutual aid, new channels for communication and consultation, are being worked out. The framework of over-all cooperation is found in our association with our allies as members of the united nations. This framework is being progressively filled in and strengthened, but the job of constructing a workable international organization for the winning of the war and the maintenance of the peace is far from completed. There are obvious gaps and anomalies in the present arrangements to worry people who seek symmetry above all. I hope to see some of these gaps closed and anomalies removed.

We must somehow succeed in developing methods and instruments of cooperation which will strengthen the spirit of partnership in which all free peoples, large and small, are associated in our common struggle. In doing so we must not prejudice or compromise—in the slightest degree—the concentration of responsibility for strategic decision upon which the successful prosecution of the war depends.

I think that statement will appeal to the common sense of members of this house. It will be apparent that however much we may desire to have organizations that may seem all-embracing, the form of organization which is likely to be most effective is something which has to come into being as events help to determine the situation. When Mr. Churchill and the President met at Washington in December, 1941, and January, 1942, no one in any part of the British Commonwealth or in any of the united nations took exception to those two great leaders conferring together along with their military experts on the score that all other parts of the commonwealth or all the other united nations were not represented. The same was true when Mr. Churchill and the President met again in Washington in June of last year.

On one of those occasions, as hon. members will recall, Mr. Churchill visited Ottawa and was present at a meeting of the war committee of the cabinet at which he gave a statement to my colleagues and myself of the discussions which he and the President had had. I think I may recall also to the minds of hon. members that when the President and the Prime Minister of Great Britain first met at Washington I was invited by both to be present, and I was present at conferences that took place between them. I was not present at all the conferences, but I was kept very fully informed. Also at the time that the President and Mr. Churchill met in June, I was invited again to be present in Washington while they were there. I had many conversations with both of them individually and together in reference to the different matters they had been discussing.

I think I am at liberty to say now that, at the Washington conference in June, plans with respect to the invasion of North Africa were fully discussed. I had inside knowledge of those plans at that time. They were not carried out for some little time thereafter, but they were known to the military advisers of the governments of the united nations concerned, and later were made known to members of the war committee of our government in so far as it was desirable that they should be known.

In many of these matters of strategy there are obvious reasons why the information should be confined to military experts more particularly rather than made known generally to the civil authorities. I could mention other instances. Perhaps I am not disclosing a secret when I say that the President of the United States invited me just a month or two ago to visit him in Washington. I spent two days and a half with him as his guest at the White House. We were practically alone in our discussions in the White House at the time, and on that occasion I received from the President the fullest measure of his confidence with regard to matters pertaining to the war. I have enjoyed a similar confidence in communications from Mr. Churchill. I am at the present time at liberty to say that when Mr. Churchill was in Russia having his conversations with Mr. Stalin he communicated with me fully with respect to those conferences. If there were any reason in the world to believe that the Canadian government was not receiving the fullest confidence of Mr. Churchill and his colleagues in the British government, or, as we have an equal right to receive it, in a certain measure, from the President of the United States and those who surround him, I would be the first one to take exception to a procedure which did not keep us fully informed. But I am sure hon. members of the house will agree with me that matters of the kind—the subjects which are discussed, or matters incidental thereto—cannot be made known generally. But what I would like hon. members to appreciate is that some of these things place a very heavy burden upon whoever has to carry the responsibility of maintaining secrecy concerning them. I think I may ask from hon. gentlemen opposite that in so far as is possible for them to do so they will realize that I have a very great responsibility in the matter of confidences, confidences which have to be maintained if the war effort is to be carried on successfully; and I trust that they will not embarrass me by asking questions which it is impossible to answer without disclosing information that should not be disclosed.

My hon. friend has spoken about the importance of an imperial war cabinet. I thought that subject had been settled a year ago, if not before that. Since it was a subject of discussion in this house, Mr. Churchill himself has been here, and in this very chamber he has talked with members of all parties. I know that this question of an imperial war cabinet was discussed with him by various members of this house. Mr. Churchill has exactly the same view, I venture to say, as I myself have and as I have expressed in this house with regard to the position of an imperial war cabinet at this time. I may say that I have had the expression of the view of General Smuts of South Africa. It concurs in all particulars with my own. I have had personal conversations with the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Fraser; his view is the same as my own. I have not had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Curtin, but I happen to know that his views with respect to an imperial war cabinet and its functioning at a time of war are similar to my own. Indeed, I do not know anyone in a responsible position in any part of the British commonwealth to-day who takes other than the view that for the prime ministers to be leaving their own countries to go and sit as members of some imperial war cabinet in London would be the greatest possible mistake. Each country should, along with all else, attend to its own individual problems at a time like the present, and we can only work and cooperate successfully in different parts of the empire if, first of all, each makes perfectly sure that matters which are of immediate concern to his own country receive the immediate attention of the leader of the government of that country.

But it does not follow that because there is not some outward and visible sign of an imperial war cabinet such as existed in the last war, and perhaps, to a certain extent, was necessary in the last war, there is not the most effective possible conference and consultation and cooperation between all parts of the British empire. The agencies of communication to-day are very different from what they were at the time of the last war. Anyone who reads Sir Robert Borden's memoirs will see the reason why he laid stress on an imperial war cabinet in London. He could not get any information from London; he did not know what was happening with respect to many of the matters which were being decided; he felt it very necessary that Canada should know on what grounds decisions were being made which were affecting her forces, and the only way that seemed possible to achieve that end at that time was either for Sir Robert himself to attend or for him to have one of his colleagues represent him at the council table in London.

The situation is very different to-day. Since Sir Robert Borden's day we have built up about as perfect a system of communication and consultation between different parts of the commonwealth as it is possible to have. Every day the government receives not one, but many dispatches, direct from the government of Britain relating to matters immediately affecting the war. There is not a major decision with respect to which Canada could be even remotely concerned that is not a subject of communication between us. There have been, I must say, one or two occasions where decisions were reached very quickly in Britain and communicated to us immediately afterwards. Where those cases have arisen they have been matters which, in the opinion of the British government, did not permit the delay of so much as an hour or two in the matter of a decision. But may I say with respect to that and I could not give a better illustration of the importance of not resorting to the old method of consultation in the present war, with regard to any matter of real importance which is to be decided in Britain, if a prime minister attending an imperial conference is to be other than an autocrat or dictator and to settle everything by his own word and decision, he would wish to communicate with his colleagues in Canada and get their views and the collective view, before he gave an official decision in the name of his own country. I have been at several conferences in Britain, and I know something about how matters are decided at the council table. I was present in the war cabinet in England, as hon. members know, a little over a year ago, and I must say that what I saw and felt as a member of a war council sitting in London only helped to emphasize what I am saying to the house at the present time, namely, the importance to a minister who wishes to be effective in decisions that he is required to make, of being able to say that he speaks, not in his own name alone, but in the name of his colleagues; and further, the importance of his having with him at the time he is making his decisions the expert officers of the departments which are immediately concerned. In attending a war cabinet meeting in London the ministers have, either sitting by their sides or in adjoining rooms, experts who come and give them the information on which they base their decisions; and these experts give the information as a result of long and carefully prepared consultation in advance. I go to London and take my place at a war cabinet, and unless I take the staff of military headquarters from the Department of National Defence, the staff of the Department of External Affairs, and officials from some other departments of the government, I am not in a position to say what the government of Canada is prepared to support in the House of Commons of Canada. But the way in which matters work out to-day is this, that if a question of importance comes up on which the views of Canada and the different parts of the commonwealth are desired, I may receive a cable at my office at eleven o'clock in the morning; I can have my colleagues together at half-past eleven; and in a great many cases I am able to send a reply at half-past twelve; if I am not, there is the best of reasons why that reply should be held over until there is an opportunity of getting expert advice from different sources here. But with respect to any decision that Canada makes it is important that we should have the decision made in the atmosphere of this new world in which we live and where we can take account not only of the feeling of Canada but also of possible relationships of questions arising that will be of concern as well to the United States. Time and time again, during this war, opinions have been sent from Canada on possible repercussions which would result in the United States or in some other part of the British commonwealth. I am sure that the British government would be the first to acknowledge that those opinions have been of the utmost service to the British government and to the common cause.

I say, therefore, that what we have to-day is a continuing conference between cabinets of the British commonwealth. Surely nothing could be better than that. Instead of a single war council at London to-day there is a collective cabinet, a cabinet composed of the cabinets of the nations of the British commonwealth. True, its members are not all sitting in one room, but you have a cabinet in Ottawa, one in Australia, one in New Zealand, one in South Africa, and one in London, all pooling their information there and in the different centres which I have mentioned; and out of that means of consultation and communication are evolved the different policies which are given expression to in one form or another. That is my answer to my hon. friend when he says that we have not the outward and visible sign of unity which we should have.

This is a world war, and methods that have proved adequate in the past are inadequate to-day. I am happy to be able to say that, with one or two exceptions, I cannot see that we have suffered in the least by reason of not having further representation than we have at the present time in London.

May I add that we have in London a member of the Privy Council of Canada in the person of the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, the High Commissioner, one who has had a great deal of experience in public affairs and who enjoys the full confidence of the British government. Hon. members may not be aware that after important meetings of the war cabinet one of its members calls together the representatives of the governments of the different parts of the British commonwealth and advises them of what has been discussed in the war cabinet, and with respect to any matter that relates particularly to any one part of the commonwealth the fullest information is given on that particular subject.

Mr. Massey keeps in constant communication with myself and the Department of External Affairs and gives us this added information. In addition to that, we have in Ottawa a former member of the British government, the Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, than whom there could be no abler diplomat or one who has a better understanding of government, and he is receiving day by day from his government information which he imparts to our government. Further, I receive in regard to the most important matters direct communications from Mr. Churchill, the British Prime Minister, and I communicate direct with him. In addition to that I receive, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, numbers of communications which come from the British government through the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on all matters pertaining to the war. The result is that every day, before the day ends, my colleagues and I have here in Ottawa as complete a record as it is possible to obtain with respect to matters relating to the war up to that moment. There may be some matters that have to stand over for a day or two; but so far as procedure has gone up to the present, and speaking generally, we have been amazed at the rapidity with which the government has been kept informed on most matters. It may be that my hon. friend is not aware of how complete the whole system of consultation and conference is, but I trust that what I have said will answer any doubts there may be in his mind on that question.

My hon. friend has spoken about the man-power problem in Canada. Well, we have a man-power problem. Every country that is at war, indeed, for that matter even if it is not at war, has that problem to a greater or less degree. There certainly is no more difficult situation to handle than that of taking people out of occupations in which they have spent their lives and putting them into entirely different occupations. There is nothing more disrupting to good feeling than to be obliged, as the government is, in a time of war, to make restrictions which will prevent people from carrying on the pursuits in which they have been engaged since their earliest days and to which they had hoped to devote their lives, and to tell them to do something else, to go somewhere else. There is nothing more distasteful than suddenly to be obliged to have an officer of the government go into the homes of citizens of our country and tell them that it is a part of government policy that not merely the men but in some cases the women as well in those homes must leave them in order to help in the war industries of the country or to take part in some other form of war service. This is the most difficult problem with which any country can be faced at any time, and the amazing thing to me is that we have been able to work out matters as smoothly as we have.

At the last session of parliament I gave the house a statement of what I thought the man-power requirements for this year would be. Hon. members will see in Hansard of March 24, 1942, my statement of the estimate of what would be required to fulfil man-power needs for the fiscal year 1942-43. These were the figures given: war industry, 100,000; navy, 13,000; army, 90,000-100,000; air force, 70,000-80,000, making a total of from 173,000 to 193,000 for the armed forces all told. I think these figures were also given, in part at least, by my colleague the Minister of National Defence.

Various revisions have been made from time to time in the light of changing needs of the war. The army estimates were raised because of the increased home defence programme. What are the actual achievements? I have given the estimates. The actual achievements for 1942—that is, for the calendar year—were these: For war industries, instead of merely the number estimated being provided, that is 100,000, there were over 300,000 added. That was the number of persons who entered war industries. As regards the armed forces, the number was over 200,000, a figure above that which in the earlier stage had been estimated with regard to the three forces. In other words, the achievements in the mobilization of man-power greatly exceeded the earlier estimate in 1942.

There may be a controversy with regard to methods, if you will. All methods, particularly new methods, when they are adopted, are difficult. But what matters most is the result, and I have given the house the results of such methods as have been employed in the past year.

I made perfectly clear to the house in what I said that it would not be an easy matter to carry out the necessary measures. Speaking on January 26, 1942, I said:

> The administrative machinery required to carry out the proposed measures equitably and efficiently will necessarily be intricate and complicated. The capacities of men and women cannot be weighed and measured and graded with the same certainty as the qualities of wheat, or cement or steel can be determined. To perform the complicated task of selection with success will demand both time and skill.

I also said:

> Certainly no government is wise enough to decide the appropriate task for every individual in the nation. And, even if governments were all-knowing, the war would not wait while this stupendous job was being performed. What the government can do, and what we propose to undertake to do, is to meet the urgent needs by the best means we can devise.

And that I say we have carried out in the way I have indicated.

Let me repeat that the government does not claim that it has been able to do everything perfectly or even as rapidly as might be desired. Perhaps I might direct the attention of hon. members to this fact, that there has not been a single phase of the war effort—I make no exception—in connection with which this government has not been charged from the very start that we were not going fast enough, that we were not getting the results that should be obtained. The very first year it was, Why didn't we have more troops overseas; why didn't we have more clothing; why didn't we have more equipment? My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was continually taunted with not getting planes fast enough, not getting tanks, that we had no tanks, and the like. So it has been all the way. Little if any account has been taken of the fact that unless there had been very careful planning at the outset, all the rest might likely have been a muddle. I claim for the present administration that we have planned carefully from the start. We have resisted the pressure to proceed at a rate which would sacrifice quality for quantity. As a result, what we have done stands in good stead for this country and for the united nations to-day.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition ended his address with a peroration—it was not his own, it was one of Mr. Churchill's; it was all the better for that. It was one with which we are all familiar, telling how the British people were prepared to fight in the streets, to fight on the beaches, to fight on the hillsides, prepared to fight everywhere, and my hon. friend said, Now I present that as a challenge to hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to their war effort. Well, I am going to answer that challenge to-night. I answer it by asking him to survey what is taking place to-day in different parts of the world as a result of the services of the armed forces of this country. I ask him to stop and think of the position of this country on the day this parliament met and decided that we would enter the war. At that time Canada was not prepared for war any more than were any of the other countries now fighting the axis. We started practically from scratch, but to-day we have one of the finest navies in the world. We have two army corps overseas, the best trained and best equipped of any corresponding number of men in the world. We have an air training plan in this country which has turned out pilots and air crews that will be found over every theatre of war in the world, an agency of war as great as any other to be found in any country to-day. And we have in proportion to our population greater war production than can be shown relatively I believe for almost any other country. Not only have we armed forces engaged in active combat to-day in all parts of the world, but we have in addition been assisting in arming and supplying the other united nations that have been taking a great part in the war.

In answer to my hon. friend's challenge, let him ask himself what Canada has done for Russia, for China, for many of the united nations that are to-day fighting in this war. In the answer to that question he will find the answer to the question whether we have been doing our part in the war.

My hon. friend has asked for facts and figures. I shall make a brief statement. I had thought that I would leave this to another occasion, but as he has asked me to give something concrete I shall at once give a brief statement of the growth of the armed forces in the past year, 1942.

Here may I pause to join with my hon. friend in the tribute he paid to our heroic men at Dieppe. Nothing has happened in the past year which has touched so deeply the hearts of the Canadian people as the spirit shown by the forces who were engaged in that combined reconnaissance at Dieppe in the middle of the year. Their resource and ingenuity, their skill, their bravery, the valour and heroism they showed; all this and much else has helped to make the name of Dieppe stand out in the history of our country as one of the memorable names blazoned on the banner of war honours of our land. And may I say that I do not think full justice has ever been done in this house to the memory of the men who fought at Hong Kong and sacrificed their lives or their health there in an equally brave endeavour to preserve the safety of their country and the freedom of the world. In our thoughts at this time above all are those who have made the supreme sacrifice, the families that have lost their loved ones, those who to-day are suffering as prisoners of war in different enemy countries, those who have been wounded, those who are away from their homes; all of them are present in our thoughts at this time, and I hope word will go out to the living among their number that the House of Commons, whatever differences it may have in its parties, is one in its thought for them and its determination to see that everything that is in its power to do will be done to help and support them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come to facts and figures. A year ago the navy comprised over three hundred and fifty ships and over twenty-seven thousand men. At the beginning of the present year there were more than five hundred ships and the personnel had almost doubled, the number exceeding fifty-two thousand.

At the beginning of 1942 the active army included some 260,000 volunteers and an additional 20,000 men called up under the Mobilization Act. At the beginning of this year the number of volunteers had risen to about 360,000 and the number of men serving compulsorily to about 55,000. A considerable portion of the men called up during the year had volunteered for general service.

In the air force the number of men rose in 1942 from about 100,000 to about 150,000.

In addition to the armed forces, about 38,000 Canadian merchant seamen are serving on vessels of Canadian or foreign registry. Some 400 men are serving in Britain in the corps of Canadian civilian firefighters.

Just a word about the war effort of these forces. The Canadian navy has three tasks. It shares with the army and the air force in guarding Canada's shores. It shares with the British and United States navies in protecting merchant shipping on the Atlantic. It cooperates with the sea forces of the united nations. In engagements with the enemy, officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy have borne themselves gallantly. Several enemy submarines have been sunk by Canadian naval forces. I pause to ask hon. members if their pride and the pride of the country has not been stirred by the announcement made within the last few days that a Canadian corvette bearing the name Ville de Quebec had torpedoed a German submarine and sunk her in the waters of the Mediterranean, and the report which has been published to-day that another Canadian corvette bearing the name Port Arthur has sunk an Italian submarine. And, Mr. Speaker, while these announcements are not made from day to day, it is a fact that something like eight or nine or ten of our corvettes or other ships have succeeded in sinking U-boats during the course of this war.

That is only one phase, but I say it is something of which Canada may well be proud. I ask the members of my party and others in this house who come from the province of Quebec if they are not proud that a corvette manned by Canadians and bearing the name of the city of Quebec, the capital of old Canada, was able to sink an enemy ship in the waters of the Mediterranean. I see my hon. friends at the far end opposite, to whom I am addressing my remarks particularly, smiling. May I make this statement; may I say to them that proud as I have often been of this House of Commons, I was never prouder than when I heard two of our members in uniform speak as they did about the defence of Canada being accomplished through the defence of freedom in all parts of the world; coming here to this house while on active service to proclaim the larger vision, the only vision that counts for aught in a war like this, that the safety of Canada is bound up with the safety of freedom throughout the world. Yet at this critical time, of all times, hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite find it necessary to separate themselves from colleagues in their province in order to support an isolationist view with regard to the war effort of Canada! Their action does credit neither to themselves, nor to their province or to our country.

To continue with respect to Canada's war effort. A programme of expansion in the navy has been followed continuously since the outbreak of war. Only a part of Canadian shipbuilding capacity is devoted to the needs of the Royal Canadian Navy. The total shipbuilding capacity is divided between the construction of cargo ships and naval craft. A considerable number of ships of both kinds are constructed for Britain, the United States and others of our allies. At the same time British shipyards, as well as our own, are building ships for the Canadian navy. A considerable increase in the number of ships, including several destroyers, is anticipated in the present year. The enlistment and training of naval personnel is keeping pace with the increase in the number of ships.

The Canadian army in Britain has continued to guard that island citadel and to prepare for offensive action against the enemy. In the combined operations at Dieppe the valour and heroism of our troops as I have said has filled our country with pride. May I pause here to say that I sometimes think we do not sufficiently estimate the part which our troops in Britain have played from the beginning of this war. We have, for example, been attaching considerable importance to the visit which Mr. Churchill had with the President of the United States in North Africa. At different times we have been stirred by similar visits to Washington. How has it been made possible for Mr. Churchill to travel as he has to different parts of the world in this time of war? If you ask the people of Britain they will tell you to-day that this is due in very large part to the sense of security which Mr. Churchill and the government of Britain feel because of the presence of the Canadian forces, along with the British forces, in the British isles. Our men have not merely been prepared at any moment to meet the assault of the enemy should he seek to attack Britain. They have been equally prepared to cross the channel and be the spearhead of an attack upon the German forces there. Moreover, the effect of the presence of the Canadians in the British isles has been to keep locked up in the mainland opposite, in occupied France, divisions of German troops which would have been available for service in Africa or elsewhere.

In addition to hard training and ordinary duties of life in the field army, the army in Britain has done many other things. I should like to describe some of those activities in the words of General McNaughton. I intend to do so in a few moments because I wish also to have the challenge which my hon. friend has thrown out answered in the words of General McNaughton himself.

In connection with the army overseas, the Canadian active army of two army corps announced a year ago has completed its formations in all its major components. Ancillary units are month by month proceeding overseas. Thousands are in training as reinforcements wherever required. The programme of army expansion in Canada, announced on March 25 of last year, is being carried out. The 6th and 7th divisions and the brigade groups of the 8th division are mobilized. There are in addition troops on garrison duty on our coasts and in our vulnerable areas. In addition to the troops in Newfoundland, Labrador and the West Indies, the Canadian army is cooperating in the defence of Alaska. Behind the active army are the tens of thousands of citizens who are effectively devoting their time and energy to the important work of the reserve army. Then also there has been the important voluntary work carried on by many tens of thousands of our citizens in air raid precautions and civil defence.

The Royal Canadian Air Force continues to develop its threefold activities: air training, territorial and coastal defence, and active combat against the enemy in all parts of the world. During the year the agreement which set up the original British commonwealth air training plan was renewed and extended. Royal Air Force training in Canada has been coordinated with the commonwealth plan in a greatly enlarged combined training organization. The expansion of the home war establishment, forecast a year ago and set out in greater detail on March 25 last, is being actively advanced. The growing submarine menace along our eastern coast and in the St. Lawrence, and the combined operations with the United States forces in Alaska have increased the combat activities for the squadrons of the home war establishment. Canadian bombing squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Air Force have been engaged in steadily mounting numbers in operations over Germany and German-occupied Europe, Italy, North Africa and the middle east, India, Ceylon and the southwest Pacific. A Canadian bomber group was formed in Great Britain in December last. During next year the number of Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons will be increased to thirty-eight. The Royal Canadian Air Force is undertaking increasing responsibilities for the maintenance, equipment and welfare of Canadian airmen serving in combat areas overseas. Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons serving overseas will be fully equipped and maintained by Canada. In addition, Canada is undertaking to provide the pay and allowances of the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel serving in squadrons of the Royal Air Force.

I should like now to say a word with regard to war production. There is perhaps no more graphic way of indicating the progress of Canada's war production in the past year than to cite a few figures of production in 1942 as compared with 1941. First, as to shipbuilding: in 1941 Canadian shipyards built eighty-five corvettes and minesweepers, and in 1942 we built seventy-four, a decrease of eleven. But in 1942 many of the larger shipyards were devoted to the building of cargo ships. Over eighty cargo ships were built as compared with one in 1941. The output of military aircraft in 1941 was under 1,700. In 1942 it was almost 3,800. In 1941 Canada manufactured some 3,000 armoured fighting vehicles including tanks, universal carriers, scout cars and armoured cars; in 1942, well over 12,000. The output of mechanical transport numbered less than 120,000 vehicles in 1941 but over 200,000 in 1942. The increase in the output of field guns, naval guns, machine guns and small arms and ammunition of all kinds is even more spectacular. In money value Canada's war production in 1942 had increased some 159 per cent over 1941, from over $800,000,000 to over $2,100,000,000. The number of men and women employed in war industry at the close of 1941 was some 700,000. At the end of 1942 the number had risen to well over a million. These figures should be a source at once of pride and of encouragement to Canadian industry and to the working men and women whose labours made possible such production.

Canada's war production was not confined to ships and aircraft, machines, weapons and ammunition. Primary production was also greatly increased. Aluminum, nickel, copper and other base metals; steel, timber and other essential war materials were produced in greater quantities. Canadian agriculture responded splendidly to the increased need for foodstuffs. Shipments to Britain were greater in all lines. Cheese increased from 112,000,000 pounds in 1941 to 125,000,000 pounds in 1942. Bacon increased from about 425,000,000 pounds to over 600,000,000 pounds, in this case over a slightly longer period; dried eggs, from some 15 million dozen to 38 million dozen. The programme for 1943 calls for 675 million pounds of bacon, 63 million dozen eggs and at least as much cheese as last year.

Most of the food Canada exports is sent to Britain, but Canadian implements and munitions of war have found their way to all our fighting allies and have been used on almost every front. More than two-thirds of our total munitions output is supplied to other of the united nations. While our munitions programme has now reached full capacity, within the limits of available man-power and materials, we may expect the output for 1943 to exceed substantially that of 1942. In volume and quantity, it already compares favourably with that of any allied country. And, speaking about food supplies I would ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to recall a remark he made, to the effect that it was a reflection upon the government of this country, and one of which the farmers in particular should take full account, that we find to-day that butter and beef are being rationed in Canada. Why are butter and beef rationed in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Beef is not yet rationed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend said beef.

Mr. ILSLEY: He said beef might be.

Mr. GRAYDON: I said there was a hint that there might be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He did not say beef was rationed, though he thought there was a hint that it might be. Well, why is butter rationed at this time? The answer is—and I may say that if my hon. friend were helping the war effort of the country to the degree to which he professes he desires to help, he would tell the farmers of this country it is because Canada is providing the enormous supplies of food which she is sending to the people of Great Britain, from the supplies of foodstuffs of this country. We have made an agreement with Great Britain to supply her with foodstuffs. She has given us this opportunity in service above that of any other country. We had gained for the farmers that sure market, and I am certain there is no farmer in this country who, if he were told that it was to serve two purposes, namely to help sustain the armies and the people in Great Britain and give employment to those on his farm, would not very gladly have that extra supply go to Great Britain, even if we have to ration it here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say a word about the financial measures connected with the war effort.

Because of the success achieved in preventing inflation and maintaining the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, the real extent of Canada's war effort can be fairly accurately measured in financial terms.

In the calendar year, 1941, direct war expenditures amounted to more than $1,100,000,000, and an additional $900,000,000 was necessary to provide the Canadian dollars to meet the United Kingdom deficit. Canada's total war costs for 1941 therefore exceeded $2,000,000,000. In the calendar year 1942 the corresponding total was more than $3,600,000,000.

The splendid way in which the financial burden of war is being borne by the Canadian people is evidenced by the fact that in addition to over $2,000,000,000 collected in 1942 in taxes and compulsory savings, cash subscriptions for victory bonds and war savings certificates exceeded $1,900,000,000.

There is my reply to my hon. friend's challenge as to how Canada fights; how Canada is carrying on its war effort.

And referring to Mr. Churchill, I do not think he would mind my saying to the house what he said to me on different occasions when I have had conversation with him. He has said, "How does Canada manage to do what she does? It is beyond me to understand how she has been able to do what she has done and is doing in the war." That is Mr. Churchill's estimate of Canada's war effort. I add that, with no fear of contradiction whatsoever.

But now, lest it might be thought that what I am saying does not represent exactly the position of our armed forces and more particularly our armed forces overseas, I should like to read the following communication issued by General McNaughton, the commander of our army, as a greeting to his troops and to the people of Canada at the Christmas season and the beginning of the New Year. For some strange reason—and I cannot account for it—this very important message seems to have received very little publicity in our country, either over the radio or in the press.

I believe I heard only a paragraph of it over the radio one evening, but I searched in vain through the press of the country to find any reproduction of the statement. I am not reflecting in any way. There are lots of things which go over the air and appear in the press which I may miss. However, I do think that this important statement should have its place in Hansard, and for that reason I place on Hansard this statement of the commander of the Canadian army overseas which will indicate whether or not in his opinion there has been any lack of energy or efficiency or sufficiency so far as Canada's war effort is concerned in relation to the troops overseas. This is General McNaughton's message:

This is the fourth Christmas which the vanguard of the Canadian army has spent in England, for it was on December 17, 1939, that the leading elements of the first division arrived at a northern port after an uneventful voyage across the Atlantic under the sure escort of the Royal Navy. At that time our numbers of trained soldiers and experienced officers were very few indeed and our equipment consisted of little more than the rifles we carried and the clothing we wore. But this caused little anxiety, for during our period of organization we were to rest under the shield of the British expeditionary force, and of the armies of our allies in France and all the facilities of the British army in the United Kingdom were available to help us in our training and development. Moreover, we had behind us Canada's magnificent young manhood and our great peace-time industry, both potentially very formidable and, we were confident, readily adaptable to the preparation and making of war. Our cause was just, our participation necessary, and there was certainty that the government and people of Canada would see the struggle through to a victorious conclusion.

In the months which followed, this confidence was amply justified, for in Canada preparations were pressed forward with energy and decision and soon there was a steady flow of men to us, limited only by the capacity of the ships we could obtain. And gradually at first, and then in rapidly rising tide, now approaching the flood, came our arms and vehicles and equipment of every sort and kind.

So to-day, our first few have become many tens of thousands and they now are firmly based on the vast arsenal which our country has become, we count ourselves most fortunate both in the quantity and, best of all, in the high quality of the supplies which Canada has sent to us.

In the three long years we have stood guard within the British isles there have been many periods of intense activity when battle against the enemy seemed imminent, the anxious time of Dunkerque when we were witness of the miracle of the salvation of the British expeditionary force, our expedition to Brest as a forlorn hope to support the last stand of our ally France, the Battle of Britain when we watched the air force in their glorious defence, ourselves half-armed and ill-equipped but ready to meet invasion should it come, Spitzbergen in the Arctic and Dieppe across the channel and other far-flung designs most carefully prepared at the behest of those who rule these matters with all the repeated meticulous precision and all the vast expenditure of time and energy that is required, only to end in nothing through some proper change of strategy as circumstances arose which called others, with alternative roles equally prepared, to carry their allotted task forward in satisfaction to fulfilment.

And always throughout, by day and night, in fair weather and in foul, unending training in all the varied aspects of modern war, continuous development to a settled plan, and as each day passed, the units and formations growing stronger and our men and officers more fit in body and in mind, and more adept with their weapons and skilled in leadership for the hard tasks which lay ahead.

Meanwhile, and over and beyond the ordinary duties of life in the field army itself, there have been many things to do. Camps and roads and airfields to build; depots for stores and workshops to erect and operate; waste to be eliminated and salvage to be collected; help to give in the quest for key minerals needed for war production and tunnels to drive for power to aid in manufacture; forestry operations in Scotland to supply great quantities of timber when its import would have needed the use of precious shipping otherwise required; military schools and courses to organize and conduct; the central administration patiently evolved, by those entrusted with this task, to regulate our dealings with the civil power and with the great departments of state with whom our daily business has been adjusted in harmony. Likewise, and of very great importance, the widespread detailed systems, some army, some civilian, built up to secure the complicated task of caring for the individual in all his many wants and needs. To transport and house, to feed and clothe, to issue out the arms, to promote and pay, to minister to our spiritual requirements, medical and nursing services and hospitals and the Canadian Red Cross to look after the sick and other casualties, dental services, postal services, education in which we gratefully acknowledge the help so well given by our comrades of past wars, hospitality so generously given by the people of these isles, canteens and sports and recreation and welfare provided to us by the legion, the Salvation Army, the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus and all our many friends who have worked with them.

In all of these, devoted service has been given, not only to our own troops but also and on occasion to the civil population as well.

Those years in England have not been easy, nor do we seek their long continuance. The men and women with the Canadian army overseas are far from home and kith and kin to whom they would return, but there has been no wavering in the steady purpose which brought them here and they watch and wait for the proper time to strike with that quiet patience which bespeaks a high morale. When that time comes, be it soon or late, the army of Canada will go forward with reasoned confidence to discharge its duty to the cause we serve.

There is the answer to the challenge, if challenge there be, as to whether Canada's war effort in these past years has been worthy of our country. There is one clause in that statement of General McNaughton's which I wish to emphasize and draw attention to. General McNaughton points out that from the beginning they have been able to get all the troops that they could find ships to bring them in. May I say to this House of Commons that the only limiting factor to-day with respect either to troops or supplies for overseas is the limit of the ships available to transport them. There is the answer as to Canada's war effort. Does anyone dispute that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the man-power question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am answering it; my hon. friend is getting an answer. I repeat what I said, that the only limiting factor on supplies or men going to Britain to-day is the ships available to take them. My hon. friend is seeking to raise a commotion in this country over the man-power difficulties which would undoubtedly be apparent in any movement of people here and there as I have described already, but is neglecting altogether what the commander in chief of the Canadian army says is the position to-day in Great Britain. I say that we owe a duty to the people of Canada, we owe a duty to the united nations to see that Canada's war effort is presented in the true light of its accomplishments and not in the light of some domestic struggle we may be having in regard to man-power.

Speaking of man-power, may I say that I was a bit surprised at my hon. friend, the new leader, this afternoon when it seemed to me he was seeking to embarrass the government in its war effort by directing a veiled attack at the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). My hon. friend said that there was a need for change in Canada's labour policy and rather sought to add what he could to the efforts that have been made to stir up added difficulties for the Minister of Labour. May I say, to begin with, that no member ever came into a government in Canada with higher encomiums from all sides than did the present Minister of Labour. These were pronounced by men in all parts of this dominion. If one will look at the press of this country, he will see what was said about the appointment of Mr. Mitchell as Minister of Labour and will find that I am perfectly within the mark when I say that there was but one note and that of praise from one end of Canada to the other. That note of praise was given in equal measure by persons of all classes. It was given by hon. gentlemen opposite, in sparing measure it is true, and it was given by the labour men of this country.

When I was seeking to obtain a minister who I believed would be the best minister that I could get to head the Department of Labour, I offered the portfolio of Minister of Labour to Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress. Mr. Moore told me at that time that he was ready to do anything in his power to assist the government, but he did not think his strength was such that he would be justified in taking on a portfolio in the administration. More than that, he reminded me of something I had said to him years ago to the effect that at the time of the last war Mr. Samuel Gompers in the United States had played an even larger role in the way of assistance to the government by remaining at the head of his organization than he would have been able to play had be been a member of the administration. Mr. Moore told me that he believed he could assist the government in a more effective way if he remained outside. But he said to me, "You cannot get a better man than Humphrey Mitchell." It was on Mr. Moore's recommendation and on what had been said by members of other labour organizations throughout this country, because of the regard in which Mr. Mitchell was held as a labour man and as a former labour member in this parliament that I asked him to accept the portfolio of Minister of Labour and believed that I was securing the best man that could be found in Canada for that position.

Why has there been an attack upon Mr. Mitchell such as has been made in different parts of the country? It has been due, above all else, to the simple fact that Mr. Mitchell has tried to uphold the government's policy of wage stabilization and price control. I want to put this very clearly to this parliament because it is a question we shall have to face through the whole of this session. The government will have to be supported in its wage stabilization and price control policy if we are to control inflation in this country. If that support is not forthcoming and we have to change that policy, then whoever is responsible for that change of policy will have to be responsible for the consequences if they lead to a complete breakdown in price control and to inflation in our country at this time of war.

This is a very difficult policy to maintain; nothing in the nature of restriction is easy in a time of war. I have been repeating that over and over again. There are restrictions that we shall all have to put up with, and if we are going to control prices there has also to be a stabilization of wages. I am not saying for one minute that any stabilization of wages which is unjust or unfair should be maintained. I would be the first to resist anything of the kind and demand that injustices should be remedied. But I do say that no class in the country has as much to lose through inflation as the working classes. I think they will be the first to admit it.

May I point out that this parliament has already approved that policy. Last session we did not have an attack upon our wage stabilization and price-ceiling policy. Members generally conceded that this country was not only doing what was good for itself but was setting an example to other countries in dealing with a situation arising out of inflation such as Canada and other countries were faced with in the last war. As nearly as I could judge, this parliament seemed to be almost of one accord with respect to maintaining the price-ceiling policy. As I have said, you cannot maintain a price ceiling without having wage stabilization. Because the Minister of Labour has had to refuse certain demands that have been made by labour in the way of increases in order to maintain the price ceiling, because he has stood firm in support of the policy of the government, he has been constantly attacked and his position has been made more difficult than it otherwise would have been. If there is another explanation I would be glad to hear it, or perhaps, I should say, I would be sorry to hear it. I honestly believe that that is the explanation of the feeling which has arisen in certain quarters in an effort to bring about a change in the portfolio of Minister of Labour.

Speaking of ministers of the crown, may I say this, because we had a new theory of government, of which I am going to speak in a moment, pronounced by my hon. friend this afternoon—the theory of the occupational basis of government: when a minister of the crown is sworn in as a member of a cabinet he becomes the representative of the people as a whole, no matter what his occupation may have been theretofore. He does not represent a class; he represents the people of Canada, and his responsibility is a part of the responsibility of the cabinet as a whole. When Mr. Mitchell came into the cabinet he had to assume his share of responsibility for the policy of the government; and if to-day he has to refuse certain demands that may be made upon him because of the policy of the government, the choice before him is to decide for himself, "Is it to be what in the end will be the greatest good for the greatest number by standing by a policy which for the moment makes me a bit unpopular?" or "Shall I resign from the ministry and thereby help to destroy a policy which will do more good to labour and others of my fellow men than could possibly be achieved in any other way?" Labour has no more right to think that the Minister of Labour represents labour only in the government than bankers or financiers have the right to think that the Minister of Finance is only their representative or than lawyers have to think that the Minister of Justice is exclusively their representative. When a minister of the crown takes the oath of office, by that is meant that he becomes one of a group which have a united policy and collectively are responsible to parliament and through parliament to the people. That is the meaning of responsible government; and I hope that any efforts which are being misdirected against the Minister of Labour on any score such as that he is not doing his full duty in supporting government policy will not be pursued further unless there are grounds which will substantially support them.

My hon. friend spoke this afternoon of the government's national social insurance policy of which special mention is made in the speech from the throne. I am glad to feel that members of all parties in this house are more or less in accord that the time has come in our country's affairs when we should be giving all the thought we possibly can to these great questions of social security. The chief objection which the leader of the opposition raised to the social security policy as outlined was not to the policy itself but to the government's method of proceeding. He asked why in the first instance we should ask for a select committee of this House of Commons to study the whole question.

Well, there have been many reasons for that. One reason is that the question of social security, of any policy of social security which is to be a national policy for the whole of Canada, is a very large one. It is a question the proportions of which cannot be properly appreciated unless it is studied very carefully and with the aid of expert advice and information. For years to come the membership of this house will be concerned more with social and economic security than with any other question which will be to the fore, once the war is concluded. Anything that is done to-day in the way of making possible a further development on the lines of social security after the war will be of service to the war effort itself; because the men who are at the front are looking to us who are here to see that when they return they are not only given employment of a character befitting their worth, and ample opportunity to work, but that the conditions under which they will have to live hereafter will be different from those they have experienced before.

The government has felt that this question, as I have said, can be appreciated in its full significance only after a very careful study made on the part of members of not only one party but of all parties in the house. It is of very great importance that it should not become a matter of party discussion any more than can possibly be helped. It has been suggested that we should have introduced a bill. Had we introduced a bill what would have been the result? Immediately the whole question would have become one of party discussion. The bill would have been criticized for containing this and for not containing that. My hon. friends know very well how these matters develop in the House of Commons. But presenting the question in a broad way to a committee of this house affords ample opportunity for the study of all aspects of it. It is a matter which affects, in Canada, not only the dominion but the provinces; and, as hon. members well know, there are in these matters of social legislation financial difficulties, matters which relate to sources of revenue and possible changes in the sources of revenue; and constitutional difficulties, matters which relate to the powers of the provinces and the dominion respectively. All these matters lie at the root of efficient administration of any social security measure, and they are questions which can be studied by a committee of this house better than they can be discussed in the first instance on the floor of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: At what stage of this national social insurance is it proposed to consult the provinces with respect to any dominion-provincial scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that is not for me to say. That is one of the things which I should think the committee would be in a better position to say than I would. The provinces will certainly have to be consulted; and that is one of the reasons I think that the matter ought to go before a committee of the house in the first instance. We shall then learn, in the light of the discussions in committee, what in their opinion is the order in which certain steps should be taken and the best time to take them.

May I say to my hon. friends that there is another reason why I feel that this matter should go first of all to a committee. None of us knows the particular trend that this war is going to take. But we do know that this year is going to be the most serious for the Canadian forces of any since the war commenced. What may be happening in April, May or June, sooner or later, no one in this house can say. I for one should be very sorry indeed if either between now and the months I have mentioned, or at that time, or later, or whenever the time may be, while this house is in session, that all our armed forces were engaged in mortal combat with the enemy it should be found that we were or had been spending most of our time discussing in this house whether or not certain aspects of social insurance should be passed immediately; or, worse than all, that we should be convening or having at the same time a conference between the provinces and ourselves on this matter. Everything this year will have to be done in the light of what developments the war takes; and the government, in planning its programme, has had that very much in mind. We want to expedite our programme, but the matters we wish to discuss first and foremost are those which are related immediately to the prosecution of the war. There is a very large financial programme to be considered, the war appropriation bill, the programme with respect to allocation of supplies to the united nations, other policies which bear immediately on the war effort of our country as it is to-day and will have to be taken up before any other questions are begun to be discussed at length. But that does not prevent a committee holding its sittings on the same days, obtaining expert advice, and being in a position before the session is over to come back to this house with recommendations which will help to expedite the legislation which ought to be passed. That is one of the reasons why the matter has been referred to a committee.

I have gone on at greater length than I should have. I will close with just a reference to what seemed an extraordinary statement on the part of my hon. friend in the discussion this afternoon. In his veiled attack on the Minister of Labour—which was equally a veiled attack on the government itself—by mentioning the Minister of Labour, and also the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the one as having been associated with labour in the past, and the other with the farmers in the past, while the rest of the government were not either farmers or working men, my hon. friend put forward a new theory that, namely, of government on an occupational basis.

Let us go over the government as a whole, my hon. friend said; but he picked out just these two. The implication of what he was saying was that there are in the government a number of hon. members who belong to other callings or professions and that we ought here to have a government formed on a basis of occupation. No doubt we shall hear more of that from other members. Well, if that is to be the theory of government from now on, perhaps it would be well at once to point out certain fallacies with respect to it. My hon. friend spoke about himself as a great friend of labour and of the farmers. These were the two groups in the community with whom he had associated all his life. They were the ones to be considered first, and anyone who did not rub shoulders with one or the other of them could not possibly be equal to the task of filling a position in the ministry as it ought to be filled.

I am afraid my hon. friend is not as widely read in social movements and reforms as he ought to be. Speaking of labour, as I think of some of the names that in the past have stood out as beacon lights in the path of reform there comes to my mind first of all the name of Lord Shaftesbury. Lord Shaftesbury has been upheld in all countries as one whose life was devoted to the welfare of the working classes. He was not himself a working man, and most extraordinary of all perhaps is the fact that he was a member of the House of Lords. That at the time was going about as far in the other direction as anyone could possibly go. But according to my hon. friend's doctrine, Lord Shaftesbury would not have made a good minister of labour because he was not a working man; nor would he have made a good minister of agriculture because he had not been brought up on a farm.

I might mention many other names, but I might refer to one name that stands out as perhaps few others in the history of the world, the name of the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln. He belonged to the same profession as my hon. friend. He was a lawyer. But he had a heart and soul for the well-being of the masses of the people, as great as that of any man who ever lived. Take the Prime Minister of Great Britain to-day. He is neither a farmer nor a working man, but will anyone say that Mr. Churchill is devoid of sympathy for the masses of the people, devoid of any knowledge of their interests, and that the sort of talents that Mr. Churchill possesses are not the talents very much needed by men, women and children on farms, in the workshop and everywhere else to-day?

Let me mention another name which my hon. friend very naturally is fond of citing, and which comes equally to the minds of all of us. What about the present President of the United States, Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt? Mr. Roosevelt also belongs to the legal profession. He is a lawyer. Will anyone say that Mr. Roosevelt has not played his full part in the public life not only of his own country but of the world, and that he lacks sympathy for and understanding of the lot of those who work with their hands, those who work on the farm, in the forests, in the mines, on the railways, or in the workshops, or those who go down to the sea in ships? Did it, I wonder, occur to my hon. friend that he was reflecting on every leader his party has had with the exception of two? There have been eight Conservative Prime Ministers in Canada's history, and with the exception of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was a journalist, and Sir Charles Tupper, who was a doctor, all the rest have been lawyers. Did my hon. friend think, when he was speaking, of the friend who is sitting immediately to his left and who so generously provided him with the seat he occupies to-day? That hon. gentleman is also a lawyer. I imagine he has sympathy with labour and with the farmers. He has always told me he had, and I believe he has. I cannot imagine that he would be ruled out of a position in any government if his party ever came back into office.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope my right hon. friend is not being unduly exercised over something which I said with respect to the inclusion of more farmers and labour men in the government. I was very careful, as my hon. friend knows, not to make any reflection on any other members of the government or on these two gentlemen. I simply made it clear that I thought it would strengthen the government to have more farmers and labour men among its number, and I wish to make that clear to the Prime Minister in case he is under some misapprehension.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not under any misapprehension. When it comes to choosing men for government I believe the first essential is character, and that what above all else the people desire in their representatives in a government is heart and brains. These are the qualities which I believe count for most in public life. Nor should my hon. friend rule himself out of any future cabinet because he, too, is a lawyer. I think he does possess broad sympathies, but he should not seek to trade on them for political purposes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think my right hon. friend, in all fairness to me, should withdraw that because I did not have any such design in mind. I was not trying to make political capital, and I think my right hon. friend has overdrawn the picture.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can see I have touched a tender spot, and as my hon. friend has taken on new duties I certainly wish to assure him that I was not reflecting upon him. But he took great care to call attention to the fact that in order to merit the support of labour and of the farming community it was very desirable that one should belong to one or other of these classes.

May I say this in conclusion, as something which it might, perhaps, be well for all of us to keep in mind. A man is not known in his service for others in any more effective way than by his acts and deeds. His words may go a certain length, but the real test of a man is what he stands for in his community irrespective of the particular calling or profession to which he may belong. I share the view first expressed by my hon. friend. I should like to see in this parliament a larger number of men who have grown up in the ranks of labour and who have taken their part in labour's struggle to better its condition. I should like to see a larger number of farmers and a larger number of the representatives of other callings. That will come in time. What particularly I should like to see when this war is over is a larger number of men returned to this parliament who have served their country overseas and have fought for the preservation of freedom. They should be here to help shape the future in which their children will grow up. Above all, I should like to see in this parliament men of broad human sympathies, with hearts large enough to understand something of the pulse of the world to-day, and sympathies broad enough to feel for those who are less privileged or fortunate than themselves.

My hon. friend closed with a quotation from one of Mr. Churchill's speeches, and a very stirring quotation it was. As he spoke to-night about the different classes and as I thought of what counts for most in public life and service, there came to my mind lines which will be familiar to him also, and which I would ask the house to permit me to quote in conclusion. The little poem I should like to quote is by Leigh Hunt. It is entitled "Abou Ben Adhem." It helps to illustrate what I mean.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold:—
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?"—The vision rais'd its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answer'd, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerly still; and said, "I pray thee then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."

The angel wrote, and vanish'd. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And show'd the names whom love of God had bless'd,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): We have listened to-day to two quite long speeches. My time is more limited than that of the speakers who have preceded me, so that I shall be able to touch upon only two or three phases of the problems that confront the country at the present time. I want briefly to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply, because I think, as Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon) said, they made notable contributions to the debate. Also I want to add my word to that of the Prime Minister and say that the new leader of the opposition this afternoon seemed to have all the assurance of an old-timer in the position he now occupies.

This afternoon the Prime Minister suggested that we should keep away as far as possible from anything savouring of party politics. I think the Prime Minister had a good time in his speech to-night, and I noticed that he could not resist the opportunity of taking an occasional crack not only at the new leader of the opposition but at the little group that moved across the floor of the house and now occupy seats to the extreme left in this chamber.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. COLDWELL: No reason whatsoever, except that the Prime Minister was not following his own advice.

An hon. MEMBER: He never does.

Mr. COLDWELL: To-night I want to follow rather closely the speech from the throne. First, let me say that I think we all meet at this time with a feeling of some relief, because the war situation during the time the house has been in recess has taken a decided turn for the better. That does not mean, I believe, that the war is nearing its close. I am in agreement with the Prime Minister when he said that he thought this war was going to be much longer than most people anticipated some time ago. If I may say so, I think when we have Germany and Italy beaten and suing for peace, we shall still have a sizable job to do in the Pacific. Therefore I am not under any illusions as far as the war goes.

I have read the speech from the throne carefully several times since its delivery last Thursday. It is long, and except for occasional statements of obvious facts, is filled with platitudes, which like all platitudes may be nothing more than empty words. If "freedom from want should be the assured possession of all", as the speech from the throne says, then I suggest that "the early appointment of a select committee to examine and report on the most practicable measures of social insurance" should be accompanied by the immediate raising of the pittances paid to our old age pensioners, the veterans of the last war and their widows, and the dependants of those who have lost their lives in this war, and of the beggarly provision of $9 a week for single men and $13 for married men who have already been discharged from the forces.

My knowledge of the record of governments headed by the present Prime Minister makes me very suspicious of proposals to appoint select committees to examine and recommend policies and programmes of social significance. We have had many such committees since 1921. We examined unemployment insurance, for example, in the early 1920's, and an act reached the statute books in 1940. We were promised senate reform in 1921, and in 1943 the senate remains with thirteen seats vacant and is as undemocratic, useless and expensive an institution as could be found anywhere in the civilized world.

Thus the trite statements about the necessity for a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance and a charter of social security for the whole of Canada leave me cold, particularly when I know, as everyone in this house must know, that a comprehensive national scheme like those now in existence in New Zealand, under consideration in Australia, or a consolidation and expansion of social security measures as outlined in the Beveridge report in the United Kingdom, is impossible of enactment by this parliament without a new division of constitutional powers between the federal and provincial governments. I have said, and I repeat to-day, that the government has allowed this problem to continue when an attempt should have been made long ago to find ways and means of straightening out the difficulties and modernizing our constitutional relationships.

These difficulties should be faced by all of us. I know of course there is a fear in some quarters that any change in the constitution might interfere with the preservation of rights which are the very basis of the confederation agreement. It seems to me that such rights could be adequately safeguarded by the enactment of a statute of this parliament, or a Canadian bill of rights, recognizing clearly the rights of the minority, and of the majority as well if you will, as fundamental to the existence of confederation and thereby being the means of setting at rest once for all the very natural fears that exist. But the passing of a comprehensive national social security plan must be preceded by an agreement between this parliament and the provinces that we shall have the right to enact it and put it into effect. A piecemeal plan depending upon grants in aid by this parliament and concurrent legislation by the provinces will in my opinion be ineffective and, indeed, may lead to difficulties between the provinces and the dominion and therefore may produce a dangerous spirit of national disunity.

To a truly comprehensive national plan this party will give its undivided support. Indeed, I think I can say without fear of contradiction that our movement, and particularly our late leader, J. S. Woodsworth, pioneered for old age pensions, unemployment insurance, socialized health services and other forms of social legislation. But because we have asked from time to time on behalf of the Canadian people for bread we are not prepared to accept the offer of crumbs.

Nor do we deceive ourselves into believing that even the most comprehensive plan of social services would solve our post-war problems.

The speech from the throne states that the government has begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war—again the kind of pious platitudes with which the lengthy speech abounds. Have we learned no lessons from our experience during the war? Surely everyone can see that we are doing things to-day that some of the ministers who surround the Prime Minister at the present time said could not be done in the days of peace because we could not find the money with which to do them. Now, with some 700,000 of the fittest of our young folk in uniform, we are producing more than twice as many goods as we produced a few years ago. Indeed, on the estimated production of 1942 we are producing more than two and a half times as many goods as we produced in 1933, when those same young people or their parents rode the rods or languished in unemployment and want. What we are doing to-day to win the war we can and must also do to provide for the welfare of the Canadian people. Our country has been transformed from a land of idle factories, many unemployed and wasting resources, into a country with almost full employment, vastly increased production, and a rising national income. When the war ends, pretence of poverty or an alleged lack of money will be no excuse for intolerable conditions, nor must we allow this excuse to be made although even now the government's own agencies are circularizing the employees of the government, warning them that they ought to buy annuities in order to avoid becoming objects of charity from their relatives or the community in the future.

In spite of the pious platitudes about adequate prices for primary products and full employment, there are unmistakable signs that unemployment and perhaps also ruinous farm prices and poverty are in the offing unless we do more than explore international agreements and domestic measures in the hope of making some undreamed-of discoveries. We dare not delay in formulating policies and programmes that will protect our citizens from the scourges of unemployment relief and poverty. We have found billions annually for the destructive, wasteful and yet very necessary purposes of war. We must assure our people that we can and will find billions annually for the constructive, life-giving and equally necessary purpose of the peaceful development of our land.

Let us not put off the doing of it any longer. Instead of merely appointing a select committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, let us appoint a representative body—and by that I mean really representative, one representative of labour, agriculture, industry and all the principal fields of endeavour in our country—and let that representative body be a body of national planners, as it were; with this addition, the definite commitment by this parliament that Canada is prepared to accept from that body a programme of national social economic development upon which this parliament will spend, in cooperation with the provincial authorities—and I mean that this parliament will appropriate the sum of money —an amount, let us say, of not less than $5,000,000,000 in the first two years after the cessation of hostilities. With that national appropriation in sight the exploration of appropriate domestic policies could proceed with reality, and the boys now fighting our war would have an assurance that we were in earnest regarding expressions of faith in a new and better world. This, may I say, is not a proposal for priming an economic pump. On the contrary, it must be part of a national policy formulated for the social development of our resources and to prevent a return to pre-war capitalism which will mean inevitably a return to pre-war poverty. We dare not continue to allow this nation to remain under the control of monopolistic private enterprise, the power of which has grown apace during this war.

Two things, then, are necessary: first, the pledge of the appropriation of funds sufficient to enable us to undertake immediate post-war national social development projects of housing, electrification, irrigation, reforestation, road building and so on; second, plans for the post-war conversion of publicly-owned war industries and machines for the production of peace-time goods and services. These together with monopolistic industries and financial institutions, which must be socialized, and the development of cooperative institutions, would provide us with the means for the long-term planning of our economic life for the benefit of all.

But can we even hope that the present government will plan constructively for the post-war period? Even during the present war we have had no over-all plan for the effective mobilization of our resources. We have the conscription of man-power for the army, but we have failed to apply the same policy to industry and wealth. The report of the war expenditures committee of this house, presented on Thursday of last week, should not only give us food for thought but jolt us out of our complacency. On the subcommittee which drafted the recommendation to which I wish to draw attention there was no member of this party, but the report confirms the misgivings we have expressed from time to time since the war began. Note this recommendation:

> That as soon as company financial statements are available for the year 1942 a special study should be made of profits, accelerated depreciation and corporate taxation. The question of excess profits and accelerated depreciation has caused the subcommittee considerable concern. Very substantial profits are being earned in some instances far in excess of normal profits and while the Excess Profits Tax Act should result in no one being allowed to retain any excess profits which have been earned yet in many instances we found, as a result of rulings which have been given, companies will at the conclusion of the war own valuable physical assets which have been entirely paid for out of money which would otherwise have been payable as excess profits. Steps should be taken now to prevent sale of physical assets and company reorganizations during the post-war period to escape taxation or to provide for the sterilization of physical assets whose cost has been completely written off through permitting very drastic depreciation write-offs as are now in effect with respect to plant and equipment of war-time industry.

I want particular attention paid to this last sentence:

> The subcommittee found that in regard to industries engaged in war production rulings have been given in most instances permitting plant and machine costs to be written off in three years.

In other words, the cost of these industries and the machines is written off in three years. The Canadian people pay for them in the prices they pay for war goods, and at the end of the three years the corporations own the plants and the machines.

I have often said and I want to emphasize that the profits of industry in this war not only are going to appear in the annual balance sheets of the corporations, but will be much more material, though hidden from our view, when drastic depreciation write-offs have given monopolistic industry the new factories, power plants and machines for which this nation has paid. My opinions have now been confirmed by the report of the subcommittee, which I have quoted.

I am not going to belittle what this nation has done in spite of the lack of any over-all production plan, but the thousands of trucks and the equipment covering acres of railway sidings from Windsor to Montreal are eloquent testimony to what I mean. Over two years ago we were told that this country could not build ocean freighters. Afterwards we went into merchant shipbuilding. To-day we have acres and acres of trucks and other equipment —I have seen them, and so have some hon. members who come from southern Ontario— piled high, because we lack shipping. This is the condition, partly because of the submarine menace, and partly because we had no plan of our own to build ships to transport the goods we were about to make.

Had we had a war-planning body to organize our industry and guide the use of our man-power, we should not now be suffering from acute shortages in so many directions, and have such surpluses in some others. The trouble has been that our country, at the beginning, was encouraged to believe that Canada's main contribution would be made in the raising of armies, whereas we are now beginning to understand that Canada's main contribution must be made in other fields, while we maintain the army approved by parliament, fully reinforced in the theatres of war.

On September 9, 1939, in my speech supporting the declaration of war, I took a line which was then unpopular but which time is vindicating in several particulars. I said, as reported at page 57 of Hansard for 1939, second session:

> We are the nearest dominion to Europe. We have tremendous resources. In modern war huge masses of men are being replaced by mechanized units which require vast quantities of supplies to maintain them in the line. Frenzied demands for the enlistment of more and more men, if granted, may defeat the very object in view, success in this struggle.

Then I quoted a letter from Sir Wilfrid Laurier dated May 15, 1917, in which he said:

> There is a shortage of labour in agriculture and industry, in fact in every field where brawn and muscles are needed, and in the face of this condition there are still people yelling for more men being taken away from occupations in which they are so much needed.

Those were the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917. And with that before us in 1939 we failed to make the inventory we should have made of our resources, our machines and our man-power, and failed to adopt an over-all plan which would have assisted us in meeting some of the difficulties which have overtaken us.

Now again, as then, our farms are depleted of labour badly needed for the production of bacon, dairy and poultry products for overseas. Grain lies under the snow unthreshed, and the government discourages production of wheat which in my opinion will be needed in the future to prevent further mass starvation in many countries when the war ends. This incidentally might be utilized now, and, indeed ought to be used as soon as the submarine menace has been sufficiently overcome to feed our Russian allies, who are putting up such a magnificent fight on behalf of the united nations, and our Chinese allies, many of whom today are suffering the pangs of starvation. Yet we adopt a policy of restriction of a foodstuff which is the most easily stored foodstuff of all. Grain, too, which is stored on the farms is made a burden to producers, while elevator companies are paid storage for the wheat they have received from the farms. The government by order in council decreed last March that essential farm workers should not be drafted into the army, but—and I say this without fear of contradiction—that order is being entirely disregarded by some of its own national war services boards. Young constables of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are sent out to investigate the claims of men applying for postponement and, although they know nothing of the needs of agriculture, their word is accepted instead of the statements of reeves, councillors, doctors and ministers who know whether the applicants are essential on the farm or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not to speak of members of parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, not to speak of members of parliament, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has added. The whole man-power question has been mishandled from the beginning, and grave injury has been done in many instances. The government's industrial labour record is also bad, but I intend to leave that record for a thorough discussion by some of my colleagues.

I wish now to move an amendment to the amendment. This afternoon the leader of the opposition moved an interesting amendment. The three clauses dealt with the use of Canada's man- and woman-power; it asked for a rational labour policy, and it sought to provide adequate measures for the assistance of Canadian agriculture. We are in agreement with those three aims; but in spite of the professions of the party sitting with new garments in this house, I think it is altogether significant that the amendment deals only with human power and agriculture, complaining that these have not been sufficiently mobilized. It fails to make any mention of what I have just referred to in this house, the necessity for the mobilization of industry and wealth. If you are going to demand a labour policy, if you are going to demand an industrial policy on a compulsory basis, then at the same time you must also demand something which is more necessary at the present time because compulsory mobilization of man-power is already in effect. I refer to the compulsory mobilization of industry and wealth. I read the programme of the Winnipeg convention and I think I noticed two little words. After calling for the mobilization of man-power, the leader of the opposition, this afternoon, called for the mobilization of industry and wealth, "where necessary." I suspected that there was a joker in the policy adopted by the convention which was attended by my hon. friends, and therefore I want to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That the motion be further amended by adding to the amendment the following words,—

"And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service."

I am not going to deal to-night with the pressing need for a reduction of farm debt because, as I said before, my time is not unlimited. I shall not deal with the question of adequate parity prices for agricultural products, because this will be dealt with by some of my colleagues. But I do wish to say a few words about the Casablanca conference about which the Prime Minister made some explanation to-night. This was a conference between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States. We share the satisfaction expressed in the speech from the throne; but we regret, because of circumstances of course, that Premier Stalin and Generalissimo Chiang-Kai-Shek were not present. We feel that if they could not have been present themselves, they might have been represented there.

The remarkably successful invasion of north Africa by Anglo-American armies was one of the most remarkable feats of organization the world has ever seen and one to which we should pay tribute. But the situation which developed thereafter, I believe, filled everyone with any sense of democracy with grave apprehension. I know it did me. Nor has that apprehension been allayed by the retention in places of great power of former French collaborationists with the nazis. The appointment as Governor of Algiers of Peyrouton, the friend of Pierre Flandin, the former minister of the interior of the Vichy government and former minister to Argentina, if I am not mistaken, has strengthened this feeling of misgiving across the world.

For example, we know that Jewish refugees from nazi aggression and volunteers who fought against the fascist and nazi troops in Spain when this war was being rehearsed are still languishing in north African prison camps under conditions which are reported to be particularly vile. It seems to me that Canada, as one of the united nations with her sons and her materials fighting in every quarter of the globe, has earned the right to make herself heard on behalf of persecuted democrats and oppressed minorities wherever they may be found. I want to go further than that and say that in my opinion the time has arrived when Canada as one of the smaller nations sharing the sacrifices of this war should demand on her own behalf and on behalf of all the small nations a voice in the inner councils of the united nations. I realize, of course, as the Prime Minister has said, that it is impossible to call together the representatives of all the nations involved in this war on every occasion, but I certainly think a meeting of the nations should be held in the near future, at which meeting the nations themselves could appoint a small executive council to carry on with the conduct and strategy of the war.

I know that at least one of our great allies, China, feels the need for the formation of an executive council of the united nations. Such a body is essential if we are to achieve greater unification and closer cooperation in the formulation of a more effective war strategy, a clearer understanding of war aims and a more regular exchange of views regarding the post-war world for which the democratic peoples are fighting. I take it that the democratic peoples know, in a vague sort of way it is true, the kind of world for which they are fighting. Such a council should be concerned, too, with evolving an international instrument capable of dispensing justice and enforcing law and order in the post-war world.

These are not Anglo-American problems alone; they are the common problems of all the united nations. It is sometimes argued that we are represented now by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. That is not my view, nor is it the view of Australia, as Prime Minister Curtin's speech to the people of the United States made abundantly clear. Those of us who heard that speech last week will remember the unmistakable manner in which he expressed his views over the air, speaking not to the government of the United States, not to its great President, but, as he said, appealing directly to the people of the United States. I suggest that Canada should join her voice to those of China, Australia and the other nations who are urging the formation of an executive council of the united nations. A united purpose to win the war, a united purpose to rebuild the world is essential to the well-being of mankind, but it is manifestly impossible to go into these matters at length to-day. I am asking the Prime Minister now to arrange for an early debate on the place of Canada in the council and strategy of the united nations.

It is, I think, significant that last year the speech from the throne made no reference to the fate of our army which we had dispatched to Hong Kong, and this year no reference is made to the gallant and major part played by the Canadian soldiers at Dieppe. I understand that the Dieppe attack was reviewed carefully at Westminster. It should be reviewed equally carefully by this house, because in the main our own men were involved. This house, too, should be made aware of the extent of the submarine menace to our shipping, of the steps taken to defend our coasts and coastal waters, and to what extent, if at all, we rely on the United States army for the defence of any of the vital strategic defence areas of this country or just beyond it. The government must decide whether all this should be done in open or closed session, but the time has come when hon. members should insist on a complete report to this parliament. In view of Canada's contribution to the common cause we should not allow ourselves to become the mere satellite of any of our major allies. Because of our peculiar position between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations, because of the fact that we are not interested in the building up of any sort of imperialism, and because of the fact that across the north of our country stretches the main air route between the great populated areas of the world, Canada's voice may be of more importance in the future than most of us can realize now.

My time is just about up, but in my concluding remarks there are one or two other things that I want to say. I am glad to note that the Prime Minister is thinking of relieving his ministers of some of the work and duties in this house. We are told in the speech from the throne that assistance will be given to them. I have suggested on more than one occasion in former years that the government adopt in this house the British system of under-secretaries, not only because I believe it would relieve the ministers, but because I believe it is good that the younger members of the party in power should have an opportunity of gaining that experience which is essential in an institution of this description. I therefore am very glad to welcome the proposal of the Prime Minister. It has been made before; it has been supported in this house from all quarters of the house before; and I sincerely hope that this time the suggestion will be carried out, not only as a war measure but as a policy of future governments in this country.

I was disappointed, however, to hear the Prime Minister say that he thought a revision of the rules of the house ought not to be undertaken during this period of war. I saw, as did the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) who is sitting right opposite me tonight, His Majesty the King read the speech from the throne in Great Britain at eleven o'clock one morning. We went to the commons gallery and we heard the mover and the seconder of the address; we heard the leader of the Labour opposition, we heard the leader of the Liberal party; we heard the first ten minutes of Mr. Churchill's speech as Prime Minister; and we were on our way to luncheon shortly after one o'clock. In two hours that business had passed through the British house. I have read the rules of some of our sister nations, New Zealand, for example, where the rules have been changed in comparatively recent years; and in my opinion if we would modernize the rules we could do very much in this house without interfering whatsoever with freedom of expression or freedom of speech.

After what I have said, I do not want to transgress the rules of the house by going beyond my time limit as I am apt to do; but I want to say again, Mr. Speaker, that other matters connected with the government's proposals will be dealt with by my colleagues when they have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this is the first full day of the session and I am sure nearly everyone is weary, I wonder if it would be asking too much to ask Your Honour to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is rather hard for Your Honour to call it eleven o'clock, but if my hon. friend would like to move the adjournment of the debate I do not think there would be any objection.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Tuesday, February 2, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION FOR FEMALE JURORS IN TRIAL OF FEMALE PERSON

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The bill will enable women to serve on juries in criminal cases. I call the attention of the house to the fact that the right of female persons to sit on juries is subject to section 921 of the code, which reads:

> Every person qualified and summoned as a grand or petit juror, according to the laws in force for the time being in any province of Canada, shall be duly qualified to serve as such juror in criminal cases in that province.

The reason for that will be found in section 92, item 14, of the British North America Act, which provides that:

> The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts . . .

—shall be a subject upon which the legislatures may exclusively make laws. For instance, the statutes of Ontario relating to the constitution of juries, and fixing qualifications, contemplate the fact that jurors are male persons. This bill will be effective only in so far as the provincial legislatures agree to amend their own acts in consequence of such a federal enactment. Women serve in the high court of parliament and there is no reason why they should not serve on juries. A similar bill was brought forward in 1927-28 and it was stated then that women were too temperamental, but they are no more temperamental than some of the men attending some of the conventions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEBT LEGISLATION

DISALLOWANCE OF ALBERTA STATUTE BY JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the decision handed down by the judicial committee of the privy council regarding Alberta's debt adjustment legislation and its consequent effects upon the debt adjustment legislation of the other prairie provinces, will the Minister of Justice give the house some assurance that steps will be taken by the federal government to protect the farm debtors who will otherwise be left to the tender mercies of their creditors?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is clearly a question that should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the Minister of Justice when he will make some statement on the farm debt situation, which is very pressing in the west? The minister promised in the latter part of July—

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have already said, I think that is a question that should be put on the order paper.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister make a statement as to when he will say something in the house?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the considerable number of questions, and notices of motions for the production of papers, which have already been placed upon the order paper. During the past two sessions it has been arranged, I believe, by consent, that these questions and motions should not await the conclusion of the debate on the address. I suggest to the Prime Minister that an opportunity be provided later this week for the presentation of answers to the questions on the order paper and for the passing of the various motions for the production of papers. Many of them deal with matters of considerable importance upon which members of the house would wish to have information at the earliest possible day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I had intended to say to my hon. friend before he brought up the question that I thought it would be advisable to follow in the course of the debate on the address the practice which we followed last session of fixing one day in the week on which questions and notices of motions for the production of papers might be considered. I had in mind suggesting Monday of next week, but if my hon. friend prefers Friday of this week, that will be equally acceptable. It might be understood that it will be Friday.

ESTIMATES AND WAR APPROPRIATION BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct three brief questions to the Minister of Finance:

1. When does he anticipate that the ordinary estimates will be tabled?

2. Does the minister anticipate that the war appropriation bill for the next fiscal year will be presented immediately upon the conclusion of the debate on the address?

3. Does the minister anticipate that a supplementary war appropriation bill, for the present fiscal year, will be necessary?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The answer to the first question is that the estimates will be tabled at the conclusion of the debate on the address, when the address is adopted. The answer to the second question is that the war appropriation bill for the coming year will, I anticipate, also be introduced at that time. The answer to the third question is that a supplementary war appropriation bill will be necessary.

I should like to add that it is of very great importance, for reasons that I think will become apparent when I have an opportunity to explain the matter, that the war appropriation bill be introduced at the earliest possible moment, as well as the supplementary war appropriation. I do not say this with a view of urging hon. members unduly to shorten this debate; I am simply bringing the fact to their attention.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister does not intimate that they should do so?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is just intimating that the money is all gone.

PRISONERS OF WAR

SHACKLING OF CANADIANS IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Will he be in a position shortly to give the house some information about the shackling of Canadian prisoners of war by Germany?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will make a statement at some later date, and will try to make it at an appropriate time.

THE WAR

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION OF SUBMARINE MENACE AND COASTAL DEFENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would be prepared to set aside a time for some debate on the war situation and the submarine menace with respect to our own coastal defences, as I suggested in my remarks last evening. Has the Prime Minister given any consideration to that suggestion, or would he do so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have been giving careful consideration to the whole matter of the procedure of the session. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has just told the house that there are very special reasons why the war appropriation bill and some other measures should be brought down as soon as possible. It is desirable that the government should have very much in mind the time that may be taken in discussion of other measures, also the imperative nature of some of the measures that may have been considered. If my hon. friend or hon. members feel that it is desirable to have a discussion on such matters as the submarine menace, the defence of our coasts and the like, I would feel that such discussion ought to come at a time which will admit of discussion being comprehensive. I would not like to make just a bare statement to the house. If it is to be a comprehensive discussion we shall have to find a time that will fit into the procedure of the house generally. That may mean that some days will have to elapse before any discussion can take place.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF CANADA

EXTENSION OF TERM OF OFFICE FOR FOUR YEARS FROM JANUARY 7, 1940

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend an act respecting the Chief Justice of Canada.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise not for the purpose of opposing this measure, but rather to explore the position which the government has taken, to ask some questions, obtain some information, if possible and make some general observations.

I assume that the government in introducing this bill early in the session and asking for precedence for it does so because it is a matter of urgency. The situation is that for the present at least this country has no chief justice of the supreme court. That of course is not a calamitous matter, but it is one which I think should be corrected at soon as possible.

At the outset I should like to ask whether the chief justice himself, for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, and for whom I think generally speaking all members of the bar from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and especially those who have had the privilege of practising before him, have very great admiration, is a willing party to this extension of his period of office; or is this a movement from within the ranks of the government? If so, for what purpose? Is it to serve an ulterior motive, is there anything behind or dehors as to the suggestion that the term of office of the chief justice should be extended for a further period?

I have always thought that the policy behind the statute which was passed by this parliament several years ago, whereby judges of courts created under the jurisdiction and authority of the dominion parliament should retire at the age of seventy-five was wise, and under ordinary circumstances should prevail, and should not be departed from other than in the most exceptional circumstances. I remember well the time that law was put on the statute book and of some of the reasons therefor. I am not going back into ancient history to indicate how certain judges were legislated out of office. I have never been in sympathy with the theory that justices of the provincial courts are there for life, so long as they are capable of carrying on, on the ground that there is an implied contract that they should so remain. I have an idea that the judiciary would be immeasurably strengthened if some of the younger men of the profession were afforded opportunity to ascend the judicial bench and wear the ermine while still in the prime of life, rather than that these places should be filled by men who have passed the allotted tenure. I think there will be general agreement in that. I do not understand how a man of eighty or more—perhaps I am judging by myself—can bring to bear upon the duties of his office as good an intellect as a man of forty-five, a man in the prime of life. In this country we are too much inclined to delay appointment until the age of fifty has been exceeded. I am glad to see that recently a distinguished member of the Ontario bar who is on the right side of fifty has been appointed to the supreme court of that province. As I scan the list of judges of some of our provinces I am reminded that we have perhaps too many old men. I do not say that in any spirit of disrespect; I am merely attempting to state a fact and support a principle.

I suggest that unless there are urgent reasons why this measure should be passed it should perhaps be reconsidered in the light of the theory I have endeavoured, perhaps inadequately, to bring forward.

There is another aspect of the matter. I say this with the greatest respect. I say to the Minister of Justice and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that in my view, which may not mean very much, and in the view of many who practise before the Supreme Court of Canada, and of the profession as a whole, the supreme court bench could well be strengthened. I do not want anyone to interpret that as a reflection upon any gentleman who has the honour to occupy a seat on that bench. If the Supreme Court of Canada, which is the highest judicial tribunal in our country, has among its membership the very best men drawn from the profession and from the appellate courts of the provinces, then I suggest to the Minister of Justice that there will be fewer appeals to the privy council, at least in commercial cases. I have had some experience in that regard in the last two or three years, rather sad ones in both instances, I may add, because we lost the appeals when the cases got over there. I am just throwing out this suggestion to the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —I mean the Minister of Justice; the Minister of Finance has enough burdens on his shoulders without being called upon to carry this one. I should like to say a word for the younger men who have the ambition to become judges. Certainly they will do their best if they are appointed while still in the prime of life, instead of waiting until they are sixty or what not. That will not bar the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), in connection with whom I made a prediction last year. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) has already been given his reward, which is of the very highest category, as I also predicted. But I am serious in what I have to say with respect to the appointment of members of our judiciary. Give the younger men a chance; they will grow in stature day by day and will become greater judges. I offer these remarks to the Minister of Justice in the best of good spirit, and I hope he will give consideration to them. In the meantime I should like to know what is the position with respect to Sir Lyman Duff.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to support the former leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), in the point of view which he has taken. I believe the matter should be reconsidered. I was here when the original bill was introduced in 1939, when the present chief justice had attained the age of seventy-five. At that time parliament saw fit to continue him in that position for another three years. Consequently the chief justice is now that much older, and the present bill extends his term for another year.

I know there are exceptional cases in which men who have long since passed the allotted span of life are able to render signal service in the field in which they serve, but under the circumstances what the previous speaker said is relevant to the case. I do not believe the people of Canada would desire or approve an extension when there are so many able and capable younger men who could fill the position adequately. I have heard criticisms, not so much of Supreme Court of Canada as of other courts, because aged judges have been unable to pay concentrated attention to the arguments presented. On one or two occasions on which I have had the opportunity of following cases before some judges I have noticed that, particularly toward late afternoon, the aged justice did not seem to hear what was being said, if I may put it in that way. Consequently, when judges are interpreting law which may have an effect not only in the present but may create precedents for the future, parliament should endeavour to have on the bench men in the prime of physical and intellectual life.

I rise to support the plea that this bill be not proceeded with—not because I have any personal criticism of the present Chief Justice of Canada, but rather because I think it is in the public interest that parliament should not consent to this proposal and create another precedent. I may say that those of us who followed with great interest the recent history of the United States noticed how the supreme court of that country blocked progressive measures for some time until in his wisdom, and exercising his powers, the President of that country appointed a group of younger and more progressive men, with most beneficial results to the great republic to the south. When a man has reached the age of seventy-eight, as in this case, the government ought not to ask one so far advanced in the eventide of life to continue in a position which I imagine is, in one sense, arduous physically, and certainly intellectually. In view of the fact that younger men are available who have had experience on the various benches of the country, instead of approving this proposal the government should reconsider the bill and make an effort to appoint a younger person to this, one of the most important positions in the country.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have not been able to determine by any process of reflection why this bill is brought in. I will grant that this gentleman may have done his work exceedingly well and merited the gratitude of the country, but a singular exception is being made in this case. When no apparent reason exists why such a thing should be done, I become suspicious. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I am going to oppose the bill.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill has been before the house during discussion of the justice estimates for the past ten years. I have no particular objection to extending the term of the chief justice for another year, but I want to point out one important principle. This bill applies to a gentleman who is one of the greatest jurists in our history, a very able judge who has performed his legal duties excellently. But I should like to refer to a bill which has been before the house for the last ten years, to amend the Judges' Act, as to judges serving on political commissions. One section of that bill provides that judges shall not be allowed to sit on various political commissions appointed by municipalities, by provinces and by the dominion. As I have pointed out to the present hon. and learned attorney general and to his predecessors for the last ten years, the taking of judges from their judicial duties to serve on these commissions has seriously interfered with the administration of the law courts. They are asked to leave their judicial duties and take appointments to consider many matters under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. In the province of Ontario this practice has seriously interfered with the administration of justice. As we know, there are twelve high court judges on circuit in that province, some of whom at times have been ill, with the result that the bulk of the work has had to be done by the others, and with the judges absent on commissions the work is delayed.

Then we come to the county court judges in Canada, the appointments of whom are controlled by the Minister of Justice. I could mention one able judge in the county of York, Judge Morson, who, although over the age limit when he was retired trained thirty or forty hon. members I see in the house to-day as students at law. It takes five or six men to do his work now, and even then they cannot do it. I ask the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) if that is not right; he knows it. In these days some members of the county court bench are serving on rent commissions, and blackouts and various other commissions. Some of them in Ontario do nothing else but serve on commissions about blackouts. Others are out on food and rent control, with the result that some of them have scarcely ever tried a case.

We should follow the law of England, and make it clear that once judges are appointed they shall act continuously as judicial officers. Under section 91 of the British North America Act they have certain powers in the federal law courts. Then, in addition, powers are given them under section 92 of the British North America Act. Some of these learned gentlemen are away from their judicial duties for long periods of time, and this condition at times seriously interferes with the proper administration of justice in the courts in Canada. Only recently in Ontario on two or three occasions courts have had to adjourn because of the condition I have described. I ask the minister to consider these points in connection with the whole question of law reform.

I have no particular objection to the bill. I have known the chief justice of this court for a long time, but I believe the principle I have enunciated is a wise one, namely that once judges leave political life and legal practice they should be placed in their positions with good salaries, and that careful provision should be made for them by the government so that we may have a proper judicial service, as we have had in the past. I do not agree with part of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has to say on the point as to the United States. He was referring to the United States, of course. Everybody in the United States who becomes a lawyer is called judge—because if he is not a judge to-day, certainly he hopes to be a judge to-morrow on a change of government. We in Canada are also becoming a nation of judges.

I do ask the Minister of Justice to consider these points in connection with law reform and any appointments he may make. I can tell him this, that some of the younger men who have been appointed to the bench cannot stand the pace of attending the circuit courts throughout the country; they find particularly trying the heavy assize lists in Ontario. Some of them have not the physical strength to stand it as did some of the older judges of a few years ago, such as Judge Morson and others I could mention.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, as an official witness on the Hong Kong inquiry and having read in some detail the evidence there given, I regret that I cannot reconcile that with the official report; and I am therefore forced to oppose the bill.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I express my appreciation of the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) with respect to the bill. I can assure him that with all the general principles he has enunciated I am in entire agreement. As he himself has said, there are occasions which call for some exceptions to even the best of rules.

The hon. member inquired whether this legislation was introduced with the consent of the right hon. the Chief Justice of Canada, and whether or not there was any ulterior purpose to be served by extending his term of office for another year. I give him my assurance that there is no ulterior purpose whatsoever. The only reason for the introduction of the bill is that it was found that the health of the right hon. the chief justice was remarkably good, and at the end of the last calendar year he was asked if in the event of parliament agreeing to the extension of the term, he would consent to perform for a further period the duties connected with the chief-justiceship.

As hon. members are aware, three years ago the right hon. the chief justice was entitled by law to retire with a retiring allowance equal to his full salary—to all indemnity whatsoever he received from the crown in his capacity of chief justice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is scarcely accurate. He was obliged to retire when he attained the age of seventy-five years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He would have been obliged to retire, had not parliament six months before the time arrived enacted the legislation we now ask parliament to amend. At that time, upon his reaching the age of seventy-five years, notwithstanding the legislation passed by parliament in the preceding July, he would have been entitled to retire on full salary—a retiring allowance equal to every dollar he was entitled to receive as chief justice of the country. The country was then at war. The government had already adopted its policy involving the abrogation of the rule under which civil servants under normal circumstances retire at sixty-five years. In those instances where civil servants were considered fit to carry on their work for a further period, they were permitted to do so.

The chief justice consented in 1940 to remain in office, and up to the end of 1942 he continued to perform the duties of his office, under conditions which meant that an additional payment equal to the amount fixed for the office was not being made annually by the Minister of Finance. It is perhaps because of that that the hon. member for York-Sunbury referred to the minister. Up to the present time the Department of Finance has been relieved of a burden of $45,000.

At the end of 1942, the health of the chief justice appearing quite as good as it had been at any time subsequent to July, 1939, when the legislation was passed, the Prime Minister asked him if he would continue for a further period, if it were the will of parliament that he should do so. He gave his consent.

The hon. member has suggested that the Supreme Court of Canada might possibly be strengthened. I am sure he did not intend to suggest it would be strengthened by placing any other Canadian jurist in the position of the present chief justice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite so.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure the hon. member and all other hon. members agree that this generation in Canada knows no greater jurist than the present chief justice. No one at this time is better qualified than he is to fill the office, and the placing of any other Canadian jurist in his seat would not in any way strengthen the court.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

These being the facts, it was felt that in view of present conditions, when it is the duty of each of us to contribute to the service of his country in whatever capacity he may be best able to serve, it was indeed fitting to ask parliament further to amend the act so that the chief justice could continue for another year to perform services which are of such great value to the Canadian nation.

Mr. GRAYDON: What would be the normal retiring allowance of the chief justice?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under present legislation the normal retiring allowance for justices appointed since 1926 is a portion only of their salaries while in office. But for those appointed to the bench prior to that date the retiring allowance is the full salary.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the distinction?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a distinction between getting it all or getting only a part.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the portion?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The maximum for those appointed since 1926 is two-thirds, while for those who would come under the provisions of the former law it is one hundred per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Provided they have put in a certain number of years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The present chief justice is entitled by law to an allowance equal to his full salary, and he could have taken that at any time since January 7, 1940. There has not been a day in that period when he was not entitled to retire and to receive an allowance equal to his full salary for life.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, said that he did not think the people of Canada would approve the continuance of the chief justice in office, and that he would prefer to see a younger man appointed thereto at this time. That may be the opinion of the hon. member, but from conversations I have had with many members of the legal profession since the announcement was made at Christmas time that the government would introduce this legislation it does not appear to me that that is the opinion of the profession. I have met no one who did not rejoice at the thought that the health of the chief justice was such that this move could be contemplated.

Mr. HOMUTH: More than the legal profession should be considered in this matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly, and the representatives of the people of Canada here in this house are asked at this time to express the opinion of those whom they represent.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said that on reflection he saw no reason for this bill. I have no other reason to offer than the opinion I hold that the chief justice is still in such a condition of mental and physical well-being that he can well carry on the duties of this high office. It is my belief at this time that any man able to perform a service for his country should do so.

I shall not fail to give consideration to the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), but even though we were all in agreement with him they could hardly find an appropriate place in a discussion of this bill. They will come up for consideration on another occasion. I do not think the hon. member himself would suggest that they could be implemented in this bill, the sole purpose of which is to amend an act passed in 1939 by substituting the word "four" for the word "three".

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Donnelly in the chair.

On section 1—Term of office extended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to make it clear, if I did not do so in my remarks on the second reading of the bill, that when I intimated that in my opinion this court should be strengthened I had no idea of suggesting that it would be strengthened by the retirement of His Lordship the Chief Justice. The Minister of Justice has correctly interpreted my position in that respect, and I have given effect to my view by voting for the second reading. At the moment I felt somewhat at a loss as to what should be done, but I have no doubt about what my course ought to be having regard to the esteem in which I hold the chief justice. On the general principle of this bill, however, I think I am just as right as any man can possibly be on any question about which there may be more than one opinion, and I do think that we ought to have an undertaking from the government, while the house is still in committee, that this will be the last time of asking as a matter of precedent. It should not go any further. The court should be recuperated and built up by a system of promotion, if possible by promotion from the lower appellate court. I wanted to make that explanation because what I meant might be open to misinterpretation. I do say that this court can be immeasurably strengthened by the addition of new blood from the younger members of the bench and bar. With that I shall be content.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can assure my hon. friend that whenever the time comes for recommendations to the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada, if I am in the office of minister of justice, I will endeavour to make the best possible recommendations in the interests of the Canadian public. I appreciate, as does my hon. friend, how important it is to the Canadian public that the supreme court should be a strong court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about a possible recurrence of this legislation? I should like to make it plain that while I should be embarrassed in having to vote against a repetition of this measure, on account of the personality involved, with respect to the principle I shall have no doubt. This should not be repeated another year. I should like to have some assurance now from the Minister of Justice that it will not be repeated. Three years ago when the original bill was passed I was not in the house. I should probably have voted for that bill. I have voted for this bill. I serve notice on the government, however, that it ought not to repeat this another year. There are men on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada who have a right to aspire to the position of chief justice before they too are ready to retire.

Mr. CHURCH: Law reform is one of the most important matters which Britain has had before it for the last twenty years, but I have yet to see any measure of law reform brought down in this house since I have been a member. My objection to the bill is to judges serving on commissions, away from their judicial duties. I would ask the Minister of Justice to take up this matter. It is not proper. We have one judge who had been trying cases and who is now in Australia making speeches. I may tell the Minister of Justice that this country wants a vast measure of law reform all along the line, and it has been a long time coming. The minister has been in office about a year and I hope he will bring down some general measure of law reform. I suggest that judges should be kept from serving on commissions and there should be a measure of general law reform in the interests of the working classes. We have had no such reform. That was a live question in England for years before the war started and they adopted vast measures of reform to bring the law up to date in many respects. I urge upon the minister the consideration of this question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Following what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has said, I should like to add a few words with respect to law reform. I shall not say much because I do not intend making any lengthy address at this stage of the proceedings. What the hon. member says is quite true, but there is something further to be said, and I bring the matter up at this early stage of the session so that the Minister of Justice will have ample notice with a view to having it considered by the house at some appropriate time.

A good many complaints have been made with respect to a practice of some of our judges in certain sections, and this is not confined entirely to county court judges or supreme court or appellate judges. The complaint is that in many parts of Canada there have been extraordinary delays in the handing down of judgments. We might well ask the Minister of Justice to make a survey across Canada if it is within his jurisdiction to do so. I know he will shake his head and say it is not. But the government has assumed extensive powers and jurisdiction over many things in this wartime period and I ask the minister to consider a survey across the country to find out what judges are handing down their judgments within a reasonable time and those who are unreasonably delaying judgments. It is a matter that affects not only those of the legal profession—that would not be of the same importance; it is of great importance to litigants, to the ordinary citizens of the country. I am quite sure that there are members of this house on all sides who could point to scores of instances in which actual injustice has been suffered by litigants owing to the failure of the bench to hand down judgments within a reasonable time. Very often judges who have the most to do bring down their judgments most quickly. The minister may expect the question to be raised later in the session, and I wish to warn him so that some consideration will actually be given to it.

Another point I wish to mention is very appropriate in view of the national social legislation proposed in the speech from the throne. We are going to try in this country, and I hope we shall succeed, to bring greater equality of opportunity and security to the men and women of Canada. I am raising my voice to-day not so much against the system that prevails with respect to judges of our courts as against the inequality which exists in respect to retiring allowances for other persons who are just as worthy. It is not showing a very good example to single out certain persons in Canada for retiring allowances up to one hundred per cent, and in other cases, as the minister said in answer to my question, two-thirds of their salaries, and to be so tardy in seeing to it that other sections of our population are given something more than a bare subsistence when they retire, sometimes at a much earlier age. I bring that up not with any idea of being small or mean or making any reflection on our judiciary, because I realize that many men are attracted to the judiciary by the provision for substantial retiring allowances. But while keeping that aspect of the matter fully in mind, I submit we should not single out any particular class for such ample retiring allowances without considering carefully the manner in which other classes who are just as worthy are treated in this regard. I hope that the type of security which others receive compared with that provided for those who sit on the bench may be given consideration—and this of course is no reflection whatever upon the bench.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope that the matter to which the hon. member has referred will be fully considered by the select committee that is to be appointed to deal with all matters of social security. It is certainly an interesting point, and I am sure the select committee will not fail to deal with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is no reflection upon any individual to suggest that with the passing of the years it is not always possible to discharge serious and onerous duties with the same powers of concentration as one had in earlier years. This is particularly important in view of the fact that for some years in Canada and the United States the powers of those who interpret the law have been of tremendous social significance to those countries. The decisions of the person holding the position of Chief Justice of Canada, by virtue of the leadership which he gives through his judicial interpretations, have a tremendous effect upon the operation of legislation that has been passed and legislation that will be passed. It is, therefore, important that men should not be kept in such an important office beyond the time during which they can normally bring their full energy and powers to bear upon the task assigned to them.

Some mention has been made of the Hong Kong report. I have no wish to go back into that, but hon. members may recall that I made a statement to this house on July 27 last, found in Hansard at page 4794. I said then:

> I should like to refer particularly in connection with this question of reinforcements to a matter which affects myself. I note that the commissioner did me the honour of quoting me on page 39 of the appendix. He stated that all the officers had completed their training—that is, reinforcement officers—and he says:
> > In general, this opinion was confirmed by Mr. T. C. Douglas, M.P., who knew five of these officers and saw them shortly before they left for Hong Kong.
> That is one of the things which amazed me most in this report. If the rest of the evidence presented to the commissioner was interpreted with as prejudiced a point of view as the evidence I submitted, I have grave doubts about this report. I went before the commission at the suggestion of counsel for the commission. The commissioner was very kind to me, and seemed to be anxious to get all the facts. I told him what little I knew: that in October, 1940, I went into a reserve officers' training camp with some of these men. These men had thirty days' training in squad drill, ordinary rifle drill, and some elementary map-reading. They had never fired a Bren gun, a machine gun, or pistol when they came out. They went back to civilian occupations and were picked up again next spring and sent to Gordon Head, there to take a four months' course. They were then transferred to the Winnipeg Grenadiers and sent overseas. These officers were naturally perturbed—and I explained this to the commissioner—at the prospect of taking men into action after they themselves had received in total about five months' training, one month as reserve officers and four months to qualify as active officers. They had no knowledge of mortars and only a limited amount of training in the handling of platoon weapons. In giving this evidence I tried to be fair to these men. I went on to point out that these men were not cowards; they were not perturbed about the danger to themselves; they were perturbed about the fact that they would be leading men and they doubted if they were qualified to do so. The commissioner interprets my remarks by saying only this:

> He stated that they were overjoyed at the prospect of going into more active service and they were satisfied with their training courses as regards the handling of men and general instructions, although they had some uncertainty about their experience in operational manoeuvres.

It is difficult for me to understand that statement in the light of the evidence which I attempted to give.

It seems to me that there can be only two explanations of that statement in the commissioner's report. Either there was inability to interpret the evidence given, or, what seems the more likely, the appendix was not written by the commissioner. It was not signed by him. It will be remembered that the report consisted of only a few pages, but there were forty or fifty pages of appendix. That part was not signed by the commissioner, although of course he was technically responsible for it. Looking at it as generously as possible, I should like to think that probably it was drawn up by others on his staff.

Whatever may be the explanation, a man who has reached this time of life has neither the virility nor the power of mental concentration to deal with very complex matters. Particularly is this important at the present time when questions of the division of power between the provincial and federal governments will have to receive so much consideration. I referred this afternoon to the farm debt legislation; it is a very serious question in the west. There is also the question of the division of powers with reference to social security legislation and post-war reconstruction. This country needs in the Supreme Court of Canada not only men who can bring a new point of view, but men who still have sufficient physical and mental vigour to apply themselves strenuously to that task. That is why, without casting any reflection whatsoever upon the gentleman who now holds this high office, I for one am opposing this measure.

Mr. HANSELL: There is one matter in respect to this legislation that I do not understand, and it fills my mind with misgiving. Why is the term of office extended for only one year?

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

My point is simply this. I believe the government should be perfectly open and aboveboard with the members of the house in respect to this matter. Personally I do not like to entertain any unwarranted suspicions; to do so is not conducive to clear thinking. The other day the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister urged that we do our best to avoid political discussions here. Well, we should all like to do that, and we shall all try our best. We ourselves want to be free from political discussion. But it is equally true that we want to be free from any misgivings as to the motive behind this or that legislation. I believe the government should be free to tell us exactly why they are desirous of extending the term of this office for one year instead of, say, four or five years. I have nothing to say with regard to the ability of the Chief Justice of Canada; though he has reached a ripe old age, sometimes wisdom grows with age, and when one's mind is particularly alert perhaps we have nothing to fear. I am not arguing along that line; I am not adopting a line of argument similar to that which has been advanced by other hon. members, though their argument may be sound. The Minister of Justice has tried to dispel our misgivings in that regard by telling hon. members that in spite of the age of this very honourable gentleman he is still in fair health and mentally alert. Surely if that be so, one year is not going to make very much difference. Why does not the act continue him in office for four or five years? It is for just one year, just twelve short months. Would the government care to tell the committee why that should be so? Is it that they have some special work they wish to have done by the Chief Justice of Canada during the coming year? Is it that they would like to keep the office intact for some specific time for some specific reason? If so, why not be frank about it and tell us?

There is another point that concerns me. Perhaps I am not versed in all the matters of parliamentary procedure, but when the second reading of this bill was moved to-day I could not help asking myself why all the rush. It is generally conceded that the debate on the address should be concluded and the decks cleared for legislation. When I came down to the building to-day I expected that the first order of business would be the debate on the address, and that I would have the privilege of listening to my leader in this chamber. Instead, however, this bill is placed before us. Would two or three weeks make any difference? I may be over-suspicious along these lines, and that is something we want to avoid. Let us not have any misgivings. Will the Minister of Justice tell us frankly why we are asked to pass this bill at this particular time, and why he is only asking for one year's extension of the term of this honourable gentleman, who, he says, is physically able to carry on his duties and mentally alert in spite of his age?

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the Minister of Justice tell the committee what emoluments are received by the Chief Justice of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In all, $15,000, which includes the salary he receives as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I understand that if he is asked to undertake any other work, such as the Hong Kong inquiry, there is no further payment for services rendered in that connection?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: None whatsoever.

Mr. HANSELL: Then, following the minister's reply to that question, the reason for the extension of the term of office cannot be that this gentleman needs the money. Now will the minister tell us the reason?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. gentleman wishes me to state the facts I shall do so, and I think his misgivings will be entirely dispelled. There is no special work the government intends to ask the supreme court or the Chief Justice of Canada to do. There is no one for whom the office is being kept intact. The reason the house was asked to consider the bill at this time was given in the opening remarks of the former leader of the opposition. At the present time Canada is without a chief justice. It was thought that this bill would not be of a controversial nature, that it might be passed in a very short time; and the next clause of the bill proposes that it be made retroactive to January 7, 1943, from which date it will operate for one year. The other question was why one year is being suggested. It is that parliament will be meeting again within a year, and it was not considered advisable at this time to ask parliament to commit itself for more than one year.

Mr. COLDWELL: How does the department evaluate the work of judges? I am not thinking only of the work of the chief justice, but how is an estimate made of the capabilities of judges? It is difficult to discuss this matter and remain within the rules, but most of us know of judges who have passed the age when they can give concentrated consideration to cases coming before them, and I should like to know if the department has any way whatever of finding out whether a judge—we will say the chief justice if you wish, because we are discussing this bill—is really capable of performing the work which a judge must perform. I am speaking from a background of, shall I say, slight experience and knowledge of some of the judges who occupy the bench in this country. I am not referring to the chief justice in that particular, but I should like to know how the work of the judges is evaluated. We have many who have progressed far toward the end of life; what steps are taken to make sure that they are able to give concentrated consideration to the cases before them, and how is their work evaluated by the department in order that it may be done efficiently?

Mr. CHURCH: The principle of the bill is contained in one clause, which extends for four years instead of three the term of office, which means that the chief justice will remain for one year from January 7, 1943. As I say, I have no objection to the age limit, because some judges at seventy-five or even more are almost at their best. The principle involved in this measure came up in the house, in a bill, about seven years ago, as to the court of appeal in Ontario, where there was no law to prevent judges of eighty years from continuing their duties. The bill, which provided for retirement at seventy-five, passed this house, but was thrown out in the senate. At that time I said:

> The frequency, of recent years, with which judges are drafted for all kinds of such work impairs the efficient administration of justice and causes congestion in the law courts, and, as they are largely only fact finding commissions when appointed, they duplicate the efficient powers and functions of parliament, of the committees thereof, and of the many outside boards of recent innovation in war work, and furthermore they are a costly adjunct to good parliamentary government of the people, by the people and for the people, cause delays and interfere with parliament's right to immediate solution of social and economic problems of urgency to good government; thus a system of "judicial commission government" is slowly being built up in Canada.

It is for that reason that I voted to-day against the second reading of this bill. I believe some of the judges over seventy-five years of age are the best we have. The principle applying in England with respect to judicial appointments and law reform should be copied by the dominions, so far as age limits are concerned. In Ontario high school teachers have been retired at sixty-five years. That was one of the worst possible pieces of legislation, because some of those principals cannot be replaced by younger men. In England they are being asked to go back to work in war-time. The same applies in some cases in the law courts. I can tell the committee that some of the judges who are over age are doing excellent work. I made special reference to Judge Morson in York county. No one can be found to do the work he did, with the result that four or five men are now trying to do it, and still they cannot do it as well as he did. Six hundred members of the Toronto bar presented a petition to the late minister of justice, and he said that so long as Judge Morson wished to stay he would not be retired. And yet the party which appointed him, the last appointee of Sir John A. Macdonald, never gave him any notice of his retirement. He was going down King street one day on his way to the Woodbine, and upon buying a newspaper he found that he had been retired by a Conservative government.

I believe there should be a principle of law reform in connection with this matter. We have never had any sort of reform in the Department of Justice, and I hope the minister will consider it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): From the discussion which has taken place thus far it might appear that parliament is conferring a great favour upon the chief justice by keeping him in office another year. The facts however are to the contrary. The chief justice is conferring a favour upon the people of Canada by remaining in office for another year. As has already been pointed out—and this should be emphasized—if the chief justice retired at the present time he would for the remainder of his life receive an amount equal to his salary at the time of his retirement. As the Minister of Justice has said, his salary is $15,000 a year; therefore by remaining in office he actually saves the country that amount each year. If he were to retire he would continue to receive that sum, and the man appointed in his place would receive a like amount.

In this time of war many men who ordinarily would retire from active life are continuing in their work. Younger men are entering the armed forces, and those who are older feel they should do their utmost as long as they can. I am sure the present chief justice would be happy to retire from his task, a most arduous one, and enjoy the things he would like to do when freed from his office duties. But with his keen sense of patriotism he feels he should remain in office as long as he can serve his country. Instead of taking the attitude that we are conferring a favour upon him, we should be indebted to him for his willingness to remain in office another year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I inquire just how much of a favour the chief justice is doing us by remaining in office? On what basis does the chief justice pay income tax on the $15,000? And, answering the hon. member for Brantford City, if the chief justice made even one mistake it might cost the country more than $15,000. I do not feel it is a favour to the country to keep a man in office if he is over age. Perhaps the hon. member for Brantford City could fill his shoes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Oh no, I am sure I could not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I feel that there are other hon. members in the house and other persons throughout Canada who could fill the job. Does the chief justice pay a special rate on his income, or does he pay as you and I?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Chief Justice of Canada, like every other citizen in Canada, follows the laws of Canada and pays on the same basis as other citizens.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister quite sure of that? I thought there was a special provision; that is my recollection.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member had received the letters I received from judges since the last budget was adopted, he would be under no misapprehension in that regard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a special provision, though.

Mr. COLDWELL: Generally speaking how is the work of the judges evaluated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Judges in the provincial courts are appointed and paid by the federal government. The administration of justice in the provinces is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. In two instances since I assumed office a little over a year ago attorneys general from two provinces made representations to the effect that certain gentlemen were no longer capable of carrying out the duties of their office. After making some discreet investigations—and these cannot be public investigations, of course—I took advantage of the provisions of a statute which has been on the books for some years, and wrote to the gentlemen concerned pointing out that representations had been made that they were no longer in a fit state of health to discharge the responsibilities of their office. Of course they were under no obligation to take my opinion, which had been formed from the information I had received, but it was indicated that if they were not disposed to accept my opinion I should feel compelled to appoint a commission under the statute to inquire into their state of health. In both cases the gentlemen sent in their resignations, and have since been replaced.

As the hon. member knows, the prevailing opinion is that under the provisions of the British North America Act with respect to the administration of justice, judges cannot be removed from office unless very good grounds have been shown for such action, and not under normal circumstances without a joint address of both houses of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is in respect of the courts established before confederation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the high courts. With respect to federal courts the question has arisen as to the unfairness of the reservation of judgments. I quite agree with the leader of the opposition that this is unfair to the litigants and to the public generally. Frequently there are cases the determination of which awaits the settlement of other matters. That is one of the difficulties with which we are constantly confronted. From time to time representations are made by members of the bar that certain judges are taking an extraordinarily long time to give judgments. In such cases correspondence is initiated with the attorney general of the province concerned and representations are made to the judge about whom the complaints have been received. They are not always as effective as we would like to see them. Only recently the benchers in one of the provinces considered a recommendation to the legislature of that province that an act should be passed to provide that if a judgment was reserved for more than a certain number of months either party to the litigation could treat the case as susceptible of appeal and inscribe it for decision in the court of appeal. That matter is still under consideration.

I should like to see followed by as many as possible of the judges in this country the advice that I understand is given frequently to those who mount the bench in the United Kingdom. Lord Hanworth told me that when he first became a judge he was advised to try to deliver judgment immediately in all cases. He said that he found it very difficult to do that, but had succeeded in training himself to the point where in ninety per cent of the cases he delivered judgment immediately, and in cases where he had to reserve judgment, it was seldom that he did not succeed in getting his opinion ready over the week-end so as to deliver his judgment on Monday morning and avoid starting the week with any reserved cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was wonderful.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If anything approaching that degree of perfection could be achieved by our judges, it would be a real service to the public generally. I am sure the fact that this matter has been the subject of discussion in the house to-day will have some beneficial effect.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I do not suppose anyone would hesitate to agree with the general principle which has been stated that men should not be kept in high positions of any kind, much less upon the bench, whose powers have waned and whose ability to discharge the high offices they hold is no longer theirs. But that is a general principle. No one with any knowledge of the facts would care to contradict the suggestions that have been made. I have practised in the courts too long for that. Men do grow old, and sometimes judgments are long delayed, and judgment delayed is frequently justice denied. I have in my memory a case in which I acted counsel on one side in 1933 and the judgment has not yet been delivered. At least one of the litigants is dead; the lawyer who was on the other side is dead, and now the judge is dead. I fancy that the litigation is dead also.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not go any further.

Mr. ROEBUCK: You cannot go any further in an instance of that kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was thinking of the hon. member.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I suppose it is time that that happened. I have mentioned an extreme case, but it was because of incidents of that kind that I proposed, when I held the office of attorney general of Ontario, to introduce legislation giving a litigant the right to appeal to the court of appeal after a judgment had been delayed, say one year. The very threat of that legislation I think brought about a certain measure of reform. I know that the number of old and undelivered judgments was decreased in consequence.

But that is all general. At the moment we are not dealing with the general principles involved in delayed judgments or the continuance in office of judges who are too old, and all that sort of thing; we are dealing with one specific case. I have some knowledge of it. I have pleaded before the present Chief Justice of Canada, and a more delightful, more encouraging, polite and able judge never sat on the bench in Canada. I can say that from personal knowledge, knowledge of fairly recent date and knowledge that goes back a good deal. I have in mind an argument of ten or twelve days' duration in connection with constitutional appeals. It was a reference from the government, and it involved the most abstruse points and a vast amount of most difficult law. No judge whom I ever approached in court had the keenness of knowledge and insight, the breadth of knowledge of law, the patience, the good nature and the kindness of the present chief justice. If, as is now said, his health is as it has been, and, therefore, his keenness undiminished, I can say from real knowledge that there is no jurist in the Dominion of Canada who could replace him to the benefit of that court. I am voting for this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Without wishing at all to delay the passage of the bill through the committee, but rather to satisfy a measure of curiosity which I think is legitimate, I should like to ask the minister a question which arises out of a remark he made with respect to investigation of complaints under the statute against judges who have passed the stage of usefulness. Does the department of its own initiative ever institute investigations, or does it wait until complaints are made by some body such as the law society, the benchers or what-not? I have known of a judge being incapacitated for three years, and yet nothing was done.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The policy of the department is to not initiate an investigation until some complaint has been made. It is felt that to do otherwise might be considered by the provinces as an undue interference with the administration of justice.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Coming into force.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the status of the action which has been taken by the chief justice since January 7, 1943?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Since January 7, 1943, the former chief justice of Canada has not been in office, but the statute provides that during a period of six months after retirement a judge may continue to consider cases which he heard while in office and participate in the judgments that are to be delivered. My understanding is that the chief justice has been very busily engaged during the last few days on the preparation of a judgment in connection with a reference which was considered in his court some months ago, and which dealt with the right to tax the legations of certain governments.

Mr. SLAGHT: Because my failure to make any contribution to this debate might be misunderstood, let me endorse what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) has said. I have had the privilege of practising before this court.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

Some three months ago I was engaged in a case before the supreme court which lasted part of two weeks, and I want to say to the house that the keenness of intellect of the chief justice is not in the slightest degree impaired by his advanced age, which has been commented upon. I think I can put it in this way: he is outstanding, a man of rare intellect and ripe experience, with a high sense of honour and integrity, and perhaps above all these qualifications as a judge he is a man of great kindliness of heart and of full understanding of human nature.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly interested in the discussion which has thus far taken place on the speech from the throne. I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris, Grey-Bruce) and the seconder (Mr. Halle) of the address and to give a little attention to some of the remarks which have been made before I proceed with what I had thought to say myself.

We are living in a time when there is a great deal of random talk about big things to be done, without any constructive proposals as to how those things are going to be done. I find in Canada, for example, politicians going all the way from promising $1.10 a bushel for wheat without telling us anything about how they are going to get the money to pay for it, to promising a new heaven and a new earth without giving us any idea of how these things are to come about.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have heard of a man promising $25 a month.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, and there was abundant evidence given of how that was to be paid.

As I was going on to say, persons abroad are indulging in the same kind of vague promises, and I think it is an extremely dangerous practice. We find outstanding statesmen promising, for instance, that the world is going to have freedom from want and freedom from fear, without ever breathing even a word as to how they propose to bring about these great achievements. The members of this house at this critical time in our history should not accept all these assurances without some scrutiny. It is our duty to find out to some extent where we are going and how we are going to get there. We may be detoured from our path, but at least we ought to have some idea of where that path should lie.

May I turn now to some of the remarks made by hon. members who have already taken part in this debate. First I should like to give some attention to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and to his very fine speech. I congratulate him warmly upon his first speech as leader of the opposition. It was beautiful, but, as I said before, there was not a word in it as to how he proposed to attain his ends. He told us that people, not socialists, are seeking a voice in parliament. Very true. He said that there is room for a new party, and he indicated that the Progressive Conservative programme provided a basis for a new people's movement, that it constituted an honest attempt to find a solution of our problems. A gentleman whom I am now going to quote has made a pronouncement upon the very problem which confronts us. I refer to Milo Perkins, a well-known government official in the United States, who has said this:

> What we need most is a redirection of our genius as a people. Heretofore, we have concentrated on methods of efficient production. For the first time in history, we are suffering because we have too much of the things we need most. Henceforth, we must concentrate on efficient and businesslike methods of increasing domestic consumption, no matter how much violence it may do to some of our preconceived notions.

I am going to quote another passage from the same statesman:

> The unsatisfied wants of two-thirds of our people make up the greatest new market that has ever loomed before our businessmen and our farmers. It is right in our backyard. All we need is some courageous internal pioneering and some imagination.

I trust that the leader of the opposition will not consider me too unkind when I point out that I fail to see in all that he said and in all that emanated from the Winnipeg convention any sign of that pioneering and that imagination. Our problem is that of distribution. Men have solved the problem of production not only in Canada but throughout the world. Not only have men solved the problem of production, but they are on the way to achieving a measure of production surpassing all that a man could have dreamed of as possible ten or fifteen years ago. Men like Henry Kaiser, the famous contractor, and Doctor A. A. Stine, of the chemical organization in the United States, are witnesses to this truth. If our problem when the war broke out was a problem of distribution, it is going to be doubly a problem of distribution when the war ends. Let us never for a moment lose sight of that fact. Then we shall look into every set of proposals for the secret of distribution. We need a new technique of distribution.

May I examine for a moment or two our distribution machine as at present constituted, with the object of endeavouring to discover if possible why it is inadequate and why it has broken down. Let it be borne in mind that the medium of exchange which we now use is the medium of distribution; for up to the present time there is no distribution without an exchange. This means that the medium of distribution to-day is the dollar, or a unit of currency.

We use for our dollars, for our media of distribution, only money which is borrowed from the banks. It matters not how great our production may be or how great it may become, the limit of our distributive capacity under our present system is the amount of money which bankers will lend, the amount which men will borrow from bankers. This constitutes the major flaw in our distributive system. Not only do we have to pay back every dollar which is borrowed, but we engage to pay it back with interest, which means that progressively there will come to be less and less money in circulation with relation to the debt which the community owes for the money. This constitutes another serious flaw in our distributive system. It means that the amount of monetary distributive machinery which exists in any community becomes progressively less effective as the years advance.

Let us bear in mind that this also follows: If bankers at any time choose to cease to lend or to restrict lending, or if men for any reason at any time cease to borrow, then immediately our distributive machinery is bound to be seriously impaired.

No government up to the present time has been able to prevent banks from ceasing to lend; no government up to the present has been able to get men to go and borrow when they chose not to borrow. These two facts put together force one to the logical conclusion that at the present time the government of any country under the system under which we operate has no effective control over its distributive machinery.

There is another difficulty. Money, in so far as it gets out to people, reaches them through wages and salaries. The only access which the ordinary individual has to money or to distribution is through his wages or salary. As machinery increases, and as technological skill develops, the number of people who are required to operate the productive machine progressively decreases, with the result that unemployment arises, which means that the distributive machinery is again seriously impaired.

There is yet another difficulty—and this has a particular bearing upon the Atlantic charter and all the glowing promises of freedom from want and fear. Up to the present time, if goods are to be distributed from the United States, for example, let us say to Timbuctoo, so as to be completely harmless in our remarks, the only way in which that distribution can be made is through Timbuctoo sending goods to the United States to pay for the goods it receives. This means that no matter how much Timbuctoo may need the goods of the United States, if Timbuctoo has not acceptable goods to pay for them it cannot get them, which again means that the United States is forbidden to distribute to Timbuctoo by reason of the laws of our present distributive machinery. That is an exceedingly serious matter. Regardless of how much the President of the United States may desire to help Timbuctoo's people, the only way in which he can overcome the difficulty is probably by giving them the goods outright. How that can be accomplished we need to study.

Any nation with meagre resources or with a large population is placed under an exceedingly serious handicap in this world when it undertakes to get goods which come from a nation that is abundantly endowed with resources and richly equipped with industrial machinery, as a result of which it can manufacture a wide variety of goods. The more such a rich country can manufacture the less it wants to buy from abroad.

One more serious difficulty is that the cost of secondary products or manufactured products tends to increase progressively, and that the price paid for primary production, such as that of wheat and meat, tends to decrease progressively. We see this well illustrated in our own Canadian west where the farmers to-day are obliged to pay, for 147 articles which they require, 152·8 per cent of what they had to pay for similar goods in 1914, and at the same time, except for the influence of the war which is transitory, they must accept less for their own products. This means that the primary producing area, nation or part of a nation, runs increasingly into debt to a secondary producing area. This truth has an exceedingly important bearing on all the proposals for the establishment of unity of nations, the removal of tariffs and trade restrictions, and all the rest of it.

May I turn now to the leader of the opposition and ask him earnestly to examine during the next two or three days all that emanated from Winnipeg and to say whether in all of that he finds anything whatsoever that goes to the root of this distribution problem. May I ask him two or three other questions in the most earnest and sincere way—for I have no desire to play politics. I am just an ordinary Canadian with children growing up in this country, who I suppose will be represented by grandchildren, and I really do want to see some reform made in Canada before everything goes to ruin.

The hon. gentleman said that he stood for the conscription of industry without telling us what that means. He said that he stood for the conscription of finance or the mobilization of finance. I hope he will examine closely what I say in case I do not carry in my mind just what he meant to convey. What does he mean by the mobilization of finance? The Social Credit group in 1939, when the war broke out, declared in favour of the conscription of finance and pointed out what it meant by that term, namely, the taking over by the government of Canada of the power and function of creating the nation's money. It insisted that that money should be created debt free. I should like to know what the leader of the opposition means by the conscription of finance. Does he mean greater and greater taxation? If he does, heaven help us. We have already gone too far in that direction. Then what does he mean? I will ask him three or four searching questions. Does he mean by the conscription of finance that the government shall take over the power to create money debt free? If he does, then I know something about how I shall line up with respect to him. Does his party agree, for example, with the idea expressed by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) in the budget debate last year when he advocated state-created debt-free money and when he elicited from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) such a sound scolding? Does the Progressive Conservative party agree with the views advanced by the hon. member for Parry Sound, or does it agree with the views of the minister, who rose and delivered a speech which one of the members in the Conservative party characterized as a model of expression, or something of the sort? I want to ask him two or three more questions. What, in the opinion of his party, gives a dollar value? Is it the gold behind the dollar, as we were told in kindergarten? Is it a bank behind the dollar? Is it the fact that someone gave security when he borrowed the dollar? Is it the fact that the dollar has been borrowed? Is the dollar of no value unless it is a debt to someone? Is it scarcity of dollars that gives the dollar value? Is it the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada behind the dollar? Or is it the goods-producing power of the Dominion of Canada behind the dollar? There can be a difference. The guarantee of the Dominion of Canada might be this, that the Dominion of Canada agrees to get another dollar and replace the dollar in case it is asked to do so; whereas in the other case, if the goods and services of Canada are behind the dollar, the Dominion of Canada simply agrees to deliver goods in return for the dollar. When the leader of the opposition answers those questions we shall be able to tell whether he agrees with the social credit stand or not.

A good many people in this country are now beginning to talk monetary reform, because people are becoming interested in monetary reform. But there are different kinds of monetary reform, some of which are a good deal worse than what we already have. It is well to be specific in this matter.

Having asked the leader of the opposition these questions, I am now going to ask the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and his group what their answers are to each of those questions. And I am going to ask the Liberals through their Minister of Finance to tell us what their answers are. When we get those answers—if those leaders are courageous enough to give them, which I doubt—we shall be able to tell whether those three parties differ among themselves or whether they all stand for the same thing. The line of demarcation lies right there, in their attitude to money.

The leader of the opposition referred to progressive labour proposals of the Winnipeg convention. Since he did that, I should like to point out that the best collective bargaining law in Canada is on the statute books of Alberta, put there by a social credit government. Also one of the best minimum wage laws in Canada is on the statute books of Alberta, put there by a social credit government. And many other progressive measures with respect to labour, in so far as the province has the power to legislate respecting labour, are already on the statute books of Alberta. This indicates quite clearly the stand of social crediters with respect to labour.

I now turn to the social security proposals. They sound very fine, but the question must be asked over and over again, Where do the Conservatives propose to get the money? Here, for example, are a few searching questions: Does that party intend to pay the interest on Canada's debt at present contractual rates? If it does, what is it going to do if this war continues for several years and the debts of this nation mount to such a point that the annual revenue will be insufficient to pay the interest? What chance will the people have of obtaining social security under such conditions?

If the Conservative party is in power—

Mr. GRAYDON: The Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I hope every time I slip he will remind me until I get the habit of using that name. Does the Progressive Conservative party propose to pay off the debt of Canada if it gets a chance? Does it propose to reduce the interest if it gets a chance? Does it propose to reduce taxation, and if so, how is it going to obtain the money with which to fulfil all its fine promises?

These matters are important, because an answer to these questions would serve to take off the mask and show what is behind it, whether there is a sincere heart and genuine understanding that intends to do things and has some idea how it will go about doing them.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) jocularly intimated that the Liberals had been advocating the present Progressive Conservative platform for about twenty-five years. Well, the Progressive Conservatives can take warning by reflecting how far the Liberals got with that programme. If the Progressive Conservatives are not prepared to adopt some measures different from what the Liberals are adopting, they will not be able to do a bit more than the Liberals are doing, even if they should add three more handles to their name.

Turning to the speech from the throne, may I deal with two considerations that come to my mind. The first has to do with a matter that is not mentioned in the speech, the other with three which are. The matter not mentioned—and this astonishes me—has to do with the immediate prosecution of the war. At the present time Canada is in danger of grievous food shortages. Warnings are on every hand; people are losing confidence from sea to sea. At one time they were promised that there would be no rationing of certain commodities, and within two or three weeks they were astounded to hear that there was to be rationing of those very commodities, which indicates not only incompetency of the Liberal party in dealing with food production but also apparently inability to keep books well enough to know where they stand. This constitutes a very serious reflection upon them, no matter how buoyantly they attempt to laugh it off.

The three matters which are mentioned in the speech from the throne have to do with the post-war order. I shall refer to them at a later time.

With reference to the food and other requirements of the Canadian people, let me say we must manage to bring about greater and less variable production of essentials in this country. It is no use our doing so much to fight the war that we forget the people at home; that will but impair our efficiency as a fighting force. Let us remember what the Prime Minister intimated yesterday, that this war may last for years and years. This means that we must build up a reserve of productive equipment capable of sustaining this country's exertions at a high degree for a long time. We should be taking every precaution to see that all such things as, for example, milk products, meat, eggs, fruit, feeds, vegetables, sugar, honey, coal, gasoline, rubber and other essentials which can be produced in this country shall be produced.

Hon. members know my stand as to sugar. Years before the war broke out I told this house that the day would come when we would need sugar, and advised measures to increase sugar production. But all we received was good-natured tolerance from the Liberal party and just nothing done. All indications were that there was a deliberate plan, by some organization working through the government, to restrict the production of sugar in Canada. I have more than a suspicion that a similar plan is in operation with respect to gasoline and many other essential commodities. Unless the Liberal party sternly take the stand that it will not be moved by persuasion of that kind, they are placing this country in grave peril of serious suffering.

How is greater production to be stimulated in Canada? First of all we must have for every vital job wage rates that will be encouraging to the people employed in that job. This must be done either by direct federal bonus or by federally-assisted provincial bonus, so that the increased wage will not cause increase in the cost of production. This principle I regard as vital. There has been a good deal of discussion in recent weeks regarding increased wages in certain plants. The government have repeatedly taken the stand that they must not increase the wages in those plants because that will cause inflation. If they will pay the wages from an external source, so that the cost of the wages does not enter into the cost of production of the plant, the increase will not cause inflation.

I should like to read a set of figures dealing with the wage situation in Canada. The census indicates that in 1941, 35·9 per cent of the total wage-earners in Canada received less than $500 a year; those receiving less than $1,000 a year constituted another 28·4 per cent; those receiving less than $1,500 a year another 19·6 per cent, and those receiving $1,500 and over were only 16·1 per cent of the total wage-earners. In view of the fact that the ordinary expert on nutrition would declare it impossible for a family to support itself in any degree of comfort, not to mention decency, on less than $1,500 a year, the members of this house can see what a glaring reflection those figures are on the administration which has been in power in this dominion since 1935. Therefore I say the wage rates in this country must be adjusted.

The whole Canadian wage structure is inequitable and should be scientifically overhauled. Such upward adjustments ought to be made as will give all workers, male and female, a square deal. Everyone doing essential war work should be allowed the means of enjoying a decent standard of living, and this matter should be attended to without further delay if we intend to take care of our production.

Government officials will argue that such upward adjustments would cause inflation. Their arguments are unsound; I challenge any hon. member on the government side to prove the contrary, any time he chooses to enter this debate. Inflationary tendencies resulting from the added purchasing power which would be incident to giving such increased wages can be offset effectively by four measures, singly or in combination: price fixing, bonuses, subsidies and rationing.

We still have in Canada much labour not being used. I remember that when war first broke out we had members on the government side rise and prattle about the scarcity of labour in Canada. I am at a loss to understand why that was done. We still have plenty of labour in Canada if it is wisely used and properly distributed, and we can distribute it by adequately paying for it where we require it.

The second measure I suggest is this. Producers must receive such additions to the prices they are now receiving as will bring within their reach a decent standard of living and will stimulate greater and greater production. Third, credit must be made available upon terms attractive to the producer. Fourth, the means of production—for example, cows in the dairy business—must be rendered easily accessible to producers. Fifth, stable markets for at least two years after the war should be guaranteed. If these suggestions are disregarded, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are going to pay for the oversight in suffering and privation. These five principles, wisely applied, will render available a substantial margin of at present idle or partly idle productive capacity. It is utterly unpardonable to have in Canada shortages of butter, milk, coal, honey, eggs, meat, fruits, lumber and so on. The very existence of such shortages indicates glaring incompetence on the part of the men in charge of affairs in this country.

The question will be asked, where will the money come from? It does not matter where the money comes from; if men persist in using only borrowed money and taxed money, then it must come from borrowing and taxation. The blame for the accumulated debt and the increased taxes must lie at the doors of those who lacked vision in administering our affairs. In 1941 Britain is reported to have spent over £100,000,000 in discounts, bringing down the price of goods much as the Canadian government wisely did not long ago with respect to milk. That principle is sound; it must be applied consistently over the complete range of commodities until the cost of living is brought down, so that the average consumer can get what he needs. In the same year the British government spent £30,000,000 in subsidies to primary producers. As a result of such management they were able to do such things as give seventy-five cents a dozen for eggs which were sold to the consumer for fifty cents. What Britain can do, with meagre resources, certainly Canada can do.

The question will be raised immediately, will such measures give us inflation? In the first place they have not caused inflation in Britain; and I would say that the danger of inflation in Britain is ever so much greater than it is or could be in Canada. Let us examine inflation for a moment. The word "inflation" apparently is being deliberately, and I am afraid insincerely, used by a good many men on the American continent as a great big bogey to scare the people into doing whatever the men in power want them to do; a play upon the lack of information and understanding of the people; a betrayal of the trust which the people are reposing in the men who have been chosen to take care of their affairs in these trying times. What is inflation? It is nothing more or less than a rise in price. Keep that in mind; that is all it is, a rise in price. What causes inflation? There are three things. First, there is deliberate price manipulation, such as we saw immediately after the beginning of the war, when the price of lard was run up. Second, there is price spiralling, a state of affairs in which increased costs force up prices. For example, if labour costs increase, then the price of the product must be increased to offset the increase in wages. Third, there is the scarcity of goods and services.

Let us examine these three causes, to see whether or not they are uncontrollable. Will an increase in the money in circulation necessarily cause inflation? First, must and will it cause price manipulation? There is no reason why it should. If it does, price fixing, with penalties, must be used immediately as it can be and has been used. Second, must and will more purchasing power cause price spiralling? Not if it does not cause an increase in the cost of production. That is, if the government increases the wages by bonuses; if the government keeps down the cost of the raw products that go into production, there is no reason why any spiral should occur no matter how much money is in circulation. Third, must and will extra purchasing power cause scarcity of goods? No, provided the goods on sale are rationed if need be, and provided care is taken to increase the production of goods so that the supply is somewhere near the demand of the people.

These vital facts concerning inflation lie right at the very basis of all national financing, and of the economic management of any country. I submit that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, and every other hon. member I have heard speak from the government benches upon the subject of inflation, have been misinformed on these important facts pertaining to inflation, and have misinformed the people of Canada.

If inflation can be governed by the devices I have mentioned—and it can—and if inflation is produced by the causes I have mentioned—and it is—it need have no relationship whatsoever to government-created money. Yet, time and again, we have heard the Minister of Finance from his place in the house rave about inflation, whenever a Gerry McGeer or some other member has risen and advocated government money—indicating the finance ministers were either utterly uninformed or insincere. And they can choose whichever of those alternatives they wish.

Now it ought to be, then, feasible, practicable and safe for the government of Canada to take an inventory of all surplus goods which we have or could have within a reasonably short time, such as butter, eggs, wheat and other grains, vegetables, potatoes, fruits, certain kinds of fish, certain kinds of lumber, coal, gas and the like, and create, to represent and to distribute these goods, credit instruments such as stamps, coupons, tickets, commodity dollars, dollar bills or book entries; all of which are credit instruments capable of being used for the distribution of goods. Such credit instruments created by the government would be debt-free, causing neither debt nor taxation. Such media of exchange could be used, (1) to subsidize primary production prices; (2) to discount secondary prices; (3) to bonus wage rates; (4) to grant production loans; (5) to guarantee stable prices after the war, and (6) to provide adequate storage facilities on the farms or off the farms.

The simple application of the principles of social credit will solve our production problems in Canada in war time. These principles are:

(1) The state creation of debt-free media of exchange, to represent unconsumed production in the country.

(2) The use of such media of exchange or credit instruments to (a) subsidize primary producers; (b) discount by subsidy the prices of goods to consumers, and (c) bonus or subsidize wages and in other ways bring about just prices.

(3) The use of such media of exchange to increase old-age pensions, to pay allowances to mothers, to provide medical care, dental care, to provide free hospitalization, to aid the unfortunate such as the blind, invalids and victims of accidents, and to reward the meritorious, such as returned soldiers. The amount of well-being in Canada can thus be caused to conform to the ability of the country to produce. The more she can produce, the more prosperous her people can be. Under the present system the more the country produces, the less prosperous the people are likely to be.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. C. S. BOOTH (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I regard myself as most fortunate, after two and a half years overseas, to find that the course of my duties has made it possible for me to return to my seat in the house, if even only for a few days, and to speak for the first time. I do regret sincerely it has not been possible for me to give more care and attention to the special problems of my own constituency of Winnipeg North. I believe however, my constituents appreciate that the work I have been doing is of some importance. Perhaps they appreciate it more because almost seventy per cent of them have their origin in countries now suffering under nazi oppression.

If I can make any contribution to the debate, it would be by telling the house something of what is taking place in connection with the Canadian army overseas. I will not give statistics, because I do not think the people at home want them. I can say, however, that we have a grand army. They are grand men, and all are good Canadians who are over there to fight for their homes.

What people at home want to know is, I believe, how those men are being treated, how they train, how they do their work and how they play. I wish to make a few observations regarding these questions. Those of us who were over there during the previous unpleasantness, and who have again taken part in this one, are very much impressed by some of the improvements in certain aspects of training, accommodation, and also particularly in connection with some of the auxiliary services.

As a rear rank private in 1916 and 1917, I was never able to understand how the continuous drudgery of forming fours and marking time was going to win the war. Nowadays however, it is very much different. Battle drill, assault landings and the like bear a direct relationship to the job the men are going to do when they get into battle. They can really see and understand what their training is leading to, and for that reason they enter into their training readily and heartily.

With respect to accommodation may I say that our men are well provided for in England. In the reinforcement units the permanent buildings are well equipped; and even troops on operational duties are well taken care of. I believe I can say that our hospitals in England are better equipped than most of the civilian hospitals in that country. Notwithstanding the peculiarities of English weather, the health of the troops is quite good.

One change I have noticed from the last war is in the matter of feeding. I have some terrible recollections of the Newfoundland cod sent over to us in 1917 and 1918, along with a lot of other funny things they used to give us. To-day an intelligent approach has been made toward the problem of feeding the troops. First of all, our cooks are well trained. We are getting away from the idea of the unit providing its own cook, and hanging on to him throughout the piece. We have all our cooks in one packet. There is one place in a reinforcement unit where they undergo their initial training. Then, if a cook becomes a casualty in a field unit, they can whistle up another immediately through second echelon. And they can be quite sure, no matter where he originated, that he will be a well-trained cook and will know his job.

The next phase of the matter of feeding is that in each of our formations overseas we have a catering officer. Of course there is not too much food in England nowadays. For the first two or three weeks after I got back to Canada I was most uncomfortable after almost every meal. This was simply because I had got used to pulling in my belt and restraining my appetite. I think this has been an excellent thing for a lot of people. When rations are not too plentiful it is necessary that the greatest care be taken to ensure that the fullest benefit will be secured from them. Therefore catering advisers, who are specially trained, are provided. They travel around among the units, look over the cookhouses, consult with the commanding officers and advise on how to set up attractive menus and to get the best value out of the food.

We have added to this service lately and have now in the office of the director of medical services a nutritional officer whose job, among other things, is to ensure that the quantity and quality of the rations supplied are adequate to sustain the men and to ensure that they will be perfectly fit for the duties they have to perform. It is true that in England the troops get much more by way of rations than the civilians. While the civilian in England has a fairly tight belt, I can say that this is not the case to anything like the same degree with our Canadian soldiers. The British soldiers, of course, are treated on the same basis as ours.

I should like to tell the house something about the educational services overseas. At the beginning of the war the Canadian Legion stepped in and undertook to provide educational services. They have done a splendid job. In 1940, or even before that, there was appointed overseas a director of educational services. This gentleman is assisted by educational advisers who are qualified teachers or professors and have a thorough knowledge of the kind of work the legion is doing. One of the main objects the legion had in mind in setting up this service was to provide facilities for those men who wished to raise their standard of education or perhaps undertake vocational classes or special courses. Education is a special pet of General McNaughton, and he has done everything in his power to encourage the men and to have his officers encourage the men to take these courses. Hon. members may be surprised to hear that over 20,000 men in the Canadian army in England are taking classes or courses of one kind or another during the present winter. I am quite satisfied that nothing like that happened in the last war, at least not until it was over.

There has been some change recently in the educational set-up overseas. The army found that it was calling more and more upon the legion to provide facilities for education in certain specific cases. For example, there might be other ranks who possessed qualifications which would fit them to become officers but who found they were somewhat lacking in general knowledge. Quite often it was some time since they had been to school and they needed a little polishing up. We called upon the legion to provide courses for this purpose. Strangely enough, we found that there were some illiterates in our army in England and we had to set up special classes to take care of them. There are many other ways in which education may be provided which is of direct benefit to the army as such. With very little increase in staff, using most of the facilities that were already there, we have now an army educational service in the Canadian army overseas.

A point of interest in passing is that this army of ours is an army of specialists. There are thousands and thousands of young men in the army over there who have learned trades of which perhaps they knew nothing when they went overseas. I am hopeful that when this war is over we shall find that a goodly proportion of these boys will find themselves much better equipped to fight the battle of life than they were when they joined up.

I should like to say something about the work of the auxiliary service organizations. I suppose all hon. members know that there are four of these organizations, the Canadian Legion, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army and the Y.M.C.A. Early in the war these four organizations volunteered to provide auxiliary services to the troops. In the first year they put on drives for funds, each one handling its own drive and each securing its own money. Of course they did not each secure the same amount. As they came in to this work, some of the organizations found themselves particularly well qualified to carry it on, while others were not so well qualified. In any event the important thing was that they were there, and were ready and willing and reasonably able to carry on. We had nothing else which could have done the job at that time.

The next year the decision was taken that the drives for funds would be consolidated into one, and that was done. In the meantime the work went on steadily. Let me complete the matter of finances. In 1942 the decision was taken that the funds for these services would be provided from the treasury. Controlling these funds and the expenditure of them in Canada is the war services budget committee. I know nothing of the situation in Canada, but I do want to mention a little about the work of these organizations in England because it has been of such great importance to us there. Without this work, particularly during the last year and a half, I just do not know how we would have maintained the morale of our men at the high level at which it now stands.

The four organizations each has a senior representative in London. They work in cooperation with the three services, the army, the navy and the air force. I shall speak only about the army because that is what I know about, but in any event the services available to the army are available also to the other services. The control in England is this: on the one hand there are the senior representatives of the four organizations; there are the heads of the forces, and then, as a third party, there is the overseas executive committee of the budget committee in Canada which controls the finances.

In passing I want to say just a word about that committee. It was set up quite recently, and it consists of five prominent Canadians who live in London, with Sir Edward Peacock as the chairman. We have found that the existence of that committee has solved a great many of our problems. It has speeded up the provision of services to the men and, what is most important, Sir Edward Peacock has the confidence of the organizations as well as the confidence of the services. While he and his committee scrutinize expenditures most carefully, their first concern is to provide essential services to the troops.

The work overseas of the auxiliary services is divided into two main classifications. The first classification, by far the most important, is that in regard to the services to the troops in the units in the field. This is carried on by means of auxiliary service supervisors who are trained personnel provided by the organizations to do this work. They are allocated to the troops in the field on the basis of one supervisor for each 800 men. The large units have their own supervisor, but in the case of the smaller units, two or three may be served by one supervisor.

Because of the developments over the past three years the four organizations have now reached the point where each is providing the same measure of service. Each organization looks after approximately one-fourth of the troops overseas, and each has about the same number of supervisors. These supervisors are allocated to the units in accordance with our plan, and this is the kind of service they provide: Each of them has a car, and he may have one or two or three military helpers. He has a moving-picture outfit; he may have a canteen; he has a library, and he spends his time looking after the welfare of the troops, putting on picture shows in the evenings, organizing concert parties, sing-songs and games of all kinds. It is most important work, and it is of the utmost value at the present time because so many of our troops are spread around the countryside of England miles away, in many instances, from the big centres.

In addition, with the field formations, we have mobile canteens, which are under the charge of the supervisors. While these mobile canteens are not so necessary now, they will be of great value when the troops become engaged in active operations and they will then be used to provide essential services for the troops.

The organizations also provide recreation centres in troop areas. They provide leave hostels in London and elsewhere. At the present time in Canadian hostels in London there are some 2,800 beds, and they are full most of the time; indeed, every week-end there is an overflow of from one to two thousand who have to be taken care of in accommodation provided from British sources.

Each organization has also taken on a special project. The Y.M.C.A. look after a large share of the recreation centres. They also look after the major sports events for the whole army. Their experts advise the army on sports matters.

The Canadian Legion, in addition to having education as one of its projects, looks after the organization of concert parties. It trains and equips them. We have four soldier concert parties in operation at the present time. In addition, the legion provides entertainment, by professional performers who go around and visit the troops week after week.

The Salvation Army has performed a most useful work in purchasing and supplying moving-picture films for the whole army. It has in circulation at the present time a library of over sixty feature movie films, the same kind that can be seen in the moving-picture houses in this country. It has also hundreds of shorts and newsreels.

The Knights of Columbus have as their special project the providing of hospitality for the troops. Notwithstanding the rationing restrictions and restrictions of many other kinds, the people of Great Britain have been most generous in providing hospitality for Canadian soldiers and officers. The Knights of Columbus have a long list of individuals throughout the country who are willing to provide accommodation for our troops on leave. They have an office in London and sub-offices in the troop areas, and any Canadian soldier or officer going on leave who wishes to be entertained anywhere in the United Kingdom has only to get in touch with one of their offices and he can secure just about what he wants in the line of entertainment. It may be salmon fishing or a spot of grouse shooting, or he may want to spend his leave with some literary companions, or he may just want to go some place where he will not be bothered. Any of these things and many more can be provided for him. Thousands and thousands of our Canadian boys are going out into British homes every month as a result of this hospitality. Therefore it will be seen that the auxiliary services overseas are doing a splendid job for our troops.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BOOTH: Before the six o'clock recess I was speaking of the work of the auxiliary service organizations for the troops overseas and was mentioning some of the many things that are provided by way of entertainment and recreation for the troops. From that I do not want to leave the impression that life is just a continual round of pleasure for the boys in England. Training is not only realistic but very hard. Manoeuvres are carried on continuously and the troops will march twenty-five miles a day, day after day, and continue fighting throughout that time. In a pinch I have seen an infantry regiment march forty miles between daybreak and night-fall.

I should like to describe the demonstration which was put on by General McNaughton in December to celebrate the third anniversary of the arrival of the Canadian troops in England. There were all kinds of vehicles, big tanks, little jeeps, troop carriers, tank recovery vehicles, mobile workshops, ambulances, weapons of war, vehicles of war of all kinds. The demonstration lasted for about two hours and it was a marvellous exhibition of the make-up of the Canadian army in England. It was most impressive, and yet I think perhaps the most impressive unit of all to me was the last one to pass the reviewing stand. The review took place on a wide country road in the south of England. The road stretched almost as far as the eye could see in both directions, and as this last unit came into sight in the distance, about a mile away, it appeared to be a column of infantry coming along at a steady trot. As they came nearer we could see that they were carrying full equipment. They were carrying their rifles. On they came, and when they passed the reviewing stand not a man was out of place. Their alignment was perfect and there was not a sign of distress on any one of those keen healthy faces. And on they went, maintaining that steady pace up the road until they disappeared in the distance. To me that was more impressive than all the tanks and guns in the whole parade. To me it typified the calm, steady, persistent spirit of the Canadian army, and I am satisfied that that spirit will remain until the job is done, no matter what may be the odds, no matter how great the task.

I have referred to certain matters which affect the morale of the troops. Three others I want to mention quite briefly in passing. First, there is the relationship between officers and men. These officers and men have worked together, some of them for three years now, and there is a spirit of mutual understanding and respect which can be gained only by men working together, striving together toward a common end. The men know that the officers will do as much as and more than the men themselves will do, and I am thoroughly satisfied that when the time comes the results of this will be manifest and will be of tremendous advantage to us.

Next is discipline and military justice. Discipline is good, and I attribute it in large measure to that same spirit which exists between officers and men. At the same time we have our offenders. You cannot have the thousands of men we have without having some bad eggs, and we have our troubles. However, in the administration of military justice, first of all we endeavour to ensure that everyone is fairly treated, both in the administration of justice and in the review of sentences. We bear in mind the fact that these men are soldiers and that the sooner we get them back out of the "jug" the sooner will they be efficient fighting soldiers once again. This question of the review of sentence is considered to be so important that the policy in regard to it is centralized at Canadian military headquarters, and the senior officer at that headquarters, General Montague, gives his personal attention to every one of these reviews and himself signs whatever order is made with respect to them. We find that this is bearing fruit, because any man who demonstrates that he has learnt his lesson, who shows by his actions that he is willing to turn over a new leaf, is given an opportunity to do so. We are getting results. Notwithstanding the long time we have been there, our statistics show that relatively fewer offences are being committed. Between August, 1941, and August, 1942, there was a proportionate reduction of over 20 per cent in the numbers of all offences committed. I have not the later figures, but I do know that a steady decline is being maintained.

The third point with regard to morale affects particularly the people at home and is most important. It is a matter of letters from home. Not only do we want more letters but we want better letters. It is a sad thing to hear of a Canadian soldier who has been in England for two and a half years and who has not received a single letter or a single parcel. It is hard to imagine the feelings of that man as he sees week after week his comrades receiving letters and parcels. It is one of the most damaging things so far as morale is concerned. It is true the people at home are busy, but there is too much of a tendency to put off. It is easy for the family to leave it to mother, but mother is busy too. So that quantity is one of the things we want, and next is quality, and I am not sure that is not even more important.

The boys over there are hungry for news. They want to know what is happening in the home town, what is happening to the family and to the neighbours across the street, or in the town hall or the community hall or whatever it may be, and it is only in letters from home that they can get that information. They are looking for cheerful letters. They like to feel that the people at home, while missing them, are not unhappy. So very often we hear of cases perhaps of a wife who is lonely, who is feeling badly, just pouring out all her complaints in her letters to her husband overseas. It is proper that she should discuss her problems, but to pour out troubles for the sake of filling paper is not a service to anyone. An even worse class of letter, of which unfortunately we get too many, is that sent by trouble-makers, an interfering neighbour, perhaps a jealous mother-in-law, who writes and suggests that Mary is not behaving or that she is not looking after the children. There are many such cases where these complaints are true, but there are many more which we have had investigated by reputable authorities here and we have found them to be absolutely without foundation. I mention these matters because they are of real importance to the boys overseas.

It is marvellous that morale is so high after we have been so long in England. Three years of waiting is a severe test. I believe, however, that events have to some extent helped to carry us over the waiting period. When we first went to England everything was new; everything was different; we were training, getting ready for the job. Then came the fall of France, and the Canadian division at that time assumed much greater importance than one would expect its size could warrant. The fact is that the Canadian division was practically the only force that was intact and reasonably well equipped. Britain had been pouring out her troops and weapons overseas; when the boys came back from France they came back with nothing, and the Canadian division assumed the real defence of England—a poor enough force when one considers now what was against it. Fortunately the Royal Air Force, in which there are many, many Canadians, defeated the Luftwaffe, with the result that the probability of invasion during the winter of 1940-41 became remote. We were given a breathing spell. During that winter and the next spring our army was growing; England was busy making replacements for the weapons she had lost, and the situation eased a little. But Britain was still pouring out her troops and supplies to other theatres of war. Therefore the Canadian force, by this time growing, still continued its vital role of guarding the homeland. During that period there was little trouble with the men; they knew they were doing a job, and they were satisfied to do it.

