Mr. GARDINER: Before this is passed I should like to get some information from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). Does he desire the final reports of the different surveys made? It will be understood that these survey parties simply ran levels on all the streams flowing into the Qu'Appelle valley, and the interim reports to the department would simply show what those levels are at the different points. If it is a return of that kind that is required it will involve a great deal of work, but it can be brought down. If my hon. friend simply requires the report of the findings of the survery party as to what might be done on these different streams, it would involve much less work.

Mr. PERLEY: I think that might serve the purpose. Is the work continuing, or has a final report been made?

Mr. GARDINER: A final report on what might be done as the result of the investigation?

Mr. PERLEY: Are any survey parties working there now?

Mr. GARDINER: They were working up until the end of the summer. I do not suppose they are working at present, but they will continue in the spring.

Mr. PERLEY: If the minister will bring down the final report, that will be satisfactory.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SAINT JOHN DRY DOCK COMPANY

Mr. WRIGHT:

For a copy of all contracts, correspondence, and other documents in possession of the government relating to construction of cargo or other vessels by the Saint John Dry Dock Company of Saint John, New Brunswick; also copy of all repair agreements from January 1, 1940, to January 1, 1943.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—RETIREMENT OF ELLIOTT LITTLE AS DIRECTOR

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between Mr. Elliott Little and the Minister of Labour, or any official of the Department of Labour, the Prime Minister, or any member of his staff, or the clerk of the privy council, with reference to the retirement of Mr. Little from the position of director of selective service.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister to move for the appointment of the proposed select committee on social insurance at once, rather than delaying the appointment of the committee until the debate on the address has been concluded. The names of the opposition members on the committee were submitted some days ago, along with the names of opposition members of all the standing committees. I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that this is a matter of considerable urgency if the committee's work is to be concluded in time for legislation to be introduced this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will observe that the government had anticipated that it was the desire of the house to have some of the committees appointed forthwith, and to-day there was introduced by my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health, lists of the membership of the standing committees which have now been constituted. It was the government's intention to proceed day by day with the constitution of other committees. I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable to have the committee on social security appointed at an early day. There was last session a committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation. It is understood that committee will be reconstituted. I think that that committee should perhaps be set up before the one on social security. I can I think undertake to say that a motion with respect to both committees will be introduced within a week.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sure the Prime Minister will understand the significance of my inquiry. There will be a tremendous volume of work before the social insurance committee, and it will require a good deal of time to complete its labours. I hope there will be no delay in appointing the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am equally anxious to have the committee constituted as soon as possible.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to be called the Supplementary 1942 War Appropriation Act to provide inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $858,000,000 be granted to his majesty in addition to the sums granted by the War Appropriation Act, 1942, towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1943, for:

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditures under the War Appropriation Act, 1939, the War Appropriation Act, 1940, the War Appropriation Act, 1941, the War Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1942, the War Appropriation Act, No. 2, 1942, and the Supplementary 1942 War Appropriation Act.

He said: I stated the other day, Mr. Speaker, that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the house goes into committee, I am quite sure that the minister is prepared to make a statement supplementary to that already made.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quite prepared to make a brief statement before we go into committee, although I have not prepared any statement. I am prepared, however, to answer questions. As I said the other day, I hope we shall be able to get this resolution through as soon as possible for the reasons I then gave.

This resolution is to provide for sums not exceeding $858,000,000 to be granted to his majesty by way of supplementary war appropriation for the current fiscal year. The amount already voted is $2,000,000,000, and from the most careful estimates that can now be made it would appear that we shall need before the end of the current fiscal year another $858,000,000. If members are interested, the initial estimate of the last year will be found in the Hansard of March 17, 1942, at page 1531. The estimate there is for $2,213,000,000. It would have been more than that if it had not been anticipated that there was some duplication between the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply. It would have been $2,363,000,000 but for that. It is therefore not correct to say that our war estimates have been exceeded or will be exceeded by $858,000,000 in the current fiscal year, because we did not ask the house to vote the total amount of our estimates last year. I explained then, I think, that it is impossible to forecast with any accuracy the demands which will be made upon the treasury in time of war. So much depends upon developments that one can only make an approximation. The practice that has been followed in the last two or three years has been this. I have brought before the house the estimates for the war departments and the war estimates for the other departments, which have added up to more than the amount I have asked the house to vote. That was the case last year. As it turns out I would have been safe in asking the house to vote more than our estimates last year instead of less, but having asked the house to vote less than $2,213,000,000 I have now to come and ask the house for what appears to be a very large additional amount, $858,000,000. There have been many unanticipated programmes and projects through the year and additions have been made from time to time to the war estimates. On the other hand, though I cannot give the house details at the moment, some of the projects which were anticipated have not made the demands upon the treasury that were expected or have not been carried out in the way that was expected. So that there is a great lack of agreement between the amounts spent during the fiscal year in time of war and the amounts which it is anticipated at the beginning of the fiscal year will have to be spent.

I should say that during the summer and fall it was expected that our total expenditures would amount to about $3,900,000,000. That was the figure I gave in the budget last June and it is the figure I used whenever I was asked about the matter thereafter. Now it would appear, as I have stated recently, since the beginning of the year—I think, in the house; certainly outside the house, before the house met—that our total expenditure for the entire fiscal year will be nearer $4,500,000,000 than $3,900,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister if the $3,900,000,000 included the peace-time expenditures?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and the $4,500,000,000 does too. Those are the total expenditures of the dominion government for what we sent abroad and for our armed forces and for our non-war expenditures and so forth. I am not an economist, but it was a surprise to me that the country was capable of such a large expenditure, that there would be goods and services available produced by the people of the Dominion of Canada to such a high amount. It shows how productive the country is, what a great capacity for production there is.

These are the fundamental facts underlying these estimates: that our expenditures will be about $4,500,000,000 during the fiscal year, instead of $3,900,000,000; and when it is borne in mind that we did not vote the full $3,900,000,000, it will be seen that what I am asking is substantially consistent with these figures.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall make no more than one or two observations with respect to the minister's brief statement this afternoon. I think I should repeat what I said with regard to the attitude of our party towards the facilitating of the passing of this measure. We are anxious that the government shall not be held up in any way with respect to this vote. But any curtailment of discussion at this stage will be with the distinct reservation and upon the definite condition that when the regular war appropriation bill is before the house we shall have the opportunity of discussing in full any points which might normally arise with respect to discussion of this one. That, I believe, is understood by the government, and it is understood by us.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister stated just now that he was amazed at the capacity of the Canadian people to rise to the position of production by which they are capable of handling as large a budget as that which the minister has just indicated. I think perhaps all of us are amazed at this. I might point out, however, to the minister and the government, and with this I will conclude, that all sections of the people are anxious that whatever is required to win this war shall be given—whether it be in man-power, in material, or in finance. That is a pledge to which our people have definitely committed themselves in order that this battle for freedom shall be won. But while they are willing to shoulder whatever financial burdens may be necessary that are within their power, they also expect that every dollar which is given to the government for this very important object shall be spent without waste and without inefficiency.

We hope that during this session, when the war appropriation bill is presented to the house, it will be presented in sufficient detail to enable members of the opposition and all other hon. members to have the opportunity of examining, perhaps more closely than has ever been done before, each of the details in connection with the war expenditures covered by these large amounts. To-day nearly every person in Canada, according to his or her ability, is required to pay; I think hon. members in general will corroborate my statement that more people at this time are conscious of government expenditures than ever were before, and that there is a growing desire among the ordinary taxpayers of the country that every dollar given by them to this worthy purpose shall be properly and effectively spent. I warn the government that we shall require the war appropriations to be set before us in greater detail than ever before. That, I believe, is in the interest of the people, and to insist upon anything less would not be to discharge properly our duties as members of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not propose to make a speech; I shall say only that in conformity with the understanding arrived at, we are prepared to allow this appropriation bill to go through as rapidly as possible. When we come to the main bill we should like a complete break-down of the expenditure over the current year so that we may understand precisely how the money has been spent.

It is an amazing thing to many people that Canada has been able to find the large amount of material supplies which is represented by the sum of money involved. We may congratulate the Canadian people that the Canadian economy has been able to do this in war time; and if I may say so, I think our people expect that when the war is over we shall be able to find the same material things, and to the same or greater extent if necessary, for the building of this country in the post-war period. I look forward to seeing the government plans of the future for the construction of this country in the post-war period.

We shall, however, want to make a thorough inquiry into these expenditures when the main appropriation is before the house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Members of the Social Credit party are desirous of enabling the government to expedite the passage of this bill. We realize that they require the money, and it is our desire to see that they have the money to fight the war.

I think it is timely that we point out to the minister that we are not surprised that he should have said he was amazed at the productive capacity of Canada. We are not at all surprised that the leaders of the Progressive Conservative and the Cooperative Commonwealth groups should have said the same thing. We wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that in 1935 we social crediters began to point out that there was a tremendous productive capacity in Canada, and that Canada's productive power could be mobilized by a monetary technique. The members of the government were merely tolerantly indulgent of the foolish ideas which they thought we were expressing.

Canada had the same productive capacity in 1935 that she has to-day. But the powers in control did not see fit to allow Canada's productive capacity to be used and the result thereof to be distributed among the Canadian people to enhance their well-being. That could have been easily done, just as well as it can be done now.

I wish to point out one other matter that is vital in this connection. Even yet the members of the government and parliament generally have not come to recognize that all these vast wartime productive schemes could have been accomplished without increasing the debt in Canada. As has been pointed out time and again, what is physically possible is fiancially possible; where the productive capacity of Canada actually exists the financial capacity is there, and the end can be achieved without debt and without injurious taxation. May I point out to the government that one of the most important tasks confronting the administration to-day, as it approaches a possible peace, is that of finding a means—some means must be discovered—whereby the productive capacity of Canada, as is evidenced by the tremendous achievement during this war, shall continue to be used after the war.

Production has been stimulated during the war by the borrowing and spending of money. Where productive capacity exists the money can be spent, and it need not be borrowed. It is the spending of money which causes inflation, if inflation is the result; it is not the place from which a government gets the money. State money, debt free, could have resulted in the same production, whether in peace or in war, as has been brought about by the means already used. The resultant production could have been distributed in time of peace among the people, if the government had had vision enough to see how the distribution of goods could be effected among the Canadian people.

To-day we are becoming fairly prosperous, or would be, if it were not for the scrupulous care with which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) through his taxation structure limits our prosperity. We are becoming prosperous because we are distributing our goods in the form of munitions and instruments of destruction abroad. In order to obtain the financial prosperity in Canada which results from the manufacturing of tanks Canada does not need to manufacture tanks and send them over to Hitler to be destroyed. The same prosperity could result from the manufacturing of anything to be used in Canada, the difference being that in the case of something to be used in Canada, Canada would have not only the money to spend here but the goods to use as well.

I do not wish to discuss this matter at any great length now but it seems fitting that the members of the house should be very thoughtful in view of the tremendous productive power which has been evident in Canada.

One thing more. Our productive capacity has not yet been fully exploited. Enormous quantities of additional foodstuffs of many kinds can be produced in Canada. Canada is capable of producing a tremendous quantity of rubber by synthetic processes, huge quantities of gasoline, great quantities of sugar and an abundance of fruit which we have not yet produced.

Mr. MacNICOL: And oil.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And oil. One could name scores and scores of commodities. If the productive capacity of Canada were organized and utilized so that production would be for the use and benefit of the Canadian people, and if a financial technique were perfected whereby that could be brought about and the resulting goods distributed, all without taxation, we should then see the way to a new order in which the standard of living of the Canadian people would bear some sort of relation to their productive capacity.

We are prepared to cooperate with the government to the limit in providing the money to enable Canada to make the greatest war effort that it is possible for her to make, considering the man-power and other resources at her disposal.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Blanchette in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I regret that the minister, in the course of the all too brief observations which he made with respect to this resolution, did not take occasion to give a break-down of the $858,000,000. On February 8, at page 217 of Hansard, he referred to the fact that funds for the transfer of munitions plants from the imperial government to the Canadian government would be requested in the supplementary war appropriation bill; but apart from that I can find very little reference to the items which are to be covered by this appropriation. There is of course reference to other matters which presumably may or may not be in the bill. I am going to ask the minister, at the conclusion of the brief remarks which I have to make, to give us a break-down of the whole sum of $858,000,000.

Having regard to the undertakings which were given by my leader and the leaders of the groups in the house, the discussion of this matter must of necessity be very limited. Let me say at the outset that since the minister has made it clear that the money must be voted immediately, that it is a national necessity in order that the contractual obligations of the nation may be promptly met, there is no disposition on the part of anyone to hold up the bill. But I may say I was startled, as I think the country will be, at the size of this supplementary bill, having regard to what we were told during the last session of the house. Perhaps it would not be out of place if we were to have a review of the whole position. The minister expressed amazement that the people of Canada could sustain the weight of a war expenditure of the size and scope they are being asked to sustain. The answer is that this government is asking the people of Canada to bear a greater ratio of load in proportion to the national income than is the case in either of the other two large belligerent nations. I have before me a review contained in a federal reserve publication issued just prior to January 15 which reveals that the proportion of the national income devoted to war purposes is considerably less in the United States than it is in either Great Britain or Canada. This bulletin shows that the war effort in the three countries is absorbing the national income according to the following percentages: United States, 24·5 per cent; Great Britain, 36·8 per cent, and Canada, 39·1 per cent. If these figures mean anything, and if I correctly interpret them, they show that the Canadian people are being asked by this government to contribute to the war effort a greater proportion of the national income than either our rich neighbours to the south or our very hard-pressed blood brothers overseas.

Mr. REID: Do not forget that the United States have state income taxes, and that now we do not have provincial income taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not quite see the relevancy of that remark. I may be dense, but I cannot correlate that suggestion with the point I am trying to make. I am speaking of the portion of the national income being taken by the government for war purposes from the people of Canada as compared with the portion taken by our neighbours to the south and our friends overseas. To me that means that the Canadian people are being taxed more heavily than are our friends in the United States or our friends in Britain, that we are asked to do more in terms of dollars and cents than either of those countries. I am assuming that these percentages are correct. I have no means of checking them, but since they are given out by the federal reserve system I assume at once that they are accurate.

That tells the story. It is often said in this house by certain parties that too much emphasis is being laid on the problem of man-power qua the army. I want to say that in my view —and I do not care who gets the credit or discredit, for that does not mean anything— this country is doing more financially than any other of the united nations. I am not complaining about that, but the question has arisen as to how far we may go in personal income taxes. I am reminded that last summer, during the course of a tour, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) made the statement, if I remember correctly, that personal income taxes in this country had reached their peak. I understand that statement was not very pleasing to the members of the government at a later stage ,and perhaps the minister was a little indiscreet in making it. However, he did make it, and I presume he was speaking for the government. That shows that the loyal people of this country are willing to pay to help win this war, as well as giving their sons and now their daughters in the national cause. Whoever says there is not conscription of wealth in this country by way of taxation, no matter what may be the vehicle of taxation, just does not know what he is talking about and is talking very loosely. I wonder sometimes just how much farther we can go.

The size of this supplementary bill is astonishing. When the minister brought down war appropriation bill No. 1 for $2,000,000,000 he gave the estimates and asked for the round figure, and left his position open in regard to the estimates he gave. But I do not understand how they could vary so greatly. I do not understand how there could be such a wide variation between the estimates and the actual results. It is true that we have increased our armed forces and increased our production, but this is a very large sum. It may include some items of which I have no knowledge; from the remarks of the minister I think it does include an amount for the acquisition of war plants. How much that amounts to, I do not know; would it be $200,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very well. I think therefore that as a duty to the people of Canada I should put on record a clear view of what is the position in dollars and cents, and to that end I have prepared as best I could a brief statement.

During the session of 1942, war appropriation bills No. 1, which I think was assented to on June 9, and No. 2, of which I have not the date of assent before me, provided for the sum of $2,000,000,000. In addition we had the United Kingdom war financing act, which appropriated another $1,000,000,000. Then we had the peace-time estimates amounting to $454,000,000 in round figures, and supplementary peace-time estimates of $28,000,000, making the total peace-time estimates $482,000,000. These three figures aggregate $3,482,000,000. Under this war-time supplementary resolution that we are being asked to consider for the present fiscal year the amount is $858,000,000, making a grand total of $4,340,000,000—a sizable sum for eleven and a half million people.

According to an answer brought down on Monday last to a question put by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) which will be found on page 202 of Hansard, the latest published estimate of direct war expenditure for the present fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, including the gift to Britain, was $3,900,000,000. And the latest estimate for peace-time expenditure is $600,000,000. I understand how the $3,900,000,000 is made up, but I am at a loss to account for the difference between $482,000,00 peace-time main estimates plus supplementaries and this estimate of $600,000,000, a difference of $118,000,000. I think the Canadian people will require some explanation from the minister at a suitable time as to why our peace-time estimates so far exceed the amount of the vote of this house.

The peace-time estimates should be reduced instead of increased. The government made some show of endeavouring to decrease them; witness the appointment of Mr. John Thompson. I do not know how far he will get. I know that there was a very limiting factor in the order in council appointing him; I understand that has been amended so that now he has full authority to go into every department, which authority was at first denied him. But the minister ought to give some explanation in regard to that $118,000,000 excess in the peace-time estimates. It will be rather a shock to the people of Canada to learn of that. While we exceed the war-time estimates by many millions of dollars and might reasonably expect that, to have also $118,000,000 of peace-time expenditure beyond what we were told at the last session of parliament is something I do not understand. There will have to be some explaining to the Canadian people as to why we have exceeded or are about to exceed our estimated peace-time expenditures to the extent of $118,000,000. I have a suspicion that a very large portion of expenditures which might properly be charged to peace-time activities is included in the war appropriation bill and paid out of that fund. We have not much to say about the distribution; we know about it only after the event. But if that suspicion is well founded—I am only calling it a suspicion, because I have not the time or the ability to dig it out myself, neither have I the information available—I would assume that a very large sum of peace-time expenditure is included in the war appropriations, and that if the real truth were passed on to the people of Canada we should find the peace-time activity expanded not merely to $600,000,000 this year instead of $482,000,000, but to a substantially larger sum than that.

Now according to the same answer, the revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ending March 31 next are estimated at $2,250,000,000. Having regard to the greatly increased rates of taxation, this estimate is probably accurate. No doubt the officials of the Department of Finance have made a careful estimate as to what the probable revenues are from the returns already available and from the flow of funds to the treasury.

From these figures I draw two inferences: first, that there has not been very careful planning by the government with respect to war financial expenditures. As a matter of fact one of the charges against the government is that there has been no all-out planning of our war effort, in relation not only to this, but also to nearly every other activity. Certainly that is true with respect to the man-power situation, about which I hope to have something to say on a later occasion. Yet here we are to-day in the position that the cupboard is bare, the treasury depleted, because of what I call a lack of planning on the part of the administration. All the greatly increased revenues, the proceeds of the huge loans subscribed by the Canadian people, are gone, or nearly so. I think an explanation is due to the Canadian people far beyond that which the minister gave this afternoon. We all assumed that there would be some supplementary war appropriation bill for this fiscal year, but I do not think any of us every visualized a bill to the extent of $858,000,000.

The second lesson I draw—and I hope I am wrong—is that there has been some lack of treasury control over expenditures. In the course of this discussion the minister should tell us just what the treasury control is over war expenditure as well as over peace expenditure. The minister is very alert to tax the people; no one can accuse him of lack of initiative in levying taxes. I have heard him many a time urge them to tighten their belts and to lend and give to the utmost. So far as I am concerned I have had to tighten my belt; I can speak from personal experience. But I am not complaining—I am not in a position to do very much else—although I have found it very hard going, as many another has. I am willing to pay, because I cannot contribute much otherwise. But I wonder whether the minister is just as alert in protecting the public in connection with these war-time expenditures as he is in getting the money to make them.

Time was when the minister of finance was the guardian of the public treasury. I put this query to him: How far has that function been performed? What about extravagant expenditures and waste? Probably the minister will challenge me, as I was challenged last year, to name them, and on the spur of the moment I said: Look around you. Some newspaper supporting the government said I was referring to the number of page boys in this house. Of course I was not referring to anything of the sort. But if the minister wants an answer I refer him to the speech made last year by his follower the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean), to which the government has given heed in connection with expenditures in the operation of this House of Commons. That speech did a lot of good, and the preparation of it must have taken a great deal of time. But if you will look around in this country, if you will listen to what the public are saying, you will realize that they are condemning this government for the waste that is going on everywhere. I have evidence that orders have gone out in the army to prevent waste, and that is all to the good. But it is in response to public opinion. Things have been tightened up in the training camps, for instance, and expenditures are being restricted. That was not always so. It certainly was not so with the Minister of National Defence for Air, who was very disarming on one occasion when he told us that speed was the only consideration. He so disarmed me that I could not go on and criticize him.

Mr. POWER: But he was amongst the first to start economy measures after the speed mania was over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be; I am simply commenting upon the disarming statement made by the minister which prevented me at least from going on to criticize when I was compelled to believe in my own heart that speed was a necessary requirement because of the magnitude of the war operations. The money had to be found and the money had to be spent. I am just wondering if in connection with the construction of airports in this country, we will say, the proper ratio has come back into the public treasury by way of income tax.

Mr. POWER: Profits by contractors?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By contractors.

Mr. POWER: Talk to munitions and supply, not to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And finance. I am not blaming the minister. I recall an occasion on which I stood in this place and described how a contractor had obtained a contract in connection with an airport at prices that put a smile on his face that I compared with the smile on the face of a tiger. The unit prices were so high as to warrant the statement by me to-day that those prices should have been obtained by competitive tenders. I know there are times when you cannot do that; I know there are conditions under which it is not possible, but the competitive system has much merit.

If there is one thing I should like to impress upon the minister it is the necessity of some treasury control even over the three branches of the armed services. I could give a number of instances, but I shall refer only to one, the prices paid for land in connection with the Gimli airport. I do not say that there was any graft in connection with it; I do not know anything about it, but a newspaper in Winnipeg made an examination and came to the conclusion that two or three times as much was paid for submarginal land in that district as should have been paid. I do not know the truth of it at all, but here is an instance in which the public believe there has been a waste of public funds.

Recently I heard of an installation of the Department of National Defence being made on a marsh at Windsor below tide level which has had to be protected by a dyke eight feet high.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not true; that is incorrect, to say the least.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) has been there. I was to have gone with him but I could not do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think he will say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the information I have.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It is protected by a dyke. I do not say that it is below the water level, but it is protected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why the dyke? I have lived on the marshes of Westmorland county and I know why the dykes are there. They are put there to protect against inundation by the sea. I am not going any further into this sort of thing, but I do want to impress upon the minister the necessity of treasury control. I know there are many people who will say that the expenditures of the army must not be interfered with by the treasury, but I say to the army that treasury control is absolutely necessary; the civil authority must at all times be paramount over the military authority in any democracy.

We are willing to vote for this measure in order that the national honour may be maintained, but I warn the minister that the country is expecting much from him by way of protection against waste. Last year, the year before and the year before that I said that the people of Canada from the highest to the lowest would give gladly and willingly according to their ability to give and pay, but they would expect a dollar's worth of value for every dollar of expenditure. They would expect all waste to be eliminated and they would expect the government to watch expenditures. I repeat that to-day.

There are some other remarks that I desire to make in connection with this matter. We are told in the press that we are to have a national budget well in excess of $5,000,000,000 or perhaps $5,500,000,000. I have in front of me a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa, the heading of which states that the war is costing close to $6,000,000 daily and that Canada's expenditures for ten months had been $1,826,000,000, the average for January being $5,968,000 daily. The item then goes on to say that in all probability we will have a budget in excess of $5,000,000,000 and perhaps $5,500,000,000.

What does that mean? It means a per capita expenditure of $500 for every man, woman and child in Canada. If we are to be called upon for that, it is the duty of the government to see that every dollar is properly expended. I must say that an anticipated budget of $5,500,000,000 for 11,500,000 people is something to cause us to think and think violently. I am willing to pay the shot so far as my part of it is concerned, and I think all loyal citizens in Canada are willing to pay theirs, but I do not believe we ought to be asked to pay beyond our ability to pay. We should not be asked to pay a greater portion of the national income than the people are being asked to pay in hard-pressed Britain.

We shall vote for this resolution and the bill which will be based upon it, but I fear that the undertaking to provide an opportunity for full discussion of this $850,000,000 when the war appropriation bill comes on will not be very effective. We will be so concerned with an examination of the details of the huge war appropriation bill that this relatively trivial item of $858,000,000 will be lost sight of. I think the government should have brought down this bill a week ago. They should have suspended the debate on the address and given us a break-down of this sum so that we could have had time to consider it. The Prime Minister should have suspended the current business of the house if this bill was so urgent and we had to have this money as of to-day.

I want to repeat what my leader has said, that we reserve the right to investigate on a later appropriate occasion the whole break-down of this $858,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any difficulty about examining the expenditures for the current fiscal year when the main appropriation bill is before the house, because that is the time when the ministers give an account of their activities over the past year. It is incidental to the passing of the new estimates that the various ministers concerned should rise in their places and state what has been spent and what has been done. As a matter of fact most of the discussion on the main appropriation bill is a discussion of what has been done, not of what will be done, and therefore the hon. gentleman need have no fear that there will be any skimping of discussion on these estimates.

Before I sit down I shall put on Hansard a break-down of the $858,000,000, and for the convenience of members I will give them the citations from Hansard of last year, so that at their leisure—I hope they will not do it this afternoon or ask that this go over until to-morrow to enable them to do it—they can, before the main bill comes down, ascertain where the increases have been. It will be fairly clear, if they will look at Hansard of March 17, 1942, page 1531, which I cited before, and Hansard of June 1, 1942, page 3180, where a break-down of all expenditures of non-war departments is to be found, just what has been done. It may be that there are other pages of Hansard of last year where a break-down is given of the estimates of the war departments. I think there are, but I have not them before me. At any rate these two citations will give a very good idea where the increases have taken place. But before I give these figures I want to refer to two or three points made by my hon. friend.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the increase in the non-war expenditures from an estimate of $482,000,000 to an estimate now of $600,000,000. I am afraid that I cannot give him a final or complete and satisfactory explanation of that. I think, however, the explanation is this, that payments to the provinces and the increased interest on the debt account for the whole thing and more. It must be remembered that the interest on the debt which is in substance a war expenditure, is included in the non-war estimates. The hon. gentleman said that there was a tendency to charge to war what should be charged to peace. I think there is an inherent tendency, a natural tendency on the part of departments to do that, but it is a tendency which is combated by the treasury very resolutely, and, I believe, fairly successfully. If one goes through the amounts which have been charged to war I do not think there will be found in them anything that should not be charged to war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In connection with the payment of subsidies, was there not a vote in the peace-time estimates of last year to take care of them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot recall.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not either.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may have been a token vote. I cannot be final on that, but my recollection is that the increase is accounted for by those two items. It may be that under the wheat acreage reduction plan there is also expenditure which was not included in the estimates but came under a bill, but the increase in any event is not accounted for by overexpenditure of the items voted. That is the thing the hon. gentleman fears.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not suggest that.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no looseness or laxity whatsoever in that regard. In explanation of that increase there is an important fundamental which anyone will understand when I put the facts before the house.

With regard to the proportion of our national income that we are spending on war as compared with Great Britain, I have been advised all along that we were not quite up to Great Britain, that we were not spending quite as large a proportion of our national income on war as they are doing in Great Britain. The figures which the hon. gentleman has given, while issued by a most respectable authority, may not be correct. I assume that they have taken some estimate of Canada's national income which may or may not be an accurate estimate. Any statement of Canada's national income is an estimate. I have read articles in the London Economist criticizing our estimates of our national income as being away too low. They may be; I do not know about that. It may be that the federal reserve board, if that was the authority that issued the statement, has used an estimate of our national income which is considerably too low. If so, the actual figures might show that the comparison was in favour of Great Britain rather than in favour of Canada. But if it is correct that we are spending a larger proportion of our national income on war than is Great Britain, that does away with the criticism that we are not conducting an all-out war effort, which has been the criticism of the government for the last two or three years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not with respect to finance.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Finance is merely a measure, merely an index of what the people themselves are doing. That is all it is. When we talk about a certain proportion of the national income being devoted to war, all it means is that a certain proportion of the work that is done by the Canadian people, a certain proportion of the human and material resources of this country, is devoted to war. That is all it means, and the proportion of the national income in dollars that is devoted to war is merely an indication of the other.

With regard to United States, I would assume it is true that the United States is devoting a smaller proportion of its national income to war than is the Dominion of Canada, but the Dominion of Canada has been in the war since September, 1939, whereas the United States has been in the war only since December, 1941, and they have not yet by any means speeded up their activities to full capacity. If, however, they spend what the president says they will spend this year, they will spend much more than the Dominion of Canada proposes to spend in proportion to national income.

The hon. gentleman also said that the fact that these estimates have been so substantially exceeded is an indication that there has not been very careful planning. The planning was careful enough, but conditions have changed to such an extent. In May or June we revised the British commonwealth air training plan drastically, extending it widely to take effect the 1st of July. Situations also arose which required us to embark upon construction programmes of the most vital character, and our plans had to be altered. In fact, war plans are under a continual process of week by week alteration, and it is not a valid criticism to say that there is evidence of lack of careful planning because one changes one's programme during the course of the war, abandoning some parts and taking on other projects which are more expensive than the ones which have been abandoned.

Then the hon. gentleman said that there was a lack of treasury control. Well, we have in this country six thousand treasury officials. They are in all the departments. They are headed by the comptroller of the treasury; they make reports for me from time to time of anything they feel should be investigated. Members of the public send in criticisms of what they allege to be wasteful and extravagant expenditure; when they do, I write to the department and the minister inquires into it. If there is anything really wrong the practice is changed, and if there is not anything really wrong I send an explanation back to the person who wrote in. That, I think, is about the most the Department of Finance can do. It is becoming almost impossible to get qualified auditors, cost accountants and so forth. As I said, we have already a staff enormously greater than before the war. We have our check when we pass the non-war estimates; we have our check when we pass the war estimates, and then we have the check on the expenditures which is provided by the officers of the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the day-to-day operations. I was not referring to that; I have no doubt that is being looked after. It is the over-all control to which I referred. How far shall you go? What is your target? That is what I mean.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I give my targets every year. As I say, we do not hit them exactly in the middle, but we do the best we can to estimate what we should spend and can spend, and we do the best we can to keep our expenditures within those estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister get from the public many letters of the kind he has indicated?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, quite a number. I do not know what the hon. member means by "many". There are undoubtedly instances here and there of what the public regards as unnecessary or excessive expenditures. I would be the first to admit that. Every minister knows that, and every minister is, I believe, doing the best he can to prevent these things from happening. In a war effort of the dimensions of ours it is inevitable that here and there persons will be selected for positions of responsibility who have not the necessary qualifications for discharging those responsibilities. In other words, there will be some mistakes made. This happens in private business; it happens in every line of human activity. As long as the authority in charge—in this instance the government—has the right principle in regard to it, follows it up, and does not condone anything of the kind, that is about the best it can do. I know somebody may say that this sounds complacent, that we should go further.

Mr. GRAYDON: It sounds like a pretty good story, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if hon. members knew the great trouble we go to in order to keep our expenditures so that we can justify them to the house and to the public, and the fight we keep up year in and year out to do that, I believe they would give us a considerable amount of credit.

Those, I think, are the main points. The hon. member referred to Windsor, Nova Scotia. I know about that, because the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) went into it very fully. It is quite near where I live; and there is a good explanation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will take some explanation, in the minds of the people, you know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I do not think so. That project was most carefully considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister give the same consideration to the matter of who would build the plant?

Mr. ILSLEY: I know what the hon. gentleman means. But my information is that it went to the lowest tenderer.

These are the estimated war expenditures for the present fiscal year. I have to give the whole of them, and then subtract the $2,000,000,000 we already have. My figures are as follows:

National Defence
Army services	$1,060,508,000
Naval services	207,822,000
Air services	626,960,000
Sundry services	17,649,000
		$1,912,939,000
Munitions and Supply
Administration	$ 9,500,000
Expansion of war industry	480,004,000
Acquisition of United Kingdom interest in war plants	200,000,000
		$ 689,504,000
		$2,602,443,000
Other Departments
Agriculture	$ 20,820,000
Auditor General	280,000
Civil Service Commission	477,000
External Affairs	518,000
Finance	98,668,000
Fisheries	278,000
Justice	95,000
Labour	17,451,000
Mines and Resources	7,904,000
National Harbours	350,000
National Research Council	2,022,000
National Revenue	4,000
National War Services	8,746,000
Pensions and National Health	15,591,000
Post Office	269,000
Privy Council office	1,627,000
Public Archives	2,000
Public Works	7,096,000
Royal Canadian Mounted Police	4,147,000
Secretary of State	81,000
Soldier Settlement of Canada	81,000
Trade and Commerce	8,049,000
Transport	5,766,000
		$ 200,322,000
Total war expenditure		$2,802,765,000
Active assets		55,235,000
Making a grand total chargeable to war appropriation		2,858,000,000
Less amount provided under the War Appropriation Act, 1942		2,000,000,000
Leaving further amount required		$ 858,000,000

Mr. COLDWELL: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. The first is this. I realize that what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said has a great deal of merit; that we should go into this huge appropriation very carefully. May I suggest that when the main war appropriation bill comes up we should follow to some extent the same procedure as we followed last year; that is, we should consider the appropriation by departments. I was wondering if it would not be possible for the departments to give us a break-down somewhat in the nature of the break-down we had in the main estimates; not, perhaps, quite as much detailed, because I realize the amount of work which that would involve.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And in advance.

Mr. COLDWELL: And in advance, so that we may look over the amounts and the proposals and so forth, the expenditures of last year and this year. After all the war appropriation bill will be the biggest budget we shall have ever had before us, and I think it was unsatisfactory last year that we did not have just what I suggest. I do not think any of us got the picture precisely as to how and where the amounts of money were to be spent. I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that this should be done this year because I believe it would facilitate the discussion; certainly it should keep it in order. Last year, in discussing the appropriation, the ministers were asked for information first on one thing and then on another, and we jumped from place to place. Frequently the same questions were repeated, because hon. members who were interested were not in the house at the same time during the day. If we could dispose of one item or classification of items, that matter would be got out of the way and we could go on to the next, very much as we do when we consider the main estimates. If we could get a similar break-down of each department, it would help members to understand what this was all about and it might even facilitate the passage of the measure. But even if it did not facilitate the passage of the measure, it will be the largest appropriation we have ever had before us, and in my opinion, if we devoted one-half of the session to a study of the expenditures item by item, the time spent in such a study would be fully justified. I listened to the hon. member for York-Sunbury speaking of the tremendous—

Mr. POWER: For the sake of information I would point out to the hon. member that, last year and the year before, the Minister of Finance indicated the sums which were allotted to each of the three services—so much for air, so much for the navy and so much for the army. I am not quite sure what the procedure was with regard to the army, but our allotment was again divided into so much for overseas war, so much for home war and so much for the joint empire training scheme. On two occasions, I believe, last year and probably the year before, I gave a further break-down showing how much was spent on aircraft, ammunition, pay and allowances, clothing and so on. I follow my hon. friend, and I agree with him, but I am trying to find out what else we could do except perhaps to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that we give a rough break-down in advance. That is the gist of what my hon. friend wants.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have in mind a break-down in advance and also the desirability of passing the items item by item instead of wandering all over the map as we have been doing.

Mr. POWER: If the procedure suggested by my hon. friend were followed, no one would be more pleased than the ministers. Day after day, time after time we have had to answer the same question. I am trying to see if my hon. friend will give us a chance to look into the procedure suggested in order to ascertain to what extent it can be carried out, if it can be done without giving too much detail. I do not think my hon. friend would want all the details as they appear in our own book of estimates, down to the last cent, but if we could give him a rough idea of the amount of money spent under, say, seven or eight or ten headings, and then take them up item by item, this would, I am sure, greatly facilitate the work of the defence ministers. I will make inquiries to see if that can be done.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is exactly what I had in mind. If the minister for air will remember—no doubt he does—I said that I did not expect a minutely itemized statement such as we get in connection with the main estimates. We might take them in groups; if we could pass a particular group at a particular time, this should obviate discussion of the same thing over and over again and we should get along very much better as a house, and make a much more thorough investigation.

I wanted to refer to one or two statements made with regard to the burden placed upon finance. I agree with the minister, of course, that the figures which appear in our budget are merely a measure. After all, we are talking about goods and services expressed in a way in which most people understand them, namely, in the form of money figures. But I do not agree that those who own and control the resources of the country are making their maximum contribution when compared with that which the human element in the nation is compelled to make. What I believe is going on is this—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said they were comparable.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would not say comparable either, but people put too much stress on the financial end; that is what the hon. member did. But when we go into the matter on the main bill I think we should see to what extent the amounts of money that have been collected from the taxpayers of Canada, and particularly from those with the smaller incomes, have been handed over in the form of property to the great corporations of the country. I put on the order paper a question intended to bring out some of these points. Here, for instance, is a dispatch that appeared in the New York Times of January 30, two weeks ago, dealing with the Shipshaw hydro electric development:

Not in the least amazing thing about it—

That is, the development.

—is that it is already paid for. The $65,900,000 cost of the new plant was financed by the Aluminum Company of Canada out of contracts for sales of aluminum to Britain and the United States which were in some measure paid for in advance so as to encourage this enormous new power development so essential to war.

In other words, what is happening is this. Great Britain, the United States, and Canada, to the extent that we had been using aluminum in Canada, will have paid for this plant and the Aluminum Company of Canada will own it. That is not the conscription of wealth. It is taking from one set of people in this country or in Great Britain and the United States, and giving the physical asset to another—

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt my hon. friend. I am sure he does not want to place the aluminum company transaction in an unfair light before the people.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not.

Mr. HOWE: It is a large and important transaction, and I shall be glad to discuss it in the house at any time. His facts, as he states them, are not, in several particulars, entirely correct. I must say that every member of the house has been considerate of us, but it is difficult to meet statements made casually about individual transactions. My hon. friend mentions the Gimli airport, and I shall be glad to discuss that. I do not think a fair statement, from the point of view of our department, has been given. We have in our department over ten thousand separate transactions, some large and some small, and I shall be glad to discuss any one of them. I think a fair way, especially with a transaction as large as the aluminum company contract, which I think will bear the closest scrutiny by any one, would be to suggest that it be set down for discussion. We could then get to the bottom of it, going into the matter fully. I will put the facts on Hansard, and we can draw conclusions from those facts.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad the minister has made that statement. I was taking a report which probably is just as authoritative as the report my hon. friend placed before the house a few minutes ago, regarding the amount of taxation in comparison with Great Britain and the United States. It comes from the New York Times.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend created, I thought, a wrong impression with regard to the purport of the article he read. As I heard it read, the article said that this plant had been paid for in some measure in advance. My hon. friend left the impression that the entire plant had been paid for in advance.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is precisely what it says. May I read it again:

The $65,900,000 cost of the new plant was financed by the Aluminum Company of Canada out of contracts for sales of aluminum to Britain and the United States which were in some measure paid for in advance so as to encourage this enormous new power development so essential to war.

Part was paid for in advance, the rest by contracts made, but I am not going to discuss this further this afternoon in view of what the minister said. The point I should like to be clear about is this. When this war ends, who will own this power plant?

May I also refer to the Gimli matter, which I believe has been discussed pretty thoroughly in some of the newspapers. The minister said that the side of the story which he has as yet has not been given, and in view of the interest which has been aroused in connection with this transaction I would suggest that the recommendation which I believe appears in the report of the war expenditures committee should be adopted, and that the matter should be referred to the public accounts committee to be gone into thoroughly. I know nothing about the deal, but in my opinion the suggestion contained in the report of the war expenditures committee is quite appropriate, and I believe the matter should be gone into thoroughly.

I notice an amount of $480,000,000 for the expansion of war industries. That is a huge sum, and I suggest that we should get to the bottom of it, to see how it will be spent and what will become of these expanded industries when the war is over. I think that is all I wanted to say at this stage; I rose largely because of the remarks which were made just prior to my rising.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One word more with respect to treasury control. I hope I made it clear that I was not referring to the day to day operations of the government but generally to the allocation of the moneys for these large projects, and that sort of thing. How much has the department to say as to the amount that may be spent in certain departments on this, that and the other thing?

While I am on my feet may I ask the minister to give some consideration to another point. We have a number of crown companies owned by and operated for the government. As a rule, notwithstanding what my hon. friends to the left may say, the executives of these companies are, I think, among the best executives we have in Canada. I know of one crown company the head of which works day and night for nothing, and I have no doubt he is doing a magnificent job. But just what control have we over the operations of these crown companies? I have read some orders in council, and I have had some correspondence with the auditor general about the matter. It was more or less in the nature of inquiry on my part and elucidation on his, and we did not reach any finality about it. It comes down to this, I think, that the operation of these companies depends upon the honesty and honour of those operating them. I believe that is the result at which he and I arrived, and with that I do not quarrel. But in that connection I am wondering, and I am only throwing this out as a suggestion, how far the treasury has control over the operations of these companies, and I do not refer to the day to day operations, the internal workings. The minister might give some consideration to that point and perhaps reply at a later date.

Mr. ILSLEY: When these companies require money the Department of Munitions and Supply applies to treasury board for an allocation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A requisition?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes. I forget the exact term. There are a number of terms used, such as draft estimate, allocation, allotment and so forth, but at any rate they come to treasury board to get the money they require out of the munitions and supply war appropriation. They give an explanation of the purpose for which the money is required, and ordinarily they get it. I am pretty sure that just before the house adjourned last summer I put a statement on Hansard concerning crown companies and the extent to which the comptroller of the treasury and the auditor general kept a check on them, and I think the hon. gentleman will find the information there. That is how they get the money. At present they are permitted to revolve their money, though for years they were not allowed to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Permitted to do what?

Mr. ILSLEY: To revolve the money they receive, in the case of companies which have incomes. They are permitted to use that income or revenue to meet their expenditures, but any new projects they undertake have to be approved either by the war committee of the cabinet or by the treasury board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose those are continuous operations in which they use these revolving funds?

Mr. ILSLEY: It all depends on the company; I do not know that they all have revolving funds. There are some twenty or thirty of these companies, but generally speaking that is the principle; if they require money they have to come either to the war committee or to treasury board for it. If they have a revolving fund they have to come to the war committee, through the minister, for authorization of any new project they may undertake. With regard to the control of expenditures in the broad sense mentioned by the hon. member, if a minister decides that he must have authority to embark upon a new programme or project—I forget exactly which word is used in the relevant order in council—he must get that authority from the war committee, and that means something. The war committee is a vital, live and important controlling body. Committees are set up from time to time by the cabinet. Some of the committees do not amount to much; they become defunct, and so on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or become judges.

Mr. ILSLEY: But a few of the committees of the cabinet, under the stress of war, have developed tremendous vitality. The war committee of the cabinet is one of these, and the ministers simply have to battle it out there as to whether or not they should have that addition to their appropriation. I have a tendency to be on the negative side when those debates occur.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Somebody has to put on the brake.

Mr. GOLDING: Just in case there should be any question following the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, with regard to the recommendation of the war expenditure committee as to further inquiry into Gimli, I think I should read just what the subcommittee did say:

> It is not the duty of this subcommittee to supplant the responsibility either of the public accounts committee or the civil courts. This subcommittee does not express any opinion as to the need for further inquiry.

I would not want the house to get the notion that we recommended that a further inquiry should be made.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was speaking from memory, but it was suggested that it might be referred to the public accounts committee.

Mr. GOLDING: If I were to express the opinion of the subcommittee, they would not spend any money on any further inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the hon. member is not expressing the opinion of the subcommittee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest to the hon. member for Huron-Perth that the extract he just read from the report of the subcommittee contains a pretty broad hint that perhaps another inquiry should be instituted.

Mr. GOLDING: I am not going into that, but it does not recommend that any further inquiry be held.

Mr. ROY: Before submitting my remarks on this resolution I should like to make a comment on what was said by the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago when he denied the statement made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), that the Canadian people were more highly taxed than people in Britain or in the United States. The minister's statement may be correct to a certain extent, but I think he disregards the fact that our system of administration is different from that of England, where almost all taxes are collected by the central government. In Canada there are more taxing authorities, the provincial, municipal, school commissions and so on, and when all these taxes are added together it brings the figures above those paid by the people of Great Britain or of the United States.

I am also of opinion that an expenditure to the extent of nearly a billion dollars in excess of that authorized by parliament is not a habit that should be approved. In the years prior to the war parliament used to be convened to discuss budgets running about $400,000,000 or $450,000,000. It was right to do it. But this deficit alone is $858,000,000, or twice as much as we used to vote for an entire year prior to the war. And this was done while parliament was in session, because it was only adjourned. It would not have cost much to convene parliament and ask for further credit so that we could have studied where the money goes. For instance, I understand from paragraph 2 of the resolution and from what has been said and by the figures given by the minister a moment ago, that some of that money is to pay for goods which have been given to Great Britain on the same system as the billion dollar gift which we authorized last year. Such a transaction I do not think can be carried out without being authorized by parliament.

I recall seeing a few days ago a complaint by people in Australia that England had sold back to Australia goods which were given to her by this country. If people in this country are paying more taxes than people in Great Britain and the United States I do not think we have a right to give our goods to a country that is selling them. We are opposed to this resolution. It is a simple principle of business that we should sell those goods the same as England did; though it has not cost that country any sacrifice to produce goods, it cost our country heavy sacrifices to produce them. We are not able to do as much for the war, in which we are not as closely concerned as are Great Britain and the United States. We are not supposed to make the war effort that those populations are compelled to make. We are a young country. For these reasons I am not going to support this bill if it involves the payment for goods which have been granted by us to England, and which England has sold to another country, while some of those goods have been given without being authorized. The War Appropriation Act of last year providing for that gift to England was definite, and the government have not the right to go beyond it and give more than was authorized. For that reason I am going to oppose the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to correct the hon. gentleman. There is nothing in these estimates that provides for further gifts or further contributions. The war plants to which he refers constitute a different type of transaction. That is a case where we are obtaining title to plants in return for the money mentioned here.

namely, $200,000,000. The authority for making contributions to the United Kingdom was contained in the War Appropriation United Kingdom Financing Act, not in the ordinary War Appropriation Act and not in this supplementary War Appropriation Act. It is under a different act, it is a different type of transaction from anything provided for here. I want to put my hon. friend right on that point.

I want to put my hon. friend right on another point if I can. This is very hard to explain, hard not only for my hon. friend but for a great many members of the house to understand. If under the War Appropriation United Kingdom Financing Act we had sold our goods to Great Britain instead of giving them—he advocates selling them—our taxes would have been just as high and our borrowings just as great. I want to make that very clear, because many hon. members do not believe that, and a great many people in the country do not believe it. The only way in which we can reduce our tax burden or the amounts we borrow from the Canadian people would be by producing less, by putting less into the war effort, going easier, slackening, sagging back; that is the only way. Provided we go all out, do everything we can, make the goods and shells that are required, our tax burden is going to be there. The only effect of selling that stuff instead of giving it would be that we would have a cash drawer full of I.O.U.'s. The question is, do you want the I.O.U.s? Hon. gentlemen may think that if we had the I.O.U.'s it would in some way relieve the tax burden. But it would not. It is not Canadian dollars we get, because there are no Canadian dollars to get; it would be an obligation in the currency of another country we would have, not dollars at all. I wish hon. members would address their minds pointedly to that question and would not say, as some hon. members do, as one hon. member, the other night, in a debate to which I cannot under the rules refer, said, that we are taxing ourselves to provide money to give to another country. But that simply is not so. I repeat, our taxes are no higher than they would be if we were selling the stuff instead of giving it.

Then it is a question of how we want to finance. Some might say, well; do not take I.O.U.'s; do not take sterling; do not have your cash drawer full of sterling; but exact securities; strip Great Britain of any securities she has. That sounds plausible. But what would we do with the securities? If we sold $500,000,000 worth of securities to the Canadian people, our sale of victory bonds would be decreased by $500,000,000. We would not have any more money in the treasury if we did that. It is true that the Canadian people instead of the British people would be holding the securities; but if we carry that process too far, and we have carried it a very long distance to date because we have expropriated $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 worth of securities, we imperil our post-war trading position. We shall be giving the British the strongest possible incentive to buy their wheat from the Argentine instead of from Canada. We shall be giving them the strongest incentive to deal with those people whose currency they have and not with Canada, of whose currency we have stripped them. We must be careful about that. We think our policy has been not only broad-minded but in our own interests. I implore hon. members not to say that we are taxing ourselves in order to raise money to give away—we are not.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not going to enter into this discussion, but at a later time I should like to say something in connection with the remarks of the minister. I do not hold the views he has just expressed. I rise simply to say that there are times when a partial quotation misrepresents one more than deliberate misrepresentation. We have had an example of that this afternoon. My memory is usually pretty good, but I have looked up the report of the war expenditures committee. The hon. member for Huron-Perth stopped when he should have read one more sentence. Perhaps I had better read the whole thing. It reads:

> It is not the duty of this subcommittee to supplant the responsibility either of the public accounts committee or the civil courts. This subcommittee does not express any opinion as to the need for further inquiry.

I read the next sentence.

> In the light of the request made by the solicitor for the Winnipeg Tribune the subcommittee believes that such an inquiry, if deemed necessary, could be more satisfactorily made as above indicated.

A broad hint is thrown out. I suggested that if inquiry is to be made, it should be made by the public accounts committee. I said that I thought it should be referred to the public accounts committee, as was suggested in this report by the subcommittee.

Mr. GOLDING: I want to repeat that at no time and at no place did the subcommittee recommend that further inquiry be held.

Mr. COLDWELL: They suggested it.

Mr. GOLDING: They did not suggest it; they did not recommend it.

Mr. COLDWELL: The words speak for themselves.

Mr. ROY: I should like to thank the Minister of Finance for the effort he has been making to make me understand that we would not be paying less taxes if we sold our goods direct to Australia instead of sending them free to England, and if we were making some money on the transaction. My point is that we are trying to do just a little too much for the size of our population, especially when compared with what other nations are doing. I suggested last year that we should lend this money and charge interest instead of sending over the goods free of cost. I believe Great Britain is solvent and will be solvent after victory, and the same would apply to Australia. I think it would be good business for Canada to have some assets in these countries instead of making gifts. The mere fact of granting a loan with interest, the same as the United States does would not change things at all and we would not be acting beyond our means. That is what I suggest, and I want the hon. gentleman to understand our position. It is well enough for the Minister of Finance to ask us to understand his meanings, but I would ask him to understand our contributions himself.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the Chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the bill ready for distribution?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand it is on its way here from the printing bureau.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It should be available by eight o'clock. I suggest that the minister move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and then we can take this up at eight o'clock. I understand there are a number of new provisions in the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are there?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think so. I should like to compare it with last year's bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will do the same. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, during the debate last Friday I intimated that there were two matters which I wished to lay before the house at this time, both referring to the income tax act. I am bringing these before the house at this time because I know the minister is working on his budget, and I want to direct his attention to them. I want to cite certain injustices in the hope that they will receive serious consideration by the minister and that an attempt will be made to remedy these grievances.

The matter to which I now wish to direct attention is the taxation as income of capital used in the production of oil and the development of the Turner valley oil field in Alberta. At the outset let me make it clear that I am not quarrelling with the taxation of profits under the income tax act. What I do object to is the taxation as income of capital, capital that has been invested by the people in this country in the Turner valley oil field.

It takes about $225,000 to drill a well in Turner valley and to get production from the well. In the first place you have to pay the geologist. Then you have to purchase the oil lease, create and organize a company, sell royalties or shares to the amount of $150,000 or $175,000 to pay for the cost of drilling a well. You have to pay for surface rights, pay for roads, pay for drilling the well, pay royalties to the government, pay pipeline charges, municipal and school taxes, purchase production equipment, pay production costs, government taxes, conservation board assessment and office and general expenses. All of these items come to something like $225,000.

The life of a well when drilled is not long. You get the greatest production from an oil well when oil is first struck. During the first year you get a comparatively big production. During the second year you get much less, and by the end of the fourth or fifth or sixth year the production is so small that it is no longer profitable to operate the well.

The people who invest their money in drilling a well consider that they should be entitled to get back the money they have invested in the well. The government does make provision to some extent for amortization, depletion and depreciation costs, but these costs are not allowed to be written off fast enough.

The instructions sent to the inspectors of income tax by the department are in part as follows:

> The actual cost of pre-production development, including casing (exclusive of the cost of property and surface equipment) shall be allowed on the following basis:
> 1st year, 30 per cent of cost
> 2nd year, 20 per cent of cost
> 3rd year, 15 per cent of cost
> 4th year, 12 per cent of cost
> 5th year, 10 per cent of cost
> Thereafter 10 per cent until cost fully amortized.
> Depletion will be allowed at 25 per cent of net profits from production after allowance of development charges and depreciation.

When a company starts out to drill a well no one can tell in advance what there is in the bowels of the earth. You may drill down to eight or nine thousand feet and get a "duster", a dry well. In that case no investor gets any of his money back. Or you may get a well producing two hundred barrels a day, and from such a well an investor can count on getting about one-third of his investment back, the balance being taken in taxes. You may strike a well which has an initial production—and it is initial production of which I am speaking—of four hundred barrels a day. In that event the investor may get two-thirds of his money back. The remainder is taken in taxes. A production of four hundred barrels a day is about what one can expect from the average well in Turner valley.

I suggest that this is unfair, unjust taxation. When the government revised the tax schedules last year the Oil Bulletin, an oil publication, called in a chartered accountant, a well-known authority on taxation, to make a study of the taxation situation. In his report as summed up by the editor of the Oil Bulletin this chartered accountant found:

> (1) Wells with initial oil flows of two hundred barrels per day would, during their productive life, fall short by between $170,000 and $195,000 of returning the cost of development (some $225,000);
> (2) Wells with initial flows of four hundred barrels per day (the approximate field average initial) would fall short by anything from $54,000 to $133,000 of returning costs.
> In brief, under existing tax schedules, no investor can hope to recover his original stake from Turner valley wells in the "average" and "below average" groups; he has a chance of getting his money back with perhaps a very small profit from wells in the "above average" group; and, if his well is fortunate in being one of the big wells with initial allowable of eight hundred barrels daily, he may make a fair profit on his investment.

[Mr. G. H. Ross.]

That is the finding of the chartered accountant who was engaged to investigate this matter.

I wish to read an editorial dealing with this matter which appeared in the Calgary Herald of February 5. It says:

> Under the present income tax regulations, a Turner valley well has to produce six hundred barrels of oil a day or more to be a profitable investment. There are not many of them.
> It is not surprising that under present conditions private investors are not keen to help finance well drilling programmes. If income tax concessions were granted, however, and the field price of crude oil were increased to a proper level, money would again be available for drilling purposes and thus maintain or increase production at a time when oil is vitally required by Canada.

At present the oil situation in Turner valley is desperate. Many rigs are idle. I am informed that there are twenty wells drilling at the present time as compared with thirty a year ago. The oil field is being taxed out of activity.

I suggest to the minister that it will be much better for everybody if this industry is allowed to survive. It will be better for the war effort, because we need the oil. It will be better for the government, because if they kill off the industry they cannot get taxes; if they allow the industry to live, a reasonable revenue can be obtained from it. It will be better for labour. It will also be better for investment, because a depressed industry will be built up and conditions in that area improved.

An order in council was recently passed, effective February 1, 1943, exempting from the war exchange tax and the tariff—

> All machinery and apparatus and parts thereof (including motive power and rope) for use exclusively in exploratory or discovery work in connection with, and development, depletion and production of petroleum, natural gas or water wells, or in prospecting for minerals; seamless, lapwelded and electric welded iron or steel casing, tubing and drill pipe for use in connection with water, natural gas or oil wells.

That is very fine as far as it goes, but I should like to have seen it go much further, and extended to the machinery which is necessary in order to separate the oil and gas which come from the well, and the machinery which separates the oil from various impurities, in order to enable something to be done in the way of refining the oil. If, however, the industry is to be allowed to live, the change made will be helpful and will be much appreciated by the industry.

A word with regard to prices. An article appeared recently in Maclean's magazine, reading in part as follows:

It is reported that the war transportation costs of bringing crude oil up the Atlantic seaboard are so high that the gross subsidy being paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is running at the rate of about fourteen cents a gallon.

There are thirty-five gallons of crude oil to a barrel, which means that a subsidy of $4.90 a barrel is being paid by the government. The Alberta operator is entitled to charge only one and a half dollars a barrel at the well head for his oil. Why is the government paying such a big subsidy for bringing in oil from the United States, and yet refusing to allow our operators to charge more than $1.50 a barrel for oil at the well head? I cannot understand it. If there is any reason, I hope the minister will give it to us. It seems to me that the government could help the industry a great deal by increasing to some extent the price of oil there.

During last session I urged very strongly upon the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and upon this house that there should be a ceiling on oil leases. I wish now to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), particularly, in the hope that he will place a ceiling on oil leases. Prior to the outbreak of the war ten per cent was the highest royalty ever charged by any government in Canada on oil leases. If governments could get along without it before the war I submit they should get along without it now, in view of the urgent need for oil at the present time. But, someone may say, the government of Alberta is only attempting to impose an additional royalty of two and a half per cent on all oil leases, and that is not very much. However, I wish to point out that that two and a half per cent is on gross royalties, and it means a tax of about ten per cent on net royalties, so that it is a considerable burden.

I do not believe there is another industry in Canada which is used so badly at the present time as the oil industry in Alberta.

Mr. FAIR: Does the hon. gentleman not know that there are farmers in Canada?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I am sorry; I did not hear the hon. member's question. If he will call around after the house rises I shall be glad to talk with him.

Mr. FAIR: I suggested that we have farmers in Canada who might be remembered also.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I think the government could be much fairer to the oil industry than it is. I hope the minister will give very careful consideration to the matters I have brought forward. He is a fair-minded man; he has always shown that in the house; and if the injustice is once evident to him, and I hope it will be in this case, he will take the necessary steps to have the act amended so as to provide the necessary relief.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) would move the adjournment of the debate until the bill to be taken up is disposed of.

Mr. QUELCH: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 6, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Blanchette in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have a copy of the bill and I have also before me a copy of Bill No. 19 of last session, as passed by the House of Commons on March 26, 1942. I find that the two bills are substantially the same, except that in the bill under discussion, if I may judge from the hurried comparison which I have been able to make, there is a new section 4, "loans authorized". Perhaps when we come to that section the minister will give the reasons for the interpolation of this new section.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Appropriation $858,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This bill has just been distributed, and I think the chairman should read the section.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Loans authorized.

Mr. CRERAR: Carried.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I object. We have just received the bill. Hon. members have not had a chance to read it and this is a new section. I asked the minister, before the hon. gentleman who is leading the house was in his place, to explain this section when we came to it. Hon. gentlemen across the floor who are vociferously calling "carried" should restrain themselves, because that is about the only contribution I observe they are going to make to the bill. I ask to have the section read. What is the object of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the loan section which appears in practically all the war appropriation acts. Evidently it did not appear in the supplementary war appropriation a year ago, but it did appear in the main War Appropriation Act of last session appropriating $2,000,000,000. I do not know why it did not appear in that supplementary war appropriation, but I assume we thought our borrowing authority was abundant without it. My recollection is that the supplementary war appropriation of a year ago was $135,000,000, and compared with the amounts we were voting it was small, and the section was not considered necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be the explanation.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the explanation, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Orders and regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot remember the explanation given in previous years, and I have not had time to look it up, as to why it was necessary for the governor in council to be empowered to make orders or regulations. Has the minister that under his hat, I was going to say, or in his head?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe that all the things that the governor in council was authorized to do, all that we could think of, are included in these enumerated subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e). It would be necessary for the governor in council to have those powers, and I assume the general words at the top were put in to cover anything that was not foreseen. The subsections here cover a variety of acts which the governor in council should be authorized to perform. I should expect that this section would be found in all appropriation acts going back to 1915.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I expect it is, but I could not remember the reason.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The powers set out in the subsections are natural and necessary powers for the governor in council to have.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne emphasizes the greatly improved situation of the allied nations to-day as compared with a year ago. While the road to victory still may be a long, hard and rough one, nevertheless there need no longer be any doubt in the minds of the Canadian people as to our ability to achieve a final and decisive victory. However, it is essential for us to remember that winning this war is merely the first objective, the final objective being the making of a world peace under which it will be possible to bring to all people the greatest degree of economic and social security. It is well to remember that the soldiers of the last war made a very fine job of winning it, but that our statesmen and politicians made a ghastly failure of winning a peace that had any permanency attached to it.

If Canada is to play her part in helping to bring about that sort of peace, it is high time she put her own house in order. How can Canada be in a position to advise as to methods to bring about social security when she has failed so miserably in the past to provide that security for her own people? The speech from the throne lays a good deal of emphasis upon the need of guaranteeing to the peoples of the world freedom from fear and want. It is interesting to note that the speech from the throne of 1919 also laid a good deal of stress upon the need for the introduction of measures to provide for the welfare of the people. That speech reads as follows:

> Further important measures, designed to promote the welfare and prosperity of the people in the new era of reconstruction, social as well as material, upon which the world has entered, will be recommended to your consideration.

I note further that the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address on that occasion also dealt with the need for the introduction of measures looking to the welfare and prosperity of the people. We know to-day how miserably those measures failed to bring about that sort of security. Have we any reason to-day to have any greater faith in the promises that are being made at this time with regard to post-war reconstruction? I suppose some people may feel a certain amount of confidence in the ability of the government to provide that security, as a result of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before the Canadian federation of labour on October 9 last, when he said:

> Fortunately, we are also learning that the only limit to our productive capacity is the limit of our resources, and our will and skill to use them to satisfy human need instead of human greed.

Apparently the Prime Minister has a new vision in this regard. Is it not strange, however, that he had to be in power for twenty years before realizing the truth of that somewhat elementary, though fundamental principle? We emphasized that fact consistently from 1935 to 1939 and were ridiculed for our pains. The interesting point to note, however, is that this is not a new principle. Its soundness was recognized from 1914 to 1919. We never could have won the last war if we had not recognized the truth of that statement. I recall David Lloyd George saying that all the money needed in order to fight that war would be found. He pointed out that wars were not lost through lack of money but only through lack of ability to produce. Then in 1919 Mr. Lloyd George, during the course of a speech regarding the promise of a new world, showed only too clearly that he recognized the soundness of that principle. I quote from a report of that speech which appeared in the Western Producer of January 7:

> Millions of gallant young men have fought for the new world, hundreds of thousands died to establish it. If we fail to honour the promise given them, we dishonour ourselves. What does a new world mean? What was the old world like? It was a world where toil for myriads of honest workers, men and women, purchased nothing better than squalour, penury, anxiety and wretchedness—a world scarred by slums and disgraced by sweating, where unemployment through the vicissitudes of industry brought despair to multitudes of humble homes; a world where, side by side with want, there was waste of the inexhaustible riches of the earth, partly through ignorance and want of forethought, partly through entrenched selfishness. If we renew the lease of that world we shall betray the heroic dead. We shall be guilty of the basest perfidy that ever blackened a people's fame.

I wonder if anyone would dare to say that the Right Hon. David Lloyd George was any less sincere when he made that statement in 1919 than the Prime Minister to-day when he talks about a new social order. Some might say, Yes, but we have had a severe depression since that time. But that statement of David Lloyd George shows that there were severe depressions before. Yet we know that according to his own words we have been guilty of the basest perfidy, because there has been unemployment and abject misery throughout this country.

It was undoubtedly the will of the majority of the people of Canada from 1935 to 1939 that better conditions should be brought about. Then what was it that thwarted the will of the people in a so-called democracy? I would say that the reason why the people were not able to achieve the results they wanted was on account of the fact that in the past we have not had a real, live functioning democracy. It is true we have had political democracy; that is to say we have given the people voting power, but we have not given them a similar degree of economic power. And political democracy without economic power is democracy in name only.

Let me try to explain what I mean by that statement. Democracy is largely a matter of degree, the degree to which the will of the people becomes supreme. Furthermore, the representative principle belongs to the very being of democracy. Then what are the checks on representative government that have in the past thwarted the will of the majority of the people? I would name three main checks: first, the constitution, second, the upper house, and, third, the direct intervention of the people. Of those three I would say the last is the only legitimate check on representative government.

The constitution I take first. I think we may say that where anything greater than a majority vote is required in order to amend a constitution, the will of a minority is enthroned. In many countries it takes two-thirds or three-quarters or even a one hundred per cent vote to change the constitution. When that is so you are allowing less than twenty-five per cent of the people to set aside the will of the majority. I believe ways and means will have to be found whereby an amendment of the constitution can be facilitated when the constitution stands in the way of the demands of the majority of the people. In that regard, however, I appreciate only too well that on various occasions the constitution has been used as an excuse for not bringing in social legislation that could have been introduced in spite of the constitution. In that regard I have in mind the old age pension. We could easily increase the old age pension to thirty dollars a month provided the federal government would assume the responsibility of financing it.

The second check to which I wish to refer is the upper house. In that regard we have two extremes in different countries. In some both houses are elected by the people, and in others one house is elected and the other appointed. In the United States and the U.S.S.R. both houses are elected; in Canada and Great Britain the House of Commons is elected and the other appointed. It is undoubtedly true that where you have a body of men who have been appointed and given the power to set aside the will of the people as expressed by the members who represent them, you have a distinct weakening of democracy. I believe that the upper chamber has long outlived its usefulness and could very well be abolished. To people who say these men are getting on in age and need some financial consideration I would reply that they should be given the same consideration as we give other aged people, namely the old age pension.

The third check is intervention by the electorate; that is the right of the people periodically to change their government. Yet it is a strange thing that in spite of the fact that the people have that power we have not enthroned the will of the people. Let me examine that for a few minutes.

The party system is, I think, possible only in a political democracy. It is not possible in a totalitarian state. The party system itself should be the guarantor of economic democracy. The system was evolved as a protest against special privilege; yet strangely enough to-day we find that the two old-line parties have to a large extent become servants of the very people who benefit by special privilege. In the past the main difference between the two old-line parties was the tariff. I wonder whether any hon. member could give any clear definition of the difference between the old-line parties of to-day. I think it was the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who stated that the only difference is that one is in and the other is out; in other words, the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) in June, 1938, gave a very clear picture of the situation when he said he never thought it would be his misfortune to sit in a House of Commons where the leader of the opposition was more liberal than some Liberals sitting on the treasury benches. If I had been saying it I would have said, where some Liberals sitting on the treasury benches were more conservative than the leader of the opposition. Both statements mean the same thing. That statement was true in 1938. I believe it is even more true to-day.

When the two main political parties have no clear line of demarcation the result is bound to be a thwarting of the will of the people, because the people have no alternative vote. The result is that multiple parties come into existence, as we have them to-day. Real democracy, embodying economic as well as political democracy, is impossible under the two old parties as they exist to-day. I say that for this reason. Both parties are to a very large extent financed by the same interests. The people become befuddled by the party press and misguided by the independent press—independent only so far as party is concerned, not independent as far as their source of revenue is concerned. Multiple parties are therefore necessary in order to give expression to the progressive-minded people throughout the country. But I believe that the time is rapidly approaching in this country when there will be a realignment of the two main political parties of this country, a realignment representing two distinct ideologies. On the one side there will be those who believe in complete freedom of individual enterprise, rugged individualism, hands-off by the state, survival of the fittest; in other words, those who believe in a type of jungle law. On the other hand there will be those people who believe in a greater degree of intervention by the state in order to protect the people against exploitation by ruthless individuals and corporations. There you have two distinct policies leading to two distinct objectives.

In the first group would be what one might call the Conservative Liberal party, and in that party there will be those people who believe that the prosperity of a nation is to be judged by the size of the profits and dividends of the various corporations. It will be remembered that this is the definition which was given by a former Minster of Finance, Hon. Charles Dunning, in his budget speech in 1937. He pointed out at that time that Canada had reached an era of prosperity, and he said he based that statement upon the fact that the profits and dividends of various corporations had reached a new high level. He said that this was the only true criterion upon which one could base the prosperity of a nation.

In the second group there would be those who are socialistically minded, those who believe that the prosperity of a nation is to be judged by the general level of the well-being of the people and who adovcate a sufficient degree of government intervention to provide that type of security. I believe that this division will come in the very near future, that it is definitely on its way. I do not believe that we shall have true democracy in this country until the second of these two groups has been placed in power. However, until that time arrives I think it is necessary that members on all sides of the house do everything in their power to get the government to remove some of the most grievous injustices which exist throughout the country at the present time in order to impress upon the people that they are sincere when they talk of a new social order. Furthermore, I think it is up to us to do our best to prevent them from taking steps that will endanger the success of the future peace.

I would say that the success of the future peace is bound to depend upon our ability to make it possible for all nations to give their people the greatest possible degree of economic and social security. The Atlantic charter is supposed to provide for that type of security. I would say that our ability to achieve that objective will depend to a large extent upon the degree to which we are prepared to adopt the principle laid down by the Prime Minister when speaking before the Canadian federation of labour. At that time he stated that the only limit to our productive capacity was our resources and our will and skill to use them. I have pointed out already that this principle is not new, that it was recognized back in the period 1914 to 1919. It is apparently recognized to-day; yet it was denied during the peace from 1919 to 1939. I am afraid there is every indication that it will be denied again at the conclusion of this war. There are many indications pointing to that very thing.

An important point to notice in that regard is that the statement made by the Prime Minister is only true just as long as there is a nationally managed currency. It would not be true if you were on a gold basis; it would not be true if you were on a gold standard or if you tied your currency to an international currency based upon gold. You are then introducing another restriction which has absolutely nothing to do with the productive capacity of the country.

Take the situation that developed in this country at the start of the war. At that time we were on a 25 per cent gold basis. It was recognized that if we were to have a total war effort it would be necessary to increase our production to its full capacity. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said that no financial restrictions would be allowed to impede that war effort and therefore we were forced off the gold basis. There is not one dollar of gold behind our money to-day. Surely it must be evident that if it is impossible, on a gold basis, to maintain our production at its maximum capacity in order to put forward a maximum war effort, it will also be impossible to have a maximum peace effort if we are on a gold basis. We would be introducing artificial restrictions.

I do not wish to labour this point unduly. I am emphasizing it because there is every indication that a number of the united nations are intending to become a party to an international currency based upon gold. Among these nations we find the United States of America, Great Britain and apparently Canada. A year ago the Prime Minister denied this fact when I brought this question up in the house. I wonder if he is prepared to deny that fact to-day? I doubt it. This afternoon, when replying to a motion of mine for the production of certain papers, he stated that no commitments had been made, but he was not sure whether or not there had been any correspondence and he would have to get the permission of the United States and Great Britain before he could table that correspondence. Last year he said there had been no correspondence; this year he did not know whether there had been any. In so far as commitments are concerned, it must be remembered that one can say that there have been no commitments right up to the time the signature is placed on the paper. The commitments may be practically in existence to-day although nothing has actually been signed. Again I say that there is every indication that Canada has agreed to become a party to an international currency based upon gold. First of all I should like to refer to a statement which I read in the house last year in connection with the Rio conference. This was reported in the Edmonton Journal of January 21, 1940, and it reads as follows:

> Creation of a free international exchange currency to facilitate flow of goods and prevent delay in transactions. It would be on a gold basis and in addition to the American nations, Great Britain, China, the Netherlands, India and all British dominions would enter into the agreement. A pool of allied gold holdings would be creatsd. The Latin American countries would agree to peg their national currencies into the free international exchange currency.

I asked the Prime Minister whether or not Canada had any commitments, and he said that Canada had not any commitments and that there had not been any correspondence on this matter. It seems strange that it should be stated at the Rio conference that Canada had become a party or had agreed to such a proposal. At the same time I referred also to a speech made by the chairman of the seven-man post-war reconstruction committee, Doctor Cyril James. A speech which he made in Philadelphia is reported in the Toronto Daily Star of September 17, 1940, as follows:

He declared that the United States gold holdings now exceeding $21,000,000,000 were at stake in the war and that their value would depend on who won. A British victory meant continuance of gold as the monetary medium whereas a German victory, as Doctor Funk himself recently made bluntly clear, would mean the setting up of regional autarchies in which gold would be useless except for economic decoration. Another definite reason, if any were required, for Canadians doing their utmost, in war loans and everything else, for the defeat of Germany! One of our greatest industries is gold mining and, to protect our economic order as well as our country and our homes, victory must be assured.

In commenting on that I pointed out that it was quite evident that Doctor Cyril James had a definite opinion that Canada was prepared to return to the gold standard after the war. The Minister of Pensions was in the house at that time and emphatically denied that there was any danger of that occurring. I wonder if the minister would still be prepared to deny to-day that Canada was playing any part in the introduction of an international currency based on gold.

I have two more quotations of recent date which clearly indicate that Canada is at present very much interested in this matter. I quote first from Trend, a Canadian News Letter, published at 231 St. James street west, Montreal. On the back page of its issue of February 5, 1943, under the heading "international currency" I read this:

1. Great Britain and the United States are agreed on the necessity for continued and rigid control of international currency fluctuations.

2. Plans are being made for creation of currency control machinery which will include extension of the "stabilization fund" idea and the redistribution of America's vast hoard of gold.

3. The currency rates of all countries will be tied together, and governed by the rate fixed for the British pound and the American dollar.

4. Leading nations will ascertain that such rates be maintained, regardless of adverse developments.

5. A new monetary unit—a "world dollar"—will be introduced for the stabilization of all moneys.

Canada will participate in this scheme of monetary rearrangement.

There does not seem to be any uncertainty with regard to that statement.

To come back to the government, another statement was made over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's network last year on behalf of the government that the Prime Minister wished to assure the people that just because "we were curtailing the production of gold it did not mean that the government had lost confidence in gold." What does confidence in gold mean if it does not mean confidence in the gold standard? When you say that you have confidence in gold it means that you believe in gold as a monetary unit. Quite evidently the Prime Minister did not appreciate what his own statement meant when he said that the only limit upon our productive capacity was our resources and our skill and will to use them and at the same time says that he has confidence in gold. You cannot use your productive capacity to the limit when at the same time you believe in that automatic limitation which would exist under the gold standard. I did not think it possible that there could be in the government to-day people who would be prepared to say they still believe in the gold standard. I recall the statement made by Lord Sempill in the House of Lords in November, 1941, that no progressive people anywhere believed in the gold standard, that the only people who believed in it—he should have paged the Prime Minister—were museum pieces and gold-bugs. Unfortunately in the past we have had too many elderly ostriches on the treasury benches who have dug their heads so deeply into the sands of reaction that they are unable to face the realities of life.

Here is a statement that merits serious consideration. It was referred to in the Montreal Star of February 2. It is the statement made by Sir Kingsley Wood, Chancellor of the British Exchequer. I quote:

Turning to the future of world trade, the chancellor said:

"We want to secure an economic policy agreed between the nations and an international monetary system which will be the instrument of that policy.

"This means that if any government is tempted to move too far either in inflationary or deflationary directions it would be subject to check."

Mark well the significance of that statement. An international authority is to have the power to check any programme of expansion in any country if it considered that expansionary movement as being inflationary. The international authority apparently would be the sole judge as to whether or not a country's programme was inflationary. Just imagine for one minute what would happen if on that international authority there were men of the type and mentality of the former Minister of Finance of this government, the Hon. Charles Dunning! I recall that time and again in this house during the period from 1935 to 1939, when he was pressed to start on a programme of monetary expansion so as to put unemployed to work in order to build up the wealth of the country, he made the never to be forgotten reply that it would be crude inflation. That is what he always called it whenever we suggested that the unemployed be put to work on developing the resources of this country to provide a higher standard of living. I remember that at one time the actual sum of $200,000,000 was mentioned, and the Hon. Mr. Dunning became perfectly hysterical at the thought of putting $200,000,000 into circulation to put the unemployed to work. Yet to-day we are bringing down budgets of five and six billion dollars! But remember the Hon. Charles Dunning was held in very high esteem by financial institutions in this country from one end to the other, right through that period from 1935 to 1939. Presidents of banks, loan corporations and other financial institutions all praised the wonderful mentality and financial capacity of the Hon. Charles Dunning. That is undoubtedly the type of man you would have on your international authority, with power to prevent any nation from bringing into force a programme of expansion. It would be prevented on the ground that it was inflationary.

This is supposed to be a war, Mr. Speaker, between the democracies and dictatorships, but if this proposal is put into force we shall have an international financial dictatorship. We shall win the war but lose the peace, and in that event, in the words of the Right Hon. David Lloyd George we would be guilty of the basest perfidy that ever blackened a people's fame, and our sons' sons in less than twenty years from now might very well become engaged in another war, a civil war if not an international war. I have emphasized this fact because when we recall the tremendous sacrifices that were made in the last war and appreciate the tremendous sacrifices that are being made again to-day, we cannot afford to make the same mistake as we made after the last war. Some people will say: That is a matter for the experts to decide. Our troubles of the past have been brought about by these so-called financial experts, and I think it is high time that the people of the country use a little common sense themselves in dealing with the situation in order to make sure that an international financial dictatorship will not be imposed upon this country and other peoples of the world.

My time is rapidly passing. Before concluding, I should like to make a few comments on the amendments. We will support the main amendment; we will also support the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I might point out that their amendment is very similar to a number of amendments which this group has moved in the house from time to time since the declaration of war. We have emphasized in the past that we believe in a pay-as-you-go policy. We should realize that the real cost of the war is being met to-day. We therefore believe that the financial cost should be met at the same time. Such a policy, a pay-as-you-go policy, would not reduce the standard of living of the people in the slightest degree. There is so much production available that production can still be made available to the people no matter what the government's financial policy may be. But the great difference between a pay-as-you-go policy and the present type of policy would be that by the end of the war we would not have increased our debt, instead of allowing, as we are allowing to-day, a small percentage of the people to accumulate claims, in the form of bonds, against a very large percentage of the future production of wealth. We contend that this is unfair, because our soldiers are now making the greatest sacrifice they should be called upon to make. When they go overseas they are making what should be considered the supreme sacrifice. Yet, as a result of the policy we have in operation to-day, when our soldiers, our sailors and our airmen come back they will be called upon to help pay the financial cost. We consider there can be no possible justification for that situation.

Mr. J. E. S. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my reason for speaking at this time, is that I wish to make my stand absolutely clear both before this house and before the whole country.

On March 26, 1940, the electors of the beautiful constituency of Rimouski conferred on me the great honour of returning me to parliament as their representative. Consequently, I cannot let this occasion pass without assuring them of my enduring gratitude.

I must sincerely say that my reelection by my constituents is due, in a great measure, to the fact that I have always been opposed to conscription. I was opposed to it in 1917, in 1940, and I am still more opposed to it in 1943.

My feelings and my attitude on the ticklish question of conscription have not changed; I remain an unshakable opponent of compulsory military service for overseas and no power on earth could incite me to alter by a single iota my firm stand on this knotty problem.

During the 1940 election campaign I ran as the official candidate of the King-Lapointe government, opposing conscription for service overseas.

I accepted the official Liberal candidature because I had full confidence in the leaders of the government who were then promising that compulsory military service for overseas would never be enacted in Canada by an administration under their leadership and as long as they would preside over the destinies of the country.

With every reason to believe in the sincerity and frankness of the Liberal leaders, I took the solemn pledge of voting, in this house, against any government who would attempt to enforce conscription for overseas service. I added that I would not hesitate a single moment to vote against my own party if it ever decided to enact compulsory military service for any place outside the Canadian territory. I took this solemn pledge to all my constituents and, God helping, I have kept it and intend to remain faithful to it in the future.

However, the leaders of the Liberal party, forgetful of their formal undertaking toward the electors of the whole country, altered their views and had the majority of the members of this house vote for the hideous conscription measure for overseas service.

First, the government submitted to the approval of parliament a bill authorizing them to hold a plebiscite to know whether they should be relieved of the anticonscriptionist pledges they had taken during the 1940 electoral campaign.

Realizing as I did that such a measure, if passed, would inevitably lead to conscription, I opposed it with the utmost energy and I voted against it with great readiness. The bill was passed by a very strong majority and the government took advantage of that fact to order the holding of a plebiscite on April 27 last. As a result of a carefully planned campaign, which took place over the radio and in the press, the government had an overwhelming majority of "Yes" votes in eight of the Canadian provinces, but the province of Quebec gave a huge majority of "No" votes, and I am proud to say that 94 per cent of the voters in my constituency replied in the negative.

What is more, Mr. Speaker, over 700,000 negative votes were registered in the rest of the country.

However, the government gave no heed to that warning, and such a landslide of negative votes did not impress them.

Therefore, a fortnight after the plebiscite, they requested the house to amend section 3 of the 1940 Mobilization Act, so as to extend compulsory military service for overseas.

After a protracted and acrimonious debate, the heinous conscription for service outside Canadian borders was passed by a majority of the members of this house. In keeping with the firm stand I had taken on the plebiscite bill, I voted against the government's amendment enacting compulsory military service for overseas. What the Hon. Mr. Godbout, premier of the province of Quebec, had called a "national crime" became an accomplished fact and the crime was consummated. I for one have the satisfaction of having done my duty, all my duty toward those I have the honour and the privilege of representing in this parliament. And to be consistent, I reserve the right to be at variance with and vote against the government whenever they introduce measures or bills conflicting with the principles for the defence of which I was elected and which I will continue to defend in this house.

Mr. Speaker, that is my position, my stand before this parliament and before the leaders of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, I should like for a few moments to deal with the agricultural question, which is of particular interest to me. Agriculture offers to-day our most alarming problem and as representative of an agricultural constituency, whose whole population has remained firmly rooted to the land, I feel it my duty to rise in this debate and defend its rights.

I personally believe that this government has been too tardy in doing its duty to the farmers of this country. Since the outbreak of hostilities, I have been of the opinion that the government did not take the agricultural situation seriously. But now that our military training camps are filled with farmers' sons they seem to realize its seriousness.

In Rimouski county, there are at least 1,400 young men in one military camp. Of these, two thirds are farmers' sons, notwithstanding the fact that during the last session assurance was given by the government that farmers' sons and farm workers would be exempted. That was merely a bluff. The farmers and their sons have been subjected to so many difficulties when claiming exemptions that very few, if any, have succeeded in getting them.

Nevertheless, farmers are being asked to increase their production, to produce more and more. I heard the other day a public speaker, an official of the Dominion Department of Agriculture, asking farmers to increase their production of pork and of all kinds of live stock. He invited farmers to grow more potatoes and to increase their production by all possible means.

But how are farmers to increase their production when they are deprived of the needed help? The difference between agriculture and the war industries is that the first produces life while the latter produce death. Farmers feed not only the civilian population, but also the soldiers who are called to the colours. If our soldiers are to fulfil their duties efficiently, they must be fed and well fed. No matter how well they are equipped or armed, if they are given nothing to eat, what will be their value as soldiers in the defence of their country?

This session, the mistake made by the government since the outbreak of the war is claimed to have been realized and it is suggested that farmers and their sons be exempted from military service. A document signed by the director of the selective service and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) says that henceforth farmers now living on the farm are to be exempted from military service. Is that merely a repetition of what happened last year, is that more bluff? I hope not.

However, if the government are sincere, if they really wish farmers and their sons to remain on the farm, I ask them to go somewhat further and to recall from training camps all the farmers and farmers' sons who are actually under training and to return them to their farms. This the government would do if they really wished to help agriculture which, everything considered, is the mainstay of the nation. The land is the great feeder and if the government really and sincerely wish to show a practical interest in agricultural matters, their first important measure should be, I repeat it, to return all enlisted farmers to their farms. In training camp No. 55, at Rimouski, two-thirds of the trainees are farmers' sons and I ask the government to return these young men to the farm instead of forcing them to pursue their military training.

A few days ago, certain individuals appeared in the constituency of Rimouski. In a hotel in Rimouski, there are, at present, 60 provosts—you may call them by whatever name you please—or military police hunting the defaulters and the deserters, those who failed to report for military service and those who deserted the training camp. I do not condone this policy. I remember too well what happened in 1917 and 1918. We then severely criticized the Union government, because they hunted farmers' sons even in the most remote forests of the counties and then incarcerated them in the common gaols of the county seats. I remember seeing 400 young farmers crowded in the Rimouski gaol for failing to report. I wish to ask why the government is acting in this way. Why are they sending these provosts or military police to terrorize our population by hunting farmers' sons who have failed to answer the call for military service in a training camp? What was wrong in 1917 and 1918 is not commendable in 1943, under a Liberal administration. Personally, I condemn this system.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day. He took pride in being able to state before parliament and the people that of all the allied nations, Canada, with a population of eleven million and a half inhabitants, was the one which had made the greatest contribution to the war effort. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a matter for pride. Canada to-day has under arms 700,000 men. She has supplied to her allies not only food but war weapons. Finally, as was said by the Prime Minister, she has made a greater contribution than any other country. Well, this is a proper time for thinking more than ever before, and I wish to say for the second time that we have a good opportunity not only to tell our farmers and their sons to remain on their farms, but to authorize those who are now in training to return home, to go back to the farm. In so doing the government will realize that agriculture is of prime importance and that, more than ever, Canadian farmers must have some consideration from the government and the people's representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, even though we are at war, the situation can be faced from a practical standpoint. Mine is not the only constituency where there are rural mail carriers. That is true of most constituencies. I understand that those mail carriers obtain their contracts by tender. That is no reason for paying them an insufficient salary. That is no reason for starving them. Most of these people, especially in these times, and in the winter season, labour under great difficulties, and for them as for the whole population, the cost of living has increased. Therefore, I make a special appeal to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) asking him to consider the case of our rural mail carriers, whose services are extremely valuable to the public, and I am convinced that the Postmaster General will try to improve their condition. The mail service is also inadequate because in some remote sections of Rimouski, mail deliveries are made only once or twice a week. That is not adequate. I have often asked for more frequent deliveries, but was told: "This is war. Let us win it first, and we will then deal with that matter." Well, Mr. Speaker, after the war the world will not come to an end, and in the meantime those people must live.

When a billion dollar gift is made to England and a further gift is being considered, I fail to see any good reason for the post office department not granting the legitimate claims of these rural mail carriers in my constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my friend the energetic member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) for having brought to the attention of the house to-day a question in which I am deeply interested. He spoke of the newly created national war labour board. Even since I became a member I have noticed how in Ottawa French Canadians were being flouted, how no opportunity to ignore their rights is overlooked and in the present instance, I believe the government has been ill-advised in setting up a new national war labour board without appointing a single French Canadian on it. It seems that for one member out of three, namely one-third of the representation on that board, to have been a French Canadian would not have been exaggerated. I was hoping that the government would show more fairness to my compatriots. In this instance, I regret to find that the government has overlooked the fact that English and French Canadians enjoy equal rights in this country guaranteed by the pact of confederation. It is never too late to mend one's ways and I hope the government will appoint a French Canadian to represent us on that national war labour board.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, with the utmost frankness and I believe I can state as I resume my seat that I have fulfilled my task and I feel satisfied that I have done my duty.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne falls naturally into two main divisions: first, our progress in the world war and, second, the social problems at home. In both these spheres there are certain aspects which will bear watching very carefully by every Canadian. We remember what happened in 1918, and how it formed the basis for the catastrophe that we are facing in the world to-day. In just the same way what we do in 1943 may easily form the basis for another catastrophe in a few years, with an interlude which will be nothing but a period of rationed poverty, unemployment, want and fear. We must take steps now to prevent that. Frankly, we can see very little hope either for the prevention of the world war of 1960, or for the solving of our other problems under the old administrations, for the simple reason that neither of the old parties will recognize the fact that basic and radical changes must come about in the economic order.

On the war front magnificent retreats and disgraceful surrenders have been fewer on the western and southern fronts. On the Russian front conditions are much more hopeful. The lifting of the siege of Stalingrad, the recapture of Rostov, the recent brilliant successes of the Russian winter offensive, are sources of the greatest satisfaction to us and the greatest hope for the allied cause. When the history of this world war is properly written I think it will be said that democracy was saved in 1942 at the gates of Stalingrad. In contrast, however, we had the disgraceful rise of Darlan to power in Africa. Fortunately his rise was cut short, but such things give the world cause for serious thought. There is evidence that there are Quislings in the allied nations; that the Chamberlains have heirs and successors; that the Cliveden set and the Oswald Mosleys are still at large. We have had allied conferences at which China and Russia were not represented.

Canadians are making sacrifices on many fronts. Canadians deserve the right of proper representation in order to bring forward the Canadian point of view at the peace conference; and at that conference these allies to whom I have referred, Russia and China, must sit round the table and have something to say in the establishment of peace and the reconstruction of the world. We must face the possibility that the Atlantic charter may easily become as empty a gesture as the fourteen points of President Wilson in 1918. There are three basic things of which Canadians must make sure at this time: first, that this war will not end until fascism and nazism are completely destroyed; second, that those internationally responsible for this war are brought to justice and prevented from carrying on their plans; third, that the foundations are laid for economic democracy throughout the world as one means of preventing a recurrence of this catastrophe and one step toward giving the rights of the common man to all people. Already there is evidence that there are too many people, even within this country of ours, who fear real social change just as much as they fear Hitler.

The second phase of the speech from the throne deals with the problems of social security here at home, in these words:

In Canada, a considerable measure of social security has already been provided through federal enactments establishing annuities, unemployment insurance and pensions for the aged, the blind and for disabled veterans; and through provincial enactments related to accidents, sickness and hospitalization, widows' and mothers' allowances and maternity benefits. There is, however, no approach to a nation-wide plan of social security.

Apparently the government imagines that already we have some large measure of social security. Words like those in the speech from the throne are not sufficient. We must look to the acts of the government for proof of its sincerity; and it is not to be wondered at that the people of Canada are sceptical when they hear phrases such as these used by governments which have administered this country since its inception, and under which this wealthy land has been brought to a condition of debt and destitution. In no land on the globe have the opportunities for good living been more abundant, but nowhere has the failure to provide a good living been so complete. Canadians as a whole consider that they have been completely duped by the old, wealthy and powerfully backed political parties of Canada. Since confederation the administrators of Canada have done two things effectively. In the first place they have handed over the resources of this dominion to privileged groups, and in the second place they have fortified these groups in their position by establishing laws to protect their powers to continue their exploitation.

Such administrations cannot institute real social reform. What is their record? To-day the farmer in Canada finds himself hopelessly in debt. His insecurity is complete; there is fear on every side. No matter how he toils, there is no assurance that his toil will provide him with anything like a decent standard of living. Now in war time he finds that the prices of many of his commodities are frozen at levels which are below the cost of production. He is constantly urged by this administration to continue the production of his goods; he is encouraged to go into mixed farming and to grow more coarse grains.

On March 24 last he was assured by no less a person than the Prime Minister that his labour would be kept on the farm. These are the words of the Prime Minister, as reported on page 1567 of Hansard in dealing with the farm labour problem:

On the other hand, the growing scarcity of labour on the farms and the increasing importance of maintaining, and indeed of increasing food production, has been recognized. This has been accomplished by a fundamental alteration of the policy regarding compulsory military training and service where such service touches persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture. Up to the present there has been a general obligation to serve, and the responsibility for proving a case for postponement of service has rested with the individual. Under the new regulations, farmers, farmers' sons and agricultural labourers will normally not be obliged to undertake compulsory military training and service. It is realized, however, that in a limited number of cases, men on the farms are not, in fact, essential agricultural workers. If it is established to the satisfaction of the national war services boards concerned that such persons are not essential workers in agriculture, they will continue to be called for service in the appropriate age groups.

What do we find? I should like to read a letter I received the other day which illustrates the fact very well. It reads:

My son Peter—got his call and pass on the 26th of January stating that on 1st February he was supposed to be in Regina. He just sent it back asking for a postponement. Then on February 5 this call or pass came back saying he was to be in Regina on February 8. So went on the 8th.

There is something I would like to know why is it so that Peter my only son I have, and he has no father, just him to work half section of land and do everything still support me and my daughter; and other families around here with three or four boys in one family to work and yet that have a dad able to work. They got their calls before my son and they are still home. Some sent calls back like my son for about two months and had no answer. Some asked for postponement and got it. Why my son had only a week's time between the sending of the call back and receiving it. It sure is hard to understand.

My husband died and I was left alone with young children my son being only nine years. He supported me and my daughter from the age of sixteen years.

Mr. McNIVEN: Did he put in an application for postponement?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He did. I should like to read what was reported in an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle on February 1.

On the other hand, the president of the maritime federation of agriculture declared recently, upon his return from Ottawa where he attended joint meetings of federal and provincial agricultural officials, that a conflict of ideas among the heads of those agencies entrusted with the administration of the many phases of food production and distribution was largely responsible for the present state of confusion. This confusion, Mr. Oulton added, was causing additional trouble for the farmer rather than helping in the solution of his problems.

Instead of having a definite, clear-cut policy which would assure each agricultural unit which maintains a certain production that it would be guaranteed some labour on that farm and that labour would be left to it, what do we find? The farmer is left in uncertainty and insecurity. There is no definite policy at all; it is entirely up to these boards. The Prime Minister promises one thing and the boards do something entirely different. Cases similar to that which I have cited can be repeated by the dozen. When a farmer does not know how long his labour will be left to him, when his labour will be called up, how can he possibly plan mixed farming or the raising of cattle? Constant insecurity; constant uncertainty! The farmer has to put in all his applications for bonus. After being assured that the government wants all the coarse grain he can grow, he gets busy and grows one of the greatest crops ever produced. But now he finds that he cannot deliver it. He also finds that his wheat crop cannot be delivered. On the day the house opened the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) informed the Canadian people that the wheat delivery quotas in many parts of the country were now up to fourteen bushels an acre, but he did not tell us how many hundred thousands of farmers living in those areas where that quota is established cannot deliver that crop because there is no room in the elevator.

Most Canadian farmers are in debt. That is a problem which will have to be solved before we provide social security for the people of Canada. In many instances one-third of the crop must be delivered in the elevator in the name of the creditor. The farmer produces his crop. He puts it in the granary if he has one. He has done everything he can to pay off his debt. He tries to deliver it but is not allowed to. Surely he has paid his part of the bargain. But he still has to pay the interest on the money he owes until the law permits him to deliver his grain. You see how well the laws are set up always to protect capital. Sometimes, in cases that I have had brought to my attention, he is threatened with foreclosure by the mortgage company for not delivering the creditor's one-third of the crop. But he is not allowed to deliver it; there is no room in the elevator. He has done everything in his power, but he is tied hand and foot.

What is the position of labour? Wages are frozen at levels which represent an income of less than $1,000 a year for eighty-five per cent of the wage-earners in Canada. In Ontario they were frozen as low as fourteen cents an hour in some instances. Basic rates of wages in some of the essential industries in Quebec are from twenty-four cents to thirty-five cents an hour. What has the worker to look forward to? When the war is over, the bonus will be taken off in the interest of the employing class of Canada. That is why there is unrest in Canada. Labour in many instances works seven days a week, with no holidays, no security for the future. Therefore there is unrest and absenteeism. This government pays lip-service to the right of the workers to organize, but at the same time every stop-block that can be invented is placed in their way to prevent them from organizing. The industrial workers of Canada are filled with confusion; they are frustrated. That is not the spirit which will produce the goods and things needed in this war. The government should bring down legislation making recognition of organized labour and the right of collective bargaining compulsory on every employer in Canada. That is what is done in Great Britain.

Then take the matter of old age pensions. The young and the old, the blind and the crippled, and those who cannot take care of themselves should be the first care of every nation that calls itself civilized and that hopes to have the people look to an administration for social security such as we are told about in the speech from the throne. The most glaring example of the social attitude of the administrations of Canada in the past has been the neglect of these people who are unable to provide for themselves. I should like to read from a letter from one of these men; it will state the matter more plainly than I can myself. It reads:

Dear Sir,—

I am writing to you to complain of the attitude of the dependents' allowance board. We raised our grandson from childhood and who is now in the R.C.A.F.

We have applied for dependents' allowance and as we are both old age pensioners we are informed that they cannot do anything for us.

If this is all they can do after we have given up for the service the boy who helped to support us in our old age, then there is nothing for us to do but lay down as we are not getting the nutrition that we need. This is how we are placed. Out of our joint pension of $40 per month we have $20 rent monthly, light and heat to provide for, so you will readily see what we have left for food, etc.

It means that unless something is done for us that our home will have to be broken up and our hopes of eventide disappear.

Our only son (married) is overseas with the R.H.L.I. and now the grandson is with the R.C.A.F. Our all given to freedom's cause. Myself veteran of world war No. 1.

It is not gratitude or anything else on the part of the allowance board that is shown us. We are only asking for what we consider the right thing for our sacrifices.

What can people expect in the way of social reform when this happens?

Take the field of education, for instance. The failure to establish minimum standards of education and compulsory education throughout Canada for children up to the age of sixteen years is a thing which cannot be endorsed by thinking Canadians. The federal government should undertake to see to it that every Canadian is provided with an opportunity to obtain education; that it be made compulsory for children to attend school at least until the age of fifteen years. Furthermore, this government should see to it that the young people of our nation are given an education enabling them to do their part in service toward their fellowmen. Government subsidies and bursaries should be available for our young men and women who show ability in the schools. Some day a government will sit in those benches, a government that realizes that the brains of the young people of a country are the finest national resource and asset of any nation. Some day the training of those young people will not be dependent upon the wealth or poverty of their parents, upon whether rain happened to fall on a farm for two or three years.

Mr. McNIVEN: Were not such bursaries provided in 1938?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many young men or young women in Canada leaving our public or high schools have had an opportunity to continue their education in a higher field? In the field of social service, Canada's care of its war veterans of the last war and the policies of the soldier settlement board are a blot on the administrations of this country.

There is evidence already that the veterans of this war, even under the highly lauded scheme of the present administration, are suffering hardship and neglect which should not exist. I came across this case in my own constituency. A young man still in uniform happened to be at one of my meetings. I asked him what he was doing now and he told me he had been discharged. I asked him why and he said he had been a motorcyclist overseas, but that during manoeuvres he had been side-swiped by a truck and had suffered a severe fracture of the bone above the left knee. He said that he had been sent to hospital, but that unfortunately cancer of the bone had set in and he had been returned home. He had been undergoing treatment, and when I asked him what pension he was receiving he said none at all. I asked if he had received a clothing allowance and he said he had. I quote from his letter:

> I have received 28 or more treatments and have not received any since, only that I had to report back at the hospital in Regina every month since. Received the treatment in Regina Grey Nuns hospital. They quit giving me treatments on October 16.
> I have spent on travelling, November 16, $8.10 and on December 18, $8.10, and now again on February 18 will cost me another $8.10, which will amount to $24.30 on travelling alone and expenses besides cost me $7.50.

In another letter, he says:

> Why should they cut my pay off and not start my pension as I was in to see them once about it and wrote twice and no answer or anything? What would be your opinion? Also they took my overcoat and overshoes away.

When I drew this matter to the attention of the board here I must say that they took immediate action. They arranged for an immediate investigation of the case and placed the man on temporary one hundred per cent allowance, and the authorities were notified. Any government with such a long record of failure in the social field does not deserve nor will it retain the confidence of the people.

For those who are so smugly satisfied with what our governments have done in the past, I should like to read an extract from a pamphlet entitled, "Health on the March" which was issued by the Canadian federation of agriculture. In dealing with what has been done in New Zealand it said:

> The results of New Zealand's plan for social security are already showing a great increase in the birth rate. For instance, when the labour government came into office, the birth rate was at its lowest level, 16·17 per 1,000 of population. In 1937, it rose to 16·64; 1937 saw a further rise to 17·29; 1938 to 17·93; 1939 to 18·73. After the maternity benefit was introduced in 1940, it rose to 21·19; and 1941 to 22·81.
> The story told by these figures is a tribute to the labour government, in a period in which the birth rate is still declining in most countries of the world. There has also been a decline of absenteeism in industry, due to illness; and an increased rate of production.
> This is a lesson to us. Here we are, with the heritage of one half of a continent, and a totally inadequate population to develop it. You would think that we would have come to our senses long ago, and developed our human resources to the utmost.

Referring to the soviet union, the writer states:

> From a condition of revolution, famine and disease; utter poverty; with 90 per cent of their people unable to read or write, they sprang from the age of candle-light, skipped the gas-light age, and emerged into the electrical age in a few years. What has been accomplished since 1922 is almost unbelievable to us, who are accustomed to the slow process of evolution of capitalist states.

And again:

> It seems to me that the following four points represent the most characteristic features of the soviet health system. 1. Medical service is free and therefore available to all. 2. The prevention of disease is in the foreground of all health activities. 3. All health activities are directed by central bodies, the people's commissariats of health, with the result that 4. Health can be planned on a large scale.

There can be no doubt that the soviet system of social insurance is infinitely superior to any insurance system in capitalist countries. The costs are what they should be, part of the cost of production. The benefits are infinitely greater than under any other insurance scheme. The worker is guaranteed complete medical service, he is given social security. He is entitled to it because, after all, he is creating the values that make such a scheme possible.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Who wrote that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A former minister of health of the Alberta government, I believe. That is the soviet union, the country that is doing so much to save democracy to-day, the country that is showing such surprising reserves. The Canadian people, learning this, will not go back to the old regime of unemployment and want. The men who return from this war where they have risked everything to save and extend the democratic way of life will not be frustrated in their efforts to obtain a decent livelihood. There will be no constitutional difficulties placed in their way, difficulties laid down by the dead hand of the past in such things as the British North America Act. The laws of the land made to protect financial and industrial exploiters must be changed in a democratic way to suit the new order.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) seems to have started a sort of blitzkrieg in the house when he proposed representation in the House of Commons for the armed forces and recommended that the elections act should be amended to that end. I endorse what he said in that regard. The war of 1914-1918 was won on the battlefield, but the peace was lost to the politicians and the international bankers. I believe that the armed forces should have representation in the House of Commons. They should be permitted to nominate their candidates freely and to have free discussion of the issues within their own units. That was denied to them before, although they had the right to vote in the election of 1940. Their representation in the house should be in the same ratio of population that determines the election of members in the various constituencies throughout Canada. In this way we shall get the opinions, hopes and aspirations of the rank and file of the men and women of the armed forces who are doing their bit so nobly to-day. We want their voice heard in the reorganization of the world.

The old economic order is utterly incapable of giving security or freedom from want and fear. Economic democracy must be established. By that we mean that the resources and the machinery of production of the nation must be democratically owned by the people and operated for the people. Then each person will be given his share of the nation's wealth in cultural advantages and economic security to satisfy his needs, and that in turn will be the incentive which will draw from each according to his ability to give. The economic and social well-being of the people will be the first duty of the state. Then and then only will there be an end to fear and an end to need. Then we shall have a state where fear cannot exist, and where health, education and recreation will be a national achievement. Then the old and the young, the crippled and the blind, shall live without fear, and those who work, being the creators of all wealth, shall have a claim on that wealth to satisfy their human needs before capital be permitted to take its toll. Such a programme determined by Canadians in annual democratic conventions, democratically controlled by those who toil in Canada, is the aim and objective of this party. A democratically elected council in the province of Quebec recently discovered that the milk distribution in its area was ineffective and wasteful. They decided to set up a municipal milk distribution plan. The farmers who supplied the milk then got more for their product; the people who consumed the milk got the milk cheaper; the people with the lower incomes got more milk, and they are the ones who need it most. I suppose my hon. friends to my right would call that socialism. Well, if that is socialism, I am pleased to be called a socialist. To those who fear such a programme, who fear for the rights of property, I will give this assurance: They will be permitted to own anything except the right and the power to exploit their fellow men.

The amendment which has been moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation reads:

And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

Those are the principles which we must follow in time of war if we are to fight a full and proper war, and when this war is won those are the principles which, being established in a democratic way, will make possible equality of opportunity in time of peace, just as there should be equality of sacrifice in time of war.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): Mr. Speaker it is not my intention to run the whole gamut of the speech from the throne or to embark upon a review of world events. The speech from the throne has been discussed at great length, and it has been approved and condemned, eulogized and criticized. It has been called apt and inept, depending on the mood of the speaker and his political complexion. I intend to discuss but three paragraphs of the speech from the throne, and to discuss them briefly because there will be another opportunity to develop them at greater length.

At the very outset I should like to express my personal thanks and my own appreciation to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for his continued interest in western Canada and in the province of Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman has employed the time during the recess in visiting our western provinces in order to cultivate an all-Canadian viewpoint, and from personal experience he has found on the rolling prairies a home for countless millions in the future. And that hope is based upon what? He there finds the finest and largest continuous stretch of good agricultural land that lies out-of-doors anywhere. He has carried his explorations further. He has come to agree with us who reside on the prairies that ours is a badly balanced economy. In northern Saskatchewan, following those two great rivers, the North and South Saskatchewans, he has found potential power sites which will support industry to be established in the years to come. He agrees with the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Gregory), who described the gas fields that have been developed at Lloydminster, which could and should be used as a basis for industrial development; with the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Evans), also from our province, who knows all the deposits of pottery and building clays inexhaustible in their extent; with the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) in whose constituency are to be found huge deposits of china clays equal to the best to be found in the county of Kent, England; and with the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who will take ten minutes off any time to elaborate upon the deposits of firebrick clay to be found in his constituency, and who will tell you, along with the hon. member for Davenport, that all the firebrick used in the fire boxes of the engines of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways in the west are manufactured south of Moose Jaw. If we go further south into the constituency of Assiniboia, the hon. member (Mr. Tripp) rejoices with us that in his constituency there are twenty billion tons of lignite coal, with an overburden of from 40 to 150 feet. The value of that coal is emphasized in a little book I hold in my hand entitled "Brown Coal and Magic". It tells the story of how the brown coals of Australia have been developed and used to support cities of half a million, and their whole industrial development is based upon that coal. There is in the Estevan area a potential development of power in unlimited quantities. Not only that, but the coal we have in southern Saskatchewan is superior to that of Australia. Australian coal has a moisture content of 65 per cent, and ours has a moisture content of 30 per cent. Once again may I point out that the whole industrial development of Germany is based on the brown coals of that country. I need refer only to the dye industry and the chemical industry. We have not even scratched the surface of this great potential natural resource.

Not only has the hon. member for Davenport done us the honour to which I have referred, but he has done more, and I thank him for it most sincerely. He has come to eastern Canada and told the story to the sceptics, to the men and women who here, a few years ago, would have given the land back to the Indians. We invite him back to our province, and we shall be glad if he will continue his speeches in eastern Canada. I can assure him that he will have an ever-growing and ever more appreciative audience.

There is a passage in the speech from the throne to which I should like to make a brief reference. I do so because it is the subject-matter of many communications to myself, many editorials and news items in the newspapers and, I would say, it is uppermost in the minds of ninety-nine per cent of the taxpayers of this country. The passage is as follows:

> These will include the further development of the method of payment of the personal income tax in the year in which income is received, thus carrying to its logical conclusion the approach made last year to the collection of taxes on a current basis.

In the popular mind and in the newspapers that plan is associated with the name of Beardsley Ruml, and in so far as the United States of America is concerned it is properly associated with him. But in Canada that plan should be referred to as the Ilsley plan, for in the budget of last year the principle of that plan was introduced, and came into effect on the 1st day of September. For that reason I welcome the passage in the speech from the throne which indicates further progress of the pay-as-you-go policy in the matter of personal income. It will afford relief to a very large number of people who do not like to be in debt to anyone, even to their own government.

I should also like to make a brief reference to another matter referred to in the speech from the throne:

> My ministers believe that a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance should be worked out at once which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada.

I will not enlarge upon that at any great length, for practically all of those who have preceded me have spoken on it and have agreed with the substance of that declaration in the speech from the throne. In that regard the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), who preceded me, was no exception; but I must say that the nature of his remarks was decidedly different from the great majority of the contributions to this debate. I know the hon. member quite well; I also know the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas); I delight in having conversations with them, and I assure the house that in my personal conversations with these three hon. members they do not give birth to such statements as we hear from them on the floor of the house. Let me recall some of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Yorkton. He speaks of destitution, of Canadians being completely destitute. He speaks of lack of sincerity. He speaks of no assurance of living or of security. He speaks of frustration. He speaks of a blot against this country. He speaks about complaints. He speaks about a long record of failure. One would imagine, from what he has declared just within the last thirty minutes, that he and those associated with him had a monopoly on success, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that is very far removed from the fact. Why, sir, he called upon this government to institute a minimum standard of education, and he criticized them severely because they had thus far failed to introduce a standardized system of education. Apparently he is not familiar with the British North America Act, which gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over education.

Mr. REID: And I hope it stays there.

Mr. McNIVEN: The hon. member for Yorkton uses that as a pretext to criticize this government; and then, when I pointed out to him that bursaries and scholarships were provided in the dark days of 1937 and 1938 he said, "And what did they amount to?" I want to tell him that the educational institutions of Canada are being widely used by our young men and young women.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the hon. member permit a question? Could he give me the approximate percentage of students who leave the public and high schools of this dominion and who ever reach a university?

Mr. REID: Do not answer that.

Mr. McNIVEN: I will not attempt to. But I know of a great many students who, but for the assistance they have received from scholarships granted by this government and by the various provincial governments, would have been denied an university education.

Again, the hon. member speaks about health standards. I am quite ready to admit that they are not perfect, that they are not as good as we would like them to be. But the tone of all the utterances, both here and elsewhere, of the group to which my hon. friend belongs,—C.C.F.—is that nothing of that kind is being done in this country. All the hon. gentleman has to do is to go to our own province, where for eighteen years tuberculosis has been treated free of charge, in two public institutions, with the result that our province enjoys one of the lowest mortality rates from tuberculosis of any province or similar area in the world. Our cancer clinic is open to all those who cannot pay. I recall that a few years ago the hon. gentleman cited one isolated case, just as he did here this evening, wherein, he said, some individual had been refused medical treatment. In reply I described his remarks as an insult to the medical profession of our province. I repeat that to-day. We have in our province, in the men and women belonging to the medical and nursing professions, including those engaged in the hospitals, just as fine a body of men and women as will be found anywhere.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the hon. member know how many there are?

Mr. McNIVEN: Yes; and I would say that fully half of them are to-day in the armed forces. I know that fifty per cent of the doctors from my own city have enlisted.

The hon. gentleman, too, deprecates the fact that provision has not already been made for soldier representation in the House of Commons. In that connection I suppose he would charge the government with lack of sincerity and suggest that they do not desire to recognize the soldiers' rights. But I say, sir, that the province from which he comes was one of the first to recognize the soldiers in the last war and did give them representation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of order, the hon. member for Regina City stated that I deprecated the fact that there was no representation of the armed forces in the house at the present time. That is not my statement and I should like to have it withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. McNIVEN: Well, sir, I want to repeat that in the fall of 1916—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: What the hon. gentleman states is not a point of order. It is a denial.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I ask that the hon. member withdraw it.

Mr. GARDINER: He did not say what the hon. gentleman says he said.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not stated anything against the hon. gentleman except to offer an opinion with regard to remarks which he made, and that is perfectly in order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not make those remarks.

Mr. McNIVEN: I repeat that in the fall of 1916 or in the spring of 1917 the Saskatchewan legislature made provision for soldier representation in that legislature. Liberalism recognized it as a principle then, and three members were elected, two from the active forces in France, and the third from those on active service in England. So that the hon. member does not have to go beyond the confines of our own province to find full recognition of soldiers' rights in the matter of representation.

The party to which I belong, as well as the province from which I come has expressed itself recently on this matter of social security, and I cannot do better than read to the house a resolution that was passed at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Liberal Association on January 12 with regard to the subject.

Mr. GILLIS: What year was that?

Mr. McNIVEN: 1943.

Mr. PERLEY: After the Winnipeg convention.

Mr. McNIVEN: If I may deal with the interrupters in order, substance of the interruptions being the same namely, the suggestion that it was a last minute conversion to the policy of social security, may I ask the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to take the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) into the corridor after the house adjourns, and tell him what has been done in the way of social security in our own province over the last twenty-five years. Let him tell that hon. gentleman of the policies introduced there. They do not go as far as we would have them go, I will admit, but the principle has been recognized, and it will be developed and carried along until the day comes, we hope, when proper provision will be made for all those who find themselves in unfortunate and difficult circumstances.

Mr. ROWE: There was not much progress until the Winnipeg convention.

Mr. McNIVEN: If the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will take the hon. member who has just interrupted and give him a lesson in what has taken place in our province he will not be so satisfied as to the merits of his position.

Mr. ROWE: We talked it all over at Winnipeg.

Mr. McNIVEN: Then if they talked it over at Winnipeg I give the hon. member from our province credit for bringing his party up to the standard which has already been attained by the Liberal party.

Mr. ROWE: Give him the credit he deserves, so long as we arrive.

Mr. McNIVEN: I hope you do arrive. We shall welcome help in any direction which will accomplish a measure of social security for those who deserve it and are unable to provide it for themselves.

Mr. ROWE: I expect the hon. member will be with us before it is over.

Mr. McNIVEN: When I read this resolution by hon. friend will wish that he had had a better lesson before he reached the Winnipeg convention. This is the resolution:

Whereas the present and future generations are greatly indebted to the pioneer for much of what we enjoy to-day;

And whereas the interests of Canada are best advanced by a healthy and robust citizenship;

And whereas the youth of Canada constitute its greatest asset;

And whereas the home is the foundation unit of every worth-while citizenship;

And whereas national strength is achieved proportionately as a nation assumes and performs its maximum duty to the aged, the pioneer, the unfortunate, the youth and the home:

Therefore be it resolved that the council of the Liberal association for the province of Saskatchewan unequivocally pledges the Liberal party of Saskatchewan to a policy of social security effective immediately, and the Liberal party will recommend to the Saskatchewan and dominion governments that such a policy of social security, without limiting the scope of such policy, shall include:

1. An immediate increase of $5 in the monthly payment presently payable under the Old Age Pensions Act, and that a study of prevailing conditions applicable to the old age pensions be forthwith undertaken to determine the schedule of monthly payments which will provide an improved standard of living.

2. An increase of the maximum annual income of the pensioner under the Old Age Pensions Act from $360 to $500.

3. A progressive reduction in the age limit now fixed by the Old Age Pensions Act in order to provide openings in employment for the men and women now in the armed forces of Canada and likewise those engaged in war work.

4. An adequate allowance to widows with small children and in particular those with large families to enable such widows to devote their time and attention to the care and upbringing of their children.

5. An increase in the allowance presently made for each child under the mothers' allowance act.

6. A substantial increase in the schedule of payments now made to sightless persons, together with improved facilities and greater opportunity for the training and advancement of those sightless persons who are below the age limit.

May I pause here to make this observation. It was this government that in 1927 introduced old age pensions. It was this government that, in 1937 or 1938, provided pensions for sightless persons. And now members have the temerity to charge this government with lack of sincerity and lack of consideration. It has not done all that we should like to have done, but surely it is not subject to that charge in any event. To continue:

7. That a dominion-wide system of compulsory old age insurance be worked out and adopted at the earliest possible date with a variable age of retirement.

8. That a dominion-wide system of compulsory contributory health insurance, or alternatively a dominion-wide contributory plan making provision for medical care and hospitalization be worked out and made effective at the earliest possible date.

9. That the present scheme of unemployment insurance be carefully supervised in order to iron out existing inequalities and to extend its benefits to an ever-widening circle of employees.

And that for the purposes aforesaid the provincial and dominion governments assume by agreement their fair share of the financial responsibility involved, or alternatively that the government of Canada obtain the necessary authority by way of amendments to the British North America Act to enable it to introduce legislation designed to give the widest possible security to the aged, the unfortunate, the youth, together with the largest possible measure of protection for the homes of Canada.

There stand the Liberal party of Saskatchewan, prepared to implement those parts of this scheme that lie within their jurisdiction. They have not carried it to the length they would wish, but they are looking confidently to the time when adequate provision will be made for those who are unable to take care of themselves and when the Liberal party of Saskatchewan will be in a position to implement that programme in its entirety.

With regard to those who have criticized this government concerning old age pensions, I should like to hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) as to what, if any, representations have been made to him by the provinces since he declared in this house in November, 1941, that he would be willing to receive and consider any representations that might be made by all or a majority of the Canadian provinces for an increase in old age pensions. Not so long ago I saw in the press that the eastern provinces had not made any such representations though, if I know the Minister of Finance as I think I do, once having made that statement he will stand by it; and when the Canadian provinces, whose responsibility it is to care for aged persons, come to the dominion government they will be received by a gentleman who will listen to their plea. I am in favour of an increase in the old age pension. I have great respect for the pioneer, for the old man and the old woman, and I do not think we in this house, or the young men and young women of this country, should ever be allowed to forget the contribution that has been made to the development of this country by those old people. Much of what we enjoy to-day in our cities, our towns, our villages, our schools, in connection with our highways and so on, we owe to the enterprise, initiative, courage and financial contribution of many of those men and women who have since fallen upon evil days.

I was interested in reading a pamphlet issued by the much maligned public information department, called "Canada and the People's War," which I find replete with information. It gives an historical survey of the development of the armed forces and the industrial life of Canada, and after a perusal of this pamphlet there is no reason why every man and woman in this country should not be fully informed as to what Canada at war has accomplished. Canada has been at war for some forty-one months. A hurried review of the twenty years that preceded the declaration of war reveals that Canada had no foreign policy as this is known in other countries. Canada maintained no diplomatic service in the European capitals, nor was Canada concerned in any of the intrigues that went on there. Time and again during five years preceding the war the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that we have no commitments in Europe. Canada was not anxious to secure an improved position in the capitals of the world by arranging for the marriage of the Prime Minister, or the first leader of the present opposition, Viscount Bennett, or the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), into some of the royal families of Europe.

This country had no desire for territory which any other country possessed. Aggrandizement was not part of our policy, no matter what party was in power. Ours was a policy of being willing to trade, a policy which might be summarized as that of the open hand and the friendly gesture, a willingness to trade with anyone who would trade with us on a reasonably equal basis. For such a policy Canada needed no great armada, no immense standing army, no great aerial fleet, no great industry for the manufacture of munitions and warlike supplies. For these reasons Canada, in common with the other twenty-eight united nations including Great Britain and the United States, was caught totally unprepared for war. At that time the Prime Minister of Great Britain said that it would be three years before the democracies would be ready to meet the hun on his own terms. The Prime Minister of this country concurred in that statement, and made it a fundamental, primary principle of his policy that we should have unity at home as a pre-requisite to a maximum, balanced, continuous war effort from the beginning of the war until peace finally returned. That, sir, has been accomplished in splendid fashion, well within the time indicated by the hon. gentlemen. I distinctly recall during the last three years many people criticized this government for being slow, unwilling, wasteful; for lacking sincerity in the prosecution of the war. But to-day many of those critics are wondering in hushed tones if this government has not undertaken too much, if it has not embarked upon too great a programme for twelve million people. This afternoon we heard the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who was one of the severest critics of the government, give expression to a statement of that kind.

I started to say that this is a people's war. We find that in the three years of which Mr. Churchill spoke 721,000 of our young men and women have rallied to the colours. We find that our output of munitions and the impedimenta of war has an annual value of about 3·7 billion dollars. We find that over a million people, of whom 145,000 are women, are employed in industry, and therefore we in this house, irrespective of our political affiliations, can join in paying tribute to the manner in which labour has worked with capital and capital has worked with labour in order to produce a continuous flow of munitions to the various war zones. Truly, sir, it is a people's war. Then, too, we come to the production of food on a threefold front—food for the civilians of this country, food for the armed forces of this country, and food for the nations, the allies of this country. Canadian farmers have responded to every call and have produced in unbelievable quantities, which thanks to our fleet and our convoy system have been going across the Atlantic in an endless chain. I want to pay my tribute to our farmers for what they have accomplished and also to pay whole-hearted and sincere tribute to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for his guidance and planning and direction of that effort which has given such surprising and marvellous results.