Time went on. The boys were looking for a fight. However, bombing over Britain continued and our men saw the sacrifices, the uncomplaining sacrifices, of the British civilians. What soldier could honestly complain when he saw how much was being suffered by others?

The winter of 1941-42 was a difficult period. The invasion scare was passing and the boys were again becoming a little restless. However, with the spring there was new hope that at last we were going to get into action. There were large scale manoeuvres, assault landing practices. We were getting closer to the real thing.

Then came Dieppe. Great as was the cost of Dieppe, the lessons we learned and the experience we gained are invaluable. We shall not know until the last line is written how many lives may be saved by reason of the experience gained at that time. Many of our boys were bitterly disappointed that they had missed the show, but at the same time they knew that Canada had at last been in a real fight, and our boys had demonstrated not only that they could take it but that they could hand it out. Dieppe was a promise to them that their turn was coming.

So time went on. We saw the happenings in North Africa, in West Africa, and more recently in Russia. At last we can see the shape of things to come. We feel now, at long last, that we are really going to be in it. When and where the attack will come we shall not be told until the time comes. Just how we are going to find the ships, how we are going to find all the forces that will be necessary to sustain and maintain an attack on the continent, I do not know. All we know is that the Canadian army is there to lead that attack, that it can break its way in and is ready and able to carry on. But if we are to maintain our morale we must get into that fight, and soon. The boys went over there to do a job; they are not bloodthirsty, but they went to do a job and want to get it over.

Now as to the post-war period. Everyone over there is concerned more or less about what is going to happen to him when this show is over. I think the boys appreciate the arrangements that have been made so far with regard to post-war rehabilitation, but they do want to see more. They are not overly concerned; they are trusting the people of Canada and the government of Canada to ensure that adequate provision will be made for them when they return. They are not looking for hand-outs; all they ask is a chance to work and make their own way, and they wish to be sure that there will be security for those, the wounded, the sick, and their dependents, who will not be able to look after themselves.

I cannot close without just a word about our leaders, Generals McNaughton, Crerar, Montague and Sansom. I know them all. I have worked under them and with them, and it has been a privilege to do so. The army commander, General McNaughton, is of course outstanding; he is a great soldier and a great leader. The others are fine soldiers, men in whom the troops overseas have the greatest confidence. Theirs is a great task and a great responsibility. But I firmly believe that they will measure up to that task and that responsibility to the limit.

I have said that our army is eager to be on its way. Let me add that we do not believe that the mere fact of our landing on the continent of Europe will cause our enemies to collapse. We know there is much hard fighting ahead; our losses will be grievous and there will be much sorrow in Canada. Knowing all these things, we look forward to the struggle with confidence and in the sure knowledge that nothing will be left undone by the people of Canada to ensure that we shall be able to carry on to the end.

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, for special reasons I feel that at this time I must disregard the suggestion made by my leader (Mr. Graydon) yesterday and offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply. I do this for two reasons: first, because I believe that in offering my compliments to these gallant gentlemen I also pay tribute to the armed forces of Canada to which they belong. My second reason is that if I am correctly informed, these two gentlemen represent in this house rural ridings somewhat similar to my own.

May I also congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Booth) who has just taken his seat upon his maiden speech. The description he gave of conditions in the Canadian army overseas was very interesting indeed.

I intend to speak briefly this evening, and to confine my remarks almost entirely to one question, the position in which agriculture in Canada finds itself to-day. I am sure everyone will agree that the production of food is just as essential to our war effort as any other kind of production in which we may engage. The farmers of Canada know this to be true, and they are doing their best to achieve that maximum contribution to the war effort which is expected of them. Unfortunately they are labouring under most severe handicaps in many ways, handicaps which they find themselves powerless to overcome, but which I believe must be removed if we are to achieve the greatest possible effort in the production of foodstuffs in this country.

The speech from the throne falls logically into two parts. The opening paragraphs are devoted to questions dealing with the war, and I am sure we all agree that measures concerning our participation in the war should be the first consideration of this house. The needs of our army, our navy and our air force must be considered most carefully, and I believe it is the duty of the government to inform the house as fully as possible to what extent these needs are being met, just as it is the duty of an opposition to criticize when criticism seems necessary, and to offer suggestions of a constructive nature.

The second part of the speech from the throne deals with the legislative programme of the government, and, if I may say so, this part of the speech is more conspicuous because of the omission of certain subjects than because of those matters with which it deals. The amendment which was offered by my leader yesterday, and which I intend to support, recites three of these subjects. First, there was the question of man-power; second, the question of labour and third, questions concerning the problems of agriculture. It seems to me most disappointing that nothing is said in the speech from the throne about any solution of the important and immediate problems which confront agriculture. It is true that some suggestion was put forth that a study is to be made in order to see that primary industry shall receive an adequate income after the war, but there is no indication that measures are to be undertaken to overcome the shortage of labour on the farms and to see to it that prices of farm products bear a fair relationship to the cost of the goods and services which the farmer must buy.

It is difficult for me, and I believe the country will find it difficult, to understand why no undertaking to deal with these questions is apparent in the speech from the throne. Certainly some solution must be found; otherwise agriculture will be unable to achieve that effort which we all hope it may put forth. Moreover, I do not believe it will be able to meet the demands which have been placed upon it for higher food production. Those demands necessarily are very heavy. In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made some reference to the volume of foodstuffs being shipped to the United Kingdom, and took unto himself and his government a certain amount of credit for that achievement. Undoubtedly there was a very large production in Canada last year; it was a remarkable achievement. The farmers of Canada worked early and late and did everything humanly possible to bring about that result, and I believe they are entitled to any credit which may accrue because of the magnificent contribution we made in that regard.

I have said that the demands upon agriculture are particularly heavy. Production goals for 1943 were set at a dominion-provincial agricultural conference held last December. I believe that meeting was convened by the agricultural supplies board, and those goals provide for substantial increases in food production as compared with 1942. For instance, in the case of meat an increase of 285,000,000 pounds was asked, or an increase of 16 per cent as compared with 1942 and 18 per cent as compared with 1941. I believe last year we had the greatest production of hogs in the history of Canada, but there the increase asked for is 28·5 per cent, a fairly large increase. In the case of dairy products the increase asked for amounts to some 6 per cent as compared with 1942. I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who was present at that meeting, gave out figures showing the increases that were asked in various lines of farm production. For instance, in Ontario the increase over 1942 in connection with hogs was some 400,000, or 20 per cent; in the case of butter, 15 per cent; eggs, 15 per cent; lambs, 20 per cent; cattle, 10 per cent; potatoes, 5 per cent, while the production of cheese was to remain at the same level.

I wish to point out that these increases were not asked for in connection with only a few lines of farm products they were requested in connection with almost every line of farm production, and if the house will bear with me I should like to mention the figures in order to show the increases on the wide range of products for 1943. They are as follows:

	Percentage increase
Beef cattle	9·0
Hogs	28·5
Sheep and lambs	12·0
Butter	14·7
Powdered milk	42·9
Poultry	10·0
Eggs	29·5
Oats	11·6
Barley	11·3
Hay and clover	7·7
Alfalfa	17·4
Flax seed	67·6
Sugar beets	42·2
Potatoes	10·7

I think the house will agree at once that this is a fairly large contribution for agriculture to be asked to make, in view of the conditions existing in the industry at the present time, in view of the shortage of labour and in view of other matters I shall mention as I proceed. I have stated already that production in 1942 was high. Last year we were blessed with bumper crops, and in most sections of the country we enjoyed ideal weather for the harvesting of those crops. But if I may be allowed to say so, I believe those crops were harvested—at least in eastern Canada—at the expense of preparation for the 1943 crop. In eastern Canada and particularly in Ontario a very small acreage of fall wheat was sown. Fall ploughing was only nicely under way in many sections at the freeze-up, and there were large areas left in grass which would have been ploughed but for the fear in the minds of the farmers that they would be unable to harvest their crop in the fall of 1943.

In spite of these large crops last year, however, it has been shown by the leader of the opposition that shortages already are beginning to develop, that several kinds of farm products are rationed already and that others may be rationed shortly. Some mention was made yesterday of the rationing of butter which, as everybody knows, is an accomplished fact. The Prime Minister took the leader of the opposition to task for not stating that the rationing and the shortage of butter were occasioned by heavy shipments overseas. As a matter of fact I have made some investigations, and I cannot find that there was a pound of butter shipped overseas to the United Kingdom last year. In the case of beef, another farm item which is likely to be rationed in the near future, if we can believe the Minister of Agriculture who, according to radio reports, made a statement to that effect at Brandon a short time ago, there has been very little if any sent overseas. Therefore I think the Prime Minister was perhaps wide of the mark in criticizing the leader of the opposition for making such a statement.

The government has had plenty of warning that there is a labour shortage on the farms of Canada. A short time ago I mentioned the dominion-provincial conference held in December. At that conference where the provinces were represented, where the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa was represented and where the federation of agriculture and other farm organizations were present, a committee was set up to study farm labour problems. They brought down to that conference a report which, I believe, was passed. I have in my hand a copy of the report, and I must say it makes interesting reading. With the permission of the house I will place on record what it contains. The report of the conference on skilled farm labour quoted in the Farmer's Advocate of December 24, states:

> In view of this increased production required for 1943, in face of the decreasing labour supply the conference is of the opinion that the urgent necessity for conserving and supplementing skilled farm labour available must be recognized. And in view of the misunderstanding and confusion which exists with respect to farm man-power, the importance of a clearer definition of the man-power policy as it is expected to apply to agriculture is evident. With a view to contributing to the solution of the difficulties inherent in the farm man-power problem the following proposals are submitted for the consideration of the national selective service authorities.

There are five of these proposals, and I shall state them as briefly as possible to the house. They are:

> 1. That agricultural man-power policies be administered with the assistance of local farm committees, and the provincial departments of agriculture working in conjunction with the employment and selective service offices.

As far as I am aware no local farm committees have been set up, and if the provincial departments of agriculture are working in conjunction with the employment and selective service officers it is certainly to only a very limited degree. Then:

> 2. That the initial call-up which goes out to men on the farm be reworded so that they will clearly understand what the notice means in respect to their status as an essential agricultural worker, and state definitely what procedure they should follow for obtaining deferment.

I saw these notices not so very long ago, and as far as I know there has not yet been any change in them. If there has been a change it has been of only a very minor nature. So that as far as I know the second recommendation has not been implemented up to the present time.

> 3. That all farm workers whose essentiality has been established should be given some form of official recognition which would indicate they are performing an important war service.

That is something which should have been done long ago. Many a skilled farm labourer has left the farm to enlist—and all honour to him for doing so—who would have served his country just as well if he had stayed on the farm to produce foodstuffs. He would have been doing just as useful a service there as he could possibly perform in the armed forces. I believe such men would have been perfectly satisfied to remain on the farms, had they had some way of showing that they were doing their part, and that they were willing to do anything demanded of them.

> 4. That a much larger proportion of men on farms where essentiality has been established be granted the longest postponement term with each successive call.

I believe in some instances that suggestion has been followed. Postponements have been granted on the U.F.N.—until further notice—basis. I believe those postponements are fairly permanent. But when the National Resources Mobilization Act was introduced, and it was found that no exemptions were to be allowed, and that only postponements were permitted, I for one protested against that procedure because, after all, farmers must be assured that they are going to have sufficient help on the farms to harvest their crops. Otherwise they are not going to produce, and are not going to plan for production as they otherwise would. I see no reason up to the moment why young men eligible for war service who are allowed to return to the farm because they are absolutely needed to carry on food production should not have exemptions rather than postponements from time to time.

Those are some of the recommendations made by the conference to the Minister of Agriculture, to be carried to the appropriate authorities. As far as I have been able to ascertain, up to the present time those recommendations have not been carried out, at least in their entirety. I hesitate to discuss the matter of labour at much greater length. Every one knows that for years past there has been a constant exodus of young men and older men from the farms to the cities. They have been lured there by the hope of higher wages and shorter hours of labour. That condition was greatly accentuated during the early years of the war and, as I have already stated, farm labour shortage was very much increased by voluntary enlistments.

I warn the government and the country that unless something is done, and done soon, to assure the farmers of Canada of a more adequate supply of farm labour, the production goals for 1943, to which I have already referred, will never be attained. Owing to the lack of preparation for the 1943 crop, unless something is done I doubt very much whether it will reach the production reached in 1942.

There is another factor which to a great extent affects food production by farmers. I refer to the price ceilings which have been established on so many lines of farm produce by the wartime prices and trade board. My complaint about those ceilings is that they do not establish parity. I can see no reason for the disparity in farm prices. I do not believe the wartime prices and trade board can offer any reasonable excuse as to why there is not a fair relationship between farm prices and the cost of goods and services the farmer must buy. We have more than one proof of the condition which exists. Our federal and provincial governments have recognized the fact, because they are paying bonuses to-day on quite a number of farm products.

In addition to that, the present federal government is setting arbitrary prices on wheat. I have always felt that these ceilings were unfair to agriculture and I have often doubted whether they were necessary or needed at all. In fact, speaking in the house last year from this same place I said that I did not think high prices had done any harm in the last war. At that time the farmers were enabled because of higher prices to pay off their mortgages in a great many instances and to set aside money which stood them in good stead during the days of the depression. Up to the present time I have not seen any reasons whatever why I should change my mind. Undoubtedly the imposition of price ceilings at levels at which they stand to-day has resulted in a great deal of confusion and discouragement to the agricultural industry.

I go on to give what I think is even more convincing proof that these price ceilings are not at a high enough level. Agriculture to-day, as in the past, is not enjoying a fair share of the national income. Hon. members will remember that when the Sirois report was brought down it showed that for the ten years ending in 1938 agriculture in the Dominion of Canada enjoyed only about 10 per cent of the national income although the farmers comprised over one-third of the population. The situation has been very little better during the past four years. Although prices for farm products are somewhat higher, they still present a most alarming picture.

I have in my hand a statement from the bureau of statistics entitled, "Relative importance of agriculture to other sectors of the national economy of Canada". I do not intend to burden the house with a lengthy recital of the figures which this statement contains. There is shown not only the total figures of national income and farm income, but the percentage of farm income originating in agriculture in relation to the national income, at farm prices obtained from the records of gross incomes throughout Canada. I should like to point out that these figures are made up from four items: first, cash sales of farm products; second, the value of products produced and consumed on the farm; third, the computed rental of the farm house, although I have never been able to understand just why this should be included, and, fourth, government bonus payments. While the percentage of national income enjoyed by agriculture is somewhat higher than for the ten-year period prior to 1938, which I quoted a moment ago, it has not yet reached a fair level. For the year 1939 our farmers received 14·8 per cent of the national income; for the year 1940, 13·1 per cent; for 1941, 13·1 per cent and for 1942, 13·3 per cent.

It will be seen that despite price ceilings and bonuses which have been offered by both federal and provincial governments, the farmer of Canada to-day is in the unfortunate position of not receiving his fair share of the national income. I will go further and say that in most instances he is not receiving for his products prices which will pay for the cost of production and give him a reasonable profit. May I pause here to say I am glad that in the fourteen points which the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party enunciated some time ago there is included the principle that all classes of primary producers should receive a fair share of the national income.

Moreover, if agriculture is to reach the production which is being asked for the year 1943, it is absolutely essential that the farmer should not be asked to produce at a loss. I do not believe that Canada will ever enjoy the prosperity to which our agricultural areas and resources entitle us unless our primary producers can buy the goods and services they need. I believe it is an economic fact that income derived from primary production creates the buying power of the country. It is new wealth which is being produced each year, and for that reason it is one of the factors which contribute very largely to the country's buying power. If the farmers and other primary producers of this country or of any country are not prosperous, that country cannot enjoy the prosperity which it should.

I am not pleading for extremely high prices for farm products. I am not asking for prices which will bolster up inefficient or poor management. I am not asking for prices which will encourage the cultivation of the submarginal lands in certain areas of this country. If we see to it that the farmers receive a fair price for their products, they will deliver the goods. There is no doubt that if the farmer is assured reasonable prices, if he is supplied with a reasonable amount of labour, he will produce to the fullest extent.

There is another reason why these price ceilings are not satisfactory. If there is one thing more than another that the farmers have complained of in days gone by, it is the rapid and violent fluctuations which occur from time to time in farm prices. A farmer must plan a long time ahead. If he is going to produce grain he must plough his land anywhere from six months to a year before he can place the grain on the market or even feed it to his stock. It seems to me that stability in farm prices is absolutely essential, and yet the war-time prices and trade board has perpetuated this system of price fluctuation. In the case of butter, prices are on a sliding scale, and the same applies to beef.

In this respect may I pause to make a suggestion. Under the present arrangement the peak of beef prices will be reached next May. Farmers all over the country, particularly those who have an abundance of feed, are holding their cattle in the hope of realizing these high prices next May. That is one reason why there is to-day a scarcity of beef on the markets of Canada. I would point out that there is grave danger that when the time comes when these higher prices are to be paid there will be such a glut on the market that the abattoirs will be forced to reduce prices in order to cope with the situation. The whole price ceiling policy to-day as it applies to beef seems to me to be most complicated and blundering.

There is another reason I should like to advance to show why it is unsatisfactory. A ceiling price has been placed on beef and it has had the effect of setting a price for killer cattle. But the price of stockers has been allowed to find its own level, and last fall when many men were anxious to buy stockers they found that the price was actually higher than for the cattle which were finished in their stables and which the farmers wanted to sell. The result was that in a great many instances those cattle were held over, and the feed lots in Ontario and eastern Canada were allowed to remain vacant. That was a most unsatisfactory and unhealthy condition to prevail, particularly when we are so badly in need of beef.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. Last fall, when the beef shortage began to become apparent and when the quota of cattle which we were supposed to export to the United States began to operate in the last three months, the government set up a food corporation the duty of which was to purchase the cattle which were destined for the United States. Drovers went into the country, bought up these cattle at Canadian prices and then sold them to the food corporation at United States prices which were as much as twenty and twenty-five dollars more than the farmer received for the cattle. Somebody made a handsome profit out of these transactions and certainly it was not the farmer, the man who was entitled to it. I am afraid that the activities of the food corporation at that time cost the country a very pretty penny indeed. I have pointed out these matters in the hope that something will be done to remedy the situation.

Just for a moment I should like to refer to another matter. I listened with a good deal of interest and attention last night to the remarks made by the leader of the socialistic group to my left. With his description of conditions in agriculture I very largely agree, but in a recent address which he delivered over the radio he condemned what he termed "rugged individualism", and he laid the blame for the world-wide depression of the thirties on its door-step. I cannot agree with that statement. The depression was world-wide. It was just as prevalent and just as serious in those countries where private enterprise and individualism were shackled as in our own country or in any other democratic country. It is true farmers will never become wealthy, but if proper measures for their benefit are taken they may arrive at a competence which will provide a fair measure of security. One thing farmers prize above all else is their pride of possession. It guarantees to them the privilege of private enterprise and the right to follow their own way of life. We are at present fighting for these things, for our liberty and freedom. Nowhere are these privileges exemplified in all their beauty and in all their value more than on the Canadian farm. It would be a tragedy, if after these rights have been saved and retained for us by our brave men at the front, they should be taken away from us by any system of regimentation or state control such as is advocated to-day by our friends of the socialistic party.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks have been rather rambling. They have not been made in any spirit of carping criticism of the government. They have been made with a real desire to point out some of the difficulties under which agriculture is labouring at the present time and, if possible, to point out the way in which these difficulties may be remedied. There is no doubt that farmers, if they are given a reasonable opportunity, are only too anxious to cooperate in our war effort, and I believe that if the remedies which I have suggested are applied and the farmer is assured of a reasonable supply of labour and of a fair price for his products over and above the cost of production, he will produce to his full capacity.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address. It was refreshing to hear these two brilliant young men speak in this parliament after returning from overseas where they have been defending the cause of liberty. They were both very modest, and I am sure that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) must have found inspiration in their splendid addresses. Both spoke in a refreshing manner, using no extravagant language at all. It was evident that they were speaking for the sole purpose of revealing the facts as they are to-day.

[Mr. Senn.]

I also wish to congratulate the leader of the opposition upon having been chosen by his party to occupy the exalted position in which he now finds himself in this house. I have enjoyed his friendship ever since he came into this house, and I trust that nothing will ever happen to weaken that friendship in any way. Of course he has taken upon himself the responsibilities that go with the leadership of the opposition, and it may become my duty at times to take him to task.

Mr. HOMUTH: That would be only natural.

Mr. WOOD: I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member. I should like also to commend the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) for his contribution this evening in defence of the farmer. I believe he was wholly sincere in presenting his case, and I share with him his concern for agriculture in this country in regard to the labour shortage. But I wish he had spoken a little longer and offered some solution. It is very easy, of course, to find fault, but what we are anxious to hear is a solution of the problems that beset us.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is your job. You are in power.

Mr. WOOD: And I believe that if we do as well in the coming year as we have done in the last three years we shall make a pretty good job of it, too.

Mr. HOMUTH: Ask the farmers about that.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to give a little résumé of conditions as I see them to-day. We have just harvested one of the largest crops in the history of Canada, and if we do not harvest a large crop this year I believe we shall have a sufficient carryover to maintain our production of meat, for which we have a market overseas. We have only a limited market for our wheat and grains, and we are therefore in an extremely fortunate position in having a large carryover of grain because it enables us to maintain our production of meat and meat products.

The hon. member for Haldimand rather challenged the explanation which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave last night with regard to the butter situation, and I do not think the hon. member was quite fair. We do not export butter, it is true, but we do export butter fat in the form of cheese, and no one knows that better than does the hon. member for Haldimand. I think he should have completed his statement on the butter situation by giving that explanation if he wished to be fair not only to himself but to the house. Butter is in a similar position to beef. We do not export beef, but we do ship about 200,000 head of cattle to the United States each year. That is done under our reciprocity agreement with the United States which was brought about by this government in 1935, an agreement which has done more to maintain farm income than anything else, I believe, in the last few years.

May I take this opportunity to give a resume of the progress we have made from the point of view of agriculture, as far as the national income is concerned. The hon. member for Haldimand was very much concerned because, on the basis of the prices which the farmer receives for his products, agriculture does not obtain, according to him, an adequate proportion of the national income. I do not take too seriously the percentages given with respect to agriculture's share of the national income and the assertion that it is but a small proportion of the whole, because possibly the hon. member is living in a state of mind suggestive of the days of Christopher Columbus, when 100 per cent of the national income came from the land. We must bear in mind that we are progressing and that we have steel mills and various manufacturing industries, and naturally, therefore, the proportion of agricultural income to the total income will not be as high. But what the hon. gentleman should have pointed out was that the portion which one-third of the population received from agriculture was so much, because many people living in rural sections receive incomes from sources other than the farms. That is something which should be taken into consideration. What does concern me as a farmer is whether the farmer is receiving more to-day than he did in 1939. That is the real point. It does not make any difference to the farmer what anyone else gets as long as he gets his share. That somebody else is wealthy makes no difference to me so long as I receive what I want.

Mr. ROWE: How much more do you pay?

Mr. WOOD: Well, I know that at the close of the last war in 1918 the cost of living had increased by twenty per cent, and to-day it has increased only two per cent in consequence of the restrictions brought about by price control.

Mr. ROWE: And the farmers got forty per cent more for their products then.

Mr. WOOD: Yes, but what good did the forty per cent do? As a matter of fact, it created in the farmer the belief that he could accumulate debts, public and private, and that is something which we are trying to avoid by the system of price control. The national income in 1942 is estimated at about $7 billion, of which labour, with four million workers, gets about $4,150,000,000, or sixty-three per cent. The farmer's cash income this year, according to estimates I have from the Department of Agriculture, is $1,080,000,000 and added to that will be $90,000,000 of subsidies, which brings it to roughly $1,100,000,000. Against that he has costs of production of about $350,000,000. But what I wish to point out is this. There has been a steady increase in the prices of farm products in spite of the fact that we have a ceiling price on the finished articles. Many object to the ceiling price being applied only to the manufactured product, leaving natural products free, but the result of the system is this, that there has been practically a two cent increase in the price of beef from 1941 to 1942. Steers in Toronto in 1940 were $7.50; in 1941, $8.63, and in 1942, $10.16. The average for twenty years was $7.03, so that there has been a pretty fair increase. Let me give prices for the live weight of hogs. In 1940 they were $8.57; in 1941, $9.95, and in 1942, $11.72. Will anyone say that there has not been a substantial increase in the price of farm products? The same applies to lambs and butter.

Butter in the Montreal market in 1940 was 30·2 cents; in 1941, 34 cents, and in 1942, 36 cents, and on top of that we have a ten-cent subsidy until April.

Mr. HOMUTH: And now we cannot get it.

Mr. WOOD: Now that the hon. member has raised that question I might as well discuss it at once. No one knows better than he does the reason why we cannot get butter. It is not that the farmer did not produce as much butter in 1942 as he did the year before. The difference is only one per cent, but the fact is that there was a greater consumption by seventeen million pounds, and we have exported in butter fat to our friends of the united nations thirty-two million pounds which went into cheese. Surely it does not call for a great deal of intelligence to understand why there is a shortage of butter, and I am surprised that the hon. member keeps raising the question. There are few people who have access to the information that he has, and he should not go round trying to sow the seeds of unrest among the population when he could do a kindness not only to himself but to the war effort by informing the public of the facts.

I am quite aware that in a country such as this, under the principle of free enterprise, and especially to us who are the sons and grandsons of old pioneers who came here seeking liberty and who hewed out for themselves a home in the stubborn forests, we do not take kindly to these restrictions. I trust, however, that the day is coming, when the war is over, when we shall get back again to the principles and policies of free enterprise and when we shall not have these restrictions any longer. Until that happens, I heartily agree with the leader of the opposition on the policies and principles which he has endorsed, and I am glad to know that at least there are some things which I have in common with him in that regard.

May I call attention to one matter about which I am concerned. It is to be found in the Atlantic charter in clause 4. I believe the leader of the opposition quoted clause 5, but the one I am concerned about is this:

> They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

Mr. HOMUTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD: I am glad to hear the hon. member for Waterloo South endorse that. He is one of those who are in and out, on and off, ready to change their name and adopt any kind of policy, and they seem to get away with it. Nevertheless it is good for the people concerned to know where the Progressive Conservative party stands on the matter of tariffs.

As far as social security is concerned I was pleased to hear that the leader of the opposition was favourably impressed with that part of the speech from the throne and was even prepared to enlarge upon it. I must say that until the Winnipeg convention I cannot recall one contribution he has made as long as he has been in this house that indicated to me that he was seriously interested in broader plans of social security. After all, it is by one's deeds that one is known.

I should like to refer to a contribution I made on this subject, which will indicate that I am not a new convert in the matter of social security. I have always believed that in a country like ours we should at all times exercise sufficient frugality and thrift to set aside a certain portion of our earnings for future welfare and social security. On May 2, 1938, speaking on relief and agricultural distress, I had this to say, as reported at page 2472 of Hansard:

> The time has come when, no matter what station in life a man may hold, it is his duty to contribute, according to his ability, to his own general welfare, and I would suggest that when the minister brings down his unemployment insurance scheme he keep that fact in mind.

On June 25, 1940, when asking for extension of the scope of the legislation for unemployment insurance, I made this statement, as found on page 1120 of Hansard:

> I should like to see in our social legislation some provision for a contributory national pension scheme which would take the farmer into consideration. To-day he is not only supplying the food of the nation at less than cost, but he is making a great contribution to the education and to the social and industrial life of the country.

No nation can afford to neglect the farmer. The farm has given a great contribution to industry and all branches of society by giving periodically a blood transfusion, as one might call it, to all departments of public activity. Farmers have made a great contribution to the pulpit and to all walks of professional and industrial life, and it is essential that we should retain a strong and virile people on the land. If we have a policy whereby farmers can participate in social security, it will do much to encourage people to stay on the land.

I do hope, however, that no plan will be devised that will lessen or destroy initiative in any way, and that it will only be a plan that will contribute to the minimum requirements of life, and our future policy should be based upon the principle of merit. The greatest contribution that can be made is by individual initiative.

I should like to call attention to the share that labour is receiving in our present war effort. The share of labour amounts to $4,124 million. I do not yield to the leader of the opposition in my desire to serve labour. After all, labour is the greatest customer of the farmer, and it is necessary that the industrial worker should be prosperous. But labour is not entitled to the only place. Very often, especially at times such as this, there is a great desire on the part of organized labour to seek to increase its share of the national income. I have in my hand some Canadian figures showing that in 1929 total wage payments amounted to 61·4 per cent of the national income. It is interesting to note that regardless of what labour does, it seems to be able to obtain only a certain proportion of the national income. I believe it is the duty of labour, as of everyone else, if they want to enjoy a fuller life, to try to increase the national income. That does not mean, as our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation seem to argue, that a more or less equal distribution of the country's wealth should be made; that will not raise the standard of living. But if the national income is increased, the standard of living for all will be improved. We must all go down the road of success abreast; there is no use in seeking to safeguard our own class only.

I listened with great interest to the speech by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) on the radio about two weeks ago. One thing that struck me was that when he was commenting upon the weakness of the old orthodox political parties he made some grand and glorious promises about a new order and a new world. There came to my mind stories that when an election was on, politicians would come to a town and promise the inhabitants a new post office, hoping to secure the votes of that community. But the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had them all stumped because he promised a new world.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Prime Minister promised a new heaven and a new earth.

Mr. WOOD: That would not be very interesting to some hon. members.

What about this new order? I have listened time and time again to these promises of freedom from want and all these other freedoms. There seems to be a belief on the part of some people, who, I am sure are sincere, that by creating certain conditions and changing things around they will be able to take the struggle out of life. I do not think it can ever be done. As long as this world is inhabited by human beings, most of us will have to be kicked upstairs. There is plenty of room there; but we need something to put us up there; it will not be done automatically, and I do not believe it would be a very good thing if that were so.

I should like to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to some views I hold and the reason why I take this stand. We talk about the distribution of wealth; we are told very often that there are a few people in this world who have control over great wealth while the rest are nothing but slaves and peasants of the very favoured few, who are able to reach underneath the chairs in which they recline comfortably and pull out anything they want while the rest of us have to get along with very little. If you analyse the income tax returns you will find that if you took everything away from those with incomes of more than $50,000 a year, which is considered the high income tax class, you would be able to maintain our war effort for only a very few weeks. I happen to have before me an article published by the Wood Gundy people, which shows the distribution of our bank deposits. Savings deposits amounting to $1,000 or less account for 31 per cent of all savings deposits, and total some $496,300,000. Accounts of from $1,000 to $5,000 total $522,200,000, or 32 per cent of the total savings of the country. In other words, in this class there is practically 64 per cent of all the savings held by our small bank depositors. We have some $3,100,000,000 lying in our banks, belonging to about 4,000,000 depositors. That is a pretty good percentage of the population of this country. We also have 2,500,000 people holding insurance policies, having an average value of $2,000. Surely there never was a time in the history of this country when wealth was more equally divided than it is to-day. Some of us have perhaps had a little taste of how it feels to have some savings, and we want more. When we look around and see someone with more than we have, of course the human elements of jealousy and envy creep in; the have-nots envy the haves, and we begin to think we need a new order so that we may be placed in a favoured position. But I notice that generally the man in the most favoured position is the man who has earned it. I remember as a boy listening to a sermon in the Baptist church to which I went in the village; I remember that the subject was that the Lord does not trust everyone with talents to the same extent, and I thought there was a great deal to that. The reason why many of us have not very much wealth is that we cannot be trusted with it, and I have discovered that a great many people cannot be trusted in that way. Perhaps the greatest calamity that could happen to many people would be access to too much money. We have records to show that many men who at one time possessed some wealth lost it over a period of time, and it came into the hands of someone else. There is nothing permanent about wealth. We have the income tax, the succession duties and everything else to take away this wealth and hand it back to society, thus giving those who have not been able to accumulate anything a second, third, fourth and perhaps tenth chance to do so.

I notice that this new order is being discussed by many who belong to an element in the community who, as far as I can see, have never known what it meant to make a living, but under our capitalist system they have enjoyed the privilege of free education. I do not want to be unkind to the academic mind just because I do not happen to possess one myself. I do say, however, that in my opinion if there is anything calculated to disturb the equilibrium of our country it is the few people who have been blessed with absorbent intellects, who have taken advantage of our educational institutions, who have become proficient in the use of the English language and who go round this country talking to working people, farmers and others, but who have nothing to sell except speeches. They are good enough business men in their own line; they are cautious in what they say to their customers, generally saying the things they know their audience want to hear rather than the things that should be said. I am satisfied that these men constitute a challenge to the sober, orthodox-thinking people who have laboured hard, who by frugality and thrift have been able to secure command of some of the good things of this world. Perhaps if some of these men had possessed some capital to offer together with their suggestions, they would not be talking quite so much. Generally speaking, however, it is those who have nothing who are always looking for some new world order to take the struggle out of life.

Just here I should like to mention that I come from the county of Brant, which on February 19 will celebrate its freedom from debt. That is a splendid thing. The county of Brant is out of debt to-day, and I hope to attend that celebration. This is the result of action taken a number of years ago, when a number of frugally minded men—and I want to say that then, as now, they were the sons and grandsons of the old pioneers of Brant county—decided that we would get out of debt and follow a pay-as-you-go policy. That was early in 1930. At that time we had to meet a bill of $220,000 from the province of Ontario, representing our twenty per cent share of the cost of building highways. In addition, we had a funded debt of $218,000, and early in 1933 a bridge was built at a cost of $129,000. We set to work to pay that amount in cash. In order to meet all those commitments we had to sell a bond issue of $150,000, and the balance of what we owed we paid in cash. Previously our funded debt had always been on the fifteen-year plan. We issued that $150,000 on a ten-year plan, which is why we are going to be out of debt this year instead of five years from now. The point, however, to which I should like to direct attention is that we took this action at a time when the purchasing power of the dollar was extremely low. I happen to have before me a record of prices from 1930 to 1934-35, when it just happened that it was not a Liberal government that was in power here.

Mr. HOMUTH: Or 1936 or 1937, or 1938.

Mr. WOOD: It happened to be one of the ancient parties we used to hear about, called the Conservative party. They had a different name, but I guess it is now in the museum. In 1932 it took fifteen hogs to pay my taxes on a 100-acre farm. This year I paid my taxes with three and a half hogs. Nevertheless at that time we had courage enough to start the policy of paying our way as we go. That is one of the reasons why I stand loyally behind this government in its price-control policy, in spite of all the disabilities and the discouragements which present themselves. I believe, when we get far enough away from this war effort, the efforts of the government and its many activities will be looked upon with favour. I hope I shall be able to attend the celebration in ten years' time which will undoubtedly arise from the splendid type of administration we are having. I point this out only to show that the path of least resistance is not the one for public men to take. It is their duty to stand firmly behind their principles, and do those things which they believe right, knowing what the results will be.

We have, undoubtedly, an immense debt. But we are servicing that debt to-day almost twice as easily as we did in 1921 when we took over the debt of the Canadian National Railways. At the present time the average rate of interest is only three per cent, while at the time of and shortly after the last war it stood at about five and a half per cent, and on top of that the money we borrowed was in United States funds. We did not have foreign exchange control at the time of the last war, and as a result much of our money went to the United States. We had to pay it back in United States funds, and we paid interest in the same way. The issues of loans at that time were tax-free. To-day our total investment income stands at about $512,000,000. The interest on our loan is about $237,000,000, and this goes back to the people who, in turn, pass part of it back to the government in income tax. I believe if we analyse the government's financial policy, and if we are fair about it, we must admit that the country's business is wonderfully well financed. I believe, if we deduct individual income tax payments on interest received from government bonds, we shall find that probably the government is paying less than two per cent on our debt.

Let me revert to the policy of the new order. In my closing observation I should like to draw particular attention to some of the things which have taken place under what some will describe as the old capitalistic system. After all, to look back and see what we have done may give us confidence for the future. I wonder if we are fair in our judgment of the capitalistic system. I wonder if any other system could have possession of 1,500,829 automobiles in 1940—and this with only eleven and a half million people. In other words, practically one out of every seven people is driving either a truck or an automobile. That is something to think about, when we are considering how the old capitalistic system has worked. We have enjoyed in Canada, and on this continent, the highest standard of living in any part of the world. In this respect Canada gives place only to the United States. In 1941 we spent $151,865,000 on the purchase of automobiles, and in addition to that we spent $79,935,000 for roads on which to run them. They consumed 702,114,883 gallons of gasoline.

I am satisfied of this, that if we had some of that socialistic order emphasized over the radio by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, while we might get along for a while on the capital and impetus built up under the present system, the time would come when we would have a terrible headache.

In Canada we enjoy the use of 1,461,038 telephones. I do not know of any other system which offers that advantage. Last year aircraft carried 155,591 passengers, 14,440,967 pounds of freight and 2,710,975 pounds of mail. The other night I had the pleasure of listening to the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation over the radio, and a similar opportunity was offered 1,454,717 other people in whose homes are radios. There are that many radios in Canadian homes.

When we want diversion we may go to the motion pictures. The figures reveal that 152,137,225 admissions were sold to the motion-picture theatres, costing us $37,858,955. In spite of the rationing, in 1940, we each consumed 122·8 pounds of meat and 31 pounds of butter. So that if we are rationed a little bit we have only to spread the butter a little thinner. Surely that will not be considered any great hardship when we reflect upon the privileges we enjoy.

To continue: we find that 21,969,871 people travelled on our railways an average of 99 miles each. For the protection of labour $24,000,000 was spent in workmen's compensation, for the men who happened to get hurt while working. Since its inception the federal government has contributed over $231,000,000 to old age pensions. In 1940, $28,472,475 was contributed for this purpose from the federal treasury, and $1,087,239 was allocated to the blind. For mothers' allowances we paid over $10,000,000. Up to that year 2,661,275 people had subscribed for life insurance policies, bringing the total insurance figures to over five billions of dollars, with an average of $2,000 for each person. Surely these are some of the things we ought to take into consideration before we wreck the house in which we are living.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. WOOD: I thank the house for this gracious gesture. I do not wish to take advantage of this privilege, but there is one further point I should like to mention. I know there are troubles in this world and there always will be. It is, however, our duty to try to do our part, whatever our station in life may be, and make some contribution toward making this a better world.

I had sent to me a book which I have no doubt other hon. members received. It is entitled "The Common Problem", and is written by William R. Yendall. I have enjoyed reading the philosophy of life outlined in this book and I accept a great deal of it. The solution of our problems is well explained in it, namely, that instead of wrecking and tearing down our present economic order we should follow the plan therein suggested. The author relates that an Irish town councillor called in an engineer and said:

> "We have decided to build a new gaol. We have decided to build it out of the bricks of the old gaol, and we have decided to use the old gaol while we are building the new one."
> The engineer laughed, for that is not the engineering method. But the problem of modern society is essentially the problem of the Irish town council, to build a new world out of the bricks of the present world, and use the present world while we are building the new one.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my words of appreciation to those of the hon. members who have preceded me in the honours accorded to the members of the armed forces in moving and seconding the address of his excellency in the speech from the throne. I think every member of this house realizes that our armed forces are the spearhead which stands between our democratic way of life and nazism, that the very existence of this house is dependent upon their initiative and their success.

I should like also to compliment the new leader of the Progressive Conservative group (Mr. Graydon) upon the honour which has been accorded him by his associates. I am, however disappointed that he should have accepted even the temporary leadership of a group which for the past seven years has consistently set its sails to catch every political breeze which has been blowing in Canada and then found when the sails were set that the wind had veered and they were again left in the doldrums. I am disappointed also that they should, in stating their mobilization policy, have again used the qualifying phrase. The hon. member should have known by now that he cannot compete with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who has had thirty years experience in this house in the use of that phrase. Their mobilization plank reads:

> We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance.

That is exactly the policy of the government, mobilization where necessary. I do not think that is what the people of Canada desire to-day. I believe they desire total mobilization, mobilization of industry and finance on the same basis as we have mobilization of man-power at the present time. I know that is what the people in my part of Saskatchewan believe.

He complained also about the adoption by the government of many of the planks in their platform. This is nothing more than could be expected because there is to-day no fundamental difference between the two major political parties in this country. They both believe in capitalism; they both believe in the return to capitalism immediately this war is over. The people of Canada realize that to-day there is no fundamental difference. This is not only my opinion; it is the opinion of some of the keenest political observers in Canada. Mr. Grattan O'Leary, writing in Maclean's magazine of December 1, 1942, said this:

> Except in labels there has been no difference between the liberal conservatism of the party led by Meighen, Bennett and Manion and the conservative liberalism of the party led by Mackenzie King. If there has been difference at all it has been in that while the Conservatives practised liberalism in office and talked toryism in opposition, the Liberals talked liberalism in opposition and practised conservatism in office. In fundamentals they have been alike as two peas.

But in Canada to-day there are two distinct lines of thought. There are those who believe in the continuation of our present capitalistic system and there are those who believe in a cooperative economy. The one is the direct opposite of the other; both cannot continue to exist and expand in any country; one must supersede the other. Capitalism stands for the control of the services and productive facilities of this country by individuals and groups of individuals who shall operate them at a profit for themselves. On the other hand, cooperation believes that these services and productive facilities should be owned by the people cooperatively in order that the services may be provided at cost. Any political party or parties that contend that they believe in the return to capitalism and believe in cooperation are patently trying to ride two horses at the same time. The farmers of this country know that is an absolute impossibility.

We hear a good deal of talk about free enterprise under the capitalistic system. Free enterprise is fast disappearing under our present monopolistic capitalistic system. The farmers of Canada are concerned over what is going to take its place. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believe, as do the farmers of this country, that a cooperative economy is the only democratic solution and is the only method by which the individual can use his initiative effectively at the present time. I do not think I need to bring this particularly to the attention of the house. We have seen in many instances during the past thirty years the disappearance of private initiative. To-day the small storekeepers are finding it practically impossible to compete with the chain stores and the mail order houses. The small manufacturer and the small machine-shop have disappeared. The small farmer is disappearing, and the present-day value of farm property has depreciated fifty per cent from what it was twenty years ago. Farms which were worth $10,000 twenty years ago, to-day are worth approximately $5,000. This is what has happened under a capitalistic system.

That is why the farmer is now becoming more and more a cooperator, and a believer in the cooperative movement. He believes that lack of planning is hampering production on all farming fronts. His criticism is that he is deprived of any opportunity to participate in the planning of the contribution which he will make. Had the counsel of the farmers been sought, many of these blunders might have been avoided. In the fourth year of the war this government continues to leave economic controls largely in the hands of business men who have been trained in the technique of monopolistic capitalism, while they ignore almost completely the counsel of the farmers. Under such domination there is great possibility of the enterprise and initiative of the farmer being further endangered and crushed.

Not only have the recommendations of the national federation of agriculture been ignored, but no attention has been paid to the part that could have been played by local committees and by the farmer producer and consumer cooperatives. One of the most glaring results of this lack of planning is the farm labour shortage that we have in Canada to-day. Last March the Prime Minister stated in a speech in the house that it was the intention of the government to maintain the men then on the farms in their positions there, except those who wished to enlist voluntarily. After that address in the house, the then Minister of National War Services issued a press release explaining the new policy which had been adopted. In explaining the difference between the new policy and the old, he said:

> There is, however, this fundamental difference, namely, that if the applicant is a person wholly or mainly employed in agriculture within the meaning of the amended regulations, the board, subject to certain exceptions hereafter mentioned, shall—

The word "shall" is underlined:

> —grant him a postponement order until further notice and such postponement order shall be an allocation of such person to agriculture.
> It is this direction to the board, namely, that the board shall grant him a postponement order until further notice, that constitutes the "fundamental alteration of the policy regarding compulsory military training and service where such service touches persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture," referred to by the Prime Minister in his speech in the House of Commons on Tuesday, March 24, 1942.
> Previously, under subsections (1) and (2) of section 14 of the national war services regulations, it was provided that the board "shall have power to grant an advancement or postponement order when it is of the opinion that it is in the national interest to do so," but there was no obligation upon the board to grant such orders. The matter was left to the discretion of the boards.
> There has therefore been a fundamental change of base in the regulations. It is not a question of greater latitude having been given to the boards in the matter of granting postponement orders. Nor is it a matter of preferential treatment. The amendments go much further and constitute a fundamental change of approach, both by the applicant and by the board. When the applicant has shown that he is a person wholly or mainly employed or engaged in agriculture within the meaning of the amended regulations, he is prima facie entitled to a postponement order until further notice. He does not have to prove, as was the case formerly, a special case for postponement of a fixed duration.

These instructions have certainly not been followed by the mobilization boards in western Canada, at least not by the ones with which I have had contact. As far as the Saskatchewan board is concerned, it has proceeded in exactly the same manner as before. It is calling up men from agriculture and granting them only temporary postponements. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in western Canada a short time ago, stated that only ten per cent of the men from agriculture applying for postponement to the Saskatchewan board have been refused, but I maintain that that is only a half truth. The whole truth is—

Mr. GARDINER: Just in order that the record may be accurate, what I stated in Saskatoon was that I was so informed by the board in Saskatchewan.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not stating that the minister's information was not correct; what I am stating is that if it is correct, these men were granted postponement for only a short period, and within six months from seventy-five to eighty-five per cent of those who had been granted postponement found themselves in the armed forces. I had an instance brought to my attention. A young chap wrote to the board asking for a postponement for three weeks in order that he might complete his arrangements before he was called up. In reply he received a telegram from the board stating that if he would signify his willingness to enlist for active service, there would be no trouble about granting the postponement. These things are not right, and the government must face this problem in a realistic manner. They cannot have at one and the same time both more men in the armed forces and greater production as far as western agriculture is concerned, and I believe this applies to eastern Canada as well. The man-power problem is acute. In substantiation of what I have said I wish to quote a telegram which has just been received by the leader of our group. It is from Rosetown-Biggar and reads:

> Am farming two sections and half of land. Am up against it for farm help. My last man just called up. Have over sixty head cattle, over hundred sheep, thirty brood sows, twenty horses and nobody to look after them. I am sick and cannot get help. What am I to do? It would be a great sacrifice to sell stock. Have had four or five men working other years, now the last man is going. Please advise.

If the government requires greater production from western agriculture I believe that the men who are on the farms in western Canada to-day should remain there.

There is another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the government. In obtaining evidence as to the essentiality of a man to agriculture the practice has grown up in western Canada of using the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as the body to make a report. I have every confidence in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when it comes to enforcing the law. I believe they have done wonderful work in Canada during this war in preventing sabotage, but I maintain that they are not the proper body to make these reports. Many of the men who are at present in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in western Canada are young constables, the older men having gone to other posts. These young constables are not acquainted with the people in the locality in which they are stationed, and they must go to somebody else to get information to complete their reports. I know of many instances in which they have never approached the individual concerned but have taken the word of neighbours and other individuals as to the essentiality of that man to agriculture. Reeves of municipalities, the municipal doctor, the clergy and other representative men in the locality have written in to the board signifying that certain individuals were required on the farms, and yet the report of the mounted police has been accepted in preference to the advice given by these people on the spot, with the result that men have been taken off the farms and called up for military service. I know of several instances in my own constituency where that has happened, as a result of which the father of the boy has had to sell his stock and rent his farm, and that farm is being used to-day for the production of more grain instead of producing things which the government requires much more urgently at this time. Local committees of responsible men who know the people in their own community and their circumstances would be a much better source from which the board could obtain evidence than the reports made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

There are two specific recommendations which I should like to make with regard tc farm labour. I believe that all men now engaged in agriculture should be continued in their present occupation, and that in cases of emergency, where real need is shown, men might be taken from the armed forces in Canada to supply the deficiency of manpower on the farm. I also believe that the services of conscientious objectors who have experience in agriculture might be used. These conscientious objectors are to be found in some of the camps in large numbers. I do not know what the total number is, but many of them are experienced in agriculture. Farming to-day is a specialized industry, and farm labour must be experienced. A farmer cannot afford to-day to hire an inexperienced man to run machinery which may cost anywhere from two to five thousand dollars a unit.

What happened with regard to the harvesters' excursion which was run to western Canada last fall? Some four weeks before harvesting started in western Canada the government of Saskatchewan made a survey of conditions throughout the province, and every municipality stated what its needs were with regard to harvest help. The provincial government had that information, and I suppose they passed it along to the proper departments at Ottawa. We were told by the Minister of Agriculture and by others that we must depend in Saskatchewan upon our own help in harvesting the crop. Yet when harvesting was almost half completed the labour situation became so serious that the government decided to send large numbers of men from eastern Canada to the west. These men were largely taken from our universities in the east. These men were anxious to do the job, but they were inexperienced and just could not fill the bill. Within a very short time large numbers of them were back in the towns and cities with blistered hands and sore backs, asking to be returned to eastern Canada. Probably fifty per cent of the men who came out on that excursion performed a useful service, but there were large numbers of them who should never have left eastern Canada. There should have been more selection in the choosing of them.

Another thing that happened in Saskatchewan was this. Our university opened as usual. Students from all over Saskatchewan went into the university, and the second day after they were there, universities in eastern Canada closed and started to send their students to Saskatchewan when our own students were there in the university. Immediately the university authorities or the provincial authorities, I do not know which, became alarmed at the anomaly, and the students were sent home. Many of them were left stranded in Saskatoon and had to telephone to their parents to send them the money to pay their fares home. These are examples of lack of efficient planning.

I believe that if serious conditions are not to develop this fall there must be a greater allotment of machinery to western Canada. The allotment of our farm machinery required for production of grain is twenty-five per cent of the 1940 sales. In the case of many companies I was informed that the 1940 sales were very low, and I do not believe that twenty-five per cent of those sales are going to be sufficient to meet the requirements of western agriculture this year, especially with regard to certain types of machinery. I believe we shall have to have a larger number of combines. One large combine would have taken the place of approximately twenty of those men who came from eastern Canada. During the last year of the last war wheat was selling in western Canada for $2.25 a bushel and you could purchase a binder there at that time for $285. To-day it is worth $385. A seed drill which then cost approximately $250 is to-day worth approximately $400. I believe, and the western farmers believe, that there should be a greater parity between the prices we receive to-day for what we have to sell and the prices we have to pay for the commodities we have to buy. The government's policy of freezing farm prices at levels that obtained between September 15 and October 10, 1941, has, I believe, proven unworkable. In a great many instances it has been necessary to adjust these prices by subsidies. These subsidies in some instances have been paid to the processor of agricultural products. In others they have been paid directly to the farmer, but where they have been paid to the processors it was expected that they would pay a higher price for the product which they were processing.

We in this group do not believe in the principle of subsidies. We believe that the government should appoint commodity boards which would purchase from the farmer the products he has to sell, at cost of production or, if that could not be ascertained easily, at a parity price established on the basis of a period of years in which agriculture has received a proportionate share of the national income. If there were a loss to the government, the commodity board could absorb that loss, and we would not have to set up the bureaucracy which in many instances has been set up in the payment of these subsidies in western Canada. As an example of this I would mention the subsidies paid on the wheat acreage reduction plan. We have in western Canada, according to returns tabled in this house, a list of names of men who were paid for this purpose, and according to that list, there were some six hundred men in the west who were doing this inspection work.

Mr. GARDINER: Six hundred employees.

Mr. WRIGHT: In that particular part of the province which I represent ninety per cent of these men are political appointees, and they are deliberately mixing business with political propaganda. The farmers of Canada have become disgusted with this method of doing business. We had a grain policy announced last Friday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), and I should like to compliment him upon the promptness with which the government's grain policy has been announced this year. I would suggest, however, that it would have been better had he consulted organized agriculture, as represented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, before presenting this policy.

There are some things in the policy with which I do not agree. I believe that the stoppage of payment for storage of grain on the farm is not defensible at this time. The minister gives one reason why the policy was adopted. I submit that there are two other reasons. Statistics show that a considerable amount of storage is not being used in the elevators in western Canada. In many instances this is because certain elevator companies have bins which have been available for, say, No. 4 wheat, but a large quantity of grain in that particular district is No. 3 wheat, and when the farmer comes and asks if there is a bin for No. 3 wheat he is told that there is no space available but that they have a No. 4 bin if he is willing to accept No. 4 for his wheat. As a result of that, there has been a great deal of grain held back in the country. There are also a large number of farmers in the west who desire to use their own facilities in the delivering of their grain, and they are holding their grain back until there is room in the pool elevators at their particular point so that they may deliver their grain through their own system. This legislation, stopping the payment of storage, is forcing these men to deliver their grain through other sources than those which they would like to use, and they are delivering grain at a lower grade than they should obtain.

With regard to prices, may I say that they are far below a parity level. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding in this country as to what is meant by parity prices. In the United States they took the period of 1909-1913 as the period in which agriculture in that country enjoyed an approximately equal place in the division of the national income with labour and industry, and they worked out a basis of parity prices on that period. In Canada a great many organizations have accepted the period 1926-1929 as being the basis on which parity prices should be established in this country. I would point out that during those years agricultural income was only one-sixth of the national income, although one-third of the employable males in Canada during that period were engaged in agriculture. As far as we are concerned we are not prepared to accept that basis. We believe that a period should be chosen in which agriculture enjoyed a proportionate share of the national income with the other economic groups.

According to a pamphlet issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture there has been only one period in Canadian history in which this has occurred; that is, the years 1915-1919. Agriculture will be satisfied with parity prices established only on a basis that will give it a proportionate share in the national income with other groups. This pamphlet shows that the average income per farm in 1932 in Canada was $198 in cash and kind, and $111 in actual cash. From that time on there has been a substantial improvement. In 1941 the total cash income of the farmers of Canada was $876,500,000. Adding produce consumed on the farm amounting to $172,000,000, we get a total income of about $1,048,500,000. Deducting expenses of $363,000,000, which according to the Rowell-Sirois report is about what the expenses would amount to in that year, we get a total net income of $685,500,000. This figure, however, does not include depreciation or interest on investment. Dividing it by the number of farm units, we find that in 1941 the average income per farm was $914.

At the present time we have available income figures for only the first nine months of 1942. Working them out on a percentage basis, we find that the average net income per farm for 1942 would be about $1,005. On the average farm there are at least three people engaged. This gives an average income of about $335 for those three people.

In spite of these facts, we see articles in the press suggesting that the farmer is not paying his fair share of the income tax. This is an entirely inadequate income at this time, and if the government are to get the increased production necessary for a successful war effort they must give further consideration to the establishment of parity prices for farm products, which are at present entirely out of line with the returns to industry.

Another matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the government in connection with increased farm production is this. In industry, if the government wants increased production of any commodity and it is necessary to have new plant and equipment for the purpose, depreciation allowances are made which enable the industry to write off the cost of that plant in two or three years. This was shown quite clearly yesterday by the leader of this group when he read quotations from the report of the special committee on war expenditures. But when the government ask for increased farm production they make no allowance for depreciation on the additional equipment that the farmer must buy to get that increased production. This is a distinct preference given to industry.

Again I wish to state, as I did at the beginning of my remarks, that it is only by long-term planning for agriculture that we can hope to obtain much further increase in production. While it may be that the present shortages in butter and dairy products are not entirely the fault of the government, nevertheless they must accept a considerable share of responsibility. I do not like to be one of those who say "I told you so," nevertheless in 1940 I did point out in this house that our export of dairy cattle to the United States had increased thirty-five per cent over that for 1939 and our export of calves to that country had increased by fifty per cent. These were largely dairy calves. Anyone who knows anything about agriculture would know that this increasing shipment of dairy stock out of the country would result in a shortage of dairy products sooner or later. Nevertheless nothing was done about it. At that time the price of butter was entirely out of line with the cost of production, and farmers naturally disposed of a large amount of their dairy stock because of that and of the shortage of labour.

If we are to get the increased production that the government have asked for, we must have long-term agreements with the countries to which we are exporting. It is not enough to have agreements which just run from one year to another. Our agreement with Great Britain should continue at least for the duration of the war and two or three years after, so that agriculture could be assured of a market for its products if our herds are increased as the government is asking at the present time. The methods being followed in the United States in their long-term plan, of establishing local committees of farmers prepared to advise in the carrying out of the AAA programme, have been a means of bringing about great additions over there. It is a democratic way of obtaining the support and the participation of the farmers for any such plan, and I believe it could be used with great advantage in Canada to-day in our war-time production effort.

There are several other matters which I should like to bring to the government's attention. Two of them are the implementation of the Veterans' Land Act and the amendments to the Soldier Settlement Board Act recommended by the committee on land settlement last year. In that special committee last year I endeavoured to have a parity price clause written into that agreement. I thought this might be a suitable place for the government to introduce the principle of parity prices in our agricultural economy. Here we have a small group of the most deserving of our citizens who were going to be placed in agriculture on their return to Canada. Surely, if the government was genuine in its protestations of desire to better agricultural conditions, this would be a good point to start. They refused, however, to introduce this amendment. Nevertheless the committee brought in a recommendation that the government give further consideration to the principle of parity prices. I should like to know if the government has given this matter consideration, and, if so, what its decision is.

There was also the matter of the treatment of soldier settlers of the last war. I did not consider that the recommendations made by the committee which dealt with the matter were sufficient, and this year I should like to see the committee reconstituted in order that it might receive a report from Mr. Murchison, director under the new Veterans' Land Act, as to what progress has been made under that act, and so that we might be able to make certain recommendations to him at this time.

There is also the matter of the allowances paid to the girls who are at present in our armed forces. I understand an order in council has been passed providing that women employed in industry shall receive the same wages as the men they are displacing. If this applies to women in industry, I believe it should apply equally to the girls who are going into our armed forces. They are displacing men, taking over their jobs, and I believe they should receive the same pay as the men. That is only fair, and the government should give consideration to this matter. There are also the matters of old age pensions, veterans' widows' allowances, health insurance and the social security provisions, on which I hope to have more to say at a later date.

There was, however, one matter taken up in the speech from the throne, on which I should like to say something definite at this time. I refer to the question of redistribution. Under the new act we in Saskatchewan will lose four members, and I believe Manitoba will lose three. We believe that any redistribution at this time is going to work an injustice as far as Saskatchewan is concerned. Large numbers of men and women who formerly lived in that province have gone elsewhere to secure employment. Many families from the south of the province were settled in the north, in the reestablishment areas, where their living was very slim indeed. As soon as war broke out and employment became available in other parts of the dominion, these people came east or went to the coast, where at present they are employed in war industry. There is no doubt that immediately the war ends, many of those people will return to Saskatchewan. If to-day under any redistribution bill the number of seats in Saskatchewan is reduced, two years from now, when those people return to Saskatchewan and our population again increases, as I believe it will, we shall not be fairly represented in this house; and that will apply for the next ten years. Consideration should be given this point in any redistribution carried out at this time. I also believe that instead of a committee of the house we should set up a commission to deal with this matter. Redistribution has been a political football too long. I believe we will get a fairer redistribution through a commission than through a committee of this house.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to ask the government if it approves the "don't give a damn for the middleman" policy that has been adopted by the wartime prices and trade board. I do not ask this question in any spirit of levity; I ask it in all seriousness, because I have been informed by businessmen from my own community, on their return from Ottawa where they had been discussing with the board difficult problems which confronted them, that the officers of that board had told them in no uncertain terms that they "did not give a damn for the middleman."

I found it hard to believe that such a policy had been adopted by the board, but a short time ago, at a public meeting in the city hall of Saint John, called by the mayor of that city, to inquire into certain difficulties regarding the delivery of milk which had arisen by reason of regulations recently passed by the New Brunswick dairy products commission, the secretary of that commission told the meeting that recently he had been in Ottawa and said, I quote his remarks from the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of January 14:

> The wartime prices and trade board is interested in the price to the consumer and the price to the producer; as far as the middleman is concerned, the wartime prices and trade board does not give a damn; he has to stand the squeeze.

A policy that does not give a damn for the middleman or for the little man, a policy that squeezes him out of business, cannot, in my opinion, be justified. Under our system of competitive business and freedom of enterprise, he carries on because he renders a service to the community. To adopt a policy of "don't give a damn" toward him and to make regulations that will squeeze him out of business is to adopt a policy which at the conclusion of this war, or perhaps before that time, will place all the business of this country in the hands of great corporations and monopolies.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HAZEN: Not just now, if you please.

I know that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, or socialist party, in a radio address only a few evenings ago, said:

> . . . when peace comes there must be no return to the old way of doing business with its unplanned, unregulated competition. . . .

I do not agree with that statement. In my opinion, competition subject to proper safeguards as to hours of labour and living standards of wages, is the life of trade and of economic progress; and only as long as we have freedom of competition and freedom of enterprise will freedom continue to exist in this country.

I was not inclined to believe that the government would approve any such unwise and dangerous policy, but only a few days ago I read an address given in Vancouver by Mr. Donald Gordon, the energetic and able chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, during the course of which he said:

> In spite of uninformed critics, responsible government was nowhere more in evidence than in the administration of the board. The suggestion that the board or its chairman could wield wide powers without ministerial control or responsibility was not in accordance with the facts.

If the correct conclusion to be drawn from that statement is that the government approves this don't-give-a-damn policy, then I have no hesitation in saying that it is time it reconsidered that policy, and came to some other decision in the matter. I would say further that the time has come when these regulations, or some of them, should be reviewed, and, when necessary, altered in order to protect the middleman and the small businessman.

This matter was forcibly brought to my attention recently by certain regulations that were passed by the New Brunswick dairy products commission. This commission was established by act of the New Brunswick legislature in 1935. Its object was declared to be, and I quote from the act:

> The enforcement of commercial ethics and marketing conditions that will enure to the common benefit of the dairy trade and the general public.

The dairy trade, the act states, comprises the producer-suppliers, or farmers, the vendors, the dealers or dairies and the storekeepers.

The vendors are the men who buy their milk from the dairies and sell it to their customers who, until these regulations came into force, were stores, restaurants, hotels, institutions and private homes.

Most of these dealers, or dairies, in addition to selling milk to the vendors also have their own delivery wagons, and sold milk to the householders.

These vendors had been in business for many years in the city of Saint John. They would be up every morning, about half past two, and would reach the dairies at a very early hour. They would have their milk delivered to their customers in time for breakfast. They would not finish their work until some time in the afternoon. Their hours were long and the work was hard. But these men did not think the country owed them a living, and they did not look for government bonuses or assistance. They made their living by rendering a service to the community.

Recently, without consultation with the dairies, without consultation with the vendors, without taking any expert advice so far as I have been able to find out—and I questioned the commission about it—the commission issued certain regulations having the force of law, which provided that in future all milk sold to stores, hotels or other institutions had to be sold by the dairies themselves, and could not be sold by the vendors. These regulations took from the vendors about fifty per cent of their business—the best part of it, because it is much easier to deliver two or three cases of milk to a store, hotel or some other institution than to climb up one or two flights of stairs to deliver one or two bottles of milk to one householder and one or two to another. Not only did it take away about half of their business, and the better half, but it cut their incomes in half. It did all this without providing them with any compensation whatsoever.

Undoubtedly it was highly pleasing to the dairies, or most of them, to get the best part of the vendors' business, without any expense to themselves. But it worked a great hardship and a great injustice to the vendors; for these men had families to keep, rent to pay, taxes, insurance premiums and other obligations to meet, and this drastic cut in their income put them right on the spot. They had no redress other than to appeal to public opinion.

In effect the commission said to these men, "Sell your trucks to the dairies; get jobs with them as hired men, or else be content to get along with half of what you are earning now, or seek some other form of employment".

This, sir, is Hitlerism with a vengeance. It is a step toward the establishment of a totalitarian state in the place of freedom of enterprise in competitive business.

If three or four persons get together, break into my house and steal my property we call them gangsters and thieves, but three or four people can get together and take away half of the business of certain hard-working taxpayers in a community, and we call them a commission. It would be just as well if we called a spade a spade. It would be well—and I think the time has come—to take steps to put a stop to such wrong-doing.

Not all the dairies of Saint John were pleased to get this business. One of them, which had been established by a man who had a thorough knowledge of the dairy business, first as a farmer or producer, and then as a vendor, conducted its business on a different system. It did not make any of its own deliveries. All of its milk was delivered by vendors.

Many dairies which made their own deliveries had had a difficult time of it. Some of them failed. But this particular dairy went ahead. The system had great advantages. Under it the vendors owned their own delivery wagons, and consequently took a greater interest in and greater care of them than hired employees would have done. The vendors were interested in getting additional customers, and this meant more business for the dairy. The vendors made their own collections, thereby making fewer bad debts, and the system resulted in a simpler and cheaper method of accounting for this dairy.

Under the new regulation, if this particular dairy were to remain in business it had to buy additional trucks at a time when it was difficult, if not indeed impossible, to obtain them. It had to hire additional men to deliver its milk at a time when it was difficult, if not impossible, to hire competent men. It had to set up a much more elaborate system of bookkeeping in its office. There was arbitrary interference with business management. It completely upset the system under which this dairy had successfully conducted its business, and the managing director of the firm had grave doubts if it would be possible for him to carry on successfully if these regulations were enforced.

Among other things, the regulations provided that all milk and cream had to be delivered in a conveyance owned by the dairy and operated by a full-time employee. This meant that no dairy could hire a vehicle or a man part-time to make deliveries. The effect of this regulation is that if I own a truck or other conveyance which I do not use all the time and wish to get some additional revenue from it and a dairy would like to hire it from me, I cannot rent it to the dairy nor can I get employment with the dairy for part-time. This is restriction of individual rights that goes to the extreme.

The chairman of the commission said in a statement which appeared in the press on January 4 last that these regulations had been passed "to eliminate duplication and overlapping." As a matter of fact the regulations do not prevent duplication and overlapping. There were just as many trucks delivering milk on the streets of Saint John after the regulations were passed as there were before. They did prevent vendors from delivering milk to stores, hotels, restaurants and other institutions, but they did not prevent them from driving up to a store or restaurant, stopping their trucks, walking upstairs and delivering milk to customers who might live above the store or the restaurant.

The reason given by the commission convinced no one, and the public are up in arms over the injustice that has been done to the vendors who are hard working men, some of whom served in the last war and some of whom have sons serving in this war.

When the public began to take an active interest in the controversy because of the injustice that had been done, the commission announced that these regulations had the approval of the wartime prices and trade board. I do not know the details of the communications that passed between the commission and the board; I have not been informed of any of the details of the conversations that took place between them, but I have good reason to believe that the board was not fully apprised of the situation, although it should have been. I doubt very much if it would have given these regulations its approval had it known that the vendors' business was being taken away from them without compensation and handed over to the dairies as a free gift.

May I give brief details of one or two instances of the effect of these regulations upon the vendors. A man owned a small dairy farm about two miles by road from Saint John. He became a vendor with five customers. These customers were one or two of the largest hotels and two or three of the largest restaurants, all centred about one public square. When the regulations came into force he went to the commission and asked them if he could deliver his milk by horse and wagon, assuming that the regulations had been passed to save gasoline and rubber. He was told that he could not, but there was nothing to prevent him from loading his motor vehicle up with milk at his farm and driving several miles past the centre of the city to sell his milk at wholesale to some of the dairies who would then pasteurize it and get an additional price and an additional profit when they delivered it.

In another instance a vendor had not been very successful. He was forced to sell his truck and what customers he had to a dairy and get a job as a hired man with it. The dairy then gave three vendors who purchased milk from it about thirty quarts each. This was milk which this man used to sell to householders. But it took away from them over 200 quarts of milk each which they used to sell to stores or restaurants, and it said to them, "If you keep on selling to stores or restaurants we will not sell you any milk at all."

I can readily understand that a system of zoning in the distribution of milk might save duplication and overlapping in large communities, but I am not in a position to say whether a zoning system would be practicable or would effect any worth-while saving in Saint John. These regulations, however, did not establish a zoning system. If they are intended to be the first step toward a zoning system, it has been a very ill-advised step, a step that cannot be justified. If it is proposed to establish a zoning system, the steps taken to set it up should be based upon the foundation of fair play and justice and not upon confiscation without compensation.

In bringing this matter before the house, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not making an attack upon the wage stabilization and price-ceiling policy of the government. I believe that all reasonable efforts should be made to keep inflation under control. I agree with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said yesterday, that there is an obligation upon every member of this house to help to interpret the necessary restrictions that further our war effort, particularly those restrictions which some people find to be irksome or irritating. But I say that neither fear of inflation nor the furtherance of our war effort should lead the government to approve injustices such as taking people's businesses away from them without compensation and making a free gift of it to other companies or corporations.

[Mr. Hazen.]

These regulations which have been approved by the wartime prices and trade board are most unjust. They serve no useful purpose and I would ask the government to instruct the wartime prices and trade board to review the situation with a view to withdrawing the approval which it has given, or else to insist that the vendors be fully compensated for the business which has been taken away from them.

This is not the first time I have complained in this house about citizens having been deprived of their rights without compensation. I have on more than one occasion protested against the regulation that was passed on the recommendation of the then Minister of Fisheries, which deprived the owners of property fronting on the non-tidal waters of the Saint John river of their proprietary rights in fisheries. I do not propose to deal with that matter now, but it is an injustice that must in the end be rectified.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say what perhaps I should have said when I began. I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address upon the excellent speeches they made. It was most fitting and proper that members of the armed forces, one an English-speaking Canadian from the province of Ontario and the other a French-speaking Canadian from the province of Quebec, one who had been overseas and expects soon to return overseas, and the other who expects to take his unit overseas within a very short time, should have moved and seconded the address. The speeches they made were the speeches of loyal British subjects and of loyal Canadians who realized the very serious situation which we face to-day, and I have much pleasure in congratulating both of them upon what they said on Friday afternoon.

On motion of Mr. Gershaw the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Wednesday, February 3, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

HEALTH INSURANCE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SELECT COMMITTEE ON SOCIAL INSURANCE—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister. The speech from the throne states that among the matters which will be referred to the select committee on social insurance will be the establishment of a national system of health insurance. Perhaps the Prime Minister will be good enough to indicate to the house whether or not it is the intention of the government to bring down legislation covering this subject before the matter has been referred to the select committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The intention of the government is to have the select committee appointed in the first instance, and when the select committee is meeting there will be special consideration given, among other subjects, to the establishment of a national plan of health insurance.

Mr. GRAYDON: There will be no bill first?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. May I add, lest my reply might be misunderstood, I should not like the impression to go abroad that no legislation may be introduced at this session with respect to some aspects of social insurance, including possibly health insurance. That will depend among other things on the recommendations of the committee, and what the events of the next few months may be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not true that a bill has been prepared and submitted to the medical profession, at least in part? I happen to know that that is true, that the medical profession have seen the bill and have made some pronouncement on the question of health insurance.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I might answer that. For the past year and a half, officers of the Department of Pensions and National Health, along with experts of various other departments, have been exploring certain proposals in relation to health insurance. No bill has been submitted to the government, but certain proposals have been discussed from time to time by my officers and myself with the medical and dental professions, druggists, nurses, and about twenty-two different organizations in Canada. These proposals will probably be discussed before the select committee. But no bill has been submitted to the government. And this work was going on long before the Winnipeg convention.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might I say to the minister that it is pleasant to find one exception.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is submitted to everyone but parliament.

CANADIAN NAVY

ARTICLE IN "BOATING" MAGAZINE BY COMMANDER A. D. MACLEAN (RETIRED)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the government's attention been drawn to serious charges contained in an article in Boating magazine, written by Commander A. D. MacLean (retired), extracts from which are published in to-day's Globe and Mail, together with an editorial suggesting that this house should concern itself with the charges? In any event, will the minister make a statement at the first opportunity?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What charges?

Mr. COLDWELL: The charges are detailed in to-day's issue of the Globe and Mail. I thought it unnecessary to read them into the record.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister). My hon. friend I think will agree that the members of the government can hardly be expected to be reading all the magazines and papers as they appear. If my hon. friend will allow his question to stand as a notice, an answer might be given later.

Mr. COLDWELL: That will be satisfactory.

GASOLINE

INQUIRY AS TO RATIONING FOR ENSUING YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply, in view of the great public interest in the question, whether he is in a position to make any announcement with respect to gasoline rationing for the ensuing year. If he cannot make a statement to-day, will he be good enough to indicate when a full announcement on the subject may be anticipated?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I am not in a position to make a statement to-day. Rationing for the coming year of course is closely involved with the supply situation, which at the moment is rather desperate on the Atlantic seaboard. But when the situation clarifies itself I will make a statement in this house. I shall do so as soon as I can.

DEVELOPMENT OF ALBERTA TAR SANDS

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In view of the allegedly serious shortage of gasoline I would ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply what progress is being made with the development of the tar sands of northern Alberta.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to make a statement on that matter at an appropriate time, but I think this is hardly the proper moment. It will take some minutes to explain the situation.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF COST OF LIVING BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Numerous letters are appearing in the papers asking when the cost of living bonus is to be paid to old age pensioners. Is the minister able to give the house any information in this regard?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL: (Minister of Labour): The question of old age pensions does not come under my jurisdiction. The inquiry might perhaps be directed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the Minister of Finance tell us?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): There has been no decision to pay a cost of living bonus to old age pensioners.

RATIONING

REQUEST THAT RATION BOOKS BE SENT THROUGH MAIL RATHER THAN CALLED FOR IN PERSON

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with the new ration books, and I am asking it to-day because there is not time to place it on the order paper. A new regulation has been issued requiring individuals to call in person for their new ration books. I have had complaints to the effect that the man of a house may be working and the woman doing war work. The children are not permitted to obtain the books. Will the government make a statement on this matter, and see if it is not possible to return to the old practice of mailing the books? Here we have an organization costing us $4,000,000 a year, and surely the old practice of using the post office would be better. Will the government consider reverting to the former practice?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall bring the hon. gentleman's question to the attention of the rationing authority, which is the wartime prices and trade board.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUSTICE MCTAGUE AS CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the house is aware, the government has been seeking to secure the right person to fill the position of chairman of the national war labour board, from which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has resigned. I am happy to be able to say that the government has secured the services of Mr. Justice McTague of Toronto as chairman of that board. I need not tell the house that Mr. Justice McTague has had long and exceptional experience in dealing with industrial problems. He has been on many conciliation boards, and I believe is the best person that could be found to fill this very important position.

In connection with Mr. Justice McTague's acceptance of the position there will have to be some reorganization of the board in fundamental particulars. Later the house will be given the further information on that point.

As hon. members doubtless know, for the last year or two Mr. Justice McTague has been acting as chairman of the war contracts depreciation board, and there are matters connected with that board which make it inadvisable for Mr. Justice McTague to resign as chairman for the present.

VISIT TO OTTAWA OF REPRESENTATIVES OF MONTREAL DISTRICT AIRCRAFT WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The representatives of the aircraft industry of Montreal were given the assurance two days ago that they would have the opportunity to present to the national war labour board any grievances or matters they wished to have considered by that board, under the new chairman who was to be appointed. As a new chairman has been secured for the board I am hopeful that this opportunity will be afforded very soon.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY SPEAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask when the opportunity will be given to complete the organization of this house by the appointment of a deputy speaker?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will recall that under the rules of the house the deputy speaker is not appointed until after the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been agreed on. As soon as the rules of the house have been complied with in that particular the deputy speaker will be appointed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I direct attention to the fact that the third reading of the bill respecting the Chief Justice of Canada appears under government orders. The government would like to have the third reading of that bill before the special order is taken up. I might add that yesterday we could have proceeded with the third reading under the rules, had we wished to do so, as there was no amendment in committee, but the government was not anxious to press the matter unduly.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I think we of this party are prepared to agree to the third reading, on the distinct understanding that by thus expediting the bill we do not indicate any more approval than we gave it yesterday.

The house having proceeded to government orders:

CHIEF JUSTICE OF CANADA

EXTENSION OF TERM OF OFFICE FOR FOUR YEARS FROM JANUARY 7, 1940

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend an act respecting the Chief Justice of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GRAYDON: On division.

Mr. COLDWELL: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in venturing to offer a few remarks during the course of this debate I want first to congratulate most sincerely the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address both upon their eloquence and upon the subject matter which they presented. I do so particularly because they represent in this house the armed forces, and I say all honour should be given that great body of free men who are offering their lives to preserve the precious heritage which has been handed down to us and which is threatened at this time by a ruthless aggressor. All down through the centuries brave men have been called upon to do battle in times of danger. The history of the past records their valiant deeds; but when the history of this war is written the skill and courage of the airmen, the sailors and the soldiers of democracy will add a shining page to that record, a page which will be outstanding in the annals of human conflict.

We who are not facing the enemy directly must bear some trials and inconveniences, but these inconveniences are as nothing compared with the things with which the fighting forces must contend. As has been pointed out, we have some inconveniences with regard to rationing. We cannot sell all we should like to sell; we cannot buy some of the things we should like to buy. We may be restricted to a certain extent in our food supply, but the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is setting up a nutrition organization which will teach the Canadian people the art of living and will go a long way toward preserving the health of the Canadian people. Hard work will be the lot of many who remain in Canada. My heart goes out to the elderly men and women who are trying to carry on their work on our farms with the younger people away at war work. Again, we may be confused by the many complicated forms which business men, farmers and others are asked to fill out. We cannot always understand the need of this information being given, because it often takes a good deal of time and energy to prepare. We may be hampered somewhat by the licences we have to procure, and by difficulties in connection with priorities. But the people of Canada are willing to submit to these things, and the officers administering them are willing to adjust them to the needs of the people, so as to cause as little inconvenience as possible.

For seven hundred years there was a small village named Lidice in Czechoslovakia. The men and women lived there as happy neighbours. The children laughed and played on the streets. Then the German conquerors came. The men were forced to do what they were told to do. The women had scanty supplies of food for their tables. Worship in the churches and teaching in the schools were interfered with. And then, on a road which did not even lead into this village, two men were mortally wounded. The gestapo stepped in. They claimed that a radio had been found and that the people of that village wanted their freedom, and so a terrible vengeance was visited upon them. Their buildings were levelled to the ground, the men were shot, and callously thrown into common graves, and the women and children were carried off to we know not what. That is an example of what is being inflicted upon people in countries overrun by our ruthless enemy.

One other inconvenience we have to put up with is the high income tax, but I am sure that those who can pay that tax do not begrudge it. The single man who earns $3,000 must pay a tax of $668; he who earns $5,000 must pay $2,128, he who earns $10,000 pays $5,122, and so on until we reach the higher brackets, where ninety-two per cent of revenue or income is taken, for this one tax alone.

The great, outstanding issue before the people of Canada to-day, the issue which transcends all others, and toward which we must direct our thoughts is the winning of the war. With the cooperation of the civilian population, the strategy of those in command and the courage of the troops this war will be won. Right will triumph over the hordes who claim that might is all important. Some day the war will end. Unfortunately some of the warriors will not return, while others will come back maimed and suffering revolting disabilities. We hope and trust many will return to Canada to a better civilian state of affairs than the world has ever known. I believe the people of this country and the members of the House of Commons are, like the people of New Zealand, determined that in so far as possible no one will lose for having gone to the war, and no one will gain from having stayed at home.

I believe it is the fixed desire and the firm resolution of the people to see to it that never again shall there be widespread unemployment, such as we endured in the thirties. It is their firm desire that there shall be equal opportunity for adults and children of all classes, and that the four freedoms written into the Atlantic charter will be realized and become a great blessing to mankind. These things are not beyond the realm of possibility. The road to them may be hard and rough, but we must lift our eyes from the plains on which we tread, and look to the hills; because it is not beyond human ability to reach that condition of affairs.

Some one has said: How can it be done? How can this bright picture be realized? I say it can be done by the energy, ability and inventive genius of the Canadian people, guided and directed by the leaders in power at the present time. I say this because a similar and perhaps greater Canadian accomplishment is being unfolded before the eyes of the world, an accomplishment which has received the unstinted praise of Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt. I speak of the Canadian war activity.

For example, consider the situation as regards the navy. Starting with fifteen ships and 1,774 men, the navy has grown until it now has 500 ships and more than 40,000 men and officers. They have patrolled our irregular coast-line; they have defended our shores; they have convoyed thousands of ships bearing vital war supplies to the mother country; they have fought on all the seven seas, side by side with ships of the British navy. It has been the greatest naval accomplishment in all history.

All of us are thrilled by the heroic flights of Canadian-trained airmen over Germany. If we were to study the accomplishments of the army and the air force we would find a similar expansion. We would find that these branches are worthy of a great tribute, and their expansion can be placed to the credit of the three ministers of defence in this government.

At times both in the country and in the house the price-ceiling regulations have been criticized. But it becomes more and more clear that those regulations are working out successfully, and that they have been a great help to the Canadian people. Our regulations constitute a model which has been copied by other countries, and those who were pioneers in producing this measure have the satisfaction of knowing they have made a great contribution.

The success of price regulation measures, and the outstanding success of victory loan drives are indications that the people of Canada have confidence in the ability and sincerity, and in the firmness of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Then, the technical knowledge and managerial ability of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) have been a great help to Canada, enabling this country to build up an organization which employs a million workers at the present time, and which is sending the very best of munitions to every battlefield in the world. The Midas touch of the minister has done much to transfer the peace-time economy of Canada into an arsenal of democracy.

At this point I should like to pay tribute to those thousand or more so-called dollar-a-year men who are making a great contribution, and who have been doing so at great cost to themselves. They are getting little credit for it, but I believe that they are doing a great work. If there is any selfishness in their actions, it has not become apparent.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has shown himself to be a master in the art of government. He has gathered around him a group of ministers who are capable of meeting the great responsibilities which are theirs. He has been a great Canadian leader for a quarter of a century. He has held this position in times of sunshine and in times of storm; he has held it in spite of rapidly changing public opinion. He has done much to maintain unity in this country and good-will in an international way, and I think the records of history will justly value what he has done.

I desire at this time to refer to a few matters which are of particular importance to the district whence I come. To a great extent we are interested in the agricultural industry. While the lot of the farmer is better to-day than it has been for many a long day, at the same time there is a class of farmer, there are certain people whose lot is anything but happy. Figures have been quoted in this house to show that during the long ten years of the depression, 33.9 per cent of the people of this country, those who were engaged in agriculture, received only from ten to fifteen per cent of the national income. Their share is higher at the present time, but it still falls short of what it should be.

Those depressed years left a huge mountain of debt. The debt of the farmers of the west is estimated to be $800,000,000. In Alberta alone the farmers owe the banks $35,000,000; they owe the machine companies $50,000,000, and they owe mortgage companies and individuals a total of $100,000,000. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has reduced this debt by some $21,745,000, but there are still obligations that cannot be met. These cannot be met for one reason, namely, that the farmer is being asked to produce at a figure below his actual cost. During the last few years the farmer has received 45 cents, 50 cents, or perhaps up to 70 cents a bushel for his wheat, but Professor Hope of Saskatchewan university has estimated that for the farmer to be able to meet his costs and have a decent standard of living, the price of wheat on the farm should be at least 90 cents a bushel for the average grade. It may be asked how this industry has survived in view of these circumstances. It has survived because the farmer started in with considerable capital which has gradually been reduced until it is all gone. Some farmers have survived by going into debt and assuming mortgages, and others have survived because their wives and children have stepped in and done a great deal of the work of the farm.

In our economic set-up there is one great maladjustment. The home is the very cornerstone of our civilization. The end and aim of all legislation should be to make conditions better in the home. Yet our farm homes are not what they should be. They have not the conveniences which they should have and which the work of the farm warrants. Men and women on the farm visualize the advantages of general and technical education for their children; their children dream of obtaining this education, but their dreams seldom come true because their hopes are often blighted by despair.

My contention is that farm products should not be sold below cost of production, and my further contention is that farm production should be regarded as a munition of war and should have the same sound, practical support and assistance given to those manufacturers who are producing other munitions of war.

Mr. HOMUTH: The government can remedy that.

Mr. GERSHAW: I am pointing out that the parliament of Canada can remedy that. I want to enlist the support of members of this house for a small section of our population who at the present time are suffering from what I have referred to as a maladjustment.

Farming is a skilled occupation, and yet the return for this work is much less than the return for so-called unskilled labour in our factories. It is a dangerous occupation; yet it is without the protection of the provincial workmen's compensation acts, and the farmers are without the ability to protect themselves with accident insurance. It is a lonely, isolated occupation, and yet it is without the comforts of modern homes and present-day inventions which add so much to the zest and interest of life. About the only security that many of the people engaged in this occupation, many of the people in this particular group of which I am speaking, can look forward to is the hope of getting an old age pension. Many of them are worn out before they reach the age of seventy.

I want to make an appeal at this time to have a better Old Age Pensions Act placed upon our statute books. This legislation should start at a younger age and should provide more comforts. By all means let all pensioners have the small sum referred to as a cost of living bonus. The difficulties in getting accommodation and renting quarters are real in most of our towns and cities. The prices of the commodities that these people have to buy have gone up. According to a return brought down last year, in 1942 the dominion contributed $20,611,706 for old age pensions. If the pension is increased to $25 a month, it will mean an increase of $7,402,000 If the pensions are paid at sixty-five years of age, the additional cost will be $19,603,000.

There is one other thing which is proving a great difficulty to old age pensioners. The total amount allowed is $365 a year. The maximum pension is $240, and if the pensioner makes more than $125 a year, the pension is reduced accordingly. In these times this means a hardship to a great many of these deserving pioneers.

The people of this country realize that we are at war and are anxious to make their contribution. Go into the rural districts and you will find that men are willing to give their time in the collecting of scrap iron which may be of use, and the women are spending long hours in sewing and doing Red Cross work. Even the children are bringing in their pennies as a contribution. They are unable to buy war bonds, but they are anxious to do what they can in this regard. I have two suggestions to make which I think are of importance. One is that the local officers of the wartime prices and trade board should have a little more authority and the privilege of making more decisions, because it is often difficult and takes a good deal of time to locate the man who can settle the difficulties that are constantly arising. Although the central office must have control, this system works to the disadvantage of many people because of the difficulty and the time it takes to get in touch with the different officers and secure a decision.

One other suggestion I have to make is that local draft boards be given some voice in granting postponements for military service. Conditions differ very much in different localities. In an irrigation district, for instance, a farmer must have a large staff both summer and winter, doing irrigation work in the summer and stock feeding in the winter. When the younger men are called into the army and the older men go into munition plants the owner of the farm is in a desperate situation. It is believed that stock feeding has dropped as much as forty per cent in some of these districts because of the impossibility of getting help. The returns are not sufficient to allow the farmer to pay enough wages to attract the help he requires, and if he could the help is not available.

There is another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house. A young man—I know of an actual case—enlisted; he was anxious to do his part. After he had gone, his father was taken permanently sick. No one else was available who could carry on the work. Many efforts have been made and much correspondence has taken place, but that young man has not yet received any extended postponement. In the meantime the life savings of this aged couple are rapidly disappearing. It is cases like this which would seem to make it advisable to give men who are acquainted with the local situation some say in granting postponements.

We in the west feel that we are fortunate in having a Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and a Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) who understand western conditions. We realize that they have obtained for the western farmer as much as any one in their positions could possibly obtain. Millions of dollars have been allotted from the treasury to pay for wheat for which there is no market, and bonuses of various kinds have been granted up to an amount of sixty-five million dollars or even more. All these things are much appreciated by the farmers of that western country, although they do find in connection with the bonuses that there are many discouragements and delays and that often the regulations are such that deserving people are denied the bonus.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture one particular phase of this subject. This year there is no prairie farm assistance provided, and yet in southern Alberta we have twenty-two townships where the average yield is much below eight bushels per acre. These people are in a desperate situation, and I hope that arrangements can be made whereby the prairie farm assistance payments can be made to these deserving people. I am not asking for a parity price. I am asking the department and appealing to this house to find out the cost of producing the various farm products and to pay that cost, as it fairly should be paid. The health of the people of the nation demands these agricultural products. If all the people had all the foods which they really require, the full output of agricultural production would be used up. If the farmers of a country are prosperous, all others share in that prosperity. Here is an opportunity to do some of these things which will bring contentment, permanency and attractiveness to the people of this country.

We must look to the great to-morrows. For centuries yet to come future generations will look back upon the efforts and accomplishments of the people of this generation, and we shall be judged by posterity by the efforts we put forth and by what we accomplish now. This is not only a time of trial but a time of great opportunity. Few generations have had the opportunity which is offered to the people of this generation, an opportunity to shield that precious heritage which has been built up by long struggles and which is now threatened with destruction, an opportunity to build, upon the foundations which have been laid, a more noble edifice.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all join with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Gershaw), in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris, Grey-Bruce) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address, and by so doing to pay a tribute to all the fighting forces of Canada. It has not been my custom in the past to extend these congratulations, but on this occasion I am very glad to do it because I realize, as all the rest of us here and throughout Canada must realize, that those in the fighting forces are giving everything they have in the fight for the preservation of what we in Canada wish to keep. I cannot say that I am satisfied with everything we have, but it is much better than people in other lands have, and it is our duty to do everything possible to bring to a successful and speedy conclusion the fight that is now in progress.

We have, as has been pointed out on several occasions, a number of small inconveniences to put up with, and among them is rationing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board could not have been very active when the speech from the throne was being written, because certainly in that document there does not seem to have been any rationing of words, and it is evident that a number of good things which might have been included in it have been omitted.

There is in the speech from the throne only a brief reference to agriculture. We had better all understand that without food we cannot win the war or secure a successful peace. Food is one of the first essentials. I realize, of course, that other things are necessary too, but food is one of the first things, because if we cannot feed our soldiers and our factory workers and those on the other side of the Atlantic whom we have been feeding for the last few years, they will not be in proper physical condition to fight or to manufacture the munitions of war. Therefore, I believe that more attention should have been paid in the speech to the subject of agriculture. I am not particularly surprised to find the references to this subject so meagre, because agriculture has been neglected longer than the period of time I have been in Canada, which is almost thirty years now. Around election time all across Canada farmers are patted on the back and told what good fellows they are; at conventions and similar gatherings members of this house and others hand out bouquets; but when it comes to providing the dollars for the products the farmers raise, we find a number of these good people absent. I am sorry that this condition exists, and I hope something will be done in the very near future to have it remedied.

One short paragraph of the speech from the throne says:

> A joint committee representative of the Departments of Agriculture of Canada and the United States has been agreed upon to co-ordinate the efforts of the two countries in the production of food for the united nations.

We all realize that Canada and the United States are geographically married and that there is no possibility of a congressional or house of commons divorce; and I do not see any reason why we on the Canadian side of the border should not enjoy the fruits of our labours to the same extent as those do who are south of the line.

On Friday last, January 29, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announced the joint agricultural policy for himself and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). If we look back just one year we may remember the delegation which came from the three western provinces. It was not a delegation wholly of farmers; it was representative of all western business and industrial life. The delegates asked for very moderate consideration. Consideration was promised to them and, I believe, was given; but we were minus the financial consideration when the crops were harvested. The delegation asked for an initial payment of one dollar per bushel on wheat, and later they wanted to receive parity, which I believe some suggested at that time to be $1.41. When the government's policy for the year was announced we found that a price of ninety cents was to be given, twenty cents above the seventy cents for the year—or for years —prior to that time, and much below what it should have been. The fact is that the summer-fallow bonuses in the year 1942, the prairie farm assistance and prairie farm income bonuses, have shrunk so much that there is very little financial return from that ninety cents when the amount which is taken away by the bonuses is subtracted. We were told by the Minister of Agriculture that the government was taking every dollar it possibly could out of the treasury and paying it on our wheat crop. Hon. members who have followed the record of the various articles which have been purchased for the prosecution of the war will have noted that in every case cost of production plus profit is paid, and that the farmer is about the only class in Canada that is denied the cost of production. We have been told that the operations of the wartime prices and trade board are the cause of prices in some cases not having been put up. But those who are on the land and have had to buy farm machinery will agree with me when I say that wartime price orders did not provide that those from whom we had to purchase these things should be treated in the same way. If you bought a tractor a year ago this spring it cost you about $85 more than it did the fall before; and in several other lines similar rises of price have been recorded. I do not think, therefore, we are getting the equality of treatment which has been spoken of in this chamber time and time again.

I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture have done their best; the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) has given them thanks, and I want to do the same—for small mercies. But the hon. member who preceded me must realize that these two ministers are a minority of the cabinet, that the more powerful interests are represented by the other seventeen members of the cabinet, and for that reason we are denied that to which we are entitled.

Since coming to Canada I have been trying to get farmers organized, and in the course of that work I have discovered various reasons why farmers have been kept where they are easy to deal with—that is, kept as near the bread-line as it is possible to keep them and yet have them produce interest on the money which they have to borrow to carry on their businesses.

In his announcement the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that we were expected to reduce our wheat acreage this year by three million acres, and that we would be allowed to deliver a straight fourteen bushels per acre. I am not sure whether in all cases we shall be able to deliver fourteen bushels, because, while this year we have had an exceptionally heavy yield of wheat and coarse grains, that condition may not recur for some years. If we look over the averages for a number of years we shall find that the yield this year is nearly as good as that of two average years.

In the course of his statement the minister said that in 1942 we can deliver only 1942 wheat. This, I believe, is a grave mistake on the part of the wheat board and any others who have the authority to deal with the question. There are, I believe, in the house today men who have a carry-over of No. 1 wheat and at the same time are compelled to deliver No. 6 and feed wheat in 1942. That is, they must deliver No. 6 and feed wheat to the wheat board in order not to break the law and incur a fine by the wheat board, while they are compelled to feed to their live stock the No. 1 wheat they have in their bins. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if that is right or just or reasonable or good business. On the day the minister made his statement I asked if he would not immediately bring in an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act and have this changed, and let us get down to business, but because of the rules of the house I did not receive a reply. I now ask the minister and the government to make an immediate change in the regulations so that a common-sense policy can be put into effect and farmers shall be allowed to deliver any grain they may have, whether grown prior to 1942 or during that year. I suppose none of us, when eating a piece of bacon, can tell whether it was produced from No. 1 wheat or feed wheat; and, while we are shipping most of our supplies at the present time to the old country, they over there are not so particular that they will not eat the pork and bacon produced on low grade feed.

We are asked for an increase in hogs, cattle and poultry products. I believe that the farmers of Canada—I am not referring only to the farmers of western Canada—from the Atlantic to the Pacific are doing everything possible to meet this demand. From the Wainwright district I have a number of resolutions; I do not think it necessary to read them because I believe the Minister of Agriculture has copies of them. On December 16 the farmers there met and organized to the best of their ability. I am not sure how effective that organization will be or what cooperation there will be so far as the government is concerned, but I know that the farmers are doing everything they can to produce to the utmost during the coming year.

One of the shortcomings of the government's programme is the withdrawal of payment for grain stored on farms. It is not possible in all cases for farmers to deliver all their quota, because the local elevators—and they are allowed to deliver at only one point—have not the space available. We are not getting such a high price for wheat that farmers can pay that storage. If you compare our prices here with those in the United States it will be seen that we are very much underpaid. In the Western Producer of January 21 last I find this item:

> $1.13 Advanced on United States Wheat
> The United States Department of Agriculture has announced that Commodity Credit Corporation through December 31 had completed 514,687 loans on 386,297,684 bushels of 1942 wheat in the amount of $436,695,969. The average amount advanced was $1.13 per bushel, which includes some transportation charges from the area of production to warehouse locations and storage advances on farm-stored wheat. Loans had been completed on 171,874,656 bushels stored on farms, and 214,423,028 bushels stored in warehouses.

So that in the United States they are advancing on grain stored in the elevators and on the farms. I do not think the United States can grow better wheat than we can; in fact I do not think they can grow as good wheat, and their costs of production are lower than ours. Therefore we are being cheated out of a good many cents a bushel on all the wheat we grow.

On January 7 last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) addressed the Ontario Federation of Agriculture in Toronto. I do not know whether the minister felt he would catch the farmers napping; he told them that the very real harm that agriculture would suffer would be from the deflation and collapse of prices that would follow inflation. If the minister can show me and show the farmers whom he addressed in Toronto, taking into account the price increases that have been allowed on the things we have to buy, that we would suffer by having the price of our grain, particularly our wheat, raised fifty cents a bushel, he will have to make a better explanation than he has done in this house up to the present time. Deflation and inflation are straw men that are often used to scare the farmers. But some of our farmers are at last getting wise about these straw men and are not taking very much notice of them.

We have been charged on several occasions with coming here looking for charity. The farming class, and I have talked to them in different parts of the country, are the last to ask for or accept charity. Farmers comprise about one-third of the population of Canada. The remaining two-thirds are largely dependent directly or indirectly on the farmers, because if there were no farmers in Canada the country would go back to the Indians and those who in the past have exploited the farmers would be in some other country. We want parity, not charity.

A number of reasons may be given for loss of production during this present year. One of the first I would refer to is the shortage of farm help. On March 24 last the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made an announcement in connection with farm help. At that time it sounded pretty good, but the action taken on several occasions since then shows that the Prime Minister and his order did not go nearly far enough. Many young men necessary on the farms, key men, were called up and given postponement only until a certain date. In several instances those young men, in order to get into the branch of the service that they wanted to be in, enlisted before their postponement had expired, and for that reason I know of several farmers who had to sell their stock and equipment and rent the land. Therefore there will be a considerable reduction in the production of live stock and live-stock products.

Again, because of lack of help in the last harvesting and threshing season, we have millions of bushels of wheat in the stook, and some of it even standing waiting for the combine. This cannot all be attributed to lack of farm help, because we had rather a late and rainy harvest season, and then when the time came that the threshers could be operated, several outfits that should have had a crew of ten men were compelled to operate with two or three or four. In my home district I know of only one outfit that had a full crew of ten men. For that reason, on thousands of acres in that vicinity, and I believe in perhaps forty per cent of the province of Alberta, the crop is still standing in the stook or waiting for the combine. This is not a healthy condition. When the grain is finally harvested the quantity will fall far below the earlier estimates. There will be a drastic reduction because of mice and rabbits and weather and other damage.

There is another serious situation in this connection. In many cases the grain is not all threshed; only sufficient has been delivered to pay the harvesting and threshing wages and other necessary expenses, and while their money is tied up in the field the farmers find that the machinery companies are seizing their machinery, which should be and would be paid for if the farmers had a chance to deliver their grain.

What is being done to take care of this serious situation? Only a few days ago we learned that the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act was ruled ultra vires by the privy council. I believe the other western provinces, and some of the eastern provinces as well, are in the same position as we are. I wonder what the situation will be before we can get modern judges, trained in the up-to-date modern school, who will give the proper interpretation to the legislation that comes before them. Something must be done. Last session I stated, and I repeat it now, that the President of the United States found it necessary to put progressive judges on the bench before any advance could be made with progressive legislation.

There is another question which will have to be considered before agriculture can get on a sound footing; that is the present farm debt situation. I am not like some people in talking about this; I know of what I speak, because in my own case I bought quite a bit of land when wheat was selling at from $1.40 to $1.70 a bushel, and I had to do work outside of the farm, in different lines, in order to keep up my payments. This is nothing new in western Canada, because under our price structure the farmers have not been able to pay for their farms, and for that reason have been compelled to carry on other remunerative work during their slack seasons. Now principal and interest have piled up to such an extent that the farmers can never get out from under the load; and while plenty of good suggestions are offered, no attempt is made to remove that burden which must be lifted before the farmer can make progress.

In connection with hog and cattle prices, while they are not just what they might be we have not yet received very many complaints about them. But there is a good deal of discontent in connection with the grading of hogs. As usual the packers seem to get the larger share of the melon, and we are wondering how long it will be until this matter is straightened out. Then in connection with the price of eggs, in my part of the country we had a reduction of 17 cents per dozen during the three weeks period prior to January 15. I wonder what the wartime prices and trade board is doing about that. On January 15 the temperature went down to 58 below zero in my district, and I think the Minister of Finance or the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board would have to go out there with a new mash or something of the kind to make the chickens lay in order to produce with a price reduction of 17 cents a dozen as compared to the previous price. I should like to have a good deal more to say on that question, and perhaps the opportunity will come later.

I do not see why the farmers, together with all the help they can get, and their families, should be compelled to work longer hours than any other class in this country and still get such a miserable standard of living. Time after time we have been told by the Prime Minister and others that we must have an equal standard, but I am still waiting and hoping for the day when some government will be put into power here that will do a little levelling up and bring about a fair distribution in this country. Time and again we have asked that representatives of organized agriculture be placed on boards dealing with agricultural matters. Up to the present we have not had much success in having that done, so that again to-day I am offering this suggestion to the government.

I have not time to deal with a number of other questions to which I wanted to refer, but I should like to take up one which I believe is of particular interest to the whole of Canada, since now we are telling the men serving in this war what we are going to do for them when they come back. I am going to mention some figures to show what the men who served in the last war have been done for, not what has been done for them. I am referring again to the soldier settlement board. After the last war, in order to put some of the returned men to work and perhaps to keep them out of mischief, the soldier settlement board was set up; I believe that was about 1919. Originally the number of settlers under that scheme was 25,017; the government advanced loans to the amount of $109,034,331, and I believe the rate of interest was 5 per cent. Up to the end of March, 1941, collections on those loans amounted to $65,640,518. In other words it took about twenty-two years for the government to get back some $65,000,000 of the original $109,000,000, and included in that figure were the deposits or payments made on land which was resold to civilians after the soldier settlers got wise and left. Only 2,750 settlers have obtained title to the land, and a number of these had pensions or a little stake obtained from other sources. On March 31, 1941, according to the figures I have here, of the original number of settlers only some 7,360 remained on the land. Of those, 2,953 had an average equity of 67·5 per cent; 606 had an average equity of 32 per cent; 1,078 had an average equity of 16 per cent, and 2,723 had no interest whatever in their farms. In other words, 2,723 men were staying on the land, wondering from day to day when the director would order them off or take some other action.

That is what we have done for the men who served in the last war. Further breaking this down, we find that 3,801 men, or 52 per cent of the settlers remaining on the land, have an average equity of not more than 16 per cent. Some say it is not good business to look back, but I am looking back and once more bringing before this house the question of the settlement of soldiers after the last war, for the express purpose of seeing that the men and women who come back from the present war are not treated in the same way. I hope hon. members of this house will see to it that when the men and women come back from the present war they are given better treatment.

One of the things that has hurt me time and again is the statement I have heard on various occasions that many returned soldiers from great war No. 1 enlisted in this war because they could not make a living for their wives and families, and saw a way of keeping the wolf from the door by going into the army again and getting the government allowances. But we find that under an order in council passed by this government part of those allowances has been held back and paid over to the soldier settlement board to apply on the debts of these men. Apparently the board would much rather have the ready cash, which rightfully belonged to the wives and families of the men who enlisted, than take a chance on the crops grown on the land, on which the debt was due. The government figures that there is still some $30,000,000 that may be recovered from the soldier settlers who have remained on the land. Up to the end of March, 1941, the cost of administration of this scheme amounted to $25,910,495, approximately $1,250,000 a year. During the period between 1919 and 1941 the government admitted that they had made a mess of the soldier settlement scheme, and proceeded from time to time by six different operations to bring down the debt against those people, and in that way to keep them on the land as long as possible. First of all they brought about a consolidation of loans, then a cancellation of interest charges, then a revaluation of land, then in 1930 a 30 per cent reduction, then a dollar for dollar bonus, and finally the benefits of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Total deductions through these six methods I have mentioned amounted to $47,518,215. If things keep on like this, I do not know what is going to happen. We are told that $30,000,000 can still be salvaged; and while $30,000,000 is but a drop in the bucket in paying for and prosecuting the present war, so that things may be made better for the rest of us in Canada, I feel that that $30,000,000 does not begin to balance the misery and suffering endured by those men, their wives and families up to the present time.

On other occasions I have advocated that those who have fought against weather elements and other obstacles and stayed on the land up to the present should be given a clear title to the land. The government has not taken notice of that suggestion. Knowing what happens when a person has to pay five per cent interest, having paid seven or eight per cent myself on many occasions, and knowing the condition of farmers generally, I am now asking for something else namely, that those who have paid an amount equal to fifty per cent of the original debt, whether principal or interest, be given a clear title to their land. The men and women who are administering the act could be put to far better purpose in furthering our war effort, or, as one of my neighbours has suggested, in growing sugar beets, so that we would not have to have so many employed by the ration board. Those who had not paid in fifty per cent, or who would not be covered by that provision, would be placed on the same basis as those affected by the Veterans' Land Act. That is, they would have at least a fifty per cent equity in the land. In some cases this would mean a drastic reduction. But for heaven's sake let us clear the blot of the old soldier settlement board off our Canadian statute book. Give those people a break now, even though it is too late.

When I came to Ottawa a week ago there were so many of our forces on the train that it was almost like a troop train. There were members of all branches of the services, and a finer, cleaner and healthier group of young people you would not see anywhere. I discussed with some of the men their occupations before joining, their reasons for joining, and other matters. And in that connection I should like to place on Hansard a poem which was sent to the Western Producer by Eric A. Dowson, Runciman, Saskatchewan, because it describes very well the position of the diners who were in the dining car as we came east. This poem is entitled The Diner, and is in these words:

He was dining on the diner;
And the waiter called him "Sir."
White linen decked his table
And gleaming silverware.
They placed good food before him,
He sat and ate his fill,
They paid him every service
And his country paid the bill.
And he thought of another journey
Of a not far distant date;
When he passed through this same country,
Just a hobo on a freight.
His country did not need him,
For he had no work to do
And he wore no service uniform
Of khaki, or of blue.
When his grim task is over
Perhaps we'll understand,
That hungry mouths may all be fed,
From the plenty of our land.

And to go with that I have one further clipping. I am not sure who is responsible for it, but it is very well put. It reads:

Is it possible that when this war is over, the heroes of Dunkirk, the battle of Britain, Hong Kong, and Dieppe must do like so many of their fathers, the heroes of Mons, Ypres, Passchendaele, and Vimy Ridge, did after the last fracas and exchange the weapons they used to defend democracy and freedom for a peace-time issue of picks and shovels? What a "freedom", what a "democracy" the "planners" are planning. Do we never learn? Must this war also be fought in vain?

May I say on my own responsibility that the youth of our country must and will win the war, and therefore must be given their place in shaping and in enjoying the peace that follows.

I had intended to talk about social security, but my time has almost expired, and I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house. In the few minutes left to me I should like to record an incident which happened to me while passing through Winnipeg. The hon. member for Medicine Hat stated in his speech that the Prime Minister is a master in the art of government. A person came up to me while we were waiting at Winnipeg and said, "You are going to be fighting another election pretty soon; our Prime Minister is going to be elevated to the House of Lords." I began to wonder if we were to have another half-day session, or perhaps a day, and then be sent back to wade through the snow in another election campaign. He continued, with a smile, "I do not know what his title will be, but I do know his coat of arms is going to be two snails rampant on a field of red tape."

Before concluding I should like to make one further plea on behalf of old age pensioners. This is one blot which should be removed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted the time at his disposal.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. FAIR: I shall come back to this question at a later time.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the opposition I admit the government of the day has done a lot of good work in connection with the war. After all is said and done, the onus for conducting the war is on the government of the day, and as long as they are the government they are responsible to the people for a total war effort.

I have been one of those who have been associated with opposition. I do not know what I call myself now. I started in with Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck, and we were called amateur anarchists by Sir John Willison in the News, because we went up and down the province on behalf of the people's power scheme, the hydro. I received a telephone message last week-end from a newspaper reporter who asked me if I was a Prog. Con. The telephone connection may not have been very good, and I thought he asked me if I was a frog pond. Of course a rose by any other name would smell the same. As long as we have the word "Conservative" in it I shall not object to any prefixes or affixes or titles—although I do not believe in all those titles, because I have never been anything but a progressive. I have always been too modest to admit it. Of course one may call himself a progressive, but the fact that one calls himself a progressive does not make him a progressive. In 1921 the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), whom I do not see in his place at the moment, sat in this house with a following of about fifty members. He and his party were known as Progressives, but the fact that he called himself a Progressive did not make him a Progressive.

I have been in this house during every session since the war started. I pay a great deal of attention to the proceedings. I read them every day and I want to compliment the Speaker, the Clerk of the House and the other officers of this house of parliament upon the way in which the business has been conducted since the war started. It is not the fault of this high court of parliament that we as a house are being criticized to-day.

As I see it, under our democratic system the acid test for a newspaper is how it reports the House of Commons. After all is said and done, this is the only forum. We have 245 members and this is the only place where the average man on the street can have his grievances remedied. The opposition and the private members are the connecting link between the government of the day and the electors. When that link fails to function all parliamentary government is at an end. I sympathize with those who are conducting newspapers in this country to-day. They are under a terrific cost. I want to pay a tribute to what the press has done in this war. We had a newspaper bill up in the house some years ago, and on that occasion I paid a tribute to the press.

In my humble opinion the government of the day made a grave mistake when it changed the old system. We have a press bureau and an information bureau. I have received a huge pile of literature, but I have found that there is a most useful piece of furniture in my office called a waste-paper basket and that is where I consign a whole lot of it. The government has appointed this publicity board, and its officers and other liaison officers are running all over the country. Some of them are in Hollywood, and they are spending money like water flying by air to California, and all over the world. They have been over to the old country and to many other places. It is hard to know, except for our newspapers, what is going on in this country, and the newspapers supply the information at their own cost, without government aid.

The government should put back this function where it belongs with the press of the country. It is a reflection on the press to appoint such a board. The newspapers are quite capable of handling this work. They were doing it at a great cost to themselves. There has been parliamentary criticism since the days of the Stuart kings. Criticism is a tonic; it spurs the government into action. We had an example of this in connection with the bonus to the soldiers. Public opinion in Canada was aroused, and the government of the day were compelled to change their views and grant this bonus, after the municipalities from coast to coast forced it. The money spent by this information bureau will run into a fabulous sum before the war is over, and this money is being taken from the hard-earned wages of the people of Canada. If this money had been given to the press of the country, to the dailies and the weeklies, the work would have been handled much better, and economies effected.

I have been dissatisfied with the conduct of the war during the past two years. I do not apologize, nor do I offer any excuses for the constructive criticism which I have offered on many occasions. From time to time I protested against what I honestly thought were mistakes that were being made and that could have been avoided. I mention some of them to-day. Using the words of Abraham Lincoln, "I have done and said what appeared to me to be proper to do and say on these occasions."

A great deal has been said about the British empire, in which I believe overwhelmingly. It was said here by my former leader, Viscount Bennett, that on empire matters I represent a large body of public opinion in this country. I agree with a very important statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain last November when speaking at the Mansion House or Guildhall. He did not use any high sounding phrase like the British commonwealth of nations, first heard of when Lord Rosebery discovered it in 1900. I think the vast majority of the people of Canada will agree with what the Prime Minister of Great Britain then said. It was as follows:

> Let me therefore make this clear in case there should be any mistake about it in any quarter. We mean to hold our own. I have not become the king's first minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British empire.

I quite agree with those sentiments. I think Great Britain will be known in history as the good samaritan of the nations. Russia came into this world war because she was attacked by Germany. The United States came in after the attack on Pearl Harbour by Japan. The President of our great ally said that he reaffirmed the policy of George Washington and Andrew Jackson, those great presidents who said that, unless attacked, the United States should have nothing to do with world affairs and were isolationists. Britain was not attacked; she came into the war voluntarily because she had given a pledge to Poland. Others had given pledges, but they ran away from them. Great Britain, assisted by the dominions, bore the whole brunt of the war for over two years alone. If it had not been for Dunkirk and the hand of providence, long ago the United States and Canada would have had to make peace with the axis powers. That would have been the end of civilization. As I say, Britain will be known as the samaritan. She did not pass by on the other side like the lawyer, priest and the levite; she came immediately to the help of Poland with her whole strength and organization.

We talk about the League of Nations, but let me say what I have said before, the only League of Nations in the history of humanity that has been a success is the British empire. Long may it continue. Referring to this after the seven years' war, Burke said:

> We ought to elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of providence has called us. By adverting to the dignity of that high calling our ancestors have turned a savage wilderness into a glorious empire and have made the most extensive and the only honourable conquests, not by destroying but by promoting the wealth, number and happiness of the human race.

I believe that the little man referred to and immortalized by Strube in England is the personification of the people of the mother country. Those people represent the civilization and the progress of the world. That country is almost in ruins to-day. They gave up everything for an ideal. What was that ideal? The right to live a free life in the world. That is what we are fighting for. Mr. Winant, the able United States ambassador in London, said at a banquet the other day that there is a great divergence of opinion in the United States about our colonial empire. The little man in England is going to be brave enough to destroy Hitler and the axis powers, and after the war the little man whom I described will be able to look after the future of the world without all this planning, which is only an alias for socialism, and to handle reconstruction. I believe in what Lord Bennett said the other day in London when he was addressing the Empire Service League. He said:

> Don't apologize for our colonial history or our administration, than which there is nothing finer in the records of mankind.
> Don't apologize for India. There we have given millions of people centuries of peace in place of chaos and blood-letting.
> Don't be ashamed to have it said you are an imperialist. An imperialist is a man who bears proudly the responsibilities of his race and breed.

I am surprised that through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a section of the press and come community clubs in this country, speakers are being heard who, through ignorance or for some other reason, do not give the public the truth about the colonial empire of Britain and its splendid administration.

Let me mention two statements which have been made and which are very far from the truth. One is that Britain has taken more wealth out of the colonies than it ever gave to them. That is not correct. The mother country never got one pound in the exchequer out of its colonial empire. On the other hand she has spent millions of pounds on its development, and she has never taxed the colonial empire one pound for all that development work. She gave the colonial empire peace for over one hundred years and poured wealth into the colonial empire in the form of grants of every kind, never asking for one cent in return.

The other statement that was made was that the mother country had prevented other countries from obtaining raw materials from the colonial empire. That is also untrue and false. There has never been an embargo put upon the export of raw materials from the colonial empire. At a time when Britain had millions of unemployed at home she gave the colonial empire a preference in her market, and all the countries of that colonial empire were free to trade as best they could, and dealt far more with foreign countries than with Great Britain. We in Canada should not forget what the mother country herself has done. In any reconstruction or planning that may be done, let us not forget the mother country which saved our shores. I believe in reasonable tariffs; I believe they will be in existence as long as time lasts. We talk about a united states of Europe. The people of twenty-six countries of Europe have been driven out of their homes and look to Britain to restore them. Patriotism is the cement that holds nations together, and these people who have been driven out of their homes will want to go back to their own countries and rebuild them. The duty of Canada and the mother country, and we hope of the United States too, will be to use the principles of the lend-lease system to help them to do it. That same principle was followed by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in the agreement he made in respect to grain, and there have been other illustrations of the same principle. We must help to restore these poor nations in Europe which have suffered such tyranny from our dastardly foe.

There is very little in the speech from the throne for the toilers and workers of this country—nothing but platitudes, inertia, and evasions from start to finish. I think of the experience of the soldiers who returned from the last war. It had been said that they would come back to a country which we would make fit for heroes to live in, a war to end war, and all that kind of thing. But twenty-one and twenty-two years after the last war some of our soldiers were still trying to get a pension and were going through the process of examinations and reexaminations, appeals and all that kind of thing, only to get in the end perhaps one or two or three dollars a week. I also know what happened in connection with the cost-of-living bonus for our soldiers, and therefore I have very little faith in these platitudes, promises and plans, because history always repeats itself.

I see no mention whatever in the speech from the throne of a national coal supply. I wish the government would come down out of the clouds and face realities, such as coal. In the session of 1922-23 I brought in a resolution for a national coal supply to make ourselves independent of other countries for coal.

That resolution was adopted by the house. I had seen Canada pictured in the New York papers and other sections of the United States press as Lazarus sitting along the railway lines of the United States trying to beg a lump of coal. That was the reason why I brought in the resolution to make Canada independent of the United States for its coal supply. I wanted to ensure that all the coal we used should be mined and coked under the British flag, in Nova Scotia, in Alberta, in Wales. The government referred that resolution to a select committee of the house of which the chairman was a very fine gentleman, now Mr. Justice W. F. Carroll, of Halifax, and the committee brought in a report recommending a national coal supply. Sir Henry Thornton told me that I was proposing a lunch-counter system of freight rates for Canada. I told him then I did not know whether he had ever dined at a lunch counter, but I told him that it would be far better for us to have such a lunch-counter system and give bonuses, subventions and subsidies than to send $56,000,000 to Pennsylvania for coal for Canada. Look what happened this winter in our cities and towns and on the farms. You could hardly get a bag of coal delivered. They said that an embargo had been placed on the export of coal from the United States, but we found out that there was no real embargo. What happened that two of our coal controllers went to New York? They were asked by the United States controller if they would object if a suspension was put on the export of coal from the United States to Canada for one month, and they said they had no objection. Parliament was meeting two weeks after that, but parliament was never consulted. The result was that some soldiers' families could not get a bag of coal to keep themselves warm. The system is all wrong, and yet there is no reference to the coal situation in the speech from the throne.

Britain can almost be said to be made of coal. As the great British economist, Ernest Benn, said in a great British publication, the National Review, recently:

> If any raw material can be the foundation of empire greatness, then our position in the world is or was firmly founded upon coal. The machinery of the industrial revolution, the shipping of our world trade, everything which has gone and still goes to give us our high standard of living, all can be traced back to coal. And now we are in grave difficulties about our very first national asset. The subject is well worth study at the present moment because if coal, as we understand the word, were accurately analysed it would be found to consist of rather more politics than fuel and by the recollection of what politics has done for coal, we should be able to make an accurate forecast of what politics will do in the matter of our needs for other essential raw materials. . . .
> But the planners now at work massing everything together, devising priorities, reducing everything to a speculative statistical basis and arranging for the movement during and immediately after the war of great quantities of wealth from one to the other side of the world, are bold enough to suggest that, the war being over and the aftermath of trouble being abated, then the perfect world can be secured by perpetuating the planning idea. It is at this point that the story of our coal may be useful not only to us, but to the whole of mankind. Planning, which of course is only an alias for socialism, has its roots in the essential but quite natural aversion to the existence of poverty amidst plenty. It proclaims boldly that the well-being of man can be so devised as to provide everything to each according to his needs. It ignores, indeed denies, the natural difficulty expressed in the old proverb, "Necessity is the mother of invention", and bases itself with commendable hope upon the theory that man will work even though with everything provided the need for him to do so is, to put it mildly, relieved of its personal urgency.
> The planning of the past remains as a warning, but is a thing of the past, all of it has been concerned with the simple task of robbing Peter to pay Paul: that comparatively easy process has been completed, for Peter has nothing left.
> Some of us have spent a lifetime in calling attention to the inevitable end of that sort of planning. It has been proceeding with progressive vigour for two or three generations, but Peter was so wealthy as to obscure its true nature. Two wars have expedited the inevitable end and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the other day that those with incomes of more than £6,000 a year have been reduced to a mere handful of eighty persons, he pronounced the committal sentences or the blessing, whichever way you care to look at it, of the old sort of planning. . . .
> An interesting sidelight on the story is provided by Lord Passefield who, as Mr. Sidney Webb, had the indiscretion to publish a book during the kaiser's war entitled "How to Pay for the War", in which he advocated nationalization, planning, and all that kind of thing.

I have previously referred to the house which meets in another place. I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) three or four times if he would give this branch of parliament more war work, but he would not do it. So much for senate reform.

Ten years ago I brought in a resolution which was debated for two days, stating that the most important problem Canada had before it then—and its most important problem even now—is constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform. There is not one word in the address about that.

Coming to housing and reconstruction: I moved in January, 1935, for a select committee on this subject, and our then leader, Viscount Bennett, appointed a committee. Its work was crystallized by the new government a year later in a scheme under which nearly $80,000,000 have been spent on small housing. There is not a word in the address about that. Where are our soldiers to live when the war is over? The government of the day cannot solve the problem of housing even in this one city of Ottawa. How are they going to solve it on a nation-wide scale? One of the main reasons for the decline of agriculture in this country has been the lack of proper housing facilities for the urban, suburban and rural sections. It remains one of our most important problems, with no mention of it in the speech from the throne. Where are houses to be found? When the soldiers come home they will be living in hovels, the way they did after the last war. The government made a football of this question last session; although I brought it to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) almost every week, they did nothing about it. There was a cry of shortage of materials; yet we find sufficient steel and iron can be provided for railway terminals and other places.

What about reforms for the benefit of Canadian youth? In 1935 and 1938, speaking on this question, I proposed to the then Minister of Labour, the late Mr. Rogers, that a plan whereby the young men who were coming out of the high schools at the rate of 200,000 a year could learn a trade, get pocket money, food, clothing and housing and deferred pay, with military training, instead of riding the rods. That was rejected by the minister. Had it been adopted, we should have had 25,000 air cadets, trained pilots and mechanics before the war started.

As regards soldiers' bonuses, I would merely ask hon. members to look at the way in which that question has been handled during the past three years.

The speech from the throne refers to parliamentary under-secretaries. In my opinion it is a system which is not adapted to this country. I have opposed and will continue to oppose it. We have a cabinet of nineteen, nearly three times the size of the cabinet of the United States, a country of 134,000,000 people; and with the controls we have, costing $4,000,000 a year, much of the work is taken away from the minister. The system proposed is duplication and a waste of money.

The government says nothing about what it is going to do to restore the country of Macdonald and Laurier, when Canada was a nation of property owners, so that the poor retail man, the small man, and the wholesalers will be no longer hamstrung by these controls. I have asked the cost, but the minister does not know, from week to week, or from month to month, what the control system is costing.

There is another matter I wish to point out to the house, as I did last June. The auditor general does not audit one cent of the appropriation bills. That is provided for by the cabinet by order in council. Talk about expenditures; there is very little check or audit on them, as far as I can see.

As regards income tax, in 1927 and for three years before that I had a resolution before the house to restore the income tax to the municipalities, where it was before the great war. Their exclusive right of taxation in this field was invaded in 1917 by the dominion for the purposes of the war. When the late Mr. Robb was Minister of Finance it was proposed by me during those debates that we should have a pay-as-you-go plan.

One would like to refer to the war in the Pacific, because the issue is going to be decided there by the command of the sea, and it is not going to be easy going. There is no royal road to victory. Let us devote our whole time to the war. Let us recognize that neither blockade nor propaganda nor attacks from the air will win this war. There must also be an invasion of Germany on land.

I have been glad to see the success in Africa, where the much abused British army has saved the day. Those men are the very same troops who were attacked last spring during the battle of Egypt and they have proved their quality. Once provided with mechanized equipment which made them more nearly equal to the enemy, they conquered them very quickly. There was never any doubt among the people of the empire as to the ability of those wonderful troops, the famous British army, assisted as they were by troops from the dominions, when once they were put on equal terms with their opponents.

I believe several important matters have been left out of the speech from the throne. One is civil aviation. There is not one word with reference to it. Unless Canada gets busy in this direction, it will lose the opportunity of providing a great deal of work after the war for our soldiers. We are further behind in civil aviation than almost any other country. All that has been done is to write essays and that kind of thing. If one gets down to brass tacks, what else has been achieved? Not a thing. As mayor of Toronto I raised this question with Ottawa after the great war. Colonel Barker, V.C., Colonel Collishaw and other airmen were in Toronto for about three months after they came back from the war, and they told me that we should make the greatest mistake of our lives if we did not develop civil aviation.

I hope that the dominion will invade a field that should be theirs, namely education and health legislation. In 1921 and 1922, when I first entered this house, I introduced a resolution favouring unemployment, health and sickness insurance. That was twenty-one years ago. I also supported the dominion government in embarking upon a constructive policy to aid education and public health. Some good work was done in connection with technical education.

When all is said and done, two things of supreme importance have been brought home to the people of the British empire. One is religion. The people of the empire during this war are turning back to religion as a primary thing. To-day they believe that without religion there is no real education. I believe that this government should recognize in future that it is the first function of government to look after the health, wealth, happiness, well-being and prosperity of its people. In the city from which I come, after the last war Doctor Hastings, the great health officer, and others of the department of health introduced health legislation more advanced perhaps than anywhere else on the continent. We had a modern health department and important measures of inspection in the interest of children and infants, inspection of milk, food and other commodities, and medical inspection, were carried out in the schools and elsewhere. I am sorry that the government has not brought forward a forward policy on this public health matter. For example, consider how many of the working classes are unable to buy insulin at its present price. Free insulin should be obtainable by the universities and the health departments and hospitals of this country. Let it not be forgotten that, if properly administered, insulin puts many a man and woman back where they can do useful work. I know of men who are engaged in heavy work at the present time and for the past several years who but for insulin would have been dead long ago. Equally it is the duty of the government to meet the menace of tuberculosis. Parliament must advance along this line and in many other matters of social security.

As I have said, I believe in education, and I believe further that there can be no education without religion. Christianity is part of the law of Great Britain; it is also, by the act of 1791, part of the law of Canada. Thomas Arnold, the famous headmaster of Rugby who died one hundred years ago, did not believe that examinations were the true key to education. He believed that character building came first, morals and right social relations second, and academic and literary education third.

We are fighting for an ideal. When the war is over some advanced measures will have to be taken along the lines of social security. The Beveridge report is all right as far as it goes, but it is based on the old system of government, the capitalistic system. The capitalist system is not perfect; it will have to be brought up to date. Nobody proposes to go back to things as they were, to the old pre-war system. I have respect for the views of my friends to my left, but my views have been consistent for a long time. The paymaster general, Right Hon. W. Jowitt, who has charge of these measures in Britain, addressing the House of Commons recently, said that the first thing the government is going to do is not to appoint a committee—it will go to a committee later—but to have a three-day debate in order to get the views of the government and of the opposition and of the whole house. That is what should be done here, so that all views may be presented.

After all we are putting the cart before the horse. What are we going to do about the mother country? That will have to be determined. To-day she imports twenty-five out of twenty-seven articles of raw material and food. She has coal and iron; the other twenty-five she has to import. Without export trade and corresponding imports, without an exchange of goods and services, without her dominions and colonial empire, the mother country would be reduced to a second Denmark, would be no longer a first rate power.

There are constitutional difficulties in the Beveridge report as applied to Canada. The house should go into these questions. I believe some way can be found of aiding Europe and our colonial empire under the lease-lend provisions with the assistance of the United States. The Beveridge report is a good report in many ways, but it is based on the old plan. Many of its social features have been adopted by some of the large municipalities in Canada —for instance, the advanced legislation of the city of Toronto adopted twenty-one years ago. We must keep faith with our men at the front. If we give only promises to the men who are offering their lives for us, no guarantee against hardship and suffering when they come home, these heroes will not be getting their due for serving and saving the world.

In the days of Laurier and Macdonald everyone owned some private property—a small farm, a store, a mill—but that has all been taken away and Canada has become a land of proletarians. The right to possess private property is derived from nature, not from man, and the state has no right to abolish it; it has the right only to regulate its use. I believe in private enterprise and the old incentives of business, brought up to date to meet changed conditions. Those principles made Britain the great nation she has been, and are the principles which should guide this country in the future.

Regarding the price ceiling and related matters I shall have something to say on another occasion.

Let me conclude by reading a short statement about the cruelty of this dastardly foe which but for Britain might have set foot in this country. It may be of interest to some of my friends from Quebec who have crossed the floor to this side of the house. This is from the Lisbon correspondent of France:

I hear of the arrival in Bessarabia of 20,000 Jews deported from France to the Germans. The state in which these wretched people arrived when their trains reached that country made a deep impression on the civil and military authorities . . . Twenty thousand men, women and children had been sent from France in sealed trucks, they were to be forcibly installed in the ghettos of these towns.

When the trucks were opened an appalling spectacle was revealed. More than half the prisoners were dead and their bodies were decomposing. Dead bodies fell out on the railway line as the doors were opened. Those still alive were ill from terror, from hunger, from sickness caused by the atmosphere of putrefaction which they had breathed during the journey. Their condition is desperate and few of them will live.

One of the number who could still speak stated that they had been arrested in their homes in Paris in the middle of the night by S.S. men and taken to the railway station. There they were put into sealed trucks. They were not allowed to take any luggage save three days' provisions. The journey had lasted two weeks.

On these wagons of death was written the label "Explosive Material In Transit for Russia"; that is why none of the customs authorities had opened the trucks at the various frontiers.

Just one other quotation. Every day in Europe, now almost entirely dominated by Germany, men, women and children are tortured and killed. Here is the story of one martyr, a Frenchman. It was published in the paper France in September, though it related to events many months old. A German colonel named Holtz was shot. In reprisal fifty Frenchmen were murdered by the German rulers. One of them was called Fourny. A farm labourer, he educated himself as a youth; he joined up in 1914. He fought well, but was taken prisoner. In prison he worked at his books, and while there he was condemned to death, but was saved just in time by the armistice. He became a lawyer's clerk and passed his examinations. On the collapse of France he joined the underground organization. In August 1941 he was arrested. Holtz was killed in October. A few days later the first batch of martyrs, twenty-one in number, were chosen and Fourny was among them. The night before the execution Fourny wrote his last letter, and having done this he turned to his comrades, cheering and comforting them, writing their letters home for them, urging them to send messages.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: By leave of the house may I read just a few lines?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CHURCH: I thank the house. I would like hon. members to hear something of the way they torture these young people. I quote:

"Tell me what you want to say, I will write for you. Is it your wife, or your mother you want to write to?" All night long he gave courage to the weak and sorrowful men who were to suffer.

When the time came for death the victims were brave, but among them were two lads of seventeen who were in revolt at the thought of what was happening. Fourny put his arms around them and spoke to them quietly. "It is not difficult to die, my children; come with me, we will die together, you will see it will be quickly over, you won't suffer, it is all quite easy." Affectionately putting his arms around them so that they could not see the machine guns, Fourny helped the young martyrs. The same spurt of machine gun fire laid them all three low. The name of Fourny will forever live in Nantes, where he was known and near where he was shot.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last year, on March 23, this house paid eloquent tribute to the life and work of one of the greatest Canadians ever elected to this parliament, the late J. S. Woodsworth, whom I have the high honour to succeed as member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The expressions of high regard for the founder of our movement which were made at that time came from every section of this house, and they were reechoed throughout the country. My coming to this parliament is to a very large extent because of Winnipeg North Centre's appreciation of the work of its former member, and I wish to take this opportunity of paying my tribute to his memory. I am one of the many to whom he gave the vision of a better day for the common people of this country. It was my privilege to know him as a close personal friend and adviser. I am deeply conscious of the honour that is mine in being called upon to take his seat in this house, and I pledge to the people of Winnipeg North Centre and to the people of this dominion my loyalty to the cause of social justice which Mr. Woodsworth served so well.

Coming as I do directly from a by-election campaign, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am in a position to give to this house a clear statement of the views of the people I represent, and I am satisfied that the views of my constituents are those of an ever-increasing number of Canadians right across this country. In the general election of 1940 the government candidate, though defeated, polled over 40 per cent of the votes cast in Winnipeg North Centre. The Liberal and Conservative candidates together polled 59 per cent. In the by-election held on November 30, 1942, the government candidate, supported by three cabinet ministers, having the old party field entirely to himself, received only 28 per cent of the votes cast and lost his deposit. Our vote rose to over 70 per cent of the votes cast, representing the largest vote and the largest majority ever given in Winnipeg North Centre. I suggest that a similar shift in public opinion is taking place all over Canada, and it behooves this house to consider seriously the matters which are of concern to the people whom I have the honour to represent.

The anxieties of my constituents are two. First, they are deeply concerned about the mess that obtains at the present time in war production and selective service, the existence of unemployment, and matters relating to labour policy. Second, they are filled with fear and misgiving for the post-war period. Speaking further on the present situation, may I tell this house that the people of Winnipeg, anxious as they are to make their fullest possible contribution to the winning of the war, are, to put it mildly, aroused by the lay-offs which have been taking place for some time in war industries. During the month of January I wired the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) three times, advising him of the lay-offs in such plants as Dominion Bridge, Manitoba Bridge, Western Steel and the Defence Industries Limited cordite plant at Transcona. In the replies I received I was advised on one occasion that a new contract had been awarded which would make possible the reemployment of a number of men who had been laid off, but when I called the manager of the plant concerned I was told that the new contract could be filled without such reemployment. On another occasion a Winnipeg plant, in posting a lay-off notice, stated that full production was anticipated in the spring, but the Minister of Munitions and Supply advised me that such could not be counted upon. The Winnipeg city council, in conjunction with many local organizations, has sought to intervene in this matter. The final word of the minister to the mayor of Winnipeg, as well as to me, was simply this, and I quote from his letter of January 14:

> I regret as much as anyone the dislocation of staff that results from changes or reductions in programmes. However, this is inevitable in war production. One of the principal functions of the national selective service organization is to arrange for the reemployment of any staff that may be displaced in war industry through changes or reductions in programme. This department maintains a very close liaison with national selective service in this connection.

On Monday I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) what steps his department was taking to deal with this situation, and what was his reply? After trying to minimize the situation by referring to inevitable "pockets of unemployment" he said, and I quote from Hansard at page 23.

> The Department of Labour is working in close cooperation with the Department of Munitions and Supply in an effort to place these people where they can be most useful.

These two ministers may feel that they answered my question by passing the responsibility to each other, but that does not provide employment in Winnipeg, nor does it make possible the full production to which the workers are exhorted by posters and placards hanging in the war plants from which they are laid off. The failure of capitalism, even under the impetus of war with its demands for equipment, to maintain full production, is evidence of the imperative need for economic planning. The people I represent are deeply concerned over the failure of the government in this regard.

In his reply to me on Monday last the Minister of Labour endeavoured to brush aside my question by stating that large numbers of those registered for employment in Winnipeg are women, and that other large numbers are unemployables. Entirely apart from those groups, however, on January 21, just before I left Winnipeg, there were 1,800 employable men registered for work, many of them having had machine shop experience. When these men are told to register for unemployment benefits, to remain idle on $9 or $13 a week, with a war on, they use language which I thought was unparliamentary before I came to this house. As for selective service, the people of Winnipeg feel that its only purpose is to hide the fact that the government has no plan for full employment in the production of our war needs.

There is another fact which must not be forgotten, even in war-time; that is, that when workers are unemployed they and their families suffer want and fear. The Minister of Labour speaks lightly about "pockets of unemployment", but the people I represent feel that it is the duty of the government so to plan our economy that useful work will be provided for all able-bodied citizens. The men who are fighting this war are not fighting so that they may come home to "pockets of unemployment". They are fighting for a Canada in which all our citizens will be employed producing an abundance of goods to make possible a high standard of living for all our people. If "pockets of unemployment" is the best the present government can do now, what in heaven's name are we in for after the war is over?

I listened closely on Monday to the Prime Minister's defence of the Minister of Labour. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) seemed utterly unable to understand why so much criticism has been directed against the Minister of Labour. I may say that I am a member of a trade union. I have close contacts with all sections of the trade union movement in greater Winnipeg. I had unanimous endorsation of the trade union movement in Winnipeg in the recent by-election campaign. I can say to the Prime Minister that labour in this country, both organized and unorganized, is up in arms against the Minister of Labour because he, as a trade unionist himself, posing as a labour man, is willing to administer the government's policy as it now stands. Labour is fed up with being told every time it seeks an adjustment in unjust and low wages that it is unpatriotic, that it is attacking the government's anti-inflation policy. Labour, Mr. Speaker, is fully aware of the perils of an inflationary spiral. But the freezing of unjust wages is not the only way to prevent inflation. It can be done, for example, by taxation and by rationing.

At the present time the government places upon the workers and farmers of this country the whole burden of avoiding inflation, and labour is thoroughly disgusted with the way in which the government uses this weapon to deny justice to the workers of Canada. Let me repeat that labour is fully conscious of the perils of inflation, and is not opposed to the government's aim to avoid it. But labour is opposed to the governments' one-sided policy in this matter, putting as it does the full burden on our farmers and workers.

In the thirties there was no money. Now there is too much money. If it is not one thing, it is another. But labour must be kept down. This is the policy of the government; and no one, least of all a labour man, can expect to administer such a policy without a storm of protest from Canadian labour.

I may say further to the Prime Minister that one of the reasons labour delegations are seeking interviews with him, which he deplored on Monday in answer to a question about the Montreal aircraft workers, is that labour's grievances involve more than the matter of administration in the Department of Labour. They involve the whole policy of the government, in its attitude toward labour. I am confident no member of the house ever spoke the mind of his constituents more clearly than I do when I say that Canadian labour wants a new minister of labour in whom labour can have confidence.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. Labour also wants a new labour policy, and I make that fact known directly to the Prime Minister. Apart from the injustices of the low-wage freezing policy, there is also the government's attitude toward trade union organizations, and the complete failure of the government to make labour, and agriculture as well, full partners in the common struggle in which we are all engaged.

By order in council the government has paid lip service to trade union organization and collective bargaining. But much more effective orders in council have denied these fundamental principles of democracy, in actual practice. I mention Kirkland lake, steel, Montreal Aircraft, Vulcan Iron Works at Winnipeg, and so on.

I would remind the house that the government picks its controllers, its dollar-a-year men, from the big businesses concerned, on the ground that they know what it is all about. But when it comes to the placing of men in employment, at which trade union business agents are specialists, they are not only ignored but their functions are superseded by the hodge-podge of selective service. To labour this is all seen as a well-designed attempt on the part of the government to prevent the common people in this country from coming into their own, in the kind of cooperative society for which this war is being fought. The farmers and workers of this country, supplying as they are the personnel of our armed forces, working and sacrificing in every possible way for victory, have an end in view—a Canada in which there will be full employment, fine homes for all, adequate education, care of our health, a high standard of living and full social security. These things cannot be denied forever. The processes of democracy may work slowly, but they are to-day working in favour of the common man, because of the interest he is taking in his own well-being.

I want to go back for a moment to the matter of unemployment in the city of Winnipeg. It is the responsibility of the government to explain the situation, but I may state here an opinion that is widely expressed where I come from. It is that we are already experiencing the first slackening of the post-war period. This opinion produces two comments. First, there is resentment that there should be any slackening until victory has been won. Second, it drives home the fact that the problems of the post-war period are with us to-day.

I said earlier that the people I represent have two major anxieties—the mess that obtains at the present time, and the fear that a worse state will be ours when the war is over. I have spent most of my time in discussing the present situation, but I may say that the fact of unemployment now, coupled with the government's anti-labour policies, aggravates the fear of my constituents for the post-war period. If production has to be curtailed now, under the impetus of war, what then, when the war is over?

The Minister of Munitions and Supply, speaking in Winnipeg in November in support of the government candidate in the recent by-election, was reported as saying that he was confident there would be full employment after the war. He is reported to have said that we would have new plants and machinery, thousands of men trained in new skills, and a ready market in the needs of our people for cars, trucks, washing machines and radios. All we would require would be to connect these three factors. Precisely. But the people of Winnipeg North Centre know that we had these same three factors—plant, men and human needs—in the thirties; and yet we had unemployment and poverty.

I represent a people who know that both for the production now of our war needs, and for the production after the war of a high standard of living, we need a basic change in our social structure. Private industry, based on the principle of producing only where profit is to be made, in the vain hope that some benefit of that production will fall like crumbs to those who toil, will not fill the bill. The people who are giving their all in this war are entitled to democracy, to the ownership and control of their own instruments of production, so that they might produce goods, not for the profit of a few, but because they are needed by all.

Our men are not fighting to come home to "pockets of unemployment," to relief, to wage-slavery, to $20 a month at the age of seventy. They are fighting for a new Canada, in whose life they will participate in every way. That participation involves a voice in those matters which affect our daily lives. That participation will not be complete, nor shall we have achieved democracy, until our people, through social and cooperative ownership, are in complete control of the economic life of this country, which thus far has been the preserve of private and vested interests, both in war and in peace.

I know that the speech from the throne makes reference to a plan of social insurance. No doubt there are some who imagine that because social insurance, in our view, does not go far enough, we of this group will oppose any steps the government may take in this direction. This is not the case. In fact, since all we have been offered for this session is a select committee, and recalling how long it has taken in the past for other forms of social legislation to pass from the committee stage to the statute books, the chances are that we of this group will find ourselves having to fight for all we are worth to get the government to go ahead with its present intentions, whatever they may be.

But, although we may prod the government to implement its own ideas, let me make it clear that I represent a people who agree with the position taken by this group, that social insurance is not enough. It will not be the century of the common man until we have social justice. What is the difference? Social insurance under capitalism is a means whereby those who are subject to unemployment, sickness, invalidity, and insecurity pool their meagre earnings so that when calamity falls they can be kept alive. So long as we endure capitalism, such will be necessary. Social justice, however, involves an economy in which those who toil, being part of the community, own the productive machinery of the nation and therefore receive every day and every month and every year their full and just share of the wealth they produce.

To-day, the workers and farmers produce the nation's wealth, but get only a meagre portion of it. There is no justice under such a system. Charity and insurance are the best that can be offered. But one day this Canada will become a real democracy, and the workers and farmers will do two things; they will increase our production, and they will get their fair share of what they produce in a high standard of living through the whole of life, including full protection against sickness and invalidity, together with security and dignity in old age.

Speaking, however, of the government's references to social insurance and social security there are one or two comments I would like to make. First, I may say that the country will not share the government's satisfaction expressed in the words in the speech from the throne:

A considerable measure of social security has already been provided.

Further, may I say that if the government really means business in this field, the least it could have done would be to offer legislation increasing the amount of the old age pension. I mention also the blind, the veterans of the last war, and widows of veterans of the last war. I understand that those discharged from the armed forces now, after one month, if still unemployed, go on unemployment benefits of $9 a week for single men, $13 for married men. This is not good enough for the defenders of our right to build a democracy. And why the discrimination against women in our armed forces? After one month a discharged unemployed woman goes on benefits not exceeding $6 a week.