Then in the matter of finance, there is scarcely a man or woman in this country who three years ago would have believed that Canada could bear and would submit to taxation in the huge amounts now required to meet our war expenditures. There are very few who would have even suggested that this country was capable of producing the immense sums of money which have been subscribed for the three victory loans. When we realize that Canada's vote for war purposes in the fiscal year 1942-43 with the supplementary estimates is approximately three times the entire amount spent by Canada in the whole of the last war we have some measure of the accomplishment of the Canadian people in financing this war. Truly, sir, it is a people's war, and the taxpayers of this country have responded nobly.

Every province is making its comparable contribution to this meritorious result, not even excepting the province of Saskatchewan, which has been so loudly berated this evening. Sometimes, because of the addresses delivered from time to time during the last six or seven years from the C.C.F. section of the house our province has become known as the "orphan Annie", the poor relation, the unwanted child, of the Canadian family; some even go so far as to say, give it back to the Indians. But in those self same three years of which I speak, our province had recruited to the end of October 53,900 soldiers for the armed forces, and recruits have been pouring in since then at the rate of twelve hundred a month. I mentioned a moment ago that this is a people's war, irrespective of class, race or creed, and is so regarded in our province. There comes to my mind a citizen of the town of Wolseley, a French Canadian with seven sons, all of them in the armed forces, and Rudolph Deutcher, a German farmer at Odessa with eight sons, of whom six are in the armed forces, the seventh in an important war industry and the eighth impatiently waiting on the calendar until he can join his brothers. I think of a Jewish family at Kamsack with five sons in the armed forces; I think of old Mr. Reinlander in Regina, born in Russia, with four sons in the armed forces. My mind goes back to that sunny afternoon of August 8 with the Prime Minister present in our city when two women were presented to him—Mrs. Muirhead, of Estevan, of Scotch-Irish origin, and Mrs. Uren, of Regina, both she and her husband born in Austria. These two women were presented to the Prime Minister and received from him his personal thanks and the thanks of the people of Canada because each of them had six sons and two sons-in-law in our armed forces.

I am using only a few illustrations, but I have no doubt every hon. member can multiply, times without number, illustrations such as I have used. I want to emphasize again that in our province and, I believe, in every province, this is a people's war, irrespective of class, race or creed.

This province of ours, sometimes known as the "orphan Annie" province, has been pictured as the special domain of the mortgage companies. What I protest against most vigorously is that the other side of the picture is never given by the C.C.F. section of the house. For their information and the information of hon. members generally I say that we in Saskatchewan are proud of our province, and I am going to put on the record some statistics in order to show what has been accomplished in the matter of production and the increase in the last three years:

	Production in bushels
	1939	1942
Wheat	271,300,000	335,000,000
Barley	26,000,000	92,000,000
Oats	112,000,000	255,000,000
Flax	1,250,000	10,500,000
Rye	9,300,000	15,000,000

As to cattle, hon. members will remember the year 1937 when 375,000 head of our cattle were slaughtered because we had a complete crop failure on account of the drought. In 1939 Saskatchewan marketed 172,865 head of cattle, and in 1942 marketed 256,186. As to hogs, listen to this: in 1939 we marketed 312,188; in 1942 we marketed 964,622. In the same period the annual marketing of sheep has increased from 63,807 to 88,908, and the production of creamery butter has increased from 25,000,000 pounds to over 41,000,000, pounds.

The farmers of Saskatchewan heard the call. Canada required butter, and they answered it by an increase in production of nearly 100 per cent. In 1935 our production of honey was a little over a million pounds. In 1942 it was approximately five million pounds. In lumber our production for 1939 was 37,974,000 feet, and last year it was 125,853,000 feet.

With regard to coal, of which I spoke a little while ago, the production in 1939 was 959,595 tons, and in 1942, 1,299,891 tons, or an increase of 340,000 tons, and there are people all over western Canada who are grateful, on nights such as this, for that increased production.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria B.C.): If I fail this evening in extending the usual compliments to the mover and the seconder of the address, it is not on account of a lack of respect for those two hon. gentlemen, or for the uniform they wear; it is not because I have not a full appreciation of the contribution which they have made, but simply because so many previous speakers have paid compliments to them in a manner which I could not do. Therefore I shall let it go at that. Because of the time at my disposal I will change almost completely what I had intended to say. I should like to finish before eleven o'clock. I had hoped to use practically all my time on the speech from the throne itself, because I consider that this document will go down in history, either as one of great credit to this government or as one that will condemn it.

The other evening the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said that it was a barren statement, but I do not agree with him. I think it has everything in it to make us proud. If we follow it out it will make for us a great nation, one of which we shall be proud, one worthy of the sacrifices of those who have gone before and of those who are fighting for us at the present time. But if we allow trivialities and politics to interfere with our path of progress, then we may easily expect confusion. I think we can say of this, to use the words of Robert Service:

> The choice is ours, to make or mar
> To count the ties, or drive a motor car.

If we choose to follow what is set out in the speech from the throne we can make out of it something worthwhile. But I shall not say anything more about it at the present time because I want to deal with some other matters.

One thing about which I want to make my position clear is the pay of our junior officers in the army. The other night the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Ross) had something to say on this subject, with all of which I agreed. But there are some things he did not say which should be said. Most of the young men going into the armed services are leaving positions of importance. Many of them are professional men, and they are sacrificing much in the way of remuneration in order to do their duty. They are the type of men upon whom we must depend for leadership; they are the type of men whom we would want our sons to follow when they are in the army. We should not expect such men to make a double sacrifice or more than is necessary. I think this government could well afford to exempt these junior officers from payment of income tax. I have before me a statement giving the net pay of all officers in the army from colonel to class C sergeant, covering single men, married men, married men with one dependent, and married men with two dependents. I should like to have the privilege of placing this on Hansard. The statement is as follows:

Net Available Monthly Income

	Single	Married	Married (1 Dependent)	Married (2 Dependents)
Lt.-Col.	$185 89	$235 07	$249 73	$264 49
Major	154 02	197 48	212 72	227 86
W.O. class I Grade A	150 56	190 56	202 56	214 56
Captain	133 67	175 11	190 35	205 27
W.O. class I as referred to income tax amendment	133 43	173 33	185 33	197 33
W.O. II grade A	117 10	152 10	164 10	176 10
Lieut.	108 58	147 80	163 52	179 32
S/Sgt. class A	98 85	133 85	145 85	157 85
2nd Lieut.	96 97	135 02	150 74	166 46
Sgt. class A	89 73	124 73	136 73	148 73
Sgt. class B	82 12	117 12	129 12	141 12
Sgt. class C	74 51	109 51	121 51	133 51

I do not like to present a statement of this kind without offering some suggestions as to how it can be brought about. I know that in offering these suggestions I shall probably be open to criticism by some of my own friends. I contend that when a man is willing to go into the army and wear the badge "Canada" on his shoulders, once he is found to be physically fit to go overseas, from that time on he should be exempted from payment of income tax. This creates a difference between the man who is in the army and not able to go overseas and the man who is in the army but able to go overseas.

I know those who are at home are doing a mighty fine job; they are making sacrifices the same as the rest of the citizens of Canada, but I do not think they have any right to complain. I do not wish to belabour this point any further because I understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will have something to say about the Ruml plan. Probably the solution of this problem will be found in that plan, so that I shall leave the matter at this point.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the hon. member include merchant seamen as well as young officers in his plea?

Mr. MAYHEW: I certainly would; I would probably put them first. I am glad the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is in his seat because I should like to refer to those soldiers who have been discharged from the army on account of tuberculosis. There are two men in the hospital at Victoria who went before the medical board, were attested and examined by the doctors, including X-ray examination of their chest; they went into the army and served for some months, I think for a year, and are now in hospital suffering from tuberculosis. They get no pension or allowance, although they do get treatment. I realize that a number of these men are receiving hospital treatment as well as compassionate allowances.

I have made inquiries about this matter; I have seen Doctor Kincaid, who is in charge of tuberculosis in the provincial government at Victoria. He is an authority on this subject, and he advises me that there is very little excuse for this disease not being determined at the time of enlistment. He says that science has gone far enough that we can determine this pretty well. I think we have reached the time when the onus of proving that a man's health has been impaired, that he has contracted tuberculosis on account of military service, should not be his responsibility but should be the other way around; that the government should have to prove to the soldier that he did not contract the disease while away. These boys get their hospitalization. But when they leave they have no money, and they are compelled to go into the labour market and find themselves a job. They can last only a short time, and then they come back into hospital in a worse condition than before. In the meantime they have been a menace to the health of the people in the community. I know that the Minister of Pensions and National Health is sympathetic, and I hope he will bring in some amendments at this session to cover that situation.

I wish to say a word about old age pensions. It does seem too bad that these old people, many of whom have helped to lay the corner-stones of this country, have cleared our farms and helped to build our railroads and practically all the institutions we have, should find themselves living to-day on a bare subsistence. Their allowance is not enough in many parts of this dominion to enable them to live in comfort. British Columbia recently made some advances to give these old age pensioners an extra five dollars a month, and I think the old age pensioners in that province are probably as well cared for as in any province, but I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the government that at this time they should give these old people the cost-of-living bonus. There are many others whom I should like to see receiving the old age pension. I have spoken of that before. Every time I have spoken in this house I have expressed my opinion that we should have in this country a compulsory, contributory, all-in pension system.

There is one other point I wish to make, particularly because I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his seat. I want to congratulate him upon the speech he made the other day and upon his work as Minister of Agriculture. But I was surprised to learn to-day that his department is not going to give the guarantee which it has formerly given in aid of seed growing in Canada. The people of my district are very much concerned about that. Prior to the beginning of the war most of our seed was grown in the old country and exported to Canada, but at the start of the war the dominion government, in cooperation with the provincial governments, guaranteed a price for certain vegetable seed. I understand that sixty per cent of our vegetable seed is grown in British Columbia, and a good deal of it is grown very close to my own home. Our people are concerned about what they are going to do, not particularly about this year's crop, but about the crops of future years. It takes two years to grow this seed. British Columbia thought that this was a matter of national concern and that the dominion government should guarantee the whole subsidy for the growing of seed, but apparently the dominion government is not prepared to do that. I understand that the seed branch at Ottawa sends out men, and when they find a farmer with a suitable piece of land for growing seed they tell him how to go about it and guarantee to take at a guaranteed price, all the seed he produces, but up to date they have never had to buy any of that seed because there has always been a sufficient sale for it without calling upon the dominion government to buy it. I understand that now the dominion government is not going to give that guarantee, but I hope I am wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: If I might just make a remark, I think the intention is to follow the same plan this year as we followed the previous year, but we have not agreed to pay the whole cost which was asked by the provinces.

Mr. MAYHEW: My time is passing and I want to say a word or two on shipbuilding. In 1940 I advocated in this house a programme of shipbuilding. That programme was not started for nearly a year afterwards. But when it was started it went very much farther and very much faster than we expected it would go. Our province is now building more than double the amount of ships that we expected it would, but still that is not enough. We need merchant ships; we need ships that will convoy them across the seas; we need ships that are going to patrol our coasts; and we have not sufficient of any of these three types of boats. I am going to suggest, and I think it is time, that we consider the advisability of converting some of our man-power and some of our steel into the building of ships. We do not need to go very far from Ottawa to find along the railway tracks quite a quantity of materials which, for lack of shipping, we are unable to ship across the seas. True, Mr. Churchill said that we were gaining; that in spite of all the sinkings we had over a million and a half more tons of shipping now than we had six months ago. But I think we should put shipbuilding first on our programme at this time. We should spend every effort upon it. We have at the present time plants wihch are turning out tanks and munitions. If they had to stop and idle for a time in order to allow the steel they use to be used for shipbuilding, they could readily resume work when more munitions were wanted abroad. I do not see much sense in raising huge crops and manufacturing huge quantities of war materials if we find it difficult to transport them across the water. We should devote our efforts at the present time to building more ships. We also need a good many more boats than we now have for our coastal patrol. Almost daily, I was going to say, but that would be an exaggeration, but every week since I have been here someone has written or wired to me saying "the government is going to take my boat for some other purpose than commercial enterprise."

To be quite frank, without wishing to be too critical of our government, I doubt whether the three departments have yet made up their minds as to how much equipment and how many patrol boats are needed on our coast. They will hand out an order for a couple of boats here and a couple of boats some other place, and our yards are running in a hit-or-miss fashion without any programme. I believe it is time that we asked the government to formulate a programme and I would be failing in my duty as the member for the city of Victoria if I did not say so. We need an adequate coast patrol, because all our dangers are not yet behind us.

In conclusion, I will say a word or two about the income tax situation. I shall not discuss it at any length, because I believe that the Minister of Finance will bring in a change as regards the collection of at least the personal tax, and I hope he will also introduce some change in the matter of collecting the corporation tax. I suppose this will be along the lines of the Ruml plan; I hope it is. There is one suggestion I wish to make to him. At the present time he is collecting twenty per cent of the excess profits tax and treating it as a loan to the government. But the people from whom he is taking it have nothing but their own statement as to how much that is. I suggest to him that he could issue some kind of scrip to show what these people have paid in the way of a tax which will be returnable. A better way of doing it than the way it is done at the present time would be to treat the tax as an interest-free loan from the corporations, to be returned to them upon condition that each corporation, after the war is over, submits to the government a plan of development which will modernize or extend its plant, and which is satisfactory to some regional board established by the government for that purpose. The total amount will be a good many million dollars. It would be the first step toward increasing the amount of labour which will be needed in this country for building or modernizing industries, and, probably, for operating the plants when they are ready. Think, for example how large an amount would be available in connection with our railways alone. I do not think we want the money to be paid in to the government at the present time merely to go back into our hands. I say this although I happen to be a manufacturer, one of those fellows who apparently are not thought worthy of much respect from some quarters in this house. Nevertheless I do not believe the majority of the people wish this money to go back to the corporations to be split up as a melon among stockholders; they would like to feel that it would be put to work for the good of the country and in particular for the good of the district in which they live.

I should have liked to make some observations in connection with rehabilitation matters, but I have sweated enough about even rising to speak at all to-day, and I would rather end my speech here than adjourn the debate, knowing that I would have to rise in my place again to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Kootenay East) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 16, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House, Ottawa,
February 16, 1943.

Sir.—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Poore Duff, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day, Tuesday, February 16, at 5.55 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Bertrand (Terrebonne), Bonnier, Bourget, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Chambers, Chevrier, Corman, Crete, d'Anjou, Denis, Dubois, Durocher, Edwards, Emmerson, Esling, Evans, Fauteux, Ferland, Fraser (Peterborough West), Furniss, Gillis, Goulet, Grant, Green, Healy, Hlynka, Hoblitzell, Hurtubise, Kuhl, Leader, MacDiarmid, MacKinnon (Kootenay East), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), McGregor, McNevin (Victoria, Ont.), Mills, Moore, Mulock, Nicholson, Purdy, Rhéaume, Ross (St. Paul's), Sinclair, Sissons, Soper, Tripp, Tucker, Tustin, Weir, White, Whitman, Winkler and Wood, will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messieurs Adamson, Aylesworth, Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon), Bruce, Cardiff, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Coldwell, Emmerson, Eudes, Factor, Farquhar, Fontaine, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gershaw, Goulet, Graham, Green, Hansell, Henderson, Howden, Hurtubise, Jaques, Jean, Lizotte, Macdonald (Halifax), Mackenzie (Neepawa), MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent), Macmillan, Marier, Martin, Mayhew, Moore, Poirier, Pouliot, Purdy, Raymond, Reid, Rickard, Ross (St. Paul's), Thauvette, Warren, Winkler and Wood, a committee to assist his honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a brief contribution to this debate it gives me great pleasure to welcome back to this house the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He is a very active minister and I predicted that something would happen to him if he did not take things easier, but I was not thinking of an accident of the kind that did befall him. In January he came to visit the military units in my city. It was a cold day, although not quite as cold as it is to-day. He was reviewing the troops when the thermometer registered 21 degrees below zero with a thirty-mile gale. I went up to call on him and I prophesied a severe attack of pneumonia if he did not watch his step. We are glad indeed to see him back, restored to health and ready to take up the onerous duties he has to perform.

I desire to make some brief reference to the speech from the throne. It is rather colourless; there is nothing very startling in the government's programme. Nearly all the major proposals have been anticipated already by the general public and by the press. I am glad to know that we are being spared the indignity of another plebiscite and that sort of thing; so that I shall not devote much time to a discussion of the subject matters referred to in the speech, although some of them require elucidation.

Reference is made to a joint committee representative of Canada and the United States to coordinate the efforts of the two countries in agricultural production. I regretted that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did not touch on this important matter during the course of his remarks. I am not condemning him; I am simply saying that the house and the country should be told at the earliest possible moment just what these proposals are.

There is also the matter of the Canadian war supply board. In the resolution standing on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) reference is made to the establishment of a Canadian war supplies allocation board. I understand that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is to be the chairman of that board, and that it is to be made up of members of the cabinet. We shall await with considerable interest the statement of the minister in this regard. I assume he will make it at an early day, possibly on that resolution if not during this debate. The house should be told just what this proposal is and what is intended. It is a new departure, a departure that carries with it implications of great good in the common cause. More than that I shall not say at the moment, except that I shall await with interest the government's proposals.

Then there is the paragraph written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the seclusion of his own sanctum sanctorum. He utters this pious hope:

Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities, the establishment in useful and remunerative employment, of the men and women in our armed forces and in war industries.

I think we can all reecho that. But as to the ways and means of doing it we are left entirely in the dark. How is it to be accomplished? We are not told. May I remind the Prime Minister and the members of this house that in a magnificent address delivered within the last few days, to which I am sure nearly all of us listened, the President of the United States told his people and the world at large that private industry and private enterprise would provide the great bulk of employment after the war, to be supplemented by appropriate congressional legislation and action. He made bold to make that assertion, and so it will be in Canada, notwithstanding all the isms and all the talk that is going around in this and that circle as to the world that is to be. There is nothing that will take the place of private enterprise in our economic system.

I have not looked into the constitutional history of the development of what is known as the speech from the throne, but my memory indicates that it had a definite purpose in the days of long ago. To-day it is a truism to say that quite often the speech from the throne is used as an instrument to conceal rather than to reveal the government's intentions. I think that can be said with some degree of truth with respect to this speech from the throne. I have sometimes wished it were possible under our constitutional set-up that our speech from the throne could be patterned on the address which the President of the United States gives to his nation at the opening of a congressional session and in which he dilates upon the state of the union and gives a lead to the nation. I quite appreciate that with us this may not be possible, since we have not in Canada the same separation that there is between the legislative and executive functions in the United States. This is just a suggestion which arose in my own mind, because I have been convinced that the speech from the throne does not mean very much in Canada. I am certain that there is great opportunity for improvement.

I should like to turn for a moment to a consideration of the war position. As I read the speech, more than once, I felt that sufficient emphasis had not been placed upon the fact that this world-wide war has not yet been won. I believe the Prime Minister during the course of his remarks in this debate endeavoured to bring us back to a sense of reality, but I am afraid, and I hope I will be pardoned for saying so, that the Canadian people do not listen very much these days to the Prime Minister with respect to matters of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true notwithstanding the "ohs" that greet me now. Because of his vacillating policies the Canadian people are not impressed as they ought to be when the Prime Minister strikes a note of warning. Be that as it may, and it is a matter of opinion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the matter over there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the matter over there?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is nothing the matter over here. Let us have a little quiet.

In most of the speeches in this debate, if not all of them, I have sensed a lack of appreciation of the fact that the end of this devastating conflict is still far off. It would seem that some of us are more concerned with post-war conditions and political manoeuvring than we are with the vital task of winning this war—and that goes perhaps for all of us. For three long years Britain and her dominions were on the defensive. Then the great United States came into the conflict. In November last, and not until then, with the invasion of North Africa we began to see a gleam of light over the hill top—the end of the beginning, as Mr. Churchill so aptly put it. Since then in Russia, in the southern Pacific, in Africa and in other theatres of war our gallant forces have steadily gone forward. But I suggest to hon. gentlemen that the victory is still far ahead. One thing has emerged, and perhaps we can be in agreement on this, that as the allied nations have taken the offensive the danger of invasion of this continent is receding. But we have not yet won the battle of the Atlantic. The U-boat menace—and I want to be careful in what I say about this—is as great to-day as it was at any other time in the history of the war. The battle of Tunisia is not yet won; it is only beginning. I predict it will be a long and a hard battle, but it is a battle which must be won before there can be a successful opening of a second front in Europe. It may be months before Rommel is driven into the sea, as Mr. Roosevelt so graphically predicted the other night. Notwithstanding the magnificent, the marvellous progress of the Russian armies, the battle of Russia is not yet won. Our gallant Russian allies have not yet recovered all the territory that nazi Germany took from them in the summer of 1942. But I am happy, as I know we all are, to pay tribute to them for the magnificent victories which they have already won over German arms at Stalingrad and elsewhere, and to wish them godspeed on their way.

While it is all right to talk about the world that is to be after this conflict is over, and to begin now to plan to win the peace, I say with all the earnestness at my command: let us concentrate on winning the war; let us keep our eye on the ball; for winning the war is the first and foremost objective of this nation and of every other one of the allied nations. All other matters are in point of time and in substance relatively unimportant.

On this issue of the winning of the war the position of the party to which I have the honour to adhere is clear and unequivocal, and always has been, and please God always will be until the last gun is fired. I have proclaimed that objective many a time during the three sessions I had the honour of leading this party. From that objective I have never wavered and this party has never wavered. Recently at Winnipeg this party reaffirmed its position in the following words—I am going to put them on Hansard so that all who read may understand:

> We pledge to the men and women in the services at home, abroad and at sea, support to the limit of our resources, to the end that they shall be adequately supplied with reinforcements, equipment and munitions of war in order that they can and shall be so employed in cooperation with our fighting allies that Canada shall make her due and honourable contribution to a common and complete victory.

There is nothing equivocal about that. And further:

> Recognizing that the world struggle in which Canada is engaged requires a total war effort, we believe in compulsory national selective service, and that all those selected to serve in the armed forces should be available for service wherever required. We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry, and finance, as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about so far as human means can achieve it, an equality in sacrifice.

We stand by that declaration, Mr. Speaker, and by it this party shall be judged. We believe in the principles enunciated in those two paragraphs, and we commend them to the people of Canada.

With many of the topics raised in this debate, I have not time to deal, but I cannot refrain from making a brief reference to the speech delivered the other evening by my old friend the member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). What I shall have to say in this regard is said in all kindness and without intent to wound or to injure; I hope no word of mine will be constructed as having been so intended. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not in his place to-day.

First let me say that with many of the views which the hon. gentleman expressed, those, for example, relating to methods of government by order in council while parliament is in session, those relating to certain regimentations and forms of control, and especially those relating to the supremacy of parliament, I am in hearty accord. But I was much pained at what he said near the conclusion of his address, in what I believe was the main portion of his address, with respect to Canadian participation in this war. As I heard him I thought: This is isolationism in the nth degree, this is isolationism stark naked and unashamed, I wondered whether his views reflected those of his compatriots whom he represents in this House of Commons. If they do, then let us say good-bye to national unity in Canada; for it indicates a dangerous situation which must be faced by every one of us who loves Canada and desires to see it prosper, everyone who would like to see the two great races in this country go forward hand in hand to build up this country and have it do its full duty. If the views which he expressed are the considered opinion of the people who sent him here, there is not much hope for this nation. The school of thought which he represents in that connection is as far apart as the poles from the school of thought to which I adhere in this great conflict. I shall not say more in that regard, except that I regret the attitude on the part of the hon. gentleman, and I regret it the more if he represents any very considerable body of public opinion in his province and among his compatriots.

But, on reflection, I am not really surprised. As a student of public affairs I know, and we all know, that since 1917, for more than twenty-five years, he under the leadership of my right hon. friend taught his people day in and day out that Canada, if ever called upon to fight in battle, should think and fight only for her own defence and for her own salvation. That, I submit, is an unworthy attitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception to my hon. friend's statement when he attributes to myself a point of view such as he has just described. It is not correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am content to leave the matter to the judgment of history and the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So am I.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All I would add is that the Prime Minister has changed but my hon. friend the member for Richelieu-Verchères has not changed; and the chickens are coming home to roost.

I should like to refer briefly to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The minister made an able but, may I say, an ex parte defence of his administration in the agriculture department and the food situation in Canada. A calm reading of that speech will disclose many fallacies in his argument. I have only time to refer to one or two. On the question of shortages and surpluses I put this conundrum to the house after listening to the Minister of Agriculture; when is a surplus not a surplus? When is a shortage not a shortage?

Mr. GARDINER: Read the speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have read the speech. I did the hon. gentleman the honour, or—I will put it this way—I did myself the honour of listening attentively to his speech; I read it as well, and as I say, it was an able but ex parte exposition of his position. We really have only one great surplus in this country, and that is of wheat and other grains. We have no large surplus of butter, but we have a sufficiency. It is apparent that, for reasons, there is a shortage of beef, but I suggest that if the price ceiling policy of the government were not so sacrosanct there would be an ample supply of beef in this country.

What is happening? The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Mills) intimated the other day that there was a black market in beef.

An hon. MEMBER: He quoted the Globe and Mail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there a black market in beef? I know this, that if the wartime prices and trade board will allow the price of beef on the hoof to rise to twelve cents a pound there will be an ample supply for everybody. And why should not the farmer, the primary producer, who has gone for so many years without his fair share of the national income, now, at a time when there is an abundance of purchasing power in this country, get a fair return for his beef?

There is no shortage of butter, but the butter situation is spotty. There are shortages in some communities and surpluses in others. In my own province there is no shortage of butter, but a grave injustice is being done to one-half of the producers of butter in my province by reason of a system under which the price structure is being buttressed by the bonus system. Half the production of butter in New Brunswick is through the creameries, and half is home processed butter: the one is given the advantage of ten cents per pound bonus on butter fat, and the other class of producer is denied it.

An hon. MEMBER: Let them send their cream to the butter factory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I examined that position. How are you going to send your cream to the butter factory in a country which is filled with snow and where the roads are not ploughed? How are you going to divert channels of trade which have been built up for fifty years? Something has to be done to redress the grievance of half the butter producers in the province of New Brunswick, and if it is not done there will be trouble in store for somebody. The party across the floor was licked once on butter, and history might repeat itself. They are slipping, but they don't know it.

Mr. ROWE: I think they realize it now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to say anything more on that point, because I am just realizing how short my time is.

There is another topic, however, to which I desire to refer, and that is the man-power problem. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in his seat. It will be recalled that on March 23 of last year the Prime Minister, after voting down the amendment I had the honour to move in this house three or four weeks previously setting forth a substantive, affirmative motion which would lay down a definite principle for dealing with this question of man-power qua agriculture, industry and the armed forces, announced the establishment of the national selective service and defined its scope and policy. Coupled with that announcement, or at about the same time as that announcement was made, came the appointment of Mr. Elliott Little as director of national selective service. Mr. Little came to Ottawa amid the acclaim of the government and all the government propagandists. Most people, I fancy, thought that the government did have a real policy in relation to this vital question of man-power, and they were expecting to receive and ready to receive a definite lead on the question. I have no doubt that when Mr. Little came to Ottawa he too thought that the government had a policy. At all events I believe he entered upon his duties with the good will of everybody, including, if I may say so, organized labour itself. The next step in this tragedy of errors was the man-power speech which the Prime Minister delivered over the radio on August 19, in which he told of an extension of that policy. I quote his words:

. . . in order to put every competent man and woman to work in essential industry.

I believe I am correctly quoting him. Mr. Little went to work. We had a new minister of labour under and with whom Mr. Little was to work. I ask this question in view of the disclosures of last summer: How much help did Mr. Little get from his minister?

Mr. MITCHELL: All the help he wanted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All he wanted? Well, that is a question which is in the minds of many, and the minister's affirmation that he got all he wanted does not prove the case. Did Mr. Little have the full support of the administration and his minister? I put that query to this house. If one believes what Mr. Little says, he did not have it. Now, what did happen? The minister instead of staying and supporting Mr. Little took a jaunt to Europe and left his job.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think it is fair to say it was a jaunt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A trip to Europe, then.

Mr. MITCHELL: No more than my hon. friend's trip to Europe.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes; but I had not the responsibilities of the Labour department on my shoulders, and the minister had. I pause here to say to the minister that it was very natural, very human, that he should want to go to Europe after he had risen to the dignity of a privy councillor and Minister of Labour in this country. It was natural that he should want to go to his own home town.

Mr. CRERAR: Very necessary too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly it may have been for one reason, but I suggest to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who has interrupted me, that it was necessary that he should stay at home and work out the government's policy on national selective service, and that was not done. Mr. Little told the sad story in his lengthy memorandum made public on the return of the minister and on his resignation. I have not the time to go into all the details, but that statement shows conclusively that the man-power policy of the government as announced by the Prime Minister was a delusion. The government had no real policy.

If it had, it refused to give governmental direction, and that is one of the charges Mr. Little made against this administration; and what was called a man-power problem was really a man-power muddle. I am not coining these phrases; these phrases were coined by the oldest liberal journal of the maritime provinces, the Halifax Chronicle, in discussing this matter. And a muddle it has remained ever since. That is the consensus of opinion of the people of Canada.

The Prime Minister, so far as I can recall, has never made any statements publicly since the Little resignation. I was given to understand by press reports that he was having the memorandum studied by a group of experts. Recently, in the month of January, a report was published that the Prime Minister had sent the Minister of Labour a letter requesting detailed answers to nineteen pertinent questions relating to Canada's man-power situation. The minister the other day verified that statement, but tried to laugh it off by saying that it was merely a routine matter. Was the letter ever sent? If so, what were the nineteen questions and what were the answers? I do not know, as a matter of fact, that the letter ever was sent, but it would be a matter of tremendous interest to the people of Canada if they could see the questions and the answers. So far we have had very little enlightenment from the administration. Some slight hint, I am bound to say, of the attitude of the ministry was given by the Prime Minister in this debate, when he intimated in veiled language that it was not easy to transfer labour from one branch of industry to another in this country. But apart from that we have been kept in the dark, and I do say that elucidation of this whole matter should be given to the Canadian people. It should be brought out into the light of day.

True, we have a new national war labour board under Mr. Justice McTague, and I pause here to say that in my view, so far as the chairman is concerned, the government could not have made a better selection. I am not quite so certain about the other gentlemen. I am going to reserve judgment until we see what their performance is. My own view and, I believe, the view of public opinion in this country, is that the government refuses to deal realistically with this problem, one of the great problems before the nation. It has adopted a policy of hedge and compromise, and that has emasculated the whole selective service plan.

I am indeed glad to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in his place to-day, because I am concerned about the reinforcement position of our troops overseas.

For three years the Canadian army has been in training in the old land. It has not yet been in action. That is no fault of theirs. We are told that they are the best trained and equipped army in the world, and that is high praise. I hope it is true. I believe it is true in large measure, but the fact remains that they have not been in action, and when the testing time comes, as come it must, be it soon or late, this whole question of reinforcements for the fighting units of our army overseas becomes of paramount importance.

If the casualties are as high as they were at Dieppe, or even if they are half as high as they were at Dieppe, what is the position of reinforcements then? In the last war, I am assured, for every fighting man in the trenches it was the objective of the Canadian authorities to have one hundred per cent reinforcement man for man, so far as that was possible. That was the target aimed at; that was the objective. I do not say that it was always reached, but I am told by those who have knowledge of military matters that that should be the ratio. What is the ratio to-day? We have never been told and we should be told. The information should be given.

There are certain questions which I desire to put to the Minister of National Defence. I shall not expect him to answer them to-day or to-morrow. When the war appropriation bill is before the house I hope he will answer them fully, so that we, the people's representatives, may understand what the true position is. I believe it is in the national interest to put these questions to the minister, and that they should be answered, so that the house and the country may know exactly what the man-power situation is as it affects the armed forces.

In 1942 our army establishment consisted of an active army overseas, the home army, and the veterans' guard, and it was greatly increased in that year. We have now six divisions overseas and two in Canada—

Mr. RALSTON: Five.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought there were six. However, together they constitute a huge army for this little nation of eleven and a half million people. These are my questions:

1. What is the total establishment for these divisions (a) in fighting men, (b) in auxiliary units?

2. How is that establishment being maintained?

3. How many men have been requisitioned during the last fourteen months, say since January 1, 1942?

4. How many men have been actually received in the training centres in that period, (a) as volunteers for the active army overseas, and (b) draftees who have not volunteered?

5. How many men have been returned from overseas and discharged from the army because of disabilities and unfitness since the first division went overseas? I fancy the number is rather large and I am surprised at it.

6. What is the number and quality and extent of the training of the men who are sent to replace them?

I may tell the minister frankly, I have heard some disquieting rumours about the character and quality of the training of men who have been sent overseas as reinforcements and additions to the troops. I have heard that some of them had not completed their four months' basic training. I know that if they are not put into action at once they will complete their training in England, but I suggest that every man sent overseas in a reinforcement unit should have at least his basic training in Canada if that be possible.

7. Most important of all, what is the ratio of reinforcements or replacements, (a) overseas, and (b) in Canada, to the number of fighting men in the divisions overseas?

8. If the Canadian army goes into action in an invasion of continental Europe, how long can the present ratio of reinforcements or replacements be maintained under the present set-up?

9. What is the present position of voluntary enlistment?

10. In the event of Canada's army being engaged in large-scale action in Europe or some other major theatre of war, can its establishment on the present basis be maintained, at what rate and for how long?

These are searching questions. It is my conviction from what I have been told that if the Canadian army is engaged in any large scale action, say in an invasion of Europe, and the casualties are even half what they were at Dieppe, where I believe casualties and prisoners went as high as sixty-seven per cent, the ratio of reinforcements will be exhausted in a month. That may not be true, but I should like to know. If it be true, what then? It is our responsibility, I submit, to the men in the active army overseas, and to the people of Canada who are so magnificently supporting them, to get the facts and to be in a position to know and to urge upon the government appropriate action; for when the testing time comes these trained reinforcements will be needed and needed at once. And they must be trained men. Canada must not fail these men.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not like to ask the indulgence of the house, but there is one other matter with which I did want to deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank the house for its indulgence. I will not trespass too much on the good nature of the house in the days to come.

After three years Canada has done well in certain aspects of her war effort. I rather attribute that to the urgings and promptings and proddings that we gave to the government for three long years. I am proud of the little Royal Canadian Navy, even though it has not any capital ships. I know some of the personnel of that navy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have sunk a good many submarines.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I said I was proud of them, although they had not any capital ships. But you cannot run before you can walk, and you cannot walk before you creep. I am proud, very proud, of the contribution of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I think our greatest contribution in fighting capacity has been in the noble lads who have gone—I was going to say to every theatre of war—from the Royal Canadian Air Force. I saw them in action myself in England, and I know something of the character and temper of the men who are operating day in and day out at great danger to themselves. The casualty lists that come to us daily tell a more eloquent tale of their heroism than any words I could summon to my assistance.

May I say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that Canada is now in her stride in production, and any meed of praise that is coming to him personally he can have from me. But the greatest praise should go to private industry—and by private industry I do not mean only executives and management; I mean for the most part executives, management and labour. There have been bottlenecks in production; I know of some of them. At times I have known of bottlenecks in the production of aircraft. I have never splashed it on the pages of the newspapers, but I have taken the opportunity to write occasionally to the director of aircraft production, and he has been good enough to tell me of some of the troubles in connection with production.

I wish to deal briefly with this amendment of our socialist friends. I shall not read it, but I call attention to a phrase in the body of the proposed amendment in which the leader of that party refers to the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act and their application to war industries and financial institutions "in the same manner" what is the significance of those words—"as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service"? If he means in the sense that men have been bludgeoned into the active army overseas under false pretenses, I am not in agreement; for I know some of the methods that have been employed to get men to enlist as "volunteers" in the days gone by. I wish before this debate is over he would elucidate just what he means by that phrase. I am at a loss to know what he does mean.

Mr. COLDWELL: The meaning is obvious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it is. The truth of the matter is that there is nothing new in this amendment to the amendment. It is in effect a repetition of the principles underlying the policy outlined by the leader of the socialist party at the last session. But behind the principle enunciated by that amendment is his proposal that in the first two years after the war is concluded the government of this country shall spend five billion dollars to provide against unemployment. I suggest that that proposal is wholly political, that it is looking for the votes of the people. He does not tell us how that money should be raised or to what it should be devoted. It is the most colossal bribe ever offered to the people of Canada. The intention is to bribe the people with their own money; that is what that proposal means, at all events to me. Therefore it is wholly political.

Does the hon. gentleman think that government spending will cure unemployment? Let him look at recent history, not of this nation alone but also of Britain and the United States. It was tried in Britain and was condemned. Mr. Roosevelt tried it in the United States on a colossal scale, and it failed.

Mr. COLDWELL: What did you do in 1932?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We tried it on a minor scale and it failed. It will never work; government spending can never under our economic system take the place of private enterprise. It can help.

Mr. COLDWELL: How would you do it, then?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder if the hon. member heard President Roosevelt last Friday night, when he stated unequivocally that private initiative and private enterprise would supply employment after the war, and that if it could not take up the full slack, then congress by legislation and otherwise would devise ways and means of taking up the slack. That is the attitude of the greatest national leader of the United States since the time of Lincoln. But government spending is not the cure for unemployment—and, by the way, neither is the Beveridge plan. They are mere palliatives. It is an aid to private enterprise and private initiative, but it is in no sense a substitute.

I suggest that under any democratic system private enterprise is the only effective agency that can give full employment, and you cannot have private employment under a system of controlled governmental regimentation such as my socialistic friends visualize. You cannot have a successful system of private enterprise unless it is a system of free enterprise, controlled, if you will, against abuse and exploitation, but free to engage in useful production with the aid of governmental action and supervision.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Why has it failed so far?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has not failed. It has had its weaknesses; but your ipse dixit that it has failed does not prove that it has, and never will. Believing thoroughly in that system, I propose to vote against the subamendment.

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to address a word of welcome to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who is back in our midst to-day. All hon. members agree that he is a busy man. Sometimes we think he is too busy; certainly he does not consider his own physical welfare. From time to time he visits Kitchener, the city from which I come, but on those visits he moves so rapidly that one can scarcely see him for dust. Particularly is this so when he visits No. 3 training camp of the Canadian Women's Army Corps. His visits of inspection are always a source of inspiration.

In spite of the suggestion that all frills be eliminated from the debate, and that the usual congratulatory references to the mover and the seconder be dispensed with, nevertheless in view of the fact that this is my first speech from the floor of the house and that the mover and the seconder are members of the armed forces, I am sure that under the circumstances even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) will excuse me if I transgress in this respect. Both the mover and the seconder are to be congratulated upon their splendid and eloquent addresses. I think it was most appropriate that two soldier members of parliament should have been selected to fill so ably this important assignment.

A personal note about the mover, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) will, I hope, be permitted. On his recent return from overseas the hon. member had as his cabin mate a near relative of mine who is a captain in the Scots Fusiliers of Canada. He had not had the pleasure of meeting the hon. member prior to that crossing. Reports he gave me upon his return to Kitchener respecting the good character and high ideals of the man he had the pleasure of meeting and with whom he bunked only serve to bear out the earlier impressions the hon. member for Grey-Bruce has already made upon all hon. members of the house. Undoubtedly similar favourable reports as to the character and high ideals of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Hallé), who so ably seconded the motion, could be given by those from his native province who know him best.

Personally I am strongly convinced that the great body of men in the armed services who are fighting our battles should receive not only our unstinted praise and thanks for their great sacrifices, but as the opportunity presents itself should be further honoured by being placed in high positions in the government of our country. My suggestion in this connection is that Lieutenant-Colonel Merritt, V.C., of Dieppe fame, be named to fill one of the existing vacancies in the upper house. Surely a man of his type would be a valuable acquisition to the parliament of Canada, particularly in the post-war period when men of his calibre and courage can contribute so much to the stabilization which will then be so necessary.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is noted for progressive innovations, such as the appointment of the first lady senator. Who can doubt his wise choice in this connection? I am sure he will not consider it out of place if I make a suggestion which I feel will be equally progressive and popular with the people of Canada. I trust he will give this matter his early and favourable consideration.

Just a word about the riding of Waterloo North, which I have the honour to represent. It is the historic constituency which first sent our present illustrious Prime Minister to the House of Commons. He was born in Kitchener and it was from his native city that he first came to Ottawa to represent the good people of that great industrial and agricultural riding. As a small boy I well remember his first vigorous campaign there. If you will permit me to say so, Mr. Speaker, election fights of those days had a far more interesting rough and tumble tone and a far greater interest was manifested on behalf of the voters in exercising their franchise, than campaigns of recent years in which the radio is so extensively—perhaps too extensively—used. In passing I cannot help contrasting the elections of yesteryear with those of to-day, particularly municipal elections in which there is an alarming lack of interest on the part of the voters in the exercise of their democratic rights. I am told that in a municipal election recently in Toronto less than twenty-five per cent of those entitled to vote took the trouble to go to the polls. This general matter was recently given careful study by the council of Kitchener, and recommendations were made to the various governments in this respect. It is to be hoped that some remedy for this apathetic trend will be found at an early day.

To come back to Waterloo North, may I tell the house how proud the people of his native town were to have had the honour of first sending to parliament their native son, our present Prime Minister, and how proud they still are of his grand record of achievement in the many years of unselfish service he has given to his country since that time. Their justifiable pride is enhanced by the fact that he has a longer record of government leadership than the head of any other allied nation. As he himself said in jest the other day, "Prince Albert now has the best of representation". I can assure you Mr. Speaker, in all earnestness, that this opinion is shared by the good people of Waterloo North, who heartily concur in this jocular observation. Undoubtedly as time goes on some move will be originated in the Prime Minister's native riding, in which I hope the whole of Canada will be privileged to assist, to recognize suitably the fact that it was there he was born and it was there he spent his boyhood days.

The riding from which I hail has been the battleground of many hard-fought campaigns. I cannot let this opportunity pass without also paying tribute to the splendid service rendered to his country by my immediate predecessor, the Hon. W. D. Euler, former minister of trade and commerce and now a member of the upper chamber. In the discharging of his duties in numerous portfolios of government there was not a more conscientious or able minister. Others who have preceded me were Mr. J. E. Seagram and Mr. W. G. Weichel. It makes me very humble indeed and conscious of my great responsibility when I consider the men who have previously represented Waterloo North in this house.

Much has been said in this chamber during this debate about the plight of agriculture and the unhappy lot of the farmer in these strenuous war days. Fortunately the farmers in our district have developed mixed farming over the past years, to perhaps a far greater extent than in many other parts of the country, and therefore one perhaps does not see as much distress there as has arisen in other parts of Canada where a similar technique has not been developed to the same extent. It is gratifying to note that with the much larger shipments of hogs, cattle and dairy products from the west, along with the higher prices received for them, mixed farming is developing rapidly and continued improvement can be looked for throughout the country.

I have recently been in touch with members of the wartime prices and trade board and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in connection with the butter fat subsidy being paid to the producers of dairy butter. I am pleased to be able to say that while this matter was overlooked in the original butter fat subsidy, it is now being considered. It is hoped that announcement will be made soon and the plight of these farmers overcome, particularly in view of the fact that under the coupon system the farmers would receive coupons when they sold their butter, which coupons could be used as a basis for settlement so far as the subsidy is concerned.

I notice in connection with the beef shortage that it has been announced recently that freight subsidies will be paid in connection with the shipment of western cattle to the eastern market to relieve this shortage. These shipments will augment the supply of beef in the more thickly populated provinces of central Canada. This is an intelligent move and fine as far as it goes, but it appears to me from information I have gleaned from many farmer friends that this is only a palliative. They say that the beef shortage would be very quickly overcome if the price were set immediately at the May figure instead of registering periodical advances as the season progresses. Whether this will be done without puncturing the all-important price ceiling, I am not aware, but if it can be done I think it would be a tremendous relief so far as the beef situation is concerned.

Apart from any other benefits which would accrue, there are undoubtedly others worthy of consideration. First, shipments would be coming to the market before the ravages of the warble fly had reached peak proportions on winter stable-fed cattle. Second, the hides from these cattle would be freer from grub holes caused by the warble fly and as a result would be much superior to those hides taken off later in the season. They would produce leather and shoes much more suitable in quality for high-grade leather footwear for the armed forces. It is a well known fact that a serious hide shortage as well as a beef shortage is developing in this country, and unless steps are taken promptly to ensure a greater flow of cattle to the killing floors and an increase in imports, if necessary, of raw materials from South America, a situation will develop which will be most embarrassing so far as the providing of footwear to the armed forces is concerned.

While provisions have been made for postponement of military service for farmers and essential war workers, in the opinion of many these provisions did not go far enough. In order to ensure continuity of effort these postponements should be changed to exemptions, the future status to be changed only in case the present needs of the armed forces for farmers and war workers become more urgent than at present. By making this change our producers could plan a much better flow of war production than is now possible with farmers and war workers living in constant uncertainty.

I think most hon. members are interested in the controls and administrations that have been set up, and I would not be fair to the people of my constituency or to the people of Canada as a whole if I did not register their strong disapproval of some of the rulings of certain of the administrators who hold positions of war-time control. It is the general feeling that far too large a percentage of these temporary appointees are ruling with an iron hand and without consultation with those affected or with those who know the answers to their problems. They are entirely unmindful of the fact that in a democracy, for whose rights we are at present engaged in a life and death struggle, the people and their representatives are entirely disregarded and dealt with in a far too arbitrary manner.

Recently one of my constituents came to Ottawa to discuss a matter with one of the control officers. He was given a fair hearing but he was told that in no case would it further his cause to bring with him the representative of his constituency. I do not know whether other hon. members have had the same experience. None of us is looking for additional work in these strenuous days, but I do think that in matters in respect of which the member can be of help to his constituency, he should be allowed to go to see a controller or administrator.

There are far too many examples which might be cited at this time, but the outstanding regulation concerning which one hears perhaps the most violent objections is the fifty-mile bus limit regulation. The unnecessary inconvenience caused to many passengers, particularly those in the armed forces who are on leave and those in essential war industry, is in my opinion entirely unnecessary. If it is necessary to curtail further the use of gasoline and rubber, it has been suggested that the travelling schedules be amended by having fewer buses run, but let those which are running carry passengers to their destinations and eliminate the present practice of discharging them from the bus into snowdrifts or wherever they happen to be.

There is another matter which I think might very well be considered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). It is a ruling which I believe has greatly impeded our war effort. I refer to the extreme restrictions on the taxicab business in Canada. It may be argued that these restrictions are necessary in view of the shortages, but I strongly maintain that this branch of transportation should be one of the last to suffer so extremely. Surely the services it renders are more important than those rendered by many other forms of transportation, and I would urge the minister to reconsider this matter so that at least the taxicab operators can increase their fares to a level commensurate with the additional costs and present hardships.

In the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) recently I was pleased to note his assurance to this house that appointees in the various control departments would in the future to a far greater extent than in the past be responsible for their actions to their ministers and to parliament as a whole. This is a very welcome announcement and one which will be received by the people of Canada as a necessary and constructive development. I believe that the large majority of Canadian citizens appreciate the splendid work and many personal sacrifices which most of these gentlemen are making, and if the few cases are dealt with as the Prime Minister has suggested I think all reasons for complaint on this score will be quickly removed.

I want to say a word about the civil service. I think it is only proper that at this time we should pay high tribute to the civil service as a whole. I have come in contact with a great many members of the civil service, both here and in my travels throughout the country, and have noted not only that they are faithful in discharging their regular peace-time duties but that many of them, motivated by high patriotic principles of service, have willingly undertaken additional responsibilities. They are doing a splendid job, and many of them are discharging duties far beyond those of their original positions. But I think the time has come when we should not only pay tribute to the civil service but see that they are paid a proper remuneration for the work they are doing. Many of the civil service do not receive the cost of living bonus. These are matters which might be very carefully considered so that the civil service can get a much better break.

Coming to the speech from the throne, I see much in it to commend itself to the people of Canada. I cannot agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that it is an indefinite document. Personally I think it is clear and terse. It leaves no doubt as to what it means with respect to the various policies it mentions. I am pleased to note that it forecasts a further expansion of the Royal Canadian Navy. The remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury with respect to the Royal Canadian Navy may be considered, I think, as damning it with faint praise, but he tried to make up for that by saying later on that the navy had done a good job. In my observation, Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Navy has done a splendid job under the very able leadership of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). Undoubtedly the submarine menace is the greatest we have now to contend with. I believe that the navy and the merchant marine should be increased to the greatest possible extent so that we may have more and more ships not only to transport war supplies but to protect our own shores, and let us have these ships without delay.

The speech from the throne states also that parliament is to be asked to make further grants towards Canada's making her utmost contribution to the winning of the war. These are desirable and necessary, and no doubt will be cheerfully agreed to by all parties in this house.

I am also pleased to note, in spite of what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said, that the government is making further efforts to economize in other directions wherever economies are possible. Buildings and tracts of land temporarily required by the services should in my opinion in future be rented and not purchased. I am convinced that both large and small economies can still be effected which would ease considerably the lot of the overburdened taxpayer. I do not see the sense in purchasing many buildings for the different departments if we can get along by renting buildings. This trend towards buying new buildings should be carefully considered, and buildings should only be purchased where it is absolutely necessary to do so.

In a conversation recently with me the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) indicated that there was far too great a tendency for many departments of the government to place their financial requirements on his doorstep, on the assumption that they could readily and easily be taken care of. While the Minister of Finance and his capable aides have done a splendid job in achieving their various financial objectives, nevertheless I believe that their burdens in this connection should be eased to the greatest possible extent. The Minister of Finance is doing a splendid job and it is up to every spending body in the government and to every member of this house to support his efforts and those of his aides. I am convinced that if the spending departments not directly connected with the war effort will continue to make strenuous efforts to cut down unnecessary expenditures the tax burden will be very materially lightened.

I want to say a word about the pay-as-you-go income tax plan. I am glad to see that the speech from the throne contains the forecast that further measures will be introduced to alleviate the present situation in regard to outstanding income taxes accumulated from previous years. This announcement has been well received by all classes of the community. I have received a great many petitions from working people in my riding who to a man are favourable to having this change made in collecting the income tax. It is to be hoped that when legislation is brought down dealing with this matter no discrimination will be shown and that all taxpayers will receive the same treatment. I hope that the legislation will provide for complete cancellation of back taxes.

While I am on the subject of finance I wish to make a suggestion to the minister, and that is that when the new budget comes before us for consideration provision will be made for returning to the former method of collecting income taxes from employees through what was known as the national defence tax plan. I think some similar plan should be adopted now, because the present system is too complicated and too cumbersome, particularly for workers who are not accustomed to keeping books and accounts. I submit that a straight deduction in the form of the old defence tax, instead of the present complicated method, would materially reduce the serious trend towards absenteeism in essential industry, and that a greater incentive to stay on the job would accrue to the worker.

I cannot let this opportunity pass, Mr. Speaker, without congratulating the Minister of Finance and his able assistants upon the policies adopted by this government for price control and controlling inflation. That the policy pioneered by this government has been remarkably effective is indicated by the fact that from November 1, 1941, the high point prior to the imposition of the price ceiling, to December 1, 1942, the official cost-of-living index in this country has risen by a little more than two per cent, while in the United States, where controls have not been as effective as here, the corresponding increase has been nearly ten per cent. Compare this truly remarkable record with conditions that existed in the last war. The Canadian cost of living then rose in a similar period by more than twenty per cent. While one hears many fair and unfair criticisms of the government, it is regrettable that one hears so little of an achievement in price control which is truly outstanding, not only in Canada but in other countries, none of which has been able to surpass Canada's record, let alone equal it.

Just a word, in closing, about social security. The indication in the speech from the throne that a select committee from the house will soon be appointed to examine and report on questions of social and health insurance is timely, highly desirable and has met with public approval. I feel, however, that timely and desirable as these all-important objectives are, the winning of the war and the defeat of the axis powers with the utmost dispatch is still objective number one, and must be pursued with relentless determination. But I wish to congratulate the government upon having taken the initial steps to bring about a greater measure of social security for the people of Canada in the post-war period. This government has done much in the past to improve living conditions through progressive—I might say liberal progressive—legislation, such as unemployment insurance and other similar acts. And now, by the introduction of legislation which will provide in the final analysis a still greater measure of freedom from fear and want than has ever been experienced in the history of the country, it has shown its direct interest in and its ability to deal with such all-important subjects affecting the everyday life of our people, and at the same time to foster free enterprise and individual initiative. I am sure that such a measure will be well received by the people of our great country who share with me the basic belief that Canada, having demonstrated clearly through her production record in this all-out war effort and through the energy and resourcefulness of her people, that she can carry on and finance successfully, by the same token should be able in peace time to plan and produce so that all her citizens shall have the right to employment and to a share in the heritage to which they are so justly entitled.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): My first words in this house are words of thanks: thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, for the kindness you have shown me since I have been here; thanks to the hon. members of this house whom I have had the privilege of meeting in the course of the last two weeks, for their hearty welcome; thanks especially to the hon. members for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), who dared to come and help me during my recent electoral campaign; but thanks over and above all to the electors of Charlevoix-Saguenay for the magnificent support which they gave me on the 30th of November last.

I wonder whether all hon. members have a true knowledge of the constituency which I have the honour to represent. May I be allowed to give a short description of it so as to complete if necessary the information they already have?

If we look at the map we can see that it is the largest constituency in the dominion. It starts from Chateau Richer, a place situated fifteen miles below Quebec on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and it goes as far as Labrador, over eight hundred miles farther. It encloses all the northern part of the province of Quebec from the St. Lawrence to Hudson bay and Hudson strait.

I must tell the house that this very large area of our country has not yet been developed as it should have been, owing to lack of means of communication. In the western part, that is to say west of the Saguenay river, we have roads, and one railroad which goes as far as Murray Bay. In the eastern part, east of the Saguenay river, which is the larger area, we have just one road about a hundred miles long, as far as Comeau bay, and beyond that we have only the water and the air as means of communication.

I know, Mr. Speaker, having been informed by experts, that our country possesses great natural resources. There are huge water powers, rich mines, wonderful forests, and in numerous places the soil can be cultivated to great advantage. The best and probably the only way to provide this country with the necessary means of development would be to build a road along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. In this regard I wish to draw the attention of the government to the fact that the building of such a road would be very useful for the defence of our country and for the help of our allies; in fact it could be used to carry food and war materials to the Atlantic coast and to Newfoundland. Would it not be the safest way to provide the eastern military stations with the necessary equipment, food and war materials?

Furthermore, this road, which would be very useful for military purposes during the war, would also be immensely advantageous after the war. It does not happen very often that we have the opportunity of undertaking military works which will become necessary improvements after the war. The building of this road is one of them. That is why I urge upon the government that they consider this project and execute it as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to tell you that this constituency is inhabited by over 65,000 right-minded and peaceful people whose only desire is to devote themselves to their country and their families. They love this country which has been built up by their forefathers and to which they are loyal. They like the democratic system under which we are living and they want to keep it. They have fought in the past for the maintenance of their rights, their creed and their tongue, and having been successful in preserving them, having no attachment to any other part of the world, they are deeply rooted to the soil out of which they themselves, like their forefathers, have extracted their living, and they are not much interested in international disputes. They understand, however, that we are now fighting for the safeguarding of democracy, and they are willing to share the war effort in so far as it does not annihilate altogether their national patrimony. They believe that the right definition of democracy has been given by Lincoln, as follows:

> Government of the people, by the people, for the people.

They believe also that, as was expressed by Mr. H. E. Manning, K.C., a few months ago:

> The essence of democracy is respect for the rights of minorities. In their contempt for the rights of minorities lies the iniquity of totalitarian systems. Beware lest in the heat and stress of war we trample upon the rights of minorities. If we do we shall have cast away the thing for which lives are being sacrificed and fortunes squandered.

We believe also that if our efforts to-day must be directed towards the winning of the war, we must not forget that we have to prepare for the post-war period. The publication of the Beveridge report containing a programme for social security in Great Britain has aroused world-wide interest. In the United States the national resources planning board has placed a somewhat similar programme before President Roosevelt, calling for extension of social security measures. The technical adviser of the board, Mr. W. J. Cohen, recently said, commenting on the Beveridge report:

> If Great Britain during her life and death struggle can find the time to undertake during the course of the war a comprehensive evaluation of her whole social security system, then surely we can follow a similar course. It is becoming increasingly clear that an extended social security programme is as necessary to victory as is production of guns and ships.

The people of Charlevoix-Saguenay, like the people of the whole province of Quebec, desire earnestly the establishment of a true national unity throughout Canada, unity not only in words, but in facts, unity not only in war time but also in peace time. They want to remain what their fathers were at the time of the building of the confederation, that is to say, the partners of their English fellow citizens, and not their inferiors. They want to do their utmost to attain the object our fathers had in mind, the building of a great nation.

On this point, may I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to tell this house that we in Canada must at last attain our unity not in regimentation, but in a balanced, well-knit cooperative diversity. Otherwise our historic and present mission will not be fulfilled. Lord Tweedsmuir said five years ago:

> Canada can never be quite like her neighbour, and that is all to the good; for it means that she has a specific contribution of her own to make to North American civilization. I like to think of her, with her English and French peoples, as in a special degree the guardian of the great Mediterranean tradition which descends from Greece and Rome, and which she has to mould to the uses of a new world. I want to see her keep her individuality; for that is of inestimable advantage, not only to her, but to her neighbour.

If we, the members of this parliament, followed these wise admonitions, I am sure we would contribute to the settlement of many internal misunderstandings.

We must not forget, either, that we are here to participate, as representatives of the people, in the government of this country. But, looking around me, since I have been here, and trying to find out what we had to do, I came to the conclusion that most of our privileges had been vested in numerous boards and commissions. We have built up an enormous bureaucracy; we have administrators of every conceivable trade appointed by the wartime prices and trade board; we have controllers of every kind. We have different boards and different administrators giving conflicting orders and conducting duplicated and triplicated investigations of the same thing, and we have an immense amount of red tape. What is worse, many of these administrators and controllers are young men without experience, and are the real makers of the laws of this country.

Think of it just a moment, and see if it is fair and reasonable that our whole economic system should be in the hands of these dictators. The people of this country are not satisfied with this state of things, and the government should bring in the necessary corrections.

Even if our efforts and our energies must be directed towards the winning of the war, we must not forget that we shall have to live again in this country after the war. We must, if our political system has failed to bring us all the satisfaction we wanted, do our utmost to improve the situation. This is the reason why, in September 1941, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Gaspé, a few hundred people, from all parts of the province of Quebec and from all ranks of society, met in Quebec and adopted the following resolution:

> This meeting expresses the wish that the efforts of the people of Canada in this war be rewarded with success; and this gathering prays the Almighty to stand by our armies and those of our allies in order that a definite victory be achieved.
> Our country will then enjoy a lasting peace which will favour the full development of the vital forces of the various technical groups and will foster an intimate collaboration among them, this to be achieved in a spirit of constitutional liberty and social justice; thus paving the way to the creation of a truly and exclusively Canadian nation.

This resolution contains a real programme which could and should be accepted by all true Canadians.

Before closing my remarks in English, I cannot refrain from referring to a declaration made the other day by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which was reproduced in big headlines by some newspapers. He was referring to the sinking of enemy submarines by Canadian corvettes. Addressing himself to members sitting in this corner of the house he was asking us if we were not proud that a corvette manned by Canadians and bearing the name of the city of Quebec was able to sink an enemy ship on the waters of the Mediterranean. As this argument did not press upon me very strongly, I really could not prevent myself from smiling. It was then that the Prime Minister added:

> Yet at this critical time, of all times, hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite find it necessary to separate themselves from colleagues in their province in order to support an isolationist view with regard to the war effort of Canada! Their action does credit neither to themselves, nor to their province or to our country.

I thought at the time he was addressing himself to the hon. members sitting to my left, but the following day I noticed in the papers that my name was connected with those of the members for Beauharnois-Laprairie and for Beauce, and therefore that the public was under the impression that I too was pointed at as supporting an isolationist view.

I must state, first, that I am not associated with the hon. members who recently formed this new political group called Le Bloc Populaire, and I have not to come to their defence. But speaking for myself I wish to say that I have no lesson of loyalty to receive from anybody, because during the last war, instead of travelling through the United States, I enlisted at the age of nineteen in the Royal Air Force. I went and served overseas and I came back with my commission of lieutenant in the imperial army. To-day my only son, who is twenty years of age, student at law at Laval university, voluntarily enlisted two years ago in the Canadian Officers' Training Corps. I think that settles the question.

Furthermore I found it very peculiar to hear the Prime Minister speak about isolationists. I wondered whether he did not remember what he and his colleagues had been telling the people of the province of Quebec during the last twenty-five years. I do not hesitate to declare that considering the attitude taken by the Liberal party during this period of time, no member of this party has the right to accuse anyone from the province of Quebec of being an isolationist.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, even if I could speak English as readily as French, I would make it my duty, on the occasion of my first speech in the house, to say in French what I have to add to my previous remarks, in order to stress the officially bilingual character of the house.

A few moments ago, I enumerated the reasons why the electors of Charlevoix-

Saguenay have put their trust in me, on November 30 last, and I wish to complete this statement.

First, my election constitutes an evident proof that the citizens of the province of Quebec refuse to support either of the two older parties. After forsaking the Conservative party, they long held to the hope that the Liberal party would guarantee the accomplishment of their legitimate yearnings. They honestly and loyally put their trust in the leaders of the Liberal party in their province of Quebec, who strongly condemned the Conservative external policy and promised that a just and fair solution would be found to the internal problems; they now realize to what extent they have been deceived.

After having, for 75 years, been tossed between "reds" and "blues" with the only result of serving as stepping stones to power, and without any advantage to themselves, they have become wary and, although not sure of the political orientation they will ultimately adopt, they have decided, for the present, to support men, who, having broken with old ties, can offer them guarantees of sincerity and above all, unselfishness.

If the citizens of the province of Quebec have reached this point, which I may call a strategic turn in their political history, it is because they have understood that their representatives in the past had been but a minority in both old parties and had been incapable of upholding their interests and, unfortunately, too often unequal to the task.

The French Canadians intend to play the part assigned to them in both political fields of the country. In the dominion field they want the spirit of the confederation pact maintained. They ask for no more, but they are insistent on this point.

Is there, in this whole country, a single man who could honestly claim that in the dominion government, the French Canadians get their rightful share? And is not this truer than ever since we have resorted to be governed by commissions? Let us review the list of these dictators who presently control the economic life of Canada, without any responsibility to the people through their representatives, and let us examine whether the French Canadian element gets its rightful share.

I do not claim that the solution of this problem lies in the granting to French Canadians of a few positions in the civil service or in the various dominion departments. This matter goes much deeper.

What is needed is that, through actual and active sharing of responsibilities by French Canadians in the government of the country, our whole economic set-up should show plain evidences of the dual character of our institutions rendered necessary by the two racial elements making up the Canadian nation.

They want the representation in this house to be proportionate to the populations of the various provinces, as provided by the confederation pact. In my opinion, the government should, at this session, introduce a bill to effect such a redistribution of the electoral seats. Otherwise, we shall once again tear up another section of the confederation pact.

They claim that Canada, in its international relations, should be guided solely by the interests of its inhabitants; not as has so often been the case in the last 50 years, by the interests of some other nation.

They realize that Canada is an American country and that as long as its leaders endeavour to manage its international affairs as though it were European, they will never attain the object intended by the Fathers of Confederation.

They also claim that Canada should assume its proper place in the Pan-American Union and thereby reap all the privileges enuring from association with natural allies.

Indeed, whether we want it or not, in spite of the ready communications, which have lately brought all the nations of the world so much closer together, it remains true, nevertheless, that on each side of the Americas, there are oceans which will always have to be reckoned with, especially when we consider that, at the start of the present war, a 20-mile-wide channel has been enough to halt the ravaging hordes of the German dictator.

In the same train of thought, I take this opportunity to state that we are wondering why we are still allowed to have our legal problems solved by the Privy Council in London. The right of appeal to the Privy Council constitutes, in my way of thinking, a vestige of the former domination of the mother country over her colonies and I feel that this right of appeal should be abolished.

In the provincial field, I repeat what I said a few moments ago: all that the French Canadians want is the enforcement of the confederation pact. Unfortunately, jurists and politicians have not always been of a mind as to the proper interpretation of the British North America Act, respecting the relations between the provinces and the central government.

Two theories have been vigorously upheld. There are some who claim that the central government has precedence over the provincial administrations; they take the view that the confederation act is an act passed by the Imperial government and accepted by the contracting parties; the others say that it is a contract based on an agreement concluded by the provinces in 1867. This last theory has been brilliantly defended by a number of legal and political lights; it has even been accepted, in a certain measure, by the courts of law, at different times.

In the course of an enquiry held by a parliamentary committee, in 1935, to consider ways and means of amending the constitution, certain opinions have been expressed from which I shall quote the following extracts:

Hon. Mr. Veniot: Confederation is not based entirely on the Quebec resolutions.—

Mr. W. S. Edwards (Deputy Minister of Justice): I know.

Hon. Mr. Veniot: Because the Quebec resolutions make provision for certain jurisdiction on the part of the provinces which at the time of confederation when the act was passed in Great Britain were not included; for instance, jurisdiction with regard to immigration, and certain other matters such as fisheries were given to the provinces by the Quebec resolutions. When the Act of Confederation passed these were transferred to the dominion; and further than that, it must be understood I maintain that it was a strict agreement between the provinces.—

And Mr. Edwards added:

I agree with you, that it was an agreement.

Although I believe that the right of appeal to the Privy Council should be abolished, I am evidently not questioning the ability of the legal gentlemen sitting on that court. So that I have no hesitation in seeking a solution for our outstanding problems of the moment in the opinions which they have expressed. In this manner I have found in the rulings of the Privy Council arguments in favour of this second proposition regarding relations between central and provincial authorities.

In the case of John Deere Plow Co. versus Wharton there is mention by the Privy Council of a political agreement.

In the reference of the Initiative and Referendum Act, the Privy Council states that the constitution of Canada was adopted in 1867 by the Imperial Parliament in order to give effect to the wishes expressed in the resolutions adopted at the Conference of Canadians held at Quebec in October, 1864.

In the case of Edwards versus Attorney General for Canada, the Privy Council, referring to the B.N.A. act, mentions that it is a case of compromise.

Again, in the reference concerning Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, the Privy Council once more mentions a political compromise.

Another theory has been put forth in recent years, known as the theory of Institution, and here is what an eminent Dominican sociologist, Reverend Father Delos, has to say about the definition given by Georges Renard:

An institution, says he, is the result of a communion of men in an idea, it constitutes the body, the reality, the being born of this communion. An idea to be realized, a purpose, "establishing solidarity between them who entertain it together or successively"; a community of purpose arising between contemporaries and successive generations. An institution, again according to Mr. Renard, is an idea supported by appropriate ways and means of eventual establishment, of realization, through the assumption of shape and objective being. . . . It entails the giving of an internal statute and organisms permitting external action, a coming into being as a social body enjoying internal life and external activity.

This doctrine has been upheld by men whose functions afforded them more than most others opportunities for a close study of the mechanism of the British North America Act. I would quote the opinion given by a journalist, Mr. Léopold Richer, which is to be found on page 125 of "Notre problème politique":

We regret that up to the present our jurists should have offered commentaries on our national constitution which on the whole are rather superficial, oftentimes even of a controversial nature. It is not sufficient to state that our constitution is a legislative act; its nature, its finality and its origin must also be accurately defined. Nor is it sufficient to contend that the British North America Act does or does not constitute a contract or to dispose of the matter in a few pages.

But, for practical purposes, I am convinced that we are bound to conclude that the Canadian confederation was established, following an agreement between the various provinces and that, consequently, we must always consider the legitimate aspirations of each group forming the constituent elements of the dominion.

Although each province is interested in safeguarding its rights and privileges as conferred by the British North America Act, for the province of Quebec it is of essential and paramount importance. As a matter of fact, the history of the province of Quebec begins 100 years before that of the other provinces. We cherish special traditions; our culture does not spring from the same sources and our civil law differs from that of the other provinces. We have, therefore, a very special ethnical character and that is why the citizens of Quebec are so anxious to safeguard the autonomy of their province at all costs, so that they may keep what they cherish above all else and thus avoid, in another field, useless arguments and dissensions.

Unfortunately, in the last few years, and especially since the beginning of the war, this provincial autonomy has been severely assailed.

Under the urgency of war, the dominion government has passed a number of laws curtailing the activities of the provinces to a large extent. We are often told that this centralizing policy is of a temporary character only; however, I must frankly admit that this statement, in itself, does not constitute, in my opinion, a sufficient guarantee of an eventual return to normal conditions at the close of the war.

For these various reasons, the citizens of the province of Quebec, fearing, more than ever, that their provincial autonomy might disappear, are averse to supporting the old political parties who have both, each in its turn, shown tendencies toward centralization.

Once more, I say that they wish to cooperate with their English-speaking fellow-citizens. They are ready, as they were in 1867, to extend to them a loyal offer of cooperation in the erection of a great nation. They claim, with reason, that cooperation between the various elements of our population, when properly understood, does not mean assimilation, but the very opposite.

In conclusion, I ask my English-speaking fellow-citizens not to judge the ideals actuating the citizens of Quebec from reports that are too often fantastic. I believe these ideals are perfectly and briefly described in the following few sentences taken from the concluding remarks of a lecture given by Father Lionel Groulx, at the Monument National, in Montreal, on September 16, 1942:

> Let us re-create our economic, political and national solidarity. Yes, doubtless, we form only a small, a very small people. We are reminded of this fact often enough, at the present time, when we are ceaselessly told that minorities have to submit to the harsh rule of majorities. But we know that, in the eyes of God, nations are not valued by their material, political or military strength, but by the nobility of their souls. And our faith, as well as our history, teach us that, in heaven, there is a merciful and generous Providence for the small nations who have the strength to accomplish their mission.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks this afternoon I wish first to associate myself with hon. members who have extended hearty and well deserved congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The efforts of these hon. members was an outstanding example of having the right men in the right place, saying the right things. Those hon. members not only represent vital civilian communities in the dominion, but are representative of the Canadian forces who to-day in the different theatres of war are fighting for liberty.

I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the house by going into any detailed description of the commendable progress made by the Canadian people in their war effort. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and many other hon. members in their speeches have given factual and detailed analyses of our war effort. I am sure every hon. member and each intelligent person across the country knows the history of our successful programme, and I am equally sure each is proud of it. It is an achievement whereby, in four short years, Canada has been transformed from a state of military unpreparedness to the third greatest arsenal of the world. Not only is this a splendid achievement by the people of Canada, but it stands as a lesson to the whole world, because it reveals that we must have had first-class management by the ministers in charge of our war programme. Our war effort has given evidence of Canada's unlimited resources, and has shown the willingness and ability of our people to utilize our resources for the nation's good.

If we were to accept what we read in some parts of the press, and what we hear in some speeches both in and out of the house, we would think there was much disunity in Canada in connection with the carrying out of our war effort. I believe if we survey the facts any such idea will be driven from our minds. We will find that in every province of Canada thousands of our young men have enlisted voluntarily and have shown their willingness to serve in any theatre of war. Then, we must not forget the part played by our brave women, some of whom have left lucrative secretarial and clerical positions in order to enter industrial plants for the purpose of releasing young men for the armed forces. Then, comparatively old men, men beyond middle age, men who experienced the hardships and horrors of the last war, are voluntarily standing in arms to defend our shores. Men and women are giving freely and generously, not only of their savings but of their earnings. These offerings amounting to huge sums are given to assist Canada in her gigantic war effort. We find to-day that the taxpayers are accepting without murmur the burdens which are placed upon them by way of taxation and which, as the war goes on, will become greater and greater. We find that our people are not complaining about the restrictions and rationing which are important elements in our war effort. To-day the housewife is obliged to accept inferior substitutes for commodities which were available in peace time. She has had to deny herself the use of certain utensils which would make her work easier and more expeditious.

The travel of business men and pleasure seekers has been reduced to the minimum, but we hear very little murmuring about this. In many instances the present volume of business of industrial employers is only a fraction of what it was prior to the war. Many of these men—there are some in my constituency—have been obliged to fold up but we hear very little complaining.

Does this indicate disunity? What does this generosity, this tolerance, and this willingness to pay indicate? Does it not reveal that our people are intelligent and that they realize that the winning of the war is the all-important thing? Does it not reveal that they realize that their money would be no good if we were overrun by the hun? They realize that the sacrifices and inconveniences which they are suffering to-day are as nought compared with the serfdom, tyranny and butchery to which they would be subjected if our allied forces did not succeed in turning back those who would be world dominators. All these things show clearly that our people are united, and show that they are capable of cooperating with the other powers to carry on this great effort. I believe that when the history of the world is written one thing that will stand out among the records of all countries is that in proportion to population Canada has contributed more to this war effort than any of our allies.

We hear sometimes that there is a lack of preparedness for the aftermath of this war. I believe, and I imagine almost every Canadian believes, that while the successful prosecution of this war should be uppermost in our minds, we must have some thought for the day when the thousands of men and women now employed in industrial work revert to their peacetime pursuits. There must be some planning for that time. Prices will drop from the dizzy heights of war time down to the lower and stable levels of peace time. We must plan if we are going to avoid the terrible depression which we experienced after the last war, some of the pangs of which were almost as bad as anything we have experienced during this war and many of the results of which have not entirely disappeared.

Has our government taken any notice of this? What do we find? Three months after war was declared in 1939 this government established the wartime prices and trade board. We all know the effect of that. As a result of the control there has been over prices we are not looking to-day on the disgraceful spectacle we witnessed in the last war when men grew fat on the sacrifices and blood of the nation. The government has been doing a little planning all along. Take, for instance, the land settlement act. We all know what a failure the former act was. It was nothing more or less than a racket, but under the amendment, which is remedial in character, security is now accorded to the settler and he knows that he will be sustained on his land. The present regulations provide that the land must be up to a certain standard of production and that the man who goes on the land must have some experience as a farmer. In fact, it does the very thing the old scheme failed to do, namely, put the right man on the right farm.

There are also the compulsory reemployment regulations. These were introduced by the government during the last war. It may be difficult to figure out just how effective they will be in the solution of the unemployment problem, but they will help to solve that problem. There is also the Unemployment Insurance Act, a remedial measure to provide for our unemployed. Without doubt the coffers will be full after this war is over, and at least some temporary relief will be provided for the unemployment situation.

All these things go to show that the government has been planning from the inception of the war for the aftermath of the war. We who have faith in our Prime Minister, we who have faith in our government are happy to learn of this splendid forecast of future planning. We hear a great deal about planning for the future and about planning for social and economic security. In the flood of literature which the post-war economic problem has engendered there is some that is constructive and far-reaching in scope, but if we examine it all closely we find that much of it is doctrinaire and speculative.

If we are going to talk about economic security we should know what it means. There is a great difference, and we must differentiate between what is government regulation and what is cramping and regimentation. Judicious regulation is splendid, but rigid regimentation which cramps and stultifies is quite different, and I would say that the government in taking charge of matters which will be conducive to economic security had better limit itself to doing the things that private enterprise cannot do and leave private enterprise free to do what the government itself cannot do. There is no doubt, and I think we have a good example of it in our own government, that a government can create an environment in which economic progress can be accelerated; but, on the other hand, regimentation stultifies the whole process of economy. What we want is a balance between the two; and if ever we needed a balance in this Canada of ours, if ever it was needed in this world, it is now when the ship of state is riding on such a stormy sea. I have every confidence that the government, which has carried on its war programme in such a splendid and commendable way and made such a success of it, even while planning for the problems of the post-war period, will see to it that in its planning for social and economic security a proper balance will be maintained between government enterprise and private enterprise. I have every faith that after this "red" reign is over, our democracies will become much stronger as a result of their common experience, and that when they enter the council chamber of the world Canada will take a prominent part and will cooperate with her allies in regard to peace measures just as splendidly as she has cooperated with them in the prosecution of the war to victory.

I do not wish to be considered too regional, but I have a few local matters which I wish to submit to the government, and I will cite them now so that if the ministers directly concerned are not at the moment in the house they will be able to read my remarks in Hansard. On several occasions I have brought these local matters to the attention of the various ministers.

First, I would ask the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) to consider a matter which I have brought to his attention before. I refer to the establishment of an airport in the vicinity of Port Hawkesbury. We have there a large tract of land, and the topography and soil make it in every way suitable for an air base. It is on the direct route of the Trans-Canada airway. In the last couple of months there have been incidents which might cause the minister to look upon this suggestion favourably. Within one month four planes have crashed in that neighbourhood, and on each occasion the planes hovered over that area attempting to find a landing place. An emergency landing field at Port Hawkesbury not only would be of benefit to war planes, but after the war would be a splendid emergency landing field for commercial planes.

I would ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) to consider seriously the establishment of a naval port at Port Hawkesbury in the strait of Canso. I have before me a resolution from the town of Port Hawkesbury pointing out what must appeal at least to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. The whereases in the resolution are as follows:

1. Our harbour is such that ships of all sizes are afforded safe anchorage.

2. The property already surveyed has already a sea wall established which gives a sufficient frontage and depth of water that will enable ships to lay to in safety.

3. Railway facilities adjoin the property, a siding being already established.

4. Fresh water for supplying ships easily available from an artesian well already established.

5. Gas, fuel oil as well as aviation gas storage tanks also established near the property operated by the Imperial Oil Company.

6. Grounds surrounding site could easily be made available for drill, etc.

7. Marine railway with machine shop available here which should be of priceless value during the present crisis.

8. The serious economic situation prevailing in our county and considering the fact that no benefits have accrued on account of war activities should, we think, be a deciding factor.

9. We as a committee offer our services in any way we could be of assistance in helping during these trying times.

10. The old-established firm of boat builders is situated close by, where any necessary repairs could be effected.

We submit these facts with the hope that your decision will result in our having established here a base that will be practicable from every point of view.

I have on several occasions spoken to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) about the development of a magnetic iron ore deposit in the district of Glencoe in my constituency, and I would again ask him now to give this matter a little more consideration. We have also a deposit of tungsten in the northeastern end of Margaree district. I hope the house will pardon me for trespassing on its time in bringing these matters to the attention of the various ministers, but it is difficult at times to consult them in their offices. I would ask them to give these projects further consideration because I believe they would all be of great value in our war effort and, further, I think some recognition should be given of the splendid contribution which has been made to the war effort by the people of my constituency who, proportionately, have contributed as much as, if not more than, the people of any other constituency.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) upon the splendid recovery he has made from his recent serious accident. I am sure it is a great testimony to the skilful services which he has received from members of my profession in the city of Ottawa.

May I also congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his selection of a distinguished soldier to fill the position of Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche).

The minister has made a number of patriotic speeches which have appealed to a large number of Canadians and with which I am personally heartily in accord. I am sure he will bring to this house a great deal of valuable assistance in the carrying out of our work.

I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that some form of health insurance is forecast to be dealt with during the present session. It will be recalled by many hon. members that on several occasions during 1941 and 1942 I brought in an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act with the object of securing information upon which the government could base a national health insurance bill. I believe they have benefited by the suggestions I made, in that they have gathered a great deal of information which I understand is now ready to be presented to the select committee which has been appointed, and from which I hope a suitable measure of health insurance will emerge.

Might I recall to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) the circumstances under which that great statesman Sir John A. Macdonald adopted the name "Progressive Conservative." There were in Upper Canada the High Tories, under Sir Allan Napier MacNab, and the Moderate Conservatives under Mr. Macdonald; and then there were the Moderates and the Clear Grits. The Clear Grits were so called by their leader Mr. George Brown because, he said, they were all sand and no dirt—clear grit all the way through. The continual uncertainty of government with so many parties led Sir John Macdonald, on February 9, 1854, to attempt an enlargement of his party, when he stated:

> Our aim should be to enlarge the bounds of our party so as to embrace every person desirous of being counted as a Progressive Conservative.

He succeeded speedily in his objective. Almost the only opposition in Upper Canada was from George Brown's Clear Grits, who later on changed their name to the "Reform" party; but a few of that party were dissatisfied with Mr. Brown, and they became the Baldwin Reformers, and ultimately emerged the Liberals. To-day we have the Hepburn Liberals and the King Liberals, and in this house we have been watching the gradual disintegration of the Liberal party. The first to break away was the Canada party in the southeast corner, formed by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). Then there was formed the Bloc Populaire, headed by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). There is still a rump of this party who have not as yet crossed the floor of the house but who broke away from the Prime Minister on Bill No. 80 of last session, to amend the National Mobilization Resources Act, 1940. Then there is the group of some forty Liberals led by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), to whom the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred this afternoon. We are not quite certain as to the present position of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. Is he still a follower of the Prime Minister or not, and where do these other forty men who joined him stand now?

According to the Prime Minister, however, the Progressive Conservatives have still another crime to answer for, namely, that of having frequently changed our leader. I say to him that this is the best proof that we are a truly democratic party, whereas the only way in which the members of his party can register their dissatisfaction with his leadership is by breaking away and forming the new groups to which I have just referred.

May I remind the Prime Minister that the choice of Mr. John Bracken as our leader was the logical outcome of the policies adopted at the Winnipeg convention, which were perhaps partly inspired by the meeting at Port Hope. What better proof could the Canadian people have of the sincerity of our intentions to put these progressive policies into effect than the selection as our leader of a man whose very name is symbolic of all that we stand for. What he has accomplished over a period of twenty years in the way of progressive legislation and good government in Manitoba, those who know him believe he will succeed in doing in a larger field for the good of all.

I wish to speak for a moment about the seriousness of the farmers' plight. It has already been emphasized by a number of hon. members during the last few days. In my opinion the farmers are the backbone of the country and they have certainly had a raw deal. One-third of the total cost of living is for the food which the farmer produces. Although there is a demand, on account of the war, for all he can produce, he is prevented from making a fair profit which would enable him to pay some of his accumulated debts—perhaps the mortgage on his farm—to improve his equipment and repair his buildings. Farmers work longer hours and receive less return for their labours than anyone else. The increased difficulty they are finding in securing labour, even at a cost two or three times as much as it was at the beginning of the war, makes it hard for them to carry on even without a profit, and has forced a great many farmers in Ontario, and I am sure elsewhere, to abandon their farms. Old-established herds of dairy cattle have been dispersed, and the farmers have had to sell their implements, often at a loss, and abandon their farms because they cannot possibly carry on as a result of lack of labour, and in addition, through lack of ability to make both ends meet. All of this would have been avoided had the government courageously adopted compulsory selective service in 1940. Thirty-one per cent of Canada's population consists of farmers whose average annual income in the fifteen years prior to 1940 was one thousand dollars. To-day the farmer's least experienced helper can leave him and get work in a munitions factory for double the wages which the farmer can afford to pay.

In this country, the primary industry of which has been farming, we have had bacon, beef and butter shortages. These shortages have been explained by the necessity of sending large quantities of these products to England. This, in my opinion, is a very unfair excuse. Surely, in a great agricultural country like Canada, if we had had proper planning there would have been ample supplies, not only for Great Britain but for ourselves, without rationing.

I wish to say a word about nutrition. In a letter from the Prime Minister, published as an advertisement in the press under the heading "Canada's nutrition programme", we are told that every effort has been made by the government to ensure that, despite war conditions, there shall be an adequate supply of essential foods for all our people. But the speech from the throne speaks only of exploring the farm situation. These two statements do not tally. Exploring will not give the working man a lunch-pail with good beef sandwiches made with buttered bread, or a good rasher of bacon for his breakfast. These things he is at present unable to get in spite of the nutrition programme heralded by the Prime Minister. What use is it to tell people what nutritious food they should eat when they are unable to procure this food? It is on a par with another government advertisement from the salvage department asking housewives to save fats, and thereby assist in providing forty million pounds of needed fat, when they cannot buy bacon or pork and only a limited amount of beef from which they could secure such fat. It does not quite make sense.

Since bread is still the staff of life, it is highly desirable in these days, particularly when there is a food shortage, that we should see that all our citizens get bread, but bread of the highest nutritional value, especially in so far as essential vitamins are concerned. May I suggest to the government that they establish still another control, and make it illegal for bakeries to offer for sale more than the two types of bread which meet this requirement, namely, first, vitamin B, white bread, Canada approved, and second, whole wheat bread. As to the respective food values of different kinds of bread, the public are hopelessly at sea, and since it is in the national interest that our citizenry maintain a high standard of health and efficiency by eating the most nutritious foods, this can be assured them only by making it impossible for them to purchase any other kind. The most nutritious breakfast cereal is the old-fashioned coarse oatmeal upon which our Scottish ancestors were brought up, and yet it seems a strange circumstance that one cannot buy coarse oatmeal in any grocery store in Ottawa or Toronto, so I am informed. One can, however, secure this oatmeal in feed stores at six cents a pound, and it is not only a nutritious food but the most palatable of all breakfast cereals.

There are a great many prepared foods made and put on the market. Many emanate from Battle Creek and other places, and the only value in them is that they act as a vehicle to convey real food in the form of cream or milk to the individual who eats them. Nevertheless, on account of the tremendous amount of advertising, they have not only fooled the public into purchasing them as beneficial food but have made huge fortunes for those who invented them.

Growing dissatisfaction about food shortage has resulted in a demand made in this house by several members for a ministry of food. While I agree that something should be done in this regard, I do not agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), or the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should fill this post. Shortage of food for civilian consumption in this great agricultural country constitutes a national emergency of the first magnitude. It has been emphasized over and over again that one of our greatest contributions to the war should be supplying foods to Great Britain and our allies as well as to the countries of Europe and Africa which will soon, I hope, be liberated from nazi domination. It is hardly necessary to say that this food scarcity is the result of a shortage of farm labour, and this in turn has been caused by the muddling of man-power by a government which I fear thought more of its political future than of the welfare of the country, and refused to face the issue of compulsory selective service. This manpower muddle called forth from Mr. Elliott Little. the former director of selective service, the statement to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred this afternoon, namely, that in the fourth year of war we find ourselves with no clear direction from the government on man-power policy, and with quite inadequate organization to achieve a total and balanced war-power effort.

The resignation of Mr. Charles Vining from the wartime information board causes one to reflect upon the type of information which would be of the greatest value to us in the United States. Most of us recall that after the last war the question of war debts owing to the United States was used as a reason for isolationism. We know there is a great deal of criticism of Canada in the United States owing to the refusal of our government to send draftees for service wherever the enemy is to be found, whereas in the United States, after Pearl Harbor, this was immediately put into effect. This criticism has been accentuated as the war goes on and will place Caanda in an unfavourable position at the peace table if it continues.

Is it fair to our war industries, to our farmers, or to our forces to continue this vacillating policy of political expediency when our very existence is imperilled? Farmers are asked to produce more food this year than they did last year; yet they have more difficulty with labour this year than they had last, and therefore, I fear, they will be able to produce much less. One cannot turn farm production on and off like an electric current by turning a switch. No amount of manpower can produce sides of bacon in less than a year. Although operating a farm I speak for a city constituency, which will be the first to suffer from a food shortage. The city consumer therefore is vitally interested in the farm labour problem. The city consumer includes workers in our industries, and they as well as the soldiers and airmen need an abundance of food. Does not the cutting of the army ration by twenty-five per cent recently indicate that we are close to a serious shortage of food? This problem must be met and met immediately if the situation is not to deteriorate still further and if we are not to let Great Britain and our allies down. It gets back to the problem of our having two armies, one overseas and the other of home defence draftees, which again is the result of the government's unwillingness to impose compulsory selective service.

I therefore suggest as an emergency measure that all those draftees in the home defence army who will not go active be put into a labour battalion, distributed among the farmers on April 1 next and remain on the farms until the crop is harvested in the fall. At the present time they constitute a waste of manpower; they are not helping to win the war; but in a labour battalion, helping in the production of food, they would be usefully employed in a war industry. If by any chance there are more than enough to supply the farm needs, the surplus could be used in some other war industry, but since our farms are said to have been drained of 250,000 men I doubt whether there would be much of a surplus.

The greatest promise that we can hold out to the starving conquered countries of Europe is that of providing them with food as soon as they are liberated. What faith will they have in our promises when they learn that we have had to ration ourselves, that even here there is not enough food to go round?

I have just to-day received an answer to a question I put on the order paper at the beginning of the session, regarding a report which is alleged to have been presented to the government or to some of its key men here in October, 1940, by Mr. Charles Burton, president and general manager of the Robert Simpson Company Limited, Toronto, on the vital question of food supply. I have just received sessional paper No. 146 purporting to reply to my question. It consists of twenty-one pages, and I submit that this is a great waste of material in war time. Each sheet duplicates the same question and has taken up the time of some official, and they are all answered in the same way, "no", or "nil". If we had adopted in this house or adopted now the suggestion made a few days ago by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) that there should be a change in the procedure of the house so that questions could be submitted one evening and the next day ministers would give their answers in the house, this would be much more satisfactory. If they had given this answer to me to-day, I would then have asked them if this plan was not submitted to some of the key men in their departments, and I venture to say that the answer would not have been no, because I think it is a well-known fact that there was such a plan submitted. As a matter of fact I have a copy of that plan and should like to have it put on the record if Mr. Speaker will allow me to do so.

Mr. Burton made this report after wide travelling in western Canada during which he made a study of the whole economic situation and all possibilities through the channels open to a company which sells to and buys from all types of Canadians throughout the dominion. Although there are many able men in Canada, it is doubtful if any of them get the clear view of what is happening or will happen economically in every part of the country that is obtained by a man whose managerial ability has placed him at the head of a great institution such as Simpson's or Eaton's. Such a man has to know, and his advice in keeping Canada solvent cannot be lightly disregarded. President Roosevelt recognized this fact when he conscripted Donald Nelson, one of America's greatest buyers and sellers, to help his government.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I am now going on to another subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are just waiting for the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, who will be here in a moment. Would the hon. gentleman prefer to continue at eight o'clock?

Mr. BRUCE: I will say just a few words now and then discontinue.

The munitions industry has been organized single-mindedly for output, and I should like to say, successfully organized. Why cannot we do the same thing for food? When we hear proposals for a ministry of food it should be clear that the matter is urgent. Mr. Burton's plan of wheat disposal was intended to hasten the solution of other problems as well. He suggested using the enormous surplus of wheat to produce animal food. I ask the government why this plan was ignored, even though it was only presented to some of the key men belonging to some of the ministries? It would seem that this country is being run like a big business without a general manager.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

An act for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Bruce.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. BRUCE: In Canadian War Orders and Regulations, volume 1, number 4, of February 1, 1943, will be found the announcement of the reappointment of a board of civil servants headed by Doctor W. C. Clark, over which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) presides, to consider questions of rehabilitation.

Are we to understand that this board is to supersede the committee on rehabilitation and post-war problems headed by Professor James of McGill university? This newly appointed board appears to consist of the same group of civil servants who imposed upon the country the economic bureaucracy and price and wage control principles which have been subjected to so much criticism. It is the same group of men, very worthy, no doubt, who were in the same position of influence during the depression, men who then said that we could not afford large-scale undertakings on account of lack of credit. Will there be a greater amount of credit available after the war? The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) was right when he said that parliament was being side-stepped, for here we have another example of an important committee being appointed upon which there is not one member of parliament.

If this means that business is to be subjected to the control of these professional theorists, I fear it will have the effect of drying up all business enterprise and that the post-war reconstruction period will get no help from business. Is it not time that the government made plans for large-scale public works to be undertaken as soon as the need arises after the war? If the government has no plans, it is surely high time they made them. I submit, however, that instead of economists from the finance department and the Bank of Canada, the men who are best qualified for such a job are experts from the departments of Public Works and Trade and Commerce, and like departments, who should be able to bring forward large-scale plans which should form a foundation for reestablishment and reemployment. I have no doubt that provincial and municipal governments could be interested also in the development of plans of their own for public works, if assured of assistance by way of subsidies from the dominion government.

If the government takes the lead in matters of this kind, private business will automatically and speedily make its own contribution. The ultimate result would probably be that for every dollar spent by the government on public works, private enterprise would spend ten. If, on the other hand, these economic "high-brows" are to tell business what it is to do, I venture to say that not ten per cent of private enterprise will cooperate.

The principal trouble with Roosevelt's New Deal in the 1930's was that, instead of confining his efforts strictly to public works, which were out of the field of private endeavour, he entered into all kinds of projects, which had the effect of destroying the confidence of business people. I fear that the appointment of this committee, while well-intentioned, no doubt, will be inimical to the best interests of our war effort—certainly a detriment to labour and the farmer.

After the disturbance of the public mind caused by strikes in some of our steel plants, which strikes must have interfered with our war production, it was refreshing and encouraging to read the advertisement in the Hamilton Spectator of January 23 last, published by the employees of the Steel Company of Canada at their own expense. It was a fine expression of independent labour. The C.I.O. unions have become notorious as trouble-makers in war industries. We all remember the strike of C.I.O. workers in the automobile plant at Oshawa in 1937. It is an organization which came into Windsor fresh from acts of violence in the United States, and there began at once defiance of constituted authority. In spite of this, the Prime Minister has appointed its solicitor and sponsor, Mr. J. L. Cohen, as the representative of labour on an industrial court. I wonder whether the labour unions will accept this without a protest and, as the Globe and Mail said in an editorial yesterday:

> If C.I.O. methods are to be reproduced in this code, industry in Canada may as well prepare for the end of stability and the people for the sort of chaos introduced in the United States.

No one, I am sure, would quarrel with unionism in this enlightened age, but those of us who have watched the policies and tactics of the C.I.O., will not confuse this organization with any real honest labour movement. I do not believe that the cause of the worker will ever be permanently advanced by such dishonest practices and low ideals of fairness and decency as those which seem to guide the C.I.O. effort.

I should like to pay a tribute of respect to the employees in the plant of the Steel Company of Canada for this evidence of their loyalty, for in these days of strikes and unrest one is apt to forget that there are many workers who wish to be let alone to do a good job of work to help our war effort, and who object to being pushed around by C.I.O. organizers.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I believe I read somewhere recently that a ceiling should be placed upon platitudes. I think it was the Ottawa Journal, which said editorially that the growing propensity of our political leaders to use all sorts of vague, high-sounding words and phrases without attempting to define what they mean has become a pest. The speech from the throne delivered in 1943 at the commencement of this session differs very little in this regard from any other which his excellency has read during previous sessions in which this country found itself under Liberal party administration. I fail to see in the speech from the throne anything that will positively guarantee security to our armed forces when they return after the battle is over. In fact, there is very little mention at all of the returned soldier. I read merely these few lines from that part of the speech which seems to deal specifically with the returned soldier:

> Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities, the establishment, in useful and remunerative employment, of the men and women in our armed forces and in war industries.

It stops there. It seems as though this is the very best that the government can put into his excellency's mouth to tell the people's representatives in parliament what the government will do for those who spill their blood, or offer to spill their blood on the battlefields of Europe or in some other theatre of war. These young men who, we have often said, are the cream of the land, offer their all. I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, what are we now offering them? A noted journalist has written a book entitled, "The Time to Act is Now." The time is now. If we are to do anything for our returned men, the time to act is now. Yet what are we doing for them? When a young man returns he is offered the magnificent sum of nine dollars a week until he can find some remunerative employment. It is about time that we should be ashamed of ourselves to offer a man who has offered his life a sum of money which is not equal to the wages of an office boy.

While the speech from the throne was being read there was an elderly lady in my office. Her husband fought in the last war, and she has been living on charity and relief ever since. We are asked to discuss this speech from the throne which offers nothing to the returned men, but we have the audacity to say that we are giving them nine dollars a week. The startling thing is that parliament seems to be powerless to do anything about the matter. We have not come to the place where we in parliament can positively guarantee, without any uncertainties whatsoever, that when the boys return they will be given absolute security.

I wish to remind the house of what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) said the other day in this particular debate when he was speaking on the same subject. He was pleading for better treatment of the widows of those who had fought in the last war and had since died. He said, as reported in Hansard, at page 141:

> I think I can speak for every private member on this side of the house . . .

He could have said he spoke for every private member in this assembly, but he said:

> I think I can speak for every private member on this side of the house, when I say that the dire necessities of these soldiers' widows should be relieved, and relieved immediately.

There he was voicing the sentiments of the private members on the government side of the house; yet there they sit, helpless, powerless, impotent to move their own government on behalf of the widows of returned soldiers I felt like asking him at the time, Do you mean to say that although all the members of the opposition, combined with the members on the government side of the house, want something which is most reasonable and most desirable, they cannot get it from the government? That is just the position. I wonder what has become of our parliamentary institution. Instead of being a parliament of the people which represents the views of the people and asking the government to put those views into practice, we find that it is the parliament of a party, where the government of that party says, "This is the legislation which parliament must accept and pass. You must do it because we say so." Instead of parliament telling the government what legislation should be passed, the government tells parliament what legislation it must or must not pass.

To come back to the problem of the returned men, we are not yet feeling the full impact of these returned men because there are very few of them returning. The former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) said this afternoon that our soldiers had not yet seen the action which they will see. But if we can read correctly I am certain, and every hon. member will agree with me, that before nazism is destroyed from the earth there will be a terrible and tremendous slaughter somewhere; and the time will come when hundreds and thousands of our soldiers will return, and are we going to say to them, "We will give you a little bit of a hand-out, nine dollars a week"?

Not so long ago I was at a convention in Edmonton where this group had a part and where the Social Credit members of the Alberta legislature also participated. There we drew up a number of resolutions which should form a basis upon which we could discuss post-war reconstruction. In respect of the return of our fighting forces this clause appears in that resolution:

> Therefore be it resolved that the minimum measures for the rehabilitation of the men of our fighting forces and their dependents shall be:
> 1. (a) On demobilization, persons who have served in the Canadian armed forces or merchant marine shall, while domiciled in Canada, receive a monthly income equivalent to not less than the full pay and all allowances, including subsistence, for a private in the army, for a period of not less than three years, to enable the individual to become established in the economic life of the country.

I heard some remarks, after this resolution reached the press and the public, that this, of course, was far too big a promise. Let us see if it is. Let me ask this question: How much money are we spending every year for war purposes? I think it is reasonable to say that in round figures we shall spend this year about five billion dollars. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is not at the moment in his seat; the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his; but if any of those who are present representing the government wish to answer the question, all right. If they do not, all right. Let me ask this question: If we are spending five billion dollars this year on the war, supposing the war lasts for ten years, will the government continue to find at least five billion dollars a year for the next ten years? No reply. I suppose silence gives consent. I will answer the question for them. If the war lasts ten years, certainly we shall find fifty billion dollars with which to fight it—yes, and more. For if this year we are spending five billion dollars and the war lasts ten years, our productive capacity will be greater and we may have to find more than that. Certainly we shall find the money.

My second question is this: Suppose the war lasts only one more year. Oh, well, it will be said, that will be fine; we shall need to find only five billion dollars more. Then would the government say this: Therefore, because these men of our fighting forces have offered their lives, have risked their lives, some coming back maimed, wounded, shell-shocked, we will place forty-five billion dollars at the disposal of the armed forces of Canada to guarantee them security just as long as any of that amount of forty-five billion dollars remains. I do not think anyone will dispute my logic there. But instead, what does the government do? They write a speech, to be delivered by his excellency, and they say:

> Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities—

Who says that every effort must not be made? Does anybody question that?

> Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities, the establishment, in useful and remunerative employment, of the men and women in our armed forces and in war industries.

That is quite a document, is it not? Anybody would say that. There is nothing startling about it. Why cannot the government stand up and say, without any uncertainty whatsoever: We will absolutely see that no soldier, no dependent of any soldier, be she widow or child, will ever, ever, ever go in want, but will be given the highest possible standard of living which our administration is able to give. But they do not make any such assertion. That is the sort of thing that is causing people to lose confidence in political parties. That is the sort of thing that is causing people to lose their respect, or the respect they should have, for this institution known as parliament.

The speech from the throne suggests some plan of social insurance. Let us not permit ourselves to be fooled by terminology. Social insurance is a nice phrase to use, but social insurance does not mean social security. It does not even mean social assurance. I happened to refresh my memory to-day on the meanings of these two words, "assurance" and "insurance", and those meanings are not identical. They are sometimes used interchangeably, but there is a difference between the two. The dictionary I happened to pick up said that "insurance is an act or system by which pecuniary indemnity is guaranteed by one party, as a company, to another party in certain contingencies, as of accident or loss, upon specified terms." Sometimes in Great Britain the term "assurance" is used for that, but when I turn in the dictionary to the meaning of the word assurance, this is the definition it gives: "the act of assuring; any encouraging declaration; a promise; full confidence; undoubting conviction."

Let us not be fooled by the terminology that is used in the speech from the throne. The speech from the throne deals with a proposed plan of social insurance, and then it glides off and tells of certain little things we have done over the years to bring about a certain type of social security. There is all the difference in the world between the two terms. Why does the government not say outright: Here is the guarantee we will give, a guarantee of economic security for those who return after the battle is won.

Then the speech from the throne moves on to the platitudes of the Atlantic charter. I must beware lest I commit sacrilege in speaking of such an important document. I do not know particularly what makes it so important. I do not see that there is anything new about it. The other day I picked up a little bit of a poem—I regret that I am unable to give credit to the paper from which I cut it. Evidently it was printed not long after the signing of the Atlantic charter. It is entitled, "Footnotes to the Four Freedoms":

> "Freedom of speech"; well, even slaves may chatter
> So long as they're unarmed it doesn't matter.
> "Religious freedom"; well, what are the odds?
> So long as Mammon heads the list of gods!
> "Freedom from want"; no breeder would deprive > Good cattle of the means to keep alive.
> "Freedom from Fear": a counsel of perfection?
> Not if there's always ample police protection.
> Freedom to act, to choose or to refuse?
> Ah that's a "very different pair of shoes!"

I have often wondered what is so particularly startling about the terms of the Atlantic charter. There is nothing new about it. I wonder what makes it famous. What makes it famous is that the president of the great democracy to the south and the Prime Minister of Great Britain met in the middle of the Atlantic ocean, secretly, but on the other hand perhaps with all the pomp that such dignitaries deserve, and drew up the charter under these circumstances. All they did was simply to assemble a number of words together to explain a principle with which everyone agrees and has agreed for years. The Atlantic charter of course will go down in history; it will go down in United States history, it will go down in British history. I do not know so much about Canadian history, because the Prime Minister of Canada was not at the meeting. The Atlantic charter will go down in history nevertheless, in spite of the fact that it enunciates no new principle. If it did, then the Atlantic charter becomes a condemnation of every pre-war government that has existed in those two great democracies. I repeat that; if the Atlantic charter does enunciate some new principle, that charter becomes the condemnation of every pre-war government that has existed in this dominion. Why? What have previous governments been aiming to do? Have they not been aiming to bring about freedom from want, freedom from fear? The answer is obvious; of course they have. Then there has been no new principle enunciated in the Atlantic charter.

While the representative heads of those two great democracies got together and returned to their countries with this that has come to be known as the Atlantic charter, have we any reason to believe that existing governments can do next year what they were unable to do the year before? Have we any reason to believe that existing governments can do in post-war days what they were unable to do in pre-war days? That is a question which bothers me. Personally I have no confidence that they can; I have no confidence that they will, unless they change the present system. I do not wish to become too satirical at this point. The other day when the Prime Minister was speaking he gave us to understand that he was very careful when he chose men for his cabinet, men who had to work with him in the administration of the affairs of this country. He said, There are three rules that I follow; I choose them first because they have character; second, because they have ability; and, third, because they have brains. That is very wise. I hope the Prime Minister did not forget that we must conclude that it takes brains to choose brains. I suppose he took that for granted.

I am not going to question for one moment the character, intellect and ability of those who sit on the treasury benches. We all agree that they are capable men. But even if we recognize that, there are yet some things that I cannot understand. A few years ago the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) gave a very simple illustration here, and I am going to use it again. I have not his words; I do not know whether he read it, but he gave this illustration. He said, Here are ten men; their clothes are worn out, they have no money, and they are hungry. And over here are ten loaves of bread. Yet the government cannot get those ten loaves of bread over to those ten hungry men. In pre-war days that illustration was a very apt one. Even the Prime Minister, who had the brains to choose the brains, could pool all the brains and yet there were not enough brains there to devise a way by which those ten loaves of bread and those ten suits of clothes could be given to those ten hungry men, when they had no money. If we use that illustration, one of two things is true: either that pool did not have any brains, or there were more powerful brains influencing them not to do the thing they should have done.

While I am dwelling on that point, things do bother us a little sometimes. I recall in March, 1938, we had, I think I may say, a very intelligent gentleman as finance minister of this country in the Hon. Mr. Dunning. In the course of debate the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) suggested that there should be an expansion of credit in order to end unemployment and take men off the relief rolls. He was interrupted by an hon. member on the government side, and I should like to read what happened in that little discussion as recorded at page 1125 of Hansard of March 8, 1939:

> Mr. Martin: I have followed the hon. gentleman very carefully and sincerely, and I should like to ask him a question, because he has given this matter a great deal of study. To what extent would he advocate that we should go? . . .
> Mr. Blackmore: In the first place we must not enter into too many technicalities here.
> Mr. Blackmore: It is all right to laugh, but the details I have given here this afternoon are quite sufficient. At another time I shall go into those details along that very line, if I am required to do so. In the first place we can say this: No one would be afraid if the banks throughout this country were to take a notion to lend $300,000,000.
> Mr. Dunning: I would.
> Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister be afraid?
> Mr. Dunning: Yes; I am afraid of notions like that. I would want to know what was back of it.
> Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister be afraid that $300,000,000 loaned to farmers and various other producers throughout the country would cause inflation?
> Mr. Dunning: I would want to know precisely what was back of it.

Those are the words of a Minister of Finance in this government, the words of a man who had intelligence. Those words were spoken just a year before the beginning of the war. What do we find now? Well, the war broke out; and over night half a billion dollars sprang into existence. We are now spending every year in the neighbourhood of five billion dollars. Did somebody say something about brains?

Those are the things that bother us. I say once more I cannot help thinking personally that the Minister of Finance and perhaps other responsible ministers of the government are ill-informed by their advisers. When I read statements such as that of the Minister of Finance of that day I feel like saying, "Hast thou said it of thyself, or did some other tell it to thee?" I am suggesting that somewhere in the picture there is the personification of elements more powerful than governments. Somewhere there is a powerful government which governs government.

The other day, having an interest in post-war reconstruction, I read from a newspaper where, by order in council, a committee of men had ben chosen to examine matters pertaining to post-war reconstruction. This is a Canadian press dispatch dated at Ottawa, and is headed, "Ottawa men will plan for post-war." I do not wish to be too harsh, nor do I wish to be mistaken. Certainly I do not want anyone to mistake my meaning. I have every respect for any man who is doing his best to solve the problems of this country. But what do I find about this post-war committee? Evidently it is a departmental committee. Doctor W. C. Clark, deputy minister of finance, is to be chairman. One of the members of the committee is Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and one time deputy governor of the Bank of Canada. I find also on the committee Mr. Graham F. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, and Mr. R. B. Bryce, of the Department of Finance, is to act as secretary.

These are honoured gentlemen, and I am not being sarcastic when I bring their names to the attention of the house. But when we come to the terms of reference we find that the committee is to prepare reports and recommendations respecting measures to deal with post-war problems. The thing bothering me is this. The same honoured gentlemen were advisers to the government in the pre-war depression days. Have we any confidence that those men, who could not solve pre-war problems, are any better fitted to solve post-war problems? That is the difficulty in which I find myself. Those same advisers have been advising the government for many years. They were the men who were advising the Hon. Mr. Dunning when we challenged the ability of Canada to absorb $300,000,000 of bank credit, something which the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said could be done. His words have become true, because we have issued amounts far greater than that.

It seems to me that the present situation might be compared with an old and patched pair of trousers. The trousers are patched from top to bottom, and we are now choosing a post-war interdepartmental brain trust and delegating them by order in council to sew a few more patches on the same old trousers and, as one of my colleagues suggests, in the same old place.

Why can we not tackle the post-war problem as it should be tackled? Why can we not tackle the problem of the returned soldier as it should be tackled? We have a land settlement scheme, and we have now had suggested a scheme of social insurance. Last year a committee of the house discussed post-war reconstruction. They did good work at the beginning of their discussions, but before they had completed their work they turned their attention to the subject of nutrition. They did not seek to find ways and means of finding the fundamental wrongs in the system, but ended up by trying to measure the size of each other's belts. Let us get right down to business and find out, first of all, the fundamental cause of the failure in pre-war days. When we have found the cause let us look for a solution.

I notice Mr. Speaker is indicating that my time is up and, although I have a raft of notes before me, I shall have to deal with them at a later time. Let us really get down to the fundamental principles of giving real security to the boys when they return from the war.

W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in rising to-night to contribute a few observations to this debate I wish my first words to be of appreciation of the two hon. members who respectively moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do so not only on account of the splendid contribution they made, but also on account of what they represent in the house. It is gratifying to the country and particularly to hon. members on the government side of the house to hear the comments now being made with respect to Canada's war effort. Listening to the observations thus far made, I think it can be taken for granted that on the whole the country is magnificently impressed by the effort which has been made. We are hearing little criticism to-day with regard to developments which have taken place along those lines.

The contributions of the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address remind us that the war is still going on, and that the end is far from sight. We are reminded that our first and real job still to be done is that of carrying out the war effort to its successful conclusion.

Having said that, I should like to discuss one or two other matters. Perhaps it will not be considered out of place if I remind the house that, since last we met, a national convention has been held in my native province, and that from that convention emanated a brand new political party under the title of the Progressive Conservative party. Sometimes I take a little amusement from the attempts of hon. gentlemen opposite to become familiar with their new title.

It reminds one of the new bride and her attempt to become accustomed to her new name. I should like to go one step further with respect to the development that has taken place in connection with our hon. friends across the floor of this house. I took the liberty of looking up a dictionary in order to ascertain just what these two names had in common so that they could be tacked on to the same political organization. The dictionary that I have gives the following meaning to the word "Progressive":

> One who believes in and works for changes and reforms, especially in political matters.

With respect to the word "Conservative", this definition is given:

> One opposed to hasty changes in political, religious or civil institutions as the Conservative is seldom progressive. A member of a political party in Great Britain opposed to radical reform as distinguished from Liberal and Labourite.

I mention these definitions merely to indicate the contrast. To me it is comparable with that between water and gasoline, and I fear that as enthusiasm cools off, the one will likely freeze to the extent of clogging the mechanism, so that the other will not work. Perhaps it is not out of place to say a word or two with regard to the early development of the Progressive movement, upon which our hon. friends opposite are attempting to capitalize. May I say that the Progressive movement of 1921 originated many long years before. It originated in the little red schoolhouses all over western Canada; it originated in the farm homes; it developed into community and district conventions and then into provincial conventions which became known in western Canada as the farmers' parliament. It finally was headed up in the Canadian council of agriculture as far as national issues were concerned.

Contrary to what many people think, the success of the Progressive movement in 1921 hinged largely on two matters of policy. First, there was the reinstitution of the Canadian wheat board and, second, the fact that candidates were nominated at properly held conventions and that their election expenses were paid by the electors. Those were the two things that appealed to the electorate of western Canada and other parts of the country as well during that election campaign. May I say here that whatever else history may say with respect to the development of the Progressive movement, it did more to purify politics in this country and to develop and further the true spirit of our democratic institutions than anything else ever did. Unfortunately that fundamental principle of our electoral system has been departed from to some extent in the meantime. My point, however, in commenting as I have so far is to show that the Progressive movement as it has been known had developed over a period of thirty years. It was rooted deeply in the soil. It had fundamentally far-reaching principles, and its development came from the bottom up, not as an organization already existing having that name attached to it.

I should like to say a word with respect to one matter referred to in the speech from the throne, namely, redistribution. If redistribution is gone ahead with, two of the western provinces will lose seven of their members in this House of Commons. These members will be lost through no fault of those provinces. The drouth condition which prevailed in western Canada did its part in moving the population. On top of that, those provinces have contributed in a magnificent way to Canada's war effort, both in the armed forces and in all forms of industrial and agricultural production. It seems to me most unfortunate, after having made the contribution in the manner they have, that they should be penalized to the extent of seven members in the Canadian parliament. I hope the government will decide not to proceed with redistribution at this session of parliament. Conditions will change in the course of a few years, particularly when the war is over, which we hope will be soon, and then those two western provinces can again gather up their population and be entitled to full representation in this house.

Coming as I do from a rural constituency, I should like to point out that the representation affected will be rural representation. This only goes to show how we are tending to further the representation of our industrial centres and larger towns and cities at the expense of our rural representation. I merely wish to impress upon the government my hope that they will not proceed with redistribution at this session.

I am constrained to say a word or two largely on account of the remarks made a few days ago by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). I think one of the things we are all desirous of having in this House of Commons is as true a representation of the Canadian people as it is possible to secure. As far as elections are concerned, if I may refer to them, there are two main difficulties. First, elections are too expensive—I do not think anyone disagrees with me on that point—and, second, too few of the people go out to vote. What I am saying in this regard does not refer only to the federal parliament; it applies also to our municipal and provincial governments as well as to school boards and so forth all down the line. I am afraid that this apathy toward our political institutions may lead to our people being prepared to accept some other form of government less representative and certainly not as democratic as the one we have.

Something must be done, although I do not know what it is. This institution, both in its own interests and for the preservation of democracy, must do something. Perhaps our political organizations could do more than has been done. At the present time there are people who recognize this difficulty and who suggest that we should adopt a system of proportional representation or the single transferable vote. They claim that these methods of voting give a truer representation of the people. My fear with respect to either one of these systems is that it would lead to group government with a consequent lack of stability which is necessary if a government is to carry on. I do not know what the solution is, but something more is necessary.

I can see a place for proportional representation and the single transferable vote in our municipal and in our provincial governments where the work and duties are largely administrative, but I doubt the wisdom of their application in the national field. In the larger fields of national and international policy I am afraid that we must rely on the philosophy of a government supported by a political party.

It was gratifying last night to hear my hon. friend the member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) refer to a resolution which the Liberal organization of Saskatchewan had put on record. I am not referring to its contents, but it indicated to me a degree of activity on the part of a political organization that was doing its duty and keeping its organization intact, preparing to do its part in making democracy function. That is a responsibility which should attach to all political organizations in the country. On one occasion I had the pleasure of doing something along that line, by way of promoting an essay-writing competition. It is neither here nor there what use was to be made of the essay, but the title of it was, "Our Canadian democracy, what it is and what it demands." I emphasize "what it demands." We were attempting to bring home to those who took part in the competition the demands that democracy makes upon the citizen and how he should endeavour to prepare himself to make his contribution under our democratic system of government. Something more along that line is probably necessary. Some have advocated compulsory voting. I recall that a committee of this house dealt with that question a few years ago, but decided that it was not practical, particularly in a country like Canada, and I am inclined to agree. Nevertheless something of that sort is necessary. I have often wondered whether we could not institute a system whereby political organizations would be obliged to incorporate themselves, and be required to hold annual meetings called in a proper manner, and along with that there might be a campaign directed by the state itself to impress upon the people what a democratic system of government means and what their obligations are with respect to it.

There are two or three matters to which I wish to refer and which the debate on the address affords about the only opportunity of doing so. The first reference I wish to make is with respect to our control boards. One of the first criticisms I would make with regard to these control boards as a general principle is that for the most part they are not composed of trained civil servants and therefore in many instances they are very poor public relations people. I say that from some experience. I do not know who they are or how they got their appointments, but that is a general observation which I think can justly be made with respect to many of these control boards.

Second, I believe the authority of these boards is too much centralized. In a country such as Canada with its wide diversity of conditions, I do not think one can satisfactorily centralize control in any one place and have one policy applicable in the same degree throughout the whole country. I suggest that these boards should recognize the difference between different parts of Canada and give greater power or direction and authority to provincial and local boards. Let me give two illustrations, two experiences that actually came to my notice.

A farmer's stock-watering pump went out of order. The repair for it was in the neighbouring town, but when he went to purchase it he was informed that he would have to get a priority which must be secured from a town 150 miles away. It would take at the very least three days to get that priority, and there was that farmer with all his live stock waiting for drinking water! Surely conditions like that were never intended under this control system.

The second case is that of a hospital which had its pumping equipment break down. The hospital authorities knew perfectly well that the repair was available, but they could not get it because they could not secure a priority rating.

These two cases illustrate the point I wish to make, that the authority of these boards should not be so much centralized that the system breaks down and people condemn it out of all reason.

I do not want to be considered provincial or local or anything of that kind, but there are one or two things which should be said with respect to rationing. I refer first to tea, coffee, sugar, butter, of which in the main I think we have enough for our needs. But I point this out, that the town or city dweller has an advantage over the rural dweller in that some member of the family in a town or city, if not all of them, is able to go to a restaurant or hotel for one or two meals a day. That applies scarcely at all to the farm population. The townspeople can go to a hotel or restaurant and save on their sugar and tea, but the country person cannot do so. Again, we know that if a man goes out into the country to repair some farm equipment, he seldom brings his ration card with him, and the consequence is that he has to be fed out of the farm family's rations. Therefore I am suggesting that there might be a little more leniency for the people in the country who are thus situated.

I wish to make a plea with regard to beef, which from present indications is to be rationed. If there is to be rationing of beef, the authorities in charge of the matter should have regard to the fact that people doing heavy manual labour require a heavier meal than people who are doing lighter kinds of work. Farmers, bushmen and coal miners, in fact all those engaged in heavy active work, should receive special consideration when a product such as beef is being rationed. I do not want to be misunderstood and have people think I am making a plea for rural people as against city people. Personally, I think I am simply making a request that is logical.

There is another regulation which does not work well in view of our western conditions. I refer to the fifty-mile limit on bus travel. Anyone who has been in the west and also in the east knows that the situation in the west is entirely different, and a regulation providing for a fifty-mile limit on bus travel in western Canada simply does not get one anywhere.

With regard to gasoline rationing—I am not pressing this at the moment—there is, nevertheless, a good argument, I believe, in support of western people being allowed a larger gasoline ration than people in the more thickly populated parts of the country. The distances are greater in the west; the towns are farther apart, and for that reason the people are entitled to additional consideration. I have mentioned these items largely for the purpose of supporting my argument that there should be more localized control.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the payment of income tax by farmers. I do not wish to be misunderstood in my argument. The farmers are willing to pay income tax when they are taxable; but here I want to make a distinction between a farmer and a business man. The farmer is not only in business, but his business is his home, in contrast with the ordinary business man. We have heard arguments on all sides of the house regarding the plight in which the agriculturist finds himself. Perhaps up to now he has not been obliged to pay income tax to any great extent, but many farmers are now going to be called upon to do so. When we look back over last year and the year before, when the quota system of delivery applied to grain, many farmers were obliged to market most of two years' crops in one year, which brought them into the higher income ratio and made them taxable.

In the period from 1930 on, farmers all over the country, and particularly in western Canada, took a terrible licking. With the personal income tax in operation they are not going to be able to recoup very much of the losses they sustained at that time. Moreover, we know that a farmer can suffer a substantial loss in one year and have a bumper income the next year, but he cannot recoup himself for the losses of the previous year, and the result is that all he makes is taken up in taxation. My suggestion is that the income tax as applied to real farmers should be applied on an average of three or five years, so that they will not be taxed for everything they make if they happen to have a good year. I know that some farmers were shrewd enough to delay the marketing of some of their products this last year until after the close of the calendar year. Hogs, for example, were held back, and marketed overweight. I know of a man who would not sell his flax until after the new year. That is indicative of what the situation is with respect to the application of the income tax. We cannot blame the farmers for that, because this year the same men may have no income at all. I think the suggestion I have made is worthy of consideration.