Coming back to the matter of old age pensions, I understand that two provinces, British Columbia and Alberta, have made provision to pay $25 a month in certain cases. In Manitoba we have been pressing the case of our old people for all we are worth. The Winnipeg city council has urged the federal government and the Manitoba provincial government to raise the amount. I note that the Manitoba government proposes to increase the pension payable in that province by $1.25 a month. Apparently that government dares to hope that this government will provide an additional $3.75 to make a total of $25 a month. That would not be enough, but surely it is the least we might have expected, and I hope, despite its non-inclusion in the speech from the throne, that we may get action along this line during the present session.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) express this view from the government side of the house this afternoon, but I was sorry to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) say earlier in the day that nothing had been planned as yet in connection with this matter. I hope that the hon. member for Medicine Hat and others in his group will join with us in our continued effort to press for action in this matter while the house is in session.

There are other matters I must defer until later. There is the problem of housing, concerning which we in Winnipeg have been given a disgraceful run-around. I shall deal with this matter at length when the opportunity is afforded. I gather that the city of Ottawa has had an experience similar to ours in Winnipeg. On a future occasion, as the only Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member in this house from Manitoba, I will have something to say on behalf of the farmers of that province. In the meantime, I may say that my colleagues in this group from Saskatchewan are, in my opinion, stating clearly the views of the farmers of Manitoba. Possibly before I get around to a speech on this subject, a by-election will have been held in the riding of Selkirk, now vacant in Manitoba, with the result that we may be joined by a C.C.F. member for rural Manitoba. If Mr. Bracken decides to run in Manitoba, and some other seat is opened for him, we may be joined by two C.C.F. farmer members.

In that event those of the Conservative party who argued at the Winnipeg convention that a leader should have been chosen from among the membership of this house would be vindicated. I recall that the fear was stressed there lest the disgrace of York South be repeated. It may be that they were right.

In closing may I say that I have not indulged in some of the niceties and platitudes with which the debates in this house seem to abound. I do wish, however, to express my appreciation of the cordial welcome that has been extended to me by hon. members whom it has been my privilege to meet. Coming as I do from a much smaller body, the Winnipeg city council, where one gets to know everyone, I am struck with the large number who are here and how difficult it is to get to know everyone. Yet I hope that it may be possible for me to get to know as friends as many as possible of the members of this house even though on the floor of the house we may differ sharply in the views that we present.

I may say finally that I feel that I have been sent here on serious business. I represent a people who want to play their full part in winning the war. Toward that end they insist on full production and on the acceptance of labour into full participation in the war effort. They want a new attitude toward the workers of Canada in the Department of Labour. They want a new minister of labour and a new labour policy. They want some evidence now of a better Canada after the war is over. If social insurance is the best that can be offered by the present government, they want that now, but the people of the constituency I represent insist that from there we must move on to the full realization of social democracy and social justice. In short, Mr. Speaker, the people whom I represent want this parliament to get on with the job of winning the war and winning the peace.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has just delivered his maiden speech in the house, and because he cannot be expected to be thoroughly familiar with the rules I did not call his attention to the rule which forbids the reading of speeches. I should just like to say that I hope no other member will take this as a precedent when he is speaking.

On motion of Mr. Reid the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

Thursday, February 4, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

FOOD

PROPOSED MINISTRY AND BOARD TO SUPERVISE SUPPLY, PROCESSING AND DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On January 19 last a deputation representing the food industry of Canada placed before the government certain suggested correctives with respect to Canada's food supply, and among other things recommended the creation of a ministry of food and the setting up within that ministry of a food board, with the end in view that responsibility and authority for a complete food programme might be vested in one ministry.

A press dispatch from Ottawa under yesterday's date indicated that delegates attending the twenty-first annual meeting of the Canadian Horticultural Council here passed a resolution urging the appointment of one cabinet minister and a food board definitely charged with the responsiblity of obtaining an abundant food supply, and the maintenance of means and facilities for its processing and distribution. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government has given consideration to this request and, if so, when he expects to be able to make an announcement with respect to it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In his last words my hon. friend referred to "this request". Does he mean the request made yesterday, or the broad question of the establishment of a food ministry?

Mr. GRAYDON: It was the one request, coming from two sources.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any matter of government policy will be announced in due course, and this is one.

FUEL

PROPOSED MINISTRY AND BOARD TO SUPERVISE SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I am going to ask the Prime Minister another question, and perhaps I will have better luck with this one.

From communications I have received, the fuel shortage in many parts of Canada continues to be acute. On Friday last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) directed a question to the Prime Minister on this point. At that time the Prime Minister asked the hon. member to allow his question to stand as a notice and indicated that a committee had been appointed by the cabinet some little time ago to deal with the problem. Perhaps the Prime Minister is now in a position to indicate to the house and to the country what steps the government has in contemplation to meet this quite serious shortage.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have in my hand material that was sent to me by the committee to which my hon. friend has referred, but it did not seem to me to be in such form that I would care to present it to parliament. Also I should mention that the committee is associated with the wartime prices and trade board. I think the reply should be made by the Minister of Finance. I have had a word with the deputy minister of finance about the matter, and he indicated that he thought he would be in a position to see that the minister would have a definite statement to give to the house to-morrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED LAY-OFF AT MONTREAL ANGUS SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Just before I came into the chamber I met a delegation of men from Montreal, and as a result I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. They are perturbed because reports indicate that a serious lay-off is to be made in the Angus shops, Montreal, where the production of the Valentine tank is to be discontinued. According to their statement some 4,000 men will be affected, of whom only 1,500 may be taken over for the production of other war equipment. The war expenditures committee had this matter before them at one time, and we were given some assurance that when this time came the men would be given other war work to do. I wonder if the minister, either to-day or to-morrow, for he has not had time to look into it, would be prepared to make a statement, because this matter is seriously disturbing a large number of men in Montreal.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): With regard to the position of the Angus shops, I am aware that newspaper reports are current that there will be a suspension of the production of Valentine tanks on April 1. That is by no means a certainty. Discussions are going on at the present moment looking to the continuation of the contract. It depends upon a number of factors, some of which are beyond our immediate control, but I should say there is an even chance that the work may be continued. In any event, if the work is discontinued there is other work to go into the Angus shops. We are short of capacity in certain lines, and it is probable that there will be a transference of part of the capacity, in any event. With regard to the transfer of only a portion of the men to other work, I can assure my hon. friend that everyone at present working at the Angus shops will be transferred to employment either in the Angus shops or in other plants in Montreal. Those men are skilled mechanics, and there is and will be I think a real shortage of skilled mechanics.

VISIT TO OTTAWA OF REPRESENTATIVES OF MONTREAL DISTRICT AIRCRAFT WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. The other day a strike delegation from Montreal, representing aircraft workers, was in Ottawa, and asked a certain settlement of difficulties and grievances which were troubling them. I understand that they were given some assurance that their troubles would be looked into, and some adjustment made. Is the Minister of Labour in a position to report to the house the progress made in settling their grievances?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I believe the question the hon. member has just asked was answered yesterday by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne this year was one of the most encouraging and reassuring delivered to parliament since the beginning of the war in 1939. Recent successes in Libya, Russia and the Pacific, coupled with the news which has come out from Casablanca to the effect that the allies are now able to maintain the initiative, and will do so this year, has given renewed hope and courage, not only to the Canadian people and their friends across the boundary line, but to all peoples in slavery and under the heel of the nazi and Japanese dictators. Canada's contribution has to a large extent contributed to the initiative we are about to take. Our contribution has been most effective, both as to the men and women in the services and as to the large quantities of munitions and supplies we have sent to Great Britain and our allies.

While continuation of the war until the unconditional surrender of our enemies must be our first consideration, the proposed measures outlined in the speech from the throne with respect to social security have been well received throughout the entire length and breadth of Canada. Some measure of social security was to be expected. In fact I may go further and say that keen disappointment would have been felt by many of us, especially in view of the Beveridge report, had the government not made certain proposals looking to the establishment of social security, the provision of useful remunerative employment, the removal of fear and want, and the creation of a national system of health insurance.

This is not the time to deal with details of any proposed recommendations in respect of social security, but I would commend to members of the special committee to be set up to deal with the report, and to every member of the house, a study of the Beveridge report. It is my opinion that it is the finest document of its kind in the world to-day. It is published by the Macmillan company, and since only a few copies are available in the parliamentary library I suggest to the government that steps be taken to see that this work becomes readily available to members of the House of Commons and to the public generally.

If there be any who fear the introduction of social security measures, may I for a moment refer them to the three guiding principles outlined by Sir William Beveridge. In clause 7, at page 6 of his report, we find this:

> The first principle is that any proposals for the future, while they should use to the full the experience gathered in the past, should not be restricted by consideration of sectional interests established in the obtaining of that experience. Now, when the war is abolishing landmarks of every kind, is the opportunity for using experience in a clear field. A revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching.
> The second principle is that organization of social insurance should be treated as one part only of a comprehensive policy of social progress. Social insurance fully developed may provide income security; it is an attack upon want. But want is one only of five giants on the road of reconstruction and in some ways the easiest to attack. The others are disease, ignorance, squalor and idleness.
> The third principle is that social security must be achieved by cooperation between the state and the individual. The state should offer security for service and contribution. The state in organizing security should not stifle incentive, opportunity, responsibility; in establishing a national minimum, it should leave room and encouragement for voluntary action by each individual to provide more than that minimum for himself and his family.

There are two cogent reasons why Canada must follow the lead given to us by Great Britain. The first is contained in the Atlantic charter, in which Canada fully concurred. It reads:

> To bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing for all improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.

The second is stated by Sir William Beveridge, as follows:

> There will, it may be hoped, come a season when it is profitable to consider the practical relations of social insurance in Britain and of schemes for the same purpose in the dominions, in the colonies and in other countries of the world. On the assumption that once again it will be possible for men to move from one country to another to find the best use for their powers, it will be desirable to consider the making of reciprocal arrangements between the schemes of different countries facilitating transfer from one to the other, that is to say arrangements enabling men on migration to avoid forfeiting security and allowing them to carry with them some of the rights that they have acquired in their former country. That should, in due course, become a practical problem. It is not possible to-day to do more than mention the problem to show that it has not been forgotten.

The matter of immigration following the war has been mentioned by hon. members who spoke earlier in the debate. I shall make only one comment respecting that matter. Canada must first stabilize her domestic economy for her own people, and especially for her own returned men and women, whose sacrifices must never be forgotten, before she embarks upon any general policy of immigration from Europe. Conditions after the war will not be the same as they were before 1939, and it must not be overlooked that even to-day Great Britain is producing well over fifty per cent of her food requirements.

I commend the government for the steps taken, and particularly do I commend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), whose activities in this regard have at last borne fruit. I trust that in any legislation that is brought down the guiding principle will be that enunciated by Sir William Beveridge, namely, a national minimum about which prosperity can grow, but with want abolished. We are taking the positive rather than the negative side. I believe it is well to emphasize the positive side. On the positive side we are putting work and useful employment ahead of the other measures. There may be opposition to the measures proposed, not perhaps from inside the house but by interests outside. There always has been opposition when measures have been introduced looking to the betterment of the lot of the common people. There may also be the cry, "Where will the money come from?" We have heard that cry many times in this house, especially up to 1939. It must not be forgotten that in no year until 1939 did Canada spend more than $500,000,000 by way of total expenditures, but this year our expenditures will amount to something like $4,000,000,000, just eight times as much. I think that should answer any cry of, "Where will the money come from?"

Travelling eastward for the session I was gratified to hear that the medical profession from one end of the country to the other were one hundred per cent behind the health insurance proposals and had been most helpful in drafting them. This is a splendid beginning and augurs well for the success of the scheme. I am hoping that the special committee which is to be set up will get to work as speedily as possible and that definite action will be taken during the present session. If this is done, the hopes of thousands of our people may be realized, especially the war widows and other widows, and also the aged. Large numbers of these people have almost given up any hope of a better world this side of the resurrection.

Mention is made in the speech from the throne of a joint committee to be set up by the United States and Canada to deal with agriculture. In their speeches both the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) mentioned the food problem. It is a matter which has become of great importance and it is causing grave concern. I believe we have barely touched upon the food problem which confronts not only the north American continent but all our allies, and the matter warrants more attention than has so far been given to it. All the facts of the situation should be made clear. Many people in this country have not realized that food is required not only for the Canadian people, for our fighting men and women, but for all our fighting allies.

From 1939 up until some time last year the first necessity was for guns, tanks, aeroplanes and other military supplies. The extent to which we have been successful in regard to these was revealed in the speech made by the Prime Minister. I commend to the study of every hon. member of the house the figures which he gave. Sometimes I think that we are not proud enough of the tremendous contribution which is being made by the Canadian people to our allies and to help the bringing about of victory. The important necessity this year is for food. There is a challenge to Canada's fertile plains to provide the food quotas for victory. Although over 100,000 men have left the farms to go into the various services, last year our farmers produced greater crops than in the year previous, and for this some commendation is due them.

I should like to take a moment or two of the time of the house to refer to the great task and the high responsibility which Great Britain has undertaken; it has not been touched upon so far in this debate. First of all Great Britain has her own people and troops to feed and clothe. Her next responsibility is the hundreds of thousands of prisoners of war which were taken in Libya. The people in the Libyan cities which she has taken over must be provided with the necessary food. On top of this, quantities of food have been sent to Russia. I do not think it is generally known that butter left this north American continent last year for the soldiers in Russia. We all know the civilian population of Russia have been denying themselves every possible morsel of food in order that their soldiers may be taken care of. Let us not overlook the fact that many if not all the Russian granaries have been in the hands of the nazis for over a year. Great Britain has also been called upon to send wheat and other food supplies to the people of India out of her own meagre supply.

I have not the figures of the present food requirements of the Canadian navy, army and air force, but the other day I saw some figures in the press with regard to the food requirements of the United States army. I know it will surprise you, Mr. Speaker, as it did me to learn that it takes over 15,000,000 pounds of food daily to feed the army of the United States. What I have just outlined is a challenging problem of itself; but there is something more: there is the spectre of famine which is haunting every country in Europe. All these peoples are looking to the fertile plains of the north American continent for food.

These facts should be placed more plainly before the people of this country. Tell our people what will be required this year, and I am sure they will gladly respond. Can we meet this challenge? I say yes, we can meet it, but not in the way we have been endeavoring to meet it in the past year. Questions have been asked regarding a food ministry. I propose that a food ministry be set up, not next week or next year, but right now. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members and particularly to the government that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) be made the head of that food ministry. But should he be given this power and authority, his efforts would be greatly thwarted did we not also give him the power to fix the prices of farm products.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Page Mr. Donald Gordon.

Mr. REID: I am not going to make an attack on the wartime prices and trade board at this time. I criticized the board at the last session, and I may have plenty to say before this session is over. I do not want the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) or any other member to accuse me of attacking Donald Gordon or the wartime prices and trade board, except in this one particular. I object to the method by which they have endeavoured to handle the farmer and farm prices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that a promise or a threat?

Mr. REID: Both. Everyone realizes that there must be control of prices and rationing, but to place under the wartime prices and trade board the fixing of farm prices is entirely wrong. I can imagine the cry that would go up from some in this country if farmers were chosen to handle the Bank of Canada and other banking institutions. And yet the farmers know more about banking institutions and their bookkeeping methods than the banker knows about the farmer and his problems, and I say that without fear of successful contradiction. The control of farm prices under the wartime prices and trade board is hampering the production of farm products. How could it be otherwise? The job of the wartime prices and trade board is to keep down prices, and with them production becomes a secondary consideration. I have witnesses with me to-day who can support that statement, and I am going to quote from a statement of a member of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. F. S. Grisdale, acting food administrator, who, speaking at Calgary on January 30, is reported as follows:

"The only means available to the food administration for increasing supply was through the price incentive," he said, adding that the prices board might know something about the supply situation but might not know the viewpoint of the producers with regard to ceiling price on various commodities.

The farmers know the attitude towards them which has been adopted by many members of the wartime prices and trade board and they have resented and do resent the approach which has been made to their problems and the manner in which these have been dealt with. I say, Mr. Speaker, that too much power has been put into the hands of many of these men. I am not going into details to-day, but I should like to cite instances of a dictatorial attitude and of threatening by members of the wartime prices and trade board which I believe should not be tolerated.

The potato growers of British Columbia and the milk producers of the Fraser valley have been threatened that if they did not supply the market with potatoes and milk the prices board might take those products from them. I have before me a letter from a prominent farmer in which it is said that one man from the wartime prices and trade board,—Mr. Nadeau I do not know whether he knows anything about farming or about British Columbia — came out to British Columbia and told the farmers this. He said that the milk in the cow might belong to the cow but once you take the milk from the cow "we have the right to take it from you, and we might do so."

There are two ways of getting men to do their best. One is the German method and the other is our own, and we should be careful to see to it that we do not depart from the democratic standards which we value in this country. Anything in the form of threats should not be tolerated. Last year I spoke of the power that was given to officials on the wartime prices and trade board. I now find myself in very good company, as I see that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Duff, must have something of the same sort in mind, because in his judgment issued recently he said:

There is always the risk of abuse when wide powers are committed in general terms to any body of men.

Perhaps attention will be paid to his remarks; I know that none was paid to mine when I warned the government last year. I do not wish just to criticize and leave the matter there. I wish to make certain suggestions to the government in regard to the food problem and how I think it should be tackled. First of all, set up a food ministry, to handle food production. Second, remove farm prices entirely from under the wartime prices and trade board. Third, I would have the dominion inaugurate and give leadership to a women's land army. I want to pause here to say a word on behalf of the women of this country.

It was my privilege as a member of the war expenditures committee to visit many aeroplane factories in Canada and I was astounded, first of all, at the large number of women who work in those factories, and secondly at the splendid work they are doing. I want to say to those men who still have old-fashioned ideas about the superiority of men that they had better take note of what these women are doing. They are doing a mighty fine job, and great credit is coming to them for it. Great Britain is employing some seven and a half million women in its war effort; when we talk about the effort of this country let us not forget that in Great Britain, with a population of 46,000,000, there are 23,000,000 persons employed in their war effort, over 7,000,000 of these being women. The question in Great Britain to-day is not what kind of work women can do, but what kind of work a woman cannot do. Women there are employed in almost every class of work. I suggest a women's land army in this country. Let me give a local instance to show how women have risen to the occasion.

When the Japanese were removed from the province of British Columbia some fear was expressed that the British Columbia canneries would lack their usual help. Efforts were made to bring in white girls. Fears were expressed at the outset as to whether they would do the work. There were some difficulties in the beginning, but after the cannery operators had provided proper conditions for the white girls and paid them decent wages, the employment of white girls in the British Columbia canneries was a success. The employment of women on the land would be a success too if leadership was given from Ottawa. We need not look to the various provincial governments to give leadership in these things. In my opinion the provincial governments today are nothing but glorified municipal councils; when they attempt to do any of these things they find themselves immediately up against officialdom and red tape, and cannot deal directly with members of the government but are referred to officials of some department or other.

My next proposal is this. I would prohibit the various members of the wartime prices and trade board from making statements to the press from time to time as to what articles are to be rationed or not rationed. One day we will read that a certain commodity or article is to be rationed, and the next day that statement will be contradicted. What has been the effect of issuing these statements? It has been to send a rush of people to the stores to buy up the article which the press statement said is likely to be rationed. Why not adopt the system that they have in Great Britain? There, when an article is to be rationed, an announcement is made over the radio on a Sunday, at a time when all the stores are closed, that the new order will go into effect the following Monday morning.

Next I would develop further the national nutritional scheme. Under the Minister of Pensions and National Health a body has been set up to investigate nutritional schemes, and now would be the time perhaps to make many changes in our diet. The people of Great Britain have found that through the many changes in their diet that have been brought about by rationing, and through the eating of essential foods provided them, they are enjoying better health than they ever did before. I was talking to some doctors who have recently returned from Great Britain, and they tell me that various ailments seem to have disappeared over there under rationing and the government's nutritional programme which saw to it that the essential foods were placed before the British people. In this country the Department of Pensions and National Health, under the minister and Doctor Pett, much has been done. But the question of absenteeism is arising. Attention has been drawn in the press to the number of girls in the civil service at Ottawa who are absent from work through illness. I also came across an article by Marion Harlow, entitled "Canada Fights 'Hidden Hunger'". Miss Harlow is assistant director of the Nutrition Services of Canada's Department of Pensions and National Health, and speaking of a survey which has been made of the health of workers in war industry she has this to say:

> Our surveys revealed that many of the younger workers, both girls and men, dash from bed to the plant. Then, by midmorning or earlier they stave off the pangs of hunger by swallowing cake or pastry and soft drinks or coffee bought at the canteen.

That, she claims, is the cause of a great deal of illness and consequent absence from the offices or factories which employ them. Doctors will tell you that more suffering in this country comes from over-eating than from under-eating. The nutrition campaign should be carried further than it has been, though I commend the Minister of Pensions and National Health for having inaugurated a scheme. I am not advocating a lower standard of living.

Then, too, I would add to those who could be employed on the land, the group of conscientious objectors. Something like fifteen hundred in all are so designated. The majority of them are in the province of British Columbia, being given work under a reforestation scheme. The objective is an excellent one, and I am not opposing it, but in these days, when there is so much need of help on our farms, these fifteen hundred men should be sent to the farms and made to work there.

The Prime Minister in his address the other day drew to the attention of the house and the country the great submarine menace and the need for ships. I was not surprised at all as to the need for ships. Last year, when some of us proposed in this chamber that more ships, especially wooden ones, should be built, we were laughed at, although at that time the lack of ships had created a bottleneck; and things are worse to-day. I then proposed to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that he proceed with a programme of building wooden ships, and was rather rudely turned down. I am going to change the direction of my appeal at the present time, and am going to make it to the three ministers of defence, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, the Minister of National Defence for Air, and the Minister of National Defence, who we were all sorry to hear had met with an accident and who we hope will soon return to the house. I say to these three ministers that a joint programme should be carried out with the cooperation of the three departments, and a better policy as regards the construction of ships should be put into effect. I do not know what is happening in other parts of Canada, but in British Columbia we are a little worried about what has taken place there. Instead of building all the ships they want, representatives of the three departments go round and if they see a fine fishing boat they send in a requisition and take it over from the owner. They also go to the various shipyards and if they see a fine commercial boat being built they say, "Oh, we would like that one," and away goes the boat. To-day many commercial owners will not build a boat, realizing that if they give an order to build it they have no guarantee that they will be able to acquire ownership, because the government may step in and take it away from them.

We have shipyards in British Columbia, at Vancouver, New Westminster, Victoria and other points, which are not working to full capacity. I have in mind one now, a shipyard in New Westminster called the Star shipyards, which has eight ways; six of them are idle, and the other two soon will be. That shipyard has been compelled to accept orders for rowboats to keep their men going. We should have a definite programme of building ships, and if we have not the engines to put in wooden ships we should put sails on them. From what I understand, a sailing vessel might pass more easily through the submarine menace than one propelled by engines, because I believe it is the noise and vibration of the engines which conveys the whereabouts of the ship to the submarine.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Egyptian Queen did not have quite that history.

Mr. REID: There is no reason why these shipyards should not be working to full capacity, and every kind and type of ship should be built. Perhaps we shall have to come to it, but why has a programme not been inaugurated and proceeded with? I plead with the three ministers of defence to give attention to this matter and to hand over their orders to the Minister of Munitions and Supply; it may be that we shall then get some action along the lines I have just recommended.

My time is passing, but there is one particular matter I wish to discuss for a moment or two before I close, and that is a recent statement of Mr. G. E. Trueman, a member of the British Columbia placement commission, who, speaking at Toronto on January 6th, had this to say:

> The reason for mass evacuation of Japanese from British Columbia coastal areas was not because of the Japanese but because of the white residents. The problem was one of mass hysteria and race prejudice.

Now, sir, I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to see to it that Mr. Trueman is called to account for that statement, because I believe it is an insult to the people of British Columbia and should not be allowed to pass without some note being taken of it.

Mr. O'NEILL: Read the rest of what he said.

Mr. REID: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is bad enough. If I had time I would. The members for British Columbia and the people of that province who urged the removal of the Japanese from the coastal area did not do so on account of mass hysteria or race prejudice; they did it for the safety of the people of that province, including the Japanese themselves. No one in this country can tell which of the Japanese—or for that matter some other nationalities, but especially the Japanese—is loyal or disloyal, and it was felt to be in the best interests of the people of British Columbia to move them out. So far as I know, no Japanese citizen born in this country or in Japan, has come forward to the authorities and given any information or made any statement against one of his own race. That is significant. Although an inquiry has been held in the matter of the "Black Dragon", I would say that one of the reasons that none of them has come forward is the fear of reprisals.

In a booklet which has just been issued, entitled "Removal of Japanese from Protected Areas", issued by the British Columbia security commission, the statement is made, regarding the removal, at page 5:

> The libraries of this continent held no reference to guide the organizers in their initial actions.

Well, if they had investigated a little further they would have discovered that this is not the first occasion on the north American continent when there has been a wholesale removal of people. How many hon. members realize that during the days of the war of independence the Americans moved the British people back fifty miles inland—and they did not receive the same consideration as we have given the Japanese, because their property and chattels were confiscated. I mention that to refute the statement that there is no precedent for the removal of Japanese from the coastal areas of British Columbia. Much good may come out of it; and one lesson I think this country should take to heart is that it is not in the best national interests to allow any large group to live away off by themselves and unto themselves. I may be wrong, but I am one of those who believe that difference of language does divide a nation. I point to the amicable relations between the United States and Canada as one outstanding example.

I wish now to deal for a few minutes with the fuel shortage which exists in British Columbia.

We have had one of the most severe fuel shortages that have ever beset our people, as will be seen from the following brief paragraph in this article:

Harassed with cold homes, sick children and frozen water pipes, men and women lined two and three deep before the fuel board office of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board on West Pender Monday afternoon, in a desperate "last hope" to obtain fuel—any kind of fuel just so long as it would burn.

I do not want anyone to think for a moment that I am sniping at the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, but he went to Vancouver recently and the general statements he made in connection with the fuel situation were in my opinion uncalled for. He wondered what sort of people they were who could not go out and cut fuel for themselves, and he intimated that if he were placed in a similar position he knew what he would do. I need not point out, if he had made the same statement in Ottawa, how foolish it would have seemed, because the people in the city of Vancouver could not go nineteen and twenty miles and cut fuel for themselves and bring it in. As a matter of fact, a great many of them did help themselves, because I have pictures of men sawing up their garden fences, parts of their garages and even part of the furniture in their home in order to obtain fuel—and yet all they get is a statement of that sort from the head of the board. I wonder why he did not investigate the closing down of two lumber mills in British Columbia when lumber was in great demand and when the people could not get fuel. I say to the board that if they really want to do the people a service they should find out why these two mills were bought and closed and hundreds of men thrown out of employment.

Mr. MacINNIS: Private enterprise. That is what the members to my right want. The hon. member should come over here with us.

Mr. REID: I think I am safer here. I see my time is up, but before I sit down I would ask the government to take special note of the fuel situation, which is really serious, and also the fact that on the coast cargo ships being built for the United States government have been changed recently from coal burners to oil burners. We might have had a small tanker to supply our people with fuel. At any rate the conditions are such as to warrant something more definite and satisfactory being done for our people than simply the uttering of a lot of words.

[Mr. Reid.]

I am sorry, sir, that my time is up.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I agree with a great many of the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I have a copy of the Beveridge report, much of which I have read, and I should like to recommend, as he did, that every member of the House of Commons study the report in detail. The hon. member pointed out that Britain is now producing fifty per cent of her foodstuffs. I suggest that her goal for 1943 is a production of over seventy-five per cent of her foodstuff requirements. I agree with the hon. member that the time has come in Canada for the appointment of a food ministry; in fact that time is long past. This is very essential.

I was greatly disappointed to find that the speech from the throne does not contain any constructive suggestions for the proper allocation of man-power or for assistance to Canadian agriculture in these distressing times. One paragraph in the speech from the throne states that a joint committee representative of the departments of agriculture of Canada and the United States has been agreed upon to co-ordinate the efforts of the two countries in the production of food for the united nations. That is all to the good, but there is no mention of bringing about parity prices as between the producers of the two countries. Further on, this statement appears in the speech from the throne:

My ministers have already begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war.

They have only begun to study these conditions in this the fourth year of the war. Again:

My ministers believe that a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance should be worked out at once which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada. The government accordingly proposes to recommend the early appointment of a select committee to examine and report on the most practicable measures of social insurance, and the steps which will be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan.

This charter of social security comes apparently as a result of the convention held in Winnipeg last December. It has all the earmarks of it. In that respect, notwithstanding the views expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other evening in this house as to the composition of his cabinet from the point of view of occupational representation, may I say that the election of the Hon. John Bracken to the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party is regarded as an event of extraordinary importance, especially to the agriculturists of Canada, because for the first time in Canada's history will the chieftainship of one of the great political parties rest in a man who is essentially of the soil, a man moreover who is well versed in the science of government. His sincere conviction is that Canada cannot be prosperous unless all groups within the country enjoy prosperity. Agriculture is Canada's basic industry, and without prosperous basic industries Canada can never prosper.

The greatest asset that any Canadian statesman can possess is a profound knowledge of agriculture and its many serious problems. The Hon. John Bracken qualifies completely in that respect. He has a scientific, technical and practical knowledge of agriculture such as is possessed by few people in this dominion, certainly not by any member of the present House of Commons. At the Rowell-Sirois conference of provincial premiers with the Prime Minister, held in this chamber, in January, 1942, he proved himself a great national figure, having a grasp of national problems throughout the dominion. The platform or peoples' programme adopted by the Progressive Conservative convention affords ample scope for a leader of Mr. Bracken's broad humanitarian convictions.

Any party is as good as its leader and can never be better. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) intimated recently that Canada would presently emerge as a great industrial nation and that the basic industries would henceforth be only of secondary importance. His is precisely the point of view which has condemned Canadian agriculture to the role of hewers of wood and drawers of water for the urban communities. Judging by governmental action to date this view is also held by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others.

To-day Canada's agricultural population, which is over one-third of the total population, is receiving less than one-sixth of the national income. The Prime Minister, speaking in this debate on February 1, as will be found on page 49 of Hansard, said the reason why butter is rationed, with a hint that beef also might be rationed, is that Canada is providing the enormous supplies of food which she is sending to the people of Great Britain, from the supplies of foodstuffs of this country. That statement is untrue with respect to beef. Until the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce can stand up in this house and say what quantity of beef has been shipped, giving the dates of shipment, to Great Britain during the past calendar year, or give us that information at least in confidence, then I say that statement is as untrue as it is misleading.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman has mentioned my name, and the Prime Minister is not here to reply. What the Prime Minister did state was that the need for any rationing arose from the fact that food was being shipped to Great Britain; and I am sure my hon. friend will agree that if a percentage of the butter fat represented by the cheese being shipped to Britain had been converted into butter, which would have been quite possible, there would have been no necessity for the rationing of butter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was speaking particularly of beef.

Mr. GARDINER: Beef is in exactly the same relationship to pork. We are shipping approximately seventy per cent of our bacon and ham to Britain.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Pork is not beef.

Mr. GARDINER: Partly as a result, all our beef, much of which previously went to the United States, is being consumed in this country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I desire to continue with my speech—and no proof has been given by the minister with regard to beef, the only item I am discussing at the moment. With reference to butter, which the minister just mentioned, the present shortage is due to the price ceiling and to the inefficiency and muddling with regard to the question of manpower in this country. The lack of parity prices, more than anything else, is responsible for the butter shortage, and that is also the case with many other agricultural commodities. Many dairy herds have been shipped to the United States, and many dairy animals have been slaughtered in this country. Last year the producers received 50 cents per pound for butter fat used in making cheese and only 35 cents per pound for butter fat going into butter. To-day, including the 10 cent bonus, the producer receives 44 cents per pound for butter fat going into butter, while his neighbour in the United States receives approximately 50 cents. When Canada went to war the government used as a base period for industry and organized labour the years 1926-29. When the United States went to war they took as their base period for the whole nation the years 1913-14. On January 30, 1943, the cash grain quotations, Winnipeg and Chicago, were as follows:

	Winnipeg	Chicago	Difference
Wheat	.90	1.45¾	.55¾
Oats	.51¼	.62	.10¾
Barley	.64¼	.90	.25¾
Rye	.65¼	.84½	.19¼

Then the implements of production cost much more in Canada than in the United States. On previous occasions I have placed upon Hansard price charts showing these differences. A comparison of the prices of four of the necessary farm implements in Canada as between 1934 and 1941 is as follows:

	1934	1941
2-furrow gang plough.. .. ..$137.50		$155.00
8-foot cultivator.. .. .. .. 143.00		162.00
20-row double disc drill.. .. 250.50		295.25
8-foot binder.. .. .. 257.00		327.00

The average increase in the cost of these four farm implements, which are most necessary on any farm, was 18½ per cent during that period. To-day there is a large demand for power equipment, but it is expensive and difficult to obtain. According to agricultural statistics the average wages of farm help by the month increased by over 65 per cent from 1940 to 1942. It is most difficult to obtain help at any price, since agriculturists find it impossible to compete with industry in order to obtain labour on their farms. In the matter of live stock, Winnipeg and Chicago quotations as of January 30, 1943, were as follows:

	Winnipeg	Chicago	Difference
Fat steers.....	$11 00	$15 50	$4 50
Fat cows.....	9 50	12 50	3 00
Fat calves.....	12 00	16 50	4 50
Fat hogs.....	15 35	15 35	....

The choice hog in the United States weighs from 190 pounds to 330 pounds. The choice hog in the Canadian market weighs from 190 pounds to 230 pounds. The Canadian producer takes a heavy cut in price for the hog weighing over 230 pounds; for any producer knows that it costs much less per pound to put weight on a hog over 200 pounds than under that weight. There is a large disparity in connection with grain, live stock and dairy product prices to-day; and will any hon. member say that the agriculture industry should not be entitled to parity at this time?

In connection with the man-power muddle, there is no master plan. Agriculture, labour and the armed forces are all competing for our man-power resources; there is no co-ordination whatever. Last July a young man in my constituency, the only male on a half section, with a widowed mother, in order not to be drafted volunteered for the air force, and was accepted. He asked for leave to assist in harvesting his mother's crop, but his request was refused. I investigated his case in detail and wired the officer in command of the manning pool in an attempt to get harvest leave for the boy, but my request also was refused. I could cite many such examples. I could go back to the fall of 1941, when a strenuous effort was made to get men into the armed forces and the categories were lowered. I know of one farmer who in many respects was a splendid chap, though suffering a certain physical handicap. He was just over thirty years of age, tactful in the handling of other men, and a fine mechanic who could repair machinery out in the open field. He operated several sections of land and had a large number of live stock. He did not particularly want to serve in the armed forces, but he offered his services so that when his pals came back he might at least say that he had tried to enlist. His neighbours knew of his physical handicap and much to their surprise he was accepted during the fall of 1941. I have already placed upon Hansard figures showing what it costs to equip and train a man in the armed forces. This man was trained and sent overseas; after fifteen months he was brought back to Canada and discharged. I know of other young farmers in my neighbourhood who enlisted, came home and sold their farms and equipment, and after a few months were found to be physically unfit and were discharged. Some time ago it was officially stated that there had been more than 60,000 discharges from the armed forces. Imagine the amount of money that has been wasted in equipping and training some 60,000 men, many of whom never should have been accepted, to say nothing of the man-power lost and the lessening of production that has resulted.

The man-power situation has been lamentable in this country. During August of 1940 we had a national registration of men and women, conducted under the supervision of the Department of National War Services, then headed by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Advantage was never taken of this registration, as I had imagined it would be, in order to develop a master plan for agriculture, industry and the armed forces. In this connection those who are interested might read the opinions with respect to farm labour as expressed on June 2, 1942, by the Minister of Agriculture, at page 3267 of Hansard, or those of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) at page 3471 of Hansard for June 9, 1942. The indifference of these ministers at that time to the question of agricultural help is astonishing to many of us now.

The hon. member who preceded me in the debate has referred to the seriousness of the fuel situation in British Columbia. We on the prairies have a difficult fuel situation these days, and it is a condition which prevails throughout all of western Canada. We read in the daily press that in many districts schools, hospitals and other public institutions have had to close down because of a lack of fuel.

Under date of November 21, 1942, I sent a telegram to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as follows:

Many municipal officials fear that due to lack of fuel with severe winter weather there will be undue hardship and suffering on the prairies. The present labour difficulties at the coal mines is the result of lack of proper coordination by various departments of the government. Imperative that immediate action be taken to avoid a very serious situation.

J. A. Ross, M.P. for Souris.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to tell my hon. friend we have put 1,800 men in the coal mines of western Canada since November, 1942.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not disputing that. I received a reply from the Prime Minister stating that the telegram had been passed on to the ministers of the two departments most vitally concerned, and that the cabinet were giving the matter its attention. Those two departments were the Department of Finance and the Department of Labour.

On January 27, 1943, I had considerable correspondence with respect to a meeting of the boards of trade and municipal officials at Minnedosa, Manitoba. I shall not go through the whole of this correspondence, but I shall read the principal resolution, which is as follows:

Resolution of a meeting of western associated boards of trade and municipal bodies held at Minnedosa January 27, 1943.

Whereas the fuel situation is a national problem due chiefly to lack of labour, and the need for fuel is immediately urgent.

And whereas the dominion government controls all available labour, such as conscientious objectors, forestry battalions, and with their consent prisoners of war, and whereas in the Riding Mountain National Park supplies of one hundred thousand cords of dry poplar are now available and in the park and wooded areas of provincial lands great supplies of green wood is available.

Be it resolved that the Minister of National Resources and the fuel controller be urged to take action forthwith to make these supplies available.

Signed Mayor Young, Brandon
Mayor Pollock, Neepawa
Mayor Ramdsden, Dauphin
Mayor Clark, Minnedosa.

I have several other resolutions with regard to the matter, of which the departments concerned have copies.

Speaking on March 24, 1942, the Prime Minister announced the establishment of national selective service, and defined its policy. On August 19 of the same year on a nation-wide broadcast he told of the extension of that policy in order to put all men and women to work in essential industry.

On January 16, 1943 he is reported to have written the Minister of Labour asking for detailed answers to some nineteen questions relating to Canada's man-power situation, or as to what has become of the words uttered by the Prime Minister himself on March 24 and August 19.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know how that letter got out, but I think the use of it is reprehensible. I am not referring of course to the use made of it by the hon. member who is speaking. But it was merely a routine letter such as is sent out every year by the leader of the government prior to a session. I say that the use of that letter is unfair and unfortunate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if it was unfortunate, let us have the letter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have only taken it from the daily press; and in view of what the minister has said now, he should let us have a copy of it.

In the meantime two things are entirely responsible for the present difficulties in connection with food production, namely, the price-ceiling set-up without proper consideration for parity prices, and the mishandling of Canada's man-power problem. With respect to the price-ceiling may I say that since June 29 of last year I have had a question on the order paper concerning the wartime prices and trade board, and I have not yet received an answer to it, because some of the information asked for Mr. Gordon does not wish to give.

I believe most people realize that inexperienced men cannot properly operate and take care of modern mechanized agricultural equipment. With it, one man can do several times the amount of work that can be done by a man using horse-propelled equipment. Many of these experienced operators have left the farms. Under the present set-up it would be difficult if not impossible to get them back on the land. A great deal of planning and effort must be put forth before a crop is produced and harvested in this country. Much of this production is used, in turn, in the production of beef, bacon, poultry, eggs, dairy products and the like. Agricultural production in Canada during 1942 was very high. But increases on a wide range of products is asked during 1943. Some fourteen farm products vary in percentage increases of from 8 to 67·6 per cent. This is a large contribution for agriculture to be asked to make, in view of the present labour shortage and other difficulties now confronting that industry. The importance of a clearer definition of the man-power policy, as it is expected to apply to agriculture, is now most evident to all; and I trust that governmental authorities will work in closer collaboration with organized agriculture.

The report issued by officials of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture while in session at Calgary last Saturday, January 30, to the effect that they had not been consulted about 1943 production, is disappointing. When the grain policy for 1943 was announced last Friday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) it was disappointing to learn that payments of storage of grain within the quota held on farms would not be allowed on the same basis as that paid the elevator companies holding grain for the government of the day. And equally disappointing was it to find that a parity price would not be paid for the quota the government agrees to take from the producers of this country.

In conclusion I would ask the government:

1. To assure the nation that our army as now organized will be properly reinforced when they go into battle and suffer casualties —as they surely must do at some future day. It is most important that the nation should have this assurance now.

2. That a food ministry be established in order that Canada may do her utmost in the production of essential foods for the united nations at this time. This is a matter which may be of vital importance in Canada in the coming season.

3. That parity prices be created immediately for all products and services essential to the war effort and the human family.

4. That industry be decentralized. Plants for the production of alcohol from wheat, plants for the manufacture of synthetic rubber and flax processing plants should be established west of the great lakes, adjacent to the raw materials and the abundance of cheap power which is available in that area.

5. That redistribution of representation in the House of Commons be not dealt with until after the conclusion of the war, because there has been a considerable movement of population in various parts of Canada since war was declared. If necessary the British North America Act should be amended in this respect. An amendment to that act will be necessary if social security legislation is to function properly.

6. That old-age pensions be increased to $30 a month.

I shall support, Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) which reads:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (a) to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man- and woman-power;
> (b) to adopt and carry through a national labour policy which will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful position as one of the major partners in our Canadian democracy; and
> (c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the pungent and eloquent remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and I want to join with him in the congratulations which he offered to the government of the day upon the forecast which appears in the throne speech, to which we are speaking at the present time, in regard to security measures.

The hon. member for New Westminster has spoken of the increase in the national income during these years of war. If my memory is right—I am not quoting him but giving my own memory of the figures—the national income of Canada in 1939-40 was four and a half billion dollars. To-day it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of eight billion dollars. In other words, in a time of disorganization and disruption consequent upon a state of war we have practically doubled the income of Canada. I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that we have done that during a period when we have withdrawn from active production as many as 600,000 of our healthy, young and otherwise producing men by enlisting them in the armed forces. The old statement, "Where shall the money come from; what shall we use for money?" is hardly applicable and can hardly pass as an argument. Were we to maintain the productive power of the Canadian people after the war closes at only the rate at which we are producing now, and producing under difficulties, in factories newly established and worked by men recently trained, it would be possible for us to double the income of every man and woman in Canada—yes, and maintain all the graft and exploitation that goes on as well.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Why maintain it?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am not advocating the maintaining of it. Do not take that meaning out of my words. I say that even if you do maintain the exploitation and waste in future years, as I hope we shall not, we could still double the income of every working man in this country. So that the time for saying we have not the wherewithal to deal with the necessary calls upon our purse has gone by. When the war needs and the fear that war engenders has passed, Canada should be able to build a secure and prosperous and healthy people. I mention these matters referred to in the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster because they are along the lines of the remarks I had planned to make.

Many tempting topics present themselves to a speaker in the debate on the address in reply, but I propose to confine myself to just one, and thus I may lend greater emphasis to the cause I propose to plead. I wish to bring as forcefully as I can before the people of Canada, if my voice carries that far, before the members of this chamber and the members of the administration, the matter to which I intend to refer.

I ask hon. members to throw their minds back, not very long in the memory of man, and recall the days when the soldiers of Canada marched away to world war No. 1. They donned the king's uniform and left this country to engage in the horrors of trench warfare. When they were going, from thousands of platforms, from the floor of this house and from the mouths of the responsible statesmen of that day they were assured that under no circumstances would their dependents suffer want. The men who made those speeches believed in what they said. They had a right to believe in what they said, because I have no doubt they had every confidence that that would be the wish of the people who would succeed them. I do not mean necessarily the government; I mean the people of Canada who would come after them. They felt that it would be the desire and the determination of all men that under no circumstances would any of the dependents of those bold young men of that day be left in want.

A little more than twenty-five years has gone by since those fateful days when the young men of Canada marched to war. To-day several thousands—I do not know how many; it is impossible to know—of aged widows of the men who were then youths are in dire poverty, living upon charity, or dependent upon relief. The humble pleas of these poor, poverty-stricken in many instances, and old women—I do not think they will take offence at my calling them old, since most of them are far beyond middle age—have been presented to this house on numerous occasions, but seemingly they have fallen upon deaf ears. No, not deaf ears, that is wrong; they have been heard with sympathy, but for some reason nothing has been done. I hold in my hand a petition which was circulated among some of the members at the last session of parliament, and in substance it says this:

That the soldiers of the last great war were assured that their dependents would not be left in want; that many widows of deceased veterans of the last great war are now living in poverty, are dependent on charity, or are in receipt of municipal relief; therefore your petitioners pray that all widows of deceased veterans of the great war of 1914-18 who are now in necessitous circumstances be pensioned in an amount sufficient to provide the reasonable necessities of life.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I interrupt my hon. friend?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have a good deal more to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the hon. member is referring to the delegation of non-pensioned widows that came here last year to interview the committee, and which was sponsored by himself and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), I may tell him that provision is being made in the estimates this year to meet some of the considerations then advanced.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am sorry I objected to the interruption. The news, Mr. Speaker, is splendid news. I hope that the measure which the minister has announced will be a wholesouled and sweeping measure. I suppose I can hardly hope that it will be as sweeping as I should like, but I do know the kindly spirit and the sympathetic nature of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). The hon. member for Westminster had occasion to compliment the minister no less than three times during the course of his speech, and in each of those compliments I join, because the minister has accomplished something in an outstanding way since he assumed the most important office of the ministry of pensions and health.

I should like to say something further on this question, notwithstanding what the hon. member has said, in order that I may urge the fullest consideration for the cause I am now pleading. I know that the words the minister has just uttered, brief but much to the point, will bring a measure of relief to many a poor old woman in many a humble home across Canada. They will be accepted with gratitude and relief, almost with exultation, by those who for years have advocated the cause of these poor women—the soldiers' organizations and the friends of dependents of soldiers generally.

To understand what the position now is which the minister says will be relieved, one should bear in mind that in the past only those widows were entitled to pension whose husbands drew fifty per cent disability pension. That is to say, those who drew pensions less than on the fifty per cent basis were not entitled to a continuance of the payments made to the soldier when he finally passed on, unless of course it was possible to prove that the husband died as a result of injuries directly related in some way to the war.

I think we all know that practically all the men who took part in trench warfare from 1914 to 1918 returned as casualties. We know that, and their wives and their widows know it. But it is another matter to prove direct connection between the loss of life and the war. It is much easier to be satisfied of that in your own mind than to bring evidence sufficient to prove it to the meticulous gentlemen who sit on the pensions board. And so it is that very few, comparatively speaking, have been able to jump that hurdle and actually prove that the death of the husband was the result of war service. Pensions accordingly have been restricted for the greater part to those whose husbands were in receipt of a fifty per cent disability pension. The result is that the great mass of the war widows of world war No. 1 have been non-pensionable irrespective of how necessitous were their circumstances.

We made considerable progress in 1941. Section 11 of the new act is an illustration, for now a member of his majesty's forces who dies in service either in Canada or abroad leaving a widow in necessitous circumstances may, in the discretion of the board, receive a pension. It was not so in past days.

I have a memorandum here which may be interesting to hon. members. It is to the minister from the chairman of the pensions board, dated June 22, 1942. The chairman says:

> Since May 1, 1941, when the select committee of the House of Commons received representations in regard to the non-pensioned widows, a total number of 59 pensions have been awarded to widows under section 21 of the Pension Act by the Canadian pension commission.

I do not know what the figures would be if I brought them up to date, but I fancy they would not be changed very greatly. In any event I am confident of their total inadequacy. Fifty-nine pensions only have been granted to those in necessitous circumstances. I know of more than that number myself, I think, personally. It is totally inadequate. I have given and I give great credit for the improvements in the act brought about primarily by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. He was not only legally, shall I say, formally, responsible but he was chiefly responsible. A great many consecrated absurdities were washed out of the old act and some time-honoured wrongs were abolished or mitigated. We ironed out a lot of wrinkles which should never have been in the old pensions act. Evils were removed. In some cases sores were healed, but unfortunately many of the scars remained. This is one of those scars. Had the Pension Act of 1941 been in effect since 1918 I think it is safe to say that many soldiers would have received pensions who, under the older and harsher act, were disentitled, and that some of them would have received larger pensions under the new act than they did under the old.

But here is where the scar remains. The present act will benefit veterans of the present war and those who still live from the last war. But what about those who have died? It is small comfort to the widow of to-day to be told that she must live in penury and want without government support, because of the harshness of a former law which kept the pension which was given to her husband below the fifty per cent basis or denied him a pension altogether; that she must not benefit because he did not benefit. But that is in effect the rule. Unless he was able to secure a fifty per cent benefit there is nothing now for her. It is a rule which is incapable of logical defence. Moreover, that whole fifty per cent rule is in my judgment arbitrary and illogical; and I hope that in the measure which the Minister of National Revenue has forecast he will sweep away at least that—what shall I call it?—technical defence to a claim which would otherwise be good. "National Revenue", did I say? Well, I will include the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) in some of the compliments I have been extending to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. If I have mixed the two, their characteristics of sympathy and consideration for the weak and helpless are as one. I mean that. A minister of national revenue gets mighty little sympathy. He is the one who makes us pay our taxes; and I know that the present Minister of National Revenue does it as easily, as kindly and as politely as it can be done.

But to come back to what I was saying: I do hope that the ministers will eliminate all stultifying technicalities of the kind and look these women in the face. Let us get down to realities; let us get down to facts and see these women as I know them to be. I suppose most of the hon. members who are listening to me went to the little red schoolhouse about the same time as I did and read the old third and fourth school book. If they did they will remember the old-time Song of the Shirt:

> With fingers weary and worn,
> With eyelids heavy and red,
> A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
> Plying her needle and thread,—

The women whom I am pleading for to-day and intend to make the sole topic of my speech in this debate cannot get jobs at all. Most of them who are employed are mere charwomen; most of them have spent their lives in bringing up a family, or possibly have been attending a sick husband over weary months and long years, and have thus unfitted themselves for the competition of the modern labour market. They are not old enough to qualify for an old age pension, and they are too old to obtain work in our factories or war production plants. The time when they could receive the mother's allowance has long since gone by, because in the most instances their families have now passed sixteen years of age. So, without work, or in most cases the ability to work, they are depending upon charity, living in the houses of relatives to whose economy they are not able to contribute. Their position is a most unenviable one. They are the wreckage of world war number one.

Parliament in the course of this debate will concern itself with post-war problems. I hear them discussed in almost every speech; and there will be many speeches, no doubt, in which reference will be made to two of the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter—freedom from want and freedom from fear. We shall be speaking, in an academic way for the most part, about these matters; for it will be a want of the future which is to be relieved and not of the present, and so in a sense we shall be discussing academic problems. But the one I am laying before parliament now is not a problem of the future only; it is a problem of the present. The fear and the want are right here now; and it seems to me that if this parliament wishes itself to be taken seriously in its discussion of the abolition of fear and want as a post-war problem, it had better take care of the fear and the want which are before our eyes at this very moment. It can easily be done. I am only asking for consideration on behalf of the widows of soldiers of the last war—it might even be restricted to those who saw service abroad, although I do not advocate that; I can see no special reason for drawing that line—widows of men who served twenty-five years ago and who are in necessitous circumstances. That is all. I am asking not for a general pension for these people, but simply for the relieving of the distress of those in necessitous circumstances. If this house cannot do that for the women whose men were assured by our predecessors that they would never suffer want, then we need not be expected to be believed or be taken seriously when we talk about freedom from want and freedom from fear in the years to come.

I may have said some things which it was unnecessary to say in view of the assurance just given by the minister, but perhaps what I have said will do no harm; and it may strengthen the hand of the minister in preparing the measure to know that at least on this side of the house there are many who agree with it. I know I can speak for every one of those whose names appear on the document which I read; I think I can speak for every private member on this side of the house, when I say that the dire necessities of these soldiers' widows should be relieved, and relieved immediately.

I congratulate the minister of pensions upon what he has said. He said only a word or two, but as I caught it I thought he gave the assurance that at this very session of the house steps will be taken to deal with this matter. Is that what he said?

An hon. MEMBER: That is what he said.

Mr. GARDINER: There is provision in the estimates.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There is, or will be, provision in the estimates? Well, that fills me with joy. I am happy, very happy to have received that assurance. These women have been looking to me to say something on their behalf. I congratulate my hon. friend across the way upon what he may have contributed to this matter. I see that the good women have put me down as an honorary patron of the Toronto association. It will make me happy indeed to tell them of what has taken place in the house this afternoon.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, to say that we are living in the most serious period of the history of mankind thus far is to make a statement which by now is almost worn threadbare. Nevertheless I believe far more importance is to be attached to that statement than many are prepared to acknowledge. I am not thinking so much of the outcome of this war. We are all heartened, as has been expressed by most of those who have already spoken, by the turn of events in the military conflict. We are all quite certain of the successful conclusion of the military conflict. We can rest assured that the armed forces and all those associated with them are going to do their part, and, with certain adjustments at home, we are all quite satisfied that the outcome of the military conflict is not in doubt. My greatest fears are in association with the order that we shall have after the war is concluded. We are not bound to win the peace as an automatic result of winning the war. Judging from what some say one is led to believe that they conclude that just because we shall again win the military conflict we shall automatically win the peace. That is not so. I believe that after the war is won, even while we are winning the war, the common people are going to be obliged to fight and to exercise themselves to the utmost to assure themselves that they are going to win the peace as well.

From my observations and reading I am satisfied that in behind the scenes there is an unholy, ungodly, devilish gang of individuals who are determined that we shall not win the peace, and I am satisfied that they will move heaven and earth to see that we shall not win the peace. At the present time, because we are beginning to see through the woods in this military conflict, many proposals and plans are being made for a new world order. Everyone everywhere has some conception of a new order. All parties in this house are suggesting plans and programmes for a new order, and I think we do well to examine every one of these proposals and programmes very carefully for two purposes, first, to discover whether they are genuine solutions, and, second, to discover whether they are disguised plots against the people's liberties.

As I look over these proposals and plans I have two comments to make. First of all, as has been emphasized by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) in his address, many of these proposals indicate that their objective is economic security. In fact, they all do. But the thing that is conspicuous by its absence in most of them is the technique, the method by which the objective is to be attained. We are all aware of the circumstances that prevail in the way of poverty, destitution and the low standard of living, and I do not think it is necessary to emphasize these aspects of our national life. The question to which we ought to be confining our attention is that of ways and means of eliminating these unnecessary conditions. I think the most serious aspect of many of these proposals is that while they do provide for security, many of them do so at the price of individual liberty, and I believe that what we desire in Canada, as elsewhere in the British empire, is not only economic security but individual liberty as well. Not only are we fighting a military aggressor, but we are supposed to be fighting for a way of life as well and not alone for the right to establish economic security.

To me the alarming situation with regard to some of these proposals that are being made is that they have as their basic philosophy the very philosophy against which we are in armed conflict and which we are trying to drive from the earth. As I look over the proposals I find that everything from absolute anarchy to absolute despotism is being advocated, and all in the sacred name of democracy. It is time that we gained a very clear conception of some of the objectives for which we are fighting, and in what I have to say this afternoon I shall endeavour to point out what I consider are some of them.

What constitutes our way of life? What are the requisites of complete democracy? What is the basic philosophy of our way of life? These are questions which are proper at this time and which ought to be answered. There are those who suggest that we ought to throw overboard everything that existed in pre-war days. Personally I cannot subscribe to that view. I do not believe that everything that has obtained in pre-war days is wrong and unjust. I think it is mere childish prattle to suggest that we must throw overboard everything in order to have a new order. Consequently the question arises: what are we going to preserve from pre-war days?

I believe the answer to that question depends upon certain basic major fundamentals which we desire to see obtain in the new order of which we speak. Some of these principles have been at work in what is referred to as the old order, and in my opinion we shall have to preserve the best of these principles, making changes or additions where necessary. There are three aspects of democracy—the political, the economic and the social. One could elaborate at great length on all three aspects, but this afternoon I wish to confine my attention particularly to the economic aspects of democracy.

I believe we are all fairly satisfied that we have a good measure of political democracy, but there is never anything so good that it cannot be improved, and there are many ways in which we could improve our political democracy, though on this occasion I am not going to offer any suggestions in that regard. Social democracy is largely dependent upon what obtains with regard to political and economic democracy. We have yet to achieve economic democracy in this country; and in considering what is involved in economic democracy, the first thing we have to settle in our minds before we can make any progress is, what is the object of an economic system; what is its purpose; why have we an economic system? I suggest that the only legitimate purpose of an economic system is the production of the greatest desirable abundance with the very least amount of work and trouble. I consider that a sound fundamental. It is basic; and unless we properly establish the object of an economic system, then any superstructure we may erect upon it will be faulty and to no purpose.

I have listened to various proposals which have been made, but as yet I have heard no group in this house or outside it, other than those who subscribe to the social credit philosophy, advocate as a basic fundamental the maximum production of goods with the minimum amount of work and trouble. Today we hear from many quarters, including the speech from the throne, the suggestion that the object of an economic system is to find jobs, to put people to work at full employment. The speech from the throne states:

> My ministers have already begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war.

I suggest that the providing of jobs is an illegitimate objective of an economic system. The objective of an economic system is, I contend, to produce abundance, whether or not that creates jobs. I consider that principle to be sound. I believe we ought to engage extensively in national projects once the war is over. The other evening the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that an appropriation of $5,000,000,000 ought to be set aside to be spent during the first two years after the war. I also observed, however, that he skilfully avoided indicating where this amount of money was to come from. I certainly believe there are many national projects in which we ought to engage when peace comes. There is no reason in the world why we should not have at least a two-lane, hard-surfaced highway from coast to coast, or a four-lane highway if necessary. There is no reason why all the roads in this country should not be hard surfaced, right up to the front door of the farm-house. There is no reason why we should not make every natural beauty spot in this country accessible to the people. I am very much interested in this aspect of our national projects by reason of the fact that I have the honour to represent one of the largest and most beautiful places of this kind not only in Canada but in the whole world. In looking over the situation I am satisfied that we could build a thousand miles of hard-surfaced roads in Jasper park itself in order to make these beauties of nature accessible to the people of Canada as well as to the outside world. I am satisfied that we could spend a million dollars very easily in one year in Jasper park in order to make it more readily accessible and more attractive. Again, I see no reason why we should not launch a national housing programme under which we would rebuild up to three-quarters of all the houses and dwelling places in this country. Again, our forests ought to be replanted and there ought to be far more fire protection than we have at present. We could also devote attention to the reclamation of waste land, to irrigation projects, and to the complete electrification of every home in the country.

I consider these legitimate projects; and if it takes work to bring them about, well and good. We ought not, however, to engage in these projects for the sake of providing jobs. We ought to build roads because we want roads on which to travel, not just in order to put people to work. We ought to rebuild houses because we want our people to live in the most congenial surroundings possible, not in order to put carpenters to work. If we adopt that attitude toward all our projects we are going to get somewhere; otherwise we are going to do a lot of foolish things such as we did previous to the outbreak of the war.

In carrying out these national projects, as well as in conducting our industrial enterprise, we ought to take the fullest advantage of all technological improvement and progress. As I have suggested several times already, there are those who constantly suggest that it is the duty of industry to provide jobs. I say definitely that is not so; it never was, should not be and cannot be. It is the duty of industry to produce, and that is its only objective whether or not it requires human effort. We all know that in this modern day, by reason of technological advancement, human energy is a very small factor in the production of anything. The constant trend of human endeavour ever since man was placed on this earth has been to free himself from nature-forced labour. That is why we have had all these modern inventions. Man is trying to free himself from the bugbear of drudgery so that he may have more leisure time, and I think that is a legitimate objective. We ought to use every piece of machinery that can be devised by man, whether or not it puts people out of jobs; but we should see to it that everything produced by the machinery is distributed among the people. If this is done, if we take maximum advantage of technological advancement, it will mean that the necessary hours of work can be reduced to a very small amount, perhaps even to the extent of four hours a day for four days a week, as has been already suggested. This means that all the people would have leisure—paid leisure. Leisure is not a loafer's paradise. It is an opportunity for man to satisfy his creative instinct, an opportunity for him to satisfy his musical inclinations, his artistic inclinations, and many of the things which people call hobbies.

That is the attitude we ought to take with respect to this question of work. I assert that we are not fighting for a work state. A work state is simply a slave state. We are fighting for the opportunity to satisfy our creative endeavours. We are fighting for a set of circumstances under which man can engage in and satisfy his creative instincts to the maximum.

Therefore the first fundamental we must establish, if we are going to make progress in the establishment of a new order, is to insist that the purpose of an economic system is to provide abundance, and not jobs. A second fundamental which I suggest must be recognized and established is that there must be a definite relationship between the money issued, which is created and put into circulation in the nation, and the goods produced. I consider that one of the greatest false assumptions—and it is an assumption of Liberals, Conservatives and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as well—

Mr. GRAYDON: Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. KUHL: Yes; I beg the hon. member's pardon. I consider one of the greatest false assumptions in economic thinking is the assumption that automatically there is always a definite relationship between the money put into circulation and the goods produced. That is not so. There are direct statements, and statements which imply that national income and national production are one and the same thing. That is not true, and anything based upon that assumption cannot stand. It is false to assume that automatically there is always in circulation an amount of money which equals the prices of the goods the people are expected to buy. There are many who assume that if a farmer produces a thousand bushels of wheat and it is priced at fifty cents a bushel, automatically the consumers have $500 with which to buy that thousand bushels of wheat. It is assumed, too, that when a manufacturer manufactures shoes to the value of a thousand dollars, automatically the consumers have a thousand dollars with which to buy a thousand dollars worth of shoes. That is a false assumption, and anything based upon it is unsound. One can discover that by going into the books of any business. It can be discovered in the "Canada Year Book".

The sum total of the situation that existed in Canada before the outbreak of war was that we had a production of goods or goods priced to the extent of six billions of dollars, whereas the money paid out in the course of production was only around four billions. It is apparent that four billions of dollars in money or purchasing power, which represents all the money and all the income that all the people rich and poor alike have, cannot buy six billions of dollars worth of goods. Therefore any scheme or any proposal based upon the redistribution of the national income cannot do the job.

I contend that we shall not be on a sound basis until the amount of money put into circulation in this country is equivalent to or governed by the desirability and the capability of the people to produce goods. That was not the case in pre-war days, and if the policies still intact to-day are continued in post-war days, it will not be so then. The reverse is the situation to-day. I am referring of course to a time of peace. In peace time it is always the amount of money put into circulation which determines the amount of goods we shall have. The reverse should be the case. The amount of goods we have or the amount of production we have should determine the amount of money in circulation.

I say, therefore, that the key to the whole solution, to the solution to all the problems, lies in the restoration to parliament of its high prerogative, namely, that of creating and issuing the money of the nation. When the government has control of that prerogative, it is master of the situation. Does anyone think the old banker Rothschild was joking when he said, "Permit me to create and issue the money of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws." Was he simply joking when he said that? Of course he was not. If parliament is in possession of its most sacred prerogative, then the government is in absolute control—and not until then.

I say, therefore, that one of the major changes which ought to be brought about is the restoration to parliament of its highest prerogative, that of creating and issuing the money of the nation. Once that is done, it should be the duty of the government to use money to reflect physical facts. That is not what happened between the last war and this one. That is not happening now. Money does not reflect real facts to-day; neither did it in pre-war days.

We are told that the cost of this war is blood, sweat and tears. That is true. Which of these elements is it that the Canadian people are not providing? Canadians as a whole—in the armed forces, in the workshops, in the factories, in the mines, on the farms, behind the desks, or anywhere you wish to go —are expending their energy, or are giving their time, and are applying all their ability. The people as a whole in Canada are providing the blood, the sweat and the tears from moment to moment as this war is being fought. Therefore they are paying for the war in full from moment to moment as it is being fought. Consequently our financial policy ought to indicate that situation. The fact is that it does not. Our financial policy indicates that we are not paying as we are going. We are going into debt. That is an absolutely false situation. It is preposterous and unjust to suggest that after the people of the country have paid for their participation in the war with their blood, their sweat and their tears, they should have to pay a second time for a good part of it. There is absolutely no need for a war debt, neither is there any need for a national debt in peace time. It is only so because of a false financial policy. Our financial policy does not reflect physical facts. Once the prerogative of creating money is restored to parliament, then it is the duty of parliament to make money reflect facts.

In the use of this privilege the first objective of the government should be to see that production is stimulated to the highest desirable possible level. That is the first thing to do once the government is absolute master of the money situation. Because of the manner in which prices are established in our modern industrial set-up, the situation always arises where production is in excess of income. Prices of goods are always greater than the money paid out in the course of production. This is not because somebody is getting away with exorbitant profits. If profits were fair all the way through, if all charges entering into prices of commodities were just and sound and fair all the way through, nevertheless the condition would be as I have stated. By reason of the way in which business is transacted to-day, the natural consequence is that prices of goods coming out of any institution are always greater than the money paid out in the course of production. Consequently there is always a part of the national production which is unmonetized, which is not represented by money anywhere, in people's pockets, in savings accounts or anywhere else.

The second duty of the government should be to use this privilege to monetize that unmonetized portion of production. In normal times, before the war broke out, there was a deficiency of approximately $2,000,000,000; there were $2,000,000,000 of prices of goods, the equivalent of which did not exist in money anywhere. In the post-war period there is no reason, provided production is stimulated to the maximum, by using the increase in production machinery that we have during the war, why national production should not go up to $10,000,000,000 worth of goods. The only limit would be the capacity of the machinery of production and the desire of the people to produce.

The difference between national income and national production must be monetized. It is the duty of the government to issue to the people, either directly or indirectly, an amount of money equivalent to the difference between total income and total prices. This money can be used for national services of one kind and another, for national projects and so on; it can be supplied to the citizens, either directly or indirectly, and as a consequence our economy will be balanced. I insist that when the government uses the prerogative of creating and issuing the money of the nation as it should, our economy will be balanced and, as a consequence, many of the problems which to-day are regarded as special problems will automatically disappear.

We shall no longer talk about the returned men's problems, either of this war or the last war; we shall no longer talk about the war widows' problems; we shall no longer talk about the problems of the aged, the blind and the maimed. We shall no longer be confronted with the problem of supplying medical aid and dental care. Farmers' problems will take care of themselves once the government is in supreme control of money. The government can then make any price for any commodity, and in that way the producer of any kind of commodity will be assured a just price. The labourers' problems will disappear and, as a consequence, they will have security and will be enabled to purchase the products of industry.

One problem which is common to all the problems raised both inside and outside the house is that of relating money to physical facts. When that is done, the majority of these problems automatically disappear. They will be solved by reason of the fact that the major, fundamental and basic problem is solved. This would solve not only our internal problems, but would largely solve our international problems as well. It would remove the incentive for trade wars. Under present methods, by reason of the fact that the people of this country have never had an amount of money to buy the total production of the country, there is an incentive to export goods. Most of those goods could be consumed right here at home. The greatest potential market for Canadian production is the Canadian people. If they had an amount of purchasing power equivalent to the prices of the goods offered for sale, there would not be this drive for foreign markets, which is one of the contributing factors to the causes of war. We would distribute among our own people our own production to the limit of their desire to consume, and what would be left would be a genuine unusable surplus, a surplus which the people could not use. That would be something which could be legitimately traded for anything that we desired from the outside.

I suggest that if the fundamentals to which I have referred are established, we shall not only have economic security in this country in the post-war period, we shall also maintain and preserve our individual freedom. I should have liked to elaborate somewhat extensively the philosophies of some of the proposals which are being made to-day, but my time is about up and I shall simply say these words in conclusion. All the proposals that are put forth to-day as a solution or as a programme for our post-war days can, I believe, be classified in two classes. They have as their objective making either the people supreme or the state supreme. Some of them may lean slightly in one direction or the other, but all the proposals that are made can be classified in these two classes. I insist that we want a post-war period in which the people are supreme, in which the state is the servant of the people, not the reverse. Democracy stands for decentralization; totalitarianism stands for centralization. Any proposal that tends toward centralization of power is a repudiation and negation of democracy. We want decentralization. Let us, when we examine the proposals that are made, try to discover into which one of these two categories they fit. When this war is over, we are going to have, as a consequence of the peace terms we draw up and the proposals we implement, either a supreme state or a supreme people. If we establish and carry out the fundamentals to which I have referred, we shall have an economic set-up in which we may have economic security as well as individual liberty.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to compliment the government upon the splendid way in which they have handled the problem of price control. During the last war prices were allowed to go to extremes, and it was very difficult to arrive at proper valuations. I must say, however, that at the present time I am receiving many representations from farmers and farmer organizations in my constituency urging that the price of cattle be raised to some extent, but not to any excessively high level. Our farmers bought their cattle on the understanding that the Canadian price would be on a parity with the United States price. They have their cattle, and plenty of food on the farm for those cattle, but the Canadian price is not sufficiently high to guard the farmer against loss. Many of these cattle cost more than 11 cents a pound. It would be satisfactory if the price were raised to 12 or 12½ or even 13 cents. Our farmers would then sell a great portion of their cattle.

A report has been spread abroad that there is a scarcity of cattle in this country. I believe that report is false. I know of hundreds of stables which are full of choice cattle. They are not being sold by our farmers because they are not prepared to take a loss. They believe that they have what they consider a promise from this government that they would receive a price equal to the United States price. There is an embargo on Canadian cattle going to the United States, but it was understood that the Canadian price would be maintained on a level with the United States price and our farmers have bought their cattle on that understanding. Naturally to-day they are disappointed at the Canadian price. Many of them have written to me urging that the price be raised, and I think it is only right that I should bring this matter to the attention of the government. If nothing is done, these cattle will be thrown on the market when spring comes, and the market will be flooded with cattle. We should give the farmers some encouragement to produce, particularly because at the close of this war the food supplies which are available among the united nations will be a power which we can use in the peace negotiations. There are many Esaus in the world, and there will be many starving nations which will want food supplies. Consequently it will be realized that food supplies may play a great part in the peace negotiations.

Our farmers are deserving of consideration, and I think we should be careful not to shut out our cattle entirely from the United States. It will be remembered that a few years ago Mexico was shipping three times as many cattle to the United States as was Canada. I took the matter up with the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Euler, and asked him so to arrange matters that Canada and Mexico would ship cattle into the United States in the ratio of their respective imports from that country. Mr. Euler sent two men to Washington, and within four days he rose in his place in the house and stated that he wished to advise the hon. member for Wellington North that Canada's allocation of cattle to be shipped to the United States market was to be in proportion to our imports from that country. As a result of that agreement we shipped into the United States that year three times as many cattle as we did the year before, and that arrangement continued in effect until the present embargo was imposed.

It is a serious thing, Mr. Speaker, to close any avenue of trade and commerce.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIR: I am glad to hear that coming from the old Conservative party. I should not like to see the Liberal party adopt a policy of restricting trade and commerce, because trade and commerce is the great thing to keep any nation on its feet.

I trust that the representations which have been made by the farmers of my constituency will be given consideration by the government. They believe that some form of undertaking has been given by the government with respect to the price of Canadian cattle.

Moreover, I should like to see the control of our cattle trade put into the hands of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He may have his faults; indeed he has often been criticized in my district, but I have more confidence in him that I have in a bank manager. I am always afraid of a bank manager and will keep away from him in business affairs. I think it would be well for us to develop closer relations between Canada and the United States because we are both fighting in the same cause, and it should be possible to arrange for parity between the price of Canadian and that of United States cattle. Then our cattle would flow freely on to the market; the Canadian farmer would be on an equal footing with the United States farmer as far as price is concerned, and the Canadian farmer would win out every time because we have better soil, better cattle and better farmers. Therefore I hope that the government will give these representations its serious consideration. There is a real necessity for raising the price of Canadian cattle, and there is the further fact that when spring comes, if nothing is done in the meantime to raise the price to our farmers, Canadian cattle from east and west will be thrown on to the market. What will happen then to the price?

The packers spread the report that there was a scarcity of beef. Why, Mr. Speaker, the country is full of cattle, and the sooner we realize that the better. It would not hurt the Canadian people if a few of our Canadian cattle went over to the United States side. Those cattle would have to be paid for in United States funds, and we would still have a fair supply of Canadian cattle left to meet the demands of this country.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the speech from the throne I certainly realized that there is a tremendous number of problems which we must begin to tackle at the present time and that there is a great deal of planning to do; but reading the speech over again, I thought from what I knew of conditions in western Canada that there were some things which I should like to bring to the attention of this house which are far more urgent than any planning for future security. After all is said and done, the majority of us in this house realize that there are many things which have yet to be done before we can have any right to feel that victory is secure for us. A tremendous number of things must yet be done to ensure that victory, and in the doing of them we can lay the foundations for the post-war years. I am in agreement with planning; but planning, that is in an academic way, will fall far short of what will be required when the time comes to put those plans into effect, unless while the war is continuing we lay the foundation, the economic basis, so that we shall have something substantial upon which to work. It is because I believe this that I wish to devote the main part of what I have to say to the question of the fight on the food front.

Before I come to that, there is one thing I wish to mention in passing which came to my attention as I listened to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Toward the end of his speech he mentioned the various categories or types of people whom he hoped to see as representatives in this chamber in the years to come. He mentioned labour and the farmers; he referred specifically to returned men and hoped that many of them would have seats in this house to help with future legislation. He then mentioned men with broad human sympathies. But he never mentioned anything about the women.

I cannot let that pass. I believe that every hon. member and every person in Canada will acknowledge that during these war years the women of this country have proved by their deeds what capable people they are. They have gone into practically every one of the industries which are vital to war production. They have undertaken heavy physical labour. They have also taken on types of work requiring executive ability and the kind of ability which is of the brain and not so much physical. In view of these facts, I hope that the omission to which I have referred in the Prime Minister's speech the other evening was not intentional but occurred merely because he failed for the moment to think; for when we realize what women have done, are doing and will continue to do to fight for the preservation of democracy and for Canada, all must agree that they have a place among legislators to decide on the issues of peace and war, to see to it that this country in post-war years has those things which the people need.

As I have said, what I wish to speak about mainly is the fight on the food front. It was stated in this chamber, I believe last session by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), that with regard to the question of supplying men, materials or food, he would not like to place any one of them in the first position; that men, armaments and materials of war, and food, all three of them, are so tremendously important that none can be considered before the others. At the present time the position of the people who are fighting on our food front is receiving less consideration than any other branch of our war effort. During the recess I spent possibly about a week in my own home; the rest of the time I spent in the rural areas among the farming people of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and during that period I learned much at first hand as to the ability of our farm people to put up the fight which they want to make on their particular front.

Our job to-day in this house is to tackle immediate problems as they come up; that is the first job of legislators during a period of war, and I fail to see why the speech from the throne did not mention specifically this matter of the fight on the food front. I will not call it just an agricultural problem. Were I to do so, it might bring up in the minds of many hon. members something of a rather painful nature. It is rather like a boil on the neck; it has come up so much during the years of depression that now, in war-time, many hon. members think of agriculture, as they did in the past, as something which is painful because it is difficult. I speak of it as the fight on the food front to bring it before this house as a war emergency; for that is what it is. We are asked to tackle in a realistic manner the problem of increasing food supplies; and if we do so in the way in which we have tackled the problem of industrial development for war needs, not only will it aid in the winning of the war, but the measures we introduce to increase food production will lay the foundation of economic security for our farming people in the post-war years. We shall have a structure upon which we can plan. Unless the economic security of our farming people is made possible now, all the plans that are made will tumble about our ears like a pack of cards in the years after the war.

The question of the fight on the food front is not a political question; it is an issue of national importance. I am not bringing it forward because I am an opposition member and wish to use this material, so to speak, to hurl at the government because I sit among the opposition. It is a question which should command the interest and understanding of hon. members of all parties; and the speech of this afternoon of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) shows that it is a subject which hon. members on all sides are going to ponder more and more.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has expressed the hope that this particular debate will soon finish so that he can bring before us some financial bills. I can understand his anxiety to attend to those matters; but let me point out that agriculture will not wait, either, because agriculture and the fight on the food front depend upon the seasons of the year. The matter of increasing the production of food and stock and of ensuring that the maximum acreage of land is under cultivation this year has to be attended to before farmers get out with their ploughs in the spring. The question of stock increase is particularly important in the spring of the year. Whatever we are hoping to do to fulfil the quotas which have been set for us must be done very soon. That is why I am anxious to bring before the house certain points with regard to this fight on the food front.

The increasing tempo of the allied offensive leads all of us to hope that in the very near future we shall be able to foresee the ultimate victory—the sooner the better. But in considering the question of food increases we must remember that the achievement of military victory does not mean that we can sit back with a feeling that there will then be no further need of these increases. With the winning of victory in the field, demands for food and breeding stock for the countries of Europe will necessitate the increasing of our supplies many, many times.

What we have to do is to consider right here and now the problem of laying a correct basis for what we believe, and, in my opinion, properly believe, will be the necessity for increased food production over a period of many years. After all, we have a stupendous task. Last year we were fortunate in that we had the cooperation, shall I say, of nature. We had a year of bountiful rainfall, a year in which the production of crops was outstanding. But what basis have we for believing that the coming season will be as generous to us? Therefore we have to see to it now, in the early part of the year, that every possible piece of machinery, every single acre of land, and every animal are used and are ready for increased production during the coming season.

During the weeks and months I spent in Saskatchewan and Alberta, in very close contact with the farming people, I came to the conclusion that it was absolutely impossible for one to feel the degree of optimism which has been expressed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The Minister of Agriculture himself, speaking recently in Saskatchewan, stated, as reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 16, 1943:

> There are sufficient reserves of man-power on Saskatchewan farms to make possible the increased production of hogs, cattle, butter and eggs which the government is seeking in this province this year.

I do not know of any people; I do not know of any section of the Canadian people who are working longer hours than are the farmers in western Canada. I do not know of any people who are striving more than they are to reach the production goals which have been set before them; and yet, after this close contact with the people, I fail to see how, under existing conditions, they are going to be able to reach those goals.

It is all very well for the Minister of Agriculture to be optimistic, but I must tell the members of this house that our farming people to-day are feeling a sense of frustration on account of their inability to reach those production goals for lack of that assistance which they need. To say that they are dissatisfied is to put it very mildly. In fact, I doubt very much if I could possibly express in parliamentary language the deep disgust of the farmers. I remember, as everyone does, the marvellous and stirring effect of the words of Mr. Churchill when he said, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job." The farmers of western Canada to-day are saying the same thing to the government of Canada, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job." At present, however, they are lacking the various things they need to give them an opportunity to step up production, and for that reason they consider that this one job of the great war service which they could render has fallen far short of what they would like it to be.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mrs. NIELSEN: To continue, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in disagreement with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) again, upon the question of which type of farm we can look to for our increases in production. In one of his speeches I believe he drew an imaginary line across Saskatchewan and said that to the south of that line, where there are many of the larger farms, he expected to see large increases, particularly in live stock. I am willing to admit that these days in the provinces of the west there are many farms which still are not producing the maximum of which the land is capable, but this is so for various reasons. I think the Minister of Agriculture, in expecting increases in production on the larger farms, will find that lack of labour on those farms may, in some instances, bring about some curtailment of the production of live stock, instead of increases. It is on the smaller farms which stretch over the northern parts of the province that we have had great increases in the past and, I believe, can see further increases in the future.

The trouble, of course, is that the farmers are cautious. Owing to the fact that there is uncertainty in connection with prices, and no guarantee as to what the future may bring, many farmers hesitate to increase production even if they could do so, because in the past they have had some sad experiences. On many of the smaller farms we find that lack of ready cash with which to increase herds is preventing an increase in production. These farms lack the necessary machinery; they lack the foundation stock, and of course they also face a labour shortage. I do not think I have to remind hon. members that there has been a great exodus of people from the prairie provinces. That is an epic story, which perhaps some day will be written. The harvest of last year was brought in only because we were able to get workers from eastern Canada, and because we had the old grandfathers and grandmothers and the school children out in the field. It is doubtful whether next year we shall have that supply of extra labour from eastern Canada, and therefore we have an extra problem in that regard.

What is really happening in those western provinces to-day? During the last few months, and in fact at the present time, valuable breeding stock has been or is being slaughtered, chiefly because of the lack of help but also because of the need of ready cash. Many of these farmers have wheat in their bins, but they have no cash, and therefore they are unable to meet their operational and living expenses. Therefore they have to forfeit some young heifers or other young stock in order to find the cash they need in order to carry on. There are people on many farms who would like to buy an extra milch cow which their neighbour has to sell, but they also lack the cash with which to do so. This year, in Saskatchewan particularly, we are asked for an increase of seventy per cent over last year's hog production, a tremendous increase. The fact is that we must realize that last year we lacked the proper accommodation on our farms for the increased number of hogs we then had. There was disease because in many instances our farmers lacked the cash with which to buy the necessary vaccines. I believe one of the field representatives of the provincial government stated that last year we lost forty per cent of the young hogs in Saskatchewan through disease, and that loss could have been prevented. Then we find that machinery in the west is breaking down, following the years of drought, depression and low prices. The machinery problem was acute even before war commenced; farmers were not able to keep their machines in repair or to buy new machines. To-day we find that there is a shortage of blacksmithing and blacksmithing repairs. High prices and the present regulations governing new machinery sales are penalizing some of our smaller farmers. Then, of course, cash orders are usually honoured first, so that the man who can pay only by instalments is penalized in this manner also.

I should like to mention one matter in particular with regard to industry in western Canada which I think is pertinent to the question of agriculture. I refer to the matter of distilleries. Before too long I should like to hear from the responsible ministers why we have not as yet any distilleries built and functioning in the western provinces. They are going ahead with distilleries in the United States; on the prairies of the western states huge plants are being constructed. I am informed that this government already has under construction at Sarnia a large plant for the manufacture of synthetic alcohol, and I am further told that this plant is to use oil as the base. This oil will have to be brought from Colombia or some other place in South America by tanker. I understand further that a plant using oil for the manufacture of synthetic alcohol takes about eighteen months to build and equip. That is twice as long as it takes to build and equip a plant for the manufacture of synthetic alcohol from grain. I am also given to understand that the cost of building and equipping one of these plants such as we have at Sarnia is twice that of building a distillery. What I should like to know is this. Why was this huge plant built at Sarnia instead of distilleries being built in the western provinces? Who is going to have this plant at Sarnia after the war is over? Is it going to revert to some of the great oil interests of this country, so that in addition to having a monopoly on oil they will also have a monopoly on synthetic alcohol and the manufacture of synthetic rubber? I am told that the mash which is left after the distillery has extracted the alcohol lacks a certain amount of starch but is very rich in vitamins and therefore makes a better feed for cattle and live stock than the original grain. Consequently, even from that point of view it would have been more advisable for the sake of the war effort and for the sake of speed and efficiency to build distilleries in the west instead of building this huge plant at Sarnia. As far as I can see, the use of alcohol in post-war years is going to be very important. In connection with the manufacture of plastics, particularly, alcohol is an essential ingredient. If some of these giant distilleries had been erected in western Canada we would have had a basis for the manufacture of plastics. We in the west have lacked industries in the past, and here was a base upon which we could have built something for the future. Apparently, however, we are not to have it. It appears to be nothing more or less than that once again the people of western Canada have been sold down the river, that private interests have once more had the ear of this government instead of considering the needs of our western people, both now and in the years following the war.

Then I cannot understand why, when various farm bodies in this country have brought forward proposals with regard to increasing production, those proposals apparently should be disregarded by the government. What is the good of farmers having elected, representative bodies to bring forward proposals if governments do not pay any attention to them? We have had proposals advanced by the federation of agriculture, by the wheat pool and others, but apparently they have not succeeded in gaining the attention of the government. During the last recess I spent my time among the farming people of the prairies. There have been numerous conferences and gatherings of farm people, because the farmers themselves are only too anxious and willing to make their contribution to increased production. But as I said before they lack the facilities. At these conferences there has been very wide, broad discussion as to what the farming people need, and this evening I want to lay before the members of the house not my opinion as to what it is necessary to give the farmers of this country in order that they may have an opportunity to produce what is needed, but rather the suggestions which have been brought forward by the farmers themselves. Goodness knows, if anybody knows what is needed, they should know. With regard to their suggestions in connection with lack of labour and shortage of man-power, some hon. members may consider their proposals are somewhat drastic. But possibly we have come to the time when this man-power shortage can be solved only by the taking of drastic measures.

The first proposal, for the three western prairie provinces, is that for the time being and for some months ahead all voluntary enlistments be stopped.

The second, that the draft itself be postponed until at least the month of June, when work in connection with seeding operations is completed.

The third, that an arrangement be made during the season when help is greatly needed, particularly in the fall for harvesting operations, so that men who are taking their basic training can go to the fields and work under military discipline. Instead of doing their physical jerks three times a day, stretching their arms and touching their toes, I suggest that they be allowed to do stooking. That would limber up their muscles just as well, and they could do it under military discipline. In that way there would be established a feeling between the farmers and the forces that they were doing work of national importance which has to be done.

The fourth has reference to the women's land army. That has already been mentioned by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I am of opinion and have been for some time—in fact I believe I mentioned it last year when I spoke—that women can be very effective on farms. I think a small number of women could start, first of all, to see how efficient they would prove to be. It would be possible to get from farmers an estimate of how many would be willing to take women on their farms. In many instances these women would not have to be trained. They would be well qualified to drive tractors or trucks, or to milk cows or feed poultry. There might be the necessity of giving some of them a few weeks training. The government would equip them with strong footwear, breeches and a good stout coat. There is no reason why these land girls could not prove as beneficial and as efficient as the land women have proved in other countries.

Again—and this, I would remind the house, is from the farmers themselves—they consider that on many farms where the whole family has to be enlisted in farm work, where the son, the daughter and the wife go out and do outside work, a cost of living bonus should be paid not only to all agricultural labour but to sons, daughters and wives of farmers who can prove that they put in so many hours of work each day outside in the fields.

Then, with regard to the encouragement needed to producers to get into production, I have one or two observations to make. First of all, I must say I read in the press this afternoon that it is quite possible we may have a food ministry. I am satisfied that this will go some way toward helping the present situation. In any event, removal of control of prices on agricultural products from the war-time prices and trade board is an essential procedure. There should be an upward trend of prices toward parity. Not only that, but legislation should be brought down in this House of Commons ensuring over a period of years, or at least for one or two years into the future, a definite price standard or level, so that the farmers may know what to expect.

Then, there is the question of small loans for the smaller farmers. I have been on farms where, for lack of a small amount of cash, farmers who had plenty of feed did not have money to buy an extra cow or two to milk, or did not have money to buy concrete to build a hog-pen so that they could increase their hog production. With a little money women could go into the raising of poultry so that they could sell eggs. And, remember, if we went into poultry raising on a greater scale we would be helping out the beef shortage we are likely to encounter soon. For lack of cash on many thousands of farms production, which might otherwise be made possible, is going to be impeded.

These loans need not be large. I believe $200 or $300 might be as much as any farmer would want. When we come to consider it, the loans could be made on the land. I believe these loans should be interest free. We could lend $200 or $300 each to a hundred thousand of our farmers, and still the aggregate sum would be roughly only two per cent or three per cent of what has been taken from our national income to help speed up industrial production. The cost itself relatively is really very small. Small loans would be used for building up stock, for payments in connection with the operational expenses, so that farmers would not have to sell the stock they now have in order to take care of their living expenses.

I do not think the farmers in the west are wanting any special sectional interest with regard to machinery, but they are expecting that machinery requirements will be taken care of better than they were last year. There is no doubt an understanding on the part of many hon. members that lack of repairs was responsible for the break-down in our farming operations last year, and that this is why so many stooks to-day lie underneath the snow. Possibly an increase in the quota of repairs will be necessary, if we have as bountiful a crop as we had last year, and if we have a large acreage of coarse grains seeded this spring.

I believe that the matter of lower prices for farm machinery is something which must be tackled by the wartime prices and trade board, or whoever is responsible. I say that because present prices of farm machinery are beyond the reach of the small farmer, even though by custom work he put such machinery to full time use.

We shall have to have more cooperation among the farmers, and I know they are going to be willing to give that cooperation. They are going to pool their machinery, and work as they worked in the early days, sharing the machinery which is available. They will go a long way toward cooperating with this government and do everything within their power, as long as the government will give them the little bit of assistance they so desperately need.

As far as increase in hog production is concerned, I believe that there, again, loans would do a great deal toward helping the situation. Some assistance must be given by the government to the small farmer in connection with supplying free vaccines, so that these farmers may not have the loss from diseases that they had last year. Then, too, farmers need greater grading supervision for cattle, hogs, cream, eggs and poultry. I think we should have a youth-training plan to include courses in dairying, poultry-raising and so on, so that our young people on the farm may grow up competent, and may be able to make the greatest possible production in their various fields.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

I find it is almost impossible to go into great detail in the forty minutes allowed. It is impossible to discuss in detail the many improvements necessary for the farmer. I have seen in the press, however, that provincial governments are assisting in the setting up of small farm committees, and I would recommend that the federal government should do everything within its power to assist in this idea of the setting up of those committees. It is not a bit of use for the farmers to set up committees and take stock of what is needed in their own district unless they can have the assurance that the federal government will listen to their needs, and will supplement what is needed in the districts concerned, as far as supplies, stock, machinery and other materials are concerned. If they had the assurance that the federal government would do that, I believe there could be built up a scheme of cooperation between farmer and government which would result in an encouraging increase in production.

As I said before, this is a detailed matter, and something which cannot be covered by any blanket scheme. Schemes such as we have had in the past such as bonuses for the reduction of wheat acreage and for increases in the production of coarse grains do not give the assistance which is needed. That assistance is required in various ways on the smaller farms. I need not remind hon. members of the old rhyme about the lack of a horseshoe nail resulting in the lack of a shoe, the lack of a horse, the lack of a man, and finally the loss of a battle and a nation. What is the use of our planning a war effort as a nation, if any one of those branches in the war effort is falling short. If we fall short on the food front, then that shortage is going to damage the national effort of Canada all the way along. We must pay attention to the needs of our farm people. They are not asking for special attention; they are not asking for anything for their own salvation; they are asking only for an opportunity to get out and produce in a fair and decent way that which is needed.

If this government will give the necessary attention to the details, then I consider that there will be an opportunity not only to fulfil the quotas but to have on our farms in western Canada the right kind of security and happiness instead of frustration. Our farming people will then know that they are able to make a contribution worthy of them. Without these small details being attended to, we shall have cattle being slaughtered when they should not be slaughtered; we shall have fewer hogs; we shall have honey not collected; we shall have sheep flocks not being started; we shall have less feed grain, fewer eggs, poultry and so on. It is a question of paying attention to the details in connection with all these smaller interests. If that is done, I feel that the farmers of western Canada not only will fulfil what is expected of them but will find that security and that basis for post-war planning which is so necessary. All they are asking is that they shall be given an opportunity to fight as they want to fight. In other words, they are saying to the government, as I said before, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job".

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take up a few minutes of the time of the house because I believe I have something to say. First of all, I should like to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I consider him a Christian gentleman, and that is about the highest tribute one can pay to a man. In my imagination I see the Elijah of the past and the Elisha of the future travelling to the Jordan of the Winnipeg convention. I come back to the house and I find a pleasant thing. I saw that Elijah had cast his mantle and allowed it to fall on the shoulders of the youthful Elisha. I can see him with that mantle striking out into the future to help the common people of Canada. I congratulate the Conservative party upon having these two leaders, because they are really one.

The speech from the throne interested me considerably. The first thing I want to speak about is something that I was determined to bring before this house, namely, that there should be some form of health insurance, whether it is called state medicine or any other name. About six years ago I introduced a resolution into this house, and I did my best to have it agreed to. I was supported by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), but I am sorry to say that there were four medical members of this house who opposed the resolution. The next year they had changed their minds, because three of them did not speak while the other one supported it.

I find now that the Canadian medical association is in favour of some form of health insurance. I should like to refer to the words of my old friend, Doctor Gordon S. Fahrni, who was president of the Canadian medical association last year. A year ago he said that there were two very good arguments why health insurance in some form should be provided in Canada. One was the sense of security which would be given to the people during the post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation, and the second was the fact that if the war continued for many more years we would find ourselves under a bureaucratic rather than a democratic form of government. He told the medical association that health insurance in some form was coming and that they should get behind it. The Canadian medical association met again in Ottawa on January 19, 1943, and they passed unanimously the following resolution:

1. The Canadian medical association approves the adoption of the principle of health insurance.

2. The Canadian medical association favours a plan of health insurance which will secure the development and provision of the highest standard of health services, preventive and curative, if such plan be fair both to the insured and to all those rendering the services.

It is a fine thing to know that now the government is bringing forward some form of health insurance. The public is behind it, especially the farmers. If anyone has suffered during the past years because of a lack of medical service it is our farmers. It was not those who were on relief; it was those who come in between, the men who would rather do without medical treatment than put their wives and families into debt.

They have many fine leaders in Ontario who are not afraid to speak their minds, but I was a little disappointed when one leader found fault with the administration of the dependents' allowance board in Ottawa. When I heard that, my dander was up. I do not think this board warrants criticism of that kind. I have sent a great many requests to them, and I have yet to be treated other than courteously. I have always been given splendid service. When the board was organized Mr. MacNamara put it on a sound basis, and I want to pay my tribute to the efficiency of that board.

I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the speeches he has been making. I would commend to hon. members to my left the speech which the Prime Minister made to the congress of labour in Toronto. I think we all realize that he is a leader of the first water. He spoke of the new order, and I believe he meant it when he said that it must be built on a sound foundation. He continued:

The new order must be based on faith, leading to cooperation between the parties in industries and to cooperation among the nations of the world. The new order must be based on human rights; not on the rights of property, privilege or position. The new order must be a world order. It must be governed by a universal rule of law.

It will be seen that this new order is tempered with mercy, whereas the new order in Germany is based on inequality. I know hon. members will expect me to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his radio address on temperance. I think he was most sensible and showed the clergy of Canada how they should act. If they would give the leadership that the Prime Minister of Canada gave, they will be leading in the right direction. I commend the reading of that speech to hon. members.

I should like to say a word about Fort William. The Department of National Defence hit us rather hard this year when they took away our fine skating rink to make it into an armoury. However, the sports and athletes of Fort William are not to be beaten. They have made other skating rinks, and hockey games are being played every night all over the city. After the war they will be able to provide the finest of hockey players for the rest of Canada and the United States. I would remind the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that there is a petition piled high in the Department of Public Works asking for an armoury. But we did not get it, and I did not push for it any harder than I ought to in this house.

I should like to thank the Department of Public Works, the minister and his officials, also the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and his officials, for allowing us to use the basement of the new post office for a dry canteen. It was taken over by a group of unselfish women; a lot of money has been spent on it, and it is at present the best used place at the head of the lakes. It is all right to have enough to wet one's whistle with, when you wet it right. This dry canteen is now in difficulties because, while the building is fireproof, these young men and young women are denied the right to dance.

I should like to mention a few of the things that we have at the head of the lakes. We have farmers there who are just a little bit restless owing to lack of farm help. Some of them have had to sell out on that account. I think it should be made perfectly clear to the farmers of Canada that any man who is essential to the work of the farm will be left on the farm. I know that the registrars of the selective boards are doing a great job and that it is their duty to find men for the armed forces, but men are also essential to carry on agriculture.

The resources we have at the head of the lakes are astounding. The other night I heard an address by a specialist of the Great Lakes Pulp and Paper company, and he convinced me that if the pulp and paper resources of the Thunder Bay district were utilized to the full they would provide work for everybody in the district and for far more than that. As a result of recent scientific discoveries, wood and pulp are taking the place of steel, and the gentleman who gave this addressed convinced me that we had enough resources in the timber limits of the Thunder Bay district to keep everybody working.

Our city is now organized for the reconstruction period that will come after the war. At the head of the lakes we have also shipping, and mining, and I should like to read now a resolution from the city of Fort William which was pressed home. It is as follows:

That the attention of the provincial and dominion governments be again drawn to the fact that a vast deposit of nickel and other valuable minerals is being allowed to lie undeveloped near Shebandowan lake in the district of Thunder Bay and that this property is practically untaxed.

This council feels that the owners should be required to develop this ore deposit or in default of this, the government should have thorough tests made of the ores and arrangements made to have same put into channels of production for the benefit of the united nations in this struggle.

West of Fort William we have perhaps the most outstanding mining area in the whole Dominion of Canada, and we are grateful to know that the "Go" signal has been given by both the provincial government and the dominion government to the Steep Rock mine. This is perhaps the finest source of hematite ore that there is in Canada. According to Judge McKay and Julian G. Cross, an eminent mining engineer, our iron ore apart from nickel and other types of ore at the head of the lakes, if developed, would make the whole Dominion of Canada boom.

I should like now to say a word to the men in Canada who I think have been wronged by the war. There is no group of men who have been harder hit by the war than the commercial travellers. One of them came to me and told me that he took out a life insurance policy two years ago, paying a premium of $501, but at the end of the second year he had to let his policy lapse because the sales of the article he was selling had been so drastically curtailed. That insurance policy had cost him $1,002, and all he received from the company when the policy lapsed was $235. In two years the insurance company made out of that commercial traveller $767. I have apprised the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) of the facts of this case. I do not think any insurance company should be allowed to get away with that sort of thing; I care not whether they contribute to the victory loans or anything else. It is practically taking away what does not belong to them.

I should like to speak for half an hour on the need for extending the old age pension, but I am sure that this subject will be well taken care of by others. A government like ours which has fathered the old age pension, will surely see to it, when it knows that public opinion is behind it, that the present old age pension of $20 a month is increased to something like $30 a month, so that those old people who through sickness or misfortune or perhaps even through their own neglect have been unable to provide for their own old age, will be assured of enough to eat and a place to sleep in their declining years.

I come now to the chief reason why I wanted to speak to-night. No government in Canada has done more for labour than this government. I supported vigorously not very long ago a law brought in by the late Minister of Justice giving labour men the right to organize and making it a crime to dismiss workers for belonging to a union. Men should have the right to organize if they are citizens of Canada, but if they are not citizens of Canada I think they should keep quiet until they become naturalized. I have been interested in labour practically all my life. I take second place to no man in this house or outside in being interested in the man who toils. I know what he feels like when he works for ten or fifteen cents an hour for perhaps ten or twelve hours a day. I know what he feels like when he spends his money foolishly or spends it in a way that does not bring in the results he expected. But just the same I say that every man needs a job; when he gets a job he needs to put a day's work into it, and I think labour on the whole is ready to do that. I heard a labour leader say at the head of the lakes the other day: "We should have no strikes in Canada now." He also said: "We should have no underpaid workers in Canada now." I know of a plant at the head of the lakes where at one time some men were working for thirty-five cents an hour while others were getting two dollars an hour. I gave my criticism to a member of that union. To-day the lowest-paid man in that industry receives fifty-seven cents an hour. I say that every man has a right to a living wage. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) thoroughly agrees with me, and that is why I am going to support him.

In this matter we need cooperation. I hope the government will bring in legislation making it compulsory that representatives of the workers, the management and the directors shall have meetings to forward cooperation. I have attended meetings of this kind in one industry at the head of the lakes, and I learned a great deal. But when a man who is head of a corporation says, "I am not here in the interests of labour, of the worker; I am here to make money for the people who have their money invested", that man in my opinion is not fit to lead men; he is simply a tool. Labour, management and capital need to practise the golden rule, so that, as the Prime Minister said, quoting President F. Cyril James, there will be a levelling up as well as a levelling down.

Here I should like to interject that I have been greatly disappointed to learn that men working for the Canadian Pacific Railway have been removed when they had only two months to go before being entitled to pension. They have received no pension, and although they might be taken back and work for two more years it would make no difference in this respect. There should be some way whereby, when a man works until two months before entitlement to pension, he should receive part of it.

I am also of opinion that a man and a woman doing the same work should get the same pay. To give the man more money is a mere relic of the system under which man lorded it over the weaker sex.

I wish now to make some reference to the Minister of Labour. I suggested to the Prime Minister that he should get an outstanding labour man to represent labour in the cabinet. He told us the other day definitely that he tried to get Tom Moore. When he could not get Mr. Moore he took Mr. Moore's advice, and we have the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell. Before I have finished I shall show the house that the Prime Minister did not make much of a mistake.

History shows us that some men run along for quite a time before they encounter difficulties; but the greatest leaders of the past and even of to-day are men who have had the experience of being pretty well hounded out of office. Take that great Irishman of whom all of us who love a fight like to think, the Duke of Wellington, who relieved Europe of the scourge of Bonaparte. When Wellington became Prime Minister of England, because he did not pass legislation which suited certain classes they stoned him in the streets of London, broke the windows of his carriage, and tore his horses away. Yet the great Wellington came back. I think of another man whom nobody to-day would dare to call a second-rater. Some of us remember that when Winston Churchill first entered the House of Commons he was well recommended, but it was not very long before he became just a lone wolf. The Liberals did not want him; the Conservatives did not want him, and certainly labour did not want him. But Churchill had a message for the nation and the world, and to-day he is doing a great job. I would say to the Minister of Labour, "Let the other fellow do the worrying. You stick to your job; look after the man who toils, and if you do, some day the sails will flap the other way and you will find that the men who are most against you will be right on your side."

I do not agree with those who say that all labour in Canada wants the resignation of the Minister of Labour. That is not according to my information. I find this report in a Winnipeg paper:

Stand of Mitchell praised by McBride

Approving the stand taken by Canada's Minister of Labour, Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, in the recent controversy regarding the operation of selective service in Canada, J. L. McBride, business manager of the Electrical Workers' Union, to-day forwarded a wire to Mr. Mitchell. It read:

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell,
Minister of Labour, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Permit me to congratulate you for your recent actions. Had Elliott Little been permitted to carry out his theory of selective service the efforts to place men in suitable employment by business managers of labour organizations and even labour unions themselves, would be nullified. Take little notice of the gushes from Bengough, Mosher, Swailes, Chapel and others who do not seem to understand the situation. Carry on, Mr. Minister.

J. L. McBride, business manager,
Electrical Workers' Union.

Let me tell hon. members who Mr. McBride is. Jack McBride is known in Winnipeg and was known to me before I left that city, my second home. He is one of the oldest trade unionists in Winnipeg, and, for that matter in Canada. He is an officer of the International Grand Lodge of Electricians, as well as being business agent of the local. As far back as 1918, at least, he was their business agent. He is the labour member of the workmen's compensation board, having been appointed by Mr. Bracken.

When I think of labour leadership to-day, I contrast the lot of some men working for fifty-five and fifty-seven cents an hour with the position of leaders of labour in the United States who receive bigger salaries than that of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Robert Levitt, general secretary of the United Mine Workers of America, district 18, Western Canada, gets $7,500.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, $20,000 a year and expenses.

Philip Murray, president of the Committee of Industrial Organization of America, $20,000 and expenses.

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, $25,000 and expenses.

Caesar Petrillo, Chicago, gets $25,000 a year as president of the Chicago local of the American Federation of Musicians and another $20,000 as president of the American Federation of Musicians, national body.

He plays a great tune, and they pay for it. I think that, when the leaders of our labour organizations can receive from the toilers of Canada and the United States from twenty to forty-five thousand dollars a year, they should practise what they preach and share up with those at the bottom.

The chief objection to the present Minister of Labour comes from C. H. Millard, national president for Canada of the Committee of Industrial Organization. It is a rather peculiar thing that he is candidate in York West for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation for the next Ontario provincial election. I am not going to labour that, though I may have something to say about it later on.

Who is this Minister of Labour? When the minister came into this house he had a record behind him, and that record is still unsullied. Here it is:

Financial secretary, local 105, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 1919.

Secretary, local 105, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 1920.

Delegate, Hamilton Union Labour League, 1920.

Delegate for a number of years to Hamilton District Trades and Labour Council. President (two terms) and secretary (twenty-two terms) of Hamilton District Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 1924.

Member, Ontario executive board, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 1924.

Chairman, Ontario executive board, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 1925-31 inclusive.

Secretary, Ontario executive board, International Union of Operating Engineers, 1924-36.

Member, Institute International Affairs.

Member, Canadian Political Science Association.

Delegate to conventions of Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, 1919-36, serving as chairman or member of various committees.

Appointed by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada to serve on a special committee on workmen's compensation, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Gideon Robertson, Edmonton, 1928.

Served on a special committee of the Trades and Labour Congress Railroad Brotherhood in preparation of case submitted to Chief Justice Middleton acting as a royal commissioner on workmen's compensation.

Chairman or member of grievance committee, Dominion Power and Transmission Company and Hydro-Electric Commission, 1919-29.

Financial secretary, International Union of Operating Engineers (one year).

Delegate and member of committees of International Conventions Union of Operating Engineers, 1924-30.

Secretary, Hamilton Cooperative Creameries and prime mover in its organization.

Delegate to the British Trade Union Congress, representing Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Brighton, England, 1933.

Delegate to International Federation of Trade Unions, representing Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Brussels, Belgium (served on a number of commissions appointed by this body).

Visited Russia on the invitation of and as a member of a trade union delegation, 1935.

Visited Poland, Germany, France and Holland in 1935, studying the labour movements and the general conditions in these countries.

Alderman, city of Hamilton for three years.

Member of the Hamilton Board of Education one year. Resigned owing to duties in Ottawa as director of labour transference.

Member of Board of Governors, Hamilton General Hospitals, 1928-37. Resigned owing to duties in Ottawa.

Member of the House of Commons, 1930-35.

Perhaps this is where he made a mistake. He did not line himself up with anyone. He wanted to be an independent labour man and that he was, and that he remained. He was president and secretary of the central branch, Independent Labour Party of Hamilton. He was secretary of the Independent Labour Party of Ontario for a number of years, and at the request of the late Hon. Norman Rogers, a former Minister of Labour, he served on a special committee to investigate relief camps from November 28, 1935, to March 20, 1936. He was director of labour transference from 1936 to 1939, when the camps were demobilized, transferring men to railways, farm work and other employment, and he also negotiated agreements with all the provincial governments.

In this connection I met him, and I formed my opinion as a man with, I believe, fair judgment and with a bias toward the man who toils. The minister negotiated agreements with the provincial governments with respect to the farm placement scheme and the establishment of forestry camps and work in British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba, to meet the problems of the single transient unemployed. He directed during 1938 the rehabilitation of men in the older age brackets and negotiated agreements with various provinces to assist in the general organization plan.

I wonder where in heaven's name can you find a man who has a better background to lead labour in the House of Commons and in the government of Canada than the man who, we are told, is not fit to occupy the position. I like to stand up for the man whom certain people like to strike when he is down. I say to the minister again: Carry on. Do your duty and let the other fellow do the worrying. Trust in the Master Workman, and you will blaze, in this house and in the country at large, a trail that will be second to none in Canada.

I should like now to say a word about the soldiers. I congratulate the government upon the increased pay not only to soldiers but to their dependents, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on Hansard a table showing that the highest paid soldiers in the world are Canadians. For the man with wife only, the amounts are as follows:

Country	Amount
Canada	$59 40
United States	50 00
Australia	42 78
New Zealand	34 92
South Africa	42 09
United Kingdom	24 06

As will be seen from this table, Canada stands at the top, and I think the government should be given credit for this. As I said last year, why take a man out of his work, make him a soldier and pay him less money than he was getting. Before the government has finished, I hope it will pay the soldiers better than ever before because they are the ones who are taking the risks.

I congratulate the Prime Minister upon the fact that when the corvette Port Arthur put a submarine out of business he gave honour to whom honour was due. I would ask the Department of National Defence, however, when they are sending their silver crosses to mothers, not to forget, where there is no longer a mother, to send the cross to father, sister, aunt or other dependent. It is not very much to ask, but it would mean a great deal to a woman to look at the cross and say, "That stands for my brother."

The men in uniform were rightly honoured when two of them were chosen to move and second respectively the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was greatly interested when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Booth) addressed the house the other day. I do not think I have ever sat in this house when more rapt attention was given a speaker than was accorded that lieutenant-colonel. Let me tell the house something of the spirit of the youth who have left Fort William. One of our boys, who was a great helper to me—how I miss him!—a splendid young musician, got his wings, but he was not satisfied to stay in a training centre though his mother wanted him to remain there. He said, "The struggle is bigger than I am", and I think that is typical of the youth of Canada. I know what it felt like after the last war when returned soldiers could not get twenty-five cents an hour, and we did our best to find employment for those who were refused work. After this war is over, whatever government may be in power, if work cannot be found for the returned men and others, whether I am in this house or out of it, I shall be leading these men in an effort to obtain employment and to impress upon the government the needs of the community.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that there are to be some changes in the house. Well, there is one change I should like to see. When you are opening this house in a very reverent way, only the members are present. I think the house should be thrown open, at least to the press; I think the press should hear you when you lead us in prayer and ask for victory. They may not appreciate it, but in our press gallery we have many gentlemen whom I consider to be very fine, Christian characters.

In one point I disagree with the Minister of Labour. I think every toiler should have his Sunday off. He will do more work; he will be a happier man, and he will be able to make a better contribution to the welfare of the country at large if that is done. I should like to quote from "The Common Problem," written by William R. Yendall, in which he quotes a philosopher whom I knew and whose works I have read, John Watson of Queen's:

> Gentlemen, a serious thing has happened in Europe. Official Germany has abandoned a spiritual interpretation of the world and has adopted a materialistic interpretation. History does not always repeat itself, but it has an uncanny habit of doing so and if it does so in this instance I would say that rivers of blood will flow before this wrong in the world of thought is righted.

That was written in 1912. We all know what happened after that and what is happening to-day because of materialistic Germany.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. McIVOR: I could finish in three minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you. Sunday observance was recognized by the great Gladstone as the bulwark of the nation, and I think it is the business of the church in Canada in all its branches to work and fight for freedom. The great apostle to the Gentiles said, "He is free whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside." The church to-day and the governments of Canada stand at the cross-roads, where error and selfishness drive men to confusion and conflict, speaking the right word, offering sympathy, dispelling darkness by the alluring vision of a grander conception of the Master Workman. It is littleness that makes people unhappy and afraid. It is the sense of kinship, of the Power and Wisdom of the universe, that drives out fear and greed; and when a man knows the ground on which he stands and practises his faith every day, whether he is the Minister of Labour or the leader of the Progressive Conservative party he is doing something that will contribute to Canada that which will be vital to the welfare of our country.

Mr. SPEAKER: During the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman wished to place a table on Hansard. That can be done only with the consent of the house, since it is a practice which should not be followed because of the possibility of abuse. With the consent of the house it may be done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: If objection is taken, the table may not be placed upon Hansard.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are not sure what the table is.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman read a comparative statement of the pay and allowances of soldiers in our country and those in other countries.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the table accurate, up to date and authentic; and by whom is it compiled?

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that there is not the unanimous consent which is required.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are not anxious to place any obstacle in the way, but there is a suggestion that the table may not be entirely accurate.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth debate of this kind in which I have had the privilege of taking part, and I do so to-night in the hope that I may be able to offer the government one or more constructive suggestions in order to help Canada's war effort. I do not say "the government's war effort"; I say "Canada's war effort," because without the help and co-operation of all the Canadian people there could be no effort and no production. In last week's issue of the Financial Post the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) said that what was needed in this country was constructive help from the opposition and the press, and less carping criticism. I feel that the press of Canada and this loyal opposition have offered constructive criticism during these war years. I also feel that without this carping criticism, as it is characterized by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, Canada's production to-day probably would be on a 1940 basis instead of a 1943 basis, because it has been this criticism by the press and the loyal opposition that has pushed, shoved and prodded this government into taking action, whether or not it wanted to do so, in order to carry out the suggestions brougth forward by the press and the opposition.

I will acknowledge that to-day we are producing very well, but that is not the fault of the government; it is the people themselves who want to produce. Part of the trouble to-day may be found right here in this House of Commons. The members of this house are not allowed to voice their views as they should, owing to the rules of the house and, I may add, the lop-sided parliament, because there are too many members on the government side. The press is not allowed to criticize the government, nor are we. We are told that if we offer any criticism we are hindering Canada's war effort. The press is afraid to criticize the government as it would like, because the government have many advertisements to put in the newspapers such as war-time prices and trade board and ration board ads, and others, and if the newspapers criticize the government too much they are afraid these advertisements will be withdrawn.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I referred to our war effort. I did not say our total war effort, as it was characterized in the speech from the throne, because we do not have a total war effort in Canada to-day. We have an effort, but it is by no means total. We all know that the people of Canada can do and are willing to do more than they are doing to-day.

Right from the start the allies have expected Canada to do more, and they are expecting us to do more right now. In fact, Canada is to-day on the spot. To use a slang expression, we are behind the eight ball. Canada must show the whole world that we will and can do things. Unless we do, after the war is over we shall not be a favoured nation; we shall not share in the world's trade, as we would if we were a favoured nation. Unless we do, we cannot expect prosperity and happiness.

To-day in Canada there are certain groups of people who take every possible opportunity to destroy peace and happiness within Canada. They attempt to create dissatisfaction among our people. Canada was built by pioneers, built by our forefathers who worked and sacrificed in order that you and I might have the things we have to-day. They built for the future, these hardy, rugged individuals. They hewed paths and made clearings; they built their log cabin homes, many of which still stand. They built on solid foundations. The people who are causing dissatisfaction within our borders, these constant cackling fellows, tell us that we should not have ambitions, that we should be content to have complete government control of everything. That would be a wonderful state of affairs for people who are not supposed to have ambition, but who, if they ever obtained control of the country, would have control of our farms, our stores, our homes, our houses, our automobiles, our working hours, our hours of recreation—everything. These people without ambition would dominate; they would control you and me and tell us exactly what to do and what not to do.

This is the condition people in Canada fear to-day. They fear government control of everything; and that is why I believe that, as soon as this war is over, all these government controlled bodies should be done away with. If they are not dismantled, all those things for which our armed forces are fighting will be lost. All those things which soldiers' wives and mothers and families have deprived themselves of and suffered will have been for nought. Those boys who have been killed overseas will have died in vain. I say: God help Canada if we have full government control after the war. If we as Canadians are not allowed to do our own thinking, to do our own governing and to act for ourselves, we shall be in a position even worse than the cattle one sees in a cattle car—because those cattle are at least good for food. We would be good for nothing.

As one man told me, he felt that if those people advocating government control obtained power, we would be controlled by a handful of control-crazy fellows. We would be subjected to all sorts of regimentation—and we have had enough of that.

We can have peace and happiness in Canada after the war if we go about it in a sane and sensible way. I suggest that a sane procedure would be for the government to adopt the Bracken fourteen points, as laid down at the Winnipeg Progressive Conservative convention. The wartime prices and trade board regulations have forced men and women out of business. Those men and women have been compelled to sell their stores, their garages, their homes, their farms, and in many instances they have lost their life's savings. But the government has done absolutely nothing to reimburse those people for their losses. Many of them are to-day in want because of government regulations which even the devil himself would have difficulty in deciphering—regulations issued to-day by the wartime prices and trade board, changed to-morrow, changed the next day and perhaps changed the next day, and then perhaps at the end of the week thrown out entirely, and something new offered in their place. It is high time the regulators making these regulations should be regulated. Canadians are willing to put up with almost everything to win the war, and accordingly I suppose we shall have to put up with these regulations until after the conflict is over. I hope—I know—that the end will be victorious.

Canadians are hoping that, when the war is over, the rest of the world will look to Canada and say that Canada saw her duty and did it well. We in Canada must not and will not fail, if we have the proper leadership—leadership such as that offered by Churchill, and by Roosevelt, leadership the British are proud of and the people of the United States are proud of. If we had leadership like that in Canada, our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would have been at Casablanca instead of here, at Ottawa, trying to dig up out of the Progressive Conservative policy as laid down at Winnipeg a pre-election platform which he could include in the preparation of the speech from the throne.

I doubt very much whether the government will ever carry out some of the promises contained in the speech from the throne, because they are only promises. On the other hand the policy as laid down at Winnipeg will be carried out. Health insurance and hospitalization have been and are likely to be mentioned many times. In my opinion the house should set up immediately a special committee on health insurance and social security. At the present time we have a measure of unemployment insurance. Most industrial organizations across Canada have a system of health insurance to which the workers contribute. In some instances the plants pay the whole shot. At the present time, however, there is something the worker is worrying about, as well as the storekeeper and others. These men are worrying about sickness in their homes. They feel that if they must send a member of their family to the hospital, it will likely take all their life's savings. This has happened in many homes throughout Canada. I was talking to a man the other day who had mortgaged everything he had to pay hospital and doctor's bills for his wife. He had lost everything by reason of sickness.

A committee should be set up to study hospitalization as well as health insurance and such matters. It should consider methods of keeping the people healthy, and ways should be found to stop the spread of disease. The spread of tuberculosis and certain social diseases has caused great unhappiness throughout Canada. Many such cases have come to my attention in the years I have been in welfare work, and this will be borne out by children's aid society and salvation army workers, as well as by ministers and priests. I know I am right when I say that a healthy nation is a happy nation.

In the rural districts there is practically no hospitalization and very little medical care. In isolated districts throughout the north country babies are being born without any medical care, and the mothers know that they will have no medical care. I understand that the Canadian Red Cross Society is taking care of this to some extent by guaranteeing doctors in certain districts an income of $4,000 a year if they will look after the territory within a radius of twenty-five miles of their office. This plan was set out in the Canadian Medical Journal of October, 1942.

Canada is spending very little in checking up the health of her people. The report of the auditor general for 1942 shows the following expenditures:

Industrial hygiene	$ 7,294 99
Medical investigations	24,007 34
Child and maternal hygiene	22,106 18
Public health engineering	33,368 44
Nutrition services	7,134 46
Venereal diseases	49,408 82

I think the government would have been better advised if it had put into our health services the $1,500,000 which was spent on the plebiscite. I do not think the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will contradict me in that statement.

There is something else the government has side-stepped in the speech from the throne. Agriculture is mentioned, but it is just glossed over because the government is really unfamiliar with farm problems since it has not given proper leadership to our farmers during the war years. I called the farmer the forgotten man in 1940, and that term has stuck to him ever since. I think he will always be the forgotten man until we have an absolute change of policy. To-day the farmer is out on a limb, and the government has put him there. After putting him out on the limb, the government has proceeded to saw it off inch by inch. Many farmers have fallen to the ground, and many more will fall unless we have a little better direction in connection with farming.

Farmers who are operating dairy farms to-day do not know how they will carry on unless they get help this spring and summer. I know of one farmer over seventy-five years of age whose wife is sixty-eight years of age, and the two of them are looking after a herd of twenty-seven cows. They are working eighteen hours a day. They will be able to stand that only so long before they will have to quit. There are many thousands of farmers across Canada who are not looking for time and a half for overtime even though they are working from five o'clock in the morning until midnight; all they are thinking of is to do their bit, and they will continue to do it even though it kills them. I know it will kill many of them. If our farmers, the dairy farmers especially, do not get help, our dairy production will drop considerably during this year.

I suggest that in Ontario, and in the other provinces where there is extensive dairy farming, the government should make a survey of all farms in order to see which ones can be tractor-ploughed, disced and seeded. The government should then form a farm tractor corps of trained tractor men, even though it may be necessary to take these men out of the armed forces. This tractor corps could work day and night in eight-hour shifts to plough, disc and seed these farms. This work requires skilled labour which the farmers cannot get. The government will have to provide this help. In reply to the query, "What is parliament's main job?" by the Financial Post, January 30, 1943, I replied:

> There are many main jobs facing parliament at the coming session, but in order to keep up the morale and health of our people the production of food I believe is one of the most important. Numerous farms will not be in production this year owing to lack of skilled farm help. I suggest that farms be put on a munition basis. I also suggest a survey be made of all farms to see which ones can be tractor-ploughed and seeded. Skilled farms corps should be formed in each district to plough, disc and seed these farms on a custom basis at below cost. These tractor corps should operate twenty-four hours per day. Women's land army of uniformed corps should be formed and capable farmers working on poor land should be moved to good land to produce.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) refer to a women's land army. In Great Britain they have 53,000 women in their land army, and I notice from the paper, I think it was yesterday, that they expect that number to be doubled this year. The harvesting on these farms could be done by women and also by school boys and girls, because harvesting does not require the skilled labour that seeding and ploughing require.

I should like to make a suggestion on the subject of education, a subject which was not mentioned in the speech from the throne. Voluntary committees should be set up throughout Canada to pick out bright and healthy—that should be one of the main qualifications—boys and girls with a view to seeing that they are put through university to become doctors or dentists, scientists, engineers, agriculturists. To-day in Canada we have many boys and girls who would be only too willing to go on to university but whose fathers and mothers cannot afford to send them. I know of one particular case, the child of a veteran of the last war, a girl who won a scholarship, the brightest girl in the whole of Ontario, who was unable to go on to university on account of the lack of funds. It is boys and girls like that who should be helped.

There is another subject upon which I shall touch. I had not intended to mention it, but the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is in his place and that is why I refer to it now. It is with regard to the men and women who have been discharged from the armed forces and returned home, some of them after two or three years in the service. I know of one case—the minister knows it too—where a boy had been in the service for a year and a half and was then returned home. He was anxious to do some work even if he had to do it sitting down. He wanted some work to do with his hands. The pension board gave him a pension of forty dollars a month. The boy, of course, is tickled pink to have the forty dollars, because he has been sponging on his sister who has had to go out and work to support him. But the boy is anxious to do something for himself and earn his own money, and there are many others who are in the same position, anxious to do something for themselves. We should not wait until after the war to prepare jobs for these men and women. We should have jobs for them now, and if there are no jobs for them we should create jobs. Surely there is something they can do even if it is done in their own homes.

I have touched on many subjects, Mr. Speaker, but in war time there are many subjects of interest to us all, and I can only thank the house for its indulgence.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have placed before the house the opinions of this group with respect to social security and most of the other matters arising out of the speech from the throne, but there are a few observations which I should like to make.

First, I want to join with those who have preceded me in paying tribute to the two members who moved and seconded the address. They made excellent speeches. There is, however, something I wish to point out in that connection. It arises from the statement which was made particularly by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) and others that the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address represented in this house the armed forces. I do not think that statement is correct, and I draw attention to it advisedly. Both these hon. gentlemen were elected by constituencies in Canada and sent to this house to represent their respective constituencies. They became members of the armed forces later on, and to classify them as giving voice to the opinions of the armed forces is not correct, for they have no mandate to speak for the armed forces and can express only their own opinions; and being members of the government party they are morally obligated to express the opinions of the government on any matters pertaining to the armed forces. I say that not because of any antagonism to these two members themselves. I listened to their speeches and heard them eulogize—and rightly so—the educational programme which the government is carrying on in the armed forces. They also drew attention to many other matters which were favourable to the government.

I know that the members of the armed forces both in Canada and Great Britain have definite opinions upon the question, for instance, of rehabilitation, and they have definite grievances with respect to legislation now in existence and affecting them at the present time. The members of the armed forces cannot be represented in this house unless the government is prepared to change the elections act to permit the armed forces both overseas and in Canada to nominate and elect their own candidates to this house, with a mandate from the armed forces on matters pertaining to them and their future. Until such time as that is done, I do not think anyone has the right to create the impression, consciously or unconsciously, that some particular member or members exclusively represent in this house the armed forces. We pay tribute to those two members themselves for the fact that they are in uniform and recognize the fact that a greater contribution to winning the war is necessary than merely lip-service. They have demonstrated that they are prepared to make their maximum contribution to winning the war.

I have taken this position, Mr. Speaker, and I have taken it advisedly. If I am elected to represent a constituency in this house, that is a big job at the present time, and any member who comes here and tries to do that job is going to have to work at least sixteen hours a day. On the other hand, if I feel that my maximum contribution can be made in the armed forces and I decide that that is where I am going, that is a full-time job also, and anyone who undertakes to do the two jobs can do neither one of them well. With all due respect to those who are in uniform, I think a decision should be made one way or the other as to whether they belong here or in the service, because no man can do both jobs. It is done in England, some will say. It is all right in England, because the armed forces in Britain are in the front line, and when you are in London or in any other part of England you are at the front.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Many members of the armed forces are in the British house every day.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Cape Breton South would not suggest that these two hon. gentlemen should resign their seats in this house?

Mr. GILLIS: That is entirely up to themselves. I am merely pointing out that either one of these jobs is a full-time job, and when you try to do both one of them suffers. I know this statement may not be popular, but I make it in passing and I am not particularly anxious whether it is popular or not, if it is correct. I think it is correct, and I am prepared to make it. I do not intend to allow anyone to create the impression that certain things are being done that are not being done. Definitely, the forces require direct representation in this house; and as far as this group is concerned, it is prepared to give it to them. I would welcome in this chamber men, who I know have definite ideas with respect to the future and the things they are fighting for, sent back after a free election, to put forward their programme. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, from conversations and correspondence I have had with them, that we of this party would see eye-to-eye with them on almost everything. Until that is done, the illusion is not going to be created that the armed forces have direct representation. There are many things of which they complain, as every hon. member knows. For example, there is the question of dependents' allowances. There is an angle which should be straightened out, and if I represented exclusively the armed forces I would draw attention to it; in fact I have done so on several occasions during the past two years. I refer to the practice of discontinuing the allowance to dependents when the man is absent without leave for more than twenty-one days. There are a number of such cases at the present time. If the absence is longer than a couple of months the allowance is cut off. It is a pathetic situation. The man is away; the woman has a family, and often she is put in the position where she is obliged to place the children in a home. It is a crying shame, if the army accepts the responsibility of taking a man and placing him in the forces and he commits an infraction of military law, that his dependents should be punished for it. He himself should be punished; but he is not, because his food and clothing are provided for, and even after he is picked up he is no worse off. His wife and family, however, have to go through a period of misery and degradation waiting for the allowance and the straightening up of the situation. There is quite a lot of that, and it is something which should be taken care of. The attention of the house has been drawn to it on many occasions.

Again, the increase of pay looks very nice on paper and is a good gesture, but it is not working out as it should, and it is not what it should be. My understanding was that the soldier was to receive twenty cents additional and that his pay would be increased to $1.50 a day without any strings on it, but I find that quite a lot of strings are attached to it. He must be in the army for four months before he gets the first ten cents, and then only upon the recommendation of his commanding officer. When he has been in the army for six months he receives another ten cents, again upon the recommendation of his commanding officer. Discretionary powers are placed in the hands of the commanding officer. If he recommends it, the man gets the ten cents; if he does not consider him an efficient soldier, the extra twenty cents is withheld. If he has a crime sheet or has been confined to barracks, he is not considered an efficient soldier, and accordingly he does not get the increase. Also, he must make application for it. Consequently there are strings on this increase, and I contend that there should not be, if the government meant to award the increase of pay to the armed forces. I had accepted the statement as I saw it in the press, and I did not know the facts until I came to Ottawa, since the opening of the house. There is unfortunately quite a lot of friction in connection with the administration of this matter, and there should be service representatives in the house to take care of it.

I am concerned about the treatment of the soldier. The soldier has a definite place in the future of this country. I do not like the present trend of events, and I am particularly anxious that the soldier is given everything that we think he is fighting for. I do not want to see any antagonisms created in the mind of the fellow who is overseas to-day and will come back here some time. There are elements in this country that would like to use him for their own purposes, and there are developments which may make this possible. I believe every hon. member would be well advised to see to it that those at present in the armed services, both men and women, are well taken care of, and that everything we can do for them is done. Let us not make gestures that we are going to do something and then put all kinds of administrative stop-blocks which build up antagonism. Far better not to do anything than to put forward an attractive paper programme and give it an administration which will not make it workable.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is sitting opposite. He knows the problems of rehabilitation, the plans necessary to deal with them, and the run-around they are getting. There is resentment right across the country. I am not speaking here to-night for the purpose of creating antagonism or helping to break that machinery down. I want to see it work; there is no other hon. member who tries harder to make it work than I do. But the administration with respect to the whole programme is not what it should be. It is developing many illusions which I do not like to see developed, and making it possible for people to capitalize on it whom I do not want to see capitalizing on it.

I make these observations in passing on account of the fact that someone has said that the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne represent in this house the armed forces. If the soldiers are to be represented here, I want to see them represented in the way I mentioned, namely, by being sent here by a free election, nominated by the troops themselves, and having their own programme. It will then be our duty to see that that programme, embodying the hopes and aspirations of the services and brought direct from them to this house, is carried into effect.

I now wish to say just a few words to my hon. friends to the right. I do so because they have invited our attention. We of this group endeavour as far as possible to deal on their merits with the matters before the house. Nevertheless, when someone brings us into the picture by criticisms which we do not think are legitimate, or tries to misconstrue what we stand for, we are obliged to reply to them. I notice that my hon. friends to the right have acquired a new name—the Progressive Conservative party. I am not particularly anxious about the tag. It does not make much difference what label you put on a thing; it is the basic principles which count, and whether they can be applied or not. It seems to me that the major job of that particular party at the present time is to get in between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Liberal party. Their technique is clearly expressed in this chamber by each member of the party as he rises and through their official press, the Telegram, the Globe and Mail and the Montreal Gazette. For the past two or three months these newspapers have consistently referred to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, not as such, but as the "socialist party". The socialist party is, of course, a left wing movement, and the Liberal party is a right wing movement, and therefore the Progressive Conservative party is going to get in the centre with a sound and sensible programme for the people of Canada. What I want to make clear is this. The leader of the Conservative party—

Mr. MacINNIS: Which one?

Mr. GILLIS: The one in the house at the present time. He is the leader. The one outside is, in my opinion, just an organizer. He is not doing very much leading, he is organizing. The leader of the official opposition did a very good job. His initial performance was good; he made a nice speech, and I believe he means what he says. But my job to-night is to try to warn him. He is fishing in troubled waters. There are many sharks, and an innocent chap like him is apt to find himself in a lot of trouble.

They have tried to prove to the people of Canada that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is bringing to Canada some foreign ideology, a mysterious something imported from other parts of the world. Let me call attention to the fact that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in Canada was born out of the needs of the Canadian people. It represents the efforts of the Canadian people for the last thirty years to lay down a political expression for themselves in Canada. For at least twenty-five years I have had some knowledge of the different labour parties across Canada, from British Columbia to Nova Scotia. I know that in 1932 they came to the realization that there was no solution for our problems in the provincial fields, and consequently men and women who were active over that period of time met in Calgary and examined the problem on a national basis and set up a national organization, because our problems are national and not provincial. That is where the C.C.F. was born.

It was a federation of all the existing political organizations of labour and of farmers in the country at that time, and they drafted a programme based on the economic set-up in Canada, couched in language which is acceptable to the mentality of the Canadian people. Better than that, they meet in convention every year. That programme and policy is reexamined by the rank and file of the Canadian people, and if it is necessary to change it they do so, but the control is completely in the hands of the people. If we do not like Coldwell next year, we shall replace him by democratic vote at the convention. Complete control is in the hands of the people, and that is as it should be, but we have gone a step further. We have taken no chances on building a bureaucracy from the top that can hold a convention in 1919 and not hold a convention any more. The people have nothing to say under such an organization. We have rooted ourselves into the economic organization of the people and have affiliated our party with the trades unions as they did in Britain. The C.C.F. in Canada is following the British pattern, and the only way to make a political organization a democratic organization is to have its roots in the economic organizations of the people and the control in the hands of the people. That is the C.C.F. in Canada to-day. Farmer, industrial worker, affiliate, meet in convention, draft a programme and elect a leadership, and that will be done year after year. There is no other way of building a democratic political organization. There is no chance of a dictatorship or of a state controlled society growing out of that kind of organization. Make no mistake about that. That is why we are so anxious to anchor ourselves to the Canadian people and keep control of the political organization completely in the hands of the people.

With respect to the question of socialism, I am not ashamed of being called a socialist. After considering the question for a long time, and making an examination of the system under which we now live, I have come to this conclusion, and I do not want our friends across the way or to the right to make any mistake about this. What we are witnessing in Europe to-day is the last struggle of a dying system going out the hard way. Organized society lasts only as long as it serves the need of the people. There is no doubt about that. There was barbarism and then savagery and feudalism, and this system took over from the feudal system. It was born to solve one of the first problems of man, that of production, and it solved it 100 per cent. For many years prior to the outbreak of the war we had everything in abundance necessary to feed, clothe and house the people and afford them luxury, but unfortunately control was in the hands of a small group and they withheld it from the people. When it no longer served the needs of the people it travelled its cycle. It will travel the road as the other systems have done. It will go out either by evolution or by revolution, one way or the other. It went out in Europe, unfortunately, in some sections, by revolution. It was extended in others in the only way in which it can be extended. This system cannot continue to function except in the way that Hitler is making it function, and I challenge anyone to contradict that statement. It is an extension of the capitalist system, the last stand, the boss with a gun at the head of the worker, extracting his profits. That is not my opinion; it is the considered opinion of everyone who has studied the question. I am simply expressing the opinion of men who have made a thorough analysis of the situation. That is their description of it. We are fighting a war against that. That is what we are fighting against to-day the continuation of this order of society. We must be cognizant of that in Canada. They are in Britain; I have no doubt about it. I have watched developments there, and they are marching in the right direction, as they are in Australia and New Zealand. But we are not doing that in Canada, and that is why I am alarmed at the situation. The trend of events in Canada is the reverse.

What is the difference between capitalism and socialism? It is not difficult to understand if you have lived on wages most of your life and have run into the system the hard way. It is very plain and simple to me, as it is to the average worker. You call this system capitalism because the dominant factor in the system has been the protection of capital. Every one of our laws was designed to protect capital, while human values were given no consideration. A good example of it is this. If you bought a farm, or a piano, or a radio, or anything else, on the instalment plan, and were taken ill and your income ceased, at the end of a month or two months or a year you would be called before a judge, and he would say to you, "You agreed to pay a certain amount of money on a certain day." You might reply, "I am not working; my family are suffering; they have nothing to eat, and I cannot meet these instalments." But you may have nearly paid for the commodity or whatever it might be. No matter; the judge will tell you that you agreed to pay, and your condition of affairs is given no consideration. The mortgage is foreclosed, and they will take your house or piano or radio from you, because the dominant factor in the system has been and now is the protection of capital as against the recognition of the rights of man. That is the plain and simple truth.

On the other hand, why would you call the new order of society, socialism? For this reason, that we would change the existing laws, and we would so frame the laws of the country as to make the dominant factor in the system the protection of society itself, the people. We would make human values take precedence over monetary values. We believe in abundance where there is abundance, and in the organization of society there would be abundance for everyone wherever it was possible to produce it. And it is possible to produce it. You would not have to cut off the head of anyone here, but there is a small group at the top that claims and controls and withholds from the great majority the things that are necessary, and someone has to take hold of that situation and so reorganize society as to distribute back to the people the things produced under the system.

That is my understanding of socialism. Would we build a state-controlled machine? No; I would be the first one in this house to fight that with every means at my disposal. But I know the programme and policy of this party is not that. As I have said before, it is control from the bottom. If you understand what statism means, you have it now in Canada. The present government is administering absolutely and exclusively a complete state-controlled order of society, with absolutely no representation from the ordinary common people of the country, who have nothing to say with respect to the writing of our laws. To-day the controls are completely in the hands of one group.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is nonsense. I represent the common people of this country as much as my hon. friend does.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not nonsense.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thirty-five thousand orders in council.

Mr. GILLIS: In my opinion the Minister of Pensions and National Health, under the present circumstances, has about as much say in making the laws of this country as I have. I see the laws of this country being made to-day by controls set up on the outside, and who are in on these controls? Neither the Minister of Pensions and National Health nor anyone else on that side of the house is writing these orders in council; they could not do it. They are being turned out somewhere on a mimeograph, and who are in on these controls? Well, there is Canada Packers, there is International Nickel, there is Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal, there are Simpson's and Eaton's, and all the big monopolies of this country in on the controls. There is no common, ordinary representative of the people, expressing the viewpoint of the great majority of the people, who has anything to do with the turning out of these orders in council.

I am not quarrelling with the controls; I realize that a certain amount of control is necessary in war time. I am quarrelling with who are controlling, what they are controlling for, where they are going and where we are going to wind up. The same people are in complete control to-day who brought about the situation which led to what we have over in Europe at the present time, with the same short-sightedness, selfishness, and fear of social changes. Therefore we have the present situation, and they are in there taking no account of the common ordinary people of this country, of their needs, their hopes or their aspirations. Some hon. members opposite tell us that we are never going back to what we had when this war broke out, and I agree with that statement. But they stop there; they do not tell us what we are going to have when the war is over.

Mr. REID: No man can tell you that.

Mr. GILLIS: I can tell you; it will be what we have now. We have complete regimentation, and that regimentation is going to remain.

Mr. FULFORD: What does the C.C.F. advocate but absolute regimentation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just listen and you will find out.

Mr. FULFORD: I have listened to that for years.

Mr. GILLIS: The C.C.F. advocates equal representation on these controls. That is the answer, plain and simple. If you take Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal and give them charge of the fuel control board and the making of your fuel control policy, then take the man who digs the coal, the man who manages the mine, the man who negotiates contracts for the people who mine the coal, and give them equal representation on that board, as they do in Britain.

Mr. MITCHELL: Have we not done that here?

Mr. GILLIS: We certainly have not done it here.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is the last thing in the world the Department of Labour has done.

Mr. GILLIS: And if Canada Packers have their representatives writing orders in council in connection with their own particular interests, take in some of the men in the plants, who may have equally good ideas about production; take in some of your farmers, directly from the farms. These are the things to do. We are not quarrelling with the controls, but we want representation on those controls, representation by the man who produces on the land and in industry. What is wrong is that there is no such representation. That is a good example of statism, but that is not what we are advocating. There is no one in Canada to-day fighting harder against that sort of thing than we are. We want an equal share of these controls. That is the only thing necessary.

I leave these thoughts with my hon. friends to my right, because as the situation is to-day there is absolutely no difference between the two old parties. One is out; the other is in. If one is not fooling the people successfully, there is an ace in the hole; the money will be sent behind the other party. They will put in a Mr. Bennett or a Mr. Graydon or someone else who will carry on the little show, and the opposition will cross to the other side. Then the other party will say, "Well, now we are out, but we are going to get in again. We will wait until those fellows fall down on the job and then go in again." There is absolutely no basic difference between them; fundamentally they are exactly the same and will be as long as we have an economic dictatorship in this country, as we have now and as we have had all during my lifetime, with control of the resources of the country in the hands of one small group. By virtue of the money it controls and the industry it controls that small group can swing elections to suit itself, can bring on depressions when it sees fit. If you want to be progressive you must get over here and join this party; you must accept a programme that means social change. At present there is no change. It is immaterial to me which party sits on either side of the house; behind the scene sits the invisible government, just watching. When one party is not doing the job well enough to suit it, and in its interests, then it gives its money to somebody else and that party comes in at the next election. That is the situation. I just want to leave these few thoughts with my hon. friends here, because I have a good deal of respect for the present house leader of the opposition. I know that he is honest and that it is just a matter of talking and explaining things to him. Then I think he will be on the right road.

I rose particularly to deal with another matter which gives me great concern, namely, the situation in industry itself. On one other occasion I rose in this house and drew attention to the possible developments at Kirkland Lake. One of my friends on the Montreal Gazette criticized me roundly later on, saying that I predicted such and such, that I told the house what was going to happen. My only thought in bringing these matters to the attention of the house is to try to offset them. In the present circumstances I do not think strikes, upheavals and stoppages of work should be permitted to take place. They should be stopped before they occur, and that can be done if common sense and a little judgment are used. To-night I am going to refer to the steel strike, which really was not a strike but a spontaneous walk-out; it was not a called strike in that the officials of the organization had nothing to do with it. I bring up this matter for this reason, that five thousand of the men involved in that walk-out live and work in my constituency; that is the steel workers at Sydney, Nova Scotia. For that reason I followed developments very closely. I know all the things that were done by the steel workers' organization, both national and international, with respect to finding a solution of that problem, without success. I have seen those steel workers referred to in the press as saboteurs of the war effort, as doing a disservice to the war effort, and there is no doubt that the walk-out did not help the war effort. But the responsibility for that walk-out does not rest with the steel workers' organization or with the men involved. I place the responsibility squarely at the door of the government, and particularly the Department of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend think he is helping the present situation, which we have more or less clarified, by raising the question here this evening? The matter is before the national war labour board at the request of the steel workers. Does the hon. member think he is helping the situation by criticizing the government or any other agency at the present time, after we have just pacified the situation?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I do.

Mr. MITCHELL: With the consent of the steel workers.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I do, and for this reason: If I had any indication whatsoever that that matter was settled, or that it would be settled satisfactorily, then I would not be saying anything about it. But—

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend says this, does he not question the good faith of the national war labour board? In advance he makes the statement that the matter is not going to be settled. I think that is a reflection upon the board. It is a reflection upon labour and upon the representative of the employers on the board.

Mr. GILLIS: I cannot take any other attitude, and for this reason. I have in my hand the order in council which was passed. This is order in council P.C. 689, which was passed on January 26, 1943. In it there was a settlement, or an armistice. The situation, as it stands to-day, is not a settlement.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is talking arbitrarily. We are trying to make a settlement.

Mr. GILLIS: But the order in council prevents it. That is the reason why I have mentioned it. This order in council prevents a settlement. I will read only the last clause of it. It states:

> It is understood that the government will adhere to its price-ceiling and wage-stabilization policy.

That is the very thing that brought about the present trouble. If this order in council means what it says—and I think it does—then the adherence to the wage-stabilization and price-ceiling policy is going to precipitate the trouble all over again.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Does he realize that the men themselves agreed to the present status quo in an effort to settle the matter, without further trouble?