The next reference I wish to make relates to the income tax as it applies to our co-operative marketing institutions, and what I have to say in this regard applies equally well to our credit unions. In the main these institutions have been established in this country for years. So far they have considered themselves not liable to pay income tax. Recently two or three of them in our province have been assessed income tax, and the matter has been taken to the courts and still remains there. My contention is that a cooperative, a true cooperative, should not be required to pay income tax. Such institutions are established by the farmers themselves. Their capital set-up is built largely on a revolving plan. It is savings which they make on the type of business they are doing. It is not a profit. They have simply banded 'together in order either to sell or to purchase collectively some of their necessary requirements, and any saving they make is, I repeat, not a profit. They are associated without any thought of profit, interest or dividends. If the present situation is such that this cannot be established so that they can be declared to be non-taxable so far as income tax is concerned, I suggest to the government that it is time we should have a cooperative act in this country defining the status of cooperative organizations and requiring them to live up to it, and thus determine whether or not they are taxable. Personally I think most of them will get around the income tax, but they may hurt their own business in doing so and not carry on upon as sound a basis as they are now doing. What they are doing at the present time is simply adding to the wholesale price of the goods which they are buying, not knowing exactly what their handling risks may be. If they have anything left over at the end, they are simply redistributing that saving back to themselves. I contend that a cooperative organization is just as much a part of the farmer's machinery as is his horse and buggy, his tractor, or his automobile.

One other thing, and it is of the nature of a complaint: I refer to the application of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. I have under my hand the serial number of a tractor which was imported into this country in April, 1940, before the foreign exchange control tax was enacted, and was sold to a customer in August, and in the sales sheet there is an item of war tax, so many dollars. I contend that the company selling that implement had no right whatever to include an item of tax in the case of that implement, for it was a tax which they did not pay to the government. Moreover, the minister, when he introduced that tax, said that it would be done away with at the close of the war. Very well; what is happening? Take the farm implement industry. Their warehouses were full at the time that this tax was applied. To-day they are depleted and certainly not likely to be stocked when the war is over. The result will be that these people have been able to gain materially through the application of that tax. Therefore I suggest that the application of the tax is entirely unfair. I know the minister will say that so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned the importation complied with regulations and that if there is responsibility beyond that it belongs to someone else. That is hardly a good enough answer, because farmers all over Canada, particularly in western Canada, have been obliged to pay the added amount, which did not come to the state. I am not saying that all implement companies or all other businesses took this procedure, but in the one case I have under my hand that is certainly what has taken place.

A word with respect to the farm labour situation. There is not any doubt that an agricultural labour problem exists. To-day most of the farmers in western Canada, and I assume all over Canada, are short of efficient help. Not only are the farmers short, but there is a shortage in the mines and the woods. At the same time there are reported to be several thousand men and women in Winnipeg who are unemployed. Along with that, we have the newspapers advertising jobs in the woods, in the mines, and on farms; I am told that there are positions for some five hundred domestics in Winnipeg alone, and I venture to say there are thousands of farmers who would gladly accept the services of a domestic. What is the situation? These people want war jobs; they do not want jobs which are on land. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to turn to compulsion and oblige them to go where there is work? I do not know the answer. Moreover, I fear, and I think it is not unreasonable to assume, that these people for the most part would be inexperienced farm help. That being so, I doubt whether their services would add greatly to the productive capacity of any of our farms in western Canada. After all, the chap with the real knowledge of our western farms is to-day in the army; it is his old dad who is left behind, who does not know much about running a tractor, and is not so able to plough around through the deep snow in the cold weather as he used to be. It is the man to take his place who is required. It is not an easy job, and I doubt whether the suggested women's land army can perform the services needed at the present time.

I wanted to say a word with respect to another matter raised in this house, namely, the question of conscientious objectors. I hold the view that our conscientious objectors in the age groups called for military service should be required to perform some service for the state the same as others. I think it would be for their own good to do so, and moreover I think that they themselves have no objection. I am prompted to make this reference on account of a clipping which appeared a few days ago in one of the Winnipeg newspapers. Unfortunately I do not have it before me, but the report stated that fifty or sixty conscientious objectors were being sent up to Riding Mountain national park, and that was all it said. That bare statement is the most misleading type of statement that can be made. The fact is that these men were sent there to cut wood at fifty cents a day for the people in the surrounding country. That is the contribution they were making. They were not sent there to clear the park for tourist purposes or anything of that sort. These men can and should be used for useful work but not for work that is unnecessary. More than that, I think they could properly be given a little further consideration. I do not think we are going to get full efficiency out of a man doing a day's work at fifty cents a day even if he is getting board and clothing, and while they may be performing some service for the state, I think they would perform a greater service if they were given some further incentive.

I suggest that so far as the man-power situation in the west is concerned, it will depend a good deal upon the season and the size of crop. Last year we had a large crop, and with the assistance of women and children and townsfolk and other help we could get, that crop was taken off in a reasonably satisfactory manner, but no extras were taken care of, and the fall work this year is considerably behind. Moreover, the spring season will be approached with a good deal of hesitancy as to what they can do this season. I can go further than that. If it had not been for bringing the Japanese to our province there would not have been any sugar beets produced this year, so that I submit to the government that steps will have to be taken to see that a more adequate supply of farm labour is provided.

I had hoped to mention two or three other matters, but my time is passing. However, in the few minutes left, I should like to make one further reference, namely, to the Atlantic charter and the declarations made therein. The Atlantic charter and the circumstances that surrounded its presentation to the world are heralded to-day as the ideals of the united nations with respect to the war and what may follow. The question that has occurred to me, looking at these declarations, is this: What part is Canada going to play with regard to these declarations? What interpretation are we going to place on the different sections of these declarations? What is going to be Canada's attitude toward the carrying out of these declarations? I come particularly to clause 4, which declares that they will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access on equal terms to the trade and raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

That, I submit, is where Canada must be concerned. I have listened to and read a few articles with regard to Canada's position at the close of this war, and it seems to me that the whole emphasis is pointed in the direction of what we are going to be able to dispose of to keep up our production. What are we going to be able to sell? I suggest that if we are going to sell, if we are going to try to keep up our production, we must be prepared to buy because there is no other way by which we shall sell. I think the government can take a lead and take it immediately in its attitude to the Atlantic charter and should start now to make provision for what we shall buy from those people to whom we hope to sell goods in the future. I think we can give a lead in that direction, and we are in a magnificent position to do so. It comes down to this, that we must determine whether we shall industrialize this country further, or recognize the position of agriculture. If we are to recognize the position of agriculture, the one thing it needs for social rehabilitation, or anything else we wish to attach to it, is an opportunity to produce and market its goods at a reasonable price.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne reveals at last some apprehension on the part of the government concerning fundamental post-war reactions. We have so often warned the government against them that we disclaim any share of responsibility for events which they have prepared quite freely and of their own accord.

In the face of rationing applied to essential goods and food products in a country disposing of a 600 million bushel wheat surplus, have we not a right to doubt the efficiency of the so-called economists guiding our administration?

In the face of homes being abandoned by mothers and the consequent breaking up of families, the very foundation of society, one is at a loss to visualize any possible efficiency connected with the social security plan contained in the speech from the throne.

Our first duty is to safeguard the family, failing which any social legislation is without avail in a moribund society.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to quote from the January issue of this year of Canada at War, on page 6:

> There are approximately 3,970,000 women in Canada over the age of 15, and about 1,350,000 of this number are in paying jobs.
> There are about 225,000 women working directly or indirectly in war industry, an increase of 45,000 from last September.
> The proportion of women thus employed is soaring and Canada looks to women to bring its new and great war industrial machinery to peak output this year.
> It has been estimated that 80 per cent of the jobs in industry can be filled by women. Canada does not expect to reach anything near this proportion in industry as a whole, but in some new war plants the percentage of women employees to total employees is already near this mark.

The number of mothers now at work has increased to such an extent that day nurseries are being opened in every locality of any size.

What will be the effect of this nefarious policy upon future generations? This is a cause for deep worry among more experienced sociologists. I wonder if the government has even any thought for it. Let the government adopt every imaginable social measure; they cannot substitute for education and a mother's care the framework of their secular legislation.

Ever bent on legislating, the government is now proposing to coordinate Canadian and American agricultural production. Why go to so much trouble for the farmer whom the government persist in taking away from the farm and sending to military barracks? Let them first put their house in order before worrying about the neighbours. Some will claim that farmers get postponements. A certain number of them, after all kinds of formalities, after being subjected to every annoyance, have obtained postponements of a few days, weeks or months. But, Mr. Speaker, I know farmers' sons, farm hands and even married farm owners who, after returning the request for postponement, duly filled, sworn to and addressed to the registrar, received for answer a notice to report to the training camp and a transportation warrant. To support my claims, I could give the names of hundreds of draftees: the Giroux of St. Eustache, the Beaudoins of Ste. Rose, the Ouellettes of St. Augustin, the Laroses of St. Eustache, the Girards of Oka, the Daousts of St. Benoit, the Cyrs of Ste. Scholastique, the Jolys of Ste. Rose.

How can there be coordination of agricultural production while our dairy stocks are being thinned out, our farms abandoned, our production reduced through the acts and errors of our own leaders?

Let us keep our farmers on the land; then it will be possible for us to feed our troops and civilian population. Instead of coordinating the production of the United States with our own, let us ensure production at home by granting complete exemption from military service to our farmers.

Since the adoption of the mobilization act, on June 19, 1940, how many times have I requested the government to grant such an exemption? I have never ceased asking for it, in keeping with the firm stand I have always maintained against mobilization, which is and always has been a hypocritical and camouflaged form of conscription. The alleged postponements the farmers are supposed to get are nothing but a ridiculous and cynical kind of deception. It is a new falsehood added to the series of broken promises. Thus spoke the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) a few days ago, in this house. My hon. friend, who is now smiling, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) recalls this perfectly well. He is well aware of this, representing as he does an agricultural constituency. Let him state if this is true or not.

The registrars persist in calling farmers for military training without even using the measure of discernment which we have a right to expect from smart and shameless officials.

Mr. POULIOT: Quite true.

Mr. LACOMBE: Thus, through the fault, neglect and rank prejudice of a government who accumulate on their shoulders the most formidable responsibilities, the people of the country are headed toward starvation. And our so-called economists, our would-be statesmen remain impassive witnesses of the ruin of agriculture instead of realizing into what abyss we have been led and are still being led by a policy of unrestrained waste.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to replace farm labour by passing bills. Agriculture is more important than war industries. If we do not maintain agricultural production we shall be heading not only toward rationing of food for the army and civil population but even toward famine. How will Canada be able to fulfil its pledge to supply the united nations with enormous quantities of bacon, wheat, milk, butter, cheese, vegetables, fruit, honey, if we do not cease once and for all calling up farmers for military training? How will Canada be able to feed its soldiers and its civilian population, and at the same time send abroad all the food we have promised? Is the national selective service in a position to solve this dire problem of farm labour? Until now its failure has been disastrous. As an instance. I will cite only the rationing of butter, and the imminence of rationing of meat in a country where wheat and many other farm products are sold at ridiculous prices, or remain in the fields, as they did last fall, for lack of help to reap them.

The government claims it is moved by the best of intentions. This is what is said in the speech from the throne. Very well. But intentions and actions are two different things. The leaders of a country should always act, whether the country is in peace or at war. With many others I belong to a generation that has lived through the two greatest wars which have fallen upon the world. I saw the civilian and military demobilization which followed the first world war. With my compatriots of all races I felt the awful reactions which burst out in the agricultural, industrial, social and economic domains after 1918. After a few years of fictitious prosperity I saw in Canada thousands of farms which were abandoned because they could no longer feed their owners and their families. I saw crooked financiers and hard-boiled loan companies, eject from his property a debtor who could not pay his mortgage.

I saw governments close their eyes on this deplorable state of affairs until, as a legislative measure and as a makeshift, they passed some bill of settlement. I saw thousands of strong young men who were only too willing to work fall under the direct relief of the state and receive the miserable allowance granted to beggars. Furthermore, a whole generation of young people who wanted work were deprived of this right, until general mobilization gave them military uniforms. This is the solution to unemployment brought forward by all governments during the post-war period.

Any measure of social legislation will remain ineffective as long as trusts continue to press down upon the people and exploit our natural resources for their own benefits, and for the benefits of a selected few. These are the worst obstacles to the application of the proper social measures which will benefit the whole population. For many years the various governments in the economic life of Canada have been run by electoral money-lenders and unscrupulous financiers. The great misfortune of our democracy is the extreme inequality of wealth, which was once condemned by His Majesty the King.

Notwithstanding all these abuses, I am willing to support any sincere attempt toward a serious and rational improvement. In the programme for this session I sincerely cannot find a serious guarantee that the most urgent social measures will be applied. I believe I am quite right in drawing these conclusions.

Another subject to which I should like to refer is the protection of our population against communist propaganda. Because Russia is fighting Germany must we in Canada give a legal status to this wicked and Godless communism? Are we losing all sense of realities to this extent? Did Winston Churchill not assert at the very beginning of war between Russia and Germany that Great Britain would help Russia but would not recognize its doctrine, its communistic principles, its form of government? Let us keep our heads on our shoulders. We must not lift the ban which at present strikes communism in our country. The government must take a strong attitude if it wishes Christianity to survive in the face of the atheistic, revolutionary and bloody doctrines of communism. Communism is atheistic because it proclaims a state without God. It is revolutionary because it has taken advantage of all circumstances—unemployment, depressions—to promote rebellions, strikes, sedition and civil war. Will legal authority bring about its own destruction by giving a legal status to the avowed enemy of all authority? Are we fostering the insidious beast which will devour the established authority in Canada?

Finally, communism is responsible for the extermination of thousands of innocent victims in Russia and in other countries where it has provoked revolutions. Since communism is basically atheistic, giving a legal status to communism in Canada would be tantamount to betraying Christianity, for which the united nations are now fighting.

Tim Buck is free, while Camillien Houde, a former mayor of Montreal, member in the provincial legislature for the constituency of Ste. Marie, and former provincial leader of the Conservative party, has been interned in a concentration camp for more than two years. This is shameful persecution, and its authors will have to account for it some day.

I shall not dwell any longer upon matters which have been dealt with already. I like very much the genuine Canadian spirit which has been shown by certain speeches delivered by some of my colleagues. Some of them have objected to the enormous expenditures provided for in our war budget. Canada is heading for bankruptcy. Billions are accumulating in a bottomless abyss. When shall we see the end of this mad race toward bankruptcy? Nobody can tell. The government levies taxes upon taxes, launches loan after loan and makes gifts of over a billion dollars to a nation whose wealth is far greater than ours. These things have become an obsession.

Our planes, our tanks, our ships, our guns and our ammunition, all urgently needed for the defence of our coasts, are being sent all over the world. Thousands of soldiers, sailors and airmen have died abroad and others have been stationed at outposts everywhere in this mad world. Hundreds of thousands of young men have been taken away from their work and professions, even from their studies in order to answer the call to the colours. The government told them that they would remain in Canada to protect their own country, but what happened? Without parliament being consulted they were sent to Newfoundland, Labrador and Alaska, while many thousands were subjected to the worst mental tortures before they signed up for overseas service. This is infamous. This is hypocritical conscription in the most hideous form.

While our soldiers were dying at Hong Kong, Dieppe and elsewhere, war profiteers have been increasing their fees as company chairmen from $10,000 to $30,000 a year. While our conscripts are being rationed in the camps, our public men celebrate and attend magnificent banquets. Did we not see one who was elevated to the cabinet giving five or six of these banquets? What a show in a country labouring under the weight of taxes, in a country where the first necessities of life are rationed and where we shall soon see fathers and mothers being forced to travel considerable distances in order to obtain the ration books with which to feed their families!

What about the waste and the abuses which have been revealed in our war industries, the waste of materials and man-power as a result of lack of direction? Are the government incapable of controlling public expenditure? Why do they not establish some system of checking operations in all our war industries? The people who pay have a right to know what is happening to their voluntary or compulsory savings. When a country with a population of only 11,500,000 people must carry a burden of $5,000,000,000 in one year, it is urgent that we protect by all possible means the remnants of our resources and our domain. Some will say that nothing matters but victory, but it can be asserted that ruin and bankruptcy would be as disastrous if not more so than defeat.

Notwithstanding the many sacrifices that have been made, Canada is treated with indifference by the military and financial imperialists. She was not considered at the meeting which gave birth to the famous Atlantic charter; she was not represented at the Casablanca conference. Only one thing matters, to shear the sheep, if not to eat the turkey with all the stuffing. The Canadian people will never consent to become the laughing-stock of the world because they are sacrificing their blood and their resources in this war. Where there is equality of sacrifice there must be equality of glory and prestige. We have suffered enough already from the treasons which have been accomplished in the lower strata of international diplomacy.

What reward did we get after the last war? Agricultural chaos, unemployment in our industries and the birth of numerous trusts whose strength is always increasing. Equality of sacrifice should carry with it equality of privilege and representation, but what share do the French Canadians get in the administrative services? What share do they have in the higher ranks of the army? Who can answer these questions without blushing? My compatriots have paid with their blood, their savings and their resources like all true Canadians in this country, and we ask only for what is right; we ask only for justice from our government.

I repeat here what I have often said elsewhere. I sincerely hope that harmony and good understanding will prevail over the greedy ambitions of a few. I formulate this wish in the best interests of Canada. At this moment, I am closer to my colleagues from Quebec. I know how difficult it is to build anything solid on doubt, distrust and opportunism. I will express my whole thought: I deeply regret the clouds which are accumulating over the sacred union which in the past was our strength. Thank heaven, everything is far from being lost. This is why I urge my colleagues not to trust those who try by all means to divide us in order to rule.

I have done everything in my power to prevent our participation in this war. I had previously opposed the increase in our military budget, which I knew was intended for our participation in the war. On September 9, 1939, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), I moved an amendment against our entry into the war; later on, I moved two amendments against the mobilization act, which was nothing other than conscription. In spite of the sole support of my hon. colleague, I never ceased fighting. Now, in order to avoid a greater disaster, I appeal to my colleagues from Quebec in favour of understanding, union and harmony. By all means it is most important to avoid conscription for overseas service. It would be detrimental to the defence of Canada, and it would mean the death of the last remnants of national unity and of the liberties for whose conquest we have had to fight so stubbornly.

One last word. I would not be fair toward the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy), if I did not express all my gratitude for the generous support he has granted me during the last session of parliament. Together with a few of our colleagues, we have fought for a policy which would be exclusively and honestly Canadian. I shall never forget the memorable day of February 19, 1942, when a dozen members of this house voted with us to oppose the drafting of farmers' sons. Also, I shall never forget the memorable night of July 23, 1942, when a greater number of our colleagues voted in favour of the Roy-Lacombe amendment which opposed the granting of discretionary powers which would have given the cabinet a free hand to impose conscription for overseas service by order in council. Subsequent events justify our position, and the future will prove that we were right.

Before taking my seat, allow me to congratulate the newly-appointed member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) upon the magnificent future which can be forecast from his maiden speech on the floor of the house to-day.

Mr. BERT H. SOPER (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the many fine speeches we have heard in this debate in the last two weeks it is with some reluctance that I rise to say a few words. First I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These two young men in uniform bore out what has been often told me by men who have returned from overseas, that our armed forces have wonderful equipment and wonderfully trained armies on all the battlefronts.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

I also wish to congratulate the new leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and of the Conservative party in this house. It is a very fine tribute to that young man to be asked to lead his party temporarily. Might I also say a word in tribute to the late leader of the Conservative party. While the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was critical at times of government policies I think he was always fair, and I know that he had the admiration of a great many members on this side of the house. I am also glad to note that if the Conservative party had to have a new leader they chose one from my native county of Leeds—although the new leader is not really showing the traditional fighting spirit of the people of that county or he would be here in the house.

The constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house is in the rural section, very much of a dairying county, and it is on behalf of the dairy farmers that I wish to say a few words. We have heard a great deal from the farmers of the west, the wheat growers, and we have heard of the difficulties of the raisers of beef cattle in our own province, but really the farmer who is to be pitied is the dairy farmer. He has a job 365 days in the year. Other farmers, I admit, have their busy times, but they do not have the long and arduous hours that the dairy farmer has, and with the present shortage of farm labour I am sorry to say that we are losing some of our best dairy herds. The farmers' sons have joined the armed forces or gone to work in munitions plants, the fathers and mothers are getting older and find it harder to carry on, but in spite of all that we had an improvement in our dairy production last year and the year before. But do not forget that the fathers and mothers are getting older, are more worked out, and cannot be expected to handle the work unless they can get more help. I should like the government to be as considerate as possible regarding the dairy farmer and the price he receives for his goods.

In manufacturing, our county, I think, has been very well used. We have at the present time about fifteen manufacturing plants which are engaged chiefly on war work, probably to the extent of ninety-eight per cent; the people working in them are well paid; and although at times, no doubt, there have been some disagreements, they consider they have been fairly well treated by the Department of Munitions and Supply, and are receiving a reasonable share of raw materials and contracts.

I also have in my county one of the largest line divisional points of the Canadian Pacific railway. Probably some hon. members are aware of this fact because they spent considerable time with us yesterday when they were snow-bound. The people who make up that vast army of Canadian Pacific workers are very loyal; a great many of them have sons in the army. We never hear of labour troubles; all they seem to think of is, get on with the war effort and win the war. But I often wonder what is the present opinion of those people who a few years ago were advocating the amalgamation of our railroads. I am sure that everyone, whether or not of the same faith of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), agrees that he was a man of vision when he said, "Amalgamation never, cooperation ever." If a certain number of our lines had been torn up and much of our equipment scrapped, in what position would we be to-day? At the present time we are using every last line and every bit of equipment which both railroads can muster. The car in which I came to Ottawa this morning has been on the Canadian Pacific railway for twenty-five years and is still going strong.

The butter situation has been mentioned in the house two or three times. I must say that I was very sorry that, in a dairy country such as Canada is, it was decided to ration butter. I do not believe that it was necessary. If the wartime prices and trade board or whoever was in authority had not talked so much about it and given so much information to the newspapers, thereby getting the public scared and thinking of hoarding, I believe we would have come through without any such restriction. I am sure we shall get our reserves back to where they should be, and I hope that the order will be cancelled as soon as possible.

A word about potatoes, because the situation has been very bad in the last month in our cities. I do not want anybody to think that I am not in favour of the wartime prices and trade board. I am; I think they are doing and have been doing a wonderful job, and that without them we should have very hard times later on. My county is about half industrial and half farming, and they are the two classes of people that are hurt the most by inflation. However, I am afraid that the economists gave the wartime prices and trade board some bad advice with regard to the distribution of potatoes. It looks to me as though they had advised them that they could get along without the middleman. Anybody who knows anything about the distribution of farm products knows that we cannot dispense with the middleman, and had the wartime prices and trade board called in some of the members of this house they would have got better advice. One hon. member I have in mind in this connection is the hon. gentleman who represents Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) on the opposition benches, and who has had a great deal of experience in the distribution of farm products. I know also that there are hon. members on our side who could have given the board good advice along that line.

Another question to which I would briefly refer is, where are we going in the matter of erecting temporary buildings in this city, where living accommodation at the present time is taxed beyond all reason? I understand that in many instances girls who are not in very good circumstances have to live three and four in a room. I do not see why the government could not have moved some of the departments which are less essential to the war effort to some of the fine towns in the surrounding country. We have a number of cities wherein buildings could have been adapted to office use at a reasonable cost, where housing accommodation would have been more adequate, and, no doubt, much cheaper. There are, for example, four fine towns in my own county—Almonte, Carleton Place, Perth and Smiths Falls.

I was pleased to see in the speech from the throne some reference to social security. It is a matter about which I feel very strongly, because I am sure nothing makes for a better feeling among our people than the knowledge that they will have economic security in their old age. I should like to see the allowances raised to old age pensioners, to the blind, and to disabled veterans. A few years ago we thought that forty dollars a month was quite a generous allowance to those entitled to the old age pension—I am sorry that any of them have to draw it—but the situation is quite different to-day and these people are entitled to much more.

I trust that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) brings down his budget he will have some announcement to make with regard to the Ruml plan. Although I am not very well qualified to speak about it, I have read through the proposal, and I am sure that anyone who has done so will agree with me that it is an advanced step and one that should be taken in this country. Why should we be paying next year on something we have earned this year? It is bound to catch up with us some time. Some people say we are dropping a year's taxes, but we are not. We shall have to pay, and the only time that we shall be dropping a year's taxes is when we die.

We have had a great many controls, but one control which I hope will never be relaxed is the one that stops people from instalment buying. Instalment buying was one of the worst things that our people ever had. A man could go in and with a slight down-payment, practically nothing, buy something, paying an extra carrying charge. He has to keep on paying interest, because no one is selling goods to-day without getting payment for the use of his money, and the bookkeeping which that system involves.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): It is not my intention to dwell at any length on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We have listened to-night to two farmer members speaking in this house. While the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Soper) is not perhaps directly a farmer, he is very much interested in farming, having operated a dairy farm. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) is a real farmer. With what these two hon. gentlemen have said I am in total agreement in a great many respects, particularly with the views of the hon. member for Macdonald on the controlling of some of our produce. I am not going to repeat what he has said. I did intend to say a great many of the things that he has said, but as he has said them I will take them as conveying my ideas.

At the risk of repeating what has been stated already, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, not because these hon. gentlemen did a really good job, as in fact they did, but because they represent the armed forces of this country. They are two men who have served in the forces overseas and who expect to go back and serve there again. They are worthy of our commendation.

The speech from the throne has given us a summary of our war record during the last year and of what we propose to do in the post-war period, and I believe it has given us, as individual members, something to think about, and has given us a place in the economy of the country. That is very necessary because the ordinary member of parliament has been, perhaps, too much forgotten in the past. The ordinary member of parliament, no matter how humble he may be, can offer the government some suggestions which would be of some assistance, and I often think governments, if they paid more attention to some of the things which ordinary members of parliament say, would not get into so many difficulties. There are many people to-day who think we have too much government by order in council and too much government by those who are outside the administration, and I am inclined to believe that they are not very far wrong. I hope the day will soon come when we shall get away from this kind of thing and get back to a little more democratic government by the members themselves. I can understand that it is necessary, in war time, to pass orders in council and have legislation of this kind, but when the house is sitting, and when we have an opportunity to say what we have in mind, we should be given that opportunity.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has given us a fine record of the war effort during the past year, and to my mind it is a record of which we can well be proud. When we think of a country with a population of less than twelve millions and compare our war effort with that of any other country in the world in this war, it is nothing less than a miracle. When we think that in 1939 we had practically no army, no navy, no air force, and that to-day, in less than four years, we have in the active army about 420,000 men, in the air force about 160,000, in the navy about 47,000, and 500 ships, as well as at the present time nearly 95,000 men on active service who have been called up under the mobilization act, it is a wonderful achievement. In the first five months of 1942, we had enlistments in the army of over 10,500, in the air force of over 3,900, and in the navy of over 1,350, and in the second five months, in the army something over 12,000, in the air force over 7,500, and in the navy, something over 2,000, or nearly double that of the first five months of 1942. This speaks well for the plan that has been adopted by this government.

The house leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Graydon), in his splendid speech—and I wish to congratulate him upon his promotion to that important position—spoke for nearly two hours and enunciated the policies of that party, what took place at Winnipeg and what took place at Port Hope. To my mind the winning of the war is the most important thing. That is what we should centre our attention on to-day, and not on the political ambitions or policies of any party. He offered some suggestions which I am sure will be received by the government, but for the most part he dwelt on the policies of the party. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) did the same. That is all right so far as politics are concerned, but we have a more important job. I am not saying that we should not give some consideration to post-war problems, because I think we should. I believe that this country should be in a position to offer to the men who come back from fighting our battles overseas something worthwhile so far as social security is concerned, but I think we have a long time yet to discuss those problems and put them into shape before the war is over, because I do not think it will be won in a year or two.

What I am most interested in is agriculture. Being a farmer, I know something of the condition of the farmers and particularly of how they feel in the riding which I have the honour to represent. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made a very fine speech. I do not think there is any man in this house who can make a better speech. But I think he will have to go into every riding—I was going to say in the dominion, but in Ontario at least—and show the people that what he said is right. I am not disputing that what he said is right, but there are a great many people to-day who think something more might be done than what the Minister of Agriculture told us in his speech. Farmers to-day think we have too much government by men outside the government. They may be good men in their own line but I am afraid that they do not understand the problems of the farmer and the condition of agriculture. For years farmers have not had an even break with industry. They consider that with this war on and their produce in so much demand they should be given a little better deal. I believe that the Minister of Agriculture should be more responsible for the distribution of food and for the prices that the farmers are to get for their produce, now that we have started paying subsidies. To my mind there is no man in Canada who knows agriculture or the problems of the farmer better than does the Minister of Agriculture, and I do not believe there is any man in Canada who is more sympathetic to the farmers than he is. I should like to see him the head of a separate food board.

The farmers feel that they are working more or less in the dark. I mean by this that they have no assurance that when they produce they will get the same price for any length of time. I do not mean, as some have said here, that they have not been given direction by the government or by the Minister of Agriculture and his officials, who I believe have done a wonderful job in that regard. But the farmers consider that they have no assurance that if they produce they will over a period of time get anything like the same price.

Agriculture is a long-range business. We cannot produce cattle, hogs, milk, cheese and eggs overnight. We want reasonable returns over a period of years. We cannot understand why cattle should be fifty cents or seventy-five cents higher one week than the next week when there is a scarcity of beef. The same applies to hogs; why should hogs be twenty-five cents a hundred pounds dearer one week than the next when we are shipping seventy per cent of our bacon overseas and have a good market?

Much has been said about butter. I do not wish to repeat anything along that line particularly, but I believe there is discrimination between the farmer who produces butter, who sells his cream to a creamery, and the farmer who makes butter at home and sells it to the storekeeper if he can. The circumstances must be considered; roads and conditions of different kinds, the distance from centres where cream trucks do not go, all have a bearing on the price that the farmer should get.

Mention has been made of rationing. I have before me a copy of the rationing of the people of Great Britain. There is no comparison between the way we are rationed and the way they are; they are rationed far more than we are in everything. But I think that if there were not so much advertising of shortages, whether it be beef or butter or whatever it be, over the radio and through the press, we would not have so much hoarding and so much scarcity; there would be a more even distribution.

I believe we should have a floor as well as a ceiling for farm produce prices. As far as live cattle are concerned, the farmer to-day would, I believe, be satisfied with twelve cents a pound live weight for the winter months, perhaps a little less for the summer months, but around twelve cents a pound would, I think, satisfy the farmer. Then the price would not go up and down from week to week.

A board should be established that would take care of any surplus in any of these lines. I have an instance of a farmer who bought some plymouth rock pullets. He bought these pullets at $1.40 each, ready to lay. The pullets and feed cost him $720. In October he was selling his eggs at 47½ cents for grade A large; the last of January he was selling them at 33 cents, a drop of 14½ cents; yet we are told that we want more eggs, that we should produce all the eggs we can. I know another man who bought six hundred plymouth rock pullets and sold them to a Jew for $1.60 each for meat, figuring he could make more money in that way than by keeping them for laying.

These are the things that trouble the farmer to-day, no stable prices. We consider that we have a good market. Scarcity of labour on the farms is of course an important factor, but I believe that is not so much because the boys from the farms have joined the army. They have done so in goodly numbers, but that is their privilege in a democracy. The reason for the scarcity of labour is that industry has been allowed to pay too high wages, especially when contracts are on a cost-plus basis. Every farmer wants to see his son do his duty to his country; the boys want to do their duty, and as I have said, have done so in many instances. But a farmer cannot compete with industry so far as wages are concerned. We have about a million men and women in industry to-day, and that is a big drain on agriculture. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) the other evening said that we should have more men on the farms. But I well remember that in one of his speeches or if not, in the policy of his party at the beginning of this war, they said that we should have a million men overseas. If we have a million men overseas or in the army at home, where will they come from? Some of them must come from agriculture.

Just a word about the selective service board in military district No. 3. I believe the board there has been most fair in its consideration of farmers' sons. Some mistakes may have been made; some boys may have been called that should have postponement, but all in all I believe that the board have done a really good job, and where the proper information has been supplied to the board they have in nearly all instances been giving good consideration. I still believe, however, as I said here before, that farmers' sons could very well have been given total exemption, that is, farmers' sons who have always remained on the farm and made their living on the farm. There would not have been nearly as much dissatisfaction or nearly as much interference with agriculture as there has been.

The new regulations brought down by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should be of some assistance. The minister has said that wages should not be allowed to decline, and on the other hand not allowed to rise unduly, on account of the danger of inflation. With that I entirely agree. Farmers to-day do not want inflation, although through inflation they stand to lose less, perhaps than any other group of men. They are willing to send their boys to fight the battles of this war. They are willing to give their money, if they have any, to victory loans, and to all charitable organizations—as they have done. They are even willing to pay their income tax, if necessary. But they do want a more definite price, and a more definite programme over a period of years.

I am leaving these few observations with the government, and particularly with the Minister of Agriculture, in the hope that something I have said may be of some assistance to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. L.-PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is most gratifying to all hon. members that the present debate on the address in reply should, with few exceptions, have been kept on the higher plane of national service and national policy, thereby indicating the sincere belief on the part of most of us that we shall be appreciated according to our realization that our foremost thoughts should be the efficient performance of our share of that effort necessary to ensure the liberation of the world of to-day from oppression, and of the world of to-morrow from fear and from want.

Our discussions have been marked by an apparent desire, whether by praise or constructive criticism, to strengthen the hands of the government in its pursuit of the war effort. With but little petty criticism and untimely recrimination, all the more noticeable by its scarcity, there has been an evident desire by all to serve in the execution of our mandate, in order to remain worthy of those of our compatriots who have the greater and nobler task of serving in a more arduous and meritorious way.

The example given to us by the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, both of whom have had the privilege of serving in the house as well as in the army, has evidently been felt in the debate. They deserve our praise and our congratulation, not only upon the splendid way in which they worded their sentiments and thoughts, but also upon the higher tone which they imparted to this debate.

The care showed by most to cooperate and to render constructive even their criticism is a welcome improvement on some of the bitter exchanges of yesteryear.

In the same spirit I intended to make a study of the speech from the throne. However, at this advanced stage of the discussion, I might even say at this advanced hour of the evening, I have decided to leave for future debates such considerations as I should like to make on the broader aspect of the man-power question as well as on the administrative set-up of Canada's industrial war effort. I shall therefore limit myself to-day to general observations on a few questions.

One of the important references in the speech from the throne is the social security problem, a study of which may well lead one into an analysis of the different possibilities of reshaping the world of to-morrow. This first step toward a full study of necessary social reforms is one in the right direction, and it must be comforting to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that most parties seemed to agree on that, the opposition criticism appearing to be that some part of their programme had been stolen, while we are of opinion that this is but the normal sequence to a number of measures for which the Prime Minister may claim credit. The decision to refer this vast question to a special committee is to be commended in that it will take it, right from the first, away from political controversies in this house and enable anybody, any group or party to refer their plans and their views to the committee for close study and careful consideration, thereby saving precious time for the house to carry on its work.

Another question which has already been the subject of many comments is the lease-lend appropriation advocated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). When a measure of somewhat similar nature was presented to us last year in the form of a grant of one billion to the United Kingdom, I agreed to it because I felt that a country that had been spared the actual sacrifices of war on its own territory, a country that had not been invaded and trampled and massacred as had Russia and China, and a country that had not been subjected to the most horrible aerial warfare, as had Britain, could make further financial sacrifices as a sort of compensation, I may say, to those who had been in the path of the monster and who had delayed so much, as to render it nearly impossible now, his direct assault on us. Those were the motives which made me accept last year's proposal. The way in which it was presented and the poor and insufficient explanations given to the public were such that many still think we took one billion in gold from our treasury and gave it to Britain. What we did was to provide the tools of war for those who were in the front line of defence and could not pay for it. That money was spent in Canada, provided work for Canadians and used Canadian materials. What I did not like about it was the way in which it was done, handing everything to Great Britain, which took the credit for transferring afterwards part of it to China and Russia. If there is truth in what has been published in a Canadian paper lately, to the effect that part of it was directed by Britain to Australia and New Zealand who paid Britain for it out of their credit balances in Britain, I like it less.

But the way in which the lease-lend appropriation is presented to-day should not provoke the same objections. It appears to be an improved, more dignified and more nationally conscious form of financial help to world freedom.

The motives are the same as last year, but the method of doing it is greatly improved. We thereby take one more step to manifest our complete independence from and equality with Britain. We appear no more as the vassal bringing tribute but as the equal partner who puts his assets in a common pool with those of his partners, the United States and the United Kingdom, so that they may jointly decide where they may be better used for the safeguarding and ultimate victory of the united nations. The deciding voice as to the allotment of the goods produced in Canada by Canadian workers and with Canadian materials will remain in the hands of the Canadian government, and rightly so. This makes me more enthusiastic for the vote I shall give, if needed, in favour of this appropriation.

I did not intend to speak on the man-power question, but I should like to say a few words about agricultural labour. It has been comforting during this debate to hear so many members from all sections of Canada, in all political parties, the opposition as well as the government, urging the necessity of keeping all possible hands on the farm in order to maintain the level of agricultural production as high as possible. In the early days of the war it was not considered to be the right thing to speak about exemptions or deferments for any special class of the population. At that time it seemed to be the monopoly of the Quebec members to remind the house of the urgency of ensuring better farm production by exempting or deferring farmers' sons and farm hands. I did so myself on two occasions, but I was criticized for it. We were told that we were overdoing it. Therefore it is a real pleasure to know that so many members from all parties and from every province have indicated one plan or another to ensure a proper flow of labour to the farms of Canada.

In this regard I wish to commend the director of national selective service and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) for their letter of February 3 to the mobilization boards explaining the future policy of the government with regard to bona fide farmers. However, much more enlightenment will have to be given before the situation can become clear and the decisions of the board based entirely, not on certain peculiarities of a case but in the general interest of agricultural production in a given district.

In order to illustrate my point I should like to cite a story of a farmer boy in my own constituency. This boy has worked all his life on the farm; from the time he left school until he reached the age of twenty-four years he had worked on his father's farm. His father had no other sons except some younger children, aged fifteen, thirteen, eleven and nine years of age, respectively. The father operated a farm of 195 acres, of which 185 acres were in cultivation. He had ten cows, four horses, thirteen hogs, and sheep and poultry. Last year he produced 700 bushels of oats, 8,000 bales of hay, fifty bushels of barley and 200 bushels of potatoes. This farm is considered to be quite a large farm in that part of Quebec.

The boy was called up on July 15, 1941, under the mobilization act, and he reported for medical examination. He was classified as B2 and received a nice letter from the registrar stating that since he was in a class not yet callable, he was at liberty in the meantime to engage in any other pursuit. During all that year of 1941, when he had been classified B2, he worked on the farm with the exception of six weeks during the winter when he went to a lumber camp.

In 1942, at the end of June or early in July when most of the early work on the farm was done, he met an agent of a shipbuilding company located near Quebec, about thirty miles from the farm. This agent wanted to know why he had not called on him because they were in need of men. The farm work was finished for the spring and the wages were good, so he went to work for the shipbuilding company near Levis. This company was making corvettes and other ships for the United Kingdom, the United States and other united nations. He worked there except for a week or so during the fall when he went back to the farm to help gather the crop, after which he returned to the factory.

In the meantime he had arranged for a young man to take his place on the farm and help his father, and he paid this young man out of his wages. He remained at the factory until December. Late in December or early in January his category B2 was called, and he reported again. Under the plans entered into between the department and certain industries, about which there seems to be great secrecy, the reason for which I cannot understand, he was considered to be in a class not essential to the pursuit of the war. Therefore he reported to his mobilization board and asked to be assigned to farm work for the next year. They denied his request because out of his life of twenty-four years, or out of ten years of usefulness on the farm he had spent less than six months, apart from the week spent gathering the crops, in an industrial plant.

Here is a boy who has spent all his life on the farm except for six months. He is needed on the farm, and the board admits that the farm is of a size that would warrant the employment of more than one man in order to have it operated efficiently. The board admits that there are no other sons in the family, that the father is alone and that he is, let us say, twenty-five per cent incapacitated by sickness. Yet this board has ruled that because the boy worked six months in an industrial plant he shall not be permitted to go back to the farm where he belongs. That is his punishment for having left the farm for those six months. They decided that he should go back to the army and then in the spring put in a request for six months holidays from the army in the busy season, which request could be vouched for by the father.

On motion of Mr. Picard the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 17, 1943.

The house met at three o'clock.

CATTLE

PRESS REPORT AS TO PROPOSED SALE IN WISCONSIN OF CANADIAN PACIFIC HOLSTEIN HERD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture two questions. Has he been informed of the announcement that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company intends to sell in Wisconsin, United States, its large herd of 250 holstein cattle from the company's farm at Strathmore, Alberta? If so, will the minister tell the house what the government has done to retain these valuable dairy cattle in Canada?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have no information with regard to the matter other than what has been contained in the press. I have seen a notice there to the effect that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were selling their herd. So far as I know there is no restriction on selling breeding cattle in the United States or on their selling cattle in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the government not taking any steps to retain these cattle in Canada, either by buying them or by some other means, in order to ensure that Canadian breeders will have access to them?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION OF CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking in the house on January 29 the Prime Minister made reference to the consideration which the government has been giving to the appointment of a committee on estimates. I think it would be the desire of the members of the house generally to scrutinize in greater detail the estimates brought down this year by the government and to avoid a repetition of what occurred at the conclusion of the last session. I should be very glad to have the Prime Minister indicate to the house what policy the government intends to pursue with respect to effecting a closer audit by the members of the house of these estimated annual expenditures.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact I have been waiting until the estimates were tabled to have a word with my hon. friend and the leaders of other groups with respect to the possibility of referring the estimates, either in part or in whole, to a committee or committees. I expect that the estimates will be tabled immediately after the conclusion of this debate, which I hope may be to-morrow night. In that event I shall be glad to have a meeting with my hon. friends with respect to this matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REFERENCE TO ADVERTISEMENT BY STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA IN DAILY PRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with certain advertisements which are appearing in nearly all the Canadian papers. I bring this matter to his attention because of his statement on Friday last that henceforth the national war labour board will be in the nature of an industrial court, and the protest made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) against my referring to the steel dispute during my speech on February 4. I should like to draw the attention of the house to the full-page advertisement appearing in the daily press of Canada and published by the Steel Company of Canada, denouncing the organized steel workers and accusing them of the grave crime of treason. I wish to protest against this dirty and provocative advertising—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GILLIS:—particularly as it will undoubtedly—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has a question to ask he is allowed to lay the foundation for it. He should now ask his question without making any other reference or offering any opinion.

Mr. GILLIS: Does the Prime Minister think that advertising of this kind tends to a peaceful solution of the dispute now being adjudicated upon by the war labour board?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not believe that what I think would matter one way or another. I have not read the advertisement to which my hon. friend has just referred. To tell the truth, I spend less time on the advertisements than I do on any other part of the paper. However, I should think that if the advertisement referred to is adding to existing difficulties in the steel industry the national war labour board itself will probably take cognizance of the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if this particular advertising is allowed to be charged by the corporation as part of its operating expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY: My colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) would be the one to answer that.

CANADIAN NAVY

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO ARTICLE IN "BOATING" MAGAZINE BY COMMANDER A. D. MACLEAN (RETIRED)

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon) placed questions on Hansard, and asked for a statement in regard to an article entitled "Fairmiles and Foul" which appears in the January-February issue of a magazine called Boating. I regret that some time elapsed before I was able to gather together all the information necessary to make a full statement, and I regret still further that the statement itself must occupy some little time. But the article in question, together with editorials and other articles in the January-February issue of Boating, occupied practically the whole magazine, and it has been necessary to traverse a good deal of ground in order to be able to make an appropriate reply.

The article purports to criticize the building and manning of Fairmile boats in Canada and their operation by the Royal Canadian Navy. The article was written by Andrew D. MacLean, Commander R.C.N.V.R., retired. It is quite a long article. In places it expresses the writer's opinion. In others it purports to state facts. I shall not attempt to deal with every statement of opinion or with every insinuation contained in the article. I shall deal chiefly with what the writer alleges to be facts, and I shall make such comments on these allegations as I can make from my own knowledge or from information supplied to me by officials of my department or by other reliable sources.

Training of crews. One of the first statements which Commander MacLean makes is with regard to the training of crews for these Fairmiles. On the very first page of his article, page 7 of the magazine, he says:

> The senior officers of the Canadian Navy prefer to run things in their own particularly obscure manner....and make no difference between the training of Fairmile crews and the maintenance of the 600 h.p. Hall-Scott engines than they do for men and the steam machinery of corvettes, minesweepers and destroyers.

Again, on page 9, he says:

> No special training was given our officers or men on being accepted volunteers for the Fairmiles service.

These are some of Commander MacLean's statements, and I should like to point out what the facts are. The facts are that before any Fairmiles were completed in Canada, engine-room crews were given special training in the running and maintenance of Hall-Scott engines, which are the engines used in these boats. Beginning early in 1941 and going on until February, 1942, two engineer lieutenants, one warrant engineer and fifty-four specially selected chief motor mechanics were sent to the Hall-Scott works in Berkeley, California, to undergo a complete course in the management of the Hall-Scott type of engine. The men who were given this special training had, prior to their entry in the Canadian Navy, considerable experience with internal combustion engines, such as the Hall-Scott engines are. Upon completing this course one of these men was detailed to stand by each Canadian Fairmile as the machinery was being installed. One of these men was also a part of the crew of each vessel commissioned. As the shore repair staffs for Fairmiles at Halifax and Esquimalt became more familiar with the maintenance and operation of the Fairmile machinery, it was found that training which formerly had to be undertaken in California could now be efficiently conducted in this country, and accordingly the practice of sending men to California was discontinued.

In addition to this training in the maintenance and operation of Fairmile machinery, the naval mechanical training establishments at Halifax, Esquimalt and Pictou ran special courses in internal combustion machinery. This was general training for the class of engine to which the Hall-Scott belongs.

On page 9 of the article Commander MacLean says:

> By August, 1942, out of more than thirty boats in commission only ten were fit for operational duties as a direct result of Ottawa's failure to provide specialized training and adequate, specialized base facilities.

The fact is that in August, 1942, there was a completely adequate number of trained men available to operate each Fairmile then in commission. In addition there was an adequate number of replacements available to take care of any emergency which might have arisen. A special branch of the Canadian Navy had been established for internal combustion engine ships. This branch corresponds to the regular stoker branch in the navy.

Providing crews before boats are ready. The second allegation with which I should like to deal is that in the autumn of 1941, twelve officers and seventy-two men waited at Toronto for some six weeks before they could actually man the ships and bring them down through the lake and river to the east coast.

It must be pointed out here that it is very common practice to send some officers and key ratings to every new ship some time before the ship is accepted. It is obvious, I think, to anyone who reflects upon the matter that men cannot arrive on a new ship, accept her, commission her and begin to operate her all in one day. Some considerable period of instruction and of getting acquainted with the machinery is necessary.

The Fairmiles to which Commander MacLean refers in this instance were launched in July and August, 1941. We fully expected that they would be ready for acceptance much earlier than they actually were ready. Delays were caused by the difficulty in securing equipment, some of which had to be got in the United States, and it was not until the first days in November that the ships could actually be taken over by the Canadian Navy and sailed for the east coast.

Commander MacLean goes on to say that in the spring of 1942, "twelve boats had complete crews provided three months before they were needed, or 192 officers and men with nothing to do for ninety days." My information is that this statement is directly contrary to the fact, and some reflection would seem to show that my information is correct. The month of May is the first month in which wooden ships, not large ships, either, as these Fairmiles are, could safely leave great lakes ports for the east coast. If Commander MacLean's statement is correct, it would mean that complete crews for these twelve boats had been sent to the lakes in the month of February, when the rivers and lakes are completely frozen over.

Paying off Fairmile crews. Commander MacLean goes on to say that the crews of five boats were paid off in Halifax in December, 1941, "because of an artificial shortage of officers created by the opening of special schools before we had enough people to man the ships so urgently needed at sea." My reply to that statement is this, that the Canadian navy had to make the best disposition possible out of the men it had in the service.

Its principal task then was, and still is, that of escort work across the Atlantic. That is work which Fairmiles cannot undertake, at least for a transatlantic voyage. Corvettes and other ships of that type were urgently required for this duty, and so, too, were officers and men to man them. In December, 1941, training facilities were not available to the same extent as they are to-day, and in view of the shortages of personnel, the manning commander at Halifax had to use the available men on the ships where they were most urgently needed. Hence it was not the opening of special schools which deprived Fairmiles of crews in the winter of 1941. It was the urgent need of personnel for the larger ships which could be used as transatlantic escorts.

Dinghies for Fairmiles. Commander MacLean then refers to the dinghy supplied for these Fairmiles, and says that it was a joke. "Heavy beyond belief, it would not handle under oars or sail and was unsafe with more than two people on board."

The dinghies supplied for the Fairmiles were built, just as the Fairmiles were built, in accordance with designs worked out by the British Admiralty. It is not true to say that they would not handle under oars or sail. In this instance Commander MacLean is giving an opinion, but I prefer to take against his opinion the view of the director of naval operations, Captain H. N. Lay, an officer of vastly greater naval experience than Commander MacLean, and an officer who has won two decorations in this war for his gallantry in actual naval operations. Captain Lay paid a visit to the shipyards building Fairmiles in the month of October, 1941, and he reports as follows:

> I took particular notice of the ten feet dinghies which are supplied to the Fairmiles built. This boat is an extremely well built one, very strongly constructed, and should stand up very well to the handling it will receive during service. It is slightly on the heavy side, but as a davit is fitted for lowering, it is considered that this is an advantage rather than a disadvantage.

Guns for Fairmiles. The next allegation of Commander MacLean deals with guns. He says this on page 9 of his article:

> The guns supplied were from eighteen to thirty years old and the ammunition of United States origin and very doubtful history. . .

As in the case of the dinghies, the guns supplied to Fairmiles were the same as those specified by the Admiralty for the same class of boats built for the Royal Navy. The guns for the Fairmile boats were obtained originally, in part from the Admiralty and in part from the United States Navy. The type of gun fitted to our Fairmiles was the one deliberately planned to be fitted, as laid down in the plans and specifications received from the British Admiralty. It is not a question here, Mr. Speaker, of having the perfect gun. It is a question of taking the best that you can get at the time.

But since the Fairmiles were originally armed, now nearly two years ago, I am happy to say that a better type of gun has become available, and is being fitted in the Fairmiles. I say further that the problem of securing better armament for these Fairmile boats and for all other types of ships used in the Canadian navy is one which is constantly under review by competent gunnery experts and armament specialists. These men are in touch with the Royal Navy on the subject all the time, and whenever better armament is available for any Canadian ship, it is procured.

To illustrate the attitude which Commander MacLean has adopted throughout the article, I should like to refer to a photograph on page eleven, which he captions:

Lesson in Fire Power for the R.C.N. Picture shows Fairmile of the Royal Navy on patrol in the North sea.

I am advised and I believe that the vessel shown in the photograph is not the same type of vessel we use at all; it is a Fairmile of a totally different class, one used against German E-boats, whereas our Fairmile is used against submarines. I think it is strange that Commander MacLean, who sets himself up as a great expert on Fairmiles, should make so grievous a mistake as that.

Electrical equipment. Then he deals with the question of electrical equipment and complains that in Canada we have maintained the English standard voltage of 24 instead of the north American standard of 32 or 110 on our Fairmiles. It may be said in reply to this charge that the electrical supply of 24 volts is not only in accordance with Admiralty design, but was also determined by the voltage of the generators supplied with the main engines. There was no option in the matter. We had to take the generators as they were or go without them.

It is true that two increases in electrical power supply have had to be made on these boats, but these changes were made necessary by the introduction and development of new equipment since the original Fairmiles were designed. It must be remembered that the present-day supply of electrical equipment is very limited indeed, and the retention of the 24 volt and the introduction of the additional 110 volt systems were the most feasible and economical and the only practical arrangements which could be made in the circumstances.

The Lynx. Then Commander MacLean refers to the breaking-up of the Lynx. The Lynx was one of the yachts which the navy procured in the early days of the war and converted for naval purposes. He says, on page 30, that he was appointed to command the Lynx, which was to be the mother ship of certain Fairmiles, that shortly after his appointment he went on leave, and that on his return the Lynx was being broken up for scrap metal. He goes on to say, "A signal had been misread."

Nothing could illustrate the unreliability of this gentleman any more clearly than this statement about the Lynx. While the Lynx, which was a very old yacht, had been condemned as unseaworthy and unsafe and unfit for service, and while her machinery had been taken out, she was not being broken up at the time that Commander MacLean returned from leave, nor has she since been broken up for scrap metal. She is still lying at a dock in a certain eastern Canadian port.

Delays in building. Commander MacLean complains next of the great delays that occurred in the building of these Fairmiles, due, as he claims, to lack of intelligent priorities on engines, tanks and fittings. He says that it takes two to three times as long to build these boats in Canada as it does in Britain.

I should be the last to deny that there have been delays in the shipbuilding programme for Fairmiles. Here, it must be remembered, there was a new industry for Canada. New sources of supply had to be developed; new materials and new machinery had to be secured. Shipyards had to be built in some cases and their staffs had to be organized in almost all cases. There is bound to be delay in any country in such circumstances, but I must point out that in Great Britain several designs of Fairmiles are produced, whereas Canada produces only one type, and that is the Fairmile used in anti-submarine work.

In Britain, again, boats are built on the mass production principle, but even with this mass production method it takes from five to six months to build a Fairmile in Great Britain. In this country, as I said before, we built and are building Fairmiles to the British design. The first contract was let on December 17, 1940. The contractors were required to build the hulls only. The department supplied special equipment and machinery. In procuring this equipment and machinery very many difficulties and delays were encountered.

In a war where there are great demands upon every form of mechanical production, difficulties and delays are inevitable at first. I believe, however, that any shipbuilder building Fairmile boats will say that so far as the naval service is concerned it has done its utmost to help out the situation. For example, in the first month of the building programme, representatives of the naval service met with the contractors, with the builders of these boats, to clear up certain problems that were presented by the plans and specifications, and this contact with the builders has been maintained ever since. There are on file at naval service headquarters many letters expressing the builders' appreciation of the help received from the naval service, and I have seen no letter or communication of any kind to the contrary.

As to the comparisons between the rate of building in this country and in England, as I have said, England employs the mass production method and even by that method it takes from five to six months to build a boat there. In Ontario, where most of these boats were built in the lake yards, from the time the first keels were laid, early in 1941, until the boats were commissioned, the average building time was eight and a half months. In the case of one firm, the time taken was six months and six days, and last year, 1942, one firm delivered one of these vessels in three months and twelve days from the laying of the keel. This is a splendid tribute to the zeal and skill of our shipbuilders.

Idle shipyards. The editorial which appears in the magazine Boating, on page 6, states that "of the five Fairmile building yards in Ontario, two are very busy and three have no Fairmiles to build." The facts are that there are seven Fairmile yards in Ontario, and in all seven yards Fairmiles are in various stages of construction at this very moment to the total number of ten.

Delivery of engines. In the article, Commander MacLean alleges that engines were delivered to some yards six months ahead of time, and in other cases the builders could not get engines when they required them. I will say, in answer to that, that there is no case known to me or to the department where engines were delivered to yards six months before they were required. As the engines were received by the navy at Toronto, they were shipped to the builders whose vessels were in the most advanced stage. There were some cases where builders who originally had been rather backward eventually made more rapid progress, and some of these builders might have had to wait a short time for engines, but never for six months.

Attack on Royal Canadian Navy. So much for the specific charges which Commander MacLean makes. But there is another matter to which I must refer, and it is this. Throughout the whole article, as well as in an editorial comment, and in another article appearing on pages 40 and 41, numerous slighting references are made to the Royal Canadian Navy, that is to say to the permanent force. It is suggested, for example, that the naval board should have more naval reserve and naval volunteer reserve representation.

In this connection, I should like to observe that the board of admiralty in Britain has no reserve officers on it. The Canadian naval board is modelled on the British board of admiralty, with this difference, however, that the board of admiralty is an executive body whereas the Canadian naval board is a body advisory to the minister of naval services. The minister, under the act, has full executive authority corresponding to the authority exercised in England by the board of admiralty itself. But there is one further difference which Commander MacLean, or the editorial writer, has forgotten, and that is that the secretary of the naval board here is an officer of the naval volunteer reserve, whereas in Britain the secretary is a permanent civil servant.

The Canadian naval board consists of the chief of naval staff, the vice-chief of naval staff, the chief of naval engineering and construction, the chief of naval personnel, the chief of naval equipment and supply, the deputy minister of naval services, with a naval volunteer reserve officer as secretary.

It is alleged in this magazine that the board has awarded promotions and decorations to itself and to the personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy in a very improper and unfair manner. I must point out in answer to that charge that in the last promotions list which appeared at New Year's 3·1 per cent of the permanent R.C.N. officers received promotions, 10·5 per cent of the R.C.N.R. received promotions, and 4 per cent of the R.C.N.V.R. officers received promotions. In other words, the permanent R.C.N. officers received proportionately fewer promotions than either of the other two branches of the service. But beyond that, the naval board does not make promotions. Recommendations for promotions are made, in the first instance, by officers commanding ships and establishments. They are in the best possible position to know the merits of those serving under them. Their recommendations are then reviewed by the promotions board, which is a totally different board from the naval board, and finally the recommendations of the promotions board are reviewed by the minister, who has to make the final decision as to promotions.

So far as decorations are concerned, 84 have gone to members of the R.C.N., 54 to members of the R.C.N.R., and 123 to members of the R.C.N.V.R. It must be pointed out with regard to both promotions and decorations, that at the beginning of the war we had a very small navy. The ships were commanded and manned almost entirely by officers and men of the permanent force. They were the first officers and men to see action, and I think I can safely say that they were all keen to get into action. It took some time to develop officers and men in the two reserve branches. The profession of a naval officer, as I have often said to this house, is not one in which skill can be acquired in a day, or a week, or a month; it is a matter of years of training and experience.

In the first days of the war, therefore, inevitably the brunt of the work fell upon members of the permanent force. I am glad to say that now members of the two reserves, having gained valuable experience, are taking their places nobly, gallantly, in the battle line, and as time goes on and the navy increases in size, more and more of the work will fall on their shoulders. But I know of no officer in the permanent service who would not gladly go to sea at this instant if the opportunity presented itself.

It is alleged that we have too many high-ranking officers in the Canadian navy, too many admirals, too many brass hats. The Australian navy, which is only about one-half the size of the Canadian navy, I notice has five officers above the rank of captain, while we have seven. In comparison with the British navy it can be said that we are not too heavily staffed in the higher ranks. Indeed I think we are below the United Kingdom standard, for in the United Kingdom there are some one hundred and eighteen admirals while we have five, which is a definitely smaller proportion.

I shall say nothing on the general question of the propriety of such articles as those that appear in the January-February issue of Boating, beyond this, that several of the statements may well be deemed to constitute an offence against the defence of Canada regulations. Such matters as details of the construction of ships, and the armament of ships, are not matters that, in time of war at least, are usually made the subject of newspaper or magazine articles. More especially is this true when a person acquires knowledge of these matters in the course of his service as an officer.

Above and beyond these particular matters I think I must say something, although I say it with some reluctance, about the writer of the article himself. I believe that is necessary, because many people who have read his article, even though they may hear or read what I have to say to-day, may still feel that there must be something wrong somewhere when a former officer takes what ought to be the very serious step of attacking his own service.

Let me say on this point that the total number of persons employed in Fairmiles at this time is under one thousand, and this out of a total strength of something more than fifty thousand. So that with every consideration in the world for what the Fairmile fleet has done, and with every appreciation of the gallantry and fidelity of its members, the Fairmile fleet after all constitutes in men something less than one-fiftieth of the total strength of the Canadian navy.

Now a word about the author, because his experience and ability are proper matters for consideration in a case of this kind. He has criticized the ability and the judgment of others; he cannot blame us if we look now at his own talents and his own training.

Commander MacLean is now in his forty-seventh year. He has reached an age when service in small ships becomes very trying, as we have found by unfortunate experience with many officers who have passed beyond the vigour and resilience of youth. He served in the last war with the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve for a little over two years, first as a probationary sub-lieutenant and latterly as a lieutenant. His service was mostly in small craft in the Mediterranean sea and his record was good. He commanded the Toronto division of the R.C.N.V.R. from 1927 to 1931, when he retired. In 1935 he was made a lieutenant-commander on the retired list. Just before the outbreak of this war he offered his services to the Canadian navy. Subsequently, no place having been found for him in the Canadian navy at the time, he became attached to the Canadian air force. However, during the first nine months of the war he had considerable correspondence with the naval department, with the result that on July 13, 1940, he was offered an appointment as lieutenant-commander. But he thought this rank was not high enough to induce him to leave the air force, where he was a flight lieutenant. He felt that he should be a commander. He was told that there was no such appointment available, and he finally agreed to accept an appointment as lieutenant-commander. In this capacity he took charge of a group of yachtsmen going to England, and he arrived there on September 23, 1940.

After spending some time at bases there, he was given command of a coastal trawler, and in December, 1940, he was appointed to the staff of rear admiral coastal command. From January to June, 1941, he was on the staff of captain of motor launches at a United Kingdom port. The whole time which he spent at sea in United Kingdom waters in this war could not have exceeded two or three months; I think that is a generous estimate. He returned to Canada in August, 1941.

At this point reference must again be made to certain parts of his article. For instance, on page 8 he states that he was sent back to Canada to help with the Fairmile sub-chasers that were building. There is no record whatever to show that he was sent back to Canada or asked for by Canada for this purpose. Later on in the article he refers to his experience as acceptance officer of the British Admiralty on Fairmile motor launches. I communicated with the British Admiralty on this point, and I am informed by them that though he was on the staff of the captain of motor launches and though he would have had certain duties in connection with Fairmiles under construction, he was never admiralty acceptance officer for this type of craft.

When he returned to Canada we did not have any reports on him from Great Britain, and, as one Canadian officer put it in making a report of Commander MacLean's ability later on, "we had to take him largely at his own valuation." At any rate we took him and placed him in charge of Fairmiles as senior officer Fairmiles. He was given a set of definite instructions and told to go ahead. He held this post as senior officer Fairmiles for nine months. If the Fairmile situation is as bad as he says it is, should not he as senior officer in those formative months bear at least some of the blame?

I pass on now to what is perhaps the most significant comment I have to make. I have looked over all the files relating to Commander MacLean and to his service, both in Canada and in England. He has sneered at and belittled the Canadian navy so violently and so openly; he has lauded the British navy so highly—and quite properly lauded it—that I expected to find in his records something to indicate that he stood very high indeed in the opinion of officials of the great British navy. But what did I actually find? I found that his standing in British naval circles was exactly the opposite of high. The reports by his senior Canadian officers are not very flattering, but one of them at least is absolutely fulsome when compared with the reports by officers of the royal navy. Some time in 1941, in answer to a request that he be given some sea service, he was told in England that an endeavour would be made to send him to sea, but that he would not be considered for a command. These facts from the record, from the opinions of British and Canadian officers alike, together with the fact that his experience at sea in this war is quite limited, I think will have to be borne in mind in valuing his article.

I have only one word more to say. Boating has an editorial in the same issue suggesting that the House of Commons should order an inquiry into the administration of the navy. Remember, about a year ago the same magazine was threatened by a naval officer with a libel suit, and had to offer an apology for making incorrect statements. But I may inform Boating that if this House of Commons wishes to order an inqury into the administration of the navy, either in respect of Fairmiles or in any other particular, I shall be quite content, and I have no fear whatever of the result.

I have always conceived the main function of the Canadian navy up to the present to be that of convoy work in the north Atlantic. It has other tasks on our coasts and on other seas, and as this house knows, more recently its work has been extended to the Mediterranean sea, where some Canadian ships of war—we were told yesterday that we had none—have already gained great distinction for themselves, and where unfortunately one has already met its end with a loss of thirty-five lives. The value of our naval contribution up to the present stands or falls on that work. A few weeks ago I stated publicly that more than forty per cent of the burden of escorting convoys from these shores to the United Kingdom falls on the ships, officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy. That is the most precious, the most vital line in the world to-day, the line that runs from America to the United Kingdom, and more than forty per cent of the work of guarding that line falls on Canadian naval officers and men.

No matter what individuals may be attacked, ministers, chiefs of staff or other naval officers; no matter what innuendos may be cast or opinions offered, one fact will remain outstanding, namely, that to organize and carry out such a programme from small beginnings and under the stress of war conditions is not a minor contribution to the war effort; it is not the sort of contribution that is made by inefficient, incompetent or careless men.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think every member of this house, regardless of the position he may occupy, at least will agree with the statement of the minister as to the magnificent service being rendered by the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy at this time. I would not rise in my place this afternoon to attempt for a moment to belittle the Canadian navy; rather I desire to point out to the minister, as I pointed out last year to the Minister of National Defence during the debate on the war appropriation bill, that after all these men and these departments are not infallible. We must not get into the habit of lightly tossing aside every suggestion with respect to the betterment of these services which already are doing good jobs, even though we may sometimes be termed arm-chair critics in war time. It is possible that these departments may render even better service. It is not my desire therefore to speak from any narrow point of view or to belittle any of our services.

I do not apologize to the minister for having suggested that he should make a full statement with regard to this article. I am not an expert on naval affairs, but to me this article appeared to have been written by one who because of his experience, should know what he was talking about, and it seemed to me it was deserving of the attention of the minister and the house, so that the navy might be able to profit by the statements and charges contained therein. I think that is the stand the country would expect to be taken by the leader of an opposition.

I was interested, of course, in the defence to the charges put forward by the minister. Upon one point he raised I should like to comment further; that is, his suggestion that this was a serious step for Commander MacLean to take. I know nothing of what may have been the underlying motive in this case, because I merely read the article and must go by that entirely, but I agree with the minister that it was a step which this man must have known when he took it. But when the minister suggests that this article may contravene some provision of the defence of Canada regulations, then I say that he has said either too much or too little. During the last seven or eight months we have had an experience in Canada with respect to charges laid under the defence of Canada regulations. If this article, or these charges, by Commander MacLean actually contravene the defence of Canada regulations in any way it is the duty of the minister and the duty of the government to prosecute both the magazine and the author of this article to the full extent of the law. We as members of this house must realize, I think, that we cannot allow men, no matter how high they may stand in naval circles or in public life, to contravene or offend against the defence of Canada regulations. The minister must now make up his mind with respect to the position he is to take. I should like to ask him if, in view of the serious charges which have been preferred, this matter has been referred to the Department of Justice for an opinion, as would ordinarily have been done.

What I say is not said in defence of the author of this article. I have no desire to defend anyone at the moment with respect to these charges. I am only anxious to have one thing happen. If there is something that can be done to make our naval board and our whole naval contribution in this war more effective and more nearly perfect, that should be the sole aim and object of every one of us. We must not indulge in carping or quibbling criticism of our navy, and I do not want that to be done. If there is something to this, then I think we must utilize it for the benefit of Canada and for the benefit of the navy on this particular occasion.

I am informed that on October 28, 1942, there was issued from naval services headquarters a release with respect to the retirement of this man. I know nothing about his record other than what the minister has told us; consequently I have no desire to dilate upon that. However, the press release from naval headquarters did say—I point this out to the minister so that he can check on it; I do not want to enter into any controversy with respect to it—that this man had retired from the naval service at his own request. At the end of the quotation in connection with the release it indicated that on his return to Canada last year he was appointed senior officer in charge of Fairmiles. At that time there was only one boat and he was instrumental in developing this branch of the Royal Canadian Navy to the large and efficient force it is today. I do not make this statement with any desire to defend the man who has made these charges, because I want to make it clear and have it distinctly understood that so far as we are concerned we are anxious only that should there be anything in these charges which will bring about a closer approach to perfection in our naval services, it should be looked into.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This matter is not debatable, but there is one point that I should like to make quite clear. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has referred repeatedly in his remarks to charges. I think the minister has made it perfectly plain that while the article contained numerous allegations and innuendoes there was not one specific charge against the Canadian Navy as a service or any officer of the Canadian Navy. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any charge to make, the minister has already made it clear that he will not hesitate concerning an investigation into that charge. I do not think it should remain on the record that there are charges which have not been fully met. As a matter of fact there have been only allegations and statements. These have been answered, I think to the complete satisfaction of this house, by the minister.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The minister has made a reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). This reply was at considerable length and under our rules and the rules of the British house the question should have been answered categorically and handed in, to appear in Hansard the next day. The minister did not do that; he made a long speech justifying his administration. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the reply should have been handed in in writing, because it is not debatable. Then we could have seen it next day and if there were any questions to be asked, they could be asked then. In my opinion, and in view of the minister's reply, a naval board should go into this matter. The whole department seems to be top-heavy with admirals, some of them being on the shore.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the light of the importance of the statement made by the minister I was willing that some latitude should be allowed to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), but I point out that there is nothing before the Chair at the present time.

Mr. CHURCH: Admitting that, may I be pardoned if I say that it is a wide stretch of the rules to allow on the orders of the day a debate which has lasted nearly an hour. A navy board or a commission should be appointed to go into this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): On the point of order, may I say that on three different occasions I was asked to comment on the statement which had been made by Commander MacLean, and it was in response to a request from the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that I made the statement which I made to-day. I could not give it in any briefer form.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister might also look into the navy mansion houses, one of them on Crescent road, Toronto—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —that are used when many of our soldiers' families are living in hovels.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. L.-Philippe PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in rising to proceed with the remarks which I started to make last night I should like my first words to be words of welcome to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I should like him to be assured that we all rejoice at seeing him back in his seat and in such apparent good health. We appreciate the considerable strain he is under at all times and the heavy burdens which he has to carry. Whatever may be the opinion of some of us about certain of the policies upon which he may advise the government, I do not think anyone will deny the extent of the service which he renders to his country at a moment like this.

There was an unforgivable omission in my remarks last evening. When I started to speak I wanted to keep my remarks as brief as possible because I knew I had only fifteen minutes before eleven o'clock. I omitted to congratulate the new parliamentary leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). Many have wished him long life in his present position, but I cannot be that cruel. Let us say that we wish him a better fate than that of some of his immediate predecessors. Since he is quite young, let us say that we wish him to reach the head treasury bench when he is the same age as the only one of his immediate predecessors, who became Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett. Then after a short tenure of office, he could enter the House of Lords as Viscount Graydon of Peel.

In an effort to keep my remarks last evening as brief as possible I skipped from one subject to another and there were one or two remarks in connection with lease-lend which I postponed making. As I have a few minutes at my disposal, I shall make them now.

I have expressed my entire approval of the new set-up for lease-lend, and I do not intend to withdraw anything I have said in that connection. I should not like either that anything I will say now be construed as qualifying or conditioning what I said last night. It is said that we are to extend credit to any nation up to the amount they can pay and that we will then continue to provide goods as long as they are needed for the war effort or for the safety of the united nations. This brings to my mind the fact that the control of one of the most important Canadian corporations is allegedly still held in private hands in England. I refer, of course, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The railway problem in Canada has been one of our anxieties. Many remedies have been proposed by the railways and by the different railway groups, and there may be opposition to the plan I suggest.

I wonder whether it would be possible to do over there what has been done to a certain extent here. All United States securities at present held by Canadians are listed with the foreign exchange control board, and under the rules which now prevail the board can offer to Canadians a fair market value in Canadian funds for these securities. That would give the board, or the government, United States funds for the financing of our war purchases in that country. Why would it not be possible for the British government to do the same thing with shares of Canadian or foreign corporations—have them listed and get control of them, paying for them in English currency? That could be done without any disturbance to international exchange. These shares could then be transferred to the Canadian government, which would hold them as part payment for the goods we shall send to Great Britain under lease-lend. That would seem to be a perfectly normal and fair exchange.

When the United States gave to Great Britain fifty old destroyers, Britain in return granted the United States bases in certain British islands or territories which the United States considered necessary for its own defence. Those bases may be in the hands of our good neighbours for longer than a few weeks or a few years. Would it not be considered another fair exchange if financial control of one of our largest corporations passed finally into the hands of Canada? Would it not simplify matters when the time comes that we shall have to face the railway problem in Canada if at that time the Canadian government, or an independent corporation under the government, such as the foreign exchange control board, owned or controlled the shares of the C.P.R. now held outside this country? It is a well-known fact that prior to this war and prior to the last war a considerable amount of this stock was held in Germany, France, Holland, and a large part of it in the British isles. Such stock as is now in alien hands is being taken care of by the custodian of enemy property. Would if not be possible to arrive at an arrangement with Great Britain for the transfer of such shares as are held in Britain, as an appropriate compensation for whatever we may do under lease-lend?

[Mr. Picard.]

It also occurs to me that the Labrador question, which was settled so nicely by the privy council in 1926, if I remember correctly, might be the subject of negotiations, let us say, between the two governments. Not that I should like to pose as a Canadian imperialist or be suspected of a desire to promote Canadian imperialism. I see my good friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) smiling when I use the word "imperialism", because he knows how much I am against British imperialism as applied to Canada; I certainly should not like to advocate Canadian imperialism and spread that doctrine all over this continent. But would it not be a good opportunity for Canada to clear up the Labrador situation? There are vast water powers on the Hamilton river of which we were deprived by a scholarly judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council in 1926. Nobody would dare suggest that that body was tinged with political influences or affected by imperial policies; however, at that very time an imperial conference was sitting in London in which Newfoundland had a vote. But Newfoundland is now administered by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and an arrangement could be arrived at granting Canada substantial benefits which, counted in dollars, would be considerable in years to come, if not at the moment. That might be a splendid gesture for the United Kingdom to make in return for what we may graciously decide to grant her under lease-lend.

When the house rose at eleven o'clock last night I was discussing the case of some young agriculturists who had been called up under the mobilization act. I told the story of one of these men, and I ended by saying that the board had decided that he should go into the army and that in the spring he could put in an application for six months' leave so that he could work on the farm in its busy season. But getting a release from the army is not as simple as it may appear at first sight, even when the man has a good case, and I will come to that in a moment. Lest some of my previous remarks be construed as disparaging the revision board sitting at Quebec I wish to state emphatically that I have the greatest respect for all members of the board, and especially for the chairman. I think that they deserve all possible praise for the manner in which they perform their arduous task, and they do it with a great sense of equity and justice. But their hands are tied by a lot of silly regulations, and on many other questions they lack immediate information on different government policies with respect to exemptions or deferments which may be given to farm hands and farmers' sons. I would say further—this may sound personal, but I must express my feeling—that the board at Quebec is advised by a representative of the registrar's office who to my mind is the man least qualified to occupy such a position of trust. His very presence on the board is sufficient to take away any respect for the law and its administration on the part of anybody who may be appearing before the board.

In the case to which I referred a moment ago, this man, file in hand, was trying to impress on the board that the young applicant was hiding behind special privileges granted to industrial workers while all the time he was classified as B2, and when his class was called he reported and left the factory where he was engaged. He was given no special privileges as a specialist; yet this man who was advising the board was continually emphasizing that point. At every moment of the board's proceedings when I have been there this man has acted in the same way. I thought at one moment that his conduct might be attributable to the fact that his own name translated into English means "let us win"—but I afterwards discovered that he had not served in any war, so that that motive might not be applicable to him. My point is that if there are many men on the boards like this man it is not surprising that in some places there have been complaints against the boards from people engaged in agriculture. If agriculture is to be protected, clear instructions should be sent to all the boards and to all the officers, and such men as the one who represents the registrar before the board of revision in Quebec should be dismissed. As to the registrar himself in Quebec, I consider him an able and efficient public servant, who performs his duties conscientiously and well.

I spoke a few moments ago of releases from the army. That is a much more difficult problem. These boys who appeal for release have been sent into the army in many cases because of their ignorance as to the proper manner of filling out the information sheets sent into the registrar's office, or because they did not know that they could appeal from the registrar's decision, or because of a decision of the board based on incomplete information supplied by the applicant. In some cases the file is misinterpreted.

In some cases the boy may have been properly sent into the army and the father who is left on the farm may be injured or become seriously ill, or perhaps the boy's elder brother may be in that position, which makes the boy's presence on the farm necessary for its efficient operation. In either case considerable correspondence and endless delays take place before you can get any satisfactory results, if any. I know that we should proceed carefully in this matter and that we should not permit anybody and everybody to withdraw from the army. There should be some way in which these cases could be rapidly eliminated, especially when the spring comes, the season when men are most needed on the farms.

I will not go into the detail that I had intended to about two cases which I know of. In one case there was a delay of six months; in the other, five months have gone and no answer has yet been received. There have been medical examinations by doctors; statements have been submitted as to the size of the farms, and in one case, although the father had become permanently injured, the son had not asked for exemption, but application was made later, and we are still awaiting the result. I refer to these matters to show the necessity of a clear-cut policy as regards the farm workers, and the importance of advising the boards immediately on this question, so that uniform decisions will be arrived at all over Canada.

All men in trades directly connected with agriculture should be dealt with in the same way. For instance, where a man is a blacksmith, and the only one in the neighbourhood, and you cannot find another one within ten miles, the consequences are serious if he is taken into the army; yet in one case it is admitted that he is necessary to agriculture, and he is given a deferment; in another case deferment is not granted. Or take the case of a man who is operating a flour mill, perhaps the only one for several miles around: one board may decide not to grant a deferment, while another board may say that he is necessary to agriculture and must be retained at his work so that farming may proceed in his district. Uniform decisions should be easily arrived at in matters such as this, if the government would send to each of the boards a straight and clear-cut announcement of policy in this respect.

There is another thing I would like to speak about while I am on this general question. It concerns those who for one reason or another are considered at fault under the mobilization regulations. A right move was the decision arrived at some time ago to give a chance to register to all those who had failed to do so. This privilege could have been better explained in the press, although it was something to have it. It should be extended, I think, to everyone whose position is not regular under the old regulations. Of the men technically at fault, I would say that ninety per cent are in such a predicament because of their ignorance, or the ignorance of their parents, or lack of information which should have been supplied to them. They are now hesitant to regularize their situation, and procrastinate in doing so because they fear reprisals and punishment.

I think the department should declare an amnesty, let us say of two months, for all those whose situation is irregular. Give them two months in which to report in writing to the nearest district mobilization bureau. At the same time the registrars should send a further notice to all those whose cases are irregular, those who did not get their notices from their local post offices, those who have failed to report for medical examination, or those who have failed to report to camp. Let them know that if they come forward and report, their case and whatever requests they may make for deferment or exemption will be studied and decided on their merits, and let them have no fear of punishment and reprisals if they get to camp because they are in some cases many months late. Let them come forward: if they have a good case give them deferment; if not, let them go in the army, but without any special hardship or punishment when they get in. The results, I am sure, would be good throughout Canada, because this is not a problem peculiarly applicable to Quebec; from what we see of the results of registrations in many districts it is much more general. In this way we would clear up a false situation which exists now in many parts of the country.

To this new advice should be added the questionnaire which is sent to all men engaged in agriculture, and they should receive two copies so that they can retain one. At the moment there is this process. A man receiving a questionnaire fills it up; if he is deferred for six months or some other period, the present practice is to ask him to fill a new questionnaire if his category is called anew, or if the delay given to him has expired. If in the meantime there has been a change in the farm stock; if the number of cows or pigs does not exactly agree with the number given in the previous return, if the man has one acre more or less in hay or barley or potatoes than was indicated on the previous questionnaire, immediately it is assumed that the man is trying to cheat the government, and whatever he says afterwards is regarded with suspicion. If these matters could be clearly explained, if the proper information were supplied to everybody, there would be considerably less trouble. As a matter of fact I received a letter yesterday from a registrar informing me:

[Mr. Picard.]

In answer to your letter asking me to send you a hundred copies of the questionnaire for the use of farmers, I must tell you that I have adopted the policy of not sending out copies of this questionnaire except to the interested party himself, because in the past there have been a number of abuses which have caused us worry.

I thought that was a very inappropriate answer to send to a member of parliament who is asking for information on a public matter.

In conclusion I should like to impress upon the house the difficult situation in which some farmers find themselves at this juncture. They do not know how to plan their production for the next year. They do not know where they will stand so far as help is concerned. On the one hand they are advised by the Department of Agriculture to produce more and more—which is good advice; on the other hand they face mobilization orders and varying interpretations in each district by the mobilization board. They do not know where they will be if they are without the help of their sons or their farm-hands. So far as production is concerned, they face a shortage in certain supplies which they need.

I had some trouble about the dairy question in my district, where men have increased their herds and produced more. This is one of the questions mentioned by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when he interested himself in the fate of the processors of butter, those who processed their butter at home instead of sending their milk to the dairies. He may have some trouble in his district because of lack of transport. We are nearer the city; we have not so much trouble in that respect, but above all things we need cans. We have no containers, and under the new regulations it is going to be very hard to get them because they are not so quickly made in these days. I have fortunately good news to-day, because in a letter I have received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) he informs me that the production of cans in January was nearly fifteen times as great as it was in January of last year. Last year there was a real lack of containers throughout the country, and especially in our district, where people extended their herds, enlarged their agricultural and dairy production to meet the demand, and, having facilities for transport, thought it would be easy to meet requirements. According to the letter from the minister, last year, in January, one of the largest companies produced only 1,026 cans, while in January of this year, upon a specially urgent request from the Department of Agriculture they produced 16,038 cans. If this goes on, and if the good offices of the Minister of Agriculture are exerted in the same proportion all the way through, we may be in a better position in the months to come. But at the moment our farmers in my district are suffering from this shortage. They used to spread their small production of home processed butter in the adjoining district in quantities of twenty-five or thirty pounds. Under the new rationing regulations they cannot do that; they have to dispose of their production wholesale. Some of these places have no cold storage, so that they are forced to produce less because they cannot find containers to send their product to the city, nor can they dispose of it under the new rationing regulations.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer while on the subject of rationing. It may not be exactly in my field, but it concerns workmen. It seems strange to me that men who are working hard in industry, who leave their homes in the morning and do not return until evening, are not given a larger ration of butter, let us say, than men who are idle, or, as is true of many, are doing nothing in their homes, or are office workers. The man who leaves home in the morning, or at night for the night shift, is usually unable to come home for his meals; he has to have sandwiches or other things of the kind, and he must have sufficient butter. If he has only a share of the family ration or of his own ration the meal will not be so appetizing. I wonder if something could not be done in that regard. It may be difficult to arrange it but I fancy it has been done in other countries. It might be possible to stamp the books of factory workers who are under a special strain, so as to give them some special consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PICARD: I shall take only a minute longer, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house. Last year when we were discussing bill No. 80 I came across a passage in the British Hansard with reference to the question of agriculture, which I should like to submit to the house. In a speech, the Rt. Hon. Eugene Wason, chairman of the committee that considered relief to agriculture in Scotland, made this statement:

> It should be represented to the military authorities—

That was in 1916, a year and a half after the war started.

> —that any attempt to maintain or increase the food production of the country would be made impossible by the further withdrawal of experienced workmen.

In conclusion, sir, may I say this. Let us not forget that the land is the first element that enters into the question of production. Farming is the primary industry and the most essential in carrying on a war, because the best trained men, with the best and most modern equipment, cannot fight on an empty stomach.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): While it is hard to realize, the fact is that this is the fourth war session of the nineteenth parliament of Canada, and since it is a war session I suggest that it is essential that, throughout its length, the members of this house should keep before them a clear view of the war situation. By so doing they will help the Canadian people also to keep a clear view of that situation. As I see it, the picture is this. The united nations are at last able to turn to the offensive. There have been victories, grand victories, particularly in Russia and in North Africa. We have some reason to take heart, but let us remember that behind us defeat is barely out of sight, and ahead are tremendous tasks. The year 1943 will be a year of fierce fighting, and fierce fighting means heavy casualties. Therefore, for this house and for the country, the most important part of the speech from the throne should be the last paragraph, which reads:

> We have reason to be profoundly grateful for the improved position of the united nations. We must be careful, however, not to be misled by recent successes. The submarine menace has been growing, not diminishing. Decisive battles have still to be fought and won. For some time past, the movement of munitions and supplies overseas has been seriously restricted because of submarine activities. Until that grave menace is effectively controlled, there is always the danger that reinforcements and supplies in sufficient volume may not reach the battle zones. As areas of conflict close in, fighting will increase in intensity and ferocity.

I stress the next sentences:

> The hardest battles, the heaviest sacrifices, may be in the future. Only the utmost sustained effort on the part of all the united nations will ensure defeat of the axis powers.

With that warning in mind, let us look out across the seas. Canada is a nation facing both great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific. To-day Canadians look across the Atlantic and see a frightfully powerful Germany, which has yet to be beaten to her knees, a Germany dominating the whole of the continent of Europe. They look across the Pacific to Asia and see another powerful nation, Japan, dominating many lands, a nation which must be attacked, a nation which has already won great victories, a nation which is now coiled and ready to strike. Its premier showed this quite clearly when he said in the Japanese diet three weeks ago, as reported in the press:

Reviewing the first year of war in greater east Asia, Premier Tojo asserted Japan "has completed the basis for certain victory". "Our position for both offence and defence has been completed," Tojo declared.

The former ambassador from the United States to Japan has written a book entitled "Report from Tokyo: a Message to the American People." That is a book which I suggest should be read by every member of the Canadian House of Commons. He points out clearly what we face in the Japanese military machine. He refers to it in these words:

I have indicated the surprise and the shock I experienced on returning to the United States to find how little the American people, as a whole, appreciate the dangers we face in fighting this machine, a machine which, without any shadow of doubt, firmly intends, after consolidating the areas it has temporarily occupied in greater east Asia, to attack countries in the western hemisphere.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the war situation which confronts members of this house and the Canadian people to-day, in the month of February 1943; and this picture of the war situation at once brings to mind certain subjects which should be considered by this House of Commons during the present session.

First, questions having to do with our fighting forces. We have been led to believe that our Canadian army in Great Britain will lead the attack when the continent of Europe is invaded. If so, and there seems to be no doubt of it, they are entitled to and should get training in actual fighting before they are called upon to lead that invasion. They will be attacking an army that has been fighting for nearly four years. One wonders why Canadian units have not been sent, say, to North Africa, for war experience. It is true that some officers and non-commissioned officers have been sent there. But why have no Canadian units been sent abroad as such? Why have the Canadian units been held so closely in Great Britain? One wonders whether it has been because that is the Canadian government's policy or whether it is because the Canadian staff overseas insist on keeping direct control at all times over all Canadian units. I would point out to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and to this house that in any event such war training now would probably mean greater efficiency and far fewer casualties when the Canadians are called upon to lead in the invasion of the European continent.

[Mr. Green.]

One wonders, too, whether there are sufficient reinforcements in Great Britain to keep our Canadian army up to strength once fighting begins. We know there will be heavy losses. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) warned Canada of this in his New Year's message when he was reported as follows:

Prime Minister Mackenzie King, in a New Year's message, warned the Canadian people that "all our armed forces" will be in action during 1943 and that they "must be prepared for heavy losses".

There is concern across the country as to whether adequate reinforcements are available. This question is so important that I ask the government to give the Canadian people immediately definite assurance that adequate reinforcements are available, and to arrange for a secret session of the House of Commons at which the members may be given the facts with regard to reinforcements, such facts as cannot be given out to the public.

We also have an army on the Pacific coast. Their job is to fight the Japanese. Why have not units, or at least officers and non-commissioned officers from the Pacific army been sent to the southwest Pacific where they could learn by actual experience the best methods to use in fighting the Japanese? Such action would increase the efficiency of the Pacific army, raise the morale of the men serving in it, and promote good feeling between Canada and the United States and between Canada and Australia. In fact Major-General Odlum, who is now our ambassador to China and was formerly our minister in Australia, went further. Late in November he advocated in Toronto that Canada send troops to the southwest Pacific theatre of war to assist General Douglas MacArthur. He is quoted as saying:

The best defence for this country is not a group of divisions sitting passively in Canada, but some additional force—even as little as one division—sent to General MacArthur, so that, on the Japanese tender southern flank, he may pass from the defensive to a vigorous local offensive.

General Odlum was the first commander of the second Canadian division overseas. Whether or not he is right, the fact is that sooner or later Canadian troops will be fighting Japanese troops, and if forced to do so without some war experience, the result will be increased casualties and perhaps lost battles.

Then a further question in regard to the fighting forces: How can the officers commanding in the Pacific army be expected to keep their units efficient and to instil in their men the spirit of the offensive when they have in the units two kinds of troops, one group who have enlisted for service anywhere, and half or more than half who cannot be sent out of Canada? Furthermore, those officers commanding are put in the invidious position that their units must serve beside United States units the men of which can be sent anywhere in the world. Canada is put in an impossible position in that regard. I urge the government to change its policy, cut out all delay and all political considerations and change its policy, bringing in a realistic policy by making all Canadian troops, certainly all Canadian troops serving in the Pacific army, available for service anywhere in the Pacific area.

Another question is whether our navy is getting sufficient escort ships to beat the U-boat menace on the Atlantic, and if not, why not? Last week a startling statement was made in Toronto by Mr. Desmond A. Clarke, director general of shipping, in which he pointed out that men were to be taken out of other war industries in order to help build escort ships. He is quoted as saying:

> And we need them right now (referring to the men) not for cargo ships but for fighting escort vessels. We must lick the submarine. There is no use building more cargo ships to have them sunk.

Why should the men of the merchant navy, men who are facing such great hazards, not be treated as members of the other fighting forces? Why should they not be given the same statutory right to pension, and why should they not get the same income tax exemption? I suggest that these are things that should be changed without further delay.

One final question concerning the fighting forces is whether the time has not come, in fact whether it is not long since past, for the awarding of all pensions on the insurance principle, which, as hon. members know, now applies only to men once they leave the shores of Canada. I suggest it is high time that all men serving in the active army were protected by the insurance principle with regard to pension. It is also time that steps were taken to protect from cancellation the insurance policies which our men had taken out before they enlisted or were called up. Great hardship is being suffered by many married men in that connection, and something should be done to remedy the situation.

A second subject that should be considered at the war session is Canada's position in the group of nations known as the united nations. There are many signs of the growth in Canada of a "small-power complex," a feeling that we must run along behind Great Britain and the United States. Take, for example, the government itself; it apparently is quite content to be left out of all the major conferences. Last year it had to be prodded into claiming a seat for Canada on the Pacific council. This question is vital for Canada, because we are at the parting of the ways. Canada can eventually become one of the most influential powers in the world. I do not say one of the largest; I use the word "influential," far more influential than perhaps our numbers would justify. But we never will if we develop a small-power complex; other nations certainly will not take us at higher than our own valuation. If there is not a change in that respect, Canada will have very little to say at the peace conference, and this might mean great tragedy for the Canadian people; many of them have definite ideas, and very sound ideas, as to what sort of peace they want. Yet the larger nations may decide on some other type of peace that prevents the kind of world Canadians want from taking shape. Canada, I say, must make herself heard, and heard in no uncertain manner, on these questions.

A third subject which should be considered is this: this house should insist that Canada's man-power policy be "work or fight." It is just as simple as that. The picture at present is that there is a shortage of men for agriculture, logging, mining and many other vital occupations, such, for example, as fuel delivery. At the same time ministers are actually talking about Canada reaching her full production. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has thrown out the hint that it is questionable whether Canada can produce any more. I thought I detected in the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day something to the same effect. This is a great mistake, because there are still many Canadian people who are impatient and anxious to do their share in connection with the war effort. It is simply a matter of mobilizing them. Many cannot find a place; for example, older people, and men and women carrying on their ordinary work during the day who are nevertheless willing to do part-time work in the evening or during the week-end. Little or no attempt has been made to make use of their services. Canadians are begging for direction from the government, while at the same time some at least of the national selective service offices are carrying on in the utmost confusion and with the utmost delay; long lines of people seeking work cannot get any satisfaction, and apparently no one is able to give direction.

It can all be traced to the policy of the government of not quite a year ago, which was "the negative compulsion of restriction," the same old policy that had been used in raising men for the forces, except that it was described by a different name. It is really a policy of coaxing, threatening and bluffing, instead of courageously leading, and is exactly the policy we have had in connection with the raising of troops. As one looks back over the past year it becomes interesting to read again newspaper dispatches appearing on March 25, 1942, when this "negative compulsion of restriction" policy was announced, and to find this:

The government yesterday launched an extended national selective service plan designed to obtain from every Canadian the utmost contribution to the war effort through application of "the negative compulsion of restriction."

Then it goes on:

Fruit of months of planning under direction of the cabinet war committee, a series of orders in council was tabled by the Prime Minister, giving effect at once to the new regulations.

I am sure you will remember, Mr. Speaker, how excited and thrilled we were that Canada was really going to see action with regard to the use of her man-power. Then a couple of months later, in May, 1942, we saw another splurge, as follows:

Canada prepared to-day to take up the last slack in man-power, when it was announced by Elliott M. Little, director of national selective service, that all unemployable male persons, including persons on pension, must be registered within one week of June 1 and renew their registration every two weeks while not employed.

Important sidelight divulged by Mr. Little to a press conference this morning was that the government not only intends to dredge its man-power pool to the bottom, but may move war industry into sections where most unemployment is reported.

So we went along until August, when the Prime Minister announced new man-power controls. This was after parliament had gone home, and we read:

Prime Minister Mackenzie King on Wednesday night announced proposed new measures of control over man-power and woman-power designed to place "all but very old, the very young and the disabled" behind the war effort.

Then on August 31 we had more headlines:

Compulsory employment for all under new selective service; no transfers without permit.

Regulations under which every unemployed Canadian must seek work were announced to-day by Labour Minister Mitchell and Elliott M. Little, director of national selective service. They go into effect at midnight to-night.

The next thing we heard was that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had gone to Great Britain. While over there he gave an interview, in the course of which we find these words:

. . . application in Canada of some features of Britain's man-power policy may be forthcoming when he returns to the dominion. He described Britain's mobilization of men and women for service in the armed forces and industry as "a magnificent piece of organization."

Months before that, the British had gone much further than Canada, when they conscripted for national service, either in the armed forces or in industry, all men between eighteen and a half and forty-five years of age, with similar provisions for women between twenty and thirty. The Minister of Labour was to come back and make things hum. Well, he came back and then followed a quarrel with Mr. Elliott Little. So that we have drifted along under the same policy, which is typified by an order in council issued on January 28, 1943, amending the national selective service mobilization regulations. On December 11, 1942, an order in council had been passed under which all men of certain age groups who had not reported for service were directed to report by February 1. The order in council of January 28, 1943, just three days before the men were to report, reads in part:

And whereas it is deemed necessary for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada and for the efficient prosecution of the war that the time within which every designated man aforesaid is required so to report be extended. . . .

Then it goes on to extend the time until March 1, and I suppose there will be a further extension to April 1. I think the reaction of the public to this man-power policy may be expressed in the words "disappointment" and "disillusionment". The government must stop dodging and twisting on man-power; it must give clear, courageous leadership based on a policy of "work or fight", and I am confident that the people will respond. Accordingly there should be no doubt about my support for the amendment to the speech from the throne, particularly the paragraph which regrets the failure—

. . . to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man- and woman-power.

Then I come to my fourth subject. The speech from the throne mentions the need for a scheme of social insurance which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada, and a committee is to be set up to study the question. This is all to the good, but there seems very little chance that any legislation will materialize at this session, which means that Canada will continue to hold her present unenviable position as the most backward socially of the English-speaking nations of the world. Many hon. members, in all parties, wish to see humane legislation placed upon the statute books without further delay; in fact they insist that this be done. I suggest that during this session, while this scheme of social insurance is being studied, at least two great needs should be met. Those are the needs of our old age pensioners and of the recipients of the war veterans' allowance. These people are in an impossible position at the present time, with the cost of living as it is, and I suggest that they should receive at least $1 a day if unmarried and $2 a day where the husband and wife are together. Moreover, the regulations should be amended with regard to their opportunity to earn some extra income. At the present time, as the War Veterans' Allowances Act is being administered, great unfairness is being done those old soldiers who are able to go out and get jobs perhaps for only a few months. The new age is here now; it is not coming after the war. We are now in the new age when humanity, rather than material things, should be our first concern, and a very good place to start doing something about it is by meeting these needs I have mentioned.

Then fifth and finally there is the attitude of the ministry toward this house, and in this I am sure I shall have some support from hon. members on the government side. Last year I had an uncomfortable feeling that the ministers cared very little what went on in the house, as long as they personally were not hurt too much; that the debates were allowed to drag; that the house was used as a sort of safety-valve while the cabinet did the legislating by order in council. The press gallery had that feeling, too, as well as the public; and respect for parliament fell. If this is not changed it may lead to the break-down of parliamentary government in this country. I could give many examples, but I shall limit myself to two. In the first place it has been said repeatedly by hon. members on all sides of the house that parliament should have at least some check on the orders in council and administrative orders that are going through the mill in such volume these days. Yet the ministry have not provided any means whereby such check can be exercised. It cannot be done satisfactorily in the house, but there is nothing to prevent the setting up of a committee of members to which these orders in council and administrative orders could be referred for consideration.

The Canadian people need the protection of parliament against some of these orders. For example, last fall there was the threat of an order being put through to force the early closing of small merchants' stores. In Vancouver, and I assume the situation was the same in many other centres, this would have meant the putting out of business of many small merchants, most of whom are veterans, widows or men and women who cannot do any other type of work. The reason given for the proposed order was that these people could be used in the war effort. I have always had the suspicion that somewhere behind it all was some man accustomed to big business who may have wanted to get rid of the competition of these small merchants. Any private member of this house, I do not care what his politics may be, would have known at once that such an order was foolish, but it took the controllers a long time to find this out. In the meanwhile these small people were caused a great deal of unnecessary worry.

There are other regulations, such as those having to do with taxis, the rental regulations, the national war services regulations and the fuel orders. All these should be considered carefully by this house. In the last few weeks there has been a great deal of trouble in Vancouver with regard to fuel; this year, incidentally, we have been forced to stop boasting about our mild climate. The fuel controller issued an order last summer that sawdust could not go over a certain price. Many of the sawdust dealers decided that they could not carry on at that price, and they simply went out of the sawdust business. The controller was not worried about this; all he did was to pass the order and let somebody else do the worrying. Then there were no men to deliver fuel. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) was not worrying about that; it was up to the fuel dealers to get the men. The dominion government has got into the habit of stepping in, but not stepping in the whole way. They step in just far enough to make a great deal of trouble, and then let the people do the worrying. Fuel is a necessity. In the speech from the throne when the last session was prorogued on January 27, we find these words:

> Where required, more equitable distribution of the necessaries of life has been ensured by the rationing of supplies to consumers.

This was not done with regard to fuel. In my city people suffered, and I think people died because they were unable to get fuel during the cold weather. This sort of business is not good enough for Canada in the year 1943. Yet we find the Vancouver Sun, a supporter of this government, reporting on a visit which Mr. Gordon, the head man, made to Vancouver on January 25, as follows:

> Mr. Gordon did not hesitate to rap Vancouver authorities and the Vancouver public for failing to heed warnings which he said his office had sent out.

He rapped them in the same tone in which he squelched speculative questions about future rationing of commodities and issued an implied warning to potato producers to bring out their potatoes.

Some of these moguls seem to have very little understanding of the problems of the small man who is the backbone of Canada, and their actions should be checked and checked carefully by this house.

My second example of how this government has flouted parliament is in connection with naturalization. The Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) will be interested in this. In 1940 a committee of this house was appointed to review the defence of Canada regulations. I happened to be a member of that committee. During the hearings we found many questions having to do with naturalization and with the deportation of enemy aliens which needed careful consideration, and on August 1, 1940, the committee recommended:

Your committee, therefore, recommends that at the next session of parliament a special committee of the house be appointed to consider and review the law relating to naturalization. Your committee is also of the opinion that the special committee should review as well the law relating to deportation and again consider and review the defence of Canada regulations.

At the next session, in 1941, a committee was set up again to consider the defence of Canada regulations, and was instructed to consider also the law relating to naturalization and deportation. It reported on June 4, 1941, as follows:

13. Naturalization—Deportation.

Your committee has received some evidence and has investigated these two important subjects in part only and, notwithstanding the fact that your committee has held a great many meetings, including on occasions two meetings a day, the limited time at our command has made it impossible to devote the time to these subjects which they require in order to enable a proper report to be made to the house.

Your committee therefore respectfully begs to recommend that at the next session of the house the law relating to naturalization and deportation and matters incidental thereto be the subject matter of a reference to a committee of the house.

During the following session of 1942 I asked on different occasions whether a committee was to be set up to study naturalization and deportation, and it was my understanding that this would be done. However, nothing happened. This was bad enough, but when we came back here in 1943 we found, if you please, that on July 9, 1942, while the house was sitting, an order in council was passed amending the naturalization regulations. Important changes were made in the regulations having to do with the necessity of an applicant filing a declaration of intention. Later, on September 23, another order in council was passed again amending the regulations. On January 14 of this year, just a little over a month ago, we find that an order in council was passed revising all the regulations under the Naturalization Act. All this has been done without any reference being made to the House of Commons. Apparently nothing has been done with regard to deportation, but perhaps we shall have an order in council on that subject popping out of the bag one of these days.

At this time both these matters are most important. The question of who is to be a Canadian citizen, what rights he is to have, how his fellow Canadians are to treat him and what we are to do with enemy aliens are matters that must be considered carefully. At the present time any enemy alien who is interned cannot be sent out of Canada after the war if he has been here for five years. That is the law as it stands at the present time. It is ridiculous and a change should be made, without further delay. I repeat that this is the time when the law should be carefully reviewed by parliament or by a committee of this parliament. Parliament and parliament alone should decide what is to be done in connection with these matters.

The subjects I have mentioned, the flouting of parliament by the cabinet, the need for humane legislation, the "work or fight" policy with regard to man-power, Canada's attitude toward the other united nations and the affairs of the fighting forces are vital subjects which should be considered by the House of Commons during this session.

The year 1943 will be one of severe testing for the Canadian people. They have shown great strength, not only in material resources but in character, and they will see this year through with courage no matter what tragedies may occur. I have no doubt of that. In return, however, they have the right to expect of their government bold leadership; they have the right to expect of their parliament, of this gathering of their elected representatives, the most careful consideration of all vital subjects, and may I suggest, consideration given in a patriotic spirit modelled on the spirit of our young Canadian airmen who will be flying in the skies over other countries far from their own homeland during every day that this house is in session.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, in common with many hon. members who have preceded me I should like to express my great pleasure at the favourable turn of events in the various theatres of war. I am sure we are all heartened by the successes which have attended our forces and those of our allies in Africa and in the Pacific, and particularly in the Soviet Union.

I cannot help expressing regret that the speech from the throne made no mention of the gallantry displayed by the Canadian troops at the battle of Dieppe. The constituency which I represent is the headquarters for the South Saskatchewan regiment. The commanding officer of that unit has the distinction of being the first Canadian in this war to be awarded the Victoria Cross, and other officers and men of the regiment were decorated for bravery and devotion to duty.

I want to support the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he asks the government that an opportunity be given this house as it was in the British house to discuss the Dieppe operation. The administration itself can best judge whether or not such discussion should take place in closed or in open session. But opportunity there must be; for while the gallantry of the men involved left nothing to be desired, that cannot be said of the staff work of those who were responsible for conducting this combined reconnaissance. There are several things which we ought to be told as members of this house, either privately or publicly, and the first thing is why there was no preparatory aerial bombardment to soften up the objective. My information is that in the original plan that was the intention, but at the last moment it was deleted. If this be true, we should know why. We should know why men were landed at high tide and taken off at low tide at an hour when anyone who is familiar with the channel tides would know that these men would have to cross four hundred yards of open beach to reach their barges. We should know why tanks were landed on a beach facing a twelve-foot sea wall which had not been breached. In 1936 I spent a day in the town of Dieppe, and I would imagine that even aerial photographs would show the impossibility of scaling a sea wall unless it had first been partly demolished by aerial bombardment. What astounds me is not that none of the tanks got off the beach, but that those who planned the operation ever expected them to do so.

I think this house should have some information from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) regarding any reports he may have respecting the weapons which were used in this operation; and if there were found any defects in quality or quantity we should have the assurance of the minister that this matter is being taken care of.

A recent newspaper report indicated that General McNaughton told press reporters that the lessons of Dieppe had been invaluable to the British and United States forces in their recent landings in North Africa. But, Mr. Speaker, General McNaughton and the Minister of National Defence will have to go much further than that. They will have to give the Canadian people the assurance that the lessons of Dieppe will be of value to our own forces when they are called upon to invade Europe. To lose sixty-seven per cent of our effectives in nine hours of action is a grievous loss, but I believe that those who lost their loved ones at Dieppe will be encouraged if they can be assured that the sacrifices made there will result in the saving of thousands of Canadian lives when our troops finally invade nazi-occupied Europe.

I have said repeatedly in this house that the people of Canada will forgive the defence ministers and their general staffs many things. But there is one thing they will never forgive them. They will not forgive them the loss of a single Canadian life on account of either incompetency or lack of carefully prepared planning. We all know that some attempt will be made to invade the continent this year, and that in all probability Canadian troops will be the spearhead of that attack. Casualties are inevitable—heavy casualties—and I believe the Canadian people will bear those casualties with fortitude; but they will demand the assurance that every possible precaution in the way of aerial support and meticulously laid plans has been taken in order to keep the casualties down to a minimum.

I do not say these things, Mr. Speaker, in order to reflect upon any person or persons on the general staffs, but we may just as well recognize the fact that the man on the street no longer believes in the infallibility of military experts. Some of these military experts were the same men who told us that the Maginot line was impregnable, and that the Russian army would last only six weeks. With such catastrophes in our minds as the campaign in Norway and the loss of Singapore and Tobruk, the man on the street is fearful lest the traditional conservatism of the military mind should result in fruitless and unnecessary sacrifices of human life. The Minister of National Defence and the other defence ministers can do much to allay such fears by being very frank with this house, either in open or in closed session, and telling us something of the lessons that have been learned, of the precautions which are being taken, and of the plans which are being laid to see to it that operations in the future will be successfully carried out with the minimum cost of human life.

The speech from the throne also makes mention of the Casablanca conference. I want to make only one reference to that. I believe there will be general disappointment that as yet the united nations have not stated in clear and unmistakable terms what their peace aims are. There are those, of course, who say, and they have said it in this debate, that our first job is to win the war, and that afterwards we can discuss the question of the world we want to build. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the winning of the war is to some extent dependent upon the kind of world we shall build afterwards. The people of the occupied countries and of the neutral countries, and above all our own people, wish to know what we are fighting for; and since the common people are paying for this war in blood, sweat and tears, they most certainly have the right to know.

In the past few months a number of things have happened which have done much to chill the enthusiasm of those who believed that we were fighting this war to establish the four freedoms in the world. There has been the recognition of General Mihailovic of Yugoslavia as against the guerilla peasants of his own country. There has been the recognition of the so-called Otto of Austria, who has been given permission to raise an Austrian battalion in the United States. There has been the sanctuary given to Prince Paul of Yugoslavia, a former nazi collaborationist now enjoying refuge in British Kenya. Above all, there has been the unsavoury deal with Messrs. Darlan, Flandin, Nogues and Peyrouton. Have we forgotten that these are the men who were responsible for the loss of British and Australian soldiers in Syria, for the death of British sailors at Oran and Dakar, and that some of these new-found friends of ours were responsible for the deaths of over one thousand United States troops at the recent landing at Casablanca? These pro-nazi collaborationists have had the Morocco radio turned over to them. The type of propaganda which has been coming from that source has been so vicious that even the state department of the United States has had to tell its own people not to take that propaganda too seriously.

The man on the street does not think in terms of subtle diplomatic distinctions, and he wants to know what we are fighting for. He wants to know whether we are seeking to destroy Hitler only to replace him with a lot of little Hitlers. Some will take the view that these matters do not concern us here, that they are the sole concern of the United States state department and the British Foreign Office. I protest most emphatically against that view. This is a global war. Whatever affects the united nations in any one part of the world affects all. To-day Canadian boys are flying over almost every continent, and if blood is the price of having a voice in building the world to-morrow, then Canada has bought and paid for a place in the councils of the nations. I should like to tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government that they will have the support of the great majority of the Canadian people if they urge upon the British and United States governments that there shall be an end of dealing with collaborationists, because we can convince the world of our good intentions after the war only if we take a firm and courageous stand during the war. The Prime Minister can render a great service to this country and the world by urging, particularly upon Great Britain and the United States, that the united nations shall state in clear and unmistakable terms what our peace aims are, and by showing the man on the street that we are not only seeking to destroy nazism and fascism in Germany and Italy, but seeking to destroy them wherever they raise their ugly heads anywhere in the world. The time has come when we have to get over having a colonial mind, when the government has to begin to conduct itself as befits the government of a self-governing nation within a great commonwealth of nations.

I should now like to come nearer home There are so many matters regarding which one might speak as affecting the welfare of our country in war time that it is impossible to deal with them all. I shall, therefore, confine myself to dealing with one subject, namely, the state and condition of agriculture as it affects the people of Canada and particularly the farmers of Saskatchewan. In doing this, may I say that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) said the other night that those of us in this corner in private conversations do not talk the same way as we do on the floor when we are discussing government policy. Let me say that we do not say to every government member whom we meet in the corridors what we think of the government's policy. We do not think that is necessary; we take it for granted that the government members know what we think of their policy. I would not think of wasting the hon. member's time or my own in trying to appeal to his reason to get him to leave the Liberal party. I have never really thought it was reason which kept him in the Liberal party.

The first comment I wish to make with regard to the government's agricultural policy is that it is apparent that there has been no satisfactory cooperation between the government ministers responsible and organized agriculture. On January 29 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) stated the grain policy for the coming year. In the course of his remarks he said that the government had arrived at this programme after full discussion with the wheat board, discussion with the advisory committee of the wheat board and some conference with the provincial agricultural authorities and the Canadian federation of agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: That was absolutely correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister says that is correct. I merely want to draw to the attention of the house that, according to the Regina Leader-Post of January 30, this is what Mr. Wesson said, speaking in Calgary at the annual convention of the Canadian federation of agriculture.

I resent the action of the Canadian government in completely ignoring nationally organized agriculture when laying down a major farm policy.

Mr. GARDINER: That statement was not based on the facts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Wesson is not only a national vice-president of the Canadian federation of agriculture, and president of the Saskatchewan pool; he is also a member of the advisory committee of the wheat board; and when Mr. Wesson makes a statement like that it seems to me that, whatever conference or consultation there may have been, certainly it was far from satisfactory, to elicit a statement like that from a man holding the position which he occupies.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted, I said in my speech the other day, with all of the delegation from the federation sitting in the galleries at the time, that the group had met the government just prior to our coming to this house and had agreed that there had been a misunderstanding when the statements were made at Calgary.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, as is said on the radio sometimes, "That ain't the way I heerd it." That is not what I heard from some of the delegates who were here. At any rate I will let the statement stand.

Mr. GARDINER: It is in a written statement, and is public property.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then we shall be very glad if the minister will table the statement.

Now, as to the government's agricultural policy, it seems to have been bedeviled, ever since the war started, with a series of improvisations and a total lack of any long-term, careful planning. There are a great many illustrations of this contradiction in policy, and it is rather significant that in all the speech from the throne there is no mention of the government's agricultural programme for the war period, but merely a statement of what they intend to do to help agriculture in the post-war period. This is significant for the simple reason that the government has not had a clearly defined agricultural policy for war time but, as I say, merely a series of improvisations and contradictions. Let us look at some of them.

Take, for instance, the contradiction of having the Minister of Agriculture and the food administrator saying to the farmers of Saskatchewan, we want you to increase pork production 70 per cent, and beef production and coarse grains by so much; and, on the other hand, the Department of National War Services taking man-power away at such a rate that it will be virtually impossible to hit the target set by the Department of Agriculture. The man-power question is something that will have to be gone into in greater detail as the session proceeds.

On March 23 last order in council P.C. 2252 was tabled, which gave the right of postponement to any man who was essential to agriculture. It placed the responsibility, not on the man to prove that he was essential, but on the board to prove that he was not essential. I can speak only for the province from which I come, but in that province little or no attention was paid to that order in council. The board continued to call men, and I am not laying the blame entirely on the board. The secretary has said to me repeatedly, in reference to cases that I have referred to him, "We are given a quota each month by the military authorities." They are faced with divided responsibility. The Department of Agriculture said, leave the men alone; the military authorities said, you must get so many men a month. The board could not, therefore, pay attention both to the order in council and to the request of the military authorities, and undoubtedly for the last year in Saskatchewan the decisions of the divisional board have been dominated almost entirely by the officer representing the military authorities in that province. The result is that our farms have been almost completely denuded of man-power. In some instances the last man on the farm has been called.

The Minister of Agriculture visited Saskatchewan in January and made a statement, as reported in the Regina Leader-Post, in which he said that the present regulations provide that any farmer can obtain postponement of military service merely by demanding it and showing that he is a farm worker. Well, nobody knows better than the minister how absurd that statement is. Suppose the farmer does demand postponement and suppose the board does not pay any attention to him; then what? In scores of instances men have made application to the board, and the board had so many of them that they did not even get to the man's application by the date on which he was supposed to report. He had, therefore, one of two choices. The Minister of Agriculture is saying something. He can make his speech afterwards. Let him sit up in his chair and dangle his feet until I make mine. As I was going to say, in many instances these men found that by the date upon which they were to report they had not heard from the board, and they had either to risk being arrested for failing to report or, if they reported, they then were out of the jurisdiction of the Department of National War Services. It was, therefore, absurd to say that any man could demand postponement. He could make application, and many such applications were made, but they were often not replied to, so that a man had no choice but to report. As the government knows quite well, when Mr. Milliken was appointed as agricultural representative, he was so inundated with applications that he simply threw up his hands and resigned in disgust.

The government has issued an 8-point statement in the matter. I hear them referring to the new regulations, but they are not new regulations. Let us get that clear. The regulations are the same as those contained in order in council P.C. 2252. What has been issued is simply an interpretative letter seeking to advise the respective boards how they shall interpret the regulations. Let me remind the house of two things. First, we have no guarantee that the divisional boards will pay any more attention to the interpretative letter than they did to the regulations; and, second, even if they do, in many instances the damage is already done. I think the government will have to go much further. They may have to take the drastic step of taking men out of the army and putting them back on the farm wherever the farm has been left without sufficient man-power to produce the kind of things which the Minister of Agriculture wants to have produced in the programme which he outlined the other day.

There is no use in the minister or anyone else saying, as the Minister of Agriculture did last week, that we have a farmer representative on the board and that it is up to the board. The government cannot hide behind the skirts of the divisional boards. These boards either carry out the government's policy or do not. If they are not carrying out that policy, the government should dismiss them and appoint new boards; but if they are carrying out the government's policy, the government must accept responsibility for their actions. The sooner we get back to the place where someone in the government is responsible, and will accept the responsibility, of dealing with this situation, the sooner we shall have sufficient labour power on the farms to fill the quotas which the Minister of Agriculture has contracted to fill.

Take some other contradictions. The farmer has been bewildered and confused by differing advice and different suggestions which have been made to him. The Minister of Agriculture goes on the radio and tells him to hold his cattle, and not long after that Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, tells him not to hold his cattle and chides him for doing so. One day Mr. Taggart, the food administrator, declares that it is nonsense to talk about butter rationing, and within ten days we have butter rationing. At one time the farmer is told to produce more flax, to get into flaxseed production, and now he is told we do not need increased flaxseed production. I have before me a copy of a broadcast, reported in the Western Producer of January 21, made by Mr. George Robertson, secretary of the Saskatchewan pool, in which he says that early last December, that is 1942, an agricultural production conference was held here in Ottawa, in which it was agreed that the acreage seeded to flax during the current year should be increased by more than one million acres, representing an increase of 68 per cent over last year's acreage. Repeatedly it was suggested to the farmers of the prairies that they should get into flaxseed production. In my own constituency I know of many farmers who paid from three dollars to five dollars a bushel for royal flax seed and now, according to the programme announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, apparently the government does not want the farmer to increase his flaxseed production. Many of these men will use the seed anyway, and we shall find next fall that we shall have quotas on flax—and there is nothing harder to store than flax.

We had a similar problem before in connection with coarse grains. Last year farmers were told to get out of wheat and into coarse grains, which they did. They put several million acres into coarse grains. To-day thousands upon thousands of granaries all over the prairies are filled with coarse grains which farmers cannot deliver. The farmer has a quota of twenty bushels to the acre, and he is lucky if he can get cars to ship them. He was told to produce coarse grains; he had every reason to think that if he did he would be able to dispose of them, but now he cannot dispose of them.

One more contradiction in this policy. We have frozen farm prices and, what is even worse, we have frozen the amounts of certain farm commodities that the farmer may deliver and sell, but we have done nothing at all to freeze the farmer's debts. The debt situation on the prairies, and particularly in Saskatchewan, has reached a point where something must be done. At the present time, farm debt in Saskatchewan—mortgages, agreements of sale, debts on implements and so forth—is in excess of $600,000,000, or something over $21 for every acre of crop land. I ask hon. members to realize the plight of a prairie farmer. He has in his backyard all the means to make some payment on these debts. But he cannot dispose of his wheat; he cannot dispose of his coarse grains; they are frozen. It is not his fault; yet the interest on his debt continues to accumulate even though it is not his fault that he cannot meet it. Last year the debt adjustment act of the province of Alberta was declared ultra vires, and consequently the debt adjustment acts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba were placed in jeopardy. A debt conference was called in Saskatoon last fall, and my understanding is that at that time assurance was given that some steps would be taken by the federal government to pass an order in council under the War Measures Act giving the provinces power to protect the farmers during this war-time crisis. But that order in council has not materialized. In the meantime the judicial committee of the privy council has concurred in the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and declared the debt legislation ultra vires. The other day I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) what the government intended to do about the matter and was told that it is still under consideration. I suggest to the government that it will have to have more than consideration; some steps will have to be taken immediately to prevent all foreclosures and evictions and to freeze debt. If the farmer is to have his prices and quotas frozen, then he ought to have his debts frozen. I say to the Minister of Agriculture in all seriousness that if the farmer does not get some measure of security on his farm, if something is not done about his debts, about his manpower—because he is to have less machinery—then we are headed for trouble. I know in my own constituency farmers are getting rid of their stock, in some instances men who have been trying hard to raise stock. I say to the minister that I am afraid that unless some steps are taken not only shall we not reach the objectives which we have set but we may not reach this year even the objectives which were attained last year.

That is why we in this group ask for a long-term plan mapping out the things to be produced and the quantities which the government is prepared to accept. We ask also for parity prices for the duration and for a period after the war. The average farmer cannot go into producing certain commodities unless he knows that he can count on a certain price over a period of time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why should he not always have parity prices?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of course he should, but certainly he should be guaranteed them now. If he starts certain lines of production at the suggestion of the minister, he should not find a year or two hence when he is ready to market the products that the price has gone. The slogan on the prairies has been: When there is a price there are no pigs and when there are pigs there is no price. We are seeking to avoid that.

The third thing we suggest is that the government should set up agricultural commodity marketing boards which would take delivery of these commodities from the farmer at the guaranteed price; dispose of them to the retail or export trade and absorb any loss incurred, as is being done by the wartime prices and trade board, which is subsidizing certain industries.

Fourth, we ask that sufficient labour be returned to the farms that are denuded, and sufficient left on the other farms, to enable them to meet the demands for foodstuffs that have been sent out by our allies.

Lastly, we ask that the government take steps to freeze farm debt and give the farmers security on their farms in this period during which they cannot deliver the commodities which they have produced.

In conclusion, one word with reference to the discussion of social security in the post-war world. We in this group have always maintained, and continue to maintain, that there cannot be such a thing as a system of social security superimposed upon a system of economic insecurity. There can be no social security apart from economic security. Sir William Beveridge makes it perfectly plain that when he is talking of a social insurance scheme it is based on more or less continuous employment. He says that any excess over eight and a half per cent of unemployment will throw his whole scheme out of gear. Therefore we believe that for anyone to talk, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) did yesterday about social security on the one hand and retaining free enterprise on the other is a contradiction in terms, because rugged individualism has never produced for our generation anything but ragged individuals on the one hand and people wallowing in wealth on the other. It is time we realized that to talk glibly about "social insurance" and "social security" and the "Beveridge plan" as though these things could be superimposed upon an economic system that has produced poverty on the one hand and plenty on the other, natural resources needing to be developed on the one hand and unemployment on the other, is to talk about things that contradict each other. We believe that there can be no social security for the people of Canada until we are prepared to make fundamental economic changes and to reorganize our society in the interests of all the people instead of allowing it to be used as a means of economic exploitation for the benefit of a few.