Mr. GILLIS: No, they did not.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course they did.

Mr. GILLIS: No, they did not. I happen to have been pretty close to the Sydney steel workers. They accepted this agreement with a proviso, that if their full terms and their full demands were not met within thirty days they would resume the walk-out.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes; but they accepted it in the hope that a peaceful solution would be reached.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Is my hon. friend helping matters by raising them here while the steel workers, as well as the government, are endeavouring to work it out?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that you give the hon. member who has the floor the opportunity of placing his case before the house, and then the hon. gentleman opposite may make his speech afterwards. These interruptions should not be counted in his forty minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a false statement.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member did not protest.

Mr. COLDWELL: He did not sit down.

Mr. SLAGHT: I will not sit down, on your dictation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) should sit down. I was saying that the hon. member who is speaking did not sit down while the hon. member for Parry Sound was interrupting him.

Mr. SLAGHT: He is not sitting down now to hear you talk, either.

Mr. COLDWELL: But I did not interrupt him.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not fair.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There have been innumerable interruptions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may proceed only with the consent of the house.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think he should be allowed to go on. I interrupted him.

Mr. GILLIS: I draw this to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and of the house. I know something about these matters, and if this order in council means what it says, then you are going into that trouble all over again. If I had the time I could prove conclusively to the Minister of Labour, by documents and so on leading up to the trouble that that condition existed with the steel workers from April, 1941. They started in on this in April, 1941, and there was no walk-out until January 12, 1943.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not wish my hon. friend to leave the impression that the matter came into the hands of the federal Department of Labour in 1941. Let us have that clear. I do not care what the hon. member says, but I would make it perfectly clear that when the matter came to the federal Department of Labour—and I am not making any criticism about any other department, or the machinery of the board—they got the commission as soon as it could be established. And of course the strike took place before they had received the report of the commission.

Mr. GILLIS: This matter was in process of negotiation before the present Minister of Labour took office.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: It was under negotiation.

Mr. MITCHELL: You know what labour negotiations are; they are continuous.

Mr. GILLIS: From 1941, when the first application was made before the Department of Labour, it has gone through the process of negotiation, until January, 1943. I think the men were patient and long-suffering. But that is not what I am concerned about. I know definitely that it was the adherence to the price-ceiling and wage-stabilization policy that precipitated the whole matter. The commission under their terms of reference were prevented from bringing a settlement back. They met, not to decide as to whether the wages asked were justifiable, or whether the company could pay the wages the steel workers were asking, but they met to determine whether P.C. 5963 gave them the privilege of making any changes from the basic rates. They found that under that order in council they could not make any changes in the basic rates, and consequently, with a minority report, they came back and reported accordingly. That order in council is the thing which precipitated the whole walk-out. If we are to adhere to that, and use it as a basis for the next inquiry, then the war labour board has no authority to do more than what was done by the Barlow commission, and we shall have it all over again, even before it starts. That will be the case, unless the government is prepared to give the board broader reference, and permit them to negotiate the matter on its merits. I do not want to see the steel workers of Sydney go out again. I do not want to see them go out at Trenton or at Hamilton. I think the Minister of Labour will have to recognize that right across Canada to-day there is unrest. It is to be found at Arvida. There are 600 on strike at Wallaceburg, and Hamilton is seething.

Mr. MITCHELL: That does not give the straight story. The hon. member knows that the Arvida dispute is a jurisdictional one. It is an inter-union difficulty. The question at Wallaceburg is an inter-union dispute.

Mr. GILLIS: It is a question of union recognition.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a question of inter-union dispute, or what they call a jurisdictional dispute.

Mr. GILLIS: If I had the time—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He has had about ten minutes of interruptions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member finished his speech?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I will close now. There is a good deal I should like to say on the question, but if my time has expired I shall not transgress the rules of the house.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hesitate to rise at this time, Mr. Speaker, but there was an arrangement made, which the acting leader of the government will perhaps confirm, whereby the hon. member for Qu'Appelle would move the adjournment at this time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Speaking in a personal capacity, may I point out that in the last three or four days we have adjourned the debate ten minutes, twenty minutes or thirty minutes before the hour for adjournment. I strongly protest against adjourning a debate at 10.30 p.m.

Mr. COLDWELL: I suggest that what the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) says is right. We ought to continue. But may I suggest this, that if an opposition member wishes to adjourn the debate he should be given the same opportunity for adjournment as is given to a government member. Last night the house was adjourned at 5.45 p.m. by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), and I have no doubt the hon. member for Qu'Appelle thought he should have the same privilege to-night. If we are going to have sauce for one goose, we should have it for both geese on both sides of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would inform hon. members that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order, if I may. I do not think we on this side of the house should be put in an impossible position such as has been attempted to-night. Ordinarily we would go on till eleven o'clock, and I think it is our duty to do so. I endorse what the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has said. There is no one more regretful than I that the speaking arrangements have fallen down to some extent on this occasion, but I want it to be quite clear that we will not countenance this sort of thing again. On the other hand, this does seem to be an exception and time might be made up on another occasion. I want it to be quite clear that we are not in favour of having early adjournments. However, it has been done, and perhaps with this example in mind we will make this the last for this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In view of the arrangements that have been made I will withdraw any objection I may have had.

Mr. CRERAR: Earlier in the evening the government whip said to me that the present list of speakers would be exhausted with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He said also that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) intended to speak this evening but was indisposed with a sore throat. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me if under the circumstances we would be prepared to adjourn at 10.20 p.m., and I expressed the opinion to him that I thought it was a bad practice.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are both agreed on that.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not been present at the previous sittings of the house this week, and I was not aware that the house had been adjourning before eleven o'clock. I suggested to my hon. friend who leads the opposition that we might adjourn after the hon. member for Cape Breton South had spoken. Perhaps we can do this to-night, but agree unanimously that it will be the last occasion upon which the closing rule will be violated.

Motion (Mr. Perley) agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, February 4, 1943.

Sir, I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the senate chamber on Friday the fifth of February at 3 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

On motion of Mr. Crerar, the house adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

Friday, February 5, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name royal assent to the following bill:

An act to amend an act respecting the Chief Justice of Canada.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAPOINTE (LOTBINIÈRE)—REFERENCE IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 4 TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT SERVING IN ARMED FORCES

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege to protest against the remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with regard to hon. members of this house who are serving at the present time in his majesty's forces. On that occasion the hon. member, according to Hansard, made two statements. First, he said:

I do not think anyone has the right to create the impression, consciously or unconsciously, that some particular member or members exclusively represent in this house the armed forces.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that when any hon. member in uniform addresses this house on military matters he is considered as representing or is trying to create the impression that he represents the armed forces in the sense that he has a mandate from them. But it so happens that from the very nature of his duties in His Majesty's service he is often better qualified to know just what are the conditions and circumstances in the army, and it is not only his privilege but his duty to express himself in the house.

As regards the hon. member's second statement, that he did not think it was possible at the present time for an hon. member to discharge his duties both as an officer of his majesty—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the point of order?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, have I the right to state the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: My understanding is that a member may rise to a question of privilege affecting the person, but in this case we are listening to a speech. To that I have no objection, but in my opinion it is not in accordance with the rules of the house. The statement might well be made in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is far more serious than any question of privilege affecting individuals. It affects the whole constitution of this assembly of parliament. The statement that was made was a reflection upon hon. members who have been privileged to serve in the uniform of his majesty in this war, therefore the question which has been raised is the most serious question of privilege which could be brought before this parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not wish that there should be a debate on the question of privilege, because that is not allowed under the rules of the house. But the hon. member as a matter of privilege is replying to a statement which affects him as an individual, not only as a member of his majesty's forces but also as a member of this house, and I think he is entitled to make his statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Lotbinière): The second statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was to the effect that in his estimation no member of parliament could discharge his duties properly both as a member of this house and as an officer of his majesty's forces. I protest against such a statement, and I refuse to accept my hon. friend's judgment on that matter. I do not know whether what he said expresses the views of his party, or whether it was only his own personal view. But in my opinion the sole judges in this matter are the constituents of the riding who freely elected me to this house. When there is an appeal to the people I shall go before my constituents and abide by their judgment. If at that time my hon. friend or members of his party wish their views on this matter to be expressed and wish to try to influence the judgment of those judges, they will be free and very welcome to do so, but I think I can assure them that they would be wasting some of this time which they claim is so valuable to the country.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house last night when the hon. member for Cape Breton South made the observations he did, but representing for the time being the three armed services, and being in a sense their mouthpiece so far as the interests of the members of the armed forces are concerned, I feel that I must express on this question of privilege the resentment which I am sure the members of the armed forces will feel in view of the reflection cast upon them by the hon. member. The members of the forces who attend the meetings of parliament do so on their regular leave of absence. That has been the custom not only in this war but during the last war, a custom which has been sanctioned during all the years since the last war; for this House of Commons every year has voted a pension to the relatives of Harry Baker, M.P., who was killed in action in 1916. It is also the custom in the British house at Westminster. It is true, as my hon. friend has said, that members of the British house of parliament are in the front line when they are in London. But time after time, as press reports show, members of the British House of Commons have become casualties while on duty in the middle east or in India or elsewhere, and no one to my knowledge has ever raised in the British house the question of their right to sit in the commons.

So far as we are concerned in the administration of the armed forces this matter was very carefully considered at the beginning of the war. It was thought that if any hon. member of this house wished to devote some of his time, or the greater portion of his time, to the service of the state in the armed forces, and his constituents were willing to allow him to do so, the administration of the services had nothing to say about it, more than we have anything to say about members of parliament who carry on outside the house their profession of lawyer or doctor or preacher or labour organizer or school teacher.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Speaking, sir, on the question of privilege as one of those to whom the remarks made in the house yesterday refer, may I say that I have no interest in the views of the hon. member who made those remarks, neither have I any confidence in his judgment as to my capacity either as a member of this house or as a member of the armed forces in which I have the honour to serve this country. He is entitled to his views and I and my constituents are entitled to put any interpretation upon them that fits the circumstances.

The question whether one is capable of doing the two jobs at the same time is hardly relevant because I think none of those present in the House of Commons in uniform was ever attempting at the same time to carry on his military duties but was here on regular leave. I have come here on two occasions while on my annual leave, and on every other occasion and for every day or part thereof on which I have been absent from my duties as an officer of his majesty's forces I have been absent without pay. That is nothing unusual; it is the same with everybody else, but I think it is time somebody brought this point out into the open.

So far as I am concerned, with all due deference to hon. members of the house and the people who sent me here, I should have no difficulty in determining where my duty lay. I had no difficulty before, and if misfortune overtakes us I shall have no difficulty again, because I have to live with myself. But I am concerned for hon. members of this house who have gone overseas and have given distinguished service there in the organization of the Canadian army—distinguished service which has been recognized by those with whom they deal. If they do make an appearance in this house once in two years and give an informative, not to say discursive description of what is going on within the armed forces they should not be subjected, nor should the people who sent them here, to the kind of suggestion which was made in this house yesterday. It is not indicative of a helpful spirit or calculated to induce people who put public service before personal aggrandizement to enter the service. It is no encouragement to them; therefore, so far as one may reasonably and calmly resent that type of suggestion I raise my voice in protest against it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I endeavour just to shorten this debate? The hon. member for Cape Breton South is not in his seat. As to the suggestion that any reflections were cast by this group upon any member of the armed forces, I want to say that no reflection whatever was cast or intended by the hon. member, nor would we tolerate for an instant any such reflection.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not intend to detain the house for more than a moment, but two things which have not yet been mentioned in connection with this matter should I think be mentioned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to prevent any hon. member from rising to a question of privilege, but I do think that the statement which has already been made by the hon. member for Lotbinière has covered the question of privilege which was raised. There can be no debate on a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With all deference, may I point out that this statement affects every single member of the House of Commons. I repeat what I said before I was interrupted so unnecessarily by my hon. friends opposite—that every member of this House of Commons is entitled to speak on a question affecting the privileges of this parliament—every single member here—and especially are those entitled to speak who wear his majesty's uniform.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the remarks made by the minister, I would point out that at the moment there is no motion before the chair for discussion. On the question of privilege, any member who thinks that there has been a breach of privilege is entitled to speak. I am allowing the hon. member who has now risen to proceed, because he has stated that there are two matters which have not beeen discussed and to which he wishes to speak on a question of privilege.

Mr. TUCKER: In reference to what has been said, the suggestion was thrown out very distinctly by a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, as follows—Hansard, page 162.

[Mr. Mutch.]

With all due respect to those who are in uniform, I think a decision should be made one way or the other as to whether they belong here or in the service, because no man can do both jobs.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read the next sentence.

Mr. TUCKER: All right:

It is done in England, some will say. It is all right in England, because the armed forces in Britain are in the front line, and when you are in London or in any other part of England you are at the front.

I wonder if there is not a danger of attack on our west coast, on Alaska and parts of the west coast of Canada just as there is a danger of attack on England. If it is all right for people to go from the parliament of England to defend their country, it is all right for a Canadian to go to defend his country and to have a seat in the House of Commons. Every hon. member in the forces who comes to attend this house, unless he is on leave, gets no pay or allowances from the army while he is sitting here. It is a strange state of affairs that it should be suggested that a man can continue in business, or continue in a profession, or continue to earn his income in any other line whatsoever, but that if he dares to enter the forces of his majesty to defend his country he is to be excluded from this House of Commons. I hope that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and the leader of the C.C.F. in the province of Saskatchewan, who desired, as I did, to get into the armed services and serve his country, will absolutely repudiate on behalf of their party the suggestion that merely because a man wears his majesty's uniform he should be prevented from sitting in the House of Commons.

FRENCH LEGATION

VACATING OF LEGATION BY FORMER MINISTER—PROVISIONS FOR CUSTODY AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house will be interested in having information with respect to the position of the former French legation and matters surrounding the closing of the legation. I should therefore like to make a statement at this time.

When, on November 7, 1942, forces of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and others of the United Nations, including certain Canadian naval forces, commenced landing operations in North Africa, the government at Vichy ordered resistance and took other measures which made it obvious that it could not longer be recognized as an independent government representing the French state. Accordingly, on November 9, 1942, a statement was made by me to the effect that, following the resistance by the French in North Africa to the British and United States forces landing there, "there no longer exists in France a government that has any effective independent existence—in other words . . . there no longer exists in France a legal or constitutional government in any sense representative of the French people, but only a German puppet government," and that, accordingly, diplomatic relations with the Vichy government were terminated by Canada.

On the same day, November 9, this information was communicated by me to the French minister personally. The formal note conveying the attitude of the Canadian government was sent on November 11.

The effect of the above measures was to withdraw any recognition that had been accorded to the Vichy government and to end all relations with it. This did not mean that France was to be in any way regarded as an enemy.

Immediately following the communication of the attitude of the Canadian government to the French minister, the position of the minister as representative of a French government in Canada ceased.

Following the severance of diplomatic relations, the normal course of action is to place the affairs of the government with whom relations have been broken in the hands of a protecting power. In this case, however, relations had been terminated and a declaration had been made that the Canadian government did not consider that any government any longer existed which could be considered to represent the French state. Consequently, there was no government which could designate a protecting power. Moreover, the possibility that at some later date a real French government might be recognized made it seem unwise to place the handling of affairs in the hands of a third power which might cause difficulty at the time that it was desired to hand over matters to whatever new government might arise.

The former French minister has vacated the legation. Inasmuch as no protecting power has taken over the control of French interests in this country, it has been necessary to make special provision for the custody and maintenance of the French legation property. Special provision has been made by which the property has been placed in the custody of the Capital Trust Corporation Limited, which has accepted custody in accordance with the terms of a letter dated January 22, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The custody and administration by the trust company is subject to the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and must be handed over at any time to any agency which is designated by him to receive the property. Expenses in connection with the maintenance and administration are to be paid out of French funds held by the custodian.

In order to ensure that the legation property will be subject to constant care and attention, it has been arranged that Mr. Anfossy, formerly French vice-consul, will reside on the premises, along with his wife, to supervise the day to day maintenance which is to be carried out by a caretaker. Certain offices in the chancery part of the legation will continue to be used for the administration of war pension payments to persons formerly in receipt of pensions from the French government. With these exceptions, the French legation is now empty. These persons are subject to the arrangements made with the Capital Trust Company which may be altered at any time by order of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

There have been, hitherto, pensions to the amount of approximately $4,000 a month payable by the French government to veterans of the last war and a few other French citizens in Canada who had been recognized as deserving of assistance by the French government. It would obviously cause very great hardship and injustice if these pensions ceased to be paid and, therefore, provision has been made for their payment out of French funds in the hands of the custodian. It has been decided that the administration of these payments will be by the Canadian pension commission, who will receive assistance in the technical aspects of the work from three subordinate members of the former French legation staff. By this means it has been ensured that Canadian residents who have hitherto received pensions payments from the French government will continue to receive them.

It will be recognized that the arrangements which have been made with respect to the various aspects of French interests in Canada are of an interim nature only. As soon as a government appears which is recognized by the Canadian government as being capable of independent action and as truly representing the French people and the French state, all aspects of French affairs in this country will be turned over to the control and administration of the representatives who may be established here by that government.

In taking this action it will be recognized that a position exists in which there is no government or authority recognized either by the Canadian government or by others of the united nations as entitled to speak as the representative of the French state. The enemy occupation of a substantial part of France is not recognized in any way, neither is any puppet government which is in fact subject to enemy domination. At the same time we must all hope that in the not too distant future there will again be a French government which can be recognized by the governments of the united nations as entitled to speak for France. It will then be possible to hand over to such a government the property of the French state in Canada. In the meantime, the Canadian government regards itself as in a position analogous to that of the negotiorum gestor under the principles of French civil law. The application of such principles to the present position would justify the Canadian government in taking measures for the preservation of the property of France and for the discharge of clearly established obligations in Canada of the French state out of French property. These principles would require the government to exercise the utmost good faith in a position closely analogous to that of a trustee under the common law.

I am tabling the following documents which, for the convenience of the members of the house, might be printed in the Votes and Proceedings:

(1) A statement by the Prime Minister of Canada, November 9, 1942.

(2) Letter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to M. Ristelhueber, November 11, 1942.

(3) Letter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Capital Trust Corporation Limited, January 22, 1943.

(4) Letter from the Capital Trust Corporation Limited to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, January 26, 1943.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have only a word or two to say with respect to the statement which the Prime Minister has just read. One is this. I fancy that most members of the house will be anxious that the Prime Minister give some indication as to where M. Ristelhueber is now, if that is not an embarrassing question with respect to the relations of this government with M. Ristelhueber. Another point that occurs to me offhand is this. Are these steps which are contemplated similar in all respects to the steps taken by the United Kingdom government under similar circumstances?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to M. Ristelhueber, he is residing in Ottawa, though not at the legation, and as a means of enabling him to continue to live he receives as a temporary arrangement, moneys out of French funds that are in the hands of our custodian, to pay the customary salary which he had been receiving. I am informed that both M. Ristelhueber and members of his staff have offered their services to General Giraud, but beyond that I have no further information. As to the second question, the situation which arose in Canada had not been paralleled in any other country, so far as I am aware, at any other time. So far as the British government is concerned, France was an ally of Britain from the beginning of the war. When the British embassy was closed it was because every one of its occupants had left France and relations were completely severed. The British embassy in France was placed under a protecting power, first, the United States, later, Switzerland. Our termination of relations took place at a time when, in our view at least, no independent government continued to exist in France.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has there been any French government that has been officially recognized in recent times by the United Kingdom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has not been a United Kingdom ambassador in France for some considerable time past.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the Prime Minister what liaison is maintained between the Canadian government and the fighting French organization in London under General de Gaulle?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to have that question stand as notice, to be answered later.

FUEL

SHORTAGE OF COAL—MEASURES TO DEAL WITH PROBLEMS OF PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday I directed an inquiry to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenize King) seeking information as to any steps the government had in contemplation to meet the serious fuel shortage in Canada, and the right hon. gentleman was good enough to inform the house that he expected that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would have an announcement for us this afternoon. I should be very glad to hear that announcement if the Minister of Finance is in a position to make it now.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This matter was raised by a question which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr.

Diefenbaker) asked last Friday, and I believe that the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) intimated that there was a situation in Ontario as well as in the west.

Before dealing with these specific questions I think I should outline to the house the magnitude of the problem involved in furnishing adequate supplies of coal for domestic use and the difficulties that have been encountered. Prior to the war Canada produced 15,000,000 tons of coal annually and consumed 27,000,000 tons, the difference being met chiefly by imports from the United States, though appreciable quantities were also brought in from the United Kingdom. In 1941 Canadian production reached 18,200,000 tons, but, owing to the enormously increased demands for war purposes, consumption increased to nearly 40,000,000 tons. Meanwhile shipments from overseas had practically ceased, and we had to make up our deficit by imports from the United States, where war demands were also placing a strain on production facilities.

Up until midsummer of 1942, production in Canada continued to increase, but after that date the rate of production began to slip, chiefly owing to labour leaving the coal mines, some to other industries and many into the armed forces. Those that left were largely from the younger and more active age groups, resulting in a decline in output per man.

Consumption of coal, on the other hand, has continued to rise, estimated coal requirements for 1943 being placed at 43,000,000 tons, 3 millions more than in 1941. The United States, because of its own expansion of industry, its own railway congestion and its own coal mine labour problem, will hardly be able to increase its shipments to Canada. For a short period in January the strike in the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania resulted in an almost complete cessation of shipments.

To make matters worse, we have had one of the most severe winters in many years, some say the worst in fifty years, with extremely low temperatures and heavy snow conditions which added to the strain on already congested transportation facilities.

These are the underlying facts of the present coal situation, and I think they will enable members of this house to grasp the magnitude of the problem with which we have been faced.

Difficulties were foreseen, however, and the government has been actively engaged in coping with them. Last summer the coal administrator of the wartime prices and trade board issued emphatic and repeated warnings of a possible shortage, urging consumers to take delivery of their winter coal during the summer months and offering through the banks special arrangements for financing such purchases. Many thousands of people followed this advice, thereby relieving the strain on transportation facilities, and ensuring that they would be warm during the coming winter.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was that a large percentage?

Mr. ILSLEY: Of the coal users? No, a small percentage availed themselves of the facilities. Unfortunately, others ignored the warnings, including many who are now suffering hardship. I believe that while the financing arrangements offered by the government were not taken advantage of on a large scale, the dealers, as a result of the arrangements offered by the government, themselves offered arrangements which were taken advantage of on a fairly large scale.

Realizing that the fuel situation presented one of the most serious threats to the war effort, the government on November 23 last formed an emergency coal production board, naming the coal administrator of the wartime prices and trade board as chairman. Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, and Mr. Charles Payne, of the United Mine Workers, were appointed as the other two members of the board. This board was directed to stimulate increased coal production by all available means with a view to reversing the downward trend in output and, if possible, establish new high records in Canadian production. One of the immediate tasks placed before the board was to deal with production problems in western Canada, where the most serious local shortages have developed.

In the brief period of the board's existence active measures have been taken to prevent further losses in production, particularly in cooperation with the Department of Labour and the armed forces. Arrangements were made under which men experienced in coal mining already in the armed forces might be released on leave. In western Canada this has resulted in 285 experienced men returning to the mines, and others are being approached.

From November 1 to January 14 about 2,300 men were placed with mines through the employment and selective service officers, including a number of certified coal miners. Arrangements were made in early autumn to provide deferments under the military call-up to men working in specified coal mines. Steps were also taken to withhold work permits to those working in coal mines who wished to enter other employment.

In western Canada arrangements were made for provincial governments to issue emergency certificates as a war measure, to allow qualified men to work underground at coal cutting, without having to serve the full probationary period. In the three prairie provinces arrangements were made under which provincial officials might, consistently with selective service regulations, recruit men for the coal mines. Farmers especially were solicited, and some were secured. Farmers generally, where not needed on the farms, were urged to take work in the coal mines during the winter, and a considerable number responded.

In British Columbia 280 former coal miners were taken back to coal mining from other industries. Through employment and selective service offices, coal mines have been asked to provide lists of former employees, and these men are being approached with a view to their returning to the coal mines.

The acute shortage of domestic fuel resulted in special appeals to mine operators, and more especially to miners, to speed up production, which in the main meant asking miners to work harder and longer hours, to cut down absenteeism and certainly to avoid stoppage of work through strikes. During December and January, while we were not entirely free from stoppages due to strikes, in the main the men responded to the appeal very well, and the strikes that did occur were minor, of short duration and quickly settled.

Another side of the coal production problem is the financial ability of the mines themselves to remain in operation. The emergency coal production board was given power to direct the production policy of mines and, where necessary, to provide financial assistance to mines which find themselves financially unable to continue in maximum production. This has been one of the major aspects of the board's work since its formation, and it is hoped that the measures taken will be reflected in increased output.

In so far as this is a distribution problem it is under the jurisdiction of the coal administrator of the wartime prices and trade board, and I am informed that every effort is being made to distribute available supplies to the best advantage. Foreseeing the coming shortage in the west, the coal administrator, as long ago as last September, prohibited the movement of Alberta coal into the Ontario market. More recently, Alberta coal which usually moves into Manitoba was diverted to Saskatchewan, and coal from the United States was brought from the head of the lakes to fill up the resulting deficiency in Manitoba. Instructions have been issued that deliveries to consumers in western Canada are to be limited to those actually in need. In connection with the fuel situation in western Canada, I should point out that due to the shortage of labour, wood fuel supplies upon which many areas are dependent were greatly curtailed, further accentuating the demand for coal.

Within the last few weeks, regional representatives of the coal administrator have been appointed for Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver to regulate and allocate distribution of coal.

In eastern Canada there have been no serious difficulties with the possible exception of isolated shortages of anthracite coal due to the strike in the Pennsylvania fields during January, and some difficulties in distribution due to lack of labour and severe weather conditions.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations, which sat during the last three sessions, will be reconstituted this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I mentioned in my remarks at the opening of the session that the committee would be reconstituted.

CANADIAN NAVY

ARTICLE IN "BOATING" MAGAZINE BY COMMANDER A. D. MACLEAN (RETIRED)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On Wednesday last a question was raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in regard to certain charges by Andrew D. Maclean, retired commander, R.C.N.V.R., entitled "Fairmiles and Foul". At that time the Prime Minister intimated he might have a statement to make with respect to the matter. One of my reasons for calling the attention of the Prime Minister to the question arises from a letter I received yesterday from a parent of a sub-lieutenant in the Canadian navy, who expressed grave concern over the charges made in this article. Is the Prime Minister in a position now to make some statement? I think the matter is sufficiently serious and urgent to warrant some comment being made by the government.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend knows, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) is away, but the matter which my friend has just mentioned was brought to the attention of officers of the department in order that a reply might be prepared for the minister to make when he returns.

Mr. GRAYDON: A considerable section of the press in Canada is calling for some kind of inquiry with respect to it.

Mr. POWER: I cannot speak for the department of naval affairs, but if every disgruntled officer in my department starts writing to the press I am not going to get wildly excited and—

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that on reflection the minister will perhaps not continue that line of argument. After all we are only trying to bring to the attention of the public, and particularly to the attention of the government, the charges that were made.

Mr. POWER: They were not charges at all. It is a tirade regarding promotion.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I might continue; this is a serious matter, one which I do not think should be dismissed lightly by calling someone a disgruntled officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is not debatable.

Mr. GRAYDON: Inquiry will discover whether he is a disgruntled officer, and if he is he will be treated as such. In the meantime the matter ought to be aired to see if there is anything in the charges.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK ON FRIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I intended to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention to follow the usual custom at the earlier stages of the session and adjourn at six o'clock to-night.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That has been the custom followed for many years. We will not depart from it to-night unless strong objection is raised.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, many of the previous speakers in this debate have offered their congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply. I am in accord with that practice, but I am going to call it briefly to your attention in a slightly different way. I think this parliament made history at the opening of this session, when the mover was a Canadian officer in the king's uniform who had been overseas and returned, and was about to go back again, and the seconder was an officer of the Canadian forces ready to go overseas. May I recall, too, that the second speech after the speeches delivered by the leaders of the different parties was that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Booth). He had been overseas, had returned to Canada, and is now on his way or is about to go back. It is worth while recalling that history was made at the opening of this session. I do not think there is any precedent to compare with it. We hope it may never be necessary to follow the same procedure again.

May I say, however, that I was thrilled, and I think every hon. member must have been, when I heard two of those men relate what had taken place in connection with our Canadian forces overseas. We were encouraged to hear about the high standard of morale, courage and enthusiasm, and we were deeply interested in the condition of the British people, and the sacrifices they are making. I believe if we were honest with ourselves, most of us would admit that we had a feeling that we were rededicating ourselves to the winning of the war, so that when the time comes those splendid forces might have proper reinforcements in men, munitions and food.

When those hon. members spoke about Dieppe I recalled to mind the first-hand information I received concerning that raid. I obtained my information in conversation with a hero who had been at Dieppe, a boy from my home town who had been fortunate enough to survive the expedition and return to his home town of Wolseley, but who, unfortunately had paid the price of losing his right leg. Talking with him I heard the story of the men who took part in the Dieppe raid. He told me the conditions they faced, and the reception they received upon their return across the channel. After listening to that story, I rededicated myself to do anything I can to further the interests of Canada's efforts in support of those men.

I believe the speech from the throne was disappointing to the people of Canada. It was long in words but fell far short in concrete announcements of any action to be taken by the government to remove or remedy some of the difficulties we are facing to-day, difficulties having to do not only with the war but with labour, farm man-power and matters of that kind. I am going to support the amendment. Why? Because in contrast with the speech from the throne it sets out some definite proposals, and definite results to be attained if those proposals are carried out.

My chief interest is in agriculture. I believe you will agree, Mr. Speaker—because I have had the honour and pleasure of sitting in the house with Your Honour for some time, and under your speakership—that since coming to the house I have consistently and on numerous occasions, either by resolution, motion or constructive suggestion, brought to the government of the day proposals which, had they been accepted and put into force, would have meant much to the producers I represent. The principles at least of some of my proposals have been accepted, a fact I view with some satisfaction.

I believe there are only two other hon. members in the house who sat on the committee in 1935 to consider the wheat situation. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who, I regret, is not yet in his place on account of an unfortunate accident, served on that committee. I had much to do with the work of that committee, and I recall vividly the fight I made for 90 cent wheat, and the compromise of 87½ cents which was made. While my suggestions have not always been accepted immediately, I have had the satisfaction of witnessing the acceptance of my proposals a year or so after they have been made.

May I recall one or two proposals which I expect will be adopted at this session, only a year after my suggestions. Our first duty as members of parliament is to do all we can to further Canada's war effort and the winning of the war. All other things count for naught. In the language of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speaking at the time of the last victory loan, nothing counts now but victory. That is the way we should approach this session.

What is Canada's war effort? Are we satisfied with it? Can we do more? Are we prepared to do more? These are some of the questions we must answer. I am prepared to give credit where credit is due, because it is well known that we began this war from scratch. I believe that the constructive criticism from this side of the house in 1940 made the government realize we were in a real war, with the result that they began to get busy.

In a review of the situation from 1940 I stated last year that there are two forces of prime importance, namely, the armed forces and those of production. All credit to our armed forces. All credit to the gallant men from western Canada, and from all other parts, who volunteered as soon as war broke out and who are to-day in that magnificent army overseas. Credit is due those men for the way in which they entered the forces and the work they are doing.

In so far as production is concerned we realize at once that this war is quite different from that of 1914-18. We must have vastly greater amounts of munitions and food. In 1940 and the early part of 1941 we were passing through a period of organization of production for our armed forces. That organizational period is over. In the early part of 1942 we were making good headway. I will give credit to the government for making headway, although possibly they were prodded by the opposition. The fact is, however, that progress was made, until we have now reached the period of peak production, or the production of almost all that is necessary. The supplying of materials is the responsibility of the government and the different boards who have this matter in charge.

I believe the farmers throughout Canada have done practically everything asked of them by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). They have responded nobly, and that response is to their credit. We have increased our food production almost to the point required. Possibly this brings us to the question of man-power and woman-power.

I was interested yesterday in hearing the hon. members for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), for Souris (Mr. Ross) and for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) refer to a women's land army. Canadian women, especially the women in western Canada, deserve considerable credit for what they have done. If I had the time I should like to relate to this house the particulars of the work done by women in harvesting the crop in Saskatchewan, particularly in my own district. I have seen women in overalls and sweaters driving stook teams and doing their part in the loading of sheaves in the field. They would bring them up and when they could not unload them at the separator, someone else would take over. On one occasion I saw a woman drive in sixteen miles with a truckload of 121 bushels of wheat. The one bushel was put on because that was the final bushel in her husband's quota. It was a very cold day, and she told me that she had hauled all the wheat from the combine. There was no heater in the truck, and she had put up with considerable hardship in bringing in the wheat. There are many other cases I could detail. I think the women have done wonders in helping their husbands by driving trucks and tractors this last fall. The young girls also have done much of this work.

National selective service should have been put into force properly long ago and then full use could have been made of our man and woman power. Every man and woman in Canada should be placed in a position where he or she can do the most good. I am not going to say much about labour in industry; I do not know anything about that. I do know something about labour on the farm in Saskatchewan. We have heard a great deal about labour in industry, and questions have been placed upon the order paper about this matter, I think any hon. member of this House of Commons who listens to petty grievances —that may not be the right word—of labour leaders or of organized labour or their representatives and is not sure that those grievances are just and right, is doing something he should not do. It is possible that these grievances may be agitated to the extent that strikes in industry may result. Any hon. member who does anything to jeopardize production or cause a bottleneck in our war effort should be open to criticism.

Labour in industry has its rightful position in our national life. It is just as much entitled to fair treatment as farm labour or any other type of labour. My conscience will not trouble me in this regard, because I have done nothing to help them or encourage them to make trouble for this government or anyone else.

There have been certain difficulties in connection with farm labour, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows all about them. Not long ago he was in western Canada. Some of us did not know just why he made the trip, but perhaps we should not be too critical of him; we should give him credit and assume that he was there on business pertaining to his department. But it has been asked why he did not see to it that the order in council freezing farm labour, passed I think on March 23, 1942, was not carried out. Possibly the minister will let us know. If it had been carried out I am sure we would not have the difficulties with which we are now faced in western Canada.

I know of many young men who thought they were going to be permitted to remain on the farm but who were called up last December and January, in many instances on very short notice. I have had all sorts of men come to me with their boys, and I could cite many cases of hardship. At Fort Qu'Appelle there was a farmer who had two boys overseas. His last boy was called up when they had not completed hauling their grain and had no wheat out on their quota. The only other son of a widow who already had one boy overseas was called up. Her husband died last summer. She is operating one of the finest farms in Saskatchewan. This boy was called to report on December 19. He is a fine chap; he told me in my office before his mother that he was going to get into the army because he had a brother over there. This woman may have to give up the whole of the farm upon which she and her late husband had put in their entire life work. These are matters that would have been dealt with properly if the order had been carried out as we expected it would be.

I have had some experience with respect to postponements and young men trying to get leave when they have been called up. There is one incident I am going to relate because I have a report here in the Leader-Post. Mr. Milligan was appointed as the agricultural representative on the national services board in Regina. He was recommended by the Minister of Agriculture and was doing good work. I dealt with him on several occasions and was pleased with the treatment I received. I may say that I never brought any case to the war services board, to the board of review or to Mr. Milligan which I did not think was justified. A father and a son came to me one Monday morning and wanted me to call up Mr. Milligan. I did so and the report came back that he would not talk to me. I called back and asked if he would talk to me after lunch—I thought that perhaps he was busy—but the report came back that he would not talk to me at all. Knowing this man quite well I sat down and wrote him a letter and asked him to let me know just what I had done to warrant the treatment I had received in his refusal to talk to me. The next morning I was called out of bed by a telephone call from this man, who apologized for not having talked with me before. He told me then that he had resigned Saturday night, that he had walked out of the office and told them that he was not going back and would have nothing more to do with it.

Here is the report in the press stating that on Saturday he had had four hundred men to interview him and had received six hundred letters. All this work had piled up and there was no proper machinery to deal with it. If the thing had been properly organized, if he had had the proper assistance, there would not have been this accumulation and things would have gone along much more smoothly.

I am going to give the particulars of another one of these cases with which I had to deal. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture gets the odd anonymous letter; I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) does, and I know I have had a few. I got one not long ago which started out by saying, "You—" and then used a word in the singular that is not parliamentary. The writer went on to tell me what would happen if I did not get some of these cases straightened out for these boys who had been called up. This letter was from a farmer. It had been mailed along the main line. I read through the letter and then down about the fourth paragraph he said, "You so-and-so"—using the same word in the plural—and he referred to Gardiner, Patterson and Perley, and told me what was going to happen to us if such and such a thing was not done. Well, it does not worry me very much. But just for a lark I took this letter across the street to a Liberal friend of mine—the Minister of Agriculture knows him very well. I showed him the letter and he asked, "What are you going to do about it?" I said, "There is nothing I can do about it, but if I could answer it this is what I would say: I do not mind being called what you called me in the first paragraph, Mr. So-and-so, but I do object when you get down to the fourth paragraph associating me with the Minister of Agriculture and Mr. Patterson, because that is their mess, not mine." That is just in passing.

The Minister of Agriculture has announced a policy of more production—and that with less or at least no more man-power. A list was put on Hansard the other day by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) showing the increased production asked for in dairy products, cattle, beef, and so on, ranging all the way from increases of seven to sixty per cent. I am sure the farmers are willing to give increased production. They have done pretty well in trying to meet all the demands that have been made upon them by the Minister of Agriculture, but surely he must realize that this increased production of hogs, dairy products and beef that he asks for means that more labour will be required on the farm. It is not there, and the labour question presents some difficulty.

I have under my hand the report of a speech which the Minister of Agriculture delivered in Saskatoon recently. The report appears in the Western Producer of January 21, and it reports the minister as saying that the labour lag will not hamper food production. The minister went on in that speech to give details of the greater production goals required. But he left the labour situation just as it is. The farmers will do their best; nevertheless it is going to be almost impossible for them, with the present labour situation, to meet these increased production goals asked for.

Yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) urged the appointment of a food ministry and suggested the Minister of Agriculture as the new minister of food. I have no objection to that because if anyone in the present cabinet is to be appointed to that post I think the Minister of Agriculture is possibly the one. Measure him from the chin up and you will find he will measure up with any other member of this House of Commons. He has the ability, if he would only apply it. But even if we give him all the credit that is his due, he cannot do it all. This question of food production is not a new one. A food ministry was advocated by the Canadian federation of agriculture a few days ago. I myself, speaking in this house on February 3 of last year, as reported at page 264 of Hansard, dealt with this very question. I spoke of the two fronts on which we were fighting, the economic and the military, and then I made a plea for a parity of prices for farm products with the products of other industries. I said:

> We want a parity of prices with the products of other industries which the farmer has to buy in order to carry on his business.

Then listen to this. I went on to say:

> After twenty-two and a half months, I think we should have what I would term a food production board to give direction.

I suggested this as long ago as February last—a food production board to give direction to the ministry. I went on to say:

> Represented on that board should be farmers and others, who would direct in the production of different commodities.

I said that a year ago, and what I say now is that the suggestion I made then will have to be accepted, because the Minister of Agriculture cannot do it all and must depend upon advisers. On that board there should be representatives of agriculture, representatives of the Canadian federation of agriculture, and I believe we should also have on that board representatives of the retail merchants of Canada. I know many retail merchants in my part of the country who are almost "nuts" because they simply cannot carry out all the various orders issued by the wartime prices and trade board and the rationing administration. Some of them have even had to go out of business. Certainly they should be represented on such a board because the control of food will touch prices as well as distribution and production. I just wanted to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that I made this suggestion a year ago, and it should have been adopted then.

Coming to the amendment which has been moved, I will quote paragraph (c):

(c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

I am supporting that. When we consider the great contribution that agriculture makes to the national income I think it will be realized that we are not asking very much when we ask for a parity price. Agriculture contributes $996,000,000 out of a total national income of $7,500,000,000. I am quoting from the table which was presented to the house the other day by the hon. member for Haldimand. What did the wheat growers alone do? They made a greater contribution than did any other part of the agricultural industry, a contribution greater than that of almost any other industry in Canada. Last year they produced over 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. At ninety cents Fort William, what did that amount to? I regret that only some 280,000,000 bushels of wheat will be accepted this year. Nevertheless the wheat growers have made a greater contribution than did any other part of the industry to the national income, and yet they received only 13·3 per cent of the national income, while about 40 per cent of the Canadian population are directly dependent upon agriculture. I urge again that an effort be made to bring about a parity of price and a fair share of the national income for the farmer.

I have under my hand one or two indexes which I wish to put on the record because they are most interesting. Taking the period of 1935-1939 as the yardstick at 100, we find that in August, 1939, the index stood at 100, and in August, 1941, two years later, it was 112·8. In January of this year it stood at 118. This includes food, rents, fuel, light, clothing, household furniture, and so on.

I have another index here. The Searle index gives a list of 147 items which the farmer has to buy. In 1913-14 the index stood at 100, and it now stands at 152·8. This means that these items which the farmer has to buy now cost him 52·8 per cent more than did the same items in 1913-14. Here is another index which I think is interesting. It is the index of Canadian industrial activity. In 1937 the index stood at 100. In 1940 it reached a low of 105. In 1941 the index averaged 160, and this year, on February 1, the index stood at 185. Well, where does the farmer get off, with seventy-seven per cent increase in two years, while wheat has increased only twelve and a half per cent, that is, from 80 cents to 90 cents? It is not fair.

I have another index here which is most interesting and which I want to put on the record. It is to be found in the Monetary Times of February 1, and is headed "Milling and grain stocks". Listen:

Of general interest to the people of western Canada was the strength displayed by the milling and grain storage and the agricultural implements groups. Alberta Pacific Grain,—

That is a company which we know has been in difficulties for practically the last twenty years.

Alberta Pacific Grain, preferred, skyrocketed 21 points. . . . The common was up one and three-eighths cents to $1.90, also a high.

That is, the preferred stock skyrocketed 21 points. It is also stated that Ogilvie Flour common and Lake of the Woods reached a new high. The point I wish to make is this. While grain companies stocks are going up, what about the farmers? What profits are they making? The profits of the companies have come from grain which has been taken off the farm and stored in elevators and annexes.

Then how about the milling companies? They, too, have made their profits out of the farmers' grain. But the farmers' stock has not sky-rocketed or hit a new high.

Coming to the price of grain, I am not going to take time to discuss that. It reached 90 cents last year, and last Friday we had an announcement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) that it is going to remain at that figure this coming season. I have before me a statement put out by the department recently which shows that No. 1 wheat is quoted at Saint John at $1.11 or $1.12 a bushel. We know that it does not take the difference between 90 cents and $1.12 to move it to Saint John.

In Britain the farmer is receiving $2.12 a bushel, guaranteed to him, on one of the largest wheat crops ever harvested, over 100,000,000 bushels. In Dakota, which lies south of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the farmer receives $1.21 less the freight but plus seven cents storage which is guaranteed to him at the rate of one cent a month for seven months. I ask hon. members, why should British and United States farmers receive so much more than our farmers? Canadian farmers are just as loyal; they are doing their part and will continue to do it as fully as the farmers in any part of the empire or of any of the allied nations. We should be treated fairly and on an equal basis. The Chicago price for May wheat as I got it to-day is $1.40; at Winnipeg it is 92 cents. Why should there be 48 cents difference? That may be something for the minister to explain.

Early in the session, that is on Friday last, the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced the programme with respect to marketing and production in the coming season. As I moved the adjournment of the house last evening, the minister did me the favour of writing me a note saying that he regretted he could not be here to-day. Accordingly I replied that there were a few things which I intended to say to him to-day that I would defer until some other occasion. However, the Minister of Agriculture is in the chamber, and he is second in command, indeed he may be first in command with respect to this policy, because it deals with production and prices.

Here is one criticism I am going to make at this time. The house has been talking for a week; we have had speeches from every quarter. The first day, before even the mover and the seconder had spoken, an announcement was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although not in any detail, of his policy. In my opinion the Minister of Agriculture should have been one of the earliest speakers after the mover, the seconder and, possibly, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon). At least, following the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture should have gone carefully into this matter and let us know what the whole position is, what the government proposes to do as regards price and production and the rest of it, so that we should not be speaking at random here, as some of us, maybe myself among them, are doing. We should know exactly what the minister has in mind so that we could discuss the subject intelligently. The Minister of Trade and Commerce announced the plan as being a reduction of three to four million acres in wheat, the maintenance of the 14-bushel quota, no storage on farms, the price to remain the same, and the production of oats and barley to be increased, at the same prices. It will be recalled that I started out to say that this would be very unsatisfactory. But I was right when I said it. I have before me a report from Calgary of the meeting of the Canadian federation of agriculture, at which disappointment was expressed in no uncertain language. The president said that he resented the action of the government in ignoring national organizations such as the federation of agriculture, the Saskatchewan pools and so on; and when the government were framing a major policy with respect to this farm problem why should they not have been consulted? Mr. McCaig, president of the Saskatchewan cooperatives, threatened that a delegation of one thousand would come to Ottawa. We had four hundred here last year. That had some result. They did not get all they asked for but they achieved something; and I venture to say that if transportation facilities and accommodation were available there would be a delegation here in protest against this very thing. I believe these organizations should have been consulted. There was no particular hurry; we could have waited another month or, at any rate, three weeks.

Last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised in a speech that there would be proper farm representation on all important boards dealing with production and other farm matters and national war services. Why has that undertaking not been carried out?

My time is about up, but let me say that I hold that the farmers should have a fair deal, which includes fair representation on all boards having to do with production.

I think the amendment is properly worded and meets what is the popular demand. The Progressive Conservative party's creed is freedom, security, opportunity and the British partnership. I believe no one will disagree with those principles. Let me quote from the words of the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party when he spoke on the radio on December 21:

> In my opinion one of the principal obstacles in the way of an all-out prosecution of Canada's war effort is the failure of the government to adopt a courageous and realistic man-power policy. There is confusion and doubt with respect to man-power, not only in the armed services and in the munitions and other plants but also on the farms of this country. This is due to a lack of control and coordination within the government itself, and to an excess of timidity in setting up and enforcing policies which the effective prosecution of the war demands.

There is much of our programme that I should like to put on the record, but in conclusion I will merely say this: I believe we have now reached the point that we should consider those things which count most with respect to Canada's effort in the winning of this war: freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear; that thereby a continued peace may be enjoyed by the peoples of the world, and in particular this great dominion of ours, for many years to come.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, it is quite some time since I offered any contribution to a debate, nor would I do so at the present time if it were not for the fact that I desire to bring to the house and members who are kind enough to listen to me the point of view of the people whom I serve. A number of meetings have been held recently in my city of Portage la Prairie, attended mostly by the farm population, in which the points of view of the people as to certain problems were expressed, and I promised to bring it to the attention of the house.

First of all you will be interested, sir, to know that the majority of people in my riding are satisfied that the war effort carried on by the government and the people of Canada as a whole is creditable. It is true, as they say, that some mistakes have been made, but mistakes are inevitable in any undertaking carried on on such a colossal scale.

I had the privilege of sitting in on a committee, or committees, if you like, just before leaving Portage la Prairie. I believe they are called local advisory committees, and they are being set up by the government to advise those in authority with regard to post-war measures. I think that in this innovation, because after all it is an innovation, we are now getting close to the people, where we belong. In looking over the members of that committee I could not help thinking that they were representative of nearly every organization in our constituency, leading men, good men who desire to do all in their power to help this government or any other government to formulate policies that will be for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada.

I said that some meetings were held and some resolutions were passed, and that is my main reason for rising to-day. One of the resolutions passed, which had the support of the war veterans of our city and district and of the legion, was in protest against the military exemption which is granted to certain denominations sometimes referred to as religious in this country. They know that the Mennonites were exempted from military service by order in council in 1873. They know also that the Doukhobors had a similar arrangement in 1898. We have also a class of settlers in our district whom we call the Hutterites. They have a longer name but I cannot remember their exact title. These people are excellent farmers and efficient producers but they settle in colonies and are declared to be no asset to the district. I am not expressing that as my opinion; it is the opinion that is prevalent among the neighbours who farm adjacent to the land occupied by the sects to which I have referred.

This matter was discussed at the meeting and I suggested that the law which granted these people military exemption should be repealed. I told the meeting that if they would pass a resolution I should be glad to present it in the house. I can look back to a speech—it was very short—which I made on one occasion with regard to the Mennonites, in answer to a speech which had been delivered by the Minister of Agriculture, who told the house that the Mennonites did not want to shoulder a rifle and kill but that they had offered their services in any other capacity in our war effort. I could not allow the occasion to go by without expressing my gratitude and satisfaction that these people were willing to do what they could in regard to our war effort. Of course, I was speaking generally and I presume the Minister of Agriculture was also. But there are others who do not offer any help, and this resolution was passed on that account.

I have the resolution here, and out of courtesy to the meeting which passed it at Portage la Prairie, I will put it on Hansard:

Whereas owing to the enlistment and call up of farmers' sons for military service, land which they formerly assisted in operating is now available for sale or rent.

And whereas the Militia Act, passed in 1868, grants protection from military service to persons of certain religious denominations, who take advantage of this situation by the purchase or lease of said lands.

And whereas conditions have greatly changed since said act was passed, and the action of said persons is resented by many Canadians, and is causing disunity and unrest, and if said protection is to remain in force be it resolved that parliament be urged to take the necessary action to prohibit such exempted persons or sects from purchasing or leasing farm land, without the consent of the municipal commissioner and the council of the rural municipality in which said land is situate, so that the returned men may have an opportunity to buy or lease, if they wish to do so.

I will also put on the record a similar resolution passed at the annual meeting of the union of Manitoba municipalities dealing with the same subject. This is resolution number 27:

Whereas there is information that certain aliens, conscientious objectors and others, who are not supporting the war effort or contributing toward the winning of this war by serving in the armed forces or buying bonds, or in any other way, are purchasing some of the best farm lands for themselves and families;

And whereas after the war a great number of farms will be required for returned men;

Now this convention goes on record as being in favour of legislation which will prevent such persons from buying further farm lands until the end of the war.

I am sorry that circumstances did not permit me to attend the house when the Veterans' Land Act was being passed. I am deeply interested in that measure. Out of my concern to do what I can to further the war effort, if you will, but certainly to make conditions better after the war, I wanted to tackle something that I knew something about. I thought I might be able to offer some advice in regard to reestablishment of our soldiers on the land. The terms of that bill are generous, and if it is properly administered it should prove a blessing to those whom we place on the land. In order that it may do so, three things are essential. The first is proper selection of the applicants. Do not try to fit round pegs into square holes, or vice versa; see that the man has had practical farming experience before he is placed on the land. Unless that first requisite is observed he will never make good. I know that in other days some green men have come to Canada and made good on the land. But conditions now are altogether different. A second essential is that the men should be placed on productive soil, purchased at prevailing values. I discussed this at a meeting at Portage la Prairie, and I said that I believe the board which they are setting up or had set up should be purchasing land now, or at any rate getting options on it, because many of these boys are returning home. The last figure I got was about sixty thousand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is now seventy thousand.

Mr. LEADER: Seventy thousand have been discharged from the army now. Not all are applicants for farms, of course, but many of them would like to get started on a farm right away. So that the directors should get busy and secure some land now. Someone will say that if the government starts buying land now it is bound to boost the price. I told our people at the meeting that we are now controlling the prices of farm products and other commodities, and if you can do that you can control the price of land. Tell them the price of this land must revert to the values placed upon it in 1939 and we will send an arbitrator out to see if that is a fair price.

These farms should be located in improved districts. There is no reason whatever for opening up new districts in this country, especially with our returned men. There is plenty of land available in every municipality, in western Canada at least. Speaking for my own municipality, there are hundreds of farms that can be purchased at current values on which they would be glad to have our soldier boys reestablished. And if they are placed in improved districts the soldier settlers can have the advantage of hydro power, which is exercising the minds of so many of our public men at the present time. These men must be placed on good farms; the buildings should be constructed along roads on which hydro power and other advantages can be made available.

This board or the directors should work in cooperation with three agencies. First of course is the director himself. Next is the provincial government. Most important of all is the municipality, because it gets closest to the people. The municipalities have all the data available, or would have on very short notice. They know where the good lands are. They know who wants to sell, and they know the value. The director should go to the offices of the municipalities and get lists of lands and other information in order to be able to make proper selection and valuation. If these principles are observed our returned men will have the benefit of hydro power and other advantages.

In regard to old age pensions, I am glad to note that nearly every hon. member who speaks on this subject agrees that pensions to old people are inadequate. This view is not held by any particular group; it is held by hon. members in all groups, and it is held by me. In Portage la Prairie we passed a resolution. I have not a copy of it here but speaking from memory it was to this effect: Resolved that the old age pension should be increased to $25 a month and the age limit lowered to sixty-five years. How can people live on $20 a month? In this house I brought out the information that we have paid lawyers $400 a day and granted them $20 a day living allowance in addition. But the pioneers who built this country are expected to live on $20 a month; in fact I know some who are getting as little as $8 a month because the wife happens to have a small amount of money in the bank and they figure that the interest should be deducted from the pension.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is a shame.

Mr. LEADER: I have a resolution passed by the union of Manitoba municipalities. It is long and I shall not read it all, but there is one paragraph I should like to read:

And whereas this convention feels that the age limit for old age pensioners should be reduced to sixty-five years and the maximum pension to old age pensioners and blind persons increased to $25.

Some of our provinces have made a move to increase the old age pension. My own province of Manitoba has gone so far as to say that it will pay its share of this additional $5 that we are asking for. I plead with the federal government to meet that and raise the pension to at least $25 a month. Our present old age pension is a blot on our nation. If we are going to provide a pension at all, let us give the old people something a little more liberal. And I would have it that they get the full $20 without any deductions.

Alberta, I believe, has also made some provision to increase pensions. Both these provinces in the speech from the throne in the legislatures announced it just the other day. Therefore Alberta is in the same category as Manitoba. I believe British Columbia is willing to grant old age pensioners an increased pension.

Mr. FAIR: Alberta has done it.

Mr. LEADER: I am glad to hear that; hats off to Alberta, and I mean that, with the greatest respect.

A few minutes ago I mentioned the electrification of rural districts. I am glad to inform hon. members that in 1935 I brought this matter to the floor of the house as a scheme for the relief of unemployment. I pointed out that there was no reason why our farming communities could not be served by this great labour-saving development. Surely they have as much right to the use of electricity as have the people who live in the cities. I pointed out at that time, and I believe it is true to-day, that one of the reasons why so many of our young people leave the farms is the lack of these very conveniences of which I speak. I am satisfied of that. I have lived among these people. I have seen farmers who have had private plants installed at terrific expense. Their neighbours will say, "Well, that is very nice, but we cannot afford it."

It is pointed out in the speech from the throne in the Manitoba legislature that a commission was appointed last June in that province to investigate the possibilities of electrification in the rural sections. The committee brought in its report in which it was declared that such a scheme was feasible, and that an expenditure of approximately $16,000,000—just postage stamp money, in these days of war finance—would be sufficient. It was pointed out, too, that the equipment would be much cheaper if the tariff on imported electrical equipment were removed. I want to see all possible industries grow and thrive in Canada, but we must not forget that there are other institutions which must thrive also. It was pointed out by the Winnipeg Tribune that the tariff on electrical equipment was 40 per cent. I had not thought it was that high, but I presume that the war regulations have brought it to that level. It was advocated by the commission that the tariff be removed or reduced.

The people of Canada have expended $100,000,000 in erecting a power plant in northern Quebec on the Saguenay river. That is a tremendous sum, when compared with the $16,000,000 required in Manitoba. In our province farmers have to do without electrical power, although it may run right past their doors. It is found in almost every town or village in the province, but it is so costly that the farmers cannot take advantage of it. I visited the airport at Macdonald, which is only a few miles from my home, and I could not help wondering why we could find money so easily to build a power plant out from Portage la Prairie to service this air field, while the farmer living alongside the air field does not have that service. I am not finding fault with that situation; I do not think any one should be allowed to tamper with the plant in war time. But why can we not take advantage of it after the war is over? I think we are going to. These people who ask us where we are going to find the money will not be listened to any more. I believe that was almost the expression used last night by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). As a post-war measure I could think of no better plan. Both farmers and manufacturers will prosper by such a policy, because the installation of hydro power throughout the rural parts of Canada would be bound to help industry and labour. It would help Canada as a whole, and that certainly should be our object. It is the object in my mind to-day.

Coming from Manitoba I should like to say something about a recent change which will affect not only our province but the whole of Canada. I make reference to the selection of John Bracken, the ex-premier of Manitoba, as leader of the Conservative party. Along with that he takes—or his party takes—the name "Progressive." Mr. Bracken was our premier for over twenty years. When he was called upon to lead a progressive government in 1922 he had had no previous political experience. I do not think, in fact, he had any political affiliations. It was a case of the job seeking the man, and that fact in itself marks Mr. Bracken for distinction.

During his tenure of office in Manitoba his government was usually referred to as the Bracken government. He stamped it with his personality, and his record can best be judged by twenty years of unbroken rule. While I do not believe Mr. Bracken needs any testimony from me, I should like to say that he was a first-class premier of a first-class province, but his field of operations of necessity was somewhat circumscribed. I can understand why Mr. Bracken would wish to sit in the federal parliament. He is not an old man, and I presume he is actuated by a desire to continue his services for Canada. As I said before, however, his field of operations in the province was somewhat restricted. When Mr. Bracken sitting in a provincial legislature undertakes to do anything about the tariff he is up against a stone wall. That is federal legislation, and beyond his sphere of influence. Now that he has sought a larger field I believe he will prove an asset to the House of Commons and to Canada.

When I heard the rumour that Mr. Bracken was to become leader of the Conservative party, I was amazed; I was astounded. I could not understand why the Conservative party would want him, and I never thought he would accept their views. But, alas, this strange phenomenon has taken place. The Conservative party, under his leadership, has taken the name "Progressive Conservative." Let us hope that progressive principles are also embodied.

Speaking for myself, and following my usual procedure, I shall support any promise of legislation coming from any group in this chamber, if I think such measures will prove beneficial to our nation's welfare.

I would hate to introduce a jarring note into the discussion. My position on certain questions cannot be misunderstood after the years I have served in parliament. I think—I am just making this reference—that the 1942-43 new policy introduced the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) with regard to wheat is not in the best interests of the Canadian people. Ever since this legislation was brought before the house a few years ago, I have always taken this attitude. I think the policy adopted by the government was faulty, and the regulations announced the other day are the inevitable result of the bad foundation. That is all I want to say to-day with regard to wheat. It may be that I shall have the privilege of speaking further on this matter. I am glad to have had this opportunity of speaking and I thank you, sir, for listening.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, may I, at the outset of my remarks, endorse most emphatically the words of the immediately preceding speaker with respect to old age pensions. I am sure that any hon. members who know anything at all about the situation that exists across Canada to-day in connection with housing conditions and the difficulty of obtaining food must agree that it is impossible for any man or woman to maintain a reasonably decent standard of living on $20 a month. In most cities it is impossible to obtain a room for $20 a month, let alone purchase food and clothing and the other necessities of life.

The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) referred to the matter of more attention being paid to a man's occupation when members of the cabinet were being selected. I agree most heartily with his expressions. Without casting any reflection upon those who are members of my profession, I think more attention should be given to representatives of the two largest bodies in the dominion, labour and agriculture. I have, however, what I believe is a more serious criticism to make with respect to the actions of the administration in the selection of boards which deal with matters pertinent to the whole dominion. The administration has, in my opinion, been most short-sighted in the selection of the membership of many of these boards from the geographical point of view. It seems to me that an examination of some of the most important boards will show that the administration has completely forgotten that there is any other part of Canada than that in the immediate centre. Again I am casting no reflection upon this particular part of the country. I suggest most sincerely and emphatically that unless the viewpoint of all the people of this country is obtained with respect to problems which affect the whole country, we cannot expect to obtain the efficient war effort which we should have at this time.

One of the most serious problems before the Canadian people to-day is the matter of man-power. No one will deny that, and there is no part of Canada more concerned about it than the part from which I come. Agricultural workers are very scarce and farmers are having the greatest difficulty in taking off their crops. In many instances farmers have not been able to take their crops off at all. Yet when it came to the selection of the board which was most concerned with this problem of labour we find—I refer to Hansard of May 20 of last year where an answer is given to a question asked by myself—that the members of the national selective service advisory board, which is described as being composed of the members of the national war labour board and the interdepartmental committee on labour coordination, is made up of eight members from the province of Quebec, six members from the province of Ontario generally and eleven members from the city of Ottawa, a total of twenty-five members. There was not one representative from west of the great lakes on a board which is of paramount importance to workers across this dominion. This is indicative of the insular attitude which has been adopted by the administration with respect to a problem which affects the whole country.

There is another matter which is of interest to the province from which I come and to the other wheat growing provinces, namely, the proposed production of industrial alcohol and synthetic rubber from surplus farm crops, particularly wheat. Yet when an advisory committee was set up the other day to cooperate with the rubber controller in connection with matters involving synthetic rubber, and I presume the production of things like butadiene from which synthetic rubber is manufactured, we find that the chairman of the committee is from Toronto, a gentleman high up in one of the rubber companies of this country, while all the other members come from the central portion of Canada. There is not one from western Canada, not one from the Pacific seaboard or one from the maritimes. This production of synthetic rubber and industrial alcohol is of growing importance to western Canada; yet there is not one representative on that committee from that particular part of the country.

It makes the people out there suspicious that the administration is not giving to these problems the consideration which they, in western Canada, consider is due to them. They feel that they will not be allowed to take their proper place in the war effort of this country unless a larger view is taken of the whole subject. This question was most succinctly expressed a short time ago in the Regina Leader-Post in an editorial which referred to a report concerning the sending of wheat to eastern Canada for the production of industrial alcohol. The editorial was reprinted in the Star-Phoenix of November 4, 1942. I quote:

> A few days ago it was announced that 264,000 tons of wheat were being shipped, or were to be shipped, to central Canadian distilleries to produce 66,000 tons of commercial alcohol. So far as shipping is concerned this means sending by rail 264,000 tons of raw material a distance of about 1,500 miles as against sending one-quarter of that tonnage, if the alcohol were made in the west. Apparently in this case, the question of placing a "strain" on the railway facilities does not count as much as when the proposal is to set up plants in the west.
> Then, of course, the residue from the production of alcohol, amounting to 25 per cent of the weight of the raw material, after liquids and waste have gone down the drain, is first-class stock feed and needed in the west. No doubt someone in Ottawa or Toronto will get the bright idea of shipping it back to the west in cake form at a profit despite the fact that doing so will put another "strain" on the railways.
> The argument for placing these alcohol plants in the west is so logical it cannot be refuted. The same applies in the case of linseed and soya bean oils which are and will be needed in vast quantities both now and after the war.

I would point out that the prairie provinces are being forgotten as far as war production is concerned. But this problem involves more than the immediate present; it involves the future. There is a great deal of talk at the present time about social security, the necessity for sickness insurance, health insurance and the continuation and improvement of unemployment insurance. All these things are necessary; they are long overdue, and I agree with all of them. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took time to send out a few gibes about the position of my party in this connection. The Prime Minister has been in power as Prime Minister for sixteen out of the last twenty-two years, and yet an unemployment insurance scheme which was advocated by his party as long ago as 1919 was not put into effect until a year or two ago. While health insurance is mentioned in the speech from the throne, we do not know when it will be put into effect because it is going to be referred to a committee. These things are required and no matter who brings them in, I will subscribe to them.

It seems to me, however, that we forget a most important principle when we are discussing matters of social security. We do not forget those words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States when they formulated the Atlantic charter—security and freedom from want, but we seem to fail to remember that the whole thing is based upon the necessity of providing gainful employment to all the employable people in this country. When we discuss these matters of social security, unemployment insurance, health insurance, state medicine and so on, we forget a paramount and important premise, namely, that you cannot have them unless the majority of the people of the country are gainfully employed. A scheme of social security will not work if nobody is working.

An hon. MEMBER: What about machinery?

Mr. BENCE: You cannot make machinery work unless you have somebody behind it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You cannot put twelve men to work on a combine.

Mr. BENCE: I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend on that point. If you put one man on a combine where you previously used to have twelve to do the work, I would take the other eleven men and put them at some other useful work. There are all kinds of things which the people of this country need and will want in the future. An important consideration is to provide gainful employment for people who are willing and able to work. One of the first duties of this administration is to ensure that there shall be gainful work. We as individuals in this country, if we have the strength and the health, cannot escape our responsibility. The people want the opportunity to work; they do not want something for nothing.

If the present policy of the administration is continued it will perpetuate a situation which for years has been intolerable in the part of the province from which I come. Those of us who come from the west know that a situation prevails there of which the administration cannot be fully seized. At the present time we are practically one hundred per cent agricultural. We have a large surplus of wheat, and probably at the end of this crop year there will be almost a billion bushels of wheat in Canada—far more than we can hope to consume or export for a number of years to come. It is true that we have a ready market for most of the other farm products we can raise. Our beef, pork, butter, cheese, and the like, can be readily marketed; but let me point out to the house that the need for these other agricultural products is not a permanent one. It is only a temporary condition. After the war is over, and pray that it may be soon, all the countries of Europe which produce these farm products will gradually get into full production again and then we shall not have the need for anything like the quantities of beef and pork and eggs and cheese and butter that are required at the present time.

As to wheat, I will grant that for a short time after the war is over a large amount of the wheat we have on hand will possibly be required to feed the starving countries of Europe, but when the great plains of the Ukraine and other parts of Europe are again in full production we shall not be able to consume or export all the wheat that it is possible for us to produce in this country for human consumption. What is in store for us? Those of us who come from the prairie provinces are concerned about the situation. We feel that the administration is not fully seized of it and is not taking sufficient cognizance of the present situation to bring about a better economic situation in that part of the country. Instead of endeavouring to bring work to the men and women in that part of the country, as has been advocated by myself and by many other members from western Canada, the administration is continually draining our population to the point that now we have, according to the last census, fewer people than we had ten years ago. Our province is being literally denuded of its population by the policy of the administration.

Our men and women are being brought to this part of the country and crammed into Ottawa dwellings. Ottawa is a sufficient example, I should think, to any member of this house. I was aghast when I came down this time to find how many more people there were in Ottawa than a year ago. You cannot get into a restaurant in Ottawa today and it is difficult to get accommodation of any kind. Temporary building after temporary building is being erected to house the office workers. Eight temporary buildings have been built already, and another one is being put up at a cost of $350,000. Why is it necessary to continue to build all these buildings and bring men and women from western Canada to Ottawa and to other congested parts of eastern Canada? It is economically unsound, and so far as an efficient war effort is concerned it is absolute nonsense. In my own local paper for the last number of months advertisements have been printed by different departments of the government in an effort to persuade stenographers and accountants and others to come to work in Ottawa. I will tell you that if those who do decide to come here had any idea of what conditions are like in Ottawa, most of them would not come; in fact I know many who are now endeavouring to get back, but they just cannot find employment out west to go to.

Not only is the government trying to persuade people to leave the west and come to Ottawa through advertisements in the newspapers but the national selective service tell men and women that it is their duty to come down here. They tell men and women in my part of the province that it is their duty to go to eastern Canada and take up war work. It is the duty of the administration, I submit, to see that war work is taken to these people in as large a measure as possible. Not only does the administration tell the people that it is their duty to come here, but it offers them more money than we are able, financially or legally, to pay them.

On the question of congestion and overconcentration, my fear is, and I think it is borne out by the facts, that if we continue this overconcentration and this congestion we shall get far less results per man and woman-power than we would if we had a sane policy of distributing the war economy over the whole of the country.

I was interested in reading an article in a pamphlet called the "Letter-Review" which came to my desk the other day. I will quote briefly from a paragraph having reference to the physical volume of business; it states:

In August, 1941, the index of employment was 156·2; in August, 1942, the index was 173·0. These figures are startling. An increasing number of workers is producing a steadily decreasing volume of goods. It might be well, before we went any farther with selective service, to stop and consider whether we are on the right track. It would be far better to obtain correction by increasing the output per man, rather than to stress too urgently the need of reducing any form of production, if we can avoid that.

Those figures are an indication that, by the very fact of bringing here these numbers of men and women from all parts of the country, we are creating problems of congestion which are taking up the attention, the time and the work of many other people to cope with them—problems of housing, of food conditions and the like.

There are many activities arising out of this war which we believe can be carried on in our particular section of the country. We think we should have more flax processing plants out there. We believe that some of these plants could be located in Saskatchewan, where we are able to produce large amounts of flax. The farmers of Saskatchewan were very much disappointed the other day to be told that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had discovered through a visit to Washington that they could not increase their flax production as they thought they should be able to do, because there were not sufficient plants to process the flax once it was grown. The very kind of thing we should be doing in that part of the country is to retain our man-power there in order that we may assure for it a modicum of prosperity at the present time and in the years to come.

We believe there should be a complete examination of the use of surplus agricultural products for war needs. In the United States of America this matter has been given a great deal of attention, so much so that special senate hearings were held on the matter. I have in my hand three rather thick volumes of the evidence which was given before the United States senate committee. It had been more or less conceded prior to that time that they could not produce industrial alcohol effectively or economically from wheat, but after hearings by this committee those in charge of affairs decided that it was economically possible to produce industrial alcohol and synthetic rubber from grain. As a matter of fact, only a few days ago, in the January 11 issue of Time magazine, the following paragraph appeared:

Some time next week the first synthetic rubber plant in Rubber Czar William Jeffers' 1,000,000-ton programme will actually start turning out butadiene—the strategic chemical that forms the basis of Buna-S tire rubber. The plant: Union Carbide and Carbon's 80,000 ton unit at Institute, West Virginia, which will make rubber from grain alcohol.

We believe that not only should there be flax processing plants in our part of the country but that we should be given an opportunity of producing industrial alcohol and synthetic rubber. We believe also that it is utter folly to be sending our prairie bone to the United States and eastern Canada, there to be made into glue, and that we should be making it where the bone is and where we have men and women to do it if they are only left there.

The greatest opportunity lies before this administration to do something toward solving post-war difficulties in western Canada, if they will take advantage of the opportunities now before them. If they do not do so now, they will never have as good a chance in the future. The important consideration, of course, from the economic point of view, is to ensure that enterprises established in western Canada shall be such as will continue to give employment not only during the period of the war, but afterwards. Such matters as I have suggested—the production of synthetic rubber, the manufacture of glue, and the processing of flax to produce vegetable oils—are industries which can be continued after the war and will not only be valuable economically but bring about a needed diversification in our part of the country. We shall not then be entirely dependent upon the production of agricultural products for human consumption.

Mr. LEADER: May I suggest also the manufacture of farm machinery?

Mr. BENCE: Naturally we should bring to western Canada, if it is possible to do so, opportunities to manufacture everything which is useful in that part of the dominion.

Announcements have been made from time to time in the press as to the cutting down of businesses, and I suppose that the exigencies of the situation render this necessary. But I suggest to the administration that, in the cutting down of these businesses, they consider principles which are being followed in Britain and the United States, and do not continue the present policy of what I term folly. In that connection I would quote a recent article by B. T. Richardson which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of November 4, 1942:

The American intention of considering geographical distribution is based, in part, on the policy of devoting the best and most efficient facilities to war production. This is a factor that has not been raised in Canadian discussion of concentration so far, and there are obvious compelling reasons why, if war production is concentrated as it is in the Ontario-Quebec region, remaining civilian production should be concentrated in other regions such as the west. In other words, the basic or nucleus plants remaining in civilian production should be the plants outside the main war production area, as much as possible.

The men and women who have left our province to come to eastern Canada and create the congested situation which obtains in cities such as Ottawa, Toronto and Hamilton, and the men and women who, being in the armed services, necessarily have moved to other parts of Canada and other parts of the world, will in the greater number of instances be returning to their homes after the war. I am sure that the citizens of Ottawa would not like to see a continuation of the present overcongestion; they expect these people to move; and other cities where congested areas exist expect the same. When the men and women in the armed services come home we want to have something for them to come home to. We want to be able to supply them with employment: we want so to build up our communities in the meantime that they will be worth coming home to. But if the present system of denuding our country of its population and entirely overlooking its right to a fair share of the war effort is to continue, they will have nothing to come home to, and this country will be faced with the greatest economic headache it has ever had.

In that connection, I was pleased to note that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had come back from his recent trip to Great Britain with a point of view to some extent similar to my own. He had reference, I believe, to labour when he made the statement I have in mind, but his remarks apply also to industry and the other matters to which I have referred. This is taken from the Canadian Press of November 7:

My observation is that this tremendous programme—

He is referring to the man-power policy over there.

—perhaps the most important phase of the war effort on the home front, could not have been administered so effectively unless the British had resorted to the principle of decentralization.

Mitchell said he learned that if headquarters of the labour ministry were destroyed by bombing, the eleven regions into which the country is divided could carry on without difficulty.

[Mr. Bence.]

"Surely if decentralization is desirable here it is all the more needed in Canada with our vast distances," he said. "I intend to work in that direction for I believe the British experience in this matter points the way for solution of many of our problems."

I suggest that in addition to the work in connection with the regional offices the administration of labour should, as far as it is possible for them to do so, endeavour to decentralize war-time production and production for ordinary consumer use.

These are important things as far as war work is concerned; but I see no reason why, in addition to spreading out war work and giving us a fair opportunity to perform such work in our part of the country, there should not be some spreading out as far as administration is concerned. May I refer again to the fact that we are continuing to build temporary buildings in Ottawa. According to reports, the authorities are going to erect another building, No. 9, which is going to cost $350,000, and yet we are told that we cannot have erected in the city of Saskatoon a very necessary naval barracks which would cost probably $100,000 because we have not the materials and cannot get priorities. Why have we not the same right to the construction of administration buildings there? We can do work that is commensurately as important and commensurately as good there as here. Why in the world should we not be given an opportunity to erect our building, which is badly needed, as they are given here to erect No. 9 temporary building in Ottawa, or Hull, or wherever it is to be, at a cost of $350,000? Communication is no bar. Someone may suggest that the city of Saskatoon is a long way from here. The Prime Minister himself the other day referred to the fact that communication was so simple now that there was no need of an empire war cabinet, because the government could communicate with London with the greatest ease. Well, Ottawa could communicate with Saskatoon or Regina or Calgary or Edmonton or any of the other cities out in the west with equal facility.

Not only are our people being taken from us; not only are they being brought to eastern Canada, in many instances under intolerable conditions, but at the same time we get a slap in the face by being told that we shall lose four seats in our representation from Saskatchewan and three seats in our representation from Manitoba. And in the speech from the throne it has been stated that a special committee will be set up for the purpose of considering this problem, and for the purpose, I presume, of making a redistribution. Already the newspapers are full of speculations as to what particular district will gain a seat. The city of Ottawa will gain a seat, as a result largely of bringing from other parts of Canada citizens who are ordinarily resident in those parts. I protest as emphatically and as strongly as I can against my province and the province of Manitoba losing any representation at this time, because these are extraordinary times and conditions are extraordinary, and those provinces should not be forced to lose these seats because the administration has been so shortsighted as to have persuaded our people to leave those parts. Ample opportunity is given this House of Commons to see that that course of events is not followed.

The British North America Act makes the following provision in section 51:

> On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be re-adjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules.

I emphasize those words "and from such time". There are two courses open to us. We do not need to put into effect any plan of redistribution at the present time because to do so would be unfair to our part of the country, but we can follow this procedure. We can do as I understand they did in the last war. We can go to the privy council in England if necessary, and this House of Commons can see to it that my province and the province of Manitoba, indeed any of the western provinces, will not lose a seat as a result of the exodus that has taken place from those parts of the country on account of war work and the policy of the administration; and afterwards, when the next census is taken, we shall find ourselves in a position to obtain a fair picture of the situation with respect to our population. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in my closing remarks, let me urge this House of Commons and every member here to consider very seriously before taking any step that is going to rob the provinces of Saskatchewan Manitoba of their proper representation in the councils of the nation.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): First of all, in spite of the suggestion of my very dear and hon. friend the present acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), may I extend my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If the sentiments which were expressed in those speeches could only become the thought of all the people of Canada, what a wonderful country this would be to live in; what a wonderful country in which to face the future for oneself and one's children! Certainly there would be no difficulty about the question either of national unity or of fairness to the people who are underprivileged, as the saying is, or to any great branch of our population such as agriculture, which, as everyone knows, is not getting to-day more than half its fair share of the national income.

Along that line I suggest that what is unfair should not be perpetuated longer than is absolutely necessary. It may have been necessary to freeze agricultural prices at the start of the war in order to be able to set a policy of no inflation in connection with the whole economic set-up; but if something is not done to redress the unfortunate position in which agriculture was placed at the start of the war, it means that agriculture has been frozen into a permanently inferior position for the whole period of the war. The time is rapidly approaching when the agricultural industry is going to make a major contribution to the whole conduct of the war. The question of food will become more and more important. We cannot possibly require people to continue indefinitely labouring on farms at lower wages and with lower returns than they could get in other equally essential war work. As a result of doing so we have to-day a lack of labour in agriculture from one end of Canada to the other. If something is not done to put agriculture on a fair basis with the other industries of the country, I am afraid we shall have to face a real crisis with regard to agricultural production in this dominion. It can be done without in any way upsetting the price level. It can be done by simply paying subsidies in order to give those people who are producing essential food products a fair price and a fair return for their labour. In that connection, we have to-day a situation wherein agricultural income has increased as a result of the increase in the amount of production, but in order to produce that increased quantity we have had people working on the farms hours which in industry would not be tolerated for a moment. We have children working, which would not be permitted in any industry, and we have women working long hours in the fields. That cannot be permitted to continue; it can go on for only a certain length of time. We want to increase our production of agricultural products, but I am afraid our production will begin to fall off unless a fairer deal is given to the people who produce them.

With regard to the position of agriculture in Saskatchewan, I bring this to the attention of the government. During the last war and from time to time when we were having difficulty keeping people on the farms in western Canada, western legislatures passed debt adjustment acts, which meant that if a farmer was doing his best to meet his obligations a creditor was not permitted to eject him from his farm. Apparently that legislation has been ruled ultra vires of the provincial legislatures, which means that with regard to any debt incurred after May 1, 1935, a creditor will be able to eject a man from his farm even though he is doing his best to produce in support of the war effort. It means also that men who went before the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act boards and had their debts adjusted to some extent, cannot meet the terms set out in the orders of those boards, also can be ejected from their farms. It means that, owing to the policy of the Saskatchewan national war services board of ignoring the government policy laid down by the order in council of March, 1942, and of sometimes taking the last boy from the farm, even though he may be the only boy left to a widowed mother, farmers in some instances of sixty-five to seventy years of age have lost the only boy working on the farm. With prices of what they have to sell frozen at low levels and the protection in connection with their land taken from them by the decision of the privy council, we have put some of these men in the position where their farms may be taken from them while their boys are fighting for this country. I have no doubt that the government will do something to protect those worthy people. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will do something in that regard. But I suggest that he consult the provincial attorneys-general who know the problem and how serious it is, and follow their advice rather than advice he may get from some people here in eastern Canada and particularly Ontario who seem to have an idea that the farmer is not doing his best to meet his obligations. I have lived among farming people all my life, and it seems to me that they of all people are the ones who worry most about their obligations and are most anxious to meet them. Therefore I urge him to see to it that these worthy people who are doing great things in relation to the war effort are protected as far as the possession of their farms and homes is concerned.

One other matter I wish to speak about before six o'clock is the representation of Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the House of Commons. If we followed strictly the policy of representation by population, we might be accused of being on unsound ground in asking the government to postpone the redistribution until after the war. We however do not do so. I have under my hand a table which shows that on one ground and another, apart from Quebec, no provinces after the next redistribution will be represented on the basis of population except Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. All the other provinces are not and will not be represented on the basis of population, owing to riders that were interjected for one reason or another, whereby they were given special protection. We ask that this measure be postponed until after the war because we have lost so many of our population on account of war conditions. In doing so, we are not asking for nearly as much as other provinces have asked for and obtained in the past from a fair-minded Canadian people. This is the table to which I have referred:

Representation in House of Commons

	Number of members province will have after next redistribution	Number of members province would have if representation based strictly on population	Excess over population basis

Nova Scotia	12	11	1
New Brunswick	10	9	1

Ontario	82	74	8

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think it was understood that questions and motions for papers would be taken up before proceeding to-day with the debate on the address. If the house is agreeable to that, I need not put a motion.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally indicated by an asterisk.)

OTTAWA SNOW CLEARANCE—USE OF SOLDIERS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. By whose authority were soldiers in the Canadian army ordered to assist the Ottawa Electric Railway Company, Limited, in snow clearance, on or about December 31, 1942?
2. How many soldiers were allotted to the task?
3. What amount, if any, was paid by this private company to the Department of National Defence for the services thus rendered?
4. Was this amount, if any, arrived at on an hourly rate? If so, what was the rate?
5. Did the soldiers receive additional remuneration?

Mr. POWER:

1. The Adjutant-General.
2. 307.
3. None.
4. See answer to Question 3.
5. No.

*RADIO BROADCASTING—DOCTOR WATSON THOMSON

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is Watson Thomson engaged in radio work for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
2. If so, what are his fees, allowances and other emoluments, who recommended his appointment and for what purpose?
3. Has the attention of the government been called to some of his utterances reflecting on the mother country and were his addresses submitted to the government before delivery?
4. Is this man still in the employ of the corporation?
5. If so, in what capacity?
6. Is he a returned soldier and has he any military record?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I consulted with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in respect to question No. 7 and was given the following information and they stated they had no objection to its being brought down. The answers are as follows:

1. Mr. Watson Thomson gives occasional broadcasts on invitation by the supervisor of talks of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
2. The regular fee paid for such broadcasts, i.e. $25 per occasion; he was first engaged by Mr. Donald Buchanan in June, 1939, and later by Mr. Hugh Morrison, who succeeded Mr. Buchanan; he is one of a panel of three engaged to talk alternately on the series "Week-End Review".
3. No.
4. He gave his final talk in the present series on February 7, 1943.
5. See answer to No. 2.
6. The information obtained from Mr. Thomson shows that he was a signaller attached to the Royal Field Artillery between March, 1917, and October, 1919, and saw active service in France between April, 1918, and the armistice.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if in his answer to question No. 4 he means that Doctor Thomson has given the last of his talks in the series but that there will be another series, or is he now out of the employ of the corporation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I can answer that, Mr. Speaker. He was engaged for a series, one of a panel of three gentlemen who did speak. He has given his final talk on that series and there is no other engagement standing at the present.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just ask the minister a question on one remark that he made. He said that the corporation had no objection to this information being brought down. What was the significance of that remark, if any?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I was stating a fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I think there is an important principle involved in that particular reply, as to whether it is merely at the discretion of the corporation that the question is answered. That is the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question No. 7 must be considered as having been answered and no discussion can take place thereon.

MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY AND ENVOYS EXTRAORDINARY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary have been appointed since the house adjourned on August 1, 1942, to where and at what cost to Canada?
2. Where are they located?
3. Who compose their staff and what are their respective salaries, travelling expenses, living allowances and all other emoluments?
4. What previous experience had they before their present appointment as diplomats?

5. Was the government of Great Britain consulted or advised as to their selection or appointment in view of the war and the need of joint action with British embassies?

6. Are their speeches, on and off the record, first submitted to the government before being published, and does the government accept responsibility for their utterances?

7. What expenses have been incurred by each of these diplomats since appointment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Four ministerial appointments to diplomatic posts abroad have been made since the house adjourned on August 1, 1942. Canadian ministers will shortly be going forward to the following countries: China, the U.S.S.R., Chile. In addition it has been decided to accredit a Canadian minister to a number of allied governments now temporarily established in London. Until these missions are actually established and final arrangements are completed, it is impossible to determine what the final financial arrangements will be.

2. When the four ministers arrive at their posts they will be located at Chungking, Kuibyshev, Santiago and London.

3. Canadian Legation, U.S.S.R. Minister—L. D. Wilgress, Brigadier H. Lefebvre, R. M. Macdonnell, Major G. J. Okulitch, A. C. Smith, J. A. McCordick.

Canadian Legation, China. Minister—Major-General V. W. Odlum, G. S. Patterson, R. E. Collins, Major H. Wooster.

Canadian Legation, Chile. Minister—W. F. Chipman, M. J. Vechsler, Jules Leger.

Canadian Legation, Allied Governments in London. Minister—Major General G. P. Vanier, Pierre Dupuy.

Since financial arrangements cannot be completed until the various missions abroad are actually established, it is not possible to provide this information at the present time.

4. The experience and abilities of each of the ministers appointed to these posts is a matter of public record.

5. Canadian ministers are appointed by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the Government of Canada. In accordance with usual constitutional practice, the United Kingdom government has been fully informed in each case before the opening of new diplomatic missions.

6. For obvious reasons it would be impracticable to arrange for the submission of such speeches in advance in all cases. In general, however, it may be said that the government accepts responsibility for statements made abroad by its representatives when acting in their official capacities.

7. See answer to question 3.

[Mr. Church.]

VICHY REPRESENTATIVE IN OTTAWA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the government still recognize the Vichy French government and their representative in Canada?

2. Has Vichy still an embassy in Ottawa and who compose the staff?

3. Have they representatives elsewhere in Canada? If so, where, and who are the members of the staff at each location?

4. Is there any inspection of this embassy or of its mail, cables or other communications?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Answered by 1, 2 and 3.

WAR PENSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any pension tribunals yet been set up to deal with casualties in the present war?

2. If so, where?

3. What policy has been laid down and what rules and regulations have been issued in this respect?

4. How many applications have been received for pensions so far in this war and what action has been taken in the matter?

5. What is the total sum paid to the end of 1942 for pensions and other direct aid to dependents of casualties in this war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Yes. Provision has been made whereby the Canadian pension commission and appeal boards of the commission adjudicate upon applications for pension in respect of disability or death suffered by members or former members of the Naval, Military and Air Forces of Canada during the present war.

2. The Pension Act provides for initial consideration of all applications at the head office of the Canadian pension commission. When an application is not wholly granted the applicant may, if he so desires, have a hearing before an appeal board of the commission sitting in his district without expense to him and with a minimum of inconvenience.

3. Early in 1941 a special parliamentary committee gave exhaustive consideration to pension and other related matters arising out of the present war. As a result of its recommendations, the Pension Act was amended so as to make its provisions, rules and regulations with appropriate modifications applicable to the present war.

As a result of these modifications, in respect of military service rendered during the war with the German reich, pensions are awarded in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule A of the Pension Act for disabilities and in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule B of the Pension Act for death. In respect of service, any part of which has been rendered outside Canada, pension may be awarded for disability or death incurred during or attributable to service.

In respect of military service during the war with the German reich which has been wholly rendered in Canada on and after the 21st day of May, 1940, and no part of which has been rendered in a theatre of actual war, pensions are awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who suffer disability in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule A of the Pension Act and in respect of members of the forces who die, in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule B of the Pension Act, when the disability or death in respect of which the application for pension was made arose out of and was directly connected with such military service.

In cases in the present war in which pension cannot be awarded as above, but where the applicant is seriously disabled, or dies, as a result of a disability incurred during service, and he or his dependents are in necessitous circumstances, the commission may, in its discretion, award such pension not exceeding the rates payable under Schedule A or B to this act as it may from time to time deem to be adequate in the circumstances.

4. Formal or personal application for pension has been made in a very limited number of cases and, of these, no statistical record is kept. Such formal application, however, is not awaited by the Canadian pension commission, but every member of the forces who is discharged as medically unfit is considered by the commission to be an applicant for pension. Since the outbreak of the present war, the commission has considered 38,370 such cases. In 6,601 cases, entitlement has been granted.

5. $1,536,082.

RADIO BROADCASTING—SPEECHES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What members of the houses of parliament have been given free time on the radio by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1935, to the end of January, 1943, for what purposes and by whose authority, or under what rules or regulations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. Was there any censorship of such addresses?

3. What free time was allowed by the corporation for reports of their speeches delivered in Canada before community clubs or other civilian or military meetings?

4. What number of such speeches were printed and distributed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and at what cost?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Speaker, I have taken this question up with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and am informed that it will take about one month to prepare a reply, and that is, of course, apart from any question of privileged documents, into which I do not now go. I should like to make the suggestion for the consideration of the hon. gentleman who asks this question that the question be brought before the committee the creation of which was announced in this house a few days ago by the Prime Minister.

Question stands.

POSTAL SERVICE—DISTRIBUTION OF "LONDON ECHO"

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

3. If so, by whom was such classification authorized?

4. Who are the registered owners and directors of this paper?

Mr. MULOCK:

2. Yes.

3. Post Office Department in 1879.

4. No information.

3. Have any changes been made by order in council in the National Housing Act?

4. Order in Council P.C. 4020 dated December 5, 1939, restricts loans to single-family houses and to amounts not in excess of $4,000.

Order in Council P.C. 11047 dated December 8, 1942, provided for a sliding scale of loans for the purpose of making higher percentage loans on lower cost houses thus increasing the limit under which 90 per cent loans could be made from $2,500 up to $3,200 as per the following schedule:

Ninety per cent when the lending value does not exceed $3,200, or

Eighty-nine per cent when the lending value exceeds $3,200 but does not exceed $3,300, or

Eighty-eight per cent when the lending value exceeds $3,300 but does not exceed $3,400, or

3. Are any conditions attached to their postponement of service and duty?

4. If so, what are such conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL:

2. Section 10(15) was put in the regulations at the request of the Department of National Defence. As the men are being called for that department, it was felt that they were best able to decide how the men could be most usefully employed.

3. Yes.

4. Only that they are in the reserve army with the rank senior to that of corporal and the Department of National Defence has not requested that they be called up.

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENT OF ENEMY ALIENS

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many enemy aliens domiciled in Canada have applied for enlistment in the Canadian army, navy and air force since the outbreak of the present war?

2. Have any enemy aliens been enlisted in the said forces since the outbreak of war? If so, how many?

3. Have any enemy alien members of the Canadian armed forces been sent out of Canada since their enlistment? If so, how many and to where?

4. How many of such persons have been discharged from the armed forces since the outbreak of the present war?

5. Of those discharged, how many were discharged because of the fact that they were enemy aliens, and how many for other reasons?

6. What was the date of enlistment and date of discharge of each enemy alien who was enlisted and subsequently discharged?

Mr. SHAW:

1. Did Hans Ludwig Backs, an enemy alien, apply for enlistment in the Canadian army at Calgary, between January and April, 1942?

2. If so, who was the officer at Calgary who took Mr. Back's application?

3. Was this application sent to Ottawa for consideration?

4. Was it approved? If so, what is the name of the official who approved same?

5. Upon what date was Mr. Backs enlisted in the Canadian active army?

6. Where did he take his basic training?

7. Was he trained at the Trade Training School, London, Ontario? If so, for what period of time?

8. Has this man been discharged from the army?

9. If so, upon what date and for what reason?

Mr. SHAW:

1. Was Bernard Schaght, an enemy alien, enlisted in the Canadian army in Calgary in 1940 or 1941?

2. If so, who approved of his application for enlistment?

3. What period of training was he given in Canada?

4. Was he sent out of Canada? If so, where was he sent and when?

5. Has he been discharged from the army?

6. If so, when and for what reason?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, with respect to these three questions, I might make the following reply, first with regard to the security difficulties which might arise, and secondly with regard to the physical difficulties in preparing the answers. First with regard to the security difficulties, this answer comes to me from the director of military intelligence, as follows:

Answers to these questions would inform the enemy the number of men in the army, both here and overseas, who probably have relatives in enemy countries. This creates a situation where such relatives might be made the object of enemy vengeance. This is unfair to the men themselves.

If such men are taken prisoners, they are liable to be shot forthwith, as traitors to their country of origin.

The misinterpretation which could be placed on this information by other members of the army could lead to mistrust and suspicion of men possessing Germanic names, with consequent impairment of efficiency.

It is considered that for security reasons the information requested should not be disclosed.

Secondly, with regard to physical difficulties, the information is as follows:

1. Number who have applied for enlistment unknown as recruiting officers do not record or report particulars of personnel turned away or rejected.

2. Yes. Number unknown—see footnote.

3. No known enemy aliens have been sent out of Canada—but see footnote.

4. Numbers unknown but all are included in group of approximately 1,800 persons who have been discharged because their services were no longer required. Exact figures can only be obtained by examining all files of this group. Names of individuals cannot be disclosed in interests of security.

5. Answered by 4.

6. Answered by 4.

Footnote

Policy is not to enlist or call up enemy aliens but some nationals of countries now at war against the allied nations were enlisted or called owing to

(i) failure to disclose correct nationality;

(ii) enlistment or call up prior to the entry of their country into the war.

No known enemy aliens have been sent out of Canada.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, might I point out in connection with the first of these three questions that I have made only reference to numbers. As to the statement now made by the minister, one answer is not correct inasmuch as certain enemy aliens have been sent out of the country, Germans who enlisted after their country became involved in war. I should like to have that corrected if possible.

"Alberta debts reference appeal dismissed on ground act relates to insolvency stop Further ground act seriously interferes with existing bankruptcy act stop Board recognize debts may be statute barred because act has been applied but hardship only removable by province.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—STRIKE IN STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister or any official of his staff, the Minister of Labour or any official of his department, and the representatives of the employees and of the employers in connection with the strike in the steel industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say a word just here with regard to this motion; it applies to other returns as well. There is no reason why a complete return should not be made up. It might, however, be possible to save a great deal of labour in the departments and a good deal of expense as well if the files could be looked over in advance by the hon. member who is asking for it. In the case of at least some of these returns there are a great many communications which have been sent in for obvious reasons but are really not very important, considering, in some cases, the sources from which they come. After seeing the papers the hon. member could decide for himself which ones he would wish to have brought down as a return.

Take, for example, the request for correspondence on the steel strike. I received a very large number of telegrams, obviously the result of certain organizations having been circularized to make particular representations. They were so identical in phraseology that there could be no doubt on that. This happens in regard to any number of subjects. To have all those telegrams individually copied by stenographers, to say nothing of the time of officials who have to look them over, is just a waste of public money. At this time of war, when we are seeking to economize in the departments and when officials in the departments are overworked, I would ask hon. members to be as specific as they can in regard to the material they may wish to have brought down, and, where it will help to serve the public interest in the matter of economy and time, to be prepared to follow the course which I have suggested—namely, go to the department and see what information there is and limit as much as possible the material which is to be copied and brought down. In these matters there is no desire on the part of the government to conceal or hold back any information, but of necessity there must be, or should be, discretion exercised on the part of the minister in respect to the amount of work involved in different returns.

Mr. GRAYDON: I might say something on that point. I have no doubt that as a rule hon. members who ask questions or have motions on the order paper for the production of papers are not familiar with how much work the preparation of the return will actually involve. Until such time as the motion appears on the order paper and the full information is asked for it is difficult for a private member to assess the exact relationship of certain correspondence to the general subject to which he is referring. In answer to the remarks of the Prime Minister with respect to this matter, I would say that if there is a great deal of correspondence which is of a similar nature to that which has preceded it, there might be some way of having reference made to that fact on the return so that a great volume of material need not be copied out at public expense. I would thoroughly agree with that. On the other hand it must be remembered that, once a return is passed, it is not merely for the private information of some hon. member. It is for the information of the house and of the public. We must bear that in mind in connection with the answer which the Prime Minister has made.

Mr. HOMUTH: I think if the Prime Minister will read that question over he will find that it deals only with the official documents as between the strikers, the negotiators and his department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I was saying really had reference to several of the motions.

REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE BARLOW ON STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of the report of the commission investigating conditions in the steel industry, which was headed by Mr. Justice Barlow, together with a copy of the minority report.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—GENERAL MANAGER

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda or other documents passing between the chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or any member of that board or any official of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the Prime Minister, or any member of his staff, the clerk of the privy council, the Minister of National War Services, or any official of his department, the Minister of Munitions and Supply or any official of his department, or the Minister of Transport or any official of his department, with respect to the retirement of Major Gladstone Murray from the position of general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, his appointment as director of broadcasting of the said corporation, the appointment of the Rev. J. S. Thomson to succeed him as general manager, and the salaries to be paid to the said persons and to the assistant general manager of the said corporation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to this and certain other motions, it is generally recognized that communications between a minister of the crown and officials of the government are privileged and that it is within the discretion and also the responsibility of a minister to decide whether such communications should or should not be brought down in a return. Take for example a matter which has to be decided by a minister, involving communications which he receives from members of his staff. Unless it were understood that communications of the sort would be privileged, many communications would be drafted, not so much with a view to giving a minister the exact information he would wish to have as with a view to having the communication in a form in which it might be made public. That is quite obvious, and therefore it has always been understood that communications between departmental officials and heads of departments are privileged. In regard to the particular request in this motion, there may be communications concerning the appointment of one person or the retirement of another to the bringing down of which there could be no objection. But in other cases there are communications, which I can think of, wherein the government has sought to get information with respect to say some matter to be considered by the cabinet. It would certainly not do to have communications of that character brought down.

Here too it is necessary to consider what I mentioned a moment ago, about the amount of time and expense involved in seeking to provide information. This may be a matter largely of procedure. The government might say, with respect to bodies such as the CBC, we will consider only such questions as are placed upon the order paper in the first instance and refuse to provide a committee by which information in detail may be obtained. On the other hand, the government might take the view, that a committee of the house should be appointed to look into certain matters and that all information must be elicited before that committee. I do not think either would be a good position to take exclusively. I do say, however, that as respects the time of the house as well as the business and the procedure of the house generally, where we have a committee for the purpose of dealing with any subject, questions should be asked and information elicited in the committee rather than by means of questions and motions on the order paper. There may be some questions which hon. members would like to have answered immediately, but where there is a committee of the house dealing with a subject, as there will be with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I should think that information should be sought in the committee rather than by questions on the order paper.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister's suggestion with reference to this question underlines the question I asked the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche). It raises the whole matter of the status of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That was the purpose of my question to the Minister of National War Services and I am anxious to see the position clarified. As I understood the Prime Minister's remarks they implied, to me at any rate, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is now regarded as a department of government, whereas I have always understood that it was a free and independent corporation and therefore had not the same standing as departments of government with regard to correspondence between a minister of the crown and officials of the corporation. That is the point I had in mind when I asked the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was about to make an observation similar to that of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I was amazed to hear the Prime Minister, in reference to this question suggest that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had the same status as a department of government. Those of us who have made some study of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's structure realize that it is half and half, so to speak, partly a department of government and partly a public corporation. As I understand, it is in some respects like the Canadian National Railways while in other respects it is not. One of the recommendations of the radio broadcasting committee last year was that this anomalous position of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be clarified, and I hope the government will do something about it.

The Prime Minister is not on solid ground when he argues that in a matter of this kind communications between the minister of the crown responsible and officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be in any way privileged. If we are to take the government's view, as outlined so many times, that this is a free and independent corporation, then it seems to me that there cannot possibly be privilege as between a minister of the crown and a free and independent corporation such as this is supposed to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's description of this corporation as being partly one thing and partly the other is, I think, fairly accurate with regard to the view of the situation as it stands at the present time. It was for that reason that I made my remarks quite general and indicated that, while there might be some information which the government would be prepared to give immediately, there was other information which should properly be brought out only before the committee appointed to deal with matters affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Certainly it is not the government's view that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a department of government. It is not; it is a separate corporation. It is, however, a corporation with respect to the affairs of which the government is of the opinion that a committee of this house may be appointed to discuss. There is that difference. The fact that we are having a committee on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation makes clear that it is in a different category, vis a vis the house, from other corporations.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the pleasure of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Subject to what has been said.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING—SPEECHES OF MEMBERS OR POLITICAL LEADERS

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, or other documents exchanged between any member of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any official of the said corporation and any other person, since March 31, 1942, with respect to the broadcasting of speeches of any member of the government or of any leader or representative of any political party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is information that might be brought out before the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, dropped.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff), for whom I have moved the motion, I must protest against the Prime Minister taking that attitude. I know what he would say if he were on this side of the house asking the question. This is something to which we are entitled and we want the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not saying that my hon. friend is not entitled to it, but I am saying that the time and place to get it is before the committee. To take up the time of the house in discussion on returns to be brought down would only mean that whatever is brought down would be gone all over again when the committee is in session.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think perhaps the Prime Minister might review his position and allow this information to come down, because it is information which, in my opinion, we should have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I make this statement because I have a responsibility for the procedure to be adopted in the house. If we begin to pass motions which call for detailed information regarding these outside organizations whose affairs are to be reviewed by committees, we shall be spending unnecessarily a great deal of the time of the public service in preparing returns to those motions.

Mr. HOMUTH: If the information must be prepared for the committee, why can it not be prepared in response to a motion in the house and brought down in the regular way?

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: All in favour of the motion please say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed, nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. HOMUTH: We expected that, anyway.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Subject to the reservation I made a little while ago with respect to these motions that call for pretty nearly everything.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the Prime Minister.

MOBILIZATION ACT—POSTING OF MEN FOR EXTRATERRITORIAL SERVICE

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all orders in council authorizing the posting for service of men called up pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, outside the territorial limits of Canada.

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all governor general's warrants issued since January 1, 1942.

ENDEAVOUR, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence, recommendations, reports and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, dated since January 1, 1941, regarding the change of postmaster at Endeavour, Saskatchewan.

Mr. MULOCK: No objection, but subject to the usual reservation that the reports of officials are confidential, and are tabled only at the discretion of the minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: You have that too.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

INVESTIGATION INTO SINKING OF P.E.I. CAR FERRY "CHARLOTTETOWN"

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of the findings of Mr. Justice Archibald, Halifax, Nova Scotia, with respect to the sinking of the ferry steamship Charlottetown off the coast of Nova Scotia in 1941.

ALBERTA DEBT ADJUSTMENT LEGISLATION

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters and other documents exchanged between the dominion government or any official thereof and the government of the province of Alberta or other provincial government or any official thereof, concerning the Alberta debt legislation, as well as a copy of all briefs submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the judicial committee of the privy council, along with a copy of decisions that have been handed down with regard to this legislation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I take it the copies of decisions which have been handed down are the decisions in the supreme court, and before the privy council.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And not decisions which have been handed down by other courts prior to that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, only those two.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will realize it will be some time before we can have these documents ready.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

CANADIAN ARMY—ENLISTMENTS, DISCHARGES, ETC.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing:—(a) the total number of men by military districts who have enlisted with the Canadian active army as of the latest available date; (b) the total number of men by military districts serving overseas with the Canadian army as of the latest available date; (c) the total number of men by military districts who are attested for service anywhere, but who are now serving in Canada, as of the latest available date; (d) the total number of men by military districts who are serving with the Canadian army reserve, as of the latest available date; (e) the total number of men by military districts, and/or administrative districts, who have been called up for training and service pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, as of the latest available date; (f) the total number of men by military districts and/or administrative districts, called up for training and service under the National Resources Mobilization Act who have volunteered for service anywhere; (g) the total number of men who have been discharged from the Canadian active army on the ground of (1) medical unfitness, (2) misconduct, (3) all other reasons.

Mr. POWER: There is no objection whatsoever, indeed the information is readily available, with respect to (a), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g). But with respect to (b), if my hon. friend wants that information at once there will be some difficulty, and it may take some time. If he will permit me to table as soon as possible the information with respect to all the others, and would ask a separate question with respect to (b), we would be able to get it out for him. But I must advise him it would take some time to get the information, because I fear it would mean the examination of files overseas. Perhaps my hon. friend would have a chat with me as to whether he wants the information concerning (b) to the extent he wishes to have the other information. In any event, the order may pass, with that exception.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the statement made by the minister.

RADIO BROADCASTING

VACANCIES ON BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I am informed there are now two vacancies on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house when the appointments will be made, and when making them does he propose to follow the recommendation of last year's report of the committee on radio broadcasting that if possible there should be included persons who would be able to represent the points of view of agriculture and labour?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government has been considering carefully the recommendations of the committee which sat last year. What my hon. friend has mentioned is just one of the considerations of which the government is anxious to take account. How soon the appointments can be made I cannot say at the present time, but I hope it will be very soon.

MILITARY SERVICE

REFERENCE TO CERTAIN LETTERS FROM THE MEMBER FOR COMOX-ALBERNI TO HON. MR. LAFLECHE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask two questions of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche). I really should make it a question of privilege, because it concerns the privileges of all members; but if I get these questions answered it may suffice.

On May 5, 1942, I wrote the minister, who was then deputy minister, on some matters of public concern with respect to selective service. I wanted information that the public should have. Receiving no answer I wrote again on August 3 of last year. Having got no answer I wrote again on September 29, and specified five specific questions on which I wanted definite answers. Getting no answer I wrote again on December 29, and again no answer. I wrote again on January 30, 1943, and again no answer—five letters and no reply.

The questions I wish to ask the minister are these. Does he not think that anyone, whether a member of parliament or a private individual in Canada, who writes civilly and definitely to a public servant ought to get an answer to his questions in less than nine months? My second question is, when may I expect an answer, not just an acknowledgment or a stall?

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, may I say to my hon. friend that I did write him recently—

Mr. NEILL: On a totally different subject.

Mr. LaFLECHE: —and in my letter I requested the pleasure of discussing matters with him. May I say that the matters about which he put the questions, in the correspondence he mentions, were very largely in a state of flux throughout; and at the present time they are not under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National War Services.

I certainly agree with the hon. member that he should have answers, and I shall do my best to supply them. But I would request the privilege of discussing these matters with him, so that I can help him all the more.

FOOD

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED SHORTAGE OF POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): In view of the fact that there is a shortage of potatoes in some districts in Canada, will the Minister of Agriculture make a statement as to what is being done to remedy the situation?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be in a position to discuss that matter during the course of a day or two.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister gave me that same reply last year in regard to beef, and I waited months for the answer. I hope he will not take as long in this case.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

REPRESENTATION OF FISHERIES DEPARTMENT ON ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question in regard to an announcement appearing in the press that a committee has been set up to formulate plans for post-war reconstruction, on which apparently most of the departments of the government are represented. Will the Prime Minister not go further and consider having a representative on that committee from the Department of Fisheries?

[Mr. Neill.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I imagine the committee to which my hon. friend is referring is the economic advisory committee. If that is so it will not be necessary to consider the matter further, as Doctor Finn, the deputy minister of fisheries, has been named a member of that committee.

Mr. REID: That announcement was not made; that was why I asked the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for the question.

FINANCIAL MEASURES

PROVISIONS FOR CONTINUED FLOW OF CANADIAN MUNITIONS AND SUPPLIES TO THEATRES OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement concerning the business which the government proposes to place before the house in the next few weeks. I have particularly in mind several financial measures which will be provided for in resolutions which will appear on the order paper during the next few days. I think it is most desirable that the house should be made aware at once of the general nature and purpose of these proposals and of their relationship to each other.

The measures to which I refer include the supplementary war appropriation for the current fiscal year, the main war appropriation for the new fiscal year, and the bill to establish a Canadian war supplies allocation board and provide an appropriation for it.

The house will, I am sure, wish to begin the discussion of the war appropriation bills as soon as possible. Hon. members will be given the opportunity to discuss fully Canada's war expenditures, including the record for the current fiscal year as well as the programme proposed for the next year. However, as the war appropriation vote last session is already almost exhausted and we shall be needing almost immediately additional funds to take care of expenditures during the remainder of this month and the month of March, I would like the house to consider the best procedure by which the supplementary war appropriation could be dealt with expeditiously, without limiting in any way the right of the house to make any inquiries which it may desire and debate in full the details of expenditure for the current year.

As was indicated in the speech from the throne, it is the government's intention to have the budget brought down at an early date. I hope to have it ready within the next two or three weeks, so that the Canadian people may know as soon as possible the details of our financial and taxation programme for the year.

I wish to outline a little more fully the measures that are being proposed to make possible the continued flow of Canadian munitions, foodstuffs and other war materials to the various theatres of war. The principal measure for this purpose is the bill to set up a Canadian war supplies allocation board and provide it with authority and funds to procure war supplies to be transferred to others of the united nations. There are two subsidiary proposals which I shall mention later, one of which is provided for in the supplementary war appropriation and the other in the main war appropriation.

Canada has been able to provide a huge volume of war supplies over and above the requirements of our own forces. Raw materials and foods we have been able to furnish from the beginning, and we have greatly increased our production of these basic necessities to meet the war requirements of Britain, the United States, Russia and others of the united nations. From the large new factories we have built during the war and the extensions to other plants has come a flood of munitions and specialized war equipment —ammunition, guns, tanks, aircraft, transport vehicles and merchant ships—which have been sent to many theatres of war. A large part of these war supplies has gone to Britain and to British forces abroad. Much has gone to other nations of the commonwealth. Canadian supplies have also been sent in substantial volume to Russia and China.

In order to enable these various countries to obtain these supplies from Canada, special financial arrangements have had to be made, because these nations did not have available Canadian dollars that were required to pay for Canadian products.

The main way in which we have assured this flow of war supplies to our allies heretofore has been to provide Britain with the Canadian dollars necessary to pay for what the sterling area obtained from Canada in excess of what it sold to Canada. This served to make Canadian dollars available not only to Britain but also to Australia, New Zealand and other British empire countries which purchased their foreign exchange from Britain. The first means by which we provided dollars to Britain was that of paying our debts before they were due. The next was merely to allow pounds sterling to accumulate to our credit. Later these sterling balances not used in payment of debts were converted into a loan to Britain, interest free for the duration of the war. Finally we provided a free gift of a billion dollars, assuming this as part of our share of the cost of the war. This billion dollars has now been exhausted. Other means must be found to continue providing Britain with the large volume of essential war supplies she requires from Canada.

Others are involved as well as Britain. Canada desires to continue sending supplies to Russia, to the heroic Russian army and to the hard-working men and women who have made its success possible. We want to play our part in providing China with everything that can be transported to her, so that she may strike back at Japan quickly and effectively. We want Australia, New Zealand and other parts of the commonwealth to be able to get from Canada all that we can provide them of the things they require from us in carrying out their part of the united nations' effort. Heretofore, as I have indicated, Australia and New Zealand have purchased from Britain the Canadian dollars they required, but we think it would be more satisfactory from the point of view of all concerned if they were able to make more direct arrangements with us.

We will continue to produce many kinds of war supplies substantially in excess of the requirements of our own forces. We are able to supply a great deal because we have a high productive capacity in relation to our population and because we are relatively safe from direct attack and invasion. I believe, and I think most Canadians believe, that it is our national duty and our privilege to share our abundant supplies with the other united nations, putting the excess of our supplies over the requirements of our own forces into a pool to be allocated among those of our allies who can make the best use of them in accordance with strategic needs. No financial impediment should be allowed to interfere with this sensible sharing of our war production. We are engaged in a common enterprise; the defence and security of Canada are imperilled if any of our partners lack arms; victory for each depends upon victory for all.

After thorough consideration, therefore, the government is proposing that Canada should share its production of essential war supplies with the other united nations on the basis of strategic needs. It is proposed in the legislation to reserve the right to transfer goods on such terms and conditions as the government may deem appropriate, so that in certain cases Canada may receive the benefit of such reciprocal arrangements as may be practicable. However, the government believes that the conditions under which Canadian war supplies are made available to the other united nations "should not be such as to burden post-war commerce or lead to the imposition of trade restrictions or otherwise prejudice a just and enduring peace." Therefore, an essential feature of this proposal is that it shall be good and sufficient consideration for transferring war supplies to other united nations that such supplies are to be used in the joint and effective prosecution of the war.

To make the matter absolutely clear, I shall quote the paragraph dealing with these terms and conditions which we intend to incorporate in the bill. It is as follows:

> It shall be good and sufficient consideration for making war supplies available to any of the united nations hereunder that the said war supplies are to be used in the joint and effective prosecution of the war, but no war supplies shall be made available to any of the united nations except upon terms and conditions approved by the governor in council or by regulations, and the governor in council may require, in respect of specific classes of supplies or any specific transfer of supplies under subsection one of this section, such reciprocal action or provision of supplies or any such other direct or indirect benefit as the governor in council deems appropriate.

To carry out the new arrangements, it is proposed to establish a Canadian war supplies allocation board consisting of five ministers and acting as a committee of the cabinet, which will purchase or procure war supplies in Canada and then allocate and transfer such supplies to those of the united nations which require them, in accordance with strategic needs. The government is proposing to request an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 to provide funds for the production and transfer of these war supplies.

In addition to guns, ammunition, tanks, aircraft and similar military equipment, the war supplies to be covered in this measure will include raw materials and foodstuffs, which are just as essential to a nation at war as arms themselves, and which we are particularly well able to supply. Of course, all our exports of war supplies will not need to be transferred under this arrangement, because Britain and others of the united nations have current receipts of Canadian dollars which enable them to pay for substantial quantities of what they obtain from us. It is only the excess which they cannot pay for that will be dealt with under this new measure.

Incorporated in the supplies which Canada will furnish to other united nations under this proposal, there will be in almost all cases some materials and parts imported from the United States. Canada is able to obtain these materials and parts because of the sensible arrangements already existing between Canada and the United States arising out of the Hyde Park agreement, made between the President and the Prime Minister in April of 1941.

In accordance with that agreement, the amount which Canada must purchase in the United States has been reduced to a small extent by arrangements under which the United States endeavoured to lease-lend to Britain certain components and materials required from the United States for British orders and commitments in Canada. The principal effect of the agreement, however, has been that Canada sells substantial quantities of war supplies to the United States in order to obtain the funds necessary to pay for her war imports from the United States. It is hoped that, as a part of the programme of coordinated war production in the United States and Canada and the mutual cooperation which has existed between the two countries, it will be possible for us to transfer some war supplies to the United States under the new mutual aid bill instead of being forced to rely on sales of all war supplies to the United States in order to meet our minimum United States dollar requirements.

It is of the greatest importance that the vital flow of arms to the fighting fronts be maintained and increased this year. That flow must be directed in accordance with strategic needs and not diverted or obstructed by financial considerations. Moreover, we do not want that flow to give rise to huge war debts between nations, debts which cannot be liquidated without destroying trade, debts whose very existence will undermine international understanding and good will. We want it to make the most effective contribution to an early victory, not only for our allies but for ourselves.

In certain cases it may be practicable to obtain reciprocal benefits to Canada in the form of goods or services from other countries in return for what we transfer to them under this plan. We will enter into such reciprocal arrangements where they can be made. Already the United States has found it possible to obtain substantial reciprocal aid corresponding to its lease-lend aid to other nations. In some cases it may be possible to arrange for the return after the war of the equipment or vehicles which Canada provides under this new programme. In still other cases the nation receiving the war supplies from Canada may be able to provide us with some other form of post-war benefit. But we do not want to make the sharing of war supplies dependent upon the ability of those who use them to pay for them. We recognize that we in Canada, because of our position and capacity, are able to produce and contribute to the common cause more war supplies than we require for our own fighting forces. We also recognize that others of the united nations, who, for geographical reasons, have had to grapple more closely with the enemy, require far more than they are able to produce. Each nation must make the maximum effort of which it is capable in the form in which its most effective effort can be made. It should be enough that those of the united nations suffering far more than we from the attacks of the enemy, having necessarily to take a far greater part in the fighting than we, should make effective use against the enemy of the arms, the materials and the food that we produce.

I do not think the spirit behind this measure can be better expressed than it was the other day by one of our French-Canadian newspapers in commenting upon the announcement in his excellency's speech when it said as I translate it: "Whether they are employed in England, in North Africa, in China or in Russia, whether they are used by Canadian soldiers or by our allies, all our war supplies are contributing to the triumph of the cause of the united nations, who, in effect, have pooled all their means of defence against a common enemy."

I referred to two subsidiary measures that are being proposed to assist in ensuring that our allies are to continue to obtain what they require from us. These measures have very direct benefits of their own as well.

The government proposes to take over the ownership of all the interests of the United Kingdom in war plants in Canada. The British government has provided over two hundred million dollars of capital for the construction and equipment of factories in Canada to produce munitions for the British forces. The United Kingdom owns the whole or a share of many such munitions factories or specialized equipment in privately-owned factories. The Canadian government now proposes to take over these British plants and this equipment and to reimburse the United Kingdom for its investment in them. We will then have complete ownership and control of all the capital assets provided for under the capital assistance programme of the Department of Munitions and Supply. There will, I understand, be a great saving in the amount of administrative and accounting work on war production in plants heretofore jointly owned by the Canadian and British governments. Finally, the transaction will provide the British government with cash to meet its immediate deficit of Canadian dollars during the remainder of this fiscal year, before the new mutual aid bill can be put into operation. Funds for this transfer of munitions plants will be requested in the supplementary war appropriation bill.

The other related proposal has already been explained by the Prime Minister, as well as mentioned in the speech from the throne. I refer to the expansion in the number of Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons overseas, and in the degree to which Canada bears the cost of equipping and maintaining them. This will have the effect of increasing our expenditures in sterling in the United Kingdom, thereby providing indirectly additional Canadian dollars to Britain to assist her in purchasing supplies she requires from Canada. This additional cost of the air force overseas will, of course, be reflected in our war expenditures to be covered by the main war appropriation for next year. Canada will also meet the full cost of pay and allowances for Royal Canadian Air Force personnel serving overseas in Royal Air Force squadrons.

These air force changes will reflect and emphasize the increasingly important part being taken by the Royal Canadian Air Force in achieving that air supremacy in Europe which is so essential an element in victory. They will also make clearly Canadian what should be Canadian.

The measures I have outlined today are intended to ensure that Canada's war production over and above that required by our own forces is directed as rapidly as possible to those fighting fronts where it will be most effective in defeating the enemy. From the beginning of the war, the Canadian government, with the full support of this house and the Canadian people, has followed the policy that whatever can be done by the provision of equipment and supplies to enable our forces and our allies' forces to fight most effectively, to accomplish their objectives with the least cost in men, must be done. These measures are required to continue that policy. They do so by enabling us to mobilize our resources most quickly and most efficiently. That means a great saving of national strength and resources, for it shortens the war; it means an enormous saving of human life; ultimately it means victory.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any lengthy comments on the statement which the Minister of Finance has just read, but there are two matters upon which I think we should have some clarification. Three principal nations among the united nations now conducting this struggle against the axis powers are providing large quantities of the sinews of war by way of munitions—the United States, Great Britain and ourselves. I should like to ask the minister if the programme which is envisaged by the bill he mentions will be in collaboration with the lease-lend operations so far as the United States and other nations are concerned. Will there be collaboration with that country as well as with Great Britain in the allocation of supplies? So far as I could see there was nothing in the minister's statement which indicated that this was a move in collaboration with the other countries which are now supplying China and Russia. I should like the minister to be clear on that point because it is a very important factor in the discussions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The allocation board set up under this bill will undoubtedly find it necessary and will wish to keep very closely in touch with the munitions' assignment board in Washington and the assignments board in London.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the government decided to bring down this legislation, may I ask whether Great Britain and the United States were consulted?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so, no; but perhaps I had better give that some consideration and make inquiries before I answer the question definitely.

Mr. GRAYDON: The only point I wished to bring out was that we are engaged in a vast pooling arrangement of our resources and man-power to defeat the axis, and it seems to me only appropriate that we should bring down any such bill as this only in collaboration with our allies.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very important, too, to communicate one's intentions to the Canadian parliament before they are communicated to other nations.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that the minister is interested in getting the supplementary war appropriation bill through as rapidly as possible. If I might make a suggestion it would be that the supplementary bill be introduced and carried through the house without discussion, interrupting this debate, if necessary, for the purpose, on the understanding that we should be free to discuss all war matters on the main measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for making the suggestion, for that is exactly what I should like to see happen. I suggested last year that the debate of our whole war effort take place on the main appropriation bill, but the house did not take kindly to the suggestion. It is important that the supplementary appropriation bill be passed immediately or very soon. I do not know what the house will want to do about that, but if the leaders and the members talk it over and there is no objection to that course, I will put the resolutions in connection with these bills on the order paper right away. A full accounting of our stewardship can be made on the main appropriation bill. That is when the main debate takes place every year, and I do not see any reason why we cannot adopt that procedure this year by mutual consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: With this proviso, of course, that anything which might have been discussed on the supplementary bill may be discussed on the main bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I readily agree to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I supplement what the Minister of Finance said a moment ago in reply to my hon. friend as to the war supplies mutual aid allocation bill, as it will be called when introduced. The particular action as therein proposed has been proposed by the Canadian government on its own. It was our government that decided to adopt this method of aiding to the utmost in the war effort. In the course of the preparation of the measure particular departments in the governments of Great Britain and the United States especially interested were cognizant of what was in our minds. I think the word "cognizant" is the best word to use, better than "collaboration" perhaps.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just did not know how to answer the hon. gentleman's question, whether other governments were consulted.

Mr. GRAYDON: They were not consulted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Were not. This is our own action, but I should not like to say that certain details were not discussed.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I answer the minister's suggestion with regard to expediting the passage of this legislation, following up what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just said. Our view, of course, is that in times like these we must not allow any technicalities to stand in the way of the government's proceeding with the war effort. I think all members of the house will wish to make sure that no course of procedure is adopted which will in any way hamper the government with respect to the war appropriations which are required. I have tried while I have been in this position to facilitate as much as possible the government's war effort and the legislation in connection with it. I do not think it is the wish of the Canadian people that we should put any small technical obstacles in the way of the government. So far as our party is concerned, so long as the reservation that has been made is observed, we shall be glad to discuss matters pertaining to our war effort and get a complete report upon it on the main war appropriation bill, which will come up in due course. I think the minister will find that it will be very easy to arrive at an agreement which will meet the government's wishes and give them the necessary funds with which to carry on.

THE FIGHTING FRENCH

STATEMENT AS TO LIAISON BETWEEN CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND GENERAL DE GAULLE'S ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) asked me on Friday last:

> May I ask the Prime Minister what liaison is being maintained between the Canadian government and the fighting French organization in London under General de Gaulle?

The answer is that contact is maintained with the fighting French through the delegate in Ottawa of the French national committee, Major Gabriel Bonneau, whose appointment in this capacity, in succession to Colonel Pierrene, was announced by the Department of External Affairs last week. Major-General G. P. Vanier, Minister Designate to the allied governments in the United Kingdom, has been appointed to act in consultation with the French national committee on matters relating to the conduct of the war.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon I should like to be those of joy at the safe return from the epic conference at Casablanca of the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. I am sure it is the hope of all of us that both may be spared to continue to give to their respective countries that courageous and far-sighted leadership which they have given up until now, and that they will be spared to see their countries through to the victory which I hope is not too far in the future.

My next word I should like to be one of satisfaction and pleasure at the continued good health of our own leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I have noticed that throughout the country, for one reason or another, there is not the same tendency to hold up his leadership to the approbation of our people that all are disposed to give to the leadership of the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Our Prime Minister is the leader of our nation at war. Whether or not the decision was right that Canada should go into this war, that issue was finally decided when this country declared war on the German reich on September 10, 1939. He is now the leader of the whole Canadian people, and there should be no further argument because the only way in which this country can survive is by victory of our cause. That has been recognized by such leaders as Herbert Hoover in the United States, who stated plainly, just recently, that no matter what one might have thought before Japan attacked Pearl Harbor, that question is now at an end; the United States is in the war; the only way to get out of it safely is to win it, and all the people, without reservation, should get behind their commander-in-chief. Those words should be taken to heart by everybody in Canada; because, no matter what our beliefs as to what should be the future set-up in Canada, no matter what race or religious creed we happen to belong to, it would be very bad for all of us if we did not win this war, and it is only by unity that we can hope to make the maximum contribution to victory. For this reason I am happy and pleased that the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government is at the head of the country at this time.

Looking over the situation at the outbreak of the war, with the problems which obviously would confront us as a people, anyone, to whatever party he might belong, could not but see that the unity of this country was to be tested as it had never been before. I believe I can say that Canada is more united to-day from coast to coast than she has been at any other time since the war began. Many thought that this stage of our effort would find Canada at war within herself because of issues which were bound to arise. That has not happened. I believe that everybody, regardless of party, should, if he is honest, give the credit to our Prime Minister for his able and fearless leadership which has achieved this. Without this unity obviously we could not have made the splendid contribution we have made, and if our leader has made that unity possible he should be given the credit, just as Mr. Churchill is deservedly honoured for the leadership which he has given Britain.

There is another reason why I am glad that destiny ordained that the present Prime Minister should be our leader prior to and when this war struck us. I have reference to his record of friendship with the United States of America. It must be admitted that we were greatly relieved by, for example, the Ogdensburg agreement, with the declaration of the President of the United States that he would not see Canada brought into subjection by a European state. That statement implied that the United States guaranteed that Canada would not be defeated by Germany and it was approved by the people of the United States. It did not go unnoticed by Germany and Japan; for they realized that if the United States could not see Canada defeated it meant that in order to defeat Canada they would ultimately have to strike at the United States, so it followed in the natural course of events that the United States sooner or later would become our ally. Who of us to-day that wishes to be honest with himself can do other than thank God that the United States stands by our side face to face with the power and might of the German reich? And is it not something to be thankful for that a programme was pursued by our government and our Prime Minister, year after year, of friendship and close collaboration with the United States and their great leader? When the history of this era comes to be written, and particularly of the epochal meeting between the Prime Minister of Great Britain, a country at war, with the President of the United States, not yet at war—at which time there was laid down the Atlantic charter, which in effect was a declaration of war against nazi Germany and all it stands for—it may very well be said that the Prime Minister of Canada had acted as a bridge between the two English-speaking countries and had more to do with that meeting, the Atlantic charter and the resulting present situation than many perhaps realize.

Our war effort, by all admission, has been a magnificent one. It has been magnificent because of the unity which alone made great national achievement possible. It has been magnificent because our leader has had the ability to surround himself with able and outstanding men and has given them the authority and the power to go ahead and do the best they could in their own departments without being continually hampered by dictation from him.

[Mr. Tucker.]

In regard to the war effort I should like to mention, in passing, that I regret it has not been found possible to locate more war industries in western Canada. We in the west realized at a time of great urgency, particularly after Dunkirk, that speed in getting out war materials was most important, and we did not unduly press for the setting up of industries in the prairie part of Canada. But now that the turn has come for the better, as it has, we do urge that the government should recognize our forbearance at that time, should realize what has been done to decentralize industry all over the United States and stimulate manufacturing particularly in the western and central part of that country, and do something of the same kind in Canada. We ask particularly that a start be made in the production in western Canada of alcohol from grain grown in the west as a basis for a synthetic rubber industry there. In the past we have always been told, as one reason why industry could not be established in western Canada, that the raw materials would have to be shipped long distances to be fabricated there. In this case we have untold quantities of raw materials which could be turned into alcohol and then into synthetic rubber. I ask that everything possible be done—perhaps it is already being done; I hope it is—to spread a certain amount of industrial production over the western part of Canada, particularly in the prairie provinces.

I wish to express to the government, and in particular the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) my appreciation of their having done away with the requirement which obliged loyal citizens of German origin who were naturalized following the last war to humiliate themselves by reporting each month to the mounted police in their own districts. When that requirement was first imposed our people were in a state of nervous alarm because of Dunkirk and what had happened elsewhere in Europe. It was perhaps understandable that they should be uneasy. But those of us in this house, of all parties, who were acquainted with these people knew that with the exception of one or two here and there, practically all of them were loyal to this country, and it was too bad that they were subjected to that obligation. I thank the government and the minister for having removed it.

The next thing I wish to refer to is the attitude of the government at the outbreak of war. We all recall the speech of the Prime Minister asking parliament to declare war on the German reich. The policy was laid down that we would stand at Britain's side. However, we noted at that time the activities throughout the country of a party which claims that in external affairs it has always been right and therefore should receive the support of the people now and in the days that lie ahead: I refer to the party led by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Let me quote from the policy of his party as read by him in this house and reported in Hansard, second session of 1939, page 54. It suggested that——the same struggle for trade supremacy and political domination which caused the last war . . . is again the primary cause of the present conflict.

That was laid down as the considered opinion of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation throughout the country at that time. He went on:

. . . in part at least, the people of Britain and France are waging a war against aggression.

"In part at least." It was very good of him to make that admission. Then he said:

Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

And what was the economic assistance? The expansion of war industries "must be strictly controlled" according to the policy laid down. Mark this:

Volunteers for home defence should not be required to sign also for overseas service. This practice, now being followed, is unwarranted and should be abandoned.

In other words, at the time we were setting out to defend ourselves against Hitler it was the considered policy of the C.C.F. not only that should we not send troops overseas but that we should discontinue raising volunteers in order that those who were willing to go overseas might be permitted to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not what it says.

Mr. TUCKER: It certainly is, and I have the book here. If my hon. friend wishes to get up when I am through he can try to prove differently, but I defy him to do so. The hon. member must realize that I have only a few minutes at my disposal. If I could be persuaded to read the whole statement of their policy, it would take up all my time.

The C.C.F. on May 20, 1940, as reported at page 50 of Hansard, indicated continued support of that policy, in a speech by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Then on June 10, 1940, twenty-one days, three weeks, after that time, France had fallen and Italy had struck. Three weeks before these momentous events the C.C.F. had said that they reiterated their stand that no military assistance should be given to Great Britain. I have given the page and the hon. member can look it up if he has any doubts, but he knows it is true. If I were given unlimited time I would read it all, and the more I read the worse it would be.

An hon. MEMBER: The more you talk the worse it will be.

Mr. TUCKER: Worse, not for me but for my hon. friend who is interrupting. I hope that Mr. Speaker will take these interruptions into account in computing the remaining time for my speech.

Many people have said that at the time France fell the only forces which were armed and prepared to defend Great Britain were the Canadian troops that were already in that country, and some people have suggested that the only reason why Hitler did not invade Great Britain was that these Canadian forces, which were highly mobile and ready to strike wherever he might attempt to land, were already there. If that is so, and no one can say it is not so, history may record that it was because of the decision of the Canadian government to stand at Britain's side and send troops over there that to-day we are able to stand as free men in this parliament. There is the record. Who was right at that time—the C.C.F., who said, on May 20, three weeks before France fell, that they would not have had troops in England, or this government who had them there and who, perhaps, thereby saved the day?

There is one other point I would mention in that regard. We well remember that on June 10, 1940, our fortunes were so black that the policy of the government at that time was to shut off as quickly as possible the supply of materials to Japan, but to do it in such a way that Japan would not be able to say she had been insulted and thus be given occasion to enter the war. The Prime Minister on the floor of the house stated more than once that it was the desire of the British government that we should not do anything to provoke Japan and give her an excuse for attacking us. When we think of what would have happened to us had Japan attacked us or had she been given reason to strike on June 10, 1940, before the United States stood at our side, before Russia was attacked, when we stood alone alongside Great Britain and the other members of the British commonwealth of nations; when we think of what would have happened to us if Japan had struck then instead of eighteen months later, then we must at least be grateful that nothing was done to give Japan that excuse. And who can say now that she would not have accepted the gauntlet if it had been thrown down to her? We know now that the government of the United States had the same requests made to them. Although we were shutting off these supplies as fast as we could, without giving any overt cause for Japan to attack Great Britain, throughout this country the C.C.F. were going up and down claiming that the reason we did not absolutely quit sending supplies to Japan was that profit element was involved. They were told that there was danger of bringing Japan in, but that did not stop them from going up and down the country making that claim. As a matter of fact that very claim was made in this house. On May 20, 1940, at page 53 of Hansard, the present member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that the only effective way to eliminate war profiteering is to nationalize all war industry. This too would prevent the export of essential war material to potential enemies and indirect shipment to enemy countries. . . . To-day the copper which we export to Japan mangles the bodies of Chinese patriots. . . . Each year we of this little group have urged the stopping of the export of such supplies to aggressor nations.

They coupled Japan with aggressor nations on May 20, 1940, three weeks before the fall of France, three weeks before the entry of Italy into the war. They were talking of Japan as an aggressor nation and suggesting that we should slap her in the face. There is the record of the C.C.F. party.

Well, here are the facts. No scrap iron was exported after October, 1939, no copper after October 8, 1940, and exports of aluminum, nickel and zinc had all been stopped between those two dates, but stopped in such a way that it did not give Japan any excuse to say that she had been insulted. Did our friends of the C.C.F. make that clear? No. This speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was repeated over and over again. They were the ones that did not want profits, but these other people in the other parties were ready, in order to make a little profit, to run the risk of our people being later killed by our exports of metal. The verdict of history will be, I suggest, that it was very wise of this government and the government of the United States not to give the government of Japan an excuse for attacking us at that time. Had she attacked us then it would not have been well for the democracies.

While dealing with the C.C.F. I wish to touch upon one further point. We have here an amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:

And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

I should like to read what an hon. member of this house said in regard to a similar proposal.

On September 8, 1939, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said:

Therefore, the New Democracy declares that justice, equality and effectiveness depend upon conscription of finance, industry and man-power.

Exactly the same in effect as the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. That will not be denied. And this is what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said about that, speaking after the hon. member for Lethbridge, as reported at page 54 of Hansard for the fifth session of the eighteenth parliament (on September 9, 1939):

We must see to it, then, that during this struggle the foundations of a regimented totalitarian regime are not laid. Yet already we have heard in the house, and particularly in the speech last night of the leader of the New Democracy group, a demand for conscription of men, of finance and of industry. Moreover it was suggested that this was good in peace and in war. Let us beware of the implications of such a policy; for whether or not it is apprehended by those who advocate it, such a war-time policy, if successful, would see us emerge from this struggle as a thoroughly regimented and totalitarian state.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Under this government?

Mr. TUCKER: Well, my hon. friends are moving for this, under this government. That was the opinion of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation with regard to the conscription of finance, industry and man-power at the outbreak of war. What are we to think now of their motion? He has condemned it, himself, in most unmeasured terms. And this is what he goes on to say:

Let us make up our minds at the very outset of this struggle that under no circumstances and in no guise shall we permit the foundations of a regimented totalitarian state to be laid in Canada.

I ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and his followers to read his own words uttered only three years ago, and then to vote accordingly with regard to their own amendment.

Mr. REID: Hansard has a lot of good points, too.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, it has some good points.

There is one matter I should like to deal with before concluding, namely, the fact that when we win this war—and I have no doubt we are going to win it—we must see to it that we do not lose the peace. We must see to it externally by making sure that any possible aggressor is not permitted to get going again, in the way in which Hitler was permitted to get going; we must be sure that any such aggressor is nipped in the bud. We must watch any possible aggressor, wherever he may be, and we must be sure of some form of world organization to prevent from reoccurring anything such as happened between the last war and this one.

Internally we must see to it that the productive powers of the country are used to raise the standard of living of those who to-day are making such great sacrifices in order to protect our whole set-up. Many of the young men who to-day are offering their lives, many who have given their lives, had not much in a material way at the beginning of the war to defend. They had only themselves and their loved ones. Many of them had been out of work; many had been in camps where they had only a bare subsistence. The suggestion was made over and over again that if war came it would be found possible to raise the national income of our people so that, with our present productive powers, everybody would have a good income and a good standard of living. But in those days of peace it was not found possible to give that standard of lving.

Without argument or question, when war came and our country was in danger, those young men went to defend it. It would be almost sacreligious if we did not see to it that those young men who are risking their lives to defend their country on their return or the dependents of those who have given their lives, were able to enjoy their fair share of the productive powers of our country. Hon. members will recall how it was argued before the outbreak of war that we were producing up to our full productive capacity—that scarcity and poverty were inevitable. I hope that argument will not be offered any more. People, like myself, were scoffed at when we begged and pleaded for a stepping-up of our productive power and a stepping-up of our national income, and when we said that those young people who were not getting a chance to make a living for themselves by productive work should be given that opportunity.

I know, from young men with whom I have come in contact, young men who have entered or are now entering the army, that they expect that after this war our tremendous productive power will be put to work, in order that they may earn for themselves and their loved ones a reasonably high standard of living.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply. I would also extend my congratulations to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Since war began in 1939, I have thought, as I have sat in the house, that it would be next to impossible to convert some of these old die-hard Liberals. But now the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has shown that he is an apt student. It is true that it has taken him four years of war, during which there was a time when the country was almost subdued by the enemy, to convince himself that the proposals advocated in 1939 by the Social Credit party are sound. In that respect I am pleased with what the hon. member has said.

But when he goes so far as to eulogize the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the great unity in Canada, that is just a little further than even a good-natured fellow like me will go. Had he said that the Prime Minister was possibly responsible for the great disunity in Canada to-day, he might not have been so far wrong. However, his words are as I have stated; they are not mine, and I am not taking them for my own.

It is a fact that at the outbreak of the war the Social Credit party was the only one which saw a proper solution.

Mr. HANSELL: And never had to change.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And as my colleague, the hon. member for Macleod, has said, we have never had to change. Although the government have at times ridiculed us, stating that our proposals are idiotic, yet when they come to the place where their backs are against the wall they have found it necessary to adopt those very things for which they criticized us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And they will go further yet, too.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): To a great extent I can agree with the references made about production by the last speaker. During the last year I have been over a large part of Canada, and I can say honestly that our industries are doing a good job. In almost every instance they are turning out good products in large quantities. But that is not by any manner of means the equivalent of saying that we are doing an all-out production job. In this time of war we must all realize that production is the most essential thing in our war effort. Right from the first, when we asked for the complete conscription of industry, the Social Credit party has urged that production is one of the very first necessities in connection with our war effort.

Certainly it cannot be said, even by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that the government is responsible for this all-out war effort, or possibly I should say for this partial war effort. Had it not been for the pressure of public opinion—yes, and even of industry—we certainly never would have achieved the amount of production being carried on to-day. In fact, I do not think the government would wish to take credit for all the development in production. It has become an established fact all across the country that this government will not move until it is forced to do so. Certainly credit should be given where credit is due, and I would be the first to give it, but I think one of the greatest responsibilities upon the shoulders of the government is to see to it that when there is an obstacle in the way of an all-out production job, that obstacle is removed by legislation, and that every possible step should be taken to assist industry and the people to do a greater job than is being done. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) have said on many occasions, the only limit to our productive capacity should be the man-power and the raw materials we have in this country.

It was for this reason that we of the Social Credit party advocated an all-out war effort in 1939. At that time we stood alone in our demands, and we had the most severe criticism directed at us. We have not by any manner of means achieved an all-out war effort yet, even in the field of production, to say nothing of agriculture. As I have said already, we are doing well. I have travelled around the country; I know the industries are doing a good job and that the men employed in those industries are just as anxious as they could be to carry on a greater production programme than is the situation at present. Industry is also anxious to increase production, and I would not say that the government were not equally anxious, but what they desire to do and what they actually do are two entirely different things. It largely boils down to this, that as a result of government policy we have not been able to get down to an all-out war effort. I remember that last year I made in this house a statement to which the Prime Minister took very strong exception, even going so far as to attempt to reprimand me and to say that my statement was untrue. Now, after having had a year's experience on the war expenditures committee, after having gone through another year of war and after having travelled across the country, I am more than ever convinced that what I said then was true. Therefore I am now going to repeat my statement, that by reason of government policy industry has been compelled to slow up production.

I am not going to dwell further upon that statement, but I have repeated it in order to make myself perfectly clear to the house. I think every hon. gentleman is greatly concerned that we should achieve an all-out war production, and for that reason I think we should have more information. The other day I was pleased to hear the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) state that the four thousand men at the Angus shops in Montreal, who were expecting to be laid off, were going to be given some other useful work to do. As the minister said, many of these men are trained mechanics, and he said he would see to it that they were kept at work, either in the production of Valentine tanks or in other plants where their services might be required. But while he was making that statement I could not help thinking that I have heard similar statements on previous occasions, so that before I put too much faith in what he said I am going to wait and see the result.

I recall that when I was in Calgary a short time before coming to Ottawa for the present session, there were from 150 to 200 men laid off at the Ogden shops, where they had been making guns. I visited that plant; I was introduced to the superintendent, Mr. J. L. Gubbin, who had been brought there from, I believe, Montreal. He was exceedingly courteous to me and called in one of the plant foremen, whom he asked to show me about. I was shown all through the plant, and I think I saw everything that was to be seen. Here was a factory that had been changed over to make guns; now they were laying off two hundred men, among whom I was told were some of their best mechanics. These men were going to be thrown out of their jobs; as a matter of fact some had already been laid off, and I believe the greater portion have not been given other employment even yet. That was not, by any manner of means, the fault of that plant. The management were exceedingly put out because they were not able to keep these men working. As was pointed out to me, the management had gone to a great deal of expense and trouble in training these men for this particular job, and now that job was to be taken away from them. At that time the management did not even have an order to go ahead with anything else.

That is why I am a little sceptical of the minister's statement the other day, when he said he would see to it that these four thousand men were put to work. Here is an actual case where trained men were laid off, right in the midst of our war effort; and two hundred men in a factory of that kind is a very large proportion. It was not that the men desired to quit; they were not going on strike. It was the very opposite; they were very angry because they had no jobs. Some of them said to me, "Is this supposed to be our war effort?" I was talking to one of these men in his home the evening after I visited the plant. He told me that for the previous two or three weeks these men had known that they were going to be fired, and do you know what took place? It was just exactly as I have stated in this house time and time again. These men were deliberately slowing down the work, not because they wanted to do so but in order that the job might hold out; and that was not against the rules of the management, either. I do not say that the company was making a greater profit, because it was a cost-plus contract, but certainly the cost to the government and the country was much more.

Those in charge of industry dislike very much having their men thrown out of work, because the management know that when they are asked to do another war job they will not be able to find trained men to do the work. But here were these men being laid off, with no orders at all in sight from the Department of Munitions and Supply. That was why I said to the Prime Minister a year ago that the policy of the government was wrong; and it was as a result of the policy of this government that this plant was forced to close down. They did not have even as much as a go-ahead letter in connection with another contract. They hoped to get another contract, it is true, but they did not even have a blue-print in connection with it. As it was explained to me at that time, if the management had been given even the blue-prints in connection with an expected contract, they would have been able to go ahead and prepare their plant, which would have enabled them to use some of these two hundred men, but that was not the situation. In fact I was informed that under the contract which they hoped to get—I emphasize the word "hoped"—they would not be allowed to make gun barrels. They were making gun barrels at that plant, but their equipment would have to be pushed to one side and left idle because they were being barred from the advantage of making the same type of gun which they had been accustomed to make.

I do not cite this as one particular case where the government has failed to give orders in sufficient time for an industry to be able to absorb its unemployed when one contract was tailing off into another. Let me give the house the details of another absurd situation lest some hon. members think I am just a little prejudiced. I should like to refer to a speech made by a Liberal member of this house. I may say that I have thought there were not any good Liberals in the country any more.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are there?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): To my surprise, yes, there are one, two, or possibly three. Of course, I will agree with my hon. friend that they are as scarce as hens' teeth.

I should like to refer to one statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) who I see is in the Chair at the present time. I hope some day he has that Chair. He said, as reported on page 133 of Hansard:

> We have shipyards in British Columbia, at Vancouver, New Westminster, Victoria and other points, which are not working to full capacity. I have in mind one now, a shipyard in New Westminster called the Star shipyards, which has eight ways; six of them are idle, and the other two soon will be.

I am sure that had the hon. member for Rosthern read that statement he would not have thought we were doing an all-out production job. The hon. member for New Westminster then went on to say:

> There is no reason why these shipyards should not be working to full capacity, and every kind and type of ship should be built.

I agree with him one hundred per cent. That has been my greatest concern since this war started. I have made no bones about it. I have said definitely that I wanted to see this country producing to the maximum. I was convinced of this a year ago when I was speaking in this house, but the Minister of Munitions and Supply took exception to what I said. I see he is not in the house at the moment; in fact, with one exception, there are no ministers at present in the house. I suppose they are taking their cup of tea. The Minister of Munitions and Supply has taken exception at various times to what I have said, but the facts are there and not even he can get away from them. There is a terrible state of confusion in this government during war time.

Let me give the house another illustration, the Calgary rolling mills, to which I have referred before. From the very outset of this war I have advocated in this house that we should get the Calgary rolling mills going. There was a tremendous amount of opposition even to getting them started. They were going to move them to Vancouver at one time. Then they were finally started, and ever since I have tried to have another blast furnace put in there so that the plant could be worked to one hundred per cent capacity. Whenever I have spoken in the house I have referred definitely to the rolling mills section, but the minister rose in his place and said that the plant was working to one hundred per cent capacity. I do not know why he should have made a remark like that; probably he was just ignorant of the facts. He should have known that the rolling mills section of that plant has, I believe, never worked a 24-hour day. I have a full report on the whole matter, and I was in hopes that another blast furnace would be put in so that this plant could be worked to full capacity.

I understand that at last the Department of Munitions and Supply has consented to put in another blast furnace, so that now the plant will be able to go ahead and employ more men. But it has taken the department four years to realize that fact. Think of all the scrap we have been shipping from the west to the east, even to Hull, Quebec. When I was home in Three Hills, the little town in which I live, I saw a car of scrap steel at the station, and I was told by the station agent that it was to be sent to Hull, Quebec. Even the hon. member for Rosthern has complained about there being no industries in the west. We have been shipping all this scrap steel here and then shipping back the finished product when all we needed was a blast furnace in Calgary.

I recall the president of the manufacturers' association in Alberta coming to Ottawa after the minister made the statement that that plant was working one hundred per cent. Why did he come here? He told me that he came here to get the Calgary rolling mills working one hundred per cent. When I reminded him of what the minister had said, he told me that that did not make any difference, the plant was still not working to capacity. This shows a lack of planning. I do not contend for one moment that all the blame should be placed upon the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but I do say that when a member points out these things to him he should make a special investigation to see whether they are true or not. If they are true, then he should attempt to alter the situation that exists. No man is perfect and no man can, without more help, look after a job as large as the one he has to look after.

Here is another situation which I believe requires immediate attention. We are rationing everybody on oil. Those people who are living in houses heated with oil are nearly freezing to death because they cannot get sufficient fuel. Yet we have in Alberta the world's greatest potential supply. Listen to that, "the world's greatest potential supply". That takes in a lot of territory. But what is being done? Hon. members know that the members of the Social Credit party have always been after the government to do something with the oil field in Athabaska. That is not the only place in Alberta where there is oil, yet nothing has been done. I believe the minister promised last year that they were going to build a little pilot plant, but the Abasand company has been producing 400 barrels a day. Surely if the government had wanted to go in there to bring about an increase in production they could have done a tremendous amount in that regard. But again procrastination was the motto. It seems that the government will not do anything until a crisis is definitely upon them. Then they try to get out from under. I have a clipping which I took from the Calgary Herald of January 19, 1943, with regard to the oil situation. It reads:

Claim Canadians fail to see need

Canadian government officials are "dumb" because they fail to realize the importance of development of a supply of oil in western Canada to make the Alberta to Alaska highway of paramount service to the war effort according to an article in the Cut Bank (Montana) Pioneer.

The article points out a greater realization of the importance of oil to the war effort is held by United States government officials.

"Oil is desperately necessary for any armed force operating from Alaska and we have neither the petroleum products available nor the tankers or tank cars for their transportation to supply a large armed force in Alaska," the newspaper quotes a report made to the government by Representative W. J. Cole.

Then I have another clipping taken from the Calgary Herald which is headed, "Largest oil pipeline in world completed by U.S." In the article it is stated that they have built over 500 miles of this pipeline and are going on with an extension of something like 800 miles. They are getting somewhere. They are not waiting for the crisis to develop. I have before me another clipping, dated January 15. Speaking of the oil output it says, "Oil output down three hundred barrels a day."

Our war supply is going down—so is the government for that matter—and the government is not doing much about it. It is a very serious situation, and as time goes on it is going to grow more and more acute. It is time this federal government got busy, for that is where the responsibility lies. The responsibility is not with the provincial government or any other body, but with the federal government. Oil is definitely a war necessity, and you can be well assured, Mr. Speaker, that if the big oil companies have anything to say about the matter, there will be no more oil production in this country until the civilian supply is absolutely cut off. They are going to make the present supply last no matter whether we win or lose the war. Unless this government steps in and does something, our oil position is going to grow worse and worse. I do not know how much worse it will get.

We are having strikes all over the country. When the hon. member for Rosthern was speaking about unity I could not help thinking of the great number of strikes that are now in existence or pending. There was a steel strike in Nova Scotia, another at Sault Ste. Marie, another in Montreal, another in Ontario—there are strikes all over. Who is to blame for these strikes? The other day I was interested to hear the Prime Minister defend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). He told us what a terrible job the Minister of Labour had and how pathetic it was that everybody should jump on him. Possibly the Prime Minister was right because I do not think the Minister of Labour is all to blame. He is in a dual position: he must satisfy the demands of labour and he must also satisfy the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Of course the workers in different industries are striking. They are not striking to curtail production—not by any means. They are just as desirous of increased production as anyone else. What they are striking for is increased wages. In these war times everything has gone up in price. While the index of the bureau of statistics indicates a rise in the cost of living of something like 16·2 per cent, everybody knows that the cost of living generally has gone up much more than that, and accordingly these workers, and rightly so, I think, are demanding an increase in their basic wage. When I say that I do not necessarily mean an increase in wages all along the line. This strike situation is another evidence of the government's procrastination. It never attempts to solve a difficulty until a crisis is reached.

These workers who have been on strike have had quite a going over by some of the newspapers, especially the Montreal papers and some others. We have received from Cockfield, Brown and Company, Limited, of Montreal, clippings from the Montreal Star—not on behalf of the workers. Looking over these reports, I notice that they give the working hours of the men involved in these strikes. They say:

> Wage-earners by hourly earnings were distributed as follows.

I will cite just a few figures. There are 410 employees receiving 55 cents an hour and under, or 9·3 per cent of the employees. Those getting from 55½ cents to 65 cents an hour number 1,115, or 25·3 per cent of the employees. Let us take those two together. They represent about 1,500 men in the one plant. At 55 cents an hour, and working 48 hours a week, a man gets $26.40 a week, or $105.60 a month. Out of that $105 he is not only expected but forced to buy victory bonds. He has to pay doctors' bills, bus fare, income tax, national defence tax, both of which have increased, and he has also to pay for clothing which has increased in price, and then pay rent, fuel and so forth—all of these things out of $105 a month. Yet the Prime Minister rises in his place, raises his hands to heaven and says that the members of this house should not criticize the poor Minister of Labour so much, because the price ceiling on wages must be maintained. Shame on the Prime Minister for making such a statement! We have men working in Canadian industries for the paltry sum of $100 a month, when we have right in this country huge profits being made—and make no mistake about that.

The Prime Minister went on to speak about the fear of inflation. No word has been so much misused as that word "inflation". Every time the Minister of Finance wants to get out of a jam he uses that word "inflation". We are getting used to it now. The Minister of Finance knows quite well that if you raise the wages of the men in the lower salary brackets you are not going to have inflation. He knows that; the Prime Minister knows it, and so does the Minister of Labour who has just entered the chamber. The Minister of Labour knows very well that if you raise the basic wages of those in the lower wage brackets you are not going to have inflation if you have controlled prices and rationing. The blame is put on the Minister of Labour when he is not the only one to blame. It is the Minister of Finance. Therefore why not put the blame where it belongs. These workers went on strike, but first of all they had tried every other means and had got nowhere. Then this government steps in, always procrastinating and putting things off until a crisis or a strike is upon it. Then it is up against it.

Lest some people, others besides the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance, are still fearful of inflation, I will tell them where they can get the money to raise the wages of the workers who are in the lower wage brackets, and then there will not be so many strikes. I was a member of the war expenditures committee. I am not going to discuss the work of that committee, but I should like to quote two of its recommendations, and then I will ask hon. members if the workers are to blame for asking for a little higher wages. At page 760 of No. 124, Votes and Proceedings, containing the recommendations of the war expenditures committee, I find this:

In its investigations the subcommittee found in one instance that an aircraft producing firm agreed to pay a salesman for release of an existing sales contract an amount equal to 50 per cent of its firm capital and which agreement the subcommittee believes to be an improvident agreement and should not have been entered into had the facts been brought to the attention of the department promptly.

There is one instance, if you want to get a lot of money—and I emphasize "a lot"—where you could get money to pay more wages to those in the lower income brackets. I commend that to those who are so fearful of inflation. Let me read the next recommendation of the committee, on the same page:

That active steps should be taken now to plan for post-war salvage of physical assets owned by the Department of Munitions and Supply. Hundreds of millions of dollars of public money have been spent on buildings, plant and equipment for war production, some of which has been expended on private property and which the department is under agreement to remove within a very short period of time after the cessation of hostilities. This whole problem demands special study.

There is another place where money can be found. Let me read another recommendation because I want to help the Minister of Labour and the government. In its report the war expenditures committee says:

As a result of its investigations to date the subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

(1) That the policy of placing fire insurance on material to be used for the manufacture of aircraft and also on the finished aircraft down to date of actual acceptance by the Department of National Defence for Air should be discontinued and all existing contracts amended accordingly to provide that this risk should be carried by the Department of Munitions and Supply and further that the amount of fire insurance carried by privately owned companies on their own property and chargeable by the companies as a cost item with respect to aircraft built under the aforementioned contracts should be restricted to an amount not to exceed actual cost less depreciation. . . .

And so on. These are instances of glaring —I was going to say—misappropriation of funds. Without question of doubt, the men who are working day after day in those plants know that men in the higher executive offices are getting salaries which must be regarded as huge in contrast with workers' wages of fifty-five cents an hour, a little better than $100 a month. They know that these executives are receiving anywhere from three to twenty-one and twenty-two thousand dollars a year; yet you go to the workers and tell them they should not strike, that they should be satisfied with $100 a month. Well, if you are used courteously you should not be. Yet the Prime Minister has told us on more than one occasion in this house that there would be no blood money in this war. I fear that he does not know the facts, because if he did he would see to it that certain changes were made.

As a result of this serious situation, and in view of the references which I have made, although briefly, in passing, to the war expenditures committee, I ask the government to hold a secret session of parliament wherein the operations of the committee can be thoroughly discussed, and that the evidence be brought down so that every hon. member shall have access to it. I am sure that the membership of this house will be tremendously surprised when they have all the evidence before them, and they are the ones who should have it. In my opinion an immediate secret session should be called. I am going to leave it at that. If a secret session is granted, we shall discuss the matters in secret session; and if not, we shall discuss them outside the secret session.

One other phase of this question to which I wish to refer related to women in industry. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) referred to it the other day; and I agree heartily with what he said. Anywhere I have travelled I have been tremendously impressed with the ability and the interest women have applied to this class of work. They are working at the side of the men and doing just as well as the men. I do not think there have been any complaints about them. As far as both quantity and quality of production are concerned they have achieved equal results. Yet we find a man and a woman working side by side, doing exactly the same type and quality of work, and the one receiving higher wages than the other. This is not right, and the Minister of Labour will have more trouble on his hands if he does not rectify it. I suggest to him that he get busy before the matter comes on his doorstep. There should be equal pay for equal work. There is no question that that is the right principle, and the United States has shown that it can be applied. I quote from the October, 1942, issue of the Labour Gazette:

A recent decision of the American war labour board establishes the board's policy in regard to the question of whether women industrial workers should receive as much pay as men for the same kind of work. The board declared its opinion that women who "in comparable jobs produce work of the same quantity and quality as that performed by men" should receive the same wages.

This statement of policy arose out of a decision by the war labour board ordering the Brown and Sharpe Manufacturing Company of Providence to introduce the principle of equal pay for equal work for their 7,600 workers. The company had offered to reduce the differential between the wages for men and for women to a maximum of 20 per cent.

That, however, was not satisfactory, and they were ordered to institute equal pay. It is further stated, in the September, 1942, issue of the Labour Gazette, page 996:

A recent memorandum of Canada's national war labour board in effect recognized the practical application of the principle of equal pay for equal work.

The Canadian labour board has recognized that principle, and if the Minister of Labour wishes to relieve himself of some pending dangers he had better take cognizance of the things which are being said on this matter.

I wanted to divide my speech this afternoon between two topics, industry and agriculture, but time will not permit me to say all I have in mind in connection with agriculture, so that I shall do that on another occasion, nor have I been able to deal as fully as I hoped to do with this industrial problem. I trust that the government will give serious consideration to the calling of a secret session of parliament to discuss the report of the war expenditures committee, so that all our members will be thoroughly informed as to what has taken place before the committee all the way across Canada. A secret session will enable us to discuss the subject among ourselves with benefit not only to ourselves but to the country's war effort. I will leave it at that, but as I said, if the government is not going to hold a secret session we shall discuss the report otherwise when the opportunity arises.

Mr. J. A. GREGORY (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne deals with many important and weighty subjects. A number of speakers have already referred to many of these subjects, and I hesitated to add to the repetition by again referring to some of these matters. However, on account of the nature of the subjects with which I propose to deal I have decided to stick to my notes and, at the expense of being wearisome or repetitious, I propose to deal with some of them again.

I am sure, in the first place, that we can congratulate ourselves, as the speech from the throne mentions, on the vastly improved war picture since this house rose last August. Second, I am sure the country at large will receive with every satisfaction the news—to quote from the speech from the throne—that—

. . . the progressive expansion of the navy will be continued. The army programme will include the maintenance and reinforcement of the overseas army of two corps, and the maintenance of units and formations required for the territorial and coastal defence of Canada and other areas in the western hemisphere. The air force will continue its three-fold activities. . . .

May I digress for a moment from the speech from the throne to say that I believe many people throughout the country are beginning to doubt the wisdom of the size of the army pattern. The seventh and eighth divisions crept into our war pattern when there appeared to be imminent danger of invasion from Japan and invasion likewise of the eastern coast. We are attempting in our war effort to maintain eight divisions with all the ancillary units and tank units and reinforcements required. Men in the country are just wondering if we have not cut our army pattern—and I am speaking entirely of the army—too generously for the cloth available. In other words, when we consider the growing demands of man-power for war industry, including shipbuilding; the actual shortage of man-power on the farms, with which I propose to deal in a moment, to produce for the fighting men and civilians at home and abroad, the ever-expanding naval man-power requirements, and the growing air force and accelerating demands for reinforcements in this service particularly, I ask myself with misgiving if the army has not cut a pattern out of all proportion to the total man-power available in Canada.

I realize that the man-power in Canada must be further combed out of non-essential industry and transferred to more essential industry, that further age groups must be mustered and that women must be trained for many classes of duties which they have not undertaken heretofore. This, sir, will probably be an awful year of wastage, and Canadians, I am sure, are in the mood to accept, grimly and with determination, any duty which this government may see fit to impose upon them.

While I am on this subject of the proper apportionment of man-power to produce a balanced and most effective war effort, I wish to refer to the order in council of last March respecting farm labour being frozen on the farms, which has been referred to repeatedly by previous speakers. I believe every hon. member understood that order in council, and I believe they understood that the divisional boards in Canada had no power thenceforth to draft young men from farms when it could be proven that the sole or main occupation of the draftee was farming. That was my understanding of the order in council and of the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 23. I do not know whether other provinces have reason to complain of the attitude of the divisional boards with respect to the drafting of men for Canada's army, but in my province of Saskatchewan there has been a total disregard of the requirements of agriculture or of the consequences of depleting the farms of farm labour. In many instances the last son of an aged and decrepit father has been drafted. The only remaining worker on the farm has been drafted, and I personally know of farms which will not be producing to capacity this year in grain, hogs, cattle, cream, eggs and other farm products.

I am not concerned with the number of postponements or the number who have been called up for service in Saskatchewan. I see an attempt made in the daily press of that province to excuse the actions of the divisional boards by quoting these figures. I am only concerned with the facts as I find them. I find families of three and four sons, none of whom has yet been called from the farm in that province, and then I find a last surviving worker on the farm taken off the farm, with the result that production will be slowed up this spring. When I find that, I am concerned in the work of that board. I am going to quote one instance.

I pleaded four times for this particular young man, by telephone to the divisional board, by two letters and by personal interview, and the edict of the board was that this man must go. The farmer happens to be a deformed, dwarfed, crippled man from his birth. He earned his living during most of his life by keeping books in a general store in which he had a financial interest. The store was sold, and he bought a farm and employed his son-in-law, a neighbouring farmer, and a very fine farmer indeed. He entered into agreement with his son-in-law to come and operate and manage the farm. I am referring to this son-in-law being taken from the farm on which there remained only a deformed, dwarfed, crippled man. I have another appeal from him to-day, a letter again requesting that this son-in-law be permitted to return to the farm; otherwise the farm will not be operated this spring. I submit that the production of food is a very important matter in the winning of the war. I am supported in this belief by a little excerpt of information that came to my office this morning headed, "Hoover on food problems." The ex-president of the United States, before a meeting of industrialists, made a speech in the city of New York on January 21, in which he dealt with the question of the food problem as it affects the united nations. I am going to quote four short excerpts from Mr. Hoover's speech on that occasion:

> Food supply has now become secondary only to military operations in determining the outcome of the war. And it will take first place in saving the world from anarchy after the war.

Again:

> The burden of furnishing food supplies to the united nations now and to a starving world after the war rests largely upon the American and Canadian farmer.

Again:

> Agriculture simply must be envisaged as a munitions industry. The farmer must receive men and tools if he is to perform his part.

And lastly:

> But the first and imperative necessity is to get more production. The American farmer will do it if he gets a chance and the fate of the world may depend upon it.

I should like you to visualize the condition of the farmers of western Canada during the last forty years. The young man of forty years ago stood behind the handles of his walking plough and yoke of oxen and, later on, his horses and gang ploughs, but during the last twenty years that young farmer's son has grown up and has bought a tractor with heavy discs and ploughs and seed drills and heavy machinery drawn by the tractor. In most instances the father never learned to operate power machinery and is still using his horses while the son operates power machinery. The young man is called for military service and away he goes. I need not enlarge upon this picture this afternoon of the father who is now forty years older than he was at that time, carrying on, not with power equipment but with horses. His hogs and cattle have been sold because he has no one to feed them. That is a picture of many farms in western Canada under present conditions.

The original draftee under the National Resources Mobilization Act was called for thirty days training and that was extended to four months. I have no quarrel with that term of four months. Later on he was kept in uniform and he is in uniform to-day. I ask you, sir, do we need to retain these draftees in uniform? Would they not be better employed on the farms, in the coal mines, in the logging camps or at other useful occupations, subject always, of course, to military call when required? Do we need a seventh and an eighth division, a reserve army and a defence army for the protection of Canada from invasion, or from internal strife? Both factors have largely disappeared since this became the formal set-up of the Canadian army. Should we not alter our policy with respect to retaining the trainees in uniform? In any event, in the light of orders which have recently gone out to the divisional boards, orders which were reported in the papers the other day, it seems to me that there are a lot of scrambled eggs which should be unscrambled.

In other words, I am asking the government to give instructions to reconsider the call-up of this drafted army. Send back to the farms many of these young men who should be on the farms, because in my judgment their contribution to the war effort of Canada can be better performed on the farm than by standing in a defence army in uniform.

To change the picture, may I say that Canada has passed through an industrial revolution in the last two years. Among the nations of the world her record stands out in shining relief. I believe that when history is written of this particular period it will refer to certain characters who are at present on the very active stage in the government of this country. If I were inclined to look into the unwritten pages of history, I believe I could visualize the names which would appear on those pages. I could see the name of Clarence D. Howe, the miracle man of this period, the man who has transformed the economic life of this nation in the last two years, a man of energy, a man of genius, a man of foresight, a man of decision, the man who turned Canada into an arsenal for our allies, as well as for our own fighting forces—a man to whom this country owes a very great debt of gratitude. It is a remarkable contribution, sir, to think that in two short years we have become so industrialized that we require to-day only one-third of the war equipment manufactured in Canada for our own fighting forces both in Canada and abroad, and that we can contribute the other two-thirds of that equipment to the armies of the united nations. To-day Canadian equipment is fighting on every front, wherever the war is being waged. I believe history will not be backward in giving credit for this remarkable contribution to our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

If I were to gaze again at the pages of history and try to conceive what will yet be written therein, I would see another character. Every time I think of this subject, that other character comes to my mind in a quaint sort of way. I see a Hindu wizard sitting on a carpet on the ground, lighting a match, the flame leaping to the heavens, enlarging and extending until it covers the whole of the firmament. That character of the Hindu wizard takes form and shape in my mind, and I believe history will record that the wizard of this period has been C. G. Power. To my mind, he is the figure who lit the small match, who gave birth to the small flame which enveloped the skies, and became a leading part in the direction and the activity of the war effort of Canada. The commonwealth air training scheme was his responsibility, and I believe history will call him the wizard of this incomparable and unique period in our history.

Turning again to the speech of the throne, we find that parliamentary assistants for ministers are to be provided. In my judgment this is long past due. I have sat in the house, along with other hon. members, for three sessions, watching the lines deepen on the faces of tired ministers who were attempting vastly more, by way of the burdens they are carrying, than human endurance is capable of bearing. Therefore I welcome the approach to the British system of under-secretaryships.

Recently, however, I heard a speech delivered by one of the leaders of a great political party in this country, criticizing the appointment of men to boards, commissions and controllerships, allegedly accusing these boards, and appointees to boards, commissions and controllerships of being supreme over parliament, and even supreme over the government. He described them as being dictators, practically, riding roughshod over parliament, and over people's rights; and even placing the democracy of our country in danger.

Well, I listened for the remedy, and finally it came. The remedy was the appointment of under-secretaries to do the work, in place of these boards, commissioners and controllers. First, I wish to dissociate myself from those who fear dictatorships in war time, and who fear that the liberties we must give up during war time may never be regained when peace returns. The parliament of Canada passed the War Measures Act, and the powers the government is taking are under that act. The government, by virtue of that act, appoints boards, commissioners and controllers to do a certain kind of work. With the return to peace parliament will repeal the War Measures Act, and the operations of these boards, commissions and controllerships will come to an end.

Candidly I have always stood ready to give the government vast power. I want it to cast away any timidity, of which it has sometimes been accused—if, indeed, it has been guilty of timidity. I am sure that if a demand comes for greater sacrifice and greater duties, the Canadian people will always be ready to answer that call. We want the government, then, to take all necessary power, and let us get on with the running of the war.

To those who fear the loss of democracy, who fear the setting up of a dictatorship in war time through boards, commissions and controllerships, and who would remedy these alleged grievances by the appointments of under-secretaries, may I say most emphatically that the proposed remedy bears no relationship to the alleged wrong.

For a moment let us consider this: What are under-secretaries? First of all, they are members of parliament. They are, therefore, responsible to their constituencies and to parliament, as private members. This is a purely representative capacity. Then, second, they are assistants to the ministers, and are empowered to act for them and to speak for them in parliament and in the country, within the limits of the ministers' policies and the general policies of the government. Again, the duties and functions of an under-secretary are purely representative. In the second instance, they represent the minister and the government, and that is all. Those are the functions of under-secretaries.

What about these boards, controllers and commissions? In peace-time we are very clear about the relationship between a minister and the staff under him, who carry out his instructions and whom we call civil servants. They receive orders from the minister, and it is their duty to see that the mechanical or practical work is carried out on his orders. But war-time has thrown an emergent responsibility upon every minister to create boards, commissions and controllerships to perform specific war-time jobs. All these boards, commissions and controllerships, however, operate under some minister. They must confer with the minister; they must accept the minister's policy; they cannot go beyond the policy established by the minister or by the government of the day. Therefore, sir, in a very real sense these appointees are only a temporary war-time civil service, and in no way are their functions similar to those of under-secretaries. I welcome the appointment of under-secretaries to overworked ministers.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I read with very great satisfaction another passage in the speech from the throne:

> . . . a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance should be worked out at once which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada.

Knowing the life history of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I would have been very much surprised indeed if in this fourth year of war provision had not been made in the speech from the throne for greater security and a happier nation after this war is won. I remember the Prime Minister as a student of humanities at the university. I remember him as a post-graduate on social problems. I remember his journey through Europe, following his student days, studying the social conditions of the masses. I remember him as the first commissioner of labour, as the first deputy minister of labour and, later, as the second Minister of Labour. I know something of the splendid contribution he made under the Rockefeller foundation during the first great war in harmonizing the differences of employers and labour in the United States. Therefore it is not surprising to read the words which were delivered by the Prime Minister at the lord mayor's luncheon in London on September 4, 1941, when he said:

> Much is being said about a new world order to take the place of the old world order when the war is at an end. If that new order is not already on its way before the war is over we may look for it in vain. A new world order cannot be worked out at some given moment or reduced to writing at a conference table. It is not a matter of parchments and seals. That was one of the mistaken beliefs at the end of the last war.
> A new world order, to be worthy of the name, is something born, not made. It is something that lives and breathes, something that needs to be developed in the minds and hearts of men, something that touches the human soul. It expresses itself in good-will, in mutual aid. It is the application in all the human relations of the principle of helpfulness and service. It is based not on fear, greed, hate, but on mutual trust and the noblest qualities of the human heart and mind. It seeks neither to divide nor destroy. Its aim is brotherhood, its method cooperation.

Therefore, sir, the Prime Minister has run true to form in the speech from the throne and has followed Liberal traditions established during the long and useful career of the Liberal party in both Great Britain and Canada. Again Liberalism has been true to its past history, "Humanity First". With the implementing of the recommendations of the committee on social insurance, I am sure we shall all welcome the day after this war when we can assuredly say that we have made a land fit for heroes to live in, that we have made of life a journey to be enjoyed rather than a burden too heavy to be borne. We said that after the last war, but with shame were forced to admit that we had done nothing to implement the statement. That will not be so after this war.

Again referring to the speech from the throne, I note with very great pleasure the broadening of Canada's diplomatic relations with other countries. This is just another indication of Canada's growing importance within the British commonwealth of nations.

I note with particular gratification and pride that a native son of Saskatchewan, Mr. Justice T. C. Davis, has been appointed high commissioner to Australia. I am sure that in this capacity he will be a credit to Canada and will bring great distinction to himself.

I cannot commend the expressed intention, as mentioned in the speech from the throne, to bring in a bill to redistribute the representation in the House of Commons. As a result of extraordinary circumstances, largely resulting from the war, Saskatchewan stands to lose four members, according to the 1941 census. Even before the outbreak of war many young men and women of that province were drifting away from the farms and urban centres, looking for employment. On account of drought and prices of farm commodities, the sons and daughters of our farmers were discouraged; and lack of employment in the towns brought about a great exodus from Saskatchewan. I join with other hon. members in protesting against this bill being brought down at this time, for the reasons so splendidly outlined by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GREGORY: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was referring to the great exodus of young people from Saskatchewan to look for employment. We have reason to believe that after this war is over there will be a return flow of population, and it would be most unfair to penalize Saskatchewan to the extent of four members during the next ten years.

May I say further in that connection that this exodus has been aggravated and accelerated by the policy of crowding all the industrial war effort of Canada into a small compass within what one might call a charmed ring in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I have made frequent representations, and many other members from Saskatchewan have made frequent representations to ministers and departments asking for a fair share of the industrial war effort for Saskatchewan. I was pleased the other evening to hear the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) speak along this line, and the hon. member for Rosthern and other hon. members have spoken to the same effect.

It may not be known that there are many spots in Saskatchewan particularly favoured by nature for the location of war industries. Other hon. members may speak for themselves, but I prefer to speak of one particular location within my own constituency. I refer to the town of Lloydminster, which sits astride the fourth meridian line where the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta meet. It so happens that this town has developed a great industry in natural gas and crude oil. If I had the time this evening I should like to tell the house something of the proportions of these natural gas and crude oil resources. The power plant in the city of North Battleford which develops steam and electric energy to satisfy the needs of the town of Battleford and the city of North Battleford, as well as the airport in the immediate vicinity and a mental hospital which has buildings on both sides of the river and a population of three thousand, uses Lloydminster crude oil to heat the boilers.

May I tell the hon. member for Saskatoon City that if a gas pipe line were built from Lloydminster to his beautiful city, that city could be served with both light and heat as well as every village, town and city on the 200 miles between Lloydminster and Saskatoon, and the surrounding country on each side of the pipeline, and still Lloydminster would have an abundant supply of natural gas left over. What a magnificent site for a war industry, for that matter, any industry, to be established! It would be suitable for a flax mill, which is a war industry, an industrial alcohol plant, a synthetic rubber plant, a bone processing plant or a steel rolling mills. The northern half of Alberta and Saskatchewan is filled with abandoned farm machinery and other scrap steel which could be gathered together as salvage to keep a moderate sized steel rolling mills going at the town of Lloydminster. Again returning to the speech from the throne, I note:

> A joint committee representative of the departments of agriculture of Canada and the United States has been agreed upon to coordinate the efforts of the two countries in the production of food for the united nations.

In this connection may I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) be appointed immediately as minister of food and be given full authority over the production of food in Canada. I assume that the price control board would still exist as a body with full authority to fix prices, but the appointing of the Minister of Agriculture as minister of food would naturally place in his hands the question of the classes of food most needed for our war effort. After giving him that authority as minister in charge of the production of food, the next logical step would be that he would have increased influence in bringing his representations before the price control board.

It is a well known fact that there is nothing more sensitive than prices and production of all kinds of farm commodities. If one raises the price of a particular food product, the production increases; if the price decreases, there is an immediate response and reflection in the amount of that particular food which is raised.

I am going to pause here to say that there never was a time in the history of western Canada when there was the same degree of appreciation for the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture as there is at the present time. I do not think there has been a man in western Canada who has been more blackguarded at certain times, who has been more misrepresented, than the Minister of Agriculture. Not only in my constituency, but throughout the length and breadth of Saskatchewan there is a growing appreciation of the fights which the Minister of Agriculture has put up here for western agriculture. This appreciation has grown as the result of a broadening knowledge of the class of fight which the Minister of Agriculture has put up.

There is a further growing knowledge or growing opinion of a fact which I have emphasized on previous occasions in this house, that government must always be by compromise. We have four great regions in Canada, the maritimes, the central provinces, the prairies and British Columbia. No region gets all that it asks for. All that the members can hope to get from any government sitting in Ottawa is a compromise, taking into account the influences and objections of members coming from other regions. Therefore I say that with that growing knowledge that government must be by compromise, the Minister of Agriculture is receiving greater appreciation in western Canada than heretofore.

I am reminded to-night of a couplet which we learned as boys in school in that famous poem of Oliver Goldsmith, "The Deserted Village". In referring to the village preacher Goldsmith said this:

> And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.

I am going to translate that liberally, and referring to the Minister of Agriculture I would say:

> And those who came to scoff, remained to praise.

That is the attitude to-day in western Canada toward the Minister of Agriculture.

I view with great interest the arrival of a new party in the house with a refreshingly new creed. Or is it an old volume with a new cover? The leader of this new party, the Progressive Conservative party, is well known in western Canada. I should like to digress for a moment to congratulate the house leader (Mr. Graydon) of this party upon his elevation to his present position. May I tell him that there are many on this side of the house who would be almost inclined to forget his politics while basking in the sunshine of his lovely smile and gracious manner. As I say, the leader of this new party is well known in western Canada. At one time he was a farmer, and he has served the farmers of Saskatchewan through the college of agriculture in Saskatchewan and through the provincial department of agriculture at Regina. He is known to be progressive in his views and progressive in his outlook, but many of those standing on the side-lines are wondering if he will impose his views upon the party, or if the old, hard-crusted high tariff, Tory wing of the party will impose their views upon him. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have no misgivings whatever of future happenings in this regard. There will be no hard-crusted, high tariff parties anywhere in Canada after this war is over. Many will be free traders, and we all will be believers in low tariffs. Let us view the picture for a moment; let us go back to the early days of Canada. In the primitive days of Canada's industrial growth the home market was the only market Canada had for her manufactured products. Thus a policy of protection of the home market by a high tariff was built up as a policy for the protection of industry in Canada, and it has continued ever since the "national policy" of 1874 was first initiated. But as Canada's industries expanded—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. P. E. COTE (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, one feature among others of the speech from the throne has attracted the attention and the interest of the entire population of Canada, and doubtless of my constituents as well, many of whom I have already consulted in this regard. I refer to the proposed legislation on post-war social security. A committee of this house, to be assisted by an advisory board, which was appointed a few days ago, will soon be set up, whose definite duty it will be to study the social problem from its different angles and submit its conclusions to this chamber. Let us hope that this committee, one of the most important ever appointed by this house, will get into action at the earliest possible date, and that each of its meetings will prove most fruitful and beneficial to every class of our population and to a united Canada as a whole.

I have great confidence that the government will neglect no way of realizing to the fullest possible extent the hopes which the entire population draws from that item in the speech from the throne.

I consider as an additional token of the serious intentions of the government in that matter the statement which was released last Thursday by the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) which concerns the welfare of the widows of veterans of the last war.

Ever since my election to this house I have devoted much of my time and endeavours to the relief of those ladies who were in needy circumstances. During the past three years I have had the honour to be an honorary president of the Quebec branch of the Non-Pensioned Veterans' Widows Association Incorporated. The headquarters of that body happen to be in the city of Verdun, and the president is one of the most respected among my constituents. For these reasons I regarded it as my imperative duty to do everything in my power to assist in obtaining justice for the needy widows of those Canadians who so magnificently contributed to our country's war effort of twenty-five years ago. Through the president of the Quebec branch they asked me this year to take steps to have a committee room in this building reserved for a delegation representing them that intended to come to Ottawa next Wednesday in a further attempt to impress their views upon the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Last week I received an assurance that room 268 could again be made available for them this year. But now I may say to the minister that his statement of last Thursday will deprive him of the pleasure of meeting again those gallant delegates, since their requests have now in a very substantial degree been met.

For the last five years these associations of veterans' widows have consistently appealed to members of this house that legislation be enacted to remedy the deplorable physical and moral condition of their members throughout the country. Time and again they have stated their grievances. With your permission, sir, I shall quote from the last brief which has been forwarded to each hon. member of this house, I believe on January 25 last, under the signature of Mrs. Margaret Wainford, president of the province of Quebec non-pensioned veterans' widows association, and with the endorsement of eight similar bodies from Toronto, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Calgary, Vancouver and other cities.

> We are again placing before you a request that a pension of $40 a month be granted to all non-pensioned veterans' widows under the following categories:
> (a) the widows of those men who were in receipt of a pension of 25 per cent but less than 50 per cent disability,
> (b) the widows of those men who were in receipt of a pension of less than 25 per cent disability,
> (c) the widows of those men who served in actual theatre of war though not in receipt of a pension,
> (d) the widows of those men whose history sheet shows record of serious illness.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health stated a few days ago that provision is being made in this year's estimates to permit allowances for veterans' widows who, through advancing years or through mental and physical infirmity, are incapacitated from earning a decent living and are in necessitous circumstances.

I have no doubt that the attitude which the minister has taken in connection with this problem has already received the spontaneous approval of this house, and more particularly of the members who have given their strong support to the cause up to this day. I find it a duty to recognize the valuable assistance given by my fellow members from Trinity, (Mr. Roebuck), Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), Mount Royal (Mr. Whitman), St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), St. Ann (Mr. Healy), and Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes), and it is with sincere pleasure that I thank them on behalf of the Quebec branch of the association.

I do not hesitate, however, to state that the one who will be happiest to hear of the policy just announced is probably Mrs. Wainford, who has so ably and devotedly presided over our local association since its foundation in 1937. Replying to a question by the special committee on the Pension Act and the War Veteran's Allowance Act at its sitting of April 9, 1941, one of the Toronto delegates gave the following appreciation of her work:

> Mrs. Wainford took up the torch in Quebec and she has never let it burn out.

This is a concise and eloquent admission of the debt of gratitude which the non-pensioned widows feel toward their courageous leader.

To-day we all join to praise the government for having listened with no less sympathy than efficacy to a just and meritorious case. By so doing the government has clearly demonstrated that it intends to continue its sound policy toward the solution of as many social difficulties as possible at this time, and on that ground alone it certainly deserves the recognition of the whole country.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): This is the first opportunity I have had to participate in a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. When I first came to this house the debate on the address in reply had just concluded, and the vote was about to be taken.

I have been wondering for some days what good purpose is being served by this—usually lengthy—debate. I take it for granted that every hon. member can foretell now with a reasonable degree of accuracy what the vote will be, and none of us is so optimistic as to believe that by his speech in this debate he will be able to change a single vote. I suggest that the leaders in this house agree among themselves to limit this debate, so that we may as soon as possible get on with the much more serious business of this session, some items of which I shall attempt to outline.

I have been very much impressed during this debate by the fact that this Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group has received more free advertising from both old parties this session than, I think, we received during the six months I was here last session. I begin to look around for a reason for that free advertising, and I recall that members of his majesty's loyal opposition took a certain little old lady to Winnipeg last summer. That little old lady had on several earlier occasions divorced her former spouses. She had been known by many names. At Winnipeg she divorced her most recent spouse, had a really good face-lifting job done, was outfitted in a new suit of glamorous clothes, and remarried to a new spouse, which meant of course that she must take his name. She was even given a book of etiquette to guide her in the future. With that she sallied forth for new conquests. Inasmuch as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was in a large measure responsible for that episode in the little old lady's life, I presume the criticism we have been receiving is the way the Progressive Conservatives have of showing their appreciation of our work.

I have also been amazed at the indignation displayed by this newly named party because the government has promised to implement by legislation some of the resolutions contained in their Winnipeg programme. I take it that, had that programme been drawn up in the interests of the Canadian people, there would be rejoicing, instead of indignation and consternation, over the fact that the government had done so. I want to assure the members of that group that there was no indignation felt in the ranks of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation last summer when they proceeded to build an entire programme from a few planks taken from our platform and tied together with a great many reservations. It makes one question just what were the objectives of that new party programme, and I suspect that this letter, which, when I returned over the week end, I found being circulated in my riding, expresses more clearly than I can just what the objective of that conference and that new programme was. This is a circular letter. The recipient of it is asked to return it with one dollar attached—

> . . . and your membership in the South York Progressive Conservative Association will be paid for one year. You will thereby assist us and yourself to defeat the C.C.F. . . .

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is not as bad as the C.C.F. franking their appeals for money.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I have also been amazed, Mr. Speaker, at the resentment felt in the ranks of the Progressive Conservatives on account of the disappearance of the small business man, the small vendor, the small manufacturer. This is no new phenomenon in Canadian life. The small business man in every field has been going under over a period of many years, under the government of both Liberals and Conservatives. Monopolistic and capitalistic enterprise have been slowly but surely squeezing out of existence the small man in every enterprise. The only new feature in the present situation is that those enterprises, which formerly were carrying out this squeezing process by themselves, now have lent their key men to the government, and from those inside positions they are able to accelerate the process which has been going on for a generation.

I am sure that we all share the gratitude expressed in the speech from the throne for the change in the war situation. It is fitting that, in the light of the important part which our fighting forces are likely to play in the coming year, the government should have made the gesture of appreciation which they did at the beginning of the debate. I am confident that every hon. member is agreed that this gesture was a fitting one. It is agreed that those hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address made worth-while contributions to this debate. Whether they expressed the point of view of the soldier or the point of view of the Liberal party can well, I think, be left to the good judgment of the men themselves in the armed forces. What we in this group objected to regarding that incident was the apparent attempt being made by certain Liberal members to make political capital out of those speeches.

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), about whose speech there was a lively discussion afterwards, himself a great war veteran with a creditable record, and with his eldest son, a boy of eighteen, now serving in the Canadian army overseas, had no intention of saying anything disparaging to the forces themselves. I am in agreement with the one constructive suggestion which he made on that occasion and which was entirely overlooked in the heated discussion that followed, namely, that when the coming redistribution bill is introduced, provision should be made to change the elections act whereby the men overseas may have the right to elect their own representatives to speak freely for them in this parliament.

I suggested at the beginning of these remarks that I would welcome a short debate on the address in reply in order that we may get down to the serious business of this session. I shall set forth a few matters which, in my opinion, constitute the main business of this session apart from the regular and routine business which will come before us. Our first obligation, in my opinion, is to strengthen and maintain the morale of our men overseas; for upon them, in the coming year or years, we shall in the final analysis depend for victory.

What distinguishes war from peace is the fact of sudden death. No amount of talk about the totality of modern warfare, no amount of talk about the privation of civilians or about equality of sacrifice should blind us to the contribution that our fighting men are called upon to make. Only those civilians who are suffering under the heels of soldiers in occupied countries of Europe, or those civilians in Russia and China who are starving and dying that their defenders may have bread and arms, can claim any right to share in the fame that these men will win. The first concern of these men overseas is, I take it, and I have talked with many hundreds from all parts of Canada from overseas during the recess, that we should in this country mobilize everything we have for a speedy winning of the war, in order that as quickly as possible the men may be able to return to their homes. I am confident that, should we bring into this house representatives of these armed forces to speak freely for them, they would support in this chamber measures for the mobilization of wealth, industry and man-power far beyond anything that this government has yet done.

The next concern of these men is with the opportunities which will be accorded to them on their return from overseas for rehabilitation in civil life. Anything that we can do by planning or by legislation which will provide for them the substance of that democracy for which they are fighting overseas will give them greater determination to win. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that nothing we brought down in this house last session is sufficient to engender any enthusiasm in the returned men. They are looking for something much more substantial than anything we have provided so far.

We propose to give to those who cannot find jobs $9 a week if single, and $13 if married. I am told that eight thousand of the boys who have gone overseas have married since they went there. Those among those eight thousand who survive the war will return to this country, without any homes, without any capital reserve, without any furniture, without anything to start a home except a wife, and possibly children. We have no right to ask them to spend any of their time in this country on $13 a week. The least we can do is to see to it that they are kept on the country's payroll until we can find places for them in the civil life of Canada.

The people of Canada want to see this parliament get down to the business of making definite provision for a change-over in our production from war to peace, with as little loss of time as possible, when the war is over. During the war years we have just about doubled our capacity to produce. We can produce about twice as much now as we could in 1929, notwithstanding the fact that we have withdrawn so many of our men from peace-time or war-time production to the armed forces. The people of Canada are asking to-day, and they want an answer from this parliament, what use we intend to make of these increased facilities. Are we going to proceed, when the war is over, to use these facilities to produce the commodities they need, or do we intend to restrict production in order to increase prices and to increase profits as we did before the war began? The only assurance we have received so far from the government came from two cabinet ministers during the Winnipeg by-election. These ministers assure us that there need not be any unemployment, or any depression after the war, because we have many more factories and many more skills developed than we had before the war. That statement will provoke nothing but laughter and derision in any public audience to which it is made. During the depression there was not a community in this country which did not have factories and skilled workmen which were not used. Something more than the mere existence of these is required. I suggest that what is required is a policy which will produce the commodities which the people of this country need, because they need them; a policy which will use the facilities of production to meet the needs of the people; a policy based upon the needs of the people, and not upon the profits that can be made from production.

The policy which the government is following to-day, as regards both farm prices and wages, is disconcerting to the Canadian public. It does not augur very well for the post-war period. The Canadian people to-day are living, or existing, at a standard much below that which is possible in this country. The policy being pursued by the government has the effect of maintaining that low standard of living.

Let me quote from evidence given under oath by a clergyman to a recent government commission, regarding the standard of living in his community. This is what he says:

I would say that about half of the homes I go in have not a sufficiently decent standard of living. I go into homes of men who work seven days a week, and are real industrious men, fine types of men, and yet they have not enough to live decently. I have been in this community for sixteen years, and I will say that those people have never had enough to live decently, and be fair to their families.

Later on, he says:

I would say that in about seventy-five per cent of the homes the men who work seven days a week are too tired to really enjoy life.

Speaking of their homes, he has this to say:

These old frame houses are very hard to keep warm. Some men are using two tons of coal a month to keep their houses fit to live in. They have no money with which to repair these homes.

Speaking of overcrowding, he says:

It is decidedly worse now than it has been in the sixteen years I have been in the community. I believe that there are two families living in homes that could comfortably accommodate one, and sometimes not that.

Speaking about one family of seven, he said:

They have one room downstairs. They use the kitchen downstairs for the living-room, kitchen and everything else. Then I think two bedrooms upstairs. They have to crowd the boys and girls together in the same room in winter time.

That is an illustration of the conditions under which some of our Canadian workmen have to live, and as a result of the government's policy they can receive no higher wages.

A few days ago the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) placed on Hansard a record of the income shown by the dominion bureau of statistics for 87 per cent of Canadian wage-earners; that is the standard which to-day is frozen by government policy. That policy in effect decrees that 35·9 per cent of all Canadian wage-earners who in 1941 were in receipt of $500, or less, shall remain at that level. These statistics show that another 28·4 per cent were in receipt of less than $1,000; another 19·6 per cent in receipt of less than $1,500, or a total of 83·9 per cent of all Canadian wage-earners in 1941 in receipt of less than $1,500 a year. And that is where their income is frozen by government policy.

Let me point out that the Department of Labour, in its own official bulletin in April, 1941, stated that a pre-war wage of $25 a week would leave a family practically no margin for expenditure on anything but the basic necessities of life. The amount of $25 a week in 1941 would be equivalent to $29.25 to-day. The $29.25 a week amounts to about $1,500 a year. In other words, 83 per cent of Canadian wage-earners in 1941 were in receipt of less than the Department of Labour itself considers a decent and fair standard of living.

Then, $29.25 a week for a 48-hour week works out at approximately 62 cents an hour. Let us consider from the government's own record, the Labour Gazette, just how many people in Canada are in receipt of less than 62 cents an hour—$29.25 a week or $1,500 a year. Here are the statistics from the Labour Gazette: in Halifax, in 1941, eight companies paid from 37 to 43 cents—and the wages are still frozen at that level. In New Glasgow five companies paid from 34 to 45 cents. Twenty-nine pulp and paper companies paid from 25 to 50 cents; 44 manufacturing companies paid from 25 to 45 cents; 23 furniture companies paid from 25 to 45 cents, and so on down the list; until we have a majority of the plants in which wage-earners are employed paying at least $6, or more, less each week than the Department of Labour's own estimate of what constitutes a fair wage income. Contrast this with what has been taking place in England. Official statistics based upon a survey made of six and a half million manual workers in England last fall show that the wages of those over twenty-one years of age had increased by 61·5 per cent over 1938, while those under twenty-one had received wage increases amounting to 77 per cent as compared with 1938.

Mr. HOMUTH: What was the rate per hour?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Among women workers the increase amounted to 77 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend quote percentages in Canada He has quoted percentages in Great Britain, and I wonder if he has the same information in both cases.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: These are the percentage increases since 1938.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but when he quotes wage rates in one country I think he should quote wage rates in the other, instead of quoting wage rates in one country and percentages in the other.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister knows the wage rates are different in the two countries.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I know something of wage rates in England.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the cost of living is different; rents are different, and so on.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The point I am making is that while in this country wage rates have been frozen in order to prevent inflation, in England they have been allowed to rise as much as 60 per cent, while the cost of living, except in reference to luxuries, has risen by less than half that percentage. Those statistics have been issued by the labour office in England.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think if my hon. friend looked at those figures he would find that he is speaking of wages in bulk rather than wage rates. When he says that wages in Canada are frozen, that is not so; and no one knows it better than he does.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Wage rates are frozen in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister will have an opportunity to make a speech showing it is not true, if he can.

Mr. MITCHELL: And I shall.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The treatment being meted out to the men who are trickling back from overseas is not such as to engender enthusiasm among the armed forces. I find there is very little difference between the treatment being meted out to men returning from this war and that meted out to those who came back from the last war. Only yesterday I met a man back from overseas a few months who told me that he had received the same treatment men received, to my knowledge, in 1920. He was passed from one plant to another; no industry wanted him, and he finally secured a part-time job with the municipality as assistant to the ash collector. That was the best job we in Toronto could provide for a man returning from overseas. I have another case which came to my attention over the week-end, that of a young man who returned from overseas more than twelve months ago. He receives no pension or other consideration. He is paid $9 a week while attending a vocational class. He has had to be taken, always in a state of collapse, off every job he has tried to handle since returning from overseas. He has passed out a number of times in his classroom at the technical school; yet that man receives no consideration. It is time we had something much more promising to offer those men whom we are asking to risk their lives overseas to save democracy.

I should like to direct attention to another situation which came to my attention yesterday, through a deputation representing men who are working on the Alaska highway. If half of what they tell me is correct, the government should immediately institute a thorough investigation into the situation prevailing there. I am informed that while United States workmen are being paid $1.25 an hour, Canadian workmen are paid whatever the contractor chooses to pay them, anywhere from 60 cents to $1 or $1.10; that three or four hundred of these workmen are crowded into quarters built to accommodate 100, living under conditions unfit for cattle, let alone human beings; that while Americans can buy their small necessities, cigarettes and so on, at cost, Canadians are gouged for all that the traffic will stand. I am told that these men are charged $1.25 a day for food and a bunk. The situation is such that they are almost in open revolt over the exploitation that is taking place in that camp. Conditions such as these are doing more to impede Canada's war effort than any other single factor. This parliament and this government should take steps now to remedy this situation if we desire to secure the whole-hearted support of our people in our war effort. It just is not good enough to have these measures withheld so that they may be dangled before the eyes of the people just before election time. The people of Canada want to see definite measures introduced and put into effect now, while the war is on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, for the sixth time since the outbreak of this war, parliament has met to discuss the nation's affairs. In his review of the situation, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has stressed the fact that the year 1943 marked a favourable turning-point for the united nations. He has praised the courage of the allied soldiers and extolled the valour of our armed forces overseas. I join him in paying tribute to our sailors, our airmen, our soldiers; they bring glory to Canada. After Vimy, Dieppe will add to the history of this war a chapter of gallantry worthy of my country's traditions.

The war is still going on. The speech from the throne, apart from reminding us of its stark reality, intimates that the Canadian people must keep up their efforts, and generously provide the united nations, as they have done in the past, with great quantities of arms, munitions and war supplies. But war will end one day, and already the government are heralding a programme of social security meant to offset the unavoidable consequences of post-war readjustment. While prepared to support all measures that will endeavour, through a charter of social security to protect the lowly and the weak in all emergencies, I nevertheless have serious fears and deep feelings of hesitation as regards some expenditures which to my mind are out of proportion with our resources and often detrimental to our own defence. Accordingly, while wishing to make some remarks of a general character, I reserve the privilege to advance some other particular considerations when the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne comes up for discussion in this parliament.

The present conflict, Mr. Speaker, has imposed on our people great sacrifices which I need not review. This war, brought about by ambition, pride, and lust for domination, has engulfed Canada which, remote as it is from Europe was in 1939 less concerned with overseas quarrels than with pursuing in peace, on this American continent, its forward march. It does not behoove me to analyse at this time the reasons which have brought about our participation. One fact is outstanding: we are in this war, and we will remain in it to the end. Our population has accepted every restriction and sacrifice; it has shown its willingness to bear a heavy burden of taxes. It has accepted these restrictions, sacrifices and taxes, and will continue to do so with a patriotic spirit provided the war occasions as few abuses as possible.

Far be it that I should at this time, through a criticism which to some will seem carping in spite of its sincerity, be unfair to the government. During the last three years they have been confronted by perplexing problems, by numerous situations which were both difficult and complicated, by the imperious need of meeting uncontrolled circumstances which often became uncontrollable. The Right Hon. Prime Minister has fulfilled his duties—I believe we all are agreed on that point—with a devotion that enhances his political fame; he has been on a level with the great parliamentarians of the modern world and the prestige he enjoys in the United States will receive special recognition in the history of the present war.

I am pleased to witness this closer association of Canada and the United States. To my mind, it presages for America, a marked advantage in the solving of post-war problems. The American nation on the other hand, has copied a number of our legislations. Canada, together with the United States, has endeavoured to restrain the egotism and slave-driving ambitions of war profiteers. Certain measures have been adopted which although not perfect have, in many fields, if not cured every evil, at least mitigated the effects of an inflation which could easily have become uncontrolloble. Limitless restrictions have been imposed on our people, some were doubtless warranted, others may not have been absolutely necessary, but they were all willingly accepted by the people of this country who considered that they were still preferable to the horrors of bombardment and war. Huge gifts were handed, mostly to Great Britain, gifts that have helped the allied cause to a great extent, but that have appeared exaggerated to many, when the small population and inadequate defence of the country were taken into account. In spite of the wide powers granted the government in the field of enlistment, the voluntary system is still maintained as the sole method of reinforcing our armies overseas. The selective service authorities have just recently stated that a redistribution of man-power was under consideration. The recruiting of men for the armed forces is of paramount importance; however, what good would be the largest armies without a sufficient number of hands on the home front to manufacture modern weapons and draw from the soil the food necessary for the physical welfare of the nation.

I stated a few moments ago that war should not become a pretext for misuse of authority. In war time, nothing is more detrimental to morale, to sound cooperation between the administration and the administered, to good will and voluntary efforts than the misuse of authority in military affairs. Of course, war entails certain inconveniences and tremendous sacrifices and expenses and these very conditions must forbid every abuse. For my part, I believe it is dangerous to inaugurate bureaucracy even in war time, for it is raising a state within the state, which, with time, may become a state against the state. I followed very closely the remarks of the Prime Minister in this regard. He stated that the present methods would endure in war time only. So much the better. However, it will become impossible, after the war, to eradicate the habits contracted and the precedents established. Parliament adopts legislations, for which the departments are responsible, but their administration is left to hundreds of officials, and this means, first, the scattering of responsibility and, for the public at large, besides enduring the inconveniences of the moment, the duty of protecting themselves against the disastrous enthusiasm of law-making officials.

It is no doubt necessary to organize boards: among the essential ones we may mention the war service boards, the crown companies. However, I feel that certain of these boards have too many ramifications and the evil lies in the fact that each branch constitutes a miniature government. Without any responsibility whatever to the electors, these boards, committees and subcommittees substitute themselves to parliament, and even to the cabinet and the departments of the government. Setting too much faith in the power of legislation, they ceaselessly enact new regulations to remedy evils the real causes of which they have not investigated and, most of the time, they are astonished that their legislation remains ineffective or produces results opposite to what they expected. Step by step, they invade every branch of the government with the result that parliament has become a figure-head and the members serve solely as a buffer to absorb the shocks of public opinion.

No one is against the war effort. No one, if he be a Canadian in heart and mind may refuse to do his share loyally. We all know that the government cannot see, control, lead, know or do everything; however, the war effort cannot be useful and efficient unless it is based on general policies which our people expect to see carried out in return for their sacrifices.

We believe in the war effort; but it must be rational, that is exempt from the narrowness of views which inspires autocratic government and allows irresponsible parties to transform the authority which has been granted them into dictatorial privileges;

We believe in the war effort, but the legislation, the orders in council, the public orders must converge to a practical end instead of engendering greater evils and culminating in man-made disasters adding to the unrest which is already prevalent;

We believe in the war effort, but it must not become a cause of economic upheaval, by the elimination from our industrial life of small or average industries which have been the mainstay of our country through the ten-year depression and will still be important factors in the post-war rehabilitation;

We believe in the war effort, but it must not be a damper to all intellectual endeavours; if, for example, the war effort demands that the advertising of wine, beer and liquor be prohibited, at least, let us, by some compensation, prevent the liquidation of a number of newspapers of my province and, especially of about forty weeklies which, for years, have established themselves firmly through unpublished sacrifices and devotedness to a cause as a symbol of social progress and public co-operation in the districts they cover;

We believe in the war effort, but, in the army, let it be a further reason to the establishment of a sane and mutual understanding between officers and men; let the rulings concerning postponements requested by soldiers be arrived at in such a way that no chance of unfairness be possible; let some of the medical examiners in the training camps or in appeal centres take the trouble of examining the recruits before deciding that they are fit; these examinations appear to be rather superficial, since a large number of recruits are sent back to civil life a few months after their call, on the ruling of a medical board, this entailing useless expense to the country;

We believe in the war effort, but let it not become, due to over-enthusiasm on the part of certain high officials, a reason for invading the provincial field and upsetting their legislative set-up, especially when their rights and legislative measures are specially important to them;

We believe in the war effort, but let it not be a pretext to those in whom authority is vested and who, for example, are responsible for expropriations, to pose as dictators, to resort to arbitrary actions, to call in the R. C. M. P. even before every possible conciliatory and good-will method has been exhausted;

We believe in the war effort, provided it does not prevent workers to receive fair treatment in war plants, provided the salaries paid in one province are not higher than in another, but are the same all through the country;

We believe in the war effort, provided it is exempt from favouritism, the worst cause of misunderstanding and the most harmful enemy of production; provided it is also exempt from waste, this other enemy which destroys, in our population, the will to economize, and paralyses all enthusiasm for cooperation;

We believe in the war effort, provided it becomes possible for the farmer to accelerate, increase and double his production by keeping or getting the necessary help and also by obtaining the tools of which certain government orders have deprived him;

We believe in the war effort, through cooperation that is not dampened by racial or religious prejudice or imbued with extreme imperialism, or narrow Canadianism or provincialism; but that remains essentially Canadian and inspired by the love of country and the maintenance of Canadian liberties and traditions. If it be true that this type of patriotism does not preclude our humanitarian feelings from responding to the allied nations' appeal, our answer must not, however, go to extremes, but rather remain within the bounds of common sense.

Mr. Speaker, after three years of war, our debt, which in 1939 amounted to $3,000,000,000 has reached the staggering total of $8,000,000,000, or $700 per capita. This means that four years of war will have almost trebled the debt which Canada had after 73 years of existence as a confederation. Therefore, I understand how Mr. T. V. Soong, China's foreign minister, could state on November 3rd, 1942, that in this war Canada had, in proportion to her population achieved more than any other country in the world. During the last three years Canada has put all her resources in the prosecution of the war. We had no army in 1939. In 1943, we have overseas 200,000 men ready to serve anywhere as volunteers and in this country over 225,000 soldiers for the defence of Canada as recruits. In 1939, what did our navy amount to? We had fifteen ships, mostly of small tonnage, and a total number of 1,774 enlisted sailors. In 1943, we have 500 warships or corvettes, sailing the seven seas, with a strength of over 50,000 men. We had no air force in 1939; in 1943, we have on active service 150,000 men most of whom are gaining fame over occupied Europe. The male population of Canada, that is men from 19 to 45 years old, numbering 2,215,800, has supplied so far nearly 800,000 men, volunteers or recruits, or almost one third. In proportion to her population, Canada is now taxed more heavily than Great Britain or the United States. Can we do better? Can we accomplish more than that? Can we go farther? The champions of imperialism continue to proclaim that this is not enough.

[Mr. Lionel Bertrand.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no imperialistic leanings, and I condemn those who, while living in this country, have more love for the empire than for Canada. I am not anti-British, because I have never been ashamed of being a citizen of the Empire. A descendant of people who settled here two hundred years ago, I have the right and the duty of being above all a citizen of Canada. I said Canada, Mr. Speaker, not Quebec. I love my province, I would defend her against any one, but the sincere love I have for her imparts to my patriotism a truly national character. I also consider as extravagant the gift of $1,000,000,000 made last year to Great Britain, and the loans we have made to her, in view of the fact that at that very time Great Britain was loaning money with interest to foreign countries. I support the speech from the throne for the legislation as a whole which it forecasts, but I reserve the right to take such decision as I consider best when bills providing for such gifts and for the creation of the board which alone will see to their allotment, come up for discussion in this house. I have been at variance with the government in the past, and I shall still be whenever I feel it my duty. I was elected to uphold in this parliament the principles which my constituents have commissioned me to defend in 1940. I am here for that sole purpose. I shall remain on this side of the house, because freedom of speech prevails here, and I regret that some Liberals have seen fit to found new parties when they could exercise that right to voice all their views.

The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) will not have my support. That amendment takes the government to task for having "failed to provide for the effective use of Canada's man- and woman-power". In other words, we should have mobilized all our man-power and poured it overseas so as to obey the old imperialistic slogan "help the empire". I have already said in this house that Canada had no orders to take from any one as regards the conduct of her own affairs. I cannot admit that the empire has a right to ask us everything, to demand everything from us and that we should always be bound to grant all its requests.

Again, we are in no way bound to accept the decisions taken by the British general staff when we have no voice in the council. If Canada is in this war of its free will, as we are often told, it should not be the servant of anyone, but the equal of the other nations that battle to crush Hitler.

Has any other doctrine than that of out-and-out imperialism ever been preached by the Conservative party? If to-day that party camouflages its doctrine under a borrowed name, does it imagine that the new frock will hide its past? Even after twenty-five years that party still drags, as a millstone, the responsibility of the abuses, waste and nefarious legislation of the last war. Behind it, financial and privileged interests take cover, men eager for power hide; the imperialist clique, always an obstacle to the unity in this country by its appeals to prejudice, by its lectures, literature and propaganda, by raising English against French, stands in the background. Imperialist history has not changed; it adheres to the same principles, the same errors, the same opinions, the same propaganda, the same programme. Never enough, claim the imperialists. All for the empire, nothing for Canada. I have this to say: this war was in the first place a European war; America became involved afterwards; it is now a world war. Why should so many lecturers come and tell us that we should fight, contribute everything to save the empire? Canada is in this war to-day not for the empire but for something greater than all empires: for the triumph of democratic principles and ideals in the world, for the maintenance of a civilization founded on respect for Almighty God and the cult of human liberty. Shall I vote for the sub-amendment moved by the C.C.F. leader (Mr. Coldwell)? No. Does not the sub-amendment favour a total war effort? Manpower, but together with all other national resources. When so many doctrines pave an easy road toward new methods of government, I claim we would be mistaken should we move toward advanced socialism and destroy with one sweep the edifice built by the labour of mankind under private enterprise.

The social legislation forecast in the speech from the throne appeals to me. Is it timely? I would think so. As Gustave LeBon wrote: "To foresee is useful, to forestall is more useful still. To foresee is to remove the unexpected from the future. To forestall is to nullify the elements of surprise." We shall come out of this conflict impoverished but free. Problems, however, shall not be lacking: the adjustments to be made in countless fields; the return to civil life of thousands of soldiers; the change over to a commercial and industrial footing of thousands of plants having suspended normal operations due to the war; the exacting economic conditions with their various and universal effects. This critical post-war period frightens me and I congratulate the government for its determination to prepare right now for what the future might unexpectedly spring upon us. Nothing could be more unfortunate in my estimation than to see, after a war costing billions of dollars, the hideous spectre of unemployment over thousands of Canadian homes and to countenance once again thousands of brows furrowed with care because hands are forced into idleness. On the other hand, nothing would please me more than to see us come out of this war without shock or upheaval, thus giving palpable proof that happiness can yet be attained in every walk of life on this Canadian soil, that soldiers whose civil careers had been halted by the ambition of the great can still through gainful employment let such dreams blossom forth as have not been crushed by the war; nothing would please me more than to see industrial plants and factories enter with renewed facilities into a period of progress and prosperity, should all those war plants scattered throughout the land become the nuclei of industrial centres for the greater benefit of the whole nation.

The year 1943 marks a turning point in the war. There is a promise of better days soon to come. Events seem to forecast final victory in a near future. Following a common road we cooperate ever more closely with the United States sharing a common ideal, vying with them in courage and in love of liberty. A part of the Americas, Canada is called upon to play an important role on this continent and no less an important role among the nations of the world. Canada is a nation. A nation has a soul. It comes from a common historical treasure of greatness, great men and great achievements, of customs and traditions, of sorrows and triumphs, all of which go to make up the social asset at the very origin of a national ideal. This soul is born of the will to develop together the common heritage and a common love of country becomes the indispensable bond that makes for a strong nation, for a firm social structure. Now, patriotism inspires us to defend the country in its hour of peril and I know not of any Canadian who would be lacking in courage on that score. Patriotism puts no obstacle, in view of the divine precept of charity, to helping within the bounds of one's resources other countries in the throes of adversity; we have not failed to observe that precept. To attain greatness a people must have achieved great things and still harbour great designs: such are my people.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): A great deal has already been said in this debate concerning the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I should like to make, if I can, a little contribution in furtherance of this discussion.

I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has pretty well set out the policy of the Progressive Conservative party in relation to the matters that are most urgent in our country to-day. I believe, too, that the Hon. John Bracken, in his fourteen points, given some time before the Winnipeg convention, when he was guiding the provincial ship of state and before he took the helm of the national dreadnought, has set a beacon at which this government might very well aim and, I think, has aimed to some extent in the speech from the throne.

As I listened to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) describing the little old lady who went to Winnipeg, got her divorce, married her new love—as he stated—and came back to the ship of state, I could not help feeling that, in the light of the attitude of the socialist party for which he spoke, who in western Canada call themselves the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Labour, and Farmers' party and are so addicted to bigamy in their three-fold name, their three-fold life, and their practice of bridegrooms' promises, the hon. member should be well qualified to make that comparison.

I also understand that the hon. member for York South has been for some time in the teaching profession and that as a teacher in a secondary school he is expected to know a good deal of history. I am afraid that his lack of knowledge of Canadian history and Canadian parliamentary institutions displayed itself rather flagrantly in that he did not know, or did not profess to know, that the leader of this dominion at the time of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, called this party the Progressive Conservative party.

I should like to join those who have already spoken in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in drawing the attention of the house to what I regard as a most regrettable omission, the failure to mention or, at any rate, sufficiently mention the most important and most critical problems facing our country to-day—man-power and woman-power; labour relations; agriculture; and, I might add, finance as a fourth.

Our most difficult problem, a problem demanding immediate attention in Canada, is the allocation of man-power. It will be generally agreed, I believe, that the drawing of men and women from peace-time pursuits into war production, to the extent that we have carried it, does of necessity diminish the supply of labour, but I do not think we in Canada can say that we are really short of labour yet. Our problem is the result of improper placement of labour. Labour is not used in the most efficient manner, and the government of the day has lacked initiative and courage. It has not shown the initiative which it should have done in the placing of men and women.

I was privileged this fall, as a member of the war expenditures committee, to visit a great many of the aeroplane production plants in Canada, as well as some in the United States. What struck me with amazing force was the part which women are playing to-day in the manufacture of aeroplanes in this country. I believe that about fifteen or twenty per cent of our employees in aircraft production are women. In one of the great factories of the United States the percentage is as high as forty, of women engaged in that industry. The objective is from sixty-five to seventy-five per cent of women employees in aircraft production. That is their immediate objective, and it is one at which we, as members of the House of Commons, and the government particularly, could very well aim. The women of the country, I am sure, are only too willing to put their hands and their hearts into an all-out war production effort, but that problem has scarcely yet been touched in Canada. In the allocation of man-power we have something that could not only harness our man-power and increase our production but, to a great extent, bring about equality of sacrifice and continuity as well as equality of service among the Canadian people.

Take the position of key men in industry. That is a serious point in the war effort to-day. Expanding our industries as we are doing and training our men as we are, throughout the length and breadth of Canada, as members of that committee we could see that particularly in the aircraft production industry many of our key men, many of our best trained men in the field of aircraft production, men skilled in the production of certain types of planes, were on what was known as slow-downs through lack of material, as a result of the inefficient allocation of man-power in our primary industries producing raw materials. Our plants were capable of manufacturing two, three and even four times what they are now doing. They had the men, to a great extent capable men, and the plants were certainly capable of manufacturing aircraft; but the men were sitting down, slowed down waiting for material. They were held by the firms who had employed them, where the organizations were disrupted by reason of slack time, waiting for conversion of a factory from one type of plane to another, instead of being placed elsewhere, where they could be giving all they had to an all-out effort. This was quite demoralizing to employees who, as faithful, loyal, anxious and courageous citizens, wish to do all they can in industry to further our war effort. A key man in a certain factory, making a certain type of aeroplane, found his factory converted to the manufacture of another type. He had special techniques, capabilities and experience to do that particular job. Why could he not have been moved to a firm who could use him, where his technical skill could be used to advantage in an all-out war effort, instead of slowing down, waiting until a new type of production was embarked upon by the firm for which he worked?

That condition was prevalent all across the dominion, not only in the aircraft industry, but certainly in the shipbuilding industry as well, and in other industrial enterprises. What could be more serious to the war effort than such a situation, when we want to produce all we can? In the failure of the government to mention this matter in the speech from the throne they have failed to mention the most important problem, probably the most difficult that is facing our country at the present time.

The allocation of man-power applies not only to industry but also to agriculture, which comprises one-third of our population drawing only one-sixth of the national income. Let me quote the words of a great man in the United States, a former president, who in a speech in New York on January 21, made this statement:

> Agriculture simply must be envisaged as a munitions industry. The farmer must receive men and tools if he is to perform his part. . . . The shortage of labour, of machinery and methods of price control are limiting the vitally essential expansion of this production, and the flocks and herds upon which production depends. And unless we can quickly realize and quickly reverse these limiting forces there are dangers to the conduct of the war.

That is a quotation from a former president of the United States, a country which has been just a little over one year in the war, whereas we are in our fourth year.

Another matter to which I direct the attention of the government is that of existing labour relations in Canada. I do not wish to dwell in detail upon it; but with regard to the steel strike, I am of opinion that the rate of wages paid to labour, in comparison with tripling and quadrupling the rate paid in salaries to some officials in the management of the companies, constitutes a just complaint which is not only demoralizing to the war effort, but depressing in its effect upon production. This is a factor causing greatly increased costs of production. I do not think I would be far astray in this statement, that if the materials were available we have the plants; and with the men, if labour relations were as they should be, we could increase our production of aeroplanes at least three times what it is at present with the factories we now have set up in Canada.

Another thing to which I object, as affecting both industry and agriculture, is the repeated call for men to serve in the armed forces and the uncertainty of the men as to when they will be called from munitions production or from agriculture into the armed forces. The men in industry and agriculture are some of the best we have in Canada, some of the most loyal and patriotic men, the furthest from slackers, men who would be the last to want to feel that they were not doing their utmost in the war effort.

Perhaps agriculture would give the best illustration. Let us consider the case of the young man on the farm. He has been raised on the farm; he has spent his whole life on the farm. He has received his education from the farm and has studied the various principles of farm operation, such as the rotation of crops, maintaining fertility on the land, the proper feeding of his stocks and flocks, the proper cultivating of his land, the planning of seasonal crops a year ahead. He has studied the multifarious sciences, such as the complicated science of marketing. He may have had an education in primary and secondary schools, and may have even attended university. But he is now on the soil, and he feels that he may be called from that soil some day—but he does not know when. It may be a call in three months or in six months, and he may be granted a postponement—but there is no certainty whatsoever of his getting off. In fact, in my own experience very often they do not hear from their applications for postponement until the very day they have to report for military service, or after.

What chance has this young man to use his scientific knowledge? He has applied himself with sincerity and devotion to his mode of life, to the mode of production on the farm, to the complicated problem of progressive agriculture, and the uncertainty connected therewith. What opportunity has his employer, be it his father or otherwise, a year in advance to plan crops, to decide how many milch cows he will keep, how many hens he will have, how many sheep or hogs he will keep, what grain he will grow? What folly it would be for a farmer in these days, in view of the shortage of farm help, to plan on keeping sixty or seventy milch cows, and to rotate his crops on a 100 or 150 acres of land! What folly it would be for him to plan his seasonal occupations, when he does not know that his son or his hired man may be called the following day for military service!

Several illustrations have come to my attention. Before, however, making any further comments, may I say that my objection is not levelled in any way against the registrar in military district No. 3. I believe the registrar and the selective service board in military district No. 3 have properly reflected government policy. I have no personal criticism to make of them. But I have had many young men come to my office to see me. I have had young men come to see me the very day they were to report for military service, and tell me they had made application for postponement three or four weeks, or a month or two months before, and had no reply. They asked me what to do. These young men were in unfortunate predicaments If they signed up, volunteering their services in the armed forces, they could count on just about six months more trying to get out—if they ever could. If, on the other hand, they stayed away and suffered the shame and ignominy which would be theirs, the condition would not be relieved, These men would not suffer that shame, but would prefer to answer the call.

On many occasions I have had to go to my telephone and communicate with the registrar at Kingston, Ontario. The registrar could not know whether this man was or was not a good farmer. I have tried to find out what attention would be given to his application, and I have had the registrar tell me, "Well, I will fix it up for him; tell him to wait until he hears from me."

This does not lend itself to efficiency. It does not lend itself to encouragement to agricultural workers in our country to put their heart and soul into the production of cheese and bacon, which the government would lead the worker to think they want him to produce. The agricultural worker is told that the world requires these commodities and that he should produce them.

But, once he has got into the armed forces, up to a short time ago when an announcement was made—and possibly even after that announcement, if one reads it carefully—whether or not he was a farmer's son, whether or not he had been spending his life in agriculture, whether or not he was a specialist in that industry, if he was in the military services he had about one chance in a hundred of ever getting back into agricultural production.

I remember one case very clearly. It had to do with an only son and two sisters, whose father had died a year earlier. These children lived with their mother on a 250-acre farm. They had eighteen milch cows, all the necessary machinery, splendid and fertile dairy land. This young man received his call for military service. Fearing he might be put into the army, and desiring to enlist in the air force, he proceeded to join that force. He had been in it for only two weeks when the one and only hired man they had left them. There was the mother with her two daughters left to look after a herd of cattle. I believe I am correct when I say that there were forty head of cattle altogether, including the eighteen milch cows. In addition, there were 200 hens, and 150 acres were under cultivation, the remaining 100 acres being held for pasture. The woman and her two daughters were left to farm that land.

Upon application being made by the young man, myself and many others, to let him return to the farm, where he was so urgently needed, we received the answer that there was no change in his situation. The attitude was: He knew what he was doing when he enlisted; he cannot get out of it. What happened as a result of this? The farm was converted from a dairying farm to pasture land. The mother and daughters had to leave their house and their farm.

Another case was brought to my attention. In this instance I interceded for an only son whose father and mother were both ill. The mother was confined to bed, as a cripple. The father was arthritic, and was not able to carry on his duties around the farm. This young man signed up under these circumstances. No leave of absence or discharge could be secured for him.

I know about a third case, and I point this one out as indicating something which the selective service board may possibly cure. I think they must cure it, and I surely hope they will, under the recent announcement. In this instance the farmer in question had three boys, one of whom was laid up with a heart condition, which left him incapable of doing the heavy work on the farm. The second was laid up with a stomach condition, rendering him unfit for work. The third was called. He signed up, leaving his sick brothers at home to look after a herd of sixty-seven milch cows. In this instance the farm consisted of 250 acres of tillable land. This boy applied for leave of absence—not a discharge. He wished to return to work on the farm, and was refused.

He obtained a doctor's certificate to the effect that the father could not look after the farm. Upon a rehearing being permitted, it was stated that the authorities had thought that the two boys left at home could run the farm. They pointed out, however, that upon reviewing the circumstances they saw matters in a new light. They realized that the situation had changed since the boy had enlisted, and they permitted him to go back for six months.

I believe all hon. members have their hearts and souls in the soil of Canada. Few of us have not had sufficient contact with agriculture in Canada to appreciate how difficult it is for the agriculturist to carry on progressively under prevailing conditions. Each of us will realize that to become a successful farmer requires many years of hard work; one must become accustomed to the mode of living. It is a highly developed vocation. Yet in these days we see farmers staying at home who are not permitted to sell a pound of butter manufactured on their own farms. A farmer may not kill his own pig for his own use, without first obtaining permission. Were we to engage in farming we would find that it requires some planning, and I certainly think the farmer merits more consideration than he is receiving.

For these reasons I welcome the announcement made the other day that the strings with respect to national selective service, as far as agriculture is concerned, are going to be loosened. My only regret is that the extent to which they are to be loosened was not announced long before this.

In my community many a herd of milch cows has been reduced and many a farmer has had to discontinue his activities, for I think it will be found that enlistments in the army from my constituency compare favourably with those from any other constituency in Canada. What is the farmer getting for the milk he has to sell? He is receiving the very same price he was getting in the depth of the depression. To-day in the city of Ottawa milk sells for twelve cents a quart, including a bonus of two cents paid by this government to the consumer, not to the producer. That was the price four years ago.

I now come to the price ceiling, which is of greatest concern to the farmer. I think every hon. member will agree that there is a great deal of truth in the old adage that farm prices are the last to rise and the first to drop. The object of having ceilings on prices is commendable; but in order to fit into our national economy these ceiling prices must be fair in our national interest. These ceilings were put on in the fall of the year, when in the main the produce of the farms was ready for marketing. This was done just after we had emerged from a depression, when the business man was able to raise his prices, change his brands, cut down on quality and quantity and do whatever else might be done in order to meet the fixed price. As usual, however, agriculture was behind commercial enterprise in raising its prices, and those prices did not reach the levels they should have been allowed to attain.

What has been done to meet the situation? Well, the government give a bonus on cheese. That is all very well. They give a bonus on butter, but that bonus is given to the consumer. A bonus is given on milk, but no part of those two cents a quart goes to the benefit of the producer. The only way in which the bonus on butter can help the farmer is by increasing the consumption of butter, but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government would have us believe that it is the duty of the farmer to convert his milk into cheese. He cannot do both. Then there is the farmer who manufactures his own butter, which he brings to the city and tries to sell. He cannot sell it unless he collects coupons, and he can collect only so many coupons from each individual. What an encouragement to agriculture that is! Then there is the question of farm wages. I do not think there is anyone in this house interested in agriculture who will not deplore the shortage of help on the farms. Why is there such a shortage? There are two reasons: either the farmer's son has left, or the farmer cannot pay wages high enough to get a man to help with the work. Agriculture demands long hours, with heavy work, which can be done only by those who have been accustomed to it. How many people not brought up on a farm can go out and establish themselves on the land, and produce as progressive and thrifty farmers do? I ask hon. members to compare the wages being paid to-day. A man driving a truck for an industrial concern can get eighty cents an hour. Can any farmer in Canada pay eighty cents an hour for a man to operate his power machinery? Is that not the best answer we have to any talk of equality of service and of sacrifice for our farmers? Or there is the other answer, the fact that one-third of the people of Canada who are engaged in agriculture receive only one-sixth of the national income. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that until the farmer can afford to compete with industry for labour, he is not getting his proper share of the national income.

What can we do about the matter? First, there are the national selective service boards. How many agriculturists are given positions to advise the registrars as to what farmers' sons are needed on the farms, as to what farmers should be called and what farmers should not be called? In my own case the registrar is at Kingston, almost a hundred miles away from my community. How can he know whether John is a good agriculturist, turning in a good war effort on his farm, and Tom is not? I believe that was the reason for the action taken in the case I mentioned a short time ago, where the man made application for a six months' postponement and was refused. To-day a farmer may send his son or daughter into industry, into the army, or into the civil service. If the daughter enters the civil service she receives a cost of living bonus, and rightly; but dad does not. That daughter comes to Ottawa; she gets her meals in a restaurant, where there is supposed to be a price ceiling. Will any hon. member say that restaurants serve meals of the same quantity and quality to-day as they served before the price was fixed? Go up to our parliamentary restaurant and see; you will get one potato instead of two, and someone says that is not a good one either. The daughter receives a cost of living bonus, superannuation benefits, and all the rest of it; she sees the millions of dollars being spent on temporary buildings which are to be removed within six months after the war is over; she sees the billions of dollars being advanced to industry to speed up war production. Then she goes home on a visit to dad and mother and says, "What about you?"

I had intended to go into the question of finance, Mr. Speaker, because I believe the people of Canada are critical of the millions of dollars being spent on temporary buildings, on the construction of munitions plants, on the large increases to the already high salaries. I have every sympathy with civil servants in the low income brackets, who are paid $60 or $70 or $75 a month and who must pay $30 or $35 for board; but even so, that is more than their father and mother are earning on the farm. As they see the vast industrial expansion; as their sons and daughters return home and tell them of the conditions under which they must live in Ottawa, it is a wonder there is not much more discontent. It is no marvel to me that the agriculturist, able as he is to see what is going on, should ask for parity and equality of treatment.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who would let the seriousness of the hour or the seriousness of my own remarks deter me from those amenities of life which, even in troublesome times like these, may be more pleasant than they otherwise might be. For that reason I elect to begin in the traditional way by extending my compliments to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I would be remiss if I did otherwise at this moment than address a remark to a personal friend of mine who has been done a most signal honour since this house last met. I refer to the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I mentioned to him before, and I should like to remind him again, that a signal honour has been done to him because there is the probability of his going down to posterity as the last leader of the once great Conservative party.

It will not be expected of me in this house at this time that I should attempt to make a political speech, neither will it be expected that I should fail to comment upon at least one event which took place in or near the constituency which I have the honour to represent. While I accept no responsibility for it, I was interested in what took place in the city of Winnipeg during the past few months when an honour was done to one of my most distinguished constituents in the person of the Hon. John Bracken when the late Conservative party surrendered to him at Winnipeg. The people of Winnipeg, and indeed the people of all Manitoba I think will join with me in a feeling of some natural pride that a man whom most of us have known at one time or another has been so signally honoured by an old and established —we thought it was established—political party. With respect to that I should like to make just one observation. I do not think I shall be misunderstood when I say that if the erstwhile Conservative party can do as much for John Bracken in the federal field as the Liberal party did for him in the provincial field, then he is one of the most fortunate men that Canada has produced.

I do not think I have ever made in this house anything approaching the nature of a constituency speech. There may be some difference of opinion about that, but in any event I do not think I ever did. For a little time to-night I propose to speak about, not only the constituency which I have the honour to represent but the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba as a whole. We in Manitoba during the war have done a magnificent job. Thousands of our finest sons are carrying Canada's battle might by land and sea and air throughout all the fields of operation of the present war. Two of as fine regiments as have ever left Canada have suffered grievous sacrifice, almost elimination, first at Hong Kong and then at Dieppe. No loan which has been put before the people of Manitoba has failed of its quota; no appeal for the Red Cross, no appeal to sacrifice has ever gone unheeded. During the period of the war all of these appeals have been exceeded by the citizens of that city and that province.

Take salvage collection alone. The figures in connection with national salvage collection came to my desk the other day, and they showed that the voluntary collections in Manitoba amounted to 42,167 pounds per thousand of people. The nearest province to Manitoba was Ontario with a figure of 37,100 pounds per thousand, but our original figure was almost double that of nearly every other province in the Dominion of Canada. These figures indicate the war-mindedness, the war spirit and the earnest desire of the people of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba to make their full weight felt in this war. We are proud of these results, but we are by no means satisfied with them.

I should like to say to the house, to the members of the government and to all who may be interested that the contribution which Winnipeg and Manitoba are making to the war effort is not contingent upon any quid pro quo return by way of those advantages in the way of distribution of work and the added increment of wages which accrue in some places at some times in a state of war. Up to the middle of 1940 any war contracts accruing to the city of Winnipeg constituted a mere trickle, and at no time have they bulked large in the economic life of the province. It is perfectly true that we have one large and successfully operated war plant, a plant which is an outgrowth of the war, due entirely to the war, and for the work which has been given, for the opportunity which has been accorded to share in the war contribution, we are indeed grateful.

Responsible thinking people in the city of Winnipeg do not ask that one man should work for one day at a job which is no longer essential to the war effort of Canada, but we do object to the suggestion which is put out at times that the full weight of the man-power of Canada, and to a lesser extent the machine-power of Canada, are employed in this war when we have in our own city and province a residue of unemployment, a considerable number of employables who are possessed of skills but who are not yet employed, and a considerable backlog of unskilled labour which is capable and willing and anxious to share in the industrial war effort of this country. What we desire is that in the fulness of the national effort we be given an opportunity to utilize those powers which we have, in order that our contribution to the war effort of Canada may be as great as possible. We can show unused resources, and we are now ready to share fully in the war effort.

I do not think anyone in the province of Manitoba or in the city of Winnipeg thinks of war contracts as a sort of melon to be cut. I have never heard any responsible person say that because we have sent so many thousands of men, so many thousands of our women into the service of Canada, both at home and elsewhere, because of their sacrifice and effort, we have a right to participate in any economic melon or anything of that description. That is not the background of the complaint which I desire to register in this house to-night. We want a full opportunity to contribute and, frankly, we do not think we have had it.

In the last few months I have had an opportunity to travel over considerable portions of Canada, and I suggest in all seriousness that there has been plant expansion which is both unnecessary and uneconomical and, as far as I can see, wholly unjustifiable in view of what remains available in other parts of Canada, particularly that part from which I come. I do not suggest that this is the major breakdown, but I do know the potentialities, the unused reservoir if you like, of labour that is available. Again I suggest that the magnitude of this expansion was unnecessary, and the practice should not be perpetuated. In my opinion, workers should not be sharing work and wages to-day anywhere in Canada in order to keep their number employed if we were in a position fully to utilize, as we have sometimes said we were, the whole man-power and woman-power of the nation.

There is one suggestion that I should like to make. I do not wish to deal with it in detail, but I will place the information I have before the minister who probably can do something about it. I speak of steel for fabrication. It is no military secret that steel is constantly going through Winnipeg to British Columbia for fabrication, where we are told that facilities are already congested and conditions sometimes unsettled. We have facilities in Winnipeg for the fabrication of steel. I know something of the arguments against it, the problem of trans-shipment.

Simplicity of design; the potentialities of the fabricating plants in Winnipeg are matters about which I am not particularly qualified to speak. Therefore I will not be technical, but I suggest to the minister, the government and the house that consideration should be given to the provision of some of these simple expedients for a fuller and freer opportunity for our people at this time.

I have seen factories built or reconditioned in a certain spot in the middle east of Canada, because there was in that particular place what the minister called a pocket of unemployment, yet within 150 miles of there work was plentiful and a cry was going out for labourers. I do not object to the building or reconditioning of such plants in order to provide work there for those Canadian workers who prefer to stay in their own homes. But I do not think it jibes very well with the suggestion made, I do not know how officially, but certainly unofficially, that we ship our unemployed population across half the continent.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is being done right now.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not even regret that. I say I am glad they are being given an opportunity anywhere. But I am registering my protest against that discrepancy. I am not admitting for a moment that full consideration has been given to the situation in Winnipeg. I do know that a deliberate attempt has been and is being made, and the cause, of those workers has been bedevilled, by people who seek to make political capital out of workers' misfortune. That being the situation, is it to be wondered at that some of our people are willing to follow will-o'-the-wisps, to listen to the persons that some call prophets of doom? Is it to be wondered at that many of our people are worrying not so much as to whether we are going to have another depression after the war as when the one they have been living in for the past ten or fifteen years is going to end? And is it to be wondered if some ask the question, if in a time when Canada is all out in the war effort we cannot get a break, what hope is there about what may come after? This is aggravated by the fact that this country is full of unthinking people who go up and down prophesying distress and misfortune when the war is over. I do not make any bones about who these prophets of doom are; they are the people who hope to get political power in this country after the war if, as they hope or at any rate proclaim, we are in for a bad time once the war is over.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Personally I have no fear of the aftermath of this war on Canada. I do not think anything that we in this house in our wisdom or lack of it can do can hold back the future destiny of this dominion. I look forward to seeing within fifteen or eighteen years, or at the most twenty years after the close of the war, thirty million people in Canada. I hope in twenty-five years to see forty million. Would anyone say now, in view of what we know, that this is impossible? Dare anyone stand up against the surging tide of humanity that will be inevitable when the holocaust that we are now enduring is over? Mankind is bound to surge from the wreckage and destruction of the old world to build again in the new world, encompassed by the freedoms for which we fight. We must look to a necessary and, as far as I am concerned, welcome period of mass immigration into this country when the war is over. Some will say, selective immigration; with that I have no quarrel. Let it be selective as to health, as to skills, as far as that is humanly possible. But I wonder how long artificial selective principles can stand against the march of humanity in view of conditions which prevail, not in isolated spots in Europe but throughout practically the whole of the known world to-day with the exception of our own fortunate north American continent. The tide will turn to us. If we catch it on the flood, we can do in twenty-five years in Canada what it took England seventy-five years to do and what the United States with the policy of the open door scarcely accomplished in fifty years. That is one thing the war is doing for us, one opportunity it has placed at our front door.

If we believe that, as I do, I wonder why we are delving into the dead ashes of yesterday. Yesterday cannot come again. To-morrow will be better or worse as we make it. I am not in the least afraid that when the war is over we shall slip back into repetition of the mistakes of the days following the last war or of the depression. I expect we shall make new mistakes. I do not think all the foresight, wisdom and legislation this side of eternity can prevent some mistakes being made or even the repetition of some of those we made before, because society is not a static thing. If mankind followed a precise and perfect pattern throughout the ages or even throughout a generation, we might be able to look back and say, Yesterday we made this mistake; we will not make it again. But in our social legislation or social thinking or national thinking we must not be in the position of turning our eyes backward all the time in order to keep constantly in our memory the mistakes we made. We are all equally guilty or bear our share of responsibility for the shortcomings of that era, and I include the prophets of the new utopia with the rest. The only difference between them and us is that they are trying to perpetuate the memory, to seize on that unfortunate chapter of our history and intimate that while the rest of us were going to economic damnation along certain lines, they were looking the other way seeking in order to prevent the anchor from dragging. I do not see it that way. They look to the past, saying to the public, Look here, when the whole works start to slip back down the hill we have the biggest block to put under the wheel; we have something brand new to block the wheel with, and if you will trust us you will never go back. But you will not get up the hill by blocking the wheel. My wish is that when the time comes to resume our upward climb we shall have the vision to give new leadership so that all will put their shoulder to the wheel in the spirit of the pioneers, who came to this country not just to get rid of persecution and difficulty and merely hoping to have exactly what they had over there except for the removal of the things that troubled them. They were not satisfied with that; they did not endure the hardships of the pioneer for that; they came to build something better, not only something which did away with the things which caused them to come here, but something finer and better for their sons than had existed before.

I venture to say that this is the spirit which motivates large numbers of the people of Manitoba. We have not been caught up in the dizzy whirl of the intense activities of the industrialized parts of Canada. We have had time in the evenings, and some of us unfortunately in the daytime, to look at the picture of the past, to think about those sons and daughters of ours who are not with us, who are engaged elsewhere, and we are thinking of what is going to happen to them when they return. We are wondering what we are going to be able to offer them; and, if the boys who are in the actual theatres of war are also wondering what they are to return to, if it is any consolation to them at the present time, we too are thinking about it. One of our conclusions is that we cannot go along forever with twelve or fifteen million people scattered across a country which has a governmental and industrial set-up sufficient for a terrific expansion of population. Many of us on the prairies have watched the growth of the city of Winnipeg. Some remember it when it was hardly more than a very small town. I cannot go back that far, but I have seen the population doubled. We recall some of the conditions which caused it to grow, which kept its sons and daughters at home and made them busy. We are determined that some of those conditions shall return, and we do not expect to accomplish our purpose entirely by legislating ourselves into utopia.

We cannot think all the time of to-morrow; and, as I have said, we should not look backwards except for a moment or two, for humility's sake. It is not enough to have a vision of the future. It is not enough to make up our minds that we will not repeat the mistakes of the past. There is also some obligation to look at the problems of to-day.

I should have liked to speak for a little while, though I shall not do so, about the military contribution which Canada is making in the war. I shall reserve my remarks on that subject to a later time when the department concerned is under discussion and the minister has been restored to health and is in the house.

But there are problems of urgent importance. The plight of the aged in Canada cries aloud for more generous consideration, and I suggest to the government and to the house that the British North America Act will not do for our present needs. Canada expects a better deal and she wants it now.

We are concerned about attacks on the price control measures. We believe in stern measures against those who, for selfish reasons, attempt to undermine the protective influences of both price and wages legislation. Stern measures in dealing with those selfish attempts where they occur would meet with proper acclaim. I would suggest that control must not become a weapon in the hands of either side in an attempt at class war, and the government must see to it, if they are to get the popular support which controls require, that control is a means to an end and not an end in itself. No union, no combine, no individual can afford at this stage of Canada's struggle to contribute for selfish or unworthy ends to the weakening of any war effort.

We cannot overlook the problems of those who are dependent upon the state. I have pleaded on three or four occasions for further consideration of the lot of the aged. I have in committee and in this chamber appealed on more than one occasion for better treatment of the widows of the men who fell in the last war or who have died since, and I am grateful for the announcement that some provision along that line is to be made.

I do not believe that the government or the provinces can afford to wait until the end of the war before doing something about the housing situation in this dominion. I know there is a problem of raw materials as well as of securing skilled labour for doing the work.

But I suggest seriously that the war effort itself is suffering in a major degree in at least some parts of Canada by virtue of our inability as yet to figure out a way to deal with this situation. I do not suggest that there is an unwillingness to deal with it, but I maintain that we have been incapable of dealing with it up to this point and that we require to do more about it, and to do it now, if we are to sustain our proud boast that we are getting the maximum of effort from our people.

One other matter, and I shall close. We had in Canada in pre-war days a degree of sectionalism which thwarted the best efforts of the finest minds that have been engaged in the problem of governing Canada for the past twenty years. I am happy to say of my own knowledge that to a large extent that narrow sectional attitude has been dissipated throughout the period of this war. I come from the west, and for seven or eight years I have stood with good humour all the jokes with respect to the desires, idiosyncrasies and peculiarities of the people of the west. In return I have made various retorts, pungent or otherwise, depending upon the degree of intimacy, which have been endured with good humour. I suggest to the administration, because it is a matter of great concern to them, that to proceed with a measure for the lessening of the representation of western Canada, and particularly of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in this house during the period of the war is to invite the resurgence of a bitterness which has largely evaporated during the last few years. It is likely to accentuate every nasty insinuation which has ever gone on the record, and which is in the process of being forgotten. Although we believe that our contribution in the war is as good as anyone's, as I have said before, we do not ask for our contribution a quid pro quo in the matter of the distribution of the things which come out of the war, except in so far as it is in the general interest of the war effort. Our people ask no more than that. But we cannot go home—I question if anybody from Manitoba or Saskatchewan can go home—to our people and convince them that they are anything but stepchildren in the family of Canada if, at a time when by every single word which is said in this house and in every act which is passed in this house or by order in council our lives and the lives of our children are affected, this measure of restriction is to be applied. We do not feel that we are overrepresented. There are some who may question the quality of the representation.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. MUTCH: My hon. friend may find it out. Perhaps there are some who question it, but there is hardly anyone who believes that we are overrepresented; in view of the fact that almost every other section of the dominion has, at one time or another, perhaps for lesser cause than exists to-day, been able either to fix its representation or enhance it. I do not want this to sound like an attack; I do not intend it to be such. But it is not good enough to say that some well-established practice that has existed for a period of years is one of those sacred necessities which we cannot disturb in a time of war. To me that is hooey. We think a way can be found to suspend it and to protect our representation in this period until such time as those thousands of our people who are serving either overseas or in other parts of Canada can come back and we can get in the prairies that representation of population which is relative to the natural home and habitat of those people. We desire, and I think most of us demand, that the matter be left for the period of the war and a reasonable period of adjustment afterwards.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the house to bring forward some ideas which I should like to have the government consider before they proceed with legislation, or before the budget comes down. First of all, I want to say a word with regard to trade. To-day in the House of Commons, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) rose in his place and, I think, convinced everybody of the difficulty that Great Britain and other parts of the empire are having in an endeavour to pay, partly at least, for the commodities that Canada is sending forward to that country to help them in the war, and to help us through them. Therefore I say that to have any tariff whatever against Great Britain at this time is absolutely ridiculous. To put anything in the way of allowing Great Britain at this time to ship goods into this country to help to pay for the commodities that she is getting from us is too foolish, and I hope that the government, during this session, will see to it that tariffs are entirely wiped out between Canada and Great Britain.

I wish to say a word also about trade with the United States of America and with any other country in the world that wishes or is willing to deal with us on a free-trade basis. In my opinion, during this war the industrialist of Canada has proved that in the war effort he has carried out he is the equal, if not the superior, of any industrialist in the world. We have found, in looking into the production of munitions and supplies for the war, that the industrialist in Canada has done a remarkable job, that the engineers behind that industrialist have great ingenuity, that they have been able to cut costs at an amazing rate, and that we can stand on our feet industrially to-day with anyone in this world.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him business; that is all he needs.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The way to get it is to open trade routes. Do that and you will get business. When this war is over, industry throughout the world will have to be rehabilitated. All industry to-day is practically on a war-time basis, and there must be an adjusting period. All industry must change over again to peace-time pursuits, and therefore at that time all industry will be on a level in the world, a level on which it has not been for many years. There are also many controls—war controls, exchange controls, and the controls in the handling of raw materials—which will have to be gradually done away with as we come to the finish of the war. No one to-day can be hurt by the removal of any tariff, because exchange must be turned over to those who are to import into the country and the whole thing is controlled anyway. So that now is the one time that Canada can lower her tariffs or do away with them altogether, without hurting any industrialist, any worker, any citizen of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, in the budget the government should come down with free trade with Great Britain and the freest kind of trade with the United States and many other nations.

We have had some war-time controls which I do not think have worked altogether to the benefit of Canada. Under the wartime prices and trade board, we have practically closed the American border to the shipment of cattle to the United States. We have done that, but I hope the United States people will not look upon that as a more or less unfriendly act in trade on our part. Some of them may say that at the time they needed beef cattle from us we would not allow cattle to cross the border. It must be remembered, however, that we are giving them a considerable amount of beef in other ways. For instance, their ships that go in the convoys from this country get large supplies to take them over and back. Their people in Alaska, their troops, their construction workers, have received large supplies of beef from Canada, and, as we all know, the north American continent as a whole is short of beef to-day.

Ever since I came to this house in 1925, and I believe for many years before that, there has been a great lack of appreciation of the importance of agriculture in the Canadian economy. The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and every past Minister of Agriculture has had to battle like a Trojan to get any money for agriculture out of any government in Canada. This has been the policy of all governments in this country. Thank goodness we have not tried the policy which an hon. member who seeks to interrupt me is trying to bring in, but every Minister of Agriculture has had to battle to get sufficient funds to help agriculture in Canada, and I do not doubt that the present minister has made himself unpopular with some other ministers in the government in an endeavour to put forward the rights of the farmer, which I know he does morning, noon and night. But what we need to-day in this country, more than we have ever needed it before, is a forward-looking policy in agriculture. That would be, not a policy for one year, but a policy for at least five years, or for at least two years after the war, whichever may be the longer.

The situation on this continent to-day is this. The United States and Canada, the two greatest food-producing countries in the world, are shipping considerable supplies of food to the united nations, and while doing that are having to cut down, to some extent, on the amount of food being used by their own people. For some years the United States put into effect policies of curtailing production in agriculture. At the present time there is only one product that is even called a surplus product in Canada and the United States, namely, wheat.

As I said before in this house, and as I will say again, all of that will be needed by the end of this war, or immediately after the war is over. When the war started there were those in Canada who thought it would not be well to bring down a policy with regard to hogs, butter, eggs, cheese or milk, because we would get ourselves into a position where we would not be able to sell them, and we would have surpluses. But that has pretty well all gone now. There are shortages in respect of all those commodities to-day, as far as the needs of the united nations are concerned.

We must plan for the future, for the war, for the period after victory, for bargaining with people who need food, and for the feeding of people as our armies go forward. Canada must be the chief supplier of these commodities. As quickly as possible we must accumulate stock piles of food, in order to feed the people of the united nations, and the people who will be liberated in Europe. Even in north Africa to-day, people who have been liberated there are not receiving sufficient food. If Italy were to fold up in this war, there would be 55,000,000 more people to be fed, immediately. Then, we must consider Greece, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria—food must be available with respect to all these countries when our armies start to move in.

Although they may not be interested in what I am saying, I wish my hon. friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would keep quiet, so that others might listen.

I have said that we need future planning and stock piles. For instance, such commodities as powdered eggs, powdered milk, flour, peas, beans, edible oils and fats of different kinds, dried fruits, dried and desiccated vegetables, canned meats—all these should be accumulated in great quantities as quickly as possible.

There are those who will say that we have not sufficient processing plants. Well, when war started we did not have manufacturing concerns to turn out the munitions of war. However, we have them now, because we built them. We can build processing plants in Canada very rapidly, if we want to. Some will say we have not the storage warehouses in which to store these goods. These, too, may be built very quickly. Some say that these meats, and other commodities, cannot be stored for a period of years. I believe Canadian scientists have enough brains and enough ingenuity to find ways and means of protecting perishable goods in storage.

We must find new methods of shipment and handling of perishable foods, in order that these commodities may be transferred during the war, and rapidly thereafter. I have said that Canada must be the main supplier. Why? Because in Canada we have followed a sane policy of endeavouring to try to keep our population at a fair level. Through our price control and wage control measures we have endeavoured as far as possible to give an even deal throughout the country, and not to let wages and salaries run away and thereby start an inflationary spiral.

Unfortunately the United States of America has not followed quickly enough. We find that in that country many thousands of people are getting high wages in money, but because the commodities they have to buy are rising rapidly in price they will not get much more out of it in the end. They will be paying higher prices and demanding many foods which to-day are not plentiful in the United States. That process has already started. Therefore it may be that the increase in food production in the United States will be taken up by their own people for some little time.

Then, in Canada we should have a policy in regard to live stock for the time the war is going on, and for the time when it is over.

An hon. MEMBER: Why have you not one now?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There is one; but I am talking about a more extensive one. No doubt in many parts of Europe the supply of live stock has decreased considerably. We cannot develop a live stock policy in a year or two years, For instance, the production of dairy cattle cannot be accomplished in much under four years. The same applies to beef cattle. Breeding stock of hogs or sheep can be produced much more rapidly. That condition, however, does not apply to cattle. Therefore I say that money should be made available to the Minister of Agriculture so that a policy may be developed whereby we can produce more and better live stock in Canada, against the day when the war is over and this live stock can be shipped to rehabilitate the herds and flocks of Europe. But help in that regard must come to the farmers throughout this country.

I do not intend speaking beyond eleven o'clock this evening. I had intended only to point out that Canada is one of the united nations in a position to accumulate large supplies of foodstuffs of all kinds and classes. They can be produced by farmers from one end of Canada to the other. Our policy should be such that not one available acre of cultivated land should be left unproductive while the war is in progress, from now on. Every acre should be used to produce as much as possible. I do not say that high prices should be paid by the government for those commodities that are to be put into storage, but I say that fair prices should be paid to all producers in agriculture. I will admit that this may mean the financing to a very considerable extent by the government of such a programme for one, two or three years. Let us take a look at what has been done in the past. Last year we financed, to the extent of a billion dollars, goods which were sent to our allies. This afternoon the Minister of Finance spoke of some amount of money to be spent this year in order to see to it that the united nations may be able to obtain their supplies from us. Well, I do not know what the government spent last year on agricultural products to be turned over to the united nations, but I venture to say that it was not over ten per cent of the billion dollars. Probably $900,000,000 went into industry throughout Canada and perhaps $100,000,000 into agriculture. Certainly that is not a fair proposition. If within the next two or three years we devoted four or five hundred million dollars to the purpose of gathering together and storing foodstuffs for the united nations, in the end we would not have to pay that whole cost. The united nations will have to feed these people who are liberated, and we are in a position to have these foodstuffs readily available when the war is over. It is a big job, but it is a job that we in this country must tackle. As a farmer I say it is the business of this government to-day to think along those lines and to endeavour to formulate a policy that will carry out thoughts of this kind which I am satisfied have been in the mind of the Minister of Agriculture for some time. But with this government, as with past governments, it is a hard job for him or any other minister to get money with which to do anything for agriculture.

There is only one other thing I want to say, and then I am through. This afternoon I listened to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) when he referred to the leader of this house (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have heard other leaders throughout the world praised by almost everyone in Canada. I cannot understand some of our people. Here is a man who for years has led the greatest political party in this dominion. Here is a man who for years has been Prime Minister of Canada. Here is a man who has been attacked on the ground that he did not give leadership in this country, when from the start of this war he has given leadership which has been followed by practically every other prime minister in the world. We have people who call themselves good Canadians crossing the border into the United States and disparaging the efforts of Mackenzie King and the government of Canada. They are not only border-crossers; they are double-crossers of the people of Canada. We have Americans coming into this country singing the same sort of song with regard to Mr. Roosevelt, when we know he will go down in history as the greatest president the United States ever had. He has been blackguarded by people throughout the United States, just as Mackenzie King has been blackguarded by people throughout Canada. It is about time this business stopped. Mackenzie King has given real leadership in this country, and Canada has done a better job in this war than any other country in the world.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, let me add that in Canada's war effort the farmers of this country have done a remarkable job and have said very little about the tough times they have had in doing it. Therefore I ask the government to look into the matters about which I have spoken to-night, to see if we cannot get a proper policy for agriculture in the coming budget.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

FREE RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, this bill raises the whole question of soldiers' transportation in Canada. The purpose of the bill is to amend the Railway Act to provide that members of the forces when in uniform may be carried free on railway trains within Canada. In the last war the railways voluntarily carried the members of the forces for single fare on week-ends. Now they carry them every day at half rate. The Railway Act itself does not provide for any special concessions to soldiers during the war, nor has the board of transport commissioners power to order any. In view of the fact that so many of the camps are far away from railways I think that some measure of free transportation should be provided for our troops who are training all over Canada. Furthermore, a large number of them have been killed on the highways when thumbing a ride. The fifty-mile limit on travel by bus over the highways should be suspended so far as soldiers are concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VICTORY LOANS

STATEMENT AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF SUBSCRIPTIONS TO FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD ISSUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make two statements, one a brief one and the other a longer one. The brief statement is with regard to the sales of victory bonds.

As wholly inaccurate statements regarding victory bond sales have been made in certain quarters, I desire to table a statistical compilation showing a classification of the source of subscriptions, at time of issue, to the first, second and third victory loans. The statement has been compiled by the national war finance committee and reveals the amount of each issue purchased by individual investors; by banking institutions for their own account; by dominion, provincial and municipal government agencies or funds; by insurance companies, pension funds, etc.; by trust and mortgage companies, etc.; by colleges, churches, hospitals and charitable organizations; and by business firms and corporations.

For the information of the house I may point out that preliminary figures for the third victory loan show total subscriptions by individuals of $401·1 millions, leaving $590·4 millions representing the total purchases of all other kinds of buyers. Government agencies or funds purchased $54·5 millions; insurance companies, pension funds, etc., $176·7 millions; trust and mortgage companies, etc., $11·3 millions; colleges, churches, hospitals and charitable organizations, $3·3 millions; mining companies, $43·6 millions; other business firms and corporations, $298 millions; and banks, $3 millions.

Of the $3 millions purchased by banks, $2·5 millions were purchased by the Quebec savings banks and the remaining $·5 millions by the chartered banks. In the first victory loan the chartered banks had purchased for cash only $6·7 millions and in the second victory loan there were no cash subscriptions by chartered banks—although, of course, in both cases there were conversion subscriptions by the banks. I stress the insignificant volume of the purchases by the chartered banks because I fear the impression has been given in some quarters that the chartered banks have been among the largest purchasers of these securities. As the house knows, we have actively discouraged the participation by the chartered banks in the purchases of victory bonds except in those cases where a short-term, low interest-bearing bond was offered as part of a victory loan issue for the purpose of converting a maturing issue already held by the banks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister proceeds, will he say whether the statement covers dispositions and sales of victory bonds, say, by other investors such as corporations? My understanding is that a large number of corporations have sold their first and second victory loan bonds and others are still holding them for resale.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member means, does it cover the number of sales?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is the fly in the ointment.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not very serious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not? Well, I think it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am tabling this statement. It follows:

First, Second and Third Victory Loans
Estimated Derivation of Subscriptions at Time of Issue

The attached memorandum contains the estimated derivation of subscriptions, at time of issue, to the first, second, and third victory loans. Figures in regard to the third victory loan are preliminary, as the final results of this loan are not yet compiled.

The subscriptions to each loan are divided into two broad classes, designated Individuals and Non-individuals.

The group designated Individuals includes two sub-divisions, described as special names and all others. Special names individuals represents subscriptions received from investors believed to be capable of buying $25,000 or more par value of bonds at the time of each issue. The group shown as all others represents subscriptions received in the general and employee canvasses. This group includes subscriptions from small commercial and non-profit bodies, the aggregate subscriptions from which would be relatively small in proportion to the total.

The Non-individuals section has been subdivided to show subscriptions from banks for their own account; government accounts; insurance companies, pension funds, etc.; and miscellaneous, this latter group reflecting, for the most part, subscriptions from business firms and corporations.

These data have been compiled by the National War Finance Committee from information obtained at the time of public offering of the three loans, and from other sources. The data should be regarded as estimates, and the results of the third victory loan should be regarded as subject to revision when final results of the loan become available.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

STATEMENT AS TO RELATIONSHIPS WITH DEPARTMENTS OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES, AND MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The other statement I wish to make is with regard to the wartime prices and trade board.

There has in recent months been some discussion in the press on relationships between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture and during the past ten days the subject has been raised in the house. It seems desirable, therefore, to make a statement regarding these relationships. The occasion also presents an opportunity for announcing certain other changes in jurisdiction affecting relationships between the Department of Finance and the Department of Munitions and Supply.

The wartime prices and trade board was created by the government on September 3, 1939, with the responsiblity and the necessary powers to control prices and under wartime conditions to ensure adequate supply and equitable distribution of civilian goods and services.

During the earlier stages of the war the frequent exercise of its mandatory powers was not warranted by the circumstances, and the board in respect of the commodities under its jurisdiction was able effectively to control prices and ensure adequate supply by anticipating and preventing distribution shortages with the minimum use of formal orders.

As the war progressed, as we approached the stage of total mobilization, the board's powers were further extended and it became more and more necessary to exercise its formal powers of regulations. Fifteen months ago the stage was reached when far-reaching and almost universal controls of prices and of other aspects of our economic structure became necessary, if we were to avoid inflation and secure, so far as war conditions permit, adequate supply and equitable distribution.

In the development of these controls and of other controls in other government departments, it was inevitable that some overlapping should occur and some uncertainty of jurisdiction arise. Such a situation began to develop in 1941 between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Munitions and Supply, and this was clarified by arrangements made and announced in August of that year.

I think quite a number of hon. members still may not realize the tremendous inflationary pressure that has been developing in Canada during the past eighteen months and how severe and complicated a task it is to prevent these pressures breaking out into a violent and uncontrolled price inflation that would jeopardize our war effort. In spite of what we have felt to be very severe taxation, in spite of the tremendous and gratifying success of our loan and savings campaigns, the pressure of free consumer purchasing power on the necessarily limited supply of consumer goods shows few signs of diminishing.

During the complicated period of organization of these new price and supply controls in the past year, things have had to be done quickly, and one result has been a blurring of the lines of responsibility between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture. Let me say at once that there have been frequent and detailed consultations between the departments concerned, but time has not always permitted either party to assess all the implications of the actions of one upon the other.

In recent weeks this matter has been fully reviewed by the Minister of Agriculture and myself with the result that a full understanding has been reached between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture, overlapping has been eliminated and clear-cut responsibilities established.

The new definition of functions presents no substantially new alignment of authority, but clarifies the basic considerations which have always applied, but which under the pressure of events have at times become confused. Such clarifications of relationships are a frequent, almost continuous, aspect of governmental administration and do not normally warrant a statement to the house. In this case, however, there has developed a good deal of speculation in the press and in some instances this speculation has given rise to greatly exaggerated ideas of the administrative difficulties which have arisen. It, therefore, seems appropriate to advise the house as to what the relationships between the Department of Agriculture and the wartime prices and trade board are.

The wartime prices and trade board is responsible to the Minister of Finance and, subject to that responsibility:

1. It is responsible for estimating and defining the over-all domestic needs for food. Such estimates will be prepared and from time to time revised in consultation with the other departments or agencies concerned.

2. It is responsible for food imports and their distribution subject to existing laws and regulations.

3. It has the final responsibility in all matters of price.

4. It is responsible for all consumer rationing of foods.

The Department of Agriculture, on the other hand, is responsible for the primary production of agricultural foodstuffs, and it has certain functions to perform in the distribution of agricultural products. In order to clarify relationships with the wartime prices and trade board, the following working principles have been adopted:

1. The Department of Agriculture is responsible for seeing that the greatest possible production is forthcoming within the price ceilings established by the wartime prices and trade board.

2. If the desired production cannot be obtained within established price ceilings, there will be consultation between the Department of Agriculture and the wartime prices and trade board. Such consultation will include consideration of subsidies, price adjustments, or a decision to regard the estimated deficiency of supply as non-essential.

3. Recommendations to council respecting subsidies to primary producers will be made by the Minister of Agriculture. Consumer subsidies, however, that is those designed specifically to reduce costs to the consumer, will be the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board but any such subsidies relating to agricultural products produced in Canada will be a subject of consultation with the Department of Agriculture.

4. Export of such foods as are made available under contract to the united nations (except wheat for milling or flour, which are under Trade and Commerce) will be supervised by the Department of Agriculture.

5. All other steps necessary and desirable for the encouragement of domestic food production by primary producers rest with the Department of Agriculture rather than the wartime prices and trade board.

In the matter of distribution the Department of Agriculture is responsible for any necessary diversion of meat products, dairy products, poultry products, and fresh or dried fruits and vegetables to the armed forces and other priority users in accordance with approved allocations. Distribution to retailers and to ultimate civilian consumers is the responsibility of the board. To avoid duplication of services and staff there will be the closest possible cooperation between the board and the department in the inter-area wholesale movement of foodstuffs for civilian consumption. Wherever possible the use of existing machinery and mutual use of employees and offices will be arranged.

Hon. members will see from this statement that the lines of demarcation are simple and clear. In essence, the Department of Agriculture is responsible for production by primary producers, for export arrangements under contract to meet the needs of Great Britain and the united nations and, where its field organization is already functioning, for inter-area distribution and transfer of supplies as required. The wartime prices and trade board is responsible for imports, and for wholesale and retail distribution. The board also has final responsibility in all matters of price and rationing. Wherever there are mutual interests, there will be the fullest consultation, interchange of information, and cooperation and mutual use of offices and staff.

In this statement I have dealt with the wartime prices and trade board's relationships to the Department of Agriculture. A similar clarification of relationships with the Department of Fisheries has also been reached.

Another rearrangement in jurisdiction with a view to clarification of duties and responsibilities has been arrived at between the wartime industries control board of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Finance, and has to do with certain domestic end products of a civilian character heretofore under the jurisdiction of the controller of supplies, and to the control over coal and wood fuel.

In the division of jurisdiction between the Departments of Munitions and Supply and Finance, more particularly between the wartime industries control board and the wartime prices and trade board, there is, as I have said, a certain amount of inevitable overlapping of authority, but in so far as it is possible to state a general principle, it is that jurisdiction over basic materials or end products, the principal use of which is for war purposes, should rest with the wartime industries control board, while those which are primarily of a civilian nature should be with the wartime prices and trade board.

Prior to the introduction of the price ceiling policy and the establishment of industry administrators by the wartime prices and trade board, a number of end products of a civilian nature were declared to be "supplies" and were brought under the jurisdiction of the controller of supplies, not because the end products themselves were direct war requirements, but primarily because of their critical material content. These items have now been transferred from the controller of supplies to the appropriate industry administrators of the wartime prices and trade board.

In line with the general principle the control of oil, electrical energy and gas rests with the

Department of Munitions and Supply through the wartime industries control board, but coal and wood fuel have been with agencies of the Department of Finance.

At one stage in the development of controls this arrangement was satisfactory, but the growing shortages of coal and wood fuel emphasize the desirability of centralized control over all forms of fuel in order to facilitate production planning. Moreover production of wood fuel is closely related to the timber control under the Department of Munitions and Supply. It is therefore proposed to transfer control over both coal and wood fuel to the Department of Munitions and Supply, which will now be responsible for all domestic primary production other than agricultural or fisheries products.

When these rearrangements have been completed responsibility for primary production will be clearly established. The Department of Agriculture or Fisheries will be responsible for the primary production of food, and the Department of Munitions and Supply for the primary output of the mines and forests.

These rearrangements will also serve to clarify the authority of the wartime prices and trade board in the fields of civilian distribution and supply. The board is responsible for imports for civilian consumption, for manufacturing of civilian goods and for wholesale and retail distribution and has full responsibility in all matters of price and consumer rationing with the exception of gasoline rationing which remains with the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): In what material respect does that alter the relationship that has heretofore existed between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a clarification.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a clarification, but is there any actual change in the relationship between the Department of Agriculture and the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that I can give any further explanation than is contained in the statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: If it is a clarification, then there is no actual change in principle in the relationship.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is just one instance of the application of these principles. Certain producer subsidies have been paid. They have been recommended and paid by the wartime prices and trade board agencies and hereafter recommendations with regard to subsidies will come from the Department of Agriculture because of the clarification of their position as being charged with primary responsibility for agricultural production.

Mr. GRAYDON: It may be a clarification in the public mind of the relationship between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture, but the minister well knows that throughout Canada there has been a strong plea, particularly on the part of the agricultural interests, for the setting up of a food ministry and a food board under it to avoid the mistakes of the past which have led to the conditions that now exist. Did the minister in his statement really mean that there was to be some change in the relationship between the board and the Department of Agriculture? It seems to me that mere clarification is not sufficient to cover the situation as it exists.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

QUESTION OF REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I wish to direct two or three questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On Tuesday last he tabled the report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the year 1941-42. I should like to know, first, how he proposes to have this report considered this year and what opportunity will be given members to get information with respect to it. May I suggest to him that the report be referred to a special committee of, say, ten or eleven, rather than to the agriculture committee, which was very unwieldy last year in dealing with the report. I wonder if he would take that suggestion into consideration.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board is at present in the hands of the printers. I expect to have it for distribution to members by the end of this week or possibly to-morrow. It has been my intention to have the report referred to the committee on agriculture. I shall take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. PERLEY: One more question. The minister announced last week the new policy with regard to marketing of production. Can he indicate whether there will be any special bill with respect to the marketing of wheat this year, or will it be done by order in council?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is no intention of introducing any special bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the discussion of the motion which was so ably moved by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, and seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Hallé). I wish to join with all those who have spoken before me, and, I am sure, with all those who will speak after me, in expressing my own appreciation, and that of the people I represent in this house, of the clear and able manner in which those hon. gentlemen presented to the house their views on matters having to do with the carrying on of the most important task of this nation at the present time, namely, the prosecution of the war.

I rise this afternoon to answer the suggestion made in the amendment moved by the official opposition rather than to discuss the speech from the throne generally or to debate at length the amendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell). My reason for stating that at this time is that a part of the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) is to all intents and purposes a motion of want of confidence in the government, and particularly in the administration of the Department of Agriculture. Since this is the first opportunity that a minister has had to reply, I wish to confine my remarks largely to the part of that amendment which has to do with agriculture.

The criticisms which have been made by speakers in different parts of the house during the discussions have had some reference to matters which were dealt with a few moments ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Since a statement has been made covering those matters it is not my intention to go into them, other than to say that the line of demarcation of responsibility which has been indicated emphasizes the necessity of the Department of Agriculture giving even greater consideration from now on to the matter of production than has been given in the years since the war began.

The criticisms which have been made with regard to matters of policy have had to do largely with questions of production. Running through the speeches that have been made, there has been a suggestion of shortage in production of farm products. It will have been noted that in his statement the Minister of Finance refers to distribution shortages rather than to production shortages. I should like to put in another clause what we are usually referring to when we in this house and others outside the house speak of shortages. The clause I would rather use is this, that requirements for food increases have grown faster than production. There has not been a shortage of production in this country, nor has there been a shortage in the sense in which we speak of shortages in peace time. Whenever we have had sufficient production of any commodity in Canada to permit of exports we have always spoken of having surpluses. We have greater surpluses of farm products in Canada in that sense at the present time than we have ever had. It is scarcely correct, therefore, to say that we have food shortages in Canada.

I think a warning should be thrown out in regard to this matter for another reason. The amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition reads:

That the following words be added to the address:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

I have before me an important publication known as The Statist, which is widely read throughout the English-speaking world and which is considered to be an authority on matters relating to production in the different parts of the English-speaking world. I should like to throw out a warning to hon. members as well as to publishers in Canada as to the effect of the kind of discussion we sometime carry on has upon those who are thinking of our position outside of Canada. The heading of this article is: "Anti-Inflation Measures in Canada," and the writer states:

But apart from wheat there is little surplus farm production and the people of Canada have, for instance, been asked to eat less bacon so that more can be shipped to Great Britain.

This statement fully understood may have no bad effect, but not fully understood it may give an impression in many quarters outside of Canada that we in Canada are suffering for lack of sufficient food for our own people and for that reason are not able to do our share in the war effort. I am sure no hon. member is desirous of having that impression go abroad, partly because of the assurance it might give to our enemies, and partly because of the difficulty it might create for those who are arranging the food supplies for the nations with which we are associated in the war. I would emphasize again the fact that never before in the history of this country has there been such a large tonnage of foodstuffs produced in Canada as is being produced at the present time. I am not saying that never before have we received as much for the produce of our farms, but I might even make that statement, and probably will before I have concluded my remarks. But at the moment what I am emphasizing is that in actual production of food, apart altogether from the price received for it by farmers, a greater tonnage is being produced now than at any previous time in the history of our country.

The question may be asked, how have we arrived at that position? We have done so because of the efforts put forth by primary producers in agriculture to meet the requisitions made upon them from time to time by the government of this country.

Here I should like to reply to statements of those who say that no direction has been given to the farmers. It would appear that the only persons who feel that way are those who do not occupy farms. We are being told from time to time, in periodicals and otherwise, that no direction has been given to our people. But the remarkable thing is that every year since the war began our tonnage of production has increased by leaps and bounds, and in every year since the war started we have met the objectives which have been set for our people at the beginning of the production season. Farmers seemed to know what they were being asked to do; they applied the necessary energy to the task and got the results. This is my reply to those who say there has been no plan, no direction, that nothing has been made known to the farmers generally to lead them to produce the things that are needed in the war effort.

In order to make sure that this information would go out to the farmers the government set up at the beginning of the war an agricultural war supplies committee. That committee or board has functioned since the beginning of the war. Nine conferences have been held, attended by representatives of provincial governments and of farm organizations throughout Canada. At every one of these conferences, held not later than December in each year preceding the year in which the crop was to be grown, these matters were fully discussed with provincial authorities and representatives of farm organizations. The first gathering was held in the early winter of 1939. The provincial representatives then went back and organized fully the provincial departments of agriculture, and some of them went out and organized farm groups, municipalities and counties, to assist in giving the necessary information to the farmers in the different sections of their province. Finally in December of this year we had a meeting at which we were able to take into consideration not only the requirements from agriculture in this country but the requirements from agriculture in the great country in the south, which joined in the war in the early winter of 1941. Having set up this board, we then entered into agreements or understandings with the countries fighting on our side The first agreements naturally were made with Great Britain. It will be recalled by hon. members that we entered the war along with Britain, in association with France. In the spring of 1940 France dropped out, and during the greater part of 1940 and 1941 Great Britain, with her dominions, stood alone in the war effort against the axis powers. During that period of time we entered into agreements with the British government, and made known the terms of those agreements to the farmers long in advance of their spring operations, emphasizing the importance of producing the amounts necessary in order that our own people and the people of Britain might be fed.

That was the second effort put forth in order to get production. We made an early announcement of policy. The other day I picked up a farm publication issued in Canada, edited by a man who visits the department perhaps more than any other publisher in Canada, and I was surprised to read therein that the farm policy for last year on acreage reduction was announced on the last day of the session. I directed attention to the fact that the legislation having to do with acreage reduction last year was introduced in this house on March 9 and was finally assented to on March 27.

I recite this only in order to indicate that the statement is made in spite of the fact that we have announced our policies in November and December of the year preceding the seeding; in spite of the fact that our legislation has been brought down early in the session, and in spite of the fact that this year we brought it down so early, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) rose in his place to raise some objection based upon a statement which came from the west with regard to the announcement which was made on the first working day of this session. But I am happy to be able to say to the house to-day that the organization which met in Calgary met the government again to-day, and indicated in their statement that they have received an explanation from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), who made the original announcement, which is entirely satisfactory to them.

So much for the announcements. The government has not stopped at planning and at making early announcements of the programme for the succeeding year; we have also given financial assistance by way of subsidies. I am not going to discuss the question of subsidies at any length, but assistance has been given by the payment of a part of the freight upon fertilizer, in order that farms may produce more than otherwise would be the case. Assistance has been given through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the wheat acreage reduction scheme, in order to increase the production of grass and to bring water to land that otherwise could not produce live stock. Assistance has been given by paying part of the freight on feed grain from Fort William to eastern Canada. This freight and fertilizer assistance has cost the government from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 and has been of great help in increasing production in various parts of this country. I should add that this assistance was not given only to the movement of grain eastward and the movement of fertilizer within the eastern section of Canada; it also has been given in the province of British Columbia. In recent months, since the United States entered the war, it has been the custom of officials of the departments of agriculture of the United States and Canada to meet from time to time and coordinate the efforts of the two countries in the production of the foodstuffs necessary to the most vigorous prosecution of the war by the allied nations.

Perhaps now for a few moments I might dwell upon the results of the efforts which have been made to obtain greater production. Someone has spoken of shortages. What is the basis of the production of all animal products in this or any other country? Is it not the feed available for the production of live stock? When one looks at it from another point of view one realizes that while wheat is the basic cereal food of the people of Canada and of those who live in Great Britain and the United States, there are many European countries in which wheat is not the basic cereal food. Barley, rye—even oats, in Scotland—are very important cereal food products in other countries. What is the position in Canada? Not only are our elevators bulging with the wheat that is stored in them; the bins of the farms are running over. Much of the coarse grain of this country is piled in heaps on the prairies, and some of the bountiful crop which was produced in Canada last year is not yet harvested. Still some people talk about shortages in Canada. We have wheat; we have oats; we have barley; we have rye; we have flax, all in surpluses so great that now the farmer is concerned as to how he can turn his grain into cash in order that he may go on and produce a crop next year.

I make that statement in order to emphasize another point. Last night the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) delivered a speech which displayed a vision of the future upon which I think he is to be congratulated. But I should like to emphasize the fact that it takes eight pounds of grain to produce one pound of beef, and five pounds of grain to produce one pound of pork. Under emergency conditions a man can live just as long on a pound of grain as on a pound of meat. If the task before this country is that which was outlined to us last night, as I am sure it is, the task of storing in this country foods which will enable us to assist those who will be joining our ranks as we advance toward victory, there is no food product that can be stored in Canada which will do more in that direction than cereal products such as barley, oats, rye and wheat. In other words under emergency conditions a man can be maintained at least five times as long by feeding him grain than by feeding him meat products produced from the grain.

I mention this in order to indicate that we in this country are fortunate in being producers of a product which can be stored so easily. The great task before us at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is to produce food in order that we may assist in winning the war. And while I am hopeful that the war may end much earlier than I really think it will, basing my conclusions upon a survey of the world as I see it to-day, I think all will agree that we must put forth an effort in every line of activity in order to see to it that the efforts which have been made by Russia, and by United States and British troops in the northern part of Africa during the last few months, may materialize in a push in the future which will bring this war to an end earlier than we expect.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, may I add that in spite of the fact that you can keep a man eight times as long on grain as you can keep him on beef fed from the grain, and five times as long on grain as you can on pork fed from the grain, in an emergency, over a long period you cannot have a balanced ration composed entirely of cereals for a people. When we look at the activities of Britain since the war began and match them with activities in this country, we must keep that thought in mind.

Prior to the war Britain was a producer of live-stock products in great quantity. She produced cattle. She paid a bonus on cattle for years before the war started, in order that people might import them and keep them walking around in the pastures for at least three months in order that they might be available in the form of fresh meat if necessary. But since the war started Britain has been insisting upon her people ploughing up the great pasture lands upon which cattle were pastured, lands which were the basis of the production of dairy products, and has insisted upon the production of cereals. The whole reason for this action arises out of what I stated a few moments ago. If submarine warfare is successful in blockading the British isles for a month or two months, cereal products during that emergency will keep a man much longer, pound for pound, than will meat products, or even dairy products, produced from the grain. Britain having taken this action in self-defence, she has said to those of us who are her friends and who are further removed from the scenes of battle, "Produce other necessities for us." And in spite of the fact that we can store foods in grain form cheaper and more effectively than we can any other kind of food, we are asking our Canadian people to produce meat—to produce pork, beef, cheese, butter; and milk which can be powdered and sent over to the British people at once.

What have we done? We have doubled the production of hogs slaughtered in this country. Seventy per cent of all hogs marketed in Canada are consumed in the British isles. When anyone says that there is a shortage of hogs in Canada, then I point out to him that we have a surplus of seventy per cent because of the policy being followed in this country at the present time.

What about cheese? At the beginning of the war we had a production of cheese which was very low as compared with present production. We started in with an objective of some time reaching 200,000,000 pounds. This is the amount of cheese we produced in Canada about the year 1900. We reached that 200,000,000 pounds, Mr. Speaker, this year. We reached that 200,000,000 pounds — and with what result? More than seventy per cent of all we produce is surplus and goes to Britain to help feed the British people, who in turn are growing cereals in order that they may meet any emergency which may be forced upon their country.

What about cattle? The other day when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking in the debate a question was asked him across the floor of the house. He stated that the reason for rationing of butter in Canada, and the reason it had been suggested it might be necessary to have rationing of beef, was that we had been attempting to fulfil our trade agreement with Great Britain. Since that time at least two hon. members, during the time I have been in my seat, have challenged that statement. One went so far as to say it was incorrect.

Anyone who understands agriculture as it is carried on in Ontario and Quebec knows that there is a close association between the price which prevails for cheese and butter, and the production of those two products. Everyone in the house knows, too, that when the price paid for cheese is 20 cents a pound, and premiums and subsidies on top of that bring the price up to 24 cents a pound, a price lower than 40 cents for a pound of butter will not bring about an increase in its production in this country.

If we go back to the year before last, what do we find? Every agent from Britain who came to this country, every person who discussed the question on this side of the Atlantic, and every agent of ours who went to the other side and brought back a message to Canada, stated that Britain required cheese and wanted it even as against butter. We have shipped no butter to Britain since the war started. But butter is made from exactly the same kind of milk as is cheese. And when we pay a price in agreement with Great Britain which induces the production of cheese at the expense of butter, of course we render necessary the control of the consumption of butter in this country. This is exactly what was implied in the remarks of the Prime Minister the other day.

When I attempted to correct a statement made in the house by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), he said: But I am talking about beef. Well, the same is true, in another way, with regard to beef. When a man sits down to his dinner table and finds on it a roast of pork, unless he is a Yorkshireman he probably does not find a roast of beef there too. If he is a Yorkshireman he may also find the beef. However as a rule when we eat pork we do not eat beef, and when we eat beef we do not eat pork.

We were exporting 300,000 head of cattle—heavy cattle, light cattle, calves, and breeding stock—to the United States at the beginning of the war. And we were exporting just as many the year before last as we exported in any previous year. Last year, down to the first of July, we exported more cattle to the United States than we had in preceding years. We exported 121,000 head of beef cattle in the year 1942 to the United States, and there have been no exports since about the month of September. I give these figures to indicate that even in the matter of beef it is not a question of a shortage in this country. It is a matter of a transition from a period when we were feeding two-year-old steers for market in this country to a period when we are feeding three-year-old steers to be marketed one year later. That we are not able to get on our tables the kind of beef we desire is not because there is a shortage of beef in Canada, but because that six-months' period is required in order to make the transition from one form of feeding to the other. While, therefore, we have found it necessary to close off exports to the United States and to cut down on the consumption of pork, both have been made necessary by the fact that we must ship more and more bacon and ham to Great Britain in order to assist in feeding the British people.

May I say a word or two about some of our other products? What shortages have we in Canada? Certainly we have no shortage of apples. We have been begging every country in the world to take apples, ever since the beginning of the war. We have begged every country into which we could ship our products under war conditions. It certainly has not been beans. We have been coaxing the British and United States governments to take more beans from this country, every year since the war started. It certainly has not been potatoes. One member who raised the question in the house cabled me when I was in Britain in 1940 to ask if I could not get an order there for potatoes, pointing out we had a surplus of potatoes in this country. But when I came back and told him that they were growing potatoes over there in every backyard and had millions of bushels of them, he realized, of course, that potatoes were a surplus in this country; and, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the remark made yesterday by one hon. member, potatoes are still a surplus in this country. Every potato grower knows that; every wholesaler knows it. Some difficulties in distribution have to be ironed out; there are always difficulties in distribution when you attempt to impose upon the people controls to which they have not been accustomed. But when those difficulties have been ironed out the distribution of potatoes in this country will meet the demands of the people of Canada.

Let me repeat; we have surpluses in all these important staple products in Canada, and these surpluses are being utilized to assist the allied countries in feeding their peoples. We shall have food when we have crossed the boundary lines of countries which are now enemy occupied. We shall have food produced in those countries when we have advanced far enough into them to permit of agriculture being carried on behind the lines. The food of our own people in surplus and the food of these people of Europe will be used to assist the allies in winning the war through food as well as through the use of bullets and machines of war.

But there has been one limitation upon the production of the kind of food our allies require during the years since the beginning of the war. In spite of all the effort that we could put into it there was a limit upon production, and that limit was the feed available. We had had a series of poor crops across Canada in the years immediately preceding the war. We had another poor crop in Canada in 1941. When I say to this house that on July 31, 1942, there was only one month's supply of feed in Canada, it will be realized what the limiting factor was in 1941-42. It was feed. Even had we had ten times as much labour as we had during that period we should not have been able to raise more live stock, we should not have been able to finish more live stock unless we did what was advised by some people, namely, to feed our wheat. I do not know just how many farmers there are in this house, but every farmer here knows that there is a limit to the amount of wheat that you can feed to live stock. Everyone knows that if you attempted to keep horses on wheat you very soon would not have any horses. Everyone knows that if you attempted to feed cattle on nothing but wheat, unless you had an expert doing it, you probably would not have cattle very long. Perhaps this does not apply in the same measure to the feeding of hogs and chickens; nevertheless even there a proper rationed feed will do much better for the stock, for the farmer and for the country than the feeding of wheat itself.

What has happened with respect to wheat? We fed twice as much wheat in 1942 as we had fed in previous years. We gave special freight rates on wheat shipped to the east for feeding purposes. Wheat was fed from one end of the country to the other until the amount fed in that year was double the amount fed in preceding years. In spite of that fact on July 31, 1942, we had only one month's feed supply on hand. Members will tell me that that was not so bad because we had the best crop standing that we have ever seen grow in Canada. But we did not know that when we bred the sows in December of the preceding year. We did not know it when we bred the cows in 1941. We did not know it when we were deciding whether to sell our milk to a cheese factory or to a creamery in the spring of 1942. We did not know until well on in July that we were going to be able to harvest that crop and make it available to the people of this country. So that the limiting factor down to the first of August, 1942, was our supply of grain.

But the government did not wait until 1942 to start to do something about that. We brought regulations into this house and we stated that we were in a hurry to get them through because of the necessity of having feed grain planted instead of wheat. What happened? The house held those regulations up day after day, and it was only by herculean efforts on the part of members, especially of the government, that we were able to get them through the house in sufficient time to let the farmers of western Canada know what was expected of them. That was in the spring of 1941. We repeated that action in the spring of 1942, and with what result? The result was that our lands in western Canada were cultivated in the manner in which they should always be cultivated, with a very considerable percentage of them under summer-fallow. When we sowed coarse grains and wheat on summer-fallowed lands in the spring of 1942, and when we had favourable weather conditions, even with a reduction of seven million acres in wheat in western Canada, we produced more wheat that year than we ever produced before.

What was our limitation in 1941-42? Our limitation was feed grain. We had twice as much feed grain when we harvested our crop of 1942 as we obtained from our crop of 1941. So that through the policies of this government—

Mr. COLDWELL: And the rain.

Mr. GARDINER: And the rain, yes. So that through the policies of this government—and I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the government always likes to work along with those who send the rain—we had the land ready, and one only has to read the scriptures to find out what that means: if you have your land prepared well in advance and your seed planted at the right time and the showers come and the sun beats down upon the land, you get a crop. And that happened in 1942.

In the spring of 1942 when those who represented the farm organizations came to Ottawa, they asked a natural question: What is the government going to do to assist eastern farmers to get feed grain? When you were putting this measure through the house in 1941, members expressed the fear that you would so glut the market with coarse grains that we would be unable to market ours in eastern Canada, or that if we fed those grains to live stock in western Canada we would have so much live stock that we would not be able to market live stock produced in eastern Canada. I must say this for those representatives, that almost without exception the men who said that in 1941 got up in 1942 and said that they were wrong in 1941 and that they were going to join with the government in its policy of 1942 of attempting to get meat supplies and oil supplies to send to our allies in this war.

Let me repeat: it was not hindsight on the part of the government that got the results in 1942; it was not lack of planning; it was not that they did not give information to the farmers across Canada. The results that were obtained in 1942 were based upon the sound policies which had had their inception at the beginning of the war and have been developed constantly from the beginning of the war down to the present time. Might I say that the announcement made to-day by the Minister of Finance is just another indication that the government is keeping abreast of the situation in connection with production across this country.

Then I think I hear someone saying, If there is no shortage, why did you need rationing of butter? Why did you need to talk about rationing of something else? I should like to tell a story which illustrates a point. When I was in Washington in January I met a man who turned out to be a newspaper reporter. Newspaper reporters are usually looking for information; and he said this to me, "I notice you have rationed butter in Canada." I said, "Yes, we have." He said, "What do you mean by saying you have rationed butter? I notice you are giving your people twenty-six pounds per head." I said, "Yes. They were eating thirty-two pounds before." "Well," he said, "that is far more butter than we eat down here. Our figures indicate that we eat only half that much." Well, I brought up a question which has been mentioned in this house from time to time—the consumption of oleomargarine; and he said, "Oh, but that makes up only about one-eighteenth of the amount." We went on discussing the matter and finally agreed that there is a great deal of vegetable oils consumed all across the south country, consumed on vegetables instead of securing fats from animal production, but having the same results. After we counted all the figures we found that the individual on the other side of the line is eating about the same amount of butter plus oils as the individual in Canada eats of butter plus oils. So that when we talk about dealing with our people on this side of the line in the same way that they are dealing with their people on the other side of the line, we must take all the facts into consideration. It is not sufficient to say that in the United States they are rationing a product down to a certain level, and that therefore it must be rationed down to the same level in this country. We must take all the substitutes into consideration, and having done so, I believe every hon. member will agree that since we are in this war together we cannot build up on this side of the line a condition in relation to the feeding of our people which differs from the condition on the other side of the line, without creating a wrong impression. There may be a necessity for rationing to make greater supplies available to our allies even if there is no shortage of food products.

Or go, as I did a few months ago, to Britain. The British said to us: We want so much of a certain product if you can give it to us; and ever since the beginning of the war this government has taken the position that if it is at all possible to give Britain or any other of our allies the food supplies necessary to the winning of the war, even if it means a regulation of the supplies to our own people, we prefer to give those supplies to the men and women who are in the front line of battle and fighting or suffering attack from day to day.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if it were not for rumours, if it were not for the publicity given to what are sometimes facts, we might not need to ration in this country. When a housewife goes to the butcher shop in war time and finds that she cannot get the cut which she desires from beef, or probably any beef at all, and the butcher says, "You might take lamb, or chicken, or turkey," somebody learns of that and writes it up as a story—usually not the housewife; usually someone else. In peace time what did we do under similar circumstances? We walked down the street a half-mile to another store and usually were able to find, if not exactly what we wanted, a reasonable substitute therefor. If we were doing that to-day in respect of food products we would not have as much agitation for rationing as we have. But even if we do the very best we can, even if we kill every rumour at its inception, when it is decided to cut down the supplies to the civilian population to absolute necessities there must be some kind of regulation of distribution, otherwise some will be left with nothing and others will have too much. So that it is not necessarily shortage in production which brings about rationing; it may be a shortage occasioned by the methods or incidence of distribution. We have had rationing of tea, of sugar and of coffee. All these are products which are produced in large volume outside this country and shipped in, and we have rationing because of an interference with shipping between those countries and Canada brought about by the war. Exactly the same reason brought about rationing at the beginning of the war in Britain, and in the end will bring rationing of some products in most countries.