In the magazine Time dated January 11, there is a statement by Monsignor John A. Ryan of Washington, an outstanding leader of the Roman Catholic church in the United States. He sums the position up in words which are very clear. He says:

> The millions of returning soldiers and sailors will not be satisfied or fooled by the old claptrap concerning "rugged individualism" "American opportunity" or "American equality" . . . they will not be lulled to sleep by commonplaces about the limitation and difficulties of distribution, nor by promises of "prosperity just around the corner". They will demand jobs here and now. I do not believe that an economy dominated by the philosophy of "free enterprise" will be able to meet that demand.

On motion of Mr. Blanchette the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN CONSTRUCTION OF WOMEN'S HOSTEL IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I would like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply why work has not been rushed on the women's hostel in Ottawa. This morning's Ottawa Journal says:

> Certainly no construction records are being broken in this project, which was launched by the government last summer, many months after the urgent need for such a hostel had been apparent to everybody else.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I will refer that inquiry to the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): If my hon. friend will let his question stand as a notice, I will give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask that the Minister of Public Works, in replying to the specific question of the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), include any recommendations that may have been made with respect to hostel accommodation at other points—that is, make a general report so as to cover the whole matter?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The only hostel coming within the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works is the hostel in Ottawa. The others were put up by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then may I ask that that information, whether obtained from the Department of Munitions and Supply or elsewhere, be included at the time the report is made?

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION PRIOR TO MEETING OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would ask the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him notice. Would he be good enough to consider, in connection with social security and the Beveridge report, following the practice of the mother of parliaments, where a committee was appointed but where they had a two-days' debate in the house before the committee met? On the government benches here there are splendid men who have come up from the municipalities and who are well qualified to discuss this question. I think it would be well to do what was done in Great Britain and give members of the house an opportunity to express their opinions in a non-political debate which might form a chart for the course to be taken by the committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend sent me a communication indicating that he intended raising this question. I must say that the more I have considered it the more I feel that it would not be advisable to act upon the suggestion of my hon. friend to have a debate upon the Beveridge report in this house before the matter of social security is referred to a special committee. My hon. friend has just said that the mother of parliaments has followed a certain course. That course, as I take it, was to discuss at Westminster a report which related to the conditions in the United Kingdom. That would be quite proper. But the Beveridge report does not relate, except so far as general principles are involved, to conditions as they exist in this country. In Great Britain most of the matters which are referred to in the Beveridge report come before only one government. In Canada social security is a matter controlled in part by the federal government, in part by the provincial governments. I think it would be wholly advisable that a committee of this house should have the opportunity of considering that aspect of the broad question of social security before we begin a debate on any one particular report.

May I draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that, in the notice I have given for the appointment of a committee on social security, I expressly request the house to permit the committee to examine and study social insurance policies of other countries. Social insurance policies of other countries will include the Beveridge report. I would think it would be preferable that a discussion of the Beveridge report, so far as it is desirable to have it in this house, would come after members of the committee had had an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the report.

But there is an even stronger objection to proceeding along the lines which my hon. friend has indicated. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is anxious to proceed as soon as may be possible with the war appropriation for the coming year. The minister is also anxious to place before the country, as soon as he can, the budget, so that the people of Canada may have an appreciation of what is involved in the recommendations which the minister will have later to make to the house with respect to the ways and means of raising the revenues required. To proceed with a debate on the Beveridge report before these all-important war measures—because the budget will be that in considerable part as well—are considered by the house would, I think, place an entirely wrong emphasis on the importance of the matters which should be considered at this time, or first of all in this parliament.

I want to take advantage of this moment to say to my hon. friend and to the house—I said it before, and I wish to repeat it—that there is a great danger of hon. members of the house and of people throughout the country getting the impression that this war is going to be won in the course of this year, and that what we have most to be concerned about at the present time is what is going to happen after the war, rather than before the war itself is won.

I do not believe it is possible to emphasize too strongly with respect to the progress of the war, the serious situation which exists at this moment, and which lies ahead. As yet there has been no invasion of Europe by armed forces of the allied powers, and up to now Germany continues to control the countries which she has already conquered. She is being driven back at the present time by Russia; but apart from that, the whole problem of the war, as to when and how the axis powers are to be defeated, still remains something which is completely unsolved. It is going to take all the efforts that all the allied powers can make to win the war in the course of a very considerable time. I believe that the more we impress that upon the people of this country, the better it will be for the good of all. If this house begins to take up at the beginning of a session discussions of a post-war matter, before we have even had an opportunity to discuss our war measures, I am sure we would be setting a wholly false example and would be conveying a wholly wrong impression to the country.

Mr. CHURCH: The only thing I would say is that probably the select committee will not present its report until the dying hours of the session—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no; there is every desire—

Mr. CHURCH: —and no action will be taken this session, as happened last session with some of these select committees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure the committee will use all the expedition possible. The committee will be appointed within the course of another few days. I think there is every reason to believe that its report will be made in time for a discussion of the matter at this session.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): In taking part in this debate at this late stage, my intention is not to take up the time of the house except to make comments which I feel it is my duty to make upon two or three points only.

I shall attempt to be as brief as possible in dealing with three summary outlines, namely, the matter of controls, man-power as affecting agriculture and lumbering, and the social legislation proposed, in comparison to what some of the other countries have already done along this line.

There is no doubt that the various controls which we have set up have been severely criticized by the press and the people of this country, the intensity of this criticism being at times directly proportionate to the curbing of our activities in a given field, industrial, commercial, or again in our habits of life.

We have been so long accustomed to doing things in a democratic way that we resent being told what to do and what not to do. However, no government, not even one which perchance my hon. friend the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon) might lead, could successfully carry out the activities looking to the winning of this war, unless these various controls were resorted to. There is no country at war to-day that has not these controls in its legislation, so that, after all, we Canadians are just doing what every other country is doing to win the war. The men placed at the head of these control boards are for the most part leaders in their respective fields, and I believe that if all of us would be prone to cooperate with them rather than to criticize them, and if we had in view not the one field of a given control as a perspective, but rather, the wider perspective of the whole war picture, perhaps we would then be contributing a certain unconscious war effort which we at present are not doing.

Perhaps one of the reasons why Canadians have not taken well to some phases of this control is that they have not been sufficiently informed of the reasons why controls of this and that have been established, and perhaps the publicity divisions of our various departments have not explained as fully as they should have done the whys and wherefores for this or that commodity being controlled. Again, some of the newspapers of the country have made a point of criticizing, perhaps too harshly, some of these rationings. I know that there is an enormous difference in the way that these controls are accepted by Canadians and Americans. Living near the border states of New Hampshire, Maine and Vermont, I have occasion to go to border towns quite often throughout the year, and a thought that strikes me on each of my trips thereto is that the Americans, once the government establishes a control or rationing, hardly offer any further criticism. There is hardly any more criticism of that control or rationing by the residents.

To mention one instance of the criticism of rationing, a criticism which we have heard in this house since the beginning, take butter. It might be interesting to know that the present fat ration per capita in Canada is, roughly speaking, 41 pounds per year, consisting of a butter ration of 26 pounds and 15 pounds of other fats. The United States has at present a fat ration of 41 pounds also, but it consists of 17 pounds only of butter, and 24 pounds of other fats. Great Britain has a ration in fats of 26 pounds only, consisting of 6½ pounds of butter per year and 13 pounds of vegetable fats, with 6½ pounds of cooking fats. So that after all, although there is a rationing of butter here, our 26 pounds per year per capita is much more than the 17 pounds per year which the American receives, and greater by four times than the 6½ pounds which the Briton is getting on his table every year.

There is a further thought which I should like to give to the house and the country. On the first of January last, the total butter stock on hand in the United States was 42,000,000 pounds for a population of 130,000,000. We in Canada had in our warehouses at the same time 22,000,000 pounds for a population of roughly a little over 11,000,000. In spite of the fact that the United States had only a butter reserve of 42,000,000 pounds on the first of January last, towards the end of 1942 the United States sent 17,000,000 pounds to relieve conditions in Russia, leaving only 25,000,000 pounds of butter to feed a population of 130,000,000. Here is a blunt fact that we should keep in mind when we attempt to criticize too severely the butter rationing of this country.

Of course the Americans have oleomargarine which they can fall back on, and there has been some agitation in this country, in the press and elsewhere, that we too in Canada should have recourse to oleomargarine to supplement our butter ration. If we do this, then there are only two places where we can get the vegetable oil needed for it, and that is the United States and Great Britain; and once the facts are known, and when we take into consideration also our present Canadian fat allotment of 41 pounds, the same as the allotment in the United States, is there any organization, governmental, commercial or individual, that would have the courage to go to the United States and ask for a share of their vegetable oil, in order that we in Canada might make oleomargarine also? Is there any one in this country who would like to ask Great Britain for a portion of their vegetable oil, with their total quota of 26 pounds of fat, in order that we in Canada might be able to increase our total fats above the 41 pounds which we get at present? I believe, however, that it may be possible for us in Canada to increase our butter production if the wartime prices and trade board would encourage the dairy farmers to produce butter on a larger scale than in the past.

We have heard and are still going to hear a great deal about man-power, and I intend to deal with the question as it affects agriculture and lumbering respectively. All the members of this house and the press of the country as well as farming organizations in Canada recognize that there is a shortage of men on the farms. That fact is patent to all who are well versed in the situation, and this beyond any fear or hope of contradiction. If this shortage of man-power on the farms continues, there is no question but that our war effort will be greatly hampered in producing quotas set for the coming year. Agriculture is a primary war industry, equal in importance to the making of munitions and other weapons and engines of war. One is the complement of the other. No country can win a war with munitions alone; both food and munitions are needed for victory.

I have seen it stated editorially in Le Soleil that to-day some 25,000 agricultural workers are in the military camps, and surely these should be returned to the farm, where they belong, in order that the ranks of agricultural workers may be replenished. Recent directions given by the national selective service to the mobilization boards with reference to agricultural workers will greatly help, I hope, not only to maintain on the farms those who remain there, but also to bring back to the farms those who have been taken from them.

In connection with the man-power question, again, some criticism has been made about the permits granted to lumbermen to work across the American border. True it is that last spring some 7,500 men were allowed to go to the United States to work in the lumber camps near the border, but these permits were gradually cut down periodically. At the time the first permits were granted there was not the shortage of men in the lumber camps that developed later on in the season. Some of the lumber operations to be completed go in cycles, spring and summer, fall and winter, and once we had granted a permit in the spring, it was only logical, as I see it, and in the spirit of the good neighbour, that we should allow these men in limited numbers thereafter, if you wish, to continue to have access to the American lumber camps to complete the lumbering operations in order that the timber cut in the spring and summer would not have to remain and rot in the woods.

Furthermore these men brought badly needed United States exchange to this country, and this on a rather larger scale, since some of the men received $10 to $12 a day for their labour across the border.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) say the other day that the war labour boards had reconsidered 8,500 cases for increase of wages and that as a result 385,000 workers had received in added salary a total of $3,250,000 per month or an annual increase of some $40,000,000. I suggest to him along the same lines a revision of pay for the lumbermen, who are receiving far less than they should. Not everyone can be improvised into a lumberman; it is a trade in itself, one of the most essential in our war effort as well as in peace time, particularly in the reconstruction period to follow the war. All who are cognizant of the situation believe that these men should be paid more for their work. In the province of Quebec I believe the basic rate is $52 a month. Immediately this rate is stated we ask ourselves whether we are doing justice to workers of this class, whose work is seasonal and at times demands endurance of hard conditions of living and hazards and requires courage and skill which should be much better remunerated. And at the same time might it not be advisable to inquire into the price that is being paid for pulp in Canada—$13 or $14 for peeled pulp, as compared with $18 and $19 in United States funds for the same product at some of the United States mills of the same hauling distance?

So far as my section is concerned some of these lumber cutting operations consisted in the cutting of veneer logs in the virgin forests, for manufacture of veneers so greatly needed by Great Britain for aircraft production. In allowing these men to cross the border for veneer cutting it was not so much a case of Canada helping the United States as it was the other way round, that the United States were favouring Canada in allowing A-1 veneer logs to be cut by Canadians, hauled to Canada, processed in Canadian mills and sent to Britain where there is such dire need for this material. We are receiving neighbourly treatment from the United States in some phases of our war effort, and, as the Minister of Labour put it, we must give some consideration for the favours which we receive.

I have previously stated that some 25,000 agricultural workers are in military camps. I believe that the shortage of men in lumber camps in 1942 was occasioned more by their being called for military service than by the permits granted to work in the lumber camps of the United States. So far as our district of the eastern townships is concerned, when one says agricultural workers one says at the same time labourers for the forests, because these occupations go hand in hand. I have been wondering at times whether it would not be advisable to form a civilian forestry corps composed of workers on the farms, who could very well be employed in the lumber camps during the less active season on the farms. This would at least greatly relieve the shortage of men in the lumber camps.

I now wish to touch upon the matter of social legislation, referred to in the speech from the throne. I would commend the government in that regard. This government is proceeding in its social legislation in the same manner as the British parliament is approaching the matter, and also to a certain extent the United States government, in that first of all a committee is to be set up to study the measures proposed, after which parliament will be duly seized of the subject and prepared to implement the committee's recommendations. No more far-reaching effect upon this country for many years to come can be had than by the thoroughness and sincerity and activity which the committee created to study this question shall put into its work and agenda and deliberations.

Social legislation is always the most important legislation, and especially is it important at this stage when principles of a new order have been predicated by the leaders of practically all democratic countries. On June 10, 1941, Right Hon. Arthur Greenwood, minister without portfolio in the British government, announced in the House of Commons that he had arranged with all departments concerned for a comprehensive survey of existing schemes of social insurance and allied services which would be considered in due course by the committee on reconstruction problems of which he was chairman, and that Sir William Beveridge had accepted his invitation to become chairman of an interdepartmental committee which would conduct the survey, giving consideration to representations from representative organizations and persons connected with the problem involved.

This report was submitted on November 20, 1942. Social security—the expression used in the Beveridge report—means assurance of a certain income. The plan for social security set out in the report is a plan to win freedom from want by maintaining incomes. But sufficiency of income is not sufficient of itself; freedom from want is only one of the essential freedoms of mankind, and any plan for social security in the narrow sense assumes a concerted social policy in many fields. The plan proposed involves three particular assumptions, namely: (1) children's allowances; (2) comprehensive health and rehabilitation services; (3) maintenance of employment.

Last session it was my privilege to introduce in this house a resolution based on the principle of family allowances. Like other resolutions of private members it was not called for debate in the house, but it was discussed in some sections of the country and in the press. One of our local papers in an editorial summed up their view in the phrase, "Where is the money to come from?"

At present we are fighting a war unprecedented in the history of the world. Let us make no mistake; we must have recourse to reconstruction, rehabilitation and social reform in a like unprecedented manner after the war. We are spending fabulous sums of money to kill; we must find hereafter vast sums to live and let live after the war. The people of the democratic countries are fighting for this very thing at the moment, and will expect nothing less after the war.

In my humble opinion, outstanding as the very keystone of social legislation and reform is the matter of family allowances. This principle was recognized by the British parliament on June 23 last, when the following resolution was proposed and agreed to:

Resolved, that this house, having regard to the supreme importance of further safeguarding the health and well-being of the rising generation, commends for the immediate consideration of the government the institution of a national scheme of allowances for dependent children as an important contribution to this vital object.

The British House of Commons therefore has recognized that parenthood is both a privilege to the individual and a service to the state.

The case for family allowances rests on the necessity of dealing with three aspects of our national life: first, that we already are within sight of the beginning of a decline in our population; second, that the greatest single factor in poverty is the size of the family; third, the power of the home market to consume the products of industry in the post-war period. When one comes to consider the cost of family allowances it is essential to consider also what will be the cost of going without family allowances. It is not only good social ethics, but looking at it on a lower plane, if you will, it is good business to pay family allowances as has been recommended in the memorandum on reconstruction issued by the Federation of British Industries. A scheme of family allowances is the most efficient single method so far suggested for dealing with social security and poverty, mentioned in the Atlantic charter; by its very nature it offers a master key to social security. Let us not be alarmed by its cost after the war. As a result of the great inventiveness called forth by the war our productive capacity will probably increase rather than diminish when the war is over; for there is a continual increase in the wealth of the country, and it will be frustrated only if we allow men to rot in idleness instead of being absorbed in productive work and in the reconstruction which will be our task after the war.

Should such a scheme be favourably looked upon by the government, and I do not see why it should not, having regard to the favourable outlook in some other countries, I believe we shall be taking a proper step in the right direction of social legislation. By this single measure of family allowances we can solve the most complicated problems of social security and at the same time help along some of the other freedoms which will be the major problems of all governments in the post-war period. Our valiant soldiers are fighting, along with those of our allies, for freedom for themselves and their loved ones, and at the same time for a bill of rights for their children which might be stated as follows: first, the right to healthy childhood; second, the right to education; third, the right to understand and observe his religious and national heritage; finally, the right to grow up in a world free from the fear of unemployment, insecurity and war.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with many of the previous speakers in this debate who have expressed great satisfaction and pleasure in the turn of the tide in the fortunes of the allied nations, in that they are now passing from the defensive and assuming the offensive. I should like also to compliment the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Booth) on his able and instructive address, which was listened to with great interest by all hon. members, in which he dealt with the work, training and activities of the Canadian troops overseas. In the course of his remarks he paid a fitting and proper tribute to the high esteem in which the officers and men of the Canadian corps are held in Great Britain.

I should like to join also in the regret expressed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) that there was no mention in the speech from the throne of the heroism and sacrifice of the Canadian boys who went through the Dieppe engagement. In his remarks during the course of this debate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that in his opinion proper tribute had not been paid in this house to the Canadian boys who fought at Hong Kong. While we in this house may have our differences of opinion as to the sufficiency of the training and equipment of the boys who went to Hong Kong; while there may be some differences of opinion with regard to the Dieppe affair, I am sure there will be no question of division among the people of Canada as to the fighting qualities of and the magnificent battle put up by our boys both at Hong Kong and at Dieppe. These two names will long be remembered in Canada. When one considers the almost impossible odds against which our boys battled at Hong Kong; when one considers the enemy, vastly superior in numbers, highly trained and fully equipped, one can only feel a great thrill of pride at the achievements of the Canadian boys, followed by a grim resolve that those boys must and will be avenged. And who among us here can picture the beachhead at Dieppe on that summer morning when the Canadian troops stormed ashore against the hail of death that was hurled upon them? Yet all the press dispatches and articles written by men who were there indicate that not a single man faltered in his task. The boys who made up those contingents at Dieppe and Hong Kong came from communities right across this whole dominion, and I am sure that tomorrow, when the historian records with unprejudiced pen the events of these historic days, the names of Hong Kong and Dieppe, together with the names of the officers and men who fought there, will be placed high on the Canadian scroll of honour.

Previous speakers have dealt with certain matters relating to lumbering and farming in various parts of Canada, and I should like to deal briefly with these same subjects, because they concern the part of Ontario in which I reside. In the counties of Peterborough and Hastings there are almost inexhaustible supplies of wood and a certain quantity of timber. For many years the wood and lumber industry has provided a livelihood for a large number of persons. During the winter of 1941-42 many wood operators, both individuals and companies, took out large quantities of fuel wood for sale during the fall of 1942 and this present winter. At that time there was no price ceiling on wood. On August 8, 1942, however, a price ceiling was imposed, providing a certain price at roadside and a certain price for the delivered dry wood. Owing to a scarcity of other fuels throughout the dominion this large supply of wood was soon sold at ceiling prices. The price set by the fuel administrator resulted in a loss, in many instances, for the individual or wood operator.

After the wood was sold, after there had been many complaints and after the wood controller discovered that he had set the price of wood too low, early in January 1943 the price was increased by $2 a cord. This increase to the wood operator just meant the difference between operating at a loss and breaking even or having a fair profit. Hon. members would be interested to know who advised the fuel administrator when he set the price on fuel wood, because I am sure any hon. member who lives in a district in which there are dealings in wood must agree with me when I say that the price of fuel wood, either at roadside or delivered, as set by the fuel controller in his order of August, 1942, was too low. While the price was raised, the increase was made too late in the season. January of this year was too late for any wood operator or company to make contracts or arrangements to take out wood during the present winter. Up to that date they were faced with a low fixed price. The wood operator had to make a bargain with the owner of the wood lot. He had to make provision for the cutting of the wood, for the trucking of it from the wood lot to the roadside, and the piling at that point. He had to arrange with the trucker who would pick up the wood at the roadside and make deliveries to consumers in towns, villages or cities. Naturally any man who owned a wood lot wanted a fair price for his wood; the workman wanted a fair price, the trucker wanted a fair price—they all wanted a fair price, and they were entitled to it. The result has been that this winter in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough no one is taking out any wood or making provision for the sale of wood during the next winter season. This situation will become more serious, because these counties supply not only many small towns and villages, but also several large cities in the immediate vicinity.

Next comes the question of labour. No provision has yet been made under which the lumber or wood dealer can obtain a proper supply of labour to carry out his operations. The same condition applies to the lumber industry in my district. Lumber operators in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough might properly be classed as small operators, because they take out a cut of only half a million to two million feet a year. In addition they supply poles, ties and material of the kind.

During the summer of 1942 I had occasion to apply to the divisional registrar for the exemption from or postponement of service of a young man who was a lumber sawyer. This young man had been called for military service, and had been granted one or two exemptions, following which he had received his final notice to report. As the calling of sawyers and other key men in the lumber industry affected many in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough, I prepared a short brief dealing with the labour and lumber situation as it applied in my community, and I attended with the young man before the board at Kingston. After consulting with the board, however, the registrar advised me that as I was a lawyer I could not appear before the board or submit my brief. I then asked the registrar if I could appear as a member of parliament, and after a second consultation with the board he advised me I could not. However the young man was allowed to appear and state his case before the board, at which there was present an officer in uniform. He was refused any further exemption; but the registrar did mention one thing to me, namely that the small lumber operator for whom this sawyer was working did not have any government contract. That was true; very few small lumber operators have government contracts. But the fact remains that practically all the lumber, poles, timber and ties they take out are sold to industrial plants which are working on government contracts. The operator in question had a large contract to supply lumber to the cement company at Pointe Anne, and he was supplying all the timber he could get of a certain kind to the shipyards at Kingston.

Just a few days after my visit to Kingston I received from the timber controller a long document dated September 1, 1942, which, I believe, all hon. members received. This document, addressed to Canada's lumber industry, states in the first paragraph:

> The paramount thing at the present time in the national interest is the maximum production of logs and lumber. We must accomplish this, even with our present difficulties of labour shortage,—

And so on.

Then follows a long list of districts in which lumbering is carried on. I wrote the timber controller and Mr. Little, who was then in charge of selective service, setting out the case of the wood and lumber operators in my counties. As usual I received a courteous reply from the director of national selective service, and a similar letter from the timber controller. In their letters they both pointed out that the matter of exemption of key men in the lumber industry had been brought to their attention before, that something was going to be worked out, that it was necessary that lumber be produced—and all the rest of it,—and that I would be advised in due course of what further action would be taken. That was the last I heard of the matter.

In closing this part of my observations may I point out that while these lumber operators are small, they have fairly large investments in equipment and machinery. They are all ready to operate. The government is urging that our lumber production be increased. With a set-up like this it seems most unfortunate that key men in the industry should be called for military service, and it is also unfortunate that the lumber operators are not permitted to obtain adequate labour to carry on this most important industry.

With respect to farm labour in my constituency I would point out that in 1942 the county of Hastings held the record for the largest cheese and pork products production in Ontario. The farmers have been asked to increase their pork production in 1943 by twenty per cent, and to increase further their cheese production, which is already at a record. There are in addition in these two counties many creameries which make anywhere from 200,000 to 700,000 pounds or more of butter a year. They also raise large quantities of beef, lamb, poultry, honey and other farm products. These two counties are ideally suited for mixed farming. I know all members will agree with me when I say that the farmer is just as willing and anxious as anyone else to produce the maximum amount for the war effort, but like the lumber dealer or the wood operator he is faced with a shortage of help. Large numbers of men in these two counties have enlisted in the armed forces, and large numbers of men and women have gone into the industrial centres. Many of our young men also have been called for military service. The result is that to-day on many farms you will find a farmer with only his wife to assist him in operating a farm which in normal times would have at least two or three men. If the farmer is to increase his production as he has been asked to do in 1943 he must be able to plan at least one season ahead; for he must increase his stock and arrange to cultivate a larger area in order to grow more feed.

As hon. members know, there is no such thing under the war service regulations as a permanent exemption. Postponements are granted which are renewable from time to time, or a man may receive a postponement until further notice. I know many young men in my district who received their call-up notice together with a transport warrant and instructions to report at the district depot in a matter of three or four days. It was a sorry spectacle last fall, Mr. Speaker, to see many crops of hay and grain left to rot in the snow simply because of the shortage of farm help. I would point out to the minister that the notices that are sent out to the young men by registered mail, enclosing a transport warrant and instructions to report at a depot, reach the young men in the country only two or three days before they are directed to report at the district depot. A sufficient time is not allowed to them to make application for postponement. I have been told that when the young man goes to the district depot and has been medically examined and accepted he is then allowed to apply for a postponement, but there is nothing in the call-up notice itself to indicate that he is entitled to apply for postponement at the district depot. The result has been that many of our young men from the farms, once they got to the district depot and passed the medical officer, soon found themselves in uniform.

The average farmer engaged in mixed farming, like the lumber or wood operator, for instance, has a large investment in his operations, and when his farm help is taken away he has no alternative but to reduce his stock and to cut down the number of acres he has under cultivation.

In the booklet, "Canada at War" No. 19, for December, 1942, it is stated at page 3 that in the army in Canada there are approximately 210,000 troops on active service, in addition to 200,000 men in the reserve army. It does not state in the book whether the figure of 210,000 troops on active service in Canada includes young men who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I trust that when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) speaks he will inform the house how this figure of 210,000 is made up, and whether it includes the "R" recruits. On the next page of the book it is stated that there are overseas upwards of 180,000 men, comprising five divisions.

Other members in referring to the troops overseas have brought up the important question whether adequate reinforcements have been provided. I would ask the Minister of National Defence, when he speaks on this important question of reinforcements, not to confine himself to simply stating that there are "adequate" reinforcements or some adjective of the kind. I ask him to tell us what percentage of reinforcements are needed, what percentage basis has been worked out. If the percentage basis is five, ten, twenty, or fifty per cent, I for one should like to know. I have inquired of many officers and I have never yet been able to find out the basis of what are considered adequate reinforcements. As was pointed out very forcefully by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) yesterday, at Dieppe our casualties were some sixty-seven per cent. It is most important that the minister should tell us frankly the percentage basis of our reinforcements. I hope that he will be able to assure the house that no matter what type of action the Canadian forces may be engaged in overseas, provision has been made for supplying them with the necessary reinforcements to maintain the army as constituted at present.

In the next issue of "Canada at War", for January, an interesting table is given on page 20, showing the enlistments in the three branches of the armed forces. This table has been reproduced in the press and has caused much comment in various editorials. The table clearly shows that some sections of the country are supplying many more recruits than other sections. The table also shows the number of recruits who enlisted in the war of 1914-18, but whoever prepared the table neglected to show the approximate population of Canada in 1914 and its approximate population in 1939; nor does this table show the approximate number of discharges or casualties to date.

[Mr. White.]

The book also states that there are 200,000 men in our reserve army. I would ask the Minister of National Defence when he speaks to say whether that 200,000 is only a paper estimate, and to tell us how many men in the reserve army are actually training. The minister might further explain why it is necessary to keep an army of 210,000 men in Canada, because under recent regulations married men between certain ages are being called for military training, and regulations were recently passed providing that boys of seventeen years of age can be accepted in the armed forces. I ask the Minister of National Defence how he can possibly justify the accepting of boys seventeen years of age in the armed forces; because if a lad of that age takes the basic training, it lasts only two months; if he takes his advanced training, that is a further two months; and if he takes a course at a trade school, for instance, I understand it requires not more than seven to nine months, so that he still has some eleven months to put in before he can proceed overseas.

Perhaps this calling up of the married men and the accepting in the army of boys of seventeen is just another example of the effort to swell enlistment figures; or is it another example of trying to dodge the issue or delay the day when compulsory selective service for anywhere in the world will be put into effect? I for one would like to have the Minister of National Defence, when he speaks, explain fully why it is necessary to take boys of seventeen years of age into the armed forces.

The Prime Minister, as reported in Hansard, page 46, made this remark:

> Little if any account has been taken of the fact that unless there had been very careful planning at the outset, all the rest might likely have been a muddle. I claim for the present administration that we have planned carefully from the start.

Let me review briefly the "careful planning" which has taken place in regard to obtaining recruits for the armed forces.

In 1940 there was passed, with a great blare of trumpets, the National Resources Mobilization Act. But after parliament went home, regulations were passed by order in council which restricted the training to thirty days. Public opinion soon realized what a farce this thirty-day training was, and demanded a change, and it was changed to four months. Public opinion developed further, and it was then changed to "service for the duration", but subject always to the restriction that these men could not serve outside Canada. Again public opinion forced the government to take some action, and we had the second farce of the plebiscite which caused months of further delay. After the plebiscite, which resulted in a large vote in favour of releasing the government from its promise, we had an amendment to the act, but this was nullified by the fact that it was not put into force, and is still not in operation. Does the Prime Minister pretend to claim that there was careful planning in regard to this matter? Can he dispute the fact that the whole operation of the act has been a muddle all the way through?

Then we have the question of the very large number of notices sent out, totalling some 750,611, requiring young men to report. Of this number, 146,276 were classed as delinquents or otherwise unaccounted for, some 96,830 notices were not delivered, and after it was all boiled down the mobilization machinery only got into the army some 14·3 per cent of the men who were called up. Does that look like careful planning to prevent a muddle?

Then we have the Hong Kong affair. Does anybody pretend to say that it was carefully planned and that there was no muddle? One has only to read the many dispatches in the press as to the training of the boys and the nature of the equipment they had at Dieppe, and compare that with the nature of the training and the equipment the boys had at Hong Kong, to see whether or not there was any kind of muddle.

Does the Prime Minister think there was very careful planning in the man-power situation which was so well reviewed yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), in which he set out the different changes, the new regulations which were passed every two or three months? Even during this debate, practically every speaker, irrespective of the party to which he belongs, has pointed out the very serious man-power situation. I wonder whether the Prime Minister thinks there was very careful planning in regard to that.

The Minister of Labour is not in his seat, but I wonder what he would say to this statement. Does he think there was very careful planning and no muddle as regards his labour policy? Is not the labour policy of this government responsible for the present unrest in labour and for the very recent steel and other strikes?

Then we have the question of cost of living bonuses for members of the armed forces. Was there any muddle about that? They are the one class of men and women who should have been the very first to receive the cost of living bonus, but instead of being the first they were the last, and they received it only after the greatest public pressure.

There is also the question of the various registrations which have taken place in this country, commencing with the national registration of 1940 and continuing down to date. Has that been a muddle? It has been a muddle from the very start, and I am advised that it is going to be necessary to have another registration before it can be straightened out.

Time does not permit me to deal with the social security legislation, but I should like to mention and to concur in a remark made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew), on February 15, when, speaking of returned soldiers, he said—Hansard, page 441:

> I think we have reached the time when the onus of proving that a man's health has been impaired, that he has contracted tuberculosis on account of service overseas, should be the other way around; that the government should have to prove to the soldier that he did not contract the disease while away.

The hon. member who made that statement has put his finger on one of the most objectionable features of the whole pensions administration. Why should it be necessary for any soldier to have to go to his member of parliament, or to his mayor, or to a lawyer or anybody else to take up his case with the pensions board? Why should any private soldier have to fight the endless red tape of the pensions board? I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will probably dispute that; but after some twenty years' experience in handling cases before the pensions board I have a pretty good idea of how tough they are to deal with. As I said once before in this house, if they would have on the administration boards of the pensions commission a few men who actually served overseas as privates, much of the present hardship would disappear.

Much has been said about the treatment handed out to the soldier who has been discharged in this war. If this government cannot ensure freedom from want to the small number of soldiers who have been discharged, how in the world do they expect to bring in a programme which will care for hundreds of thousands of persons after the war? The citizens of Canada do not want ex-service men cast aside with a small pension and obliged to tramp the streets looking for work. In my opinion the rehabilitation and care of the ex-service men is the most important job facing this parliament and the people of Canada. There should be proper plans and programmes of care for them, to see that they obtain gainful employment as soon as they are able to go to work.

In conclusion, there are several points which I should like to emphasize and lay before the government:

1. That the government consider the appointment of a minister to deal solely with soldiers' problems.

2. That the government produce to parliament the complete report of the Hong Kong investigation.

3. That a proper adjustment be made in farm prices.

4. That proper provision be made for the supply of adequate labour for farmers, wood and lumber dealers.

5. That the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act passed at the last session be brought into force at once so that all members of the armed forces will be available for service anywhere in the world.

6. That the government arrange in the near future for a secret session of this house when the Prime Minister may give the members a complete report of the Casablanca conference, and a complete report on the political situation in North Africa; that the Minister of National Defence may give a complete statement on our forces overseas and the matter of reinforcements; that private members may have the opportunity of asking the three defence ministers questions relating to the armed forces that cannot be asked in the house at a public sitting; and that the Minister of National Defence make a statement on the Dieppe operation.

7. That the government consider the granting of commissions to all aircrew overseas.

8. That the government introduce at this session, legislation along the lines of the Sparkman Act and the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act as passed by the United States congress to cover the following in regard to members of the armed forces:

(a) No eviction of families of those in service.

(b) No foreclosure of mortgage during period of service or for a reasonable period after the end of the war.

(c) No seizure or foreclosure of property for taxes.

(d) No forfeiture of instalment contracts except where things purchased are of a wasting character.

(e) Protection of life insurance policies against cancellation for non-payment of premiums.

(f) Protection against judgment or other legal proceedings for debts incurred before enlistment or call.

[Mr. White.]

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): The speech from the throne of this session contains a statement concerning our improved position in the war, but at the same time it cautions us not to become over-optimistic lest we slacken in our war effort. Rather it suggests that we should increase our effort to attain our objective more quickly and with complete decisiveness. Among other things, the speech also provides a basis for the discussion of post-war reconstruction. So far in this debate many aspects of this latter item have already been dealt with by hon. members on both sides of the house. Speakers have particularly emphasized certain phases of social and economic problems. I should like, therefore, to add to this discussion by considering what I believe to be other important phases of the subject of post-war reconstruction, namely, Canada's relationship to the British commonwealth of nations, and Canada's nationhood in the post-war world.

I believe it will be generally conceded that the present struggle is more of a revolution than merely a war. It is definitely a struggle of ideologies. It is a struggle of philosophies of life. It is a struggle of peoples and powers. But more definitely than that, it is a struggle of the sovereignty of the individual within a sovereign nation as against the onrush of totalitarianism in one form or another.

There are, in my opinion, two main features of this revolutionary war. The one is that of its global or international character; the other is that of a domestic or national character. On the international scale it touches the structures upon which is based the relationship of many peoples and many powers to one another, while on the national scale it embraces the underlying principles of our social, economic and political aspects of life. This titanic eruption is the natural outcome of the unnatural shape of things of pre-war days. We realize now that we are forced to fight not only the axis powers, but also many evils of our own creation—our own mistakes, and our own blunders. We also know that we are paying a high price for these mistakes, in human life and in suffering. Therefore we dare not repeat them in the future.

Again, our present position may be likened to that of a ship on a stormy sea. On our hazardous journey we find ourselves in the midst of cross-currents and undercurrents of fascism, nazism, federal unionism and many other forms of "isms" which are out to destroy sovereignty—the very basis of democracy—the ideal which stands for the maximum amount of individual and national freedom.

In view of this fact we must guard against the possibility of being swept away by some of these currents and finding ourselves after the war with an ideology totally foreign to our Canadian way of life. Therefore it is imperative that we apply ourselves most vigorously to the task of liquidating the many obstacles which have stood between the people and their social, economic and political security. But at the same time we must exercise great care not to lose the positive accomplishments which we have evolved over the centuries. Among these accomplishments I list Canada's position within the British commonwealth of nations. This I wish to discuss now.

To me the British crown is the heart and symbol of the British commonwealth of free and sovereign peoples. To me the British crown is the symbol of unity and the heritage of British ideals of more than a thousand years. More than that, we should prize our position within the commonwealth because we are the benefactors in all and everything that has been achieved over centuries of progress. For instance, should it not occur to us that we are equal partners in a unique association of free sovereign nations, created by an orderly process of evolution in practical statecraft? Let me point out the underlying principle of our British democratic system. It is simply this, that the extent and the power of the British commonwealth of nations are consistent with the maximum of individual freedom, the maximum of local and provincial autonomy, and the maximum of sovereignty of each unit-nation, fitting into the pattern of the commonwealth. This philosophy of statecraft has been built on practical experience, and it is opposed to other philosophies which are supported by many, and which include the surrender of our national sovereignty in favour of some superstate. It will further be apparent from this comparison that the philosophy of the British people is diametrically opposite to that of totalitarianism in whatever form it appears.

In addition to what I have already said about the British commonwealth of nations we should also keep constantly in mind the fact that it was the British commonwealth of nations, and particularly the heroic British, who stood alone after the fall of France and single-handed saved the world from totalitarianism while others hesitatingly speculated. Therefore irrespective of what victories the allies have won so far and irrespective of what victories we shall win in the future, the credit for the greatest role in our total victory should undoubtedly go to the British. It is my definite conviction that democracy will live so long as the British commonwealth of nations lives, and that Canada will remain Canada so long as we share our heritage and our responsibilities with the British commonwealth of nations. Therefore I repeat that however close our association and our cooperation with other nations shall be in the future, the road of Canada is the road of the British commonwealth of nations.

So far I have dealt briefly with only a few of the outstanding features of our British heritage which we must retain from the past and the present and which must be projected into the future of post-war reconstruction. In addition we have acquired an equally priceless heritage in our own national life. The experiences of our forefathers which crystallized into self-government must not now be discarded, under the terrific impact of events, in favour of some system based on the surrender of our national sovereignty. The integrity of Canada's nationhood must forever remain our guiding principle. Therefore I should like now to discuss briefly our nationhood.

Speaking before the Canadian Institute of International Affairs in October, 1937, Lord Tweedsmuir, a great Britisher and an equally great Canadian, made the following statement:

> She (Canada) is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain or from the United States or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations, but to Canada and to Canada's king, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

This statement, sir, expresses my sentiments on the subject. Therefore keeping in mind what I said in the first part of my address, that I do not care to subscribe to any "isms" of a social or political order, I wish to say, however, that I am a strong believer in one "ism" and that is Canadianism. It is my sincere conviction that if Canada is to make her utmost contribution to the winning of the war, and if she is to take her rightful place in the council of the nations, she must assume the role of a fully self-governing nation both in national and in international affairs.

Constitutionally Canada is now a sovereign nation, and also a self-governing nation. At the same time she is an equal partner in the commonwealth. This status was conferred upon Canada by the statute of Westminster, passed in 1931. Therefore Canada, having acquired this national maturity, now stands on the threshold of a new era.

While it must be admitted that certain changes and certain adjustments of a constitutional or legal nature must still be made, the chief obstacles in the way of realization of our full nationhood lie, in the main, in the cultural and economic spheres. Although we have drawn upon Great Britain for much of what we possess in the way of culture, traditions, history, our way of life, our institutions, and centuries of experience in practical statecraft, nevertheless we have now arrived at a stage where we must begin to develop our own distinctive character.

I have already made reference to the constitutional and political framework of our nation. We also have a territory broad in extent and rich in natural resources. The third important element in the making of a nation is its people. We have drawn for our citizenship upon people of many nationalities, with rich and varied backgrounds. This diversity should by no means be a source of weakness; rather it should be a source of strength and potential cultural wealth. Here again is a task for the government, to bring about a harmonious coordination of these varied cultures into our common Canadian mosaic. Polite tolerance toward citizens of varied ethnic backgrounds is not enough; we must offer them something more positive. We must once and for all time realize that Johnson and Ivanyshyn are equally genuine Canadian names; for they mean one and the same thing. After all, the casualty lists of Dieppe did not draw any such distinctions.

So that when we undertake the task of post-war reconstruction in Canada we must do more than attain an outward unity; this unity must find expression in a common Canadian culture and a common Canadian spirit. While we are undertaking this whole development of our Canadian nationhood we must also keep in mind the fact that this development is necessarily based on the degree of economic welfare of our people. This should not be an obstacle in Canada's way, because we are the owners of one of the richest territories in the world. We have the capacity to produce more than we need, and of all sorts of commodities for all our people. One of our main obstacles in the past has been our inability to distribute our products and the unwillingness of governments to tackle this problem in a modern, scientific manner. I believe, however, that the time is not too far distant when it will be considered criminal mismanagement of the affairs of the people to permit goods and services to lie dormant while people starve in need of them.

I have made only a brief statement, Mr. Speaker, in approaching this great problem. I have tried to point out at least a few of the things that we must retain from our way of life, and at the same time I have made an endeavour to indicate some of the things which must be added. Should we fail in this task, as we failed in the past, we will be exposing ourselves, on the home front, to the danger of losing ground to totalitarianism in spite of our victories on the field of battle.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, there is a tendency in Canada today, and even in this house, to consider that the war is already won. I think this is deplorable. It is, however, the natural consequence of the government's policy of easing us gently into total war. For us in Canada it may reasonably be said that the decisive fighting still lies ahead. Because it is dangerous to look upon the war as already won there is no reason why we should not consider briefly the methods of winning it and the pattern of hostilities from now until the collapse of Germany.

I think it is reasonable to assume that we will be attacking Hitler's so-called fortress of Europe with our land forces in the reasonably near future. That the Canadian army will fight with the traditional heroism and fortitude of the Canadian expeditionary force of the last war goes without saying. It is unfortunate but also inevitable that casualties will be suffered at a rate even greater than during the first world war. I do not wish to take Dieppe as an example, but it must be remembered that there we suffered casualties amounting to almost seventy per cent of our effectives in a period of a little over nine hours. There is no military operation so hazardous as attacking, over a considerable body of water, a well-fortified shore base.

I have made these statements and brought out these unpleasant facts merely to lead up to the man-power situation in Canada. I do not know precisely the situation with regard to our trained reinforcements overseas. I believe, however, that they are insufficient to maintain the Canadian army at striking-force, shock-troop efficiency for an intensive campaign of even medium duration. It is therefore probable that the powers given to the government in the plebiscite may have to be invoked, and that soldiers in the home defence army may have to be sent outside of Canada as reinforcements for our troops fighting against Hitler. In mentioning this I make the plea to the government that when this decision has to be taken they do not call a snap election in order to obtain further authority from the people. To call an election during these intensive operations would be nothing short of infamous.

The other night the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) quoted at length the message from General McNaughton to the troops on New Year's day, 1943. Dealing with the arrival of the first Canadian contingent overseas General McNaughton said:

> At that time our numbers of trained soldiers and experienced officers were very few indeed and our equipment consisted of little more than the rifles we carried and the clothing we wore.

I should like to compare that statement with a speech made by the then Minister of Finance, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) at Kingston on March 8, 1940, during the heat of an election campaign. I quote from the Ottawa Evening Citizen of March 9, 1940; these are the headlines:

> Ralston Says Canadians Went Over With Own Artillery, Machine Guns. Finance Minister Says Full Equipment Carried. Makes Known for First Time that Contingents Well Armed Before Proceeding Overseas.

The whole trend of the article gives the impression that the first Canadian division landed in England well equipped and ready for action. If a snap election is called, this is the sort of thing we may expect. With every day and every hour of vital importance we will see ministers going around the country campaigning, while the whole business of government will be aborted. The government now has all the authority in connection with man-power it can possibly need. It must be prepared to use it.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a subject second only in importance to that of the war; namely, the definite danger of inflation. What I am about to say will no doubt be unpopular with certain sections of the people, since there is no drug, no stimulating intoxicant, as wholly delightful as inflation in its early stages. It is easy to make sectional appeals and invite strife in both primary and secondary industries which would tend to break the price ceiling. In many cases the fantastic stupidity of controllers has caused derision and bungling. The regulations frequently defeat their own ends. They are ill-advised, hurriedly built bits of legislation which, because the government does not trust this house, have been imposed upon the Canadian people. Notwithstanding what I have said, however, I believe we must do everything we can to maintain the price structure on as even a keel as possible.

There is no reason for those who would like to see inflation to worry. No matter what controls either this government or the government of the United States imposes we are in an inflationary cycle which may, unless we are extremely careful, bring disaster. I see by the press to-day that we are spending at the rate of over five billion dollars a year. We are raising by taxation a little over two billions. The United States is spending close to eight billion dollars a month, and raising by taxation approximately two billions. That should give us sufficient warning. At present, particularly in the United States, reliance is placed on the desire of the people to invest or hoard their money. If this tendency shows signs of decreasing the strain on the price level of basic commodities may result in a fearsomely quick spiral of inflation.

As an illustration of what I mean when I speak of a condition where there is no control let me give a few examples of prices in England. These figures are for uncontrolled articles, or articles which in some cases may be considered luxuries. They do however give some indication of what people will pay, and what can happen to a price structure if the control is broken. These are not black market prices, but prices I saw for myself in London in the fall of 1942, just a few months ago. Here are a few of them: An ear of corn, 75 cents; a peach, $2.10; a bunch of grapes, $6; a bottle of brandy—purchased at an auction sale at Christie's—$48, a dozen oysters. $7.50. I could give a longer list, but were I to do so I might have to use proprietary names, and I would rather avoid doing that.

Our present situation is illustrated by an incident I observed when I was overseas. A Focke-Wulf 190 had come over, making a hit-and-run raid on a town in the southeast of England. As in many of such raids, it tackled the biggest thing it saw, which on that occasion happened to be the town gasometer—a large round tank about eighty feet high, full of coal gas for domestic purposes. It shot the gas holder full of holes, both with cannon and with machine guns. From each of the holes little spurts of flame were shooting into the air. On the top of the gas holder two employees of the gas company were courageously running around with sand bags, and every time a spurt of flame appeared it would be covered by a sand bag. Meantime other sand bags were being hauled up from the ground. I happened to be passing by with an air force officer, and I said to him, "What a terrific spectacle it would be if the thing went up." He said to me, "Yes, but neither you nor I would be here to see it." Incidentally, I might add that subsequently both the employees to whom I have referred were decorated for valour.

This incident is to me a symbol of what is happening in Canada to-day. We have certain necessary controls on price structure. People —unthinkingly, I believe—are doing everything they can to break them wherever they can. I believe we should do everything in our power to assist the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in his very difficult job of maintaining the country on an even economic balance.

For a time I lived in a country in South America where, in a period of a little less than three months the value of the currency decreased by sixty-five per cent. This, of course, was not the wild inflation of Germany; but I have not forgotten the scenes of hardship suffered by the native population. May I suggest in passing that hon. members who are interested in the subject would do well to read an article by Doctor Palyi, who was an official of the Reichsbank. This article appeared in the Northern Miner of February 4. I believe that completes all I have to say on the subject of inflation.

I now come to what might be called shelter, because to grace the present living conditions in many parts of our urban centres with the term housing would be wrong. We must look closely and dispassionately on the conditions which now exist, and also on the contributory causes which made those conditions. Furthermore we must be fearless in our approach to the subject, and prescribe and carry out the cure. Naturally it is impossible for a layman like myself adequately to cover so vast a subject. There are people in Canada who are experts and who, I hope, will be called before the committee on reconstruction at this session.

Let us, however, look very generally at the situation as it exists. Before the war the average yearly construction of new houses was 15,000. The need was 65,000. It has been estimated that there was a backlog of needed houses amounting to 150,000, across Canada, 110,000 of which existed in urban communities of over 30,000 population. It is obvious that the situation has become much more acute during the war years—and this despite all the efforts of Wartime Housing Limited. It has further been estimated in Washington, officially, by Frederick M. Babcock, that Canada must build in the ten-year period subsequent to the war between 750,000 and a million houses, in order to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Under the Canadian economy before the war sixty per cent of the population were unable to buy what the market afforded. This is based on the established theory that twenty per cent of the gross income of a family should go for shelter. The cost of production per house by private enterprise is too high to satisfy the needs of sixty per cent of the population. When I refer to housing I mean decent houses—not the substandard dwelling so common in our urban communities. It has been estimated that the income of fifty per cent of our population is less than $1,000 a year, and ten per cent have actually less than $600 a year. On the basis of twenty per cent of their income for shelter they could afford to pay only $10 to $17 a month for rent. It is obvious they cannot get shelter for anything like this sum, so that they pay more and go without their full quota of one or other of the essentials of life, such as proper food, clothing or medical care.

There is material available to show the effect that slums produced by these conditions have on Canadians. There is infinitely more material available concerning such conditions in the United States. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote briefly from a few typical reports, and first from a report submitted to the Toronto board of control by a committee on housing in that city. The report was submitted in November, 1942, and this is what it has to say in the first paragraph about health:

> Many people are living under conditions which are injurious to health.

This is 1942, remember! It goes on:

> In certain areas men, women and children are existing in basements designed for vegetable or other storage; others are housed in damp, cold, draughty and vermin-infested quarters; as many as eight persons are living, eating and sleeping in one room. Evictions and threats of eviction are putting a heavy strain on the physical and moral reserves of soldiers' dependents, war workers and persons in the low income group, in fact on all who are unable to purchase houses or to find suitable rentable accommodation.

It goes on to give figures comparing the health standards in two areas of the city, Yorkville and Moss Park, but these figures have been quoted so frequently that I shall not put them on Hansard. They can be found in the brief submitted by the federation of agriculture, in Health, and in many other publications.

I should like to quote from the Journal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, from a report on housing made by Professor E. R. Arthur, of the university of Toronto, in September, 1942. Professor Arthur says—I shall quote just two paragraphs:

> The lieutenant-governor's report on housing conditions in Toronto published in 1934 first drew the attention of the general public to the fact that a Canadian city housed a large section of its citizens in conditions not much higher than would be demanded for animals. Of 1,332 dwellings examined, 43 per cent were without cellars, 82 per cent had no method of heating other than stoves, 58 per cent were damp and 20 per cent subject to flood; 55 per cent were verminous, 59 per cent were without baths and 20 per cent had outside toilets subject to freezing. The houses examined are in a great slum area which we still have. Since 1934 a committee of civil officials has condemned some houses and enforced the repairs and improvements of others. The condemnation of houses has aggravated congestion in an area, where in 1934, 57 per cent averaged more than one person per room and 16 per cent averaged two or more persons per room. "Improvement" has kept the inhabitants of some dwellings dry, but the congestion remains the same or worse, and the environment grows progressively undesirable. The lieutenant-governor's report caused a mild stir and had the effect of bandaging a gangrenous sore where an operation of a major character was necessary.

Mr. COLDWELL: What city is that?

Mr. ADAMSON: Toronto. He goes on, in the next paragraph:

I mention the case of Toronto because the report is an excellent one and was as complete as the funds allotted would permit and time would allow. A similar investigation in Montreal, Hamilton or Winnipeg would reveal equally ghastly housing conditions and an equally callous disregard for human life. In the intervening years, government, press and public have been alike apathetic. Even labour, which in every democratic country including Great Britain, the United States, Sweden, Holland and pre-Hitler Germany, had been the driving force in housing reform, made no serious representations to government. Since housing for the lower income groups can only be financed by the federal government, the municipalities cannot be blamed for the fact that our slums still exist, and that the low wage-earner cannot find a house suited to the needs of his family in a district that is not sub-standard in regard to all the decencies of life.

That, I think, speaks for itself. I should like to quote from one more document, the official Document of the United States government, prepared by the federal emergency administration of public works. This will show that good housing is good business. I quote:

Aside from any question of need for additional accommodations and their provision for the needy, is the problem of the slum with its cost in dollars and cents, and in human life and misery. The eradication of the evils adherent to blighted areas is a prime factor in any general housing programme.

The staggering cost to the public for the maintenance of slum areas has only recently been learned.

During 1932, in a certain slum area in Cleveland, where 2·47 per cent of the population of the city dwelt on 0·73 per cent of the land area, the tax income was $225,035, whereas the total cost of maintaining the section was $1,972,437, or a net loss of $1,747,402. Likewise in Indianapolis, in those areas of greatest economic drain, it has been found that taxpayers are spending each year for the maintenance of each person $27.29, as against $4 per person in other areas; 26 per cent of the taxes spent for police, fire, health, and sanitary services are maintaining only 10 per cent of the city's population. Thirty per cent of the city hospital service in 1932 went into this area of 10 per cent of the population. More than 33 per cent of the public relief and 36 per cent of the city expenditure for arrests, trials and imprisonments were likewise absorbed by these 11 census tracts. Again during 1933, a study of a sub-standard area in South Boston of 769 families indicates an income of $27,093.23 and expenses of $275,113.74 or an excess of expenses over income of $248,020.51. These figures, astounding as they may be, are typical in a general way of every city in America where there are slums, and this means practically every one.

What are the remedies for this situation? First let me say that many countries have tackled this problem, but I would stress this point, that because a certain scheme works well elsewhere it does not necessarily follow that it would be satisfactory in Canada. There is, however, information available to show in broad outline what general principles may be followed. In very general terms, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will look at the remedies.

First, we could raise all wages and income to a level where the people could afford to pay for housing at its present cost. But this would defeat its own end because it would immediately increase the cost of houses. Up would go the price of building materials; up would go the price of labour; up would go the price of the finished house; and it would be the starting point of the spiral of inflation.

Second, we could lower the cost of building. But under present building and financing methods this is impossible. The overhead which the small speculative builder has to carry in order to finance a house may run as high as thirty per cent. His operations are of necessity on a small scale, and he is forced to sub-contract for many items such as the foundation, plumbing and electrical work, flooring, lath and plastering, et cetera. All this adds to the cost. A number of these small speculative builders have told me that they could not make a reasonable profit on a house costing less than four thousand dollars and that they would much prefer to build for six thousand dollars and above.

Third, government help. It is, I believe, established in the United States that private enterprise under existing conditions cannot solve the housing problem of the low income groups. Government assistance has been absolutely necessary in England and elsewhere. There is no reason to believe that Canada will be different. Government help must be given in a number of different ways. The three principal ones may be summarized as follows:

(a) The government builds the houses and rents them to low income groups.

(b) The government subsidizes private enterprise and gives them the differential between the rent they must ask and the price the people can afford to pay.

(c) The government gives loans to cooperative organizations or large scale building operators at a low rate of interest to build houses on mass production methods. This leaves the private builder the field of five thousand dollars and above.

I should like briefly to mention here that it has been found in the United States and in Europe that the cheapest method and that having the greatest social benefits is for the municipal government to own and operate the houses.

In the foregoing I have made no attempt to differentiate between municipal, provincial and federal government agencies, but it is my opinion that the federal government will have to undertake the major part of the financing. It is essential that the municipality have and make a firm commitment to carry out a comprehensive scheme of town planning. If this is not done the investment by the federal government will not be safeguarded.

Various methods of financing have been made elsewhere in the world, and the relations between the federal and municipal authorities with regard to a just sharing of the tax burden have been worked out. I do not propose to go into this matter in detail now. It is sufficient to say that the financing is not a serious obstacle.

Opposition to public housing frequently comes from private interests who believe they will be adversely affected by government operations. This has never been found to be true. In fact, United States experience shows that private interests stand tremendously to gain by any comprehensive state housing scheme.

The sociological benefits of proper housing cannot possibly be overestimated. A number of people approached me with the "coal in the bath" story. Here again United States experience has shown that less than two per cent of the poorest people moved into modern surroundings do not immediately appreciate the improved environment. After a few years this percentage becomes infinitesimal. If it could be produced, the relation between the soldiers discharged from the Canadian army for ill health and their previous housing conditions would be most interesting.

I regard the housing of Canada to be of paramount importance. We are the only civilized nation in the world that has not tackled this problem. It has been estimated that to house properly the people of Canada would give employment for 200,000 men for ten years, and this figure is, I believe, an understatement. I know the government are interested and are working along these lines, but I would urge on them that the time is short and that the experts who understand town planning and construction, as well as the bright scientists in our present war factories, be consulted and brought to Ottawa to check with the house committee on reconstruction. Plans take much thought and time. Now is the time they should be being formulated, not after the million and a half workers in our war industries and the six hundred thousand in our armed forces are clamouring for work.

The subject about which I have been speaking is a vital necessity in my riding. I returned from England, where even in the midst of aerial attack they are providing better emergency shelter than most Canadians have to put up with as permanent homes.

I believe that in York West I represent the largest diversified industrial riding in Canada, but I am extremely happy to say that in the entire period of the war there has not been one industrial dispute; as far as I am aware, there has been no strike of any kind in my riding. We must see that these people who have worked so steadfastly to win this war are properly housed, and we must do everything in our power to ensure that the matter is tackled without delay. Naturally the same applies to our fighting forces when they return to civilian life.

There is one group of workers, however, to which I wish to pay a special tribute. I refer to the railway workers. In York West we have two of the largest freight yards not only in Canada, but, for volume of traffic, in the entire north American continent. I refer to the Mimico yards of the Canadian National railway and the Lambton yards of the Canadian Pacific railway. These key arteries of our war effort have accomplished things which in short are astounding. This work has been carried on under the rigours of our climate at a constant pressure far greater than that which exists in most factories. The work is of necessity hazardous and exacting, yet at no time have I heard any grumbling or complaints of any kind on account of the pressure of work. I believe that these railway men belong to the strongest trade union on the north American continent, and I should like to pay them this tribute, as an example of what trade unionism can do and will do for the good of the country. We have both in peace and in war a magnificent group of workers in these yards. They deserve the very best we can provide in the way of housing.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to you, I am sorry I was not in the position of the previous speaker. I should like to have had the privilege of speaking when the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) was in the Chair, and I know of no hon. gentleman as well equipped to follow as speaker on the other side, as the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. It has been my good fortune, every time I have had the privilege of speaking in this house, to listen to a thesis being read by an hon. member from Toronto; on each occasion I seem to follow him.

I know that my good friends the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address will pardon me if I offer no apologies for not complimenting them upon their work. I have no time to waste in compliments to them, because it is going to take me all my time to compliment the acting assistant leader of the Conservative party. I am not sure whether it is called the Conservative party. Since I have been in politics it has had about ten different names. First, it was the "Conservative" party, and then the "Liberal Conservative" party; then the "National Conservative" party, and now I understand it is the "Progressive Conservative" party.

I wish to congratulate the Liberal party and sympathize with the Conservative party. The opposition had a golden opportunity, with two excellent young lawyers, both returned men who would have appealed to the returning soldier vote, available for the leadership, and they did not take advantage of it. I could have told my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that he never had a chance because the east will never let us run this country. I might have been leader myself had it not been that I was snowed in and I did not get back in time. I do not know whether it was a compliment to me or not, but I have been given a medal. Goering has many medals and I have an extra medal myself. Probably I should put it on before I start to speak, but it bears the inscription, "National Conservative convention, Winnipeg, December 9, 10, 11, 1942." I do not know who presented it to me, but somebody did.

It might have saved much of the time of the house if the suggestion I am going to make had been adopted. I understand that the vote is to be taken to-night, and that is why the Liberal party saved me for the last, so that I cannot discuss the foolish amendments that have been offered. But I do suggest that they might have saved time if, by the unanimous consent of the house, we had put on the Votes and Proceedings the report of the Winnipeg convention. Had that been done, every one who has spoken, who is interested in that report, would not have put it on Hansard. Platforms adopted at conventions are, to me, very much like the barber's pole. There is only one ring on it that means anything; the rest is for show. That is the way with their programme. I cannot agree with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I was not here, as I say; I was snowbound in the wilds of Saskatchewan—it is wild out there anyway—but I cannot agree with that party when they do not approve of members of the armed forces having the privilege of having members represent them here.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nobody said that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: According to Hansard, that is the way I read it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Quote it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You have plenty of time; I have only until six o'clock. My roommate happens to be overseas, where he has been serving for two years, and another friend of mine from Nanaimo has been serving for two years. I believe, therefore, that the armed forces have every right to have members of parliament represent them here. I cannot agree with my hon. friends to the left, including that party which has not even a name or a leader, because they had an ideal chance to offer criticism and they passed it up. Instead, they are talking twaddle about rents of houses or something else. Why do they not go after these boards? I do not agree with everything that the government has done, but I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has come back into the chamber, because I am interested in agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: I came back to listen to my hon. friend.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Much as I disagree with some of the policy of the Minister of Agriculture, there is, in my opinion, not another member of this parliament sitting here to-day who could replace him. He is the first Minister of Agriculture who—

Mr. PERLEY: Is the minister not glad he came in?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will come to dollar wheat before I have finished my remarks. I may have to ask for extra time at six o'clock if there are any other interruptions. I was going to say, the hon. gentleman is the first federal Minister of Agriculture who, when he came to my riding, did not come to meet any of the members of his own party or to meet the representative, who happens at present to be myself. Instead, he came to meet delegations of farmers, the actual producers, and they told him their own story. What they had to say was not stated through the member of parliament; they told their own story, and we are entirely satisfied that we obtained some results out of his visit. This does not say that I agree with all that the minister has said, but I think we would get far better results in agriculture if the minister, instead of boards, actually had something to do with running it. I disagree with my leader, who said that we should not criticize some of these boards. I expressed my opinion of these boards the first week I was here, and I hope I shall express the same opinion when I go—and let me say that I shall be here when many of the rest of my hon. friends have gone. I had the privilege of meeting Mr. Donald Gordon. I knew that he was a being, like the rest of us, but I am still more or less inclined to believe that he is not exactly a human being. He sets prices of farm products about which he knows absolutely nothing. I am not depreciating his work, because I think he is doing a good job in a hard position, but it is up to the Minister of Agriculture to see that we have practical agricultural men advising him and not a bunch of lawyers or bankers from the Bank of Canada telling him what prices of farm products are.

I wish to quote a few figures in connection with dairying, a subject in which I am particularly interested, as far as my riding is concerned. We have a good deal of diversified farming, but dairying is our principal form of agriculture. There is one point on which I agree with the opposition, and that is that so far the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour have not offered any solution of the farm problem. They have offered absolutely no solution as far as farm labour is concerned. Although we have plenty now, and I do not think that rationing is needed at the moment in connection with any farm commodity in Canada, nevertheless there is going to be a tremendous shortage in farm produce. I do not think labour armies of boys and girls or women will solve the farm labour problem. The only solution is to be found in paying the farmer an adequate price so that he can compete in the labour market with other industries, and the government must assume the responsibility in that regard. Two years ago my friends in the new Progressive Conservative party offered, as their sole solution of the world's evils, the conscription of men for overseas. They wanted to send every man, woman and dog overseas, and yet I have heard any number of them now saying that we have sent too many men and that we have not enough to run the farms. Well, you cannot have your cake and eat it. Probably I am unique as a member, as far as this question is concerned, but I have not yet recommended that the son of any farmer be given postponement. I have refused to do so, because I do not think a politician has any right to make recommendations or to interfere in this matter. In British Columbia we are fortunate in having a most excellent judge in charge of the board and he is absolutely fair. I have not agreed with some of his decisions, but I say that it is up to the Department of Agriculture to see that we get sufficient help for the farms in order to produce, so that we can compete in the open market.

In British Columbia, taking 2,260 dairymen last year, we averaged $4 a day from milch cows. Out of that $4, or $123 a month, we have to pay taxes, maintain our herds, keep up our machinery and buildings in as good repair as we can, and support a family. Any boy can make more than that in any job he wants to fill in British Columbia. As far as I am concerned, the Department of Agriculture must take the responsibility. There is no use in passing the buck to the boards, because, if they are to run agriculture, we may as well close down agriculture in the dominion. Just a short time ago they gave a bonus or subsidy of two cents a quart on milk. In Vancouver, the third city of Canada, where men are making more money than they have ever made before, in spite of the working conditions that prevail, they are getting milk at nine cents a quart. Is that any solution of the problem? The consumer is getting a bonus of eighty cents a can, while the average bonus to the farmer in British Columbia is nineteen cents a can. Is there any rhyme or reason in that? If the government can bonus the consumer eighty cents a can on milk, what justification have they for giving the farmer a bonus of nineteen cents for 100 pounds? Yet we are asked to increase production at all times.

In the area which I represent, and in part of the other riding in Fraser Valley, there is a milk-shed that produces forty per cent of the milk produced in British Columbia. That district is about 30 miles wide and 110 miles long. Last year we produced 200,000,000 pounds of milk, which, as I say, was forty per cent of the provincial production. One point which I wish to make and to impress upon the department, the government and some Ontario members is this. The average farm taxes in that milk shed were over $3 an acre. I know one dairy farm, excellent land, fifteen minutes by car from the centre of Toronto, about eighty-six acres, that pays $216 a year in taxes. In the municipality from which I come, for eighty-six acres one would pay $380 in taxes. That is one of the things we have to contend with in British Columbia; our municipal and school taxes are far higher than those in any part with which we compete. Yet boards come along, and instead of paying a subsidy as we think it should be set, namely, a general subsidy on butter-fat produced, it is paid on the fluid milk. In Canada only about thirty per cent of the milk goes into the fluid milk market. We think that subsidy should be on the total butter-fat. It makes a tremendous difference. We are now penalizing the farmer who is not immediately adjacent to the large industrial centres where the fluid milk market is. That is one thing the department should take up.

I wish to quote a few figures. In the Fraser Valley we have been getting the following prices for milk:

Year	Production (pounds)	Average price (cents)
1930	5,000,000	54·1
1932 (nearly) .	7,000,000	28

The price in 1930 was five cents below the average of 1921-29. The average for 1931 to 1940 was thirty-four cents a pound butter-fat. It is not necessary to point out that farmers cannot exist on such prices other than as peasants, and surely it is not the policy of the government or the people of Canada that the farmer should be forced to become a peasant. But he cannot exist on thirty-four cents a pound for butter-fat. Yet the solution offered by these boards is to subsidize the consumer eighty cents a can and the farmer nineteen cents.

Let me give some actual figures. On two thousand farms the average income over a ten-year period on the farm was $850, or $2.35 a day. On such a return, can a man pay these high taxes, support his family and keep up repairs? When I hear these Saskatchewan farmers talk about wheat it makes me wonder what they would ever do if they had to live on a dairy farm.

I turn to selective service. As far as British Columbia is concerned, selective service has fallen down. One thing that may be a minor matter, but to which I strenuously object, is the way people are dealt with in the offices. There is no privacy. When a man or woman goes in there they are not going with their hat in their hand; they go as Canadian citizens, entitled to all consideration. They are not going for relief; they are merely fulfilling what the law requires.

Another point is this. I do not know who is to blame, whether it is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) or the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who should not have such things, coming from such a fine province and riding; but unquestionably men coming back from this war are not being properly treated. That complaint comes from all parts of the house and there can be no dispute about it. One thing that is wrong is this. Many of these men who are being discharged as medically unfit were service station operators or clerks or men in different kinds of business, put out of action by war conditions, and they are not in physical condition to work in shipyards or at logging or other hard labour. In Vancouver and right in my own riding some are actually destitute, and that is not to the credit of this government or this parliament. Naturally I am all in favour of social security. But these conditions are not evidence of our good faith in our talk of social security, nor is the fact that we are still paying $20 a month in old age pensions.

There is one reform I could suggest to the government, and I know where the money could come from. I mention this because I know that most of the members are afraid to say it on the floor of the house for fear it will appear in Hansard and thus get back to their ridings, but I do not care. The government could make a little saving in the way I am about to suggest and allow some expense money to hon. members instead of imposing the income tax. I well remember the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), when he ran in my riding, speaking on this subject. We thought the problem would be solved in two weeks when he got back, but unfortunately he did not get back. I speak of reform of the senate. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was criticized for talking politics when he talked senate reform. I did not say I was in favour of senate reform for the simple reason that I forgot, or I would have done so. I know I shall never get into that political museum, a useless bunch of old men sitting there talking, the only thing they do—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is not entitled to use those expressions.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. But if the other place were to be abolished it would save a great amount of money and save the morals of some of the members; about all they do in an entire year is to listen to a few key-hole divorce cases.

In connection with selective service I suggest—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Was the hon. gentleman referring to members of parliament listening at keyholes?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: What was the expression used by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was not referring to parliament at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was referring to members of parliament?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, Mr. Speaker. If I did I withdraw it; I certainly did not intend to. I had better leave the other place alone; I am getting into trouble. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Labour that the selective service regulations be modified, particularly concerning men coming back from the army, and elderly men. A tremendous number of people are not old enough for old age pensions and are not entirely medically unfit; yet in order to get employment they must conform to the regulations as laid down under the selective service. Under present conditions I think the regulations should be amended to give those people a free hand to seek employment where they can get it. This should also apply to returned soldiers.

I wish to say something in connection with the air force. In my opinion the best-conducted branch of the entire government is that of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power); I say that with all respect for other ministers. He has done a magnificent job and has never been criticized in this house. But there is one thing which to me is utter nonsense: Two boys, one a sergeant-pilot, and the other a pilot officer, fly over Berlin. Every one of those aircrew men should have commissioned rank. It is unreasonable that when they come back one should have to go to a different mess from that to which the other who flew with him goes.

Another branch that I consider has been neglected is that of the radio technician. They are still serving as privates in the Royal Canadian Air Force attached to the Royal Air Force, overseas, and to me this seems absolutely unfair. They are highly skilled men; they had to take intensive courses; yet they get no further than the rank corresponding to private, which I believe is leading aircraftsman. That does not seem reasonable to me, and I think the minister should take this matter into consideration. I am very proud of the fact that in my riding we have the best airport in Canada, and I would invite any investigation into the price paid for the land. There was no cost-plus arrangement with regard to this airport, and an excellent job has been done. I noticed an inquiry by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as to the price paid for land in another instance. Just what he is fishing for I do not know, but I can assure him that the price paid in connection with the airport in my constituency was nothing like the price paid for the land around Winnipeg. In my case there was no criticism at all, and would not have been even from the C.C.F., though there are no C.C.F. voters in my riding; they all vote for Cruickshank.

I know hon. members would be surprised if I did not say something about the Japanese in British Columbia. I cannot agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that the commission set up to deal with the Japanese made a good job of handling the problem. I think they made a terrible job of it, but we have got rid of a great many Japanese, and I wish to commend the government for proceeding to sell the land out there which was owned by the Japanese. There is no reason why it should not be sold, if their boats and other possessions can be treated in that way, and it is also good business. In the Fraser valley at the present time there are some two thousand acres of land formerly owned by the Japanese which have not been cultivated, and now that we are short of food this seems criminal to me. The Department of Agriculture should give consideration to the advisability of making some sort of grant to the farmers who have taken over that land in order to keep it in production. In all fairness to the security commission I think I should say that I have not heard of any great extravagance in handling the Japanese. I have here some pictures of the houses which were built to accommodate two families, at a cost of $145 each, which I consider was a pretty reasonable amount to pay.

I am very much interested in the soldier problem. It has been said before, but I want to say again that I believe it is unfair that officers on duty on our coasts, who are on active service just as much as they would be in Tunisia, should be required to pay income tax. I do not want to pay any more income tax than I have to, but I think the Minister of Finance might, if necessary, tax some of the rest of us a little more and not tax those officers who are eligible for service anywhere.

On one point I agree with the opposition to a certain extent. We and the people of Canada are entitled to know whether or not we have sufficient trained and equipped men to reinforce our army overseas, though of course I realize that the minister cannot give that information publicly. I am one of those who believe that Canada never should have tried to handle five divisions overseas. If we can equip and maintain four divisions over there we are doing very well indeed. Some opportunity should be found, if necessary in secret session, to tell us just where we stand as far as reinforcements are concerned. If we have sufficient, that is fine. I hope we have, and personally I believe we have; I am sure the minister would attend to that. But in order that any doubts which may exist across Canada may be allayed, we should be fully informed upon that point. I am not a military strategist like the hon. member for Vancouver South. I do not know just how we are going to defend our coasts, and I do not think he does, either. Last year he was going to send our army to Australia; the other day he was going to send it to Japan. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly the other evening, he wanted them to be sent to the jungle to get their experience. That is strange, in view of the fact that before the Conservative returned soldier organization in Vancouver he objected to them being sent to Africa.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no, I did not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I am mistaken.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not strange.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Certainly some of those who were at the meeting of the Canadian corps association, which is nothing but a Conservative military organization, made the statement that they objected to our soldiers going to Africa to get experience, and the hon. member for Vancouver South was at the meeting.

Mr. GREEN: That does not say I made the statement.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, and I withdraw the remark, but the hon. member was in bad company and he must put up with the consequences. I have great respect for the hon. member for Vancouver South. He is a good friend of mine, and I do not altogether blame him for fainting at Winnipeg. I would faint, too, if I thought I was going to be selected as leader of that party. In British Columbia we have a beautiful and ornamental fern. I do not know if it is common to the rest of Canada, but we have it in abundance in my province, and it makes one of the finest decorations one could hope to see. A strange thing about it, though, is that if it is transplanted or moved in any way it withers and dies; yet in its own element it gets on very well. We call it the bracken, and I think the same result will follow in another instance. I intend no disrespect at all to the gentleman who I understand some day may be the leader of the opposition. I have never had the privilege of meeting that gentleman, but as a matter of fact right now I do not know, and no one else knows, who is leading the Progressive Conservatives. They do not know themselves.

In conclusion, I should like to urge that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who has, as I see it, not yet tackled the problem of food production in Canada, and I make that statement while repeating that in my opinion there is no man in this house who could fill his shoes. I do not think he realizes as yet how serious the food situation is, because, if he did, with all his ability I am sure he would see that some action was taken. Let him fire all these boards; let him take over the problem himself and go to work immediately, together with the Minister of Labour. I am sure that together they can solve the labour problem on our farms.

I want to add that in my opinion the Liberal party has had bad luck occasionally, just as the Conservative party has. I believe if some years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had used all his powers of persuasion to induce the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to take a seat in this house, it would have been a grand thing for Canada, because he has been a great asset since he came here. That is my opinion of the minister; I think he is a wonderful asset to this house, and I am sorry he did not come sooner.

I should like to say a word in connection with the Prime Minister. I for one, as a Liberal member, as a returned soldier and as a farmer, am sick and tired of hearing criticism of our Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is all very well for my hon. friends to the left to talk. They know they will never get into power. I will admit that they have many good ideas, but they will never come to power in Canada, and they know it perfectly well. If any hon. member would be fair about it; if he would sit down and talk it over, off the record if necessary, I would defy him to name any man in parliament or anywhere else in Canada capable of leading Canada as Mackenzie King has led it. It is very easy to criticize—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): All the secretary jobs are filled.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are vacancies in the senate.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Perhaps all the secretary jobs are filled, but with material of the calibre we have in our party they will be properly filled no matter who takes them.

It is time that we as Canadians, instead of belittling the leader of our country, should try to help him. I do not expect everyone to agree with his decisions at all times. I do not always agree with them, and I am a member of his party. But I do not think it is worthy of my hon. friends as Canadians at all times to give lip-service in the House of Commons, saying, "We will cooperate with the government; we will do this; we will do that," and then to telephone to that little committee of two hundred in Toronto, ask their instructions, and do everything possible to knock the efforts of the Prime Minister of Canada.

I sympathize with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). He must have a tremendous long-distance telephone bill. I understand he has a committee meeting every day at two o'clock to find out what he is to say and what he is to do. I admit that our Prime Minister falls down in that regard, because he does not call me in very often.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member was not acquainted with his leader in the last war.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, I was not, for the simple reason that I was not old enough to be a member of parliament. If I had been I would have been here then.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member would not have found him here.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Listen; I have made many speeches in this House of Commons. In them I have criticized the present leader of the government; I have criticized the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I criticized Mr. Meighen when he wanted to become leader of the government; but no remark I made respecting any member of the house has been at all personal, no matter to what party a person has belonged, and I do not intend to start now.

Mr. Speaker, my time has almost expired. The only reason why the party asked me to continue talking until six o'clock was that we were afraid we might hear more nonsense from the left. I do not think I need tell the house how I am going to vote. However I do understand that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) is going to vote with the government, because I promised him—and I should not have made such a promise—that if he would, not only would we pay him for ploughing all his farm again this year, but we would put water into all the little holes he has around his farm.

In conclusion, and in all seriousness, I wish to impress upon the hon. member who is now leading the house, and through him the government, that we now have an ideal opportunity of doing something worth while. I do not think there is a member in the house who would not in every way possible assist the government in bringing about some form of social security. Certainly no hon. member knows what that solution would be. No one can foretell what the future may bring. But we, as a parliament, and you, as a government, have an ideal chance within the next month or two to show our sincerity in bringing about a token of social security by increasing the old age pension.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this 1943 speech from the throne differs very little from that of 1942, save for its veiled terms instead of a clear statement of the government's intention of increasing the war expenditures without regard for the position in which the inhabitants of this country have already been put, of also increasing contributions in the form of gifts for the allied countries, principally for Great Britain. A better understanding of this requires connecting the speech from the throne with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mackenzie King) own speech.

You must therefore be advised, Mr. Speaker, that we have seen the day—a day now gone by—when an exhausted Canada has become a country where the people are destined to live in slavery for a century to come.

Is there no one in this country in a position to figure and count? As there surely must exist some such men, is it not possible for our government to use their services?

Where are the financial experts who in 1939 advised the government to the effect that Canada could participate in the conflict up to 750 million dollars yearly, maybe up to one billion, but not beyond, without jeopardizing her economic structure? Where are the experts who, in 1939, never stopped saying that it would be the height of folly for Canada to go to Europe every twenty years in order to police the world?

In the single year of 1942, we have spent in Canada—including the gift of $1,000,000,000 to England—for the administration of the country and the cost of war, a sum of $4,758,000,000, divided as follows: estimates for 1942, $3,900,000,000; supplementary estimates voted this week, $858,000,000, making a total of $4,758,00,000, or $413 per capita.

What does a sum of $413 mean for each one of us? In my province, where the average number of children is six, so that with the father and mother there are eight persons in each family, it means that the expenditures of 1941-42 for war and for the administration of the country have reached the tidy sum of $3,304 for each Quebec family; in other words, within a single year, Canada has spent the entire property of those whose assessment is only $3,000.

And because we ask the right hon. the Prime Minister what has become of his moderate war, and are then compelled to leave him in protest, he says we are people without honour. I wish to quote what he said on February 1, as reported on page 47 of Hansard:

> Yet at this critical time, of all times, hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite find it necessary to separate themselves from colleagues in their province in order to support an isolationist view with regard to the war effort of Canada. Their action does credit neither to themselves, nor to their province or to our country.

First, I answer with all possible frankness: "How, Mr. Speaker, am I disgracing my family, my province, my country?" I came to this side of the house to remain consistent with myself, faithful to the lessons imparted to me by the Prime Minister, from 1921 to 1939.

Let us consider his own statements. In 1939: I quote the words of the Prime Minister on conscription as printed on page 2426 of Hansard for March 30, 1939 session, vol. 3:

> The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

And what had the minister stated in the preceding paragraph?

> One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.

And then on page 2419, what are the words of the Prime Minister? I quote them verbatim:

> We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia. The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

I am not the one who said these words, Mr. Speaker, I am not the one who professed that doctrine. But in opposition to these teachings, the leader of the Liberal government caused the house in 1939 to vote for participation in the war. Assurance was then given by him that such participation was to be moderate, proportionate to the means of the country. It was to be a voluntary participation—I need not here repeat the statements of the Prime Minister—but everything was to be on a voluntary basis and limited to the financial capacity of the country.

To be consistent with my past attitude, I voted against our participation in 1939. I then said what I repeat to-night, that to my mind it was the path leading to ruin, the road leading to compulsory military service, that is, to conscription.

I believe our present effort is exaggerated for a population of 11,500,000 inhabitants.

Canada has a male population of 5,900,000. Of this number, 1,900,000 are either too young or too old to work or are medically unfit, leaving some 4,000,000 able-bodied men. Of this number, 700,000 are to-day in the armed forces, and, according to the latest figures, 1,100,000 are employed in the war industries or in the shipyards, making a total of 1,800,000 men either in the army or engaged in the construction of weapons of war. This means that on the day of the armistice, one Canadian out of every two will find himself out of work.

In what position will we be as a result of a participation so out of proportion with our population?

This situation will become intolerable immediately after the war and will expose our people to lose the peace as a result of a thoughtless administration, an exaggerated participation which, in 1940, was to be moderate and, to-day, has become an all-out participation, to the last dollar and the last man, directly in opposition to the policy outlined by the present government during the 1940 electoral campaign.

In 1941, the government mobilized our young men for the defence of Canada in Canada.

What did the government leader have to say on this subject in his radio address of February 2, 1941? I quote some excerpts from his book "Le Canada et la guerre," page 232, and from "Canada at Britains' Side," page 203. First, why does this book bear different titles in the French and the English editions, since they both contain extracts from the same addresses? Here are the two books. The binding is better on the one than on the other, that is the only difference between them. The contents are exactly the same. Everyone knows that the translation of "Le Canada et la guerre" is "Canada at War"; and that the English title "Canada at Britain's Side" should be translated by "Le Canada aux côtés de l'Angleterre." One type of policy is expounded to the French Canadians and another to the English-speaking Canadians.

It is nothing but a political expedient! "Le Canada et la guerre," in the author's mind, is less objectionable to the French Canadians, and, on the other hand, "Canada at Britain's Side" sounds better to another group of Canadians.

I therefore read an extract from page 204 of the English edition:

> Total effort can be achieved in two ways. It can be compelled by dictatorial force—that is the enemy's way. It can be obtained by the free-will offering of a free people—that is our way, and the way we must strive to preserve. We are a free people, and every day since the war began, there has been proof of the growing willingness of our people to spare no effort or sacrifice, that the needs of the war demand.

Yet to-day the right hon. the prime minister says that we are not honourable, we who sit in this corner of the house, quite near the exit. I represent a fairly populous constituency and I am convinced that my electors will keep me in the House of Commons for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote some excerpts from an article by Morton Smith which appeared on page 6 of the May 12, 1942, issue of the American magazine PIC. The article is entitled "What is an honest politician?" and it begins with these words:

> To be honest is to be great.

Here is what I read in the third column of the article:

> It is worth stressing again and again about Franklin D. Roosevelt as President that he has never in any major issue tried to fool or double-cross the people. . . .

And further on:

> Roosevelt's record of square dealing is remarkable for showing few instances of important compromises on political personalities and almost none on principles. As far as he could he has kept his administration free of the double dealers and opportunists.

In his book the prime minister also tells us about the voluntary service of a free people.

At first, mobilization entailed one month's training; later, four months' military service was required; still later, a year's training was decreed and, finally, men were drafted for the duration of the war. And to-day, by order in council, these draftees are being sent outside the country. A scarcely honourable method, a roundabout means. But, after all, the entire set up of the war machine is along that line. The book I hold in hand is one example of it.

May I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my experience I have been given lessons in honour from two sources. The first one, in my youth, came from my mother—a memory which will ever abide with me. Her words were these: "Never do unto others as you would not have others do unto you and guard scrupulously over property entrusted to your care."

The second contribution to my education up to 1939 came from my political leader, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King. He taught me a political doctrine in which I believed and in which I still believe. If his conception of honour allows him to forget his past, my mother's teachings, as far as I am concerned, do not allow me to do so.

In conscience does he blame me? I think not.

And to-day the leader of the Liberal government is doing exactly what he judged ridiculous in 1939. The lives of our soldiers are threatened, financial bankruptcy in this country is an accomplished fact and all through the fault of a government who were warning the people against such a catastrophe.

That policy goes to such extremes that no limits are set anywhere. Let us consider, for instance, the navy item. Is is not astounding that, according to the publication "Canada at war", No. 21, page 7, whereas in 1939 we had 1,717 men serving in the navy we now have 52,000? In 1939, we had fifteen warships, whereas to-day, according to that publication, we have over 500.

If the predecessor of the right hon. the Prime Minister were here, what blame he could level against the present government! What a contrast between the three small ships of Laurier in 1911 and the 500 ships we have to-day!

That is not all. Here is what is said on page 8 of that publication:

The Canadian navy now has nearly one-half the number of men the Royal Navy had at the outbreak of war.

And on page 9:

The Canadian navy is rapidly increasing, as a result of the production of Canadian and British shipyards.

Canada, which formerly was so peaceful and whose policy was so moderate in 1939 is now building as many ships as possible. Moreover, Canada is having built in England as many ships as she can obtain for the present war.

Why should a government go to such extremes? For, after all, England, twenty times wealthier than Canada, can use all her resources to build ships. Why should England build ships for us? Such a policy is extreme and short-sighted.

I have said enough. Those who in 1940 were supposedly supporting a moderate participation have reached the point where they are building the largest possible number of ships in Canada and are having ships built in British yards for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, what is the reason for this participation, and this exaggerated effort, which is out of proportion with the size of our population and financial means?

It is the act of thoughtless men, they show revealing panic among our leaders. We are on the road to perdition and slipping fast. The Liberal government and the Conservative party are allied in the prosecution of an extremist and imperialistic policy.

Yet, to-day, the Prime Minister is surprised that men such as I find it necessary to forsake his party.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a follower of the Prime Minister from 1921 to 1939. I have thoroughly understood his teachings. I have contributed much of my own money and effort in support of his truly Canadian policy. I put my faith in him, convinced as I was at that time of his sincerity; I supported him loyally until September 9, 1939. Then, I realized that the Liberal leader was turning his back on the political principles which he had upheld until then, and, from 1939 to this day, I have been an astounded witness to the means employed by his government, blind extremists that they are, to ensure our present limitless contribution to the war.

The propaganda resorted to from 1939 to this day is an exact replica of that used from 1914 to 1918, except that it is more hypocritical.

Government experts and astute lawyers tell us that conscription is not in force in Canada. in the Canada Gazette of February 9 was published a proclamation calling up all the young men born in 1924, that is, 19 years of age. Why are young men of 19 needed in the army at the present time if not to release those already mobilized for service overseas? Why go to such extremes?

We have a shortage of farm labour. Large quantities of wheat were left standing under the snow in western Canada. The mixed farmer can hardly supply the Canadian population with the necessary quantity of butter; the live-stock producer will be far from meeting the consumer demand. Beef is about to be rationed. There is a scarcity of wool—hundreds and hundreds of soldiers carry on their military training dressed in civilian clothes. There is a scarcity of fat and potatoes in certain parts of the country. Our pulp mills are short of wood for lack of labour. Lumber is scarce for the same reason. It is a shame to see young girls, young children of fifteen, showing signs of poor health, forced to work at night in industrial establishments of the province of Quebec.

And then our young men of nineteen are mobilized for military training. We are even told that from the 1st of March all single men between nineteen and forty-five and all married men between nineteen and twenty-five will be called up for medical examination. This happens at a time when we have already 700,000 men in the armed forces.

Is it not true, according to the words of the Prime Minister himself, that Canada's war effort is greater in proportion to its population than that of any other country? In my opinion we have in this country a group of leaders whose zeal exceeds in every particular what may be found in other lands.

The most solemn pledges count for little or nothing; we seem to be under the most rigid dictatorship known in any of the allied nations at war; the Canadian gestapo plagues our people.

Has not society been completely disorganized in this country? Not the slightest consideration is being shown for the common people.

Boards have been established whose members are not responsible to the people, men who are paid by their regular employers and who give their services for one dollar a year—and in many instances in the interest of their respective businesses.

The trust in certain lines of business is represented by some of these dollar-a-year men by whom personal liberty is being sabotaged.

The trade of the country general merchant is being sabotaged. Restrictions imposed are often unfair. Butter rationing is fixed at five ounces a week, alcohol at forty ounces.

The dressmaker is short of needles, of hair pins, etc., etc., but we pay over to Great Britain $200,000,000 for her war machinery in Canada, machinery which will be worth the price of scrap metal less than one year after the end of war, providing our government at that time does not, to our undoing, dispose of it in favour of unscrupulous dealers who will resell it to our enemies that they may the better lay us low twenty years later.

What a government! What a Babel! And we hear boastings of good administration.

Subsidies equivalent to 65 million dollars are being granted to a company with American subscribed capital, on the basis of a sufficient allowance for depreciation over a period of two years, so that financing is thereby assured for the construction of hydro electric plants with a total capacity of one and one-half million horsepower.

Why so much protection for these groups? And to meet such prodigalities, the people are taxed to a point where they can no longer meet their obligations. Private initiative is being completely ruined.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party, the present government, have made their own the extremist programme of the Conservative party. We have heard them singing each other's praise. The other day, the Prime Minister spent fifteen minutes complimenting the former leader of the opposition and congratulating him on his achievements during recent years.

Was not the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) one of the group who deprived the right hon. the Prime Minister of his seat in 1926? When I then offered my own seat to the Prime Minister, was it perchance my first dishonourable gesture?

Mr. Speaker, what a striking contrast between the praises addressed to his opponents and the blame cast upon his friends of twenty-five years' standing! I may say that I am not ashamed of having crossed to this side of the house as a member of "the bloc populaire canadien".

I have been identified for twenty-five years with the Quebec "bloc". During those years that "bloc" has almost continuously given sixty members to this government. I am remaining a member of that "bloc", that is all. The Quebec "bloc" will remain. This time it is the government that have parted from the Quebec "bloc" which had been of so much help to them. The government's policy is so imperialistic and extreme that Quebec is compelled to dissociate itself from them.

[Mr. E. Lacroix.]

Mr. FAUTEUX: Not Quebec; three members only.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): The people of the province of Quebec are Canadian first. Have they not shown it at every opportunity? But they do and will always remember how they have been deceived.

From a participation "by free collaboration" to a dictatorial participation by order in council, the Prime Minister has launched us into extreme participation in the war.

What is the use of compelling our small population of eleven million and a half to throw itself between Germany and Russia? We all know that Russia has a population of nearly two hundred million people and we know that her natural increase is five million people a year; we know that she can wage war for a century without decreasing her population.

What is the use of our sparsely populated country throwing 200,000, 300,000 or 500,000 men between China and Japan? China has a population of five hundred million people, with a natural increase of twelve million and a half a year and she can wage war during an indefinite period without decreasing her population.

How sound was the reasoning of our Prime Minister previous to 1939? It is too bad that he has not remained consistent with himself. Those countries must be fed. Why should we not supply them with our wheat and all other foodstuffs?

No doubt our all-out war effort seems ridiculous to the populations of Sweden, Turkey, Ireland, India, Spain, Portugal and South America.

For 1942, our exaggerated war expenditures amount to almost 5 billion dollars, compared to 50 billions in the United States, and for 1943 they will exceed 8 billions. In a comparison with the United States some will say that we are no more than they are. Let us not forget that the United States are spending the gold which they have accumulated, while we are mortgaging the property of our descendants. When this war is over, if the United States have increased their public debt by 200 billions, they will be in a position to issue immediately currency for that amount on the international basis of 25 per cent gold coverage and they still will have the soundest currency in the world. They will be able to write off their debt any day they choose. On the other hand, lacking the same reserves in proportion to the population, such a course will not be possible for us in this country. In my opinion, the United States are spending what they hold in reserve in Fort Knox, while we are spending what we do not possess. We are mortgaging the credit of future generations, and as our country borders on the United States those who will follow us will have to live in a state of slavery in order to survive.

The comparison is a very simple one. Here are two neighbours; one has a family of 26 and has a bank account of $200,000 of which he spends $150,000 during the war. At the close of hostilities, he still owns $50,000. The other family is thirteen times smaller, counting only two members; during the war this man spend $12,000 and, in order to do that, he must mortgage his property and pay interest. At the end of the war, he is bankrupt; he loses his property or goes into bankruptcy, while his neighbour is still a wealthy man. This example, to my mind, is a fair illustration of Canada's situation as compared to that of the United States.

Much is said, in Canada, about inflation. In government circles, it is claimed that inflation is being checked. Has any government ever done so much as the present administration to provoke inflation of debts in the country? No limit is set on the increase of the national debt. We are governed through inflation of orders in council. Trusts are resorting to inflation of their control on trade. Inflation is checked among our people by preventing them, through a pyramiding of laws and orders in council, from paying their debts and from realizing profits that would allow them to carry on.

Has there been, since confederation, any government who have inflated taxes to the same extent as the present one. To-day, personal taxes have reached an aggregate average of 37½ per cent of the individual incomes.

Mr. Speaker, I could pursue this subject indefinitely, but I believe my time has expired.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Jean): I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): I repeat: in order to be consistent with myself, I shall vote against the address, against the amendment and against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I first offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harris) and the seconder (Mr. Hallé) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These honourable and gallant members did honour to themselves and to the armed forces which they represent. While it is true that as yet the Canadian army has seen little of actual conflict, they stand on guard for us; and to no one has the long period of training and preparation been more trying than to the soldiers themselves. Seldom do I enter this chamber without observing in the hallway the statue of Lieutenant-Colonel Baker, who made the supreme sacrifice during the last war. It would indeed be a strange commentary on our democratic institutions if members of this house were forbidden to offer themselves in the highest form of all service, namely the armed service of their country in time of war. Indeed, the constituency whose representative wears the king's uniform is doubly honoured.

One statement contained in the speech from the throne is particularly comforting at this time; that is, that as members of this house and citizens of this country we could be heartened by the improved position of the united nations. We can take comfort from the fact that the course of the war is now more favourable to the cause of freedom than it has been in the past. There is satisfaction to be gained from the fact that we are now approaching the hill from which victory may be seen in the distance, though still a long way off. We realize that great sacrifices still must be made, but if we are even a little nearer victory than before it means that many lives which otherwise would have been sacrificed will be saved to us and the other united nations. We have advanced far along the road. In the beginning we were totally unprepared, and for two years we were almost overcome by the enemy attacks and reeled from their blows, wherever they cared to strike. We have won the battle of Britain, and by so doing we have given civilization and our democratic way of life a chance to save itself from barbarism. We have now a victorious Russia, a hard-fighting United States and thirty other united nations on our side. We are definitely on the offensive. We have equality or superiority in arms, and we never doubted the quality of our seamen, our soldiers and our airmen. Their spirit of sacrifice is an inspiration to us all, though sometimes we forget it. The road ahead is still long and hard, but we will put our shoulders to the wheel and see this conflict through to the victorious end.

We are proud of the leaders of the united nations, of Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt; we are proud of the achievements of Stalin and the Russian people. We are proud to be associated with Churchill and Roosevelt in the planning of the grand strategy of this war, even though our connection is only by remote control and absentee representation. It is obvious that all the united nations could not be represented at Casablanca, but there is a feeling on the part of many Canadians that closer and better cooperation could be achieved through direct representation on an imperial war council, or British commonwealth council, if you like, in London. Particularly is this so because our army is being held in Great Britain as a spearhead pointed at the heart of Berlin. Perhaps I should use the term "united nations council," on which we should seek representation, because it is almost inevitable that United States troops will form part of the attacking forces. Many people in this country believe that high ministerial representation should be sought on a supreme war council. Not a week passes without some utterance which affects Canada coming from one or another of the allied leaders, and one wonders exactly how instructions are given or consent is signified by this country. In 1916, in reference to an imperial war cabinet, Sir Robert Borden said:

> It can hardly be expected that we shall put 400,000 or 500,000 men in the field and willingly accept the position of having no more voice and receiving no more consideration than if we were toy automata. Any person cherishing such expectation cherishes an unfortunate and even dangerous delusion.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said recently that the agencies of communication have greatly improved since the last war. At that time, however, we had almost instantaneous communication by cable, and I doubt very much if even to-day secret messages can be sent over the radio. It is true that aeroplane transportation makes documentary dispatch easier, but the mechanical means of transportation were almost as perfect in the last war as they are to-day, and there is no closer communication now than there was at that time. It is not enough for those who have charge of government in this country to know what is in the minds of those who are directing the conduct of this war. Are our ministers and those responsible for our military commitments always to be on the receiving end? Can they only reply to the suggestions of others? Can they never volunteer information or military help? Can they never initiate proposals? Must they always act as a brake on the wheels of progress? One might almost as well suggest that parliament be not convened, that the members remain at home in their constituencies and rely on the endless press releases and official documents which are sent to them. The purpose of parliament, like the purpose of a war council, is to represent our constituencies, exchange our views and find a common ground of national action. Our war contribution promises to be very great. We should seek the position of an equal, not that of a helpful appendage. Many things are not asked of us because the ideas must originate with us. Can we possibly have a proper understanding of all the facts bearing on the various matters which come up if we are not part and parcel of the planning council?

The Prime Minister has stated that every day the government receives not one, but at least a dozen dispatches, if not more, direct from the government of Britain, in relation to matters immediately affecting the war. What innumerable problems must be the subject-matter of these dispatches? How many of them require definite and striking leadership? Mere consultation between the government of this country and the governments of the other united nations is not sufficient. The whole life of our nation at the present time is directed to the supreme effort of winning this war, and there is no place where direct and continuous representation is more needed than on a war council.

Where the supreme control of war planning lies is not clear. I doubt if any hon. member can tell me exactly where the grand board of strategy is. In his speech the other week the Prime Minister said:

> Our chiefs of staff in this city are in constant touch with the combined chiefs of staff having their headquarters at Washington. The war committee of the cabinet is informed of the discussions taking place there from day to day. We have a permanent liaison officer, an official of the government, who is there at the present time, and is there also throughout the year. We are entitled to follow the discussions and to be heard respecting any aspect of the war situation we may wish to present. Canada's interests in all these matters are placed fully before these boards that are continuously sitting and dealing with these matters.

May I again remind the house of what Sir Robert Borden said in 1916:

> Let us be done with liaison officers, and have direct participation. Let us put off our swaddling clothes, and put on the raiment of nationhood.

May I ask the Prime Minister if consultation is to be the measure of Canada's participation in the peace conference, to which we are all looking forward, a conference which we trust will bring peace and prosperity not only to our children, but to our children's children. Is Canada to have a liaison officer permitted to attend that momentous conference? What consideration shall this country receive at the council or committee which will implement the provisions of the Atlantic charter, and on all the great economic conferences which are bound to follow this war? Are we merely to have liaison officers attached to these very important conferences?

Is the Prime Minister, also, the only minister who can be sent to attend these conferences, wherever they may be held? He has said that his place is in the House of Commons and in this country. From a political point of view the Prime Minister is leader of a political party; but, if so little national unity, and so little unity of purpose have been achieved, that his presence is required here, then surely some other Canadian statesman can be substituted for him to attend these conferences. Inasmuch as one must cut one's coat according to one's cloth, I offer the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston).

In a volume entitled "Speeches and Documents on the British Dominions, 1918-1931," which has as a subtitle "From self-government to national sovereignty," edited by Arthur Berriedale Keith, we find this:

> Common effort and sacrifice in war have inevitably led to the recognition of equality of status between the responsible governments of the empire. This equality has long been acknowledged in principle and found its adequate expression in 1917 in the creation, or rather the natural coming into being, of the imperial war cabinet, as an instrument for evolving a common imperial policy in the conduct of the war.

The deliberations of the imperial war cabinet covered the whole field of empire policy, and also many aspects of foreign policy, and the war aims for which the British commonwealth was then fighting. If Canada does not take part in such a council, then surely it is following a retrogressive step. It has failed to assume and discharge its rightful duty, namely, to share in the joint administration of the war.

This war has differed very much from the last in the quietitude of its early stages, then the unexpected successes of the enemy in May, 1940, and then the unparalleled success of Russia in the winter of 1942-43. The relative quiet and building up, and the making of preparations on the European front now induce a feeling that the present method of consultation and partnership is quite adequate. But, sir, I do not believe that it will be adequate for the time when stresses and strains are greatly increased. Then the need will come. Then will be the utmost urgency. Then will be the need for consultation and cooperation which will not be present.

Hon. members who are intimate with the history of the imperial war cabinet will recall that that cabinet solved many problems which might have grown into matters of substantial friction. For instance, Sir Arthur Currie found that he did not receive the cooperation to which he felt he was entitled, and which was necessary, from the British officers. It was a matter of great importance, and finally the command of the Canadian soldiers was put entirely under General Currie. In this war we have benefited from our experiences in the last, and we have started off on the right foot.

If we are to interpret and carry out the policies necessary for the winning of this war, it may be that the Prime Minister must remain in Canada. These policies undoubtedly are difficult to apply; but we should obtain representation of a high political character on the board which does the planning of the grand strategy in this war.

While the Prime Minister has said that his place is in this country, we find proofs to the contrary in his acts, rather than in his words. Not only has he himself found it necessary to visit Great Britain, but many of his chief ministers, together with their staffs, have gone to Britain—not once, but several times—in order to learn and to contribute at first hand. Despite the means of communication these visits were entailed only by the greatest necessity. Nothing could indicate better than these visits the necessity for representation on an imperial cabinet. In the last war there were benefits, other than the chief one of joint direction and cooperation in the war, to be derived from the imperial war cabinet. At that time there was a difficult problem in connection with India and the empire. Some of the dominions—and I think Canada was one—did not welcome the immigration of East Indians into their respective countries. This was an offending matter to India. But the difficulty was solved around a common round-table by pointing out to India that if she chose she, too, could exclude the nationals of other British commonwealth countries.

It is possible that if we had a British commonwealth round-table sitting at the present time we might find a solution of the perplexing problem of dominion status for India. We might be able to make a contribution which would help to solve the problem of a recalcitrant Eire. We find a certain difference of opinion on the part of Prime Minister Curtin of Australia as to where the most important theatre of war is at the present time. It is possible that if Mr. Curtin were at a round-table conference he would see, not an immediate danger to Australia, but rather the ultimate and inevitable danger to our sister commonwealth if we pursued a course different from that which we are pursuing. As the volume of dispatches and correspondence received by our Prime Minister indicates, there is great usefulness to be served by a common-discussion table. Indeed, its usefulness cannot even be conjectured, much less measured. The opinion of Mr. Churchill given only last Thursday in the British House of Commons concerning the value of face-to-face consultations between allied leaders is well worth quoting in support of my contention. I quote Mr. Churchill:

> When you have half-a-dozen important theatres of war open in various parts of the globe there are bound to be divergencies of views when the problem is studied from different angles. There have been many divergencies of views before we came together and it is for that reason I pressed for many months a meeting of as many of our great allies as possible. These divergencies are on emphasis and priority rather than principle. They can only be removed by prolonged association of consenting and instructed minds.

Another matter I should like to mention is that of the incredible bravery of our forces at Dieppe and the winning of the Victoria Cross by Lieutenant-Colonel Merritt. The action of our troops calls forth the highest praise of our people, and similarly those of our men who patrol the seas are entitled to our highest praise. The intrepid exploits of the men of the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Air Force are the pride of Canada and are our greatest fighting contribution to the cause of freedom. It was with interest, then that I learned from the speech from the throne that Canada is to assume increased responsibility for the maintenance of Canada's airmen and Canadian air squadrons serving abroad. I wonder if the Canadian people know that our government pays not one cent for the upkeep of our No. 1 ace, Flying Officer Beurling, D.S.O., D.F.C., D.F.M., and bar, who was rejected by the Royal Canadian Air Force several times and accepted by the Royal Air Force? Do the Canadian people know that our boys in the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas are largely paid and maintained by the British government, which also pays for their equipment? Who pays for what in this war is not important, but when we boast about giving a billion dollar credit to Great Britain, we should look facts in the face and be given as true a picture as is possible. As the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) stated last year in this house: It would take a generation of accountants to figure out the tangle of accounts as between Canada and Great Britain. While the balance may be upon our side, the people of Canada should know that the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel is paid by Great Britain once it leaves our shores, and that we are responsible only for paying the difference between the Royal Air Force rate of pay and the rate for the Royal Canadian Air Force. In the meantime, may I join with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in paying a high tribute to the administration of the Department of National Defence for Air. The British commonwealth air training plan is our greatest contribution to this war.

Another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house and which I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not mention before this debate closes is in regard to the rightful hopes and expectations of the people of Canada in reference to the application of the Ruml plan to this dominion. It would indeed be hard to find a single Canadian who does not favour the adoption of this plan to the situation as it exists in Canada. Just as it would not be true to say that the Canadian public do not want to pay or are unwilling to pay their rightful taxes, provided that the money is well spent, so it would be unfair to say that the taxpayers this year or any year are unwilling to provide the financial sinews which are necessary to the winning of victory.

In the time which is at my disposal I shall not be able to go into this subject at length, but I wish to sketch it out briefly so that it will at least be on the record before this house is threatened with a bill which will be cut-and-dried reflecting not the will of the people of Canada, but the will only of those who are in the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should be informed of the desires of the electors of this country. The government is merely the agent, not the master, of the people in the matter of tax collection; and if a more equitable method can be devised which will not result in loss to the treasury, then it is the duty of the treasury to adopt that method. It was not many years ago that income tax did not exist at all upon incomes in the lower brackets, and even the taxes on the higher-bracket incomes were relatively easy to pay. The following figures cover a four-year period, 1938-1942, and indicate the rapidity of taxation growth in this country. In no other country has taxation grown at the rate at which it has in this country. In Great Britain they were accustomed to a high income tax before the war. It was not just a tax to meet the needs of government but was in effect a redistribution of the national income. Not only have we in Canada met the rates of taxation, in many brackets which they have in England, but in some brackets we have exceeded their rates, and on top of that we have corporation taxes which even on the amount of pre-war profits amount to a minimum of forty per cent. To show the house how fast the rate of taxation has grown in this country I quote the following figures which are applicable to Ontario, and they would probably be very similar for any other province.

A married man with two children paid in 1938 and in 1942 respectively the following amounts of income tax:

Income	Income Taxation paid in 1938	Income Taxation paid in 1942
$ 2,000	nil	$ 214 80
5,000	$118 00	1,662 00
10,000	668 21	4,546 00

It is the pace, not the race, that kills. It was customary and feasible for every citizen to pay a previous year's taxes out of a succeeding year's income. Indeed, the government seldom announced the rate of taxation until the end of the first or second quarter of the year following that in which the income was earned. But taxation has now become such a large proportion of even very low incomes that it is impossible to pay taxes on last year's income and at the same time save sufficient in order to pay the tax on the income currently being earned. The result is that every tax-paying individual in Canada is faced with a burden of debt which in most instances he will be totally unable to discharge. When he will be able to do so it is impossible to say, because he can never catch up with the income tax the way it is at the present time, and because of the history of its progressive increases. If the income decreases or ceases with retirement, accident, sickness, unemployment or death, the taxpayer not having as great an income, or having no income, is faced with a burden of tax debt which cannot be met.

How does the adoption of the Ruml plan for Canada cope with this problem of lessening the tax burden for a man when he no longer has as much income or perhaps any income out of which to pay the tax? The adoption of the plan would free the individual from an overwhelming burden of worry and uncertainty which fear of a never-to-be discharged debt causes in the mind of the ordinary prudent citizen. Under the plan the desired result would be accomplished by the taxpayer paying this year and every year to the maximum of his current earning capacity according to the needs of the treasury and the laws of the land. But at the same time he would at the end of the year be free from an overhanging burden of debt. The method to be adopted would be as follows: the taxes paid in this year would apply to the 1943 assessment, and not to the 1942 assessment as is the case to a large extent at the present time. The incomes of the year 1942 are now spent and gone, and the moving forward of the base from 1942 to 1943 is precisely the same as the adoption of daylight saving: the hand of the clock is moved forward one hour; nothing is changed, but seven o'clock now becomes eight o'clock.

Mr. HOMUTH: Leaving the government in the dark.

Mr. JACKMAN: The government is not cheated out of an hour, and God is not asked to forgive us for not accounting for one hour of our life on earth. Under the present system, for which the government is as much or more responsible than the individual, the taxpayer is always a year late. With the adoption of the Ruml plan by Canada the citizen will be taxed as he earns his income; he will pay as he goes.

Like Tennyson's brook, men may come and men may go, but the government goes on for ever.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not this one.

Mr. JACKMAN: There will be no year when the government will be without its full tax revenue. Ministers of finance, the present one and those preceding him, have endeavoured to have the government proceed on a pay-as-you-go basis. The adoption of this plan in Canada will make it possible for the taxpayer to be put on a pay-as-you-go basis also.

Under the plan the government gives up nothing; indeed, it will probably gain, inasmuch as there will be a greater national income to be taxed in 1943 than in 1942. Moreover, by the adoption of this plan, will be in a better position to collect more adequately from the 1943 crop of new workers than it is under the existing system. As it is, taxes on the new workers are to some extent not payable until 1944. The government has levied and will levy taxes according to our capacity to pay, this year and next year and as long as this is necessary to the winning of the war. The individual will pay as long as he earns income, and will be currently taxed, but at the end of the year he will be free from any overhanging burden of debt. In a year in which the taxpayer has less income through death, retirement, sickness, accident or partial unemployment, he will be taxed according to his then income, not according to an income which is spent and gone.

Inasmuch as the government will tax all it can, it is fruitless for it to suggest that in addition to paying the 1943 taxes in full as we go, we shall also pay the 1942 taxes spread over a number of years on the instalment plan, because the taxes this year will undoubtedly be, as they were last year, as heavy as the Canadian people can bear without the system breaking down entirely. The theory of collecting 1942 taxes in addition, even on the instalment plan, is both fallacious and illusory. The government will take all it can, as it has done during the last few years.

While the implications of the Ruml plan may not be fully understood by all the people of Canada, its adoption is desired by approximately 100 per cent of the people. Indeed, the government is fortunate to have this opportunity of being able to institute the collection of virtually all taxes at the source of the income instead of having to wait until the income is in many instances spent and gone, and the taxes irretrievably lost. Indeed, as we are proceeding at the present time, if even partial unemployment obtains after the war, during a period of switching-over from war-time to peace-time activity, there will be many workers who will owe for the previous year's taxes but who will be unable with a reduced income to meet them and we shall find a disrespect for law similar to that which obtained in the prohibition era.

The adoption of the Ruml plan without modification will cost the government nothing. It will relieve the individual from the psychological and real fear of constant and perpetual indebtedness. While it will not relieve the Canadian people of one dollar of taxes, it will relieve each and every individual taxpayer of a tax burden which he cannot and will not in the majority of instances be able to meet when his income is no longer existent.

Except in those instances where the income tax operates as a capital levy, the government is already facing an eventual impossibility of collection of taxes on incomes spent and gone. The situation exists; it should be recognized, and a pay-as-you-go policy should be adopted immediately.

At the end of last year some taxpayers had paid thirty per cent of their 1942 taxes and some had paid more. A few had not paid even back taxes. There will be administrative problems to solve, and I urge that the government adopt the democratic way of referring the matter to a special committee or use the banking and commerce committee in order to put this country's tax collection on a sound basis, so that the will of the people will be reflected and that we shall have a pay-as-you-go system for all our people.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Notwithstanding the pleasant remark of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, with reference to my two colleagues, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), and the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), and myself, I am not ashamed to address this house from an opposition bench. For the first time after having attended sixteen sessions of parliament I am opposing a government. Had the Liberal party fulfilled its engagement and honoured its word, I would not be here. The delegation of Quebec has been sworn in, especially during the provincial election of 1939, before the people of the province, that "no one would support any government, be it Liberal or Conservative, and every one would oppose any government that would vote for conscription for overseas, or apply it". This was our oath. No one should forget it now that conscription has been voted by a Liberal government and, whatever can be said, is applied. No one here should be surprised to see us on this side of the house. The present conscription differs in its application from the conscription of 1917, but it is working perfectly.

May I be permitted to give a few examples. Take, for instance, a member of this house giving a recommendation in favour of a married man, let us say, thirty years of age, with a wife and three children. This man cannot be appointed as postmaster if he is of military age, and if he has no discharge from military service. The result is this: no discharge, no position; no position, no meals, no clothing. A man thirty-seven years of age with a wife and seven children applied for a position as blacksmith in the marine department in Quebec. The first question was, Since you are of military age, have you been discharged from the army? The result is: no discharge from the army, no job. Since these two men could not enlist voluntarily for home defence, but could enlist voluntarily only in the active forces, because they were not called up in accordance with the National Resources Mobilization Act, they are free to enlist for overseas or to remain without a job. No job, no meals, no clothing, no living. Let us examine the case of a young doctor, single or married, but without children, aged twenty-five. Under the act, he is called up for military service. He enjoys perfect freedom with respect to military service. If he wants to serve as a medical man in the army, he must enlist in the active forces to serve anywhere in the world; otherwise he must serve as a private in home defence. A wonderful voluntary system! Take the case of a young student in one of the last two years of his classical course. Success does not always smile on the most brilliant pupils, and if this young man is unfortunate enough to fail, he is not given another chance to go through. The road is wide open before him to the army. A consoling voluntary system!

As a resumé of all this, I would say, as one of my friends said one day, this is a real voluntary system: you do not want to enlist but the government wants you to, and there you are. These are a few cases of the newly patented voluntary system for the recruiting of Canadian soldiers for overseas in the second world war.

Under the authority of order in council P.C. 11159, Canadian soldiers have been sent to Newfoundland, Alaska and Labrador. Another step further. The next is overseas; and if there is another delay between the promised order in council and the divulging of it, our soldiers will have time to write to their parents and receive an answer before the government has decided to make the order in council public. A very open and frank policy! The coating used by the politicians of the two old political parties of this country has become too thin, so thin that the people taste the pill and refuse to swallow it. The policy ends at the same spot; the ways of application differ.

The war effort was too inadequate, the government too slow for our Conservative friends, and by studied and well organized pressure they have forced the Liberals to come across. These promises of a moderate and voluntary effort to win the provincial elections of 1939 in Quebec have volatilized under the warm rays of the imperial sun and the cacophonic brass band of the two hundred. An identical offensive on the plebiscite put into action the old see-saw policy invented to conciliate finance, the politicians and the claims of the people.

We witnessed in this house strongly opposed members voting in favour of the plebiscite, and it has been admitted by members sitting in this house and by many newspapers that an important percentage of the population did not exactly know whether this "yes" or "no" vote was connected with conscription. It had been so clearly put before the people! However, one thing certain is that the "no" vote in Quebec was against conscription and, if it has changed, it is toward an increase in the negative vote. It was then that a new word was born, a word that is now used freely with reference to those who are opposing the old political parties in this country—"isolationist." What a handy word! For a few years the word "communist" had been stewed on every occasion where the old political parties wanted to stigmatize their opponents, especially those strongly advocating reforms on social and economic grounds, and in accordance with a true Canadian policy. Now, however, that Mr. Buck and his partisans, members of a party which has not yet been legalized, can spread vigorous propaganda everywhere in the country; now that help to Russia has become a duty among the united nations; now that Russia itself has balanced the fortunes of war in our favour, the word "communist" does not fit any longer. "Isolationist" is the new blend.

But if one examines very carefully the general selective service, the food and war material rationing, if one scrutinizes the whole system which is now held in honour within the boundaries of our country, he cannot help seeing the great analogy with the policy which has been developed in Russia since Lenin, and especially after the accession of Stalin to power. I should like very much to know the names of the men responsible for this general economic policy, their connections in the world and their racial origin. Shall I be called isolationist if I ask the government to be very careful in the choice of its financial and economic experts, in order that this dominion will not be confronted with a system which will be in the hands of men not giving a thought to the country in which they operate, ignoring national boundaries, and ignoring the boundaries of nations, whether they be enemies or allies. This war will come to and end some day, and there will be another peace treaty written. The government then in power, with its experts, will suffer another Casablanca if these experts are not real Canadians having in mind the specific interests of Canada. Shall I be called isolationist if I point out that Canada will have to act as a nation of America before acting as a colony? The rate at which we are spending should cause us to have a system of collection toward the nations, especially those which might have in mind sooner or later the erasing of the war debts.

Shall I be called isolationist if I ask the government to stop and think for a moment that our agriculture is doomed if the farmers' sons are not sent back to the land? It is all very well for the government and its numerous propagandists to flash periodically the exemption of farmers' sons, but it is not so pleasant for the farmer to spend days and weeks begging the authorities to grant postponement, which is often granted after the boy has spent from four to six months in camp and is turned back to the land after the work is partly done or, in many instances, after the crop is lost. It is all very well for the provincial friends of the government to say, we will have to be careful about the training of farmers' sons and farm help, but it would be better for those gentlemen to help those who have been urging the government to agree upon a specific policy toward agriculture in connection with military training. Why not exempt farmers' sons and farm help once and for all, and stop that flow of farmers to the commission? Let them work instead; and if they give to the cutting of wood fuel the time they are forced to spend in these trips to obtain delays from the military authorities, we should not have any shortage of this material. Let the government stop its policy of zig-zag. The farmers' sons have registered; why call them up at all?

I suppose I shall be called isolationist and opposed to the war effort if I tell this house that the work of women in war industries, especially where certain chemical products are used, is a crime against the families of this country? It is destroying a generation. What is more, if it is not stopped the next generation will be still-born. I am not the first one to give that warning to the government; a prominent doctor in Toronto gave a severe warning months ago.

That is the situation of this country, built up entirely by those who call us isolationists, to hide their real failure toward the true Canadian policy. If Canada is the granary for the united nations, it would have been wiser on the part of the administration to leave on the land those who by their patient and constant work can provide our allies with the necessary food. If, moreover, Canada is the arsenal of the allies, it would have been more prudent to organize the labour within the country than to cry out loud when hundreds of thousands of men are overseas. The trouble is that the small population of Canada was not taken into consideration. Only one thing mattered—to send men overseas. In the meantime the disorganization was increasing rapidly.

In 1939 we warned the government not to go too far and too fast. The answer was: moderate and voluntary effort. A year afterwards, one of our statesmen said in this house, "How can we participate in a war moderately?"

The war effort was changed into a total war effort. Conscription for Canada gave place to a disguised conscription for overseas service. Then, after the plebiscite, conscription was voted in this parliament under the pressure of the same men who just a few years ago were advocating a policy of no participation in any external war. And because we believe that this policy of no participation or of a moderate and voluntary effort should have been the real Canadian policy, the same men disdainfully call us isolationists. What a transformation! They were first called isolationists by their Conservative friends, and after their secret marriage they found it an appropriate term by which to characterize those among their supporters who refuse to participate in the comedy built up by those who forsook the Canadian cause. I think that at the next election the people of this country are going to isolate some of these people from power.

It is no pleasure to be isolated. I had the experience of forty-four days of isolation at the citadel in Quebec. We were nine altogether under close arrest. Some of them are not yet out. Four men were still in the "clink" the day before yesterday, nearly four months after their arrest. Two of them are married, their families living on fresh water and public charity.

I do not question the respectability of the members of that public court-martial which opened in Quebec on November 22, 1942—I do not mean the final judgment; I do not discuss that—and none of the accused officers and men had any complaints against them. What has been unbearable for us and our families, for the medical profession and for our race is the pitiful lack of judgment leading to the decision to make the court-martial public. Since it was open to the public I shall make use of my privilege to say a few words about it.

The trial clearly proved that these men had not broken their oath either as soldiers or as medical men. They sold no blue papers—I mean discharges from the army—and did not give benevolent classification to any recruit to the active forces. These men have been under close arrest nearly all the time since the end of October for the non-commissioned officers and from November 2 for the medical officers. Three of the officers are free now and have resumed their duty in the army. One private was handcuffed for eleven days, day and night, and the three others for four days, day and night. When one realizes the hygienic conditions of the "clink" in the citadel, he can imagine the intolerable conditions which these men endured. Except for the exclusive privilege of being gently balanced at the end of a rope, or of enjoying the last moments of their lives while cosily seated in an electric chair, even killers do not undergo worse treatment.

The officers were under close arrest nearly all the time at the officers' quarters, each enjoying the steady presence of an escort. These were dangerous people facing that public trial! There was no bail for them.