Someone else says that labour has been a limiting factor in the production of our farms. I have been reviewing the speeches of hon. members opposite in other sessions, and I find that in every session since the war started there have been men on the other side of the house who have said that because of a labour shortage on farms it will be impossible to reach the objectives set by the department. One of those hon. gentlemen has already spoken in this debate and has made the same statement. He made it in 1941 and 1942; he has now made it in 1943. On each of the other occasions, in spite of any shortages of labour there may have been, we did reach those objectives. When anyone asks me whether labour is a limiting factor in production on farms, I say: it has been a limiting factor on a certain type of farm ever since the war began. And what type of farm is that? It is the type of farm from which every last son joined the army or the air force or the navy in the first weeks of the war. Why did they do it? They did it because they thought it was the most necessary thing to do at that time in order to bring this war to a successful conclusion as soon as possible. I am sure that we will all agree that while they may have left difficulties upon the farm, they are entitled to the thanks of this house, of the Dominion of Canada, and of the allied nations generally for the attitude they took. There is still a labour shortage on many of those farms.

There is another type of farm on which there has been a labour shortage ever since the war started. That labour shortage did not begin with this war; it started on exactly the same kind of farm as that from which all of the sons who were engaged in agriculture enlisted in the last war. At that time their fathers and mothers were in their late thirties or early forties, and they were able to carry on the work of the farm. Many of those boys did not come back, and in some instances, because they did not come back, the fathers and mothers, now from sixty to seventy years of age, are still on the farms attempting to carry on. They are in a classification which was referred to this morning by a delegation that met the government, when it was suggested that these people should be encouraged to dispose of their farms and get others on the land who could produce more effectively because of their younger years. The government has gone so far as to record all the people in Canada who are in that classification, and I think I said to this house last year that there are about seventy thousand farms in Canada occupied by persons over sixty years of age.

Labour began to be a limiting factor in certain industrial areas adjacent to cities in the second year of the war. You will recall that in the first year of the war there was a great deal of uncertainty, particularly during the first six months, but in the latter part of the first year industry was organized, and in the second year of the war men rushed into plants from farms surrounding industrial centres. I would ask hon. members the question: what did this house want them to do? I reply by stating that while I was not one of those who were fully convinced before I went to England in the fall of 1940, I came back to this country convinced that every possible man and woman in Canada had to be got into a plant that might produce munitions of war, or machines or ships, at the earliest possible day, if we were to win the war. We did not as a government go out and tell the farmers not to go into plants. We did not say, you must not go. We encouraged them to go, and if any member is able to stand in this house, as a member did the other night, and point to the production of munitions and supplies in Canada as one of the greatest accomplishments of this war, it has resulted from the fact that these men and women were not prevented by any means, directive or otherwise, from going to these plants and producing in volume at the earliest possible time.

What has been the result? Not long ago I was speaking in Saskatoon to a group of farmers. I had been asked the question that I am putting here, a question that has been asked in the house on numerous occasions since this debate began: Is there going to be an over all farm labour shortage this year? I had to say that we had been building up our objectives year after year while the number of persons on the farms has been going down year by year; we have not yet reached the peak of production under these conditions, and until we have done so I cannot say with absolute assurance that lack of labour will prevent us from reaching our objectives this year. I have this to say as well—and every member of this house, on both sides of the house, knows it is a fact—for eight years before this war started, there were boys and girls brought up on farms who never intended to remain on the farm. They had been directed, from their childhood up, towards some other activity, but they found it impossible to get off the farm. While we counted our unemployed in Canada at one time at something in the neighbourhood of a million, if we had counted the young men and young women who were on the farms unemployed, or partly unemployed because they could not find employment elsewhere, the figure would have been increased by the 250,000 or the number who have left the farms and gone into industry and elsewhere. With regard to overall production, our farms to-day, with these 250,000 gone, are producing more than they ever produced before.

I have eulogized the old people who have been left on the farms and the boys and girls who have worked on the farms. I have spoken of their long hours, beginning at four or five in the morning and ending at ten o'clock at night, particularly for the mothers. That does not answer anything. It should not be necessary to work from four in the morning until ten at night to earn a living on a farm, and that is one of the things which we must remove in that glorious day so many talk about that we are going to have after the war. I hope we shall be able to remove the necessity for some of these long hours. But whether we eulogize them or not, the fact remains that they did the job and produced the food, and they are going out this year to attempt to do the same thing.

A delegation of men came to me and said, "We produced every bit of live stock and dairy products last year that we could produce with the labour on our farms." I said, "What are you here for?" They said, "What do you mean?" I said, "We are not asking you to produce any more. If you are producing all the live stock on your farm that you can possibly produce with the labour you have, nobody is asking you to produce more with that labour; but the fact remains that right in Saskatchewan one-fifth of the area is delivering only one hog on the average from every two farms, and I want these people to feed more hogs." These men said immediately, "Well, that puts a different light on the whole thing." And of course they will go back home and try to encourage their neighbours to produce more, and they will be encouraged by the provincial government.

I have listened to one or two stories in connection with the labour position, and they remind me of many letters that I receive in my office. People write to me about the difficulty they are having in increasing production, and I realize that it must be difficult. A man tells me he is sixty-nine years of age, and his last son has joined the army. I know he is having a difficult time; no one needs to argue about it. When I hear stories such as were told in this house yesterday to the effect that there are families in some of these neighbourhoods where there are three or four still on the farm, none of them having gone, I know what it means in that neighbourhood. But the stories I like to tell are of the opposite kind, taken from the neighbourhood with which I am most familiar. I know one Yorkshire Englishman who has seven sons. On the day he got word that one of three who had already joined the forces had been shot down over the North Sea the fourth took the train to take his place in the forces, to take that brother's place. These are the stories I like to tell. I go five miles away from that place and find another farmer, a German, who worked his way out of Germany at the age of nineteen to avoid being called up for military training. He also has seven sons. Six of them are married and three are in the army. He is alone with one daughter working the farm and making no complaints about it. He is saying, "This is my job." These are the stories I like to hear from western Canada.

Western Canada creates situations which make possible hundreds of stories of that kind. I know of districts that are largely foreign-speaking, from every family in which someone has enlisted in the armed forces. I know of districts too where the casualty list, if placed before this house, and compared with the number of non-English-speaking people that live there, would convince us as to where the recruits came from, even those who have given their lives already in this war. These are the stories I like to tell.

But I am forced by the statements that have been made in this house to deal with another situation. I am told, times without end, both by letter and by members of this house, that some of our boards that have been dealing with the question of man-power have not dealt with it in the interests of the farming population. Sometimes I am inclined to agree that there may be some truth in what they say. But again I am reminded, every time we have a delegation to Ottawa from farm organizations, and almost every time someone gets up in this house to criticize the activities of the government, that when we are appointing boards we ought to put farm representatives on them.

All I want to say is that the board that has been most criticized in this house and the one about which the most stories have been told is the only board I know of in Canada of which the president of a farm organization is a member. I should like to add that that board was at first composed of a judge and a member of the provincial legislature who is also a returned soldier and the leader of a political group that is not Liberal. When the administration of these regulations was taken over by the Labour department he personally suggested he would prefer not to be a member of the board because his business took too much of his time; he was prepared, however, to act as an ad hoc member or remain as he was and sit whenever he found it possible. From that time up to last week I think he did not sit on the board. The judge asked for another representative, choosing him because of his association with farm organizations. In order to be fair I must say I do not think he went to the farm organization and asked for recommendations, but he did select a man and recommend him to the minister, saying he would like to have him appointed because of his associations with agriculture. I know he is quite a capable man. His name was submitted to me, and I was asked whether I knew him. I said I did and that he was working for a farm organization, and he was appointed.

That is the board that has been sitting on these cases, composed of a judge; a president of a farm organization, the only educational farm organization in that province; and an employee of a farm organization in Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may interrupt to ask a question, is Mr. Milliken still on that board?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Milliken was not on the board. He was the representative of agriculture appointed to place cases before the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has he resigned?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, he has resigned, partly because of the difficulty he experienced while he was there.

These questions of course come up when I am in the west, the same questions as are brought to the attention of other hon. members who come from the west. I have discussed them on a number of occasions with persons who ought to be able to rectify the situation. On coming back to Ottawa I made representations to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and the minister had his deputy send out a letter which I am going to read to the house in order to have it on Hansard, because it states more clearly than I could otherwise the policy of the government in relation to this matter.

The letter is dated Ottawa, February 1, 1943, the beginning of this month. It happens to be addressed to Mr. Justice W. T. Henderson, chairman of the mobilization board at Toronto, but the same letter went to the chairman of every board. I would like to recall to hon. members that this matter was turned over to the Labour department on December 1, so that after all there has not been any considerable delay in the minister's taking action upon it.

This is the letter:

Dear Mr. Justice Henderson,

All will agree that uniformity of method in dealing with various problems by each of the mobilization boards across Canada is very desirable.

After conferring with the man-power committee of the cabinet it has been decided that interpretative letters will be sent out from time to time indicating in some detail the policy in respect to the various phases of the national selective service mobilization regulations.

This is the first of such letters which will be issued by the labour department.

The growing scarcity of agricultural labour makes it increasingly important that essential agricultural workers be encouraged to remain on farms.

In the following the policy in regard to agricultural farm workers is briefly outlined:

(1) An agricultural worker is, of course, free to volunteer for active service.

(2) It is the intention of the regulations that agricultural workers are to be retained in agricultural employment as far as practical through the national selective service (civilian) regulations. To the extent that their services can be spared from the farms during the "off-crop" season they are to be encouraged to take temporary seasonal employment in lumbering and logging, forestry, fishing, coal and base metal mining, and acceptance of seasonal work in such industries does not deprive men of their right to postponement as agricultural workers providing they return to farm work when the season re-opens.

(3) Agricultural workers are to be discouraged from taking employment outside agriculture except in the primary industries indicated above. If they leave agriculture without a permit from a national selective service officer contrary to the regulations they of course lose any special rights to claim deferment as agricultural workers.

(4) Farm workers who apply for postponement of military training are to be granted postponement until further notice.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

In passing I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in the regulations the word used is "shall"—that "the board shall". It also provides that the decisions in connection with these matters are to be made by a quorum of the board. The board consists of three members, and two form a quorum.

Mr. TUSTIN: Will these boys continue to be called?

Mr. GARDINER: I am just coming to that:

Farm workers who apply for postponement from military training are to be granted postponement until further notice, unless it is established that the applicant is not an essential worker in agriculture. The regulations it should should be noted do not require the farmer to produce proof that he is an essential farm labourer. If the board doubts that a man is an essential farm worker, even though postponement until further notice is given, it can always exercise the right to deny postponement by calling such a man before the board when established facts are presented.

The statement and the inference of the statement is that if the man is given postponement he is not called again at least until the regulations are changed or until the board is able to show that the information he gave was not correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is up to the board to prove that he is non-essential?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I interject? It is a most interesting statement the minister has made. Is he able to tell us how often applicants are called before these boards? Because I have never heard of a single case in New Brunswick where an applicant actually appeared himself before the board.

Mr. GARDINER: I think my hon. friend will agree that he has a better knowledge of legal matters than I have, but a man can appear by letter, and most of them do appear that way.

Mr. GRAYDON: They appear personally too.

Mr. GARDINER: There are men who appear before some boards personally. To continue:

If a worker who upon receipt of "order—medical examination" claims to be an agricultural worker but is not considered by the board to be essential to the operation of a specific farm—

This is just as important as the other, and I wish hon. members would listen. If he is called and not given the postponement——the question then arises as to whether or not he is essential to agriculture in the district.

If agricultural labour is needed in the district, he should be given an opportunity to place himself in a position where his services would be essential to agriculture on some other farm; or in the alternative to increase the production of a specific farm. The board could give a deferment for three months instead of "granting postponement until further notice" in order to give the man an opportunity of finding essential work.

This, read along with the other, indicates that the cases in which limited time should be given are those in which an effort is being made to distribute farm labour, not merely to retain it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that the district over which the board has control or the district in which the man resides?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no further definition given. These are the directions which have been issued, and it will be remembered that the boards have been asked to make any comments they wish, and those will be discussed. I would imagine it would be a different area in different places.

The next provision is new:

6. A person who may not have been employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, but who has become engaged in agriculture since that time, and is shown to be essential to agriculture, may be considered for postponement on application if the merits of the case are established.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since what time?

Mr. GARDINER: This was issued on February 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the case where the father buys a farm for the boy and makes him a farmer. Pretty dangerous.

Mr. GARDINER: I would rather recite the other type of case again, that it is for the boy who left the farm purposely to enter into a munitions factory, but now that food is considered more necessary in that community, he desires to come back. If he can establish these facts I think the board would be justified in taking action.

The next provision is:

7. Conscientious objectors, including Doukhobors, Mennonites and others, who receive postponement of military training until further notice and are agricultural workers should not be directed to report for alternative service so long as they are employed in essential work in agriculture.

8. Application for leave should be invited from agricultural workers engaged in alternative service, and such applications should be given favourable consideration.

It is felt that if the above principles are followed by all boards the increasing difficulties in maintaining essential farm production will be greatly alleviated.

Any comments and suggestions any board may wish to offer regarding the above principles will be appreciated.

That is signed by A. MacNamara, director of national selective service, and approved by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask one question with regard to the dimensions of the areas mentioned there. That has a direct bearing on the whole question of the distribution of labour, because if it is confined to only the small area where the man resides, perhaps it will not meet the requirements that are so necessary. Possibly the minister might amplify that point.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the minister would hope that this would be administered by the boards in a reasonable way, as I am sure it will.

There is just one other matter with which I wish to deal for a few moments, namely, the question, is price a limiting factor? That question has been discussed here from time to time, and the statement is frequently made that British and United States prices are higher than ours. Well, the statement could be made with equal truth that Australian and Argentine prices are lower than ours. For that reason I should like to place before the house for its consideration the fact that our position is not on all fours with either the United States or the British; neither is it on all fours with the Argentine or the Australian. We occupy a position somewhere in between. The United States and British position is affected by their dense population and by the nearness of Britain to the war itself. The position of the Argentine and Australia is affected by their distance from the places where the supplies are required. On the other hand we have a sparse population and large agricultural areas, and are located closer to the scene of battle than any of these other countries. Therefore our position is a little different.

I should like to remind hon. members that many things have been done by the government to assist the price position. Last year, as was stated the other day, we made a billion dollars available to the British government; and the fact that this amount of money was provided, whether it was used directly or indirectly, made it possible for us to dispose of our food products to Britain with much better results than otherwise would have been the case. Then the government has added to those returns by means of subsidies in certain cases, with which I am not going to deal at the moment. But now I come to the point which has been up for discussion year after year. It was brought before us to-day by the farm federation; it has been brought up in this house by a number of hon. members since the session opened, as it has been brought up continuously throughout the country. I refer to the demand for parity prices on farm products. No one has ever contended that we have parity prices on grains in Canada as compared with any other period that may be used as a basis. Those in this country who first asked for parity prices on farm products said that what they meant by parity was the same purchasing power for what was received for the product in the year in question as prevailed on the average during the period from 1926 to 1929. Recently that has been changed to some extent; some are saying that because we have taken as the basis of the wage position the highest wage in 1926-29 we ought to take the highest price in 1926-29 for farm products. But may I read the basis on which we have discussed this question year after year:

Parity definition: Parity price is the price of the commodity which will give a purchasing power with respect to articles the farmer buys equivalent to the purchasing power of such commodity in the base period.

The base period we have taken in working out the figures I am going to place upon Hansard is 1926-29, and the figure is the average figure for that period. On wheat we are down 54·5 cents; on oats we are down 9 cents; on barley we are down 12·2 cents, and on rye we are down 38·5 cents. I come now to flax, on which we are 25·5 cents up. On butter we are ·4 cents up; on cheese, 6·1 cents up; on eggs 1·3 cents down; on steers, ·24 cents up, and on hogs, ·67 cents up. In other words, on all animal and poultry products listed here, with the exception of eggs, we are, on the basis I have just suggested, above parity. This means that for flaxseed we are 112·8 per cent of parity; on butter, 101·2 per cent; on cheese, 133·2 per cent; on eggs, 86·6 per cent; on steers, 116·93 per cent, and on hogs, 105·92 per cent. Let me repeat that some of those coming before us now would dispute the fact that we have parity prices because they have somewhat shifted the basic position. In fact, some contend that they at no time took any other position but that we should start with the highest price during that period, and of course if you start with the highest price it means that on all live-stock products, I think, with the exception of cheese, we shall be slightly below parity.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the average for the entire group of commodities?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have not, but it can be worked out from these figures.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that those of us who have been speaking on agriculture have been emphasizing the necessity for increased labour during the coming year. I am going to repeat that I have not been convinced by any arguments I have heard in the house, nor am I convinced by our experiences of the past, that we cannot reach the objectives which we have placed before the farmers of this country for this fourth year of war. There is a possibility, however, that we may not reach those objectives, and I wish to emphasize that if we do not do so, it will not necessarily mean that we have not done everything possible in Canada to help win the war. At some period we shall reach the time, on account of either lack of feed, lack of proper weather conditions, lack of labour, or lack of all three, when we shall be producing everything we possibly can produce, with the facilities that are available to us for the production of food products. And when we are doing that, in so far as food is concerned we are holding up our end in the war activities.

In the first year of the war—the first six months of the war—we were piling up surpluses which no one wanted for the time being. Then, when France fell, we found ourselves in the position where these surpluses were useful. We have gone on producing more and more every year. And for every ton we produced we could find some use, with the exception, of course, of some of the products I enumerated earlier in my speech. They are not the most important food products we are producing in this country. Again, of course I must make an exception of wheat.

We now hope that we are at a time when our armed forces in the field, and those of our allies, can be equipped and supplied with munitions. Probably there is some reason for thinking that, with the support of all the great allied powers, and all their industry, there is reason for placing greater emphasis upon production on the farms than we have been placing during the second and third years of the war. The government has put out directions on farm labour as an indication that it believed that such a time had come when the regulations were put out in March.

Having said that, may I say this, that the greatest job to be done in connection with this war is still to be done on the battlefields. As Minister of Agriculture I am going to make an appeal to every farmer in Canada to produce this year all he can with the labour available, and I am going to make an appeal to the government—and I am sure it will be listened to—to provide as high returns as possibly can be given for the commodities that are produced, always keeping in mind the fact that funds must be found for other things, as well as for paying for food.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friends over here smile when I say that. Well, I have known many people in my lifetime who did not seem to know the value of money; and I have never known any of them to improve their position by laughing. After all, money is only the means by which we measure the real wealth, the things that are produced in the country. If we have the parity prices which have been asked, we are of course giving what has been asked by those who are most concerned. If in some other direction parity has not been given, and if that applies to those foods which are going to be surplus at the end of the war, I would suggest that we are not yet in a position to determine whether farmers will obtain parity. That cannot be fully determined if their labour has resulted in the production of grain which may be fed or required by allied countries toward the end and following the end of the war.

I think hon. members will agree that the government has been keeping a fairly close check on all three activities necessary to winning the war. In so far as the battlefront is concerned, only one thing will bring about the defeat of our forces. If we have not a sufficient number of men at the spots attacked most heavily by the enemy—and they may choose some of the spots at which they are going to attack—if every man is not supplied with the best equipment which can possibly be supplied, and if every bit of that equipment is not supplied with the best ammunition possible of production the allies may lose. If we do not permit any such deficiences, and if we place behind those forces the food necessary to feed them, and supply the food necessary to assist in feeding the British people, the food necessary to assist in feeding the people in North Africa, and the food necessary to assist in feeding the people in the countries on the continent of Europe, once they are won back to the side of the allies, we shall have accomplished all that is possible toward the successful conclusion of the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I am sure no one wished to interrupt the minister during the exposition which he made of government policy. But I would point out that the minister has had one hour and twenty-five minutes in which to speak.

Mr. GARDINER: Within the rules.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think the minister was within the rules, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on behalf of the government, following the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). If the privilege is going to be extended, then I think it should be extended with the consent of the house. Other hon. members have been interrupted and called to time when forty minutes has expired.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend, will recognize that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was replying to his amendment, as well as to the amendment which had been moved earlier. And as a minister replying to an amendment containing additions he is entitled to whatever time he wishes. As a matter of fact the minister, if anything, was considerate in being as brief as he was.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is every minister entitled to make a reply for the government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I raised no objection at the time to the minister's speaking for more than forty minutes, because we will all agree that it was a most interesting and instructive statement; and from the standpoint of view of his party I have no doubt it reflected great credit. However, I wondered about this question.

I rise now only for the purpose of asking for a clarification of the point. Standing order 37 was passed on March 22, 1927. I remember the committee which framed it. I should like, however to ask how many ministers can reply to an opposition amendment. By the way, may I make it clear to the Prime Minister that the Minister of Agriculture in his opening remarks made it quite clear that he was replying to the amendment of my leader, and not to the subamendment moved by the leader of the socialist party. This is what the standing order says:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister—

That would be, say, the financial critic in an opposition.

—or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what he was doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The leader of the opposition moved what, of course, is in effect a want of confidence motion. The Prime Minister replied thereto. He was the member of the government who replied. How many members of the government are going to reply, and be entitled to speak for more than forty minutes when we, as private members, are restricted to forty minutes? That is the issue. We might as well have it settled once and for all.

I did not raise the point of order when the minister was speaking. I felt he was wrong, but I did not want to stop him. The issue is now fairly before the house. Let us have it settled. I take the ground that this rule means that only one minister may reply to an amendment such as my leader has moved, namely, an amendment involving want of confidence in the government. That reply was made; therefore it cannot be made again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I thank my hon. friends and also the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) for not having raised the present point while the minister was making his statement. As I heard the minister, in the opening part of his remarks I thought he said that he intended to devote a considerable part of his time to the amendment which had been moved by the leader of the opposition; but that he was also speaking to the amendment to the amendment which had been moved—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that is where your ears deceived you. That is exactly what he did not say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact that is what he did, in effect. He made a reply to a motion of want of confidence in the administration. My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would hardly say that this amendment was not a motion of want of confidence in the administration.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was an amendment to an amendment which had already expressed want of confidence in the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should point out to my hon. friend that when the rule is being interpreted it would be well to remember that while we have one government we have four or five oppositions, and we have as a consequence amendments to amendments. In this regard the rule ought to be broadly interpreted. His Honour the Speaker will be able to give the interpretation.

Mr. COLDWELL: When I moved the amendment to the amendment I was limited to forty minutes. I saw the Speaker rising to stop me and I sat down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no other hon. member wishes to speak on the point of order, I think the practice has been pretty well established in the past as to the case we have before us. Standing order 37, which has been read by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), states:

No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

Under that standing order the Prime Minister has the right to speak without being subject to the rule of forty minutes. It is true that the Prime Minister spoke after the amendment was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), but there has been a subsequent amendment to the amendment and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I think, in the first statement he made was replying to a motion of no confidence and replying to it from the point of view of agriculture, and also from the point of view of man-power, both of which he dealt with in his speech. In my judgment, therefore, the Minister of Agriculture, speaking as the first minister to this amendment is entitled to invoke standing order 37 and is not limited in his time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. COLDWELL: Somebody says "sit down." We are discussing an important point of procedure and in order that it may be clarified I submit that I am entitled to courtesy.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that there can be no debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Am I to understand, Mr. Speaker, that the mover of a subamendment expressing want of confidence in the government has the right to exceed forty minutes?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question has not been before me, and at the moment I would not wish to say anything beyond that I think he has not that right.

Mr. COLDWELL: The rule must work both ways.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point before us at the moment is as to the right of the minister to reply, without the time limitation, and I have given my ruling.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased that no one interrupted the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and raised the point of order that the minister was exceeding his time because, before proceeding with the remarks I had intended to make, I wish to deal with two or three matters to which the minister referred. Perhaps the latter part of his speech was the most important when he began to deal with the question of farm labour and referred to the letter which each member of the house received this morning from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). That letter in itself, I submit, justifies all the criticism that has been levelled against this government for taking labour off the farms of this country. The minister has said that we have produced a tremendous tonnage of foodstuffs. We have. We had to do it; it was our job to do it. But we have not produced as much foodstuffs in this country as we could have produced if we had had a proper farm labour policy applicable to this country. There are in this letter clauses which, if carefully read over will be seen to bear out the need for many of the things for which we have asked in the past. Under this new regulation, men who are conscientious objectors, men who knew nothing but farming, had done nothing but farming all their life, are now to be allowed to stay on the farm and to produce foodstuffs, instead of being sent up the Montreal river or into the northern wilds to build roads. In my county of Waterloo I know that many of these men were taken off the farm and sent into camps to build roads which will be destroyed before they can be completed. This was a wrong policy. Had these men been allowed to remain on the farms in the county of Waterloo we would have been able to produce larger amounts of foodstuffs than we did in our county. The farmers of this country have done a tremendous job. They had a job to do, and they faced it. They faced it in spite of the many obstacles which have been put in their way by the lack of a proper man-power policy under this government.

This letter also states that farmers will have the right in the off-season months to go into certain industries such as logging, mining and fishing. We have hundreds and hundreds of farmers who can be spared from our farms in western Ontario during the off-season. Under this new regulation they are to be restricted to these particular industries in their search for employment in the off-season. Nevertheless to-day hundreds of them are working in the munitions industries in western Ontario and doing a splendid job. I do not know how we could have got along without them. These men are now prohibited from going into any munitions factory during the off-season to produce munitions of war. Surely that regulation in itself shows that the matter has not been properly thought out. These men are not adapted to fishing and the other industries specified in the letter, but they are capable of going into munitions factories and producing munitions. Therefore I say that the regulations dealing with man-power on the farm are still far short of what they ought to be under a proper man-power policy. These men in the province of Ontario particularly, hundreds of them, have contributed hundreds of thousands of precious man-hours in producing the munitions of war.

At the beginning it was announced by the government that the farmers could go into the munitions industries during the off-season without losing their category as farmers. Then a few weeks ago another regulation came out prohibiting them from working for more than sixty days in a munitions factory. Yet these men are engaged in every form of munitions industry in western Ontario, and many of them have worked for much longer periods than two months. Have they now to quit their jobs, go back to the farm, at present covered with three or four or five feet of snow, and sit and twiddle their thumbs until seeding time comes around? Surely, Mr. Speaker, that in itself shows that this policy has not been well thought out and that there is still room for improvement in our man-power policy. The very fact of these regulations coming out shows beyond all peradventure that there is a shortage of man-power on the farms in this country and that the government is now beginning to realize this. The government is now trying to cure what is the result of their own ill-advised policy.

The Minister of Agriculture also lectured the members of the house for having made certain statements; for instance, a statement with regard to the shortage of bacon and that we should not buy bacon. Was it not the minister himself or one of the men in his department who made an appeal to the Canadian people not to eat bacon and other pork products so that we could ship more of them to Britain? It was not anything said by us in the house which publicized the statement referred to in that international journal; it was the Department of Agriculture itself that requested the people of Canada not to eat bacon and other pork products, and the people, I believe, rose to the occasion.

There is one other reference I wish to make. I am pleased that the minister was not interrupted. Coming from a district like Waterloo county, where agriculture is very highly developed, I greatly appreciated the speech he made this afternoon.

Last evening a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) made one or two little jibes at the official opposition and read a letter which had been sent out by the South York Conservative organization. It was an appeal to join the Progressive Conservative association, and for a payment of one dollar the subscriber would become a member and would assist in defeating the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, an object which I hope we shall achieve, because I think it would be a good thing for the country. But I, too, have a letter here. It was not sent out by any political association within a riding, where they went to the post office and paid their postage, where they went to the printer and had their letter printed, and to the envelope manufacturer and purchased envelopes. This is a letter from the House of Commons, Ottawa, signed by Mr. A. M. Nicholson, M.P., national treasurer of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Franked.

Mr. HOMUTH: Franked; and with the House of Commons letterhead on the envelope. In this letter—and goodness knows how many thousands went out—is an appeal for funds, and the statement that they have been able to get a Rhodes scholar, Mr. Lewis, a graduate of McGill, to be secretary and organizer of their association; that he could get a position which would pay him a large salary out of which he could contribute a thousand dollars to the funds of the association, but that they wanted to keep him in their own employment.

What I want to bring to the attention of the house is a view I have always held, that no political party has any right to use the money of the taxpayers of Canada for the purpose of spreading its political propaganda or of trying to raise money for its operations. I am definitely opposed to such action. Furthermore, there is an old saying that people who live in glass houses ought to undress in the dark, and I think it applies to the hon. member for York South.

An hon. MEMBER: Have you another like that?

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to confine myself to the remarks I had intended to make. I agree that it is a happy occasion to reconvene in Ottawa in the realization that the war situation is so much better, that after all we are now beginning to see at least the beginning of the end of this terrible conflict, with the allied troops winning victories on practically all fronts. But there is, of course, something rather saddening in the reconvening of a parliament. It has been my privilege, as a member of either the Ontario or the dominion house, to attend many new sessions, and always the occasion has not been without an element of sadness, because seldom have we met without the loss of some members. As we sit here now we begin to wonder in what direction our ranks will be depleted before another session comes, and how many more members will be lost to us by death. I wish to join with others who have paid tribute to those who have passed since the last session of this house; it is a source of great regret to us.

There was, however, another hon. member who has passed from this house, whose passing is not, I believe, so greatly regretted. He has passed to that "other place." I have never had such a high degree of satisfaction over a senate vacancy as I have as a result of that appointment—and I say that in no unkind spirit. But I should like to make this remark to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), realizing that suggestions from our side of the house are always welcome! There is an hon. member of his party who has endeared himself to everyone here; he is a French Canadian; he happens to come from the province of Ontario; and I trust that when the appointment of deputy speaker is made it will go to one who is held in such high regard by all members of the house. I refer to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette).

In his address the other day the Prime Minister asked us to avoid acrimonious debate, and I believe that, generally speaking, this debate has been on a very high plane. He asked us to cooperate with the government in trying to sell to the people, as it were, the various controls and restrictions which are necessary. I agree that we as members of this house have a grave responsibility. But we have another responsibility, namely that, if there are controls and restrictions which in our opinion are not in the interests of Canada, we must express our convictions in this place, the only place where it can be done. We cannot stand idly by and allow important matters to be adjudicated upon by the various boards throughout the country without saying what we think about them. We cannot talk to the boards; we cannot talk to the minister when the boards are set up. This is the place where these matters must be discussed. I do not believe that there was ever a government which held office in this country during a trying time which had greater cooperation from an opposition than the present government has received. True, we have been critical, but I hope that the criticism we have levelled against the government has been constructive. If we look back over the plebiscite campaign, who were prouder to carry that vote than members of the official opposition?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You took a long time about it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Very well, but when the vote was to be taken we went out and worked for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I knew you would.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me tell the Prime Minister that there were not a great many members of his party who did the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, there were.

Mr. HOMUTH: And when the victory loan campaigns were launched, members of this party worked hard to make them a success. Certainly it was our duty to do so, but what did the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) and members for other ridings around my own do in this direction? How much time did they spend in organizing the victory loan campaigns? I followed the course of these loan drives very carefully—

Mr. WOOD: I would not trade Brant for your riding.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member would have to give me the rest of the province to boot.

We have endeavoured in every possible way to assist the government, but there are some of these matters which I think we have to deal with on the floor of the house, and some of the things I am going to mention to-day have come to me as a result of my activity in industry, representing a farming district. As a result of our building up of control boards, they have seriously affected our output on farms and in the factories. Man-power and these control boards are directly interlocked. Some of these boards are exceptionally good and are doing a fine job. Some of them are headed by men who plan carefully and move warily, and when they put out an order one can depend upon it that it has been so well planned that the order will work smoothly and people will fall in line. But there are other boards that do not plan, boards that do not take the precautions they ought to take, and they make rulings that disorganize industry, so that within a very short time they have to change those rulings. The whole trouble is on account of the fact that the man who was at the head of that particular board was not practical or was not a good organizer. If he had been a good organizer, even if he was not practical in that particular line, he would at least have called in practical men and have discussed these matters with them.

Take, for example, the cost of living bonus, the original order in council dealing with that question. Every industry was told that it had to pay a cost of living bonus. Most of them complied. Some, however, did not, and before any action was taken to enforce it with these particular industries, a new order came out freezing the wages. These industries then could not pay that cost of living bonus, with the result that in many municipalities and industrial centres there was a checker-board system of wages, a system which was due entirely to the effect of the orders in council which were passed by the board, one contradicting another.

Then we have industries which are 100 per cent on war work. These industries are classed as non-essential, notwithstanding that everything they turn out is war material. They are classed as non-essential for one purpose, and everyone knows it, namely, that those called for service out of those industries do not get the same consideration as those who come from what are classed as essential industries. The idea is to get these men out of these industries and fill their places with old men or women if possible.

Orders were made freezing wages. The employees accepted that; the employer accepted it, and they went along their way satisfied as far as possible to cooperate with the government and the government's order. Then suddenly the government come along and start an industry of their own in the vicinity, or perhaps right within the municipality. As soon as they are ready to start they need help. There is no ceiling on the wages they offer. They break the wage ceiling immediately for the district. They will get men and women into that industry regardless—and they do. In these other essential war industries, however, wages are frozen. But this industry starts up, headed by someone appointed by the government, and breaks the wage ceiling, causing discontent in every other enterprise in the district. These are the things that are done by these boards through lack of planning, and they disrupt the whole industrial life of the country.

Then we have the cost-plus contracts. The Department of National Defence will take over some building. They will build a barracks or renovate some building they are taking over. They will send some contractor in with a cost-plus contract. Wages mean nothing to him; he will get help. There is no liaison between that job and the Department of Labour or the wartime prices and trade board. By reason of this contract he will pay fabulous wages, wages as high as a journeyman carpenter will get, to men who hardly know one end of a hammer from the other, and he will thus cause discontent in the district, which is a serious matter. I know of instances where high school boys were offered fifty-one cents an hour as helpers—wages higher than the whole wage structure in the district—by some contractor who came in with a job from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or by government engineers.

Mr. HOMUTH: These things are done by these various controls, and they have disrupted the whole economic fabric of the country and caused that discontent which we have in industry. We had the spectacle of the steel strike. That strike should never have occurred. I can understand a strike in some munitions factory, and other munitions factories carrying on. But here is an industry that is vital to every munitions factory in the country, an industry that is the very foundation of the munitions which we are making in the various factories in Canada. It was because of the vacillating labour policy of the government that that strike ever occurred, and it was declared illegal. Before that, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the government should have prevented it from developing. They should never have allowed that board to rise until they had even moved to Ottawa, conferred with the government and brought down some sort of unanimous report. If they had done that there would have been no strike in that industry. But the strike occurred, and it was declared illegal. Then the government started to negotiate with those men who were carrying on an illegal strike, and finally the strike was ended. But what did the government do in making the settlement they did? They froze the cost of living bonus to the steel workers, so that as the cost of living index is reduced the bonus will remain, whereas the cost of living bonus in every other industry will be reduced. What are the employees in other industries going to say when, as the cost of living index diminishes, their cost of living bonus is reduced while that paid to the steel workers remains frozen? A settlement such as that cannot help stirring up trouble in other industries. Again I say it is because of the lack of force, the lack of sound reason in dealing with these matters, that a great many of the difficulties we have in industry to-day have been brought about.

One of the essentials in working out a manpower policy is that first of all we ought to know, and this house ought to know, how many men we shall require for the air force and how many men we shall require for the army. How many men shall we require for the navy? How many men shall we require for the auxiliary services? How much farm labour shall we require? What shortage, if any, is there of industrial labour in this country? How can this house deal with these matters; how can we discuss them intelligently unless we get information from the government as to what their plans are? Surely it is not giving information to the enemy to say, We are going to raise another fifty thousand men for the air force, or the navy, or the army. Those are things we ought to know. Not since the war started have we had a clear-cut statement to this house.

What is happening to the draftees who are now being called up? What is their position? True, the government was freed from any obligations in regard to them by the vote on the plebiscite, but what is their position to-day? Suppose the Canadian army gets into battle and more and more reinforcements are needed; what is the position of these men who to-day are being called up for service in Canada or Newfoundland or on this continent? Is their position going to be that if a very sudden need is apparent the government overnight can pass an order in council and immediately make these men available for overseas service? The men themselves ought to know what position they are in. These men who are now being called for military training, ostensibly for duty on this continent, ought to know where they stand. The government ought to tell this house what their position is with regard to these men that they are calling. Is it any wonder that at times hon. members say there is no leadership, no guidance in regard to these matters?

Often many of these regulations that do not regulate but that do disorganize are passed simply, it would appear, because of fear of political repercussions. I say that honestly and sincerely. Too often it seems to be done with the political viewpoint in mind. We had one of the most upsetting things happen very recently, the exodus of thousands of men to the United States to go into the lumbering business there. The Minister of Labour stated that some 3,700 men had been given permits. Would he say that only 3,700 men went over there to cut timber? Let him put his immigration officers on when these men start to come back and see if he will not find that double that number went.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many went illegally?

Mr. HOMUTH: They went over there to cut timber that is not required for our war purposes, whereas in Canada we have a tremendous shortage of these men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right in New Brunswick we have.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the minister in charge of selective service say that no requests have been made by the lumbermen of Ontario for men to carry on the lumber business, that no request was made by the department of lands and forests, the minister or his officials? I know Mr. Hipel very well; I know something of the ability that he puts into his job; I know something of the difficulty he has in getting men into the northern woods to cut the timber we need. This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said that fuel wood is now to be controlled because there is a shortage of it; yet thousands and thousands of men are allowed to go over into the United States to cut wood there.

Over and above that a member—supposedly a member—goes to the selective service administration wanting to take five hundred men to the United States, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me correct my hon. friend. There was never a member of parliament came to the Labour department for five hundred men.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, I say a permit was given for five hundred men to go over there. Who signed the permit? Who gave the right to take them over? Was it denied by Mr. Nicholson and those in charge, and did they say to the minister that that right should not be given? Those are the questions which the people of this country want answered. Those are the questions which the lumbermen of northern Ontario want answered. Those are the things that industry wants to know, because those are the things that disorganize industry and make people feel that they cannot get the cooperation of this government that they should have. It is a serious situation, a serious indictment of the whole manpower policy of this government.

These boards are set up; very often they do things that are ridiculous. If we were not engaged in a war in which our very life is at stake, some of the regulations that are made, and unmade the next day, would be a joke. I sometimes think the minister says to himself, this, that or the other should be controlled; I will hunt up someone who can do it. Accordingly he hunts him up and gives him an office, a desk, a secretary and a brief case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And a carpet.

Mr. HOMUTH: Sometimes a carpet, and a pretty nice desk. He sits there and says to himself, I am here to control something; I am going to start to control. Immediately he starts to issue orders to control this or that or to do this or the other thing. In a short time the control has to be taken off or changed or the order unmade.

Is there anything more ridiculous to-day than the regulation of bus traffic in this country? The trip limit is fifty miles. A man gets on a bus wanting to go fifty-five miles. He has to get off five miles from the terminus and perhaps hire a taxi for the rest of the way, as many do, while the bus goes on with an empty seat. If you wish to go from Toronto to Bradford you take the bus for fifty miles, get off at a hay field, take a waiting taxi that takes you the rest of the way, the bus going on with an empty seat. The termini now for bus trips are not town to town but cornfield to turnip patch. The thing is so ridiculous.

Then we have control of truck traffic. Firms had special trucks built to handle their particular commodity. There are many such in my district. These trucks are of no use whatever for general cartage. They can now travel only thirty-five miles; they used to travel one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles. How do they get around this control? Some of the trucks are actually taken off the road; the tires are depreciating; the truck is depreciating; it is just so much waste machinery in the country. At least the government should have let them carry on until these specialty trucks were worn out. But if they do not lie idle they will carry the commodity thirty-five miles to where another branch has been established; the goods are unloaded from one truck to another and carried the next thirty-five miles, and so on until they reach their destination. Think of the waste of man-power. The thing is ridiculous.

As a result of this sort of thing people are beginning to lose confidence. The government ask for confidence. How can people have confidence in view of such silly controls as that?

This story may be far-fetched, although I am not so sure that it is. They tell me that a farmer out west had a notice that he had not delivered his full quota of wheat to the board. He wrote back saying that man-power on his farm had been depleted, and that he could not deliver the wheat for another month because they were now in the lambing season. He got a letter back from the controller, "put off the lambing season for a month."

I realize that this may be far-fetched, but I do say that these things are serious. I am in the midst of it; I can see what is going on, and I do feel that to handle industry, agriculture or any other branch of our national economy, only the very best men one can find should be appointed. The other day the Prime Minister referred to the fact that we were criticizing the men who had been appointed to these positions and said, "But the members of the opposition asked us to do this." Certainly we did. At the beginning of the war, when we saw something of what was going on, when we saw the disorganized situation that existed, we urged the Prime Minister to go out and get the very best men he could find in every branch of industry to come in as advisers to the government and organize us for the war effort. But we did not ask him to have them come in and usurp the rights of parliament, as they are doing to-day.

These are just some of the things I wanted to bring before the house, realizing as I do that if we are to go out and sell this war effort, these controls and these restrictions to the people of our constituencies, the people of this country; if we are to build up confidence as we in this parliament are doing the very best we can to do, then the foolish things such as I have recited should be cleared up at once. Seriously I say that the time for any political face-saving has passed. It is up to us to build up a confidence in the minds of the people of this country. We have a tremendous effort to put forth. This may be the deciding year of the war. The extra food, extra munitions, extra equipment and so on that we can produce this year may be the deciding factor of the whole war. Let us go to work on it, and let the Prime Minister do as the other day he said he would. If it is true that some of these men do not fit into the job, let them go; clean up some of these things as they should be cleaned up. Then he will get the backing of every member of the opposition.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Homuth.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères) Mr. Speaker, being now a private member of the house I could listen with the greatest freedom of thought and mind to the speech delivered by the new leader (Mr. Graydon) of the newly baptized opposition party in the house. I do not hesitate for one moment in extending to him my heartiest congratulations, first of all upon having been given the honour of representing his party in the house as opposition leader and, second, upon his brilliant first speech in that capacity. The hon. member has many personal qualities, and I do not hesitate to say that he possesses both in mind and intellect the necessary qualifications to occupy an important place in the public life of this country. Whatever his views may be, he will always, I am sure, enjoy the respect of all hon. members, even though they do not agree with the sentiments or opinions he may express when speaking for himself and for the party to which he belongs. He has been in the house for a certain number of years, not very many compared with the time I have served here; but during those years he has made a great number of friends, and has been respected by members sitting on both sides of the house.

His presentation was good. I listened to him with careful attention, and with a somewhat more independent state of mind and spirit than I would have, had I been sitting on the treasury benches. He offered a good argument, and laid the foundations for a good conclusion, but, unfortunately, he did not arrive at a logical conclusion.

He made reference in strong, harsh terms to the fact that parliament was in need of rebuilding its reputation before the public, and of creating or developing better procedure than had been the practice for a certain number of years. I agree with him on that point. Even if we do better than others, no one can dispute that the parliament of Canada does not at present enjoy the confidence and respect it enjoyed in the past.

The hon. member referred to the changing of the rules of the house. He was quite right. Our rules of procedure are obsolete. They have been framed after the rules followed at Westminster, but here we have not developed the methods and customs prevailing at Westminster. There is an urgent necessity for a change in the rules of the house, a change in our methods of procedure.

But, even if they are obsolete, the rules of the house in many respects are not observed

This is particularly true in connection with the reading of speeches. That is something which helps to discredit parliament. To a certain extent the chamber has become what we call in French—I do not know the English expression—un cabinet de lecture.

It may be that under certain circumstances there is the necessity for reading a statement. However, I have lived long enough in political life to have seen great leaders of the past—Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, Sir George Foster, and other great cabinet ministers—who were satisfied with only a few notes, even when making in the house a statement on the most important questions.

Exceptions may be made for the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, but this procedure of reading speeches should not prevail on every occasion and on all questions. Knowing the present Prime Minister as I do, I can say that he is a master of the English language, a master of his own mind and of his own thoughts. He says exactly what he wants to say at any time and in all circumstances. He does not need to put down on paper five or six days or a week in advance what he wishes to say in the House of Commons. He has a great gift of learning, and to my mind he would be the last one, had the practice not been developed in the past few years, to ask to be allowed to read his speeches or statements on matters of secondary importance.

The reading of speeches has developed into a habit by all parties in this house for some years. The other day we listened to a very good speech delivered by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell). It was a very good speech indeed, but if he will allow me to say so he nearly spoiled it. Fortunately for him he is a good reader, and it was not too apparent that he was reading a text. But I would always prefer to hear the gentleman give his ideas as they occur to him while he is on his feet, his speeches are then far more effective.

There are many other aspects in which the rules should be amended. I have no time to go into them now. I shall make only a brief reference to Hansard. I do not know whether I would be in favour of abolishing Hansard. But few people read it now. In the old days it was referred to very often by the leaders of all parties with a view to discovering some contradiction of statements. Nowadays, however, we do not bother about contradictions. We have contradictions not only between what was said in past years and what is said to-day, but we have contradictions in the very same speech. The end of a speech does not agree with the beginning and very often the beginning contradicts the conclusion. Thus I see no great need for recording what is said. Under the pretext of new conditions and of changed times leaders contradict themselves and continue blithely their way on, not worrying at all about contradictions. They do not care whether the stand they took a month, or a week, or a day ago, agrees with their present attitude.

There are many other reasons why parliament is coming into public discredit and among then I might cite the positions which are taken by members or leaders in flagrant contradiction with their declarations to the electors. There is also the hesitancy shown on any question which might gain or lose votes to a party or group. In the end all these things come to the electors, first, causing them to doubt and finally casting discredit on parliament.

With all due deference, and with all the personal friendship I have for him, may I say to the leader of the opposition that his amendment to the main motion is an example of those hesitating moves and vacillating attitudes which help to discredit parliament in the eyes of the people. I cannot vote for the conclusion of his speech. I would have been ready to accept most of the premises that he laid down, but the conclusion of his argument as contained in the amendment that he moved to the address is not in accordance with the premises. The amendment is vague, as vague as it can be. It is obscure and lends itself to all kinds of interpretations. Any party or group in this house could find therein something that would accord with their views.

Unfortunately the same remark applies to the subamendment which has been moved by the distinguished leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It is presented in general terms which need to be explained in detail and which for the most part are not clearly understandable for the man on the street. With all due respect to both hon. members, I will say that the amendments appear to have been drafted with the idea of gaining support from people of opposite views. It shows lack of courage to state precisely the policy proposed or suggested. The amendments which have been moved, the speeches which have been delivered and, I might add, with some hesitation, the attitude of the government remind me of a man trying to ride three horses at the same time, and trying to be Santa Claus offering something to each group in order to satisfy all shades of opinion. But that cannot be done very long without destroying the confidence of the people of Canada in our parliamentary institutions.

Boards have been appointed, without any responsibility to parliament, to deal with matters which the departments could very well have taken care of. We have hired the services of outsiders who know nothing of politics and have had experience only in the limited field of their personal business activities. These boards are deciding public matters according to their whims. In their inexperience they are destroying established practices and customs which have been in existence in our country for over fifty years. The civil laws are being disregarded. The privileges and rights of the provinces are being interfered with by men who have no responsibility except the one of preparing a report to their minister. That is their only responsibility. Members of parliament have no importance and have no authority with these boards, these extraordinary men, these supermen who are directing the affairs of the country at the present time. In due time, all this comes to the ears of the people and helps to discredit our administration. We are fighting for liberty, we are fighting for democracy and parliamentary institutions. Yet most of our activities are in the hands of little potentates, men of no experience, dictators in the field that has been given to them for administration. These new appointees are nominally dollar-a-year men, but they receive salaries from the organizations to which they belong. I do not suggest that they are doing anything wrong, but certainly they are not likely to do anything prejudicial to the firms with which they are connected. There were in the public service numbers of men who could have been brought together and could have administered and directed efficiently many of our war activities.

Propaganda is also a source of discredit to parliament. Propaganda such as is carried on to-day under such high-sounding titles as "winning the war" and "war service" is some kind of blackout of the intelligence of the population of Canada. The people are not getting the truth. Most of the time they are listening to appeals based on imagination, sentiment, feelings and half-truths, all this calculated to arouse unfairly the emotions of our people.

Something which happened not long ago is a flagrant breach of a promise solemnly made in this house and of record. We were handed a few days ago a document, "Canadian War Orders and Regulations. Extra" dated February 1, 1943. It will be recalled that under the mobilization act of 1940, section 5, it is required that orders and regulations passed under the authority of that act, when parliament is not in session, "shall forthwith be published in the Canada Gazette" and distributed to the members of the House of Commons. Well, that little document dated February 1 carries on the first page an order in council dated January 19. It informs us that orders in council have already been passed on September 4, September 14, November 3, and December 8—orders in council based on the disposition of the mobilization act to send recruits outside Canada. The first order in council of September 4 and the others were not printed or published in the Canada Gazette at that time. They lay dormant in the desk of the privy council from September 4 until January 19, or February 1. Is that observing the law and causing the printing of the order in council and its distribution "forthwith"? No; it is taking advantage, as I predicted would be done, of the last sentence of section 5, which provides for special circumstances.

The government took the power, when the amendment was passed, when Bill No. 80 was adopted, to order that publicity should not be given to decisions of the government when they felt it would not be in the public interest to do so. This is a breach of a promise. I remember very well the answer which I received on that point last session from a member of the government, "Oh, do not fear that this clause is going to be taken advantage of; if the power is used it will be only under the most extraordinary circumstances. "We propose," said that gentleman, "to publish the orders in council and make all our actions public." That pledge has been broken. What danger was there to the national interest in making public on September 4 that we had sent recruits to Newfoundland? In what way could our war effort have been prejudiced by letting the public know that we had decided to use the recruits as regular volunteers and members of the militia of Canada? In no way could this have prejudiced our war effort or caused any difficulties, or have brought information of any real advantage to the enemy.

To-day we find that in orders in council the names of the regiments are omitted, because it is not in "the national interest" to say that regiment number three or regiment number five has been sent here or there. How can the disclosure of such a fact be destructive to our war effort? How can it give to the enemy encouragement or support or useful information to state that we have sent a certain regiment to replace another in Newfoundland? This gives the people an indication of what is going to happen if some day the government decides under the authority of the mobilization act to send our sons and recruits overseas. These methods do not help to maintain the prestige of parliament.

The speech from the throne contains many words, but is rather poor in substance. As my time is running short I will be brief in the observations I shall make on the speech from the throne. There is the question of redistribution. That is nothing new. It has to be done in accordance with the constitution. But there are rumours that we shall not proceed with the bill. Newspapers have already stated that owing to certain difficulties, and to the fact that certain provinces will lose some seats in the house, the bill may be postponed until after an election. At any rate that is what I have read in the newspapers.

Parliamentary secretaries are to be appointed. That is not new either. I do not think this is necessary. My remarks are not to be taken as a reflection on the personality of those who have been chosen already and, as I am told, have already started their work. They may all be good men, deserving recognition and deserving to be trained in the business of the house. It is quite all right from that point of view, but to my mind it is the fifth wheel of the wagon.

Our position is not the same as in England where the government has to direct national and imperial affairs, together with what correspond to our provincial and municipal organizations. We are a small country and a small parliament, from the point of view of responsibilities, in comparison with the parliament of Great Britain, and this is an expenditure which we could easily avoid when our taxes are already high.

After all, what are the parliamentary secretaries going to do in the house? When they are asked a question about something that has been dealt with in the privy council they will be unable to answer, not being members of the cabinet. When they are asked a question on a matter of policy of the government they will not be in a position to answer because they are not members of the government. In fact, they will be only glorified private secretaries or deputy ministers; that is all. On all questions of policy they will have to promise information for the next day, and the next day they will read a statement which will have been prepared by the minister or by somebody in the department. Well, such a statement could be read by any minister present in the house. It seems to me that our administration, with its numerous departments, its exceedingly large numbers of boards, commissions and controllers, is cumbersome enough without that additional machinery.

We have been told in the speech from the throne that national health will be taken care of and that social security will be looked after. But, as already mentioned by some other hon. members, these questions are largely provincial matters, and I hope we are not going to take advantage of the situation created by the war to deprive the provinces of the privileges and exclusive rights guaranteed them by the pact of confederation, without adopting some other satisfactory method which would protect minorities and guard the provinces against a central organization in Ottawa. With that limitation, what can we do? Very little. That is probably why the Prime Minister told us in his speech that these matters would be looked into, and probably that is all that will be done.

I question the merit of the study that we can make of the situation that will exist after the war. Where is the man bright enough and with vision enough, the man capable of prophecy, who is able to tell us what are to be the foundations upon which we shall build the welfare of Canada after the war? We shall find ourselves in a situation which none of us at the present time can properly envisage and determine. We may do a certain amount of work here and there, but it may very well be that when we are faced with the real situation after the war all the plans now prepared will be of no avail.

What is the use of building a house when we do not know upon what foundation it is to rest? Why lose our time in dealing with such uncertainties?

The speech from the throne also reviews our war effort. It has been a magnificent effort, I admit, and I am glad of it. All Canadians are proud of it, and we have the profound satisfaction of having it recognized that our war effort surpasses that of any other country of our size. As far as man-power and finance are concerned, our war effort is superior to that of the great republic to the south, the United States. Our war effort is really a great thing. It is abused, though, by a large number of people and is taken advantage of by many. Our war effort should be regulated by reason. There are certain problems which we must face courageously and one of the most important of these is agriculture.

I listened with great attention to the wonderful speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon, who always makes great speeches. He is a convincing speaker. Nevertheless the fact remains that there is a great man-power problem in the agricultural field in Canada. Whatever explanations may be given, even coloured with sentiment, they do not improve the situation.

There is a shortage of farm hands in Canada. This is admitted everywhere, in all sections of the country, and this ought to be taken care of. The very letter from Mr. MacNamara, which was read by the minister this very afternoon, admits that there is a very serious shortage. It refers to the difficult situation in which the farmers find themselves at the present time. The terms of the letter are very clear on that point. This is the substance of one of the priliminary paragraphs:

> In view of the increasing shortage of farm labour it becomes more and more important to encourage essential farm labourers to remain on the land.

This is an official document which has just been signed by the director of selective service and approved by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I need not go any further. I have also the word of the Minister of Agriculture himself in his statement published in the Montreal Standard of February 6:

> Can the farmers of Canada attain the 1943 objectives? Certainly they are going to make a valiant effort to do so, and if given some help both in man-power and farm machinery and equipment it is most likely they may perhaps surpass some of them.

Therefore there is a shortage of farm labour in Canada and we ought to cope with that situation. Such letters, circulars, promises and instructions given to judges, telling them how to read the law, are not satisfactory. That is not enough. It only means perpetuating the vague and nebulous system that exists at present and under which farmers never know definitely whether or not they are going to have the help of their sons to cultivate the land. In many instances they do not get deferment unless the military authorities give their approval. Such a hit-or-miss system that has prevailed up to the present time must cease. One might say that is an election promise if there were an election in sight!

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CARDIN: Five minutes.

Is agriculture essential or not? It is essential. We ought to take every means to help this industry at the present time, because without it, without food products, however well-trained our men, however great our armament, the war would soon end. A man with an empty stomach is incapable of carrying the most perfect gun. Agriculture is the most important thing in the world at the present time. Canada, instead of trying to be first as far as man-power is concerned should strive to be first as far as agriculture is concerned, first in supplying food and armaments for the fighting forces. There are countries capable of supplying more man-power than Canada. Russia and China have inexhaustible resources of man-power; there, men can be found in as great numbers as may be desired. They need the armaments and also the food we can produce.

Let us base our participation in the war upon reason; let us see that what we can do best is done first and not second, even if it is a source of pride for us that certain of our men are fighting gallantly at one point or another. We must sustain them, and we must help to sustain Russia, China, and Britain and other parts of the British empire.

Munitions also are necessary, they are most important. The United States are thinking of fixing and limiting their man-power to 7,500,000 men. It is about time that we ourselves think of placing a limit—as high as possible, I admit—on our man-power overseas, and try to feed those who are in need of being fed. In north Africa people are dying, and the political and military heads there to-day say that what has been provided up to the present in the form of arms and food is only a drop in the bucket and that unless something more is done in regard to food and armaments we shall not succeed and thousands upon thousands of the population will perish. The same situation prevails in China. China is threatened with famine, and she has not the armaments she needs to carry on her fight. Good old China, whom we love so much to-day, that we praise so much to-day and proclaim to be one of the first peoples in the world! For years she was fighting the Japanese on her own territory without our help, but to-day, what a change! We have discovered that she is a great country, a country that deserves our praise and support. We have modified our views; we have become a little more courageous and ready to help China now, as well as Russia. Let us give them what they need most, not men but food and armaments. That is what they want to enable them to carry on the struggle. As a matter of fact they are fighting for us as much as they are fighting for themselves.

If we have some success to-day, who has achieved that success? The Russians. Without Russia where would we be? Probably we would be signing a treaty of peace, not according to our terms or our will, but according to the will of others. That would be our position.

What are we to do? I am going to be bold, not afraid to express my thoughts. I regret that the government at the present time has not seen fit to suspend the mobilization act of 1940 until at least a survey has been made of the whole situation in order to ascertain the most pressing needs of Canada as well as of the united nations. We ought to make such a survey, instead of trying to attain the same end by a circular letter to be sent from time to time to the boards or to the committees that decide whether or not a man essential to the farm or to an industry should be given a military postponement. I hope we do not establish in this country, for coming generations, a practice by which those in authority are going to tell the judges and those who have been sworn to interpret the law what they ought to do and how they ought to interpret that law. I trust we have not reached that depth. If the law is not good, let us change it, but while the law is there, let us observe it in the letter and in the spirit. What this letter purports to do is to tell the boards that they should interpret the law according to what the authority thinks it is important to do at a given time. If that is what we are fighting for on the battlefield, we had better cease. If we are fighting for principles like those; if the law is to be changed according to the will of the government, according to the will of a superior officer, according to the will of a military authority, I do not know where it is going to end.

That is my suggestion, and I am not afraid to make it. I may be accused of not being alive to the situation, of not taking cognizance of the facts as they exist in the world to-day. To those who may be inclined to attack me and to be unjust I wish to say only this. To-day Irishmen are proud of Ireland even though their country is neutral. The Australian people are also proud of their country, though they have limited the extent of the field in which they are going to fight. They are still part of the British empire and of the British commonwealth. South Africa is still a member of the commonwealth and its people are still proud to be citizens of that country, although they have also limited the field of their activities in this war. The United States are looking after themselves and their interests first. They are helping to defend what we call liberty, democracy, etcetera; but I have not seen anything in the press nor have I heard a speech by any politician in that country stating that they were ready to give second place to their rights, principles, advantages and interests. Russia is fighting for herself, too. No public man to-day would deny that statement. Why can we not be Canadians, though participating in the war? Why do we not see our war effort through our Canadianism? In doing all we reasonably can to help win the war, we should not try to surpass, for vainglory or vain pride, the efforts of other countries who are more vitally and directly interested in the conflict than Canada?

One further word and I shall conclude. I have lived long enough to remember that one man, at one time very powerful in the United Kingdom and who was a close personal friend of our Prime Minister—I refer to the late Mr. Ramsay MacDonald—was not in full accord with the government of his country in 1914-18. He was not in favour of England going into the war as deeply as she did in those years. Who would say that Ramsay MacDonald was not a good British citizen and a great man? A few years later he became Prime Minister of Great Britain, and we acclaimed him here in Canada when he paid us the honour of a visit. Perhaps that might answer those who may be inclined to criticize me too severely.

Something was mentioned about Casablanca. Either the leader of the official opposition or my good friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation asked the Prime Minister to make a statement with regard to the conference which took place between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt in that city. Before six o'clock, that day, the Prime Minister began to give his explanation, brilliantly as always, with a fine choice of words and a careful weighing of his sentences and expressions. He presented a very good argument. After six o'clock he continued by reading a document he had prepared on the same subject. As the Ottawa Journal put it the next day, the statement before six o'clock was much better than the one after six o'clock.

The Prime Minister gave many reasons why Canada was not represented at that conference. The first was, "Well, I was not invited." That reminded me of a little story regarding a visit which Emperor Napoleon paid to a little town in France. He was received by the mayor of the locality who explained to him that for various reasons they could not fire a gun in his honour on his arrival. In fact the mayor said that he had fifteen reasons for not having fired a gun, and he proceeded to enumerate them: "First, we have no gun." Napoleon interrupted him and said, "Well, I do not want to hear about the other reasons; that suffices me." The moment the Prime Minister told us he had not been invited to the Casablanca conference I thought that was good enough, and that no other explanations were needed to indicate that while not invited he was there not in person, but in thought, and also through knowledge, because General McNaughton who is in close touch with the military authorities must have, in all probability, been aware of the questions discussed at the Casablanca conference. All these excuses and arguments were not as good as the first reason the Prime Minister gave before six o'clock, namely, that he was not invited.

I am not humiliated because we were not invited. We had no reason to be there. We had no place there, because we are not one of the main powers conducting the war. Our authority is secondary; our role is second to that of many others, and we must accept the decisions of the powers mainly responsible for carrying this war to a successful conclusion. We had no reason to be there, and we have no reason to complain because we were not invited.

Let us adjust ourselves to our role, to our position. We are a dominion. We are a member of the British commonwealth of nations. But we are not as powerful as England; we are not as powerful as the United States; we are not as powerful as Russia. We are a small nation trying to do our best to help the sovereign nations and the great cause. We cannot hope to impose our will or our wishes when decisions as important as those which no doubt were made at Casablanca are to be reached. Let us avoid all unjustified pride of ourselves. We are in this war, it is true. We are in it to do the best we can. but as far as I am concerned, Canada comes first.

I am more interested in the welfare, well-being and maintenance of Canada than in anything else. It is all very well to coin phrases and to express opinions about this and that, opinions and coined phrases which in reality mean only one thing, that the end justifies the means. That is a nazi and fascist principle, and one to which I cannot subscribe.

We must be reasonable; we must keep our feet on the ground and not lose our heads in the clouds of excitement and exaggerated pride. Let us not exaggerate the importance and the extent of the contribution we can make in this struggle.

Let us be Canadians; let us think as Canadians and let us act as Canadians.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in coming to the conclusion that I should participate in this debate I was motivated by a very strong desire to give expression to my feelings regarding matters of current concern, and matters of future concern referred to in the speech from the throne. May I say at the outset that I cannot subscribe to the theory frequently advanced in the house that, through agreement or through some type of understanding, we should bring about a hasty conclusion to the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. After all, this is the occasion upon which the private member has an opportunity of dealing with those many matters which affect not only his constituency, but all of Canada.

Upon entering the new year Canadians were greatly encouraged by the improved military position of the united nations. I fancy that it is not an exaggeration to say that we have been inspired by the offensive action in North Africa—offensive on our side, because we showed aggressiveness; and offensive so far as our enemies were concerned, because of the effect it had upon them. Furthermore, we have unbounded admiration for the people in the British isles who continue to carry on not only the defence of their shores against a threatened invasion but also the production of vast supplies of the tools of war and of the foodstuffs necessary to carry them through during the prosecution of the war.

We have been impressed, too, by the significant and heroic achievements of our Russian allies. All of those to whom I have referred are indeed deserving of our deepest gratitude. It would not be appropriate for me to proceed without further asserting that we entered the new year full of admiration for and confidence in the men of our own fighting forces who have gone into theatres of war on our behalf.

There is one danger, however, with which we are confronted at the present time. I fancy that as a result of the fact that at least for the most part the battles are now extremely favourable to us, we may relax our vigilance and endeavour to hide behind a cloak of optimism. We have among us too many volatile analysts and amateur strategists, if I may so describe them, who may endeavour to convince us that all is well, that the crisis is past, and that we may now relax. We have been told that the war will be long, that it will be bitter and bloody. I am satisfied that we should look upon the conflict in the light of the fact that it will still be longer, that it will still be much more bitter than it has been in the past, and that it will also be bloodier. We have heard it stated that the price of victory is blood, sweat and tears. We have not had a great deal of that yet, but let us not be unmindful of the fact that there shall be much of it.

In the speech from the throne many words were directed to the post-war world. I do not agree with those who assert that at this time we should not concentrate any of our efforts and our energies upon consideration of and preparation for the post-war period. With regard to that part of the speech from the throne which refers to the post-war world, we find that the government intend to endeavour to provide freedom from fear and want. They intend, so they assert, to provide insurance against the inevitable consequences of major economic and social hazards. I may be unduly pessimistic—if I am, I am not alone—but I must say that I see in the expressions contained in the speech from the throne only pious platitudes. I cannot believe they are anything else. I fancy they were designed to be soothing; and I am indeed satisfied that much of it will prove to be meaningless.

As I have said, I do not care to be unduly pessimistic; but all we have to do is to look back over the last ten years, when there was every opportunity to do something about providing freedom from fear and want. Nevertheless in those years we did so little. I remember all the fine phrases and meaningless expressions of those days. Therefore, when I remember that the same individuals passed out for our consideration, mainly at election time, fancy phrases which once more crop up, I cannot be assured that they are not again being used for the same purpose. I trust—and I think I am expecting too much—that there shall be clarification of the expressions contained in the speech from the throne. I should hope that we may be given something concrete, so that our faith may be bolstered, so that we may be encouraged to exert ourselves to an even greater extent in our efforts to bring to fruition the promises now handed out so freely. Unfortunately, for decades politicians have been providing us with these vague phrases which, in almost every instance, have eventually proven that they could give us nothing but economic indigestion and disillusionment. Freedom from fear and want—I wonder what that means. I wonder which hon. member of this house can rise in his place to-night and tell us what he means by the expression "freedom from fear and want", and what he proposes to do in an effort to bring about that condition. We insist, Mr. Speaker, upon the government giving us something concrete and definite with regard to the post-war measures which they have in mind.

Another matter which comes to my mind is this: Are our changes to be basic? Are we going to get right down to business and endeavour to determine what these things are that have in the past caused the deplorable conditions which have been imposed upon us? Or are we going to devote our energies toward finding palliatives, patches, if you please, in an effort to make the old system perform functions which, deep down in our hearts, we know it never can perform? I assert that there should be a commitment in this regard; I assert that if we are merely to have a few more schemes comparable with unemployment insurance, the government might just as well introduce their bill now and get the misery over with as soon as possible. It would be a waste not only of the time of this house but of the money of the Canadian people if the energies of the members of this house were to be centred upon the searching out and utilization of patches. We have had enough of that, Mr. Speaker.

Furthermore, when I try to determine to my own satisfaction just what faith I should have in the government when it comes to the laying down of a sound post-war economy, I reflect back upon some of the policies which have been so dear to them in the past. I shall refer to only one or two, and that only briefly.

First, the old age pension. I hesitate to mention that for fear I might incur the wrath of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), who, last year, when I made reference to old age pensions, chastized me because he asserted in effect that owing to my extreme youth I could not know anything about the conditions which prevailed among the old age pensioners.

Mr. DECHENE: I think the hon. member is wrong.

Mr. SHAW: That is just my hon. friend's opinion.

If the government are sincere in what they contend they are going to do or at least try to do, they could at least take a step forward and show their sincerity by immediately increasing the amount of the old age pension and lowering the age qualification. I go one step further. I say it is criminal that when the son of an old age pensioner joins the active service forces, and assigns part of his pay and secures a dependent's allowance for his parents the old age pension should be reduced accordingly. I repeat, that is criminal, and I say that without qualification.

Then, with respect to veterans' pensions. We are continually receiving letters from veterans of the first great war—yes, and my hon. friend beside me says, from veterans of the Boer war too—letters from veterans who have suffered degradation as a consequence of the reward which they received from the government of this country after they had offered their lives in its defence, and who in many instances returned to Canada maimed or otherwise impaired in health. I am not fond of quoting these cases, but I will make just a passing reference to one particular case.

It is that of a man who went overseas in the last war and fought in the mud and hell of Flanders' fields. He lost an eye and about 88 per cent of the vision in his other eye. Let me pause to ask you, Mr. Speaker, what would you part with an eye for? Or 88 per cent of the vision of the other eye? I dare say you would place a fancy price upon it. But what do we do about the other fellow? Here is this fellow given a pension of $20 a month. Then, because he took over a rural post office that pays him about $100 a year, less a ten per cent compulsory deduction for war savings, and because he raised $78 worth of grain and had one or two pigs to eat the slop, if I may use that term, the government officials came along, surveyed the situation and declared that his pension would be reduced by $10 a month. How can we expect a government that will condone actions of that sort to do anything for the boys who return from this war? Personally I cannot be led to believe that much can be expected. Mind you—all hon. members know it, I do not have to tell them—the case I have cited is only one case out of scores and scores and hundreds. As an indication of our good faith let us wipe these cases off the books and, if it takes $100 a month to provide the necessities of life, let us say to these men: "We will give you $100 a month, and we will not send a government official to peek around the corner of your barn to see whether there are ten or eight little pigs in that new litter."

How about the men who are returning from overseas now? I have a placard; I have not it with me to-night but I carry it with me very frequently, which is about the size of this sheet I hold in my hand. It is divided into two sections. In one section it sets forth all the advantages that accrue to the boys who will don his majesty's uniform. It gives the rates of pay for the various ranks. Then it gives the dollar value of the hospitalization services, the medical services and the dental services which he may expect. All that is set out in detail. Then it shows the dependents' allowance and the separation allowance, and it is a glorious thing when it is all added up in a corner of the placard. It just makes the fellow wonder why the government told him a few years ago that they could not afford to pay him more than twenty cents a day in a relief camp. Then in the other section are listed the advantages that accrue to the man upon his discharge, and they look beautiful too, especially when nailed on the telephone poles on every corner of my town. But it is not what the government promise that I am concerned about. What I am concerned about is what they do for the boys who are coming back now every day.

There is in my town a man who spent almost two and a half years overseas in this war. While on manoeuvres he was involved in an accident in an army lorry. His chest was crushed; his collar-bone was broken, and his arm was fractured. He came back to this country after being in hospital overseas for several months. He was discharged upon reaching this country. He appeared before a medical board and they assessed the damages which he had suffered. I might digress at this moment to give expression to my thoughts with respect to some of the boards, but I will try to curb my emotions at this time and refrain. This man, who cannot to-day carry on work, is receiving the noble sum of $7.50 a month; and he had to fight for that. The government cannot fool the people of my town, even though it used to be a Liberal town, when things like that are happening all the time. That means more than what appears on these papers. Let us show these boys that our statements are more than pious platitudes, more than surges of emotion that are here to-day and gone to-morrow. Let us prove through our actions that we are sincere in what we said about the things we are going to do for these boys who are fighting that our country may be preserved. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) tells me not to forget the girls who are in uniform too. What I say about the men applies also to the girls in the service.

What the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said this afternoon with respect to agriculture did not fool me one iota, nor did it cause me to change my notes a fraction. Black is black to me regardless of who may contend that it is otherwise. We live back in those constituencies; we know what those farmers are confronted with, and it does not take a Minister of Agriculture or anybody else to tell us what those conditions are. To-day agriculture in western Canada is in a wild state of confusion, and I find it difficult to imagine that after this war, when all available foodstuffs will be required to assist the people of the depressed countries, out of the confused agriculture of to-day there can then emerge a stabilized agriculture.

In my own constituency, of which I speak because it is the district with which I am most familiar, approximately sixty per cent of our threshing could not be done last fall. I am not minimizing the fact that we had an unusually bad fall, but at the same time I am not overlooking the fact that farmers in my constituency do not operate threshing rigs with two teams in place of six or eight just because they like to do so. Sixty per cent of our coarse grains and our wheat are either under the snow in the stooks or in swaths on the ground. The farmers in my constituency are mixed farmers, or, to use a more dignified expression, they carry on a diversified type of farming. They have encountered almost unbearable difficulties as a result of the acute shortage of feed for their live stock. I wish I could have the Minister of Agriculture in my constituency and take him for a drive.

An hon. MEMBER: Take him for a ride.

Mr. SHAW: "Take him for a ride," my hon. friend says. I will refrain from commenting on that.

The day before I left my home town to come to Ottawa I met a certain lady. I did not go out searching for her; I had not known her before that day; but she was introduced to me as one who had encountered great difficulty on account of the shortage of man-power. This lady is forty-six years of age; she lives with her eighty year old mother on a thousand acre farm not far from the town of Innisfail. I do not say that all of the thousand acres are under cultivation, but a large part of the farm is cultivated. They have sixteen milk cows which they milk morning and night; they have 100 hogs, they have 200 sheep. Last fall, after they had put in their own crop in the spring, they were obliged to cut and stook it. Unfortunately they did not get it threshed. Shortly before I met this lady she had purchased 2,000 bushels of coarse grain for the hogs, and she had shovelled all of it herself, both on to the wagon and off it after it was hauled to her place. That is but one case; I did not search for a glaring example of what we are up against.

The man-power shortage is attributable to these facts. A very great number of young men from my constituency have joined the active service. As I stated before, I reside in a town of approximately 1,200 people, and from that town and the immediate vicinity 430 men have enlisted. On top of that, the government exercised the authority vested in them under the National Resources Mobilization Act and drafted a number of men. Speaking with respect to the draftees, and the difficulties which we have encountered in connection with our agricultural problem as a consequence, I should like to refer to the letter which the Minister of Agriculture read this afternoon. To me that is one more headache, for two reasons. First, there is still too much of an indefinite nature about that letter; and second, there should be a postscript, "Please read this when you get it." I am satisfied that many of the officials whom we have in the selective service offices are in a mild state of confusion—or probably it is not so mild—on account of the fact that the instructions they receive can be interpreted in so many ways, and because, in many instances, that hard-boiled officialdom has cropped up again. Talk about an instruction such as this:

> Applications for leave should be invited from agricultural workers engaged in alternate work service, and such applications should be given favourable consideration.

To me that is bosh, in view of the experiences we have had. We have sent men to the selective service offices; we have begged for postponements because we knew definitely that they were urgently required, and we could not get them. There should be a clear-cut, definite and immediate investigation into the operation of the selective service offices. I got just beyond the point I wanted to cover, but these are the facts which I wished to place definitely and clearly before the house.

Unless our old age pension question is settled, and settled forthwith; unless we have these necessary revisions in the veterans' allowances and so forth, applicable to men of the last war as well as to those sent home during this war, and until such time as we have a clear-cut and definite man-power policy in this country, so that our agricultural industry will not flounder and ultimately fail—until we give consideration to these matters and thus prove our sincerity, we have no business talking about promises, the glowing promises of a grand, new post-war order.

There is another matter about which I should like to speak, because I believe that in this regard we encountered difficulties in my part of the country far more serious than those in other parts. I refer to the acute fuel shortage during this winter. I fancy that some hon. members have read in the press that in the city of Red Deer we were burning our fences and so forth. I know it is all right for someone to rise in his place and say that arrangements were made with the bank so that we could purchase fuel in advance; but do not forget—I learned this from actual experience—that if you did not need the money you could get it to buy coal, and if you did need it you could not. We were cautioned to put in our coal in advance. Many of us—and I had the experience myself—ordered our coal early in the summer and could never get it. We got small quantities, but we did not get enough. In view of the acute fuel shortage we should, as I have asked in a resolution which appears on the order paper, immediately take such steps as are necessary to develop the undeveloped fuel resources of the country and to arrange for the proper distribution of those fuel resources.

We speak about miners and we often criticize the miners; but if you say to the coal-miners in our part of the country, "We will give you employment throughout the year; we are going to put aside reserves of fuel," you will get 100 per cent cooperation. But what they object to is being laid off this week and working day and night next week. Now is the time to examine into that fuel problem. We cooperated last year out there, but our problem existed just the same. Therefore now is the time to give most careful consideration to that matter.

And now one or two of my own observations with respect to the post-war order. It is imperative that we should cast aside certain prejudices which many of us have and assert that we shall examine carefully into every proposal that is advanced which might be of assistance to us in determining this post-war order. If members of the government sitting on the other side of the house stay there, or sit in the committee that is to be set up, and say repeatedly, "We want nothing of you, or we want nothing of this group or of that group", then you are beaten before you ever get started.

Surely out of every proposal there must be something worth while, and when I refer to the proposals which we have so frequently advanced in this house as social crediters, I should like to remind hon. members of three or four, or even half a dozen of those proposals, which have been made use of in the present war thus far, not all of them by this government. In the first place, I well recall that on December 18, 1940, the President of the United States, in discussing the requirements of the various allied countries, asserted that if we were to wait for those countries to get themselves into the position where they might be able immediately to compensate us for what we sent them, then they would suffer defeat. Therefore he used this expression: Cut out the financial nonsense. That is one of the things we must remember in our post-war reconstruction. If the United States had not cut out the financial nonsense, where would the products of your lease-lend agreement come from? Second, I know that when the submarine blockade during recent months threatened the British isles, to the extent that it appeared as though their food supplies might be cut off, through low cost credits the United States government assisted the agriculturists of the British isles to boost their production to the point where to-day we are told they are practically able to provide seventy-five per cent of their own foodstuffs.

The point I wish to bring out there is that there was a demand for the production of foodstuffs. No antiquated financial system was permitted to impede the farmers of the British isles in producing the maximum quantities of foodstuffs. I know, too, that it was not long ago that the financial requirements in Great Britain reached the colossal sum of £12,000,000 a day, and they were suffering acute difficulties in an effort to acquire the amounts necessary under the accepted orthodox method of financing. It immediately became necessary for the treasury of the British government and the Bank of England to get their heads together and say, "These are our requirements and we will so adjust our financial policy to make them possible." And they have done it.

In the next place, we encountered this situation in Canada only recently—rationing by coupons. Does not that open one's eyes to this extent, that if, through a system of rationing or whatever anyone may wish to call it, we can distribute the so-called scarcities of foodstuffs in war time, we can adopt some similar proposal to distribute the surpluses of peace time? I say it opens one's eyes. It should. Again, we had recent reductions in the prices of certain commodities—two cents a quart on milk for example, the very thing we have advocated, namely, the reducing of the price of the commodity to the ultimate consumer.

We are not completely satisfied with the sources of revenue used for the purpose of reducing that price, but the producers were subsidized and the consumers obtained the commodity at a lower cost than prior to that time. And last but not least—I hesitate to mention this because, as sure as anything, someone is going to grasp it and endeavour to twist it out of shape so that no one will recognize it—in 1933 Germany was financially bankrupt in the eyes of the world, but between 1933 and 1939 she built a colossal war machine without going out of Germany to get the money to do so. We have reason to believe that national credit was used to a very large extent for that purpose. In fact I have a letter signed by the governor of the Bank of Canada—he did not send it to me, but I saw it—in which he asserted the same thing.

I do not propose to transgress much further upon the time of the house, but I do wish to say I believe, as do many other hon. members, that there is danger in the scores and scores and scores of boards and controllers and so on that have come into existence in this country. I am not so much concerned about them as I am about the authority that the government of this country has vested in them. To-day it is getting to be that when I write from my home to a minister he refers it to a controller and the controller answers me. The minister as much as asserts that the responsibility has passed out of his hands and that controller So-and-so has it. Many of the regulations that we have to-day are not written in the laws of this parliament; they are not written by men chosen and known by the people of this country, but rather they are written in office dungeons by anonymous experts, so-called. The time has come when we should put a stop to this practice, even though we do admit that in war time certain extraordinary powers must be vested in a government.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak on a subject that is rather novel here, namely, the working of parliament, a subject that should interest us, because nothing is more interesting than the work we do.

Last session, on two or three occasions a number of hon. members referred to the working of parliament and made suggestions that something should be done to gear up parliament so as to make it a more effective instrument for helping the country and directing its efforts in the war. On May 26 last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had this to say:

> In my judgment parliament is more and more on trial at the bar of public opinion. There is something wrong with this House of Commons. I am not reflecting on the house, and I do not know what is the cause. But there is something wrong with it.

Since then, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has proposed that it is time that we change the rules of the house, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) doubted whether this was a suitable time to do so. Meanwhile hon. members and the people are making two sets of comments about parliament. One is that parliament just talks; the other is that parliament is a rubber stamp, that its members are not independent enough. I ask hon. members how they would like to have the house full of some of our most independent members. I will not name them, but let hon. members think of them for themselves. We must have parties in order to organize opinion, or we would have a totally different system from the one in which we want to work.

Some of the criticism about the House of Commons and its working is just misinformed, and some of it probably is on account of the fact that some people are disappointed because some supporters of the government did not turn upon the government and turn it out. Other comment on the working of parliament results from the feeling that there is room for improvement and that we can do something about it so as to make parliament the great forum of the nation and a better expression of the national will.

I would suggest—and here I think all hon. members will agree with me—that there is no more certain way of weakening parliament than to sneer at it and its workings. We can all try to improve it, but there is no point whatever in just saying, What is the good of it?

If there is one answer to be made to the criticisms so far made about parliament it is that nobody seems to have studied and expressed why it is defective, if it is defective; what can be done to change it, what should be done, and when. So far we have not had a debate on the subject, because there is no way under the rules to have a debate relating exclusively to this subject.

It is not my suggestion that the rules should be substantially altered. My view is that the rules are all right for the most part, but that changes should be made in the way in which we work the rules and that this will effect all the reforms that anyone would want to make. As I go along I propose to compare our procedure with the procedure in the British house. I do that for this reason, that the British people have had a very long experience of the workings of parliament, including a great deal of experience with the working of parliament in crises. Quite properly we regard the parliament at Westminster as the mother of parliaments, and the working of that parliament throughout the trials of this war has been one of the reasons why the whole world admires the British people. But I do not say that we should copy it in everything.

If time permitted, I should like to examine some of the rules of the congress in the United States and the parliaments of other members of the British commonwealth. I suggest that we can learn from the experience of other parliamentary bodies, and at the same time that we have a great deal in Canada that is better than is found anywhere else. But I do hope that hon. members will agree that if there is room for improvement we should try to make the improvement.

Please do not think I am setting up as an expert in parliamentary procedure. I recognize my own inexperience and limitations in that regard. It just happens that I have been interested in the subject, as other hon. members are; I have discussed it with older members and members of other parliaments whom I have known, and have read something about it.

The point at which I begin is this, that the rules, the procedure of parliament here and everywhere else were primarily designed for the passage of legislation. If one studies the matter and looks through the rules, one sees that they are designed to promote the enactment of legislation. Parliament is a legislative body; that was its primary function. But when we get into a state of war or meet the developments that have occurred in the last few years we find that the functions of parliament have changed. To-day parliament does not spend much of its time in enacting legislation, considering bills and passing them; it is the executive, the cabinet, which makes most of the laws, and of necessity it must be done in large measure by the executive. To-day the main function of parliament is to support and control the executive and to conduct a kind of government by discussion, so as to keep the executive continuously responsible through parliament to the people, and also to keep the executive efficient and give it every support that we can. My submission is that the practice we have continued to follow in Canada is the practice that is adapted for the purpose of passing legislation, while in Great Britain the parliament at Westminster, under exactly the same rules, has adapted a practice which is more suitable to the changed conditions of the times.

May I illustrate that. Since this debate commenced we have had some six or seven days discussion on the address; and as everyone knows, this is a general debate. Let me take just a single day, February 4, and look through the discussion that took place on that occasion. On that day different members spoke about food control, social security, women's war work, the officials of the wartime prices and trade board making speeches, nutrition, wooden ships, the Japanese in Canada, fuel shortage in British Columbia, food control, farm labour, social security, farm income, man-power, fuel shortage, reinforcements, redistribution, national income, pensions, post-war developments, production and employment, farm prices, post-war, food, farm prices, farm labour, social insurance, farm labour and labour. Similarly we could go through any general debate that occurs in the house, either this debate or the budget debate, and see subject after subject touched upon by one speaker and then perhaps left for three or four days before being taken up by another. That also has been illustrated to-night. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) who preceded me did not follow the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), and as yet I have not followed either of those two hon gentlemen in their remarks.

The point I make is that in a general debate of this kind there is no possibility of having consecutive discussion relating to a specific point. I suggest that there are ways and means of having that. What I have just said about general debates of this kind is perhaps even better illustrated by what happens in connection with the war appropriation bills. It will be remembered that in 1940 we had a general debate on the war appropriation bills and the conduct of the war. Throughout that entire debate the members of the cabinet, almost without exception, were continually in their seats, wasting their time—which is more valuable than the time of anyone else in this house or this country—in listening to that discussion, a great part of which did not concern them. In 1941 we spent some thirty-six days in that debate, covering about 805 pages of Hansard, and I believe I mentioned once before that the then leader of the opposition had no less than 954 separate innings. At the same time in the British house they were voting ten times as much money by a similar though not the same procedure. The debate in the British house covered forty pages of their Hansard and was completed in three days. In closing the debate the chancellor of the exchequer made a speech consisting of five sentences, of which I will quote the last three:

> I think only one direct question was put to me in the course of the debate. It was directed to ascertain my estimate of the revenue we expect during the coming year. I am sorry that I cannot give that information.

On the conclusion of that sentence he sat down, completing his answer to the discussion that had gone on. That was his only contribution to the debate, apart from his opening speech. Contrast that with the ordeal through which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had to go, sitting here day after day answering thousands of questions, then stepping right from the war appropriation bills into the budget debate and doing precisely the same thing.

In 1942, the session just concluded, the practice was extended of dividing up the debate and taking the service departments one at a time. I think all hon. members will agree that was a great step forward. All that I suggest is that this practice be carried two or three steps further forward. At the end of that debate in 1942, after we had spent twenty-nine days in a general discussion of the conduct of the war, the Minister of Finance made available a general break-down of the expenditures of a great number of departments, and for the last six days of the debate the discussion was related to that break-down. From that time on, the discussion was closely directed to the specific points set out therein, and we made very much better progress.

My suggestion is that in view of the tremendous burden which is placed upon the government and upon parliament, in view of the changed functions of government as a result of the wide extension of the whole realm of governmental activities, there is no way in which the deliberations of parliament can be carried on effectively unless they are organized and controlled. I suggest that the time has come when this house should direct the government to assume the responsibility of allocating time to debate, day by day, and indicating precisely what subjects will be discussed and how long will be spent on them. Such a practice requires no change in the rules of the house. It requires acquiescence on the part of members of the house; it requires that they should discipline themselves and cooperate with the government in seeing how best we can do the work of this house, to make it the most effective instrument for carrying out the national will. In Great Britain, again, that is actually done to-day. It has been done for a great number of years, and it is done under precisely the same rule that we have in Canada; namely, the order providing for closure. There is no provision in the British standing orders or rules for the allocation of time by the government. It is all done because the government has the power of closure if it desires to use it. Out of that comes the power of the government, acquiesced in by the other members, to arrange the time of the house; and of course in doing so the government consults with the Speaker and with the whips of the other parties.

I suggest that we might well look to the government and ask it to begin—not too rigorously at first—to proceed in this way when we come to the war appropriation bills which will come up for discussion within the next few days. In the United Kingdom they finished in December the debate on the address, corresponding to the debate now going on here. For that debate the government had allocated eleven days. Of those eleven days six were spent in general debate; five were devoted to private members' amendments, which is a very interesting development there. The total number of British Hansard pages devoted to the general debate was 185, and of the six days allocated to that debate the greater part of two were spent in secret session. But then, having finished the general debate in six days, they went on to discuss a number of amendments which had been suggested by private members in order to concentrate discussion on specific points that were of general interest. Those amendments were selected by Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the various parties, as being the amendments which would concentrate the discussion on specific points, one at a time. I have in my hand copies of the British Hansard for the period I have mentioned, and when I come to No. 7 of the current session, for November 25, I see the first amendment that came up. It has to do with war injuries compensation. Then on the next day the next amendment came up, and they had a discussion on colonial development, a matter of great public concern in Great Britain and elsewhere throughout the world. Then on the third occasion they had a debate on reconstruction. That debate continued for two days, and during its course the paymaster general, Sir William Jowitt, who has charge of coordinating British work on reconstruction, made an extensive report to the house and to the country through the house, as to what was being done on that very important question.

If, however, the government is to have vested in it by the acquiescence of the house, or through the use or threat of closure, if necessary, the power to allocate the time of the house, and to designate specific subjects, then of course as a corollary the government must give opportunities for the discussion of subjects of general interest, and create such opportunities from time to time as occasion arises. In that connection I suggest that now there are one or two subjects of utmost importance to all of us, and with respect to which many of us would like to hear discussions, and would like to know what is happening. I refer first to the general international situation, and then to the particular development of defence arrangements in Canada, having regard to our very close and, I am glad to say, cordial and effective arrangements for the defence of this continent, in conjunction with the United States. Those are two subjects upon which the house should concentrate its attention for at least a day. I should hope very much that at some time in the future the government may be in a position to allow that.

In England, as we know, one of the most interesting, characteristic and distinguishing features of the British parliamentary system is the question period. Every day, according to the rules, from 2.45 to 3.45 p.m. there is a full sixty minutes of questioning. Questions are placed on the order paper the day before. Those for which oral answers are desired are marked with an asterisk. Each day from 150 to 200 questions are asked and answered. Very few of those questions are designed to get information. They are all designed to bring to the attention of the government a point of view or a grievance; and the form of the question is quite different from the form we follow.

I have chosen a question at random, and I find that it reads:

> Sir W. Smithers asked the parliamentary secretary to the ministry of food what position Mr. Calder holds in his ministry; and what were Mr. Calder's connections with bacon factories previous to his appointment. . . .
> Sir W. Smithers: Will the minister take steps to dissipate the idea . . .

And so on. The under-secretary makes reply. Then, the next question:

> Mr. Thorne asked the parliamentary secretary to the ministry of food whether he will have some of the bread made of flour, oats and barley put in the tea room?

Not only have they questions, but supplementary questions are also allowed, within reasonable limits. As I say, very few of these questions are submitted for the purpose of getting information. They are designed to bring forward a point of view briefly and quickly, and that point of view registers for what it is worth. Often when this is done it obviates the necessity of putting the point in a more formal way in debate in the house.

Supplementing questions is the adjournment debate. It is quite a different matter from our procedure to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. The parliament at Westminster has that procedure, too. However, we have not anything like the debate on the adjournment. This is a procedure whereby any member who is dissatisfied with the reply of a minister says, "I give notice that I will raise that on the adjournment," or else he gives notice without having a question. Then, the government may occasionally raise a debate on the adjournment. The whips get together and arrange that within a day or two when the normal time for the adjournment of the house takes place, opportunity will be given for a member to state his case. Two or three members may join in, if there is time, and the minister or under-secretary will reply, the matter thereby being disposed of when it is hot, and when there is still interest in it. That is the last that is heard about it. However, it has the result of releasing the subject at once, ventilating it and securing the attention of parliament, the country, and the minister. It also supplements the very effective method of interrogating the government by way of questions.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Almost every day there are adjournment debates. Even during the period I have mentioned, at the beginning of the last session of the house when the debate on the address was in progress they had, on the second day, a debate on estate duties; on the third day a debate on the situation and status of Prince Paul and Princess Olga of Yugoslavia; on the fourth day a general debate on the business of the house; on the seventh day a debate on Royal Observer Corps centres; on the eighth day a debate on essential work order; on the ninth day a debate on the weaving mill at Tayport; on the tenth day a debate on a Royal Air Force, airmen's application; and on the eleventh day a debate on civil service pensions.

That is in the period of the debate on the address. Almost every day opportunity is given toward the end of the sitting for about a half hour to be spent in the ventilation of some subject. Through those devices of questions and adjournment debates it is possible for private members to bring matters to the attention of the government and the people exceedingly quickly. All my conversations with members of parliament at Westminster have indicated that they regard the question period as the most important single feature in British parliamentary institutions. As we all know, we have not that kind of question period here. Our practice is to ask questions which seek information, a great deal of which is sometimes available in blue books. Such information is placed on Hansard or supplied through sessional papers as orders for returns. I think hon. members will agree with me, however, that a great part of the material asked for in our questions is of no permanent value, and might just as well be obtained by the member through direct communication with the department or the minister. With respect to these other types of questions, may I point out that a very large percentage of them are of a contentious and argumentative nature, and have the effect of stating a case.

In addition, arrangements are made in the British House of Commons for the holding of debates on special topics. During the debate on the budget, for example, it may be agreed that the second day will be spent on some specific topic, and the third day on another. In that way they break down the whole broad scope of a debate into topics which can be handled. Members may speak consecutively, and ministers or under-secretaries may reply. In those debates there is a meeting of minds and a clash of wills. At once they become much more lively and interesting, and at once there is something the people can follow. At the same time it is a debate about which the press gallery can write, with interest. It is something which can be handled and which has some meaning, because it is not scattered throughout a whole session. For instance, statements respecting reconstruction, and thoughts in line with that subject, will be recorded on one occasion. Having taken place on such an occasion they are not so likely to take place at other times. I suggest that in this way the parliament at Westminster not only secures more orderly and organized discussions, but saves the time of the ministers, who know when subjects are to be considered. At times when matters outside their interest are not under consideration, they need not be present.

Then, too, there is much more satisfaction in dealing with a subject in a manner which makes one feel that he is making some contribution, progressively. One idea, of course, leads to another. There is all the great advantage of discussion in a deliberative assembly, without the disadvantage of having a series of set speeches on different subjects, such as we are making to-night, and such as we make on other occasions when we have general debates.

We are told, of course, that the kind of thing to which I have referred should take place on the estimates. That may be so, and it may not. It depends upon the year. In 1940, the business of the house was such that we dealt on a very hot August day and night with 493 items in the estimates, totalling $191,623,349.69; that was on the second last day of the session, on August 6. In 1942, on the last day of the session, we dealt with 190 items totalling $251,974,758

Mr. MacNICOL: They were not dealt with; they were just voted.

Mr. CLAXTON: They were voted, and some of them were discussed. That was the only opportunity accorded for discussing the subject I am now discussing, the procedure in the House of Commons, because the appropriation for the House of Commons came up on that day. It is for that reason that I venture to take up the time of the house on this subject to-night, because on account of pressure of work another opportunity may not occur until very late in the session, and we know what it is to bring up a new subject in the house toward the end of the session. It would be like a little boy in class at school who does not understand a question, and who is scared to ask because he is afraid of getting the whole class kept in to hear the answer.

There are other suggestions that might be made in connection with the business of the house, but I would present for the consideration of hon. members in the government the suggestions I have made, namely, that time should be allotted to specific subjects; that they should be picked out and dealt with one at a time; that the question period should be extended and liberalized a little so that occasionally the government might commit itself on a question of future policy; that there should be adjournment debates and that debates, like the budget debate, for instance, might be divided up to provide an opportunity for the discussion of special topics. These proposals I have made could be carried out without a single change in the rules of the house. All they require is the general will of the membership of the house to put them into effect and the willingness of the government to carry them out, and I would hope that the government would be willing to do so because I can see no other way of saving the time of the government and making its work in the house easier than by means of these suggestions.

One further suggestion is in connection with committees. I think most hon. members would like to see the practice of referring matters to committees extended. I have had a very short experience in the house, only three years, but during that time I have served on some thirteen committees of which ten were active. During that time—and I know this is the experience of other hon. members—in no one of these committees was there a single vote on party lines. As soon as the members got on the committee they began to work seriously and intensely to find the best solution for the problem committed to them. If the problem was one which was suitable for study by a committee, and the committee was not too large, it invariably brought in a sensible, constructive report which was carried out by the government in every case except one.

I mention the size of a committee because it is my experience both outside the house and in, and the experience, I think, of other members, that the effectiveness of a committee decreases geometrically in proportion to the increase in its membership over fifteen. I think fifteen is the right number. It is the number fixed in the rules of the house. With a small committee of that size the members are much more conscientious; the responsibility is not diffused, and there is a much more steady attendance, a much closer discussion, and more opportunity for the members to meet in between meetings and work up material. Therefore I suggest that fifteen should be the maximum number for a committee, and I hope that this suggestion will be taken into consideration by the government when it comes to appointing a committee on social legislation.

I think it is our experience that the chairman of a committee should preferably, not be a member of the government. I have sat on committees with chairmen who were members of the government, and I must say they presided magnificently. Nobody could have presided better or with greater objectivity, but at least on one occasion it led to some embarrassment that a member of the government should have been chairman of the committee. My idea in this is that once we get a matter out of the house and before a committee we lose the atmosphere of the arena and we get into the atmosphere of the workshop, where we want to do the job as quickly, effectively and efficiently as possible. That is my experience.

I suggest that some committees need expert assistance, and I sincerely hope that the committee on social legislation is not set up without a great deal of expert assistance, similar in standing, if possible, to that provided for the royal commissions in England which ultimately resulted in the Beveridge report. It is impossible for members of a committee to give the detailed work and study and have the background and special knowledge necessary to handle a topic of that kind.

Then the committee produces a report. By that time the matter has been screened through the committee, and the discussion of its report in the house provides an opportunity for a useful short debate on the subject, in which debate usually only the members of the committee take part. It has been my experience in the last three years that these debates have been the best in the house, and I do not think any one of them has ever taken more than a day.

We all know, too, that the mere fact that a committee may look into a matter has a salutary effect upon some government departments. I believe that in time we ought to have committees of the house on different subjects to which matters would be automatically referred, such as man-power and labour, munitions and supply, agriculture, reconstruction, international affairs and information—topics like that, and not merely matters which are to be the subject of legislation.

This brings me to my next suggestion. We have heard a great deal said about government by order in council, but the people who talk against government by order in council seldom say how government should be carried on. The fact is that we have the executive taking the responsibility of using the authority we have given to it, but the people who complain of government by order in council would be the first to complain if the executive failed to use that authority. It is greatly to the credit of the government, parliament and the country that at no stage has our government failed to have the courage to use the authority it has been given. It alone of all democracies was the first to introduce effective measures to deal with the spectre of inflation. I see no other means whereby that could have been dealt with so effectively as by order in council. But we have had 25,000 orders in council, and now there is a kind of public clamour growing up against government by order in council which will grow as victory comes closer and people want to get rid of bureaucratic control, as they call it. To prevent this from growing to the point where it interferes with the conduct of the war and to preserve the supremacy of parliament, we must have some say at some stage in these orders in council, and in a great number of instances we cannot have it before. The practice of tabling orders in council is, for all practical purposes, an empty form. I suggest that orders in council be referred to a committee for consideration —not all the orders, but orders having the effect of legislation of a general nature. Even when they get to the committee, all the orders of that kind would not be discussed; but if the committee felt that one particular matter should be discussed it could take up that order, have the departmental officials there to explain it, and make its report to the house. This could be done exceedingly quickly. In this way there would be an opportunity of improving the drafting of the orders, which sometimes leaves a great deal to be desired; there would be exercise of control over the executive, opportunity for ventilating grievances, and also observance of the important principle of the supremacy of parliament. I suggest that is one way in which it could be done without any sacrifice of the speed and decisive action which are necessary in order to carry on the war.

There is some need of an appeal from orders of a punitive nature. I do not see why all the boards which have orders of that kind should not act like the wartime prices and trade board; that is, use the courts exclusively. But in other cases anyone who regards himself as aggrieved by the application of an order in his individual case should have an opportunity of appealing to some authority other than the men who made, enforced, policed and executed the order. Therefore I suggest there should be an administrative tribunal of the same character as the war contracts depreciation board or the board appointed under the Excess Profits Act. Both of these boards have done magnificent work.

There also ought to be an appeal from all orders under the national mobilization regulations. It is the only way in which uniformity throughout the country can be preserved. It is the only way in which possible injustices through the board being too rushed can be corrected or further consideration given. Accordingly I suggest that there should be an appeal from all these boards to some authority.

In conclusion, I have this to say. We live at a time much more important in the history of parliament and of our country than any other. There is no one who should occupy a more important role in the life of Canada than the members of this house. Not only do people look to us for leadership and guidance; they want everything that we can give in the way of devoted service to our country. We are willing to give it, and I believe, from what I have seen of them, the members of this house of all parties would be only too anxious that their very real sacrifices of time, health, family life, and future expectations of a financial nature should be made more valuable to the country, and that I suggest, might come about through the further consideration of some of the suggestions I have made this evening.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): A number of very fine addresses have been made in this particular debate. The speaker who just preceded me made an interesting contribution on an unusual subject, one which, of course, will have to be given great study, as he no doubt expected it would, before it can be accepted in its entirety. Nevertheless I should like to compliment the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) upon being sufficiently fresh in his viewpoint to introduce the subject and deal with it as he has done, indicating the considerable amount of study he must have given to the subject with which he dealt.

In addition, I wish to join those who have spoken before me in commending the addresses of the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is for me a happy thought that I have in my constituency a highly thought of citizen who is a lady cousin of the mover of the address. I have a sense of pride in the fact that there is at least some connection between the far-off constituency of Swift Current and that of my hon. friend who moved the address in reply. My remarks of commendation of course apply equally to the hon. and gallant member who seconded the motion.

May I also say, and I think the house will agree, that it would be well to note the value of the address delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon. Regardless of our political viewpoints we, as a former speaker pointed out, are the representatives of the different sections which go to make up Canada; and the concise and cogent information given to this house this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture makes the task of every member that much easier.

May I also, in commenting upon the addresses in this debate, pay a word of compliment to at least two members of his majesty's loyal opposition. I refer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). The one dealt with agriculture, and the other with the industrial war effort of Canada. While I do not find myself in agreement with many of the points which they made, it struck me that they were moved by a sincere desire to criticize fairly and constructively the policy of the government with regard to these two important phases of our war effort. Constructive criticism, as we all know, is a valuable adjunct of any government charged with the responsibiliy of carrying on the business of a nation.

The speech from the throne dealt with many matters of importance. The most important, of course, is the successful prosecution of the war. Anyone who read that speech or heard it at the opening of this session must have been struck with the fact that not only did it specifically express a note of confidence in our present position, as regards the war situation generally, but the very fact that the speech contained matters such as post-war reconstruction and social security indicates that there is in the minds of those who advised his majesty in the drafting of that speech a certain measure of confidence which will be heartening not only to the members of this house but also to the people of this country.

It is easy, too, to realize the truth of the statement that we can take pride in the progress which has been made in the successful prosecution of this war. It is only necessary to think back to the perilous days of Dunkirk, and to the time when we sat in this house and received the news of the fall of France, and compare the situation then with what it is to-day, to realize that progress has been real and substantial, and we can take pride in the immense advance which has been made upon the road to victory.

Canada's war effort is becoming more and more a matter of great pride to all Canadians. That war effort is not the result of accident; it is of course the result of a sustained and well planned programme of contribution to the common cause of the united nations. I believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government who have led the country in that effort can be justly credited with a great deal in so far succeeding as they have done in making Canada's contribution something of which we can all be proud. Not only that, but I say to members on this side of the house that those of us who saw fit to support the Prime Minister in the rather trying days of last session and the session before can all take a great deal of pride in recognizing that his aims and objects were dictated by wisdom, and in giving him that loyal support which enabled him to put that programme into effect.

I agree, however, with the note of caution expressed by the Prime Minister when speaking in this debate, that the measure of success which we have realized is only a warning to us of the path we must follow in order to achieve victory. We, in a democracy, of course hate war so intensely, and it is so foreign to our whole philosophy of life to believe that other peoples would use war as an instrument of aggrandizement, that we welcome any sign of approaching victory and the time when we can turn back to the peaceful pursuits that so suit our philosophy of life. Yet we would be foolish indeed if we did not recognize the immense task that lies ahead of us. I read in a National magazine recently of the forces that Japan still has at its disposal to fight the battle in which we are engaged with that country at the present time, and they are still a great menace. She occupies vast territories that have so widened her economy that she faces want in one or two items only. She is immensely strong in man-power, immensely strong in ships, immensely strong in the strategic position she succeeded in securing for herself by her treacherous attack prior to the outbreak of war between herself and the United States. We must recall, too, that Germany is still mighty in her military strength, the accumulation of many generations of that race that seems so far to have been bent on world domination. As Germany is forced back on her own central home front, she solves many of her communication problems, and this leaves her with a freedom of action in defence, which we must overcome before victory can be ours. So that never for a moment, either in our hearts or in our minds, should we permit the feeling of optimism, or of confidence even that pervades Canada at the present time, to weaken us in any way in the determination to see to it that Canada's material, physical and human resources shall continue to be used for the purpose we have before us, which is to defeat those forces of evil that so violently and disgracefully attacked the democracies.

May I also point this out. I think it is something we should note, those of us who by the nature of our position take a great interest in the political life, not only of this country, but of other countries as well, that in the commencement of the fourth year of the war the great democracies, Great Britain, the United States, Canada and the other component parts of the British commonwealth of nations, can feel that democracy, with all its apparent faults, has stood the test in the hour of trial, and that democracy is the democracy we have always known—a democracy of free parliaments, a free press, freedom of worship, freedom of speech, freedom in the expression of the opinons we see fit to utter so long as they do not offend the rights of our fellow men. It is a great thing to keep that in mind when discussing the relative merits of this or that kind of governing system. In the last analysis, these free democracies are standing the test, and we are all of the profound belief at this moment that ultimately they will achieve victory over the totalitarian states.

In passing, I would call the attention of those who advocate a planned economy, or the setting up of government whose control is vested in a group of experts to deal with the lives and the welfare of our people, to the importance of always keeping in mind that, despite the fact that Hitler has had many men of brains and capacity, sometimes regarded as supermen in Germany, and having devoted all the talents of that country to the planning of success in this war venture of his for world domination, nevertheless he and all his cohorts and experts will fail in the task to which they have set themselves. The same is true of Mussolini and Italy. So that I think the nature of the progress we have made should strengthen our belief in democracy as we have known it, and we should not hastily or lightly cast aside a system that has brought us the results it has during this war period.

It is true that our democracy has certain weaknesses. It is inclined to be hesitant in coming to a decision; it is inclined to engage in controversy to too great an extent; it is inclined to an inability to gird up its loins to exert its maximum war effort. Yet these weaknesses are the corollary of free institutions, and I am not afraid to say that the expression of these weaknesses in war time will become the very strength and bulwark of the free institutions of democracy in the times which we so much desire that lie ahead.

There were one or two matters that arose either in the speech from the throne or during the discussions in this house of peculiar interest to me as coming from Saskatchewan. One was the suggestion, in fact the declaration of intention, that a redistribution of seats in this house should occur at this particular session. I add my voice to those from western Canada who suggest to the government that it would be extremely unfair at this time in Canada's history to propose that Saskatchewan, the third largest province in the dominion in point of population, and its neighbouring province of Manitoba, should find, largely as a result of the war effort and the transfer of people from the prairies to the industrialized sections of Canada, that they are penalized for making that contribution by losing, for a period of at least ten years, the number of representatives they have heretofore had in the house of commons. I am sure hon. members will agree that no other part of Canada has the troubles which have beset western Canada, struggling to construct an economy that will support itself, or deserves more the fullest measure of sympathy in this house which can be given it. I therefore strongly urge on the government and the members of this house, who in the last analysis will have the decision in the matter, that they exercise generosity in recognizing the cause of the shifting population from Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and that in any redistribution measure which may be introduced, the effect of that legislation will be deferred until 1953, or for a considerable period after the cessation of the war, so that we can then see whether the movement from those provinces has been temporary or permanent.

There is also the other matter that is constantly raised, without any fruitful results, I am sorry to say, namely, the concentration of Canada's industrial life in the two central provinces. I for one have always recognized and forgiven, if that is the proper word, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), having regard to the immense task with which he was presented during the early period of the war, in procuring the great amount of material that was required at once for Canada at war. I did not blame him much, that, on account of the necessity with which we were faced, in the early days of the war he seized upon plants that were already in existence and transformed them into the arsenals of munitions and supply that we so urgently required. Since then, however, there has been a great change. We have had time, and we have time at present, to consider the larger question, the result of the great concentration of industrial activity in the central provinces and the failure of Canada as a whole to remove one of the constant points of irritation in confederation, and to see to it that decentralization takes place where it is wise and proper, and in that way balance the economy of the outlying portions of Canada to a greater extent than has been done hitherto. I believe that if we continue now on the path we have been following we shall continue on it in peace time as well. The fact that the plant, equipment, management and all the essentials are there will be used to justify the continuance of the use of those properties.

Hon. members know as well as I do that we have been seeking ways to use our surplus of wheat. I was told by one who ought to know that the United States government is spending immense sums of money and employing a large group of highly trained people to look into ways and means of using cereal crops for the manufacture of industrial products. For industrial alcohol, synthetic rubber and similar products we have in western Canada not only immense quantities of materials but immense potential capacity to produce those materials. We would thus be serving the best interests of western Canada and, indeed, of the whole of Canada if we could, to some extent at least, break up this concentration of industrial life in the two central provinces, which concentration sooner or later will cause serious trouble. We can do it wisely, and the whole of Canada will profit.

In listening to the different problems that were brought to the attention of the house during this debate, I naturally followed with great interest the speech delivered by the new leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon). I join with others in congratulating the Progressive Conservative party upon the choice of him as their acting house leader. I did, however, note that in putting upon Hansard most of the party's platform adopted at Winnipeg he did not include in the apparently important sections of that programme the resolution which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) succeeded in having passed at that convention and which had to do with the price of wheat. I am afraid that this was a child whose desirability was questioned at that convention.

I noticed also a suggestion that appeared in the Ottawa Journal and was mentioned by some hon. members in this debate, namely, that the selection of the new name—to which I have no objection—need cause no comment, because Sir John A. Macdonald once used the same name to describe the historic party of which he was the head. But may I point out that those who use that argument rob the Winnipeg convention programme of much of its freshness and the hope that it and the Port Hope meeting inspired in the minds of the people that the addition of the word "Progressive" meant a decided change in the policy of the old Conservative party. The argument lends strength to the suggestion that this is merely a revival of the old party with a new name but with no real change in its policies. I say to the members of that party that I hope Mr. Bracken will be able to persuade the members of the party that the programme is a worth-while programme, one that he in western Canada has always supported with regard to freer trade and a freer economy in this country. I shall be happy indeed—I say this quite sincerely—if members of the Progressive Conservative party in this house will declare their intention of accepting whole-heartedly the new programme now adopted by the party as expressed in its Winnipeg platform and make vigorous speeches in this house in favour of free trade and a freer economy. I for one will welcome to my side at least and to the side of a great many hon. members on this side of the house any support that hon. members can give to that wise and beneficent policy that we have so long advocated.

Also I could not help noticing that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, suggested that the speech from the throne was merely a series of pious platitudes. He will not mind if I say to him that I listened with considerable interest to his radio address a couple of weeks ago and noted the fine manner of its delivery to the public of Canada. Nevertheless let me say to him that his address dealt only with generalities. The comment of a friend of mine next morning who said he had listened to the hon. member's address was that he had come to the conclusion that there were not many Canadian soldiers in Libya. I asked him why. He said, "Well, because if there had been Mr. Coldwell would undoubtedly have promised them ice and air conditioning". There is an element of truth in that statement.

I have listened to thousands of expressions of opinion as to what should be done in this country, and almost without exception what one gets is a statement of a problem, phrased in varying language but still simply a statement of the problem; seldom is there any concrete suggestion as to how a solution of the problem can be achieved. The only time in his speech in this debate that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar became specific is worthy of note. I draw this particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who suggested that in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation programme there is no suggestion whatever of state socialism or statism or concentration of power in the state as opposed to the present system of government. The specific contribution made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was the suggestion that we appoint a representative committee. He stressed that point, that it be truly representative. How it could be formed to the satisfaction of my hon. friend is a matter that would have to be decided. Nevertheless the suggestion was that we appoint such a committee to consider ways and means of carrying out a reconstruction or rehabilitation programme, and that this House of Commons, representative of the free people of Canada, should without question, or without discussion—I take it that was meant—immediatley undertake, without examination of the proposals, in two years to vote five billion dollars to that committee and allow it to expend that money in the manner it suggested.

Mr. COLDWELL: A representative committee instead of a non-representative one, and report to this parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: To me that is the very essence of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation programme, and I suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that he note that the only concrete and specific recommendation, in which social security is mentioned, made by the leader of his party during this debate, is the suggestion that this parliament voluntarily give up its position as trustee for the people of Canada in connection with the expenditure of money; that not only do we turn over to someone else the task of preparing a programme, but that we undertake not to spend any time in examining into or discussing their proposal, and that we give them this amount of five billion dollars to spend in a given period of time.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, I have the hon. member's speech before me.

Mr. MacINNIS: Parliament does not give up its trusteeship when it votes money for the carrying on of the war.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I say, to me the suggestion to which I have referred is a denial of the democracy I took the time to praise a few moments ago. As the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) said the other night, it would mean the securing of social security at the cost of our individual liberty, to which I think no sane member of this house would agree. May I say, too, in all fairness to the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party that considering the task with which this country will be faced after the war is over; considering that some eight hundred thousand men will be coming back to our shores—at least we hope so—whom we shall have to place back in civil life in a reasonably prosperous condition; considering the dislocation that will occur in our industrial life, our farming life and, in fact, every phase of Canadian life as a result of this prolonged struggle, would any sane person suggest that in addition at this moment, or between now and the cessation of war, we should agree to revolutionize suddenly the whole system of democratic government under which we have lived and under which we shall succeed in winning this war? Would anyone suggest that in addition to the problems which we shall have to face then, we should add the further problem of the dislocation that would result from any such change, even if that change were meritorious and justified?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Certainly we shall have dislocation if we do nothing.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suggest that democracy can undertake the task of building upon what we have learned in the past, using the wisdom we may acquire during this war, to see to it that our problems are wisely met and our difficulties minimized to the greatest possible extent during the period of dislocation, reestablishment and reconstruction through which we must pass.

I now turn to the subject that really caused me to take part in this debate, one in which I take a great interest. I refer to the question of social security. As I have already stated, most of the contributions offered so far in the editorial columns of the newspapers and in speeches from different individuals have consisted of statements of the problem itself, statements of what we must face. Seldom is there any concrete, wise suggestion offered as to how social security may be achieved. Together with a great many members of this house I was very much interested in the fact that in England a commission headed by Sir William Beveridge, an economist of whom I happen to be a great admirer, brought forth what is now known as the Beveridge report, which, of course, as he has stated is only a suggestion for a solution of a certain phase of the social security problem. At least it is a concrete contribution, and I for one have greatly appreciated the opportunity of reading the result of the work of Sir William Beveridge and those associated with him in that task. Naturally his report applies peculiarly to industrialized Great Britain. I believe it is founded upon Liberal principles, according to my understanding of Liberalism. I believe members of this house and the people of this country would be well repaid if they carefully studied that report in order to ascertain the value of any ideas therein contained which might be beneficially applied in this dominion. However, I think I should say this, in connection with the whole programme for social security, that in our desire to bring about that result we must not assume that it will come simply because we are united in that desire.

On motion of Mr. Graham the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 10, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LUMBER INDUSTRY—EXIT PERMITS ISSUED TO CANADIANS TO CUT TIMBER IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): There have been references in the press with respect to the number of Canadians crossing into the United States to work in lumber camps. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) raised the question during his address on the debate last evening. For that reason I should like to make the following statement.

In normal times a considerable number of men from Quebec and New Brunswick living along the American border have crossed into the United States each winter to work in the woods. Exact figures are not available, but it seems probable that in some years up to 20,000 men engaged in this movement. In the winter of 1941 and 1942 some measure of control was introduced and the number crossing the border was limited to approximately 7,200.

The first arrangement between the governments of Canada and the United States was that this season approximately 3,700 would be allowed to cross to the United States for this purpose. There were 3,870 Canadians in the United States on permits to work in the woods in New England and northern New York during the present winter, as at January 16, 1943, the border then having been closed for new entrants for this purpose. The limit of 3,700 men was never quite maintained. Late in 1942 some Canadian firms cutting logs in the United States for Canada asked permission to engage about 200 additional men. The government agreed to the allotment of these men to the Canadian firms; under this arrangement 256 men were permitted to depart.

Subsequently the war man-power commission of the United States urged that 2,250 additional men be authorized to cross the border, and a special representative of the commission came to Ottawa in December to support the request. He stressed American-Canadian relations in a total allied war effort. As a result, it was finally agreed to allow 500 additional men to enter the United States, with the assignment as among the different logging firms to be carried out entirely by the war man-power commission of the United States. It was understood that the border would definitely be closed for such entries at January 15, 1943. When the time came only 325 of the additional 500 allotted actually left Canada.

While the total quota was raised to 4,456, preliminary figures indicate that up to January 15, when the border was closed, about 4,287 had crossed, of whom the 3,870 referred to above were still in the United States on January 16. It is possible that other men who were entitled to reenter the States for logging work were home in Canada for the week-end when the count of 3,870 was made. However, this number will gradually reduce as men return to Canada; for any man who returns for four days is not allowed to reenter the United States.

The suggestion has been made that in addition to men allowed to go to the United States legally, a number have gone illegally. There is no evidence to support this allegation. The fact is that were it not for administrative assistance given by the United States government, quite a number of Canadians might have crossed the border illegally, owing to the difficulties of policing the entire border. However, the United States government has given assistance in two ways:

1. In the early winter the Americans assisted in a close checkup throughout all the camps, made by Canadian officials, in regard to Canadians then in the United States.

2. Since exit permits have been required to leave Canada to work outside, the United States government through its immigration service has insisted that any man crossing the border from Canada to work in the United States must have a Canadian labour exit permit.

It will be readily appreciated that the co-operation of the United States authorities facilitates enforcement of the labour exit permit system.

It is important to note three points: First, not only were logging operators in the United States interested in this movement, but the war man-power commission of the United States was also keenly interested. Second, the allocation of the men among the various operators after crossing the border was wholly undertaken by agencies of the United States government. Third, quite a proportion of the logs cut in the New England states are for export to, and processing in, Canada, and enter into Canadian manufactures.

It is extremely important to Canada that we maintain good relations with the United States. The quality of these relations is emphasized by the fact that the United States has given us assistance in controlling the movement of woodsmen to that country. Some give and take in regard to labour supply along the border is essential. We receive return assistance in this regard from time to time.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister to supplement his statement? Is this the result of some reciprocal exchange of labour between Canada and the United States, or is it a single incident in itself?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is far from a single incident. If I remember correctly, and probably the hon. gentleman also remembers it, owing to the late harvest in western Canada last year arrangements were made for the movement of combines and their crews, principally into the western provinces in connection with the harvest there.

Mr. GRAYDON: When these men were given their exit permits to cross the border to work in the United States in the logging industry, was there a shortage of labour in our own lumber camps in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is substantially true.

Mr. GRAYDON: If there was a shortage of that type of labour in the lumber camps in Canada, did the minister give consideration to the question of transferring those men, who evidently were not needed where they were, to other camps in the dominion?

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend no doubt knows, there is a measure of cooperation between ourselves and the United States in the matter of labour supply in the broadest sense. Perhaps I might refer to steel at the moment. We get considerable exports of steel to this country to permit our industries to maintain the present tempo of production. While what my hon. friend says may be true—I have not looked into that aspect of the matter—we take what I might call a broad view of the question, and having regard to this movement in that part of the country we felt it was a duty as good neighbours at least in part to comply with the request of the United States.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was the request for the transfer of this labour from Canada to the United States made at the instance of strictly American firms, or of Canadian firms who had subsidiaries there?

Mr. MITCHELL: All I can say is that negotiations were carried on with the manpower commission and the authorities in the United States. While I have heard some things that the hon. member probably has in the back of his mind, I have no information in that regard.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When these Canadians were permitted to go to the United States, were they allowed the American rates of wages or were they subject to Canadian rates?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is elementary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, it is not. What about the work on the Alaska highway?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is elementary. If my hon. friend went to work in New York he would receive American wages. These men went to the state of Maine and naturally received the American rate of wages.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister tell us what percentage of the lumber cut in the United States is processed in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot tell my hon. friend.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): When the debate was adjourned last evening I was discussing the matter dealt with in the speech from the throne under the general head of social security. I had pointed out that a mere statement of the problem which we wish to solve, and unity of desire to achieve a measure of social security, will not in themselves be sufficient to enable us to reach our objective. One of the first essentials of planning for social security will be to put our house in order so that the foundation can bear the superstructure or the load that we propose to put upon it. May I say in passing that no plan of social security in a country such as Canada, with so important a part of its population engaged in agriculture, should lose sight of the position of the person engaged in farming. Certainly any plan based on the assumption that a measure of social security would merely add to the load that agriculture is already bearing would be a fatal mistake on the part of those attempting to put such a measure into effect. Our first duty is to examine the structure of Canada's economic life to see whether it can be improved so that it can bear that load which we propose to put upon it.

I ask myself what would be the two most important things to be dealt with in order to achieve our objective. First I suggest to the government and to this house that the fiscal policy of Canada must be such as to encourage the greatest possible exchange of surplus products with other countries; and secondly there must be a recognition on the part of that very important group in our Canadian national life, namely, labour, of the true relationship that exists between their wage rates, the cost of production and their own standards of living. I propose, in the very short time I have, to deal briefly with these two points.

I have often been amazed in the last few years to note that in all the strange formulas presented by different groups and individuals to cure our economic ills, the oft-repeated principle of common sense, to embark on a policy of free intercourse with the other nations of the world, has been so little put into practice. History shows that Great Britain rose to its greatest industrial strength and its highest standard of living under exactly that policy. The United States, in the early days of its development, accomplished the same measure of prosperity by free intercourse among the component parts of that great empire. It was only when their productive capacity rose to the point where they could not only serve the needs of their own people but produce great surpluses that could be exchanged with other countries, that it has been gradually brought home, by the utterances of public men in the United States, that the advisability of continuing the high protectionist policy of the United States is wrong and will not succeed. That great empire, Soviet Russia, will in all likelihood go through the same experience as the United States. It may accomplish wonders internally so long as it is in that stage of development, but when it reaches the point of saturation it must look abroad to increase the standard of living of the people.

This is a particularly opportune moment to bring to the attention of the house the advantage of a policy so long urged by practically all economists, and certainly by many groups in this house down through the years. I suggest to the government that the greatest contribution made by the Liberal party in Canada to the general prosperity of the country has coincided with those opportunities which it has taken advantage of to increase trade with the country to the south of us. That is a standing tribute to the policy of free trade, and my own submission is that, unlike some other formulas, if we find a small dose of medicine accomplishing fairly good results it is sensible to continue the treatment and see if we cannot attain the degree of satisfaction in our economy which we all so much desire.

May I hope, too, that there will be no delay in this house on that particular question. In view of the recent Winnipeg convention, the long known attitude of the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party, and the attitude which has been expressed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the leader of the New Democracy or Social Credit group, I take it that this is a most opportune time for Canada to embark upon a policy which would produce the highest possible national income and ensure the highest possible standard of living for its citizens.

The other point with which I propose to deal is the position of labour. I have on my desk the report of the special committee of this house which sat in 1937 to consider farm implement prices. At page 1230 a breakdown is given of the actual costs entering into the manufacture and distribution of a horse-drawn binder betwen the years 1913 and 1936. I draw the attention of the house to that particular table, because the more I have studied it the more I am convinced that in those figures lies the secret of the cause of many of the failures in our economy during that period. If hon. gentlemen will examine this table they will find in the story it tells, first, that the direct labour costs entering into that binder increased during that period by over one hundred per cent.

As my time has almost expired, I shall have to leave this question with the hope that an opportunity will be given to me later to develop my argument.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, while I should like to make some comment on two or three of the items mentioned in the speech from the throne, and refer to the remarks made by two or three speakers who have preceded me in splendid addresses, I shall confine my remarks to the sentence in the speech from the throne in which the government states its determination to explore further reconstruction and rehabilitation measures. I believe that if I deal with that question only, my time will be all taken up, and I may add that the major portion if not all of my remarks will be directed to reconstruction and rehabilitation in the western provinces.

I should like to know if up to the present any plans have been prepared by government agencies in charge of the matter to provide, immediately after the war is over, work for the returned soldiers and those who may be displaced from munitions plants. I should like to know of a single project for which all the details have been prepared; because after the war we shall find exactly the same thing taking place that took place at the end of the last war. Industry will not be able to continue to employ the staffs on their payrolls at the close of the war. Therefore in my judgment the authorities should have ready concrete plans, with blue-prints, specifications and everything else required, pertaining to projects which are to be undertaken after the war, together with the quantities required of the various materials entering into their construction, so that the producers of the materials can be notified at once to produce so much of this and so much of that. There should also be prepared lists of the various trades which will be required to work on such projects. In my judgment this is essential. It is all right to explore, as the speech from the throne suggests. I am all for exploring; I have done a lot of it myself, and I shall refer to that in a moment. But we have to do more than explore with regard to reconstruction and rehabilitation; we have to be ready for immediate action at the conclusion of the war.

I remember November 11, 1918, as if it were yesterday. On that day the plant which I knew a good deal about had approximately 1,000 employees working in it, mostly men. On November 15 that plant did not have 200 men and women working in it; on November 22 it did not have 150, and those who were employed were not working more than two or three days a week. The point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that it is of vital importance that whoever is going to look after reconstruction and rehabilitation after this war must begin now to prepare the projects which are to be undertaken, in order to allow industry itself to retool and reorganize its plants so that it can proceed from where it left off when the war broke out. It is of vital importance that steps be taken at once to prepare all details of the various projects to be undertaken.

Last summer I had occasion to make a trip up to the Athabaska river in northern Alberta. There I came in contact with a number of men from the United States—they are called PRA I believe—who were on their way north to work on various projects. They were United States civilians, but they were in uniform. They were, I presume, civilian workers on United States projects. I had a good deal of conversation with them; for I am always out for information. They were on their way north to a project which up to that time I had not heard of but which turned out later on to be the Peace River-Providence highway. These men told me that they were going down the river, some to Fort Fitzgerald, some to Fort Resolution, some to the mouth of the Hay river, and some, I presume, to Providence itself. The instructions they had from their headquarters were to proceed west from wherever they got off and go towards the line of the new Peace River-Providence highway. There was already a road about ninety miles in length running north from a place called Grimshaw, west of Peace River, in the direction of Providence, but it stopped some miles north of Notikewin. The United States workers were to proceed north and work first on what is known as a tractor winter road, from Grimshaw to Yellowknife on Great Slave lake. They were to proceed north some distance towards Hay river and then go to the northwest around Great Slave lake to Providence. The point I make is that they knew where they were going. They were numbered with each project; I have a recollection that one project was called No. 276, and the material for that project was numbered also. In other words they had prepared a number of projects covering the length of that new highway, several hundreds of miles, and their men all knew where they were going and what materials were required for each project.

The point I make is that we must forthwith begin to plan definite projects, for which the necessary men and material will be tabulated in order that those projects may be carried out. I think we must be ready, because I believe this war will end almost overnight, as the last war ended in 1918. I believe the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) was the second man in Toronto to be notified of the armistice on November 11, 1918, and I think I was third. This war may end in the same way. Are we ready; has anything been done to prepare for that day? From an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on January 5, I believe some schemes, of which we do not know, are ready. The editorial pointed out that there was one large project for which the details were apparently more or less complete, of such a size that it could be designated as a provincial or regional project. I do not believe the editorial writer was thinking of the St. Lawrence seaway, a project I greatly favour, because that is neither provincial nor interprovincial; it is international, and would be a mighty big project to go on with. But if there is some provincial project ready I should be glad to hear of it, and I should like to know what it is.

For myself I have followed the instructions given by the chairman of the rehabilitation and reconstruction committee at its final meeting last session, when he told each one of us we should go where we could and search where we could in order to ascertain any projects which might be undertaken, and which we should present to the committee again this session. I have quite a number ready, including one which I am going to mention to-day. It is too large for any committee to deal with. It will require the support of the government. I refer to a grand project for the rehabilitation of the great Saskatchewan river, first for navigation purposes, second for the production of power, and third for the conservation of water.

For a long time, Mr. Speaker, my warmest feelings have been for the western provinces, of course in addition to my own province which I love very greatly. I have had a strong feeling for the western provinces because during all the years I have been here I have heard from their devoted representatives in this house of the dire problems those provinces have had to face. I have made many surveys of the western provinces, both alone and with guides, and I have observed just what those provinces have to contend with. It is not their fault. It is not the fault of Saskatchewan that the rainfall of that province is so low. When the pioneers first went out there they read with happiness the advertisements telling them what a wonderful country western Canada was. They did not know that the rainfall was away below the average for Ontario or eastern Manitoba. They went in there and settled, and far too many have had a terrible time in too many of the intervening years. I made up my mind, therefore, that anything I could do or say to help reestablish the economy of the west would be done and said, no matter what the cost.

One of the great troubles in the west is the water problem. God has given them a great river. Of course it has its peculiarities. It is not like many other rivers, but it is like some. The first vision I had of what the Saskatchewan river could do for the western provinces came to me in Tennessee, where I spent some considerable time in making a thorough survey of the whole Tennessee valley project. The Tennessee river waters the land of seven states, some more and some less. It starts in the mountains, just as the Saskatchewan starts in the mountains. It gathers practically all its water within one hundred miles of its sources, as the Saskatchewan does; then it flows across a great country, just as the Saskatchewan does. The Tennessee river flows west for about eight hundred miles, but of course it flows through a country that has a much heavier rainfall than occurs in western Canada. In spite of that fact, however, they had difficulty in raising crops in those states. They had to have more water; they had to conserve their water, and they did so. I believe we can do the same thing here in Canada. I believe the time has come when Canada must organize in the Saskatchewan watershed something similar to what has been organized in the Tennessee watershed, where they have established a great transportation route, a vast power and water resource. In many places on that river they did not have a draft of more than two feet, though it is a strong and powerful stream. To-day, however, for the first 650 miles they have a draft of six feet, and when they complete their works they will have a draft of nine feet over the whole length of the river from Paducah to Knoxville.

We can do the same thing on the Saskatchewan; we can rehabilitate that river in which the water flows at the rate of 56,000,000 tons a day without giving adequate return to those great provinces.

I am firmly convinced that no matter what it costs this country, the amount required must be spent to rehabilitate our western provinces, because the success of the east economically depends upon the success of the west. We are interdependent; we cannot separate one from the other and expect to prosper. The more we work together, the more we prosper; and goodness knows western economy is entitled to some consideration it has not been getting in the past. On the Tennessee they have already built seven huge dams. I have seen all of them, ranging from 100 to 200 feet in height. Generally they are over a mile in length, and one of them is three miles long. Nothing has stopped them in their programme. They have provided storage space of 10,000,000 acre feet to eliminate the possibility of floods, and have succeeded in eliminating all possibility of floods. To-day the Tennessee Valley Authority is producing 1,600,000,000 kilowatt hours, and its power was sold wholesale at 4·47 mills per kilowatt hour. Surely that is something worth while. They are industrializing the whole of seven states through the God-given blessing of the Tennessee river.

We can do the same thing in the west through the blessing of the Saskatchewan river. Two or three hon. members who have preceded me in the debate have said there is little manufacturing in Saskatchewan. Well, manufacturing cannot grow in a big way unless large blocks of power are available at cheap rates. Saskatchewan could have large blocks of power, and could have it cheaply. Perhaps they could not finance such a project; but if they could not, then it would be up to this government to finance it—and when I refer to this government, of course, I do not refer to a political party, but rather to the government of the day. The federal government could give Saskatchewan its opportunity to shine in the sun of cheap power.

That province has lost much of its population. Why? Because there have been few places of any magnitude to which their young men could go. Compare Saskatchewan with Ontario, this glorious province of which we are all so proud. Here we have the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, with its 2,000,000 horse-power for sale in the province. Is it any wonder that Ontario is such a great manufacturing province? Well then, let us give the western provinces a chance to do something too.

What I am going to present is not new. These are not my arguments at all. Of course I have read a great deal on the subject, and last year I surveyed the area in question. I believe I travelled 10,000 miles altogether, much of that distance on the Saskatchewan river by canoe and by diesel engine boat, with Indians as guides.

Mr. COLDWELL: Which river?

Mr. MacNICOL: The Saskatchewan river.

Mr. COLDWELL: North or south?

Mr. MacNICOL: The north or main Saskatchewan river, chiefly from the forks to the mouth. That is the section about which I am going to speak in greater detail.

At the beginning of my observations, I said that this is a great river; indeed it is far greater than most people would believe. It has a watershed of 155,000 square miles. Its flow is not as large as might be expected, because the rainfall is low, but God has provided it with opportunities for reservoirs which can be filled to retain that surplus water. Sometimes the flow is as low as 2,000 second feet. Its mean flow is 30,000 cubic second feet. On one occasion it has risen to the stupendous volume of 297,000 second feet—a level to which the Tennessee has risen on occasions. Whereas the Tennessee has a watershed of only 40,000 square miles, that of the Saskatchewan, as I have said, is 155,000.

If the river were rehabilitated for navigation, power and conservation of water, we would get somewhere. The first government to propose navigation on the Saskatchewan river in a modern manner was the Laurier government. Last summer I went to St. Andrew's locks which were opened by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910. It was there that I learned what he had said upon that occasion. He and his government did not for one moment build the St. Andrew's locks just for something to play with. They had a vision. Here is the vision Sir Wilfrid had at that time: "We have opened the Red river up to lake Winnipeg; it now remains for my friend Doctor Pugsley" —who was at that time minister of public works— "to open the Saskatchewan from Edmonton to Winnipeg." He continued:

I am glad to say that my friend the Minister of Public Works is already at this work. He has engineers in the field surveying the Saskatchewan river, and before many years are over I hold that we shall witness such a thing as has been witnessed to-day—that is to say, the opening of navigation of the Saskatchewan river up to the city of Winnipeg, and if God spares me, and if the grace of God and the will of the people keep me where I am, I am sure that I shall see the day when a barge laden with coal at Edmonton, nay at the very foot of the Rocky mountains, will be unloaded at Winnipeg without breaking bulk on the way.

That would be a distance of 941 miles to the mouth, and another 300 miles to the city of Winnipeg.

Sir Wilfrid had the vision, as did his minister of public works, to rehabilitate the Saskatchewan river as a navigational course. Why? Because it meant lower freight rates to the west. Is that not one of the grievances in western Canada?

Mr. REID: It surely is.

Mr. MacNICOL: The freight structure in that part of Canada is not encouraging. I am not blaming the railways; perhaps they are getting too little. However engineers in those days advocated the building of a transportation route on the Saskatchewan river. At that time the plan called for the overcoming of Grand Rapids by, I believe, two or three locks.

That was the Laurier scheme, mainly to open up the Saskatchewan river as a navigational route. There is no reason why it should not be done, because it is a fine river. From the Pas right down to Flying Post at the outlet from Cedar lake there is no obstruction whatsoever, and that is a distance of about 135 to 140 miles. Substantial boats can make the trip. In the old days the boats used to go all the way from Flying Post rapids to Edmonton.

One of the men who advised the Laurier government was Lieutenant-Colonel Swinford, who had been general manager of a company operating ships on the Saskatchewan river from 1880 to 1888. I saw the hull of one of those old ships last summer, lying ashore at Prince Albert. It must have been a boat over 200 feet in length and 40 feet in width, and must have drawn three or four feet of water. How they ascended the rapids west of the forks, I do not know; the boats may have been pulled up by capstans. In any event the engineer in the department of that day, a man named L. R. Voliguy, estimated that the cost of rehabilitating the Saskatchewan river from its mouth to the city of Edmonton, a distance of 941 miles, would be only $21,000,000. That was to have been the cost of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's scheme.

Later other schemes were brought forward. In 1931 the Saskatchewan government engaged a celebrated engineer, Mr. H. G. Acres of Niagara Falls, to prepare plans and specifications for the production of power on the river. I am a great believer in combining navigation and power, because by so doing the cost is materially reduced. Mr. Acres went to what is known as Fort à la Corne, and proposed building a dam two and a half miles east of that point. His proposal was that the dam should be 125 feet high, and I believe his figures are available. The minimum flow of the river is not very great when it is at its low point—I believe it is said to be about 4,000 second feet—but it goes up to nearly 100,000 second feet during the flood season. The plans and specifications he submitted to the Saskatchewan government showed that at Fort à la Corne 86,000 electric horse-power could be produced, to sell at over 5½ mills per kilowatt hour at the production plant.

It would be a wonderful boon to Saskatchewan if they could get power that cheaply and if they could get it in a block that size. It would offer an inducement to the building of some of the factories hon. members have been speaking about, and others as well. The other day I had a discussion with a man in Toronto who is contemplating the development of iron ore on the Belcher islands in Hudson bay. I asked him where he was going to ship it, and he replied, to Churchill. It would be a splendid thing for the prairie provinces if they could have iron ore delivered out there and then have the electrical energy available to process it into manufactured articles. The west must have some manufacturing to retain its population and increase its economy. In order to have manufacturing, cheap power must be made available.

If it is necessary for this government to assist the Saskatchewan government in building a dam at Fort à la Corne in order to produce 86,000 horse-power, or 125,000 horse-power in shorter hours of operation, why should we not do it? Would it not be a magnificent thing for that province? Of course it would. It would give them the power they have not at the present time. God has blessed the southern part of that province with almost inexhaustible quantities of cheap coal. A huge power plant should be built at Estevan, or near the coal fields, to provide large blocks of cheap power for the southern part of the province.

In 1932 the Manitoba government put forward a scheme which in my judgment was a good one. It provided for power and navigation. So far as navigation goes, it would be superior to the plan of ascending the Saskatchewan river from Grand Rapids. I believe the Manitoba plan, which was prepared by Mr. C. H. Attwood, proposes the damming of the Saskatchewan river at Flying Post, where there is an excellent site for a dam. This dam would raise the level of the water in Cedar lake by about four feet and flood the million-acre Saskatchewan delta. I travelled through most of this country last summer and I saw what the results would be. They are producing thousands and thousands of rats in those marshes, and such a work would materially assist in that production. We could pay off the national debt if we raised enough rats down there and shipped them out of the country.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

There is a peculiar topography to this terrain. Cedar lake is about 831 feet above sea level and just across a narrow isthmus known as Mossy, which is not over three or four miles wide and no more than 75 feet high, is lake Winnipegosis. It could easily be cut through. Lake Winnipegosis is the same level, 831 feet above sea level. If the isthmus were cut through, as was proposed by the Manitoba government in its plan, then the waters of the Saskatchewan river would flow into lake Winnipegosis. From lake Winnipegosis they could flow across Meadow portage to lake Manitoba. From lake Manitoba the waters would flow down the Fairford river and through lake St. Martin; thence by a canal twelve miles long across country to fall back into lake Winnipeg, near the mouth of the Dauphin river at a point one hundred miles south of the mouth of the Saskatchewan river. The Attwood plan suggests that by thus diverting the waters of the Saskatchewan river they could be made to produce 400,000 horse-power as well as provide an inland navigation route. That power itself would pay, lock, stock, and barrel for the rehabilitation of the Saskatchewan river.

The three western provinces and the federal government should act together in solving this problem of the Saskatchewan river. We should take the same stand they took in Tennessee, Kentucky, North Carolina, Mississippi and the other states in connection with the waters of the Tennessee river. They treated the waters of that river as a single economy, and all matters that pertained to the river were handled together. One state or one province should not attempt to rob the river at the expense of another. I am going to suggest that the government set up a board of engineers to be composed of federal government engineers and engineers from the provincial governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. There would thus be no expense except that of making the investigation. These government engineers could get together and try to evolve some plan for the rehabilitation of the Saskatchewan river for the benefit of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta instead of having it run down to the sea without giving any return. The electric power belongs to the provinces.

What would be the result? There would be anything from 75,000 to 125,000 horse-power at Fort à la Corne, and another 400,000 horse-power near lake Winnipeg. This would provide the power to light up the prairies. It was not pleasant to me last summer to find that the prairies were not lighted up the same as rural communities in Ontario. They are entitled to everything that we have down here, but they cannot get these things because they have not the power. They have not the power because this great river has not been harnessed. Navigation would be increased with a reduction in freight rates; power would be developed to encourage manufacturing in these western provinces, and there would be a tremendous conservation of water.

At Fort à la Corne there would be a depth of water 125 feet deep and the water would be backed up for about twenty and a half miles. This would mean a storage of over ten billion cubic feet of water. That is not the only place where there could be water storage. West of the forks at Cole rapids they did start to build a dam some years ago, and I do not know why they stopped. But a dam could be built there and more power could be generated. This would mean a fair navigation route all the way from the mouth of the river right up to Prince Albert, to start off with. Other power dams could be erected at other places.

I am convinced that we have been asleep in this country so far as water conservation in the western provinces is concerned. I am not blaming any particular government; for all governments are in the same boat. Perhaps it was too great a problem to be solved rapidly. I know that all members in this house and all governments will be sympathetic and will be ready to do anything possible to rehabilitate our western economy through greater water conservation, the development of more power and the providing of additional navigation.

In connection with irrigation I have read over what is known as the Pearce report, and others have referred to this as well. Irrigation is most important to the west. At the present time an average of approximately 56,000,000 tons of water flow past Fort à la Corne every day in the year. Perhaps some of that water would be used to irrigate the arid plains of Saskatchewan, much as some portions of Alberta are being irrigated. It is possible that the irrigation area of Alberta could be greatly increased through conservation of water; if it could, it would be to the good of the western provinces and would mean prosperity for the whole of Canada.