For weeks and months they fed the newspaper chronicles and formed part of the radio journal, especially that of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network. I was sorry for my prison mates to have been with them, because I immediately realized that it would be impossible for certain newspapers of my own and other provinces to resist the temptation to announce that a Quebec member of parliament was facing trial, that he was garbed in civilian clothes, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation announcer even went so far as to say that I was wearing a brown suit, though he omitted to state the colour of my necktie. It was said that I was one of the lieutenants of Mr. Maxime Raymond, chief of the bloc populaire Canadien, the newly appointed organizer for the Quebec district, and so forth. Look at the size of the type in the headlines. But I must be fair to the Ottawa Journal; when I was acquitted they gave me two good columns, with my picture—not the best I have, but, just the same, my picture.

What a start for a new movement; the organizer in gaol! What an advertisement for the Quebec medical profession; five of its members in gaol! What a good piece of French Canadian for some people to chew on! Why a public court martial in that case? To serve as an example; hobbling explanation. Apart from the thousands of other courts-martial that could have been held publicly in other districts in order to make examples, if that was the purpose, one was held in the same building at the same time, but it was held privately. Apparently it would not have been interesting to the public; the man was not from Quebec. I would not for a moment dare to think it was done for reasons of secrecy. The Quebec medical profession has no reason to envy the medical profession of any other province, or any other profession, and that public court-martial was an insult to the medical profession.

In a democracy the accused is innocent as long as the court has not found him guilty. The judges we have appointed have always respected this democratic principle. The way in which we were treated clearly proved that we were found guilty before the trial by those whose lack of judgment, be they in Ottawa or the advisers of the national defence department in the Quebec district, whose unfitness for the positions they hold in the medical corps or at headquarters made them the conscious or unconscious persecutors of respectable families and the slanderers of the medical profession and of French Canadians. I shall pass over the little war of nerves designed to bring the officers and men to a plea of guilty. That would have been such a nice feather in the caps of those who had smelled a big scandal and who, after the inquiry commenced, were obliged to put up a show to hide their incompetence from the courts and from their superiors. Let me quote Le Semaine Religieuse of Montreal, under date of January 20, 1943:

A Regrettable Court-Martial

(Translation): The court-martial of a group of medical men of Quebec has come to an end. Those hoping that something scandalous nature would come out of it were disappointed. The charges were light and in most cases definitely false. But the rumours which preceded this action and the publicity given to the charges have poisoned the minds from one end of the country to the other. Such doings can only hamper the national cause. It is regrettable that they occur.

I said a few moments ago that the people are tired, and I will add that in Quebec they are tired of being treated differently. There is a legal way of democratic election which they will use freely. The mention of the bloc populaire Canadien may bring a smile to someone's lips, but that smile will change into a grin when the youth of this country turns its back to its forsakers.

Mr. W. R. AYLESWORTH (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I represent a rural riding in this house. The people of Frontenac-Addington are among the finest people in this land, but they are not wealthy. They are good, honest, patriotic Canadian farmers who earn their living by hard work and the grace of God. Their standard of living depends upon the prices they receive for their products, and a few cents here or there may mean the difference between fair living and poor living. Thus they have felt grave concern over the treatment they have received since the beginning of this great struggle. They have not complained unduly; they have done their best to produce to their utmost in order to assist in the task of feeding our armed forces, our allies and our home population, but, as we all know, times before the war were not too good to them. Their farms had suffered and needed repairs, which could not be made. They had begged for parity prices, but to no avail; and then, when it seemed that their dream would be realized through the increased demand created by the war, ceilings were placed upon the prices of their products. This was not just. The ceilings should have been so adjusted that parity prices would prevail.

Parity prices to the farmer mean only one thing, namely, that he receives for his products the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. That is what industry is getting; that is what the farmer should get. Can he go on producing to the maximum without assistance in some form? I do not think he can. He is growing older, and cannot work as hard. He has lost his sons and hired help to industry and the armed forces. His machinery is wearing out, and must be replaced if possible.

The farmer is in a position very much different from that of industry. Industry buys its raw materials, fabricates its products and fulfils its sales contracts in a matter of days or a few weeks. Production is not started until satisfactory sales arrangements have been completed. Delivery is then made before there is any general change in production costs.

That is not so, however, with the farmer. His only guarantee of even the cost of production is his faith in the weather, God and the future—which in too many instances does not satisfy his banker. What is the prospect of meeting our food requirements in 1943? I should say it is hopeless unless something is done immediately to help the farmer. The year 1942 was, from a climatic point of view as nearly perfect as could be imagined. Although our supply of farm labour dwindled rapidly in 1942, yet during most of the year the longer hours on the farm, combined with increased work by men, women and children, resulted in the greatest production of food we have ever had. This was the condition, despite the fact that nearly 300,000 persons have been withdrawn from the farm labour supply since the beginning of 1940. Fuel supplies for trucks, tractors and other farm vehicles were not curtailed.

We do not know what Providence will give us by way of weather in the coming year, but we do know that in every other respect the capacity of the farmer to produce will be seriously curtailed if present policies are followed. Fuel will be scarce; the production of farm machinery is limited, and labour is much scarcer than last year. The men, women and children on the farms cannot work longer hours or do more than they did last year.

Then, farmers are also confronted with uncertainty as to whether they will be able to secure prices which will enable them to meet the cost of production. Expenses of farm operation are constantly increasing. Wages are double. Prices of second-hand machinery are high. Taxes and other costs are increasing. We are confronted with the fact, too, that many farm units devoted to the production of most essential foods such as meats and dairy products have gone out of existence.

In addition to all these handicaps, many farmers are sincerely and honestly afraid to plan for their future farming operations for the simple reason that they do not know what further restrictions may be imposed. All hon. members realize that while many untrained people can be very helpful in supplying labour on the farms, to meet the seasonal demands, still the maximum production requires the work of men of experience, men who are skilled in the art of producing and feeding live stock and poultry, men who are trained in respect of dairy production, crop production and the handling of modern machinery and equipment.

The practice of paying subsidies to avoid raising prices to the consumer cannot be fairly considered as preventing inflation, because the same total amount is paid, whether the consumer pays it all, or pays only part of it and the taxpayer the balance. I am utterly opposed to the use of subsidies in lieu of fair prices on the market place, particularly at a time when consumers are fully able to pay fair prices. Subsidies are inflationary. They conceal costs, and defeat their own purpose. They promote inefficiency, destroy initiative and undermine character. They are not the means of building an independent and self-reliant people. Subsidies are simply an expedient way of dodging a disagreeable issue. They are the means of evading a fundamental correction to an unbalanced economy. They open the way to political abuse. Once they are used, subsidies are hard to get rid of. If we employ them now, during a period of maximum income, how can we abandon them when the war is over and income falls? An empty treasury would mean that they would have to be dropped. Food prices would have to rise or the farmer would become bankrupt; this would involve rising food prices with declining purchasing power. I seek a free and self-supporting agriculture. The allocation of materials for the production of farm machinery must be also increased immediately. We need more machinery than usual to make up for labour shortages.

I should like now to discuss the beef situation. There is a price ceiling on beef, but I venture to say that most of the beef sold in Canada to-day is sold above the ceiling price. Speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Mills) referred to the black market on beef. No one knows better than he does that when he sells his cattle for twelve cents a pound at the barn, the beef from those cattle is certainly not sold under the ceiling price. One need only look at the market report to find that good butcher cattle are selling at from 12 to 12½ cents a pound live weight. These same cattle yield around fifty-six per cent in the killing. If they are sold under the price ceiling, the wholesaler would lose $25 a head or four cents a pound on the beef. For example, let us take a beef cow weighing 1,200 pounds. The wholesaler pays ten cents a pound, or $120 live weight. The 600 pounds of beef that he will get, at fifteen cents a pound ceiling, would net him only $90, or a loss of $30, or five cents a pound. I do not think he is taking that loss. If the government still holds to a ceiling on beef, then I suggest that it should be a fair and reasonable ceiling. The number of cattle shipped from western to eastern Canada for feeding and killing increased by 78·6 per cent in 1942; yet the number of inspected killings fell by 5·9 per cent. But there are no records of uninspected killings. Estimates place the increase in uninspected killings at 100 per cent.

On January 31, 1943, the Montreal Standard quoted the representatives of two leading packing houses in that city as saying that most Montrealers who were eating beef that week-end were eating the product of the black market. Why not raise the ceiling four or five cents a pound? The consumer would not have to pay any more than he is now paying. The spread at present between the producer and the consumer was never greater. The farmer must find it strange to have to pay high prices in the butcher shop for beef which has been sold under the ceiling.

Farmers who are feeding cattle this winter are worried. During the month of May, when the highest ceiling price will prevail, too many cattle will be placed on the market and, to my mind, this will force a drop in price. Some protection must be given the cattle producer.

Butter is another product on which a ceiling might well be raised, so as to bring it on a par with cheese. Even to earn the 10-cent subsidy the butter fat must be taken to the creamery. In my constituency, with many of the roads blocked with snow, this cannot always be done, with the result that many of the farmers are letting their cows go dry this winter. Yet we are asked greatly to increase our production of milk. With money plentiful as it is to-day, most people will pay more in order to get butter, and thus another black market may spring up.

In line with the government's plan to increase food production this year, we should have the ban on new electrical connections lifted in order to permit extensions to additional farms and to allow short extensions of existing rural distribution lines to operate specified farm production equipment. It is to be expected that such extensions will among other things assist in increasing the country's supply of meats, poultry and dairy products, and in some measure relieve the farm labour shortage. It is the greatest help that could be provided to the Canadian farmer. Because too many rural people do not have what we call the conveniences of life, it does not follow that they do not deserve them. Indeed, they do, and it is our job to see that the people on the land, upon whom the country relies in times of stress, are recognized according to their merits.

When this war is over, and I pray that it will be soon, we shall be called upon to help in feeding the millions of people who now have little food and will not have much for years to come on account of the scorched-earth policy and war-torn ground. It is possible to estimate that five hundred million people will be suffering from some degree of food shortage after this war and that some European countries such as Norway, Holland, France, Greece, Poland, Yugoslavia and the Baltic states will be much worse off than after the last war. Then twenty-seven million tons of food were supplied to Europe, sixteen million by the United States, and the rest by the British empire—food to the value of six billion dollars—and it will be many times greater this time. But we must furnish it. To save these millions after the war is not alone an act of compassion. It is the only road to peace.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we urgently need to determine what we can do within our strength of man-power, materials, workshops and agriculture. We need to decide which of our tasks comes first, and if we determine rightly we shall place agriculture in the first rank of the war effort, alongside planes, guns and ships.

Our imperative necessity is maximum food production. The Canadian farmer will produce to the utmost if he is given a chance. The fate of the world may depend on it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I intend at this stage of the debate to be very brief and to indicate to the house the position which the Progressive Conservative party will take with respect to the amendment to the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Perhaps at the beginning of my remarks I may be permitted to read to the house the precise wording of the amendment to the amendment. It is as follows:

That the motion be further amended by adding to the amendment the following words:

"And further we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary action to achieve a total war effort by neglecting to apply the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service."

In dealing with this amendment to the amendment I should like to call the attention of the house particularly to its very careful and considered phraseology. It indicates that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party takes the stand that with respect to two branches of our war effort, namely, war industry and war finance, the powers contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act should be applied. But the amendment goes further in its wording, which leaves no room for doubt. They want these powers applied "in the same manner"—and I call special attention to those four words—as these powers are being applied to the mobilization of man-power for military service.

The National Resources Mobilization Act gives wide and sweeping powers to the government to mobilize the human, material and financial resources of the nation for the purpose of waging total war. These are the broad powers, and assuming for the moment that the government has not applied these powers in the case of war industries and finance to the same extent as it might have done, consonant with the national interest in a war-time period, let us see how the proposed amendment to the amendment would assist in bringing us nearer to a total war effort than we now are.

Let us examine the results which would flow from the acceptance of the amendment to the amendment by the house. It would mean that from now on two great branches of our national war endeavour—war industry, and finance—would be mobilized "in the same manner"—mark those four words again—as is man-power for military service. In simple words, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation expresses implied satisfaction with the application of the powers of the National Resources Mobilization Act in so far as the mobilization of man-power for military service is concerned.

The people of Canada and the Progressive Conservative party believe, and I think there is plenty of evidence to substantiate such belief, that our whole man-power policy in Canada is a mess, a misfit and a muddle. In our opinion it is not possible to separate entirely in any effective, master man-power plan the mobilization of man-power for military service from that of any other part of the master man-power plan which should be in operation. Our objection is very strong on the point that no really over-all plan relating to our man-power has been in existence since the war began, whether it be for military service, or agriculture, or other primary enterprises, or industry. We as a party will refuse to support an amendment to the amendment such as this, where the government's present muddling man-power policy is proposed to be used as a basis for the mobilization of war industry and finance. It would imply that our party is in favour of and is satisfied with the present man-power policy of the government—which it is not.

In every instance where a further mobilization of our war industries and finance is essential to the interests of a more extensive and total war effort, let us not hesitate vigorously to take those necessary steps as a nation, let the chips fall where they may; but when we do so, let us not take as our example the muddled policy which has been ineffectively and timorously applied to another branch of the wartime mobilization.

Were this very carefully drawn amendment to the amendment to carry, let us see what it would further mean. If the powers under the National Resources Mobilization Act were to be applied to war industries and financial institutions in the same manner as they are being applied to man-power for military service, it might easily lead to hopeless confusion. I do not think this house would dare to support such a proposal, because the application of these powers to the mobilization of man-power for military service involves many points which cannot be logically and practically applied to the case of war industry and finance; yet the words "in the same manner" indicate that this is what the draftsman of this carefully worded amendment to the amendment and its mover and seconder had in mind.

Here are some of the implications which might readily result:

1. Two important factors entering into the call-up of man-power for military service are age and condition of health. Surely the length of time a war industry or financial institution has been in business, or the state of its economic and financial health, cannot seriously be considered in applying "in the same manner" the man-power call-up provisions to these two other branches of our war effort. Yet that is what the wording "in the same manner" in the amendment to the amendment clearly indicates.

2. It is said that one out of every 107 of our population in Canada has been mobilized under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act. Surely, if war industries and financial institutions are to be mobilized for a total war effort in Canada, this would be a very puny percentage and could scarcely be regarded as an important contribution to our war effort generally.

3. The present man-power mobilization features of the National Resources Mobilization Act as at present applied call men for service within Canada only, or the territorial waters thereof. It is difficult to see how it could seriously be proposed that our war industries shall manufacture their materials of war for use within the territorial boundaries and limits of Canada and that shipments overseas should be on a purely voluntary basis; yet that is what the four words "in the same manner" seem to imply.

The amendment to the amendment, in our opinion, provides a faulty basis for the mobilization of our war industries and our financial institutions. It impliedly endorses the present muddled man-power policy of the government. It constitutes a retrograde and half-hearted step rather than an advanced move toward total war. It leaves us who represent a new Progressive Conservative movement with no option but to vote against it, in view of the definite and unequivocal policy laid down at the Winnipeg convention, which states:

We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance, as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about so far as human means can achieve it, an equality of sacrifice.

Upon that platform and that policy we stand. The present amendment to the amendment is a weak and feeble thing when contrasted with the war policy of the Winnipeg convention, and we cannot support it.

Mr. ROY: Before the question is put—have I the floor, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): I do not intend to make any extended remarks at this stage of the debate. The speech I delivered the other day expressed clearly enough my own views—

Mr. ROY: I rise to a point of order. I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the hon. gentleman now speaking has already spoken on the question. I read in Hansard of February 9, 1943, at page 281, this which was said by the hon. member on that date:

> . . . may I say to the leader of the opposition that his amendment to the main motion is an example of those hesitating moves and vacillating attitudes which help to discredit parliament in the eyes of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand the hon. member is taking exception to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères speaking now because he has already spoken. Am I correct?

Mr. ROY: He has spoken on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: All hon. members who have spoken after the hon. member moved his amendment are entitled to speak now to the main amendment. The hon. member is quite in order. I might point out to the hon. member for Gaspé that if his contention were right he himself would not have the right to speak.

Mr. ROY: Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, I never said anything on the amendment moved by the Conservative group.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not intend to make any extensive remarks on the question which has been before the house for some days. The observations I made in the speech I last delivered laid down the principles and the premises upon which I propose now to base a conclusion. During all this debate it has been apparent to everyone in this house and to everyone in the country who follows the debates of the House of Commons that we are suffering in Canada at the present time from an increasing shortage of man-power in so far as the farms are concerned, and at the same time the country is suffering from a shortage of man-power in our war industries, not to mention the fact that we are short of labour also in many other important and most essential industrial and transportation activities. Without going into any detail, I may mention rail transportation. I have been told recently by a man who is in a position to speak his own mind that they are afraid of running short of rolling stock on our railways in Canada. No one who has observed the situation has any doubt that there is a real shortage of man-power. Since the beginning of the debate, not a single member who has spoken has failed to draw the attention of the house and the country to the fact that we are short of labour in the main important fields of our activities. Therefore there can be no doubt that there is a very serious shortage of man-power. The suggestion has been made, and this indicates very well the truth of what I am now saying, that we should use prisoners of war, that we should use the Japanese, that we should use those who have been declared unfit for military service—

Mr. REID: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. CARDIN: —that we should use them where we are short of labour on the farms and in war industries as well as other essential industries of our country. So that the fact cannot be denied that there is a shortage.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), as I said the other day, did not suggest a real remedy for the situation. He complained about the lack of a proper policy on the part of the government to meet the situation. He blamed the government for not having adopted a proper policy, but he did not say what in his opinion was a proper policy. He complained also about the situation in regard to labour but did not indicate in any definite terms what method and what means he had in mind as a remedy for the difficult situation in which the country finds itself at present. The amendment is so framed that it could be used in support of all shades of opinion.

I was accused in mild terms by the former house leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson) of arguing the case of the isolationists. I am not an isolationist; and if the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to look at the record, he would have discovered that on many occasions I went a great deal further than he did in order to bring about and maintain unity between all parts of Canada. As a result I found myself in difficulties which he has never experienced. I think I have gone the limit in that regard; and with the people of my province and my race I have gone much further than he has ever gone in order to explain to them the sentiments, feelings and ideas of the citizens of other sections of Canada. To the best of my ability I have tried to interpret the opinions and sentiments of the English-speaking people of Canada to the French citizens of the province of Quebec. I have done all I could, and I think all that any reasonable man could expect from a public man in my position.

I have been criticized in my own province for having preached the doctrine I did preach in 1939, supporting our participation in the war and asking the people of Canada to unite behind the government, to do all they possibly could in order to support the cause of the united nations. It was not a popular case to argue before the electors of the province of Quebec, but just the same I argued it; and when the general election came in 1940 I did the very same thing. I explained in clear language, without being afraid of expressing my views, what the position was at that time.

The late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the late Hon. Fernand Rinfret and myself did all we could to help the people of the province of Quebec understand the necessities and exigencies of the situation in which Canada found herself at that time. We succeeded then to a certain extent in interpreting the sentiments and the opinions of the English-speaking citizens of Canada.

I am proud to say that during my long political life I have never been afraid to voice my thoughts, and I have always devoted my energies and the limited talents that are mine in endeavouring to bring together as closely as possible the different races composing the population of Canada. I have suffered from this politically. I am still suffering from it, because some people do not understand the position I have taken at certain times. They do not understand even now that I was attempting to fill the breach which existed between the two races, and trying to secure mutual concessions in order to bring them together so that they would be happy, prosperous and at peace within Canada. My attitude has been misrepresented even in this house by certain hon. gentlemen who have never been able to understand the situation with which the government was then confronted, and the position in which I personally was placed on many occasions.

I have always tried, to the best of my ability, and even by making personal sacrifices, to bring about a better understanding between all citizens of Canada. My voice has not always been heard, nor have my views been accepted in every case, but I am very happy to have heard lately, from the province of Ontario an echo of the views I expressed not very long ago, when I tried to explain that necessarily there was a difference in sentiment between the English-speaking citizens of Canada and the French Canadians. But few people understood my stand at that time, and my words were misrepresented or misinterpreted.

Just a few days ago, a gentleman enjoying a very high position in politics in the province of Ontario said in a public speech that we must recognize that we cannot see things in the same way because we are descendants of different races. And he said that he was not surprised that French Canadians do not always see the racial problems in the same light as English Canadians, because he could not feel the same way toward France as he does toward Britain. This is an echo of the sentiments I expressed, and I am very happy to record it; it is indeed for me a source of comfort.

I take second place to no one in this chamber or in the country as far as love for Canada is concerned, or as far as sacrifices are concerned. My patriotism is beyond question; my love for Canada is beyond question, and I have the right, as anyone else has, to state and explain my personal views in this House of Commons, where, thank God, we still enjoy a certain amount of liberty.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and I may say as the conclusion of the premises I laid down in the speech I delivered the other day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dubuc), as an amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the first line of the said amendment be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that in view of the recognized shortage of farm labour, also the admitted shortage of labour in war industries and in other essential industrial and transportation activities, Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service until, at least, a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house, to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war, without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to speak to the motion, but I have had a word with the leaders of the other groups in the house, and I believe it is the general wish of hon. members to conclude the debate this evening, provided the discussion does not run on too long. With the consent of the house I was going to move that the house sit after eleven o'clock this day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, as one of those agreeing with the right hon. gentleman, may I say that in view of this important amendment which, I imagine, will be debated, I do not feel that those of us who gave our consent to prolonging the sitting of the house to-night should be held to that bargain. We should adjourn as usual at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly; if my hon. friend has changed his mind I am quite prepared not to press the motion. When I asked him I presume he had no knowledge of the amendment about to be moved.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, none at all.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 19, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

STATEMENT AS TO PROGRESS IN CONSTRUCTION OF WOMEN'S HOSTEL IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) put a question concerning the women's hostel in Ottawa. The information I have is as follows:

The only hostel which comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works is the one in Ottawa. It is true progress is slow on this but it is owing entirely to the inability on the part of the contractor to obtain priorities to provide the necessary materials. Provision of construction materials to-day has become acute, particularly lumber, timber, hardware, electrical equipment and plumbing supplies. In view of the difficulties in obtaining these materials, it is considered that the contractors are making as good time as is possible. There has been during the past month a small amount of lost time on account of weather conditions, but anyone familiar with the construction industry knows that little or no progress has been made with any project under weather conditions such as have prevailed at certain times in the past month.

The answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) will have to be obtained from Wartime Housing Limited through the medium of the Department of Munitions and Supply, through which this company operates.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Cardin.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have been in politics for thirty-four years, and I am in my nineteenth year as a member of parliament. This is the most important debate that has ever taken place in this chamber. The purpose of the debate is to know precisely whether our war effort is to continue or whether it is to stop on account of the lack of man-power in industry at large; and when I say that I want to make special mention of agriculture, of railways, and of war industry properly so called.

Since the beginning of the war I have regretted very deeply that the instruments at the disposal of the government for propaganda—and I mention the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Wartime Information pamphlets, and the censor—have not been used at all to help the Canadian people understand the real aim and purpose of the National Resources Mobilization Act.

A halo of glory has been placed around the heads of those wearing the uniform—quite properly so for those who are really in the army, but very improperly so for the slackers in uniform; and there has been a real deficiency in the fact that the farmers of this country, who are doing work that is essential in war as well as in peace, the railwaymen who carry men and food across the country, the workmen in the war industries, those who make arms and ammunition, have not perhaps in the public mind the same glory that has been bestowed upon the army. But if they did not exist, if they were not doing work that is so essential, the army would be unable to fight. I regret, therefore, that the Canadian people have been left under a false impression by such propaganda, which was intended to serve ends other than those we are fighting for.

If you look at a watch, if you look at a clock, you will see the hands that mark the time, but you will not see the movements of the clock which do the work and owing to which the hands indicate the right time. We do not see those movements. The work of the farmers, the work of the railwaymen, the work of the men in war industries has been unseen by many, but it has been real; and to-day, if some countries in the world are fighting our enemy with such success, that success is due not only to the soldiers who are in the field, or the sailors at sea, but also to the humble working men covered with sweat, whose overalls are covered with grease spots and who do work which is indispensable now, which cannot be ignored and which must have the best encouragement possible from the country which, so far as we are concerned, we represent in this house.

There is one more reason why it is my duty to point out that this is the most important debate that has ever taken place in this parliament, because now the eyes of all my hon. colleagues are opening to the reality of facts. What I deeply admire from the bottom of my heart is the unanimity of expression in all the speeches which have been delivered by hon. members, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) down to the most humble member. Members of parliament observe that the bright skies of enthusiasm are dissipated. For the first time since the beginning of the war members of parliament are considering war objectively. They are considering war with the logical purpose of winning by putting everyone in his place, in order that each man, whether he be in the army or out of the army, shall do the very best he can towards our common aim, which is victory.

The acoustics of this chamber are not very good and, therefore, I have taken the trouble, rather I should say it was a satisfaction, a pleasure, to read the speeches that have been delivered by all hon. members, showing a unanimity of expression that reveals unanimity of purpose in seeing to it that the National Resources Mobilization Act shall be enforced so that it can guarantee to the army that they will always have food and arms and munitions and guarantee to the civilian population that they shall not suffer from any shortage of food.

I have made a list giving the names of all hon. members who have spoken on man-power since the beginning of this debate, and the pages of Hansard to which I refer: The Prime Minister, page 45; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), 267-271; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), 130-131; the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), 284; the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle), 315-316; the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman), 355; the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Mills), 365; the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), 428-429—and may I congratulate him upon his excellent speech—the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), 476; the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard), 483-484; the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), 497; the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Blanchette) who is the Quebec whip for the government, 513-514, and the member for Témiscouata, 343-344. All those fourteen government members spoke the same way about it. We want the mobilization act to be useful in this country; we do not want it to serve only one purpose among the many that are expected from it; we want it to give a full result. I shall say a word about that in a moment.

Speaking on the other side of the house my hon. friends will pardon me; this list is not complete; it goes to the day before yesterday, but I will make special mention of yesterday—the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) made an excellent speech, pages 317-320 of Hansard; the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), 456, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), 310-312; the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) 478; the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), 150-151; the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), 516; the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), 58-59; the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), 97-98; the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), 348; the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), 372; the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) 431, and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), 289.

With regard to the Conservative side of the house I have heard to-day that to some people it looks strange that the official opposition, which has been battling for some time for conscription for overseas at all costs, has now adopted another view. Their view is now in comformity with what has been said on this side of the house, even by members of the cabinet. It has been said by representatives of independent groups; it has been said by Liberals; it has been said by Conservatives also. I pay special tribute to my good friend the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) for the excellent speech that he made; I refer to pages 85, 87, 88 and 90; the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), 136; the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), 160-161; the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), 179-180; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), 244-245; the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), 275 and 447; the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), 277; the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), 335-337; the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), 356; and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), 464.

If I now take Hansard of yesterday, besides the hon. member for Compton, to whom I referred a moment ago, I find the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), together with many others, and especially my good friends the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) and Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth), to mention those whom I have heard.

I do not say that this list is complete, but I went through Hansard as carefully but also as fast as I could. I came to the conclusion that never in the history of this parliament was there such unanimity about a matter of vital importance. I congratulate my hon. colleagues upon the speeches they have made, as representing the real feelings of their constituents. My hon. friends have been true to the mandate that they have received from them.

What are we going to do? I was greatly impressed yesterday when I saw the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) rising in his place in parliament to ask hon. members to act in accordance with what has been said by all. He wants the members of parliament to be logical with themselves, by passing an act which will remedy the evils that all now deplore.

Everybody has been complaining also of bureaucracy; everybody is complaining that the rights of parliament have been overlooked for a long time. The remedy suggested by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is that at the present time the mobilization act should be suspended until members of parliament gathered together in a committee get enough information about the needs of all industries in Canada for the war effort and in conformity with the letter and spirit of the act. This is fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The amendment does not say so.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has not read it—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have.

Mr. POULIOT:—but I have not time to read it. It is at page 551 of Hansard, and if he will read it, it will be much better for him than to laugh with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) when I speak of serious matters. It is not a time for joking; sometimes we make little jokes, but at this time I am talking seriously and everyone is serious except those two hon. gentlemen. I want them to understand that the matter is worthy of consideration, especially at Vancouver as well as at home.

At the present time the national selective service is just the tool of the Department of National Defence. What do I mean by that? I have explained it in an article about manpower which I have sent to every hon. gentleman. The purpose of the mobilization act is to consider not only the case of an individual but at the same time to consider what can best be done by this man or that woman for the state, the nation. At the county fairs farmers are praised; they are told that they are the salt of the earth, that they have qualities and virtues equalled by no others and that they are kings on their farms. But one must remember that the work of the farmer is very hard, that tilling the land means many sacrifices, and that when a farmer is uprooted it is impossible to transplant him again on a farm. This is the experience of all nations. Yet with the solemn promises that have been made to the farmers not to disturb them at the present time I have evidence that the national selective service is acting like the ordnance stores to fill the requisitions of the national defence department. They receive from that department a request for men; then they try to get those men, from the farms or from industry. That is how national selective service works, and probably that is why the offices of the registrars which were under the Department of National War Services have been transferred to the Department of Labour.

Is that clear enough? I want hon. gentlemen to understand fully the point I am making. I say that national selective service cannot be only the tool of the army. It is impossible; it cannot work. National selective service as we have created it by an act of parliament is an organization which should direct each man and woman of military age to the job he or she can do best to help in winning the war. That was the intent of the law makers; that is the purpose of the legislation. That is why we should act at this time in accordance with the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) in his subamendment and withhold the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service until at least a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house to ascertain and determine by what means or methods—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not the correct phraseology of the amendment. Please read it as it appears at page 551 of Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: I will sit down and let my hon. friend read it, and I shall correct him. Everyone has the amendment before him. I am ready to answer any questions but I do not want to be interrupted when I am speaking. However, if I have time I shall read it in full, so there may be no mistake:

This house is of the opinion that in view of the recognized shortage of farm labour, also the admitted shortage of labour in war industries and in other essential industrial and transportation activities, Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding—

That is, the suspension; I say that in case somebody may misunderstand it. That word is not there, but it will appear in Hansard as my own.

—of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service until, at least a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house, to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war, without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country.

That is the amendment that everyone heard last night or read in the morning papers or heard to-day. This is a vital question. From ocean to ocean, from south to north, in every Canadian home those who were listening to the radio last night at eleven and twelve o'clock and this morning at eight o'clock, eight thirty and nine o'clock, in rich mansions and poor dwellings, asked themselves the same question: What will be the attitude of my member of parliament on this vital issue? Of course temptations are great. There are many vacancies in the senate. There is a job which will be open at the transport board. There are the new jobs that have been created for parliamentary secretaries. The Christmas tree is in full swing. "What will my member of parliament do? Will he think only of himself or will he remember the poor farmers of his county, the miners, the railway men, those engaged in war industries, all those who are trying to do their best to help the war effort?" They all ask that, and they say it is time to separate the wheat from the chaff. They will say, "We hope our member of parliament will not sell our birthright for a mess of pottage." I remember that during a by-election in New Brunswick, in the maritimes, a big bully who was minister of public works of that province was holding a meeting, at which I asked for the opportunity of some discussion. He spoke first, and he told the good people who were there, "Vote for my candidate, and you will get everything; vote against him and you will get nothing." When it came my turn to reply I made reference to that biblical scene describing the temptation of Our Lord, after His fast of forty days in the desert. I said to those good people, "Now history repeats itself. That man is talking like Satan, when he tried to tempt Our Lord by showing Him large cities and wealth which would be His if He dared kneel before Satan." I said to them, "I know your answer will be the same as that made by Our Lord Himself —get thee behind me, Satan!"

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is advisable for me to intervene at an early stage in the debate on this amendment to the amendment if for no reason other than first to make perfectly clear what in reality the amendment to the amendment says and proposes and, in the second place, what, in our parliamentary practice, it means.

Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has read the subamendment in part, I should like to repeat what he has read, and also a portion of the subamendment he did not read. After it is stated that the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) moves, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dubuc) the subamendment begins:

That all the words after the word "that" in the first line of the said amendment be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor.

The point I wish to make perfectly clear is this, that the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is in the nature of a want of confidence motion in the present government. The hon. member seeks to effect that end by substituting a want of confidence motion of his own for the want of confidence motion moved by the leader of hon. members sitting immediately opposite. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères proposes that the house should strike out of their amendment all the words except the first few, namely, "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that—". Those words are allowed to remain, but all the words following are to be stricken out, and in their stead are to be substituted words which I shall read in a few minutes.

I do not know that I could take any exception to that part of the subamendment which would strike out the want of confidence motion on the part of the Progressive Conservative party. I doubt however if they will be prepared to have their want of confidence motion eliminated in order that they might support the substitute motion which is being proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères.

The words the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères wishes to substitute are the following:

This house is of the opinion that in view of the recognized shortage of farm labour, also the admitted shortage of labour in war industries and in other essential industrial and transportation activities, Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service until, at least, a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house, to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war, without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country.

Let me examine these various statements. First:

This house is of the opinion—

And what is the opinion in which we are asked to concur?

—that Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service—

Note first these words:

—should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act—

"Should have provided"— in other words, before parliament assembled, and when the speech from the throne was being prepared, it is suggested by the hon. member that, instead of setting forth what was set forth in the speech from the throne of the government's programme, the government should have had His Excelleny say that a part of the government's programme was to withhold the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service.

That point I wish to make perfectly clear. It indicates what my hon. friend thinks the government should have done, namely, that it should have come to the house when parliament assembled and told hon. members that part of its policy was to withhold at once the operation of that part of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service.

And for how long was the operation of this portion of the act to be withheld? The next clause in the amendment makes that clear:

—until at least a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house.

Only yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) requested a debate in the house before another important matter, namely, social security, should go to a committee of the house for investigation. As his reason for wishing to have the debate at once he said that matters which went to committees were likely to be discussed there for the whole of a session, and that in all probability no recommendations would be made until the end of the session. I said to him at the time I did not think he was wholly correct in that assumption. However, it is perfectly clear from the amendment to the amendment that what the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères wished the government to do was to tell the house that until there had been full investigation by a committee of the house into the matters to which he has referred in his subamendment there should be no further operation of that part of the act which relates to the raising of men for military service.

But an even more remarkable feature, perhaps, is what the investigation was to determine. This investigation was——to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war.

In other words it was to be left to a committee of the house to determine the means and the methods by which Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war.

My hon. friend is an old colleague. I have known him well, both within the cabinet and without it; and I recall very distinctly that when we were colleagues in the cabinet together no one was more insistent than my hon. friend upon the government having a policy of its own, and not leaving it to a committee of the house or any other body to determine its policy. Yet to-day he suggests in regard to the all-important matter of winning the war that the best method to employ from now on would be to leave the matter, in the first instance, to a committee of the house.

This is all the more surprising, coming from the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, when we find that the hon. member himself has quite frankly stated his warm approval of what the government has already done in the matter of its war effort. And this war effort, which my hon. friend has praised so unreservedly, was achieved by the present administration, with the support of the house, it is true, but without any reference to a select committee in the first instance. Let me read what the hon. member said in that regard in one of his speeches in the present debate:

> The speech from the throne also reviews our war effort. It has been a magnificent effort, I admit, and I am glad of it. All Canadians are proud of it, and we have the profound satisfaction of having it recognized that our war effort surpasses that of any other country of our size. As far as man-power and finance are concerned, our war effort is superior to that of the great republic to the south, the United States.

I say to my hon. friend: If the government of the day was capable of so planning its war effort that up to the present time it merits the encomium which he himself has passed upon it, surely the government still remains capable of deciding the best ways and means by which Canada's war effort may be carried on during the remainder of the time it may have that responsibility.

But my hon. friend goes a step further. He suggests that we carry this out without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country. I shall have a word to say later in regard to that particular clause.

I have indicated what my hon. friend in his amendment says the government should have done when it came to parliament, when parliament opened. I want to ask him, and I want to ask hon. members: what would have been said of the government if it had come to this house with the recommendation which he says we should have made at the time, or if we had followed the course which he says we should have adopted? Assuming that we had agreed to the view of my hon. friend and had come to this house and said: We have decided to withhold the operation of the national mobilization act with respect to the calling up of men for service until a committee of this house has made a full investigation and reported to the House of Commons on the best ways and means of carrying on the war from now on. How would that have been received in different quarters?

To begin with, so far as this House of Commons is concerned, there would instantly have been a cry from the other side to the effect that we no longer enjoyed the confidence of the house because we were unable to state a policy which was our own with respect to the carrying on of the war. What would have been the effect upon the people of Canada of a pronouncement of this kind? Simultaneously, from one end of the country to the other, it would have been said that the government was preparing to back out of the war; that the government was quitting the war altogether; that it had started off by suspending the operation of the national mobilization act with respect to the calling up of men.

May I point out in this connection that it is to that part of the mobilization act which refers to the calling up of men for the defence of Canada in Canada and immediate environments that my hon. friend's amendment refers. My hon. friend has made no reference in any particular to the sending of men overseas; that does not enter into it. He himself was a party in the cabinet to the drafting of the National Resources Mobilization Act; he was a supporter of it on the floor of this house. My hon. friend will recall that the National Resources Mobilization Act was enacted immediately after the collapse of France. He was eloquent at that time in his support of the act. Why? Because of what it would mean for the defence of Canada, as well as for the defence of freedom in other parts of the world. Throughout the country there was the strongest appeal for the support of this act, and the calling up of men under it to serve in the defence of Canada. Has the situation so developed that to-day the defence of Canada by men called up under the mobilization act is not as necessary as it has been at any time in this war? Unless I am wrong in my reading of the times, the necessity is greater than ever for protection against an enemy as powerful as the axis powers are at this present time. Let me repeat, my hon. friend was one who supported the policy embodied in the act; he advocated it; but now he says that we should suspend the operation of an important part of the very act he so strongly endorsed.

What would have been the effect of action of that kind on the part of our government upon our men who are serving in all parts of the world in the armed forces of the country? What would have been the effect upon our troops in Great Britain and elsewhere? I say that it would have created consternation in the minds of the men of the armed forces in all parts of the world, if it could have been said by anyone that the government of the day at this time of war had ceased to continue in operation the part of the mobilization act which related to the defence of Canada itself. Those men who are a long distance from home, who are helping to protect this country and to save it from disaster, would be asking themselves: Is this the kind of support we are getting from our home country and from our government? Is our parliament going to support that kind of action? Does it mean that while we are fighting here we are not going to get the reinforcements that we had hoped would be ready to come if they were necessary? Does it mean that we are not going to get the supplies that are needed at the time of our greatest need? I ask my hon. friend, I ask all hon. members, what would be the effect upon the whole war effort of Canada if a feeling of that kind were spread abroad among the armed forces of this country?

What would have been the effect upon Great Britain and other British dominions? Great Britain to-day has her men fighting in all parts of the world. They are fighting for the protection of Canada as well as for the protection of Britain. They are fighting for the defence of freedom throughout the world. They are fighting to prevent the axis powers from dominating this world. What would have been the effect in Great Britain if the government of Canada had met this parliament with the announcement that it no longer intended to operate under an act with respect to the calling up of men for military service which the parliament of Canada itself had passed, until a whole session of parliament had been devoted to making an investigation as to ways and means in which the war effort of Canada could be carried on from now on?

What about Australia, where men are fighting the Japanese? They are fighting our battle as well as their own when they are keeping the enemy engaged in the southwestern portion of the Pacific. What about the men of New Zealand, who have been fighting in Africa and in other parts of the world and who, at any time, may have to fight on their own territory? What about the men of South Africa who are fighting in north Africa? These men are fighting for the defence of their soil and for the defence of freedom. What would have been the effect upon them if they had read that the government of Canada had for the time being suspended the operation of an act which related to the calling up of men for the defence of its own country and territory?

To go a step further, what would have been the effect upon our allies other than those I have mentioned? What would have been the effect in the United States? If my hon. friend had wished to give to the isolationists of the United States the finest weapon they ever had, he would have put one into their hands by having a proposal of that kind accepted. That weapon would be put into their hands now if this House of Commons were to adopt his amendment at this time. Does anyone think that, throughout the United States, from one end of that country to the other, attention would not have been drawn to the fact that the government of Canada had ceased to call up men? What would those isolationists have asked of their administration? We would soon have heard of a widespread demand throughout the United States that there be no more calling up of men for military service. How much would we be helping the cause of freedom and the allies if a cry of that kind were raised in the great country to the south? But my hon. friend has made clear in one of his speeches what he feels about the service that is being rendered by others of our allies. When I referred a moment ago to what my hon. friend said about the war effort I was referring to what he said on February 9, not last night.

I want to read to the house another statement which my hon. friend made on February 9, and I must say that when I heard him make that statement I felt that at last he had grasped the full significance of this war—that it was a world war, that it was a war which affects all the countries which love freedom, and that every country which sought to preserve its freedom was helping to preserve the freedom of other countries. No words could have been more emphatic than those which were used by my hon. friend when he said, speaking of China and Russia:

> Dear old China, that we love so much to-day, that we praise so much to-day and proclaim to be one of the first peoples in the world!

And a little further on:

> We have discovered that she is a great country, a country that deserves our praise and support. We have modified our views; we have become a little more courageous and ready to help China now, as well as Russia. Let us give them what they need most, not men but food and armaments. That is what they want to enable them to carry on this struggle. As a matter of fact they are fighting for us as much as they are fighting for their country.

That is what my hon. friend said, that China is fighting as much for us as she is fighting for China. I think my hon. friend had the correct vision then, the larger vision, and realized that we owe it to China to do all we can in a similiar way for her, that in fighting for ourselves, we are also fighting for her, and vice versa.

What did he say with respect to Russia:

If we have some success to-day, who has achieved that success? The Russians. Without Russia where would we be? Probably we would be signing a treaty of peace, not according to our terms or our will, but according to the will of others. That would be our position.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that if my hon. friend would go out through his own province from one end of it to the other and make those statements to the people, he would be rendering a real service to his country and a real service to the cause of freedom. I believe that there are few truer statements, no more correct perspective of this war and its significance for Canada as well as for our allies than are to be found in these two statements made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. If we have some success to-day, he asks, who has achieved that success? I would not confine the answer to the Russians; I would include all the countries that are banded together as part of the united nations. It is true that the Russians have within the last year taken a part in the war which has saved other nations of the world and, in the mind of my hon. friend as expressed in the words I have quoted, has saved this dominion from being conquered—that is what it is—Russia has saved this dominion from being conquered. Without Russia, he asked, where would we be? And he went on:

Probably we would be signing a treaty of peace, not according to our terms or our will, but according to the will of others. That would be our position.

Are we going to reward China, are we going to reward Russia, for what these great countries have done for us as well as for themselves and others through the sacrifices of their men and women, by telling them that we in Canada have now reached a decision that we are not going to call up any more men under our National Resources Mobilization Act for service in our own country, but are going to suspend our war effort for a time while parliament and the government make up their minds how best they can carry out the war aims of Canada? I say to my hon. friend that if his resolution were to carry and these words were to be read in China and in Russia to-morrow, there would be cause for humiliation indeed on the part of this country, and shameful humiliation at that.

There is one other all-important aspect to be considered. I have spoken of the effect of his proposals upon our allies. What about their effect upon our enemies? And here I hope this House of Commons will appreciate the real significance of amendments of this character and of statements of this character when made in this House of Commons. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said that in every home throughout his province the people would be reading to-day the statement which was made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères last night. Well, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, in every home in Germany to-day that statement is being poured into the ears of the German people. Perhaps in every home in Japan this statement of a former member of the government of Canada —and stated as being such—is being poured into the ears of the Japanese people. You ask, why would they do that? Well, could anything bring more comfort to the enemy than to tell them that the parliament of Canada at last had had one of its members stand up and advocate that the Canadian government should not have its war policies clearly defined and those policies carried out until a committee of the House of Commons had begun, after months and months of study and investigation, to indicate what should be done?

Here may I read the last words of the proposed amendment and give them their true significance:

. . . until, at least, a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house, to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war, without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country.

Do not those last words carry with them the implication that the government's policies are destroying the economic, social and national life of the country? And if they carry that implication in our minds here, or were intended to have that implication on the part of the mover of the subamendment, how will they be interpreted in Germany? How will they be interpreted in Japan? They will be interpreted there as meaning that already in Canada the economic, social and national life of the country is beginning to be destroyed. Destroyed why? Because of Germany's successes! Because of Japan's successes, because of the power of the axis! It will be said that because of these successes we see already in the Dominion of Canada, the first of the great dominions of the British empire, a former minister of the crown and a member of parliament saying that the economic, social and national life of the country is being destroyed or about to be destroyed or may be destroyed in consequence of the war and the government's war policies. Is there anything that these axis powers desire more than to sow that kind of belief in the minds of their people, that here and there, first one nation, and then another nation, and then another, are becoming dissatisfied and beginning to withdraw from active participation in the war in which they have been participating up to the present time? I can imagine what Goebbels is saying to the German people. I can imagine what his vile tongue will repeat to the German people as to what is taking place in the Dominion of Canada. I wish to repeat that these are the things that count in this war—the morale of a people, the belief in the unity and determination of a people. These things mean more at this present crisis than any thing else could possibly mean. For any word to go out from Canada which could be construed in any way as meaning that the economic, social and national life of Canada was being destroyed because of the part we are taking in this war—I say that nothing more unpatriotic could possibly be expressed.

But is it a fact? What about the economic, social, and national life of our country? My hon. friend has spoken about agriculture and about industry. Is it not true that to-day industrial production and agricultural production are greater than they have ever been in the history of Canada? Is it not true that the national income and the revenues of this country are higher to-day than they have been at any other time in its history? Is it not true that more men and women are in gainful employment to-day than have ever been in gainful employment in Canada in the whole of our history? How then can it be said that our economic, social and national life is being destroyed? I believe that there has never been a time in Canada's history when the Canadian people, speaking generally—not taking note of individuals here and there, but speaking generally—were more united and determined in any effort than they are in our war effort at the present time? And may I add to what I have said, as to the position of Canada, that there never was a time when consumer goods were as equitably distributed among the great body of the people as they are in Canada at this time.

Let me come now to the nature of the amendment to the amendment itself. I indicated at the outset that it was a no confidence motion, and I want every hon. member of this house to understand that. Those who support this motion are supporting a motion of no confidence in the administration. I want to ask the mover of this motion, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, this question: If he has no confidence in this administration, in whom has he confidence? I ask, has he confidence in the Progressive Conservative party opposite? Is he prepared to give his support to them? Has he confidence in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and is he prepared to give his support to that party? Has he confidence in the Social Credit party, and is he prepared to give his support to them? Has he confidence in the leader of the so-called Canadian party, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), and is he prepared to give his support to him? Is he prepared to give his support to the new leader of le bloc populaire Canadien? And I notice there are several others who are styled as independents. Is he prepared to give his support and confidence to them? If he is not prepared to give his support and confidence to any of these parties, or groups, or individuals, why does he try to destroy the confidence of the people of this country in the one party upon whose shoulders rests the responsibility of carrying on this war?

There is something I should like to point out at this moment, which I think is very significant indeed in the history of Canada, in the light of what we have witnessed in Europe since the beginning of the war. It is the danger there is to a country that begins to have a great number of different political parties. Look at France as she was prior to the war. Why did France collapse? France collapsed because, prior to the war itself, there began to spring up in that country political party after political party and personal and political rivalries—personal rivalries as well as political. We had an illustration of that sort of thing in this house last night. My hon. friend who moved this motion rose to introduce it, and immediately the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) felt that he was a political rival and that he should score, that he must have an opportunity of presenting a motion, no doubt something of the same character, before the hon. member, who was a former minister of the crown, obtained a chance to present his motion.

Mr. ROY: May I be permitted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my hon. friend saying?

Mr. ROY: Will the Prime Minister permit me to make a statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. ROY: The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères did not rise before me; I rose before he did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think Hansard will show very clearly where the personal and political rivalries came in, and I want to emphasize that fact. Those gentlemen who are forming new parties of their own, who are constituting themselves new leaders with a view to asserting certain views of their own in particular parts of the country, are doing the very same thing that was done by individuals in France in seeking to create parties and groups which would be able to satisfy their own personal ambitions, their own political aims; and the result was that the chamber of deputies in France—

Mr. GAUTHIER: On a point of order, I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to standing order 41. Even the Prime Minister is not allowed in this house to impute motives to any member, be he independent or a member of le bloc populaire Canadien, and this is the second time that the Prime Minister has done so this afternoon. I want him to withdraw that remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the point of order raised by the hon. member, I did not take it that the Prime Minister imputed motives to anyone.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I will read standing order 41:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

I think the Prime Minister should withdraw the remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled that I did not take it that the Prime Minister had used offensive remarks regarding any hon. member, or imputed motives to any hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I spoke of personal ambitions and political aims, and I said that certain gentlemen had personal ambitions and political aims in this country, seeking to exert their influence beyond this House of Commons among the people of the country. These different parties are beginning to create within Canada itself a situation such as existed in France prior to the beginning of the war. I say it is part of my duty, perceiving that situation, and realizing what it has led to in the old world, to point out that danger to the people of Canada at this time. And I say—and I hope my hon. friends will heed these words—if they will look at the present situation of the French people to-day, in France, in north Africa, and what has helped to make the situation the tragedy that it is, they will see the unwisdom of forming innumerable political parties for personal aims and political ambitions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the session opened last year with an effort to divide this house on a major political issue. I thought I perceived at the time where that issue would lead, if this house ever became divided and the country became divided upon it. I did my utmost to keep this country united through the whole of that crisis, and I am a proud man to-day because I feel that I succeeded in that great aim despite all the belittlement, all the detraction that persons from different parts of this country as well as some inside this house sought to level at me. What I want to make plain is this: I do not intend to go through another storm of that kind this session. If we are going to have this session open with an effort again to divide this country, to destroy the unity that we now have, the sooner the government of this country knows it the better. And I want to say to my hon. friends around me that I look to them to show where they stand in their support of me. If we are going to have a multitude of leaders in this country I want to know whether I have the support that will commend my leadership to the people of all Canada, or whether I am among the number that cannot count upon their own following.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, I shall give my entire support to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin); not for reasons of political ambition but as a true Canadian. The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member deserves my support. It reflects a constructive policy, because it relates to the reestablisment of farm labour and industrial war workers.

On February 19, 1942, I moved a similar amendment. This one goes farther, since it deals with the post-war period and reminds the government that it is very important to protect right now the economy of the nation. The hon. member is quite right in attempting to withhold operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act, which has caused us and is still causing us so much harm in all domains. An investigation should be instituted immediately of all our resources. This will put a stop to the wastage of man-power and materials and to the ruin which is awaiting our agriculture.

One year ago to-day I moved in this house the following amendment as reported at page 722 of Hansard:

> That all the words after "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" in the amendment be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) did not deem it proper to advise Your Excellency that the government should adhere to its commitments and the terms of its mandate against conscription for overseas service which it received from the people of Canada at the general elections held on March 26, 1940;

(b) that the farmers, farm employees, fishermen, fisheries employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service."

Eleven hon. members, including the mover and the seconder, voted in favour of this amendment. I sincerely hope that the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères will get more generous support. I shall indeed vote for his amendment, because I never refuse to adhere to a good measure, no matter where it comes from. Will any hon. member of this house, whether he represents an agricultural, labour or industrial riding, dare vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member? By doing so he would be in favour of ruining agriculture, he would refuse to the farmer the labour he needs so badly to operate his farm, he would approve the disorganization of our economy which is so acute and the lack of labour which exists in all our industries.

By all means we must withhold the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act. Its present application threatens with bankruptcy our agricultural, industrial, social and economic domain. The amendment to the amendment which is the subject of the present debate deals with the basis of all these activities. I much prefer it to the vague programme of social legislation announced in the speech from the throne. I always prefer a frank and practical policy to a vague and unbalanced programme. I am satisfied with the amendment to the amendment because it is honest, sincere, loyal and in the interest of Canada. Therefore it is with pleasure that I shall vote in favour of it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think our party would desire to have this important amendment to the amendment go to a vote before I at least declared in a very few words our position with respect to it. In beginning my remarks, which will be in very simple terms, I think I should say that with regard to the whole problem of man-power in Canada we have not been in agreement with governmental policy. As I have said on the floor of this house on previous occasions, we have felt marked disagreement with respect to what I choose to call the muddled man-power policy of this government. As a result of the haphazard allocation of labour that policy has been responsible for the shortage mentioned in the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin); and in the position we as a party take with respect to the amendment to the amendment I want it distinctly understood that we are opposed to the policy of the government which made possible these man-power shortages in agriculture and industry. We have believed, and we still believe, that under a proper man-power policy in Canada there would have been no necessity for these shortages to have arisen.

In our opinion there is only one real issue facing parliament and the Canadian people at this time, namely, the winning of this war. Much as we are opposed to what we think is in many instances a bungling policy on the part of this government, at the same time we wish to make it clear that while in many ways this government has shackled itself with respect to the war effort, we do not think that by supporting this amendment to the amendment we should now shackle it further. Accordingly it is our opinion that if this amendment were to carry it would be a retrograde step rather than an advance toward the objectives which this party has in view. We are being faced now with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on more than one occasion has referred to as a major shooting war; and much as I disagree with the policy of the government concerning the whole question of man-power, at the same time I do not want this country put in a position which would permit the rest of the world to say that we in Canada were stopping short of total war. In the months that lie ahead we shall need reinforcements for our army. Let us, as a parliament and as a country, not leave any doubt in the minds of those fighting with us in this great war for freedom; let us not permit the word to go forth that we are not ready to do everything that may be necessary with respect to man-power, financial resources and all things that will bring forth a total war effort in this dominion.

I said in the beginning that my remarks would be brief, and my position and the position of this party is very simple. We have not tried to embarrass the administration in the effective prosecution of this war. We are not going to embarrass them at this time, because there are greater things in public life than striving for power or political manoeuvring.

Mr. CARDIN: If the leader of the opposition would permit me a question, I do not want to embarrass him, but what would be the effect of his amendment, if it were carried, if not to destroy the government?

Mr. GRAYDON: It is true that our own amendment is a vote of want of confidence in the government, but it is founded on grounds that we think will make for a greater war effort in Canada instead of a lesser one, as would be the case if the hon. gentleman's amendment should carry.

I speak very much from the heart this afternoon, without attempting to dress or adorn my words in any special parliamentary phraseology. Let us be clear on this one point. We in this country are Canadians, not simply members of political parties. We are striving toward a common objective; and no matter how much I may disagree with the manner in which the government is carrying on—and in many instances we do disagree most sharply—I do not want to stand in my place in the house this afternoon and give support to an amendment which in my opinion will not increase our war effort but will have the effect of decreasing it, of lowering our position as a nation fighting this war, as well as lessening our prestige all over the world. Therefore, in taking this position to-day I am only carrying out an undertaking which I hope we on this side may continue to carry out during the period of this war. We may not always succeed; it may be that sometimes our point of view is wrong, but we are going to try to put our country first.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word with regard to the subamendment and the attitude of this group with reference to it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has already analysed the amendment, so that I hardly think any further analysis is necessary. However, I draw the attention of the house to these words:

> . . . Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service. . . .

I wish to point out first that this act was passed in June, 1940, and that it was in operation for two years during which the hon. gentleman who moved the subamendment, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), was a member of the administration. Never was there any suggestion that the operation of this act should be withheld, from the time it was passed by this house until last night, despite the fact that for two years the hon. gentleman was a member of the administration responsible for administering this piece of legislation.

With what the hon. member said in reference to the allocation of man-power we are to a large extent in agreement. We have said repeatedly that we think there ought to be a more adequate plan for the utilization of man-power in Canada. We have urged repeatedly that the government ought to take a more courageous stand with regard to allocating our man-power.

To give an illustration: The other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) quoted a letter from Mr. MacNamara in which the first thing stated is that men shall be free to volunteer for active service. Actually we may have to come to the place where we shall say to a man, this is where you can be of most use in the winning of the war. If it be in the military service, then that is where it will have to be; if it be in the air service, that is where it will have to be; if it be in a coal mine, that is where it will have to be. For too long we have tried to operate a war-time economy with a laissez-faire philosophy, and in our opinion the government has not been prepared to take the courageous steps necessary to place men and women in those occupations in which they could best serve the country.

The result has been, first of all, that in many instances there is economic pressure and intimidation placed upon men to get them into the active service and, second, different departments of government have been competing one against another for man-power; one department seeking to get a man into one service and another department seeking to get him into another service, with the Department of Agriculture probably telling him to stay on the farm and produce foodstuffs. At the same time the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) may be advertising that he needs men in certain munitions plants.

There has not been any responsible body prepared to say to a man, here you can best serve, and here we think you should go. While, however, we think such a policy should be worked out in order to utilize our man-power to the best possible advantage, there is no reason why this cannot be done now by the government, or why it cannot be done while the mobilization act is still operating. To suggest, as the subamendment does, that we should withhold the operation of the act pending such an investigation would, it seems to us, be most inimical to the best interests of Canada, and her prosecution of the war. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) put the matter bluntly when he said, "This act should be suspended." What would that mean? It would mean that we should not continue to call up men for military training. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) was a member of the government which passed the act. It was passed because the country was facing a great crisis. We believe we are still facing that crisis; we do not believe the crisis has passed. We believe, further, that the menace of nazism and fascism are still facing this country and every other liberty-loving country in the world, and that we ought not to comfort ourselves with the thought that the danger of invasion or even the possibility of defeat has completely disappeared.

Consequently, for parliament to suggest to the government that it should suspend the act whereby men are raised for military training would be tantamount to suggesting either that we think the danger is over or that we are not now as vitally concerned about winning the war as we were two and a half years ago when the act was passed. As far as this group is concerned, we will continue to press for a more aggressive and forthright man-power policy in which we will allocate our man-power on the basis of need, and through a process of planning rather than by the haphazard method we have used thus far. But we are not prepared to suggest that the legislation through which men are called up for military training should be suspended, and that we should give up this very important part of our war effort.

While I am on my feet may I say a word about the amendment. I might as well say how we propose to vote on it, because the vote will probably be taken immediately following that on the subamendment. It will be noted that the amendment reads:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:
> (a) to provide an adequate plan for the effective use of Canada's man- and woman-power;
> (b) to adopt and carry through a rational labour policy which will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful position as one of the major partners in our Canadian democracy; and
> (c) to provide adequate measures whereby Canadian agriculture can make its maximum war contribution and receive a fair share of the national income.

With the three things suggested in the amendment we are in complete accord. We want an effective utilization of our man-power. We want a rational labour policy. We want a policy which will give to agriculture a fair share of the national income. But in voting for the amendment, which we intend to do, I should like to point out that in our opinion it completely fails to take cognizance of the complete picture with regard to our war effort. It provides for the utilization of man-power, for a labour policy and for an agricultural policy; but it still makes absolutely no provision for harnessing the economic, financial and industrial resources of the nation, with a view to producing all the weapons of war in order that Canada may make its maximum contribution.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) quoted this from the Winnipeg convention:

> We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance, as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about so far as human means can achieve it, an equality of sacrifice.

I draw attention to the words "where necessary." Where it is necessary hon. members to my right believe they should—to use their own words—use compulsion in utilizing industry and finance. But they would do that only where necessary. Apparently it is not necessary, because it is not in their amendment. The amendment makes no mention of industry, no mention of economic resources, no mention of finance. It mentions using compulsion only in connection with conscripting and mobilizing the human resources of Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: It does not mention compulsion of woman-power, either.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It mentions using compulsion in connection with woman-power and man-power, but makes no mention of using compulsion in connection with material resources.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member now speaking about that part of my speech in which I referred to the Winnipeg convention?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think he has misunderstood the purport of what I read.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, I may have; but the hon. member quoted it himself last night, as reported at page 549 of Hansard. It is quite plain there in the English language that, where compulsion is necessary, his party is prepared to use compulsion for the utilization of financial and industrial resources.

Mr. GRAYDON: And man-power too.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And man-power, too. In the amendment, on which this house is to vote, there is no mention of conscripting or mobilizing either the industrial or financial resources of Canada. The only conscription which this amendment calls for is the conscription of human resources. While we are prepared to support a policy of having adequate man-power; while we are prepared to support a rational labour policy and an agricultural policy designed to assist the farmers, we maintain that this is not a total war effort from our point of view and that there is no total war effort until we are prepared to conscript the material resources of this country with a view to producing the weapons which are so essential.

Many people have been wondering as to the full significance of the Winnipeg convention, which has been quoted here a good deal. The old bus was taken to Winnipeg and was to have an overhaul job. Some people were not just sure what kind of job was to be done. The old bus came out of the garage with a new horn. The old one used to play "Rule Britannia" every time you touched the button, but this one will not play "Rule Britannia" even if you coax it; it only plays "O Canada" and "Deep in the Heart of Taxes". It is now becoming apparent that about all that happened is that the engine was tightened up a little and the oil changed. But above all there was a new paint job. However, the paint is beginning to chip off a little and we are beginning to realize that it is much the same old bus underneath.

I was interested in reading the speeches of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I think they give a good indication that it is much the same bus. The speech of the hon. member for York-Sunbury is to be found at page 450 of Hansard. Referring to the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that this parliament ought to set aside the sum of $5,000,000,000 to be spent for post-war reconstruction in the first two years after the war, the hon. member for York-Sunbury said:

I suggest that that proposal is wholly political, that it is looking for the votes of the people. He does not tell us how that money should be raised or to what it should be devoted.

He then went on to say:

I suggest that under any democratic system private enterprise is the only effective agency that can give full employment, and you cannot have private employment under a system of controlled governmental regimentation such as my socialistic friends visualize. You cannot have a successful system of private enterprise unless it is a system of free enterprise, controlled, if you will, against abuse and exploitation, but free to engage in useful production with the aid of governmental action and supervision.

Mr. Noseworthy: Why has it failed so far?

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): It has not failed. It has had its weaknesses, but your ipse dixit that it has failed does not prove that it has, and never will.

I draw attention to his last phrase:

Believing thoroughly in that system, I propose to vote against the subamendment.

In other words, the reason for voting against the subamendment was not that given with great sophistry last night by the leader of the opposition; it was that the hon. member for York-Sunbury believes in a system of free enterprise, not only for times of peace but for times of war. In other words, he is prepared to conscript human resources, but he is not prepared to depart from the policy of free enterprise and call for the mobilization or conscription of the industrial and economic resources of this country. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) spoke in French on February 8, and I should like to refer to the translation of his speech which appears on page 243 of Hansard of that date. I think he put his finger right on the point of issue between this group and those who voted last night for the subamendment and those who voted against it, when he said:

Shall I vote for the subamendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation leader (Mr. Coldwell)? No. Does not the subamendment favour a total war effort? Manpower, but together with all other national resources. When so many doctrines pave an easy road toward new methods of government, I claim we would be mistaken should we move toward advanced socialism and destroy with one sweep the edifice built by the labour of mankind under private enterprise.

I desire to point out that on this point of the omission from the amendment of any mention of mobilizing the wealth and industrial resources of Canada the government and the official opposition are as one. They visualize conscripting human resources for fighting power, for labour power, for farm power, but they are not prepared to conscript and mobilize the industrial and economic resources, either for the winning of the war or for the security which can be available in the post-war world. The Ottawa Journal of Thursday, February 4, contains a report of a speech made by the new Progressive Conservative leader in Toronto on February 3. I quote:

Speaking of underwriting by the state of economic prosperity as well as social security, Mr. Bracken said that social security did not mean prosperity—"it might mean rationed poverty".

I think that is a good distinction to make. If the hon. gentlemen to my right and the government believe in maintaining a system of free enterprise, then all the social security and the social insurance that they can ever hope to offer will be just rationed poverty. We believe that if both for war and for peace we utilize the resources of the nation and make the goods and services which we are capable of producing available to all people, instead of having a rationed poverty, we shall then be able to distribute abundance. This afternoon the Prime Minister pointed out the tremendous production which has been made possible by the people of Canada. The latest estimate is that our national income is now about $9 billion. This is more than twice what our national income was a few years ago. To-day we are producing twice as much in the way of goods and services as we produced before the war, although a large amount of those goods and services are not consumer goods and services. But if we are capable of producing goods and services on that scale for the necessities of war, we maintain that it should be possible after the war for us to produce a similar amount of goods and services which are consumers' goods and services, so that we shall not have rationed poverty but rather distributed abundance for the people of this country when the war is over.

While we in this group are prepared to vote for the amendment and will vote for it because we agree with the three things it advocates, we do not for a moment believe that it goes far enough. We believe that man-power in Canada must be mobilized; that we must use every man and every woman we have, wherever they can best be used in winning the war. But we still maintain as long as we leave the industrial, economic and financial resources of the country in the hands of private enterprise, in the hands of people who are more concerned about profits than any other single thing, we are not going to get a total war effort.

The members of this house have only to read the findings of the Truman committee of the United States congress and some of the evidence taken before it last year, or the findings of the Baruch commission set up by President Roosevelt to investigate the production of synthetic rubber in the United States, to see the whole story there: how powerful manipulators like Standard Oil, Goodyear Rubber and others used their power and influence, not only before the war but since, to prevent the production of things that were essential to the winning of the war. That is why we in this group say, that as long as this war lasts we shall continue to insist that there can be no maximum war effort until this government is prepared to take over and mobilize our industrial, financial and economic resources. We are convinced also that when the war is over, there can be no return to the system of free enterprise, and that we can only begin to build what Vice-President Wallace of the United States has called "the century of the common man" if we are prepared after the war to embark upon an economic system based upon co-operation and the welfare of the community rather than upon special privileges and the exploitation of the many for the benefit of the few.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group last evening were quite prepared to have the vote taken and the address disposed of, but it seems now that because there was not sufficient control in the ranks of the government to keep their own members in line a brand new debate has been precipitated.

There are a few things I should like to say this afternoon, and I am forced to say them largely because of statements which have been made by members to my right. I am not going to deal with the amendment to the amendment because I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has clearly set out the position of the members of our group.

I should like to say a few words with respect to the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party—I think that is the name they give themselves now. I was disappointed in the statement made last evening by the new leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon). I had believed he was an honest and sincere man who would stand behind any policy which was in the interests of the people, and I was disappointed to find him on his feet last evening using all the technique of a lawyer to expose any loopholes there might be in the phrasing of the amendment to the amendment as proposed by this group, and also apologizing for the programme that was laid down at the convention of his party in Winnipeg. In my opinion he was merely quibbling with words and demonstrating to the house and the country that while the party has done a new paint job on the party machine, as it was so well described by the hon. member for Weyburn, the machine is nevertheless the same old machine. It is merely a matter of fooling the people once again with phrases and slogans that do not mean anything. If there is anything I despise it is intrigue and lack of sincerity.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, now!

Mr. GILLIS: I think my hon. friend should despise those same characteristics.

Mr. HOMUTH: He would, but he would not mention them with respect to any member of the house.

Mr. GILLIS: I have not said anything about any particular member, and if anything I have said happens to hurt anybody, I cannot help it. But I do despise those characteristics. If I stand for certain principles after thinking them through, I think I should stand up for them under any circumstances. But in my opinion the programme and policy laid down at the Winnipeg convention of the Progressive Conservative party certainly is not being advocated in this house by members of the party who have spoken in this debate—or anything like it.

My conception of the house at the present time is that there is taking place a realignment of forces. I am not surprised at the stand taken by the members of the group to my right on the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment, because the forces of reaction in this country are being lined up; the issues are becoming clearer; the lines are becoming more sharply drawn. There is no third course in my opinion as far as Canada and its future is concerned. Either you stand for the necessary social changes to guarantee the full implementation of the objectives for which we are fighting this war, or you believe in a continuance of the conditions that brought about the war. My conception of the stand taken by the party to my right is they are quite prepared to hang on to the old machine. They are not prepared to make any basic changes which would eliminate in the future the conditions we are experiencing at the present time. I think the alignment is a logical one and that the party to my right are taking the course which they would be expected to take.

They are not proposing in their amendment anything that is not being done already by the government. If all they want is compulsion to use the full man-power and woman-power of this country, that is already being done in every field in which it can be done. There is ample evidence of that in the numerous orders in council which have been passed and in press statements which have been issued. Anyone in this house could prove within fifteen minutes that that is now being done by the government in every field in which it is possible to do it. The only thing the government is not doing is the things that were advocated in the amendment to the amendment proposed by this group, and our friends to my right are not prepared to make any changes in that direction or in any direction. I shall say no more on that.

My main reason for rising this afternoon is to defend the people whom I think I represent directly in the house, and that is the members of the unions, and particularly the Canadian Congress of Labour and its affiliates in the United States. The member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) in addressing the house on February 16, as reported at page 486 of Hansard, interpreted the labour policy of the Winnipeg convention, and evidently he did it with the full approval of every member of the group with which he sits.

He attacks the Congress for Industrial Organization in Canada. I said a moment ago that it was an uninformed attack. I said it for this reason—and I think it is something that should be clearly understood. The C.I.O., for the information of my friends to the right, is not a union. It has no union functions. It does not make nor does it negotiate contracts. The C.I.O. is the legislative centre in the United States to which the unions in that field are affiliated, and the C.I.O. in the United States carries on the legislative activities necessary to the movement in that country. It has no function whatever in Canada. The Canadian Congress of Labour in this country is the parallel organization to the C.I.O. in the United States, and all this drivel which the member for Parkdale talks, taking his cue from advertisements that are circulated throughout the country at this time with reference to the C.I.O., is irrevelant, inasmuch as that organization does not exist in Canada.

A few years ago the cry was communism. Any time you tried to exercise your rights as a citizen in the field of collective bargaining, you were considered a communist. Well, Russia has become respectable and it is not popular now to attack her, so that the slogan, particularly in the province of Ontario, is the C.I.O. Evidently the hon. member had the endorsation of the rest of his party in that regard because no exception was taken to his statement. The Canadian Congress of Labour to-day have 150,000 members in Canada. They have an affiliation with the other legislative body in the United States, and when that organization was attacked, the hon. member for Parkdale attacked the organized steel workers of Canada from coast to coast, the organized mine workers from coast to coast, the organized packing house workers, the textile workers, the united electrical workers. Every one of these organizations which he condemns so roundly as agitators and disrupters of industrial peace in Canada is thoroughly organized and is doing a good job in this country, and if there were more of them and they had more cooperation in that field from the powers that be there would be less strife. It is the fight put up by those who will not grant the workers of the country their day in court, which every other section of society enjoys, that is responsible for most of the turmoil that exists to-day.

I am glad that the member for Parkdale has put this on the record, because at the Winnipeg convention, while there was much talk about the right of the workers to organize, and all that kind of stuff, and how their heart bled and what they were prepared to do for the working people of their country, their official pronouncements in this house should be a clear indication to everyone in Canada that while they are still in opposition they are not ready, even for the sake of fooling the people, to make gestures in the direction of the right of the workers to bargain. What would be the situation if they were on the other side of the house and had the right to make laws? Evidently their programme at Winnipeg, as far as its practical application is concerned, is company unionism, because the hon. member paid tribute in that speech to company unionism in this country.

The other evening I called the attention of the Prime Minister to this advertisement that has been circulated in every newspaper in Canada. It was put out by the Steel Company of Canada, with a personal letter from R. H. McMaster, president. I took exception to that for this reason. The responsible people connected with the trade union movement in this country are desirous of seeing our war effort promoted; they are not desirous of seeing strikes, confusion and everything else that goes with it; and when the Prime Minister made the statement that a new board was being set up, a new jurisprudence for labour in Canada was being established, and that the new board would function as an industrial court, I thought it was bad taste for the Steel Company of Canada to take the attitude it did. I thought so in view of the fact that newsprint is rationed in Canada. Moreover, my suspicion is that the taxpayers of Canada are paying for this advertising, because advertising is a part of operating cost, and is deducted from the corporation tax. Just before that court even got started, a tense labour dispute was going on in Canada, an ultimation having been given that if, within a reasonable time, a peaceful solution was not arrived at we were likely to have a repetition of what was gone through in the steel workers' strike. I thought it was ill advised on the part of the government not to take note of the fact that the steel company was circulating that advertisement throughout the length and breadth of Canada, provoking the steel workers, provoking the organized labour movement, and at the same time making the taxpayers pay for it. The member for Parkdale complimented the steel company upon its action. He thinks it was a wonderful thing. If that is part of the Winnipeg convention's attitude towards the working people of the country, then I think it is time we found it out and governed ourselves accordingly.

In the field of compulsion, here is a newspaper dispatch from the Sudbury Star of Saturday, February 13. This horrible C.I.O. in the mines and steel plants and in the essential industries that are working, some of them, sixteen hours a day, are frozen to their jobs. They stay on the job. They are not permitted to change their job. In this order which I have here they are placed in this position—and I think it is something of which the government should take cognizance. The order of October 24, 1942, which brought about the means of holding labour to the production of important commodities in these essential industries, has been extended, and these people, whom the member for Parkdale classifies as agitators and disturbers of the peace, are placed in this position now. Those employed in essential industries are given deferment for military call, but that deferment is in the hands of the employer. The employer says whether you are to be called for military service or not, and evidently that power is being used, particularly in Sudbury in the nickel industry. It puts a weapon in the hands of the employer. If you happen to join an organization which he does not like, he can immediately notify the selective service board that your deferment should be discontinued and that you should be called for military service. If you are not exactly the kind of employee he thinks you should be, he has the right to see that you are called for military service. If that is not sufficient compulsion in the field of man-power, you have conscription in Canada not only for military service but for all essential industries.

On this question of national selective service may I make this statement, seeing that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is in the house. I followed closely the controversy between the Department of Labour and Elliott Little. I think there is room in Canada for a thorough overhauling of our national selective service regulations. Many things are happening that should not happen. For example, the wartime prices and trade board has been given authority to close out some 20,000 small industries in Canada—non-essential industries, they are declared to be—and you will find that many of these non-essential industries are highly unionized. For a period of years they built up certain wage schedules for themselves. When that industry is closed out under the present selective service regulations, these men will be relegated to the ranks of the unemployed.

They must go then to the national selective service offices and make application for employment in an essential industry. They carry with them none of the wage rates they have been able to build up over a period of years. While they may have been receiving 85 cents or a dollar an hour at some skilled occupation that is not to-day essential, they are obliged at times to go into a war plant and start as apprentices at 42 cents an hour; they lose the standard of living that they have built up through their own struggles over a long time, and nothing is done to protect them. To boil the thing down to plain and simple terms, I cannot see how the Minister of Labour could for a moment imagine that Mr. Little's proposals and the powers he asked for in connection with national selective service were in any sense dictatorial. I think the reverse is true; that the dictatorial powers that Mr. Little was accused of asking for are operating to-day in the selective service as administered by the Department of Labour.

My conception of Mr. Little's proposals is that he was prepared to accept full responsibility in that field, and he wanted the authority to do so. If an industry was closed out he wanted to make sure, before four or five hundred men were thrown into unemployment, that there was employment for these men, and that in the turnover they went from one industry to the other en bloc. In addition he wanted to protect the wage rates built up over a period of years in industries considered to-day non-essential. He did not want to reduce the standard of living of men or women who were obliged to change their employment because of the exigencies of war. That is my plain and simple conception of Mr. Little's proposals in the field of selective service.

I am not blaming the Minister of Labour; he is only one man and the problem is a big one. It is one with which someone who has technical and practical experience, which I think Mr. Little had, should be given full power to deal.

When Mr. Little first came to Ottawa we advocated in the house that he should be freed from war service regulations under that department. In addition we said he should be freed from any supervision or influence by the Department of Labour in connection with the mobilization of man-power for war service; that the transfer of man-power from coast to coast was a job that required a full-time administrator, and that he should have some latitude with respect to the administration of these regulations. The whole thing to-day is in a knot; from coast to coast there is chaos. I do not say that to be critical. I moved about the country considerably last summer, and I ran into it. If anyone here has any doubt about how it is working I would advise him to call at the Spadina avenue office of the selective service in Toronto and have a look. I do not say that the Minister of Labour can go there and kick that loose, but I do say that someone down there should have some authority to do something. Before there can be any success in the field of selective service someone will have to be appointed full time and be given full authority to make the necessary changes in the way I think Mr. Little proposed making them. When 20,000 non-essential industries are being closed out it is a big job, affecting the livelihood of a great many people. It is throwing out of the field completely a large number of men who have quite an investment in their businesses, and that is something which requires careful consideration.

I do not think anyone should take the stand in this house that you or I should be asked to reduce our standard of living fifty per cent in any transfer from non-essential to essential employment. If that were done with contractors who are building airports and ships and all that kind of thing, I would say yes; we would be quite prepared to make the same sacrifice that the other man is making. But when a man is working for a wage which just enables him to live from day to day, and he is told that he must leave that employment, discontinue all his associations, and be transferred to another section of the country and another line of work, and at the same time reduce his standard of living at least fifty per cent—I can name industries where that has actually taken place—the Department of Labour would be well advised to do something along the lines suggested by Mr. Little.

There are many more things I should like to say but I shall not detain the house any longer. I rose this afternoon simply to say something for the people whom I think I directly represent here. I belong to that outlaw organization of which the hon. member for Parkdale speaks—those trouble-makers. I have belonged to the mine workers' organization for the past twenty-five years. Unfortunately the working people of this country have not many agencies that will take up their cause. The press of this country belongs to the people represented here by the hon. member for Parkdale; the radio is largely in their hands; the House of Commons is largely in their hands. They have many spokesmen here, while unfortunately the people I attempt to speak for have very few agencies through which they can defend themselves.

I hear someone mention this committee of two hundred in Toronto. That committee does not consist entirely of Conservatives; there are as many reactionary so-called Liberals in it as there are Tories. My friends on this side and my friends over there who really believe that we are fighting a war to do away with wars in the future will have to begin to understand that the machine at the top, the small invisible government of this country, has no politics. They are not Liberals; they are not tories; their aim is power and direction from behind the scenes. Let everyone in this house understand that, and make this House of Commons supreme in legislating for the people. If while we are fighting the war it is necessary to have controls—and it is—let the members of the house use their voices in this house and out of it, to see to it that the people they directly represent here are given some share in the controls behind the scenes, in order that we may come out of this war with a free and democratic parliament. I am doubtful about it now, judging from the trend of events.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Before dealing with the amendment to the amendment I wish to refer briefly to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Since I came to parliament I have never heard the Prime Minister in such fine form as he displayed this afternoon. It really deserves note, I believe, that a man who is advancing in years is so full of fire and energy and able to give a good rousing talk on such short notice.

The Prime Minister said one or two things of which I believe every hon. member should take special note. He had a good deal to say about the formation of new parties, and seemed to be disposed to lay the blame for the formation of new parties on the people who form them. May I point out, however, that the Prime Minister completely missed the boat. He placed the blame just where it should not be. He referred to France; what caused the fall of France? Was it the new parties that arose, or was it the dead old-line parties that stood stolid and utterly refused to change, no matter what happened? Their leaders were dead; the majority of the people behind them were dead, and when the impact of war came upon them it became clear that they were dead. Let me point out that it is generally accepted and is coming to be more generally accepted in this country that the two old-line parties in this country are dead, root and branch; that the leaders and the prominent men in both of them, as well as the powers behind the scenes to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has just referred, are dead. This means only that though they are not dead to their own interests they are utterly dead to the interests of the people of the country which they have undertaken to rule.

Now I ask the Prime Minister to take a few minutes even in his busy life to tell me what possible recourse the Canadian people have if they find that whichever old-line party is in power betrays their interests and fails to keep its promises. What other recourse have the people but to organize new parties? The organization of new parties stands as a condemnation of the policies or administration of the old-line parties, in whatever countries the new parties are organized.

I think it would be a good thing to refer just for a moment to the Prime Minister's appeal to the members of his party to support him. I am unable to tell whether he was trying to intimidate the members of the house by holding forth the threat of an election, or some such thing. If he was; if he thought that by going to the country he would remove from his side several thorns which are now beginning to hurt considerably, I believe he is very much mistaken. Anyone who would imagine that a new election would remove from this parliament gentlemen like the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and others, had better do a little more studying. The Prime Minister may have been indicating that he was weary of it all and would probably resign. I would sympathize more with him if I had not heard his speech this afternoon, but considering the energy and power he then manifested I believe he is quite capable of carrying on even through another plebiscite, should that become necessary. The Prime Minister asked for the responsibility that he now has. He organized for it; he and his party henchmen did everything in their power at the last election to get it. I think the Canadian people are thoroughly justified in expecting him to stand right up to the task and carry through the responsibility which he very willingly assumed.

This house must make two very important decisions with respect to the subamendment. The first is, what are we going to do with the subamendment itself? That is a relatively easy question to deal with, but the second one is not so simple. What are members of this house to do about the causes that produced the subamendment? That is a matter not to be disposed of so easily. I should like to give some attention to the answers to these questions. First, I should like to turn to the question of the subamendment. As I see it, the plebiscite on which we spent so much time last year was designed to answer the question raised by the amendment to the amendment. A "yes" vote was generally understood to mean the willingness of the voter to give the government freedom to introduce conscription for overseas service. Canadians as a whole definitely voted "yes". A majority in Quebec voted "no", which was their absolute privilege and one which they should be free to exercise without any abuse from any organ or any person in the country. In accordance with the expressed will of the majority of the voters the government introduced Bill No. 80, which modified the National Resources Mobilization Act in order to give the government freedom to introduce conscription for overseas service. This house voted on Bill No. 80 as follows. After having told the people, through their leader, to vote "yes" on the plebiscite; after having helped the Canadian people, therefore, to vote "yes", the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came into this house and voted "no" on the bill based upon the plebiscite. Many of my fellow Canadians who speak French, among them being the mover of the amendment to the amendment, also voted against Bill No. 80. The total vote against that bill was fifty-four, so that there was hardly any doubt as to how the house stood with respect to that measure. In view of the fact that the country voted "yes" and this house voted "yes", I fail to see how, in the short space of time that has intervened, this house could possibly reverse its position and support the amendment to the amendment.

Our group, the social crediters, are committed to vote against the amendment to the amendment because of several things in our history. There has been some sort of attempt on the part of this group to be consistent, and on at least certain matters I think we have been consistent ever since we went into Canadian public life. In 1937 I issued a statement to the press to the effect that I was going to support the government's proposal to increase the defence estimates. When those estimates came up I voted in favour of them, indicating quite clearly that I believed Canada should be prepared to offer effective cooperation in the defence of the British commonwealth and all that it holds dear. When the war broke out, this group took a stand in favour of unreserved cooperation with the British commonwealth of nations until victory should be won. Again, when the National Resources Mobilization Act was introduced in 1940 we supported the principle of the mobilization of all the resources of this country, in order that we might build up a powerful force with which to fight to foe. When the plebiscite question was up for discussion I, representing this group, did not tell the Canadian people how to vote. We took the view that it was not the prerogative of any group or party in this house to tell the Canadian people how they ought to vote on a question so vitally important as the matter of conscription. We simply outlined certain problems involved and left the people to form their own decisions. When the Canadian people voted we held ourselves, as the democratic representatives of democratic people, bound to vote as the people required we should vote. Thus when Bill No. 80 came up this group voted for it, and therefore supported the change in the mobilization act which gave the government power to apply conscription.

My group will continue to vote "yes", in favour of the mobilization of the resources of this country. There is no change in the condition since last year which in any way could justify our reversing our decision. The national existence of the British commonwealth is at stake, a point which I am afraid some hon. members forget. The national existence of all the nations of North America is at stake, and that includes both English-speaking and French-speaking people, both in Canada and in the United States.

The foe continues dreadfully powerful and, in the main, victorious still; and stern, with an almost fanatical determination to win, a sort of frenzy generated by despair. I think we can hardly expect a crack-up in our enemy such as favoured us during the last war. They are fighting with their backs to the wall. All these matters should, I believe, persuade anyone to vote for the greatest possible measure of strengthening of the government's hands in the conduct of the conflict.

The good which could be accomplished by the passage of the subamendment could not possibly compensate for the inestimable harm which would result. I think in his most thoughtful moments even the mover of the subamendment would agree that that is so. Social crediters therefore will vote against the amendment to the amendment.

May I turn now for a short time to the consideration of a problem which, in my opinion, should exercise the house deeply, namely, the discussion of the cause which resulted in one who was a trusted colleague of the Prime Minister, one who has been honoured and respected from coast to coast in Canada, moving an amendment to the amendment amounting to a vote of want of confidence in this Liberal government. That cause cannot be brushed aside lightly, nor can it be scoffed away.

What caused the situation which faces us in Canada? I believe all Canadians, both English- and French-speaking, should bear in mind that fundamentally the thing which caused the feeling we have to-day was a thing over which none of us had any control whatsoever. It was the fact that the British perhaps happened—I cannot say that is correct, at this distance—to be fortunate in winning the conflict of 1759. In the peace treaty they were given the responsibility of helping to govern the lives of a great many people extracted from a race which for centuries must have been the traditional enemy of the British people. Let us face that situation squarely, and without passion or prejudice. Let us make allowance for the feeling which must have passed on naturally from father to son, through the generations. That was the first cause of the present condition.

The second is one over which perhaps no one in this house could have exercised much control, but over which perhaps all can exercise some control in the future. I refer to the knavish tricks of politics. If I am correctly informed, there has been carried on among the French-Canadian people—

Mr. LALONDE: What kind of politics?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall enlarge upon that matter shortly. I refer to the intrigue, machinations and even downright treachery by ignorant and even knavish politicians, whose efforts did not add to the knowledge of French Canadians respecting the new situation in which they found themselves; did not add to the understanding of British institutions and the purpose of the British empire, including the whole set-up in which we must live our lives; did not add to the confidence those people could feel in their English-speaking compatriots in Canada. I believe that a large part of the blame for that unfortunate ill-feeling, which at least in some measure exists in Canada, must be laid at the door of those unscrupulous men whom, on the floor of the house, I have called shysters. And before leaving that point may I add that the shysters were not all Liberals or all Conservatives.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Many of them were.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They were both.

Mr. LALONDE: The Social Credit party was not in existence at the time.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I may add that the Social Credit party had nothing to do with it.

Mr. LALONDE: Not at that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, nor now. If your people are carrying on down there under Social Credit, then they are basing everything they have to say on the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and are not engaging in any measures designed to arouse passion, prejudice or ill-feeling. There is plenty of evidence of that. I may say that the only group in the house which from the time of its entry up to the present has seen practically just what was going to happen, and which then stood for the very things for which it stands to-day, and consequently has a record for consistency not paralleled anywhere in the British empire, is the Social Credit group. You can be pretty certain they were not entirely blind when they first formed their party, some eight or nine years ago. They had some vision.

May I turn now to the third cause of the unhappy condition which exists in parts of Canada with respect to differences of race? For some reason after the last war there was sown in Canada from coast to coast one of the most pernicious forms of propaganda in favour of pacifism that one can conceive. I believe every hon. member should study seriously that propaganda with a view to finding out where it originated. It completely blinded the people of Canada and, as hon. members of the Liberal party know very well, the result of that blindness was that many men stood in the house and fought against armaments, against participation in any war to come, and all that sort of thing—only to find that they had been completely deceived. That pacifistic propaganda went throughout the length and breadth of French as well as English Canada. That malady of pacifism did not affect the French-Canadian people any more thoroughly than it did the English-speaking Canadian people. It had a part to play in the plebiscite for which the Prime Minister worked last year. It had a part to play in the delivery of his speech this afternoon. It had a great deal to do with the abuse which he has suffered.

The fourth cause of this unhappy condition I think must be called by just what it is, a lack of vision and understanding on the part of the Prime Minister. I am not suggesting that he was insincere, but I will say that if we may judge from his pronouncements, as referred to with such passion and justice by some hon. members to my left, he lacked vision and understanding of the things which might come to pass in this country. The result was that where he should have given strong, courageous and understanding leadership, he failed to do so and is now suffering the consequences.

The fifth cause is the Liberal stand from generation to generation, particularly during the last twenty-five years. I do not desire to say anything offensive, but I think they will have to grant, as hon. members to my left declared last night, that they deceived the people of French Canada into thinking for twenty-five years that if they just persisted in electing Liberals they never would have conscription. I suppose some of the most ardent devotees even told the people that they would never have war, that we would never participate in a war, and all that sort of simple foolishness. There was no justification for any man over sixteen years of age with any degree of intelligence ever forming a conclusion that we in this country could be free from war. Yet the Liberal party deluded the people from end to end of this country for twenty-five years into thinking that by electing them they would be putting in power magicians who could keep us out of war. No wonder that they were believed, but no wonder that disappointment is so general, resulting even in the mild amendment to the amendment which we are now discussing!

The sixth cause of our difficulty must be recognized as the suddenness, the strength and the fury of the attack by the foe. I had every confidence that we were going to be attacked, but I must say that I was never able to find evidence to show me how terrible the attack would be when it came. The fury of that attack placed the Canadian people as a whole, along with all other British peoples, in a most painful situation.

This brought about the seventh cause of our difficulty, which was the consequent need of Canada to leap as it were from a weak peacetime position into a great warlike exertion. Many soldiers had to be had. At the same time we were expanding our food production, our munitions production and every other activity in our industrial and economic life. What could the government in Canada do? I think hon. members will all recognize that I am in no way minimizing the blame attached to the Prime Minister, but neither am I going to exaggerate it. I want to give him the benefit of the doubt. I say, even although I am in the opposition, I do not feel that much of the abuse which has been hurled at that man's head is justifiable. He found himself in an exceedingly difficult position; I think far too little allowance has been made for that, perhaps from all sides of the house.

What could he do? What could the administration do? It had to have men, and a large part of the people of Canada had been deluded into thinking that conscription would never be used. It was almost sacrilege to mention it. His own party had committed themselves and they did so again in 1940. In many instances members occupying seats on the government side obtained those seats because of their pledge against conscription. The result was that the Prime Minister found himself in an almost impossible position. Men had to be had, but he was denied the privilege of using conscription even when the plebiscite had been voted upon. What could he do? The result was, as the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) pointed out last night, that there have been abuses in our efforts to raise man-power in this country, which I think probably five generations of Canadians will not live down.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand it is the intention not to sit to-night, so that perhaps the hon. member will move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS UNTIL TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before I move the adjournment of the house I have a motion which I should like to place before the house. I move:

That the order passed on the twenty-eighth of January, 1943, giving precedence to the debate on the address be suspended until next Tuesday, the twenty-third of February instant.

The purpose of this motion is to enable us on Monday next to make headway with some of the motions on the order paper with respect to the appointment of select committees. If this motion carries, I shall indicate the order in which the various items on the agenda will be taken up.

Motion agreed to.

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS ON AND AFTER FEBRUARY 22

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members will see in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday that I give notice:

That on and after Monday the 22nd February, 1943, to the end of the present session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Questions will be the first item on the order of proceedings, and then that motion will be the next. On the order paper of to-day hon. members will see, under government notices of motions, reference to certain motions. One is in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to the committee on privileges and elections investigating the holding of an election for the electoral district of Stanstead. That would be the second item.

There is a notice standing in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) for the establishment of a committee in connection with the defence of Canada regulations. That will be the third item. There is a motion standing in the name of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for a committee on reconstruction and reestablishment. That will be the fourth item. If we conclude with these and there is time, we might take the first resolution under government orders, with respect to the $100,000 grant to the city of Ottawa. I think that will probably fill up Monday. There will be two other motions on the order paper for the appointment of committees, one on radio broadcasting and the other on railways and shipping. If we make better progress than at the moment I anticipate, we might be prepared to take them also.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Monday, February 22, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

SITUATION IN INDIA

QUESTION AS TO EXPRESSION OF OPINION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TO GOVERNMENT OF UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the press report that the United States is taking a direct interest in the present situation in India, and in view of widespread apprehension as to its effect upon our war effort as united nations, has the Prime Minister expressed any opinion to the government of the United Kingdom regarding the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer is no.

CIVIL SERVICE

REFERENCE TO REQUEST FOR DIRECT REPRESENTATION ON TREASURY BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will he be good enough to inform the house what consideration the government has given and what decisions have been arrived at with respect to the request of the organized government employees for direct representation on the treasury board civil service advisory committee?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman gave me notice of this question, which I received just before coming in. Several bodies of organized civil servants have presented many requests for favourable consideration, all coming down to this—higher pay, more money. This is particularly true, almost wholly true, with regard to the middle and upper income brackets in the service. Very difficult questions were raised by these numerous requests and I finally felt it desirable that the government get a little advice from some independent source, that is, from persons who had not prejudged the case one way or the other. A committee, headed by Mr. Coon of the bank of Nova Scotia, was therefore set up to advise the treasury board. As soon as that was done, organized bodies of civil servants began to press very hard for representation on that committee. I felt and feel now that since we know exactly what they want, and since they have repeatedly and very ably made their representations both orally and in writing, I should not be justified in recommending to the government that a representative of them be added to this committee. I do not intend to make any such recommendation to the government.

The specific answer is that I do not think the government as a government has given consideration to the request of the organized civil servants, because I have declined and feel that I must decline to recommend that a representative of the civil servants, whose views we know and have before us, should be added to a body such as we have set up for advisory purposes.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

RELATION OF MAN-POWER TO POSSIBLE CHANGES IN PRODUCTION OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT AND CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

1. Have plans been made for slowing down the production of military vehicles, tanks, guns and other fighting equipment, coincidental with the expansion of production of ships? 2. If so, when does this go into effect? 3. Will it result in releasing man-power for other work? 4. If so, how much?

Mr. SPEAKER: The form of the question has been pretty well set forth in the statement made by the hon. member. I think it should be placed upon the order paper.

IRON ORE

PRESS REPORT AS TO CLOSING OF DOMINION STEEL AND COAL PLANT IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, February 20, there appeared a Canadian Press report stating in effect that the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation's iron ore mine at Wabana, Newfoundland, the source of most of the ore for the big steel plant at Sydney, Nova Scotia, was to be closed on February 25. In view of the serious shortage of steel for our war plants will the minister say whether he has investigated this matter and will every effort be made to see that this mine remains open?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The difficulty about iron ore from Wabana to serve the Dominion Steel and Coal company is one of transportation. As my hon. friend may know, three of the company's largest ore boats were sunk by enemy action last autumn. The result was that the company was forced to find ore on the mainland, and a mine was opened near Bathurst, New Brunswick. About three hundred thousand tons of ore are being shipped from that mine to Sydney. The situation at Wabana at the moment is that 500,000 tons of ore are banked there awaiting shipment, and that is the total storage capacity available. It was therefore necessary to close the mining operations, since no disposition could be found for any additional ore at this time. As soon as navigation opens ore will move again from Wabana; the government is furnishing boats for the purpose, and the mine will reopen.

Mr. GILLIS: Supplementary to the question just asked by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) may I say that the department was carrying on some investigations with respect to the development of iron ore deposits in Inverness county, Nova Scotia. Will the minister inform the house what progress has been made?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that question should be placed on the order paper.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF FARMERS IN MUNITIONS PLANTS IN OFF SEASONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In view of the situation that has arisen in the last week in our munition factories in western Ontario, would the Minister of Labour give consideration to extending the privilege to farmers in off-season time of working in the munition factories, including them with logging and other primary industries? The situation is serious.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The whole question of farm labour, and that is what is involved in the question of the hon. member, is continually receiving the consideration of the Department of Labour. The hon. member can rest assured that in the not very distant future a statement will be made by me in the house in regard to the matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: By the new regulations these men are only allowed to work sixty days on other than farm labour. They now feel that they have to leave work in munition factories and so there is an exodus from the munition factories to snow-covered farms.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO THE INTERNMENT OF MR. CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. In view of the numerous petitions he has received to that effect, will he order the release of Mr. Camillien Houde from an internment camp?

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Mr. Camillien Houde knows what to do if he wishes his case to be reconsidered. He must apply to an advisory committee, and whenever he so desires he can file an application.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LEASE-LEND PROVISIONS—AID TO CANADA

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce):

1. Has the Canadian government received any aid from the United States government under lease-lend law during the year 1942?
2. If so, to what extent—in dollars value?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Canada has not received lend-lease assistance on its own account from the United States government. Some materials and supplies provided to the United Kingdom by the United States under lend-lease arrangements have been used in Canada, in part incorporated in Canadian products for the United Kingdom, in part in exchange for other United States supplies purchased by Canada to be used in production for the United Kingdom, and in part as the United Kingdom's contribution in kind to the combined air training plan.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED

Mr. REID:

1. How many houses have been built to date under Wartime Housing Limited?
2. How many in each province, stating the city or the location of the same?
3. What has been the total cost?
4. What is the total number of staff employed and the cost of same since its inception?
5. How many of a staff is there in each province?
6. Is the programme of housing to be built now complete?
7. What is the number of houses built by Wartime Housing Limited, in January of the present year and where are these located?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Contracts let by Wartime Housing Limited to date are for 15,623 houses. 9,370 of these are complete as of January 31, 1943.

2. The following is a list giving the number of houses contracted for in each province together with the location of same:

Total number of houses	15,623

3. The estimated total cost of these houses approximates $46,072,227. The costs include actual or estimated costs covering—

(1) Acquisition of land.

(2) Legal and other expenses in connection with acquiring same.

(3) All costs for engineering construction, inspection, etc., in connection with the installation of sewage systems and water supplies wherever required.

(4) All costs for grading, roads, walks, etc., as required.

(5. All construction costs involved in the erection of the houses inclusive of inspection.

(6) All costs involved in equipping the houses—stoves, blinds, etc.

4. The total number of staff now permanently employed is 858. This staff subdivides into many different categories from maids, cooks, janitors, and maintenance men, etc., to the skilled technical staffs in the head office of wartime housing limited—engineering, architectural, accounting and management divisions. The number shown does not include construction personnel engaged on projects being constructed by wartime housing limited. It only includes the type of personnel employed on weekly or longer period bases.

From its inception to December 31, 1942, the total amount expended in salaries by wartime housing limited is $705,636.24.

5. The following is a list of staff employed in each province: Nova Scotia, 184 employees; New Brunswick, 21 employees; Quebec, 140 employees; Ontario, 392 employees; Saskatchewan, 1 employee; British Columbia, 120 employees.

6. The programme of housing to be built is not yet complete. There are 6,253 houses at present under construction.

7. No houses were completely built in January of 1943.

RADIO BROADCASTING—COMMISSIONS TO POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT ON LICENCE SALES

Mr. MARSHALL:

What commissions were received from the Department of Transport by the Post Office Department for radio licences sold in the year 1942, and what disposition was made of these commissions?

Mr. MULOCK: Fiscal year ended March 31, 1942,—$9,100.85. Included in gross revenue of Post Office Department.

POST OFFICE—PROFIT ON PERSONAL MESSAGES TO ENEMY AND ENEMY OCCUPIED COUNTRIES

Mr. MARSHALL:

What was the net profit on personal messages mailed to enemy and enemy occupied countries by the Post Office Department in the year 1942, and what disposition was made of these profits?

Mr. MULOCK: Fiscal year ended March 31, 1942,—$1,535.01. Included in gross revenue of Post Office Department.

FLAX CRUSHING MILLS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What is the total capacity of flax crushing mills in Canada?
2. Where are they located?
3. Will the government assist in increasing this capacity?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Present estimated annual capacity 6,395,000 bushels. It is possible that this capacity may be increased in the near future by the acquisition of additional machinery and by processing improvements.

2. Quebec—Montreal, 3 plants.

Ontario—
Toronto, 2 plants.
Baden, 1 plant.
Hamilton, 1 plant under construction.

Manitoba—
Winnipeg, 1 plant.
St. Boniface, 1 plant.

Alberta—Medicine Hat, 1 plant.

3. No.

ATLANTIC COAST LOBSTER FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the attention of the Department of Fisheries been drawn to the shortage of manpower, gear and equipment in the lobster fishing industry on the Atlantic coast?
2. What steps, if any, are being taken by the Department of Fisheries to allow lobster fishermen operating in the Northumberland straits adjacent to a district having a spring season and a district having a fall season, to use his gear and equipment to trap lobsters in both seasons of 1943?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.

2. After full consideration, and under existing conditions, it is not considered in public interest to effect any change in the lobster fishing regulations.

FLAX PRODUCTION AND PROCESSING

Mr. BENCE:

1. What is the estimated number of bushels of flax which Canada produced in 1942?

2. How many flax processing plants are situated in Canada?

3. Where are such plants located?

4. What is the individual capacity of each such plant per year?

5. Are there sufficient processing plants on the North American continent to take care of the processing of more flax than that produced on the continent in 1942?

6. If not, when was this fact brought to the attention of the administration and in what manner?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Production (western Canada)—14,700,000 bushels. When allowing for 10 per cent dockage, the marketable crop was—13,230,000 bushels.

2. Nine in operation. One under construction.

3. Quebec—Montreal, 3 plants.
Ontario—
Toronto, 2 plants.
Baden, 1 plant.
Hamilton, 1 plant under construction.
Manitoba—
Winnipeg, 1 plant.
St. Boniface, 1 plant
Alberta—Medicine Hat, 1 plant.

4. It is considered undesirable to disclose the individual capacity of each flax processing plant in Canada, as to do so would divulge to competitors the business affairs of private firms. However, the total capacity of all plants in Canada is 6,395,000 bushels.

5. Yes.

6. See reply to question 5.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—OTTAWA HOUSING REGISTRY COMMITTEE

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the wartime prices and trade board set up an organization known as "Ottawa housing registry committee"?

2. If so, who are the officers of this organization and what remuneration either by way of salary or personal expenses, is allowed them?

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. Ottawa Housing Registry committee members: Mr. C. A. McCracken, chairman; Miss Violet Tennant, secretary; Sister Mary Shostak, Miss L. O'Boyle, (Sisters of Service); Miss Joy Maines (Citizen's Committee—Council of Social Agencies); Mr. H. Rheaume (Civil Service Commission); Miss D. Randle (Civil Service Commission); Madame Gustave Lanctot—another appointment to be made—meanwhile, Miss Edna Inglis or Mrs. Norman McLarty are acting (Consumer Branch); Mr. T. W. Cowan (Y.M.C.A.—second appointment to be made); Mother St. Thomas, Sister St. Andrew (Institut Jeanne d'Arc); Mrs. H. Frechette, Dr. L. I. Pugsley, (Y.W.C.A.); Major C. S. Ford (City of Ottawa); Mrs. Alan C. Fleming (Women's Volunteer Bureau). No remuneration either by way of salary or personal expenses is allowed to any member of this committee.

GASOLINE RATION COUPON BOOKS—DISTRIBUTION

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the government taken any steps to use the services of the issuers of car licences throughout Canada to distribute the new gasoline ration books?

2. If so, what arrangements have been made?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. The category "AA" gasoline licence and ration coupon books are all issued through the issuer of motor vehicle licences in the various provinces. The "special" books are issued only through the regional offices of the oil controller.

CAMP BORDEN RAILWAY FACILITIES

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Are the removal of the railroad tracks to a different location at Camp Borden contemplated?

2. If so, what is the estimated cost of the same?

3. Is the project now under way?

4. Will the project be carried out under contract or day labour?

5. If the project is to be carried out by contract, what is the contract price or the nature of the contract?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. This work has been completed.

2. Total cost, $71,032.00.

3. See reply to No. 1.

4. Both. Some military labour was used for the day labour portion.

5. The portion of the work carried out jointly by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway was done by agreement. The funds allocated for this were $35,932.00. Arrangements were made as follows:—

A meeting of representatives of the quartermaster-general, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways was held on July 23, 1942. It was agreed that railway engineers confer with the camp commander, Camp Borden, then submit proposal and estimated costs.

The railways proposal and costs ($35,932.00) were submitted August 11, 1942.

Arrangements for carrying out the work were made between the camp engineer officer and railway representative at Camp Borden.

A letter of approval to the Canadian Pacific Railway from the quartermaster-general was sent October 8, 1942.

CAMP BORDEN ADMINISTRATION BUILDING

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Is the erection of a new administration building contemplated at Camp Borden?
2. If so, what is the estimated cost of the construction of the building?
3. Is it to be built by contract or day labour?
4. Have contracts been let for the construction?
5. What is the contract price or the nature of the contract?
6. When will it be completed?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Under consideration—no decision arrived at as yet.

2 to 6. Answered by No. 1.

JOINT DEFENCE BOARD

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Is the Canada-United States joint defence board still functioning?
2. If so, who are the Canadian members of such board?
3. How many meetings has the board held since January 1, 1942?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. The Canadian members of the board are: Colonel O. M. Biggar, chairman; Major-General M. A. Pope, Rear Admiral G. C. Jones, Air Vice Marshal N. R. Anderson, Mr. H. L. Keenleyside, secretary.

3. The board has held twelve meetings since January 1, 1942.

ITALIAN PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. REID:

1. Have any negotiations taken place between Great Britain and Canada regarding the sending of Italian prisoners of war, to be employed in work here?
2. If so, what decision has the government arrived at in the matter?
3. Will residence in Canada by prisoners of war, brought about by their incarceration, be considered a valid reason for their permanent residence following the conclusion of hostilities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No negotiations have taken place between the United Kingdom and Canada regarding the sending of Italian prisoners of war to be employed in work in Canada.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Prisoners of war do not acquire a permanent status in Canada, since they are not admitted as immigrants. Their temporary stay in Canada would not legally entitle them to admission for permanent residence.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—RADIO TECHNICIANS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence for Air formulated any plans for the recognition, by way of promotion for merit, of radio technicians of the R.C.A.F. who are serving overseas?
2. If so, when will they be put into force?

Mr. POWER: This is a question which perhaps can be better answered than by a mere yes or no. If my hon. friend will agree to let it stand until the discussion comes up on the war appropriation, I think I can then deal with it in a far more satisfactory manner than by a short answer now.

Question stands.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FUEL COMPANIES

Mr. O'NEILL:

1. Is any monetary assistance being given by the government to, (a) Canada Western Fuel Company, Nanaimo, (b) Middlesboro Collieries, Merritt, British Columbia?
2. If so, on what basis and what amount has been paid to each?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) No such company. (b) Yes.

2. Middlesboro Collieries, Merritt, British Columbia. (i) Assistance paid by coal administrator under wartime prices and trade board in respect to cost of living bonus August 24, 1942 to October 31, 1942, $448.36. (ii) By emergency coal production board in respect to production subsidy, October 1, 1942, to February 28, 1943, $9,600.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. REID:

1. Has the government given power to the wartime prices and trade board, which would allow the board to compel farmers to market farm products grown by them and which products have been placed under regulations as to prices by the wartime prices and trade board?

2. Has such power been granted the wartime prices and trade board which would give them authority to seize or take forcible possession of any farm produce from a farmer, and which farm products may be under the price regulations of the board?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Under the wartime price and trade regulations, being P.C. 8528 of November 1, 1941, the board has power to require any person producing . . . . processing . . . . or dealing in any goods or services to produce . . . process. . . . distribute, deliver . . . . or otherwise deal with any goods or services in such manner . . . . as may be specified by the board.

2. The same regulations empower the board to take possession of any supplies of any goods.

Under the said regulations farm produce is in the same position as any other goods.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—AIR MAIL SERVICE

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What is the cost of sending a letter air mail to a member of the armed forces overseas?

2. Does any of this mail go by boat?

3. If so, what percentage goes by boat?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Airgraph, 6 cents. Armed forces air letter, 10 cents. Ordinary air mail, 30 cents per half ounce. No service on account of lack of aircraft capacity.

2. Airgraph, all by plane.

Armed forces air letter. Owing to shortage of space on transatlantic aircraft due to priority accorded war equipment, it has not been possible during recent months to give air conveyance to all correspondence prepaid at air mail rates and the excess quantity has had to be forwarded by ship. Operating officers are instructed to advise the public accordingly and the department is endeavouring by means of a strenuous publicity to have the public use airgraph.

3. Airgraph, all by plane. None by boat.

Armed forces air letter. Oct. 1942, 30 per cent; Nov. 1942, nil; Dec. 1942, 34 per cent (Christmas mailings); Jan. 1943, 3 per cent; Feb. 1943, nil up to the present.

CANADIAN INVESTMENTS IN CUBA

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What amount is invested by Canadian banks in Cuba?

2. What is the amount of all other Canadian investments in Cuba?

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No information. The chartered banks monthly return of assets and liabilities to the Minister of Finance does not disclose particulars of assets and liabilities by various countries.

2. No information.

BANK FOR INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENTS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is the bank for international settlements, established in 1930, still in operation?

2. If so, has Canada any representation?

3. (a) What representation is held by the united nationals; (b) what representation is held by the axis powers and all countries controlled by the axis powers?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. The annual report of the bank for international settlements for the year ended March 31, 1942, discloses directors representing various countries as follows: Great Britain, 3; Netherlands, 1; Belgium, 1; Switzerland, 1; Sweden, 1; France, 3; Italy, 2; Germany, 4.

COMMERCIAL AIR ROUTES

Mr. GREEN:

1. What agreements are in existence between Canada and any other country or countries concerning commercial air routes?

2. Upon what dates were such agreements made?

3. Are negotiations under way at the present time between Canada and any other country or countries concerning commercial air routes?

4. If so, with what country or countries, and what is the purpose thereof?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1 and 2.

(a) Multilateral—The convention relating to the regulation of aerial navigation, Paris, 1919, with additional protocols in 1920, 1922, 1923 and 1929.

(b) United Kingdom, Ireland and Newfoundland—On March 26, 1936, the Canadian government approved, subject to one proviso, the conclusions and recommendations arrived at by the conference of representatives of the United Kingdom, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland and Canada, held in Ottawa in November and December, 1935, to discuss trans-Atlantic air routes. The terms of the intergovernmental trans-Atlantic air services agreement of 1935-36 were set forth in a statement given to the press on July 30, 1936, by the Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Railways. The principal points dealt with in this agreement have never become operative and the whole position of the parties to the agreement is now under consideration.

(c) Newfoundland — Arrangement giving Trans-Canada Airlines permission to conduct a service between Canada and Newfoundland from April 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943, renewable from year to year thereafter. (Exchange of letters of February 6, 7, 9 and 27, 1942.)

(d) United States of America—(1) Permit dated December 2, 1941, granted to Pan American Airways Incorporated to fly into, through and away from Canada on a trans-Atlantic air transport service until April 30, 1951. (Exchange of notes of November 4, December 3 and 22, 1941.) (In substitution for permit issued on March 5, 1937.)

(2) Agreement relating to the operation in either Canada or the United States of civil aircraft duly registered in the territory of the other country. (Exchange of notes of July 28, 1938, treaty series, 1938, No. 8.)

(3) Arrangement relating to air transport services. (Exchange of notes of August 18, 1939, treaty series, 1939, No. 10.)

(4) Arrangement giving American Export Airlines Incorporated permission to conduct a service over Canadian territory en route non-stop (except for emergency landings at Halifax) between New York and Ireland, for the duration of present hostilities and subject to certain conditions. (Exchange of notes of February 26, and March 19, 1942, modified by letters of June 24 and July 9, 1942.)

3. Yes.

4. Negotiations are taking place with the United States for the conclusion of an agreement to continue in force the supplementary air transport arrangement of 1940 (treaty series, 1940, No. 13) which expired on December 31, 1942.

RADIO BROADCASTING—DRUMMOND WREN

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex East):

1. Who is Drummond Wren of Toronto?
2. Has he ever received any payments from the public funds?
3. If so, for what purpose; what is the aggregate amount?
4. What, if any, have been the relations of the said Drummond Wren with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
5. Has there been any dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Mr. Wren, or any organization represented by Mr. Wren?
6. If so, what was the nature of the dispute?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. Mr. Drummond Wren is general secretary of the Workers' Educational Association.

2. He has received payment from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

3. For services rendered in connection with the National Labour Forum: in 1941, $17; in 1942, $360.

4. As secretary of the National Labour Forum, a weekly programme of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

5 and 6. Mr. Wren objected to the script.

MAPLE SUGAR AND SYRUP

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the value of all maple products manufactured in Canada in 1942?
2. How many gallons of maple syrup were produced by the manufacturers in the same year?
3. How many pounds of maple sugar were produced?
4. What was the average price per gallon and per pound?
5. What was the value and quantity of Canada's exports of these products?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Value of all maple products in Canada in 1942, $6,716,300.

2. Number of gallons of maple syrup produced by the manufacturers in 1942, 2,876,900.

3. Number of pounds of maple sugar produced, 3,737,200.

4. Average price per gallon, $2.07. Average price per pound, 20 cents.

5. Value and quantity of Canada's exports of maple syrup, $729,617; 379,504 gallons. Value and quantity of Canada's exports of maple sugar, $1,438,779; 5,818,214 pounds.

*MILITARY SERVICE—LEAVE TO FARMERS FOR MAPLE SUGAR OPERATIONS

Mr. LACOMBE:

Will leave of absence from military training be granted to sons of farmers and farm hands to enable them to participate in the next maple products harvest?

Mr. RALSTON: The answer to this question is that general leave of absence will not be granted, that no general order of the kind will be made, but that individual applications by soldiers will receive appropriate consideration, the same as applications in connection with other occupations for what may be regarded as essential purposes.

LABOUR MANAGEMENT COMMITTEES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many labour-management committees are functioning in Canada to-day?
2. How many employees are engaged in the plants where such committees function?

3. Are such committees functioning in crown companies?
4. If so, how many, and which of them?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Approximately 631.

2. Approximately 327,395.

3. Yes.

4. Committees are operating at Small Arms Ltd., Toronto, Toronto Shipbuilding Co., Toronto, and Research Enterprises Ltd., Toronto, and others are at the formation stage.

"CANADA AT WAR"

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many copies of each monthly number of the publication Canada at War, have been printed in each month since September, 1942?
2. Of these numbers, how many have actually been distributed in each month?
3. What was the total cost of the printing of each of these monthly numbers?
4. What was the total cost of distributing each of these monthly numbers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. October, 1942—Canada at War was not published. November, 1942—English, 125,000; French, 50,000. December, 1942—English, 121,640; French, 60,000. January, 1943—English, 113,000; French, 73,000. February, 1943—English, 110,000; French, 55,000.

2. November, 1942—English, 124,093; French, 49,257. December, 1942—English, 121,640; French, 60,000. January, 1943—English, 113,000; French, 67,220. February, 1943—English, distribution still in process; French, 53,842.

3. November, 1942—$1,803.18. December, 1942—$2,390.50. January 1943—$1,870.68. February, 1943—bill not yet received.

4. No separate records of distribution costs as applying to any one publication are kept.

SUBMARINES

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. How many submarines were built in Canada in the first world war?
2. How many have been built during the present war?
3. How many are now in commission?

Mr. ADAMSON: It will be perfectly satisfactory if the minister gives a private reply in this case.

Question dropped.

FAIRMILES

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. How many "Fairmiles" have been built in Canada?
2. How many are now under construction?
3. How many are now in commission?

Question dropped.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

DESTROYERS

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. Have any destroyers been built in Canada?
2. Are any now building?
3. How many are in commission?

Question dropped.

IMPORTS FROM AND EXPORTS TO SPAIN

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the value of Canadian exports to Spain for the calendar year 1942?
2. What was the value of imports to Canada from Spain for the same period?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This question deals with information which it is not the general policy of the government to make available in war time, but for fear that more harm might be done by not answering than by answering, I am submitting the answer. It is as follows:

1 and 2. Canadian imports and exports with Spain during the calendar year 1942:—Imports entered for consumption, $406,270; exports, $10,609.

WIDOWS WITH SONS IN ARMED FORCES—TEMPORARY EMPLOYMENT AND DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. HOBLITZELL:

Will the government extend to widows whose sons are serving in the various armed services, the right to take temporary employment and keep both dependents' allowance and wages or salaries, as given to widows of civil servants under the terms of an order in council passed on February 11, last?

Mr. RALSTON: This question concerns a matter of policy in connection with which an answer is not given until the policy itself is announced.

Question dropped.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the government been advised by the government of Manitoba as to whether the amount of the old age pension, and the pension to the blind, to residents of that province, is to be increased?
2. If so, what is the amount of the increase, and from what date is it to be effective?
3. Was the government of Manitoba given assurance that this government would provide its three-fourths share of a proposed increase?
4. Have assurances similar to the above been given to the governments of the other provinces?
5. What steps are being taken by the government to make provision for such an increase throughout Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No. However, the province of Manitoba has requested that the old age pensions regulations be amended to allow that province to pay supplemental allowances to old age pensioners.

2. These supplemental allowances are paid wholly by the province, accordingly the amount of the allowance and the date of commencement are matters to be decided solely by the province.

3. No.

4. No.

5. This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not the practice of the government to disclose policy in giving answers to questions; see, however, statement by Minister of Finance in House of Commons on November 14, 1941 (Hansard, page 4423).

DOMINION STATISTICS—"PHYSICAL VOLUME OF BUSINESS"

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What is meant by the term "physical volume of business" as used by the dominion bureau of statistics?

2. What were the physical volume of business figures for the years, (a) 1942, (b) 1941, (c) 1940?

3. What were the index figures for employment in Canada for the years (a) 1929, (b) 1933, (c) 1937, (d) 1941?

4. What was the earning power per man per year for the years, (a) 1929, (b) 1933, (c) 1937, (d) 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. The term "Physical Volume of Business" applies to a monthly index of productive operations maintained by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The computation is based in recent years on 66 factors expressed in terms of volume. The components are classified under mining, manufactures, construction, central electric stations, railway traffic and distribution. The weighting is based on the "value added" by the productive processes of the respective industrial or service groups. The average for 1935 to 1939 is regarded as equalling 100 and the monthly index consequently is a percentage of the results for that period.

2. The index of the physical volume of business in the three years was as follows: (a) 201·7; (b) 165·0; (c) 124·2.

3. The index of employment on the base of 1926 in the four years was computed as: (a) 119·0; (b) 83·4; (c) 114·1 (d) 152·3.

4. Following are the remuneration rates of the employees per man-year: (a) $1,209; (b) $937; (c) $1,064; (d) $1,223.

7. Is he a returned soldier, and has he any experience or training in shipping or navy affairs?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NORTH PACIFIC AREA—CANADA-UNITED STATES COMMITTEE FOR PLANNING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters and other documents providing for or dealing with the setting up of a Canada-United States committee for planning the development of northern British Columbia, Yukon Territory and Alaska.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are no orders in council. I should think that would dispose of the motion.

Mr. GREEN: I am also asking for letters and other documents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend a general statement on the matter at a subsequent sitting, but I do not think there are letters or documents that could be produced.

Mr. GREEN: Then I understand that the Prime Minister will give the house a statement in regard to this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, with pleasure.

Motion dropped.

REPORT ON COBALT, LORRAINE AND GOWGANDA—ARSENICAL ORES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of a report made on or about the end of October, 1942, by John A. Reid, M.E., Ontario, government mining engineer, to the metal controller on arsenical ores at Cobalt, Lorrain and Gowganda.

Mr. HOWE: I am informed that the report in question is to be published by the government of Ontario. I am told that it is now in the proof reading stage and will be out shortly. Of course the proper place for the hon. member to apply for a copy of the report is not to this government but to the government of Ontario.

Motion dropped.

POSTAL SERVICE—LONDON "ECHO"

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Post Office Department, or any official thereof and the proprietors, officials or any agents of the London Echo from January 1, 1937, to the present date.

GIMLI, MAN., AIRPORT

Mr. CLEAVER:

For (a) a list of names of land owners, (b) complete detailed particulars of purchase prices paid for lands acquired, (c) a copy of the report of the independent valuator, J. J. Swanson & Company, Winnipeg, (d) a copy of the report of the C.N.R. right of way agent at Winnipeg, forwarding or accompanying independent valuators report, (e) a copy of all statutory declarations recently procured from individual owners of land, showing owner-cost of lands, in connection with the land purchased for the airport at Gimli, Manitoba.

NORTH PACIFIC AREA

STUDY BY JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES COMMITTEE OF SOURCES OF DEFENCE REQUIREMENTS AND POST-WAR CONDITIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked if I would give him a statement with regard to the matter referred to in a motion for correspondence respecting joint Canada-United States study of the North Pacific area—Alaska, Yukon territory, and northern British Columbia. I promised I would. I am happy to say I have the statement now. I had been anticipating giving the house a statement, but unfortunately did not have it with me and have just this moment received it.

The joint Canada-United States study of the north Pacific area announced on January 25, 1943, was initiated by joint economic committees of Canada and the United States. These committees were established on June 20, 1941, as a result of discussions between the governments of Canada and the United States. It was agreed:

. . . that each government will appoint a committee to meet with a committee appointed by the other and that these committees shall severally and jointly study and report to their respective governments on the possibility of—

1. Effecting a more economic, more efficient and more coordinated utilization of the combined resources of the two countries in the production of defence requirements, to the extent that this is not now being done, and

2. Reducing the probable post-war economic dislocation consequent upon the changes which the economy in each country is presently undergoing.

The Canadian section of the joint committee was appointed on June 20, 1941, by order in council No. 4500. The joint study of the North Pacific area sponsored by the committees falls squarely within the second part of their terms of reference. No orders in council have been passed concerning this study project and no commitments respecting it have been entered into between the two governments.

The study will be conducted under the supervision of the joint economic committees. No special committee has been set up for this purpose.

The area to be studied includes Alaska, Yukon territory and northern British Columbia. The object is to study the possibilities for the economic development of the region for the benefit of the two countries and for the welfare of the inhabitants of the area.

The study is being carried on by officials of the two governments with the assistance of officials of the government of British Columbia. Charles Camsell, Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, Ottawa, and James C. Rettie, of the Portland office of the National Resources Planning Board, have been appointed to organize and direct the study. The immediate purpose is simply to gather basic information and to develop proposals for the consideration of the joint economic committee. On the basis of this information the committee may make recommendations to the two governments regarding desirable measures of economic cooperation for the future development of the region.

Mr. GREEN: Have any recommendations yet been made by the committee? Has the government of British Columbia a representative on the committee, and if not, does the Prime Minister not think it would be wise to have a representative of the provincial government added to the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are no recommendations up to the present time; and the government of British Columbia has been communicated with and the members of the committee are in touch with the British Columbia government with respect to any representations which that government may wish to make. Whether it is a desirable thing to have a member of the committee from the government of British Columbia, I cannot say at the moment. I have no doubt that if the United States representative and the Canadian representative on the committee think it desirable, they will ask for that addition.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister knows of no objection to having as a member of the committee a representative of the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand. I am leaving it to the two members of the committee to express their view in the first instance. I would wish to be guided in part by that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the Prime Minister not think that the operation of the committee comprising representatives of the United States and Canada to survey the resources of northern British Columbia, the Yukon and Alaska, will affect the work of our own reconstruction and rehabilitation committee, since in each case natural resources are being dealt with?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. My reply to my hon. friend would be that I think each would be toward the other rendering a complementary service. There would be cooperation each with the other, not interference with each other. Doctor McIntosh, who is on the one committee to which I have referred, has also a certain supervision of the work of the committee on reconstruction.

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY

RETURN TO GOLD STANDARD—INQUIRY AS TO CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) asked a question last week with respect to a return to the gold standard and international currency, and inquired whether I would bring down any correspondence there might be with the British government or the government of the United States on the matter. I said I would have to ascertain, first, whether there was correspondence and, second, whether either of the governments or both would be agreeable to having it tabled. I did not at the time think there was any correspondence, and I find I was quite right in that regard. The information I am in a position to give is that there has been no exchange of correspondence. Informal discussions on post-war economic and financial questions have taken place from time to time between Canadian officials and experts from the United Kingdom and the United States, and these discussions will doubtless continue. No commitments have been made by the Canadian government, and no commitments are likely to be made in the near future.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the Prime Minister assure the house that no commitments will be made regarding the restoration of the gold standard, or tying our currency to an international currency of gold, without first referring the matter to the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to be careful about making commitments, but I think I am pretty safe in saying to my hon. friend that no commitments will be made on this particular matter without the house having some advance notice.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 22nd February, 1943, to the end of the present session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: Hon. members will recognize that this motion is identical with one which has been moved at previous sessions of this house since the beginning of this war, and, I might say, is identical in its purpose and intent with similar motions which were moved in this House of Commons at the time of the last war. When Sir Robert Borden's government was in office it was felt desirable that the attention of the house should be given with as much concentration as possible to matters pertaining to the war and with as little diversion from that main purpose as possible. It was thought inadvisable for that reason to have private members' motions occupy the time of what was known as a war session of parliament.

I may say that not only has that practice been followed in this parliament, it has been followed also at Westminster, both in this war and in the last one. In the previous war private members' motions were allowed to stand over until after government business had been fully attended to. During the period of this war both Mr. Chamberlain when he was prime minister and Mr. Churchill as prime minister have introduced similar motions at the different sessions.

On one or two occasions since the house opened, I have referred to the importance of the house giving its time as exclusively as it could to the major business of the session, namely, the country's war effort and the matters immediately pertaining thereto. I would say that there are many reasons which make this procedure more or less obviously imperative. In the first place, there is the time of the house itself to be considered and which must not be diverted more than is necessary from the large questions immediately related to the war. There is also the time of the ministers. They would be obliged to remain in the house while resolutions were being called and particular resolutions were being discussed, obliged to prepare themselves in advance on subjects some of which are more or less, if not in large part, of academic interest or on subjects that might give rise to a good deal in the way of political discussion. A further consideration at this time is the services that are being rendered by members of the public service.

They are all, at least those who are at the head of departments, more or less overburdened with the additional work which has been thrown on their shoulders at this time of war. If they were also obliged to assist in the preparation of information to be used in debate on private members' resolutions, their task would be considerably augmented. I would put as of first importance the impression that would be created throughout the country if our newspapers from week to week were to record that we had had a discussion in this parliament occupying a day on some question such for example as the return to the gold standard or on some of the many other matters that appear in the names of private members.

This motion does not preclude the government at some later stage, if it is thought advisable, from taking up private members' motions; it simply postpones their consideration. As a matter of fact this motion does not go as far as the one that has been passed in the British house. The one at Westminster does not allow the appearance on the order paper of public bills other than those introduced by the government itself.

I think I need not say more on this question. I want to assure private members that there is no desire whatever on the part of the government to interfere in any way with their privileges or to abridge their rights in any way. I would feel that hon. members themselves, for the most part if not in entirety, will agree with the government that it is desirable, this year even more than in preceding years, that this House of Commons should give as much of its undivided attention as is possible to the measures that relate immediately to the war.

Mr. M J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that while I have no objections—I am speaking as a private member—to the government taking the time that is necessary to discuss government business, I do want to register a protest lest this become a part of our procedure. Perhaps the problem could be met by having an agreement in the house that the government may take private members' days when urgent business so requires, but will leave us other private members' days when business is not so urgent. There are occasions when government business lags to some extent, and at such times it seems to me that private members' days should be permitted.

The Prime Minister cited the example of Westminster. May I remind him that the procedure at Westminster is somewhat different. They have opportunities to bring problems to the attention of the government and for brief discussion in the house on the motion for adjournment; we do not have that privilege. With regard to questions, you, sir, are very careful to compel private members to place them on the order paper. At Westminster an hour is given to questions every day. During this period many supplementary questions are asked and problems are presented to the government which really are not properly questions to be answered. In this way many matters are brought before the government by private members.

The order paper contains many important resolutions placed there by private members. Because I anticipated this motion I did not place on the order paper one that I had in mind. Hon. members consider these to be worth while, and it is our opinion that they are not merely of academic interest. We have such subject matters as pensions for widows of enlisted men of the great war; soldiers' life insurance; old age pensions; prairie farm rehabilitation and irrigation; the single transferable vote; fuel resources; farm labour shortage; the development of mineral resources; irrigation projects; wheat; power development; housing and slum clearance; soldier land settlement; agricultural commodity marketing boards; measures for rehabilitation, and so on. As I say, these topics are not of academic interest alone; they are of great public interest and give hon. members an opportunity of doing what there are few opportunities to do, namely, placing before the house the point of view not only of the member but of the people with whom he is in contact.

While I realize the necessity under war conditions of utilizing some private members' days for other pressing purposes, I wish the motion had been to the effect that the government should be empowered to take private members' days when necessary, leaving us with at least the skeleton if not the reality of private members' days.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to this motion, which has the effect of doing away entirely with private members' days for the remainder of this session. While it is true that the government may introduce a motion later to permit the consideration of private members' resolutions, as a result of this present motion no opportunity will be given to any member of this house to use one of his most important prerogatives, namely, the private members' day.

I realize that everything connected with the war should be given precedence at this time, and there is no group more desirous and more cooperative in that regard than His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. But this motion, coming up as it does year after year, is assuming the position of a precedent. I desire to register a protest against what I believe to be an unfair invasion of the right of the private member in this house. I admit the necessity for the precedence of war business and I have shown a willingness to cooperate, but I have noticed one thing in this parliament that is strange. When we and the empire are fighting for the survival of our political and parliamentary institutions, paradoxically enough that is the time when our rights are in many cases being whittled down, with the excuse that the needs of the war make it necessary. Through this motion the Prime Minister gives the members of the house an opportunity to place before him and the government, and through them before the country, a situation which to-day is becoming altogether too prevalent, namely, the loss of the legislative function of this house. Why? —Men and women all over this dominion are asking. Why the sense of frustration which appears to have overwhelmed the members of this house? Why is it, they ask, that the things that should be done are not being done? Why is it that nine-tenths of the vital legislation affecting the welfare of the people of Canada, aside from the exigencies of war and the needs of the moment, is being passed by controllers, administrators and other officials?

The present situation is that often we in parliament have to read the newspapers or listen to the radio to learn of important changes that are taking place in the economic set-up of this dominion. Regulations are being passed day by day which could and should be considered by this parliament, many of them resulting in an unnecessary interference with private rights and too often substituting the caprice of individual controllers for the considered judgment of the members of the House of Commons. Too often our legislative function is overriden by the executive through the passage of orders in council, increasing in volume year by year, until to-day statutes are being abrogated, amended and suspended by order in council—something that is contrary to the principles of representative government for which the Prime Minister has so long contended. It is not altogether confined to the war period; for in 1936, long before the outbreak of this war, the present government suspended the operation of a statute passed by this parliament, the wheat board act, simply by means of an order in council.

Since the war began, parliament has gradually receded in importance until now the position is such that there is little justification for the calling together of parliament, except that the government requires supply and to that end requires to impose taxation. But for purposes other than that, just look at the record on the statute book of last year and then compare it with the booklets which are being issued containing the record of the orders in council which are being passed—and I commend their issuance. Take out from the statute book divorce and other non-vital legislation and you will find that at the present time controllers control and the House of Commons has become an institution where members make speeches but where legislation no longer rests with the representatives of the people.

I ask the Prime Minister—for I know his record in espousing the rights of parliament throughout the years: can there be liberty in this land when controllers have the power to pass and are passing regulations which deny equality under the law, which result in discrimination between members of a class, which deny the right of access to the courts which should be enjoyed by all British subjects and is enjoyed to-day by the people of Great Britain? Even our greatest right—the right of habeas corpus, a right prized by all who appreciate what British justice means—has been done away with, not by act of parliament, but by one of the regulations.

We have come to a position in this country—I do not want to be facetious about it—where there are so many regulations which interfere with economic laws, which overlap one another, which cannot be read consistently one with the other, and which are so impossible even for members of parliament to interpret, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has seen fit to send letters to members of the house to explain, for instance, the rental regulations and to interpret them so that we in turn may be able to interpret to the people of Canada what the law now is as passed by controllers.

I think the time has arrived, Mr. Speaker, when we as members of this house, regardless of political persuasion, should insist on our right and privilege as members of parliament to legislate for the people of Canada, subject of course to the exception that in the interval between sessions circumstances may arise which require orders in council to be passed. Above all I do object to the infringement of economic rights, the interference with the rights of classes by orders in council while parliament is sitting. Surely the government, with its overwhelming majority in the house, can trust the members of parliament to consider legislation that is beneficial and necessary and be assured that it will be passed. On the one hand we are fighting—our men and those who are serving in the forces—for the survival of parliamentary institutions, and I think that we as members of parliament, prizing the responsibility and honour that is ours, have the right to say to the government that it has gone far enough along the road of destroying the rights of parliamentary government in this country and further it shall not go.

Our next duty is to scrutinize the accounts, to assure the people of Canada that the money we vote will be expended fairly and honestly and secure the greatest possible results. Billions we vote and billions are expended; but what examination is there by parliament of the expenditures that are being made? The only body that we have set up for the purpose is the war expenditures committee. We have no opportunity in this chamber to examine the accounts. The estimates come down during the last week or ten days of the session and millions and tens of millions of dollars are voted in a few days without adequate consideration. When we receive the auditor general's report there is no way of breaking down the large figures which it contains.

The war expenditures committee has looked into some expenditures. I do not know exactly how many contracts have been awarded, but the number must be far in excess of 100,000. There were 86,000 last year. The war expenditures committee has been sitting throughout the period between sessions and has devoted itself to its task. I know the work of that committee; I was on it. You cannot touch the fringe in an investigation by that committee. We are supposed to scrutinize the accounts as members of parliament. The committee investigates behind closed doors; it scrutinizes behind closed doors such accounts as come before it; and then, when the matter comes before parliament, the members who comprise the committee have their lips sealed in silence. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether or not we, in allowing that condition to prevail, are discharging our responsibilities. Secrecy might be justified on the ground that to reveal the facts as they are would injure the war effort of this nation and be of benefit to the enemy. I can see no reason why their colleagues cannot be given such information in connection with over-expenditure as may come to the knowledge of the committee.

Secrecy does but one thing under these circumstances. It gives to those who would be wrongdoers, who deal with the government of Canada, through its manifold relations and departments, a false sense of security. I am not making a partisan speech. I am trying to analyse the position of members of this parliament; for on every hand we are criticized that we are not discharging the responsibilities that are ours at this time.

As members we can secure information by asking questions. We have that opportunity on the order paper. I am not saying it is intentional, but it certainly is a coincidence, that some of the questions asked last session, dealing in the main with the situation regarding man-power, remained on the order paper long after they should have been answered. Some of them were directed as returns. Weeks and months passed by before the answers were forthcoming. Orders for returns are held up. Only last week one of the ministers—he is in the house; if he were not I would not have referred to this matter—gave an answer to a question which indicated an attitude of mind that goes much farther than any minister has gone heretofore. On February 15 the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was asked these questions, as reported at page 392 of Hansard. The questions were asked by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe):

1. Has the government taken any steps to prevent irregularities discovered in certain war industries since the beginning of the war?

The material word there is "discovered." The minister's answer was, yes. The second question was:

Has the government employed the services of chartered accountants to inquire into the operations of such companies?

The material word there is "such." The answer was, yes. The third question was:

If so, (a) when, (b) in connection with what companies, (c) with what results?

The answers admit that investigations have taken place. The answers admit that irregularities have been discovered. The answer given by the minister to the third question is this:

It is not in the public interest to give the information.

Is it not in the public interest, when the responsibility rests upon the members of this house to scrutinize expenditures, that information which is known to the government should be given to the members of this house and should not be denied them? And that answer was accepted without protest by the members of the house. We are bound under the rules by the answer that it is not in the public interest to answer. Once the answer is given no further investigation can take place so far as that question is concerned.

If we recognize the right of any member of the government to give us that answer in regard to the important question of the right of parliament to investigate expenditures, then we endanger the existence of the parliamentary system that we believe in. There are three rights—the right to legislate, the right to investigate, the right to examine. All those rights, even from the casual examination I have made, have been abrogated during the period of this parliament. I feel that members irrespective of party have had the same experience, and that we must therefore in this house, as private members, assert our rights to maintain for parliament the legislative function except in so far as the exigencies of war between sessions demand its alteration. We have a right to full and prompt information. In no other way can we hope to maintain the prestige of parliament.

There is a feeling of frustration among members which I think is general in the house. It is not lack of interest on the part of members. As to those who say that members of parliament do not work, I should like them to come to Ottawa and see the industry that is displayed by members of this house both inside and outside the house. We are denied the opportunity to do the things we were sent here to do. Too many people believe, and it is not good for public morale, that parliament is stagnant in its enterprise, sterile in its ideas, and complacent when action is demanded. And, what is worse, they believe that the decisions of caucus are more important in the determination of Canada's policy than are debates in the House of Commons. We as members of this parliament must reassert the right of parliament to do more than vote supply.

So far as private members' days are concerned, the Prime Minister says, properly, that precedence must be given to matters of importance to the war. He mentioned that during the last war the same motion was introduced in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A similar motion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, pardon me; a similar motion. That is true. But in every session of parliament during the last war, private members had their days, and debated the resolutions that they had on the order paper. In 1917 private members debated such matters as pensions fluctuating in accordance with the fluctuations of prices; free entry of tractors; grants to science; the fuel situation, et cetera. In the war parliament one of the rights Sir Robert Borden endeavoured to uphold was the right of private members to express themselves as they have the opportunity to do only in untrammelled debate on their own resolutions on private members' days.

Even in 1918 it was not until March 26 that a resolution was introduced by the Prime Minister granting precedence to government business on two days in the week, Tuesday and Thursday, and it was not until about one month later, April 29, that the precedence was given to all government business. It is a singular circumstance that March 26, 1918, when private members' days were in part abridged, was one of the darkest days in our history, but even at that time the government recognized the rights of private members. A reading of Hansard of that time shows that if the right to private members' days had been interfered with or had been abrogated, there would have been strong criticism from the members of the then opposition.

The Prime Minister stated that in Great Britain they have had no private members' days since the war began. That is correct, but as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) explained, they have a right that we have not. To-day the questions before the orders of the day, and the answers were most interesting. But the ruling ordinarily is, and properly so, that you may ask only questions of current importance and immediate interest, and you cannot continue to examine the minister questioned after his answer is given. In Great Britain a system prevails that I suggest we could adopt here and thus do away with the necessity for private members' days, giving to private members the same opportunity they would have under a resolution—that is that each day an opportunity be given for an hour or so to ask questions of the ministers of the crown in regard to their several departments, and to follow up the answers given with further questions. At Westminster private members have the opportunity of presenting their views to the government on such days as questions are permitted.

To-day Britain's parliament is at its highest level in dignity and importance and prestige. Britain's parliament epitomizes the national will, the national determination and national leadership. I make the appeal that we in this parliament individually endeavour to elevate the prestige of parliament by assuring the people of Canada that we are discharging our responsibilities, and that we have not been derelict in discharging them. The restoration of the prestige of this parliament is a vital issue.

A great deal of the criticism of parliament that one hears is not merited; none the less it exists. How are we to restore the prestige of parliament? Certainly not by formal abdication of any of our historic rights, but rather by an assertion of the independence of members of this house and a determination on the part of private members that a halt be called to the trend that is altogether too noticeable in Canada, and is increasing, almost pyramiding, as we advance through the time of the war, in detracting or subtracting from the rights of the institution of parliament. We in this parliament must put a stop to any further abdication of our rights; for experience has shown that such abdication, though voluntary, may become permanent. If we in this parliament in war time fail to assert and uphold the great principles of responsible government, the principles for which we fight, we stand in danger of losing some of these rights when peace comes.

If the Prime Minister could see his way to altering the resolution so that on the conclusion of necessary war business an opportunity will be given to private members to assert their prerogative rights, this debate and the few remarks I have made would prove to have been worth while. I repeat that I speak in no partisan sense but with a desire to contribute whatever I can to raising the stature and prestige of parliament in time of war and to improving the morale of the Canadian people; for if the Canadian people realize that we are discharging our responsibility it will strengthen their determination to discharge theirs.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is making too sweeping a suggestion when in this fourth year of the war he proposes to sweep away the right of the ordinary member to express the views of his constituency as freely as he may wish to express them. I am told that in England the House of Commons sits continuously. I fail to see why the problems with which Canada has to deal, concerning Canada, should be any less difficult to solve than the problems with which Britain has to deal; and how we can expect to keep in close contact with the progress of affairs in Canada by sitting for only five or six months, while the British house sits throughout the year, I think requires a good deal of explanation.

I know it will be urged that we just have not the time to do all the things we wish to do. The Prime Minister says in effect: Let us get on with the war; let us keep all our attention on the war. I think everyone in this house is anxious to keep his attention on the war and to do everything necessary to further the war effort, but I believe we are falling into a serious error by neglecting what is to happen after the war. Had the Anglo-Saxon race devoted its attention a little more assiduously, in the five years preceding the war, to the matter of preparing for war, we should not have been in the precarious position we occupied during the last two or three years, and we should not be even now in such danger of defeat. In this particular age there is more danger in peace than in war. Everywhere I see indications that there are men who are designing to take away the liberties of mankind. There may be those who will laugh off that idea, but the laugh will be on the other side of their faces by and by, when they find that in their supineness they have allowed precious liberties to be filched away from them. The problems which will confront us after the armistice is signed will be far more serious in every respect than the problems which confront us now; yet up to the present time there has been hardly a half hour devoted to a discussion in this house of the problems of peace. It may be asked, how are we to know what will be the conditions confronting us when peace does come? My reply is, how were we to know what conditions would confront us after war was declared? Surely he who completely neglected provision for the war would have been well nigh a traitor to his country; and I say that those men in this house who sit on the government benches and neglect adequate preparation for the peace are in grave danger of becoming traitors to their country.

What are we going to do about it? I fail to see how we can do anything by closing this parliament early and going home. If this parliament really governs this country; if this is really a democracy, surely we should be about the business of discussing and governing. Let me point out several of the deficiencies which are apparent to me in the conduct of our affairs. I believe this is my eighth year here, and I should like to mention some of the things on which I believe we are going wrong.

While the war is proceeding I find no means whatsoever by which members of this house may review the rulings of the various boards that infest and afflict this country. Surely if anyone should review those rules and amend or commend them, as may be found desirable, it should be the members of this house; and if the members of this house do not do it, how is it ever to be done? This parliament must devise a method of checking up on the rulings of the various boards whose actions in many cases lead me to suspect that they consist largely of irresponsible people. Sometimes I fear we have a whole group of doctrinaire playboys at work on some of these boards, drunk with the power they have been given. Yet this house has no way of checking or reviewing what is going on, or of exercising influence to prevent abuses from taking place.

Here is something else which confounds me. We have several commissions in this country, as for example the railway commission. On one occasion I ventured to suggest that the board of transport commissioners, as it is now called, was hardly conducting affairs as it ought, and I was given the impression that I had stepped into a sanctum sanctorum, a place forbidden, something like this "other place" we cannot talk about in this house. And while I am on that I want to say that I think it is an outrage that members of this house cannot refer with perfect freedom to that other chamber, and discuss what is going on there; and it seems to me that if members of this house cannot be fully informed concerning the operation of the various commissions in this country, and cannot exercise a controlling hand over them, then we have abdicated a power which parliament should possess. Yet we simply cannot afford the time to discuss any matters at all here except those which the government consider fit for us to discuss. We are treated as children, little boys who must not know too much. We may do naugthy things if we know too much. We are not mature, we members of parliament. And as for the idea of letting the ordinary common man in Canada know about these important things which will affect every aspect of his life for the next generation, why, that would never do! He is not mature; he is not grown up or capable of forming sound judgment. How nonsensical that sounds; and all this talk about things not being in the public interest; all this suppression of public discussion in the house would seem to indicate that hon. members are not qualified to help govern this country, or that the people who sent us here are not qualified to form their own opinions.

Then there is another matter which ought to be remedied at once. There were provincial rights allowed for in the British North America Act. A good many people in Canada seem to be getting the idea that the provinces were supposed to cease to exist about the time they joined confederation. They were sovereign states before they joined, but since that time it seems to have been the consistent policy of Ottawa to weaken and destroy the rights of the provinces. Now I ask, where should the autonomy and the rights of the provinces be defended and carefully safeguarded if not in this house? Hon. members come from the various provinces, yet how often do we hear in this chamber a discussion concerning the preservation of provincial rights. It seems to me this matter ought to be given the fullest and most serious discussion. If we have arrived at a point in our history when it is unsafe to allow sovereign states, as the provinces were before they joined confederation, to exercise a full share in the governing of this country, then we all ought to know that that is so and we should be told why it is so. My own opinion is that democracy in Canada will be best preserved by full recognition of provincial rights.

I should like to see these matters discussed in the house. We have no opportunity to do it. We have now been at war three years and are into the fourth year, and during that time there have been things done with respect to the provinces which have rendered them in many respects impotent. We have seen great provinces practically taken out into the woodshed and spanked for attempting to exercise the powers which were conferred upon them by the British North America Act; and what recourse have they? Only to their own individual protests. And this house, where their cause should be defended, is not giving any time for the defence of their rights.

We have a most regrettable example within the last two or three days—the outburst from Ontario. It may be supposed that there is no fire where all the smoke is, but I am inclined to think that there is plenty of fire. We ought to be going into these matters to protect provincial autonomy, but how are we going to do it if we are to be deprived of the right of free discussion here? The only opportunity we have is in the debate on the speech from the throne and in the budget debate.

I should like to refer a little further to this question of "not in the public interest". I have heard that expression until it positively nauseates me. I know it is used in Great Britain, and it is used there far too freely. "Not in the public interest!" Imagine anything more disgusting to be said to a group of members of parliament. It may be that there are many things in the conduct of a nation's affairs which it is not advisable to make generally known throughout the country. But surely there should be provision for secret sessions, or for conferences of one kind or another, as a result of which all the essential facts pertaining to this country could be made known to every member of this house; and if it be found that any hon. member is unworthy of the trust which is placed upon him, unfit for the responsibility he carries, let him be dealt with as his constituency may see fit. But certainly all facts should be known by the members, or at least by the leaders, so that they can be given to the members.

We in Canada do not know where we are now. The ordinary individual throughout the country simply does not know what the position is, and the majority of the members of this house do not know. The second answer that the Prime Minister gave to the questions regarding the gold standard asked by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was much more satisfactory than the first. But we read of proposals of federal union and "union now"; we hear an insistent propaganda about "united nations". I wonder why we are called "the united nations" this time, instead of "the allies", as in the last war. What does all this mean? Are we to imagine that it is accidental? What lies behind the statements of Sir Kingsley Wood with regard to an international currency and several other things? Does he just talk in his sleep when he makes remarks of that sort? What does all this mean? What do we in this house know about it? The average run of us knows pretty nearly nothing, which causes us to suspect that something pretty unsuitable is being prepared for us, something so unsavoury and unsightly that the men who are conceiving it dare not allow it to be generally known. We see articles in the Readers' Digest and other publications which indicate what is in the minds of some of the men who are prominent in the conduct of our affairs.

I say that if we are worthy of the name of members of parliament we ought to know about these matters. How are we to learn about them if we have not freedom of discussion? I want to know something about where we are going. Really we do not know what we are doing, because the kind of thing we hear from the government benches, and what we learn when we get out in the country, where things are actually taking place, seem to be altogether different. The whole result is to fill us with anxiety, because we are not taken into confidence and given to understand where we are going. Even though we cannot foresee what will happen day by day so far as the war is concerned, we could at least be told at what we are aiming.

I contend also that the various constituencies have a right to have their views expressed, and we should have some private members' days in order that that can be done. I suggest to the Prime Minister that some such plan as this might be worked out. I do not intend to go into details; but why not set a week, say in every three, four, or five weeks, in which the private member would have the opportunity of expressing himself? That would be playing square with the members. If we were unable to finish government business by the time at which it was desired to adjourn, the time could be extended. Why not have a temporary modification of our rules so that while private members are discussing resolutions and other matters the length of time they are permitted to speak would be reduced? An agreement might be reached by hon. members that, upon resolutions other than government business, no member could speak more than twenty minutes or perhaps ten minutes. I am certain that if we were to go to work on the problem with good will, with the desire to make our proceedings here efficient and satisfactory, we could solve this difficulty.

I have said a little more, probably, than I intended, but I think I have made it clear that I am far from satisfied regarding this matter of dispensing with private members' days. I believe this is the first occasion on which I have spoken at length on this topic, but my wrath has been accumulating during the years. I did not object to our rights being suspended for one year or two years, but when it begins to look as though the system will continue for a decade, it is high time we took account of ourselves.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): From the tenor of the remarks which have been made this afternoon, I gather that, while the leaders of the different parties have each felt that they must say something about preserving the rights of hon. members, they are more or less in accord with the government giving precedence to government business, at least for a time. That, after all, is the extent of the motion which I have moved this afternoon and which reads:

> That on and after Monday the 22nd February, 1943, to the end of the present session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

I am simply asking for precedence in the matter of the most important business of the country, which is the government measures relating to the war. If those measures are discussed adequately before too many months go by I see no reason why we could not make arrangements to set apart a day or two for some of the motions that appear in the names of private members and give hon. members an opportunity to discuss them. I stated at the beginning of last session that that privilege might be granted before the end of the session, but by the time we had reached the end of the session—we had had six months of it—I think most hon. members were more anxious to get back to their constituencies than they were to sit here to discuss private members' resolutions. The house is at all times master of its own business and this year will be no exception in that particular.

The government must take account of the world situation as it sees it. My. hon. friend suggests that we fix two or three days each month, but those two or three days might happen to be the worst days that our country may experience as matters may develop in the course of this war. If then we had set apart those particular days for a discussion of private members' resolutions the government would be held at fault for not having had a clearer vision of what was likely to take place at a time like the present.

I can assure hon. members that so far as the government's desire to get ahead with public business is concerned, that rises from a very deep sense of the seriousness of the world situation as it has developed at this time. I doubt if any of us have begun to appreciate the ordeal which this country and our armed forces may have to pass through before this year is out. So far as members of the government are concerned we are anxious that before we reach a period when our minds as well as our hearts may be filled with suffering we shall get through some of the large financial and other measures which ought to be passed as rapidly as possible. That is the reason for desiring to give precedence for government business at this time.

With respect to private members' resolutions and their relating to matters of academic interest, I did not say that all were of academic interest; I said that some were. My hon. friend, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), mentioned some of the matters covered by the private members' resolutions; he referred to rehabilitation, soldiers' pensions and other subjects. There will be ample opportunity during this session, as there has been in other sessions, to discuss these matters. We are going to have a special committee this year, as we had last year, on rehabilitation and reconstruction. Surely when the report of that committee is before us or when the committee is dealing with the problems referred to it there will be opportunity for members interested in that subject to see that their views are amply presented.

My hon. friend referred to wheat. Already during the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne there has been considerable discussion of matters pertaining to wheat. Another subject referred to was labour supply. A good part of the debate has also related to labour supply questions. This house has already discussed in some measure almost every one of the subjects that appear under private members' resolutions; not all, but a great many of them.

Let me go a step further. It is very easy to say that hon. members do not get a chance to discuss this, or that they do not get a chance to discuss that, or like my hon. friend, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore), to say that we do not know where we are, we do not know where we are going and we do not know where we came from. May I say to my hon. friend that those are more theological than political problems.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not ask where we came from.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mention this only to illustrate that there are some subjects to which we ought to give more attention than to others. As my hon. friend has just said, a question like that of the origin of the species is not so much a matter for this parliament as it may be for other assemblies. It is quite easy to mention a variety of subjects and say that the house has had no chance to discuss them; it is quite easy to have that impression go out to the country, but it is not a correct impression.

There is not one single subject in the nature of a grievance which cannot be discussed, if an hon. member wishes to discuss it, when this house goes into committee of supply. My hon. friend is usually careful with some of his statements, but he has said that this house has no chance to discuss grievances except during the speech from the throne debate and the debate on the budget. He left out the one provision above all others which exists, the right of this house and the right of all parliaments following British procedure to decide that no money shall be voted to the government until there has been a chance for hon. members to discuss their grievances. He knows as I know that every time that the government wishes to get any money with which to carry on the war it has to move to go into committee of supply. If he has a grievance he can bring it up at that time and have it discussed. There should be an end to the talk that there is no chance to discuss grievances because the government is anxious to get on with its business, when such an opportunity is given, not only on going into committee of supply but also as well when there is a motion for the house to resolve itself into a committee of ways and means.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that some of the sittings of the war expenditures committee were held in secret and that the members of that committee, being pledged to secrecy, must not discuss certain matters in the house. May I say first of all to my hon. friend that his speech might have been more appropriately delivered when we come to discuss the setting up of the committee on war expenditures. I do not take exception to his bringing up the matter to-day, but as I say I think it would have been more appropriate at that time. May I point out to my hon. friend with respect to the secrecy which is supposed to be maintained in connection with the information obtained in secret sessions that because the war expenditures committee holds its sittings in secret its members are able to bring before them officers of the government and to obtain fuller information than would be possible to get in any other way.

There are many matters in connection with which, if it were required that they be discussed publicly in the first instance, it might be necessary for the government to say, "we do not know what the answer to this question may be; it may be something that will disclose information to the enemy, therefore the question must not be pressed." But when the committee is holding its sittings in secret it has a chance of getting information that it could not get in as complete a manner if the discussions were in the open.

Mr. COLDWELL: The right hon. gentleman has used the phrase "in secret". Is there any difference so far as hon. members are concerned between sitting in secret and sitting in camera?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is probably my loose way of speaking; in camera would be the correct expression.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there not a difference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I still would have to look into that. In my own mind a secret session is a session in camera; if one is sitting in camera or sitting in secret, it conveys the same idea to me. I have no doubt that there is a shade of difference between the two, but my hon. friend will appreciate that my main point is that it is possible to obtain full information in camera, or at a secret meeting, when it would not be if the inquiry were held in the open.

If in the course of those investigations which are held in camera it is found that there is some transaction which will not stand the light of day and it is in the interests of the country to have it exposed, there is the public accounts committee before which anything can be brought which reflects upon expenditures made by the state, and there the fullest information can be brought out. There are no restrictions on that right. Let me make that perfectly clear. All these statements that the government is hiding this and hiding that—that there are transactions here and transactions there concerning which the members cannot get information—charges that the government is doing things secretly and clandestinely and preventing the public from having full information—all this comes to naught so long as we have a public accounts committee and so long as members are free to call that committee together and to have referred any question of wrongful expenditure which they wish to have investigated before that committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Suppose that in the course of the proceedings of one of the subcommittees of the war expenditures committee a member becomes aware of a state of affairs which he believes should be brought to the attention of parliament, and that bringing it before parliament would not in any way benefit the enemy. Is that member permitted to refer to that evidence to this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand. It all depends on the evidence. There are some things which in the opinion of one person might at a time of war do no injury to the country as a whole if made public, while others might feel that a statement made on that particular matter might do a great deal of harm at a particular time. May I say this, that no government in the world has had the same experience in dealing with war expenditures as the British government, and when our government was called upon to form a committee to deal with war expenditures we felt that we could not do a wiser thing than to follow as closely as we could the procedure that was adopted at Westminster. In all particulars we have done that. The procedure followed at Westminster, with the agreement of all parties, has been followed here, realizing that it has worked out in a way that will protect the public interest and not lead, on the one side, to information not being disclosed which should be disclosed, and on the other, to things being disclosed which should not be disclosed. My hon. friend has been on the war expenditures committee, and he knows that there may be some things that are, let us say, wrong. The whole purpose of having the committee formed was just for that. No member of parliament—I do not care which side of the house he is on—is going to learn of something with respect to war expenditures that is contrary to the public interest and then try to conceal that thing; but I think every member will try to see that the right way and the right time is taken to have the disclosure made. That is the purpose of the committee on war expenditures. Some matters should be reported to the government at once privately. I think I made that statement when the committee was being set up, and no exception was taken to it. There may be things done of which the government has no knowledge whatever and which it should have brought to its attention immediately, and I would say it is the duty of every member of a committee on war expenditures, if he learns of a situation of the kind, to inform the government or the minister of the department particularly affected at once so that we may have a chance to look into the matter and see what has taken place at the earliest moment and before some exposure is made which might do more harm than good. There is in these matters a right time and a right means of going about getting a proper adjustment.

My hon. friend spoke a moment ago of some matter which has been the subject of a trial recently. He said that he was getting tired of hearing it said that it was not in the public interest to disclose certain matters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He took exception to its being said that it was not in the public interest.

Mr. GRAYDON: That had reference to a question in the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Nothing to do with the case before the courts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was an answer to a question put in the house about a subject, as I understood at the time, that was related to a matter under investigation by the courts. I may be wrong in that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not my understanding. It does not read that way

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may not have caught exactly what my hon. friend said.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The question was whether any investigations had been made. Investigations are being made quite frequently. At that time there was taking place in Montreal a criminal trial which occupied the courts for some days and resulted in the conviction of four officers of a subcontracting firm.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that the only case which has been investigated for irregularities?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; but when investigations are being made and it is considered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that it would be hampering to give them any publicity, and when an investigation has been made and it has developed that nothing reprehensible has been ascertained, it is considered that it would be unfair to state publicly that such and such a person or concern had been under investigation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But if something reprehensible is found and no prosecution takes place?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then instructions are given to take the proper proceedings. In this particular case where irregularities were found, proceedings were instituted which resulted in the conviction of four officers, who are at present out on bail awaiting sentence, which the judge announced would be pronounced on March 2. In that connection further investigations are being made about things which are suspected of having been done in the course of the trial.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend and colleague for supplementing and explaining the point I had in mind at the time.

Much has been said in this discussion today about the British parliament and the exemplary procedure there. I recall that when the debate on the address opened my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) told us that he had had the privilege—and I think possibly he had it along with my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—of being in the British house when a debate on the address was taking place which lasted only something like two hours. The hon. member was there in the morning and the debate was over in the afternoon.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not quite that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he said it was all over in one day.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said that we heard the mover and the seconder, the Prime Minister and the leaders of two groups all in the course of two hours.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All the important ones.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I was going to add, we do not find that example followed here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the British house the debate on the address, certainly during this period of war, lasts only two or three days and they consider they have had a pretty full discussion when some fifteen members have spoken in the debate. The debate on the address here, with slight interruption, has gone on now for almost a month, and in the course of that time 101 members have spoken, and spoken on almost every subject that can be thought of as of immediate concern. Is it any wonder that the government with the Minister of Finance, being anxious to get his budget before the people of this country so that they will know exactly where they are at with respect to the taxes they will be obliged to pay, and equally anxious to bring down his war appropriation measure because the country is more interested in having provision made for the carrying on of the war than in anything else, and when there are other measures also important to be brought down—is it any wonder that the government should ask for precedence for its measures before another long discussion such as often arises on private members' resolutions?

The hon. leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) again made another statement where he slipped a bit. He said: When the British house is sitting all the time, why should we not be sitting all the time here? I thought my hon. friend had a better memory. I gave the house last year a statement of the sittings of the British house in comparison with the sittings of this house. It was a carefully prepared statement taken from the records, and what did it show? It showed that as a matter of fact this parliament had sat more days, a longer period of time, than the British house. Does my hon. friend know that at the present time the British house sits for only three days a week, and that only at intervals? Does he know that during the period of the blackout the British house hardly ever sits at night? Does he realize that the sessions are very brief on many occasions? Those are the facts, and yet at Westminster they manage, as my hon. friend says, with all the great world problems they have to deal with, to get through with them in a shorter period of time than we take to get through ours. Let me give the facts as I find them in Hansard on June 5, 1942, and as they appear at page 3101:

From May 21, 1940, to November 20, 1940, the British parliament had in all sixty-two sitting days. Our parliament in the complete session from May 16, 1940, to November 5, 1940, had sixty-one sitting days. The British parliament in a like period of time took one day longer than this parliament to transact its business; I think my hon. friend and all hon. members will agree that the British parliament has a much vaster programme to cover, that the questions coming up from day to day are in degree at least, if not in kind, very much more significant than some we have to consider here. For the year following, during the complete session from November 21, 1940 to November 11, 1941, the British parliament sat 113 days in all. Here, in the complete session, from November 7, 1940 to January 21, 1942, the Canadian parliament sat during 105 days. Let me give those figures again. For the first year there were sixty-two sitting days in England as against sixty-one here. The following year, which was last year, there were 113 sitting days in Britain as against 105 in Canada. Now I come to this year. Since November 12, 1941, up to the present, the British parliament has sat for seventy-seven days. Our parliament, beginning only on January 22, not on November 12 as the British parliament did, has up to to-day sat for eighty days. In other words, we have in this time of war thus far sat this year three days longer than has the British House of Commons.

I do say that, apart altogether from the facts, it is a great mistake to estimate the amount of service which parliament renders by the length of time that members are sitting in their places in this house. It is not the length of time they are seated; it is what hon. members say in the time they are standing. That is the important thing, and I submit that hon. members can make a much greater contribution to the effectiveness of debate by giving a good deal of time, when they are outside this House of Commons altogether, to the preparation of what they are going to say and to its condensation, and bringing the discussion to a point, than they can make by forming their judgments while discussions are in progress. It is not a matter of the numbers of words; it is the value of ideas expressed and the conviction they carry with them. That, however, is, I think, obvious.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has spoken about orders in council that are passed, and also about the different controls there are, the restrictions, the number of boards and the like. I do not believe there is anyone in this parliament who wishes more, with all his heart, that we could get rid of ninety per cent of the boards and one hundred per cent of some of the restrictions, than I myself. But unfortunately we are in a time of war when problems have become so large that it is not possible for the ministry as a ministry to take upon itself the administration of the many different functions, several of them wholly new—for example, the control of prices and the like—that have come up in the course of the war. These powers have to be delegated in some way to boards, but that does not mean that the ministry gives up responsibility. Unfortunately the ministry is responsible for everything that the boards do, and it is a pretty nasty responsibility on some occasions. Human nature is much the same everywhere. We have to be careful, first of all, in our selection of men, and where they make mistakes, if they do make mistakes, we must change them and try to get others who are better. But I do not think that any system of government can be devised in a time of war which, if the affairs of the country are to be properly carried on, will leave the whole burden of administration on the ministry itself and not have a considerable portion of it delegated.

As regards the numbers of orders in council, there again I think it is a false index to estimate by numbers what is being done by order in council as against what is done by parliament in legislation, because every one of these orders in council has been passed under some authority given by parliament in the first instance; and parliament, which has given that authority, can modify it or take it away at any time. It is true that a minority cannot do that, but after all the minority have not the responsibility of governing. The responsibility of governing has been put upon the majority by the people. A great many of these orders in council are more in the nature of records, to make sure that everything that can possibly be kept of record will be kept of record, than they are of ordinances in the way of new legislation. And, as my hon. friend has pointed out, fairly, these orders all come before the house and are capable of being reviewed by hon. members.

I might say more on this motion but since I am anxious to have it carry I think I had better stop.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONSTITUENCY OF STANSTEAD—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF QUESTION OF ORDERING NEW WRIT OF ELECTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That pursuant to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, which on the twenty-ninth of June, 1942, annulled for illegal practices by agents the election of Robert Greig Davidson for the electoral district of Stanstead, and in view of section 71 of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, the standing committee on privileges and elections be instructed to consider whether the house should order a new writ for an election in the said electoral district.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a brief observation or two to make on the Prime Minister's motion, and perhaps, in prefacing my remarks, I should give the house some information regarding what has developed previously with respect to this matter. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, in connection with this election case, found corrupt practices and these corrupt practices were sufficient to void the election. Section 50 of chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, volume 2, states that, in the circumstances abovementioned, "the election of such candidate, if he has been elected, shall be void."

In Canadian Law Reports, 1942 S.C., part V, page 319, Mr. Justice Hudson of the supreme court, hearing a motion for a stay of proceedings in this case, reviewed the steps taken. I want at this time to give to the house these particular steps as indicated in outline by the learned justice on that occasion. Mr. Justice Hudson said:

This is a motion for a stay of proceedings pending an application to the judicial committee of the privy council for special leave to appeal from a judgment of this court.

On June 26 (1942) judgment was given by this court reversing a judgment of the trial judges and holding that the election of the respondent to the House of Commons for Canada should be annulled. It also awarded to the petitioners the costs of their petition throughout.

On June 30, 1942, the registrar of this court certified to Your Honour as Speaker of the House of Commons the judgment and decision of the court pursuant to the provisions of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, which he cites. On the said June 30 the Speaker of the House of Commons communicated to the House of Commons the report and certificate of this court as required by the provisions of section 70 of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act. On July 3, 1942, notice of this motion, the motion for a stay of proceedings, was served on the Speaker of the House of Commons and on the agent for the appellant's solicitors. I may say that the motion made before Mr. Justice Hudson was dismissed.

Sections 68, 69 and 70 of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act are set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Hudson. Section 71 of that act reads as follows:

When the trial judges or the Supreme Court of Canada in their report on the trial of an election petition under this act, state that corrupt or illegal practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the petition relates, or that they are of opinion that the inquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, and that further inquiry as to whether corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed is desirable, no new writ shall issue for a new election in such cases except by order of the House of Commons.

That brings us down to the position where this motion is now moved. When this section speaks of the report of the Supreme Court of Canada it evidently means the judgment, and that is all that has been communicated to the Speaker and by the Speaker to the house. This section, however, says that no new writ shall issue for an election in such cases except by order of the House of Commons.

The point I wish to make at this moment is this, that the whole matter as to whether or not a writ of election shall issue is plainly before this house. I should like very much to have the Prime Minister explain to the house why it is necessary, on a matter which seems so very simple, to have a committee of the house appointed and set up to deal with it. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the proper thing for the government to have done and for him to have launched was a very simple resolution inviting the house to order that a writ be issued, so that we would not have before us at this time the necessity of referring the matter to the privileges and elections committee.

Having reviewed very briefly the steps that led up to the position in which we now find ourselves, I should like the Prime Minister to explain why this procedure is taken instead of the procedure I suggested a moment ago.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to speak briefly on this motion, because I think the procedure, which I understand is an ancient procedure established by precedent and usage rather than by law, is one which probably has deprived a constituency in this country of actual membership in this House of Commons for a considerable length of time. I believe that the house itself decided some years ago that every facility should be given to a constituency when a vacancy occurs, to elect a member. Technically there is no vacancy, I understand, until our own committee has heard the matter and made a recommendation to this house and the house has acted upon that recommendation. I rose mainly to suggest that this may deprive a constituency of membership and representation in this house for a much longer period of time than this house, when the matter was before it some years ago, considered was either necessary or good.

I was looking up, not the law, but rather the practice as laid down on page 234 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, and if hon. members will refer to the rule and the explanatory paragraph accompanying it, it will be found, according to standing order 79:

> If it shall appear that any person hath been elected and returned a member of this house, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this house will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

The explanatory note, paragraph 820, states:

> This standing order has nothing to do with the different laws which fully provide for the trial and punishment of corrupt practices at elections, but it reiterates the house's privilege to deal with offences of bribery and corruption after they have been proved before the competent courts.

Then, after setting forth some of the corrupt practices, it states:

> . . . the house has taken such measures as were required by law or usage or as appeared suitable to the occasion. It has been usual in such cases to order a copy of the judgment delivered by the judge and the minutes of evidence to be laid before the house.

I believe that procedure was followed in July. I wonder whether in view of parliament's desire some years ago a method should be provided to prevent a vacancy from being prolonged because of an ancient usage, if I may put it in that way. While we should protect the privileges of the house and of members of this house, I think that when a competent court has gone into all the evidence in connection with a charge of corruption and has rendered its verdict, sustaining the charge, the seat should be declared vacant and the electors of that constituency given an opportunity to elect a new member to succeed one whose practices or, as in this case, whose agents were declared corrupt by the court.

I believe there is another ancient phase of this usage or law, into which I do not propose to go. I have seen it suggested that a constituency might be penalized by becoming ineligible to elect another member during the lifetime of this parliament. If that is the situation, then the sooner we face it the better, because to punish—for that is what it is, if we regard this parliament as we should regard it—all the people of a constituency for an offence committed by a candidate or by a few persons who surrounded the candidate is a penalty which I think should not be imposed upon a group of people of Canada in this age. We are following that usage now, but I would suggest that at some time the procedure for dealing with the matter of elections be considered and new rules laid down. Certainly I do not think any advantage should be taken of any loophole in the law which might be construed in such a way as to give a constituency a further sentence, to deny it the right of representation in this parliament to which it ought to be entitled. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and hon. members who were responsible for the revision of the election laws a few years ago would not desire to see any further penalty imposed upon the constituency of Stanstead. That was really what I wished to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and the house, and I should like him to make some comment upon it.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): As a member of the committee on privileges and elections and also a member of the committee that revised the elections act some years ago, I am rather at a loss to know what to say on this occasion. In this parliament, as in other parliaments in the past, we have a number of lawyers, and I consider that they have sadly neglected the rights of the people of Canada by permitting the present roundabout procedure to remain in the act. Of course it may be that it is because we have so many lawyers in the house that the act has been allowed to stand as it is at the present time. I am just an ordinary member of this house and not a lawyer; perhaps, therefore, I have something to be thankful for and some sins for which I shall not have to answer hereafter, but I should like to see the act clarified in such a way that the constituency of Stanstead or any other constituency will again not be penalized in this way. I do not believe that the hon. member who has been ousted from this house was directly responsible for what occurred, but because he is supposed to be responsible for the sins committed by those working for him, the present situation has resulted. Personally I should like to see the rights of the people protected to a greater extent than they are at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has asked me why the government is referring this matter to the committee on privileges and elections at this time, and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has asked me if we are using all possible expedition to see that the constituency of Stanstead, which is without a member in this house at the present time, is not unduly penalized in the matter of not being represented here.

I think I can answer both questions in one statement. This matter came before the house from His Honour Mr. Speaker on July 25, 1942; that was the first intimation the house received with respect to the judgment of the supreme court in the matter of the election at Stanstead. July 25 was a Saturday, very shortly before the adjournment of the house. At that time I consulted the proper authorities as to the course that should be pursued, and I was informed that the matter should go to the committee on privileges and elections. I so informed the house, and no exception was taken, so the matter was referred to the committee. Therefore one of the reasons that has caused me to take the action I am now taking in moving this resolution was that this house has already resolved that this question should go to the committee on privileges and elections. Unfortunately the committee did not meet before the adjournment or during the recess. At the opening of the house this year I indicated that I would take advantage of the earliest opportunity to see that the matter was referred anew to the committee on privileges and elections to be established, and that is what I am doing now without waiting even until the address has been agreed to.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would it not have been possible, even in the short time that was left last session, for this matter to have been dealt with by the committee on privileges and elections?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That I cannot say, but apparently the committee was not called to consider the matter. It, I think, came before the house only five days prior to adjournment, at a time when, as the Hansard to which I have referred would indicate, we were sitting morning, afternoon and evening, on Saturdays as well as other days. It may not have been considered possible or desirable to attempt to hold a meeting at the time. However, that was the responsibility of the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was too late in the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think it was.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not complaining about the committee. I am suggesting that the usage is rather out of date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps that is a matter which the committee itself may wish to discuss when this question is referred to it. Since my hon. friend the leader of the opposition referred only to the last part of the proceedings which were before the supreme court, I wish to point out this case related to the election of Mr. Davidson as member for Stanstead, and that when the case first arose it went to one of the Quebec courts, which I suppose would be called the trial court. Like my hon. friend the member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) I am not a lawyer, and I am not too sure of some of these terms. However, I believe a petition was presented to the court by someone representing the defeated candidate. That court consisted of two judges, and at that time the case was dismissed, the two judges concurring in the decision. Evidently they were nearer the scene of the contest and more familiar with what had taken place on both sides than were some others. Then an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister what he means by that last statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mean that we all have a little more intimate knowledge of things nearer home than others have who are further away.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might that not be taken as a reflection on the supreme court?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no; that has reference only to the sagacity of the two judges who heard the case and who had before them all the local facts.

Mr. BOUCHER: "Judged by the length of the chancellor's foot."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was equity rather than law, I suppose. At any rate I should like to add this further word, that when the case came before the supreme court an effort was made on behalf of Mr. Davidson to obtain permission to take an appeal to the judicial committee of the privy council, but the supreme court did not consent to that course. I mention these things to make perfectly clear Mr. Davidson's position in the whole matter. As the hon. member for Battle River said, I think very kindly and rightly, there was nothing in any of the decisions which reflected on Mr. Davidson's integrity because after all, as I think hon. members will agree, he was one of the most highly respected members of this house. But it was a case of where some of those who perhaps were over enthusiastic as supporters in the campaign had done some things which the supreme court says they should not have done.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think, having regard to the judgment, those words are a trifle mild.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I do not know much about elections in Quebec. At any rate the decision is as indicated, and the matter is now being referred, I am happy to say by agreement of the house, to the committee on privileges and elections.

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW REGULATIONS AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a select committee of this house, consisting of the following members: Messrs. Bertrand (Laurier), Black (Yukon), Claxton, Dupuis, Hansell, Hazen, McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), Martin, Maybank, Michaud, McGeer, Noseworthy, Ross (Calgary), Slaght, Stirling, be appointed to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation) 1941 and amendments thereto; with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses under oath; and to report their opinions and observations from time to time to the house.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before this motion is put, I should like to say a word or two. I had the honour to be a member of the committee which sat last year. It made its report on July 23. The report appears in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for that day.

During its sittings last year the committee went to a great deal of pains to deal with the particular matters which were brought before it. Twenty-six meetings were held; a great many witnesses were heard and many representations received. Many of these representations were on behalf of the communist party and a number of other organizations which, I believe, had been banned on account of communist affiliation. Unfortunately the adoption of the report was not moved in the house and there was no opportunity of debating it last session. Before the house adjourned I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) what the intentions of the government were with regard to implementing the recommendations of the report, particularly as to lifting the ban on the communist party. The minister's answer did not appear very satisfactory. In any event, no regard has been paid to the recommendations. It is true that, so far as I know, all the communists who were interned at that time have been released, but it seems to me that they were released under circumstances which could and would have been avoided if the recommendations of the committee had been adopted. However, the ban of illegality against the communist party is still maintained. Unlike many hon. members I am not versed in the law, but I fail to understand why the ban on the communist party should not have been lifted. The party was not illegal in this country, at least there were no legal restrictions on its activities, prior to some time in June, 1940, when it was declared illegal; and from all the information I have been able to gather, this action was taken on account of its opposition to the war.

The reason why I voted for the raising of the ban on the communist party was not that I am in accord with its policies, but that, since it had given up its opposition to the war the reason for keeping its members interned had disappeared and the party was back where it was before June, 1940. It seems to me that it would have been much better to remove the ban and put them on the same footing as they were prior to June, 1940, and I hope that either this will be done at an early date or that the house will have good reasons to the contrary.

The recommendation regarding the communist party was only one of a number of recommendations made by the committee. With regard to other organizations which had been declared illegal and whose members were prosecuted as a result of the activities they carried on, our report reads:

That subparagraph "a" of paragraph 1 of regulation 39C be amended by striking therefrom: Technocracy Incorporated, Jehovah's Witnesses, Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, International Bible Students Association, Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society Incorporated.

I understand that the three last mentioned are publishing organizations. Since this house opened, information has been placed in my hands that although the committee recommended that the ban of illegality be lifted from Jehovah's Witnesses, these people are still being prosecuted for being members of Jehovah's Witnesses. The committee was unanimously in favour of raising the ban on this particular sect, and no evidence was put before the committee by the Department of Justice which indicated that at any time Jehovah's Witnesses should have been declared an illegal organization, nor did the representatives of the department raise any objection to the recommendation made by the committee. Since coming to Ottawa, as I said, I have found that these people are still being prosecuted. Their homes are being raided and literature which they have had for ten years is being seized. There have been cases where literature forming part of private libraries has been seized, which I think is forbidden by the law. I am not versed in the law and I do not want to be, but I am told that a private library is not subject to seizure; it is only literature that is held in quantity for either sale or distribution which is subject to such action.

One case brought to my attention is that of a man named Sherwin at Cobourg, Ontario. This man's home was raided and literature which he had had in his home for ten years was seized. He was tried and convicted under sections 217 and 262 of the Customs Act. Surely a man should not be asked to say ten years later how literature had come into his possession. I doubt if many of us could remember where we got a certain book or a certain pamphlet which had been in our libraries for a number of years. I know that some years ago when certain books were declared illegal I bought as many as I could find the money with which to buy them.

In North Bay a man named William Everitt was having a hearing as a conscientious objector. In the course of his examination by the military tribunal he was asked if he was a Jehovah's Witness, and he said he was. He was then arrested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the charge of being a member of an illegal organization and was sentenced to three months in gaol. A man who appeared for this organization before the committee last year, Mr. Morrell, told me that he had rented a room in his home to a woman. She went to Cleveland to attend a convention of Jehovah's Witnesses and brought back some bibles. He told me that the Department of National Revenue informed the mounted police that she had brought these books with her. Her room was raided. But they were not content with raiding her room; they raided the rest of the house and seized several books and pamphlets which Mr. Morrell had in his possession. Not only that, they seized the brief which he had placed before the defence of Canada regulations committee during its sittings last year, or perhaps I should say the material used in preparing the brief.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Had he submitted it to the committee?

Mr. MacINNIS: He had submitted it and had kept a copy, or the original. Evidently the mounted police were interested and they took it away. He told me that he has since signed a legal form to have his property returned to him. A date for a hearing was set, but after a consultation between the magistrate and the mounted police the hearing was postponed and he does not know to this day whether this material will be returned.

It seems to me that there is little use in setting up a committee of responsible members of this house to deal with questions of this kind if the government or parliament is not going to give more consideration to its report than was given to the report made by the committee of last year. It is a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada that people should be prosecuted for their religious convictions in the way in which these poor people have been prosecuted. If a committee is set up this year, I hope that the first thing it will do will be to ascertain why no attention was paid to the recommendations made last year, that is, unless the house is informed before then. I do not think I have anything further to say except that I enjoyed my work on the committee. The members were most courteous and went about their work in a businesslike way. While we did not all agree as to some parts of the report, on other parts we were unanimous. As a closing word I should like to hear some reason given why more attention was not paid to the report made by the committee of last year.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in connection with this motion; in fact I propose to move an amendment in a few minutes. I suggest that he widen the powers of this committee to include the subjects of naturalization and deportation.

The history of these committees on the defence of Canada regulations is probably well known to all members of the house, but at the risk of wearying them and in order that the record may be kept straight I propose to go over some of the details of what has happened during other years in connection with these particular committees.

The first committee to study the defence of Canada regulations was set up in 1940, and members will find the motion setting up that committee on page 107 of the Journals for that year under date of June 13, 1940. I was a member of that committee, and in the course of our deliberations we found that the question of naturalization and the question of what could or could not be done after the war with people whom it might be necessary to intern, kept coming up. As a matter of fact, some witnesses were called to give evidence on these subjects. One was a senior officer of the Department of the Secretary of State, I think it was the undersecretary; he gave evidence with regard to naturalization; and another was a senior officer from the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources who gave evidence on deportation. Both these witnesses are well known and of high standing and each said that some change should be made in order to meet war requirements.

The committee which met in 1940 did not have time to go into the subject fully. Their report was brought in on August 1, 1940, and it will be found on page 315 of the Journals for that year. In the report it was stated that the questions of naturalization and deportation had come up and had been partly considered. The committee made certain recommendations with regard to naturalization procedure during the war, but they went further and found as follows:

> Your committee is of the opinion that measures should be taken to invest the important step of naturalization with greater solemnity and to impress upon those who apply for the privilege the importance of the obligations which they assume as British subjects.

The committee recommended that in the following session another committee should be set up which would have power to review not only the defence of Canada regulations but also the law relating to naturalization and deportation. Then in 1941, when this committee had been set up again, it was given the express power to consider questions of naturalization and deportation. The motion was passed on February 27, 1941, and will be found at page 147 of the Journals for that year. Included in the operative part of the motion we find these words:

> That a select committee . . . be appointed to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation) 1940, and amendments thereto, and the law relating to naturalization and to review as well the law relating to deportation.

And so on. At the time the motion was under consideration in the house there was a discussion on these very points, and the then Secretary of State, the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, speaking on behalf of the government, said on March 3, 1941, as reported at page 1186 of Hansard of that date:

> As regards solemnity in the granting of certificates of naturalization, so far as I am concerned I am of opinion that possibly later on, when the law is being amended—and this will be done only after the committee has considered the whole subject—the question might be considered of investing the procedure with more solemnity in order to impress new citizens with the obligations they assume on becoming Canadians. I give this as my personal opinion.

He went on to explain that as a result of the recommendations of the committee in 1940 an interdepartmental committee had been set up to study naturalization, but he said that the whole matter would be fully discussed during the 1941 session by the special committee of the house on the defence of Canada regulations. The intention obviously was that no changes would be made until after the question had been considered by the committee and also by the house.

The 1941 committee again heard evidence with regard to naturalization and deportation, and their report was made on June 4, 1941, and will be found at page 445 of the Journals for that year. Dealing with these two questions, the committee said:

> Your committee has received some evidence and has investigated these two important subjects in part only and, notwithstanding the fact that your committee has held a great many meetings, including on occasions two meetings a day, the limited time at our command has made it impossible to devote the time to these subjects which they require in order to enable a proper report to be made to the house.
> Your committee therefore respectfully begs to recommend that at the next session of the house the law relating to naturalization and deportation and matters incidental thereto be the subject matter of a reference to a committee of the house.

Then last year, 1942, when notice was given of the setting up of a committee on the defence of Canada regulations, that part of the 1941 notice dealing with naturalization and deportation had been omitted. I complained of that at the time and asked that the committee should be authorized to consider the two subjects; I was supported in that contention by several members of the house who had served on the committee previously.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) as reported at page 2100 of Hansard of 1942 took this position:

I certainly would have no objection to the committee examining any subjects.

But he went on to explain that his experience in the house and in these matters had been limited, and he thought perhaps it would be as well to let the motion go through as it stood; if the committee wished to ask for an extension of its powers it could do so. But nothing more was done. The report from the committee of 1941 was not followed either, in that no special committee was set up to deal with these two questions alone. The consequence was that nothing was done with respect to naturalization and deportation throughout the session of last year.

But now we find that on July 9, 1942, an order in council was passed which made quite important changes in the naturalization regulations, and I would remind the house through you, Mr. Speaker, that this was while parliament was still in session. One of the main changes made by this order in council was that it provided that an applicant for naturalization must file a declaration of his intention, and also provision was made that the oath of allegiance must be taken in open court.

Mr. McLARTY: I think the hon. member used the word "must." I think the privilege was given that he "might" file a declaration of his intention.

Mr. GREEN: That makes it worse, for the first committee which considered the matter was of opinion that a declaration should be filed.

Two months later, on September 23, an order in council was passed, of which again we received no notice, which provided that anyone applying during the calendar year 1943 for a certificate of naturalization need not file a notice of declaration of his intention.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GREEN: When the house rose at six o'clock I was explaining that although two different committees of this house had recommended that the law relating to naturalization and to deportation should be further reviewed by a committee of the house and then of course dealt with by the house itself; although that has not been done; and although previous ministers had let it be understood that some such course would be followed, we find now that last summer the government put through orders in council which changed the naturalization regulations; and last month they passed by order in council a revised set of naturalization regulations; this I submit was unfair to this parliament and is a practice that should be frowned upon by members and one that should not be followed in the future. However, the government now have an opportunity to make up for their sins of the past—some of them at any rate—and therefore I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence):

That the motion be amended by adding after the word "thereto", in the sixth line, the following words: and the law relating to naturalization and to deportation.

The effect of that will be that this committee which is being set up will have the power to review not only the defence of Canada regulations, but also the law having to do with naturalization and deportation.

There are several different ways in which our naturalization law could be improved. For example, some provision should be made for naturalization schools, in which our new citizens could learn something about Canada, its laws and customs, and so on, and also naturalization textbooks might be supplied. I think we might learn a good deal from the United States in the way they naturalize new citizens. Then, some provision must be made to do away with dual citizenship. On the Pacific coast we have been faced for many years with the situation that a Japanese national would take out papers and yet at the same time, under the law of Japan, he might still be a Japanese citizen. That must be stopped.

I suggest that wider powers should be given to the naturalization judges. They are quite restricted now in the questions they can ask an applicant, and they should be given wider powers. Moreover, there should be far more solemnity when we grant a certificate of naturalization. I suggest that leading citizens should be called in to take part in the ceremony. That has been done already in certain cities of Canada, and if some such plan were worked out it would do a great deal of good not only to applicants for naturalization but also to present Canadians. It might also help us to hold out the hand of friendship to our new citizens.

There are many clubs across Canada which are interested in this naturalization problem. For example, the Canadian Club, I believe, made representations to the committee which sat in 1941, and many of the service clubs are taking an interest in the matter. They should be given a chance to help to work out some better method of carrying out naturalization.

With regard to the question of deportation, I have only this to say. The ministers can contradict me if I am wrong, but I understand the present position to be that a member of the nazi party in an internment camp to-day could not be sent back to Germany after the war provided he had been in Canada for a period of five years. That is ridiculous. We must change our laws so that we can deal adequately and promptly with these people once the war is over.

Both these questions are of vital importance at the present time, and therefore I am moving the amendment. The committee that is to be set up is a small committee of only fifteen members. In each year the defence of Canada regulations committee has had the reputation of being one of the best set up by the house. Their deliberations have been non-partisan and they have really done splendid work. This year there is not so much to be dealt with in connection with the regulations; the committee is being set up much earlier than last year, and there is no doubt that they could look carefully into these two questions of naturalization and deportation.

I would appeal to the ministry, despite the few hard things I have said against them on these subjects, to accept this amendment. I think it is proper to extend the powers of the committee to deal with these two questions of naturalization and deportation as well as the defence of Canada regulations.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I do not intend to take up the time of the house at any great length in dealing with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). Perhaps it would be unnecessary for me to say anything, because I understand that my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who moved this resolution, is prepared to accept the amendment. However, in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South, it would appear to be proper if I dealt briefly—extremely briefly—with some of the matters that he has mentioned.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McLARTY: I notice that when I used the words "extremely briefly" it was greeted with a "hear, hear," and I will endeavour to give consideration to that admonition.

As the hon. member correctly pointed out, when the committee was set up in 1941 the clause which he suggests adding to the proposed resolution was included in the resolution then presented. Unfortunately—and I would not for a moment suggest that it was any fault of the committee, because it was a very able one—on account of various matters they had to consider, and perhaps on account of the lateness of their appointment, they did not have an opportunity, which I know they would have seized on if it had presented itself, of giving that consideration which might otherwise have been given to these important matters.

I can speak only with regard to the matter of naturalization, but in so far as naturalization is concerned, so far as consideration of those important questions are concerned, frankly, sir, I welcome it; and I trust in view of the fact, as the member for Vancouver South has just pointed out, that the committee is being appointed earlier in the session, and that according to the law of diminishing returns their work will be less strenuous this session than it has been for the last three, that serious and careful consideration will be given to the matter of naturalization.

Last Wednesday and again this evening the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to the passing of certain orders in council dealing with the matter of naturalization. I rather took it from his remarks, although he may not have intended it, that there was a usurpation by the executive power of the functions properly falling to this parliament.

Mr. GREEN: That is what I meant.

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member confirms it; that is what he meant. I will deal with that contention. The first order in council to which he referred was passed on July 9 last. That order in council makes no amendment, nor does any order in council make any amendment to the Naturalization Act.

Mr. GREEN: I said the regulations.

Mr. McLARTY: It is an amendment only to the regulations, and the regulations under the act itself are necessarily passed by order in council. In fact, if I may answer the remark of last Wednesday, I would say that bearing in mind the fact that these regulations will last only for the war-time period and are designed so to last, there has been no possible infringement upon the rights and privileges of this house. The act itself prescribes that the regulations are to be made by order in council, and if they happen to be made under the War Measures Act that limits them to the period of the war. Certainly there has been no usurpation of power on the part of the executive.

What does the order in council of July 9 do? It gives the right to grant certificates of naturalization to any alien serving outside Canada with the naval, military or air forces of Canada. Could any hon. member object to that? It goes further. It says that any alien who applies for exemption from military training or service on the ground that he is a citizen or subject of another country shall be debarred from applying for or receiving a certificate of naturalization under the Naturalization Act or these regulations. That must be read as it was intended, "for the duration of the war".

It does another thing; it adopts the first paper procedure, a procedure with which we are perhaps not as familiar as we might be, but which has been largely used in the republic to the south. That has two effects. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that the committee wanted a greater measure of solemnity in the matter of naturalization. This gives a greater measure of solemnity. This gives a waiting period of four years, during which the applicant can be constantly under observation and his record can be continuously followed. It does another thing; it gives to those who are new citizens of this country an opportunity of showing that they have taken every step they can to ensure that at the proper time and under the proper circumstances they will become Canadian citizens. That is the effect of the amendment to the regulations of July 9.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that another order was passed on September 23. What was the effect of that order? The effect was to give to the Secretary of State the same power to reject a declaration of intention as he has to-day to reject an application for naturalization. It does more. Because of that new procedure it was thought that the necessary papers could be prepared by September 1. In practice it was found that this was not feasible. Consequently it extended it until January 1 instead of making it become operative on September 1.

Mr. GREEN: What about the last paragraph of the order in council passed September 23, 1942?

Mr. McLARTY: Does that deal with the matter of one who under ordinary conditions—

Mr. GREEN: It states that this declaration of intention does not need to be filed until January 1, 1944.

Mr. McLARTY: I am glad my hon. friend brought that up. The situation was that there were a great many who had taken steps to be naturalized in 1943. They did not have opportunity to complete their declaration of intention in time. Consequently the order in council states that anyone who would be entitled during the year 1943 to apply for naturalization should not be debarred merely by reason of the fact that he had not previously filed a declaration of intention.

I have dealt with the orders in council that have been passed. I suggest that there is not one of those orders that in any way deals with the substantive terms of the Naturalization Act, but merely with the regulations, which apart from the War Measures Act the governor in council is entitled to deal with.

But let me go further. I might make this clear to the committee. It may be a matter of some disappointment to them, but I believe those who have been members of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations are apprised of it. In 1914 we had a great amendment to the Naturalization Act. Instead of creating Canadian citizens alone, we created British citizens. That right involved a corresponding obligation, and that obligation was recognized in this way, that in the matter of the fundamental changes of our Naturalization Act those changes would not be undertaken without first consulting with Great Britain and the other commonwealths of the empire. That will be a definite limitation on the work of the committee. To show that this has been lived up to in Great Britain, I might refer to the report contained in the Daily Telegraph and Morning Post of January 27 last. It dealt with a debate in the House of Lords. In that debate a suggestion of an amendment was proposed to the bill dealing with an important matter—and it is an important matter—of the status of married women. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Simon, dealt with it and the press report states:

> Lord Simon explained that the government could not make the proposed changes, as all the clauses in the present bill had been agreed with the dominions.

There is that restriction, that limitation which we shall have to observe, namely, that no fundamental changes in our Naturalization Act can be made without first consulting with Great Britain and our sister commonwealths. But within that limitation there is ample scope.

In war time the administration of the Naturalization Act is bound to create difficulty and to cause worries. The situation is much more acute than in peace time when perhaps we go through the ordinary procedure and may fall into a rut. In war time it is much more difficult. There will be scope for this committee, notwithstanding no recommendation of fundamental changes to the act itself, to deal with the practice and the regulations in the matter of naturalization. Those recommendations cannot help being of assistance to the department of which I have the honour to be the head.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I am pleased indeed to hear the minister accept the amendment just presented. It gives to me a reason for the setting up of this committee. Until that amendment was presented I was at a loss to know why this committee was being set up again this year. There was a committee last year that went into most of the problems pertaining to the defence of Canada regulations. That committee brought to Ottawa large deputations of people from many places at great expense and made a very thorough examination of this problem. After due consideration they arrived at certain recommendations. Those recommendations were presented to this house, but no opportunity has been given to the house to discuss or to express its approval or disapproval of them. Yet without being given that opportunity we are asked again to-night to consent to the setting up of another committee, which I presume is to cover exactly the same ground and review exactly the same situation. I wonder what purpose the minister has in mind in asking that this committee be set up. Does he hope that a new committee will arrive at different conclusions and bring in a different set of recommendations from those brought in last year? Or are we to conclude that unless a committee of this kind can bring in recommendations which are favourable to the government, the recommendations it does bring in will receive no consideration, and that such a committee is expected to bring in recommendations which must meet with the approval of the government before they can be brought before this house for discussion and consideration.

I am not going to deal at length with the communist situation, since that has been dealt with already in this debate, but one point puzzles me and probably the minister can give us the answer. Communists were interned and the communist party was banned, I presume for the reason that they were opposed to our war effort. Communists have been released from internment, but the communist party remains banned. Will the minister explain on what ground he makes this differentiation; why there is ground for the release of communists and no ground for the lifting of the ban? I hope the minister is not deluded into thinking that by maintaining this ban he is hindering in any way the work of that party. Rather I would suggest to the minister that by keeping the ban in effect he is giving those people reason to appeal to the public on the ground that they are suffering an injustice, and that they can be and are being more successful in building up their organization under those circumstances than would be the situation if the ban were lifted.

There are one or two other points on which I wish to ask for information. The matter of Jehovah's Witnesses has already been called to the attention of this house, but I think hon. members should understand that one treatment is being meted out to-day to the communists and an entirely different treatment is being meted out to Jehovah's Witnesses. Communists have been released, and so far as I know there have been no recent prosecutions. They are allowed to operate and carry on their activity under a dozen different names in this country. On the other hand, even since the recommendations of this committee were made, in fact as late as last week, the homes of those belonging to Jehovah's Witnesses have been raided by the mounted police, their literature taken and prosecutions threatened. Attention has already been drawn to the fact that in many instances the literature taken is nothing more or less than the King James version of the Bible, the only difference between the copies taken by the mounted police and those read in Christian churches in this and all other cities being that those taken by the mounted police have been printed by a certain publishing house. In every other respect they are the same as those used by the rest of us. May I ask the minister if we have reached the stage in this dominion where he and those associated with him have been given authority to determine what religious faith a man shall follow or profess in this country. Are these people being prosecuted for military reasons, for political reasons or for religious reasons? Is it because they are not good citizens? Is it because they are opposed to our war effort? Or is it because they belong to a particular religious faith? Those are questions which I think should be answered.

Another point on which I should like a little information is with regard to the Ukrainian labour temple farmer association. I have before me a telegram which I think was sent to the Prime Minister, containing a resolution which was passed unanimously at a very large public meeting held at Toronto less than two weeks ago, as follows:

> We, the persons present at a meeting at Massey Hall, Toronto, having heard a full account of the grievous wrong done to the former members of the Ukrainian labour temple farmer association by the seizure of more than one hundred properties acquired by the sacrifices of a large number of loyal new Canadians, the consequent suppression of many healthy and beneficial activities of a cultural and musical nature, an example of which we have enjoyed to-night, and the wanton destruction of valuable and irreplaceable books and manuscripts in some cities, all on the ground of supposed political activities of a small minority of leaders, hereby call upon the dominion government forthwith to restore full possession of the confiscated properties to representatives of the former members so that the former activities of a cultural and musical nature may be renewed, and to institute forthwith an inquiry in regard to the alleged destruction of books and to fix the responsibility therefor, and to deal firmly, if the fact is established, with those responsible for such conduct, and to make full compensation to the owner.

Will the Minister of Justice explain to the house just what is or wherein lies the difference between the treatment we are meting out to those people and the treatment that is being meted out under similar circumstances in Germany to-day? There is this difference. Under the present administration fewer than one thousand Jehovah's Witnesses have been prosecuted. In Germany more than six thousand members of the same organization have been prosecuted. They are being prosecuted in Germany much the same as they are here, and for much the same reason.

Mr. MAYBANK: What is the hon. member's authority for stating that prosecutions in Germany and in Canada are as he has stated?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I believe the hon. member will find that statement in a brief presented last year to the committee. The information I am giving was all placed before that committee.

We read about the burning of books in Germany, and their sale, destruction or confiscation in this country. Yet I understand that Canada is a party to the twenty-six-nation agreement which established freedom of religion and freedom of worship. Can we make our course of action gibe with that declaration?

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words before this motion is passed. It has been interesting to listen to the comments of hon. members who have spoken. Thus far, so far as I can recall, not one member has spoken in favour of the action of the Department of Justice in not accepting the recommendations of the committee.

The outstanding point is that in its report the committee made certain suggestions to the department with regard to the lifting of the ban on these different organizations, and still the department has absolutely flouted the authority of the committee, and turned it down flat. Up to this time I do not think the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has made any explanation to the house.

I agree with those who ask why the department now seeks to set up another committee. It would seem to me, as was pointed out by the hon. member who preceded me, that it would be an utter waste of time to reconstitute a committee for the same purposes which prompted the setting up of last year's committee. I believe it is evident to all reasonable, thinking people that the Minister of Justice has determined that the committee must bring in a report with which he is in favour, or he will not do anything about it. Such action as that is—I was going to say Hitlerite, but probably that would not be the right word. Certainly, however, it is flouting the authority of the House of Commons and, especially, the committee. The committee should refuse to sit until it is given a proper explanation.

One of the recommendations of the committee was the lifting of the ban on communism. I do not care what action a man takes, on almost any subject, as long as he is consistent. But if there is one thing I do detest, it is a hypocrite. We have sat in the house and listened to countless numbers of hon. members praise Russia. I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice and many other ministers do the same thing. If one goes to a moving-picture show we see the eulogizing of Russia, our great ally. We are told what wonderful heroes they are, how much they have done, how they are fighting for us, and how much we must respect them. At the same time we have them in gaol—or at least we had them in gaol. What hypocrisy! The Russians must laugh at us—and no one could blame them.

Surely we ought to be a little bit consistent. If we are going to put them in gaol, then why not come out and say so, openly? Those who were put into internment camps I believe have nearly all been released, but they are still declared illegal. They were supposed to have been banned on account of their attitude toward our war effort. If we wanted to become a little bit personal I think we could indicate quite a few people in this country who were strongly isolationist, and who are to-day very anti-British. That has been mentioned in this House of Commons. Therefore neither the Department of Justice nor anyone else could object if that were the only reason for outlawing them, but even that does not stand now.

Let us be consistent. The Minister of Justice should explain why these things are taking place. Surely it has come to a pretty stage in this country, this democracy, when men in one part of Canada cannot express their opinions as clearly as they can in another part. I can see no logical reason why the government should not have acted on the report brought in by the committee—a unanimous report, I understand—

Mr. MAYBANK: No, no.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Almost unanimous, then. Probably the hon. member did not agree. It was almost unanimous with regard to lifting the ban on communism, and I believe it was unanimous with respect to Jehovah's Witnesses—although probably the hon. member was not there that day.

Mr. DUPUIS: He was there; it was in camera.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When the majority of the committee agreed on the recommendation I can see no logical reason why it should not have been acted upon.

Our party was in favour of accepting the report brought down by the committee; otherwise I can see no use in having it.

We now come to the second part of the report, namely, that with respect to lifting the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses, the Watch Tower institution, or whatever it was called, and other religious organizations. From time to time I have been sent articles respecting Jehovah's Witnesses, and I used to receive quite regularly a publication called the "Watch Tower." In all the articles I have received—speaking, of course, of those I have read—I could see nothing to warrant their being banned.

I believe it was suggested on one occasion that they were banned because they were against the war effort, and it was considered that they were not in favour of our war effort because they did not want to kill. However I believe I could bring to the attention of the Department of Justice another place in Canada where there was much more said than anything said by the Jehovah's Witnesses along this line. If I recall rightly, the Department of Justice was informed about the matter, but no action was taken. I am not going to raise religious arguments at this time, but I say that in this connection it would be well to remember that consistency is a very good thing to follow. It is ridiculous to think that we, in our so-called democracy, would go into a man's house, take anything we like from his private library, arrest him on that evidence and put him in gaol. We do that because he happens to have a faith different from that of some of the rest of us. If that principle were carried out to the limit, then there should be many of us in gaol.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, it might be a good place to start a special concentration camp for some of you fellows over there. It might not hurt you a bit.

Mr. MacINNIS: It would not do them any good.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Probably it would not do them any good, either.

I say that the minister is in duty bound to explain to the house why he deliberately flouted the authority of a committee set up by the House of Commons. He should go further and tell the house why Jehovah's Witnesses and other religious organizations are outlawed. He should definitely explain to the house why the ban on communism is not lifted. If that old excuse about communism being against our war effort stood at the time communist organizations were declared illegal, it certainly does not hold good to-day. I recall that the attitude of some members of this house, in fact, of by far the majority of the members of this house, was against an all-out war effort. It is so recorded in Hansard. They voted against an all-out war effort. Why, then, should they go round and accuse the poor communist of being against us?

Mr. TURGEON: Does the hon. member say that the majority of the members voted against an all-out war effort?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, Mr. Speaker, by far, all but the members of this party, if the hon. member wants me to be explicit. I can prove that by Hansard, too. I do not think I shall say anything more until I hear from the Minister of Justice. At that time I may have something more to say because I have it right here before me.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members who have addressed the house on this resolution and the amendment seem to have overlooked for a moment the fact that we are at war. They complain about the drastic actions which must be taken on account of the fact that we are at war. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was the first one to refer to the committee of last session, and he took the precaution to tell the house that he did not approve the doctrines of the communists. The members of his party who followed him have not taken the same precaution. What may be inferred from that is for the house to decide.

I was a member of that committee. In connection with the different sects and isms and doctrines which were considered by the committee, I wish to say frankly that as far as I could see from the evidence before us the institution calling itself Jehovah's Witnesses was simply an over-zealous religious sect and not at all one dangerous to the carrying on of the war by Canada. The same might be said to be true of some of the other sects, but I would be astonished if any member of the committee, bearing in mind the evidence given, would say that of the institution known as communism.

Without exception the witnesses for the communists admitted that before Russia was attacked by Germany they had opposed Canada being at war with Germany. In fact, they had come to support Canada only because Germany had attacked Russia. I think it is fair to infer that if hostilities between Russia and Germany came to an end, these same communists would again be on the side of Germany and against us.

It is not fair to say that the report of the committee last year was anywhere near to being unanimous. Members of the house speaking to-night have referred to how high-minded the committee was, what a splendid membership there was, but I think the members of this house have a better opinion of the members of the committee than had some members of the committee of certain other members. However, I must say that our differences were expressed in argument and debate; we did not descend to the tactics of the communists. If we had, the minority would have been liquidated; they would not have had any report to make.

Evidence was given of the subversive activities in Canada of the communist party. They advocated and followed those subversive tactics in this country. Their literature showed; the evidence of the witnesses showed that they were advised to stir up dissatisfaction in Canada's armed forces, to incite the members of the forces to revolt against their leaders and against their officers. They even went so far as to advise methods of sinking the ships of war of the allied nations. Yet it is said that we should put up with that conduct in Canada.

It may be that communism is tolerated in Australia and in Great Britain. In Great Britain they may be able to laugh off communism with the other soap-box orators in Hyde park, but we in Canada cannot afford to do that. We cannot afford to have a change of government by force advocated in this country. I think the Department of Justice went a long way in adopting that section of the report with reference to the releasing of men who were then in prison, and I compliment the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the department upon not going so far as to lift the ban on communism.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South-Centre): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago when the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) said that the committee had been unanimous, I thought he was speaking of the report generally and I interrupted him. From what he said later I gathered that at that time he was referring to Jehovah's Witnesses. If he means that the committee was unanimous at that time, of course I was quite incorrect to endeavour to set him right because he was right already. However, as to whether the committee was or was not unanimous generally I think it will be observed by the house that already two members of the house have taken diametrically opposite views. I in turn perhaps will further show the house by what I say that the committee was far from being unanimous. I also was a member of that committee.

At the outset I would indicate one rather sharp difference of opinion between myself and some of the members who have spoken. It is that, while I hold strongly that certain things ought to have been done, namely, that the recommendations of the committee should have been implemented, I still do not see in the circumstances of the case, any right of recrimination such as has been demonstrated by those at the far end of the house. I do not see any occasion at all for the hon. member for Bow River, for instance, speaking in such a heated fashion about this question.

The fact of the matter is that generally speaking the committee got along much better than the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) seemed to hint in his last few words.

True, the committee was not unanimous on anything very often or for long periods of time. If the committee happened to be unanimous at a quarter to eleven o'clock, it was altogether likely that it would not be unanimous at thirteen minutes to eleven; but still the members got along well.

There is no use in private members blaming the government for the non-adoption of the report, and I do not want any person suggesting or hinting that I am an apologist for the government in this connection because they know better. Every hon. member who has spoken in this fashion knows perfectly well that there were many opportunities to have the report adopted. Every hon. member who has spoken knows that he personally had an opportunity to move the adoption of the report, and that he refrained from taking the opportunity. All these members knew at every moment of the closing days of last session just where the report stood with reference to being adopted or not adopted, and they themselves had the opportunity, at any stage, of proposing the adoption of that report. And they knew they had. There is no use in blaming somebody else. It may be that somebody is to blame, but if so, blame attaches to each of them as much as to any one else.

The facts are well known as to what happened with regard to that report. The chairman of the committee was a minister of the crown. He was not in agreement with the recommendations and he did not want to move the adoption of the report. I suppose that even if you are a minister of the crown you have some right of independence of ideas. He quit his job; he resigned as chairman; another chairman took his place, and there was considerable thought on his part and on the part of others as to whether the report should be presented for adoption as well as merely being tabled. All this is a matter of common knowledge. As far as the two groups at the far end of the chamber are concerned, they know that what I am saying is true. They had their representatives there on the committee; and not only that, they knew by conversation with other members that what I have said is entirely true. I do not approve this business of standing up and trying to blame some other person; that is why I am speaking in this way.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon) got the approval of the members of that committee to refrain from moving the adoption of the report. It was at first his intention to move the adoption, but afterwards he called the committee together and obtained their approval to the course of simply laying the report on the table. He did not get my approval; I did not happen to be there. The hon. members who have spoken in this discussion know all this quite well. I took the view then, quite openly, that the adoption of that report should be moved, and that it was the duty of the chairman to do so. These hon. members know that, but they are trying to keep it quiet; they would like to attach the blame elsewhere.

What was the position when the chairman decided not to move the adoption of the report? It was that anybody else could move the adoption; and in pursuance of that right I put a notice on the order paper that I would do so. And then I did not do it.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, I do not know why the hon. member says "shame". I feel no particular shame about it or in telling about it afterwards; but if I were trying to hint that somebody else is to blame, I would be ashamed. Hon. members know the circumstances around the close of last session; already the house was becoming somewhat thinner. Also a certain number of people did not want to discuss this question. I have no hesitation in saying that many of my good friends from the province of Quebec urged in conversation with me that the adoption of the report should not at that particular time be moved; that the report probably would have just as much effect if it were not formally adopted. They said, and I recognized the justice of their contention, "It is going to make a division in the country at the present time; everybody is very hot about this, and we think, Maybank, if you will let it go, in the long run that will turn out to be the wiser course." I never made any secret of my position in the matter. Finally, after a lot of argument—and it took a lot, because I am a stubborn fellow—I agreed. I no sooner agreed to refrain at that time, than members of those other two groups were made aware of the fact that I was not going to move the adoption of the report, and the position was wide open for them to step in and move it themselves. But they did not do so. I am not blaming them for such decision, but one of them, at least, might have disclosed the facts rather than hint that somebody else is to blame.

These are the simple facts, and this is why the report did not happen to be adopted or its adoption did not happen to be refused. The vote on that subject would have been about as uncertain as a horse race or a general election. I do not know what would have happened, but I do know why the adoption of the report was not moved.

Every person knows that, except with respect to the recommendation relative to Technocrats and Jehovah's Witnesses, the report was by no means unanimous. In support of that statement I would remind the house it was agreed in the committee that recommendations of the committee would be kept secret until the report was tabled in the house. A completely accurate report of the doings of the committee and the report was published in the Montreal Standard within two or three days of that time. Hence everyone was informed. Many conversations were going on around the house as to what the committee was doing, and every other hon. member knew as much as the members of the committee themselves.

I am one who believes that the report of that committee should have been implemented by the government. Make no mistake about that; that is the view I took. But I cannot agree with some hon. members who suggest that any special blame attaches to the government for the reason that the committee did not report unanimously and all members refrained from seeking adoption of the report. As a matter of fact committee opinion was fairly evenly balanced between the pros and the cons. Oh! I cannot use that expression any more on account of there being now a hyphenated party in the house; it could lead to misunderstanding. In the light of the fact that the committee was not unanimous, indeed was on a hair-spring balance, and the further fact that we did not get the house to adopt our report, I do not see how any person except one who wants to be factiously critical can, with the vehemence some hon. members have been exhibiting, lay blame on the government. It surely is quite as much their own fault. They might recall the words spoken to Brutus: The fault, dear Brutus, is in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Let me now deal with the position of some of the organizations which have been mentioned. The committee, as I said, was unanimous with regard to the Technocrats, The Technocrats are a poor little organization which, I suppose, is making some kind of study and for some reason or another they were banned. I do not imagine that there ever was any great harm in them; but when they were originally banned I was aware that there was information from societies and from companies going to the United States, which at that time was not at war. I knew of possibilities with insurance companies; I thought that something might be happening with regard to this Technocrat organization similar to what could happen with insurance companies; that information could go to the United States and be passed on to Belgium, and so forth. Information was getting from Canada to the United States and overseas from there. I thought something of the sort might be the reason for the ban. But I must say that the government never gave much of a reason for banning the Technocrats. However, I was willing for a while to let this organization stay banned. But when we came to look into the question last year, the question of whether the ban should remain on that organization or not there was no reason that anyone could suggest why it should stay banned. I think that was the view of the committee, and when they reported back to the house and the house took cognizance of it, I believe that, in the light of the facts and of the deliberations of the committee, the ban should have been lifted at once. I do not think there can be any argument, unless there is something that should have been told the committee—and was not told—why the ban should have been kept on that organization.

I now come to Jehovah's Witnesses. Again we must see there was unanimity in the committee's report. I have the case of the government—and of the mounted police—against Jehovah's Witnesses; and, Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to read that case here in this house. As a matter of fact, the case against Jehovah's Witnesses, as presented to us at any rate, is just laughable. That is all there is to it. There is no occasion whatever for that organization being under the ban. I know they are a bother and, to use the language of sportdom, I wish they would take a "rain check" on their disturbances until the war is over. I understand that they go round and play phonographs in places where the phonograph records will anger those who hear them. Pretty soon a fight develops and there is a big disturbance in the community. Having done that in one community, they will do it in another. I do not say they do it all the time, but I gather they have been known to do that sort of thing. They pick out Catholic communities particularly and go and play records that damn the pope and say things against Catholics generally, and all that sort of thing. Well, if you go into any Catholic community and carry on in that way, naturally there will be trouble. But such actions do not constitute a sufficient reason to put a ban on the organization itself.

The manner in which these people have been treated at times shows the wrong that can be done by operating under a law of this sort. Reference has already been made to the seizure of Bibles. I know of a case out in British Columbia where a considerable number of Bibles were seized and brought to a mill for destruction by reason of the fact that they were contraband and confiscated articles. The owner of the mill, looking at these Bibles, said that it was sacrilege to destroy them, and he found another use for them. Perhaps they are now in the hands of people who may read in them the proper passages from which to learn tolerance. It is nonsensical to have a law which permits such actions. As I have intimated already, the strongest case that can be made for the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses being lifted, is the very case against Jehovah's Witnesses as presented to the committee.

I now come to the position with relation to communists. I believe it is a wiser policy to lift the ban on the communists. That is the position I take with relation to them. If I should happen to fail to remark that I am out of sympathy with the communists, I hope, sir, you will not draw from my silence any inference such as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) indicated a little time ago could be drawn from the silence of other hon. members. Perhaps, for safety's sake, I should say at once that I am not in sympathy with them and thus get out from under any possible charge. I think it is wiser to remove the ban from an organization of that sort than to drive it into underground methods. That is my whole approach to the question. I know their record was bad up to the time Russia came into the war, but I think from all we have been able to learn that such is not the situation after Russia came in. The attitude of an organization which changes because a foreign power comes in as our ally is not a satisfactory attitude. I would prefer, as all would, that they should change their attitude because of their Canadianism; nevertheless, so far as any evidence we can find is concerned, they did cease to be subversive, and as a matter of fact they are doing a great many good things throughout the country at the present time.

Now, although banned, the communists are actually organizing. They are abroad doing some kind of organizing. They are probably organizing their party, but doing it in an underground, hidden way as much as possible. They are likely, by reason of this grievance, to be doing much more harm than if they were out in the open where we could see them. After all, this country, this government, this parliament, or any of the parties in the house, need have no fear whatever of any organization which it can see. When a government drives an organization into subterranean channels, it is only inviting trouble for itself.

Moreover, we are in a decidedly illogical position. We have a law whereby people cannot belong to the communist party of Canada. As a matter of fact, they will be put in gaol or in some way detained if they belong. But we let them all out. We have a law against burglary, but we do not let out all burglars. The law forbids burglary, and if the act is done those who commit it are put in gaol. But in this case these people have all been released. Great celebrations have been held in every city, and they are appearing on platforms with other citizens and joining all sorts of other community movements; yet they and their association together with the communist party of Canada are said to be illegal. The thing is illogical.

I further think that we are in danger of creating an impression of persecution. There is danger of doing more harm in the labour world than any good that can be accomplished in any other way. I have observed that resolutions came in first from what one might call the extreme left wing of labour organizations; gradually they moved toward the right, and the two chief labour organizations of the country have already requested the government to lift the ban. Also a large number of other organizations have done the same. There is danger of creating a really serious grievance if some relief is not given.

There is an argument that might be presented with reference to the communists. I think the Minister of Justice might state it, namely, that this organization is illegal anyway under the criminal code. That may be so. If so, it is not made any more illegal by the ban being put on it. You cannot direct traffic any better by putting up two stop signs instead of one. If this organization is illegal under the criminal code, there is no need of this defence of Canada regulations ban.

I come now to the position of the farmer labour temple organization. This is an organization that used to own and operate a number of labour temples. The reason why it was put under the ban was that it was tinged with communism. Its officers were mostly communists. They bored from within until they got into the proper positions and there they held. I have no doubt the organization was one that propagated communism and did so successfully.

All those people who were heads of that organization have been released from internment. As far as the public can see they are honest, honourable and respected citizens going about the country. The only thing is they are not allowed to be officers of that particular organization, and in order to prevent them from becoming officers the organization has been made illegal. That is a pretty roundabout way of trying to prevent the spread of communism, and it is another example of creating a grievance and giving people a chance to talk about it all the time. It is highly illogical to leave these leaders at large; tell them they can go around making speeches here, there and everywhere, but they cannot have their labour temples, or appear in them to make speeches. It is like saying to the soap-box orator, "You may orate as much as you like, but we will kick the soap-box from under you." We take away their property, but let them loose.

There is arising in my mind a suspicion that one of the reasons for not wanting to restore this organization is that the custodian of enemy property may be in a jam. At any rate it seems so clear that there is no reason for maintaining the ban on this organization that I am beginning to wonder whether the trustee who got the property can make a good report. I know a great deal of that property has been disposed of. I thought at one time that the custodian could take care of himself properly when he came to report on his trusteeship, but I wonder if the matter has now reached the point where it would be well to have such a report brought down and find out just what has taken place. Property difficulties should not influence us in dealing with the situation.

I know that I have spoken emphatically. I do not desire to speak with any more heat than is necessary. I do not take the position of some who have been pressing recriminatory charges against this one and that one, and the government in particular. But coolly and calmly I have reasoned the matter out to my satisfaction, and I submit to the house that it would be the part of wisdom at the present time to lift the ban from all these organizations; with respect to those concerning which the committee did not report unanimously, but with much stronger reason—which seems to me to be unassailable—with respect to those concerning which the committee did report unanimously.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): As a member of the defence of Canada regulations committee of last session, which committee made a report to this house on July 23, I should like to take this opportunity of saying a few words. During the two years that I was a member of the committee I enjoyed its deliberations very much, and I must agree with those hon. members who expressed the opinion that the consideration given to the various problems by the members and the deliberations of the committee were conducted with the utmost harmony. It is true that on many points we differed radically, but on the whole I can say that all the members honestly tried to see the other person's point of view. It is a matter of considerable regret to me that I am unable to be a member of the committee this year, but I had an opportunity to take a place on the reconstruction and reestablishment committee instead of this one, and I felt that as one of the younger members of the Progressive Conservative opposition, one representing a prairie point of view and one who has taken a great deal of interest in the matter of reconstruction in the councils of our party, I should accept that opportunity and go on the reconstruction committee. For that reason I am unable to continue on the defence of Canada regulations committee this year.

Last year's committee spent a great deal of time and effort in obtaining evidence relating to the various problems with which we had to deal. As is shown by the report there were some twenty-six meetings, all extending to two hours at least. We heard witnesses from various parts of this country and from as far away as Great Britain. We had the pleasure of hearing from that great and learned jurist Sir Norman Birkett, who is a high court judge in Great Britain and who for a long time was chairman of the advisory committee under the defence regulations of the United Kingdom. I have no hesitation in telling the house that Sir Norman Birkett impressed me greatly, not only on account of his learning and undoubted ability but also on account of his broad tolerance and his personal modesty.

We held our sessions in camera, for very obvious reasons. A great deal of the evidence that was given to us could not be made public because it was confidential. I had thought that many of the deliberations of the committee were also confidential. In fact, on one occasion when we came to some conclusions it was decided unanimously by all the members of the committee that nothing would be said about what had taken place until we were ready to table the report in this house. But to my great astonishment, within twenty-four hours after we had all decided unanimously that nobody would say anything about it the newspapers had the whole story of everything that had taken place in the committee. One would almost have thought they had a dictaphone in the room; the report was so full.

At any rate information and evidence given to us were in large measure confidential, and it seemed to me at the time and seems to me now, even in the light of the discussion that has taken place here this afternoon and evening, that it is impossible to have a properly enlightened debate in this house in connection with the matters that were dealt with for the reasons that I have given; a great deal of this large amount of evidence, which took fifty or more hours to give, was confidential, and even if it was available on an occasion like this it would be impossible to place it properly before the house and present a proper interpretation of it.

This is not a debate on the report itself but a debate on the motion to set up a new committee this year. It does seem to me, however, that in any event it would not be feasible to have a debate on the report, because statements could be made and arguments advanced, as statements have been made and arguments have been advanced this evening, which could be refuted or answered or substantiated only by quoting from the evidence, which for obvious reasons we cannot present here. I would remind the house that as usual the committee of last year contained a large majority of government supporters. Consequently it was able to reflect government policy and, as I thought, was set up for the purpose of being of assistance to the administration. This year again, quite naturally, the committee is preponderantly composed of members on the government benches; there are ten Liberals, three Progressive Conservatives, one Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and one Social Credit.

In connection with the work of this committee I am going to suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), along the lines that have been followed by other hon. members, that before it is asked to commence its work it should be advised as to the policy of the government with respect to the report which was tabled on July 23 last. As I pointed out, practically all the time of the committee was spent in considering those points which were the subject matter of the report, in hearing the evidence and listening to the arguments, and in point of fact there was no time to deal with anything else. It does seem to me that the committee which is in the process of being set up under this motion should be told whether or not it is required to deal with those questions which were the subject matter of last year's report, or whether it is not required to do so. There would be absolutely no sense in wasting the time of that committee and the time of witnesses in going over the whole ground again, hearing the type of evidence that was heard last year and all the rest of it, unless first we knew the attitude of the administration with respect to the work done last year. I invite the Minister of Justice, who undoubtedly will close this debate, to advise us with respect to these matters so that the committee now being constituted will be fully seized of the situation, and so that its position and its work may be clarified.

One point in connection with the recommendations of the committee has not been mentioned by any of the previous speakers in this debate. It is a recommendation which has nothing to do with the matter of evidence, and consequently I feel perfectly justified in dealing with it this evening. The defence of Canada regulations as they were in force at the time our committee dealt with this matter last year contained a subsection which at the time of our deliberations was known as 39B (2), and which I think is so known in the consolidated regulations for 1942, providing as follows:

> It shall be a defence to any prosecution for an offence against regulation 39 or 39A to prove that the person accused intended in good faith merely to criticize or to point out errors or defects in the government of Canada or any province thereof, or in either house of parliament of Canada or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice.

I need not read regulations 39 and 39A, but they have to do with the spreading of reports or the making of statements or utterances which are likely to cause disaffection or to prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline or administration of any of his majesty's forces. However, I would direct particular attention to the fact that in these two regulations the words used with respect to the offence are "intended or likely" to cause disaffection or prejudice recruiting and so on. The committee considered section 39B (2) very carefully and recommended to the house that the words "or the conduct of the war" be added to it. The administration has not seen fit to adopt that recommendation, and I think the house should be given a clear explanation as to why that has not been done. The position is this. There have been delivered in this house during the last three weeks speeches which, if uttered on the public platform, could render the persons making them subject to prosecution under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations. Some of those speeches were intended to urge the administration to an even greater war effort. Some had to do with the labour situation in this country or with the armed forces. In many instances hon. members endeavoured to further a greater and better war effort; yet, if they had made their speeches on the public platforms, they might have been rendered liable to prosecution, because section 39B states:

> No person shall act in any manner, spread reports, or make statements or utterances intended or likely to prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline, or administration of any of his majesty's forces.

If on the public platform the statement is made that Canada's war effort is not good enough; if on the public platform someone says, as hon. members have said in this house no doubt quite sincerely, that we have too many men in the armed forces and that we should reallocate our man-power, those statements might be held likely to prejudice the recruiting, discipline, training or administration of his majesty's forces, and the persons making those statements could be prosecuted. After considering this matter the committee decided that if the person making the statement could prove that he intended to act in good faith, he should not be prosecuted under these regulations; yet for some reason which I cannot possibly understand the administration has refused to accept that recommendation. If those words were added the regulation would read like this, taking only the parts relevant to the point I am making:

> It shall be a defence . . . to prove that the person accused intended in good faith merely to criticize or to point out errors or defects in the conduct of the war. . . .

Surely we in this country, who are so fond of declaring Canada a free and democratic country, are entitled from a public platform, or wherever we may be, to make honest criticism of Canada's war effort, for the purpose of urging the administration to even greater efforts to bring about the defeat of our enemies.

The refusal of the administration to accept the recommendations of the committee which sat last year is nothing more or less than an attempt to continue the strangling of free speech in Canada. Unless the administration is prepared to accept this recommendation it is doing something to which the people of Canada are entirely opposed, and continuing a condition against which the united nations are fighting.

I pointed out at the beginning of my observations that the evidence before the committee was heard in camera, and I do not propose to discuss it before the house. I should, however, like to say one word in connection with a matter to which reference has been made by several other hon. members, namely, the continuation of the ban upon the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses. I feel strongly about this matter, both as a result of what I learned from sitting on the committee and from personal knowledge respecting prosecutions in western Canada. I urge upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the administration that this matter be carefully reviewed so as to ensure that prosecutions be instituted only for the commission of some act which would be prejudicial to Canada's war effort, and that they be not instituted simply because persons are Jehovah's Witnesses.

I say this because my information is that these people are Jehovah's Witnesses by conviction. In their minds they cannot be anything else. They can be prosecuted and banned; we can do anything we like with them, but so far as they are concerned they remain Jehovah's Witnesses. This is the position which has arisen in some instances. Five or ten people might be gathered together in a home to read the Bible. The police may come along —and I believe this has happened in certain instances—and raid the home. The occupants of the house may be charged with being Jehovah's Witnesses. They appear in court, and cannot deny their being Jehovah's Witnesses because, in their own hearts and souls they believe they are Jehovah's Witnesses. It is not up to me to endeavour to interpret their feelings, because I cannot quite understand them. Nevertheless I have endeavoured to do so, and my understanding is that they have what is known as a covenant with God to be Jehovah's Witnesses, and that when they are accused of being Jehovah's Witnesses they cannot possibly appear in court and deny the allegation. Consequently a prosecution is practically tantamount to a conviction, even though they may have done nothing prejudicial to Canada's war effort. They happen to be members of a sect from which they cannot in their own minds divorce themselves.

I seconded the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and I most emphatically agree with the suggestion he made. I am pleased indeed that the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) has seen fit to adopt the suggestion. This has been a matter of considerable concern to many people across Canada over a number of years. They have felt that the whole matter of immigration and naturalization should be thoroughly convassed, and that it is the duty of members of parliament to see to it that the whole matter is reviewed.

I might point out that unless the points to which I have referred are cleared up, and if the committee is placed in a position again where it has to listen to the evidence it heard last year, it is possible it may not have time to deal with matters of naturalization and immigration. If the minister feels that the subject matter of last year's report should be considered by this year's committee, then it seems to me that the house should adopt the suggestion made by the committee which sat in 1941, namely, that a special committee be set up to consider immigration and naturalization only. We do not wish to be in a position again of having to put the matter off because the committee now to be constituted has not time to deal with it.

Many organizations in my part of the country have been giving careful consideration to naturalization, and have formulated certain ideas in connection therewith. They are anxiously awaiting the setting up of a body before which they may place their suggestions, with some hope of having them implemented. I commend the consideration given by the Secretary of State to the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and I certainly hope that, whether it be dealt with in the manner suggested by the hon. member or that suggested by myself, it be dealt with in some way, and the duty we owe the country in this regard thereby discharged at this session of parliament.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I followed with considerable attention the attempt made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) to explain why the report of the committee brought in last year was not implemented. He may, or may not, have given a satisfactory explanation on technical grounds, but the fact remains that the people of the city in which I live feel very deeply in the matter, and so far as they are concerned it still stands that parliament did nothing with the report. Further, the government has done nothing with it in the interim between sessions of parliament. As I understand it, the ban on organizations such as the communist party was placed there by order in council. In other words, it could have been lifted at any time by the same process of order in council. It would have seemed to me particularly appropriate for the government to act upon the sense of the report tabled and to lift the ban, by order in council. Therefore I say that, despite the attempts of my hon. friend to explain the inaction at the last session, the fact remains that nothing has been done by parliament, or by the government he supports.

I feel I should like to underline the efforts made by other hon. members to persuade the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to give some indication to the house and to the new committee we are now in process of setting up as to what the attitude of the administration is or will be toward any report the committee may bring in. I dare to hope that this attitude may be such as to suggest to that committee that it bring in a report very soon along the lines recommended by the committee of last year, so that at an early stage we in this house may have an opportunity of passing upon such recommendations.

I wish to join with others in making it very clear that neither I nor the members of the group to which I belong have any illusions as to the policies of the communist party or as to their attitude, shall I say, toward our political group. In the city from which I come we find ourselves competing frequently, and at times we are political enemies. So far as we are concerned, that does not matter. There is a principle at stake. We believe in the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter; we believed in them before that document was enunciated. In particular, we feel that the principle of freedom of speech is something that should be held to, not merely in an abstract form, but in actual practice and in specific cases. We feel that this holds with respect to the communist party, particularly now that it has been demonstrated that the members of that party are not in any way against our war effort, but in fact are perhaps the most zealous in the community at the present time.

In saying a few words on this subject, particularly with reference to the communist party, I believe that I speak not so much on behalf of the communist people of the city from which I come as for the average citizens of that city, the non-communists, those who share with me a dislike of some of the policies and the strategy of the communists. I may say that the average citizen finds it difficult to understand some of the inconsistencies that obtain at the present time, a number of which have been referred to already by other speakers who have preceded me.

For example, we have the fact that this war is being fought, shall I say, for the four freedoms and for certain other freedoms as well, and yet, by maintaining this ban on the communist party and on other groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses, we deny the principle of freedom of speech. There are also some inconsistencies of another kind. The communist party is banned, but we have released from internment camps the leaders of that party. The party is banned, and yet it carries on under such other names as workers' election committee and communist labour total war committee. I have in my hand a letter from this committee which is written on a printed letterhead.

We are proud of the fact that in Ottawa there is a legation of the Soviet Union. I imagine that in the library within that legation there are works on communist economics and principles, and yet we have the spectacle of books being destroyed in this country because they have been found in the libraries of people connected with the communist party. The party is banned, and yet a great number of demonstrations are being held in this country in honour of the Soviet Union. I am thinking in particular of a large gathering which was held not long ago in Winnipeg, the theme of which was a salute to the Soviet Union. It was arranged by a committee headed by men whom we all knew to be leaders of the communist party. We were glad to cooperate with them in making it a real success. The chairman of that huge meeting was at that time a prominent citizen of Manitoba who has since been taken away, Mr. John Bracken.

These inconsistencies are rather incidental to the fact that by means of this ban we are really saying that we do not believe in freedom of speech, while at the same time that is supposed to be one of the aims for which we are fighting. We in this group contend that to maintain such an inconsistency is definitely inimical to our war effort. From conversations which I have had with people who are non-communists, even anti-communists, I have realized that their enthusiasm for the war effort has been dampened to some extent by this very fact. They wonder what it means for the post-war period in terms of the freedoms for which we are fighting if we cannot grant these freedoms at the present time.

We in this group have pointed out on other occasions the misgivings that many people in this country have with respect to the post-war period. One set of fears which I have encountered relates to post-war foreign policy. I find that a great many people are wondering just how long the cordial attitude which we are now displaying toward the Soviet Union will continue after the war is over. What is going to be the line-up of forces among the great powers when this conflict has come to an end and we are face to face with the question of the kind of social order we are going to have in the various countries now joined together as the united nations? Many of those to whom I have spoken have felt that this ban on the communist party indicates a desire on the part of the government to be ready, after the war is over, to suppress the ideas held and advocated by the ally that just now means so much to us in the present war.

Mr. GRAY: What is the present position of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation with respect to the Soviet Union?

Mr. COLDWELL: They are our allies, are they not? As our allies in this war we are prepared to do all we can—

Mr. GRAY: I did not ask the hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member asked the position of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and I rose to reply.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has given the answer of this group. At the present time the Soviet Union is an ally, a major ally, of this country, and our attitude toward them at the present time is one of deep appreciation for what they are doing for us. We are also anxious that the various united nations might be able to pool their ideas after the conflict is over as to the science of economics and the ways of ordering our social life so that we may make progress. I believe that we have some contribution to make to the social and economic life of that country, and that they can make a contribution which will be of value to us. The fear of a great many people is that the powers that be in this country do not want any infiltration into our economic life of the concepts of socialism and cooperative government to be found in some of these other countries. The fear is, I say, that the maintenance of this ban is part of that idea; and I suggest that if this ban could be lifted this would go a long way toward helping a great many people to feel that we are thoroughly sincere in our advocacy of the four freedoms and of a new order, a better world after this war is over.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer briefly in connection with the motion calling for the setting up of this committee. I understand that a letter has been sent by the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council to the Minister of Justice, protesting strongly against the advertising which has appeared in newspapers throughout Canada, placed there by the Steel Company of Canada, and to which reference has already been made in this house. I understand that the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council has suggested—perhaps an even stronger word should be used—to the Minister of Justice that this company and, in fact, the newspapers which carried the advertising, should come in for the very close scrutiny of his department, as to whether this is not in fact subversive activity on the part of this company. I know that when the authorities, or even the defence of Canada regulations committee, go around looking for subversive activities they do not usually look in that direction, they look in the direction of groups politically to the left, or to religious sects which they cannot understand or which are out of the usual run of religious organizations. But I suggest that really subversive activity is to be found in the kind of thing which took place when that full-page advertisement appeared in all the large dailies of this country. I have received a great number of copies of this advertisement from Winnipeg, from people who were incensed by it. I emphasize the fact that the trades and labour council to which I have referred as protesting this matter is connected with the American Federation of Labour, not with the Canadian Congress of Labour, which is the labour organization involved in the steel situation. In other words, this Winnipeg labour body is concerned with a principle. They protest the right of a large corporation to publish this advertising which slanders organized labour, which speaks disrespectfully of the whole principle of industrial democracy which is sacred to the workers of this dominion and which they feel is part of what this war is being fought for. I can say, from the correspondence I have had, and from the account of what took place far from Hamilton, in the city of Winnipeg in the trades and labour council last week, that the workers of this country find this kind of thing very hard to understand. In fact, despite their utmost loyalty to the war effort, despite all the offers they have made, despite their efforts to be accepted by the government as full partners in the prosecution of the war, they find their enthusiasm cooled by this sort of thing, which seems to suggest to them that all the talk about the right to organize, collective bargaining, and a better deal for labour when the war is over, does not really amount to very much. This thing, I suggest, is subversive; and if the Department of Justice or the defence of Canada regulations committee are really keen and eager to trace down subversive activity, something which is inimical to our war effort, which dampens people's enthusiasm for it, or raises questions as to the validity of the things we are fighting for, they should take some time away from chasing communists and Jehovah's Witnesses and track down this kind of thing.

I regret very much that as yet the government has not had anything to say of any consequence in this connection. One day last week the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) what he thought of this bit of advertising. I believe the reply of the Prime Minister was to the effect that he did not imagine it would make much difference what he thought. I hope that before this debate is concluded the Minister of Justice will give us some statement. Perhaps he will tell us whether he has received letters from the Winnipeg trades council, and possibly some other organizations, and will give us some statement as to whether or not his department regards such advertising as something which should go unchecked. After all, if anything of that size by way of advertising were published in the papers of this country slandering the armed forces, we know what would happen. We have in Canada a great body of working people whose sons and daughters are in the armed forces, who themselves are working hard, making their contribution to the war effort; and for them to be slandered in this way is something they feel they ought not to have to take, and something which raises questions in their minds as to what is going to happen after the war is over.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I join with others in expressing the hope that we may hear shortly from the Minister of Justice as to the desire of the government with respect to this committee. Is the government prepared for the committee to make a report fairly soon regarding lifting the ban, for example, on the communist party? I think also we should hear from the minister whether his department, or under his direction, this committee, will be given authority to track down all subversive activities, not only the kind for which they have looked so far, but the kind to which I have drawn attention in referring to the recent advertising throughout the dominion by the Steel Company of Canada.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): I should like to say a few words only to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the opposition group from Quebec has no representative on this important committee. As a matter of fact, of fifteen members of that committee, there are only three from Quebec. This committee will have to deal with very important matters, and I would humbly submit to the minister the nomination of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) to the committee. He is a brilliant lawyer, and I am sure he would render valuable services to the committee and to the country as well.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to take only a minute to present a case to the minister. I am not going to traverse the ground which has already been covered by many speakers regarding the recommendations of last year's committee, but I merely ask that one aspect of this question be dealt with in the committee which I do not believe has been dealt with in years gone by. I refer to those who have been interned under the defence of Canada regulations, who are, as I understand it, allowed to have hearings before an advisory committee, and the minister on the advice of that committee decides whether or not they shall be released.

I can understand that in the early stages of the war, and particularly in the very dark days of the summer of 1940, it was better to be safe than to be sorry, and many people had to be rounded up and put out of the way where they could do no harm, until such time as we could make sure whether or not they were going to be a menace to the safety of the state. That was done in Great Britain, where many persons were rounded up who afterwards were found to be innocent. No one can blame a government for doing that when the safety of the nation is threatened, but that is now over three years ago and I wonder whether the minister has set up any machinery for making a more careful investigation into some of these cases. I can give a particular case which I have had an opportunity of investigating at first hand, and if it is typical of others, then there are people in this country who, I am afraid, are suffering great injustice.

This is a case which I referred to the minister a considerable time ago, namely, that of a man named Alois Zieglansberger under the file number of the Department of Justice, 16-395. Here is a man who was interned on July 27, 1940. His internment number at Petawawa is P.W. 1098. This man is a British subject of German origin. Eighteen months before war was declared he and his wife were at another person's home in the northern settlements of Saskatchewan, and in the course of an argument about economic conditions in Canada, and world conditions generally, he was alleged, by the man with whom he was arguing, to have made pro-nazi statements. There were as many people there who claimed that there were no pro-nazi statements made as there were those who claimed that there had been. On the strength of information laid by the other man who was partner to the heated discussion, this man was interned on July 27, 1940. I made representations to the minister. I have a number of letters on file which I will not take the time to read. The advisory committee, on going over the case, recommended that the detention should continue. I took no further action in the matter. If the advisory committee, after examining the facts, felt that was all they could do, then there was nothing more for me to do or for the Minister of Justice.

This fall I had occasion to go into the district. This man lived at Pierceland, Saskatchewan, over a hundred miles from railway, telephone or doctor, up in the bush settlements. I went through that scattered community and talked to people of all shades of opinion. I could find no one except the particular man who laid the information who would say that the interned man had any pro-nazi sentiments. I found that 128 people in that scattered community, covering a considerable area, had signed a petition and sent it to the minister, assuring him that, knowing this man as they did, as a good husband and citizen and a thrifty worker, they had no doubt that there had been some miscarriage of justice.

I met the man's wife, a young woman in her twenties, with three small children, living on a Saskatchewan homestead, doing all the work herself, sawing wood, driving horses and doing the chores. She had driven several miles in a snowstorm—the night I was there it was almost thirty degrees below zero—to come into town to see me about her husband's case. She brought her children with her because she had no one with whom to leave them. For over two years this woman has been without any support except what she could obtain with her own hands to maintain herself and her three children. I tell you, Mr Speaker, talking to that woman dressed in overalls, a man's clothing, fingernails broken, hands blistered from doing all the chores, and listening to the flimsy basis on which her husband has been held for over two years in an internment camp, I was almost ashamed of the way in which British justice, in which I had always had such great pride, was being administered in this country. I think that cases like that ought to be thoroughly investigated. They ought to be based on something more than information laid by some disgruntled individual in a community, and I should like to have some assurance from the minister tonight, now that we have more time, that machinery will be set up to go more fully into cases such as this. Compare this man's case with some others I could mention. It is no secret that in Saskatchewan the Deutsch Bund organization was strong prior to the outbreak of the war, and I have good reason to know that. Speaking in my own constituency about the aims at world domination which Hitler had, and speaking against the Munich pact, I was warned on several occasions by officers of the Deutsch Bund that it would be a good idea to keep quiet. None of these men was interned. One was arrested one evening, but before five o'clock next morning, he was released and he joined the army.

Mr. MacNICOL: How was he released?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not know how he was released, though I have heard it stated that he was released to join the army. Here were people who were members of a nazi organization, active in their support of the nazi philosophy; and here is a man who, from all the evidence which I can gather from his neighbours and from people who, while not his friends, knew something about him and his circumstances, was not a member of a nazi organization, was not even sympathetic to the nazis. He was of German origin, and in the course of a heated argument eighteen months before war was declared he said certain things which a man who was arguing with him declared to be pro-nazi. Well, if all the people who said things in a heated argument about economic conditions in Canada and throughout the world generally were to be interned—

Mr. GRAY: Does the hon. member suggest that that situation is general in his riding? Surely that is an unusual situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the hon. member, on more sober reflection, will agree that even if this were the only case, it warrants investigation. And if this case has not been thoroughly investigated, and my two or three days in the district led me to believe that it had not, then there may be others, I suggest to the minister that the advisory committee—it may be necessary to set up two or three advisory committees—should go over these cases and sift the evidence more carefully. In a community ninety or a hundred miles away from a railway it is not easy to send in police to make an investigation, but an investigation should be made as quickly as possible and the evidence more thoroughly sifted, because we should not have any group of people feeling that a man has been interned merely on the basis of what an informer says, or merely because someone who did not like him has reported him to the police.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the statement on which the gentleman to whom he is referring was interned was made eighteen months before war broke out?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is what I am told. The statement he is alleged to have made was made eighteen months before the outbreak of war.

I want to say this in closing. I know it is not popular to espouse unpopular causes. The fact remains that as long as there are any people in this country whose liberties are being restricted, whose freedom of worship has been abrogated, whose rights and privileges are being interfered with, none of us are free. Even a single case like this, if it is a miscarriage of justice, this house and this committee which it is proposed to set up have a serious responsibility to see that machinery, if it is not already in existence, is set up by the Department of Justice, to examine such cases, and if these men have been unjustly interned, to have them returned to their homes, while if they are justly interned some provision should be made by the federal government to take care of their wives and dependents.

Mr. GRAY: I do not wish to question the hon. member; I know he is sincere in what he has said, but I hope he will give the Minister of Justice the name or names of those he is now mentioning.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have already given the minister the man's name and number in the internment camp. The minister already has a file on this man.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): There is one matter that I think might well be brought to the attention of the house at this time with a view to securing from the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) a statement respecting the prosecution last June or at least the setting in motion of the wheels of prosecution against Colonel George Drew. The hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) dealt at some length with the sections of the defence of Canada regulations in question and in particular referred to sections 39 and 39A. If there is one thing that we should guard against in the use of the regulations it is that they be not used in any way by the government of the day in prosecutions that have all the appearance of political prosecutions.

The hon. member for Saskatoon City pointed out that the government had not accepted the recommendation of the committee in respect of the defences that can be raised to prosecutions under section 39, which provides that no person shall spread reports, or make statements or utterances intended or likely to cause disaffection to his majesty or act in any manner, spread reports or make statements or utterances intended or likely to prejudice recruiting; act in any manner, spread reports or make statements or utterances, intended or likely to be prejudicial to the safety of the state or the efficient prosecution of the war.