I do not know what more I can say, except to urge that this matter is worthy of consideration, and to ask the government to consider it and to cooperate with the three provincial governments concerned with a view to determining whether the time has come to do for the western provinces, through power, navigation and the conservation of water, what has been done for the seven states watered by the Tennessee river. For my part, as an easterner I have long believed that the more prosperous the west, the more prosperous the east, and I would support gladly any appropriation which this government felt would be necessary, though it ran into millions, to rehabilitate the western provinces and in particular the great area of which I have spoken. What if it did cost a hundred million dollars to give the west the chance to have power at 4·47 mills per kilowatt hour, as in Tennessee which perhaps we cannot hope for, or five and a half mills as engineer Acres suggested it would cost at Fort à la Corne. It would be a great thing for the west. For your own province of Manitoba, Mr. Speaker, a plan has been suggested to lower the waters at the delta of the river. Such a lowering would interfere with those great fur-bearing marshes. I hope nothing of that kind will be allowed. Has not the time come, for the sake of the economy of the west itself and of all Canada, to cooperate to preserve the waters of the Saskatchewan—that great river a thousand miles long in the north branch, perhaps more in the south branch—so that ships may go up as far as Edmonton, deliver their freight all along the way, and return with coal? The river banks near Edmonton are full of coal; why should not some of it be brought down? It would do much to relieve freight rates. I have tables of the freight rates which were compiled at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier was considering the proposal. At that time the rate on coal from Edmonton to Saskatoon was 8·4 mills per ton mile; on the Ohio river it was only 1·4 mills per ton mile. That is a vast difference, is it not? The United States rivers—I have been over many of them, the Tennessee, Illinois and the rest of them—have equipped themselves to deliver freight at a low rate to help build up the national economy; and I say, Mr. Speaker, that we should do the same for the western provinces.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speeches from the throne, except however the one we heard last year, do not as a rule contain much that might lead to practical discussion, for the very reason that they are more or less empty. This year, apart from the war programme outlined, the speech from the throne is no exception to the general rule. Therefore, I should not have taken part in this debate, had not the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a remark about the small group of members who deemed it their duty to sever their connection with the Liberal party and sit on the opposition side of the house.

In a three-hour speech, the Prime Minister has endeavoured, in particular, to show that Canada was making a greater war effort than the other allied nations, to indicate that this war effort would be increased and "that the only limiting factor with respect either to troops or supplies for overseas was the limit of the ships available to transport them".

That is an outspoken statement.

In other words, that is the policy of the Conservative party, which has been denounced for 25 years by the Liberal party and which was resumed in a well known utterance of Arthur Meighen: "To the last man and the last cent".

We already knew, unfortunately, that our war effort was much greater than that of the other allied nations—a fact which had been evidenced by the last budgets—and the Prime Minister has on many occasions taken pride in it, just as he took pride in having declared war on Japan before the United States took that action, although the country that was attacked was not Canada but the United States.

Quite recently, in a speech delivered in New York on December 2nd last, the Prime Minister made much of Canada's war effort from the standpoint of troops and supplies, as compared with the effort of the United States and he showed that ours was much greater than that of the United States.

Has not Mr. Churchill himself stated to the Prime Minister:

That it was beyond him to understand how Canada has been able to do what she has done and is doing in the war.

Well, if Mr. Churchill does not know it, we do: it is by ruining Canada, by sabotaging our whole present and future economy.

Our limitless war effort is to-day a cause of grave concern for the producers of staple goods, for all those who put the interests of Canada before the interests of other countries, and for those who think of the future, of the post-war period.

The young men in our rural communities are being sent to training camps, at a time when on all sides complaints are being made about the scarcity of farm labour and when the farmers are being requested to produce more. Through the lack of farm help, whole fields of vegetables could not be harvested and had to be mowed for the destruction of weeds.

Night work for women in munition plants is another problem which is serious from various standpoints. The government's policy seems to aim particularly at conscription of men for military service.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Allow me to read the remarks made by the chairman of one of our great banking institutions, the Banque Canadienne Nationale, at the annual meeting of shareholders. I suggest that the government give this statement its close consideration:

The war expenditure during the present fiscal year will be close on four billion dollars.

This estimate is even exceeded.

This figure gives relief to the importance of our economic effort, but, at the same time, it throws some light on the burden carried by a country of eleven and a half million inhabitants, which endeavours to become granary, arsenal and man-power pool all at once. However, the united nations statesmen speak of a war of attrition that may last some years yet. It would be well to remember the French proverb which could be loosely translated as follows: "He who wishes to travel far, must spare his horse." To win the peace that will follow a war of attrition presupposes the conservation of man-power, capital, food, raw materials and all sorts of goods. World leadership will pass from the countries who will need assistance to those who are in a position to give it.

On the other hand, the power of a belligerent country is, to a large extent, dependent on the maintenance of a proper equilibrium between military and civilian economy, for the absence of such an equilibrium might entail severe consequences. An exaggerated, premature or badly directed effort, if it unsettled the national economy on which it is based, might weaken Canada before the end of the war. After the war, the country would not be in a position to carry the heavy burden which would fall on its shoulders, unless its economy had remained sound and solid.

The man-power shortage is already serious in certain essential fields of production such as agriculture, cattle raising, lumbering, coal mining and even certain mining operations supplying metals essential to the prosecution of the war. Should we not follow Britain's example who has been forced to return 50.000 coal miners to their work after they had been called to the armed forces?

In the United States, it seems that the first step taken by Mr. McNutt, the man-power controller, has been to make sure that agriculture had a sufficient amount of reasonably paid labour. The absence from the home of thousands of women employed in munitions factories may entail severe consequences not only on the economic set up, but also on the moral and social structure of the country.

Why should Canada's war effort be greater than that of other allied countries?

Would it be to protect her territorial interests in Europe, in Africa or in Asia? No; we own no territory outside America, while most of the other allied countries are now fighting to preserve their former possessions.

Would it be to conserve the mastery of the seas and to secure post-war trade, as is the case for many of our allies? No; this does not apply to us.

Would it be because our country is richer than other allied countries? No. Being a nation of eleven million and a half inhabitants, living in a vast country, needing all our resources for development, we were, before the war, in 1939, said our leaders, without money to undertake any works that would give jobs to our men and put an end to unemployment; and now, not only do we spend more than the other countries in this war, but we offer to a richer country than ours the gift of a billion dollars, when that same country is lending money with interest to her less fortunate allies.

Would it be that we are more than others exposed to attack? No. Here in America, thousands of miles away from the war fronts, our country is better protected than others by oceans, and is far from the firing line.

Would it be that we can rely on an inexhaustible man-power reserve, numerically greater than those of other allied countries? No. A nation of eleven and a half million inhabitants, our population is less than one per cent of the total population of the allied countries.

Let us not forget that those who will pay the cost of the war will not be the present leaders so much as future generations.

Says the Prime Minister: "Nothing matters but victory." Then what? Indeed, we all want victory, victory over the axis, but let us not lose peace.

In 1918, we won the war and the same principles were invoked for participation, but we lost the peace. We do not want history to repeat itself. If there are some who have no thought for the post-war period, because they have no family worries of their own, the heads of families are in duty bound and have a right to keep it in mind.

The post-war period! All allied countries are, as indeed they have been for a long time, thinking about it. Why should we not do the same?

A dispatch received lately told us that London is thinking of calling an imperial trade conference to protect its post-war trade and safeguard its interests.

That conference is not intended to win the war but to prepare for the post-war period. Still, our Prime Minister keeps on repeating to us: "Nothing matters but victory," which was really the subject of his last speech.

I remember well the following declaration by Sir Norton Barclay, in England, in 1940:

> The winning of the war and the loss of our export trade, said he, would be a poor heritage to pass on to those who will come after us.

Besides, right from the beginning of the war, in 1940, a commission was created in London, under the chairmanship of a member of the Cabinet, for the study of post-war problems. In certain quarters of London, for a long time, plans of mass emigration to Canada have been under consideration. All this is not for the purpose of winning the war.

In Canada, post-war problems are of no account.

Was it on account of post-war problems that, at the beginning of January, representatives of the Canadian universities were called to Ottawa for the purpose of arranging a suspension of the classes in some branches of education?

Is the closing of the faculties of law, social sciences, commerce and arts an indication of the manner in which post-war problems are considered?

What does the speech from the throne indicate for the post-war period, and to allay the growing concern of the whole population?

Young people are worried because they do not know if after winning the war for others, we will not lose the peace here, in Canada. They are the same young people who, after sacrificing themselves on foreign battlefields, will find themselves shouldered with a crushing burden.

Read the speech from the throne over again. We are promised a committee of inquiry which will probably make no report at this session, as the Prime Minister has led us to believe.

Has the government no plan to offer? Have they not examined the question? Usually, we are presented with prepared plans; they have nothing to offer but a committee of inquiry.

The two most disquieting problems at present, as well as for the future, are those of agriculture and labour, and the government has no effective proposals to offer for their solution.

Suffice it to state right now that a man employed in a war plant, whose particular task tends to impair his health, is entitled to higher wages as a compensation for his reduced earning capacity in the future and the government, who grant subsidies reaching hundreds of thousands of dollars to private war industries, should insist on reasonable salaries being paid to employees in keeping with the risks they incur.

The other day the Prime Minister took us to task for having left the Liberal party at a time like the present and he added that our conduct reflected honour neither upon ourselves, upon our province nor upon the country as a whole.

As far as honour is concerned, I would remind the Prime Minister that the concept of honour varies with individuals. In the province of Quebec, since that province is being referred to, a man of honour is he who keeps his word, his promises and fulfils his obligations; and when the time will come for us to go before the electorate for our province to pass judgment upon us, we will have no fear of the verdict. In the meantime, the Prime Minister is without mandate to speak for the province of Quebec, particularly in view of the rebuff sustained at the time of the plebiscite and of the Charlevoix-Saguenay election.

We have left the Liberal party because it has abandoned the policy which it had advocated for 25 years, and particularly during the 1940 general election campaign, to adopt that of the Conservatives which it had ever opposed; because the Prime Minister failed to keep his pledge, because he broke his most solemn promises and because we have lost faith in him.

A cursory glance over the years reminds us how in 1917 the Liberal party opposed the Conservative party because Mr. Borden had written a conscription measure into the statute books despite a pledge to the contrary. Ever since, at each election, the conscription issue was the mainstay of the Liberal party's campaign argument. At the time war was declared, in September, 1939, the Prime Minister solemnly promised in this house "that no conscription measure would be put forward by his government". Here is what he said in the House of Commons, on September 8, 1939:

> I wish now to repeat the undertaking I gave in parliament on behalf of the government on March 30 last. The present government believe that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or an effective step. No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

That promise was made to the province of Quebec. In the words of Mr. Lapointe, it was a contract.

At the general elections of 1940, the same promise was made, the same undertaking given.

On June 18, 1940, in the debate on the Mobilization Act, the Prime Minister repeated in this house the same promise in the following words:

> Once again I wish to repeat my undertaking, frequently given, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration.

On June 24, 1940, the Prime Minister in a special message to the French Canadians on the occasion of their patron saint's day, renewed the same promise.

In April, 1942, he endeavoured, by means of a plebiscite, to be relieved of that undertaking, while claiming that there was no question of enforcing conscription. The province of Quebec flatly refused to relieve him of that promise. However, five days after the vote, he introduced in this house a conscription measure, stating that it was a logical consequence of the vote. Accordingly, since August 1, 1942, we have in our statutes a conscription act which is the worst that has ever been devised.

We have severed our connection with the Liberal party led by the Prime Minister who has written into the statutes of 1942 a conscription act worse than that of 1917, which he had condemned, and despite his promise that such a measure would never be introduced. We feel that in leaving the Liberal party under these circumstances, we are faithful to our pledged word and bring credit on ourselves and our province.

We have ended our association with the Prime Minister because we no longer place any reliance upon his statements or promises, especially since the plebiscite and the conscription act.

The people have been and are still being deceived when told that conscription is not enforced.

We have actually had for a long time a disguised and hypocritical form of conscription.

In accordance with an order in council dated June 27, 1941, no male person between the ages of 18 and 45, can obtain employment in the civil service, unless he can produce a medical certificate issued by the military authorities showing that he is unfit for military service.

In September, 1941, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) requested employers to release those of their employees who were of military age, in order to encourage them to enlist, the only conscription for them being to enlist or starve. That was conscription of the poor.

Young men have been called under the Mobilization Act of 1940. Once they had reached the military camps, various forms of intimidation and blackmail were resorted to with a view to forcing them to enlist for service overseas.

Such is the disguised conscription which has long been in force. It was said that the conscription for service overseas adopted in 1942 would not be enforced.

However, scarcely one month after the Royal Assent had been given to that act, that is to say, on September 4, 1942, an order in council, later supplemented by many others, was passed providing for the dispatch of recruits beyond the Canadian territory. But those orders in council, as had been forecast last year by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), remained on file so that the public might not be informed. Pursuant to those orders in council the recruits could be sent first to a specific place, Newfoundland in one case, but also anywhere overseas without any further order in council, because the order to which I am referring states that pursuant to the Mobilization Act and the War Measures Act, the Minister of National Defence is authorized to dispatch certain recruits to Newfoundland, but it further provides that such recruits are to be put on active service outside Canada under section 64 of the Militia Act which reads as follows:

The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Now, let us consider order in council P.C. 11159, passed on December 8, 1942. It is stated therein first that under the Mobilization Act and the War Measures Act—

The Minister of National Defence is hereby authorized and directed to dispatch such personnel who have been called out for training, service or duty, pursuant to the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, as from time to time to him seems necessary, having regard to the military exigencies of the moment, to Newfoundland . . . and to issue or cause to be issued all orders, and to take all steps necessary to give effect to this authorization and direction.

In other words, the Minister of National Defence has been authorized to dispatch men mobilized under the Mobilization Act, 1940, and the War Measures Act to a specific place, that is Newfoundland, but the order in council goes farther and provides as follows:

Further, all personnel so dispatched, or who may at any time be so dispatched, are, pursuant to section 64 of the Militia Act, chapter 132, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, placed on active service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

Let us recapitulate. The Minister of National Defence may be authorized to dispatch soldiers outside Canada under the War Measures Act, the Mobilization Act or the Militia Act. True, the Prime Minister stated that he would submit to a vote of confidence of parliament before sending troops overseas under the Mobilization Act, but he did not say anything about the Militia Act, which is another conscription measure. The order in council authorizes the Minister of National Defence, under the Mobilization Act, to dispatch recruits to Newfoundland only, but, on the same occasion, the Minister of National Defence was authorized, by the same order in council and under the Militia Act (which is another conscription act) to transfer these same recruits in the active force and cause them to serve anywhere outside Canada. Therefore, no new order in council will be necessary to dispatch these recruits on service anywhere outside Canada, as the minister may see fit; he is already authorized to dispatch them.

In spite of all these facts, there are some who are surprised that we dissociate ourselves from such a policy and lose faith in those who are responsible for it. We have lost faith, because we are being continuously deceived.

One more remark and I am through. Our group, the Bloc Populaire Canadien, although composed of few members, expresses, I believe, the feelings of a large section of the Quebec population. It does not wish to fall into petty politics nor to move amendments for opposition's sake. It will judge every measure on its merit and take whatever stand is inspired by truly Canadian interests.

Being unable to support the speech from the throne, because we cannot approve the government's war policy, we cannot support either the amendment or the subamendment, since they add to the speech from the throne and imply its acceptance.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I shall not follow the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) in the arguments he has used to show that we are doing too much in this war. I only wish to point out that he said we—which I presume includes the hon. member—all want to win this war, and the natural conclusion to be drawn is that in consequence we must do all we can to win it. We went into the war voluntarily and on condition that there would be no conscription for service overseas. As yet there is no conscription for service overseas, and I think we might well wait until we have it before we begin to complain. There is a principle or motto, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" and I suggest that the hon. member for Beauharnois adopt that principle as one that should be followed by everyone. To be fair, I suggest to the hon. member as a general statement that in discussing the policy of the government during a war such as this, one must constantly bear in mind the fact that war measures of necessity are unpleasant, at least, if not always onerous. It cannot be otherwise, since such legislation is bound to require some manner of sacrifice from every class of society. In French we say, "On ne va pas à la guerre sans qu'il en coûte," which expresses in a short and simple way what should be in the minds of those who undertake to discuss war-time legislation. It seems that only those who persist in thinking that we should not be in this war will disagree with what I have just said, but since the number of isolationists in this country is very small I shall not discuss their views further.

During the next fifteen or twenty minutes I wish to refer to the government's programme with regard to social security and then discuss our agricultural problem, and I shall say a few words with regard to the war-time price controls. First, perhaps, I should congratulate the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) upon his recent appointment as house leader of the opposition. It was pleasant and interesting to listen to his criticisms in his opening speech, first because there was so little criticism to be offered and second because his whole demeanour displayed good nature and a disposition to cooperate. So that I think things will go much better with everyone. It seems that from every quarter we hear that things will go smoothly. The eloquence and kindly disposition of the house leader of the opposition will inspire us all and will remind us of the old Conservative party, now dead. In the second place the government will feel much more at ease in proceeding to accomplish its wonderful work. In the third place, behind the scenes the Honourable Mr. Bracken will continue lavishly to hand out a brand new programme of social welfare every two or three days, for the benefit of posterity, in different colours and different points ranging from 16 to zero. And dominating the whole situation, almost throwing into the shade both men and things, the genius of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will continue to guide our destinies and lead our nation out of the enormous difficulties engendered by the war. The wisdom of the Prime Minister is becoming more and more appreciated everywhere, and I think it only fair to say that it has been a blessing for our country to have had such a great and able man as Prime Minister to administer properly the affairs of the nation during this war.

No legislation is more anxiously awaited than that which will tend to make people happy after the war is over. It is indeed most interesting to hear the speculations of the people as to what will take place after the war. From what I hear I must come to the conclusion that there is a great deal of pessimism in the minds of the people, probably owing to the fact that the last war failed to bring the improvements we all expected.

Mr. Anthony Eden on September 26 of last year made the statement that the old world and the old system were dying even before the birth of nazism, and that no country will escape the revolutionary changes which are inevitably coming. When I hear public men say or when I read in newspapers that we are fighting the war for the sole purpose of preserving or assuring the survival of our way of life, I would smile if I did not feel most uneasy.

In this great and rich dominion, which God created for us that we might be reasonably prosperous and happy, thousands and thousands of people suffered bitterly in the last few years. They lived on government relief. Healthy and industrious men and women were not able to find work to earn their daily bread, while on the other hand a few were allowed to monopolize and to control too much of our national assets. I for one thought most sincerely that it was impossible to get money in sufficient quantities to give work and have our unemployed earn their living.

I shall not undertake to enumerate the grievances against what I might describe as the old order, because on December 2 of last year in the city of New York the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, after enumerating many of those grievances, pictured a future society from which monopolies, which always bring suffering and disaster in their wake, will be banished.

My friend the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) who spoke well during the debate last week, made favourable comments on our ways of life. He pointed out as evidence that there was one car or truck for every seven persons in the country, that we had plenty of good roads, and that we had probably a million and a half telephones. That is all very well, and we should preserve those advantages. They are indispensable, and as evidence of their usefulness let me say that during the depression many of our Canadians were using their telephones to complain about the quality and quantity of relief they were getting, while others were using their motor cars to drive to town to collect the relief moneys allotted to them. The old order was surely a queer one.

In order to keep the enthusiasm and good will of the people let us not say that we are fighting the war to preserve our way of life. Let us say rather that we are fighting the war for better and more equitable ways of life. No doubt among our ways of life there were good features. The Prime Minister, whose ability, wisdom and foresight are well known, is preparing legislation which will make this country one in which life will be worth living. Many people think the Prime Minister and the President of the United States working together will take the initiative and will elaborate plans which will make of the whole north American continent a land of plenty and happiness. It is this hope which will maintain our courage and give us strength to endure still greater sacrifices, although we seem to have gone to the limit.

On November 1 of last year the Chinese minister of foreign affairs, Mr. F. V. Soong, made this declaration in Washington:

> Canada is making a magnificent contribution which in proportion surpasses that of any other country.

May I add that this is done while order, harmony and unity are preserved in the country. On January 23, 1943, Mr. Walter Nash, Australia's representative in the United States, said:

> The immense war effort of Canada should confer upon her at the next peace conference a voice that should be heard with the greatest respect.

These compliments have reference to every one of our different spheres of war activity—army, munitions, regulations and agricultural organizations.

This leads me to the second point I had in mind, namely, agriculture. By way of criticism we hear now that the farmers are being asked to produce more and more, while farmers, farm help and farmers' sons are called in great numbers to the army. Let us look back and see what has happened in the last three or four years. From the beginning of the war, both in and out of the house, in the press and on public platforms, who was it that asked so loudly for the conscription of more and more men? It was the Conservative party. The government did not go as far as that party wanted. And yet those same people today are claiming there is a shortage of manpower on the farms. The government was right in proclaiming again and again that our war contribution had to be balanced and kept within reasonable bounds. It is evident that a population of 12,000,000 people which undertakes at least partly to arm, feed and clothe the large armies of Russia, China and England cannot adequately fulfil that immense task if people are taken from the munition factories and from the farms, where they are so urgently needed.

Mr. McSherry, editor of the Family Herald and Weekly Star, made this statement in March, 1942:

> The best way for farmers to serve Canada is to stay at home and cultivate their farms.

On January 30, 1942, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said—and as usual he was right:

> A farmer's son brought up on his father's farm, who always worked there with the hope of inheriting it, is more useful on the farm than anywhere else.

Here I pause to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture upon the most brilliant and interesting speech he made yesterday in the house. I believe he will go down in history as one of the greatest ministers of agriculture, if not the greatest this country has ever had. Canada owes an immense debt to the Minister of Agriculture for the services he has rendered and also for the life of his son who was a casualty last year. Although it is late, in the name of the farmers of my constituency and myself I should like to express to him and to his wife and family our most sincere sympathy.

It is not easy to replace farmers. They do a hard and difficult task. Women, students or persons from the city are not of much help to farmers. Every year Canada contracts to supply large quantities of agricultural products to Britain, and if too many men are drained from the farms we shall either have to fail in our engagements or submit to further rationing in Canada. Mr. Hoover has had considerable experience in connection with supplies in war time, having looked after the providing of supplies during the last war. On January 21 in New York he said:

> The burden of furnishing food supplies to the united nations now and to a starving world after the war rests largely upon the American and Canadian farmer.

On January 16 I read this sentence in the Financial Post:

> There is just one thing more important than bullets in this war and that is food.

Therefore let the government go on with its balanced war effort, because I am sure that as long as the agricultural interests of the farmers of Canada are in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture they will be safeguarded.

I come now to the third point which I wished to discuss briefly, namely, our price control laws. I believe Canada was the first country in the world to enact such price control laws. The consumers of this country have profited. Because of these laws we have been able to carry on the immense responsibilities of this war and pay the huge expenses without inflation. Without these laws prices would have gone up almost daily, and while wage increases would have come in succession, they would have always been behind the price increases.

Those who must live on fixed salaries would have been in a desperate situation. As opinions have only a relative value, I shall place on record certain figures relating to the prices of certain goods or articles of food during the first three years and a half of the first war and during the same period of this war.

First, I should like to point out that at the beginning of the last war the cost of living index was much lower than it was at the beginning of this war. At the beginning of the last war the cost of living index was 79·7, while in 1938, at the beginning of this war, it stood at 100·8. I would point out also that the increase in the cost of living during the first three and a half years of the first war was greater than it was during the same period of this war. The increase in the cost of living from 1914 to January, 1918, was 39·6 per cent, while during the first three years and a half of this war it was only 16·2 per cent. During this war the cost of living did not go up half as much as it did in the first war.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does that include the subsidy paid by the government?

Mr. BRUNELLE: There is no mention of it in the figures I got from the bureau of statistics. Our price control has kept prices down. For instance, in 1918 the price of bread was 7·6 cents per pound, whereas as in January, 1943, the price was 6·6 cents per pound. In 1918 the price of potatoes was 36·3 cents per peck, whereas in January, 1943, the price was 40·9 cents. In 1918 the price of milk was 11·9 cents per quart; in January, 1943, it was 10·3 cents per quart. In 1918 the price of flour was 6·5 cents per pound; it was 3·6 cents per pound in January, 1943. Sugar was 10·7 cents per pound in 1918; in January, 1943, it was 8·6 cents per pound.

The prices of feed for cattle are much lower to-day than they were in 1918. The price of bran, f.o.b. Toronto, was $35 per ton in 1918, whereas it was only $29 per ton in 1943. The price of shorts was $40 per ton as compared with $30 in January, 1943. Then in addition the freight assistance given by the government to-day would have to be deducted.

The price control board has done a great deal of good for the Canadian consumer. We must remember that an increase of one point in the cost of living index represents approximately $30,000,000 that must be paid by our consumers. From October 1, 1941, to November 1, 1943, the increase in the cost of living index was 2·7, which represented an outlay by our consumers of about $75,000,000. During the same period in the United States, when they had no ceiling, the cost of living went up eight points. Had it gone up as much in Canada our consumers would have had to pay at least another $160,000,000 for the goods which they bought.

We are fortunate to be living in Canada during this war. It is true that there are annoyances, there are worries, there are privations, and there are sacrifices. Our dollar-a-year men and our numerous controllers do not always make good company, but most of them are doing a good job. Let us take comfort in the fact that they are here only temporarily. On the one hand there has been no war profiteering, and on the other hand there has been plenty of money in circulation among our people. The government has not permitted politics to interfere in war matters. Some Conservatives have had some of the biggest war contracts, and others are holding some of the most important jobs. Since mistakes in administration are bound to occur I hope that our Conservative friends will be ready to take responsibility for their proper share.

The Toronto Star of December 2, 1942, after stating that our contribution is now known all over the world, said this—and it will be my conclusion:

> In Canada where the constant barrage of partisan criticism fooled some of the people some of the time, it is being generally acknowledged that the government has done a wonderful job.
> And it has done the job with an absence of scandals and an absence of millionaire-making which are not the least of its accomplishments.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I did not intend to participate in this debate, and I do not intend to take part in the general debate on the address. But a few moments ago the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), referring to orders in council for the dispatch of recruits beyond Canadian territory, asserted that under the terms thereof as they were drawn, such troops as had been so dispatched might now, without further action by the governor in council, be used anywhere in the world. I would deprecate any impression going abroad that this is the proper construction of these orders in council. I think it is sufficient to refer to the terms of the orders in council to see that they were passed for the purposes expressly stated in their terms.

The hon. member referred to the one numbered P.C. 11159, which was for the dispatch of certain units to Newfoundland, including Labrador. If the text of that order in council is looked at it will be seen that the men so dispatched are required by the terms of the order in council, or may be required by the Minister of National Defence, under the terms of the order in council to perform while in Newfoundland, including Labrador, and nowhere else—

. . . such training, service or duty as may be ordered by any superior officer, in all respects as if the aforesaid training, service or duty in Newfoundland (including Labrador) was training, service or duty performed or ordered to be performed in Canada.

That is the purpose for which the order in council was passed. That is the authority which was given by His Excellency in Council to the Minister of National Defence: to require these men while in Newfoundland, including Labrador, to perform such training, service or duty as they might have been required to perform while in Canada.

It is true that the order in council then adds that the personnel so dispatched or who may at any time be so dispatched are "placed on active service beyond Canada for the defence thereof." That is merely a statement of fact. Newfoundland, including Labrador, is beyond Canada; the men who are being so dispatched to these points are required to perform service and duty there, and the order in council states that it is for the defence of Canada that they are so placed on active service beyond Canada. But I can assure my hon. friend that if the government ever wishes these men to perform service elsewhere there will be other orders in council adopted by his excellency to that end, even though what is to be done now is, as stated in the order in council, something "beyond Canada for the defence thereof."

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): I was very much amazed yesterday at the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who made such an enthusiastic display of the good situation of agriculture that I was near to believing that everything was very well in the best of all worlds. In spite of his great optimism, I, being more realistic, still believe that the situation as far as agriculture is concerned is altogether out of balance, and that the whole economic situation is also so far out of balance as to border on anarchy.

The amendment to the amendment to the main motion reads:

That the motion be further amended by adding to the amendment the following words,—

"And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service."

Before making my remarks on the amendment to the amendment I should like to make a few observations with regard to what was said last evening by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). I agree with most of what he said, but I am inclined to wonder whether logically it is in accord with his attitude in the past. I have no doubt of his sincerity, but quite a few things make me worry a little.

For example, the hon. member said that there was a shortage of man-power for agriculture. He criticized the drafting of recruits; he criticized the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for what he has been doing; and he said—very truly, I think—that the situation was altogether out of balance and that we should have an investigation of the whole matter in order to make a new repartition of our man-power. With that I am in agreement, but it must not be forgotten that the situation which he is now criticizing could have been foreseen long before to-day. I recall the fact that something was attempted last year with a view of preventing this very situation. All hon. members must remember amendments which were made at that time with a view to exempting farmers' employees and many others, amendments made last year by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and myself, which amendments were not adopted, as hon. members know, and which were never supported by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères.

On February 19 of last year the following amendment was moved by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains:

That all the words after "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" in the amendment, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(a) did not deem it proper to advise Your Excellency that the government should adhere to its commitments and the terms of its mandate against conscription—

That is one point which came in for severe criticism by the hon. member last night.

—for overseas service which it received from the people of Canada at the general elections held on March 26, 1940;

(b) that the farmers, farm employees, fishermen, fisheries employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service.

This amendment, which was in order, was put before the house and I see by Hansard, at page 722 of the session of 1942, that eleven members voted for it and 195 members against it, among whom I see the name of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). That was the time to oppose this law, a measure which was calculated to throw out of balance the man-power of Canadian agriculture. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères voted against the amendment. In doing so, he voted against an amendment that opposed conscription for overseas, and to-day he thinks that the government is applying conscription for service beyond our boundaries, with the possibility that those draftees who to-day are sent outside our boundaries may also be sent anywhere overseas.

That is something I do not understand, but that is not all. It is all very well to oppose the state of affairs that exists to-day, but there are reasons why that state of affairs does exist. In 1940, when the national resources mobilization bill was introduced into the house, the hon. gentleman was a member of the government as Minister of Public Works. I opposed the bill, and I declared at the time that it was the bed in which conscription would be born. I believe I was right. That was the time to foresee what was coming.

We hear very often in this house—I have just heard it from the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond)—that the form of conscription we had in 1940, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, was the most hypocritical we have ever had. That could be seen at the time. But after it had been in operation for a year or so we had a plebiscite. What was the position of the hon. member with reference to that question of the plebiscite? He took part in the campaign. He declared in the house last year, when he left the cabinet, that he had gone into the province of Quebec, risking his life, and had fought to obtain an affirmative answer to the plebiscite. The object of that was to abandon all the promises that had been made in the past in the province of Quebec. If the answer had been yes, I wonder what the hon. gentleman would have done, and I do not think his attitude would have been the same. After separating himself from the Prime Minister and his cabinet last year, on that very question of the plebiscite, the hon. member, a few days later, voted for the budget, which budget involved the application of that conscription law. Ever since then Bill No. 80 has constituted conscription for service anywhere, and the hon. member supported a budget which was the synthesis of all those measures which he criticizes today. I cannot understand his attitude. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I concur with him in the position he has taken, but I do not follow him in his illogicalness. The hon. member's position might be illustrated by an analogy. He has helped to buy the lumber to build a scaffold; in accepting our declaration of war he has voted for the money to buy the nails and to pay for the building of that scaffold—the scaffold, of course, is the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940—he has taken part in engaging the executioner, namely, the plebiscite; he has helped to bring the condemned man on to the scaffold and to have the executioner put the rope round his neck—that was the budget of 1942—and when everything was ready, he drew back just a few paces and said, "I am opposed to your hanging this man".

I know the hon. member is sincere; he has too much of the old French-Canadian spirit in his soul to be otherwise. But if he wishes to be logical there is only one thing for him to do, namely, to quit the Liberal ranks. If he supports the government on the speeches from the throne, on its budgets, and on everything, I do not see what use there is in his criticizing the government in what it is doing. That is my opinion on that question.

Coming back to the amendment to the amendment, I believe there are reasons why our economic front has been thrown out of balance altogether, and I would offer a few comments on the causes of that situation. The amendment to the amendment which I read a few moments ago pretty well touches the sore when it says that we should conscript our financial institutions just as man-power has been conscripted. Though it may not be complete; though it may not be perfect—I am not quite in agreement with the first part of the amendment where it speaks of a total war effort, because I think there is exaggeration in that regard, and we have no right to ask for a total war effort which is already out of all proportion to realities—nevertheless I say that the last part of the amendment to the amendment does touch the sore. The situation with which we are confronted to-day, and which hon. members on all sides of the house are criticizing, seems to have been realized last year by the government. If we may judge by the letter of Mr. MacNamara which was read yesterday, according to the critics and everything that has been reported in the newspapers, it would appear that everyone realizes that the situation is quite acute, and I suggest that our economic structure is about to have an attack of lumbago, if I may put it in that way, unless we change our policy.

Last year the government was given warnings that this very situation would arise as a result of the policy which we were applying, but as usual the government, with these irresponsible commissions that are running the country outside this house, ignored those warnings.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government ignored all the warnings it received. We are really being governed by these boards and commissions through orders in council, instead of by parliament, which is the body best informed on conditions throughout the country; for every section of Canada is represented in this house by the most able men we have, and parliament is therefore the body best fitted to govern this country. But we are governed from outside this house by people who are not responsible to parliament, who have been placed at the head of all these boards and commissions, by the financiers of whom I shall speak later on. The government was warned last year not only by members of parliament but by ministers in the cabinet of what would happen if these commissions were allowed to continue to govern this country, but even the ministers of the cabinet who gave those warnings were not listened to if one may judge by the conditions which exist to-day. Last year the then Minister of National War Services, Mr. Thorson, said this, as reported at page 3412 of Hansard of June 17:

> Furthermore, our war industry programme contemplates and involves heavy man-power requirements. So does the programme for essential agricultural production. I shall not deal in detail with either of these programmes, except to say that the man-power necessary for their performance cannot be withdrawn from these essential purposes of war without hurting those purposes.
> It is the duty of the government to allocate man-power in accordance with the needs of the war purposes of Canada and the war objectives that I have mentioned.

That was said last year by Mr. Thorson when he was a member of the cabinet. Then on June 25 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said this, as reported at pages 3682 and 3683 of Hansard:

> I believe that steps will have to be taken in the very near future to see that the heavy industries of this country are provided with sufficient men so that we can produce the necessary supplies according to plan. I sometimes wonder whether we have not tried to do too much for a nation the size of ours.
> In recent weeks I have received many visits from industrialists who are anxious about the shortage of labour and its effect on war production.

That was said last year by a very capable minister. But his warning was not heeded by the commissions that I mentioned a moment ago. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) also said this, on June 16 of last year, as reported at page 3373 of Hansard:

> It follows therefore that if we are to continue our vast programme of war production and at the same time meet the requirements of the armed services, it is essential that we maintain a sane balance, and that we do not adopt, on emotional rather than on logical grounds, any policy which will unnecessarily upset that balance, and hinder one or other of the all-important phases of our war effort.

These were serious warnings given by ministers of the crown who were supposed to be well informed with regard to the actual situation. Other members of the house also gave similar warnings, but none was listened to. If we have reason to complain to-day of the serious shortage of man-power, one reason is that we have drafted too many men for the armed forces at the expense of industry and agriculture. Why is it that we have called so many men to the armed forces? Why is it that we have made other blunders, one of which I instantly recall, such as making a gift of one billion dollars to Great Britain as we did last year, a gift which, according to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said a little while ago, will amount to almost one and a half billion dollars. I protested against that gift along with the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and proposed that the money should be advanced in accordance with business practice, that we should lend the money to Great Britain and charge interest on it. But I was not listened to.

I have in my hand the Financial Post, of February 6, 1943, which contains an article headed "Will assign own surplus in future—Canada to deal direct with other nations rather than through Britain." The article goes on to say:

> Australia has been highly critical that while Canada supplied certain war material to the United Kingdom free of cost, Britain re-exported the goods for Australian use and charged the Australians in sterling. The British argument was that Australia had considerable sterling balances with which to meet the cost, but the deal rankled none the less. From now on, under its new allocation board, Canada wil make a deal directly with Australia.

That could have been done last year, but out of all the sacrifices which were made by Canadian citizens last year we made this gift of one billion dollars, and another country made money from it. We could have helped our allies just as well by dealing directly with them instead of passing this aid through another country. That was a blunder, and there have been many other blunders like that. The reason for these blunders being committed is this: If we have to protest more and more about the growing shortage of man-power; if we are asked to sell or lend or give so much more; if we are asked to draft men for the army, more than we can afford to do according to the size of our population, it is because we are governed by these financiers who are also governing the commissions which are under their direction. We are being asked by them to draft more and more men for the army, and this means that they will get more orders for caps and boots and uniforms and equipment.

Meanwhile industry is asked to produce more and more, which means getting more contracts and making more money. In their blindness they have not seen that if we are to have a large army and if we are to produce a great deal, we must have man-power accordingly. We cannot get the men that we have just by a display of money; human capital is something that money cannot buy. We have not enough men for everything. As a result this finance which has no patriotism of any kind but only love of money will throw us so badly out of balance in everything, that soon we shall be getting that lumbago which I mentioned a moment ago, and as a consequence our war effort will be greatly injured. It is about time that some measures were taken to control the ambitions of those who are not more faithful to the true interests of our war effort and our country and to the principles we are defending against our enemies.

The way to correct the situation is to conscript finance entirely. If that were done, instead of making money out of the sacrifices of others, these people would be compelled to empty their pockets; they would become a great deal wiser, and their advice and management would be more pertinent. I am sure that is the way to cure this sore which is so much criticized.

Mr. JOSEPH H. LECLERC (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in the past, I have almost exclusively promoted the interests of the agricultural class, which, before the war, had been most affected by the depression. To-day, I believe the farmers enjoy a reasonable share of the national income. Unfortunately, they are now faced with a labour shortage, and I shall probably refer to this at a later date during this session.

At this time, I wish to deal with another class which well deserves our attention. I refer to the workers in the small industrial towns of the province of Quebec, and especially those of my own town, whose wages are frozen to the lowest level of any industrial province of this dominion. In September, 1941, the province of Quebec intended to enact new orders granting increases in basic wages. These orders had even appeared in the Official Gazette of the province. Unfortunately, the province of Quebec had granted a delay for the enforcement of the new scale of wages and this delay expired after the enactment of the federal order in council of November 15, 1941, freezing all wages and salaries. To-day, wage increases could be granted only provided the commission receive permission from the local war labour board, and even then, this permission would have to be approved by the national war labour board, since the increases would be of a collective rather than an individual character, and would conflict with order in council P.C. 59-63. I do not know whether these orders in council are legal. However, the provincial governments have not challenged them, because they were war measures of a temporary nature.

In normal times, labour legislation is a provincial matter and I must admit that, in my province, the wages were much too low compared to those of the other provinces. This fact is supported by the scale of wages as frozen for industrial firms in my province: 26 cents an hour for 60 per cent of the workers, 22 cents an hour for 25 per cent of the workers, and 17 cents an hour for 15 per cent of the workers. Furthermore, a special clause allows the employers to pay 10 per cent less to apprentices, in spite of the low level of wages I have just mentioned.

Several firms having failed to pay those salary rates, they were forced to reimburse $50,000, in 1942, to workers of my city. If I am not mistaken, any firm in my city getting war contracts must abide by federal enactments fixing wages in my province at 25 cents an hour for women and 35 cents an hour for men. But I am told that one firm which was given war contracts divided its plant in two with some canvas and operates under different names so as not to pay the same rate to all its employees. As I have shown, Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the wages paid in my province are ridiculously low, and firms which—like the one I have just mentioned—try, by dishonest means, to pay even lower rates are guilty of an offence which should be severely punished.

When employers making large profits do not pay their employees wages enabling them to give a decent living to their wives and children, those workers are reduced to economic slavery. If our region is poor that is due to lack of balance between the social condition of workers and that of the industrial lords. The capitalist system based on the pursuit of profits for the individual runs counter to fraternal equality which should be the lot of the people.

The freezing of salaries to the depression level, as decreed by the government in 1941, is unfair to many workers in my province.

During the depression, a great number of workers never succeeded in having their wages readjusted. I ask the government to allow my province to adjust salaries to the level obtaining in Ontario. The workers of my province are loyal to their country and they bear in silence with such conditions. The National Catholic unions would not for a moment sabotage the war effort of the government, as did recently steel and mine workers under the influence of international unions, when we saw the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) begging persons who are not Canadians to call off the strikes.

Can the government tell us what the situation would have been had our relations with the United States been less friendly than they are at the present time? It is fortunate these strikes did not happen in my own province, as my fellow citizens might have been branded as disloyal.

Mr. Speaker, we often see posters or cartoons in the press representing workers in Europe toiling as slaves under the nazi lash; but when one of these caricatures reaches the eye of a poor Canadian worker who is earning too little to afford his family decent lodging and livelihood how can we stimulate his patriotism and invite him to fight for his country in order to preserve his way of living?

In my province, everyone knows that, as a rule, our people do not set any ceiling to the number of children they will raise. They still have the courage to raise as many as Providence may decide to send. In many instances, we witness the sad spectacle of a mother being forced to work in a factory so as to make up for the inadequacy of her husband's pay, while she has to hire a young servant girl to look after her children. As an abominable consequence of such an economic set-up, the children have to leave school at an early age and look for work in the factory, accepting whatever wages are offered them. I have here the pay envelopes of a certain firm in Granby for the last three months of 1941. Here are some of the weekly salaries: $5.11, $6.27, $7.15, $7.58, $7.95, $7.40, $6.86, $7.42, $7.79, $8.19. The following are the salaries paid during another week: $5.68, $8, $9.23, $9.41, $9.04, $6.11, $8.25, $9.97, $8.25, $8.25, $8.48, $6.80. There was another person receiving the fabulous salary of $4.35 and $6.55.

The salaries I have just mentioned are paid by certain firms recently established in my own city; my fellow citizens have subscribed the capital with which they have built up their plants, and the city of Granby has accomplished a great deal of work for them free of charge while the construction of their plants was in progress. A fine reward to the people of Granby in return for the help these people have so generously given them. I think these firms have added a few cents a day to their salaries since that time. This class of employers whose ideas are still those of the eighteenth century, who regard their employees as slaves and, being masters in their own house, exploit their employees without the least concern for their social welfare, deserve our whole-hearted reprobation.

In this connection, may I be pemitted to quote Relations in a labour review:

> It is a sorrowful fact that the whole world is divided into two and that we should witness the deplorable class antagonism so energetically denounced by Leo XIII and Pius XI, a condition temporarily alleviated by the necessities of war, but threatening to reappear with accrued violence when economic difficulties will once again be at their height, perhaps not immediately after the war but certainly not very long after victory is won. On the one side we have a few beati possidentes holding dearly to their privileges; on the other, an innumerable army of proletarians who rely on the work of their hands as their sole means of livelihood. In words so well uttered that any attempt at commentary would be useless, the Archbishop of Canterbury offers a remedy, founded on the most genuine Christian spirit: "If each man made sure, before accepting the superflous, that every person has enough, there is no doubt that each and every one would not be wanting in anything." As said in Quadragesimo Anno, "the existence of an immense number of proletarians on the one side and of a small number of wealthy individuals on the other side, proves beyond all doubt that the wealth created in such abundance in our age of industrialization, is badly distributed.
> Such crying disparity, by which life is a continual feast for some and an almost unbearable load for others, arises from the very principle on which is based our economic life. It is founded entirely on the pursuit of profit. Every text-book inspired by the liberal school, —and what other books were ever put in the hands of our students?—has constantly taught us that the motive of all economic activity is profit. On profit is focused not only the management of particular enterprises, but the whole economic organization.

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to quote figures showing the wages paid to men and women in the town of Granby, including the cost of living bonus.

There are in my home town some eighteen to twenty industrial establishments of various kinds. Here is a table which was prepared by the National Catholic syndicate of Granby.

In an establishment where a rather large number of workers are employed the average weekly rate, including the cost of living bonus, is $17.82; in another, it is $17.96; and in another, from $17 to $18. We have one where the average weekly rate is $20, including the cost of living bonus; another where employees are paid at the rate of 20 cents per hour for 60 working hours a week; another where the average hourly rate is from 20 to 21 cents, and another—it deserves commendation,—is a small establishment where the basic wage is $25 a week. I must add in all fairness that wages are slightly higher in a few other establishments and I contend that with such wages as I have mentioned a workingman is not in a position to support his family decently.

I have to note with regret, Mr. Speaker, that the sickness and mortality rates in my province are higher than in any other province of this dominion. Such low wages as I have just mentioned are not without relation to this sad situation. I am glad that in the speech from the throne mention is made of social security legislation. In Canada federal legislation has already done a great deal towards providing for the welfare of the population. We have a plan of annuities, unemployment insurance, pensions for the aged, the blind and the returned soldiers, but as yet there has been no mention of a social security system on a national scale. I dare hope that in the study of these essential questions consideration will be given to providing uniformity of wages throughout Canada.

But, Mr. Speaker, as this legislation is not to be brought down immediately and following the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in reply to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that though wages have been stabilized in order to prevent inflation, it is always possible to make adjustments in cases where wages are deemed too low, I would ask that the government enquire into the wages paid in my province and that such adjustments be made as soon as possible. A large number of my fellow citizens suffer in silence and have to go without certain necessities of life. For what reason, may I ask, would not the same wages be paid in munition plants of my constituency as are paid in large plants such as Cherrier, Bouchard and others? All these plants belong to the government and for equality of risks there should be equality of pay.

To pay different rates to men and women for the same work seems to me another injustice.

I must say in fairness to the national unions of my city that, under wise guidance, they strive to settle their labour differences through peaceful means, and for that I congratulate them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have certain suggestions to make to the government and to the Minister of Munitions (Mr. Howe). I am aware that the ministers are overworked and that, consequently, they cannot check all the expenditures incurred by their officials. As a member of this house I have submitted before that it would be advisable to consult members of parliament regarding the handling of government transactions in their respective districts. Once the war is over, the members will be held responsible for the actions of the government, and I for one do not want to be involved, in any way, in the doings of those who manage the war effort of the country. As the minister's assistants are not always familiar with local conditions, involuntary mistakes may sometimes show in their transactions.

On that point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the government one transaction entered into last year in Granby.

In order to establish a munitions plant, a certain individual had acquired a fifty-acre farm, part of which was outside the town limits; he had paid $5,000 or $100 an acre for it. Out of the worst part of the farm he had sold some twenty acres for $8,000 a few months later, thus realizing quite a fair profit. According to a Granby newspaper, dated November 5, 1941, the owner of that farm had even offered part of the land free to establish an industrial plant. We have there a fine example of swindling and of the selfishness of wartime profiteering.

As I had nothing to do with this transaction and have in no way been consulted, I disclaim any responsibility in the matter and I do not want it to be said that, as a member, I took advantage of my position to work against the interest of my country. At a time when rich and poor alike are heavily taxed, and when the government is forced to collect in taxes 10, 15 and 20 cents a week from those who receive starvation wages like those I mentioned before, I claim that this type of transaction should not be tolerated. The government could easily have saved $5,000 on this transaction and it would not have been necessary then to collect a few cents from the poor, each week, for the national defence tax.

I want my fellow citizens to understand clearly that no criticism can be levelled at me, as I want to disclaim all responsibility for a transaction of which I had no knowledge.

On motion of Mr. Mitchell the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

GASOLINE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RATIONING PLAN TO BECOME EFFECTIVE APRIL 1

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Some days ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me to make a statement on gasoline rationing. I will do so now.

Since the early days of the war, the problem of obtaining a sufficient supply of petroleum products to maintain our transportation and other requirements has been perhaps the most serious with which we have been confronted. Production within Canada accounts for only about 17 per cent of our normal requirements. The balance must be transported long distances from sources of supply in other countries. A large proportion must be transported by ocean tankers.

Before the war our consumption of petroleum products was rising rapidly year by year, this being the result of increased use of gasoline for transportation, both commercial and by private automobile and for commercial and domestic heating. To this rapidly rising civilian consumption, the outbreak of war added the requirements of the army, navy and air force. I need not remind you of the vast fleet of motor transport required by the modern army or of the needs of our rapidly expanding navy and air force. You will fully understand that these have added enormously to our already high peace-time consumption.

Our pre-war imports of petroleum came in by a pipeline from the mid-continent fields to Sarnia and by a fleet of some twenty ocean tankers, all Canadian-owned or under Canadian charter. At the outbreak of war, we had large stocks of petroleum in Canada. Since then we have been doing everything possible to maintain these stocks, but I regret to say that they have been steadily depleted, until we are now at the point where we are forced to operate on a "hand to mouth" basis.

Early in 1941, the United States and Canada were called upon to furnish tankers to supplement supplies for the United Kingdom, where stocks had been reduced below the danger point. At that time it became obvious that Canada must curtail unnecessary use of gasoline and fuel oil. A public appeal was made for voluntary curtailment, which resulted in a very substantial saving, particularly in the use of gasoline for motor cars, and plans were laid for a system of coupon rationing. Early in 1942, it became obvious that rationing by coupon was necessary, and on April 1, the present system of rationing was instituted. We were pioneers in rationing by coupon on this continent, and while the system introduced at that time has proven to have inequalities and has not been free from abuses, it has been successful to the extent that consumption of motor gasoline for 1942 has been brought below the consumption figures for the year 1939.

At the same time a rigid policy of curtailment of the use of petroleum products for heating has been conducted. Before the autumn of 1942 steps had been taken to eliminate the use of oil for heating except for bona fide dwellings containing not more than two family apartments. The use of fuel oil for heating of all commercial and industrial buildings, apartment houses, schools, churches, hospitals and institutions, and production of steam and for certain other process work was prohibited. It is fortunate indeed that these prohibitions were strictly enforced at that time for, as a result of strict enforcements, we have since been able to take care of the requirements of our navy and essential requirements of war industry, and in addition supply home owners with fuel oil without recourse to rationing. It is hoped and expected that we will continue to do so during the balance of this heating season.

I regret to say that we must ration the use of petroleum products more drastically in the future. Submarine sinkings of ocean tankers has taken a terrible toll and the submarine menace has not been brought under control. Ocean tankers are still the favourite target of the enemy. Allied armies in Africa and in the Pacific theatres of war must be supplied with oil and gasoline and long lines of supply require larger numbers of tankers to perform the service.

In planning our rationing for the period beginning April 1, 1943, we must take these factors into account. The needs of the army, navy and air force must be met in full. The barely essential needs of industries and agriculture must be met. The supply situation makes it necessary to cut the allowance of many thousands of automobiles and to tighten the restrictions on commercial vehicles.

I will now state the gasoline rationing plan that will become effective on April 1, 1943. I may say that after the close of business at seven p.m. on March 31, no vendor of gasoline will be permitted to accept a coupon out of a 1942-43 book for a gasoline sale. The new plan has been devised out of the experience of rationing to date and is believed to be sufficiently elastic to meet any contingency that may arise. Under the plan, there will be only two types of coupon books for the non-commercial automobile—the basic "AA" book, which will contain 40 coupons, and a "special" book, which will contain 60 coupons or such smaller number as may be authorized in a particular case. The new system will abolish the classification of passenger cars according to weight, thus ending the provision under which a higher allowance was granted for heavier and more costly automobiles.

Every holder of an automobile licence will be entitled to receive an "AA" ration book, which at the present value of a coupon—three gallons per unit—will provide 120 gallons for the year ending March 31, 1944.

The "special" allowance will be granted on the basis of proven vocational needs. Only those engaged in essential services and necessary cars for companies engaged in war industry will be eligible for a "special" coupon book. The number of coupons in the "special" book will correspond with the proven vocational need during the year ending March 31, 1944. Only one "speical" book or portion of a book will be issued at one time, thus enabling the case history of each owner of a "special" book to be kept under constant review. Each applicant for a "special" book will be dealt with according to his own vocational needs and the use of a common category for a particular profession or trade will be abolished.

Each owner of a licensed automobile will be entitled to an "AA" coupon book. Those granted one "special" book or part thereof will be in "A" category; those granted two "special" books will be in "B" category; those granted three "special" books will be in "C" category. After April 1, every truck and every car, whether commercial or otherwise, must carry on its windshield a sticker which is supplied with each ration book and which will indicate the category of the vehicle. Thus a man granted one "AA" book and two "special" books will carry an "AA" sticker and a "B" sticker on his windshield.

For commercial vehicles the new system, unlike that of last year, will provide for strict rationing of all vehicles including farm trucks. These will be divided into two classes —the first, "transit class" will cover ambulances, buses, taxis and "drive-yourself" cars; the second, "service class" will be subdivided into four categories: "general commercial", "limited commercial", "commercial motorcycle", and "other commercial". Under this rationing of commercial vehicles, the owner will have his allowance pared down to bare essential needs and will find it necessary to eliminate unnecessary trips, to drive slowly and to conserve gasoline for his legitimate purposes. Every commercial vehicle must also bear a windshield sticker indicating its category. Cars belonging to A.R.P. workers and employee drivers under the wartime industry transit plan will bear, respectively, either an "A.R.P." or a "W.I.T." sticker. Service station operators will be required to check the category of the ration book presented by the customer against the category of the car as indicated by the windshield sticker. The windshield sticker will also make it easier for enforcement officers to determine whether the car is being used for the purpose for which extra gasoline is issued.

The category for all non-commercial motorcycles will be known simply as "motorcycle", and will allow the owner a fixed ration of 16 units from April 1, 1943, to March 31, 1944. The "commercial motorcycle" category will allow perhaps less than, but no more than, 85 units for the year. Motorcycles will not bear windshield stickers, and the same ruling will apply to cars owned by tourists from outside Canada.

Under the new system, the foreign tourist ration will not be changed. Such a tourist is permitted four coupons for his car per year, or one coupon and a third for his motorcycle. At the present unit value, these allowances represent 12 gallons for a car, four for a motorcycle.

If he applies to a Canadian oil control office, the United States or foreign business man is permitted a gasoline allowance sufficient to cover any trips he finds it necessary to make in this country in connection with the war effort.

Advertisements will shortly be published setting out in detail the basis for rationing commercial vehicles. This form of rationing is too involved for presentation here, but I believe that the allowance for all types of commercial vehicles will be reasonably adequate for the legitimate purposes for which the vehicle is intended.

Regarding the issuance of an "AA" book to every licensed owner of an automobile, a question may be raised as to whether this is justified under present conditions. I believe that provision must be made for the emergent needs of car owners, and after much consideration it has been decided to enable every car owner to have an emergency supply of gasoline, and for this purpose the "AA" category has been established. Those granted an "AA" book only must understand that when the coupons are used, no further gasoline can be obtained until April 1, 1944, if then. The owner of an "AA" book may use his gasoline as he wishes with that understanding.

In making this statement I am quite aware that owners of motor vehicles must look forward to much more restricted use of their vehicles than in the past. I can assure all hon. members that the new system of rationing represents a realistic view of the supply situation as we see it. We have made and will continue to make every effort to obtain additional supplies of petroleum products. To date we have been able to meet our objectives without undue hardship on any class of our population. I sincerely hope that we will be able to provide in the year 1943-44 sufficient petroleum products to enable us to carry out the rationing system that I have announced to-day. If we can do so, we in Canada should consider ourselves fortunate.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister just one question? What happens when a farmer who has an ordinary motor car, which I presume would come within the class for which two ration books would be provided, an "AA" book and a special book, uses his car with the customary trailer? Large numbers of our farmers use trailers with their cars. Would the minister enlarge upon that? I think they ought to come within the commercial class which would be provided with a little more gasoline.

Mr. HOWE: The interpretation of the regulations is of course a matter for study by the oil controller, and I cannot answer that question. The farmer with a car will obtain an AA ration book; every car owner will have that, and if he can show a vocational necessity he will obtain an additional special book, one or more as the case may be. Of course he must convince the oil controller that he has a vocational necessity.

Mr. REID: How will this affect fishermen owning motor boats? I am not pleading for any special class, but nothing was said about them, and it is very necessary that they have gasoline in order to carry on their work.

Mr. HOWE: Without being fully advised, I believe no change is contemplated in the position of the fishermen.

Mr. GRAYDON: In respect to the non-commercial classification I assume consideration has been given to the necessity of war workers having sufficient gasoline to get to and from their places of employment.

Mr. HOWE: The war workers will be provided with sufficient gasoline.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is any special effort being made to obtain oil from the northern tar sands? I believe the statement was made in New York on Saturday that these undeveloped areas contained over two billion barrels of oil, and they could not understand why we were not developing them.

Mr. HOWE: The tar sands have been under extensive exploration and study during the past year, and at a favourable opportunity in the near future I should like to take some time in order to make a statement of the position there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What steps are being taken to produce fuel alcohol in Canada, in view of the fact that we can produce potatoes abundantly, and also that such alcohol can be made from wheat?

Mr. HOWE: Very large quantities of alcohol are being manufactured and used, though I doubt if any is being used as fuel. I believe that alcohol as a fuel has rather limited applications. However we are making large quantities of alcohol for commercial purposes in connection with the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it not a fact that in some countries alcohol is used for fuel? If that is so why cannot some of it be so used in Canada?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will there be a uniform value for the coupons throughout Canada, in order to avoid discrimination against certain sections of the country? Is there any expectation that the number of gallons per coupon may be increased to the original number of five.

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid my hon. friend has not been watching the situation along the Atlantic seaboard from the state of Florida to the northern tip of Cape Breton Island; otherwise he would hardly suggest that there is discrimination against the eastern seaboard. As he knows, we now have a uniform value per coupon across Canada, but I cannot say what the future will bring.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the light of the information the minister has with regard to the submarine menace and its effect upon the tanker situation, would he give consideration to telling the house and the country exactly what the position is, in order to help the country understand the necessity for this restriction? I am not complaining at all. I have reason to believe that the situation is indeed very grave, but it would relieve the public mind if the minister would tell the country just what is the true position. I believe the country would be shocked if it could be made known.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot do that, of course, for military reasons. Whether the country would be pleased or shocked, I think the effect in the enemy countries would be exactly the opposite, so that I think it is better for all concerned that I should not do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not believe the truth will hurt anybody.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Churchill made a statement this morning in the British house in reference to the submarine menace and matters relating thereto. I imagine that statement will go as far in giving information to the public as any statement that could be made in this house.

Mr. SENN: Has any consideration been given to a change in the hours during which gasoline may be purchased? A great many farmers work until seven o'clock at night and then go to town to get their supplies. Sometimes they are under a hardship because the gasoline stations are closed at seven o'clock and on Sunday, and they have no opportunity of purchasing what they require.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think any change in that regard is contemplated, but the farmer is granted a special privilege in that he may have gasoline on his farm.

Mr. SENN: Only if he has a truck.

Mr. HOWE: Last year I think some provision was also made for keeping open one gasoline station in a community, where there was any necessity for it. I know it is the intention of the controller to administer the regulations without causing undue hardship, and I am sure if a hardship develops he will be prepared to deal with it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is any provision being made by the government to reimburse garage owners for the financial loss they are suffering as a result of these regulations?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know some garage men have had to go out of business already, and because of their age they have been unable to find work in munitions plants.

Mr. HAZEN: When the minister makes a statement on the tar sands will he also make a statement on the New Brunswick shales? I understood him to say last session that some investigations were being made into the shale situation there. Will he give us the results of those investigations?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to include that, and the results of any other explorations we have been making.

Mr. ROY: Will the different controllers of the scheme have the power to grant more gasoline in special cases? There are certain sections of the country, like that part of my constituency between Matane and Gaspe, where there is no railroad transportation available. I should like to know if additional gasoline will be granted in special cases.

Mr. HOWE: Each owner of an automobile is entitled to present his case to the controller for requirements of gasoline for necessary or vocational purposes. It will all depend upon what the purpose is regarding travel between those two points. If a man is travelling for a purpose having to do with the earning of his livelihood, his need will be assessed and a proper ration will be given him, but once the ration is given it will not be changed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESS REPORT AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister based upon a news item appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, as follows:

> Lionel Chevrier, Liberal M.P. for Stormont, was on the job yesterday as parliamentary secretary to Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, according to authoritative government sources. D. C. Abbott, Liberal M.P. for St. Antoine-Westmount, has also been appointed to a similar post with Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance. Both men have been familiarizing themselves with the various aspects of the work of these two departments.
> It is understood that Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, Liberal M.P. for Queens, P.E.I., is being appointed parliamentary secretary to Hon. C. G. Power, Minister of National Defence for Air. It is said that Mr. Macmillan's services were sought by Hon. Mr. Power.

On that point I congratulate the hon. member. Will the Prime Minister explain why these appointments were not announced to parliament before the new parliamentary secretaries entered upon their duties?—and of course the bill providing for the appointment of these secretaries has not yet been introduced into the house. I should like the Prime Minister to clarify the situation, so that we may understand how it happened that this news item appeared.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I could not begin to give my hon. friend the reasons for the news item having appeared as it did; on that I must say I have no information. With respect to why appointments have not been announced in the house, I would say that no appointments have been made, and therefore there was no announcement to make. May I add that as soon as appointments are made I shall see that they are immediately announced in the house. I believe it is true that one or two hon. members have been kind enough to assist certain of the ministers in some pressing matters in which they are at present engaged. At a later time I may have reason to express appreciation of that assistance. But I hope it will not be held that any hon. member of the house is performing a function he should not perform if during this war time he lends his services—

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, now, now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my hon. friend worrying about? I say I hope it will not in any way prejudice any hon. member or be held against him if he lends whatever assistance he is asked by a minister to lend to him at any time in connection with the discharge of his duties.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ASKED ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to the leader of the opposition that there is a rule under which it is sought to confine questions on the orders of the day as largely as possible to urgent matters. Questions which can be answered by notice on the order paper should be placed there. My hon. friend will not mind my saying that he himself sets an example to the rest of the house. Several times I have asked myself whether he has considered the effect of his asking me questions almost every day. I do not object to my hon. friend asking questions, but I do think a number of the questions which have been asked have not been so much for the purpose of having me give my hon. friend information as for some other purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know why that should pain my hon. friends; it is a fact.

Mr. HOMUTH: It does not pain us, because we have to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend will not mind my mentioning that it has been the custom as long as I have been in the house for the leader of the opposition, when he intends to ask an important question on the orders of the day, to give notice if possible to the Prime Minister in advance. I have not thus far had from my hon. friend any notice of any question he has asked. I shall be happy to answer immediately any question I can, but I hope I shall not be expected to encounter a sort of catechism at the opening of the house each day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we might as well clarify this position once and for all. First of all, this is the first time I have heard the Prime Minister say that he wanted notice of any question he might be asked. That condition may have arisen partly because the facility with which he answers most questions completely disarmed me, and it did not seem to be necessary to send notice. I shall, however, be glad to give him due notice from now on, and that he has not received it previously is only an oversight. If it will help him in his onerous position in trying to make clearer the answers he gives, I am sure that it will be in the interests of the house and country to give such notice.

May I add, however, that as leader of the opposition I do not make any apology for being curious about some of the policies and actions of the government. The Prime Minister himself will understand that there are certain questions which we as members of the opposition demand to be made clear to the house and country. If we have transgressed from time to time, I am sure the Prime Minister will excuse me on the grounds of inexperience and, perhaps, youth. In any event I want to say at once to him and to the house that I am not putting questions for any ulterior design, but rather I am conscientiously trying, so far as it is within my power, to carry out what I believe to be my duty as leader of the opposition in the house.

More than that may I say that I do not think the Prime Minister has been overburdened with questions from any private member or from the leader of the opposition since the beginning of the session. I have been particularly careful on that point in the questions which I have asked. They have always been questions which I thought were in the national interest. So long as there are questions in the national interest, Mr. Speaker, which I as leader of the opposition believe should be put, then I am going to ask your indulgence and the indulgence of the house in directing to the Prime Minister or to any member of the government any question which I think may fall within that category.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word further to my hon. friend, replying to the subject he has mentioned? My reason for asking to be furnished with a copy of a question in advance is not that I am in the least concerned about not being able to say something in reply, but that I would hope that the question asked would be really important enough to bring forth in reply information that is also important or of a pressing nature. I should like in replying to be in the position to give the house as full information as I may be able to on the question asked. That is why I desire to have notice where the matter is one of importance. I hope my hon. friend will not feel that he is restricted to giving notice at all times. Where there is an important question notice in advance will help me to give the house full information.

Some exception was taken to my saying that there might be some other motive than that of merely seeking information. If my hon. friend had wished to know whether any assistance had been furnished to ministers, that one question in itself would have sufficed without the newspaper article. The reading of the article was what caused me to think that there might be some other reason for the question in my hon. friend's mind than that merely of ascertaining if any appointments had been made.

My hon. friend has the privilege of asking me a great many questions. May I have the privilege of asking him one? I shall put it in the form of a notice, so that he will have plenty of time to answer it. I should like to ask on behalf of all hon. members of this house if he can inform this house how soon, if at all, the leader of the new Progressive Conservative party intends to seek a seat in this house. Does he intend to endeavour to get in before parliament is dissolved, or at what date is he likely to be here?

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that an invitation to the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party to run against my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in Prince Albert, and is that seat to be opened now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Prince Albert has the best possible representation in this parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister asked a question of the leader of the opposition, and I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the one he asked. Are we to understand from his statement that when this house rises it will be dissolved? I notice the word "dissolved" was used rather than "prorogued".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I used the word "dissolved" intentionally, but I was not saying whether this session would end with prorogation or with dissolution. My hon. friend will find that out in due time.

RATIONING

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF ADDRESS OF DONALD GORDON IN CHICAGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Following the discussion we have had, and since the Prime Minister and I have become much more intimate on the subject of asking questions, at the pain and the risk of receiving another little scolding I should like to ask another question. I shall not however, ask any more questions of the Prime Minister until I have given him due notice. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will be in a position to answer the question I have in mind. It arises from a Canadian press dispatch dated at Chicago, February 9, in these terms:

> Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, forecast indirectly in a speech here to-night the extension of coupon rationing to commodities not yet under control, and the introduction of a "point system" of rationing for some lines of goods.

Will the minister explain to the house why, when parliament is in session, such an important announcement, affecting every citizen in Canada, should be made by the chairman of a board, rather than by the appropriate minister in the house? I raise this point not as a matter of carping criticism, but as a matter of principle. I would caution the government that when parliament is in session we shall expect all announcements of the kind to be made in this house by the minister in charge of the department. Perhaps the minister would also say whether this statement of policy made by Mr. Gordon was at the minister's direction and with his consent and approval.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all one must determine whether Mr. Gordon made the statement. I gathered from the newspaper report to which reference was made by the leader of the opposition that Mr. Gordon had indirectly forecast something in a speech he had made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Obliquely.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe "indirectly" was the word used. If it is a matter of a newspaper reporter making some deduction or drawing some inference from something Mr. Gordon said, then it would be entirely premature for us to discuss the matter on the basis of his having said it. I will see what was said on that occasion.

With regard to the announcement of policies by gentlemen in the position of Mr. Gordon, may I say that the practice is very clear and I believe has been maintained consistently by the government. I do not know of one occasion on which Mr. Gordon has made an announcement of government policy which had not already been made by a member of the government. I do not know of a single one. He is extremely careful in that regard. He knows very well the functions of a minister and the delimitations of those of a governmental official.

With regard to the question of speeches by administrative officials generally, may I point out that it is necessary for them to make some speeches. The public demand that they make some speeches in explanation of their regulations and orders. Those speeches are made to assist the public in understanding and carrying out such regulations and orders. But matters of government policy are announced by ministers themselves. I do not wish to discuss this matter at length. It would be easy to make a long speech on the subject, and this probably is not the proper time to do it. I could not make my point any clearer, however, than by making reference to two speeches made in the month of December last. At the beginning of that month the government embarked upon a new policy of stabilization of the cost of living index by subsidizing consumers in the purchase of certain commodities. It would have been improper for Mr. Gordon to make an announcement of that policy, because it was a distinct departure from earlier policy and could be made appropriately to the public only by a minister. On the other hand, when a little later in the month it became necessary to ration butter, it would have been, I suggest, equally improper or at least less appropriate for the minister to announce such rationing, because the wartime prices and trade board had already been vested expressly by order in council with the responsibility of deciding when it became necessary to ration certain commodities. They were given the power of rationing commodities, of seeing that there was fair distribution. That was the position with respect to sugar, tea and coffee, and it was true also of butter.

This does not mean that the wartime prices and trade board does not keep in touch with the government. I keep closely in touch with what they do, and I take responsibility for their actions. Announcements of new policy, or departures from policy, are for the minister, but announcements having to do with the carrying out of policies already decided upon by the minister and the government are for the heads of the various boards concerned.

PRODUCTION AND RESOURCES

PRESS REPORT AS TO SETTING UP IN WASHINGTON OF COMBINED COPPER COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply based upon a press dispatch from Washington which appeared in an Ottawa paper this morning. The dispatch states that there has been set up in Washington a combined copper committee upon which apparently the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada are to have representation. Could the minister give the house the composition of this committee and the purposes for which it has been set up?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My hon. friend sent across a note to say that he had given notice of this question, but I have not received the notice.

Mr. GREEN: I telephoned the minister's office about a quarter past two, and the question should have reached him before now.

Mr. HOWE: I will simply say that if the word "combined" before the words "copper committee" indicates that it will be a subcommittee of the combined production and resources board, then Canada will certainly be represented. At the moment I must say that I know nothing about this committee.

Mr. GREEN: May we have an answer to-morrow?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. SPEAKER: A good deal of latitude was given this afternoon in connection with the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on gasoline rationing. It was a most important statement, and I allowed a number of questions to be asked which should properly have been placed on the order paper. But I wish hon. members would place upon the order paper any further questions on this matter.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF AIR CREW PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air. I have not given the minister a notice of this question because I am well aware of the fact that he is so familiar with every detail of his department that notice would be quite unnecessary. Is it a fact that Canada is to meet the total pay and allowances of its own air crew personnel overseas? If so, will the minister correct the present anomalous situation and have all members of these air crews receive their commissions upon graduation?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): That is a matter of policy, and I shall give my answer in due course.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to pay tribute to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Halle) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is well in this day and age that that task should have been undertaken by two members of the armed forces. While we may talk of sacrifices on the home front, while we may talk of hard work within the confines of this dominion, let us ever remember that when a man voluntarily puts on a uniform to defend freedom as we understand it, it is an indication that he is prepared to give his life if necessary so that freedom may live.

Since the house last met there has been a tremendous expansion in the duties and functions of the Department of Labour. This expansion has developed to an enormous degree during the past year. Many added responsibilities have been placed upon the administration of this department, functions of a kind and character which in the days of peace were far removed from the activities of the Department of Labour. We have had the Japanese question, we have had training in its various aspects, and we have had the regulations governing technical personnel. We have made arrangements with the universities to train students in specialized occupations in furtherance of our war effort. Activities having to do with social questions have received great impetus in the last twelve months, but in the time at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I shall deal with only one or two major questions—wage stabilization and man-power.

Might I first make this observation. In the very nature of things when you get such a great expansion as we have had, the machinery is bound to creak occasionally. But I have always said to my own people that a problem with which you are faced can never be solved by making speeches. It has to be solved by administration, and it is far better to speak after accomplishment of the task than before the task is attempted; otherwise the achievements may not measure up to the speeches that have been made.

In the changed status of the labour department I welcome constructive criticism. Criticism is the very essence of democracy, but I hope that criticism by hon. members of this house and by the people of this country will be of a constructive nature, because the policies which we are carrying out affect the everyday life of men and women in all classes of society. As we move into what I might call this regimentation—and by regimentation I mean, of course, that which is necessary in time of war—it is only natural that there will be criticism by those who have been used to the utmost amount of freedom of certain consequences when things do not appear to be moving as smoothly as they should be. From many quarters directly and indirectly the government's war-time labour policy has been under attack. This attack, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) so well said recently, stems from opposition to the government's wage control and price stabilization policy even by those who profess to agree that inflation must be avoided. These attacks and criticisms are nothing more than one of the incidental prices we have to pay for a policy which is fundamentally sound and which has commended itself to the people of Canada, and which in the short period of a little more than one year has, I say without equivocation, clearly justified itself.

May I say in reply to the hon. member—I forget his constituency just at the moment—who implied that because I was a trade unionist I was not a labour man, that I have spent all my life in the labour movement. I was fighting for social legislation when some people hardly knew that such a movement existed, and I have played some part in the last thirty years in the establishment of what I consider some of the fundamental necessities in connection with social legislation for the working classes. I believe that the wage and price stabilization policy of the government is the greatest contribution that has been made since confederation to the benefit of the working classes of this country.

It is not my intention to burden the house with any repetition of explanations of the effects of inflation or of the influence of the price and wage stabilization policy in preventing inflation. No matter how thoroughly the government's policy may be grounded in economic theory, it rests also upon the bedrock of what seems to me to be plain everyday common sense. A series of increases in money wages would stimulate a series of further increases in prices and eventually lead to all the evil consequences of a runaway inflation. It is perhaps worth while to remind the house that the government did not rush into this policy of stabilization at a moment's notice. It was foreshadowed in June, 1940. A further step was taken in December, 1940, when P.C. 7440 became applicable to war industry. Again, in June, 1941 and in October, 1941, the plan was developed in more detail and took final form. The plan was carefully worked out and its adoption was an instance of courageous and sound government action. Criticism, however, is to be expected when you are dealing with such an exceedingly complex control affecting the lives of almost everybody in this dominion. After careful consideration the government decided that wages must not be allowed to decline, but on the other hand, steps must be taken to ensure that wages do not soar, because an unstable wage structure would render untenable a stabilized price level and would lead to inflation. Let us listen to what the Prime Minister of New Zealand had to say recently on the question of price control and wage stabilization. I quote:

> It is my plain duty to tell you to-night that social security in this wider sense of the term is in danger. It is not in danger because it is opposed by any large part of the community, for I think I can now say that social security has become a national policy. It is in danger because the impact of war has let loose forces which, if they are not firmly checked, will throw our economic system into disorder.
> It should be unnecessary for me to tell you that if social security is not built on a stable currency it is built on sand. If the wage-earner is not sure that his wages will buy approximately the same amount of goods a month or a year hence as they buy to-day, there is no real social security.

The Social Security Act and the minimum wage are only one side of social security in this country. The other side is the measures we have taken, particularly since the outbreak of war, to control the cost of living.

Let me remind you of some of those measures. In September, 1939, all prices were brought under control through the price tribunal. In September, 1941, 38 of the more important commodities entering into the cost of living were stabilized. Meat, bread, and butter, for instance, have not increased in price since the beginning of the war. But perhaps the most important factor in controlling our cost of living has been control of farm prices.

The government soon saw that these measures ought to be crystallized into a plan and in September, 1940, referred the whole matter to the most representative conference of economic interests ever held in this country. This economic stabilized conference unanimously urged the government:

> "To stabilize prices, wages and costs so that the cost of the war is not thrown unfairly on one group to the benefit of another."

The government made this proposal its policy and appointed a committee to carry on the work thus begun. The present stabilization plan has emerged from this committee's day-to-day grappling with the practical problems involved.

So far, the result of this work is one of which we can be proud. In no country now at war has there been less economic dislocation through changes in the value of money. But the government has for some months been anxiously aware that its control measures are no longer adequate. Pressure by economic interests for increases in the prices of their products is becoming more and more insistent. Hitherto manufacturers and traders have been absorbing much of the increase in their costs but their profit margins are narrowing and the process cannot go on much longer. Effective price control is becoming difficult;

One would almost fancy that this speech had been made in this House of Commons.

and already the phenomenon of a black market with all its demoralizing consequences has begun to appear.

That is in New Zealand. Further, Mr. Fraser said:

> You may be thinking, why should wages be stabilized? Isn't everybody in this?

Those who listened to Mr. Fraser's speech can imagine his making that observation.

> Yes, everybody is in this. Stabilization applies to all rates of remuneration including time and piece wages and overtime, allowances, fees, commissions, travelling expenses and directors' fees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the date of that speech?

Mr. MITCHELL: December 15, 1942, a little over eight weeks ago. I thought I might bring that to the attention of the house because it indicates that it is not only on the north American continent that difficulties are arising in connection with these policies, and it also shows that all the democratic nations engaged in this fight, in the English-speaking world, with the exception of Great Britain, think alike on this question. Some members of the house, I believe, will agree with me that that point of view expressed in the far-off dominion of New Zealand amply indicates some of the difficulties with which this government is confronted at the present time. I say sincerely that unless every class in the community rallies behind this stabilization of prices and wage control, I am fearful whether we shall be able to hold it.

After all, you cannot build a nation, a civilization or a political organization on unrest, and when the government of the country is striving in the manner in which it is striving to protect the wage standards that exist to-day, the wage standards of the working people of Canada, and I might add also to protect those in the income groups, that great defenceless body of Canadians who have no organization on one side or the other to protect them, these people are entitled to the support of all responsible men and women in the public life of the country.

In Canada we have provided machinery for the adjustment of existing wage inequities. The war labour boards have power, when wages are proven to be low in comparison with the wage rates generally prevailing for occupational classifications in a comparable locality, to have such wages raised to the prevailing level. Realizing that, in spite of price control, some continued increase in the cost of living might be unavoidable, provision was also made for the payment of a cost-of-living bonus if or when the cost-of-living index, prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics, showed an increase.

We are apt to quote what is called the basic rate of wages with no thought of the cost-of-living bonus. Let us take the railways for example. I take a rate of fifty cents by way of illustration. That is the basic rate, but in addition there is a nine cents an hour cost-of-living bonus. I suggest that when these things are placed before the public and it is pointed out that what is received by the individual is the basic rate of wages plus the cost-of-living bonus, a fairer picture is given than by simply implying that the basic rate is the only amount received and that no allowance has been made through this policy for the increase in the cost of living since the outbreak of the present war. It is being said on many sides that wages are frozen. Let me say without equivocation that wages are not frozen, because there is that bonus provision where the cost of living increases.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

In this complex situation the government, despite criticism of the administration, has accomplished a great deal in the correction of wage rate inequities, and to a much greater extent than is generally realized. Since the establishment of war labour boards a total of more than 18,000 cases have been dealt with. Of this number something over 14,000 have been authorized in full, approximately 2,600 in part, and approximately 1,550 have been denied. Of the cases authorized in full or in part, approximately 3,900 have been applications for the payment of cost-of-living bonus based on a rise in the adjusted cost-of-living index from a month prior to October, 1941.

These applications have involved an estimate of 190,000 employees and represent increased compensation to the amount of approximately $1,765,000 a month. Similarly, of the cases granted in full or in part, 8,500 have been applications for increased wages involving 385,000 employees and an estimated increase of $3,250,000 a month in the wages bill. These approved adjustments in wage rates and cost-of-living bonus represent increased compensation to the workers in industry of $60,000,000 a year and show that the government's wage control policy is not, as so many have claimed, a wage freezing policy.

I do not think that the path of the chairman of the national war labour board or the regional board or the members of the board is a bed of roses. When I indicate that 18,000 cases have been handled by these boards, and the number of cases that have been satisfactorily disposed of, this house and the country owe a debt of gratitude to the courage of the members of these boards, composed of representatives of employers and employee organizations. It does reflect the fact that when you get men of good will representing employers and employees, who can sit down together and adjudicate on the most difficult cases, dealing with the most difficult policies, a solution is possible provided there is the will to do it and an endeavour is made to assist the state in the grave emergency through which we are passing.

In this regard I would pay tribute to the provincial governments. As we all know, constitutionally wages and hours of labour come within the orbit, in peace time, of the provincial governments. In connection with the application of the wage stabilization policy, a minister of the crown in every case is the chairman of the regional war labour board and the assistance rendered by them in my judgment reflects the best in public life. It shows also that in the deeper things of life there can be real cooperation between the provincial administrations and the federal government in the furtherance of the war effort.

Let us now get the results of this policy in dollars and cents to the people involved. In the six months before October, 1941, the cost of living, when the pressure of short supplies of labour and commodities was very much less than it has been recently, rose only about 7 per cent. In the fifteen months since October, 1941, it has risen only 1·6 per cent. To state the comparison in another form, at a comparable stage in the last war, when our resources were much less strained, the cost of living had risen 43·3 per cent as against 16·2 per cent up to date in this war. This represents an increase in the real purchasing power of money compared with the last war of a fraction over 27 per cent. I have often given this definition of money: Money is not money unless it is hard to get. The value of money depends on what you can buy with it. That this policy has resulted in benefit to the working people and to all classes of society is clearly indicated and can be proved by the fact that the purchasing power of money is 27 per cent greater than it was during the same period of the last war. It can hardly be questioned that the unrest and criticism which the policy is believed to have occasioned is much less than the unrest and criticism that would have resulted in the absence of any such policy, had the government stood idly by and permitted a further increase of 65 or 85 per cent in the cost of living with all the attendant injustices, and the certainty that these injustices would intensify with the passage of time. Such a rise in the cost of living would certainly not only injure the welfare of the wage-earning population of this dominion but would hamper our production programme by causing industrial unrest.

The wage policy, and the administration thereof, are easy to criticize, but let the critics beware that by their criticism they do not undermine the policy, and that in seeking to flee from the ills we know we do not find ourselves in the midst of much more serious trouble. Perhaps I might quote another opinion on this policy from our friends to the south. Hon. members may have read a news dispatch in the Montreal Gazette a day or two ago carrying a statement by Senator James Byrnes, the new economic stabilization director in the United States. I quote:

> The economic director announced official opposition to all basic wage increases, and at the same time pledged all his efforts to retain price levels at their present mark.

I should like in that connection to read another statement from New Zealand, made by D. G. Sullivan, a member of the government there. He said:

> We are now at the point when in bringing in an all-round policy of stabilization which, I repeat, is absolutely vital to-day, the stabilization of income cannot be balked by demands for concessions from any classes of the community. To peg everybody's income where it is might crystallize certain inequalities for the time being, but I would point out that if inflation were left to develop and run riot, the inequalities which would be created would be far more serious and far more unjust in their incidence upon the community. Thus, if stabilization brings about the fixing of wages or farm prices at their present levels, some sections of the community may feel that they are being made to contribute more towards stabilization than others. It may be only rough justice, but it will be far preferable to the complete injustice which inflation run amuck would bring about.

I thought I would dwell briefly on industrial relations. I need not comment further on the fact that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) took the opportunity to place on record in Hansard the recently adopted platform of his party. But I do welcome the chance to declare again that in substance the government welcomes the declaration of policy as to industrial relations. We are glad that they subscribe to the principles of collective bargaining, though there may be some question as to the method by which in the long run it can be made most effective. The position of the government is that the proper function of government is to clear the way for organized employers and employees to get together to engage in collective bargaining. A survey of the record will show that in the great majority of cases which have been taken to boards of conciliation in recent months about the right to bargain collectively through the trade unions the employers have accepted the recommendations of the boards. The figures show that trade union membership has increased more in the last two years than in any other period since the last war. The number increased from 365,000 in 1940 to nearly 462,000 in 1941. The increase in 1942 for the three major organizations was over 55,000, despite the wage policy which is alleged to have made trade union organization or collective bargaining almost impossible.

The conciliation service of the Department of Labour has been strengthened in the last eighteen months almost out of recognition. For the manning of that conciliation service we have called some of the outstanding trade unionists of this country into the government service. In addition we have under order in council 4020 the power to appoint commissioners. I feel that notwithstanding that industrial unrest does present itself at some times in this country, the machinery developed in the last eighteen months has been of tremendous assistance in the ironing out of difficulties arising between employers and employees. In this regard also we have actively cooperated with the provinces. In Ontario the conciliation officers of the provincial and federal governments operate as one unit. We also have close cooperation and a working understanding with the conciliation service in the labour department of the province of Quebec. And from all the provinces we have received that same cooperation.

There is a great deal of talk about the number of strikes that have taken place. I think anyone who has had experience in industrial relations will agree that where you have a tremendous expansion of labour organization it is sometimes slowly and with difficulty that the kind of leadership is thrown up that is required in order to have a stable labour organization. The price we are paying at the moment in some respects represents growing pains of the labour organizations. But I would say this in all sincerity: At this period in the last war I was not in Canada; I was at the war. As a young man I would not like to have thought that when I and others were risking our lives that freedom might live, strikes were taking place in Canada that might endanger the lives of those with whom I was associated. I know that patience is strained at times, but I have always had it in the back of my mind since the outbreak of this war that we on the home front should show a degree of patience beyond that expected from the men in the front line trenches. I leave that thought with hon. members. The statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) indicates the necessity, I might say the supreme necessity, for continuous production in this country. Particularly is that so in connection with the production of ships. Nations have risen and fallen because of their power or lack of power to transport commodities across the ocean. It is the old tramp steamer, with its auxiliaries the aeroplane, the battleship, the cruiser and the destroyer, that make possible the fighting of a successful war; and I hope that in the weeks to come nothing will happen in this dominion that might or could hamper the production of ships, particularly the tankers which are so necessary at the present time.

In the nine months of last year, from April 1 to December 31, the conciliation service participated in over three hundred disputes and succeeded in the great majority of cases in either preventing threatened strikes or bringing about satisfactory settlements in strikes already called. In that regard, while we do not see a great deal of the work undertaken by the conciliation branch of the department, which goes on twenty-four hours a day, three hundred and sixty-five days a year, when disputes are successfully settled, I suppose it is only natural that we should see it blazoned across the newspapers when occasionally a dispute gets off the track and a strike is called.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house the number of man-days lost last year in connection with industrial disputes. During the calendar year 1942 the time lost by strikes and lockouts was 455,964 man-days. Serious as that is, however, its importance should not be over-exaggerated. In the comparable year of the last war, 1917, the time lost amounts to 1,123,515 man-days, or about two and a half times as much as in 1942. If allowance is made for the increase in the number of wage earners as compared with 1917, the time lost in that year can be conservatively estimated as being proportionately five times greater than that lost in 1942. The time lost in 1942 was about twenty per cent more than the annual average for the last ten-year period. In 1942, however, the number of industrial employees exceeded the annual average during that ten-year average by 47 per cent. In perspective, therefore, especially having reference to the total number employed in industry, the loss through strikes last year proved to be very much less than in any comparable period during the last war, and not substantially more than in any recent year. The figures further are considerably increased by the fact that two strikes caused about one-third of the total time lost in 1942. So that the total loss of 455,964 man-days which took place in 1942 represented 159 days per thousand of the wage-earning population, and we have this very interesting comparison, that in 1917, the corresponding year of the first great war, the time loss of 1,123,515 working days represented 638 days per thousand of the wage-earning population, or more than four times the number per thousand of wage earners.

Recently I was in Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, and at this time I should like to pay a tribute to the people of those tight islands. I think any of us who have visited Great Britain recently have come away amazed at the spirit and fortitude of the British people. Of course it is often said that they are urged forward under the compelling force of the blitz and Dunkirk, but I think it goes further than that. It reflects in the deepest and truest sense the character of the British people, the character of the people who have given the world the greatest system of government, as we understand it, in the history of mankind. Those people are conscious of the fundamental issues involved in this great conflict. While I was in Manchester I thought I would take a walk early one morning and see the Free Trade hall, where so many historic political debates have taken place, debates which in some instances have changed the course of the history of mankind. But there was no Free Trade hall; it had disappeared. In spite of that, the spirit of the people of what we called in the old days the Manchester school is just as resolute and forceful as it was in the days of peace. And what impressed me perhaps most of all was the degree of cooperation between all classes of society. Of course they have that fringe which exists in every country, a fringe on the right and the left, whom no one can satisfy and who I guess never will be satisfied. But one saw the cooperation in industry; one saw the hours of work, the application of the industrial workers of Great Britain and particularly, may I say the part played by the women of Great Britain in this titanic conflict. When the story of this war is told the contribution made by the women of Great Britain in my judgment will stand out in bold relief and will ring down through the pages of history. They have undertaken work which I thought women would never undertake. They have entered into industries and avocations in which many of us had never dreamed of seeing women, and we must not forget that in many instances transportation is difficult, with great distances between the work and the home. Many of them work under artificial light, and except for their day off at the end of the week many never see the sun.

Then there is the food, which, while the supplies appear to be ample, I must say is pretty plain. I think the success of the rationing system in Great Britain has been due to the fact that everyone is treated alike. Strangely enough the Minister of Food, Lord Woolton, is one of the most popular members of the government, and I believe that popularity largely rests upon the fact that in the rationing of foodstuffs and other things necessary to the lives of the people of those islands there has been absolute equality of treatment, which is just as it should be. That was the view I took recently when there was a shortage of butter in Canada. I said, "Well, if there is no butter, let us all go without it, but everyone in this dominion should share fairly in what there is." As long as a policy of this kind is pursued we do not need to worry about the people of Canada on the food front. As long as, in the view of the government, regulation is necessary, if everyone is treated equally I am sure the Canadian people will measure up to their responsibilities and cooperate wholeheartedly in any policy we may think it necessary to launch.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, must join those who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and agree, without too much repetition, with what previous speakers have said as to its being most fitting that men who are serving in our armed forces should be selected for that honourable task.

I have listened with interest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), realizing that he is struggling with a great problem. I could not help thinking, however, that while we may have little doubt as to his personal standing as a labour man in Canada, he seemed to be struggling on account of a lack of any national man-power plan or government policy. I listened as did other hon. members to his references respecting the value of the labourer's dollar. That is an important problem. He told us the number of man-hours lost by strikes in the past year. Again, however, he did not reveal any over-all, sound national man-power policy and, I regret to say, I saw in his remarks no hope of solution of that problem. I compliment him, however, upon his efforts, despite his handicap brought about by the confusion which has developed through a lack of policy on the part of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I meant to speak about man-power, but my time had expired.

Mr. ROWE: I am sorry the minister did not touch upon that problem. It would seem that other ministers can get overtime, and I should think that if the Minister of Labour were prepared to discuss a problem of such importance he would have given more enlightment upon it, had he been permitted somewhat longer time, than did the minister who was permitted overtime.

This is the fourth year of a world conflict, with all its bitter effects on the lives and hopes of our people. I am satisfied that the Minister of Labour has a common and honest purpose, along with every other hon. member. To those who have lost members of their families in the terrible struggle overseas I extend my deepest sympathy. For those families, members of which are still engaged in dangerous areas, we have the deepest respect.

Sometimes we hear it said that nothing matters now but victory. However, I think we might better use the expression, "nothing else matters as much as victory." After all, even in the speech from the throne now under debate we see other objectives placed before our people who are sorely wounded and tried, as the war grows in intensity. The effect of the speech from the throne is rather soothing. In glowing generalities the government expresses keen satisfaction in itself, promises to collect taxes more rapidly, to banish fear and want at an early date, and to pave our future way of life with a new form of social security. However, I am glad to observe a ray of greater hope for the victory which, of course, must be won before any such era of comfort, joy and social security can be expected or realized.

This afternoon I should like to confine my remarks to what I believe are three of the fundamental problems facing the country, and particularly the parliament now in session. First is man-power; second, production, and third, parliamentary control. I believe we are in agreement that a wise allocation of our human resources between our armed forces and our productive forces is vital to the success of our war effort, and to the defeat of the axis powers. Unfortunately no definite plan seems to have been followed vigorously.

On December 1, when it was announced that national selective service was to take over the full responsibility of allocating Canada's man-power and woman-power it was hoped that the problem would be met courageously with some sound action and some expression of a general over-all policy. Three months have passed, and yet we find no aggressive, centralized control. As evidenced this afternoon, such control is now even more conspicuously absent. Many surveys have been and are still being made. We are asked to fill out forms and give further information as to what we are doing; yet no one is told what he should do. Indeed, it is possible that if we continue to postpone much longer, the swift action of Britain, the United States and Russia may make it possible for us to begin demobilizing before we are fully mobilized. We have not been told how many should go to the fighting zones, nor have we been told how many should stay at home, how many are needed for reinforcements of the active forces in the fighting zones, or how many are needed to reinforce the soldiers at home.

Next in importance is the question of how many are needed in our essential industries. The failure to determine a plan has already meant a great reduction in our productive efficiency. It is estimated that 9,000 labourers left Canada to work in the north-eastern states during the bush season of 1941-42. I believe the Minister of Labour stated yesterday that not quite that many had received permits. But I venture to say that that many, or more, have gone. It amazes me to note that while Canadian companies could not broadcast an appeal for men in Canada, and could not meet the competitive wages of companies in the United States, United States companies were allowed to appeal for men by radio, and that only recently 500 more men received their permits from the department headed by the minister who has just taken his seat.

We are still short to-day in man-power. Many companies have closed down, and others have reduced their operations for lack of those very men who have gone to the United States. Many farms are not being cultivated, not only by reason of the number of boys who have volunteered to fight, but because under the haphazard man-power policy of the government it has, under its selective service operations, called men for home defences who were needed on the farms.

As has been said, nothing was done to prevent skilled men from volunteering. We see there again tragic evidence of the failure to offer an over-all sound policy. No doubt some men are needed at home; but it does appear to me that we must let our men who are in the fighting fronts know what they may expect by way of reinforcements. If action comes they should know whether they have men standing behind them. I sometimes wonder if that is why they have not seen action. Is it on account of this uncertainty in government policy, an uncertainty which has seeped not only through our line of production but—yes, even to the front line itself?

Therefore I believe it is more important at the present time properly to allocate our armed forces than to add to them. I say this because I feel that we must consider the condition we may create by a policy of drift, and by establishing a larger army than we can maintain with the equipment produced behind the line. In this connection we must not be unmindful of what has been said about the collapse of France. We have heard it stated that one of the chief faults in her war strategy was that of sending, excitedly and spectacularly, to the Maginot line all her skilled men who might properly have been behind the lines carrying out processes of organization.

I realize that other countries have profited by observing mistakes that have been made. Mr. Hedley Williams, director of labour in the United Kingdom, when speaking in Washington not long ago, said that we must beware of calling too many skilled men, and he urged the United States not to make the same mistake which had been made in Great Britain at the first, namely, that of sending skilled labour to the front. He said:

> Britain did this at first, then had to send them back. There is no use of having a big army in the field, if there are not enough at home to keep it properly equipped.

I believe the war economy of Germany and Italy is feeling the effect of a similar mistake which was made there. As evidence of that, we observe that the other day an order was issued in Germany mobilizing immediately all men between the ages of seventeen and sixty-five years for industrial and agricultural purposes. In Italy, almost coincident with this—I do not suppose this left-handed warrior does much outside of what he is told to do—there was issued a similar order, but they cut off two years and provided that those between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five years would be mobilized immediately for either industrial or agricultural purposes.

If we are going to warrant the claim that we have a selective service policy then we must, without any further delay, declare what these priorities in man-power are. Unless this is more vigorously proceeded with, the present serious condition will not get better, and I am convinced that it will grow steadily worse, more confusing and prove more detrimental to an all-out war effort. We have made postponements and exemptions which were not warranted, and we have not made some that were warranted. I urge the Minister of Labour to give further consideration and direction to national selective service, so that the men who are exempted for necessary and essential purposes, whether it is on the farm or in the factory, may be given more permanency instead of having their exemptions granted from month to month and being called up in busy seasons or not knowing what to do in the following year, in the case of agriculture and other pursuits, until they receive another call. When this is repeated it makes additional work in the departments and creates confusion and uncertainty which retards production from reaching that efficient point which it should reach at this time.

I hope the government will more efficiently coordinate our war effort by a scientific and fearless allocation of man-power. That is what I had hoped the minister would have announced, but he has told us nothing about the order which we understood was to stand, namely, that selective service would have to do with the allocation of all man-power. The extent to which our superior man-power and our superior resources shall establish our future place and decide the extent of our national dignity and freedom is measured not only by the dauntless courage of our men on the front line but by our fearless direction behind the line. It seems to me that in this one great problem of man-power we have failed and failed dismally.

I realize that our production is great. We are no longer an infant nation; we have grown. I have been surprised at the comparisons which have been made between our production during the last great war and our production at the present time. But Canada today has fifty per cent more people than she had in the last great war. She has had the greatest industrial growth ever known since that time. She developed more in the ten years following the last great war than she had developed in any thirty years before; that is, as far as industrial expansion is concerned. It is fortunate that she had the diversified industries which she had because they have provided a fair foundation for the progress she has made since.

As far as production is concerned, I do not propose to deal with the generalities of production in the factory and in other lines that are essential. However I do wish to speak for a few moments about one vital requirement. I shall refer more specifically to our food requirements. For some years I have urged the government to establish a sound national policy for agriculture. As far back as the session of 1940-41 I endeavoured to have the government establish a national food board, and I suggested different ways in which it might function. Now in 1943 I am alarmed, as I observe others in this house are alarmed and as it is noted in the press, when I hear that the food requirements for this year will be the greatest with which agriculture has been faced since confederation. I am glad that the government at long last seem to recognize the problem, but I regret that their most conspicuous plans for its solution seem to be only ceiling prices for the producer and ration cards for the consumer. With little evidence of any real policy in connection with agricultural production we have nothing more or less than the glib response of a rationing system. This may help to meet the crisis which has developed, to no small extent as a result of the absence of a sound agricultural policy.

Since the government have failed to appoint a food board; since they have failed to set out the functions of such a board, I suggest that at this late date they solve the problem by establishing a food ministry. This should be done in order to solve the problems which the government's lack of policy has placed before this country. Since I do not like to be critical without offering suggestions, I wish to offer some at this time. I have no apology to make for the criticism which I have levelled; I am only sorry that I have not more time in which to level more criticism. I should like to repeat briefly some of the functions which might be performed by this ministry, at least for the duration. I am not so sure that the bureaucratic control which we have set up is necessary even in time of war; I am not so sure that we need the restraints and limitations which have been placed upon many producers, but I do believe that for the duration such a ministry could carry out the following functions.

1. The division of this dominion into productive zones to encourage the production of those products for which each zone is best adapted.

2. Allocate to each zone annual production goals.

3. Assure to each zone adequate supplies of labour and machinery.

4. An immediate survey of requirements of men and machinery, including a study of conditions created during the past year that have closed many farm operations.

5. A study of prices, a research of farm costs and a revision of ceiling prices so that sufficient increase may be allowed to bring to the farm producer prices on a parity with other prices.

6. A study of farm labour prices so that it would be possible under selective service to move labour to this essential industry from non-essential industries.

7. It should be the responsibility of this food department to plan necessary reserves of finished canned and cured foodstuffs in order to make sure of the necessary surplus supplies to finish the war and help write the peace with attractive supplies for a hungry Europe.

It is now two years since I urged much more fully what I have ventured to repeat at this time. However, this problem has at last moved up to the front line of necessary war strategy. I believe the government have some good intentions—one could not listen to the several ministers without knowing that they had good intentions; I am not going to doubt their intentions—but I warn them of the danger of delay and postponement. It is needless to remind the house that the roads of Holland, Denmark, Belgium, France, Poland and other countries were paved with good intentions, but now those roads are strewn with hunger, despair and death. Those countries are calling to us to give them some assistance, and we should benefit from the haphazard management that has been so prevalent.

We are told by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that we are producing a greater tonnage of agricultural products. One need not challenge that statement any more than one need challenge the statement that we are producing more iron and steel than we ever did. However, it does not prove that we have any master-plan of handling our human and material resources, because we have now eleven millions of people whereas we had only seven millions in the last war. Nor does it swell our chests with much pride when we know that Great Britain, with almost three times as many per capita of her man-power in active service, has doubled her agricultural production since 1939.

May I now deal briefly with the third fundamental challenge which I mentioned at the outset, namely, the challenge to parliamentary control. What is victory? Is it only the killing of Japs and Germans and Italians on the battlefield? Is it not also the prevention of the nazi and fascist methods which they represent and seek to impose upon us? This is no idle dreaming of those living in the quiet tranquillity of the home front; it has been declared many times to be the objective by our leaders at the battle-front. Not long ago that great British fighter, General Alexander, when he was promoted to his present responsible command, inspired his fighting men to greater efforts by stating:

> We are fighting to preserve freedom of speech, freedom of worship and freedom of individual enterprise.

While these gallant men face death to preserve these freedoms for us overseas, are we to surrender parliamentary control as the chief bulwark of these freedoms at home?

I realize that war must be waged by a strong central control. It is, indeed, an executive function more than a legislative function. I am not questioning the necessity of having boards of control and administrators established. However, I am not unmindful of the tendency toward a bureaucratic form of government through the delegation of unnecessary powers to these boards and commissions. The fathers of confederation wisely separated the constitutional powers of the legislative, executive and judicial bodies. The huge bureaucracy that now prevails was growing slowly but steadily before the war. It has rapidly grown during the war and now threatens our democracy itself. If this trend is not soon checked, it will constitute a real and easy stepping-stone for a state socialism which will clumsily mock the very totalitarian doctrines which our enemies seek to impose upon us.

To-day little concern seems to be aroused over the delegation of our legislative or executive control. With reckless disregard of the people's representatives in parliament, policies are set by order in council, while boards of control make the laws—modernly called regulations—for the enforcement of those policies. It appears now that we have almost a secret merger between legislative and executive control which hands on by order in council strange and undebated plans for a controller to put into swift effect.

We closed the third session of our nineteenth parliament of Canada just the day before this session opened, and on that day the government tabled 340 orders in council which were supposed to have been passed between July 1, 1942, and December 1, 1942. We find that over sixty of them were passed while parliament was sitting. It seems that parliamentary control is only a complimentary phrase which is used to appease the concern of those of us who are so old-fashioned as to believe that we represent the people in a free parliamentary system.

Expert economic controllers write the policy, and a weak and wobbly executive makes it an order in council. Following that, in the early hours of the next morning, from a government-controlled radio or a watchful press, members of parliament and millions of taxpayers learn with alarm of the silent arrival of a new order born out of the darkness of the night before.

We have in Canada so-called controllers who are actually disciples of a new regimentation. These so-called social planners have avowed plans to make a new world order. They may to some extent satisfy the socialistic party to my left through their avowed plans to make out of this world crisis a new social order. May I urge this government, however, to beware of this tendency which threatens the liberty of the subject and its blood-brother, the freedom of enterprise which has made this country great.

If we are to preserve for our boys, who we hope may return, the freedoms for which they believe they fight, we must prevent any unnecessary extension of authority to those who have had long-nurtured objectives of untried social plans to replace the freedom of enterprise which has given our young country her growth and our people an unsurpassed standard of living.

I notice that the Prime Minister is out of the house at the moment, and therefore I will ask the Minister of Agriculture who I presume speaks for the government because he is the only minister over there, can he assure the house and the country that the war regulations which are now being abused by controllers for peace-time objectives will cease when this war is over? Silence, I assume, gives consent.

Mr. GARDINER: It is stated in the War Measures Act. The hon. member has read it.

Mr. ROWE: The minister asks us to assume that these regulations will disappear with the War Measures Act. But I would urge the government to beware of the development which a rather weak executive seems to be promoting by this system of controller management in this country.

In a book written by Lord Hewart I find this:

> Of all methods of administration that is worst, is that whereby real powers are in the hands of one set of persons while public responsibility belongs to another set of persons. It is a method, as all experience shows, well-calculated to encourage the performance of acts which either set of persons if they had both the responsibility and the power, would be astute to avoid.

The Prime Minister surely recognizes this principle unless he has forgotten his speech at Newmarket on March 17, 1919, when he said:

> The war has been a great problem and it is a question whether we are not, under a stress of mind, permitting things to be shoved through by a group of men who have it in their minds that so long as they are united under a particular name they can do what they please in matters of legislation.

Further in the same speech he emphasized "getting back to government for the people by the people." Again in the same speech the Prime Minister said:

Our government to-day is composed of a group of men of one type of mind that believes in administration through orders in council rather than administration through the people's representatives in parliament.

What a difference just a few years make in the life of the most expert politician in Canada's history! We have never seen the power of the executive so much abused by order in council as it has been in the last year or more by this government under the guise of war necessity. I do not want to be too critical, but I do urge this government to take cognizance of where we are heading and to realize that this sort of thing cannot go on. The government cannot continue to ignore the responsibility of parliament and maintain the proper place of the executive any more than we can expect to maintain the free and democratic way of government by having matters settled in the evening by orders in council that are never brought into daylight before parliament. I may offer a few suggestions in this regard as well. First, I would urge the government to take greater care in delegating powers to these new-born controls and commissions, and, second, I suggest that we should have from time to time a judicial review of all controllers' decisions. In conclusion, I would ask the government to remember that parliamentary control is, after all, one of the basic features of our democratic way of life.

Let us meet emergencies by necessary controls, but avoid usurping war-time regulations to usher in peace-time new orders, foreign to that for which our boys believe they fight.

Let us therefore, fearlessly face these challenges of this tragic period by coordinating the full striking force of our superior man-power and excellent resources through a freer but more vigorous parliamentary control.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I do not intend to speak at great length, but first of all I wish to reply to something said by a distinguished press columnist of this city a few days ago by quoting what he wrote last year. A few days ago, on February 10, the Citizen, commenting upon the marvellous speech delivered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), said:

For several of his chief isolationist points, only one man pounded his desk—Jean François Pouliot, who still sits beside him next to the cabinet benches.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Of course I was delighted to applaud the hon. gentleman when he spoke so well, but he never said anything that was of an isolationist nature. In the Citizen of May 13, 1942, I see that the same gentleman wrote as follows:

A German submarine sunk a freighter in the St. Lawrence, in the river, not way down in the gulf. Forty-four survivors were brought ashore. The submarine sank the ship, apparently without loss of life, but happily it didn't take a shot at any of the shining marks that line the shore. It was below Quebec The place is not stated but doubtless, somewhere between Témiscouata and Gaspe. The war, thus, is right opposite the front door of some of the members of parliament who are more or less conspicuous. There is nothing to show that the destructive enemy craft was put out of business. Probably it is lurking about. The circumstance is illuminating and suggestive.

The enemy was at the door.

There are no members of this house who object to the help that is being given by Canada to Great Britain or to any of the allied countries. But that is not the point. We want to have this country defended. We have no defence at the present time, and conditions are so bad that in my district the men in the reserve army have not been paid since August last. Imagine the encouragement! They receive only sixty cents a day, and they have not been paid since last August. I brought the matter to the authorities—Mr. Speaker, I would ask the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to keep quiet. I will not listen to any interruptions. I had enough trouble when he was leader of the opposition without having him start again when there is another gentleman occupying that seat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a question of privilege, I do not intend—

Mr. POULIOT: Then let him sit down. I will be rough.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. McCann): Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I have been disturbed enough by him in former days and I will not stand for it now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a question of privilege, I made no observation—

Mr. POULIOT: He groaned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —but I did make a remark in an undertone. If I had done a great deal worse than that it would have been appropriate, but all I was doing was making a remark in a low undertone.

Mr. POULIOT: He is wasting my time. He has no reason to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not intend to have the hon. member for Témiscouata abuse me or make derogatory remarks about me and I ask that they be withdrawn. I would ask Your Honour so to rule.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, that having been said, I will come to the great tribute that was paid by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the former leader of the opposition. I wish the hon. member for York-Sunbury a long life. I hope he will live to be a centenarian, but when he dies I hope he will put a clause in his will that Hansard containing the remarks of the Prime Minister about him be put in his coffin. Such things must be kept even in the other world. I know that several supporters of the government were very jealous when they either heard those remarks or read them.

Now, speaking of the present, I see the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with his smiling face. From the time Mr. Bennett was leader of the opposition I have not seen any smile on the face of any leader of the opposition, and it is comforting for me to see a good-natured gentleman occupying such a high office. He knows that I mean what I say, as I mean everything I say, and it is refreshing to see him there. I am fully in accord with the great tribute that has been paid to him by the Prime Minister and all members of the house.

I wish also to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address. One of them, the seconder, I know very well, and I know that both are fine soldiers. They spoke very well and deserve congratulations upon their speeches.

There is a most important matter that has been talked about by the leader of the opposition—the present one, who is a very bright man—and also by some other members on this side of the house and even on the other side. The leader of the opposition spoke first of the setting up of committees at an early stage of the session. He mentioned that six standing committees did not meet at all during the last session, which is true. He referred particularly to the public accounts committee. But his predecessor never made any request for it to meet. That is the reason why we had no public accounts committee. The reason is that the hon. gentleman's predecessor never asked for it. Moreover, I was the one that had to fight to have an improvement in the public accounts. It was the duty of the hon. gentleman's predecessor to do that, but he forgot to do it. Therefore I had to do it myself, and I had the support of my good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). Hansard records it. Does the leader of the opposition know nothing about it? Perhaps this is why he was praised so highly by the Prime Minister.

The public accounts committee did not meet during the last ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; the Bren gun inquiry.

Mr. POULIOT: Was it the public accounts committee? Well, it brought in no report, and therefore all the sittings were of no use.

Then my friend the present leader of the opposition said that some early consideration should also be given to reviewing and modernizing our parliamentary procedure. How? The hon. gentleman is too familiar with the rules of the house and British parliamentary practice to make such a suggestion. Why should we modernize British parliamentary life that has existed for centuries and is in such a good state of health at Westminster, and here also when Mr. Speaker is in the chair?

The Prime Minister said:

> It is the present view of the administration that this is not the best time to have a committee consider the rules of the house.

I fully agree with the Prime Minister. If my hon. friend looks at the record he will see that on May 21, 1940, the Prime Minister moved the appointment of a select committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house with a view to a more expeditious dispatch of public business.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) and the member for Temiscouata respectively made suggestions as to the withdrawal of that motion, and it was withdrawn. The answer given by the Prime Minister to the leader of the opposition on January 29 last is logical, and consistent with the withdrawal of his motion of three years ago.

Sir, I have given—or rather lent—to you a complete collection of the standing orders of each legislative assembly of the British empire. It was the only complete collection of the kind in Canada. In Ottawa I went for it myself to the library of parliament. They did not have it, and then I had to complete it by writing to the clerks of the different bodies. I lent it to you about three years ago, and I am sure you have been interested in it because you are still studying it in your den. I once went to Longmans, Green and Company, a firm of publishers in London, to submit to them a compilation of all those standing orders, based on those of Australia that number 410. There I met a very bright man who reminded me of the present leader of the opposition. He was so bright he could even end my phrases; I had only to say a few words and he could end my statement; a very bright gentleman. I submitted my plan to him. I thought a composite picture of the parliamentary procedure in the British empire might be of interest. He said, "Leave it to me for a day or two and I will tell you about it." When I returned he said it would be impossible to do it, except with the support of a foundation, because nobody reads the rules.

In one of the halls of Westminster, at a meeting presided over by Lord Simon, then Sir John Simon, there was present a gentleman from New Zealand who said this about standing orders:

> I may be wrong, but I do not think parliamentary institutions to-day depend at all upon standing orders. I could conceive of parliament being conducted without any standing orders at all. I do not say it is better to do without standing orders, but I could conceive of that. Speakers give rulings, and also fresh occasions arise when new rulings are required guided by precedent, and so there may be built up a series of rulings such as built up our common law to-day.

Some people are under the impression that parliament is the building we are in. It is not that. These are the houses of parliament, the buildings of parliament, but the building is not parliament. Parliament is the meeting together of men who act in conformity with the British practice to decide the affairs of the country when they are duly elected for that purpose. Whether we as a legislative body met at the auditorium or in this building we would be the parliament of Canada just the same; we would be the House of Commons of Canada, and the Senate would be the same also. We are the parliament; it is not the building. But there is much confusion about it. Some people may think that we are true to the parliament at Westminster and its traditions because you, Mr. Speaker, sit in a chair that is a replica of that which adorns the House of Commons at Westminster. You know, sir, that that chair is a symbol, and if one goes behind it he sees an inscription stating that it is a replica of the Speaker's chair in the House of Commons at Westminster and was given in 1921 "as a fitting symbol of the great parliamentary tradition which binds together the free nations of the British commonwealth." It bears the signatures of no less persons than Lord Birkenhead, the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Speaker Lowther of the British House of Commons.

If I look at the chair in which our distinguished clerk sits, there is a plate on the back which states that it belonged to Sir John G. Bourinot, K.C.M.G., Clerk of the House of Commons from 1880 to 1903, and was presented to the house by his son, Arthur S. Bourinot.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Therefore, sir, it is not the building; it is not the furniture that we see here, even if it has an historic interest, that makes parliament. It is not even the rules of the house. It is the practice that has been followed for centuries at Westminster, the practice which enables Winston Churchill and all other leaders of the British empire to say that in this war the army is defending parliamentary freedom. Therefore, sir, we shall respect that spirit; we shall abide by that, and we shall remain true to the British parliamentary practice as my friend, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) said so aptly and pointedly the other day.

A moment ago I was repeating what I have said many times before, namely, that as a private member of parliament I feel safe and secure when you, Mr. Speaker, are in the chair. You know what your functions are in this house. You know very well that we are all equal and that in this house even the Prime Minister sits as a private member, as only the first among equals. But I have to complain bitterly about an encroachment upon our freedom of speech which took place several times last year, not when you were in the chair, but when we were in committee of the whole. I do not have in my hand the heavy volume of Hansard reporting the dialogue, but I have a copy of it, which I shall read:

> On the title:
> The Chairman: Shall the title carry?
> Mr. Pouliot: No, Mr. Chairman.
> The Chairman: Carried.
> Title agreed to.
> The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?
> Mr. Pouliot: No, sir.
> The Chairman: Those in favour will kindly say "aye".
> Some hon. Members: Aye.
> The Chairman: Those opposed will kindly say "nay".
> Some hon. Members: Nay.
> The Chairman: In my opinion the "ayes" have it.
> Mr. Pouliot: This is a most unusual procedure.
> The Chairman: Not at all.
> Mr. Pouliot: It is worse than closure, because with closure you can at least speak for twenty minutes.
> The Chairman: In my opinion the "ayes" have it.
> Mr. Lacombe: On section 3, Mr Chairman—
> The Chairman: Section 3 is carried.
> Mr. Lacombe: Section 3 is not carried.
> The Chairman: I am sorry, but it is carried.
> Mr. Lacombe: It is not carried.
> The Chairman: It has been carried.
> Bill reported.

This is an outrage on parliament; this cannot be tolerated. I said once that the greatest reproach to parliament is the fact that the supreme and only rule here is the will of the government. That is bad. I am very sorry that the gentleman who was then Chairman has been rewarded with a promotion to the other place; it means that our gain is their loss.

I now come to another matter concerning the rights of parliament. Why did not the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) protest, as against an encroachment on the privileges of the hon. members of this house, when he was informed by the press that a board composed of outsiders was to be substituted for the members of parliament in making a study of civil service matters? It is the duty of the members of the House of Commons to put their noses into that bureaucracy which has been denounced so eloquently by so many hon. members opposite, including the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). But no one said a word about that board.

Let me show what ignorance or disregard for the rules may bring about. For a time, when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was leader of the opposition, he was represented in this house by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I take this opportunity to tell the present leader of the opposition never to pay any attention to any advice given to him by that hon. gentleman. At any rate, during that period many suggestions were advanced from the other side for a union government. The then acting leader of the opposition was only acting, acting on behalf of his mentor; but this is something worth saying, even if I cannot say anything else, and even though my time should be up. I hold in my hands the Votes and Proceedings of February 1, containing the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the subamendment moved by the hon. gentleman who leads the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. Are they two or one? They are two in one. When the vote is called it will be exceedingly amusing to discover that it will be impossible for you, Mr. Speaker, to call two divisions. You will have to call only one, because the subamendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group does not subtract from the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition; it is in addition to it. Therefore all the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group wants is what the leader of the opposition asked for, plus a little more. This means that probably there will be a union between the official opposition and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. It means that in the first debate of the session, when the parties have to take their stand, they say, "We think alike, and we are a little more cocky." It will be amusing to see the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group voting with the official Progressive Tory opposition, and will be very amusing to see my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, his antediluvian predecessor and all others, vote for the following subamendment, for it is in the light of this situation that the subamendment must be read:

> And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

Therefore, all those good Tories will vote for the mobilization of wealth. Oh, that is most amusing. But I wonder if the house will permit the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) to amend again the subamendment. Otherwise hon. members who will witness that solemnity will never regret it.

I have many other remarks to make, but I shall have to summarize my position with respect to the Liberal party. I am most fortunate in having as desk-mate a very dear friend—the best desk-mate in the whole house. I am fortunate, too, in being next to the former Minister of Public Works and Transport (Mr. Cardin), who, in years of service, is dean of the house. I have been a Liberal; I am a Liberal, and I will always remain a Liberal. I did not change at all. I have never changed. Therefore why should I change my seat? Perhaps I should use the words of Disraeli, when he was blamed by Sir Robert Peel for some criticism of a budget and said. "I have been elected to sit here; I sit here; that is all."

If I did not get all I asked for, at least there has been some improvement in the last report of the auditor general. It took a long time, but I gained something. We say that if the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères had not acted as he did; if Liberal members who gave a solemn warning to the government last year had not done so; if the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy)—and a very excellent member he is—and the very brilliant new member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) did not think as they do, and as they did, it would be much worse now than it actually is.

My idea of national selective service is that each man shall serve his country during the war to the best of his ability and in that field in which he can render the best service. I am proud of my fellow citizens. I believe there is no better man in the world than a Canadian. I do not see why the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has imported Alexander Gunn, a man who knew nothing about Canadian affairs, to make reports on the transfer of what he, Mr. Gunn, thought to be a non-essential industry into what he, Mr. Gunn, thought to be an essential industry. I do not agree. Moreover, if national selective service is to be applied successfully, this can be done only by a man who has, first, enough authority; second, enough information; and, third, enough freedom of action to decide where the draftees shall be directed. Therefore, sir, it is absurd to think of a national selective service which would work successfully when we know that for the most part they are acting on the requisitions of the brass-hats who parade the streets in uniform, and who have never been in any theatre of war.

The national selective service should consider the case of each individual, not only from the individualistic point of view, but from the point of view of the service which each individual can best render the state. That is why I have not been impressed by the instructions sent out by Mr. MacNamara to the chairmen of the boards. Why am I not impressed? For the very good reason that it is only a palliative, that it will not improve the conditions of agriculture, because it does not touch those deserving farmers who are needed in the fields but who are kept by force in the army.

I have in my hand Hansard of July 13, 1942, in which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is reported as having said that it would be hard to let soldiers or draftees go to any civilian occupations. That is the way it is done. Unless the national selective service has authority not only over the draftees who have not had their training, but also over those draftees who did not enlist voluntarily, but were farmers or railway workers or lumbermen, the national selective service will never work successfully. I am not a labour man, but my contact with the farmers, with railway men, lumbermen and other labour men, has proven to me that there is the sore spot. Unless it is remedied at once, as has been pointed out by the premier and minister of agriculture in Quebec, by the minister of agriculture in British Columbia and by the minister of agriculture in Ontario, and as said by Mr. Hepburn himself at Hamilton, we shall face a famine or a state of hunger in this land of plenty.

How can we be called isolationists when we are willing to help the allies throughout the world? We are doing so. The whole country is doing so, magnificently. We have tried to help the soldiers. And I will tell you more than that. I hear some people complaining about the province of Quebec. When they complain, do they take into account the number of men and women in my province who are working in war industries and in other industries connected with the war effort? Do they consider the number of fine boys who have enlisted—over 2,000 of them from my constituency — in the three branches of the service? They deserve a tribute, and we must help them. We must look after them, and try to improve their condition of living and of health.

What has been done with regard to venereal disease in the army? In the United States many of the papers refer quite frequently to this plague. I have a copy of PM which refers to what is being done in connection with syphilis and gonorrhoea in the United States. Last year that country, under President Roosevelt, that great citizen whom we all admire, spent $8,000,000 to prevent these diseases; this year they are spending $15,000,000. What are we doing? Last year Canada spent only $50,000, and $165,000 for contraceptives to be given to the army.

I hate to say that, but it is the truth. It is a scandal. Our boys should be protected against those who have these diseases. Our boys should be looked after. When a French-speaking boy is placed among English-speaking soldiers, quite often he is miserable because he cannot speak that language. Such boys should be looked after. I believe that good food is bought, but is it well prepared? Are they well looked after? That is a great concern in many homes.

In conclusion, I have only one word to say. I have spoken at some length about the rules of the house because that is an important matter. The day we do not have free speech in this house, that day we might just as well stop and close up parliament. We are not here to create trouble for the government or to show any rancour in connection with any minister. That is much beneath us. We are here to serve our country to the best of our ability and to see that this country is not disrupted when peace comes. What kind of peace shall we have after the war? The aftermath of the war will be just what the present is. If we have no order now, what order can we expect to have after the war? When a member of parliament makes a recommendation to the government in that connection he should be listened to; the government should take note of what is said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, a few moments ago when Your Honour was momentarily absent from the chamber the hon.

member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) used with respect to myself certain language which, to say the least, was abusive, if not insulting. At the time I raised a question of privilege and asked that the statement be withdrawn and expunged from the record, but the hon. gentleman who was temporarily in the Chair did not see fit to deal with the incident. I am asking if Your Honour will be good enough to get the record of Hansard over the dinner recess and read for yourself what was said, and that what I requested should be done. I ask Your Honour to give a proper ruling because I have no intention of sitting in this house and being abused by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I deny flatly what has been said. I never abused the hon. member. He suffers from the mania of persecution.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall look at Hansard over the dinner recess.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this time to support the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, may I say that any citizen in Canada cannot fail to be proud of the part that we are playing in the present crisis. Like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) I have had the good fortune to be able to travel a good deal during the recess. I should like to pause at this stage to thank the hon. member for the valuable public service he performs each year by travelling extensively and then giving the house and the country the benefit of his observations. I appreciate particularly the reference he made yesterday to the Saskatchewan river and hope that some day a government of this country will carry into effect the constructive proposals made by the hon. member.

I visited all the provinces of Canada during the recess and was able to acquire first-hand information regarding our achievements in many fields of activity. The hon. members who moved and seconded the motion told us of the achievements of the army. The comments which have been made in the house indicate that these expressions have been valued by all hon. members. I have seen the development which has taken place across the country in our air force, and I have never ceased marvelling that a country with such a small population should in such a short time have been able to build up these training centres and train so many of our young men and our young women. While I was in Charlottetown I visited the home of an instructor in the air force, and while looking through his wife's scrap book I came across a citation which he treated in a most casual way. It read as follows:

> Promotion to the rank of pilot officer came to Flight Sergeant Mullen soon after the award of the D.F.M., the citation for which said: "Since September, 1941, Flight Sergeant Mullen has completed over 30 operational flights of which 25 have been completed at night. Disregarding danger he has pressed home his attacks against enemy ships at mast head height in face of heavy anti-aircraft fire from the vessels and shore batteries. The success he has achieved has been gained by his undaunted keenness."

Here was a young lad just out of his teens when he joined the air force, who had been a clerk in a bank in a small western town but who had trained himself in a short time to perform this spectacular work, yet was still alive to have me read about it in his presence. I mention this incident because it is merely one of many that could be recorded of the heroism of our young men who have done such remarkable work.

Likewise the achievements of the navy must bring pride to the minister and to all those from coast to coast who have contributed to its success. At an eastern port I found myself in conversation with a very young master of a boat. When I remarked on his youth he replied that he was much older than he seemed to be, that he would soon be twenty-five. When we think of young men who, until a few years ago, had never seen a body of water larger than a slough and realize that they are now sailing the seven seas and keeping open our channels of communication, surely we must take pride in the Canadian navy.

I visited a number of munition industries, and here again the accomplishments in production will provide a most interesting chapter in Canada's war history. At one large factory I saw PBY's being made. When you stop to reflect that the cost of the labour and material going into one of these machines is greater than the value of the automobiles owned by all the members of this house you get some idea of the work that is being undertaken to carry out our commitments.

While our achievements have been worth while, the question we should ask is not, what have we done but rather, have we done our best? When we compare our effort with what our allies in Great Britain and Russia and China have been doing we cannot be satisfied with Canadian accomplishments to date, and therefore when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) moved his amendment regretting that his excellency's advisers had failed to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canadian man-power and woman-power I think he was dealing with something that is quite fundamental. Even though we have been at war for over three years, we still have not a comprehensive plan which will permit every person in this country to make his maximum contribution to the war effort and permit every industry to be employed in the manufacture of goods essential for our war needs and civilian consumption. We have large numbers of men in the army, in the air force, in the navy and in war industries. I am not saying that we have too many in any of these services, but I am saying that we have not yet had a comprehensive plan showing how many a nation of eleven millions can have in the army, the navy, the air force and munitions industries and at the same time have produced on the farms, the forests and the mines all those commodities which are equally necessary in carrying the war to a successful conclusion. Consequently I think that even at this very late date the government should announce a complete over-all plan which will make clear how many men we can afford to have in these important services.

The amendment makes reference to the failure of the government to evolve a satisfactory labour policy. I shall not deal with that because my colleagues can deal with it more adequately than I can. I merely want to say that as I have travelled and spoken to people in industry I have been unable to find that spirit of enthusiasm for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that I have found for the work of the Ministers of National Defence.

Paragraph (c) of the amendment deplores the failure of the government:

> To provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

We in this group have insisted ever since the war started that the production of food is a war industry. The time will come when large supplies of food will be a very important weapon in winning friends for us among the peoples of the occupied countries. The time will also come when, if present policies are not changed, shortages of essential foods in Canada and among our allies will have a serious effect upon our own morale and upon theirs. It has been necessary to ration butter, and I am not complaining about the amount of butter that is allowed. I understand that the men of the armed forces are to have less meat in the future, and I assume that the Canadian people could consume less meat without any serious effects upon our health; but if the situation grows as much worse in the next year as it has done in the last, we shall be confronted with serious domestic problems. It does not matter where you go in Canada, whether you speak to a farmer in Prince Edward Island or in British Columbia, you will hear dissatisfaction expressed with the agricultural policy carried out by this government. Recently I received a marked copy of the Prairie Messenger, of Muenster, Saskatchewan. It is a Catholic family paper published by the Fathers of St. Peter's at Muenster. This paper could not be accused of trying to embarrass the federal administration. In a leading editorial dealing with the farm labour shortage it quotes the statement made by former President Hoover of the United States on January 21 of this year:

> We place agriculture in the first rank of the war effort alongside tanks and planes . . . the fate of the war may depend upon the farmer. . . . The place of the capable farmer is the farm if he is to contribute his maximum to the war effort.

The editorial goes on to refer to the resignation of R. H. Milliken, K.C., who was appointed special agricultural representative of the national war services board at Regina. After being in office for only two months, he threw up his hands in despair. In one week he had a thousand requests for help, indicating the wide dissatisfaction with this government's policy in Saskatchewan. The speech made by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Gregory) the other evening and speeches made by members on the government side of the house indicate that the criticisms of the government's agricultural policy are not limited to opponents of the administration.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: During the dinner hour I have read over the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and particularly those passages against which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) protested. The hon. member for Témiscouata spoke as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I would ask the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to keep quiet. I will not listen to any interruptions. I had enough trouble when he was leader of the opposition without having him start again when there is another gentleman occupying that seat.
>
> Mr. Pouliot: Then let him sit down. I will be rough.
>
> The acting Speaker (Mr. McCann): Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I have been disturbed enough by him in former days and I will not stand for it now.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): On a question of privilege, I made no observation—

Mr. Pouliot: He groaned.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): —but I did make a remark in an undertone. If I had done a great deal worse than that it would have been appropriate, but all I was doing was making a remark in a low undertone.

Mr. Pouliot: He is wasting my time. He has no reason to do that.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I do not intend to have the hon. member for Temiscouata abuse me or make derogatory remarks about me and I ask that that be withdrawn. I would ask Your Honour so to rule.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, that having been said, I will come to the great tribute that was paid by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the former leader of the opposition. I wish the hon. member for York-Sunbury a long life. I hope he will live to be a centenarian, but when he dies I hope he will put a clause in his will that Hansard containing the remarks of the Prime Minister about him be put in his coffin. Such things must be kept even in the other world. I know that several supporters of the government were very jealous when they either heard those remarks or read them.

In the next reference to the incident the hon. member for Témiscouata said:

Let me show what ignorance or disregard for the rules may bring about. For a time, when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was leader of the opposition, he was represented in this house by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I take this opportunity to tell the present leader of the opposition never to pay any attention to any advice given to him by that hon. gentleman.

The hon. member for Témiscouata said further:

It will be amusing to see the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group voting with the official Progressive Tory opposition, and it will be very amusing to see my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, his antediluvian predecessor and all others, vote for the following subamendment, for it is in the light of this situation that the subamendment must be read.

I was absent from the Chair for ten minutes during which this incident occurred and therefore I cannot deal with the attitude or the demeanour of the speaker, which may have accentuated and made his remarks offensive to the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I wish to protect as jealously as I can the right of every hon. member from insult and therefore have scrupulously examined and have read every sentence uttered by the hon. member for Témiscouata, referring to the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I must say that from the printed record, apart altogether from the question of taste, of which every hon. member must be his own judge, there is nothing said by the hon. member for Témiscouata which I could consider unparliamentary.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Very early in the present war the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) outlined a policy which, for this country, was quite revolutionary, when he suggested that whatever might be physically possible would be made financially possible. That policy was repeated by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) when he was Minister of Finance, and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has also indicated it as his policy. It seems to me that, as far as the Department of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply are concerned, this policy has been carried out, but as far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned it would appear that we are proceeding on the assumption that what is physically possible is not to be made financially possible. Members who have spoken in the house, from all the provinces of Canada, have repeatedly expressed the opinion that our farmers are not receiving a fair share of the national income. I was interested in hearing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day. I recall that when he spoke in 1940, after his return from the old country, he made a prophecy which would leave us at the end of 1945 with a shortage of fifty million bushels of wheat. The minister has not been using statistics extensively since then, but on Tuesday last he did give us some figures to create the impression that, after all, the farmers of the country are not in a very bad position. I have before me the most recent statistics with regard to prices and price indices for December, 1942, and I find that if we take 1926 as the base, at the end of December, 1942, farm commodities are still at 87 per cent of what they were in 1926, and if we assume that there were fair prices in that year, farm commodities are still below what a fair price should be. It is true that prices for animal products are up at 117, but let me remind the house that a year ago, at the end of December, animal products stood at 100 and field products at 59, the average being 74·6, and in December, 1940, field products stood at 52 and animal products at 91, the total being 67·1.

The farmers of Canada do not desire from this government or the people of Great Britain prices out of line with those of other commodities, but they are asking for a fair share of the national income. When the victory loan campaign was organized about a year ago the Minister of Finance asked the people of Saskatchewan to raise $8,000,000 as their part of that national effort, and at the same time he asked the residents of Toronto to raise $180,000,000; or, on a per capita basis, he wanted $10 per person from the citizens of Saskatchewan, and $273 per person from the residents of Toronto. That wide divergence gives some indication of the low standards of living that have been forced on a large section of Canada.

I can understand that the members of the cabinet have to meet in council and decide how our national income is to be used, and I know the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply are able to go to council and tell of pressing needs. It would seem to me that when the Minister of Munitions and Supply wants $20,000,000 to build a new factory, there is no question about a price ceiling or what will happen as a result of giving more wages to more people. When the Minister of National Defence, or the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, or the Minister of National Defence for Air wants any large amount of money, it seems that these sums are available. Although the Minister of Agriculture does not represent such a spectacular group, he does represent over 700,000 families across the dominion. I wish that the Minister of Agriculture would enter the council and put up as good a fight for those he should represent as the other members apparently do.

Grant Dexter, writing in the Winnipeg Free Press on February 5, gave an outline showing why there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with the government's man-power policy. He records the fate of every hundred calls sent out by the national selective service board. Apparently eleven of those to whom notices were sent never received them. Twenty-eight of those who did receive them paid no attention to the calls. Fifty-nine turned up for medical inspection, and of those fifty-nine, twenty-five were placed in category "A"; sixteen received postponements, nine for agriculture and seven for industry; fourteen reported to military camps, of whom three were later sent home, leaving eleven available for home defence. The complaints that have been coming from all parts of Saskatchewan indicate that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the government's handling of the man-power situation, particularly as it affects agriculture.

I must press on to the amendment moved by the leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell):

> . . . we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

I am sorry I have not time to develop this very important clause fully. I shall have to confine my remarks to a single industry which I think should be mobilized at the earliest possible date. I am very glad that the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) has achieved a good deal of publicity in Ontario by advocating what the members of our group advocate, namely, that the government should immediately take over the brewing industry as a war industry. Possibly hon members will be surprised to hear this industry mentioned as an essential war industry. I have received a marked copy of the Evening-Times-Globe, of Saint John, New Brunswick, dated February 8, containing a report of a speech made in that city by the Rev. Doctor J. R. Mutchmor of the board of evangelism and social service of the United church of Canada, in which speech he stated that he was not opposed to the shipment of beer to the British forces in Africa. I should like to state again that I am not opposed to the men of his majesty's army having available to them beer and other liquors when and where they want them. But I do think that the policy of shipping this material and of deciding how much should be made available should be decided by the responsible members of this government. The press report reads in part as follows:

> . . . I am unalterably opposed to the wasteful use of shipping space for the transportation of upper Canadian beer.
> Doctor Mutchmor stated that, "the federal Minister of Trade and Commerce says the British war department has ordered the beer. I claim that it is a manipulation and duplicity; that by having it ordered by Whitehall it is chargeable to Britain's credit fund in Canada; it classifies beer as a tool of war, making possible a ninety-nine per cent rebate in customs and excise taxes to brewers on all supplies, such as bottles, brought in from the United States, and enables brewers to charge depreciation and partly escape excess profits taxes."
> Dr. Mutchmor declared that "it is a brewers' racket."
>
> He said that "as far as can be determined the monthly shipments from November 1941 onward have been at the rate of from 600,000 to 800,000 dozen bottles per month."
> "From a conservative estimate it appears that the total quantity of Canadian beer exported to British forces in the Middle East and Egypt has been an amount sufficient to fill a train of box cars 250 to 300 miles long."

I ask hon. members to picture a railway train with an engine in the city of Quebec and its caboose in Ottawa and the entire train, extending from this city to the ancient capital, filled with cases of beer en route to the middle east; or to think of a train coming from the west with its engine in Ontario and its caboose in Saskatchewan, and every mile of the mainline of the Canadian Pacific railway filled with box cars loaded to capacity with beer en route to the middle east. We heard the Minister of Munitions and Supply state this afternoon that submarine losses have been alarming. Apparently, however, we have been able to find space for these very large shipments.

Doctor Mutchmor went on to state that his information is that there is plenty of beer in South Africa, and that beer for the troops could have been supplied from South Africa with a saving of fourteen thousand miles of carriage. He also said that the beer would have been available in Great Britain.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Pardon me; I think the hon. member just made the statement that Canada found space for this beer. That is not correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, my information is that the beer went from Canada, and I have in my hand a statement of Doctor Mutchmor's to the effect that he had two long interviews with the minister who has just interrupted me, and that the minister did not deny that to date sufficient Canadian beer has been sent to the British forces in the middle east to fill a freight train over three hundred miles long, and Doctor Mutchmor asked three questions to which so far there has been no reply:

1. If beer must be had from North America, why not ship it from New Orleans, 3,000 miles closer than Toronto to Egypt and the near east?

2. Why not ship it from Britain, where there is ample beer as reported in the London Economist August 22, 1942, issue?

3. Better still, why not ship it from South Africa, 14,000 miles closer to Egypt and the middle east than Canadian shipping points mentioned? The London Times of September 25, page nine, reports one South African brewery with a net annual surplus for dividends of more than $1,500,000. This brewery has doubled its bottle-making plant at Talana. There are ample supplies of beer and bottles in South Africa.

I think the minister should take time during the present debate to make some reply to these questions which Doctor Mutchmor has asked.

When I discussed this important question on June 1 last, I made mention of the fact that E. P. Taylor, president of Canadian Breweries, Limited, had been for a considerable time a member of the British supply council. The paper published by Mr. E. P. Taylor, the New World, carried a picture of Sir Arthur Salter, Morris Wilson, E. P. Taylor and Mr. Jean Monnet, and in a statement, he said:

Whether it is an apple or a flying fortress, the British supply organizations endeavour to get these goods to the places most in need of assistance.

My information is that at a time when the beer made by Mr. Taylor's own company was on its way to the middle east, Mr. Taylor was a dollar-a-year man, or at the time this picture was taken he was in the United States as a member of the British supply council. I submit that for the sake of the morale of this country, if the limited space that is available is to be used for the shipment of beer to the middle east, the decision as to how much, if any, should not be made by anyone who is interested in the brewing business. Hon. members who have travelled in this province of Ontario will have been struck by the miles and miles of box cars of what I assume are essential war materials held up all along the way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must press on to another very important subject that I think has not received sufficient consideration up to the present. I refer to our post-war plans. There are too many people who say we have not the time or the energy now to give any thought to the sort of world we shall have after this war. Our failure to clarify in our own minds the sort of society we want is having a detrimental effect on our war effort. Hon. members who heard the New Zealand minister to Washington, Hon. Walter Nash, who was the first minister of finance in the New Zealand labour government, were greatly taken with his story of what they have done in New Zealand. Mr. Nash directly tied up their social security legislation and their conduct of the war. He told us that they have been able to give more to the old people, more to the little children and better medical services to their citizens. He went on to say that no country in the world enjoys a standard of living as high as that of New Zealand, and that his people were fighting to preserve and maintain that standard, that they were determined that when this war was over, no one who had put on a uniform for his country would be worse off, that no one who remained at home would be better off, and that no corporation or individual would be permitted to profiteer. I believe that if this government would declare a policy of that sort, and really carry it out, we would be able to develop a great deal more enthusiasm among our people. Now is the time to make clear to those who are risking their very lives that, when the war is over, we shall do in peace time what we have done in war time, namely, carry out the policy that whatever is physically possible will be made financially possible.

During the course of this debate the leader of this group suggested that we should declare now our intention to spend at least $2,500,000,000 during each of the first two years following the war. Well, we have been voting billions for so long that we probably have not taken time to visualize what we could do with those billions in peace time. I have prepared a little table showing what might be done. This is not an outline of what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will do; it is a calculation I have made, using figures taken from the Canada Year Book, to demonstrate what we could do with just half the annual amount suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I have selected what I think all members of this house will agree are socially desirable objectives. The table is as follows:

Estimated Costs of Some Social Services in Canada for One Year

	No. affected (see Canada Year Book 1942)	Amount per unit per year	Estimated annual expenditure in millions
Old age pensions	186,834	$ 900 00	168·1
Pensions for the blind	6,208	900 00	5·5
Pensions to ex-servicemen	97,145	900 00	87·4
Mothers' allowances
Children	66,952	300 00	20
Every baby	244,316	100 00	24·4
Education
Pupils enrolled in ordinary and technical day schools	2,110,055	100 00	211
University students	49,356	500 00	24·7
Hospitals
Bed capacity—public and private	62,964	1,000 00	62·9
Medical care
Total population	11,505,898	10 00	115
Dental care
Total population	11,505,898	5 00	57·5
Farmers	734,000	300 00	220
Houses	100,000	2,500 00	250
			1,246·5

All the items I have outlined could be undertaken in any year at a cost of $1,246,500,000, or $3,500,000 less than half the amount the leader of this group suggested should be spent in a year's time. Some day the government of this country will have to decide whether we wish to balance our production and our consumption with a large army of unemployed, with slums, poverty and malnutrition, or with full employment, with our people working, with our industries producing at capacity and with the raw materials of the dominion being used in the interest of the people.

But some may say that will mean socialism. Well, people are not as badly frightened these days at the mention of socialism as they were some years ago. Before this session opened I was in the city of Montreal when the Prime Minister of this country and Mrs. Roosevelt took part in a very impressive meeting to raise money for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Many of us were at the Capitol theatre here in Ottawa on Sunday, and were impressed by those pictures which portrayed the remarkable heroism of the people of Russia who are fighting to preserve our freedom. His Excellency the Governor General stood while the national anthem of Russia was being played. People now are coming to understand that those who are socialists do not want to divide everything once and for all. The wealth of the world is something that cannot be divided now and left that way. The wealth of the world is being produced and created every second, every minute. The socialist wants every individual to have the right to work, and everyone who does work to have a fair share of the wealth which is created as a result of their cooperative work.

We realize now that we are living in a cooperative world. Those of us who have been travelling during this severe winter have come to realize how dependent we are upon those section men on the railways who go out when it is twenty, thirty and forty below zero and keep the tracks in order. We have sympathized with the members of the train crews who have been compelled to go out in bitter cold weather to attend to hot-boxes. We consider that, when victory has been achieved, we must continue what we are doing now; that is, we must proceed on the assumption that the resources of this country should be used for an all-out war effort and must be used in the post-war period to give our people a total democracy. One of the best books I have read in the last year is "Last Train From Berlin", by Howard Smith, who was one of the reporters remaining in Berlin until a year ago last December. Smith gives an encouraging picture of recent developments in Germany. In one of his concluding chapters he suggests that if we want to win friends in the occupied countries; if we want to undermine Hitler, the democratic nations should immediately make some declaration of the sort of world they plan. Too many have said, "Wait until the war is over before considering the pattern of our future society". We of this group have felt that now is the time to declare our plan for the post-war period, in order that we may get the best out of the armed forces, those on our farms and in our industries.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I, too, congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Halle) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the excellence of their speeches? I should like also to express my deep appreciation of the men and women in our armed forces who are fighting for us at the present time. These members in uniform keep the armed forces vividly in our minds.