The hon. member pointed out that the government had not accepted the recommendation made by the committee; that among the defences that would be open to a person charged under section 39 would be that the person intended in good faith to criticize "the conduct of the war." The defence of Canada regulations are a very good example of what I was endeavouring to bring before parliament this afternoon when I criticized the government for using regulations instead of statutes of parliament. As the regulations now stand, any man in this country is liable to prosecution although his purpose is to improve the war effort of this dominion, if his words are likely to interfere with the war effort. There is not a statement that any honest, patriotic citizen could make that is likely to prejudice recruiting that cannot be construed as coming within the provisions of section 39. We saw an example of that last summer in the prosecution of George Drew. The law was set in motion, he was brought before the courts. No man in Canada, not even the Minister of Justice, who must have given permission for the starting of the action, believed that the words which were used by George Drew were not those of a patriotic Canadian citizen, a returned soldier with a gallant record, a man whose sole purpose was to improve the Canadian war effort.

He was brought before the court. The charge was then withdrawn. If the charge had been gone ahead with and the law had been interpreted in accordance with the decision of the court of appeal of Ontario and, I believe, a decision of the court of appeal of British Columbia, however high-minded, however patriotic his intentions, however desirous he was of improving the war effort of this dominion, he was guilty of the offence if he used words that were "likely to prejudice recruiting". If the amendment suggested by the committee had been accepted by this government and the words recommended had been added to section 39B (2) a defence would have been afforded thereby. Why were those words not accepted? The time has come, I believe, when the Minister of Justice should give a full, frank, clear and definite statement to this house and the country as to the reasons for the commencement of that prosecution, as to whether the department really believed, when it permitted that prosecution to be laid, that George Drew had committed an offence akin to sedition and not far removed from treason.

The withdrawal of the charge shows clearly that the government realized that a grave mistake had been committed and a grave injustice done to Colonel Drew. The time has come when the Minister of Justice should on behalf of the government of this country state the facts, and if a mistake was made, as apparently one was, in commencing the prosecution, that an apology should be offered on behalf of the government.

The defence of Canada regulations are necessary; they must be stringent in time of war, but let it never be said that these regulations might be used for the prosecution of those who are opposed to the government. An example of the danger occurred the other day in this house when with reference to an article written by Commander MacLean, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), after replying to the article, made the statement that at the present time the authorities were considering the prosecution of this man under the defence of Canada regulations. At that time the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) made a statement that I thought was particularly apt. His statement was that the minister had said either too much or too little. Almost a week has passed by since that statement was made by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and one begins to question whether or not once more the defence of Canada regulations are being threatened to be used in a manner designed to prevent fair and proper criticism. They should never be used except to punish unfair and untrue criticism or criticism designed to bring or that may well bring solace to the enemy or be prejudicial to the state. I trust that the Minister of Justice when he replies will give us the facts of the Drew case. If amends should be made, as I believe they should, for the commencement of that prosecution which ended in a withdrawal on the recommendation of the special counsel employed by the crown, I hope the minister will make them by frankly admitting that a mistake was made.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to say a word in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and particularly to say something in regard to the solemnity of naturalization proceedings. A little over a year ago I had the good fortune to attend a United States court which was naturalizing several new Americans and making them citizens. The proceedings were extremely impressive. First the judge told them very simply what were the duties of a citizen. Each man read the United States constitution and then the declaration of independence. Each was questioned carefully on both these foundation-stones of American liberty. There was no question in my mind, or in the mind of the judge, that they understood what they were doing and appreciated the responsibilities of citizenship. Those men left that court imbued with a sense of patriotism and Americanism, their hearts filled with pride. We should do more to make our new citizens feel that it is a great thing to be a Canadian. So many of us seem to go about thinking it a rather shameful thing to belong to Canada. We want to get over that, and when these men come before the courts to take the oath of allegiance and complete the great step of becoming a citizen of this country they should be impressed with the fact that they are doing something of which they should be proud. Therefore I am pleased to support the amendment that has been moved.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): In just a word I should like to support the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence), though not precisely by reason of the case mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I refer to the recommendation of the committee that an additional case for exemption be included at the end of regulation 39B. As it stands now, a person may be prosecuted under regulations 39, 39A or 39C for making a great variety of utterances. It is a defence to any such prosecution if the person accused shows that in good faith he intended to criticize the government of Canada or its provinces, or the administration of justce. There were brought before the committee concrete cases, not the one mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre, of prosecutions in which there should have been a defence available to the accused on the ground stated by the committee, namely, that in good faith the accused had intended to criticize the conduct of the war.

The committee had in mind two sorts of conduct of the war. First we had in mind the conduct of the war outside Canada. A great part of the war may be conducted outside Canada by our allies, by joint boards or by various other agencies, and it should be perfectly proper for any Canadian in good faith to criticize those bodies if, in his opinion, they are affecting the conduct of the war. It was argued before the committee that in any such case the accused would have no defence provided that the prosecution found a case under regulation 39, 39A or 39C, so that for that reason this addition was suggested. There was also the additional reason that there might be some difference between the government of Canada and the agencies of the government of Canada. It might be excusable to criticize the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), but not his general staff. It might be permissible to criticize the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), though I am sure no one would wish to do so, but not the officers administering the defence of Canada regulations. It might be permitted to criticize the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), but not the contractors working for him. Therefore, to provide for those cases these words were suggested, and for the further reason that there are other agencies conducting the war in addition to the government of Canada.

When the regulation was under discussion in the committee I do not think it is a breach of confidence to say there was no objection to it. As far as I can remember we spent a good deal of time in trying to find a form of words which would meet the various cases. I do not think any formal vote was taken; certainly there was no material objection, and the proposed amendment met with the substantial support and acquiescence of the committee. We thought we were dealing with a situation which had not been contemplated at the time the regulations were drafted, that we were really making what was a drafting correction. Consequently I hope the Minister of Justice will consider the recommendation of the committee once more. It may be, of course, that reasons were placed before him which were not given to us as to why it should not be adopted, but certainly the committee did not hear any reasons to that effect, and I hope the minister and the government will give further consideration to the recommendation in question.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I will be as brief and as explicit as possible in what I have to say, because I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) wishes to make a statement and to have the motion passed. I wish to make reference to two matters which were not discussed by the defence of Canada regulations committee last session, and my reason for mentioning them now is to bring them to the attention of the committee that is to be set up.

The first matter I desire to mention is in reference to the internment of Italians in Canada. A great deal has been said about other organizations and other people who came under the defence of Canada regulations, but I think the people to whom I am referring were treated about as unjustly as anyone. In the section of the country I have the honour to represent there were about two hundred Italians picked up, but to the best of my knowledge there was very little evidence upon which infractions of the regulations could be based. For years in that section of Canada there was an acute unemployment situation, and an agitation was carried on to displace those people so as to create employment for those who were termed citizens of Canada. Upon Italy's entry into the war that was seized upon as an excuse to pick up these Italians, holus-bolus, and intern them. I knew many of those men personally, and I am reasonably sure that great injustices were perpetrated against them.

I have made representations on behalf of a few of them, and some have been released. However, others are still retained in custody, and evidently very little has been done about their cases. On two or three occasions I have brought the matter to the attention of the house. I suggest that when this committee sits some attention should be paid to the operations of the internment bureau, and special inquiries should be made as to why such a large percentage of Italians are being held in custody.

I shall not elaborate at greater length on the point, because the departmental records contain complete files of people of that nationality. I suggest, however, that the committee should pay particular attention to this phase of the matter. Absolutely nothing was done about it at the last session of parliament, and it is for that reason I should like to bring one particular case to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). The man I have in mind was named John Dornig, of New Waterford, Nova Scotia. He was a man of more than sixty years of age, and at the time of his internment was in poor health. During his incarceration he was under the doctor's care. A few months ago, after many representations to the department, he was released, and shortly thereafter received the following letter from the custodian of alien enemy property:

Department of the Secretary of State
Ottawa, January 29, 1943.

Dear Sir:

The custodian's out-of-pocket expenses in connection with the investigation into the administration of your affairs during your internment amounts to $100.

I shall be glad accordingly to receive a money order for this amount.

That man spent about two years in an internment camp, and while there he was ill. He lost in sickness and accident insurance about $2,500 which he would have received had he not been interned. Now, for carrying on an investigation to satisfy himself that the man was wrongly interned—and that has been proven by virtue of the fact that he was released—the custodian of alien enemy property wants him to pay $100. Surely that is something which should be examined by the committee studying the defence of Canada regulations. Some will say that the expense was incurred in connection with the administration of some of his property. I know this man has no property, and in my opinion the charge is for no reason other than that of making an examination into the files to ascertain whether or not he should be released. I leave these matters to the committee. There are cases I have been attempting to adjust by correspondence and personal representations where I am reasonably sure great injustice is being done.

There is one further matter I should like to mention. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) took considerable time to prove to the house that someone other than himself was responsible for the report of the committee not being lifted from the table. My understanding of his explanation, and my knowledge with respect to the report of the committee presented just prior to the adjournment of the house, lead me to the belief that he proved conclusively that he accepted the responsibility for the committee's report not being lifted. He stated first that he had notified Mr. Speaker in accordance with the regulations that he was prepared to move for the lifting of the report from the table. Under the regulations, after his notification no other hon. member was privileged to move for the lifting of the report. The matter stayed in abeyance in that manner until just before the adjournment of the house. I say, therefore, that if he had not notified the Speaker that he was going to take that action, someone in this group would have done so. I believe to-night that with all his juggling of the English language with respect to the matter of lifting the report he proved conclusively that he was personally responsible for the fact that some other hon. member did not make a similar motion.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, before the minister closes the debate there are two observations by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) concerning which I think some comment should be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister speaks he will be speaking to the amendment, and will not be closing the debate. The amendment will have to be disposed of, and, following that, the main motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Yukon suggested that those of us who were asking that the principles of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly should be practised in war time are possibly communists. He mentioned that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was the only member of this group who made it clear that his sympathies were not with the communist party. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who spoke this evening was opposed at the last general election by a communist candidate. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and I were opposed by officials of the communist party in Saskatchewan. I felt at that time that the communist group were following along lines which were not in the best interest of democracy, or in the best interests of Canada and her war effort. But it seems strange that those leading officials of the communist party were permitted to stand as candidates in a general election. I did not suggest they should be interned. I believed we had a cause which could stand up to any criticism they might offer, and I am glad to say that no member of our organization endeavoured to have communist opponents placed in internment camps.

The hon. member for Yukon suggested that if hostilities between Germany and Russia came to an end, the communists would be on the side of Germany. I consider that this does an injustice to one of our great allies, namely, Russia. Those who make statements of that kind fail to understand the fundamental differences between communism and fascism. And to suggest that those in Canada who are friends of the Soviet Union are not whole-heartedly concerned with seeing that Germany is completely defeated is simply a refusal to face facts.

I wish to voice the hope that in the near future the recommendations made last year by the committee will be acted upon by the government. I refer to the lifting of the ban on the communist party, and consideration of the status of Jehovah's Witnesses and Technocracy.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to point out that this amendment is not relevant to the motion, and its acceptance may create a dangerous precedent. The amendment proposes to graft on to the motion to appoint a committee to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations, 1941, a new question, namely, the consideration of the law relating to naturalization and deportation. There is no relevancy between these two propositions. Amendments must deal with the same subject-matter as the motion they are intended to modify. A member could not, for instance, on a motion to appoint a committee to review the Criminal Code move that the committee will also review the Companies Act. The subject-matter mentioned in the notice must be strictly adhered to, or else there would be no limit and the motion to appoint a committee would open the door to all kinds of investigations of the whole administration.

I am informed that there is some agreement to accept this amendment, but I can allow it only if no exception is taken to its regularity and on condition that its adoption will not be a precedent and be binding upon me. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) wishes to speak he will be speaking solely on the amendment. After the amendment has been disposed of, the house will then deal with the main motion, amended or not amended as the house may decide. Then the minister may reply, but when he does so he will close the debate.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT: I expressed to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that I had no objection to the amendment because I had discussed it with the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) and with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the absence of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). The reason why we thought it could be accepted as an amendment to the motion has been indicated in some of the discussion here to-night. It was suggested that it might be desirable to have some provision for the possible deportation of those whom it has been found necessary to intern as enemies under the defence of Canada regulations. On account of that connection it did not strike me that the amendment was altogether foreign to the main motion. Consideration might be given as to whether or not persons whom it has been found necessary to intern under the defence of Canada regulations should be deported. For that reason the amendment might be looked upon as being connected with the main motion, and there probably would be no embarrassing precedent for Your Honour if you were to allow the amendment to be accepted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the minister that his remarks do not cover the question of naturalization. There is no provision in the defence of Canada regulations with regard to naturalization.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was a provision in the defence of Canada regulations which treated as enemy aliens those persons who were of the races at war with the united nations and who had been naturalized since 1922.

Mr. SPEAKER: I just wish to point out to the minister that while his explanation does give a degree of relevancy to the amendment, I am not altogether satisfied that the principle which is being enunciated to-day is a proper one for the house to accept, namely, to import into a motion before the house another subject matter not relevant to the main subject-matter. I wish that to be noted. That is my opinion. The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Green) agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure that hon. members will not expect me in the few minutes that remain before eleven o'clock to answer all the observations that have been made in something over three hours of debate. This is merely a motion to set up again a committee for the examination of the defence of Canada regulations. A question was addressed to the Prime Minister on February 5 by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) as to whether or not it was the intention to set up again this committee as in previous years to deal with the defence of Canada regulations. That was the first reason for the motion. The second reason was that the committee of last year recommended that it be reconstituted this year to examine the situation as it may exist at this time. The third reason was that all the recommendations made in the report were considered. Certain of them were adopted in the forms suggested by the committee, and other modifications to the regulations were made. It was felt desirable to have the committee consider whether or not the modifications which had been made would have any effect upon the general recommendations.

One modification was dealt with by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and had to do with adding new words to section 39B of the defence of Canada regulations. This section provides that it shall be a defence to any prosecution for a violation of the section to prove that the person accused intended in good faith merely to criticize or to point out errors or defects in the government of Canada. It was suggested that the words "and the conduct of the war" should be added. This was given serious consideration, and the defence departments had serious objections to the amendment in those terms and suggested the modification which was made to regulation 16.

If and when this committee is reconstituted the officials of the defence departments will, I assume, come before the committee and explain what objections they have to the general form of the recommendation that was made. Personally I could see no serious objection to adopting that recommendation, and the law officers in the department could see no serious objection. The matter was discussed with the defence departments over a period of weeks in an effort to arrive at some formula which they considered could be inserted without danger to the safety of the state. The officers of the defence departments will be in position to give what reasons they have for the view that it would be improvident to have an amendment in those terms to section 39B.

With respect to the Jehovah's Witnesses I must say that I know nothing about them. There has not been a prosecution of Jehovah's Witnesses authorized in the department since I have been connected with it. There was a recommendation made with respect to a large number of organizations which appeared to me to be to the effect that the regulation interfered with freedom of conscience or freedom of worship. There was inserted as an addition to paragraph 39C the following:

> No person shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation by reason only of his attending a meeting, the sole purpose of which is religious worship or instruction.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

That has been added, and will be before the committee to consider whether or not it is a sufficient safeguard.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): While it is true that none of these prosecutions has come from his department, is it not true that the attorneys-general of the different provinces, and even magistrates, have carried on prosecutions against these people merely for having Bibles in their possession?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not to my knowledge that such is the situation. I will not say it has not happened; I do not know. I have no knowledge of any prosecution of Jehovah's Witnesses, and I know that none has come to my attention in the department since I have come there.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There were eleven last week, I think.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the supposed illogical situation in which the department would be because communists have been released from custody and because the ban has not been removed, I might say that all those who have been released from custody have been released not because they were communists but because they said that they wanted to help in our war effort and because they individually signed undertakings that they would > . . . not participate in any propaganda or other activities of the communist party of Canada or of any organization over which the communist party exercises control, or of any other association, group, society, or organization declared to be illegal under regulation 39C of the defence of Canada regulations.

If they have not complied with that undertaking it is not because they did not give it. They were released upon the distinct understanding and upon the assertion that they were the most ardent anti-fascists who could be found anywhere, and that they were not asking to be released for the purpose of carrying on communistic propaganda, but that they were asking to be released because they wanted to help us win the war. If instead of doing that they have done something else they have violated the undertaking. There have been certain representations that this has been done. I have had these representations investigated, and I have not yet been satisfied, with respect to any of these organizations which have been mentioned, that it would be possible to establish before a court of justice that it was an organization "over which the communist party exercises control."

As to the communist party itself and its doctrines I am not speaking for the government. I stated very clearly last year what my own views were. I considered that the communist party is illegal, not only because it is declared to be so in the defence of Canada regulations, but because its aims are contrary to the criminal code and because, when section 98 was struck from the criminal code, section 133 was amended by adding thereto the following:

Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention" everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change within Canada.

There is a clear distinction to be drawn between people who advocate the use of force without the authority of law as a means of accomplishing governmental changes in Canada, and the government of our Russian allies. I am quite sure that if we or any group of people from Canada were to go to Russia and to advocate the use of force to overthrow the Russian government, our organization would be looked upon in Russia as subversive and seditious.

The fact that these people have been released, or that those who adhere to their doctrines are now outspoken advocates of a substantial or total war effort, does not detract from their original aims; and quite recently language which I will quote before the committee was used by one of them at a meeting which was attended, not by persons who had been interned and released, but by others who were formerly known to be members of the communist party. And right here I may say that, at the same time that the other amendment about freedom of worship was made, regulation 39C was amended to make it an offence, not to belong to the communist party —those were the terms in which the article previously existed—but to act as a member or as an officer of the party. So that the intellectual adherence to the doctrines would not be an offence. The offence would merely be constituted by some overt act to further the aims of the organization. The amended regulation now reads:

Every person who acts as an officer or member of an illegal organization or who advocates or defends the acts, principles or policy of such illegal organization, shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why, if the criminal code is as it is, is the regulation necessary? Why not lift the ban?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Because, if the ban in the defence of Canada regulations were removed, it would be asserted all over Canada, and believed by a great many people, that the aim of the national council for democratic rights had been achieved; that the great issue of democracy which they have stated in a number of their publications had been realized, and that the legality of the communist party had been asserted affirmatively by this parliament. This is from one of their publications:

Why should the legality of the communist party be an endorsation of communism, any more than the legality of the Conservative party would be an endorsation of Conservative tenets?

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not forget that "Progressive", too.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Do not you forget it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The publication to which I referred also contains this:

Is Mr. St. Laurent, on the basis of political prejudice, to be allowed to determine what organizations and groups shall be legal or illegal in Canada? Is his personal opinion to be the measure of freedom of organization? . . . Since when does freedom of association and conscience depend upon agreements or disagreements with creeds by a minister of the crown? . . .

If the personal opinion of a minister of the crown, who dislikes a given political theory, is to be the principle upon which the democratic fabric of Canada is to operate, then, no group, no organization, no religious belief or any creed is safe—all will be at the mercy of the prejudices of this minister.

That is what will be taken to be the meaning of lifting the ban in the defence of Canada regulations; and one of those who was released, Mr. Tim Buck, in a number of speeches said that what was wanted was the lifting of the ban to make the communist party a legal organization in Canada; and that if the ban were lifted, the impression throughout the country would be that something had been done by this parliament to make the communist party as legal a party as the Progressive Conservative party, to which some of the pamphlets attempt to liken it. I think that would be giving serious encouragement to propagating a doctrine which now is contrary to the criminal code, and is so under an amendment which was recognized as designed to have that effect when it was inserted in the code; because, if hon. members will look at the debate which took place in 1936, they will find Mr. Woodsworth saying to the then Minister of Justice that he was taking away with one hand what he was giving with the other by repealing section 98. And notwithstanding the logic of the reproach that was then being made to the Minister of Justice, this house saw fit to do what the then Minister of Justice proposed, and to add to section 133 a paragraph which amounted in fact to taking away with one hand what was being given, by the repeal of section 98, as to its substantial provision, with the other hand.

Mr. COLDWELL: The then Minister of Justice denied that he was doing that. That is my recollection.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If my hon. friend wishes to read the debate he will find that it was on June 19, 1936.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He will find it on pages 3900 and following of Hansard of that year. I have read two or three times the whole debate, and the hon. gentleman will find that the then Minister of Justice persisted and merely accepted one suggestion, namely, that the amendment be restricted to advocating the use of force to bring about governmental changes within Canada. The amendment at first had been drawn in general terms—to bring about governmental changes. It was suggested that this might extend to governmental changes anywhere, and it was restricted to governmental changes within Canada. I think that all other matters dealt with by hon. members can be quite fully gone into in committee. Everyone seems to be desirous to have the committee set up, and since we have now taken over three and a half hours to say "yes" to the motion, I suggest that the question be put and the motion carried, so that the committee can get down to its business and obtain in more accurate form all the information required.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister going to let the matter stand as it is without making any explanation with respect to the Colonel Drew matter raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to Colonel George Drew? I did not intend at this time to make any statement in that connection. If I felt there was any apology due to Colonel George Drew, I would not hesitate to make it, but knowing the facts that I know, my opinion is that I owe him no apology.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) as amended agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

SOVIET UNION

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF THE RUSSIAN ARMY—TRIBUTE TO ITS VALOUR AND SPIRIT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): To-day marks the celebration in the Soviet Union of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the red army. Its achievements in the last twenty months have given to all the free peoples who have been resisting nazi aggression so much cause for encouragement and thanksgiving. I do not wish to allow the occasion to pass without reference in this house to the successes of the Soviet forces under the leadership of Premier Stalin. The whole free world is in their debt for what they have done to withstand the German invaders and to drive them from many thousands of square miles of Soviet territory. May their arms continue to be successful until victory over our common enemy is achieved.

Speaking of Russia's successes I should like to repeat in this house a warning which Mr. Eden gave to the people of Great Britain in his speech in London on Sunday. The foreign secretary of Great Britain pointed out that German propaganda was trying to succeed where German armies had failed and was making every effort to foster suspicion and encourage dissension between the allies by reviving the bogey of bolshevism and by representing Hitler as the saviour of western civilization. We must be on our guard in Canada against deceptions and propaganda of this kind. Inspired by mutual trust and confidence, begotten of common efforts, let us believe in and work for full and frank cooperation towards victory among all members of the united nations, and after victory has been won, towards a just and durable peace.

The past year has witnessed the establishment of direct diplomatic relations between Canada and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, which was announced in this house on June 12. Shortly afterwards we had the pleasure of welcoming to Canada Mr. Feodor Gousev as Soviet minister, and I am glad to be able to inform the house that Mr. Dana Wilgress will shortly establish the first Canadian diplomatic mission in the U.S.S.R. I am sure it is the fervent hope of all Canadians that the establishment of diplomatic relations is but the prelude to a long period of mutual understanding and cooperation between our two peoples, both in the conduct of the war and in the maintenance of a firm and durable peace.

Impressive figures have recently been made public in the United Kingdom and the United States of the supplies furnished to the Soviet government by the united nations. I should like the people of Canada to know as fully as possible within the limits of military secrecy what portion of these supplies has been produced in Canada.

Out of a total of over six thousand tanks more than one thousand were manufactured in Canada. Two thousand universal carriers have gone forward to the U.S.S.R., as well as quantities of guns and over 22,000,000 rounds of ammunition of various types. We have sent to the Russian people military clothing and supplies. Many shiploads of strategic metals and materials have gone forward from Canada. In the field of foodstuffs the house will recall the Canadian-Soviet credit agreement under which a credit of $10,000,000 was extended to the U.S.S.R. to cover purchases of Canadian wheat and flour. The Canadian people have contributed $1,000,000 to the Canadian Red Cross Society and these funds have been used to supply essential medical supplies vitally needed on the Russian front. The Canadian aid to Russia fund has also completed an appeal for $1,000,000, to which the Canadian public have generously responded by subscribing in cash a sum considerably over $2,000,000. If the value of goods donated were added the total would be considerably over $3,000,000. Thus essential weapons, munitions of war and raw materials, foodstuffs and medical supplies have gone forward from Canada to strengthen the Russian people in the fight, while at the same time Canadian forces, together with their comrades in arms from each of the united nations, have hammered powerful blows against the common enemy.

In paying tribute to the valour and spirit of the Red army our admiration is equalled only by our determination to face the common enemy with like fortitude. To-day our common task in this vast struggle has brought Russia and Canada closer together. To-morrow, when the scourge of fascism has been blasted from the minds of free men everywhere, our peoples must work side by side to aid in the establishment of a world order based on inter-dependence and on the worth of human personality.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I deem it a very great honour and privilege to associate the Progressive Conservative party in this house with what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It seems to me particularly appropriate that on this occasion, when the Red army is celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary, we in Canada should pay a well-deserved tribute to that great ally who in this war has shown a strength which perhaps many of us at one time thought she did not possess. The other day a German propagandist made this statement with respect to the present situation concerning Germany and Russia; that the Russians had broken loose with a power eclipsing all imagination. I think to-day we in Canada are only too pleased to have the opportunity to express something of our feelings and our thoughts with respect to the tenacity, the heroism and the bravery being shown by the Russian people, their army and their government in the interests of freedom and liberty throughout the world. As long as the voice of freedom is heard it will pay tribute to the valour, the endurance and the indomitable pluck of the Red army of Russia in this conflict, and I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to so honourable and so staunch a fighting ally in this great cause.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation I too should like to support what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I am sure there is no one in this house or in the country who does not admire the bravery and fortitude with which our Russian allies have withstood the onslaught of a well-prepared, dangerous and bitter foe. A short time ago I was reading Ambassador Davis's "Mission to Moscow", and I was amazed at the appreciation he had, even before Munich, of the strength of the Russian army and the likelihood of its being able to withstand an onslaught from the west. To-day, in endorsing what the Prime Minister has said, may I suggest that it is part of our bounden duty to try to break down the suspicion that still exists in some quarters with regard to Russia, bearing in mind that in the days which will follow this great struggle Russia will play a leading part in the reconstruction of the world. Ever since Russia entered this conflict I have been hopeful that two things might happen: first, that Russia might become rather more democratic in its ways and its methods of government, and second that we, the democratic nations, might become rather more progressive.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: I mean "progressive" in the dictionary meaning of the word; when you tag on to it the word "Conservative" you have a conflict in terms. Therefore I should like to emphasize this hope that the association may do us both good.

I know that in some quarters there still lingers a feeling of fear of a repetition of the bolshevik revolution. Well, revolutions are recorded throughout the pages of history, and apparently the people who brought about those revolutions were not always ashamed of them later. If we look through the pages of our own history we find that in 1649 the English people had a revolution which spilled much blood and chopped off a king's head. The American revolution was a great historic event which also caused a good deal of unnecessary bloodshed, as did the French revolution. But out of these revolutions, deplorable though they were, came something better for the nations involved and something better for mankind; so perhaps, and I think indeed for certain, out of the revolution which took place in Russia we may see something better arise in that country.

May I leave with the house just one further thought. We all applauded when we heard of the splendid manner in which our Canadian people had responded to appeals for aid to Russia. This is as it should be; but I suggest that after all Russia is not asking for charity. I am indeed glad that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), in presenting the resolution concerning the gift to the united nations on behalf of the Canadian people, has included all our allies. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the party with which I am associated I heartily concur in the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, coming fourth in the list of speakers it may well be assumed that everything worth saying has been said. Therefore I think it is only necessary for me to add that our group heartily concur in the fine things that have been said.

ALMONTE RAILWAY ACCIDENT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FINDINGS OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to inquire from the Minister of Transport when he will be able to table the report of the board of transport commissioners concerning the railway wreck at Almonte on December 27.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): No doubt the hon. gentleman has reference to the findings of the board of transport commissioners following their investigation of the Almonte wreck. The findings, decrees and orders of the board of transport commissioners usually are tabled with their annual report, as required by the act. However, I shall see that a copy of this finding is sent to my hon. friend right away.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest that the finding should be tabled in the House of Commons, because it is of interest throughout the country. We should not have to wait until the tabling of the annual report.

Mr. MICHAUD: I will ask that this report be included with those made up during the last year, and they will be tabled to-morrow or the day after.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MAYBANK

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS COMMITTEE—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. GILLIS IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 22

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this earliest opportunity to endeavour to wipe out what amounts to a reflection either intentionally or unintentionally cast upon me in the debate last night. After I had left the house the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) declared with respect to the non-adoption of the report of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations that it was I who had in effect stood in the way of the report being presented for adoption, and that I was responsible for his, and members of his party, being prevented from securing the adoption of the report. I wish to indicate by the rules of the house how completely inaccurate such a statement or suggestion is. It is true, as I said in the house last night, that there is a measure of responsibility upon me; I freely and frankly took such responsibility last night. The hon. member's remark arose from the fact that I had stated that responsibility for the non-adoption rested on his shoulders as well as on those of other members of his party, and of other hon. members in the house.

The facts are matters of record. I served notice that I would move the adoption of the report, and after forty-eight hours I was free to do so. But when I did not do so, then according to the rules and practices of the house, as is well known by a number of hon. members in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, any one of them was completely free to move the adoption. I cannot speak with certainty as to whether the hon. member for Cape Breton South was ignorant of or whether he had knowledge upon that particular point. I should have thought he was well aware of the position at all times, and that he himself knew he had that right; but if he would say I am wrong about that, naturally, I would accept his statement. However it is perfectly true that according to the rules and practices of the house it was the right of every hon. member of his party, or of any one of them, to move the adoption of the report, and each of them refrained from doing so.

The house, not I only, was at that time seized of that notice I had given. It was not I only who had the right to move the adoption of the report. It was the right also of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. But if he was not personally aware of his rights, then other hon. members of his party, and in particular his leader, or the hon. member of his group who sat on the committee, certainly did know the facts. There can be no question about that.

One other point: It was the representative of his party who agreed with others—not with me, because I was not in agreement—that the adoption of the report should not be moved.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to have an interpretation of standing order 45. I may say that that was not my understanding of the rule. My understanding was that forty-eight hours' notice was given by an hon. member proposing to move concurrence. Discussing the matter this morning I told the hon. member for Cape Breton South that I did not think anyone who had not given notice had the right to move the adoption. I should like to have that cleared up, because it is an interesting point of procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question before the house on which a ruling must be given. The question should have been raised at the time the notice of concurrence in the report was given, and therefore I am not in a position at this time to make any distinction between the points made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Within the rules of the house the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has raised a question of privilege, as he was entitled to do. At the moment however there can be no discussion with regard to what has been said in raising the question of privilege. That matter will have to be brought before me at some other time.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): With respect to the question of privilege may I be permitted to make a few observations?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is entitled to correct any error.

Mr. SPEAKER: On a question of privilege an hon. member has the right to discuss a misinterpretation of something stated by himself in a speech. He may point out any misconstruction given to his words. But a question of privilege is not an occasion for a debate with respect to a statement made by another hon. member on a question of privilege.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not my intention to debate the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. But I say he is in error in his observations respecting my remarks of last night.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member to say he is of the opinion the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was in error in the statement he made last night?

Mr. COLDWELL: The statement he made to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is all trial and error.

Mr. GILLIS: I stated last night that in his explanation as reported at page 615 of Hansard he had given me the impression that he was largely responsible for the committee's report not being moved at the last session. I still hold that impression, notwithstanding what he has said this afternoon. The report was brought in toward the close of the session. I was not a member of the committee, but I was interested in the report. I was informed that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had given Mr. Speaker notice, in accordance with the rules, that he would move the adoption of the report. I was further informed that under the rules, while his notification stood no other hon. member was privileged to make that motion. I had spoken to him personally, and he told me that he was not sure whether or not he would move the report, but that he would inform me if he did intend to move it. When he decided he would not make the motion there was not sufficient time left in the session to give anyone an opportunity of going through the regular formula required to bring the matter before the house. I still contend my contention of last night was correct.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE OF FRENCH-CANADIAN WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I have already made an attempt to draw the attention of the government to the fact that French-Canadian workers are not represented on the national war labour board. Is the government considering the advisability of naming a French Canadian to represent that group of workers?

Mr. REID: I wonder if there is a Scotsman on the board.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On February 12 I made a very full statement in the house with respect to the organization of the board, and if there are to be any changes or additions the house will be informed in due course.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Cardin.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose on Friday night I had been speaking for about half an hour, and, as I remember, I was setting forth the reasons why my group would oppose the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). During the course of my remarks I stated why I believed the motion had been made. I thought it was rather a motion of protest on the part of a considerable section of the people of Canada as represented by the hon. member who moved the amendment. I still believe that to be so. At the same time within the amendment itself two reasons are set forth to justify it. As I understand it, the first is that there is confusion throughout the dominion with respect to labour, and the second is that there is a fear that we shall not have the production which is necessary.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I should like to deal with that aspect of the amendment.

We grant that the whole labour situation in Canada is in a muddle, and we believe that every aspect of it should be examined. We contend that the entire state of affairs as regards this matter ought to be clarified and the various inadequacies adjusted. If the government has fallen down in any one thing more than another since the beginning of the war it has been in the management of the labour supply of the country. The government has been guilty of making grievous mistakes with respect to labour, and within the next few months I feel sure we shall see a clear manifestation of that fact. Then he who runs may read.

We agree that a parliamentary committee ought to be struck, as suggested by the hon. member in his amendment. This committee should investigate objectively and intensively and completely the labour conditions throughout Canada. It seems to me that a number of departments are involved in the labour question. Obviously the three departments which are concerned with the defence of the country are interested; then there is the Department of Labour and the national selective service branch. At various stages other departments have been involved; they seem to be falling over each other and creating confusion, and the result is that hardly anyone knows just what is what with respect to labour. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has had to step in occasionally and give us a speech setting forth what was to happen, and the result is we just do not know what the position is. A committee charged with the responsibility of ascertaining all the facts in regard to the matter would be doing a service to this country, and I agree with the hon. member in that respect.

I believe also that the whole food situation in Canada ought to be canvassed with the greatest care. I have indicated my feeling in this respect before. The fuel situation is far graver than most people realize; there is much danger of a serious and painful fuel shortage next year which may affect people from end to end of this country. This parliament ought to examine into the situation so that we may know just how serious it is and provide the necessary remedies. Housing conditions in Canada should also be examined into; they are partly a result of the labour situation. Then the matter of transportation, referred to in the amendment, should be investigated. It is my belief that there is plenty of man-power and woman-power in Canada provided that it is wisely and effectively mobilized and applied where it is needed.

One example that comes to mind is the mismanagement of labour with respect to gold. This point has been dealt with already in some measure in this house by certain hon. members. I understand that something like 22,000 men in Canada are still engaged in the useless work of producing gold. I understand also that over $200,000,000 worth of gold is being produced in this country. Of what conceivable value it can be is beyond the power of anyone who faces the facts to decide.

There is another matter in connection with which I think we should have a committee. As I say, I believe that this amendment is a protest by reason of the feeling which exists between a great many French-Canadian people and English-Canadian people. A committee should be appointed at this session whose work should be to examine into the whole situation that exists between the two great races of Canada. The object of this committee should be the bringing about of conditions that will be fair to both races. I have heard statements made by some of my French-Canadian compatriots to the effect that they feel they are being discriminated against in connection with the economic affairs of this country. That may be so; I am inclined to think that it is so. That matter should be looked into; the truth should be found out and equal treatment given to everybody from one end of Canada to the other. It should be done at this session, before anything serious develops. The committee should consist of representatives of both races, and the representation should be such as to make everyone feel satisfied that justice will be done, that the whole case will be heard. Every province should be adequately represented, as well as every party, so that there can be a non-political, unprejudiced investigation into the whole question. Thus we might create harmony, good feeling and good will between the two great races whom destiny and providence have ordained should work together in the building of Canada.

I believe that these committees would do a great deal of good in the country. To that extent I agree with the hon. member's amendment. However, I do not think the working of the mobilization act should be suspended until the committee has finished its work. The committee could work just as well while the war effort of this country was going forward under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Therefore I am going to oppose the amendment on the ground that the suspension of this act and the disruption of the country's war effort are unnecessary.

There is another matter which should be taken care of in connection with this whole question. Canada should remove at once the financial restrictions which are hampering the country at every turn and which are creating unpleasant and probably injurious incidents between the French-Canadian and the English-Canadian people. If Canada were to free herself of all financial restrictions and base her war effort and her economy purely on the man-power and material resources which we have, we should find it easier to clear up many of the difficulties which have caused the feeling which has given rise to the sub-amendment.

We could reward men for going into the various activities into which we wish them to go. Many people of Canada up to the present time have not realized that we could have encouraged men to join the army in such numbers that we would have found it difficult to keep out of the army a sufficient number of men to carry on the rest of the nation's business. As I say, we could reward men for going to war simply by promising them sufficient financial consideration and thus providing that they should be not worse off but better off for enlisting. We could get men to go into agriculture or any other activity by the simple method of rewarding them adequately for so doing. Consequently, if Canada were in control of the financial mechanism which is operative in this country and if she exercised that financial mechanism with the object of mobilizing all our resources, we should overcome much of the ill-feeling which has developed.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, after some hesitation I have decided to say a few words on the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). In a pressing appeal for support of this amendment the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) the other day made references to some of the members who spoke in the debate on the address and discussed man-power and the labour shortage on the farms. I was one of the members who spoke in the debate on the address and touched on those questions, but surely not in the way that the hon. member for Témiscouata implied. Indeed I think I did the very opposite. I did not criticize the government any more than the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) criticized the government. I said that the Conservative party, having advocated for over three and a half years the conscription of more and more men, were now complaining that there was a shortage of men on the farms, and I congratulated the government upon having followed the policy of a balanced war effort. I also stressed the importance of agriculture and the necessity of its being continued unimpaired. I quoted some authorities in support of my contention and ended by saying that the welfare of the farmers, while in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture was well safeguarded.

I could reply to some other urgings and coaxings and pleadings which have been made recently and which are based on predictions and prophecies, but in order to save time I shall not do so. I repeat to-day what I said the other day, and I am consistent, I believe, in voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, as I intend to do. Far be it from me to lecture anybody, but I think that in matters which are open to controversy it is often expedient to let well enough alone, particularly in this case, knowing the circumstances under which the mobilization law was passed and knowing the manner and extent of its application. In all these circumstances the act offers a singularly good occasion for letting well enough alone. I shall say no more on that, and I am sure I shall be understood.

This session, Mr. Speaker, has just begun. The members have come here to report on what has taken place in their respective constituencies since the adjournment of the house last fall. The members have already done that duty and have reported to the government what they have found. They have pointed out that great care must be taken in enlisting more men because enlistments seem to have reached what I might term the saturation point. More than ever do I think that the speech from the throne this year has afforded us an opportunity for a debate which has been very useful. We have been able to talk upon any subject. The members have come here from their constituencies with very recent knowledge of what their constituents have told them, and in turn they have been able to tell the government what is taking place throughout the country. The ministers, who are all shrewd men, have listened, and I submit that they have already begun to remedy the present situation. For instance, the Minister of Agriculture in his address in this house on February 9, put on Hansard a letter which has already been addressed to all directors of boards in charge of granting exemptions or postponements of military service. I beg leave to quote only two or three paragraphs of this letter:

This is the first of such letters which will be issued by the labour department.

This means that other letters will be sent and that further steps may be taken to remedy the situation. I quote further:

[Mr. Brunelle.]

The growing scarcity of agricultural labour makes it increasingly important that essential agricultural workers be encouraged to remain on farms.

Further:

Farm workers who apply for postponement of military training are to be granted postponement until further notice.

This good beginning is sufficient to make me trust the government and believe that whenever the occasion arises other remedies will be applied. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I believe that any investigation which may be made into the shortage of man-power on the farm should be conducted by the ministers themselves. It is their responsibility. I have complained, as almost every other member of the house has done, of the fact—and the fact is an inevitable one—that too much of the responsibility of the ministers is being transferred to somebody else. My friend the member for Richelieu-Verchères, whom I esteem very much, has himself complained that too many boards and commissions were made to assume the responsibilities of the ministers. I like to approve and follow the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères whenever he is right, and I think he was right when he said that. But in moving the amendment which is now before the house I do not think he agrees with what he said in the speech he made on the address only a few days ago, and I am sorry I cannot follow him this time.

The organization of our immense national resources was a tremendous job. It has been done well by our ministers; and happily this country had at its head the best brains and the most brilliant administrative minds that it could have. In saying this I wish to compliment the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, because he himself was one of the ministers when this mobilization law was framed and passed, and even during the first two years of its operation. In changing the complete national organization from a peace-time to a war-time production it is inevitable that mistakes will occur, that there will be shortcomings or deficiencies. The shortage of men at the present time is one of those inevitable defects, and I believe the government in charge of the affairs of the country will correct it in due course. When that famous and glorious "new order" is being established the same thing will occur; there will be defects; there will be shortcomings, but with good will and understanding everyone will do his best to correct those deficiencies and defects. So that to-day, with good will and understanding, the shortage of men on the farms will easily be remedied.

I think that the first duty of hon. members when they came to attend this present session was to make representations to the government and show where remedies should be applied. This we have done. The second duty of members was to afford the government a reasonable opportunity of putting remedial measures into effect. This, I hope, we shall do.

The amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères means the overthrow of the government; it cannot mean anything else. If my memory serves me rightly, I took this definite and precious opinion from the lips of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères himself when last year a similar amendment was made to the speech from the throne while he was a minister of the crown. I cannot support such a drastic measure at this time. In spite of the grievances I have—and at a time like this almost everybody has grievances—I retain my faith in the government; and particularly I trust the Prime Minister, whose record as a brilliant administrator and a wise leader of men is the pride of almost every Canadian citizen. I wish to add that as a rule I revolt against the mere idea of following anyone sheepishly or blindly against the dictates of my conscience or the conclusions of my humble judgment. But when I find a really superior man who is honest, who is highly experienced in a matter which happens to concern me, I do not hesitate; I take pride in following him. And to-day the Prime Minister is really a superman. I wish to add, in case somebody may say that I have changed, that last year the situation was quite different. I, in common with other hon. members, had a special and specific mandate to fulfil. This year I am free to act and to vote according to my humble judgment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the mandate the hon. member had to fulfil last year?

Mr. BRUNELLE: I can easily reply to my hon. friend. It was on the debate concerning the amendment of the mobilization law.

Mr. ROWE: The plebiscite vote.

Mr. BRUNELLE: It was in connection with the amendment of the mobilization law. I say that I had then a special mandate; and I do not intend to go into this matter again. We discussed it fully last year, and all of us knew about it. My hon. friend must have been absent at that time, because surely every hon. member must know of it.

We are invited to vote for an amendment which if carried would mean the overthrow of the government. Before plunging into such an adventure I want to know where I am going.

Mr. ROWE: Page the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Honestly and sincerely I wish to ask the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, whom I esteem very much, to tell me now whom he would want to sit in the place of the Prime Minister.

Mr. CARDIN: I can tell the hon. gentleman that I know perfectly well where he is going.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What will happen to him at the next election, I suppose.

Mr. BRUNELLE: This reply of the hon. member is not an answer to my question, and, coming from him, I say that it is a deplorable reply.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. member going to a deplorable place?

Mr. BRUNELLE: I hope the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will not interrupt. He does not like to be interrupted, and I am sure he will agree with me when I say that it takes a great deal less patience for him to listen to me than it takes for us to listen to him.

Mr. POULIOT: The truth hurts.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Some people say that any man can be replaced. It is true that the most brilliant man, even a genius, can be replaced, but how?

In conclusion I wish to say that the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères might have its raison d'être at a later time—if, for instance, the government would not listen to our representations. But coming at this time, when the government has had no opportunity to remedy the situation which has been depicted by hon. members, this amendment is unnecessary, inexpedient and premature.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before the amendment to the amendment is voted upon I should like to say a few words, since I was unable to be present on Friday afternoon when the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) placed the considered point of view of our group before the house. As he said then, we shall vote against the amendment to the amendment. We believe that in the midst of this great struggle, when in a very real sense we are fighting for our survival, we could not possibly suspend the operation of any acts or regulations which relate to the conduct of the war. No matter how much we may disapprove policies adopted by the government and subsequently approved by parliament, we hold the view, and I believe it is the proper and democratic view, that when parliament has given its approval to a certain line of policy it is the duty of members of parliament to support that policy until there is an opportunity of changing it. In peace time one can rise in the House of Commons or elsewhere almost as soon as a policy has been adopted and urge that it be changed; but once we are committed to our allies to taking a certain part in that war, and the war itself is in progress, we must support the policy accepted by parliament under which it is being conducted. That is our position.

I thoroughly agree with my friend the hon. member for Weyburn and others in this house when they point out that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) is moved by one who was a member of the government when the policies which we are now discussing were instituted. Therefore there can be little doubt that at that time the hon. member gave his support to them.

Since the war began we in this group have urged on many occasions, beginning with the day the war broke out, that the first thing that should have been done was the making of a thorough survey of all our resources in order to determine in what manner we could best serve the common cause. We believed and stated that if we allowed ourselves to be stampeded in any one direction we might ultimately find ourselves in difficulty as a nation. Ever since this war began there have been those who failed to recognize that this is not a war in which large bodies of men move from place to place or are entrenched, as in former wars, but a mechanized war in which many machines are used, the operators of which not only have to be very highly trained but also have to be supported by large numbers of men in industry and agriculture whose business it is to produce the machines and food required for the conduct of the war. Hence our failure to conceive an over-all plan is very largely the difficulty which we face at the present time.

Our friends to my immediate right have been very interesting to many of us in the house this year. In the first two years of the war we heard from them continuous criticisms to the effect that we were not placing enough men under arms, that we were not preparing to send more and more men into the battle line. This year they have been in agreement with the contention of many other hon. members of the house that in order to maintain those men in the battle line we must have large numbers of well-trained men in our factories and on the farms producing the commodities required to enable us to play our part in the conduct of this war as we are best able to do.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who said a few minutes ago that even at this time a useful purpose would be served by accepting at least one of the suggestions made in the proposed subamendment, namely, that a thorough survey even at this late day should be made of our man-power in order to see how best we can apportion it in the several fields of endeavour connected with the war. This must be done not at a time when we are withholding the mobilization of man-power, but when we are actually continuing our mobilization. There is no reason in the world why a thorough survey should not be made and an understanding arrived at of the possibilities of our country. So I say that the suggestion in the subamendment to the effect that a committee be set up to inquire into the man-power problem in this country is a constructive suggestion. But while we regard it as such we could not possibly support an amendment which would withhold from the government at this critical time the right to continue to call men for service in the armed forces.

The problem is not only one of men in the armed forces. As has been properly pointed out by many hon. members in this debate, we require to produce this year larger quantities of food than ever. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made this very clear to us when he spoke in the present debate. If we are to have the quantity of food produced in this country that is required not only by our own and allied armies but also to assist in feeding people in Europe when the second front is opened in the west and the nations are liberated, then we require to pay particular attention to the problem of man-power on the farm. I noticed that on February 9 the Canadian federation of agriculture placed before the Prime Minister a brief on the subject of man-power in agriculture in which they made the position clear. The spokesmen for the federation stated that it will be impossible to meet the greatly increased production goals if a heavy drain on the skilled man-power of the farms continues. They went on to say that it was their considered opinion that the increasing shortage in farm labour cannot be met by the unpaid labour of the farmer's wife and young children, nor can skilled labour so essential to present-day farming be replaced by untrained help from the cities, without a decline in the production of food. The federation recommended that to ensure an adequate supply of skilled farm help the allocation of the available man-power supply should be made without discrimination between agriculture and other essential war industries. For peak labour demands during seeding and harvest, they suggest that military authorities should release men in military training and that the steps necessary to this end should be taken in ample time to meet the situation. These were constructive proposals from the federation of agriculture which I would warmly commend to the minister.

Underlining the man-power muddle in which we find ourselves, a return for which I asked before the house met, which was tabled on February 10, indicates clearly how serious the situation is, not only because we have shortages in some fields of vital industry but also because we have at the present time a great deal of unemployment.

I asked for a return indicating the number of persons registered as seeking work at the regional employment offices, five in number. I find, for example, that on January 14 of this year there were 96,331 persons so registered, and I believe that number has since risen to some extent. This emphasizes the plea that we should have some investigation into our man-power policy in order that we may serve to the greatest extent possible the needs of this country and of the war effort. The group with which I am associated has continually urged that an all-out war effort requires not only the mobilization and organization of our human resources but, even more fundamentally, the organization on the same terms and the same basis of industry and wealth. If we are going to have an all-out war effort, we must do exactly that.

Before I sit down there is just one other thing I should like to say. I hope during this session of parliament we may be able to end the kind of controversy about the war effort that from time to time we have had to endure here. If we could only realize that to-day we are in very truth fighting a war of survival; that while we may hold different views and advocate different policies it should be the duty of all to endeavour to see to it that the war effort of our country is a maximum contribution to the common cause of defeating the aggressor powers. So that while it seems to me the time is long past when we should have formulated a thorough-going, comprehensive, over-all war plan for this country, at least now that time ought to be here in a very real sense. As I say, we should endeavour during this session to see to it that we make our maximum effort in the conduct of the war and that the man-power, financial and economic resources of the country are utilized to the very best effect. This cannot be done by overemphasizing one phase or the other of our national effort. We should endeavour to see each part of our great effort in its own true and proper perspective. Only in that way can we make our maximum contribution to the common cause.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to conceal the fact that I feel reluctant to rise at this time in order to voice views at variance with those suggested by the amendment moved by the honourable member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). If I find it so painful to contradict him it is because for so many years—and for my part I might say since my early youth—we had been used to see the mover of the amendment at the head of the Liberal forces in our good old province of Quebec, and we were fond of hearing the redoubtable fighter endowed with such captivating and convincing eloquence. We enjoyed following him when he campaigned in company with the late lamented Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and indeed we had every reason to admire and esteem him. If most of us cannot follow him to-day he may nevertheless be sure that he still enjoys our full esteem. Of course we are sorry that he has seen fit to leave the government which has and will continue to have our unflinching support.

I may say about his amendment that it expresses some of our feelings. Thus when the hon. member states:

"This house is of the opinion that in view of the recognized shortage of farm labour, also the admitted shortage of labour in war industries and in other essential industrial and transportation activities, . . .

When he voices such a regret, I can tell him that most of us fully agree with him. I, for one, have had an opportunity of representing to the proper authorities that they should make available to farmers such help as is essential to the production required for our armed forces and for our allies.

In Quebec military district No. 5, the responsible authorities—or what we call the deferment board—have as a rule granted postponements to those who could prove that they were bona fide farmers. Unfortunately, our young farmers, not very conversant with the law, have often failed to answer the first call and to apply for the postponement to which they were entitled. On the other hand the deferment board was rather inclined to follow the letter rather than observe the spirit of the law, and in this, as in everything, the letter killeth while the spirit giveth life.

So that quite recently, on February 3, to be exact, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) sent a letter to the chairman of the mobilization boards—that is to the postponement boards—containing instructions and an interpretation of the mobilization act. I think it important that certain parts of this letter be put on Hansard so that our farmers might be made aware of the privileges to which they are entitled and which should be granted them when they apply to the mobilization board for a postponement. This letter is dated February 3 and reads in part as follows:

It is the intention of the regulations that agricultural workers are to be retained in agricultural employment as far as practical through the national selective service (civilian) regulations. To the extent that their services can be spared from the farms during the "off-crop" season they are to be encouraged to take temporary seasonal employment in lumbering and logging, forestry, fishing, coal and base metal mining, and acceptance of seasonal work in such industries does not deprive men of their right to postponement as agricultural workers providing they return to farm work when the season re-opens.

I have often been asked, I might say, practically every day by visitors who come to see me and by electors who tell me: I have been granted a postponement, and I would like to know if I am permitted to work in the bush this winter, or to work elsewhere during the "off-season", so as to earn a few extra dollars. Well, farmers should be better informed of the interpretation of the law as given in this letter and be in a position to take advantage of this privilege. It should be made very clear to them, and on this subject the minister not only stated that they have this right, but that they should be encouraged to take advantage of it.

I also wished to call the attention of the house to this letter because the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, on Friday last, stated that he was sorry that the farm worker was not left on the farm where he was so badly needed. Now this letter shows clearly that even before this statement was made, the Minister of Labour had sent instructions to the chairman of the mobilization boards telling them to leave the farm workers on the farms where they are needed.

In paragraph 4 of this letter, the minister states:

Farm workers who apply for postponement of military training are to be granted postponement until further notice.

I must admit that a more favourable explanation is given here of the mobilization policy of the government. Ever since this act came into force our good farmers did not know where to apply. They had to fill in forms which, as we all know, even professional men can hardly understand. Then they had to get letters from their mayor, their parish priest, or from some distinguished or other responsible person and prove that they were farmers. Their cases had to be proved beyond all doubt or else their application was immediately turned down. I wish here to call the attention of the government on this fact—unfortunately we have in the army to-day farmers that are needed on the farm and who came up for military service for lack of information concerning the procedure to be followed to obtain postponement. I hope the government will consider this situation and make sure that it is remedied.

Paragraph 4 states that:

Farm workers who apply for postponement from military training are to be granted postponement until further notice, unless it is established that the applicant is not an essential worker in agriculture. It should be noted that the regulations do not require the farmer to produce proof that he is an essential farm worker. If the board doubts that a man is an essential farm worker, even though postponement until further notice is given, it can always exercise the right to deny postponement by calling such a man before the board when established facts are presented.

This is my understanding of the matter—and I would ask the hon. minister to correct me if I am mistaken; a farmer or a farm hand is not obliged to prove that he belongs to that particular class. If the board is of the opinion that he is not a farmer, it is up to the board to prove it. Yesterday, upon meeting the Minister of Labour, I submitted precisely such an interpretation and the minister assured me it was absolutely what the Department of Labour wished to see put into force.

Now then; I now quote paragraph 5 of the letter:

If a worker who upon receipt of "order—medical examination" claims to be an agricultural worker but is not considered by the board to be essential to the operation of a specific farm—the question then arises as to whether or not he is essential to agriculture in the district.

If agricultural labour is needed in the district, he should be given an opportunity to place himself in a position where his services would be essential to agriculture on some other farm; or in the alternative to increase the production of a specific farm. The board could give a deferment for three months instead of "granting postponement until further notice" in order to give the man an opportunity of finding essential work.

Here again, an improvement is evident. Let us take, for example, the case of a farmer who has three sons at home and only needs two absolutely to run the farm and does not need the third who consequently is not an essential worker, the board must grant a postponement of three months to the latter thus giving him an opportunity to find employment on some other farm in his district where his services will be required and essential to agriculture. The board, moreover, must grant him an exemption for the time during which he will do some essential work on another farm. It is one of two things: either the government are sincere ar they are not. The government is sincere, of that I am convinced; they want the farmer to produce and to produce as much as he can. Hence the new interpretation given to the mobilization act. I therefore congratulate the government and particularly the Minister of Labour on the instructions issued to competent authorities, and I now hope that the government will see to it that this interpretation is accepted by the mobilization boards throughout Canada.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères to-day, after deploring the conditions which the government must remedy, urges us to give a vote which would express a want of confidence in the government.

His own statement, however, according to the Citizen of February 22, is as follows:

Hon. Mr. Cardin said in an interview here Saturday it was not his intention through his subamendment introduced Thursday in the throne speech debate to force the formation of a national government or to consolidate groups of Quebec members opposed to the government's man-power policy.

The honourable member was stating, no doubt, his honest opinion. He himself has told us on a previous occasion—and we believed him—that any government other than that of the present Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would offer no guarantee that the province of Quebec and its feelings would be respected as they are by the present Prime Minister. I do not believe it was the honourable member's intention to precipitate a want of confidence motion against the King administration. He himself has said as much. However, he states further:

Mr. Cardin admitted his subamendment could be interpreted as a want of confidence motion but "essentially it was not intended as such."

A little further on the article continues:

However, Mr. Cardin was "perfectly sure" the government would not suffer a defeat on his subamendment.

From this, it might be deduced that the hon. member, while intending to blame the government, does not wish to be unfair. I hope that he desires the conversion rather than the death of the sinner, if there is a sinner. Just the same, it may be inferred from his statements that he does not wish the fall of the present administration. But in what position do we find ourselves? The adoption of this amendment would constitute a censure of the government, expressed by a vote of want of confidence from the hon. members. By voting for the amendment, we would express a wish to overthrow the government and we do overthrow them technically as well as practically.

I may say that popular sentiment in the province of Quebec favours our support of the government who alone offer a guarantee that our legitimate requests as well as our rights will be respected. The hon. Prime Minister surely enjoys not only the confidence of the great majority of my fellow-citizens, but even the esteem and affection of nearly 100 per cent of the population. During the 1940 election, especially in my constituency, there have been, for a certain time, dissatisfied people. One of them, known as a Liberal, not a very fervent or steadfast one, even ran against me. In Dorchester, even among the leaders and the rank and file of Conservatives who gave me their support, it was stated: "We want Tremblay because we know that he will not detach himself from Mackenzie King in the House of Commons." Which goes far to show the sincerity of my stand. I have always taken this attitude with my constituents, with those of other constituencies, of the entire province and even of other provinces, when I have supported candidates outside Quebec who were standing for election. My attitude to-day has not changed. I have faith in the hon. leader of the present government; I have faith in his ministers and my vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member, will express this confidence.

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the universe is ablaze; for the last three and a half years the world has been ravaged by one of the worst wars that has ever come upon humanity in all history. Two groups of nations are facing each other; two ideologies are trying to destroy one another. Three and a half years ago Canada made its choice and sided with the democracies. When the proposal to declare war was brought before this house few members raised their voice against it; it was carried without a recorded vote. Since that time Canada has made a splendid effort under the present government. Our industrial machine has been geared to produce more than we ever thought it could. Our agricultural production has been raised to new levels. A strong army is now under arms and our navy has been multiplied more than five times. We have more than 150,000 men in the air force and have contributed more than any other nation in the commonwealth to this splendid plan which has provided airmen for the united nations. All this has been done by progressive steps, with the least disturbance of the normal life of the country and the preservation of national unity; it has been done under the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

In considering the present amendment to the amendment every hon. member should ask himself what his attitude was in the past, what it has been up to now and what will be the logical attitude to take on it. In 1940 a vast majority of the members from Quebec supported the bill to provide for the mobilization of the human and national resources of the country. During the following three and a half years if the members from Quebec have been at variance with the government to any great extent, it was on Bill No. 80. French Canadians want to win the war and they want to win it under the present government.

If I may be permitted to talk about my own views and ideas I would say that in the past I have been against our fighting the wars of the British empire unless Canada was directly concerned. My views have not changed. But this is not a war being waged for the pleasure or the aggrandizement of the British empire; this is a world war, a war in which our own institutions are at stake. Canada, whether it is French or English, whether it is the east or the west, stands united on this question. While we may differ as to the best methods to be used to achieve the desired result, we are all convinced that Canada has a better chance to achieve this without disrupting national unity under the leadership of the present Prime Minister.

French Canada has accepted the mobilization of our youth for the defence of Canada and it has volunteered in much larger numbers than it did under the different methods used during the last war. The law that now governs this mobilization was voted upon by a great majority of the members from Quebec. That law is still the same, and that is the law that this amendment to the amendment would suspend. Men will be needed on the other side and volunteers will be taken out of the ranks of many of the regiments now defending our country. Men will be needed to train for the defence of Canada. Nothing has been changed. The law was passed with that intention and despite Bill No. 80 it is still being operated in that spirit.

Under Bill No. 80 the government is given the power to send men overseas, but I do not think that power has ben exercised except to send men to Labrador, Newfoundland and Alaska. I may say that I have had the approval of meetings in my district where I have been told that they have no objection to men being used for the defence of the hemisphere in Labrador or elsewhere, but they are against our men being used on the other continent. This attitude has been approved by French Canada at large, and I am sure that many other hon. members from Quebec will say the same thing. Nothing has been changed and the government is still tied to the declaration that whenever it passed the order in council to use conscripts for overseas service, it would bring it before the house for approval or disapproval on a confidence motion. So that the members from Quebec are still just as free as they were before to vote confidence in the government now; they are in the same position as they were when they voted for the mobilization act in 1940.

What I stated in my speech a few days ago in the debate on the address I still repeat. My good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) reminded the house the other day that I was one of those who had talked about man-power and criticized the government's policy. What I criticized was the operation and the interpretation by the boards of the mobilization regulations, and I still say that clearer instructions should be given to all these boards dealing with deferments or exemptions of farmers or workers in industry. I still think those instructions should be made clearer, but that is a question of interpretation and a question of the operation of the law. It is not a question of principle as to whether the government has taken the right course in carrying out the mobilization act. It is just a question of knowing whether the government has instructed the boards as to the proper interpretation of the rules, and whether the boards interpret them in such a way as to ensure a proper flow of workers for the farms and for industry. Should we now suspend that law and say to the rest of the world: We will deliberate for months to find out if we have enough men at work or not in industries and agriculture? Should we say at a time like this: Let us wait—German armies may be on the march here and there, and it is true we want to win the war, but let us wait and argue before committees for months in order to please a certain element of the electorate? I would rather be defeated, Mr. Speaker, than support such a proposal. The whole world would gape in astonishment if they saw any democratic institution in one of the united nations waiting and arguing for months as to whether we have enough men on the farm or otherwise. I have enough confidence in the government to believe that if abuses have crept into the administration of the law on account of a misinterpretation of the rules, and the facts are brought to their attention, they will be clever enough to correct those abuses. May I say with all due respect to the house that the people have more confidence in the Prime Minister himself settling this question than they would have even in a committee of this house.

People have evoked in the last two years quite frequently the name of a man whose memory is so dear to me that I feel I should say a word about him to-day. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) mentioned his name in the house the other day, and if there is any who has the right to do it, it is the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. For him I have the greatest respect, because he has rendered great service to the country, and no matter what people in other parts of the country may think of his present amendment they should bow to him because in moments of crisis in the past he knew what to do. He stood where he should, and he used his great influence at the time with the people of his province to get them in the right way. He deserves the gratitude of the people of this country for his past services, but on this question we cannot follow him.

I have as much right as any to evoke the memory of Lapointe, whether here or in public gatherings. I knew Mr. Lapointe for some thirty years, ever since I was a child. I knew him as his secretary for twelve years, and without boasting I think I may say I enjoyed some of his confidence. Frankly, those who tried to picture Mr. Lapointe, as some have tried at meetings of the Defence of Canada League, are either not sincere or they know very little of the man. There is one thing that Lapointe had, and that was a true sentiment for Canada at large, not only for his province but for the whole country. He was one hundred per cent a Canadian. Lapointe was a disciple of Laurier, and he believed in the true Liberalism of Laurier. He went further and believed in the true Liberalism of the English school of Gladstone and so many other leaders on the other side. He was, above all, for a united Canada. He would not have given one inch of ground on matters of interest to his compatriots where a question of principle was concerned. But in matters where the interests of the whole country were concerned he would have thought as a Canadian above all else.

Lapointe at any moment was ready to fight bigotry where he found it and when he thought that it would hurt Canada. In English Canada he would fight men like Shields and others who are trying every day to stir up racial hatred. In his own province he preached a better understanding and fought all his life against the extremists from the days of 1910 when he fought nationalism, and successfully in his own constituency; when he stood by Laurier on the question of the navy. When people said that Kamouraska would turn against him, Lapointe summoned a meeting of his people the day after he returned to his constituency from Ottawa and got his people to follow him. He was not one of those to flinch. The people stood behind him and he was sent back to Ottawa. It was those who had hesitated to follow Laurier who were defeated at the next election by Nationalists, and not those who had remained steadfast. Lapointe in Quebec in his last years had enough trouble fighting the views and sentiments preached by the Bouchards and other separatists who came against him, sometimes with the silent support of the official opposition. Everybody will remember Lapointe's attitude during this war, and none of those who vote against this amendment should think that he is not in the true line with Lapointe. That was true also, at the time, of the member for Richelieu-Verchères. He then stood by Lapointe and the two deserved credit. I again pay my due respect to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, whose true Liberalism for a quarter of a century has been an example for all of us, whose views I cannot share now, but whose sincerity I would not question. But I cannot follow him in the steps he is now taking. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères sat here on Laurier's side; he was one of his disciples. Does he think for one moment that Laurier would bring in such an amendment as this? If he does, I respectfully differ; I do not think so.

Mr. Lapointe before his death said on many occasions that he had not changed his attitude as to Canada's participation in this war to the utmost, with this reservation, which he had given to his friends and compatriots, that he would not ask them to be conscripted for the defence of Canada overseas. But he said he would support everything short of that to win the war, and if he ever came to the conclusion that that was necessary, he would withdraw himself rather than do it, because of the undertaking he had given.

That was the attitude of Lapointe. I say, if Lapointe were living he would be sad, even sadder than we are, to see this house faced with such an amendment to the amendment. Lapointe, had he lived, would not have brought forward such a subamendment; and

I can assure you, sir, that the vast majority of the members from his province will be true to him, and will vote against it.

Mr. JOSEPH LAFONTAINE (Megantic-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, if I rise at this stage of the debate to speak on the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), it is because of the fact that I want to give to this house and place on Hansard the reasons which, I think, will justify my voting the way I intend to vote when the division is called.

During the 1940 election, I visited all the parishes of the constituency of Megantic-Frontenac which I have the honour to represent in this house. Addressing all the electors of those parishes, I then stated sincerely and frankly what, if I were elected, my attitude would be on any questions which might arise, such as the very question which is now before the house.

At those meetings, in the light of statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the late lamented Ernest Lapointe and the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) who was then Minister of Public Works, I pledged myself to do two things.

First, I promised to oppose any measure or bill of conscription for overseas service; second, I promised to oppose any union or coalition government, a dream so dearly cherished by a number of members sitting on the opposite side of the house. These are the only two specific promises I have made to my electors and I may state, Mr. Speaker, that I will keep them at all cost, being convinced that keeping my word is preferable to any honours that might be conferred on me.

Moreover, at each of the meetings at which I made those promises, I declared that, in view of the war we were waging at the side of France and England, I could foresee dark and difficult days ahead. I stated that we might be faced with complex problems, such as those that confronted us during the last session and such as the present one, but that, realizing the extent of my responsibility, I would consider all these questions in the light of circumstances and in relation to the facts and arguments expounded and that I would vote according to the dictates of my conscience. I have been faithful to this policy ever since I came to this house and I will adhere to it when the time comes to vote on the motion before the house.

What does the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) refer to? It appears at page 551 of Hansard, as follows:

[Mr. Picard.]

This house is of the opinion that in view of the recognized shortage of farm labour, also the admitted shortage of labour in war industries and in other essential industrial and transportation activities, Your Excellency's advisers should have provided for the withholding of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act in regard to the raising of men for military service until, at least, a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house, to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war, without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country.

Scarcity of farm labour. No doubt remains in the minds of anyone regarding the scarcity of farm labour; but should this scarcity be blamed on the mobilization act exclusively? I do not think so, for you know that the regulations enacted under this act permit farmers' sons and farm workers to obtain a postponement of training until a specified date or until further notice.

Any man, whether a farmer, a farmer's son or a farm worker, when notified to report for his medical examination could, within eight days of the receipt of such notice, apply for postponement or extension by duly completing the questionnaire enclosed with the notice and returning it to the registrar of his division. The latter would submit the case to the board set up for the purpose, which passed upon the advisability of granting or declining suspension or postponement of the call-up in the light of the reasons set forth in the application.

May I be allowed to mention incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that all men in Division F who were called up under this Act have been treated with fairness and impartiality, both by the registrar and his staff, who invariably made it their duty to supply all the information requested by those concerned, and by the members of the board. In so far as I know—and I am conversant with the question—they have discharged their duties in a fair and sensible manner. There may have been and, undoubtedly, there were some mistakes made, but they were made unintentionally and, in most cases they were due to a lack of knowledge or a lack of attention on the part of the applicant in filling the application for postponement. In every case where an applicant deserved a postponement, such postponement was granted. If, as I have just stated, all true farmers, their sons and their employees were granted a delay or a postponement until further notice, as has been the case in Division F, then the Mobilization Act cannot be held responsible for the present scarcity of farm labour. I am inclined to believe, on the contrary, that it was caused by the large number of farmers who, lured by the industrial areas, their war munition and equipment industries and the high wages paid, have forsaken the farm for the cities. Of this, Sorel, the home town of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères offers a typical example; its population has nearly doubled since 1939 on account of its war industries.

The same condition obtains in the city of Quebec whose population has considerably increased during the past two years. The amendment says:

> Until, at least, a complete investigation is made by a committee of the house to ascertain and determine by what means or methods Canada can now most effectively contribute to the winning of the war.

I oppose the setting up of such a committee, for I feel that a measure of this sort might be a step toward the establishment of a union government. Anybody familiar with the setting up of a committee of the house is aware that such a committee is made up of members belonging to every party. Is it not exactly in this fashion that the union government of 1917 was organized? The amendment continues:

> Without destroying the economic, social and national life of the country.

I am wondering, at least up to the present moment, where is to be found the destruction of the economic life of the country and how it could be destroyed, even though the industries of war require more workers.

Just now, more people are at work than at any other time in our history; the salaries are just as high, or perhaps higher, than they have ever been.

To support what I have just said, may I be permitted to sketch the part played by war industry in Quebec? As regards implements of war, four of the nine types of aircraft made in Canada are manufactured in the province of Quebec. The largest plant in the British Empire manufacturing 25-pounders, from the raw materials to the finished products, is located in the province of Quebec. Our province manufactures and assembles two types of tanks, and turns out every kind of aerial bombs. It has two of the largest shell factories and half a dozen shipyards which launch cargo-boats, corvettes and minesweepers. Sixty per cent of the Canadian soldiers walk in shoes made in our province, which turns out, in large quantities, parachutes, bullets, cartridges, trench mortars, chemical products, explosives, and electrical and wireless apparatus.

The aluminum industry has built there one of the largest plants in the world. The province of Quebec is the centre of the newsprint industry. Pulp and paper, essential products in modern warfare, are manufactured in our province, and the capital invested in that industry amounts to $360,000,000. Our province produces more rayon than any other province. As to the mining industry, we can say that the fabulous resources of our province saved the allies from a difficult situation. Aluminum, copper, asbestos are our main products, but other strategical products badly needed by the united nations, such as manganese, tungsten, molybdenum and chromium, are to be found in our province and are in process of development.

The weekly earnings of the 600,000 industrial workers of Quebec amount to $16,300,000. They produce the whole of Canadian aluminum; they operate one of the largest tank factories on the continent; they produce planes and ships in vast numbers.

In view of such facts and figures, I do not believe that the government have been, nor are they now, leading us toward economic ruin; quite the contrary, they have given us a kind of prosperity.

Whatever may be said to disprove it, the amendment as drafted, were it adopted by the house, would constitute a non-confidence vote against the government. As there is nothing in the speech from the throne which is contrary to the obligations I have taken toward my constituents, I shall vote against this amendment and I shall support the government, for I have every confidence in them.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, it is not without a feeling of emotion and without fully realizing my responsibilities that I rise to address the house. Since the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) has moved the amendment which is familiar to all of us, I believe we can truthfully say that the province of Quebec has been deeply stirred. One cannot rise in this house and speak for or against that amendment without first realizing that he shall have to speak for or against the mover, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, the former minister of public works.

The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) stated the other day that during the thirty-odd years of his political life, he had perhaps never witnessed such a momentous occasion. I am not much advanced in years, Mr. Speaker, but still I have been in politics for about twenty years. I come from a family which is active in politics and which has taken a part in the development of our province, and if I rise in this house to-day, I may say, with all due deference to my good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata, that it is not for the sake of the Christmas tree or the gifts that may hang on it. But, before registering my vote I simply wish to explain my stand. And, as I said at the outset, it is exceedingly difficult for a member from the province of Quebec to speak on the amendment. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères must certainly be aware that the whole province and all the members, even those who do not see eye to eye with him and who will vote against his motion, have nevertheless much affection and admiration for him.

However, the electors of our respective constituencies have sent us here not from any considerations of friendship or affection, but to fulfil our duty, all our duty. And if we must not vote for the gift hanging from the Christmas tree, neither must we be prompted to vote by any fear of the pack of any organization, or of a press which I dare not style as I should, and which is striving neither for national unity in Canada, nor for the greater good of Quebec, not for the defence of Canada, but for a single cause, which is to assume power both in Quebec and in Ottawa.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères will permit me, I shall quote a few remarks of his which still move me deeply and which, if they were true and heartfelt when he made them over the radio, must still hold true in this debate.

On April 24, 1942, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, speaking over the radio on the question of the plebiscite, made a marvellous speech that we all like to remember. At the beginning of his speech, he said:

> The discussion of the great problem of to-day has upset and worried the minds of many people, especially amongst the French-speaking population of this province. I am old enough to remember a similar campaign that was made in 1911, the year I entered politics. Laurier was then thrown out of power following the attacks hurled against him by his compatriots of the province of Quebec. The men and women of my age remember it as they remember also the consequences of that serious blunder.
> The famous navy question was then to the fore. In certain parts of the country, Laurier was accused of not being imperialistic enough. . . .

The same thing is said to-day about Mr. King.

> . . . and his idea of establishing a Canadian navy was laughed at; and in the province of Quebec, he was accused of having sold his country to England. . . .

History repeats itself, Mr. Speaker.

> . . . and it appeared that the campaign in the province of Quebec was financed from outside, by Mr. Borden's supporters, through the imperialistic fund. These people were then trying to divide the province of Quebec so as to succeed in throwing Laurier out of power. How many false declarations of independence did we not hear then, how many self-seeking denunciations against so-called political partisanship. . . .

We are called "yes-men" today

> . . . accusations of weakness and treachery, in short, appeals to prejudice. It was very much like what we hear to-day, save that the leaders of the movement at the time were more important and more gifted.
> A few of the would-be saviours of that time can still be found to-day taking part in this agitation. They are somewhat older, but appear not to have learned from experience, probably because they have not personally suffered from the conditions which they contributed to bring about. These agitators claimed that Laurier was a coward and a traitor, that he was bent on retaining power at any price and that he had sold out to England.
> It was then possible to frighten the people of Quebec and many honest individuals were taken in for lack of a proper understanding of actual facts and of the grave situation of the moment. As a result, under attacks coming from two opposite directions, but supported, it has been said, by funds coming from the same source, Laurier was overthrown. Sir Robert Borden succeeded him at the head of affairs and it was under his leadership that we had the would-be union government of 1917. Those who had remained faithful to Laurier stood with him in the opposition. They still could protest, but having lost power, they were forced to submit to the law as imposed by the majority.

I call upon my province and my colleagues not to forget that statement. Therein lies perhaps my motive for rising in my seat to-day, Mr. Speaker. In 1911, I had not, like the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, the privilege of waging the political campaign at the side of Laurier. I was then but a boy at the Quebec seminary. But I perfectly recall how Laurier, our leader, defeated candidate in Quebec East, the man who the preceding day in Quebec had been called a freemason, an enemy of the French Canadians, an imperialist, a traitor—with a profound emotion, I can still see him, the traitor to his own people and to his church; he was standing in the hall of the Seminary by the side of the Right Reverend Mathieu, archbishop of Regina. He who, according to his own people had forsaken his fellow-countrymen, and his faith, had in time of defeat and sorrow found no better place to seek solace than in Quebec Seminary by the side of that great man, the Right Reverend Mathieu.

What, may I ask our electors, the province of Quebec and our hon. friends now on the opposite side of the house for whom I have great respect, what have we promised to the province of Quebec at the last elections? What have been our promises to the province of Quebec for the last twenty years? We, of the Liberal party have promised that there would be no conscription. Yes, it is true, we have made that promise, I have made it myself. When bill No. 80 was before the house, almost a majority from the province voted against conscription and most regretfully and unwillingly against their leader, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

But what are we being asked to-day? What measure is before the house? We are discussing the speech from the throne, and I believe that each and every one of us appreciates the fact that in the speech from the throne there is nothing which is likely to create embarrassment nor to interfere with our political ambitions and the interest of our country. The most striking aspect of the speech from the throne are those social reforms announced by the government, their social security programme. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker, which is before the house to-day. The debate is not on conscription, nor on the question of dividing the country; it is not directed against the Province of Quebec nor against any other province. Notwithstanding the wonderful speech made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères in which he praised Canada's war effort, a war effort in accord with the sentiments of the Province of Quebec, the hon. member moved an amendment which comes as a surprise to everyone. For my part, I oppose this amendment though it mean the end of my political career; I represent a constituency of workers in the city of Montreal and one of the most important counties in the province; I was elected without the help of the Liberal association.

I won over the friends of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). I asked my friends what they were willing to do for this war and this is what they replied, and I think they expressed the sentiments of the province of Quebec: "We wish to do our share; we are willing to make sacrifices and work for the war; we will subscribe generously for the war effort but we are opposed to conscription."

As far as I am concerned and speaking for my electors, I may say that as long as conscription for overseas service will not be forced upon the people of this country, there will be but one leader for the constituency of Montreal-St. Mary, the province of Quebec shall never have but one leader and that leader is the present Prime Minister of Canada.

I received this morning a resolution from the Liberal Association of Montreal-St. Mary, a highly important organization since during the last election out of four candidates running three were Liberals and the other took good care not to mention that he was not a Liberal.

We, the officers of the Liberal Association of Montreal-St. Mary, gathered in a special meeting, do declare unanimously that we have always had confidence in the Right Hon. Mackenzie King;

That to-day we must more than ever before be true to his policy as the only one capable of maintaining unity amongst all component parts of the country and of meeting the manifold demands of the hour;

That we have enough confidence in the patriotism of our member of parliament, Dr. Gaspard Fauteux, to give him full liberty to take the stand he deems necessary on the amendment to the amendment moved by the Hon. P. J. A. Cardin, as we are convinced that the vote he will give will be in the best interests of his country, his province and his county;

And here are some more telegrams. At the last minute, at 4.25, probably learning that my name was on the list of members who were to speak this afternoon, and knowing that I had received telegrams asking me to vote for Mr. King, the Jeunes Laurentiens sent me a wire stating they hoped that I would vote against my leader. I say again to this house and to my colleagues from Quebec that I prefer to work with Mr. King to help build a country united from coast to coast, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, than to work against him to comply with the wishes of a small group of Laurentiens who think only of their own petty interests, who seek to overthrow King as Laurier was overthrown, who attempt to overthrow another leader in Quebec as they defeated me in 1935 by resorting to slander and lies.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission and the consent of the house, I shall conclude with a sentence we love to quote in the province of Quebec, even though it was uttered by a man who was not our leader. It applies, I believe, not only to the province of Quebec, but to the whole country, and I think it is the very spirit of the policy followed by the Liberal party: "Cessons nos luttes fratricides et unissons-nous." Let us put a stop to our fratricidal struggles and let us unite.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I have taken a great deal of interest in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) and I am doubly interested for the simple reason that I intended, during the session, to express certain opinions along the same lines. More than once I have noted a scarcity of labour in my constituency, and since, on many occasions, the leading authorities in our country have deplored this condition, I had anticipated a debate on the question and I intended to take part in it. The sub-amendment moved by Mr. Cardin offers me an occasion to express my views on the subject, and I avail myself of this opportunity.

During the past two weeks in particular, the information given by the members of this house, to whatever party they belong, and the complaints they have made, offer ample proof that we are faced to-day in Canada with a serious labour shortage not only in agriculture but in essential industries as well.

In my estimation, this scarcity of labour is due to the fact that recruiting in our country has been carried on without any definite and comprehensive plan and in total ignorance of the needs of agriculture and its allied industries, as well as of the needs of other industries essential to the economic life of the nation. The raising of armies may seem all important in the eyes of the Department of National Defence, but is it possible for this department to be unmindful of the fact that armies would be helpless if, on the home front, we had no men for the production of implements of war, or to keep our communication lines open, or to extract from the soil the food products necessary to the physical life of the nation.

Agriculture is short of labour. It is asked to deliver maximum production, while on the other hand it is deprived of the necessary labour. All farmers' sons called up before or after the 23rd of March should be sent back to the land without further delay. And they should not have to go through that red tape which takes their requests from the commanding officer to the defence boards, from desk to desk, for weeks and weeks, until they get the routine answer which, no matter how important the reasons put forth, is always negative. Moreover I suggest that under the law the miller, the blacksmith and the saw-mill hands should be rated as farmers. Agriculture cannot yield sufficiently unless it has the services of those workers, especially at a time when restrictions of all kinds cripple its efforts.

Our war industries, our essential industries are also complaining of a labour shortage, which will shortly become more acute when three large plants in the Montreal district will ask for some twelve thousands of workers. War production is essential; to be efficient, it needs stable as well as skilled labour.

A number of factories have witnessed the exodus of their employees to the military camps and have been unable to replace them. Mobilization has also deprived a number of other factories—some farm implement manufacturers among them—of their skilled labour and are thereby in an embarrassing and disastrous position. It seems ridiculous to me, for instance, that expert machinists and technicians have been called for training and assigned, in military camps, to secondary jobs, while they could have been a strong element of stability and efficiency for the war effort.

[Mr. Lionel Bertrand.]

I shall go even further: I claim that essential industries should be allowed to keep all the labour they need to enable them to place production on the efficient basis which will never be reached by the present ceaseless changes in their personnel.

Is it possible to attain maximum efficiency in farm and war production when, in such a vast country as ours, fast and excellent means of transportation are not available to them? Is there not a scarcity of railway employees? Do not the same conditions obtain for the motor transport companies who have to work under more and more stringent restrictions?

On November 30, 1942—about three months ago—on the occasion of the 78th general annual meeting of the shareholders of the Banque Nationale, its president, Mr. Beaudry Leman, said:

> The present scarcity of labour may be due, to a certain extent, to the lack of a comprehensive plan to allocate all fit persons methodically as between the military and the economic fields. In any case, scarcity of labour is already felt in certain essential branches of production such as agriculture, stock raising, lumber operations, coal mines and even other mines which produce essential metals for the prosecution of the war. Should we not profit by England's experience, where 50,000 miners who had joined the army had to be returned to the coal mines?

Until recently, mobilization was under the Department of National War Services. To this end, the country was divided into districts headed by administrative commissions and registrars. The divisional offices were supposed to fill the requisitions for recruits, sent in by the department of National Defence, and grant postponements in accordance with a clear-cut policy. It would be unfair to say that these commissions did not try to be fair. The Montreal commission, apparently well organized, and evidently administered by a well-chosen staff, neglected nothing to attain this object. But those boards, in conformity with the instructions they had received from Ottawa, had to call for training a number of men who, if a fair plan of labour allotment had first been worked out, would greatly enhance our war effort in factories, on farms, in mines, in lumbering and in transportation.

Sooner or later, owing to the impulsion thoughtlessly given to recruiting, the labour shortage was bound to bring about the serious problem which this country is facing today. So far, nearly 800,000 men have gone into Canada's armed forces, out of a mobilizable population of 2,215,800, or one third of the latter. Now, the United States, whose population is about 140,000,000, has decided to call to arms no more than a maximum number of seven million and a half men, and a committee has just opposed the enlistment of married men, such a policy being considered by them as detrimental to the welfare of the American nation. Canada would then make, as regards enlistments, a greater effort than the United States, which seems ridiculous. In the neighbouring country, recruiting has been conducted on a basis which kept into account the fact that industry and agriculture are two fields which in a well organized war effort should be on a par. For a few months past, the national selective service has replaced the war services in so far as mobilization is concerned. To this date has that organization achieved what was expected of it? Obviously it could not be efficiently organized without a temporary stop to recruiting, so that past errors might be corrected and a new labour allotment plan worked out for the benefit of the various phases of our war effort. To date, our man-power has been almost thoughtlessly requisitioned, as if that were the only important factor in achieving a war effort. If the present situation continues, the economic life of this country will be threatened. If production of war supplies should decrease, if transportation facilities should be curtailed through a labour shortage or a lack of materials caused by a labour shortage, would our war effort be enhanced? If agricultural production should lag, on account of a labour shortage, would that place our war effort on a better footing? This labour problem must be faced or it will cause irreparable clefts in the economic structure of our nation.

In the speech he delivered at the meeting to which I have just referred, Mr. Beaudry Leman made this important statement which speaks for itself:

> War expenditures for the present fiscal year will reach nearly $4,000,000,000. This figure shows the magnitude of our economic effort, but it also emphasizes the burden which has to be borne by a country of eleven million and a half people, a nation which wants to be, at one and the same time, a granary, an arsenal and a man-power reservoir. Now the leaders of the united nations tell us about a war of attrition which might last for a few more years. We ought to remember that "slow and steady wins the race."
> In order to win the peace after a war of attrition, there should be left reserves of man-power, capital, foodstuffs, raw materials and products of every description. Influence in world affairs will pass from those countries which will have to ask for assistance to those which will be in a position to tender assistance.
> Furthermore, the power of a belligerent country depends in a large measure on the balance between its war-time economy and its peace-time economy, for a loss of balance might give rise to serious results. An excessive effort, untimely or misdirected, disturbing the national economy which is its basis, might weaken Canada before the end of hostilities. After the war, our country will be unable to assume the heavy responsibilities which will be devolved upon it, if its economic position is not sound and secure.

I am not opposed to the war effort of my country as witnessed by my attitude in the past. I feel that, in a war which has developed into a world war, Canada upholds the principles of democracy as well as a civilization based upon the fear of God and regard for human freedom. I am not opposed to our war effort; I have done more in my constituency than any member in this house has done in his own to help the government solve its war-time industrial problems. I am not opposed to our war effort, but if it is shown that, at the present time, Canada is doing more, in relation to its population, than any other country, am I not right in assuming that there must be a limit to its effort and that this limit has already been reached? If such talk brands me an isolationist, I welcome the name. However, I look upon other nations of the empire. Has not Eire asserted her neutrality? Did South Africa impose conscription? Is not her war effort limited to the confines of the African continent? As for New Zealand and Australia, are they not waging war within circumscribed areas and have they not clearly defined their position? Isolationists? No; but Canadians for short, that's the word. Descendants of this country's first settlers, we set Canada above all other countries. Allowances we have made aplenty since the war's outbreak. The province of Quebec has made more indeed than any other province and I need not give details. If Canada can boast of national unity, or of anything like it, let us not seek afar for the reason: it has come out almost entirely of the allowances made by the province of Quebec.

These few words, Mr. Speaker, have enabled me to express my views. I have done so without mental reservation, with the sincerity of which I feel possessed and with no thought of personal advantage. I don't know how long I shall remain in politics but, so long as I am here, I mean to say what I believe to be fair. On February 8 last, I said I continued to sit on this side of the house because I am afforded freedom of speech or of utterance. I wonder now if this freedom still exists after the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) Friday afternoon. During my address on February 8, I conceded the Prime Minister's special abilities as a leader and admired the prestige he enjoys in the United States, with whom after the war, Canada, an American country, will be called upon to assume a leading role. I did say nonetheless that, on all measures that come before the house, I will vote as my conscience dictates; and, in the present debate, duty compels me to support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the house took recess for dinner the debate had closed, and I had read and put the question from the Chair and stated that the vote was on the amendment to the amendment. I have now to put the question.

Mr. PARENT: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my comments on the amendment to the main motion I should like to say a very few words about the situation created last Friday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He made certain remarks concerning the numerous parties formed lately throughout Canada. To a certain extent I think his remarks are quite right, but I wish to remind him that those newly-formed political parties have all arisen under his regime. Some of them have been formed right from the ranks of the Liberal party.

The Prime Minister also made reference to the rivalry existing among different opposition members in the house. Well, with regard to that I would point out that the most typical example of political rivalry we have seen in the House of Commons was at the conclusion of the debate on Bill No. 80 of last session, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, when the Prime Minister himself replied to the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). The Prime Minister said also that the opposition lodged against the government was to serve some political aims and ambitions.

We from Quebec know what was said and done in our province during the twenty-five years prior to the provincial election of 1939 and the federal election in March, 1940. We know the promises that were made in Quebec during that period. Those promises were such that the Prime Minister was obliged to hold a plebiscite to be released from them, and that cost the country nearly $2,000,000 of public money. That was political ambition, and the Prime Minister should be the last one to talk to others about political ambitions.

The amendment moved by the Conservatives has been read in the house so many times that I shall dispense with having hon. members listen to it again. It looks to me like a soft pedal on the policy of the Conservative party in the past. The Winnipeg convention was held this winter, and since that time speeches have ben made by the new leader of the party, Mr. Bracken. Those speeches have been made in such a form as to give an impression to the population of Canada that the Conservative party was putting a soft pedal on its imperialistic policies. We have heard two speeches in the house, one by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), which dealt in considerable detail with the man-power shortage faced by war industries and agriculture. Then the former leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, said that the people of this country were more heavily taxed than the people of the United States or Great Britain. Hearing those speeches I thought the party had changed its imperialistic policies; I thought it was no more in favour of a greater war effort than the Liberal party was making. However there appears to have been some change in this late policy. There is a saying that what is bred in the bone will come out in the flesh. Last Friday, answering a speech by the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition said this, as reported on page 562 of Hansard:

> In the months that lie ahead we shall need reinforcements for our army. Let us, as a parliament and as a country, not leave any doubt in the minds of those fighting with us in this great war for freedom; let us not permit the word to go forth that we are not ready to do everything that may be necessary with respect to man-power, financial resources and all things that will bring forth a total war effort in this dominion.

That completes the amendment. Now that that has been said, we know more of what to think about the amendment. The leader of the opposition continued:

> It is true that our own amendment is a vote of want of confidence in the government, but it is founded on grounds that we think will make for a greater war effort in Canada instead of a lesser one, as would be the case if the hon. gentleman's amendment should carry.

If that is the aim of the amendment, we now know exactly what to think about it.

At the conclusion of my remarks I intend to move an amendment which will also be a motion of want of confidence in the government. It is to replace and improve the one which has already been offered, and I hope the Prime Minister will be satisfied with it.

First of all, I should like to say something about the shortage of man-power throughout Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: In your new party?

Mr. ROY: You will hear more about the new party after the next election. Many of you will hear about it, but from seats different from those you now occupy.

As I say, I intend to move an amendment at the conclusion of my remarks. Most of the hon. members who have taken part in this debate have referred to the man-power shortage that exists at the present time. I wonder how one can ask for a greater war effort and still criticize or complain about the man-power situation. I know that in the past the Conservative party have never brought about any great miracles and perhaps they think if they were in power they could bring one about that would supply to industry and agriculture all the man-power that is needed, and at the same time continue the drafting of men; that would be a wonderful miracle, but I do not think they will have a chance to bring it about.

There is without doubt a shortage of man-power. All the speeches we have heard in the house testify to such a shortage. In order to prevent it there is only one thing to do—and that is why I voted in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin)—we must stop the drafting of recruits throughout Canada. There are but three places where our man-power can be found. One is the army and the other two are the war industries and the farms. If there is already a shortage of man-power and the army continues to draft men from the other two sources, the problem will increase. I do not think anyone can bring about a miracle to change the effect of this wrong procedure.

In spite of all that has been said about us we are for victory. That is why last year I joined with the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) in moving an amendment to exempt from military service all men employed on the farm in order to permit the vital industry of agriculture to carry on with a production which is most necessary to our war effort. I cannot understand why hon. members should support a government which follows such a rash policy When the government needed additional employees for its own civil service, it did not let those employees go into the army. The civil service has been increased by about 70,000 men and women. However, when agriculture, which is the basis of the war effort for our allies, is concerned, the government does not deal with it in the same way. It did not proceed as it did to meet the needs of the civil service or the other needs of government in connection with various organizations. It went right ahead and took the skilled man-power, that cannot now be replaced. It took so many men that to-day every hon. member, including even those who have not expressed their opinions in this house, believes there is a shortage of labour on our farms. If we do not have an abundant crop next fall; if the season is not as good as it was last year, and if we lack labour to cultivate the farms, we may find ourselves in very great misery before very long, and our war effort will suffer as a result.

As I have said already, no miracle will happen to give us more labour on our farms and in our war industries. There is only one way to correct the situation, namely, to stop this policy of drafting men which has gone far beyond the limits of our mathematical capacity. In my opinion the way to stop such a policy is this. Conscription must be applied to those financiers who are making as much more money as there are more soldiers in the army, or who are making as much more money as there are more contracts coming to war industries. Those people will stop making money out of the army and out of our war effort when they are compelled to take the money out of their own pockets to help win the war. Then, as I said in a previous speech, their advice will become much wiser.

I should like now to deal with another matter, and I wish I had a far better knowledge of English in order to do so, for it would be much easier to keep from making any slips of the tongue, as it is said in English, and to avoid hurting the feelings of anyone. It should be well understood that the complaint I have to make about a certain gentleman or a certain little organization does not in our opinion involve all our Anglo-Saxon fellow Canadians. We know them far too well for that. We remember what was done for us by great statesmen like Baldwin, MacNab, Macdonald and a great many others, and we would not want to hurt the feelings of any person or any group, but this is a very particular case with which I wish to deal. I hold in my hand a publication entitled the Gospel Witness and Protestant Advocate. The editor is Reverend T. T. Shields, and I should like to read a few extracts from this fine example of literature which seems to be founded upon a hatred of all Catholics in regard to our war effort in Canada. First I would refer to the issue of October 22, 1942, at page 2:

> The Roman Catholic Cardinal "will assume the responsibility of settling the whole matter." This is the man who has been recently honoured by Queen's university. It seems to us that if the devil himself would only appear in the robes of a cardinal—and it must be admitted that in this cardinal he has an excellent representative—universities, city councils, Canadian clubs and empire clubs, the dominion cabinet and the Canadian premier himself would all bow down to him.

Then a little further along he says:

> That is Roman Catholicism—as deadly a poison to the individual, to the family, to evangelical Christianity and to the state—indeed a more deadly poison than the germ of typhus, or tuberculosis, or smallpox, or leprosy, or the black plague.

That is what this gentleman has to say about the Catholic religion. Then in the issue of June 25, 1942, this review reproduces an article from the Victoria Daily Times of Monday, June 22, reporting a speech made by Mr. Shields somewhere out west. The article states:

> Roman Catholicism was the enemy of free institutions everywhere, he said. It was the fourth axis power and just as much the implacable enemy of Britain as Germany, Italy and Japan, he added remarking, Though we win the war the chief enemy will still be in the Vatican.

The real ruler of Canada this moment is not Prime Minister Mackenzie King, but Cardinal Villeneuve of Quebec, he said. Not a thing could be done without approval from the Vatican, he added.

Doctor Shields told his hearers one of the reasons R. B. Bennett left Canada lay in his weariness of having the Roman Catholic church continually pulling his coat-tails for special privileges.

In the November 12, 1942, issue of the same publication appears an article entitled "The Relative Importance of Unity," which concludes in this way:

In religious controversies we have repeatedly seen errorist minorities numerically overwhelmed, only to observe an organized subtilty defeat a superior number of unaffiliated individualist advocates of righteousness.

All this is another way of saying, Beware of peace. In these columns we have repeatedly pointed to that religio-politico thing called the papacy as the chief of all visible enemies of mankind. As the tide of battle turns and the doom of the axis powers becomes visibly nearer, we may expect the papacy, gradually and without announcement, to abandon its neutrality, and endeavour to ingratiate itself with the powers of freedom. We must not allow ourselves to feel the slightest elation when gangsters begin to cheer the police. As the tide gradually turns in our favour and against the axis, we may expect to see the whole Roman Catholic hierarchy in Canada emulate the example of Admiral Darlan: they will fight even openly just so long as they think there is any chance of winning, but as soon as they see the die is cast, they will make their exit from France, and turn up as a guest of the victorious armies. Therefore, while we are far from the end of the conflict, the Quislings who helped to precipitate it will soon be attempting to reorient themselves in order to get as much out of the wreck they have made, as may be possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call attention to the fact that there is so much conversation going on that it is impossible to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. ROY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I have just read is quite clear; we can see that the reverend gentleman becomes more than saucy. He becomes somewhat dangerous. It would be easy for the government to stop this sort of propaganda. Again, in the Victoria Daily Times of Monday, June 22, 1942, Doctor Shields is reported thus:

"I don't believe the Roman Catholic Church need be feared after the war," he added. It was the most gigantic bluffer in the world. Its forces would fight in ambush and darkness, "but when you turn the light on it, it runs," he said.

He denied any personal quarrel with individual Roman Catholics, but said sometimes "in exposing the ravages of Rome some Roman Catholics may get a few splinters of shrapnel."

Is that what he wants—a sort of bloody persecution against the Catholics? He does not put to himself this question: Are the French-Canadians or the Catholics in Quebec being treated fairly in this war effort? Are they getting the same wages in the war industries in Quebec as workers in similar industries in Ontario? Does he ask himself, when our boys are sent to Hong Kong, Dieppe, or elsewhere, whether they are Catholics or not? No; this gentleman does not worry about conditions that exist in Quebec or about what Quebec is doing in spite of the unfair treatment we are at present receiving.

There is another matter I would draw to the attention of the government. This issue of October 22, 1942, of the Gospel Witness from which I have quoted, and which at the time of the last victory loan seemed to circulate to the extent of a good many thousands of copies, contained on the back page a cartoon, showing in the centre the church of St. Peter of Rome, with the armorial bearings of the pope at the top, and showing at either side of the church Mussolini and Hitler making a salute to the church of Rome. Written in big letters, so big, Mr. Speaker, that you can see them from your place, are these words, "The Relationship of Roman Catholicism to Nazi-Fascism." This pamphlet was distributed among the English-speaking population of our country at the time of the last victory loan in October. At the same time there was distributed throughout the whole province of Quebec another pamphlet, in French only—according to the information I could secure from the bureau of information—and on the front cover is a photograph of the interior of a Catholic church in which a service is proceeding. There is written at the bottom, in French, "Ils Veulent Détruire l'Eglise de Dieu", which means in English, "They want to destroy the Church of God". That is referring to Hitler and Mussolini. On the back, to give this publication the appearance of another religious pamphlet which is also published in Quebec under the name of "Le Messager du Sacre-Cœur", there is printed a picture of the Sacred Heart with these words below, in French, "Je suis la Voie, la Vérité et la Vie", which means in English, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life". Inside the booklet will be found pictures of Hitler. His portrait is close to that of Cardinal Villeneuve; and the statement of Cardinal Villeneuve in favour of our war effort and against the axis powers appears under the portrait of Hitler. This booklet was published by the Service of Information, Ottawa, under the authorization of Hon. J. T. Thorson, Minister of National War Services. This was circulated in Quebec at the very same time that the other review from which I have quoted was circulated among English-speaking Canadians in other parts of the country. This one that was circulated in the province of Quebec was published by the government's own bureau of information. I wonder which one of these gives the truth? I do not know. But I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of propaganda throughout the country is not only false, but lowers respect for religious beliefs. It is against the unity of Canadians; it is against the best interests of our war effort, and it should be condemned. Since the government has permitted the circulation of this review and at the same time has published this other pamphlet which has been circulated in Quebec province, I say that the attitude of the government in both instances is wrong, and that we should stop this business.

I should like to speak English well enough to appeal to the spirit of fair play and justice of all the members of this house and to the respect which I am sure every hon. member has for the religious belief held by Catholics throughout Canada. I appeal to my fellow-members to support our country in which all serious-minded men are willing to work to help win this war, for which purpose we are asked to vote huge sums of money. I also ask the government to stop this kind of propaganda which is nothing else but forgeries and rashness.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion):

That all the words after the words "Your advisers have" in the amendment be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"not taken the necessary measures to stop the present anti-Catholic propaganda and prevent the circulation of some abusive publications conflicting with the purposes enunciated at the time of our war declarations and contrary at the same time to the spirit of the confederation pact and of the Atlantic charter, and, further, the rural and labour populations of the dominion are not adequately represented among Your Excellency's advisers and that this deficiency is responsible for the inequitable application of the National Resources Mobilization Act."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to speak to the amendment but to correct a statement made in the course of the remarks of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I did not wish to interrupt him when he was speaking, but I do not wish a certain statement he made to go unchallenged because it is wholly incorrect. My hon. friend, as I understood him, referring to third parties in this house, said that they had come into being during the course of the administration of this country's affairs by a government of which I had the honour to be the head. Looking at the third parties in the house, I recognize first the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. My recollection is, and I think I am right, that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came into being at the convention which was held in Regina in 1932 or 1933.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were here before that, perhaps under another name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The convention was held, I believe, in 1933, when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was the leader of the Conservative party and the Conservative party were in office. I look beyond, and see another third party, the Social Credit party. My recollection is that that party also came into being between 1930 and 1935. I believe that Mr. Aberhart in his province came into power in the early summer of 1935, and that the first Social Credit candidates who offered themselves for the federal house did so in 1935. So that that party came into being during the time when the former Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, was leading the Conservative party in this house and that party was in power.

I come to another party, the Progressive Conservative party. It has come, it is true, into being in the time during which this administration has been in office, but I think I can safely say that the Progressive Conservative party is the same old Conservative party, under another name.

As for the remaining parties, so-called, I do not think they are so much parties as they are leaders and would-be leaders of parties.

I hope that my hon. friend will see that I am seeking only to correct him, but I think it is advisable that the correction should be made.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say a word to the Prime Minister with regard to what he said about the Progressive Conservative party being the same old party? Of course no one knows better than he that his statement is at least seriously open to question. The Prime Minister has been quite keen to-night to describe the growth of new parties and new groups in Canada. I believe we shall all agree that he is the same old Prime Minister whom we have had for a long time.

An hon. MEMBER: And whom we shall have for a long time yet.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. This debate is absolutely out of order. The vote has been taken on the amendment to the amendment; you have now in your hands another amendment to the amendment, and that is what we are discussing at present.

Mr. SPEAKER: We have an amendment which has been moved but not yet read from the Chair. The Prime Minister was making a correction, and the leader of the opposition wishes to reply to the Prime Minister before the amendment is read from the Chair. I think it would be fair that the leader of the opposition should have a reply.

Mr. GRAYDON: I merely wanted to say this to the Prime Minister, with all seriousness and gravity. I suggest to him that in the course of this debate, at a time when he himself has said that this country, and indeed the whole world, are facing grave issues, requiring our serious consideration and our urgent attention, these old questions of how many parties grew up, and when, could be appropriately left until such time as victory has been won.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendment to the amendment of the member for Gaspe as to what he calls "abusive publications". Freedom of religion is something which the British empire and the mother country have had since time immemorial. This is the greatest war the world has ever seen. Its importance is primary, not secondary. While I believe in freedom of religion I believe also that this parliament should stick to its task of attending to the war; and let me say that there is no province which has more to fear to-day from at least one aspect of that war, the sinkings around our coasts, than the province of Quebec.

A great many people do not agree with some of these papers. All my life I have been a warm friend of the Catholic people of the city of which I was the head. There is no bigotry in Toronto; it is a tolerant place. If we are to set ourselves up as a sort of religious parliament and take into consideration every pamphlet which is published on either side, we shall be doing something which we have no right to do. The matter is one of property and civil rights, within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and in dealing with it this parliament is going very far afield.

The amendment to the amendment also brings in the Atlantic charter. Well, Casablanca put the Atlantic charter in the waste-paper basket the other day.

Many matters which are not in order have been discussed in this chamber. Let me say to the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment to the amendment that I have a warm regard for him, but I fail to see what we, sitting here as a parliament, have to do with religion. All of us, Jew and Gentile, black and white, should be equal before the law, and subject to the law every person is free to express his opinions. A great many of the matters which are referred to were virtually forgotten long before the last war, at least by a large number of the people of this country, and why they should be reopened at this time I do not know. I recall that the Rev. Mr. Toplady, who wrote that great hymn, "Rock of Ages," was in his time one of the most violent controversialists in behalf of certain religious opinions. Those doctrines and dogmas are forgotten to-day, but his hymn written in 1836, has brought comfort to the sick and dying the world over, while his religious controversies were long ago forgotten. I believe, with war on, that we should leave these disputes alone. We must think of such matter as the sinkings in the gulf of St. Lawrence; of the fact that five hundred ships sent to North Africa, with three hundred and fifty men-of-war and one hundred and twenty escorts, have been removed from the north Atlantic; that General Winter that has been the best friend we have had in the St. Lawrence, will not continue to aid us much longer. We had better stick to our own business. It is for the provinces, controlling property and civil rights, to regulate this issue. There is a law of libel, and if there is anything libellous in these articles the courts are available to determine the question; it should not be brought before parliament.

I protest against an amendment of this kind, dealing with a purely religious controversy of which people know little or nothing, very few having even read these pamphlets. I believe in freedom of religion and freedom of thought. I have heard a great many controversies and I do not agree with most of the controversialists on either side. I am a humble member of the church of England. That church believes in freedom of religion and freedom of speech. In any event we are wasting our time, for this is a subject beyond our powers. If you ask me, sir, the amendment to the amendment should be ruled out of order as dealing with something which lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces under section 91 of the British North America Act. If there is any grievance, let those who complain of it go to Queen's Park, which authorizes the publication of pamphlets. I repeat that I object to this parliament being made the scene of a religious controversy which is none of our business.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I seconded the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) just as I would second any amendment moved in the public interest. It is indeed regrettable to view religious quarrels brought about by fanatics who should be excluded from our society. It is a known fact that a certain clergyman in Toronto is constantly attacking the Roman Catholic religion by his speeches and his articles. This gentleman even sends to hon. members of this house his publication. Does he know how insulted we feel when we receive his paper? The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is vested with all the necessary powers to stop this propaganda, which affects more than four million Canadians. The attitude taken by Reverend Shields is a cause of scandal in a country which more than ever should attempt to maintain harmony. On many occasions municipal authorities have had to intervene in order to stop this man from spreading doubt, dissension and discord. The clergyman from Jarvis street causes trouble not only in the province of Quebec, but from the Atlantic to the Pacific. A bishop from British Columbia had to appeal to the Minister of Justice to prevent this man from repeating in his diocese his insults against the Roman Catholic church. This state of matters must cease and the government should take action in that regard without further delay.

The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé deals with the readjustment of salaries for Canadian workers. This measure is urgent, and I know that the working class of Quebec is entitled to a just reward for its labour to the same extent as workers in the other provinces. Let us take the farm labour problem. As I have already said very often in this house, if the government does not grant complete exemption from military training to farmers and farm hands we shall be headed for disaster and starvation. Furthermore, all farmers actually undergoing their military training should be sent back to their farms. The hon. member for Gaspé is perfectly right in deploring the fact that farmers and labourers are not adequately represented in the cabinet. This is the reason why so many people in this country are exploited by the trusts. While farmers, labourers and craftsmen are working, toiling and suffering, war profiteers are reaping public funds. This deplorable situation must cease.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) does not seem to be pleased with the new parties. At least this was the opinion he expressed with unusual strength on February 19. He said that multiplicity of parties was responsible for the downfall of France. This was not the determining factor of the defeat of that great country, and the Prime Minister knows it. One must go further back in history, to the point where the victorious allies of the last great war began losing the peace when they were preparing the treaty of Versailles. If France was in a state of extreme weakness when the present war broke out, it was as a result of the guilty complacency of the victor much more than of the formation of new political parties in that country. Who allowed the Rhineland to be remilitarized a few years before Stanley Baldwin stated that the first line of defence of Great Britain was on the Rhine? The unquenchable financial and commercial imperialism of certain nations was responsible for the downfall of France to a greater extent than was the creation of new political groups.

During the last war a few people grew rich while others suffered untold hardships. A few loathsome profiteers flooded Europe with war equipment. Boundaries did not exist for cannon merchants. The ocean itself was no barrier for those ever greedy madmen, the most active and at the same time the most repulsive of whom was Sir Basil Zaharoff. Holder of a baronetcy, commander of the order of the bath and grand officer of the legion of honour, that shady character became the intimate friend of the great political and military men of that period. He gave advice on war operations; he travelled from one seaport to another in perfect safety; he laid down the law, and compelled those in power to obey him. In short, he dominated governments and influenced history.

The terrible and horrible war which engulfed the lives of sixty thousand of our countrymen on foreign battlefields, which cost and is still costing us billions, which cost thirty-three countries the staggering sum of $186,000,000,000, and in which fifteen million men were killed, now appears to have been useless and to have settled nothing. Why? Simply because Germany, though she may have lost the war, won a great peace-time victory through the failure of the other powers to realize the inevitable consequences of their actions. When Germany was condemned to pay reparations a few of the victors proved quite willing to grant her loans much more considerable than the amounts she had to pay. When her commercial fleet was seized her enemies of yesterday provided her with the funds required to build another and more powerful one. Dictatorship of money; what crimes we commit in your name! Twenty-five years ago the old Germany was crushed and begging for mercy. To-day the new Germany, in a shaken Europe, openly defies the democracies. Behind the back of the League of Nations she imposed humiliating conditions on Great Britain and France. What happened when the vanquished of yesterday demanded the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia? Two great nations gave way in the face of the terrible doctrine, "Might is right".

These are indeed cruel truths, but no purpose is to be served by concealing them. It is far better to turn the searchlight of truth on the lowest strata of international life. In the face of events like these, invisible forces such as cooperation and love of peace remain the only safeguards of our civilization. The petty interests and criminal hypocrisy of certain nations have led all peoples into the terrible situation which now confronts us. To ensure the peace and progress of the world should have been the ultimate goal of the statesmen who were called upon to guide the destinies of the most powerful countries on earth; but arbitration and conciliation treaties were wrecked by a formidable instrument, that of financial and military imperialism. As substitutes for disarmament, tranquillity and the free development of peoples, heinous psychological trends have given us all the devilish weapons invented by a barbarism which we still dare to clothe with the noble name of civilization. Even Winston Churchill raised loud protests at Westminster in 1938 and 1939 against the criminal complacency shown by financiers of all kinds who continued to lend Germany enormous sums of money in order to facilitate the rebuilding of her navy. Right here in Canada a few weeks and even a few days before the present war broke out, shameful trusts were shipping to the enemy large quantities of nickel, rubber, steel, oil and gasoline. With heroic Belgium and Holland, heroic France, my mother country, was the first to fall under the blows of a formidable war machine which past and present allies had built up for Germany. No; France did not succumb to the quarrels of a few new political parties who were rather harmless. France was defeated by the shameful betrayal of commercial, military and financial imperialism. When history is written the impartial historian will strike out that page which the Prime Minister wrote on February 19, 1943, on the deep causes of the fall of France.

In conclusion, I would formulate this wish. National unity will live in Canada inasmuch as our living strength is preserved from disaster by a sound political economy. Where are we going in this whirlwind of billions succeeding other billions? Where are we heading with this mad race on public funds? What will become of our agriculture, our industries, our trade? In what society are we living? The future is so dark that I foresee the disintegration of our families and the bewilderment of our population, with generations of Canadians toiling under the burden of excessive taxation. I am thinking at present of the state of decadence and bankruptcy which will fall upon us as a consequence of our participation in this war on a scale out of all proportion to our resources, and I sincerely hope that God may preserve us from such a calamity. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before the vote is taken I have just a few words to say with regard to censorship. There was a great man who was in charge of the censors in Great Britain at the beginning of the war. He was Lord Macmillan, and he stated his views on the general rules of censorship in this way:

> Lord Macmillan sensibly gave orders to the censors that they are to confine their activities to news of a military character likely to be of value to the enemy, and are to refrain from censoring matter which merely happens to be politically disagreeable to the British government.

I take this from The Week, September 20, 1939, just at the beginning of the war.

This is a very reasonable view. It is a view which is in accordance with British usage. I do not discuss the qualifications of the head of the Canadian bureau of censors, who is supposed to be a counsel of certain fame; but what I cannot understand is the laxity of censorship regarding yellow-press news, such as the publicity stunt afforded by the trial of Errol Flynn. Some incidents in his trial were simply disgusting. Then, there was the story of Frances Farmer who was always drunk; it was one which could not be accepted as an example for either the young or the old.

It takes a great deal of courage to bring the case of Pastor Shields before the house, on account of the blackmail Shields uses at all times against those who dare to criticize him. I do not know whether or not I am right, but according to my information his case was to be considered—or was considered. I would direct the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to some Quebec jurisprudence respecting the rights of minorities. It is a very old case in which a man—and I do not recall whether he was a notary or a journalist —named Plamondon was sued by a Quebec Jew who complained that the defendant had written articles which had the effect of dissuading clients from buying at the plaintiff's store, simply because he was a Jew. I do not remember the decision of the superior court, but I have a distinct recollection of the judgment rendered by the court of appeal, which was headed by no less a person than the late Sir Horace Archambault, then chief justice of the province of Quebec. That judgment stated that any man guilty of such offence against a citizen belonging to a minority in the province should pay a considerable amount of money. That is Quebec jurisprudence.

Now that most of the civil powers of the province have been taken by the federal government, I wonder that no distinction is made between freedom of speech and abuse. I did have some observations to make respecting the address in reply, and perhaps this would be a good time to make them. The amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) refers to the Atlantic charter. Well and good. I am all for the Atlantic charter. It will be remembered that four freedoms were mentioned in that charter, the first two of which were freedom from fear and freedom from want. Those two appear in the speech from the throne as it is contained at page 3 of the Votes and Proceedings of this session. But to my great astonishment the speech from the throne does not mention the other two freedoms, which are just as great and just as necessary in any democracy as are freedom from fear and freedom from want. I refer to freedom of speech and freedom of religion. They are not mentioned in the speech from the throne. Why? Let hon. members now sitting in the house check the record. I was astounded when I noted that omission.

I have another regret to express, namely, that there no distinction is made between freedom and licence. Freedom of speech and licence of speech are not at all the same thing. Freedom of speech is the right to say anything which is not against good order in the country. Licence is the procedure of saying things which may be injurious to public safety and order. I sincerely believe that what Shields has said from the pulpit is dangerous to good government, good order and peace in this country. So much is this so that two of the largest hotels in Canada—the finest hotel in Ottawa, the Chateau Laurier, and one of the largest in Montreal, the Windsor—have refused Pastor Shields the right to repeat an address in which he called the Roman Catholic church the fifth column in Canada. The authorities at the Chateau Laurier are officials under the control of the Canadian National Railways, and certainly the board of directors of the Windsor hotel at Montreal are not bigoted men. However, the officials of both those hotels felt they could not admit this man Shields to repeat under their roofs that which was injurious to large numbers of our fellow citizens. Their understanding was the same as that of the King's Bench which was presided over by the late Sir Horace Archambault on a different occasion, namely, that minority rights in this country shall be respected.

We hear a great deal about national unity. One thing I regret very deeply is that some people take for granted that Canadians of British origin necessarily think differently from Canadians of other origins. That is a great mistake. The troublemakers in this country are a very small minority. I have had the privilege of travelling in Ontario and in the maritimes, although I have not been so fortunate as to have done the same through the west, but I shall do it soon. The people of Ontario whom I know and the people of the maritimes whom I know, whether of British origin or of French origin, think the same when they consider anything without religious or race prejudice. They are all good people. There are, however, certain people who are interested in having this country disunited. They are only a few, but they do this to prevent the Canadian people from being informed of what they are doing. These troublemakers are the war profiteers who control the press through their advertisements.

One of my regrets is that there is not an independent English daily press in this country to give the proper information to the Canadian people. Recently I was in a large Canadian city where two evening papers are published. I bought both papers and they could be read in five minutes, or possibly in three or two minutes. There were just a few headlines on the front pages, some news, and then advertisements for the women who wanted to go to the stores to buy food or clothing or other commodities. I made a comparison between those large fat papers and the weekly press.

Why is our daily press not just as good as the average weekly press? The weekly press publishes some advertisements, but the editors are close to the farmer; they take time to think and they show more independence. I do not know whether the publication referred to by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) was monthly or weekly; since I do not read it I do not know what it is. I have listened to the quotations he gave. It is deplorable that papers with the largest circulation among the English people are quite often—there are a few happy exceptions—much below the average of the weekly press.

Speaking again of censorship, what I have to say will be quite brief. The other day I wanted some information about our trade but

I could not get it because the censor held it up. If any hon. member will look at our trade publications he will see that they contain practically no information. We are told that our exports are larger than they were before. This may be true because I do not know whether my information is correct, but I have been told that the total amount of our exports includes the gifts we have made to other countries. This is absurd, if true.

It is also impossible to get any information about importations from Great Britain. Why? Is it because the minister of trade of Great Britain said when he was in Canada last year that they could supply us with any merchandise we wanted? Is it because our exports at the present time are mostly war munitions, food, grain and lumber? Is it forbidden by the censor that members of parliament be given detailed information about our exports because our imports from Great Britain are entirely different from our exports, being made up mainly of commercial merchandise? If that is the situation there is no reason why this information should be refused. It would not help the enemy to know what kind of merchandise we are getting from Great Britain provided it is not war munitions and arms. That is why I express my feeling about this matter.

We are doing our best to help the common cause; we are all for it. But is it not time to follow the example of Great Britain and produce merchandise for export like that country is doing although it is exposed to bombardment? That is one question. If we do not do that, what will be our external trade when the war is over? We shall be left without any trade at all. It is time to think of that. Many people are employed to-day. They do their work happily. They make money; so much the better for them. But we must think of the aftermath and see to it that all good examples which are given by the old country are followed by us.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry I have to speak a little louder for my hon. friend. I have expressed my views on these matters, and I think my hon. friend the member for Gaspé was right in bringing them to the attention of the house.

But there is something more. I have heard from a source which I cannot give that when Mr. Chaloult was prosecuted, Pastor Shields was also to be prosecuted. Then it was not Pastor Shields who was prosecuted; it was Mr. Drew. Then the charge was withdrawn. I have also been informed that it was a Roman Catholic from another province than that of Quebec who intervened to stop all prosecutions against Pastor Shields. Did he act for himself or on the suggestion of some other gentleman? Although I cannot disclose the source of my information, I can say that it is generally pretty good. If the government had really considered the case of Pastor Shields and decided that he should be prosecuted, why did they change Shields for Drew? That I cannot understand, because they do not belong to the same church, and their cases are entirely different. By the way, Mr. Chaloult was acquitted, and so was Mr. Décary of Montreal, who was the registrar of the National war services board. He was accused before the courts and suffered calumny, and then he was acquitted by the Supreme Court of Canada. I was humiliated as a French-Canadian when I saw the way in which those gentlemen were treated, but I was most indignant when I saw the way in which the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) was dealt with. When a charge is laid against an officer there is a previous investigation and all the charges are summarized. Therefore the army authorities know in advance the charge in the case. What I complain bitterly of is this, and I would say the same if it had been any Conservative member or any Jewish member or any citizen of Canada: Here was this man, a member of the House of Commons, put in custody, in gaol, if you wish, for fifty-one days, during which time the worst calumnies were circulated against him. Some one sent me some clippings from papers from all over the country, papers from British Columbia, for instance, with headings in type about two or three inches high, "Quebec Scandal." It was portrayed as a Quebec scandal. That is what happens every time when it is a case in the province of Quebec.

I have the best possible disposition toward this government, not toward all the members of the government, but especially towards the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), for whom I have been fighting for years; but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if those things had been done by a Tory government, the Liberal party would have been one to fight it. How can we speak of freedom when these things happen? It was the reverse of the British practice. In Britain a man is considered innocent, or not guilty, until he is found guilty. In the case of the hon. member for Portneuf, it was known in advance by the national defence department that the charge against him could not be substantiated. Nevertheless the brass hats decided to humiliate him by keeping him for fifty-one days in the "clink" at the citadel. Not only that, but gossip—I know it is untrue—went on and on, and even members of the cabinet were associated in the calumnies that were made against the hon. member. I protested each time very strongly. But that is what was done. It is not only as a Roman Catholic, not only as a French Canadian from the province of Quebec, but as a Canadian, that I protest against the abuses I have mentioned which appeared in the Gospel Witness and the abuses of which the brass hats in Ottawa have been guilty, and so on and so on. It is as a Canadian I protest, a Canadian who has never raised a racial or a religious issue in this house. I have always abstained from doing so, but I think this sort of thing should stop. Of course, there are some people who live by it. But now that people throughout the country are showing a spirit of magnanimity in this war, I hope that all this which has to be regretted will not happen again and will not have to be deplored again. These things would not happen if the proper distinction were made between licence of speech and freedom of speech, and if the government were ready to assume their responsibilities when it is time to do so. Sometimes it is not necessary to assume any responsibility; yet they tell us, "Well, we have assumed a great responsibility". This time I must remind my good friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) that he has at his disposal all the machinery which is necessary to stop this; and I will tell also the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) that he must give definite instructions to the censor to censor news which should not appear in the press, and also comments which are prejudicial to the good understanding that must exist in this country.