Many of the speeches following those of the mover and the seconder were of a very high order, reflecting much constructive thinking. It was a great privilege to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) setting out the policy of the Canadian government and people at this time. It was a privilege too, to hear the other leaders in the house, who are in the front rank of our legislators. Many hon. members from the west have set out our industrial and agricultural problems. I would mention particularly the hon. members for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), Swift Current (Mr. Graham) and Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who have put before the house some of the things for which the people in the west are asking.

Of course the main business this year is the waging of the war, the raising and maintaining of our men and women in uniform, and supplying them with suitable armaments and foodstuffs. This is the problem which must come before anything else. We must bend our energies individually and collectively toward victory. Some hon. members have mentioned that a land army of women might be formed to help produce more foodstuffs. That may be a good idea. I am wondering if the present employment services could recruit women for work on the land. They know the local needs. Moreover, seasons vary from time to time, and the length of time the women would be needed on the farms would also vary. I believe these employment services should work in close cooperation with provincial departments of agriculture, just as in the past few years the federal government has worked along that line in its effort to supply extra labour on farms. If women are asked to do the work, I know they will do it 100 per cent; because everything they have been asked to do, whether volunteer or paid service, they have attempted to do to the best of their ability. There can be no doubt about that.

I was glad to note that there is hope for some comprehensive scheme of social security and health insurance this session. There are many gaps in our present social insurance I should like to see filled in. I believe it was wise to refer the matter to a committee of the house rather than to bring down legislation at the beginning of the session, because the subject bristles with problems which will have to be met and solved before any system covering all of Canada can be accepted.

The question as to whether this is the time to proceed with such measures is one of importance. However, if we are to have measures ready for the post-war period we shall have to think of them now. At any rate, if we can arrange for some comprehensive system of social security, it shows how we mean to use victory.

We need organization for this task, and I believe the Rowell-Sirois commission of a few years ago showed how a scheme might be evolved. The dominion-provincial conference of January, 1941, failed to make use of that material. However, it is still there for study. I believe we all remember how guilty we felt during those dreadful years of the depression, when methods for the solution of the problem of massed unemployment proved unsuccessful Every humanitarian instinct now calls for some preparation for social security in the post-war period. Every national instinct calls for it, for Canada, like the other nations, needs men and women well nourished in body, mind and spirit. Those depression years cost us a great deal not only in human suffering but also in hard cash. I say that because attempts were made by every public body and by individuals, through taxation, to meet the difficulties.

For instance, at page 15 of book 2 the Rowell-Sirois report states:

> In 1937 the total expenditures of all governments in Canada on social welfare, exclusive of education and war pensions and after-care exceeded $250,000,000. This was more than one-quarter of the total expenditures of all governments, dominion, provincial and municipal, on current account.

Two hundred and fifty million dollars—and was it enough? Did it do any lasting good either to the recipients of the relief, to the tax-payers or to the country? It seems to me that this is where our forethought might be used at this time, namely, in working out a comprehensive system of social security to try to prevent mass unemployment and a repetition of those dreadful years in the thirties.

The Beveridge report has given a new impetus to the consideration of these matters. It provides benefits for men, women and children, in practically all the untoward circumstances of life, at a flat rate of assistance, with a flat contribution. The United States social security act of 1935, which was amended a few years later, provides assistance on a percentage basis. Canada will have to consider which system it wishes to accept, and which one would be more suitable. It may be a matter of compromise, because conditions in Canada differ considerably from east to west.

These two reports, then—the Rowell-Sirois report, chapter 2 of book 2, and the Beveridge report, part 6—set out the background of social services, the why and the wherefore. They are well worth studying.

Let me read to the house briefly from the Beveridge report at page 163:

> Income security, which is all that can be given by social insurance, is so inadequate a provision for human happiness, that to put it forward by itself as a sole or principal measure of reconstruction hardly seems worth doing. It should be accompanied by an announced determination to use the powers of the state to whatever extent may prove necessary to insure for all, not indeed absolute continuity of work, but a reasonable chance of productive employment.

That is a broad principle, and it seems to me that this government has been trying to do that, through some of the committees it has set up. In the early months of the war the cabinet committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation was formed, then the committee headed by Doctor James, and the excellent subcommittees were headed by most able men. Last year's parliamentary committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation will, I believe, be reconstituted this year. It has considered the broad principles of productive employment, and has gone into plans which will aid in preventing mass unemployment of the kind we had during the depression years. They are urging every government, municipal and provincial, and every industry to do what can be done to prepare to change from war production to peace-time production.

What the people want is a chance to work. What shall we do when our present customer who takes all our output, who is insatiable in his demands, who destroys everything he gets—what shall we do when war no longer buys our products? That is a question which will have to be answered. As was pointed out this afternoon in the excellent address of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), that is something which has been in the minds of the cabinet. In carrying out their policy of wage and price ceilings they have had in mind to keep the value of money on a level keel. That is one of the broad principles which will have to be considered in order to prevent unemployment and to secure a livelihood for all. These committees will have an answer, and I hope they give the right answer, as to what our post-war production will go into, what projects and what development of our natural resources will be carried out.

Then again the Beveridge report in pages 154 to 158, has something interesting to say about children's allowances. Here the report discusses the background of the allowances given to children. This is something that I have felt and urged should be incorporated in our unemployment insurance and in the benefits given to returned men. The size of the family should be taken into consideration when allowances are given. There are many who find that the everyday expenses of the larger family run into a great deal more money than those of the smaller family. Every mother who has planned for the table knows that.

To a large extent the state has taken over the primary education of children, and it seems to me that we ought to go a step further and do more for the physical well-being of the children of our land. We should look after their health. This might be done through health insurance, and also through housing conditions so that there will be the type of environment from which good citizenship comes. The dependents' allowance board is working along these lines. It will be remembered that in the beginning provision was made for only two children. I believe it was the intention not to enlist men with larger families, but this principle has been gradually broadened and now the size of the allowance is according to the need of the family.

Last fall dependents' boards of trustees were set up to look into special cases that needed assistance. This was an excellent arrangement. These local advisory boards know the needs of the district. If this legislation is administered with sympathy and forethought, the extra expenses of the soldiers' families will be met. But as in other boards, if the personnel is not sufficiently intelligent and interested, the work will be unsatisfactory. Any legislation is ineffective if those who administer it are not intelligently anxious to make it work. This is something we might consider in connection with some of our present-day boards. If those who hear the appeals are not unduly biased, either in favour of the one who makes the appeal or in favour of the taxpayer who foots the bill, then these dependents' boards of trustees should work well. These dependents do not ask for charity; they are claiming only what is their right—consideration for special needs. There would be fewer worries for those whose burdens no legislation can lighten if these boards worked sympathetically.

Another interesting point in the Beveridge report is the fact that he differentiates between the earned pay of the individual and the rate of benefit. It seems to me that the argument in favour of that is quite sound. He would not have the rate of pay such that there is no margin between what a man may earn and what he would get if he were idle. He puts no premium on idleness or laziness, which is often involved in such schemes. He provides a subsistence level, which to me seems quite low, but above that the individual is encouraged to save and to get more if possible for his other wants. I think most people will approve that principle. There are no people more indignant at the malingerers who draw pay without working than the workers themselves.

At page 166 of the report, Sir William Beveridge goes into the question of the standard of living. One paragraph reads as follows:

> The social surveys showed not only what was the standard of living available to the community just before the war but also that it had risen rapidly in the past thirty or forty years. The recent London and York surveys were designed to provide comparisons with earlier studies. They yielded unquestionable proof of large and general progress. When the New Survey of London Life and Labour was made in 1929, the average workman in London could buy a third more of articles of consumption in return for labour of an hour's less duration per day than he could buy forty years before at the time of Charles Booth's original survey. The standard of living available to the work people of York in 1936 may be put over all at about 30 per cent higher than it was in 1899. This improvement of economic condition was reflected in improvement of physical conditions. In London, the crude death-rate fell from 18·6 per thousand in 1900 to 11·4 in 1935 and the infant mortality rate fell from 159 to 58 per thousand. In York the infant mortality rate fell from 161 per thousand in 1899 to 55 in 1936; in the same period nearly two inches was added to the height of school children and nearly five pounds to their weight. Growing prosperity and improving health are facts established for these towns not as general impressions but by scientific impartial investigations. What has been shown for these towns in detail applies to the country generally. The real wages of labour, what the wage-earner could buy with his earnings just before the present war, were in general about one-third higher than in 1900 for an hour less of work each day. What the wage-earner could buy when earning had been interrupted by sickness, accident or unemployment or had been ended by old age, had increased in even larger proportion, though still inadequately, by development of social insurance and allied services.

That period covered years of peace and years of war, years of prosperity and years of depression—1900-1936. It will be noticed that he states that the real wages had risen. There are some articles in the Toronto Saturday Night of January 9 and February 6 by Don Stairs dealing with this same question in the United States. He draws his information from such high sources as the Annalist, of July 26, 1935, and bases his conclusions on figures from the United States bureau of census, bureau of public roads and the United States department of agriculture, showing that the standard of living had risen in the United States. I tried to get comparable figures from our own bureau of statistics, but could find no comprehensive overall statement. I did, however, find this, that the wage rate in Canada in 1925 was 98·8, and the cost of living, 120·6; that is, the cost of living in 1925 was away above the wage rate. But in 1941 the wage rate was 118·9, and the cost of living, 111·7; that is, the cost of living was lower than the wage rate, which means that the worker could buy more with his money than he could previously. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in his address this afternoon touched upon that and pointed out that the wage earner could buy twenty-seven per cent more with his wages to-day than he could in the years of the first great war. So that there has been an increase in the standard of living in the intervening years, and yet it has not been enough. There are still gaps. There are still a number of people who are living below the subsistence level, and I hope they will be covered by this new security legislation toward which we are moving.

I have touched on a few points on the Beveridge report, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me that the better informed we are on the problems and difficulties which may arise even in the committee, the more likely are we to be able to overcome these difficulties.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, I know that many difficulties of a constitutional and financial character crop up in connection with the drawing up of a social security plan, in view of the size and political structure of our country.

Our way of life is not the same in the east as in the west; and the difference is even greater as between the various provinces, but we are united in our common resolve to reach a common aim, which is to achieve security and material prosperity for all our citizens.

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, we are all Canadians and moreover we are Canadians first and axious to see our noble country freed forever from the fear of destitution while enjoying that freedom for which our armed forces are now fighting.

(Text) If we are going to arrive at a comprehensive over-all system of social security, there will have to be some give-and-take across Canada, because the problem bristles with difficulties and it will not be easy to arrive at a solution. When the United States passed their act in 1935, which was amended later, they set up fifty-one different systems of social security, and the present chairman of their social security board is now advocating that they have a more uniform system. I refer hon. members to the Labor Information Bulletin of last October and the American Labor Legislation Review, where similar views are expressed. Mr. Altmeyer, chairman of the social security board of the United States, said in a broadcast on the American Forum of the Air, on January 17 of this year:

> While I believe responsibility for the establishment and maintenance of a unified comprehensive system of social insurance should be centralized in the federal government, I believe that the actual administration of the system should be highly decentralized, with representative advisory committees and appeal councils in several states.

So that we have before us their experience to help us in setting up and administering our act.

I live in Alberta, and I know the mountains of Alberta. I know the mountain peaks are what we see, but we cannot see the depressions between those mountains. We in the democratic countries have pretty well arrived in our own minds at what the peaks of civilization and of freedom should be. But in between there are those depths which we want to fill, so as to make our civilization of as high an order as we can make it. We must also remember this, that no one country can do it alone. Think of the countries now under the nazi heel, of Norway, tolerant, democratic, freedom-loving Norway, which stood in the very forefront of civilization; and think of Norway now in these last few years! We cannot do it alone, for any progress we might make in our own country could be swept aside by another holocaust of war. We must also think of how these things will be affected by the new international order that will be set up at the end of this war and in which Canada must play its part, because only under a stable international order could we count on having the time to work out our own progress and be assured that what we do is going to endure.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be those of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address. It was most appropriate that two members of the armed forces should have been chosen for that honour.

My next thought is to congratulate my new leader in the House of Commons, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), upon the splendid manner in which he discharged his onerous duty of replying on the address. I should also like to express my appreciation of the conscientious manner in which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) carried on as leader of the opposition in spite of great difficulties, and of the high plane on which he conducted debate in this house and always endeavoured to raise its level.

Coming to the speech from the throne, I am sure that we were all inspired by the meeting of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill at Casablanca, and now we know the result of their conference. One wonders where Mr. Churchill will be next. He is the dynamic spirit that has carried the allies through their struggles. I should like also to say a word in appreciation to the British people and our allies the United States, the Russians, the Chinese and all the smaller nations, for what they have done towards victory. It seems that now we are on the way to victory.

This afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) made a few remarks on which I would comment briefly. He pointed out that last year only 1,200,000 man hours were lost. I would ask him how many man hours have been lost this year, since the beginning of the year, through strikes. I estimate that we have lost already, in the steel strike alone, 1,200,000 man hours which should not have been lost, because there should not have been a strike. The trouble had been coming for such a long time that it should have been avoided if the government had taken courageous action in that regard.

My house leader has set out in a splendid manner the platform of the Progressive Conservative party as laid down in the convention at Winnipeg. I would remind the house that our party had a convention in 1927 at Winnipeg. There a platform was laid down which was progressive, and our party carried that platform into effect during their term of office. I might recite a few of the progressive features. There was the Natural Products Marketing Act, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Bank of Canada Act, the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, the Canadian Farm Loan Act extensions, the Canadian Fishermen's Loan Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Act to Provide for Minimum Wages, the Act to Provide for Limitation of Hours for Work and a Weekly Day of Rest, the Dominion Housing Act, the Act to Provide for an Economic Council, and the Employment and Social Insurance Act.

It is true that some of this legislation was declared and improperly declared invalid, but there is no doubt that enabling legislation could have been obtained from the provinces in order to validate a good deal of it. The Liberal party and the government, however, with their laissez-faire method, did not raise a finger toward that end. The Employment and Social Security Act went a good deal farther than the Unemployment Insurance Act of to-day, and some of the ideas contained in that act are only now embodied in the speech from the throne.

I mention these things only to show the sincerity of our party, who have a habit of keeping their promises. May I point out that the word "Progressive" is not new in our party. In 1854 Sir John A. Macdonald, writing to Captain Strachan in the city of Toronto, said that he hoped the Conservative party would be broad enough to embrace all progressive Conservatives. Since confederation, practically all social legislation and great reforms have been put into effect or instigated by our party. As my leader pointed out, a part of our policy to-day has been embodied in the speech from the throne. It was amusing to hear the Prime Minister say the other day in the house that it has taken our party twenty-five years to catch up with his party, when last year, in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) said to his own party and to the government that this government never did anything unless it was forced to do so by the Conservative opposition.

The Liberal government has never given leadership; it has always followed with a policy of laissez-faire. In that regard I would say a few words about the laissez-faire attitude of the Liberal party and the Liberal government with respect to old age pensions. I do not think anyone will disagree with me, or contradict me, when I say that Canada has treated in a disgraceful manner her old people who have passed their useful age. When one considers that they have been good citizens all their lives; when one considers that they have probably raised a family and, through no fault of their own, have been unable to provide for their old age and are now in the evening of life, it seems to me it is the right of these people to have some provision made for them. And what do they get? A dollar a day is the maximum they can obtain under the old age pension scheme, or $240 a year, and if they have more than $300, including pension, the pension is reduced, making a total of $300. It is a terrible thing for old people to have to live on a dollar a day or less, but not a finger is raised by the government to remedy this situation. Not only that, but if they happen to have a boy in the armed forces from whom they are getting a dependent's allowance, the old age pension is reduced by that amount, and all for the sake of a few paltry dollars.

It would take a long time to get legislation through the House of Commons to take care of this situation, and I say that the government ought to do it at the present time. It can be done under the War Measures Act. We should have some form of compulsory contributory old age pension scheme to which every one should contribute, from the dustman to the highest in the country, and everyone should accept the pension. Moreover, fancy having a means test for these old people and the investigation they have to face! It is degrading, and some remedy should be provided immediately. It took this opposition a long time to get the government to put into force some remedy for the condition of the widows and some benefits for the dependents of soldiers, and I suppose it will take a long time to get this put into effect.

With regard to the man-power problem, is man-power being used to the best advantage? In 1940 we had national registration, and as far as I know the only thing it has been used for has been call-ups. That registration would have been of great use if the questions asked had been more carefully thought out. "Can you milk a cow?" was one. Were they going to put all the people who could milk a cow into one category? The only thing that has been milked is the public; they have been milked for the cost of the plebiscite and of the national registration to the tune of some two and a half million dollars.

The government as far as its man-power policy is concerned is, after two years, back just where it was before. Some time ago they made a start; they got Mr. Little here, and what happened? He was forced to resign. Why? On account of lack of cooperation by the government. There was no man-power policy until he came. He established a good policy, but he was so trammelled and worried by the government that he was just forced out. The government did not have courage to back up the man they put in. We now have a new man, and I suppose there will be another policy.

The other day we received a copy of a letter—it was called an interpretative letter—sent out, I take it, for the guidance of the judges who were to judge what was to be done. The letter says that the agricultural worker is, of course, free to volunteer for active service. It goes on to say:

> It is the intention of the regulations that agricultural workers are to be retained in agricultural employment as far as practical through the national selective service (civilian) regulations. To the extent that their services can be spared from the farms during the "off-crop" season they are to be encouraged to take temporary seasonal employment in lumbering and logging, forestry, fishing, coal and base metal mining.

Why are they allowed to go only into the primary industries? Some of them live near other industries which at times need casual help during the off season on the farms. Do they have to go away from their homes in order to go into these industries? Some of these farmers have a trade; can they not work at their trade? Then again, why should they be allowed to volunteer for active service if they are essential to an agricultural job? To my mind, the outstanding factor in determining whether or not they should volunteer is the essentiality of the man to the job, not whether it is an essential job. If they are essential to the job they should not be allowed to volunteer. On the other hand, some recognition of this should be given to them so that there would be no stigma on their name after the war for not having enlisted for active service. The same thing applies in other industries.

I should like to cite a case; no doubt there are many others. A young man, married, was sent over to England in 1940; he was one of several others specially picked. They were chemists and were sent over by the government of Canada to learn a specialized industry which was to start up in Canada. They came back and were placed in jobs. One man was placed in charge of a very special job. But he was unhappy in his job. He was an essential man in the industry, but he was unhappy because his friends had enlisted in the army. For that reason and as a duty he volunteered for the army. He was afraid that after the war there would be a stigma on his name because he had not served overseas. That man is not doing the job in the army as he could do a job in essential industry in Canada at the present time. There should be some way of preventing such things as that. There are many square pegs in round holes, men who have been taken from industry and agriculture and put into the army. Something should be done to take care of that situation. Unless something is done, agriculture will in very truth become what the Prime Minister called it in his radio address, namely a war casualty. Just think of the Prime Minister of Canada calling agriculture a war casualty!

The government have fooled around with this man-power business long enough; they should get busy and lay down some policy. Labour in many instances is not being economically or efficiently employed. At times men in factories are working only half-time, although they are at the factory all the time. The employers are wondering how to keep them busy while certain changes are being made. I know it is hard to get men back if they are laid off; but we do not want to lay them off; there should be some system, some pooling arrangement whereby those men could be placed on some other job where they could be useful in the meantime. Some planning ought to be done in that regard.

Our young men have responded nobly to the call of duty. I just want to remind hon. members of the situation a few years ago when some of the finest young men in Canada, called transient unemployed, were riding the rods during the depression trying to find work, but nothing was done for them. In fact, one hon. gentleman in this house, who was sitting on the other side at that time, spoke of them in not very nice terms, calling them spineless, pap-fed saps. What are those spineless pap-fed saps doing now? They are in the army, the navy, the air force, fighting the battles of our country in spite of the way in which they were treated during the depression. We must never let such a situation occur again in this country.

I have before me some figures with regard to the call-up. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act the army asked for 150,309 home defence conscripts covering the call-up operations for 1941-42. There were 750,611 notices sent out, of which 87,465 were not delivered. This left 663,146, out of which number there were 216,791 from whom nothing was heard. They either had enlisted or died or been killed or dodged the draft. This left 446,355. Of these, 189,491 were in category A, leaving 256,864. Of these 120,610 obtained postponement, and I do not know what happened to the remaining 136,254.

These figures are interesting, but they do not jibe with the next figures. Notices to report for military service were then sent to 173,525 men; why, I do not know. Of these notices, 9,345 were not delivered, leaving 164,180. Of these, 32,826 vanished, I do not know where, leaving 131,354 to report at the training centres. Of these, 23,676 were found unfit, so that in all the army got 107,678 instead of the 150,309 they wanted. Mr. Grant Dexter summed it up in the Free Press in this way: Out of every 100 notices there were 11 not delivered, 28 never heard from, 59 turned up for medical inspection, 28 in category A, 16 postponements—9 agriculture and 7 industry—and 14 reported to camp. Three were unfit, and the army got 11 out of 100.

If that is not muddling along, I do not know what is. Why should we have such a ridiculous situation? Why should we send out 750,000 notices and find that 216,790 were never heard from, with apparently no one knowing where they are? If we do not know where they are, why not? But while this call-up was going on, there were thousands of other young men—good men, too—who volunteered for service anywhere in the world. Some of these men were vitally needed for our home production, in coal mines, toolmaking, as scientists and so on. Many of these men were essential to industry. There is a waste of effort; there is a lack of planning all the way through. Here are the three branches competing among themselves for men, with no cooperation whatever. The armed forces, industry and agriculture all want men, and they are given no direction at all.

I have in my hand a copy of a memorandum prepared at the beginning fo the war by General McNaughton concerning the supply of skilled men and tradsemen to the armed forces and to industry, from which I should like to read one paragraph.

> Under a system of voluntary service in the armed forces there is a probability, having regard to the character of the Canadian people, that many men with the highest qualifications of all sorts will seek active service. The problem of ensuring that industry is not deprived unduly of the skilled engineers, mechanics, etc., on whom the rapid expansion of production depends by reason of their enlistment in or appointment to commissions in the armed forces, is thus prevented.
> Some trades are vital, others are less important, and others again can be dispensed with under conditions of national emergency; hence a list of "reserved occupations" is needed.
> Some industries are important to or for the production of munitions; others for the maintenance of vital services to the civil community; others again which are active in peace are of little importance in war. In consequence, a list of "essential industries" is required.

Where is the list of essential industries? Has it ever been prepared? General McNaughton says what I have also mentioned previously:

> . . . having regard to the character of the Canadian people, that many men with the highest qualifications of all sorts will seek active service.

Many have done so, and many of them should be in essential industries in Canada. This memorandum goes on to point out how this question of national selective service should be worked out. Have these suggestions ever been followed by the Department of Labour? Judging by the results, I would say they never have.

That is all I have to say with regard to the man-power muddle, and now I should like to say just a few words with regard to the work of this session of parliament. We in this house have been accused of wasting time and of repetition, and of neglect in passing the estimates. I think last year it was said that we passed $36,000,000 through the house in thirty-six minutes. I would say that this is not the fault of the opposition; it is the fault of the government of the day. At the present time there is no proposed legislation on the order paper outside the $1,000 million resolution. Why should the proposed legislation not be there, so that members of the house may study it and become familiar with it, in order that they may know what they are talking about when it comes up? We shall have the war appropriation bills in a short time; and if we do as we did last year, almost every hon. member will want to speak half a dozen times or more on the same thing. Why could we not have the war appropriation bill set out in some orderly fashion, something like the estimates, so that the discussion might be carried on in an orderly way? By that means a great deal of repetition would be avoided. If we have a reasonable breakdown of the expenditures, which we are entitled to; if we are shown how the money was expended by the various departments, a great deal of the time of the house will be saved and we shall have the whole story.

Much more information should be given this house. We want to know what is going on. But when we ask for information it is always the same old story; we are told that it is not in the public interest, or that it will give information to the enemy. Well, I have before me a report to the 78th congress of the United States on lease-lend operations, published by Edward R. Stettinius, Junior, lease-lend administrator of the United States. I will not take time to read it all, but there are one or two paragraphs which may be of interest. He mentions some planes, some medium tanks, some anti-tank guns and so on sent to Egypt and then, in connection with the north African campaign, goes on to say that Great Britain provided two-thirds of the warships and transports employed in the original landing operation. Does that give information to the enemy? The report states:

> Sixty per cent of the ground forces were American and the air forces were equally divided. Of the landing craft employed most were American-built. Some had been lend-leased to Britain and were manned by British crews. United States fighter squadrons, on the other hand, flew 160 Spitfires provided by Great Britain under reciprocal aid.

Then it goes on to say:

> Supplies lend-leased by Britain to our armed forces included such items as 100 miles of portable air-field runways, more than half a million anti-tank mines and grenades, 130 reconnaissance boats, four complete 1,000-bed field hospitals, and medical supplies for 100,000 men.

It tells also, by tables, where these articles went. Then again at page 50 there is further information about the material supplied. Does it give information to the enemy? Or is it "not in the public interest"? It is certainly in the public interest. The public are paying the shot, and the public are entitled to know what they are getting for their money. That is what I think about the matter. There is no reason in the world why we should not have much fuller information before the House of Commons. We are always told it is "not in the public interest".

Moreover, too many statutes are altered by order in council when the house is in session. There is no reason in the world why a report should not be made to the house. After all, we are responsible for the discussion of the rights and wrongs arising when the laws are made. Then, too many regulations are put through without reference to the House of Commons, but while it is in session.

Not only that, but we are supposed to come here and sit for six or seven months, as we did last year, when, I suggest, it would have been far better if we had come for a month, returned home for a month, come back for another month, and then returned home. When we did arrive, much of the work was not ready for us. Had we had an opportunity to return to our homes, we might have discussed some of the measures in our constituencies.

Then, I have in mind the question of the rationing of butter. We were told by the administrator that there was no chance of butter rationing; yet, two months later, butter is rationed. Had the House of Commons been sitting, the administrator would have had the advice of the members, coming as they do from various parts of the country—members who know what they are talking about. Greater information would have been available, and the whole matter would not have been left to the administrator. There are many other matters which might be discussed by members of the house, either in the house or in committee, before regulations are put into effect.

After all, members of the House of Commons are responsible to the people, while the administrators are not. If more opportunity were given to members to discuss matters in the house we might go a long way toward getting rid of much of the dissatisfaction and discontent that exist. Parliament in Canada must be kept supreme. We do not want dictatorship, although we have almost a dictatorship now. We are not consulted about most action taken.

I now come to the matter of questions asked on the orders of the day. This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) undertook to lecture my leader when he asked questions. Is there any reason why we should not follow the practice in the British House of Commons, and have a question hour? Could we not have a similar period? We may put questions on the order paper, and the answers will appear in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings. On a great many occasions questions of great importance are answered very briefly, or by indicating that an order for return will be tabled. Perhaps the lapse of time between the appearance of the question on the order paper and the tabling of the order for return may have the effect of losing any advantage there may be in the answer given.

After all, members of the House of Commons are entitled to know what is happening, and the only way whereby they can get information is by asking questions across the floor of the house. There are just as good reasons why hon. members should receive verbal answers to questions as there are against the reading of speeches. There is no reason why we could not have a question hour during which time public matters could be discussed across the floor of the house.

Our first concern to-day must be for our own self-preservation, the winning of the war. Coupled with that aim is our obligation to see to it that those nations of Europe which are now occupied are freed. It is our obligation to see to it that there is a return of rule and order in the world. In that connection we are anxious to know something about our armed forces. Are our armed forces as efficient as they could be? Have we sufficient reinforcements? What about our auxiliary services? Are those in command of our armed forces the very best we can obtain? We as members of the House of Commons want to know this. Are our weapons the best? Is our equipment the best available, and in sufficient quantities?

We hear rumours and criticisms, and we are entitled to know the truth. No doubt, a little later in the session an opportunity will be given for the discussion of these matters. However, we want these questions answered more fully, and we do not want to hear that it is "not in the public interest" to answer them, or that by answering we would be "giving information to the enemy." The war is not yet won. Probably we are on the top of the hill, and the strength of the allies is probably equal to that of the axis powers. We must not be turned aside from complete and ultimate victory by any premature proposals of peace. Let us not be led astray by any such proposals. Victory and lasting peace can come only when the axis powers are swept from the seas, from the skies and from the territories they now occupy.

The war is our first concern, but we must not overlook the post-war period. Free enterprise must formulate plans against mass deprivation of work. Actual plans must be laid and ready. We cannot allow our forces to be discharged until there is work for them to do; we cannot permit dismissal of those who are now working in munitions factories until they are supplied with other jobs—even if we have to throw into the lake the munitions they may have to make.

Free enterprise must plan. Unless we put our economic and industrial house in order, constructively, the demagogues and the rascals will step in; they will take over and move in. Every crackpot with a promise of $50 every fish day, every scoundrel with hate for humanity in his heart, will try to wrest power for himself and his faction. They will make their appeals to the war weary, the dispirited, the hungry and the jobless. They will offer them pie in the sky, but quick, in exchange for their liberty and dignity. They will promise them jobs from a fuehrer and regular train service of a Duce if the workers will but surrender their freedom and independence. Reason and common sense will go by the board, and the process of evolution which has brought our nation to relative well-being will be wiped away.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to a discussion of some of the questions referred to in the speech from the throne I desire to pay a tribute, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of the members of my group, to those gallant and heroic men who took part in the battle of Dieppe. Dieppe is one more glorious page in history written by Canadians, and it will ever rank in importance with those memorable battles which were fought and won by Canadians in the last war, the Somme, Ypres, Vimy Ridge, Passchendaele and Mons.

In the southern part of my constituency there is a thriving and prosperous town called Stettler. From this town and the adjacent countryside have gone forth many men and women to serve their country in every branch of the armed services. They are giving of their best in every theatre of war where Canadians are found to-day. Some of the men enlisted in the Calgary tank corps, but little did they realize that at some future date they would play a part in what may be looked upon as one of the most important engagements fought thus far in this war.

I recall how the people of that district received the first intimation that their sons had taken part in the Dieppe raid. I recall, too, quite vividly the day when the telegrams were coming in almost hourly, announcing the fate of some of these men on the blood-stained sands of that French shore. Men and women of that district went about their daily tasks dreading what the hour or day might bring forth. When the roll call was finally completed it was discovered that that district had, through its sons, played a leading part in the Dieppe raid. Some of them made the supreme sacrifice and others are languishing to-day in German prison camps.

I read with great care the tribute which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) paid in his speech to the men at Dieppe. It was a wonderful tribute, couched in masterly English as only a master of English could do. He spoke of their resource, their ingenuity, their bravery, their valour and their heroism. All these words struck a sympathetic chord in my own heart as no doubt they did in the heart of every hon. member of this house. But I must confess that I was deeply disappointed at the manner in which he closed his eulogy. While I am precluded from quoting the words he used because they were used in this debate in which we are now engaged, I shall endeavour to give their essence as best I can.

He said that he hoped that word would go out to the living among their numbers that the House of Commons, whatever difference there may be in its parties, was one in its thought for them and its determination to see that everything that was in its power to do would be done to help and support them. Such an indefinite promise as that will, I think, bring cold comfort to many aching hearts. Surely the Prime Minister of this country could be more definite and more specific when making a promise to these men. Never in the history of this country was there given to any man a greater opportunity to assure, not only the dependents of these men who gave their lives, but all men and all women who are fighting the battles of their country in all the armed forces that no matter what might happen to them, Canada would deal fairly with their dependents.

It is tragic to think that such an opportunity should be allowed to go unaccepted. As I contemplate the conditions which are likely to prevail in this country at the close of the present war, unless we change the system under which we are operating, I wonder what will be the fate of these men and these women and their dependents. Would it be too much to ask the Prime Minister not only to pledge himself as leader of the government but also to pledge his party and to pledge parliament and the Canadian people that the wives and the children, the fathers and the mothers of these men shall never know the meaning of the term "economic insecurity."

Rumours fly thick and fast that we are approaching a general election, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that he take unto himself and his party another plank, one which we have had in our platform ever since the war commenced, one which we still have there and one in which we still believe. It is this: "Economic security, with individual freedom for every Canadian citizen." I do not think that is incompatible with anything in the Liberal platform.

I should like to deal now with three important questions which are to be found in the speech from the throne, and in dealing with them I shall reverse the order in which they are to be found in Hansard. Those three questions are (1) the parliamentary assistants to be appointed to assist cabinet ministers whose duties have become particularly onerous because of commitments of war; (2) redistribution of representation in the House of Commons, and (3) social security measures for the whole of Canada.

Dealing with the first one, I am not convinced that any good purpose will be served by the appointment of secretaries to ministers of the crown. I realize, of course, that there are some ministers who perhaps would find themselves displaced by their secretaries within a very short time. There are in the cabinet to-day men who might be stunted or stultified by their secretaries. But I cannot find any man, or any woman for that matter, who would be able to fill the shoes of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). I think anybody would have difficulty in acting as understudy to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), or to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power); and although I do not agree entirely with the methods adopted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), or the manner in which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) deals with the problems of the farmers, I believe that the efforts of these men would be in some way constrained by the appointment of secretaries to them. We have been at war for three and a half years now, and if those departments which have to deal directly with the prosecution of the war have not yet been so organized as to give the ministers a great deal more freedom than they had at the beginning, then there must be something radically wrong. I find myself admiring particularly the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and wondering, as Oliver Goldsmith said of the Village Schoolmaster, how "one small head could carry all he knew." It would be a calamity if anyone were to try to act as understudy in the House of Commons to a man of that calibre.

I come now to the second question—and I can touch on these questions only briefly and superficially—redistribution of the representation in the House of Commons. Gerrymandering has been the sport of the major political parties ever since confederation, and I am quite satisfied that this practice will not be eliminated when redistribution of the present representation comes up in the house for final approval. I believe that the whole question which underlies the representation of the people of Canada in the Canadian House of Commons should be thoroughly gone into. Redistribution of representation has been the subject before a special committee in the British House of Commons, the Vivian committee I believe, and that committee has submitted its report to the British house. I have not seen a copy of the report, I have not read it, but I think it would bear careful study by the committee which the Prime Minister expects to set up at this session.

The war to some extent has caused a shift in the population of this country. Some parts of the west have been badly depopulated; people have moved from that section of the country to more highly industrialized centres in eastern Canada. That is a war problem. It will remedy itself, I believe, at the close of hostilities, if not before hostilities end. For that reason I think this question of redistribution should be shelved for the duration of the war.

I come now to the most important question of all, that of social security measures. Here in this field of human activity and endeavour we find a welter of confusion—plans, plans and more plans. More plans have been advanced by different individuals and different organizations than a dog has fleas. When I spoke in this house last session I tried to emphasize one particular fact. I make no apology for bringing it up again at this session because it is very important. Plans presuppose objectives, and these objectives, so far as I am aware, have not yet been positively defined. Preachers, teachers, newspaper correspondents, university professors, orthodox economists and politicians have hinted at the shape of things to come. I have tried to crystallize in my own way the various ideas which these individuals have expressed from time to time. Here are the things which I think these learned gentlemen would like to impose upon us: (1) A return to the gold standard; (2) The establishment of an international police force; and (3) The complete destruction of British idealism, individualism and initiative, and the substitution of state autocracy.

I will admit that some planning is necessary; but as Major-General J. F. Fuller once said, "A planned world is a damned world, because, unlike the machine, man was not created on a drawing board." Since the war began we have set up controllers to control almost every commodity in Canada, and now we find it necessary to set up a controller to control the controllers. Likewise, in due process of time, I believe we shall have to set up a planner to plan the planners.

Already we have three committees operating in Canada, one under the chairmanship of Doctor Cyril James. They have taken a lot of time and spent a lot of money, and thus far we know little of what they have done. There is also the house committee set up last session which will be reconstituted this session. They have done little or nothing, and now we find there is a committee of the cabinet.

I believe there are plans in existence today in Canada. When the time comes, these plans will be brought forward; but the blueprints from which the plans have been taken will be kept a closely guarded secret. I am suggesting that there are two probable sources from which these blue-prints (upon which the plans will be based) will emanate—one, from the blue-prints which have been made by the bank for international settlements. This may sound rather strange to many, but if hon. members want confirmation of this they will readily get it in the last report which was issued by this pro-axis and mysterious organization presided over by an American, the shares of which are controlled to a large extent by the axis powers. There is ample evidence that these blue-prints are at present in existence.

I wish now to make passing reference to the proposals of Sir William Beveridge. They are causing a vast amount of excitement, and enthusiasm as well, in the minds of the people.

> You cannot hope to bribe or twist,
> Thank God, the British Economist.
> But seeing what the man will do,
> Unbribed there's no occasion to.

What is one nation's Beveridge may be another nation's headache.

Who is this man Beveridge? It is necessary to know something about the man before one can appreciate, or otherwise, his proposals. "By their fruits ye shall know them". In January there appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin a long article dealing with the past history of this gentleman. It is not my intention to read it at length, but I want to read just a few lines:

> He has been a one-man economic reformer in Britain since long before the war.

And here is the significant part:

> He has had an important hand in every major piece of social legislation in the last forty years.

Social legislation which has caused grinding and punitive taxation, social legislation which has produced labour queues, the means test, idleness, want, disease, ignorance and squalor. Then again, to round out the picture, this man has long been closely associated with the London School of Economics. To some of us this fact has special significance. Professor J. H. Morgan, K.C., writing in the Quarterly Review for the year 1929 on the life of Lord Haldane said:

> When I once asked Lord Haldane why he persuaded his friend Sir Ernest Cassel to settle by will large sums on the London School of Economics, he replied "our object is to make this institution a place to raise and train the bureaucracy of the future socialist state".

Anyone who wishes to check me up will find the statement on pages 187-8. I commend that quotation to the earnest contemplation of hon. members of this house.

Three facts should be kept in mind in connection with this statement: (1) Lord Haldane said that Germany was his spiritual home; (2) Sir Ernest Cassel was the alter ego of Jacob Schiff of Kuhn, Loeb and Company of New York; (3) There is ample circumstantial evidence that this company, Kuhn, Loeb and Company of New York, financed Hitler during his rise to power and his subsequent operations. In these days of war and social upheaval we should be very careful of our approach to these post-war problems. Some people tell us that we should forget the past misdeeds of our public men, that the book should be closed and that we should open a new one. That, I contend, is wrong, because it is only by studying the mistakes of the past that we can go forward safely in the future. Certain individuals in this country and Great Britain have brought the British empire to the verge of destruction. Sir William Beveridge is one of them. I hope the day will come when these men, no matter who or where they are, will be ferreted out and will meet their just rewards.

Whatever the merits or demerits of the proposals of Sir William Beveridge may be—I am not discussing the proposals at the present time—there is no doubt in my mind that he has been responsible, indirectly perhaps, for many of the ills which have afflicted the people of Great Britain.

I want to make just two observations in connection with these proposals. First, there is no want in a workhouse or a gaol. Second, this plan is a plan for a servile state.

My time is almost exhausted. My constituency is an agricultural one, with problems which are common to all parts of Canada. I hope to discuss these problems at the proper time later in the session. I should like also to have had time to discuss the problems of the small businessmen, who are the backbone of our communities, the treatment that is being meted out to them at the present time and how they face disaster. Time, however, will not permit.

May I say, in closing, that I do not like the trend in this country toward centralization of power. I believe it was that trend which brought Germany to the point where she is to-day. I believe that unless some radical changes are made, they will at some future time mean the destruction of our own country. We should take heed now before it is too late.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. W. H. MILLS (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I hope I may add something to this debate that will be of assistance to the government, and not just repeat what has been said already. I believe our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of his cabinet should have the cooperation of every member of this house in these trying times. There never was a period when a government had greater responsibility than is the situation at present, when it must bring in legislation that will bring about the greatest possible war effort, so that this conflict may be brought to a successful conclusion; for, if it is not, nothing matters. We must win this war, and that should be the first thought in the mind of each hon. member. We should forget politics; we should stop trying to play for a better position and put forth every effort toward winning the war.

I wish to direct my few remarks this evening to a subject which for some time past has had a great deal of publicity. I refer to the distribution of beef to civilians and to the armed forces, and the sale of beef cattle. In the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I think we have one of the best ministers this country has ever had. Perhaps he has not been praised by all farmers from one end of the country to the other, but he has had a heavy role to play, and I think he has done more to be of assistance to the farmers of Canada than any of his predecessors. He is administering the one department of government that gives us legislation to control prices, the greatest legislation ever placed on our statute books. If this legislation had to be scrapped, however, I should be perfectly content to let everything stand as it is, for, while I believe that prices were frozen when prices of agricultural products had not reached equality with other prices, adjustments have been made from time to time so that there are few complaints to-day. I believe that further adjustments can be made and that everything will be satisfactory.

I should like to add a word of praise for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who has as great a role to play as any man in this government. I think he will go down in history as the greatest Minister of Finance this country has ever had.

In the Ottawa Evening Citizen of Monday last I noticed four articles dealing with the beef situation. Up to that time I had no intention of taking part in this debate, for I believe it should be brought to a speedy conclusion so that we may get on with more important business. I was, however, compelled to clip these articles. One was an editorial which states:

Packing company officials were reported the other day as suspecting that a black market in beef was being operated in the Ottawa district. Whether this is true or not, it is something to be guarded against if United States experience is to be avoided.

Washington is alarmed at the growth of the meat black market. According to Time price administration officials guess that 20 per cent of all live stock slaughtered in the country is going to black-marketers. In New York city alone, illegal meat sales total about $2,500,000 weekly. Cleveland reports that 40 per cent of its meat supply was being side-tracked to the black market.

It should be the firm resolve of meat purchasers as well as responsible government officials that no such situation shall develop in Canada. It would lead to chaos in the marketing of meat and to higher prices everywhere. It could lead to unwholesome meat being sold.

The "black market" process by which meat reaches retail stores is that wherein persons looking for quick profits offer farmers a higher price than the present ceiling on wholesale prices. The meat is killed and is then brought to the towns and cities. The retailers, harried by meat-hungry customers, buy the meat at higher prices and sell at an appropriate figure. And meat-hungry customers do not argue much over ceilings.

It is a difficult problem to deal with this traffic. Coffee and tea are easy. But meat is produced on thousands of farms and is slaughtered in hundreds of big and little abattoirs. The meat may be excellent, even inspected. But the price will be high. People should remember that there is a meat shortage and that the black market only makes the problem worse.

Another article, which I will not take time to read, states that an increase in price is to come into effect to-day, while still another article suggests that rationing of beef may commence about March 1. For the benefit of those who may not know a great deal about the slaughtering of beef cattle I should like to give an illustration, taking a 1,000-pound steer at ten cents a pound live weight. This would cost $100. A good average beef animal as sold on the market to-day will dress about 55 pounds to the hundred, some a little more and some a little less. At 17¾ cents a pound, which was the price when I made up this calculation, 550 pounds of beef would bring $97.65, and the extra 50 cents a hundred now being allowed would bring up that total to about $100. At the price of 17¾ cents, however, you would have to get $2.35 out of the hide to pay for the live animal. But instead of costing 10 cents it is costing up to 12 cents, so that at the ceiling price there will be a loss of $22.35 on every beef animal killed.

In Tuesday's Globe and Mail I noticed a report of the Toronto cattle market, in which it was shown that cattle were selling at from 11 to 12 cents a pound. I believe yesterday there were 55 steers sold in Toronto, according to the market report, at 12·25 cents a pound. So that at these prices, I am asking if there is anyone within my hearing who believes that these beef animals are not sold on a black market? What is the use of our kidding ourselves that we have not a black market right here in Ontario? There can be no doubt about that. My opinion is—and I do not know—that the government is perhaps subsidizing the abattoirs and that the private butchers are selling their beef at more money. There is no question about that; there is no other way to figure it.

What has made the handling of the cattle situation so unsatisfactory has been the frequent change in policy in the last year. The marketing of cattle, and the general beef situation are much different from the pork situation. At the outset of the war the Minister of Agriculture was able to go to England and negotiate a market for our bacon. As a result, there has been an increased demand. He has been able to tell the farmers what was wanted, and that we have an increased market. As far as I know, I have had no complaints whatsoever respecting the bacon and hog markets. But in the west end of my riding I have many beef cattle feeders, and I must say that at least for the last nine months the situation has been most unsatisfactory. This condition I believe arose from the fact that originally the outlet for our surplus beef cattle had been in the United States. That is the market the Prime Minister was able to negotiate within a very few weeks after his election in 1935. We have shipped to that market ever since quarterly quotas amounting to about 200,000 head. As I see it, the feeders had that to contend with. They did not wish to be cut off from that market. An attempt was made to buy our cattle, and to pay us a price equal to the United States price. That did not prove satisfactory. I might say I had a feeder say to me a short time ago, "Do you not think that our market ought to come equal to the United States market?" I said, "No; if it did it would blow the lid off the whole price control, and we would have things as they are in the United States." We do not want prices to go to the point they have reached there.

Perhaps I might explain by saying that I have a brother in Portland, Oregon. I hear from him frequently, and when he writes he usually encloses advertisements from local newspapers. Reading those advertisements, I see that a boy in that city driving a butcher wagon, a bread wagon or a laundry wagon gets $50 a week. If the young men in their early teens in Canada were getting that much money we might be able to get more for our beef cattle—but it would do us no good. If there were no price control the hardware merchants would not know what to ask for manufactured products they have on their shelves. They would not know what replacement values would be.

Last summer cattle prices went up as high as 13½ cents a pound. I do not think that was a good thing; it would have been better had they not reached that height. With that in view, however, the greater number of our feeders bought their cattle last summer at prices which do not permit their selling them on to-day's market, because if we had to stick to the ceiling to-day, the price to the farmer would not be over 9½ cents a pound.

I was in western Canada last fall when word came through to the effect that no more cattle were to be shipped to the United States market. One buyer at Maple Creek had orders next morning to cancel thirteen cars of feed. I had purchased my cattle. They were loaded next day and shipped here. I imagine there never was a time that they could have been bought any cheaper, because there was a heavy demand to keep cattle in the west, there being no other outlet for grain. Cattle offered about the only way in which they could turn their grain into cash.

To satisfy the beef-cattle man in Canada I recommend that the price of dressed beef should be placed at 22 cents a pound.

Mr. GARDINER: That is for carcases.

Mr. MILLS: Yes, carcases. Those cattle would net the feeder about 12 cents a pound. That would satisfy feeders and, considering the prices they paid for their stockers last fall, they need that encouragement. If we take the minister's statement of yesterday to the effect that it takes eight pounds of grain to make one pound of beef, we find that it bears out my contention, because certainly grain is worth at least a cent and a half a pound. This would mean that it would take 12 cents worth of grain to make one pound of beef, to say nothing about the roughage and the labour required to take care of the cattle.

If this were done there would be orderly marketing. We see reports in the press that there are not as many cattle in the country. I know that many feeders are not feeding their cattle as heavily as they might, hoping to carry them along so as to get the high prices next spring. But have we any assurance that if too many cattle reach the market next spring we shall receive the ceiling? One article in a newspaper states that it will reach a high figure on May 27, and that then the market will fluctuate according to supply and demand.

I visited my home over the last week-end, and while there I went to stables within ten miles of home, each with approximately forty highly finished cattle. They would average from 1,400 to 1,600 pounds. The owners would like to sell, but one man paid 10¾ cents a pound for his replacement cattle last fall and the other man paid about 11 cents a pound, and they do not feel like accepting 11·99 cents a pound. Twelve cents a pound would satisfy them. Those cattle would be out of the way, and they would be filling in to-day, when there is a shortage. They would not be coming on the market at a time when there is supposed to be a high price. There is a chance that next spring we may not be getting more than 10 cents a pound for our cattle, if too many reach the market. That may be the condition, unless the government steps in and exports to the other side—and I should hope that that would happen. I hope we shall never see cattle cheaper than they are to-day. If it were possible to get 12 cents a pound for finished cattle, I venture to say that there are ten carloads in the west end of the county of Elgin which would go to market next week.

I should like to say a word about farm help. Members of the opposition have been saying a good deal about farm help and have criticized what has been done, but they offer no solution. When I was going home last week-end I saw carloads, almost train-loads of soldiers. When I got to London, four carloads of soldiers changed there to take the electric cars to St. Thomas. Every one of those men looked as though he would make a good farm labourer. When so many men are taken out of industry, when they no longer play a part in this country's production programme, there is bound to be a shortage. When they come directly from the farm, it affects farm help.

I should like to say a word also about the treatment the farmers in military district No. 1, which is western Ontario, have received. They have been given every consideration, and no one could be more considerate than Mr. W. A. Martin who is administering that district. I do not know of any young farmer from my county who is in uniform to-day and who should be back on the farm. Last year we had considerable assistance from volunteers and students from the city. Near me was a home fitted up where girls from Alma college changed about all summer. They were of great assistance. We also had a good deal of help with our sugar beets from people who came out to volunteer. I should like to have seen some city fellows hoeing sugar beets. I never was very lazy myself, but I think I am too long in the back because I never was able to boast about the sugar beets that I could hoe. I know of one girl who came out to help, and she told of others who were rushing by her and who seemed to be able to hoe a lot. She tried to do a good job, and she was able to get to the end of the row by night. They were being paid so much a row, but she never asked for any pay, saying that she was just getting the experience.

There is another recommendation I should like to make, but I do not know whether it can be carried out. I think every farm hand, every man who has worked in agriculture, who is in the armed forces on Canadian soil should, if he so requests, be granted a postponement for next summer in order to return home to assist with the work on the farm. A man who has always worked on the farm, who has grown up on the farm, is worth considerably more than inexperienced help. I know of some men who have been in the army for some time. I am thinking of one boy in particular who, I know, would like to come out for the summer.

I was greatly pleased, when the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) was speaking, to hear the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) announce that provision was being made for the widows of war veterans. This is very worthy, but it should have been done long ago. Many soldiers have died, and many more will die from the effects of service in the last war. At times it is hard to make the board believe, or they will not acknowledge that a death is directly attributable to war service. If a man is not getting a pension of fifty per cent or over, there is nothing for his widow. I know of widows who have worn themselves out in taking care of their husbands before they died. Many of these women are in the sixties; they are not able to get out and earn a living, and they are too young to obtain an old age pension. Again let me say that I am glad to hear that something is going to be done for them.

I have nothing further to say except that I hope something will be done to satisfy the cattlemen of this country. The only thing that will satisfy them is to have the ceiling price put up so that they can get 12 cents a pound for their fat steers delivered at the station.

On motion of Mr. MacInnis the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1943

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1943.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS MUTUAL AID

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,000,000,000 FOR PRODUCTION AND TRANSFER OF WAR SUPPLIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

1. That sums not exceeding one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) be granted to His Majesty for the purpose of making war supplies available to any of the united nations.

2. That the governor in council may determine the terms and conditions upon which such war supplies are made available to any of the united nations and may require in certain cases payment or repayment in kind or property or reciprocal action or provision of supplies or other direct or indirect benefit as may be deemed appropriate.

3. That there be established a Canadian war supplies allocation board to carry out the purpose of this resolution, and that such board be authorized to employ officers, clerks and other employees necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the board.

4. That the governor in council may be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) as may be required for the purpose of defraying the expenditures herein mentioned and for purchasing or otherwise acquiring or procuring war supplies in Canada, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Finance at this time to make a statement to the house concerning this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not the stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very important resolution. It introduces an entirely new principle. At the very earliest opportunity the house and the country should be informed as to what the government's proposals are with respect to this whole question. If the minister is not in a position to make a statement to-day then he ought to say when he will be in a position to do so, so that hon. members can intelligently understand and discuss the resolution. It should be done at the earliest possible day, before the resolution proceeds very far, certainly before it gets into the committee stage.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will read the remarks I made last Monday he will find there the fullest possible explanation of this resolution and of the bill to be based on it. I made a carefully prepared statement with regard to our policy of mutual aid. This is the resolution on which the war appropriation mutual aid bill is to be based. I could not make a fuller initial statement than I made then. But when the resolution is reached I will make another one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good enough.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, TO PROCEED WITH SUPPLEMENTARY WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING Prime Minister): Hon. members will have observed from yesterday's Votes and Proceedings that the Minister of Finance has given notice that on Monday next he will propose in committee of the whole a resolution with respect to the 1942 Supplementary War Appropriation bill, to provide certain sums of money for the purpose of security and defence. The minister will explain to the house the urgency with respect to this matter. If in the light of that explanation hon. members would give their consent, I would then ask the house to entertain a motion to change the order of proceedings for Monday next so as to permit this resolution to be the first item of business to be called on the orders of the day.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In case that consent is given, may I ask the Prime Minister how far he proposes to carry the legislation on Monday? I ask that for personal reasons. I had anticipated taking part in the debate on the address on Tuesday, and I could not do that on a later day, before the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I had better allow the Minister of Finance to state the urgency of the matter first, and then I can if necessary make a reply to my hon. friend.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the supplementary war appropriation for the current fiscal year, estimated as carefully as that can be done. I tried very hard to find ways and means of deferring the introduction of the resolution and the bill based upon it until after the debate on the address had been concluded, but the situation is so urgent that I dare not do that. About the fifteenth of the month, which is next Monday, there will be exceptionally heavy demands on the treasury, and the comptroller of the treasury advises me that we may be out of money, we may reach the limits of our existing appropriations, about Monday or Tuesday. If that is so and no other provision is made, bills presented to the government for payment, and which should be paid, will have to go unpaid. Some of those bills are of a very urgent character, notably those relating to dependents' allowances.

I have communicated with the leaders of the various parties and groups in the house requesting their cooperation in expediting this supplementary appropriation, giving the assurance that everything which could be discussed on this measure may be discussed on the main war appropriation which will be introduced next week, upon the conclusion of the present debate. I hope that without too much discussion the house on Monday afternoon will adopt this resolution and pass the bill through all stages. It will have to be done by waiving the rules, just as is done every year in the case of interim supply. I do not see that anyone will be placed at a disadvantage if this is done, and I think it should be done in view of the urgency of the situation. It may be that some hon. members will wish to draw the discussion out, but I hope not. The other house is assembling on Tuesday, and I am most anxious to get money with which to meet the government's obligations.

I think that is about all I have to say about the matter. It is urgent need that has moved us to propose this extraordinary procedure of breaking into the present debate, but it was suggested by others in the house a few days ago, and I cannot see any objection to it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Minister of Finance will find us very ready to meet the wishes of the government in this instance. The sum of $858,000,000 of course is a very large amount, in addition to that estimated in connection with the original war appropriation.

Mr. ILSLEY: In addition to what was voted.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes. In view of the urgency of the matter this party is anxious to facilitate the voting of this money just as much as it possibly can. I think the minister may rest assured that as far as we are concerned any remarks we have to make will be curtailed to the minimum, so that we may assist the government in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to thank my hon. friend the leader of the opposition for the very helpful cooperation which he has just extended, and which I gather is extended in equal measure by the leaders of other groups in the house. Perhaps the question of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has been answered by the statement made by the Minister of Finance; therefore with the permission of the house I would move:

That the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne be suspended on Monday the 15th of February instant, in order that the house may proceed forthwith with the resolution and bill to provide for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NAVY

ARTICLE IN "BOATING" MAGAZINE BY COMMANDER A. D. MACLEAN (RETIRED)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services if he is yet in a position to make a statement to the house with respect to the charges made by Andrew D. Maclean, a retired commander of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, which appeared in the last issue of Boating. This matter was before the house some time ago, when the minister was away. Is he now in a position to make a statement. or when may we expect one?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): My hon. friend sent me notice of this question a few moments ago. As he knows, the charges made by Andrew D. Maclean cover a very wide field indeed. It has been necessary to go through a number of files and generally to secure information from a number of sources in order to prepare a complete answer but I hope to have the information available and to give it to the house early next week.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT CALGARY OGDEN SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, of which I have given him notice. I have received a telegram from Calgary asking me to inquire what steps are being taken to secure employment for fifty men now laid off and one hundred and fifty men previously laid off from the munitions department at the Ogden shops in Calgary.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I received a similar telegram this morning, which came to my attention only a few moments ago. I believe a complete memorandum in this connection is on its way to me, but as yet I have not received it. The information I have at the moment is that both lay-offs are incidental to a change-over in the type of production. The plant was engaged on an order for the British navy. That order has been completed, and for some time the plant has been retooling to take on another order in connection with a similar gun of larger calibre. I feel sure that both lay-offs are temporary, and that the men will be reemployed. I am not sure whether selective service has been advised; I think probably not, as it is hoped that the men will be available when the work is resumed. But I may add that Ogden shops now have in hand the largest volume of business that they have had at any stage during the war, and I think the men will be reemployed at the same plant.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke in the debate on the address I referred to the fact that at the Ogden shops men had been laid off. The minister says now that the Ogden shops have ample work and a new contract with which to carry on. I must point out that when I was there, just before coming to Ottawa for the session, that was not so. Was the minister informed about it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the minister has made his statement.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

FURTHER STATEMENT RESPECTING REORGANIZATION AND CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on February 3 I advised the house the government had been fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Justice McTague, of the appeal court of Ontario, as chairman of the national war labour board. In making that announcement I pointed out that in connection with Mr. Justice McTague's acceptance of the position there would have to be a reorganization of the board in fundamental particulars, and that later the house would be given further information on that point.

I am now in a position to give the house full information with regard to changes being made consequent upon Mr. Justice McTague's acceptance of the position, and also for other reasons. In order that hon. members may understand the nature and full significance of the changes I shall first of all outline to the house the membership and functions of the board as originally constituted.

As hon. members are aware the national war labour board was appointed on October 24, 1941. At that time its membership was that of a chairman, a vice-chairman, five gentlemen representing employers and five representing employees. When originally formed the chairman was the present Minister of Labour, Mr. Humphrey Mitchell. When the board was formed Mr. Mitchell was neither a member of the house nor a minister of the crown. Upon Mr. Mitchell's becoming a minister of the crown he continued to perform the duties of chairman of the board, largely because of the special knowledge he had of its proceedings, and also because he believed it his duty to hold the position at least so long as he was able to help carry out the duties of the board along with the other duties attached to his new position. However the minister found, as everyone would expect, that with the heavy duties resting upon him in the Department of Labour it would be impossible for him to continue as chairman of the board. Some time ago he advised me to that effect, and in consequence of the minister's representations the government has made certain changes. Mr. Mitchell's retirement from the chairmanship of the board left the vacancy which has since been filled by Mr. Justice McTague's acceptance of the position.

During Mr. Mitchell's association with the board the deputy minister of labour, Doctor Bryce Stewart, for a time acted as vice-chairman. When Doctor Stewart retired his position was occupied by Mr. MacNamara, the present Deputy Minister of Labour.

The gentlemen representing the employers were Mr. A. Deschamps, president of the Builders Exchange, Montreal; Mr. George Hodge, manager, department of personnel, Canadian Pacific Railways; Mr. G. Jackson, of Sentinel Securities of Canada Limited, Toronto; Mr. J. H. Stovel, vice-president and general manager of Dome Mines, South Porcupine, and Mr. H. Taylor of the Canadian National Carbon Company, Limited, Toronto.

The five gentlemen representing the employees were Mr. John A. Bell, general chairman of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, Toronto; Mr. William Dunn, financial secretary-treasurer of Toronto district Labour Council; Mr. J. A. McClelland of the International Association of Machinists, of Valois, Quebec; Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, Ottawa and Mr. Gerard Picard, general secretary of the Confederation of Catholic Workers of Canada, Quebec.

Hon. members will see that this was a board of twelve. As a matter of fact in the actual functioning of the board the work, in the main, was carried on by an executive committee. That executive was composed of the chairman, the vice-chairman, one representative of the employers and one representative of the employees. The representative of the employers on the executive was Mr. George Hodge, and the representative of the employees was Mr. McClelland. The gentlemen constituting the executive carried on as I have said the major part of the work of the board. The entire membership was convened fortnightly, on an average, and on those occasions matters of concern to the board as a whole were presented and dealt with.

One will observe that in the original establishment of the board emphasis was placed particularly upon its representative character. An effort was made to secure a board which would be representative alike of employers and employees. An equal emphasis, however, was not placed upon the judicial character of the board. I do not mean to say that the board was expected to do other than discharge its duties in accordance with the principles of justice. In its actual procedure, however, there was no jurisprudence governing its proceedings. One case would be dealt with, then another and another, in the order in which they were presented without any necessary relationship as to the principles governing in decisions. The point I wish to make clear is that the board was not regarded like a court of justice in which principles are laid down which should govern generally.

Mr. Justice McTague has emphasized the fact that it would be helpful in the avoidance and settlement of industrial disputes, and in dealing with industrial relations generally if the national war labour board could partake more of the nature of an industrial court. He feels that the members of the board should be fewer in number, in order that they might, sitting together continuously, gradually build up a jurisprudence which would govern in labour matters.

The government, after giving careful consideration to Mr. Justice McTague's representations, have come wholly to agree with the view he has expressed. The national war labour board, as it will now be constituted, will therefore be more in the nature of an industrial court. It will be limited in its membership, but care will be taken to see that it will also maintain its representative character. It is not intended that any member of the existing board shall be dropped by the new organization that is to be formed, although a number of the members of the old board instead of continuing as members of the new board will constitute hereafter members of a national war labour committee to consult with and advise the presently constituted board. It will be seen that so far as the change in the position of these members is concerned, it is more in the nature of a change in terminology than in function or practice. The past experience of all these members of the old board is being thereby retained in connection with the operations of the new board.

The Minister of Labour, as I have pointed out, has resigned from the board; and for reasons closely connected with the urgency of the matters with which he has to deal in his department, the deputy minister will not be a member of the new organization. The new board will be composed of three members—Mr. Justice McTague, and two gentlemen who have had exceptional experience in dealing with problems of industrial relations. One of those gentlemen will be representative of employers, and the other of employees. These gentlemen are, first, Senator J. J. Bench, K.C., who for some years past, as hon. members are probably aware, has enjoyed retainers as an experienced labour relations counsel from a number of large industrial concerns, and has had wide experience in matters pertaining to industrial relations. When Senator Bench serves he will of course, as a member of the senate, serve without extra remuneration. The fact that he is a member of parliament should not, I think, at this time of war, in any way prejudice his position on the board. In that particular his position would be no different from that occupied by the Minister of Labour, who was chairman of the board and at the same time was a member of the House of Commons and a minister of the crown. Senator Bench is being selected because of his special knowledge of industrial matters, and also because of the success he has had in dealing with industrial controversies arising between employers and employees.

The third member of the board will be Mr. J. L. Cohen, K.C. As hon. members probably know, Mr. Cohen is an experienced labour counsel with outstanding abilities. He has acted as the representative of labour organizations on many conciliation boards and has been retained widely by labour organizations because of his exceptional knowledge of industrial questions.

I wish to stress the point that each of these gentlemen has knowledge not second I believe to that possessed by any other persons in this country, either on the side of capital or on the side of labour interests, in dealing with problems of industrial relations. They with Mr. Justice McTague have been selected with regard solely to the qualities they bring to their new duties. These three gentlemen will constitute the board which will, as I have said, be in the nature of an industrial court.

There will be associated with the board in the intimate relationship of expert technical advisers the two gentlemen who, along with the minister, were members of the executive committee of the board as it hitherto existed. I refer to Mr. George Hodge, who represented the employers and Mr. McClelland, who represented the employees. The other members of the present board will, as I have said, be an advisory and consultative committee and will be brought together in the new organization in a manner very similar to that in which they were brought into conference under the former organization.

I should like to express to those who have been members of the national war labour board the appreciation of the government, and in this I think I may say the appreciation of the country for the splendid services which they have rendered to this country in the time in which they have served. The board, up to the present, has in many respects been functioning so quietly that I am sure the public are scarcely aware of the extent of the services its members have rendered. As the Minister of Labour mentioned yesterday, some 750 cases in all came before the board in the time it was carrying on and almost without exception all these cases have been disposed of satisfactorily.

There is one other aspect of the board as now constituted which is in the nature of a fundamental change. Heretofore the board has carried on its proceedings in camera; the hearings have not been in public. It is felt that in dealing with industrial disputes that are likely to affect our war effort and affect thereby the interests, not only of the country as a whole but of the united nations as well, it would serve a useful and helpful purpose if the public could have a wider knowledge of the questions at issue. It is, therefore, the intention of Mr. Justice McTague and his colleagues to have the sittings of the board in public. The press will be admitted to the hearings of the board. In that way the public will be kept fully informed of matters which are of immediate concern to the public itself.

That covers, I think, all that I wish to say at the moment beyond adding a word with respect to Mr. Hodge and Mr. McClelland, who have served as members of the executive in the past, and who will be immediately associated as expert technical advisers with the members of the new board. I feel that we are specially indebted to both these gentlemen for the services they have rendered in the past and for their willingness to continue to serve in the capacity in which they will on this new board. I feel, too, we are greatly indebted to the chairman and other members of the new board for the all-important services they are prepared to render the country at this time of war.

Mr. COLDWELL: When does the Prime Minister expect that the new board or executive will meet to consider matters now in abeyance?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that Mr. Justice McTague has already been in conference with the parties to the steel dispute and has undertaken to have the proceedings of the board begin on Tuesday of the coming week.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

While I am on my feet I should like to table a copy of the order in council which was passed yesterday constituting the new board.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to say just one word in connection with the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to the national war labour board. There were two points that struck me as worthy of comment. The first is the evidence of the beginning of a well-recognized labour jurisprudence. I think most of us who have been interested in labour problems during these years realized that the time had come for the establishment of a well recognized labour jurisprudence. I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that one of the things on which I think the public will be in agreement with the government is that the sittings of the national war labour board are to be in public. This is a step in the right direction.

I congratulate the Prime Minister on these two things, because we discussed them and decided upon them at the Winnipeg convention, and they were included in the programme and the platform of the new party. While yesterday I did not think we were near to converting the Prime Minister on some points, I am glad to see that he has had a change of heart this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a word in reply to what my hon. friend has said. I feel considerably flattered at the extent to which the Winnipeg convention evidently drew upon a treatise which I wrote some years ago upon principles underlying industrial reconstruction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It took you twenty-five years to put them into effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have been going into effect bit by bit.

BORDER CROSSING REGULATIONS

ELIMINATION OF PASSPORT REQUIREMENT FOR CANADIANS ENTERING THE UNITED STATES FOR VISITS OF 29 DAYS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make to the house which I think hon. members will be pleased to hear. The governments of the United States and Canada have been able to effect an agreement which will make border crossing more convenient. Instead of Canadian citizens or British subjects resident in Canada being obliged to obtain passports in order to cross the border to the United States, after the fifteenth of this month all that will be required will be a border crossing identification card which will be valid for a year.

I shall give hon. members a statement which is also being made public to-day in Washington. I am giving it to the house now in order that hon. members may have it in the first instance.

The United States and the Canadian governments, with a desire to simplify travel across the border have agreed on changes which will exempt Canadian citizens and British subjects legally resident in Canada from the necessity of obtaining passports for visits of not more than twenty-nine days. Entry to the United States for longer periods and for other groups will continue as at present.

Under the plan which will go into effect on February 15, 1943, a new type of non-immigrant border crossing identification card that does not require passport will be issued free of charge by United States consular officers in Canada and will bear an endorsement by a Canadian immigration officer guaranteeing the readmissibility of the bearer to Canada. This card will be valid for any number of visits during a period of one year from the date of its issue, provided that no one visit shall exceed 29 days. Visitors' visés and non-immigrant border crossing cards already issued will retain their validity until date of expiry and, if desired, may be renewed as in the past so long as the holder possesses a valid passport.

Persons desiring to obtain a border crossing card of the new type must apply in person at an American consular office in Canada carrying three photographs, one and a half inch square, on non-glazed paper, showing full front view without head covering. They should also carry whatever evidence they have available as to birthplace, nationality and the period of their residence in Canada. In the consulate, they will complete an application form in triplicate.

If the application is approved by the consul, he will issue the border crossing card and deliver both application and card to the Canadian immigration officer in the same centre. The applicant will then call at the Canadian office for the endorsation of the crossing card guaranteeing readmission to Canada and will be given the card and one copy of the application form, the latter to be left with the United States immigration authorities at port of entry to the United States.

United States consulates and Canadian immigration offices are established at the following points in Canada:

Halifax, N.S.	Niagara Falls, Ont.
Fredericton, N.B.	Sarnia, Ont.
Saint John, N.B.	Fort William, Ont.
St. Stephen, N.B.	Winnipeg, Man.
Quebec, P.Q.	Regina, Sask.
Montreal, P.Q.	Edmonton, Alta.
Ottawa, Ont.	Calgary, Alta.
Toronto, Ont.	Victoria, B.C.
Hamilton, Ont.	Vancouver, B.C.
Windsor, Ont.

Under the new system there will be no further necessity of maintaining branch passport offices at Moncton, Windsor and Vancouver. Accordingly, these offices will close on February 15. Applications received after that date will be forwarded to the Passport Office, 38 Bank Street, Ottawa. All subsequent applications for passports from the limited number of persons desiring to visit the United States for periods of more than thirty days or to visit other countries to which it is possible to travel should be addressed to the Passport Office, Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that everybody will welcome this reform. I would point out to the Prime Minister that I advocated this step as long ago as the summer of 1940, and now this reform has been accomplished after three years' delay.

Mr. FULFORD: May I ask whether the foreign exchange control board will make regulations in line with these new United States regulations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have to ask the board.

PRODUCTION AND RESOURCES

PRESS REPORT AS TO SETTING UP IN WASHINGTON OF COMBINED COPPER COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply whether he can now answer the question I asked yesterday as to the setting up in Washington of a combined copper committee?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My hon. friend was good enough to send across to me the clipping to which he referred. I notice it says that Mr. George MacDonald represents Canada on the committee. Mr. George MacDonald is the representative in Washington of our metals controller. He will be a member of the committee and will draw in such a staff as the requirements of the committee may indicate.

Mr. GREEN: What are the purposes of the committee?

Mr. HOWE: The committee is to inform the combined production and resources board of the copper position, available and potential supplies.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my first reaction to the speech from the throne was that it was fortunate that in the debate which would follow on the address members were not limited to the matters appearing in the speech itself. Indeed the speech is almost barren of any constructive proposals. The only mention in it of anything of a constructive nature is the paragraph referring to the reconstituting of the committee which met last year on post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation, and in the paragraph in which a committee on social insurance is announced. It may be said that never was so little said in so many words.

The group with which I sit has always favoured the extension of social insurance. We have been indeed in the forefront in pressing for social insurance when many of those who to-day are so loud in their praise of this action by the government were making it quite clear that they were opposed to what they called hand-outs and doles. Times do change, and men's minds change with the times.

The speech from the throne gives every indication of having been thrown together in a hurry. What the government would have done were it not for the providential appearance of the Beveridge report it is hard to say. That only now in the fourth year of the war, when the need for social insurance and social reconstruction looms so large in people's minds, the government is taking hold of these matters is an indication of its profound reluctance to do anything in this respect. It should be noted that the Beveridge committee was appointed in Great Britain in June, 1941. We are going to appoint a committee perhaps in February, 1943. Should the investigation and the drafting and submission of the report of such a committee in Canada take as long as it took in the United Kingdom, it will be the end of 1944 before we even have a report.

Because of the constitutional jurisdictions of the governments of our country, after the report is made dominion-provincial conferences will have to be called, and after that we may have legislation. These, then, are the matters which have brought forth such paeans of praise from the government supporters.

I have said that while we approve social security measures, hon. members should be careful not to expect too much of social security based solely on social insurance. Sir William Beveridge makes that very clear, if we take the trouble to read his report beyond the first few pages. On almost the first page of his report he says that a revolutionary moment is not the time for patching; it is the time for revolution; but evidently he was referring to the revolutionary change from piecemeal social legislation to a national scheme based on one contribution. At page 163 of his report Sir William Beveridge says:

> Fourth, and most important, income security which is all that can be given by social insurance is so inadequate a provision for human happiness that to put it forward by itself as a sole or principal measure of reconstruction hardly seems worth doing.

I would like hon. members to note that, "hardly seems worth doing." He goes on:

> It should be accompanied by an announced determination to use the powers of the state to whatever extent may prove necessary to ensure for all, not indeed absolute continuity of work, but a reasonable chance of productive employment.

So then, along with any plans we may make for social security based on social insurance we must make provision, social provision, if you like, for employment. Then he goes on:

> Fifth, though it should be within the power of the community to bear the cost of the whole plan for social security, the cost is heavy and, if to the necessary cost waste is added, it may become insupportable. Unemployment, both through increasing expenditure on benefit and through reducing the income to bear those costs, is the worst form of waste.

We have been indulging in the worst form of waste during the last ten or twelve years—at least, for the decade between 1929 and 1939; and unless we take measures not only to put social insurance into effect but to abolish unemployment, we are not going to make very much progress.

I want to say a word with regard to the man-power muddle. It is not a man-power policy, it never was a man-power policy, it is a man-power mess.

I have stated many times before, here and elsewhere, that the main reason for our man-power difficulties is that we have no over-all plan for war. We have not decided yet how many men Canada can afford to put into the armed forces, to get the best results both for ourselves and for the other members of the united nations. Listening to this debate, I was struck with what must have seemed to many here the unreality of the long debate, or rather debates, in which we indulged in this house last year. We debated conscription on the address, on the plebiscite, and on the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act. This group realized what was being done, how the house was being duped about something on which the government never intended to take any action; and very shortly after the house adjourned the government showed quite clearly that it did not intend to do anything, by appointing to a place in the cabinet a man who had voted and spoken against the amendment to the mobilization act.

When the amendment to the mobilization act was before us last year the leader of our group made this statement:

> In our opinion, this house should decide now, at once, without further delay, for total mobilization of industry, of wealth and of man-power. But what are we doing under this bill that we are discussing? We are merely allowing the government once more to postpone its decision on one phase of the mobilization that I have mentioned, and that not the most important.

I think the truth of that statement is clear to everyone to-day.

I do not believe that anything could indicate more clearly the mess we are in with regard to man-power than the fuel situation. My own province of British Columbia is possibly blessed with fuel to a greater extent than any other province of Canada. I am not going to take the time of the house to deal with this matter because it was dealt with fairly well by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) when he spoke the other day. But let me point out that although the people of Vancouver had a terrible experience during two weeks of the coldest weather the Pacific coast has experienced in thirty-three years, our fuel situation had been brought to the attention of the fuel controller as long ago as last June, and it was indicated to him that unless something were done there would be a serious fuel shortage in British Columbia. Yet, as was also pointed out by the hon. member for New Westminster, when the fuel situation reached its worst the saw-mills closed down. The excuse was that they were closing down for their annual overhaul, but one large mill was closed because a certain important operator, having bought it, decided that he had no further use for it. It did not concern him what public need there was for it; and I suppose most people in this house are not concerned either, because that is the essence of private enterprise.

If a situation such as we had this winter is not to recur, two things must be done. First, fuel production must be declared an essential industry—which it is; and, second, at the first sign of shortage, rationing must be imposed and impartially enforced. That is the only way by which equitable distribution can be assured when there is a shortage of any essential commodity.

A word on the government's labour policies. This is not the first occasion upon which I have drawn them to the attention of this house. I wish however to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and his party on their new-found interest in labour.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, it is not so "new-found." Don't talk like that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Don't feel hurt.

Mr. HOMUTH: I don't feel hurt. I am just laughing about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I said "new-found" as indicated in their amendment to the address. This group will vote for the amendment, and we hope that the Progressive Conservatives will vote for our subamendment, to prove that a real change of heart has taken place.

I also listened to the leader of the opposition's criticism of the government's labour policy. It is the first time that the government's labour policies have been criticized effectively from that side of the house since 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thanks.

Mr. MacINNIS: I also listened to the Prime Minister's defence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). It was extremely weak. If anything could be weaker it was the defence which the minister made for himself in this chamber yesterday. The Prime Minister said—I hope I am putting it correctly—that the chief function of the Minister of Labour in the cabinet was to maintain the price stabilization and wage control policies of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: He did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, it was pretty close to that.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, not close. He just did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Very well; we will leave it at that. The modification of my hon. friend will go in the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not a modification.

Mr. MacINNIS: What I want to ask is this: if that is the principal function of a minister of labour, why seek a man who had had experience with organized labour? Why not appoint a banker, or a manufacturer, or, if you like, another lawyer? Another lawyer among the twelve or fifteen already in the cabinet would not make much difference. However, the Prime Minister wanted someone connected with organized labour; he wanted someone in the cabinet in whom organized labour would have confidence. To have confidence in that individual, organized labour would expect that in the cabinet that man would put forward the claims of labour. And it is because the present Minister of Labour, judging by the results, has not put forward the claims of labour, that labour is so much dissatisfied with his work. Unfortunately labour has accepted token representation in the past, and the Prime Minister is satisfied that labour should have token representation. The time, however, has passed when labour will be satisfied with token representation.

The Prime Minister mentioned that he had offered the portfolio of labour to Mr. Tom Moore. I am not going to bring Mr. Tom Moore's name into this any further, but I want to tell the Prime Minister that I am satisfied he could not get anyone in the labour movement who was qualified to fulfil the duties of minister of labour to accept the position. All that would be expected of him would be to act as apologist to the organized labour movement for the government's policy, and no real representative of labour is prepared to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is untrue, and my hon. friend knows it. That is the old soapbox socialism.

Mr. MacINNIS: I said I was not going to bring Mr. Moore's name into this, but Mr. Moore himself told me that was the reason he would not take the position.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let Mr. Moore speak for himself.

Mr. MacINNIS: He was offered the job; he did not accept; you can draw your own conclusions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we had better leave Mr. Moore out of this.

Mr. MacINNIS: The trouble with the government's wage ceiling is that the government took power to freeze wages and it froze all the inequalities of wages. To freeze the wages or salary of a person getting $2,000 or $3,000 or $4,000 or $10,000 or $15,000 is one thing, but to freeze the wages of a person getting forty or fifty cents an hour is altogether another thing. When the government took action to put a ceiling on wages it should also have taken action to put a floor under wages, and seen to it that the wages paid were sufficient for a decent standard of living.

Yesterday the Minister of Labour made great play with the cost-of-living bonus. But the large majority of Canadian workers are getting no cost-of-living bonus. The only workers who are getting cost-of-living bonus are those who through their organizations demanded it and got it because they were able to take it. If there is anything in the government's policy that is clear it is that through their labour policy they have demonstrated to labour that the way to get justice is to be strong enough to take it.

I was glad to hear the statement of the Prime Minister to-day in regard to the new board. My understanding is that the changes were proposed by the new chairman. I go as far as to say that I congratulate the government upon having been able to secure Mr. Justice McTague as chairman of the board. I had occasion to criticize him in this house, not for anything he had said or done in connection with any dispute he had had anything to do with, because my recollection is that he has shown much enlightenment in his observations in regard to the position of labour in our economic set-up. I wish the reorganized board in its new setting every success. But I want to make this clear, that since the war began, or at least since the government's wage policy has been put into effect, boards have lost their meaning. Boards have no authority; they are in the same position as the Minister of Labour—they are supposed to maintain the government's price and wage stabilization policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is not suggesting that the government dictates policy to the board?

Mr. MacINNIS: I will tell my hon. friend in good time what I suggest—and I will not merely suggest it; I will make a clear statement of fact. It is clear from the findings of boards that they do not discuss whether a wage rate is too high or too low. What they consider is whether section so-and-so of such-and-such an order in council will allow them to make a finding that would increase the wage rate. That is what they do. The chairman of the board that heard the steel dispute, Mr. Barlow, now Mr. Justice Barlow, was a member of a royal commission appointed by the former minister of labour to investigate the shipyard wages in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. That board made a finding, but when the finding was placed before the present Minister of Labour he reduced it under an order in council by about five cents an hour.

Mr. MITCHELL: We reduced some of the findings and increased others.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think any were increased. This is a new way of legislating; a royal commission is appointed and when its unanimous report is received, the Minister of Labour by order in council reduces the wages recommended and puts a clause in it that all wages not covered by the order in council shall be set at rates which the minister may consider fair and reasonable. This is dictatorship with a vengeance.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend has not explained the circumstances of the order in council.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister mentioned in his speech that attempts to regulate or control wages were made as far back as June, 1940, and quite definitely in December, 1940, by order in council P.C. 7440. I drew the attention of this house at that time to the result of that order in council in the Peck Rolling Mills dispute. Here was a group of employees fifty per cent of whom were getting thirty-two cents an hour. The board that investigated the dispute did not say the wages were too low; they said that because of the wording of P.C. 7440 they were bound to find that the rates were fair and reasonable. That is all that boards can do to-day. There is nothing else left for them to do.

The attitude of this government towards organized labour can be measured by the government's policy towards organized labour in government-owned industry. In June, 1940, the government passed order in council P.C. 2685 approving of collective bargaining as the proper method of settling labour disputes. But from that time until the end of 1942 the government refused to recognize organized labour in industries that it owns and controls. It was only in December of 1942 that the government passed an order in council making it possible for the government to recognize organized labour in the industries it owned, and to enter into collective agreements with those organizations. I do not know why the order in council was necessary; I believe the government could have done it without an order in council; however, that was done. And the government did that only when it was faced with a cessation of work in one of its plants.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not true.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am telling my hon. friend that is absolutely true.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not true, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I must ask the Minister of Labour to withdraw that remark.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know whereof I speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister must withdraw his statement.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, the inference to be taken from what the hon. member has said is that an order in council was passed—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is entitled to make an explanation.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is not entitled to make a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has intimated that the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East is false, and that cannot be allowed. It must be withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very well; I withdraw.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am satisfied that there is sufficient ground for all the criticism that has been levelled at the Minister of Labour.

I have said before, and I want to say again in all earnestness, that it is most important, particularly at this time, that parliament and the country should realize how essential it is that labour should be organized, and that organized labour should be accepted as a full partner in everything that pertains to the great struggle in which we are now engaged. That labour should be accepted as a partner is not only important in winning the war; it is also important so that labour may gain the experience and understanding which will enable it to take a constructive part in solving the problems which will confront us when this war is over.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer, and while it involves the Department of Labour I am very happy to say that I have nothing but commendation for the actions of the minister in regard to it. I wish to refer briefly to matters arising out of the evacuation from the Pacific coast defence area of persons of Japanese origin. Among those removed from that area were nearly eight thousand children from one to sixteen years of age, of whom possibly 5,500 would be of school age. In the province of British Columbia we have a compulsory school attendance act, but since these people have been moved from the coast area no attempt has been made to make provision for the education of the children. At the opening of the British Columbia legislature this month the provincial minister of education gave notice that he was introducing a bill to enable municipalities to refuse to extend educational facilities to any child born of Japanese parents.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them were too well educated before.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what my hon. friend thinks. I know of people who are not well enough educated, and I could mention names.

Mr. HOMUTH: So do I, and not very far away.

Mr. MacINNIS: I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour and I think of his deputy minister, urging him to make provision for the education of these children; for if there is anything to indicate that there is racial prejudice and discrimination, it is a refusal to give these innocent children the benefits of our educational system.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will excuse me, this is more or less an international question. I have no objection to anything he may say about the Department of Labour on a national basis; I am quite ready to take care of myself, but I do not think he is altogether correct in what he has just said. Facilities have been provided. It is quite true that they may not be quite up to the mark at the moment, but facilities have been provided for educating those children of Japanese origin in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. MacINNIS: Maybe the minister is doing the best he can under the circumstances, but the fact of the matter is that these children are being denied proper educational facilities. I should like to quote a paragraph from an editorial in the Vancouver Province in connection with this matter. The province of British Columbia takes the position that this is a responsibility of the federal government. I agree that in regard to children moved en masse the financial responsibility at least rests with the federal government. The editorial states:

> This is a reasonable position but it is still difficult to understand why Mr. Perry, the provincial minister of education, should resort to such sweeping measures as that of outlawing the Japanese children from our public schools, for that certainly is what it would be to enact the proposed amendment. . . .

[Mr. MacInnis.]

> If Japanese born here are to be permitted to stay here, they should have the protection of Canadian law without any such harsh discrimination against them and certainly they should have that protection now, while they are here.

We have heard a great deal about Hitler's Nuremburg decrees. We must be careful that we do not pass Nuremburg decrees of our own.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope Your Honour is taking note of these interruptions.

Mr. NEILL: Can the hon. gentleman tell us how many white children in British Columbia are not being educated because of a lack of teachers? Let him tell us a sob story about that.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is an altogether different matter, and something we should look after; but no white children are being deprived by law of education in this country. There are quite a number of anomalies we should try to overcome, but I am dealing now with a matter of definite discrimination because of race.

In the very few minutes left at my disposal I wish to refer to some statements made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) in the course of his speech a few evenings ago. He attacked this group for advocating a planned economy. That, of course, is his right; but in drawing attention to his knowledge of planned economy he referred only to the results in Germany and Italy, which he said were not good. When a person thinks he is qualified to speak on planned economy, surely his knowledge extends farther than Germany and Italy. I wonder if my hon. friend, in all his reading, has heard of the greatest planned economy experiment in history. If he has heard of it, then why did he not refer to it? Possibly it would not suit his purpose. Lawyers are that way; they leave out all the evidence which is favourable to the other side, and bring in all that is unfavourable.

But this group is not advocating the kind of planned economy they had in Germany or Italy, or indeed the kind they have in Soviet Russia. We have made that clear on many occasions. Neither Hitler nor Mussolini abolished the profit motive in his country; and it is because they did not abolish that profit motive that they have had the support of the capitalists in every country of the world—including this one.

Mr. HOMUTH: Where is this perfect country?

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not mention any perfect country, but I did mention a country where they had put planned economy into effect. And if the hon. member has ever heard of a city named Stalingrad he may understand something of the results of that planned economy.

Mr. HOMUTH: And are we going to adopt the Russian idea?

Mr. MacINNIS: If my hon. friend has anything to say about Russia, he can make his own speech.

The hon. member for Swift Current attacked certain proposals by the leader of this group, in which it was advocated that the government should appropriate five billions of dollars for expenditures in the first two years after the war. The impression he tried to leave was that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was asking for the expenditure of this money without reference to parliament, or on the sole recommendation of a committee. That is not what my leader said at all. He made it clear that any recommendations would be made to parliament, and that parliament would act upon them. At page 57 of Hansard, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is reported as follows:

> We have found billions annually for the destructive, wasteful and yet very necessary purposes of war. We must assure our people that we can and will find billions annually for the constructive, life-giving and equally necessary purpose of the peaceful development of our land.

He went on to recommend the appointment of a representative committee. But these are the words to which I wish to draw the attention of the house:

> . . . the definite commitment by this parliament that Canada is prepared to accept from that body a programme of national social economic development upon which this parliament will spend—

Note the words "this parliament".

> —in cooperation with the provincial authorities —and I mean that this parliament will appropriate the sum of money—an amount, let us say, of not less than five billion dollars in the first two years after the cessation of hostilities.

An hon. MEMBER: Where will they get that from?

Mr. MacINNIS: Where they are getting it now. It continues:

> With that national appropriation in sight the exploration of appropriate domestic policies could proceed with reality, and the boys now fighting our war would have an assurance that we were in earnest regarding expressions of faith in a new and better world.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. MacINNIS: One further word: Everything the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said indicates that parliament would decide how and when this money was to be expended.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South-Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is only one subject concerning which I should like to make a few remarks, and such as I may say will be for the benefit of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who is at present, I imagine, engaged in making up his budget. It is my hope that in that budget he will take account of the position of the poor people, the aged ones, who, as a result of the action of a former Liberal government, are receiving old age pensions. It is my hope that the minister will increase that pension as an earnest of the social security which is foreshadowed in the speech from the throne.

At a time like this there are many matters upon which one might desire to speak. We are impelled very often to discuss controllers, and to try to evaluate them and classify them as good controllers; sometimes good, or always bad. We feel we ought to discuss whether we should have a food controller, how control should be applied, and all that sort of thing. All these subjects might well form the subject matter of a speech, but it is my intention this afternoon to hold myself to one subject only; although that one is, in my judgment, a most important one.

Before adverting to that theme, however, may I make a few observations arising from the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I say at once that in contrast with some of the other members of his party, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is always somewhat refreshing when he speaks, because he never denies or seeks to evade the issue of state socialism. He does not wrap up his ideas in a great many circumlocutions and wordy evasions designed to hide from the public, and more particularly the private owners of farms in Saskatchewan, the fact that his party, bearing a name consisting of initials, is indeed an organization committed to the principles of state socialism. I want to commend the frankness of the hon. member in this respect.

Since the subject of critics is in my mind, I must say it is my belief that I am constitutionally a critic almost all the time. Perhaps I do differ from some other critics in that I rarely wrap up that which I have to say in words which would be difficult to understand or capable of fourteen or fifteen different meanings afterward. I believe it would be fair to say also with respect to myself that although I sometimes exhibit feeling, I try to be constructively critical. I am often in agreement with criticisms I hear from the colleagues of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Probably my state of mind arises from the fact that by reason of past history I have nearly always been one of a minority. I am told I had a grandfather; I am told that my said grandfather was born in a county named Wexford; and I am told that that county was a Catholic county. My information further is that this grandfather insisted upon being a Protestant, apparently to enjoy being among the minority. I am told further that the Protestants in that community organized themselves under the banner of the Orangemen.

Mr. REID: What size of shillelagh did he carry?

Mr. MAYBANK: I have not been told about that; but whatever he carried I am confident it would be different from that carried by anybody else, because that would give further opportunity of being in the minority. As I say, the Protestants of Wexford organized themselves as Orangemen. But again, in order to stay in the minority, this grandfather refused to be one of the Orangemen. I think that tendency to insist upon being in the minority has been passed down to his grandson and accounts for my being often a critic.

Indeed there are times when those critics to whom I have referred are in consonance with me; but not in all respects, for I wish to say to them immediately that I think it would be better if they, this organization of critics, would begin to strive, not merely to acquire but to exhibit intellectual honesty. I think their lack in that regard is the great defect of this society of critics at the far end of the house. They are an organization of, shall we say, state socialists, statists, or whatever expression one wishes to use. They are an organization that proposes to cure the ills of the world by means of the government assuming ownership of everything. It is not often they will express that view, but when one goes to their documents and carefully construes them, it can be discovered. Such was not the situation in Jim Woodsworth's day. He was too frank, too ruggedly honest to try to shy away from the position which he had quite properly taken in the first instance. He always admitted that what they were out to do was to acquire everything collectively and effect whatever measure of improvement could be brought about in that way.

[Mr. Maybank.]

But to-day, with the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver East, as I have indicated, this little group of organized critics never says a word about socialism if they can avoid doing so. They attack the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and sometimes I do not blame them; they attack the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and sometimes I do not blame them. They may have quarrels with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and they may attack him at times. I may also quarrel with him, although always in a friendly way. It may be that before long I shall be joining them in connection with some of the proposals that come up. But while they inveigh against many things, never, never, can one get this group of critics to tell anything about what they favour. They soft-pedal their socialism.

For example, let us take their amendment, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment and let us analyse it in order to see what they have proposed. I think it will be seen that it is state socialism in its nature. The amendment reads:

> And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

That is a lovely bundle of words under which to hide when it is desirable to hide. Lack of clarity is what is intended—what they advocate is expropriation of wealth, expropriation of industry, expropriation of finance and so forth. While such is the meaning of the amendment, you can explain that any way you like according to the particular hustings upon which you happen to be. That, I submit, is not intellectual honesty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing wrong with being a socialist. It has become respectable in recent years, and these gentlemen should remind themselves constantly that it is no longer not respectable to be a socialist. Why in the world a person who is a socialist wants to hide the fact and go through life with a cloak up in front of his face is something I cannot understand. The aim of many of us who are not socialists, pretty well the most of us, is very similar, in fact nearly identical with the aim of the socialist.

An hon. MEMBER: Why do you hide it?

Mr. MAYBANK: I hide nothing. There is no hiding about it. I say quite frankly that I am not a socialist. I believe that much can be obtained by reform. I know it comes slowly, but there is no doubt as to where I stand.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much reform?

Mr. MAYBANK: The greatest happiness for the maximum number of people is our aim. But on the point of respectability the position of the reformer is no more respectable than is the position of the socialist. These gentlemen are still worried about being thought not respectable; either that, or they are worried about some people on the plains of Saskatchewan who still own farms, not being willing to accept state socialism.

I am reminded of some advice which I heard that a father gave his son. He said that the son's first aim in life should be "to get on"; the second aim for him should be "to get honour"; and the third aim should be "to get honest." I submit that to be good advice for this group of critics. They have got "on" to a certain extent in the world. Socialism no longer being under the stigma of being unrespectable it may be said they have reached the comparative stage; they have got "honour". What is necessary for them is that they get "honest". They lack intellectual honesty and it would be good if they could develop that.

After all what would you think of a Catholic who got in among a crowd of Protestants and then attempted to hide the cross that dangled from his watch-chain; and generally to cover up the fact that he was a Catholic; and when any question arose about it, to slink away until he was absolutely cornered into admitting that he was a Catholic? Or what would you think about a Protestant who went to a celebration on the 17th of March, but when he heard anything said about Protestants he would act like Saint Peter prior to the third crowing of the cock and would deny that he was a Protestant? There is nothing more reprehensible than that kind of evasion. I submit to this group of critics that it is unworthy of them; it is unworthy of any group of Canadians who desire to have any influence upon Canadian life. I say to the rest of them that they would do well to emulate the frankness and honesty of their late leader, Jim Woodsworth, and his son-in-law, the hon. member for Vancouver East, who has just spoken.

This is not my main purpose in speaking to-day, but as I said there is a number of subjects that are intriguing. One is the "Prog-Cons" party which has lately been the subject of comment. The Conservatives came to my city and had a wonderful time, but unfortunately I was not there. For a time the public of Canada has been under the impression that they chose a leader in Winnipeg, but it now develops that what they did was to choose a kind of travelling organizer who will pose as a leader. They needed an organizer because the one they had was too busy following affairs in this house to carry on his other business. He is doing much better now as house leader. All and sundry should take notice of the fact that this new party has been perfectly frank in throwing off its mask of non-partisanship and has come right out into the field of partisanship. The party has no leader although it had a convention, but while it has no leader in the country, at least it has an organizer. This organizer should come in here and be a leader, I suppose, but as the Journal of this city has said, Mr. Bracken has decided to "by-pass" parliament. No doubt that is his method of showing respect for the institutions of this country, the institution of parliament. Such form of leadership is an intriguing subject which might be followed a little further; and also the manner of the nomination being sought and accepted; the seeking after Mr. Bracken, and all that sort of thing. But for the moment I shall pass that up.

I wish to present views which I hope will get to the proper advisers of his excellency with respect to one reform, and one reform only, which can be instituted now, without delay; a reform which will bring happiness to a large number of people now, immediately, and not merely at some time in the future. Let me preface my remarks with this observation. I think that since the war started this is the most hopeful of session openings. The throne speech this year offers more hope than any for some years. It is remarkable, you know, how much pleasure is obtained in life through hope. So that many of our pleasures are anticipatory. A great many of us, I have no doubt, are every day anticipating pleasures, and the very anticipation is pleasant. Sometimes the pleasures anticipated do not come about, but even then we have had the fun of thinking about them. There is a great deal of anticipatory pleasure to be obtained by reading the speech from the throne and visualizing all that will be done. In this case, of course, the pleasures, anticipatory to-day, will all come to be realized.

That part of the speech which deals with state medicine or some form of medical assistance by the state—I do not care what name is used for it—is one of the important parts of the government's programme. I should like to pause long enough to say that the father of this ameliorative legislation in Canada is a man from my own province. I believe that the first time this question was carefully presented to this house was when it was done by the then member for St. Boniface, and the present member for St.

Boniface (Mr. Howden). It just so happens that during the last week I have had four or five letters from friends, four of whom were men and one was a woman, people whom I did not know but who knew him and who all remarked on the value of his work, and now I take pleasure in drawing to the attention of the house that the commencement of this reform in Canada is very largely as a result of the work of the present member for St. Boniface. I am very glad that he is not in his place at the present moment. As a matter of fact, I know him so well and he knows me so well that I probably would not be saying this if he were, and when he reads it in Hansard he probably will not believe I said it. My regard for him is such that it is a pleasure to speak these just words of testimony to him and his pioneering in this field.

Another reform which I am very glad to see coming in is pensions for widows of veterans. I can see all the difficulties that lay in the way of this reform coming in sooner; but I have felt the delay. I welcome this reform particularly at this time. I assume the pension will follow somewhat the course of the burnt-out soldier's pension which in its nature is an old age pension. I imagine that under all the circumstances that is about the best type of legislation of this sort that we could have at this time. I know hundreds of cases of widows who certainly should be getting that pension, whose husbands certainly died by reason of war disabilities or war strain, although their disabilities could not be definitely tied up as attributable to the war. Many and many a woman in Canada to-day has become a widow much sooner than would have been the case had her husband not suffered from the strain of war. This is legislation that we can certainly welcome, which I am sure all Canada will welcome, and for which this government will have due thanks and great reward.

There is a very great present value—not future value—in all these social security measures and preparations. As an illustration of this value let me say I have read in numerous journals of the important effect upon the psychology of the axis peoples of such a report as the Beveridge report. You see, the democracies are held up all over the axis dominated countries as bloated plutocracies. We have no great access to the people under the German heel, and propaganda goes out steadily that with a victory by the axis a new order is possible which will be sort of new heaven and new earth, a brave new world, but that with a victory for the bloated plutocracies, miscalled democracies, there is no hope of change. Therefore journalists are almost unanimous in saying that there is a real psychological value in what I might term, to coin a word, "Beveridgism" now, in these very days.

There is a great value, too, in our own country right at the present time. We are concerned here, above all else, in maintaining the morale of our people. As long as the morale of Anglo-Saxondom does not crack, there is no question about the result of our efforts. That has always been clear; and, of course, there never has been any danger of the morale of Anglo-Saxondom cracking. One of the ways of keeping up our morale is to let our people understand that although we are down in the valley to-day it is absolutely certain, as Lloyd George said some years ago, that we shall again see the sunlight on the hills, and stronger, more beneficent sunlight than before. Accordingly I say that for the purpose of maintaining morale the institution of social security legislation is of the highest importance.

To follow that up for a moment, let me quote from a bank letter which came to me, giving a description of the Beveridge report. This is how it is described:

> Quoting social surveys as authority, the report states that from three-quarters to five-sixths of all want results from interruption or loss of earning power, due to such emergencies and vicissitudes as unemployment, sickness, and old age. Practically all of the remaining want is due to income being too small in relation to size of the family. The Beveridge plan aims to provide benefits and allowances adequate to maintain at least a subsistence standard of living under such conditions.

That is the bank's description of what I believe we propose to see instituted in this country. With such information abroad in Germany as to the sort of thing that Britain is now doing, I wonder how Doctor Goebbels can explain to his people that under the regime of the bloated plutocracies, as he would call them, or as they are more properly called, the decent democracies, far-reaching changes are impossible. When they come to know about a Beveridge report in Britain and other social security plans in other countries, the people of the axis countries will realize the untruthfulness of all that has been told them. Therefore the present value of social security plans, both here in Canada because of morale, and abroad because it breaks down lying propaganda, can be appreciated.

We are referring the subject of social security to a committee. It will go to the committee; the question will be well considered; there is a wealth of material for it; and the result of the deliberations of that committee, indeed the mere fact of its being appointed, will be enheartening to all Canada. But what I wish to urge to-day as a practical measure is that justice in respect of old age pensions should be done now, without waiting for any committee. There is a great deal of study necessary of a subject like health insurance; its ramifications are very great, particularly in a federal country such as ours. Contributory systems in respect of a general plan of old age pensions warrant a great deal of study, and there is sound reason for its reference to a committee. Similarly with other social service measures. There are constitutional as well as financial problems involved; in fact I believe the constitutional problems may be the greater. But as to the justice of increasing the old age pension and lowering the age at which it may be paid there can be no question whatever and no need of further study; now is the appointed time to institute that reform. The need is, of course, great. The measure under which old age pensions have been paid was introduced in 1926. I do not know the exact year when the first agreement with a province was made. I suppose it was a year or two after the bill was passed. My recollection is that British Columbia was the first.

Mr. REID: Right.

Mr. MAYBANK: I thank my hon. friend—and that Manitoba was the second to take advantage of the new act, though I may be wrong about that; evidently I am not wrong in regard to British Columbia.

Well, I was saying that the need is very great. Now, to be quite honest about it, if one looks at the index of wholesale prices from 1926 onward it will be seen that there has been nothing in the nature of a price rise. Perhaps wholesale prices for foods are not an accurate or sufficient guide to determine the cost of living. I think it will be agreed that they are a pretty fair indication of price tendencies over a period of time, although at any given time they will not be an exact measure of the cost of living. I glance at the latest publication which comes to me from the Bank of Canada, and I note under the heading of "wholesale prices" that in 1926, when the Old Age Pensions Act came into force, food prices stood at the index figure of 100, and that it so remained until 1929. And now I let my eyes travel down the page to the end of 1942. In that year the index figure is not any higher; in fact it is a couple of points lower, namely 98·3. So that there is a fair case to be made out, if one looks only at that much, for the proposition that living costs have not increased over the period since the act came into force. However, I think one should look at the period in between in order to get a proper picture of the situation. During most of the period from 1926 onward, prices which made up the chief living costs to old age pensioners were very much lower than they are to-day. It is true that prior to 1929 there was no change, but thereafter the change downward was very rapid. In 1937, for instance, the figure is 81; and 77 is the index figure of the next year. The lowest point appears to have been reached in 1932, when it was 61·5. In other words, in 1932 the old age pensioner could buy for 61 cents what to-day costs him 98 cents. Over most of the period during which old age pensions have been paid, living costs have undoubtedly been very much less than they are now.

I have referred only to foods, for the reason that a man or woman receiving only twenty dollars a month spends almost all of it on food; indeed very little money can be allowed for anything else. When one estimates living costs for people on such an extremely small income, one should think principally of food.

Mr. REID: And the majority have not twenty dollars a month.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is true. A considerable number do not receive so much; but I believe in the generality of cases where the pension is less, it is so because they have some small income from some other source. In other words, the fact of having some small income is what usually reduces the pension allowance below twenty dollars. It is not always so, but it happens very often. At any rate we can be sure of this, that whether a person's pension is $14 a month because he has another income, or whether it is $20 a month because he has not another income, no old age pensioner has very much, and none has as much as he should have in these difficult times.

There is another reason why these people are in difficulties to-day. Some of them have relied upon and have received help from sons or daughters or other members of the family. But as every person knows, under the difficulties which everyone is experiencing to-day, people who have been accustomed to support others are less able to do so to-day than they were some years ago. It is not an answer to that statement to say that wages were never higher than they are now. True, the totality of income was never so great, but the Minister of Finance quite properly exacts a very great part of the increased income. In fact there are very many young married people to-day whose income as they write it down in the first instance is fairly large and apparently adequate for their various responsibilities, but by the time they have taken care of the income tax man they are not as well off as they were a few years ago. This source of support for the older people of the country has therefore declined very much during the past two or three years.

If this country is to keep in line with other progressive nations we must increase old age pensions now, not two or three or five years from now. Pretty nearly every other country is giving attention, even while the war is on, to urgent measures of social security.

The United States situation is not as clear as that of some others on account of the federal system and there being possibly a number of state or semi-state plans. But take a look at the situation in England. After all, Sir William Beveridge is not propounding something which is new there. They have carried on all manner of public benefit schemes for many years. All things considered, their old age pension plans have been greatly superior to our own, and they have improved them during the war.

By the way, it might even be said that we pay a part of that English pension. It is an odd thing that we who cannot give justice to our own old people can help Britain to give justice to her own old people. That is what we are doing. We have lent Great Britain many millions of dollars, and we say, "Do not worry about the interest until some time in the future." We have made a direct gift of a billion dollars to Britain, and Britain has in part used that money for maintaining her social security structure. I am not complaining; I am not objecting that we gave the billion dollars; that was the right thing to do; give everything to win this war; nevertheless it is true that we are doing something for another country which we are not doing for our own people.

Should we be in line with Australia? I observe that they expand their social services even during the war. I receive the monthly letter of the Bank of New South Wales; it is always interesting, although it arrives late, to get some information from that far distant country. I observe this statement under the heading of "public finance":

> In the last two years the feature dominating the financial structure has been the size of government expenditure. During 1941-42 for instance, war expenditure in Australia amounted to £273 m., while expenditure overseas, excluding lend-lease, reached £47 m. Thus last financial year £320 m. was spent on the war. This sum was £98 m. greater than the budget estimate, the rapid growth arising largely out of Japanese aggression. Expenditure for non-war purposes in the last financial year increased to £101 m. as a result of higher widows' and old age pensions, and an increase on account of the full year's operation of the child endowment scheme.

It will be seen there is an increase in widows' pensions; there is an increase in the child endowment scheme.

I am not proposing that anything that requires great study should be immediately instituted. But here we have in Australia an increase in old age pensions, and all I am advocating now is an increase in old age pensions, something which does not require any study at all.

We might go a step further. There is a great deal in New Zealand in the way of social security legislation. I would not advocate following New Zealand in every respect; if I understand their position correctly, it seems clear that New Zealand up to date has instituted many social security schemes but is not currently paying for them. New Zealand is apparently borrowing a great deal of money outside its boundaries, and I would not advocate that. But we are not in that position. We are in the position of giving and lending money to Great Britain; Great Britain is lending it to New Zealand, and New Zealand is keeping up her social security schemes with it.

It has been well said that charity begins at home, and no person will deny that. But I am not talking about charity; I am talking about justice; and if it be true that charity begins at home, then with much stronger reason I can assert that justice begins at home. It is for us to institute this proper reform here and now before we institute or assist in the institution of social security schemes in any other country, no matter how good these countries may be and how much we should like to assist them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. MAYBANK: May I request the indulgence of the house for just a few minutes?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MAYBANK: I wish to add only that it seems to me that in a democracy governments should be responsive to public opinion. I would not advocate that government should answer to every wind and every cross-wind that blows, but it is the essence of democracy that government should be responsive to steady and uniform public opinion. I submit that public opinion with respect to this matter is steady and uniform in support of the proposal I have made this afternoon. I am sure all hon. members know that there have been circulated practically everywhere in Canada petitions in favour of a reform such as I have advocated. They have been widely signed. As far as Winnipeg is concerned I do not think there was a church or institution of any kind but had these petitions there and people never walked by without signing them, unless of course they had signed before. People did not pass them up; they were largely signed.

Then if we look at the press, it is I believe uniformly in favour of this reform and in favour of it at this time; not at some future time; but right now. To be in line with public opinion as reflected in the press it appears to me that it is the government's duty to improve the lot of these pensioners now. Listen to or read the words that come from various pulpits all over Canada; preachers and priests have inveighed against the treatment that the old-age pensioners have been getting, and have advocated an improvement in that regard.

I would not have anyone think that we are treating our aged people as the Eskimos treat theirs, where they keep them as long as they have teeth for the purpose of chewing moccasins to keep them soft, and when finally they have no teeth left, they are driven out into the cold as being no longer of any use to the tribe. But we are not doing that which we should do and which we can do. It is true to say at least that "chill penury" does repress the "noble rage" of our people, to borrow words from a poet. Life is dull and drab and mean for these people. It is not in our favour; it is not something of which we should be proud, that in this day when this reform is so badly needed we hold it back for reference to any committee or for any other purpose. The time when we should do justice to our elderly people in our own country is now, without reference to any committee whatsoever.

I thank you, sir, and the house for the indulgence granted me.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I gladly subscribe to the expressions of congratulation which have been extended by most of the hon. members who have preceded me to those two honourable and gallant members of this house, to use the phraseology of Westminster, who were chosen by the government to move and second the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. When they made their speeches they wore the king's uniform, and I think it is true that in choosing those two hon. members for the task the government paid a tribute to the fighting services of which they are members, and also did honour to the two hon. members themselves. I listened with unusual attention to what they said, because it appears to me that such men must of necessity have their sayings brightened by the breadth of their experience, they having offered themselves in this struggle on our behalf; and I feel sure that the whole house will wish them great success in what lies ahead.

Since the house last met, the party to which I belong has held a most important convention. It received the resignation of a leader; it chose his successor; it added a word to the name of the party, and it brought the policy of the party up to date in conformity with the trend of public opinion throughout the world. It is not unusual that the Conservative party should thus review its policy from time to time, because a study of history will, I think, show all people with open minds that in the past it has been the Conservative party that has marched along the road of progress in this country. In choosing our new leader we have selected a man who has not been closely associated in the past with any political party. He is a man of vision, a man not given to phraseology or to evasion. What he says he means; what he means he says, and I believe he is understood by the common people. Perhaps he subscribes to the view which I have held for a considerable time with regard to partisanship. Under our democratic system of government a political party is a most valuable instrument, and as long as it is used as an instrument and kept in the position of a servant it is not only useful but almost a necessity in our form of government. But it must never become the master, for if it does it has a sway which is so dominating that it has an evil effect upon the policies adopted by the party. It will not be at all difficult for me to give allegiance to our new leader, and I note with considerable interest the acclaim with which his choice has been received throughout Canada among those who subscribe to the party to which I belong.

The amendment which we of the official opposition have drawn to the attention of the house is threefold. It deals with man-power, with the policy in regard to labour, and with agriculture. We maintain that criticism is due the government on account of the lack of success attending their efforts in these three directions. Labour is the thread that runs through all three, and we certainly have not arrived at that degree of success which we had anticipated after the national selective service scheme was put into operation. There is in this country a given quantity of labour available for the many purposes to which it must be put. But under national selective service labour has not found its way under proper allocation into these various channels. In the part of British Columbia from which I come the principal interest is agriculture in its most varied forms, and there is also mining. Along with both these industries, however, are the various secondary industries which attach themselves to any main industry; and in all these walks of life we have been looking on during a period of considerable difficulty as a result of lack of labour. It is common to all parts of Canada. It is a difficulty which must be foreseen and which has been foreseen, and it is a difficulty which must be met. In the first place it must be met by the ingenuity of those who are concerned in the industries using that labour, but over and above that, after they have used all the ingenuity within their power, there must be direction at the top or there will be failure.

With regard to matters other than the particular industries involved in this question, I should imagine that right across Canada, and certainly in British Columbia, a very grave difficulty exists at the present time in connection with the matter of fuel. The supply of coal has been intermittent. Coal, however, is not the principal fuel used by those whom I represent. They use wood in various forms, whether in cord-wood or in sawdust; and because during the past year or two those who customarily put in their winter cutting wood and storing it for future use have not been available for this work, such stores of fuel have become used up. Unfortunately, during the bitter weather we had recently, our people had to warm themselves and to cook with green lumber; and hon. members who have attempted to cook with green lumber will know the difficulties which have been experienced in almost every home in British Columbia. The situation is bad enough in the rural areas, but in the cities it has reached the point of endangering life. I do not suggest that this is a matter with regard to which the dominion government can just step in and provide a remedy, but what I do suggest is that the fuel administrator must go far more deeply into this question of the people's fuel in order that plans may be evolved which will overcome the difficulty; for we must not forget that if we have completely run out of dry fuel, next winter must be planned for long before next winter arrives.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house two matters, both either directly or indirectly concerning labour. In the south of the constituency of Yale and along the United States border is the country in which Doukhobors live, and they run over into the neighbouring riding of Kootenay West. As this house well knows, they have been a constant source of difficulty to governments in Canada. When the registration measure of 1940 was instituted, Doukhobors, of course, were subservient to it, as were all of us. Some of the Doukhobors filled in the necessary forms, while others did not. Those who did not were not permitted, under the terms of the registration, to hire themselves out for work, nor might anyone employ such unregistered persons. Throughout that southern country, however, where a great deal of lumbering is carried on, and where the contracts undertaken by the lumber operators have largely been government orders, there has been a considerable shortage of labour. There has been a tendency for the lumber mills to employ unregistered Doukhobors. This applies not only to the lumber mills, but to other industries including the section gangs of the transportation companies.

Obviously the law has not been enforced with regard to these unregistered Doukhobors, with the natural consequence that Canadian residents in those parts look upon this as unfair treatment of them and their sons. As a result of the registration their sons are called up; they go to training camps and carry out the duties of young Canadians. But the Doukhobors do not. Ever since their ancestors arrived in 1898, they have been treated differently. Although they have not been placed in training camps, they have not been used in any other work. This is resented all through the country in which the Doukhobors live.

Last summer I was speaking about the matter to a police officer, and he said, "Look at the position in which we are placed. If we go out and demand registration cards, taking action if they are not produced, we are informed by our senior officers that it would be advisable not to be too stiff. If we do not take action, then the public will say, 'You are not putting the Doukhobors under the penalties of the registration regulations, but you are bringing the same penalties to bear upon us and our sons'." Is it any wonder that strong resentment exists in that part of the country?

Late last summer I paid a visit to Grand Forks, and heard resentment expressed wherever I went. I wrote the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) a letter describing what I had found and, on the basis of the statements of people I had met, I made the suggestion that the minister send an official of his department through that southern country to investigate on the minister's behalf, to hear what the inhabitants had to say, and to listen to any suggestions which responsible citizens who have been experiencing this trouble for a long time might make. I suggested that in that way the minister could inform himself at first hand from his official, and that a possible solution of the difficulty might be worked out. The minister was good enough to accept my suggestion and to say that such an official would be sent in. I wanted, not a commission, but rather a departmental official who could move around among the people, see conditions for himself, and listen to any suggestions.

We cannot go on year after year looking upon this Doukhobor question as something which cannot be solved. That would merely bring the law into disrepute. May I read two or three paragraphs from my letter to the minister:

> Young Canadians by their age classes go to camp for military training and subsequent service. The Doukhobors do not. Is it any wonder that the inhabitants are angry or that the Doukhobors are laughing at us? Over the years my hope has been that time would solve the difficulty. I am sorry to say that the people in Grand Forks now tell me that the younger Doukhobors, with minds somewhat expanded, are taking the view that it is quite unnecessary to submit to regulation, because the government does not know what to do with them, and so it will continue to do nothing.

Then I made reference to the suggestion I have already outlined, namely, that an official be sent in to make inquiries on the spot. I concluded with this paragraph:

> I am well aware that labour is short, that Doukhobors are employed, and that if they were discharged badly wanted produce would suffer. But the effect on the inhabitants of winking at breaches of the law by a Doukhobor, a law which is enforced on others, is very bad indeed.

A lumber operator said to me, "I must not employ unregistered Doukhobors; but if I see that my competitors are doing so, and if the section gangs on the railways use these men, what am I to do? I also have government contracts to fill." What he wanted, and what I request, is that the law be enforced on one as well as on the other; otherwise this Doukhobor question will go on, and become worse and worse.

The other question to which I should like to refer has to do with the Japanese. After the treachery of Japan, which precipitated us into war with that country, the anxiety on the Pacific coast and the danger of the situation induced the government to proclaim a protected area of varying width from the United States boundary to Alaska. The boundary of this area almost touches the southwest corner of the constituency of Yale which I have the honour to represent. We are therefore not in the protected area.

After the protected area had been so proclaimed, and after the government had intimated its policy of evacuating the Japanese from within that area, some of the Japanese did not wait to be evacuated, but trekked by day and night, by train and by car and, as soon as they crossed the line of delimitation, began to settle. My constituency was the first and possibly the most desirable piece of country in which they could settle, and as a result many of them stopped there.

Before this difficulty we had from 800 to 1,000 Japanese men, women and children who had been resident in that area. I must say for them that they were good citizens and subscribed to the law. There was seldom any trouble from them, and they certainly worked. The houses and shacks of those inhabitants became the settling point of the Japanese trekking from the protected area. The result was that we saw many more oriental faces on the streets, in the stores, on the roads and in cars. They were not wanted immigrants. When the British Columbia security commission was first set up it appeared to be more interested in the evacuation of the Japanese from the protected area than in their destination. Strong protestations were made by those living to the east of that protected area that those Japanese must not be allowed to squat among them. Eventually the commission instituted a permit system, and without a permit a Japanese could not move from the protected area.

A committee was set up to cover the interior from Kamloops to the boundary, 200 miles away, whose purpose it was to reflect public opinion on this matter and deal with the security commission. The representations of the committee were not always received with evident pleasure by the commission, but they were received and in some instances they were acted upon. When the labour difficulties of last year arose, when the thinning of the fruit, the weeding of vegetables and the eventual harvesting and picking were upon us, it was found to be extremely hard to save that valuable crop. But the inhabitants of the interior, both the farmers and the townfolk, worked admirably together, and there is nothing but praise to be said of those business men of the towns who closed their stores for one or two days a week in order that those working in the stores could go out and help the farmers with their harvest.

There were other districts, principally toward the northern end of the fruit and vegetable belt, where such help was not available, and despite the use of high school students and any labour that could be induced to come in from outside, there was an obvious shortage in prospect. Some of the larger growers appealed to the security commission to bring in Japanese for labour, but the commission took the view that they would not agree to do that unless the municipalities concerned would give their consent. Eventually the security committee, not the commission, voicing the opinion of the public from Kamloops to the line, arrived at this formula. A grower desiring Japanese labour would be permitted to receive at his own expense that labour if it came in under police supervision, if it remained under police supervision, if it was to be returned to the place whence it came and if it was male only. The commission agreed to a certain extent to allow the fruit growers of some areas to receive such help. When it arrived, some of it was sent back immediately because it did not prove amenable, it was damaging the fruit by throwing it about and did not show any desire to work honestly. But those who remained were of great assistance in harvesting the crop.

However, only certain fruit growers in certain areas were ready to adopt this means of saving their crop. Away to the south, and dotted through the whole area, were those who would not agree on any terms whatever to more Japanese being brought into the district. Why was that? I feel certain it was because these people had a longer vision. They saw that if Japanese came into that area and settled, the tendency would be for more and more to come in; they had not forgotten the experience of people in other parts of the world, especially in the fruit valleys of California and, to a lesser extent, in the lower mainland of our own province of British Columbia, and they would not consent to these people coming in.

I would remind the house that for many years there has been a provincial government prohibition of the use of orientals in logging from crown lands as well as in connection with government contracts taken by sawmill operators. Why did the provincial government take that line, and why have they maintained it? I think it is because they had a longer vision of the result of scattering Japanese and other orientals through the interior country. Recently the dominion government approached the provincial government at Victoria to ascertain whether they would remove that prohibition because of the war and allow Japanese labour to be used in logging camps. The provincial government has declined to remove the prohibition, although it recognizes that under the War Measures Act the dominion government could, if it chose, override this prohibition. Even with the difficulty of obtaining labour the provincial government has not seen fit to raise this prohibition.

The commission's task was not an easy one because they had to find destinations and, as far as possible, occupations for some 24,000 Japanese. These Japanese were distributed through the interior of British Columbia in road camps and other places and, besides that, agreements were entered into with Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario to receive a certain number for work of specified description. I think 2,500 went to Alberta, 1,000 to Manitoba and some 500 to Ontario. These were moved under provincial government agreements, and in addition there were smaller numbers who went to particular industries in the other provinces. I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that each of these provincial agreements contained a clause under which the dominion government must arrange to remove these Japanese from these provinces after the war, should that desire be expressed. From the utterances of the public men of Canada I have no doubt whatever that that desire will be so expressed. Therefore the dominion government will be under contract to remove these Japanese.

The question that many people in British Columbia are asking themselves to-day is: To what place will these Japanese be removed? It must be remembered that the fishing boats of the Japanese who used to fish on the Pacific coast have been sold by the custodian of enemy property. It must also be remembered that business premises of Japanese firms which were located in the cities on the coast and in the rural parts of the province are being disposed of. I do not think it will be thought for a moment by anyone who knows anything about the feeling of the British Columbia people on this oriental question that Japanese will be received in any part of British Columbia with anything like equanimity.

I ask the government if it does not see fit to proclaim a policy in regard to this matter and allay public opinion. I emphasize the fact that this oriental question has been debated in this house year after year for a quarter of a century. Twenty years ago it was an annual event. British Columbia considered that this was a question of greater magnitude than a provincial matter, and I was shocked last year when a minister of this government referred to it as a provincial question, as a British Columbia question, and made the statement that we in the original years of their intrusion asked them to come.

The opinion was faulty and the statement of fact was inaccurate. We never asked them to come. Forty years ago or thereabouts the Japanese government removed the prohibition which had existed until then upon emigration. In those days the Japanese might not leave Japan, but the Japanese government removed that prohibition. From then on, the Japanese started to come into British Columbia in a trickle which grew into a stream. They came, but we never asked them. Although to-day we employ some of them as labour and some find their vocation in contracts with farmers for garden truck, the great majority of them are not working for wages but have set themselves up in business premises or on farms where they are their own masters. I raise this question in this house for this definite purpose, that British Columbia considers that it has long enough been allowed to carry this burden alone. The conditions of entanglement which existed in the earlier years of this century on account of the Anglo-Japanese alliance have now ended. The treachery of the Japanese has shown to us that we cannot look behind that oriental face and realize with any certainty where their patriotism lies. Have they given up their patriotism? Have they given up their original nationality? We do not know; we shall never know.

I draw further attention to this fact, that the many who have been born in Canada, and who in accordance with our law may be described as Canadian subjects, have in many instances been the more difficult to work with and to handle under these circumstances than have been the nationals. The really bad actors were interned immediately, but many of those men of whom nothing evil was known have been placed in camps or have been sent out under the schemes to which I have referred or have found occupation of some sort. The matter has been handled and is settled perhaps for the present. But it is the future we are thinking of, and I ask the government if it will not see fit to proclaim its policy with regard to the future, because I warn the government that if after this war comes to an end these people are allowed to roam in British Columbia there will be trouble enough for the government.

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate until I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) announce a few days ago that the budget would be brought down in the course of two or three weeks. It then occurred to me that if any member had any injustices or grievances which he wished to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance, it would be an opportune time to do so while he is considering his budget.

There are two matters in particular which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. One is the excessive taxes which are imposed under the Income War Tax Act upon commissioned officers while they remain in Canada. I conceive it to be the duty of a member of this house to inform himself of any injustices under which the active forces may be labouring and to do what he can to adjust them. I suggest that for this reason. The forces have a right to complain to their commanding officers of any injustice, but they have no right, as they understand the situation, to complain to a member of this house. Their commanding officers cannot do anything toward redressing the grievance of which I am speaking, and for that reason I think it is our duty to be on the alert to bring grievances of this kind to the attention of the house.

Prior to 1940 all soldiers were taxed on their income and allowances, but in 1940 the act was amended to exempt non-commissioned officers and all other ranks in all forces from the income tax. Commissioned officers were also exempted as long as they were serving overseas, but commissioned officers serving in Canada were required under the act as then amended to pay full income tax. At the last session of the house I directed the attention of the minister and of the house to this matter because I thought it worked an injustice particularly on the lower paid officers. I pointed out at that time that these commissioned officers volunteered for service anywhere in the world, that they were ready, willing and anxious, indeed preferred, to go overseas, and yet they were heavily taxed simply because they were kept in Canada. The minister at that time promised to do something for these men. He did something for them, a little, not very much. I submit that he should have done a great deal more, and I hope that now something more will be done in this respect.

Let us consider the circumstances. A warrant officer, class 1, grade A, is not taxed. His income is $150.56 a month. The net income of a captain, a higher officer, while he is serving in Canada is only $133.67. The net income of a lieutenant is $108.58; of a second lieutenant, $96.97. A warrant officer, lower in rank than a second lieutenant, nevertheless draws $53.59 more pay after taxation is deducted, and he draws $41.98 a month more than a lieutenant, $16.89 more than a captain, and within $3.46 of the pay of a major. A staff-sergeant also receives more than a lieutenant after the tax has been deducted from the latter's pay. I am not suggesting that the warrant officer or the staff-sergeant is paid too much. They are not paid too much, nor do I quarrel with the pay that is being given to a lieutenant, a second lieutenant, a captain or a major. What I do object to is that the government is paying these higher ranks more pay with one hand and then taking it away in taxes with the other. We boast that our army is the best paid, the best clothed, the best housed and the best fed army in the world. But what is the advantage in paying these commissioned officers well while they are in Canada if we take a large part of it away in taxes? The commissioned officers are taxed so highly that there is no inducement for a non-commissioned officer to seek promotion. There is no inducement for a man to rise from the ranks to the position of commissioned officer. That should not be the situation. As it is now, if he is promoted he must live on so much less.

There are other perquisites given to non-commissioned officers and others in the ranks to which the commissioned officer is not entitled. The commissioned officer must pay for his own clothing and equipment, except that when he is appointed to a commission he is allowed $150 with which to buy clothing and equipment. But it takes another $150 to $250 from his own pocket in order to buy all the necessary equipment, and he must also pay $75 to $100 a year for replacements, and another $75 a year or thereabouts for extra messing costs. These outgoings are in addition to what a non-commissioned officer or a private is required to pay.

But that is not all. The dependent's board of trustees provide special assistance to dependents of men serving in the Canadian navy, army or air force. I quote from their circular, August, 1942:

> What kind of assistance?
>
> Financial—over and above what is already received under the existing marriage or dependents' allowance regulations. . . .
>
> Who are eligible for financial assistance?
>
> Dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces below the rank of warrant officer class I who are in receipt of marriage or dependents' allowance and who are in special or urgent need.

These concessions do not inure to the benefit of commissioned officers.

So far I have discussed only the position of the single man with no dependents. A married man is in a much worse position. A considerable portion of his pay must be assigned to his wife and family for their maintenance and support. As long as he is living in Canada he likes to have a home near where he is stationed, so that he may occasionally visit his wife and family. If he is about to be sent overseas he likes to get home during his embarkation leave, and if his family are not located near him it is very difficult for him, on his small pay, to raise the necessary money. In 1940 railway rates were such that a soldier returning home on leave could make the return trip for single fare. I regarded the charge as excessive, and on November 7, 1940, I brought the matter to the attention of the minister and of this house, and urged that concessions in the way of railway rates should be made to men in the armed forces while on leave, particularly embarkation leave. A good deal has been done in that respect, but even with the small rates which are exacted to-day it is very difficult for a commissioned officer stationed, say, at Halifax to return to Calgary on embarkation leave; the pay is so meagre that he can scarcely afford to do it.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. When he is discharged from the army he receives a cheque for a month's pay. That is all very well, but at the same time he is told that he owes the government eight months' arrears of income tax. That is not a happy prospect for the commissioned officer. The private has no such obligation. It is not just that the officer should be subject to this requirement, and I suggest that it is a condition which should be remedied.

Furthermore, a commissioned officer is held responsible for all equipment and supplies entrusted to his command. The private has no such worries.

I hope the minister will give this matter careful consideration and do something to relieve the situation.

On motion of Mr. Ross (Calgary East) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, February 15, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister tell the house just what the report involves?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is the routine report of what we call the striking committee, which decides in consultation with all parties and groups in the house what members shall compose the standing committees.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messrs. Black (Yukon), Dupuis, Edwards, Farquhar, Furniss, Goulet, Howden, Jaques, Laflamme, Lafontaine, Macdonald (Brantford City), MacInnis, McGregor, McIvor, Mayhew, Pinard, Purdy, Rhéaume, Thauvette, Tucker, Tustin, be appointed to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker I wish to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the immediate appointment of a representative of the French-Canadian element on the national war labour board, it being urgent that such appointment be made before the said board begins to function, and necessary because of the importance of the large group of French-Canadian workers.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion there is not that degree of urgency which would justify a motion for the adjournment of the house.

RATIONING

STATEMENT AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF RATION BOOKS THROUGH LOCAL BOARDS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on February 3 on the orders of the day asked a question about the distribution of ration books. I thought it would be much more convenient if I could table the answer, which I now do. It is as follows:

Under war conditions there has been tremendous movement of population. No agency who has tried to do so has ever been very successful in obtaining notification of changes of address. It is estimated that the post office, which one would expect to be in a very strong position, receives only about one-third of the address changes. There are numerous indications which point to the fact that the ration administration is not being notified of a great percentage of the address changes. When book No. 1 was distributed by mail the ration administration had a mailing list which was only three months old and which they had kept up to date by making all changes of which they were advised. Nevertheless in the city of Toronto alone, 62,000 of these books were returned to them. It was a most laborious process to get these into the proper hands and inevitably the book holders were greatly inconvenienced. In the six months which have elapsed since that date, additional address changes have accumulated. About half the population of the dominion has no street address. They collect their mail from rural routes or from general delivery.

The ration administration has available now an organization comprising local ration boards which form the basis for distribution. Volunteer workers have been enthusiastic in their offers to help and the ration administration expect the job to proceed with little inconvenience.

In spite of precautions taken, some persons have received two books. Worked out on a percentage basis, the number of these is small; however, they should be eliminated if possible. While some persons accept two books mailed to them at different addresses, it would be much less likely that they would deliberately present themselves twice to make applications.

Expense is also a factor of some importance. In order to distribute the ration books through the post office, millions of pieces of mail would have to be handled and the ration administration would be involved in considerable expense in readdressing books returned to them owing to change of address.

It is perhaps worth mentioning that the distribution of book No. 2 differs from that of book No. 1 by the fact that the former includes butter coupons which have an expiry date. When book No. 1 was distributed anyone who received his book a few weeks late at least had the satisfaction of knowing that he could still use all the coupons. With book No. 2 it would be different to the extent that anyone receiving a book a few weeks late will have lost the opportunity of using some of the butter coupons.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked a week or two ago if we might not follow this session the practice followed in previous sessions of having questions answered once a week until the debate on the address is over. The government agreed to that. Last week questions were answered on Monday and we are prepared with the consent of the house to proceed with questions to-day.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE—DRAFT CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS AFFECTING SEAMEN

Mr. NEILL:

Referring to the statement made by the then Minister of Labour, as recorded in Hansard on May 31, 1939, to the effect that the provision of certain draft conventions, numbers 53 to 57 inclusive, affecting seamen, adopted at the international labour conventions in 1936, were being given examination and that parliament would be advised in due course—has this been done and, if so, what were the decisions arrived at or what action is proposed?

Mr. MITCHELL: As stated by the late Hon. Mr. Rogers, Minister of Labour, in the house on May 31, 1939, consideration was given to the possible ratification of conventions Nos. 53-57, inclusive, all of which relate to seamen, but with the outbreak of war and the demands made on Canadian shipping, no further action was taken concerning these conventions which could have imposed additional burdens on the shipowners and, in the case at least of numbers 53, 54 and 57, would have required additional man-power. The government, however, is continuing to study the question of implementing some or all of these conventions.

*IRREGULARITIES IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the government taken any steps to prevent irregularities discovered in certain war industries since the beginning of the war?

2. Has the government employed the services of chartered accountants to inquire into the operations of such companies?

3. If so, (a) when, (b) in connection with what companies, (c) with what results?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. It is not in the public interest to give the information.

WARTIME HOUSING—ACCOMMODATION FOR WOMEN IN PETERBOROUGH STAFF HOUSE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

What is the reason for Wartime Housing Limited not making provision to use part of the staff house at Peterborough for women?

Mr. HOWE: In October, 1941, following a survey of munition plants in Peterborough, it was recommended by the Department that two staff houses be erected in Peterborough—one for men and one for women. This was approved by P.C. 8874, dated November 18, 1941. It was felt that caution should be exercised in proceeding with two staff houses at one time. It was thought probable that the erection of one staff house might release enough accommodation in Peterborough to make the construction of a second one unnecessary. As the industries in Peterborough considered their first necessity to be housing accommodation for men, a men's staff house was first proceeded with.

Should it be that the condition arises whereby only one staff house be necessary to house both the men and women unable to be housed other than in staff houses, then the Peterborough staff house can, by minor and simple modification, be made to house both men and women workers. The Department of Munitions and Supply as a matter of principle is averse to housing men and women in the same building if it can be avoided. The department, at the present time, has no reason to believe that the present staff house will not be entirely required for men, and it has no advice that accommodation for women is presently needed.

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Has the government made any plans to extend the sugar beet industry in order to alleviate the sugar shortage in Canada?

2. If so, what steps have been taken?

Mr. ILSLEY: The government, through the sugar administrator of the wartime prices and trade board, has made every effort to obtain maximum production of beet sugar. In order to stimulate production, the net price of sugar to the grower was increased one-half cent per pound offset by a similar reduction in the excise tax effective February 16, 1942. As a further encouragement to production in 1943, the excise tax will be reduced by another one-half cent per pound effective September 1, 1943, the full benefit to be received by sugar beet growers.

ASSISTANCE OF STUDENTS IN 1942 HARVEST—PAYMENTS TO RAILWAYS

Mr. SHAW:

1. Were any sums paid by the government to the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the Canadian National Railway, to any individual or groups of individuals in connection with the sending of university students and others to western Canada to assist in the 1942 harvest?

2. If so, what amounts were paid, to whom were they paid and upon what dates were payments made?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

1 and 2. (a) National Registration, August 19-21, 1940, of all persons in Canada over sixteen. Registration is continuous, kept up to date through returns made by some thirteen thousand postmasters who act as deputy registrars.	To supply information to be used as basis for mobilization of manpower and to provide identification.
(b) Registration of insured workers July 1941 through returns to unemployment insurance commission constituted partial registration of man-power.	Utilized to assess extent of unemployment insurance coverage and to provide statistics for general and administrative uses.
(c) Unemployment insurance registration April 1942 was extended to include non-insurable employees.	Information obtained was compiled by Dominion Bureau of Statistics, constituting an inventory of occupations and industries utilized by Department of Labour and wartime prices and trade board.
(d) Registration of unemployed male persons June 1942, excepting those below sixteen or over seventy, or students, or those confined in an institution, or subject to provisions of the essential war (scientific and technical) personnel regulations 1942. Registration is continuous.	To enable employment and selective service offices to have full particulars of all unemployed persons so that they may be referred to employment.
(e) Registration of female persons—September 21, 1942—born 1918 to 1922, both years inclusive, not including members of religious orders or those in institutions, or in insurable employment.	To obtain information as to the number of women in the age group and their relative availability for selective service.
(f) Continuing registration by wartime technical personnel bureau, commenced June, 1941.	To ascertain numbers of professional and trained scientists and engineers and activities in which they are engaged to meet the requirements of essential industries.
(g) Continuing registration by wartime technical personnel bureau, commencing December 1, 1942, of university science students.	To obtain information as to whether or not any such would be volunteering to serve as technical officers with the armed forces.

2. Had he any previous experience with either the production, manufacture or sale of lumber?

It was not considered that an intimate technical knowledge on lumber was required in the position of timber controller inasmuch as the controller has on his staff in Ottawa, together with his offices in Edmonton, Winnipeg, Vancouver and St. John, experienced and well-qualified technical assistants.

Furthermore, the controller calls on the advice of the members of his committees in the various timber producing areas in Canada and these committees are set up in these areas due to their intimate knowledge of local conditions. In addition to having advice available from these advisory committees in the producing areas of Canada, the controller has an eastern Canadian advisory committee, with representatives of the industry from Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

THIRD VICTORY LOAN—COMMISSIONS TO BOND DEALERS

Mr. ROY:

1. How much was paid to each firm or bond dealers of Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Quebec for services rendered during the third victory loan?

2. Who established the rates of commissions, and what were they?

Mr. ILSLEY: No commissions are paid to investment dealers on the sale of victory bonds. However, the Minister of Finance, on the recommendation of a committee consisting of the chairman of the national war finance committee, the securities adviser of the Bank of Canada, and the Deputy Minister of Finance, pays a reasonable remuneration to such dealers for the services rendered by them in connection with each victory loan campaign. The basis of this remuneration is not disclosed to dealers but takes into account the number and character of the personnel made available to the national war finance committee and the previous record of the firm in the distribution of dominion government securities. It is considered undesirable to disclose the amount paid to individual firms as to do so would divulge to competitors the business affairs of private firms and might adversely affect the morale of the victory loan organization.

The total amount of remuneration paid to investment dealers in Canada for services rendered in connection with the third victory loan was $3,067,415, or ·309 per cent of the amount of money raised.

*WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

Will a secret session of parliament be called to discuss the war expenditures committee report and evidence in connection therewith?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the committee on war expenditures is set up an opportunity will be afforded for a discussion of the reports of the previous committee. If it is found that it is not possible to obtain the information that is required in the public discussion that will be the time to consider whether it is desirable to have a secret session.

Mr. HOMUTH: The meetings of this committee were held in secret, and I do not think the evidence which came out could very well be discussed in the house when the committee is set up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to enter into a discussion with my hon. friend at the moment. In our parliament we are following in this matter the practice followed at Westminster. The meetings of the expenditures committee in Great Britain are held in secret, as they are here. The question of a secret session with respect to matters reported upon will not arise until it is seen that it is obviously necessary to have a secret session.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT—DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS—BURTON MEMORANDUM

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Did the government receive a memorandum in 1940 from Mr. C. L. Burton, of Toronto, regarding plans for the disposal of Canada's surplus wheat?

2. If so, have any steps been taken to implement these plans?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

CANADIAN ARMY—ENLISTMENTS, DISCHARGES, ETC.

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What was the total strength of Canada's armed forces overseas on December 1, 1942?

2. How many men had been discharged from all branches of the active service forces overseas up to December 1, 1942?

3. What percentage of these men were discharged because they were suffering from syphilis?

4. How many men were serving (a) in the active army in Canada on December 1, 1942; (b) in the reserve army in Canada on the same date? Of the latter, how many have gone active and are available for service anywhere?

5. How many of the armed forces serving in Canada only were discharged up to December 1, 1942?

6. What percentage of these men were discharged because of syphilis?

7. Are recruits, before being admitted into the armed services, subjected to the Wasserman or other test for syphilis? If not, why is such test not made?

8. How many have enlisted in the services and are finishing their courses in science, medicine and dentistry?

Mr. POWER: This would be an order for return. But I should like to ask that we be not pressed to give the total strength of the air force overseas. By arrangement with the United Kingdom government we do not give the numbers of air crew which have been sent overseas. They consider it just as important to conceal from the enemy the numbers of air crew over there as the numbers of combat aircraft which they have. With that exception I am only too glad to have this pass as an order for return.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Were turnips from Farnham, Quebec, supplied to any national defence camps in Ontario during 1942?

5. Of these, how many have been rejected for medical reasons?

6. Of the persons rejected for medical reasons, how many have been found in each of the medical categories below the standard required for military service?

Mr. POWER: This would be an order for return, but with respect to question 3 it is very difficult to give the answer because when a man is rejected we do not go into all the disabilities from which he suffers which would give cause for rejection. A man might be rejected for half a dozen different things, so that it may not be possible to give all the information asked.

Mr. HOMUTH: Up to what category do they accept them? That might answer the question.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: That could be given, but whether a man suffers from ulcers or a broken leg or multiple disabilities would not appear in any return given.

Mr. HOMUTH: It was a question of the medical category, not the disability.

Mr. POWER: He probably would not be categorized if he was of a class which would make him incapable of serving.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order for return, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

LABOUR CONDITIONS—LAY-OFFS IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a return showing the number of persons in war production industries or on war contracts who were laid off between November 1, 1942, and January 15, 1943, or other latest date for which such information is obtainable, and showing the names of plants, corporations or companies from which lay-offs have taken place, together with the number of workers affected in each case. Also a statement showing what provisions, if any, have been made to reemploy or utilize the services of persons affected by the above lay-offs?

Mr. HOWE: It would be impossible for the government to give this information, because it is not available. The turnover in war plants is rather high, and it is difficult to draw the line between main and subcontractors. Men are coming and going all the time and I do not think anyone could be held responsible for determining what was a lay-off and what was not. Therefore I do not think this information can be given.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the minister be prepared to give the information if I limited it to war plants employing fifty people or more?

Mr. HOWE: We have no information. Most employers are private employers and unless the lay-off were reported to the national war labour board, as it must be today, we could not furnish that information for the back periods.

Mr. COLDWELL: How about national selective service?

Mr. HOWE: They would have received figures on lay-offs only since the turn of the year, perhaps, but not before.

Motion dropped.

POWER PLANTS FOR WAR PRODUCTION

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all contracts, agreements, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government, dated from the 1st of September, 1939, to the present, relating to understandings concerning the erection of any new power plants made necessary by war production in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia, together with any orders in council, contracts, agreements or understandings regarding depreciation or rebates to be allowed by the government from amounts otherwise payable under excess profits tax or other tax legislation. Also a copy of any agreements regarding financial aid by the government in the erection of such plants, and any contracts, agreements or understandings governing conditions or terms of sale of such power to companies or corporations in Canada or for export to the United States.

ENLISTMENT OF ENEMY ALIENS

Mr. SHAW:

LOSS OF TIRES IN WYNYARD, SASK., GARAGE FIRE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY—GOLD STANDARD

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of all correspondence passing between any department of the government of Canada and, (a) the government, or any department thereof, of the United States of America, (b) the government, or any departments thereof, of Great Britain, during 1941 and up to the present time, regarding the adoption of an international currency and/or a return to the gold standard. Also a copy of all documents and papers making commitments therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house will observe that this motion calls for correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain and also between the government of Canada and the government of the United States. I would not be in position to table correspondence, if there is any such, without the consent of the other governments mentioned. In the event of there being correspondence I will undertake to ascertain from the governments of Great Britain and the United States whether or not they are agreeable to having such correspondence tabled. The last clause in the motion is, "also a copy of all documents and papers making commitments therewith." I think I have sufficient knowledge of the situation to say that there have been no commitments made with regard to the subject matters referred to in the order. That is all I can say with respect to the motion. I think it had better be dropped.

Mr. QUELCH: Would an hon. member be permitted to read this correspondence without its being tabled, or would permission have to be granted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would have to ascertain whether the British and the United States governments were agreeable before I could answer my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. QUELCH: Stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the motion had better be dropped. I shall ascertain from the British government if there is any such correspondence and if, so far as the British government is concerned, it may be tabled or read. If it is available, I shall advise my hon. friend as soon as I have a reply.

Motion dropped.