I have been very mild in my remarks. Before closing, as I do not want to make another speech on this address, I have just a word to say to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). I listened to him this afternoon; he is an able speaker. I know that for many years he was the secretary of the late Mr. Lapointe, and he was of a good enough disposition quite often to speak on my behalf in my constituency. I know him well enough to tell him that I was very sorry regarding what he said of the late Mr. Lapointe, who was a very dear friend of mine. As he knows, Mr. Lapointe and I were on the best possible terms, and I always regarded him as a big brother. I will say no more about him because his remembrance is in the hearts of all those who have known him. What Mr. Lapointe had to say in his lifetime he said, and I believe that hon. members know enough of the good relations which existed—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question before he concludes?

Mr. POULIOT: Just one minute—between the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) and myself to know that I was a good friend of Mr. Lapointe and that it was not only the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères and the member for Témiscouata who were good friends of that great minister. I was deeply touched when an English-speaking colleague, who sits across from me but is not in the chamber at the moment, told me with tears in his eyes what Mr. Lapointe had done for him. Others, too, have testified how much Mr. Lapointe was to them personally. For all these reasons I think that, while it would be perfectly in order to quote what Mr. Lapointe said in his lifetime, it is pretty difficult to accept his interpretation of the events of the day and that they should be judged in the light of the attitude he took while he was still alive.

The only thing that remains for me to do is to thank the house for their kindness in listening attentively to what I have said. I hope nobody has misunderstood my remarks. What I have done is for the public good, and for no other purpose.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the hon. member answer a question? Does he not think it will be far better to wait until after the war before some members raise questions of this kind in the house? We are not all theologians, and this forum is not a religious seminary. Surely the war is paramount. Most of us have not read the articles or even seen them. We cannot be expected to interfere in differences of opinion between reverend doctors on both sides of a religious subject of which we know nothing.

Mr. POULIOT: In answer to the hon. member for Broadview I would say this. In the first place we do not know when the war will end; and if we wait until the end of the war to prevent Pastor Shields from abusing French Canada the country will be in an upheaval within a few months.

Mr. CHURCH: Religion is outside our sphere of authority.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I had not intended to speak on this amendment, but, having regard to what has been said in the course of the debate thus far, it is important, I think, that I should draw the attention of the house and the country to the possible consequences of continuing the debate and permitting a motion of this kind to go to a division.

There are times and places for all things. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who has just taken his seat, said that he thought it was well that the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) should have brought this subject to the attention of the house. I take no exception to his bringing any subject to the attention of the house, but I take very strong exception to the hon. member bringing the subject in the form of a motion of want of confidence in the administration, bringing it on the address, and raising for discussion in the house at this particular time a subject which cannot be other than perhaps the most controversial of any which could be raised at this time of war.

On grounds of public policy I am going to make a personal appeal to my hon. friend to withdraw his amendment. He has brought the subject to the attention of the house; he has brought it to the attention of the country; and I ask him now in the interests of the country, the maintenance of national unity and the avoidance of religious controversy at this time of war that, having served his purpose by bringing up the subject, he ask leave of the house to withdraw his motion and not have the matter carried to a division. I shall give him and the house reasons why I feel the way I do, and what I think would be a preferable course to the one he has adopted.

While I was speaking with one hon. member this afternoon as to a previous vote, the vote on the motion moved by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), the hon. member mentioned to me that he thought that all the ex-minister had in mind was to bring the matter up for discussion, that he did not really mean any want of confidence in the government, but that it was perhaps the only chance he would get to present the point of view which he had presented. There may be some hon. members who are still of that impression with regard to the motion to which I have referred and some who may so view the present motion and other similar motions. May I point out that, on going into committee of supply, hon. members have the right to bring up for discussion any subject whatever if it is of the nature of a grievance. To bring forward a subject of grievance at the time of a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply does not mean that the matter has to be in the form of a motion or if in the form of a motion, pressed to a division.

If hon. members wish to bring a subject up in this house and have it discussed without subjecting the government to any expression of want of confidence they may bring the matter up on the motion to go into supply, and if this is done by way of amendment when the proposed amendment has been discussed they may ask that the motion be withdrawn and that the house be permitted to go into committee of supply. That opportunity is open to hon. members and that is one way in which questions upon which hon. members wish to present their views can be presented even if they are of a most controversial character. But to dignify a question of this kind by treating it as something so important that it must be brought forward in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the form of a vote of want of confidence in the administration, seems to me to be not only the wrong way of proceeding but to be a course which helps to bring parliament itself into contempt in the eyes of the people.

The people of this country expect this parliament to get on with measures relating to the war. They are not looking to members of parliament moving amendment after amendment all in the nature of motions of want of confidence in the administration, once the house has tested the confidence or lack of confidence there may be in the ministry. The motion of the leader of the opposition is a test on that point, each amendment is a further test, but all these motions when they are moved on the address in this way are want of confidence motions, because they mean that if they should carry his excellency would not be thanked for his speech, a speech which set forth the policy of the government, and the whole policy of the government would be repudiated by the House of Commons. If hon. members appreciate the significance of proceedings of the house and the manner in which, according to parliamentary procedure, they should be conducted, they would have no difficulty in finding that this want of confidence motion should be voted down, if it comes to a vote.

But may I go a step further than that. The government I maintain has the right to ask every hon. member of this house if they are not prepared to give their support to the government in most things, that at least they will not seek to embarrass the government in its war effort. I ask my hon. friend, does he think that the motion which he has introduced to-night is in any way going to strengthen the hands of the government in seeking to maintain national unity in this country in this time of war? If he does not, I think he ought to be prepared to withdraw his amendment.

May I say to him that the government has considered what it is wisest to do with Mr. Shields. I want to put before him a side of the matter which perhaps he has not considered. I do not think it is part of the business of the government to try to deal with matters of religious controversy. The first part of my hon. friend's amendment has the effect of blaming the government for not taking steps to stop what he terms "the present anti-Catholic propaganda." That is one of the grounds on which his amendment is based, that the government should have taken steps to prevent anti-Catholic propaganda. When I said that the government had thought of what action it should take in regard to Mr. Shields it was not in connection with what he was doing in the way of anti-Catholic propaganda, it was in respect to one particular statement he had made which had relation to the defence of Canada regulations, and whether or not Mr. Shields should be prosecuted for what he had said in that connection. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) by a slip of the tongue, I think, said that if Mr. Shields was to be persecuted such and such a course should be taken. I think my hon. friend meant to say, if he was to be prosecuted.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now there is the whole situation as related to the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé. The government would have to consider whether it were best to risk making a martyr of Mr. Shields, give him an excuse for saying he was being persecuted, or whether it were better to leave matters of libel and slander to the courts of the country to be dealt with in accordance with the law of the land. The law of the land provides as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) pointed out, that prosecutions in such matters are to be instituted by the attorney general of a province, not by the attorney general of the dominion. Let me ask my hon. friend this question—and I am putting the whole case before him and before the house and the country in order that all may see how I at least view these matters. Assume that my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who has been in the government just over a year I think, within the first few months of his coming into office, or at any time up to the present, had as Attorney General of Canada sought in some way to bring action against Mr. Shields in the province of Ontario, what would the cry have been all over this country? That the government at Ottawa, which had a large following from the province of Quebec, at the instance of its following from Quebec province, through its new Minister of Justice from Quebec province had started a prosecution on religious matters in the province of Ontario. What situation would have followed from that. If you want to start a religious controversy in this country that it may be impossible to control, just begin having matters of the kind affecting race and religion dealt with as between one province and another.

The laws of libel and slander exist and to these laws recourse for redress may be had by churches as well as other institutions and by individuals. It is open to anyone to bring an action against Mr. Shields for anything he says that is libelous. But as long as no individual brings an action against him, as long as the church itself or representatives of the church think it wiser not to bring action, because they do not wish to let him assume the role of a martyr and give more notoriety to a man who may be seeking notoriety and martyrdom above everything; so long as that step is not taken by the parties most interested I do not see why the government of Canada should be expected to take action to deal with religious controversy.

Turn the situation around. What would be said of an effort by the government to stop, in one province, anti-protestant propaganda in another? Unfortunately, both among those who profess that they are in the communion of the Roman Catholic church and those who profess they are in the communion of the Protestant churches, there are men who to my mind have no right in this world to speak in the name of religion, who despite their professions, are intolerant and seek to stir up all the religious strife they possibly can. I think the common sense of the people deals in the end most effectively with those people. I do not think the people of Ontario take Mr. Shields as seriously as does my hon. friend from the province of Quebec. They know men of that type, and they feel that the best way to deal with them is to ignore them, treat them with contempt. Speaking here as a member of a Protestant church, I wish to say that I have utter contempt for Mr. Shields and his unworthy utterances. I believe that the right-thinking men and women of our country share an equal contempt for the head of any church or one belonging to any denomination who tries to stir up in this country in time of war religious controversy and strife. If in these matters there is any action to be taken by any government the action should certainly be taken by the authorities of the province which is the proper one to deal with such matters.

I have dealt sufficiently I think with the point that I wished particularly to bring out, namely, how completely we would have misapplied the government's powers had we taken the course of action which my hon. friend says in his subamendment we should have taken. Instead of making a bad situation any better we would have made it infinitely worse.

I have said that there are other times at which this matter could more fittingly be dealt with. If the house wishes to have a further discussion with respect to Mr. Shields or any matter that has to do with religious controversy, then I say let us have one of our secret sessions and there discuss the matter as fully as we please. My hon. friend opposite smiles when I say, let us have a secret session—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not smiling at that. I would not dignify it with a secret session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my reason for suggesting a secret session is that if there are any hon. members who feel deeply on these matters and want them discussed, I for one would be prepared to discuss them as fully as possible in any session of this parliament which would not create in this country a worse situation than it was being sought to remedy. A secret session, as I see it, is the only kind of session at which a matter of this sort could be properly dealt with in time of war. So I say to my hon. friend that if he withdraws his amendment and wishes to have this matter further discussed at a secret session, for my part I will be prepared to seek to meet his wishes by providing an opportunity for discussion in that way. But I do not think this debate should be continued longer, because every voice that is raised in discussion, on one side or the other, is only helping to create or foster religious controversy in Canada during this time of war. Since the beginning of this war I have done my utmost to prevent anything in the nature of political discussion of a serious controversial character from developing to a point where it would become a question of race or religion. If in time of war we ever get into a discussion of controversies that relate to matters of race and religion, then we shall be handing this country over to the enemy without further fighting to save it.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend will accept the suggestion I have offered and at least, if he cannot help the government, will not seek to embarrass us more than is necessary in our endeavour to carry on the war effort of the country.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): I do not propose to make any extended remarks on the subamendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). While I sympathize with many of the points he has expressed during the presentation of his case, in all sincerity I must tell him that as the motion is framed I cannot support it, because it mixes religious questions with economic and political matters.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that there is necessity for a discussion of the subjects dealt with in his subamendment. Because we come from the province of Quebec there is no reason why we should not express our views on such questions and always be afraid of endangering national unity. We are not the only province responsible for the maintenance of national unity in Canada. We have our rights and privileges under the constitution, as have the citizens of every other province. We have the right, to which no one can object, to voice our views and our contentions on the floor of this house, and it is time we stopped trying to teach a lesson to the representatives of the province of Quebec only. Difficult questions affecting national unity are often raised by other representatives of the Canadian people in this House of Commons, but unfortunately the blame always falls upon the province of Quebec. We are always being asked to make sacrifices and to cease making representations because in the opinion of some our attitude might be interpreted as interfering with our war effort.

With that I cannot agree. I repeat that the motion presented by the hon. member for Gaspé deals with matters which we should be given an opportunity to discuss, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has promised that such an opportunity will be provided. That opportunity should be given not only to the hon. member for Gaspé but to all other members of this house who have similar questions to raise.

I am not ready to support the subamendment, however, because it raises too many questions at the same time. The subamendment is a little too complicated, and a vote upon it would be almost unintelligible not only to this house but to the country. If an opportunity is given for discussion I would be ready to support the hon. member on many of the points he brought up in his remarks, whatever may be the criticism as to the length of time taken or the delay occasioned to the other business of the house. These matters are of importance, and we should have the right to discuss them freely and completely.

I am not entirely satisfied with the observations made by the Prime Minister. We are told that all our actions should be directed toward the winning of the war, that we should not do anything to embarrass or hinder what must be done by the government. If we are going to stop thinking; if we are going to cease taking any action in this house; if we are going to cease expressing any opinions which are not in agreement with the policies of the government, then we might just as well close parliament, go home and let the affairs of the country be administered by orders in council. We ought to be reasonable, I admit. We ought to take into consideration the position in which the government finds itself and the difficulties with which it has to contend. I am quite ready to do my share to help the government discharge its duties. But I am not ready to sacrifice the right to express my own views on questions which I think are important and deserving of the attention of the members of the house.

The practice we are asked to follow here does not prevail anywhere except in Canada. If you look at the reports of proceedings in other parliaments you will see that members are free to discuss any question, that representatives are not met at every step with the objection that what they are doing may delay the progress of the war effort or may in some way embarrass the war policy of the government.

My motion was not made with that purpose at all. It was the logical conclusion of what had been said by all members having spoken in the debate. I never asked that the mobilization act should be suspended in its entirety. I asked that part of it only should be suspended for a short time, pending an investigation; that was all. My motion has been misrepresented and my words have been distorted during the debate.

Mr. HOMUTH: By whom has it been misrepresented?

An hon. MEMBER: Order. Shut up.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who said that? I will not shut up. Who distorted the hon. member's words?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I will not sit down; I don't have to.

Mr. CARDIN: I frankly admit the great responsibility which is on the government at the present time; I have never denied it. I have been ready up to now, as I will be ready from now on, to do the best I can to help, without going to the extent of trampling upon my own convictions. I am ready to do the best I can to help the government discharge its responsibilities, which I repeat are great; but I claim that on certain questions at least parliament has a right to express its will, and that the representatives of the people in this house have a right to voice their disagreement with certain policies of the government. This is not unpatriotic. This is not doing anything against the united nations in their endeavour to win the war. It is merely preserving, even during war time, the privileges and liberties of the members of a democratic parliament, for which at the present time our armies are fighting.

If we are going to be prevented from expressing our views on any subject on account of the war, then I repeat that we might as well go home, and close up parliament, because there will be nothing left for us to do here.

Therefore I am not very much impressed by the argument that we should stop discussion on most subjects not directly related to the war, simply because it might be embarrassing to the government. I am not very much impressed, either, by the argument that if action had been taken against Pastor Shields by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who is a French Canadian, it would have caused an upheaval all over the country. It could have caused trouble only in the minds of those who do not understand Canadian problems.

If there was cause for prosecution, whether the Minister of Justice is a French Canadian or an English-speaking Canadian, procedures should have been taken, without any fear or hesitation. The Minister of Justice, as such, must prosecute any man who does something contrary to the laws of the country. His action should not be influenced simply because he happens to belong to the minority.

But I concur in the opinion of the Prime Minister that at this time we should not mix religious matters with political and economic questions. And it is because I agree with that view expressed by the Prime Minister, that I join him in asking the hon. member for Gaspé to withdraw his motion, now that he has been given an opportunity of speaking on the subjects contained in his subamendment. I suggest to him, as a French Canadian, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, and as a man as deeply interested as he is in having our race and our religion respected in Canada, to make that little concession, reserving his right to discuss fully the matter on a more appropriate occasion.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, before the debate goes any further may I point out that evidently the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) has overlooked a provision in the British North America Act which a minister of justice cannot overlook, namely, that the administration of justice is not only the privilege but is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces respectively. Whenever anything requires to be done by the Attorney General of Canada the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères may be assured that so long as I am the Attorney General of Canada I will attempt to do it, no matter where it happens to be, no matter what race or creed may be affected, no matter what persons may be concerned.

But this matter, if it does constitute an offence constitutes such offence against the criminal law of the country, the administration of which is the responsibility of attorneys general of the provinces. It is not a war offence; it is not something contravening the regulations for the defence of Canada. If an offence has been committed along the lines suggested in the subamendment of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) it is an offence against peace-time law as much as it is against war-time law. And it possibly may be an offence, if in fact it does amount to sedition, under the common law of British countries. Sedition in British countries may consist of exciting ill-will between different classes of his majesty's subjects. But that raises a question of fact which must be determined by a court, according to the common law procedure of the country; and a prosecution can be brought about by anyone who will take the responsibility under oath of laying a complaint. Such complaint will be investigated, and if the investigating magistrate comes to the conclusion that a prima facie case has been made out, he will commit for trial. The case will then be the subject of a bill which, in due course, will be presented to his majesty's grand jury. If they in turn find a true bill the case will be brought before an ordinary court of justice. A jury will be empaneled and will determine the question whether the words or actions did amount to something which would excite ill-will between different classes of his majesty's subjects. That is as much a peace-time matter as a war-time matter, and as such is something which could be prosecuted by the attorney general of any province where the alleged offence was committed.

Mr. HOMUTH: Except the George Drew case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is very desirous, I presume, of drawing a red herring across the trail.

Mr. HOMUTH: I might as well, because—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The George Drew case arose out of an alleged offence against regulations for the defence of Canada. And this, if my hon. friend is susceptible of understanding the kind of language I use, would be an offence against the ordinary criminal law of this country.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a word, following the remarks we have just heard, remarks which have disturbed me rather greatly. I suppose none of us wants to see any controversey raised of a religious or racial nature, and I think everything should be done to prevent anything of the kind from being fomented in the country in which we live at this particular time.

I was, however, rather alarmed at the statement just made by the Attorney General of Canada, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). The wide interpretation he gave respecting the laws of sedition and slander is such that if the government of Canada followed the line he laid down, then a government could constitute itself the judge of what should be said and what should not be said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, yes. That was surely implied in the remarks made by the Minister of Justice.

This is a British parliament. It is a parliament which operates under the greatest possible freedom of thought and the greatest possible freedom of speech. In my opinion it is a dangerous thing to interfere with freedom of thought or freedom of speech at any possible time and under any possible circumstances. In my opinion, if you interfere with freedom of thought or freedom of speech on the part of a certain individual to-day, you interfere with freedom of thought and speech of another individual to-morrow. And you gradually narrow down the range of that freedom in the country in which we live. Ultimately you arrive at something in the nature of a dictatorship.

Yesterday we were debating the defence of Canada regulations. The party with which I am associated stood for a principle. We have no association with the communist party. We have no association with the Jehovah's Witnesses, but yesterday we stood resolutely for the principle that under the British constitution and under British laws these people have the right to freedom of thought and freedom of speech. The same thing applies to every other religious and political organization in the dominion. I hold no brief for Doctor Shields; indeed in my opinion the doctrine which he is preaching has led to a dangerous feeling of disunity in this country. Every person ought to be aware of the danger that lies therein.

Let me say in passing that the party with which I am associated, although at times it has been subjected to religious condemnation, has never adopted similar tactics. We would never under any circumstances raise the issue of race or religion in this parliament or in this country. I appeal to my hon. friends on all sides of the house, of all races and of all religions, to accept as a principle in this parliament that we forgo any appeal to religious or racial prejudices. Let us live together in unity under the constitution and under the principles upon which this parliament has been founded, the principle of freedom of thought and the principle of freedom of speech, believing as we do that ultimately right and justice will prevail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend must have misunderstood what the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said. Would he tell the house what were the words or what was the effect of the words used by the Minister of Justice from which he drew the conclusion he has?

Mr. COLDWELL: The record to-morrow will show.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite content to abide by the record. I did not take a note of what the Minister of Justice said, but I think the purport of his remarks was quite unmistakable.

Mr. ROY: If I may be permitted, I should like to answer the request made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Before doing that, I should like first to answer the request made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin).

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. member is speaking twice on the same question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ROY: I should like to answer the requests which were made to me on this amendment, and then perhaps I will make an agreement. If I can answer, we shall see what we can do.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. gentleman is rising to speak to the request made to him by the Prime Minister and also by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. If that is so, I think it is the wish of the house that he should reply to that request.

Mr. ROY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères asked me to withdraw part of my amendment. I was amazed to hear that request from him. I remember only a few days ago, and also once during the last session, the hon. member explained that for the welfare of the people of Quebec he had made all sorts of concessions to the government which had led to his dismissal or his running away from the cabinet.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must understand that a simple request was made to him and he should reply to that request in terms as simple as the request itself. He was asked whether he would consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. ROY: If I understand you, Mr. Speaker, you wish me to answer the request of the Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes or no.

Mr. ROY: If I am not allowed to do more than answer the Prime Minister, I will say "no". If I am allowed to answer him I shall try to make an agreement with him. That is what I offered the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now that the religious question is settled, I think we should call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is not finished, and the house has a right to stay until it is finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand there is an objection to the house sitting beyond eleven o'clock, on the part of some hon. members, and in that case I think we ought to adjourn. We will continue tomorrow with this debate, and if we conclude this debate we might take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) with respect to reconstruction and rehabilitation, and the one in the name of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) with respect to radio broadcasting, or the one in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) for a select standing committee on railways and shipping. If there is any more time we might take the resolution respecting the city of Ottawa.

Motion (Mr. Adamson) agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Wednesday, February 24, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BRING ACT OF 1939 INTO CONFORMITY WITH PRESENT PRACTICES

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: The necessity for the amendment arises out of the fact that in creating the Department of Munitions and Supply, parliament placed a limitation of three years on the life of the department, with the result that its life will automatically expire early in April, if no action is taken. I should have no personal objection to that occurrence, but I think it would be rather disturbing to Canadian industry. While the necessary amendment is being made in that regard it is intended also to bring the act into conformity with the present practices of the department.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OF ANNUAL REPORT AND GRAIN MARKETING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Is it the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to refer the annual report of the wheat board to a committee of the house? If so, will he also refer to this committee the marketing policy for the 1943 crop, which he recently announced in the house?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of the questions he has just asked. The answer to the first question is that I am asking to have the annual report of the wheat board referred to the agriculture committee of the house. In answer to the second question, it is not the intention to submit to the committee the general marketing policy of the government in connection with grain, but as far as the marketing of wheat and coarse grains and kindred subjects are concerned, the widest possible latitude will be given to a discussion of these matters when the annual report of the wheat board is being considered.

CANADIAN ARMY OVERSEAS

INQUIRY AS TO PROMOTION OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question which is in the mind of every man in the army and every civilian in Canada. Why is it that Lieutenant-General McNaughton, the commander of the Canadian armed forces overseas, has not yet been promoted to the rank of full general?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question involves a matter of policy regarding which an announcement will be made when a decision has been reached in respect of such policy.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

PRIORITY FOR PURCHASES OF ELECTRICAL TRANSFORMERS FOR DAIRYING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. STOKES (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply respecting a matter of serious concern to a considerable number of dairy farmers in the part of Ontario from which I come. I refer to the difficulties they are facing in connection with securing priorities for electrical transformers required by owners of milking machines. Will the minister take steps to see that consideration is given to providing relief for these producers of necessary food supplies?

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe that is a question which should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, some of the questions that are being asked on the orders of the day are definitely urgent. The one now asked by the hon. member for Hastings South is one of considerable urgency. Just because it happens to affect agriculture does not necessarily mean that it is not of urgent importance. I happen to know that it is, and I suggest the minister should answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Listening to the question I did not gather that it was of such urgency, but if the minister wishes to reply he may do so.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The problem of transformers for farm equipment is one which has been under continuous review since early in the war. The difficulty is that these transformers use a large amount of highly strategic material required for war munitions. It has not been felt up to this time that material could be found for transformers in addition to that which is needed for war purposes. I shall be glad, however, to review the situation again and see whether at this time any exception can be made. I may add that the problem is not a new one. We have been under pressure for transformers during the past eighteen months.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is becoming more urgent, though.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E.

Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party—

An hon. MEMBER: Progressive Conservative.

Mr. ADAMSON: —and I use the word "Conservative" advisedly in this instance—has been accused in the house within the last few days of wishing to conscript every man and every boy off the farm and the factory into the Canadian army. This is the old political strategy we are always up against—that we are a party going around depleting the farms, denuding the factories of their labour, destroying home life by taking away the sole support of aged mothers. We are accused of being ogres. That has been the policy of the Liberal party for twenty-five years. Mr. Speaker, it does not work any more; the birds are coming home to roost. I was the first to advocate national selective service in the House of Commons. I took the responsibility for advocating it then, and I take the responsibility for advocating it now. But in order to keep the record straight I wish now to repeat what I said in advocating those measures when I spoke as far back as 1940, nearly three years ago. At page 162 of Hansard I am reported as follows:

> The training of military personnel must be so arranged as not to conflict with industry. A comprehensive plan must be prepared by all industries engaged in our war effort, indicating the present and future demands in regard to man-power. To-day we have approximately 50,000 employable unemployed in this country. It is estimated that by July of next year industry will require a further 500,000 technically trained men. These men are as vital to the defence of Canada at the present time as are the soldiers who enlist in our army. Therefore I suggest that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) should go to the registration list and call out for training in our munitions industries all available people between the ages of eighteen and fifty, in order to make up this apparent deficiency.

And a little further down:

> This is a total war. Each of us in Canada has a job to do. If we are employed in civilian occupations and the government needs us for war work, whether as a soldier or in making machine guns, we must be prepared to go and do the country's bidding. Therefore I suggest an immediate recapitulation of the national registration scheme, calling out all those who may become useful in our war industries.

Does that sound as if we wanted to get every man out of industry and into the army? Does that sound as if we wanted to take all the men from the farms? No; it was a plea for a balanced man-power effort, a balanced effort in industry and in the army, a balanced effort so that our farms would continue to be in production, so that our industries would not be short-handed, and our army would know how many men we would have.

I suggested then and I suggest to-day that it is the duty of every citizen to serve the state in a time of emergency. And it is the government's duty, one which it must not shirk, to tell the individual where he is to serve.

Again, Mr. Speaker, in the address last year I said this, as reported at page 297 of Hansard:

> The way to consider Canada's war effort is to see to it that every man will be called upon to do the job he is most capable of doing. Surely there is no disagreement with that statement.
> The unfairness of the present system is that men now doing one job and doing it well can and do alter their calling or occupation almost at will, frequently to the great disruption of industry.

I went on to give an example in respect of specially skilled men in the Bren gun factory, men who had taken months to train, and who had to have special qualifications as to eyesight to carry out a certain operation in connection with the manufacture of Bren guns. I mentioned that some such men had enlisted. Then I went on to say:

> Several of these men have enlisted in the Canadian armed forces, against the wishes of their employers, their reasons being those of any red-blooded young Canadian. I suggest that to use these men in the army is not in the best interests of the country's war effort at the present time.

Does that look as though I wished to denude the factories of their workers? Does that look as though the Progressive Conservative party wished to go round the country with a sword saying that we must have a big army to the exclusion of all other effort? No. We were the first to realize that we must have a balanced war effort. We were the first to suggest national selective service. Had our suggestions been carried out then, fearlessly and with the courage the government should have possessed, we would not have the man-power muddle that exists to-day.

Our soldiers must be prepared to fight and fight anywhere, otherwise they should not be in the army. Of course exceptions must be made for low category men, training personnel, those on vulnerable point duty and in internment operations. To have a home defence army only of fit young Canadians is not in the best interests of Canada. Should the Canadian army go into battle overseas they should be available for the support of that army as reinforcements. We must support our soldiers overseas; we must provide them with reinforcements. Any country which fails to support its fighting sons does not deserve to exist.

There have been two or three isolationist amendments, and the supporters of these amendments must fall into one of two categories. Either they do not view with alarm the possibility of an axis victory and the consequences thereof to Canada, or they wish others to do their fighting for them. There is no other conclusion one can come to. We have opposed and will continue to oppose all amendments or motions of a like character, but it is absolutely wrong to think that because we do so we are expressing confidence in the government. We oppose these motions because they are acts of perfidy. It is for that reason that we oppose them and not to express confidence in the government.

Last night we had a debate in this house which ran all the way from voodooism to religious intolerance. During the course of that debate when discussing a fiery Baptist preacher in the city of Toronto the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that we might have a secret session. If a Baptist preacher in the city of Toronto is worthy of a secret session, how much more worthy is the matter of the condition of our army overseas, an accurate recapitulation of our reinforcements, and an accurate statement as to the seriousness of the Atlantic war? How much more necessary it is for us to know the accurate and precise condition of our army which is shortly to fight for the people of this land?

To-day I received in the mail a copy of some German propaganda which had been dropped over our lines in the southeast of England shortly after the action at Dieppe. I did not know that any of this material had been sent to Canada, but the mere fact that it is here makes it important that hon. members of this house should be given in secret session a complete explanation of the Dieppe action. I was fortunate to be in the House of Commons in London shortly after General Auchinleck's army had been driven out of Libya and Cyrenaica into Egypt within a hundred miles of Alexandria. That debate in the mother of parliaments after the fall of Tobruk, was free, untrammelled and extensive, and I suggest that there is no reason why we should not have a discussion on the Dieppe action.

[Mr. Adamson.]

This debate, as must all debates in this house, hinges on one question only, that of man-power. Have we reinforcements? Have we workers? Are they properly allocated? Until the government satisfies the house and the country that it is tackling this problem fearlessly and without regard to geography, race or religion; I say to the Prime Minister that until the house and the country believe that, debates and discussions such as have been going on in this house during the past three days will continue. I ask the government, for the sake of Canadian unity, to bring down a man-power plan which every one of us can get behind and support to the fullest of our ability. If the government does that, we will go into the battle that is in front of us with our heads up and chests out, ready to make the sacrifices that must be made; we will go into it as a united people. But if the government fails there will be continual bickering, a continuous undercurrent of unrest which may sap the very vitals of our Canadian war effort.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length on this matter. I feel that a few general considerations will enable me to explain my stand in this debate. Taking as a basic principle that one of the most important duties of the government is to preserve a high degree of morale in the nation, I believe it devolves upon a representative of the people to raise his voice, not for any purpose of destructive criticism, but in order to offer constructive suggestions to the government.

Several months ago the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told us that Canada's war effort must be a "well-balanced war effort". The statement still holds true. It is intrinsically unalterable. Starting from this principle, I shall merely enter into three or four general considerations. First, as regards mobilization as carried out in my district. It is true that the general feeling among the members of this house, and I dare say the unanimous view of the members, is that too many farmers have been called. I do not find fault with the act itself but with the manner in which it has been administered. Especially since the recent changes made by Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, I consider that the act as it now stands gives ample authority to registrars to give decisions based on justice and equity. However, if my information is correct, nearly 50,000 farmers are now in Canadian military camps. Mr. Speaker, action will necessarily have to be taken with a view to sending those men back to the farms. If the course so well outlined by the right hon. the Prime Minister when he said that Canada must make a well-balanced war effort is to be followed, if any consistency is to be shown, those agricultural workers will necessarily have to be sent back to the farms. The only method I can see of dealing with the matter is, in the first place, the granting of a general amnesty to defaulters. Many young men who did not respond are now sorry they did not. They did not respond because they were misdirected, because in fact they did not know of the exemption facilities provided by the act. I would appreciate it immensely if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would grant at once a general amnesty to all those who ignored the call, but on the very definite understanding that they must report at once to a special tribunal established in each military district.

Our registrars discharged their duties creditably. I might perhaps find some ground for minor complaints, but this is neither the time nor the place to do so, and I wonder whether it would not be advisable to constitute in each military district an appeal tribunal from decisions reached by registrars. Such an appeal tribunal would include a representative from agriculture, another from the armed forces and a third from industry.

Mr. HURTUBISE: It has been promised.

Mr. LALONDE: An hon. member states that it has been promised. I hope the promise is soon carried out for if those cases are left to the discretion of the registrars, we shall never have what we seek and our young people will be kept in training camps at a time when there is a shortage of labour at home on the farm. Thus in my own constituency—the situation is probably not unlike than in other constituencies—a man with 150 acres under cultivation had but one son, who was refused postponement. Why? Was it because the registrar refused to grant what he had authority to grant under the act? Not at all, Mr. Speaker, but merely because the farmer's son did not follow the proper procedure. He is still in training camp because he was not enough of a lawyer. Such cases deserve the government's consideration and sympathy. These men should be told to go back to the farm and that an appeal to this special tribunal will be well received.

And what applies to farming applies likewise to essential industries. The term essential industries seems to apply exclusively to munitions factories. Such is not the meaning I choose to give the act. To me, an essential industry is any particular industry capable of increasing our war effort. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I particularly urge the government to grant postponements to men engaged in cooperative farming for instance. Cooperative farming projects are being drained of workers. I plead for sawmill workers as well. I submit the case of this young Thomas, for instance, of Saint-Rémi d'Amherst, who was taken away from a lumber industry and sent to training camp, for the sole reason that this young farmer did not scrupulously follow proper legal procedure. The same applies to village blacksmiths whose services are quite indispensable if our farmers are to keep their farm implements in good operating condition. These are, at any rate, suggestions made in good faith; but I do not wish to encroach further upon the time of the house.

The government has been reproached, in certain quarters, with not tabling the orders in council under which draftees have been sent outside Canada. I refer to Le Devoir, of February 3, which criticized the government for failing to make those orders in council known to hon. members. Other hon. members expressed the same opinion. Indeed, those orders in council were adopted on September 14, November 3, December 8 and 16, 1942, but were not handed to hon. members until early February, 1943, by virtue of an order in council adopted January 19 of that same year. It is claimed that the mobilization act requires the government to distribute those orders in council among hon. members as soon as the orders receive cabinet approval. But the mobilization act provides that the orders need not be communicated to hon. members if it is against public interest to do so. And no one can deny that it is in the public interest to keep the enemy in the dark as to any of our troop movements. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that the government did not break the law in failing to distribute those orders in council immediately.

Moreover, the promise made by the Prime Minister that a certain order in council would not be enforced until it is discussed on the floor of the House of Commons does not apply to the order which would definitely proclaim conscription for overseas service. Now, the above orders in council do not provide for conscription of men for overseas service. Indeed, the above-mentioned orders show that this restriction is clearly expressed, namely, "for service and duty on the territory of Alaska," in P.C. 7995, or "to Newfoundland including Labrador," in P.C. 8347, dated December 14, 1942. And further, the order in council 10003 provides that recruits will only be sent to United States territory, while order in council 11159 specifies that certain artillery units will be sent to Newfoundland and Labrador, and both order in council 11346, dated December 16, 1942, and order in council 362, dated January 19, 1943, apply only to the dispatch of recruits of medical units to Newfoundland and Labrador. Nowhere is it specified in those orders in council that our recruits will have to go and fight outside this continent.

It is stated at the end of each of those orders in council that these decisions are made under the Militia Act and those forces are placed under the jurisdiction of the act, "On active service beyond Canada, for the defence thereof," precisely because of the fact that Labrador, Alaska and Newfoundland are territories situated outside Canadian borders. The legal and judicial effect of those orders in council is limited by their preambles and the definition of their basic purpose. These official orders must be interpreted as a whole, in the light of their full and complete text. To dig up a short sentence here and there, a section or a subsection out of a contract in order to obtain a general meaning is a method which leads to conclusions most fantastic and unfair. We must come to the conclusion that the above-mentioned orders in council do not enforce conscription of men for overseas service, and this, Mr. Speaker, I do emphasize. Certain people are spreading the rumour throughout my province that conscription of men for overseas service is not being enforced. That is not true. And those people cannot name one man sent outside the continental borders without his consent. That is why the right honourable the Prime Minister did not submit these orders to the members. The promise he had made in the House of Commons is reported as follows on pages 4984 and 4985 of Vol. IV of Hansard for the 1942 session;

And I quote:

> I wish to make perfectly clear my reason for saying that I desire to come back to parliament and inform parliament of the decision which may be made and why I would seek an expression of confidence before undertaking to continue as head of a government that is to administer conscription for service overseas.
> . . . If I am persuaded that it is necessary and desirable to resort to conscription of men for overseas service, I am going to support that view, but the minute I support that view, if it is the view of the cabinet, I wish to be able to come to this House of Commons and say "The cabinet has reached this decision, the next step will be to enforce it. Before that next step is taken, I want this House of Commons to declare whether it has confidence in me as the head of the administration, that is to carry out this policy of conscription or whether hon. members prefer to have another government in the place of the administration now in office. That is my conception of carrying out my responsibility to parliament."

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Thus, the promises made by the Prime Minister merely refer to orders in council concerning conscription of men for service overseas and not for the defence of Labrador, Alaska and Newfoundland in cooperation with the United States.

I wish to call the attention of this house and especially those hon. members who harbour nationalistic feelings, to an article which appeared in the latter's official organ, Le Devoir, on December 12, 1942, and in which it is clearly stated that we must defend Alaska, Labrador and the adjoining territories. The article is signed by Mr. Georges Pelletier, who says that we must defend Newfoundland, Alaska and the area immediately adjoining Canada. We are in good company, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. LALONDE: And I wonder why we should quarrel as to whether we must defend Canada, Newfoundland and Alaska. Let me ask, in conclusion, why should the government be assailed for not having tabled the orders in council which as a matter of fact give to parliament the power to defend those very territories.

Mr. Speaker, no mention was made of post-war planning. If I remember well, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) said that it was the height of temerity to restrain our imagination as regards post-war planning. Of course, I have not the gift of prophecy, but in the few minutes still left to me, I shall make but a few suggestions. May the dominion government come to an agreement with the provinces for the execution of a vigorous land settlement programme. Our demobilized soldiers, our men thrown out of employment will keep after the governments until they have been assured an opportunity of earning their daily bread. Why not start preparing immediately an intensive colonization plan for all the provinces? Why not stabilize the price of all agricultural products now? There exists a federal statute cited as The Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, 1939, 3 George VI, chapter 28. I believed at first that it would help farmers considerably in fixing the price of their products, but the learned law counsels of the departments have interpreted it in such a manner that I have found this to be utopian. The government guarantees only the first payment made by a cooperative society to its clients. That is not enough. Starting from this measure, why not adopt an act stabilizing farm prices, using the average of the last three years as a basis? So that if we have another depression, farm products will be stabilized in keeping with the standard of the last three years.

When agriculture is stabilized, Mr. Speaker, I think we will have won an important part of peace.

I shall conclude in saying that I would approve the creation of a parliamentary or extraparliamentary committee which would indicate to the government the way that leads to unity, harmony and peace in Canada. We have the Atlantic Charter which was drawn by Churchill and Roosevelt. Why should we not have our Canadian charter? Would it not be possible for all groups which at the present time make up the Canadian nation to delegate authorized representatives to these meetings, which would be held as soon as possible, in order to decide what changes should be made to the Canadian charter? On account of the developments which are bound to take place after the war, Canada will have to modify its constitution if we are to solidly establish a firm, definite and sincere understanding between the groups that constitute our nation. Such a committee might include the provincial premiers, representatives of every religious denomination, representatives of all the races which are part of the Canadian nation, and together they could reach an agreement respecting the changes to be made.

I am of the opinion that our complaints are not without foundation and that perhaps we have not made enough complaints in the past. However, this is not the proper time for vain recrimination, but rather for thought on problems of reconstruction.

I submit these few suggestions, which I have endeavoured to curtail as much as possible, to the attention of hon. members and to yours, Mr. Speaker, hoping that within the next few months they will be favourably received by everyone. I have made them not for the sake of personal prestige, but in a sincere effort to cooperate with every broad-minded individual of our beloved country. The time will come when we shall suffer the consequences of this war. The future is uncertain. We do not know what it will bring us. We have a right to demand that the future be not laden with too many sufferings and too many sacrifices for our children. We wish to win the war. We shall win it, provided we carry out—and these are my final words—a "well balanced war effort", as the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not participate in the debate at this time for the purpose of holding up the vote, but I did not have an opportunity earlier to speak in the debate and in my opinion some observations in connection with the man-power situation in Canada that have not so far been made might very well be made at this time. I am glad that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is in his seat, for there are some suggestions that I wish to make that I should like him to take under consideration. I am not one of those who condemn the Minister of Labour, as do some, for the present muddle in the man-power situation. He is the unfortunate heir to a legacy of muddling of this problem. But there are some suggestions that could be made at this time, as to changes that might be made in connection with the national resources mobilization regulations in order to ensure some improvement in the situation as far as industry and agriculture are concerned.

This opposition voted against a number of subamendments in the last few days, not because it had confidence in the government but on account of the fact that it had no confidence in the amendments suggested to meet the situation as it exists to-day. Far be it from me to take any part in connection with the argument that went on in this house as between the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The admonitions which were given by the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères seemed like the action of a schoolmaster who for twenty-two years had been teaching certain doctrines to the pupil and is now condemning the pupil for being so apt in carrying them into effect.

I shall not go back over the years to refer to statements made by the Prime Minister or any of his ministers that, to all intents and purposes, were very like unto the statements made the other day by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. I shall not do that. Conditions are too serious to-day for anyone to indulge in partisanship or the type of tragi-comedy amendments that we have had during the last day or so. We have not yet won this war.

The attitude of the opposition is that we demand total war, and say that as far as this dominion is concerned, in spite of all the protestations, in spite of representations made each month in pamphlets issued by the departments, and particularly by the Department of National War Services, setting forth what Canada has done, we are yet a long way from total war. In the degree of our effort we are behind some of the other countries within the empire, and in that connection I think it is only fair to pay a tribute to New Zealand, in which one out of every six persons is in war services, and one out of every two males between sixteen and sixty is in the armed services.

Canada's record is good; I am not one that decries it. But it does not go far enough. There has been as yet no scientific approach to the man-power situation in this dominion. Some reference was made the other day to the effect that Canada's contribution, namely, the proportion of the national income which is being devoted to war purposes, is greater than that in any other of the united nations. I have before me the United States News of February 12, 1943, an authoritative magazine often quoted in the United States congress and recognized as most dependable and non-political in its viewpoint. It shows the expenditures of the different countries comprising the united nations, including the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, as well as the United States of America. It shows that the United Kingdom still leads the united nations in the proportion of the national income devoted to war purposes. It reveals that the United Kingdom during the current year has expended $18,000,000,000 or 69·2 per cent of the national income. Next comes New Zealand with an expenditure of $430,000,000—63·4 per cent of the national income. Then comes the United States with an expenditure of $78,000,000,000, or 61·9 per cent of the national income. Next comes Canada with an expenditure of $2,997,000,000, or 45·4 per cent of the national income. I want to be fair. That does not take into consideration the $850,000,000 voted by way of supplementaries the other day, but after making due allowance for that we find that the proportion of our national income expended was approximately 52 per cent. Therefore we have a long way still to go in Canada, in spite of our record to date, before we equal what has been done by some of the other united nations.

We of this opposition, as I have already said, believe in a total war effort. We believe in compulsory national selective service, and that all those selected to serve in the armed forces should be available for service wherever required. We believe in the effective total utilization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada including agriculture, industry and finance as well as man-power. We believe that our aim should be at all times to bring about, as far as human means can achieve it, an equality in sacrifice. We have achieved national unity in the national objective in that without regard to person or province, and irrespective of racial ancestry, we are all united in the thought that we must win the war. But there is something more to national unity than a desire and an aim. Without the determination of the people in all parts of Canada to bear an equal share, each province contributing in proportion to its population, we cannot have true unity within this dominion. We believe that by bringing into effect a national service such as set forth in our platform we shall be able to secure in Canada not only equality of sacrifice but equality of service and burden, without regard to territorial considerations.

In that connection let us look at the record. No one desires to raise matters that may cause cleavage, but here are the figures that are set forth in the latest issue of "Canada At War," issued by the Department of National War Services. It gives the location of the various military districts, which are as follows:

No. 1	London
No. 2	Toronto
No. 3	Kingston
No. 4	Montreal
No. 5	Quebec
No. 6	Halifax
No. 7	Saint John
No. 10	Winnipeg
No. 11	Victoria
No. 12	Regina
No. 13	Calgary

Then this is the record of enlistments in percentages of the male population of the ages generally liable for service:

Military district	Per cent
No. 1	30·1
No. 2	32·8
No. 3	35·7
No. 4	15·9
No. 5	9·6
No. 6	37·9
No. 7	35·3
No. 10	30·9
No. 11	34·8
No. 12	27·1
No. 13	31·7

An examination of these figures indicates that there is not equality of service in Canada in proportion to population, or anything like it. I believe, as a member of his majesty's opposition desirous of securing national unity in the true sense of the word, that the people of Canada have a right to insist that there shall be equality of service in all parts of this country. We have pointed out the danger of the man-power situation for several months, but what is the position to-day? No minister of the crown has yet risen in his place to say whether the necessary reinforcements are available if the Canadian army overseas should go on the offensive. The Minister of Labour made a lengthy speech, but unfortunately he did not deal with the man-power situation. I know it was impossible for him to do so on that occasion on account of lack of time, but the opportunity has presented itself since then in connection with the various subamendments, when he could have placed the man-power position of Canada before this house. What the Canadian people want to know is this. Has Canada a plan yet? What is to be Canada's contribution? What changes have taken place in the government's man-power policy since last July? At that time I asked the following questions:

Has a survey been made by the government with a view to ascertaining how many men are still available for military service in each of the foregoing classes?

That had reference to the various age groups.

If so, who made the survey, and when was it made?

How many men were estimated to be still available for military services by provinces, military districts and/or administrative divisions in each of the said age groups?

Surely after more than three years of war a survey has been made. There have been all sorts of registrations. The list which appears at page 395 of Hansard of February 15 shows a great number of man-power registrations of all kinds, but there has never been an announcement of any plan in connection with what is going to be done after the registrations are made. Furthermore, as yet no one in Canada knows whether our main contribution is to be in the armed forces or whether it is to be in the production of munitions or of agricultural products. All we know is that we have been fumbling along from day to day until now man-power is so short on the farms and so difficult to obtain for the armed forces that the government must have arrived at the point where it must develop some adequate plan. Mr. Elliott Little in the November issue of Canadian Business indicates that there was no plan; at least that is the only conclusion that can be reached by reading his article.

Mr. MITCHELL: Somebody told it for him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Somebody told it for him? Why, at the time he wrote the article he was an official in charge of man-power; and whether he told it or somebody told it for him, apparently he got the true information. He indicated that absenteeism was rampant, that employers, while waiting for contracts, were keeping employees in idleness; that there was no directed movement of workers from non-essential to essential service. That article is the greatest indictment of this government in connection with the man-power situation that was ever delivered, and that by a man who was in the service of the government at the time he made it. Has there ever been any denial that a blast furnace in Sudbury producing copper and nickel had to close down on account of lack of men? Was there ever any denial that coal mines are producing less to-day than the country is using? Was there ever any denial that in British Columbia the production of aeroplane spruce is below requirements? Was there ever any denial that base metals mines are producing copper to-day in reduced amounts because the mines are undermanned? Was there ever any denial that steel plants in the Niagara peninsula are to-day below potential production as a result of lack of man-power? That is an indictment made against this government by a man in a position to know. Not one minister has yet risen in his place and made answer—no, nor has any endeavour been made even in the slightest degree to contradict the statements contained in that article.

When the Prime Minister spoke in the house on March 24, 1942, he said that the three great aspects in connection with man-power were an estimate of the number of men and women required for the different kinds of war services, the increasing of the total number of man-power resources available for war purposes, and the directing of available men and women into the most useful forms of war services. He went on to say that the director of national war services had been given authority to obtain information from the government departments and empowered to secure from employers, by compulsion if necessary, full information regarding prospective labour requirements, existing labour forces, wages, production and working conditions. We have not heard anything more about it since then.

I therefore ask him this: What information was secured from employers regarding prospective labour requirements? How many men does labour require for the next six months? How many women does labour require for the next six months in order to meet potential needs? What is the estimate arrived at as a result of investigations respecting requirements of all types in industry and agriculture? What arrangements are being or have been made to replace men in industry who could be in the armed services?

What arrangements have been made to replace physically fit men in industry by men who are physically unfit, or by women, and to what extent have those replacements taken place? Furthermore, how many men have been reconditioned in order to fit them for military service, by remedial treatment and by arrangements between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Pensions and National Health? How do the government intend to secure the maximum number of men for the armed forces and at the same time maintain necessary production in industry? Supporters of the government often compare Canada's record in this war with that achieved in the last war, but fail to admit that Canada's population is forty-seven per cent higher now than it was then. They fail to admit that every nation among the united nations is spending three or four or five times the amount it spent during the last war. They claim that on account of the great volume of war expenditures our war effort is an all-out one. Much has been done, but more must be achieved before Canada is on a total-war footing.

Why is it that we in the House of Commons can get no information respecting the plan or blueprint of the government for the utilization and allocation of man-power, if it has one? We have tried to get that plan on more than one occasion.

Mr. ROWE: It has no plan.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I turn now to another phase—the administration of the National Resources Mobilization Act: Seventy-five thousand defaulters! Enforcement? Two hundred and fifty have been prosecuted; seventy-five thousand have not turned up, and yet some one said the other day that in one of the provinces there was an army endeavouring—apparently, not very successfully—to enforce the provisions of the act. Why has there not been a more complete enforcement of this act? One can find men who have returned from overseas, but who are receiving notices. A woman in my constituency gave her son; fifteen months after, notice was sent that he was called for service. Then there was a second and a third notice, and the statement that he would be prosecuted unless he reported.

Mr. ROWE: That is a plan!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where is the plan? And there is nothing before the people of Canada to-day more important than the question of man-power.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I come now to another phase. I am one who, although possibly in a minority, from the commencement of the sittings of this parliament has opposed regulations other than administrative regulations. I am opposed to legislation being passed except by parliament. There is no finer example of that than we find in connection with the national selective service regulations, a copy of which I have before me.

The regulations give the boards in each of the provinces absolute power. There can be no appeal from the decisions of those boards. If in Saskatchewan—and I take my own province as an example—the national war services board decided to give postponement to everybody, regardless of entitlement under the provisions of the regulations, there is no way in which such a decision can be appealed. On the other hand, if the same board, contrary to the provisions of the regulations, called every farmer in Saskatchewan to the colours, again contrary to the provisions of the regulations, those called would have no legal right whatsoever to object.

Every right the crown has or might have to ensure that in every province there shall be equality of call to service has been done away—except for the right of the government to remove personnel on the board. On the other hand, the regulations are such that if in any province a sixteen-year-old boy were called and ordered to join the armed services, he would have no recourse at law and would have to answer the call.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does the hon. member make the suggestion that boys of sixteen are being called?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; but every other provision, in so far as the right to postponement is concerned, has been flagrantly broken, not only in western Canada but throughout the dominion. Why take away the right to the issue of prerogative writs? If the federal government wishes to make sure that every province shall have the same administration, that there shall be equality of call-up, equality in administration, equality in interpretation of the regulations, why not have an appeal? There was an appeal to the Military Service Act at the time of the last war. It would not be an appeal as of right, but an appeal where regulations are being flouted. During the last war there was an appeal to a judge of the supreme court, such judge having the right to decide whether the crown or the applicant called to the colours was receiving justice in accordance with the principles set forth in the law as it then stood. Why not embody all those regulations in a statute? The military service act contained the law instead of its being embodied in regulations.

Why deny the government the right of appeal from the board's decision in any province which is not administering the regulations properly, and has been granting too many postponements? Why not grant the crown the right to appeal against the decisions made by a board which is departing from the provisions of the law? On the other hand, can one think of anything more ridiculous than this? Provision is made in the regulations for postponements in respect of agricultural workers, labourers and employers, and definite rights are established; yet farmers and farm labourers are being called up for service every day. What is the government doing? The minister decided apparently that the proper course to take would be to send out a letter explaining the regulations to the boards. I do not think the regulations require any particular interpretation. They provide that every person who on March 23, 1942, was bona fide engaged in agriculture was entitled to postponement. I am not arguing the rightness or the wrongness of that; that is the law. But that law is not being carried out. The government admits that it is not being carried out, but says that it is the fault of the boards. The day before yesterday the Prime Minister did something he has never done before; he assumed responsibility on the part of the government for what the boards are doing when he said that when boards and administrative bodies are set up, the government must assume the responsibility for their acts. This is an excerpt from the letter which was sent out to interpret the circumstances under which postponement should be granted. It is dated February 3, 1942, and is entitled. "Mobilization Act interpretative letter No. 1." It says this:

> This is the first of such letters which will be issued by the labour department. As you will observe it is numbered. It is hoped that they will be helpful.

It goes on to say:

> After conferring with the man-power committee of the cabinet it has been decided that interpretative letters will be sent out from time to time indicating in some detail the policy in respect to the various phases of the national selective service mobilization regulations.

I ask the government at this session to bring down a statute regarding man-power; do not restore prerogative rights but restore the right of leave to appeal to a supreme court judge so that every one of the national selective service boards in the various provinces will administer the law on the same basis. The letter continues:

> The growing scarcity of agricultural labour makes it increasingly important that essential agricultural workers be encouraged to remain on farms.

And again:

> Farm workers who apply for postponement from military training are to be granted postponement until further notice.

And also:

> A person who may not have been employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, but who has become engaged in agriculture since that time, and is shown to be essential to agriculture, may be considered for postponement on application if the merits of the case are established.

The regulations remain as they were before, that a man must have been engaged in agriculture before March 23, 1942, but they have opened the door a little wider by this letter to the boards charged with the administration of the regulations and directing that they take into consideration the granting of postponement to those who are not entitled to it under the regulations.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that legal?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Everything is legal when there is no right of appeal. Section 14 (1) of the regulations in connection with conscientious objectors reads in part:

> . . . the minister may prescribe to carry out alternative service and to continue to carry out alternative service for the duration of the war unless it be established to the satisfaction of the registrar that such person is not medically fit to perform such alternative service.

I contend that the regulations if subject to interpretation contrary to their meaning may be used for reasons of political expediency. Under the regulations a conscientious objector is required to serve in alternative service. It is only right that when a man is truly a conscientious objector his scruples should be considered. These men have been sent to the national parks and they have been building roads. Under the regulations they are required to serve for the duration of the war. When a man is called up in the army he is called up for service for the duration, and the regulations provide that conscientious objectors should do so, too.

Have these regulations been carried into effect? The first thing that happened was that promises were made to the Doukhobors during the election campaign of 1940 that they had nothing to worry about. On February 29, 1940, a letter in a return brought down in 1940 alleges that the Prime Minister had a conversation with the Doukhobors and assured them that the government would grant exemption certificates in the case of conscription or compulsory service. Under the law the Doukhobors did not have a right to postponement or exemption with the exception of those who had come to Canada in 1898, but during the election campaign the Prime Minister told them that they had nothing to worry about.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand the hon. member lives in Prince Albert. Are there many Doukhobors in that constituency?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not dealing with this matter from the point of view of that constituency; I am trying to be entirely dispassionate. Strangely enough, after this house adjourned in 1940 and after the national resources mobilization regulations were passed, another order in council was issued which not only exempted Doukhobors who had entered Canada under the order in council of December 6, 1898, and the "descendants of such immigrants who have continued without interruption to be members of the aforesaid sect or denomination", but granted new rights to these people.

Surely citizenship in Canada means equality, and there can be no justification for extending the privilege granted to the original settlers who entered Canada under the order in council of 1898. Most of these people defied the government. They just said that they were not going to do anything, and they have pretty well carried out that threat. A few of them went up to parks for three or four months. I do not know what the total expenditures were, but a great deal of money was expended in the payment of wages to them during the time they were in the national parks.

During the calendar year expenditures at Prince Albert park amounted to $50,711; at Kootenay park, $17,000; at Riding Mountain park, $63,000; at Jasper park, $46,000, and so on. These men performed alternative service there for a short while. But the law says that they shall serve for the duration of the war. Mr. MacNamara, director of national selective service, sent out to the various service boards a letter, approved by the Minister of Labour, stating in effect that they were not to carry out the provisions of the regulations; that Doukhobors should not be directed to report for alternative service any more as long as they were employed in essential work in agriculture.

Just follow that through. It is a devious course but it explains why it is that the government refused to put these regulations into statute form. If such an amendment to the law had been brought before this parliament there is not a member of this house who will rise in his place and say that this house would have voted to exclude these men from alternative service for the duration of the war. Why was it done? Agriculture is asked to produce on an ever-expanding scale, and agriculture is willing to do that. There is no question that the farmers to-day are contributing a great deal. In Saskatchewan, in my constituency, there are few young men left to-day. I say to the government that it is building up the greatest resentment among the people of my province when it allows special rights to any group, and especially when those rights are extended contrary to the regulations which are supposed to be followed by the various boards throughout the dominion. I shall not deal further with that question, but I think I have covered it well enough to—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired, but he may finish his sentence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the courtesy extended to me. I was just going to conclude by saying this, that the man-power situation must be dealt with. We cannot avoid our responsibility to assure our men overseas that reinforcements will be forthcoming. We do not discharge our responsibility to ensure national unity during this war and after unless we insist upon equal interpretation and equal enforcement of the law in all parts of Canada. That can only be done, I submit, through restoring the provision in the Military Service Act for an appeal so that when the regulations are not followed rights will accrue, either to the crown or to the applicant.

Above all, Mr. Speaker, I protest against regulations being altered by letters such as the one to which I have referred, and this letter is just the first of a series of instructions to the national war service boards. What will the other letters contain?

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) always makes a good speech, and he has said many things to-day with which I agree, although I cannot agree with all that he said.

I listened this afternoon to my hon. friend the member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) who made a plea for an amnesty for the sons of farmers. At a place called St. Modeste in my constituency—there is a place of that name only in my constituency—I made the very same suggestion in the course of last summer. In my humble view all those who are farmers and have not volunteered for the armed services should have been granted an amnesty from October 15 to December 31, and a notice should have been published weekly in all the weeklies of Canada, and twice a week, in a prominent place in the paper, in each of the dailies throughout Canada, to inform the farmers and the farmers' sons that they were being granted an amnesty. And what kind of amnesty? The right to get in touch with their registrars without having to fear any punishment because they had not, for one reason or another, reported when called upon to do so. I met a high official of one of the departments and I was greatly surprised at his understanding of the Canadian feeling regarding a matter of this kind. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what he told me? He said, "Oh! that would be the spark that would set the whole country on fire." I do not believe so, and I presume that the hon. member for Lake Centre thinks as I do about it. This is a matter that as members of the House of Commons we have not only a right but a duty to discuss freely without fear or favour in this house.

When, sir, I speak of an amnesty, I mean a real amnesty with a result in view, not merely an amnesty on a piece of paper that is sent out to the chairmen of the boards and that gives no security to any draftee or conscript. What I regret is the hypocrisy which has surrounded the calling of men for their training. Once I wrote an article on advice to trainees, or conscripts; the title was "Conseils aux Conscrits"—"Advice to Conscripts." What I was telling them was to observe the law and to take advantage of it to claim their right to stay on the land when their duty—their family duty and in most cases their national duty—was to be on the land. And do you know what was the suggested correction that was made to me? My advice was within the law; nothing was said about the advice given; the only thing I was blamed for was the use of the word "conscrits"—conscripts. Hypocrisy!

I have complained once about Mr. Claude Mélançon when he was on the wartime information board. I was justified in doing so because the propaganda board was no good. I could have made the same complaint about the other member, the English-speaking fellow who was denounced, and rightly so, by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). But I am not narrow-minded enough to withhold credit for the good things a man may do; and it is my personal opinion that the memorandum prepared by Mr. Claude Mélançon favouring an amnesty in respect of farmers is an excellent one, and I will ask either the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), or the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche), who is here at the moment, kindly to table this report at the earliest possible date. I will tell you more than that, that I have also been informed that, if the trainees or conscripts—meaning probably the farmers and the farmers' sons—have not yet enjoyed that amnesty, the Department of Labour is not responsible; it is the Department of National War Services which has refused to give its assent to the proposal.

That being said, sir—and I know what I am talking about—I come to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who is the leader of his party in the house and the acting leader of his party at large. The leader at large of his party, in every speech which he has delivered since his accession to these important functions, has never missed one occasion to complain about the bureaucracy that we have here in Ottawa, and it is a very great surprise to me that the amendment moved by my hon. friend the house leader of the opposition does not say a word about it. I cannot conceive why that is so. There is the leader, among crowds of people, complaining about the bureaucracy which we have here in Ottawa, yet on the first official occasion that the party, which gathers daily to discuss its own problems, had the opportunity to enunciate this view in the house, where laws are made and where the state of things which is so much deplored by their leader may be corrected, they do not take advantage of it.

It will not be untimely to remind the house of the logical consequence of the intervention of a member of parliament who, years ago, was the first one to denounce bureaucracy in this house. In the first place let us go back to the session of 1936, though we might go back before that. We might go back to the time when Mr. Bennett was the leader of the government and when questions were put on the order paper with the purpose of getting some information about the twelve thousand people whom he had imported to this city. The figures are of record; they are downstairs in the vaults of this house.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. member to keep peace.

And, sir, they cannot complain about me. I did my best for them. I remember that in 1936, the session which I have already mentioned, I gave them four lectures on parliamentary procedure, from ten o'clock to eleven; and to my great pride and satisfaction those addresses were attended by sixty members. I hope that one of those who came to my lectures will remember that I never told them to act as the hon. member did while another member was speaking.

But now, sir, going back to those dark days when R. B. Bennett was the big boss in this house, I remember that there was one member who was standing alone against Mr. Bennett and all his social legislation—and against his own party—one.

The party policy at the time was to criticize Bennett behind closed doors, criticize him in the house and vote for him when the legislation came before the house, under the pretext that we were for the principle of it although it was said that it was just good propaganda prepared by brother-in-law Herridge. Therefore to be logical with myself, in 1936 I had the opportunity to see one of these pieces of legislation that had not been submitted to the supreme court for legal consideration, and I asked for its repeal. I remember very well when Sir George Perley, acting prime minister, was piloting that legislation in 1935, and I was interrupted by the late Mr. Lapointe. He told me it was useless to discuss that legislation. The next day the Ottawa papers had some little notes about my humble self: "'Pouliot silenced by Lapointe,' reads the headline. This ranks as the week's most notable performance."—the Journal. "Pouliot silenced, the sun extinguished, Niagara stopped."—the Citizen. Of course I did not pay much attention to that; I found it very funny. But after Bennett was overturned and after this party came to power I moved the repeal of that act, entitled, The Economic Council of Canada Act, 1935. Of course it was pretty difficult on account of the views expressed by our own leaders when Sir George Perley piloted it through this house, but, after a broadside in the morning, the bill was passed in five or ten minutes, second reading, committee, third reading and up to the senate.

Mr. Bennett's idea was to have a subgovernment composed of the deputy heads of some departments, to advise the government about what was to be done by the government. It was the first suggestion of government by remote control. Those individuals were to meet together to draft policies that afterwards were to be adopted by the government and then given to us to swallow. I objected to that. And now, sir, hon. members will find that statute, which is a very short one, repealing Bennett's economic council of Canada. It is 1 Edward VIII, chapter 5. It was a symbol of what had to be done with regard to bureaucracy in this country, killing in the egg the idea of an economic council, a brain trust. That was the idea.

Now, sir, we have gone pretty far. Why? Precisely because the men Bennett put at the control are precisely those who are at the controls to-day, especially in the Department of Finance.

After that it was not long before I had the honour to preside over the parliamentary committee on the civil service. You also, sir, were a distinguished member of that committee. I can tell all the hon. members who belonged to it that that committee, with one exception, that is myself, was the cream of the House of Commons. But, sir, you know as well as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) how assiduous was our work, how difficult it was. You know the trouble that we had to secure files transferred from the civil service commission to the House of Commons and the trouble we had to quote before the committee what was in those files. I was not believed when I told the government, and not only the government, but when I told the Liberal party fifteen days ahead, that we would have a unanimous report. But we had that unanimous report, owing to the sense of duty of the members of that committee, who understood that that report could not be perfect in the view of each one, but should represent an average view of parliament on the matter of the civil service.

That report, sir, is still on the shelf covered with dust. Nothing was done. The civil service commission has contended that the recommendations of the report have been acted upon, and I see my friend the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) who was also a distinguished member of that committee—I have not time to mention them all. It was just a smoke screen.

Afterwards when the Prime Minister asked me to sit again as chairman of the committee I said to him: Provided the unanimous report is acted upon, all right, sir, I shall be happy to do that, although it takes much of my time. And, Mr. Speaker, you know what happened. It was suggested that we proceed without any other base, that the matter should be considered again without the first report being adopted. Then the committee brought in a second report, a unanimous report, the same as the first. That was in 1939, and nothing was done since.

It was not surprising that bureaucrats jeered at parliament. When we considered together with the other members of the committee the question of the civil service it was the first time in the history of parliament that the question of the civil service was considered from the point of view of the service that each civil servant can render to the state. The same thing was done under the chairmanship of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. We achieved the same result. But our work was in vain. It served no purpose except to give those bureaucrats an opportunity to glorify themselves once more.

I do not wish to take too much time, but there is something else I must mention. Once there was a meeting of an organization called the professional institute, composed of civil servants who receive fat salaries and who are sure that they are all experts. They took the opportunity to criticize parliament, and I got in touch with the ministers of the departments in which they were employed. I was able to get satisfactory replies from the late Hon. Mr. Rinfret, who was then Secretary of State, from the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). On November 9, 1938, I wrote one other minister a letter in which among other things I said:

> During last session at several sittings of the civil service committee I brought the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that the civil servants must always respect our parliamentary institutions. Personally I pay no attention at all to what may be said about my own self, but on the other hand I cannot remain indifferent to the remark passed by one of your employees—
> I mentioned the name.
> —president-elect of the institute, who spoke about the proportion of high-minded members of the committee on that occasion. I enclose a list of the members of the committee. Will you please tell Mr. So-and-so to be more precise and indicate those who according to his views are high-minded gentlemen and those who are not.

I thought it very improper for any civil servant, whether belonging to the professional institute or not, to make a distinction, between high-minded and low-minded members of parliament. The minister to whom that letter was addressed is not in the house now, otherwise I would name him. He has an inferiority complex with regard to bureaucrats; he thought every time a civil servant said or did something it was perfect, and that members of parliament should bow to them. Of course we bow on the street but not in this house.

Then, sir, I did something else in an attempt to clean up the statute books. Of course the act repealing the measure creating the economic council did not cost the state anything, since there was no litigation, but it was different in connection with the other legislation. Those other acts were submitted to the courts for a decision. In order to deal with this point I have to go back to the dark times of Bennett. Mr. Bennett was the lord of this country before he entered the House of Lords. It was impossible to make him change his mind in connection with the draft legislation prepared by Mr. Herridge. The only recourse, when Mr. Bennett had the power in his hands, was to move that his legislation should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision as to its validity. I did suggest that this action be taken, and later it was taken by the leader of the Liberal party, who was then leader of the opposition. At the time, however, his motion was voted down. After the Liberal party was returned to power, however, in spite of the fact that every Liberal candidate throughout the country had decried that legislation as being only blah-blah, as being political expediency and political propaganda, the government decided to submit the legislation to the courts, with the exception of the measure to which I have referred, which put the government in the position of agreeing with the principles of the legislation, though they had said it was merely political expediency.

These matters were submitted to the courts, and at no small cost. If the government had acted in connection with all the so-called legislation of Bennett as it acted in connection with the economic council measure, a great deal of money would have been saved. I have before me the details as to the cost of that litigation before the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council. I am not going to mention any names, but this may be surprising to you, Mr. Speaker, though you are a prominent counsel. One gentleman received $23,928.92, which is pretty good. That was in connection with the litigation before both our supreme court and the privy council. In connection with the supreme court litigation only, Mr. Justice Rowell's account amounted to $13,267.35, while Mr. Justice Robertson's account in connection with the appeal to the privy council was $12,219.03. There were other lawyers as well. The fourth charged $6,742.52; the fifth, $3,122.99 and the sixth, $2,844.02. Then there was something for the stenographer, something more for printing and so on, making a total of $66,042.64 which was spent to have the supreme court and the privy council decide that Bennett's so-called social legislation was just a fake. This was money that should have been given to the unemployed, because it was spent at precisely the time the government refused to give the provinces any assistance in connection with unemployment relief.

That is not all, sir. The very day I heard that these so-called social acts had been declared ultra vires by the privy council in London, I placed several bills on the order paper. If hon. members would like to check what I am saying I would refer them to the evening sitting of March 2, 1937, when I moved five bills to repeal five acts that were on the statute books and that had been declared ultra vires.

I remember that same afternoon I met a minister. He was trembling and shaking, and he said, "What will happen if you go on with this? Mr. Cahan will surely speak." Nobody ever understood anything he said. I moved the second reading of each bill. The debate was adjourned, and hon. members may see in Hansard that the debate on each bill was adjourned by the Prime Minister. Of course that debate was never resumed. My idea was to make a clean-up in the statute books, and to get rid of legislation that was no good. That was so much the condition that when it was decided to pass unemployment insurance legislation we had to go to London to get permission, because otherwise our legislation would have been ultra vires. That is an extraordinary thing. When the new unemployment insurance measure was passed the old one was repealed by the same statute. And, even more peculiar, it was the old act which was rejuvenated in a new one exactly the same as the old one. The four others are still on the statute book.

What is the use of legislating? Certainly some very strange things happen. In view of the possibility of future debates on the point I bring to the attention of the house a letter I wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 13, 1939. I shall not read it again, because it is already reported at page 4599 of Hansard for 1939. Since the beginning of the session the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) has told many truths. But in order to enjoy to the full our parliamentary rights members of parliament must be in a position to say what they have to say about any civil servant or any high official. They are paid from moneys voted by us, and it is essential to have a check upon them. We are here for that purpose, and to prevent any abuse of authority on the part of those operating under the government and parliament. Otherwise we would have no order here or in the country.

It is most difficult for a private member to sponsor legislation of a public nature. I know of course that it is very easy to sponsor divorce bills. In these days however we do not have the same privileges in connection with public legislation. In view of that condition I would ask the government, and particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to see to it that members of parliament are not called here merely to vote taxation, but that they are called to do some legislating for the welfare of the Canadian people at large.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to refer to a principle laid down in the amendment of the official opposition. It contains what might be called three C's. I support that policy, but I think the amendment left out many more letters of the alphabet. After all is said and done we are meeting as a House of Commons to do the best we can in the greatest emergency which has confronted the world. The war is our first and most important topic.

A few days ago when I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for one day to debate a question respecting social security, and some other matters in connection with human resources, he said that an opportunity would not be given. However I believe if it had been given it would have shortened this debate on the address in reply. The country, the House of Commons, and the mother country would have known where Canada stands on the war at the present time.

The speeches which have been delivered in the house during the last two or three days have cleared up an idea I had all along, from the beginning of the war to the present day, as to what has kept us back in our war effort. The first part of the amendment deals with human resources—man-power and woman-power. Does the conscription of man-power and woman-power cover what the government has been doing? Young people of seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years have enlisted to fight for what? They enlisted to fight to save the world from slavery, to fight for ideals, to fight for the right to live. They did not enlist voluntarily to shovel snow. No; they enlisted to fight Hitler. They did not enlist and give up their jobs voluntarily to go out and shovel snow for the benefit of the Canadian National Railways or others. Why could not some of Mr. Donald Gordon's celebrated homeside fusiliers have been drafted for that work? Why not have used some of the stay-at-home army also for that work? There is no such thing as home defence. The battle is being decided overseas in Africa, and in other theatres of war.

Despite the money the country is spending for uniforms, 5,376 air force officials never wore uniforms in their lives. Yesterday Mr. Beurling, a young flying officer, was in Toronto. Yet in many places throughout Canada some of those 5,376 who never wore uniforms got commissions as squadron leaders, although they know nothing about the air. I doubt if some of them would know how to fire a fire-cracker, a pin-wheel, a sky-rocket, or anything of that kind. The people of this country are not getting value in their investments for home defence and a home army vote is largely wasted—and that applies to the navy and the army as well. My good friend the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) is a very popular man in Toronto, and I should not like to say anything not correct about his department. I sympathize with the three defence ministers in the work they are doing. We rejoice in the way the whole history of courage and heroism is being rewritten on land, on the sea and in the air, by our soldiers in this war. But after what was said yesterday, to-day and last Friday I wonder how Canada has made as good a showing as it has up to the present time, so far as human resources and production are concerned. We must remember the noble courage and patriotism of the men who are actually doing the work in the three forces overseas—not the large standing army of intellectuals in control in the seats of government here in Ottawa and throughout Canada. The real men are doing the fighting at the front, while these intellectuals stay at home and talk pacifism and planning. If they have their way we shall have another war. I was in Toronto the other day, and I had brought to my attention some of the work done by the women's army. They are doing splendid work now. There were about twenty-five or thirty of them on the train. One of them came up to me and asked if I was Mr. Church. I said, "Do you think I am? Do I look like him?" Then they began to doubt it. I asked some of them where they came from and they said they came from the farm. I am sorry the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is not at the moment in his place, and perhaps I should not mention the question of labour battalions. That is all we have in the mother country since the war started—labour battalions. New Zealand and Australia were sending troops to north Africa long before we were.

Canada was the first in the diamond jubilee procession in 1897, but the last of all the colonies to send a contingent to South Africa in 1899. It was said that to do that would be against the British North America Act and the constitution. The loyal people of Canada, not all in one party then, compelled the government of that day to send a contingent to South Africa, and from that day forward it was an example of policy that when Britain is at war, Canada is also at war.

We hear a lot about the newspapers. They have done good work; yet the president of the Canadian Press Association criticized this House of Commons last December when he said that the load on the press is very heavy these days as we have a very weak parliamentary opposition; a strong opposition is a spur to any government and also acts as a check on their power.

If that is so why do they blindfold the people and not give them the actual facts of what is going on here? We might as well meet in secret for all the information given out by some members of the press as to what is going on in this house. Yet this is the only forum where the average man on the street can have his grievance remedied. When the opposition and the private member cease to function, parliamentary government is at an end.

I disagree with the statement made the other day by the Prime Minister that on a motion to go into supply an hon. member can bring up any matter covered by a private member's resolution. Nearly three-quarters of the time of this house last year was devoted to talking about a referendum, Bill No. 80, to amend the mobilization act, and the many phases of the on-again, off-again conscription of human resources. No time was given last session to a discussion of some of the ideas put forward by private members.

I do not believe in this idea of having labour battalions. I do not believe in conscripting young men and putting them to shovelling snow and labour on farms when they have enlisted to fight Hitler. I see these young men on the train and they want to know what is the matter with the House of Commons. They want to know what has come over this parliament when we carry on a debate like the one we have had during the last two or three days. It is bad advertising of this country in New Zealand and Australia, especially when we have done as little as we have in north Africa. The people of this country are in a very critical mood at the present time.

Reference has been made to farm labour. I saw some of the ladies of the women's army on the train the other day, and I asked them where they had come from. They told me they used to be on farms, that they used to be helping their parents running market gardens, but they thought they would come in and join the army because there was more money in it and it was kind of fun to be wearing a uniform. I am not one of those who believe in a youth movement with a capital "Y" along the lines suggested some years ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). The youth movement which has been talked about in and out of this house is not the movement that appeals to the young people serving in the three armed forces to-day, when youth is in the forces.

Reference has been made to the scarcity of farm labour. Young people from the high schools and the public schools of Toronto go out to work on the farm yearly, and start this year on April 1. No government has ever had a real agricultural policy. If we formed labour battalions, what use would the representatives of the three armed forces in the cabinet be? What use would I be on a farm? I doubt if some members know how many pounds there are in a bushel of buckwheat, barley or timothy seed. But I am just as much a farmer as is the leader of the opposition, or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), or the acting head of the government (Mr. Crerar) whom I see over there and who used to sit on this side of the house some years ago as a Progressive.

I am a Conservative and I have never been anything else. They can put all kinds of prefixes in front of that name, but I am still a Conservative. I told my constituents that when I was elected for the present parliament I am a Conservative and nothing else. I agree with that part of the amendment which refers to the contribution to agriculture, but without proper housing, health aid, direct current and proper education there can be no real health and happiness on the farm.

We hear a great deal of talk about planning, but neither victory nor any kind of planning can bring about the millennium. No kind of planning will ever abolish the law of supply and demand. I do not believe in many of the utopian speeches that have been made all over the country about planning. These men of ours who have been fighting Hitler have been referred to by the author Strube, who immortalized them as the little men who saved England in this war. When the soldiers come back they will know how to take care of reconstruction and planning and all that sort of thing—these men who beat the axis dictators as well.

I believe in the incentive of free enterprise subject to reasonable state control. The right to possess private property is derived from nature and not from man. The state has no right to abolish that, but it can regulate its use. The principles of the Conservative party are work for our own workmen, markets for our own products and labour for our own workers. Trade barriers and nations will always exist and no one will ever be able to change them. I do not believe in this policy of planning from the cradle to the grave, of total regimentation. There can be no liberty in a regimented state. Everybody will be working for the state. Freedom from want means freedom for a job and from unemployment.

Some of the planners made a very poor job before the war of foreseeing this conflict. I remember before the war when rearmament received little or no support in this house. In 1936, 1937 and 1938 it was said that I was a war-monger. It was said that there would be no war when a bill in connection with this same question of human resources was introduced by the former member for Selkirk on March 31, 1939. It was said in that bill that if war came Canada would be neutral and parliament would decide. When this war started I recalled to the pacifists in the house the words of Jeremiah: "Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, the King of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land?"

We have reached the gravest hour of the war. This is the wrong time for a discussion such as we have had in this house during the last few days. The people of the mother country are wondering what is the matter with Canada just at a time when Great Britain and her allies are going to take the offensive. At such a time we hear all this criticism about home defence and the appointment of committees on man-power and other matters mentioned in the text of one of the amendments. We do not know who is going to win the battle of the Atlantic. What is the use of talking about labour and the problems of labour, agriculture and industry when the ships we build and the food they carry are being sunk before they reach their destination, when we lose both the ships and their cargoes in the Atlantic. Mr. Lyttelton, British minister of production, said in New York on November 11, that the great armada to North Africa, to Morocco and Algiers, consisted of 500 merchant ships and 350 warships. That would mean armed ships, but they had 120 of an escort fleet.

That magnificent armada is the backbone of the north Atlantic fleet, and the 120 escort boats can never get back into the north Atlantic service. We have reached the most grievous hour in the battle of the Atlantic, and I would ask my fellow-members from Quebec who have spoken of the man-power requirements on the farm and in industry to read the report that was published by the Polish government in London last December, giving an account of the way in which the Germans are exterminating the Jewish population in Poland—and then read the handwriting on the wall. Members of the British House of Commons on Thursday, December 17 last, in an unforgettable moment of emotion stood in silence for a minute after hearing Mr. Eden's protest against German savagery against the Jews. Over one million human beings have been exterminated in Poland by the Germans or taken to abattoirs to die there. Think what might happen to Quebec if the axis powers got up the St. Lawrence river and invaded this country! As I said in 1937, can we afford to wait until the enemy on land, sea and in the air has come up the St. Lawrence and blown up the citadel? I plead with my fellow-members from Quebec province to think of what has happened to Poland, where a million people have been taken by the Germans like a lot of cattle and sent to abattoirs where they have been butchered. It is the most brutal crime the world has ever seen. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that a copy of the report of the Polish government in London on German atrocities in Poland be laid on the table and that Canada should pass a vote of protest against this atrocity. Canada would soon have been next and Quebec and central Canada would have had the gestapo police, the whip, the concentration camps, forced labour, and would have been taken to Germany for slaughter.

I have always been a consistent supporter of the principles which I have enunciated to-day. I believe that we should do our duty to the mother country, and I will not support any party in or out of this house that fails to do its duty to the mother country both in this war and after the war. It is the mother country that has saved our shores from a slavery worse than death. We have been a party with two principles. We have had the principles of Sir John A. Macdonald, which yet have a large following in Canada to-day. But we are no longer living in the past. We want a policy that has been brought up to date to meet such a war and conditions after it. The only real socialism that I have seen in Ontario has come through the efforts of the Conservative party, which introduced wise labour legislation in the province and gave us the eight-hour day. It was the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario that first gave women the right to vote, and took over the water powers of the province so that the farmer and the city man could get direct current at cost under the system of public ownership where there are no huge dividends to pay to stockholders.

The mother country cannot live without her export and import trade. She must import twenty-five out of twenty-seven vital raw materials. She has coal and half the iron and steel she requires, but she must import all the other important raw materials. She cannot live without her import and export trade and without her empire, and we should deal fairly with her by seeing that she gets the raw materials of the empire she needs. I do not want to see the mother country left after this war starved and without an empire she has spent a fortune to develop. I have respect for our great ally and for the great President of the United States, but after the war I think the United States will become isolationist again and the mother country will need the raw materials of this country and of the British empire. She cannot exist without the dominions, for an import and an export trade is vital to her. Otherwise, Great Britain will become a second Denmark, a second-class power, just an outpost on the edge of Europe for the United States of America.

I am a supporter of the Conservative party. I have never been anything else. I was unfortunately unable to go to the convention at Winnipeg. I did not attend the previous convention in 1938 at Ottawa. I am not much good at attending conventions. I was never much good at organizing political matters of that description. But I have a great respect for those who attended the convention, and I believe they did the best they could. I will support them in and out of the house because I am a Conservative.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that our side will not forget the duty which it owes to the mother country, which we have always supported, and which by holding off the axis powers has saved our shores from a slavery which would have meant that in Canada we would have the gestapo, the endless tramp of marching feet, the execution squad and all that kind of thing—a system under which tens of thousands of the people of Quebec and Ontario would be moved over to Germany to be slaughtered in the abattoirs just like the people of Poland have been.

Mr. C. E. FERLAND: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party, through its leader, is asking us to adopt an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This amendment, which is very indefinite and might appeal to various shades of public opinion, is full of promises of exemption from military service.

I will nevertheless vote against this amendment because, fundamentally, it is a motion of want of confidence in the present government. Besides, the promises made by the Conservative party are seldom worth very much. I am afraid that the promises contained in the amendment moved by the Conservatives is not worth the paper on which they are written. When I was called to the bar of my province in 1917, I have had the occasion for a certain period, in 1917, and especially in 1918, prior to the end of the war, to appear before military tribunals on behalf of a great many farmers. I successfully defended eight or nine hundred of them, and we believed then, as well as we do now, that farmers would help to win the war and would serve their country better by remaining on the land.

Now, in the conscription act of 1917, the Conservatives had promised exemption to the farmers. They even were to organize tribunals. There were local tribunals which heard all cases in the province of Quebec under the chairmanship of two officers. There was besides an appeal tribunal presided over, in each district, by a judge of the superior court. After the tribunals had granted a great many exemptions to farmers, the Conservative government which was then in power, passed an order in council cancelling all decisions given by such tribunals which had been sitting under that act to exempt farmers. And to-day the same Conservative party, after twenty odd years, is asking us to withdraw our confidence from the Liberal party, and to place it in them, because they will exempt farmers, and will grant all kinds of exemptions, and their war effort will be much more satisfactory than that of the Liberal party.

However, Mr. Speaker, to those who find that our war effort is too great, I would say that the Conservative party asserted its position on Friday afternoon through its leader who stated that if the present Conservative amendment is adopted, it will lead to an increased war effort. Many people believe at this time that our war effort cannot be increased and that we have reached the ultimate limit of our ability to share in this war.

Mr. Speaker, under our constitution and our parliamentary law, the speech from the throne is not subject to amendment. It is impossible to amend a motion for adoption of the address. All that can be done is to oppose government policy, to move a vote of want of confidence for the purpose of condemning the whole government policy and, if such a motion of want of confidence or if such amendment by the opposition carries, the government is defeated. That is why I shall vote against the present Conservative amendment.

That is also why I cannot support the other amendments and I have voted against the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) who had thought that, because a pastor who seems utterly devoid of discretion and but poorly endowed with common sense, has written and published abusive articles against the Roman Catholic church and against our spiritual leaders it constitutes a valid grounds for the hon. member to propose a motion of want of confidence. He asked us to defeat the government because that pastor had insulted our church. What a genius! What a sum of intelligence was required to ask for the defeat of the government on a question of religion! However, I know full well why the amendment was moved. It was because our hon. friend from Gaspé expected to embarrass us. He knew the government would not be defeated on the amendment but he probably expected that his friends in the province of Quebec would later say of him: "See how staunch a Catholic our member is!"

Mr ROY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has just said that, in moving my amendment last night I had the intention of going into Quebec later on and saying that such-and-such an hon. member had voted so-and-so. I do not think that according to the rules he has a right to impute to me any intentions, and I ask him to withdraw those words.

An hon. MEMBER: Just deny them now.

Mr. FERLAND: I accept the word of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I have nothing else to say on that question. He can rest assured that I do not wish to impute to him any motives.

Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps some confusion in certain sections of the country following the many amendments that have been moved, especially in these difficult times. For that reason, I have deemed it advisable to explain why I intend to support the government. In 1940, I received a mandate from my electors; it was a formal mandate to support the Liberal government, subject, however, to my opposing conscription of men for overseas service. Last year, in February I think, the government brought down the famous plebiscite act. Prior to the vote which took place on April 27, 1942, I addressed a message to my electors of Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm, explaining why I had supported the government on the plebiscite act; I told them I had done so because the amendment moved was a motion of want of confidence and that the government would have been defeated and replaced by another government if it had not received the support of the Quebec members. But I told my electors that I still had confidence in our leader the Prime Minister of Canada and that whatever government might be in power, I would vote against them if they ever attempted to pass conscription for overseas service.

Mr. Speaker, I have kept my word. In June, 1942, I think, the government had the bill of conscription for service overseas passed, and I not only protested against it in this house, but I broke with my party and my leader and I voted against the government. Fifty-three other French Canadian members gave a similar vote and broke with the Liberal party by voting against conscription. I had no reason to walk across the house and to desert my party, even though that conscription bill was incorporated in the statutes of Canada, because at the time, before the vote was taken on that amendment to the Mobilization Act, the Prime Minister of Canada repeated once more that conscription of men for overseas service had never been, was not and probably would never be necessary.

But the Prime Minister, in a speech delivered in the House of Commons, gave us his word of honour and a verbal guarantee when he solemnly declared that if it ever became necessary to enforce that conscription measure for service overseas by order in council, he would not put conscription into force without previously consulting parliament, and without being authorized by parliament through a vote of its members. We have continued ever since to fight and to contribute to the war effort. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of all the difficulties we had to face, in spite of certain errors that we have pointed out for correction in this house where free speech is recognized, in party caucus, in the newspapers and elsewhere, I have confidence in the Prime Minister of Canada and I say there is not in the whole country a man who enjoys the confidence of the electors to a higher degree.

Mr. Speaker, I notice that it is near six o'clock and I want to conclude my remarks in order to give the house a chance to vote on the amendment now before us and on the main motion.

I shall vote against the Conservative amendment and I shall support the government on the main motion.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate, but within the past few days certain incidents have taken place on which I think I should say something.

I am satisfied to continue for the next five or six minutes if you wish, but I shall probably take half an hour. Therefore I respectfully move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, February 25, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMME RESPECTING SHORTAGE OF FARM LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I have given notice. When does he expect to be in a position to make an announcement on government policy respecting a programme designed to meet the shortage of farm labour throughout Canada? In the course of the next few weeks spring seeding will commence, and agricultural sections of Canada should be informed as soon as possible as to the government's programme for providing necessary farm help.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): An announcement will be made at an appropriate time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is hardly good enough.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF NAVAL OFFICER AS TO ENEMY SUBMARINE OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services whether the statement made by Rear-Admiral Brodeur at Quebec a few days ago was made with his consent and, if not, whether it represents the opinion of the government?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): As to the first question, the statement attributed to Rear-Admiral Brodeur in the newspapers yesterday afternoon was not made with my knowledge or consent. I believe the second question is answered by the answer I have already given.

The statement purports to represent the opinion of that officer, although he qualifies it somewhat by saying it may be, or it is possible, that the Germans might have a certain number of submarines. However until I have a more definite record of what the rear-admiral did say, I should like to refrain from any further comment upon it.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In view of Mr. Churchill's statement in the House of Commons that the number of sinkings should not be given out, why should an officer stationed at Washington interfere?

I would ask for a board of inquiry in connection with this matter. There should be an admiralty board; the rear-admiral should be dismissed from the service and not sent back to Washington. It is the most mischievous statement ever made and invites invasion. They never had five hundred submarines in the Atlantic at any time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Perhaps I should say a word on that point. The gentleman in question is a rear-admiral of the Royal Canadian Navy, and the fact that he happens to be stationed at Washington at the moment does not take away from his standing as an officer of the Royal Canadian Navy.

As to the making of statements respecting numbers I would point out that numbers of enemy ships have been conjectured from time to time by men in Great Britain, in Canada and in the United States, some of whom were and others were not in the services. I should prefer that such conjectures be not made. But, as I say, until I see what the rear-admiral really did say, from his own notes, I believe I should refrain from any further comment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not the minister think he should make a statement in regard to that?

Mr. CHURCH: The minister told me, I think it was a year ago yesterday, that there were no submarines lurking around St. Pierre and Miquelon or the St. Lawrence.

TRANSPORTATION

RESTRICTIONS ON TRAVEL BY RAIL—APPLICATION TO ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and as he is not here perhaps it can stand as a notice. It refers to an article in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday which states that restrictions on travel by rail are to be continued. One paragraph reads:

> However, a military representative said that there was a probability that rail travel for soldiers, sailors and airmen except those on compassionate or embarkation leave would be definitely curtailed.

The present temporary restriction has caused many complaints among members of the armed forces and I should like to know if the correct interpretation of this order is that the only leave that will be granted to members of the armed forces will be on compassionate grounds or embarkation leave.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Associate Minister of National Defence): I shall draw the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

LIBEL AND SLANDER

JURISDICTION OF PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL IN ENFORCEMENT OF FEDERAL LAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out that while Hansard of Tuesday, page 657, is perfectly correct, in reporting the proceedings the Canadian Press said that I had said that "old religious controversies had been forgotten by many and they wondered why they should be continued." Those words are ascribed to me. They were not mine but were those of Reverend Mr. Toplady, writer of "Rock of Ages." The words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as reported on page 664 of Hansard, are perfectly correct. I have been told four times by predecessors of the Minister of Justice, who is also Attorney General of Canada, that an attorney general should not be asked to give a legal opinion to the house. The law quoted by the Prime Minister in connection with libel and slander is correct, except for the qualification that I make, namely that the enforcement of all federal law is for the provincial attorneys general. This is the first time during the many years I have been in the house that I have known an attorney general to give a legal opinion, especially on religion. I do not ask the minister to reply to-day; he can look up the page of Hansard of last year when on his estimates, we were discussing the newspaper bill I had introduced also in 1936, 1937 and 1938. At that time I asked the former minister, Mr. Lapointe, if an attorney general could give a legal opinion, and he said I was correct; that the rule was he should not. He asked me if I knew the reason and I said that I did. The reason is that should an attorney general appear in court as a litigant it might be said, as was said in England, that he should not give a legal opinion because when he appears before a judge, the judge might consider that the case was being prejudged and there might be a mistrial. I ask the attorney general to look up what his predecessors said. No legal opinion should be given to the house by the present minister and I ask him to look up the statement.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am sorry, but I have not understood what the hon. member said.

Mr. CHURCH: I ask the minister for a reply. The only trouble is that it is sometimes convenient, as it was last Tuesday, to give a legal opinion for propaganda purposes.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I gave notice that there were some observations I desired to make arising out of certain events of more recent days. I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Dienfenbaker), particularly his criticism of the explanatory letter which has been sent out by the director of selective service and attested to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I feel definitely that equality of service has not been achieved and I think the crux of the whole situation is that we lack a co-ordinated war effort in this country.

As I say, events of the last few days necessitate my making a few comments in this house. I want to remind hon. members again of the statement made about a year ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which indicated definitely that all farm labour would be frozen, I think it was as of March 23, 1942. I should like to outline as briefly as I can what has happened since that time. The regional office of the national selective service referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is located in my district, and I commend him for the remarks he has made in this connection because I know something about this particular office.

The Prime Minister's statement with respect to farm help was expected to provide some relief for the general situation. But that was a year ago. Farmers' sons are still being called. I received three letters to-day asking me for an explanation of what the Prime Minister's words meant, the statement that he made a year ago. Our farmers have been asked by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to increase their production programme. Is it any wonder therefore that they are upset about the labour situation which affects the increased production of foodstuffs for which the minister has asked? The urgency has become so great that I am prompted to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) a question, and I shall include also the Minister of Labour. If these men are as important as was indicated twelve months ago by the Prime Minister, and as is indicated now by the Minister of Labour, can the Minister of National Defence state that they are not being accepted at the present time when they go to enlist? When this type of man presents himself for enlistment, is he told to go back where he belongs? I know that he is not.

I have visited some of these lavishly constructed recruiting offices—incidentally I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had better check on the cost of some of these recruiting centres—and I find that they grab any young man they can possibly get their hands on. The recruiting office in Ottawa has been closed up for some time, but in the last day or two the trumpets have been blaring forth again. I ask the Minister of National Defence to check up on that so that the people of this country will know that the urgent need for food is actually being recognized.

Before the Minister of Finance launches his next budget of five billion dollars, which is the amount mentioned in the press I should like to bring to his attention the fact that it is generally felt by the people of this country that there is wasteful expenditure going on under many government departments. Somebody said not very long ago that we have strange men at Ottawa. Perhaps some will say that includes some in this chamber, but it is not to them I refer. According to the press of February 20 last a gentleman who until recently held a high place at Ottawa in the timber control administration, and is reputed to be one of the greatest authorities on timber and lumber in Canada, addressing the Ontario Retail Lumber Dealers association in the Royal York hotel, Toronto, is reported to have used these words:

> Don't depend upon Ottawa to lead the course in Canada's lumber programme; those in the industry itself must map out the timber policy and vigorously present this to the federal authorities.

Mr. A. S. Nicholson then went on to make reference to his sudden resignation. The report continues:

> Prior to Mr. Nicholson's address, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing the continued opposition of the lumbermen toward the efforts that have been made, and are being made, by Wartime Housing Limited to encroach upon the field of permanent dwelling houses. It was claimed that Wartime Housing Limited was building great numbers of permanent dwellings valued at from $4,000 to $6,000 and that "this monopoly" was bankrupting legitimate builders.

He warned the retail lumber men of certain dangers in the second-hand lumber situation, and I shall refer to this a little later. There is one other paragraph in the press report which I should like to quote:

One very high official told me I tried to run the timber board too economically and that I worked too hard.

I wish anyone who has lived in Ottawa for a part of each year during the past few years would tell this house where economy is being practised in any government department in this city.

For a year and more everybody who is engaged in the production or distribution of foodstuffs in this country has been trying to convince the government that the man-power situation is in a muddle, that things are in a state of chaos which must inevitably lead to a situation that will become absolutely beyond control. Members in every part of this house have reechoed these sentiments. One hon. member suggested taking men out of the army temporarily and putting them where there was essential work to do. I think every hon. member has had brought to his attention the plight of farmers who have been deprived of help which was vitally needed, and I think everyone realizes how difficult it is to get a man released from the army once he falls into the clutches of the military authorities. But the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has asked for increased production of foodstuffs. Last year the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. MacDiarmid) made an urgent appeal to the government that help be provided for the farmers. By a strange coincidence I was informed only yesterday of three or four farms in his county, large tracts of the best land in that splendid agricultural district where the farmer has been left with no help at all. These are farms which formerly carried from twenty-five to forty or fifty head of cattle and other stock in proportion, yet to-day only the farmer and his wife are left to carry on the work, and the consequence is that the stock must be reduced and implements are lying idle. I can understand, therefore, the urgency of the appeal made a year ago by the hon. member for Glengarry, but I cannot understand why it fell on deaf ears, particularly since he is on the government side of the house. In my own county the same conditions prevail in many districts; good buildings and splendid machinery are not being utilized. Some way must be found in which the minister and the Department of Agriculture can put their increased food production programme into effect.

Somebody may say: It is easy enough to criticize but how is the situation to be corrected? That is a fair question. In reply I should like to put on Hansard the opinion of a body of men who understand present-day conditions. The Minister of Agriculture may already have seen this resolution, but if not I shall be glad to furnish him with a copy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): He can read it in Hansard.

Mr. LOCKHART: I would thank the hon. gentleman not to interrupt, because I intend to read this whether he likes it or not. Before doing so, may I pause to remind the house of the number of members of the cabinet who have been to Britain during the past year or two. I am not criticizing them for going, and if I am wrong in any comments I make I ask that I be corrected.

First let me say that I am informed on good authority that many hundreds of thousands of acres—in fact, I was told by one source that it was nearly three million acres—of good tillable soil in Great Britain has been taken over for defence purposes. We will put the amount at three millions in round figures. I am also informed on good authority from over there that an equivalent amount of land, or more, is now under cultivation in Britain in excess of what was under cultivation when the war broke out. It is not important for my purposes whether the figure is three millions or three and a half millions; certainly great areas of land have been put under cultivation. This result, I am told, has been accomplished through the appointing of committees of responsible men in every county or borough, vested with powers to deal with this situation. Over there they do not want irresponsible controllers who are not accountable to parliament. Their committees in the several counties and boroughs have authority to this extent, that if a particular farmer—say, for example, my friend the hon. member for Glengarry—is in need of help, the local board can go to industry—yes, and to the armed forces—and obtain the men necessary to keep production at the peak in that particular area. If the statements I have made are correct, I wonder why the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour have not developed a similar system here in view of the fact that the production of so many farms in this country has been seriously depleted.

I have here a resolution presented by my own county council, to which I will ask hon. members to listen, and to which I shall briefly refer. Though I have had no contact with my county council, I know the resolution was presented by two ex-wardens whom I know to be outstanding men. As for their politics, so far as I know they are of opposite political views. However, that makes no difference; they are excellent farmers. Here is the resolution—I will send a copy to the Minister of Agriculture:

Whereas the shortage of man-power is the biggest obstacle in the way of Canadian farmers reaching this years' food production goals, and

Whereas there is no source from which this labour may be secured except by securing the assistance of urban people and by cooperating with each other,

Therefore be it resolved:

1. That the council of the county of Lincoln recommend to the federal government that a qualified man be appointed for approximately each 20,000 of rural population, which in the county of Lincoln would mean the appointment of two qualified men.

2. That the clerical work be done in the offices of the provincial agricultural representatives.

May I pause at this point to tell the Minister of Agriculture that I have it on good authority, regarding the operation of the agricultural offices in Great Britain, that there is no increase, or practically none, in staff, and that the work is done out in the field by competent men who have authority to act in this connection.

3. That the duties of the men so appointed shall be to see that the various phases of agriculture are organized and that these organizations cooperate one with the other for the achievement of the one aim which is the production of more food.

4. That to aid in the attainment of this goal of production of more food the following suggestions be recommended for consideration of the federal government.

(a) That city and all urban residents be encouraged to devote some time to farm work by supplying them with extra gasoline to provide transportation to and from the farm, and that the men appointed to carry out the field work, of this war production programme, be given the power, to issue these coupons, when he investigates, and finds that these urban and city people are working on the farm, and driving their own car back and forth to the farm.

(b) That small groups of farmers cooperate to save much food.

(c) That sows, gilts, cows and heifers be kept in production instead of being butchered.

(d) That an increase be encouraged on some farms of extra sows, cows, extra acres of grain, potatoes, tomatoes and other fruits and vegetables and also soy beans.

(e) That the planting of victory gardens be encouraged and stimulated on farms.

(f) That we are quite agreed with the present government policy of price control but would suggest that a floor be put under the price of all agricultural products in order to ensure the maintenance of the present production of foodstuffs and further encourage others to do their utmost.

Having received yesterday the resolution which I have read, and having gleaned a good deal of information from the old land as to how these matters are being handled there, I am moved to ask why some of these most effective methods, of which ministers surely must have knowledge, are not put into effect in Canada.

I want to say a word about egg production, since there is quite a number of small producers in my area. The Minister of Agriculture tells us he wants more eggs. You cannot have eggs unless you have baby chicks. I do not know why this subject was ever referred to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), whom I see in his seat. I understand that he heard much about baby chicks when he was in the city of Hamilton—as did the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). Apparently this industry, not only in Hamilton but in other places of which I have heard, is completely robbed of the experienced help which is necessary properly to produce these chicks. Perhaps the Minister of Labour would be good enough to get out another letter and explain the situation; it would be very helpful under the present circumstances.

Small producers in my riding tell me that they have difficulty in getting as much as twenty-eight cents for their present production of eggs, and that distribution facilities are such that it is almost impossible to find any medium whereby they can dispose of their production. In a letter I have here they urge me to find out whether there is any medium by which they can get rid of their surplus eggs, and they ask definitely that a bottom price be put on eggs so that they can get at least the cost of production and a little something to pay them for their labours. I would remind the Minister of Labour that if we do not have chicks we will not have eggs and we will not have hens, and the minister will not get his quota of eggs unless he does something to encourage these people by providing them with experienced help. This applies also to pork and beef, and I could deal further with the situation as it affects many other commodities. It all comes back to the muddled man-power policy we have had for the past three or more years.

I want to say a word to the Minister of Finance in regard to his budget of five billion dollars, which must be raised by taxation and other means during the coming year. I am going to voice the sentiments of a great many people in my own community who are asking one question. The Prime Minister has said that we need a reallocation of man-power and woman-power. The Minister of Labour has attempted to carry out this reallocation by regulation, which regulation has been further explained and clarified. This being so, why is it necessary to keep on adding factory extensions all over the country? This is being done in my own district, and I suppose in other districts as well. I know of one large addition in my own city which has been begun just recently. Then we have contracts for hostels and other buildings. I do urge upon the Minister of Finance that he bring pressure to bear upon the proper authorities to let us have in this house a real picture of the money that is being spent on hostels, staff houses and so on, many of which are not half filled. I have personal knowledge as to that. People are beginning to wonder why this reckless expenditure should continue. I urge upon the minister that he see to it that proper and adequate information is given this house so that when the people are asked to raise five billion dollars next year they may know the money will be properly spent. I am told that a hostel to take care of five hundred persons costs more than a quarter of a million dollars. That is a lot of hard-earned money which must be raised by a good many people, and it is about time we knew how this money is to be spent.

I should like now to refer to the construction of permanent housing units by Wartime Housing Limited, to which reference was made by Mr. Nicholson in his address in Toronto. Is it any wonder that the building contractors and all the various trades associated with the construction of houses, one of the greatest industries in this country, are organizing to protest against the way this is being carried on? I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he is not careful he may have another political group with which to contend. These men are sincere; they have made representations to the government, and I can tell the Prime Minister now that he will not have heard the last from them if he continues to allow Wartime Housing Limited to interfere further with private enterprise in the construction of permanent houses.

While I am on the question of the construction of houses, let me say that before we are asked to vote a five billion dollar budget we should be supplied with full information as to the amount of money that has been spent on war-time housing up to the present. I ask particularly that the expenditures in the city of Hull be laid before this house. A year or so ago we were told that the cost then had reached $3,800 per unit. I have been over there; I have looked into the situation, and I know a little about the construction of houses. We have seven or eight hundred of these war-time houses in my own city, and it is high time we knew where the money is going that is being spent in the housing programme in Hull. That goes also for war-time housing all over the country. I am not questioning the need for a certain amount of this type of construction. No doubt the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) had a problem on his hands, but surely it is time we knew what money has been spent on this kind of thing and what has been the cost per unit, not only in Hull but all over the dominion. It might be interesting if someone would page the mayor of Hamilton in connection with this "permanent" construction, because I know he has some very strong ideas in connection with it. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue will see him in that regard, because we were told that a programme was to be developed in Hamilton, though I believe there has been a delay of some kind. I am asking, however, that the fullest possible information be given this house in connection with Wartime Housing Limited, if not before the budget comes down at least a reasonable time before the people have to raise this huge amount of money.

I want to say a word about fuel. Back in the middle of December, 1942, I believe it was the Minister of Finance who told us we were short eight million tons of fuel. What has been done during the present heating season to relieve that situation? Hon. members on the opposite side have told us no provision was made for labour to bring wood out to the highways in order that it might be brought to the people. I remember reading a news item not very long ago stating that the town of Lindsay, in the Haliburton area, had no fuel. Surely if a coordinated plan of any kind is being developed for this season there should be no shortage of wood for fuel in the town of Lindsay or the Haliburton district. What is being done? It would be very helpful to hon. members and to the thousands of people living in war-time houses in areas where they cannot get wood, because of transportation difficulties, if they were told they need have no fear of not being able to heat their homes next winter; for I know many are suffering this year. This house and these people should be told whether there is a definite programme to relieve the situation. It must be remembered that these war-time houses have only a little fuel box at the back door holding only half a ton of coal. They must depend upon the distributors of fuel to supply them every ten days or two weeks, and the labour situation is such that I know of one firm which is printing signs saying that it has plenty of fuel but that people must get it in their own wheelbarrows. Thus the man-power situation affects our whole economy. Some controller not long ago conceived the bright idea of spreading the news that there was bituminous coal in abundance in certain areas, and urging people to burn it. Surely the Minister of Munitions and Supply, knowing the equipment used by these people, must know that they cannot burn that soft, mine-run bituminous coal. A few days afterwards someone got a brain wave—to tell this to the people; and in their desperation they used it. I think it was in a Toronto paper we read that three or four people had died from coal gas poisoning. Within a week after this flood of literature about burning soft coal went over the country these people, who are munition workers—they cannot get a house unless they are—were putting soft coal into small firepots twelve inches in diameter. The result was that away went the lid and the door, and they woke up in the morning to find the place full of coal gas.

The supply of anthracite coal must be distributed where it is needed. Into the northern areas, where there is wood in abundance, no anthracite should go. What we need is a man-power policy to see that wood is got out in proper time so that there shall be no fear of lack of fuel for the winter of 1943-44.

Our man-power muddle is terrible. Here is one thing I wish to call to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday morning a young man, a skilled toolmaker and machinist who has been working in an industry in this city for three and a half years, said to me, "I am disgusted." I am not going to tell the whole story, but he told me about production in the plant. He said, "I am going to see if I can enlist." I wonder if it is possible for a young man deliberately to leave an industry after three and a half years' special training, in order to enlist.

It is high time someone told us where we have to go and what we have to do. I have felt this for some time. I ask the government to give us some lead in this respect. From the press all across the country as well as in this House of Commons comes the call for a balanced man-power plan. Surely the Prime Minister and his advisers must be alive to the situation; surely they see that the man- and woman-power of this country must be reallocated at once. In my opinion there is only one solution and it is the enactment of national compulsory selective service legislation covering every part of this country and for every war service. This is the only thing I can see that will give us an all-out total war effort in Canada. Our first job is to win the war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was paired with the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Gingues). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL: I was paired with the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Mullins). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BLANCHETTE: I was paired with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. FAIR: I was paired with the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have explained my position on the address and I shall not be long in making the remarks I wish to make now. I am always brief in addressing the Chair and I shall follow that tradition to-day.

I have been a member of this house since 1924. In the period from 1924 to 1930 I fought for the party. In the period from 1930 to 1935 I fought for my electors and also for the party which understood the work I was doing. Since 1935 I have been fighting for my constituents and also for the party which does not understand that I am working for them. In 1931 I tried to get some information about butter, because butter had been one of the controversial subjects raised by the Conservative party during the election. I got some data about butter and other dairy products. We also had a fight over the Rivière du Loup station and unemployment. In 1932 it was mostly railways, the Post Office Department and unemployment relief. In 1932-33 it was the Ottawa trade agreements. Long speeches were made on those, and we also took up statistics, radio, the Post Office Department, the redistribution bill and unemployment relief.

On page 1949 of Hansard of February 9, 1933, are to be found fifty questions which I put to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and which have never been answered. It took a long time to draft them, but I undertook that work in order to give an opportunity to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group to give us some explanation of their policy. The former member for Humboldt was a dear friend of mine and he wrote me last year to ask for a copy of these questions.

In 1934 there was Mr. Sauvé's trip to Egypt to attend the Cairo postal congress, the fight on the bureau of translation bill, trade statistics, unemployment and farm relief, and redistribution. At that time the member for Témiscouata prepared a book which was furnished to the house but the Clerk of the House informs me that it has never been used by hon. members. However, it is still kept in the vaults of parliament. This book contains the story of redistribution in the province of Quebec from 1853 to 1933 and it shows how each county was affected by each redistribution. It is there if anyone wants to refer to it. It shows what has happened to the geography of each constituency in the province of Quebec over a long period of time. If it has not been used by any hon. member of parliament since it was tabled, it may be because the redistribution bill has not come before us. However, it was used by the former minister of justice and the former minister of public works when they discussed this matter with two members of the Bennett government, Mr. Duranleau and Sir George Perley.

The point I want to make is that I was not a member of the committee. The one who represented the province of Quebec was a gentleman who made a speech about the Ottawa agreements in which he quoted four pages of a speech which had been made by Mr. Bennett, then prime minister, and four pages of a speech which had been delivered by the chief of the Liberal party—eight pages, really, four on each side—and that was the member's speech. It was so bad that it was struck off the record. He was the one who represented the province of Quebec on the committee, and since he did not do his work, I had to do it. The Liberal federation was paid to do this work. The representative of the province of Quebec on the committee did nothing. I had to do his work myself. Once when I was working on it, a member of the federation came to my office and spoke to me. I said to him, "Give me a chance to do your work. Don't disturb me when I am doing your work." I was doing it to help the members and to prevent the Bennett government from destroying the former constituency.

In 1935 what was discussed mostly was unemployment, external trade, and taxation. At the close of the session I was asked to prepare a tabulation of all taxation which had been imposed by Bennett each year. Not a single one of those taxes was removed by the party, although that tabulation was used as propaganda in the election of 1935, being issued as a leaflet. We complained of the sugar tax, but it was left where it was. I made a tabulation of all the taxes, and it served hon. members during that election. We also spoke during that session of tax-free bonds.

Besides that, another thing was done—the preparation of a report on unemployment. That report was carefully made and was well received by the press. A minister, who was not then a member of the house, wrote me a letter dated June 19, 1935, in which he said:

> It is the most able analysis of the situation I have seen and will be exceedingly useful to me.

This was done to show that Mr. Bennett's unemployment policy was no good, and that the unemployment problem deserved careful consideration. I was successful in distributing copies to every member of the House of Commons in 1935. In the following year Hon. Mr. Rogers, who was then minister of labour, had a second edition made of that report and sent to each member of parliament, especially to the new members who had not had an opportunity of securing it before. I was often told by the late Mr. Gordon, when he was minister of labour in the Bennett cabinet, that it was impossible to secure data on the unemployed in Canada. About that time a congress of municipalities was meeting at the Chateau Laurier, and I asked the mayors who were in convention there if they could not supply me with some information on the unemployed. Their first answer was no, but finally I got some information from them. It took a long time. I did that at no cost to the country except for paper and printing, which does not amount to much. I sent telegrams out at my own expense. I made a report which gave a true picture of unemployment, and it showed that Mr. Bennett was not true in the words he put into the mouth of his excellency in each of the speeches from the throne at the opening and closing of the sessions. I had the great honour of hearing Hon. Mr. Rogers, minister of labour at that time, state in the house that that report was the basis of the unemployment policy of the government.

Then I asked for a complete report on the unemployed in my constituency. It was prepared by two very able men: Mr. Lafortune, a former controller of the city of Ottawa council and a very well-known man, and Mr. Begin, who was one of the appointees of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). These men lived in my county for several months and took the trouble to go into 1,200 homes of unemployed settlers, many of whom had no cattle and no horses, some of whom had six animals (six chickens), another only one animal and it was a dog; while some had an ox or a horse. Some had a cow which was used in place of a horse or ox and also used to provide milk for the children, but the milk was not very good coming from a cow that was used as a beast of burden.

After the session of 1935 the Ottawa Journal wrote an editorial about the member for Temiscouata, from which I read this last paragraph:

> So, let's not be too shocked over Mr. Pouliot, Hypocrites that we are, must of us will probably say out loud that the man is an impossible partisan but that will only be because we like to have other people say of us that we're fair and reasonable. Secretly, we have to admit that Jean-Francois has merely had the courage—or perhaps folly—to speak out what most of us think; that he's expressed what most of us are slaves to.

And the thing isn't as bad as it seems. The story of our whole party system, which hasn't worked too badly, tells us that.

Mr. Lafortune and Mr. Begin made their report. It was a thick and very comprehensive report, well got up and showing everything. After the report was made, an agreement was signed by the dominion government with the provincial governments that it would not pay any unemployment relief. Therefore the report was of no use. But I gave it to one of my provincial colleagues, who got in touch with Mr. Godbout and it was one of the reasons why the provincial government of Quebec has been doing much along this line.

In the session of 1936 there was the loan by Mr. Bennett, without consulting his colleagues, of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Then I had some little difficulty with the Speaker. Although he forgot what was the procedure and practice of the house by asking me to withdraw certain things I had said, although they were innocent words I had used I withdrew them just to show my good will and to save him trouble.

Then there was unemployment and social insurance, which I fought and bitterly complained about. Then there was a piece of legislation to repeal the economic council.

You know, sir, I believe that when a policy is enunciated by the party, it binds us for a very long time until it is proved that the party has been wrong in submitting it. There was a fight in 1930 about the British tariff. In my humble view the policy of the government was good. At the time the only decrease in our trade was in shipments of grain. The purpose of the new trade agreements was to give a kind of premium or prize to our British customers, and therefore I supported the agreements. When the party came back into power in 1936, as we had been fighting the Ottawa agreements, with the exception of two for which our leaders voted, I thought it proper to ask for the repeal of chapter 2, of 23-24 George V, 1933, and to substitute therefor chapter 13 of 20-21, George V, 1930, the effect of which would have been to replace the Bennett trade agreements with our own. I was very much surprised when the Minister of Finance of the day, Mr. Dunning, rose to a point of order; he contended that my motion was not in order. That was on March 10, 1936. On April 6 following I asked for the ruling of His Honour, the Speaker, but no ruling had been given at the end of the session, not even when we heard the boom of the gun that announced the prorogation speech.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

In 1937 it was the Canadian National Railways, unemployment, and national defence. At the time, I voted against some estimates of the Department of National Defence because I wanted some order in the department, and I wanted the bureaucracy which was supreme in the department to be curbed. One reason I took this action was that I was invited to a private reception given by a top "brass hat". By the way, when that "brass hat" was in a theatre of war he was weeping all the time; that was the way he served his country during that war. I do not know whether the glasses were full of tears or of liquor, but the liquor was very good. There was a distribution of champagne at that reception. Oh, it was fine and there was plenty of it. But I wondered whether there was something wrong there at the time.

In 1938 we fought the divorce courts and divorce bills. In that session there was also a civil service committee, to which I referred yesterday, and an unemployment relief bill. At that time I sent to the Liberal party a memorandum on the situation in the province of Quebec, with particular reference to the padlock law.

In 1939 there was the question of the library of parliament. We fought the central mortgage bank bill, and the bill was dropped; those who were to act under the bill were appointed but they were not given the power to act. The thing was stopped. Therefore we were right on that. We opposed the national defence board, the transfer of the purchasing branch of the Department of National Defence to the Minister of National Defence; and on that also we were right. It was a service to the party, in order that the party should have less trouble. Also we complained about the deputy minister of finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, because what they were doing was being done behind the back of the House of Commons, with the assistance of the intelligentsia of this country.

At the special session of 1930, when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett rose in his full glory to state that such unemployment as existed would be cured by high tariffs, the member for Temiscouta, who was sitting on a back bench, was the only one who rose to call for a division. The fact is not reported in the papers of the house but it was recorded by the parliamentary correspondent of Le Devoir, in Montreal.

These are a few things which I wanted to tell the house.

Since the war began I have done my best to do two things—to help the soldiers, and to have a fair application of the man-power regulations. How far we have succeeded will no doubt be known in due course. It is very difficult at times to do what we want to do for the soldiers and for the civilian population. The work here is hard. There are only twenty-four hours to a day and every available minute is occupied. Sometimes we are sorry the days are not longer, because we have so much to do.

There are other things we have done—things which have been done in the interests of the party. My contention is that our actions should be in agreement with what is being said in public. Sometimes we are exposed to disagreement and to controversy with this or that hon. member. For instance, I had a controversy with the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), because he had insinuated that the Prime Minister was not well qualified to be the head of the government in war time. I was, I admit, unpleasant to the hon. member for Parkdale. I have nothing against him; he is an eminent member of the medical profession and a prominent citizen of Ontario; but I had to fight him on this issue in order to defend the head of the Liberal party.

More than that, on February 21, 1941, I used strong language with regard to some ministers, but it was because of certain intrigues which were then going on. What I have never said is that, in the forenoon preceding that speech, I telephoned to most of the English-speaking ministers outside the province of Quebec to tell them that there was an intrigue being made for the formation of a union government and that if it was successful they would be thrown overboard. One of the ministers, whom naturally I will not mention, told me that those who were against him were also those who were against me. What touched me very deeply—for I had not expected it, and had not telephoned to the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe about it, although I had spoken here on the Friday afternoon—was that, while I was at home the following Monday, I heard over the radio that Mr. Lapointe had spoken in the house on exactly the same lines on that Monday, which showed that we saw eye to eye on this matter and that we both were defending the Prime Minister against all intrigues directed against him.

You know, sir, the story of the St. Bernard dog which barked very loudly and tugged at his master's clothes to get him out into the storm. He was kicked, but he was insistent. He was so persistent that finally the master put on his winter clothes, went out, and found one of his men who had been hurt in a fall on the rocks during the storm. So that sometimes, though we do things which are very unpleasant, they are for a good purpose. It is always easier to listen to those who are close to us, but there are some who, though close to us for a time, leave us afterwards.

I have in mind the case of Mr. Victor Sifton. I remember that one day during the summer, about the end of July, I was going down the plaza here. I saw a long car approaching, and someone put his head out of the window and shouted, "Victor! Victor!" It was the Minister of National Defence who wanted to see Mr. Sifton again before he went back to Winnipeg. There was no harm in that; but since he has been in Winnipeg, Mr. Sifton, who knows more about the Department of National Defence than any other civilian, has complained bitterly about the bad influence of the brass hats.

There is something else which I regret very much; it is based upon information appearing in the press, which I presume is correct. When the bombing crew who dropped bombs on Germany one morning and came to Canada the same day were here in Ottawa, they were photographed with various members of the cabinet. For some reason or other the Minister of National Defence was not at hand, and the Prime Minister said, "Where is Ralston? I want him to be photographed with me." I suppose that is natural, because the Prime Minister relies upon the Minister of National Defence and wants to share his glory with him; but the gentleman who told me about the incident was surprised that the Prime Minister should be so insistent upon having his picture taken with the Minister of National Defence. These are minor things, but centuries ago Plutarch said that it is by small things we judge great men. I do not desire to play the role of Cassandra; speaking about ambitions, I have none. However, it is perfectly legitimate for the leader of any party to expect to be able to rely upon his close supporters.

At the time of the vote on the plebiscite I was in Montreal, where I met a prominent citizen of Quebec, who asked how things were going here in Ottawa. I told him how they were going, and he said, "The Prime Minister will go, and he will be replaced by so and so," naming one of his colleagues. A little later I was here in Ottawa, and in one of the corridors of the building I saw another colleague of the Prime Minister who looked like a conspirator. Sometimes it is interesting to watch what is going on. Let me tell the Prime Minister that he can rely upon his humblest friends, even though at times they may differ with him on certain points. It is most difficult to terminate associations we have had for a very long time with colleagues with whom we have been working with a common aim.

We have come to know each other; we have tried to help each other, and we have managed to get along pretty well.

There is one further thing I desire to say. I have never said anything against any member of parliament, and I have appreciated the kindness and courtesy of the members of this house. I have been here a long time. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) is the dean of the house in point of years; the Prime Minister is next in line, and I am one of the older members. I appreciate very much the relations I have enjoyed not only with members on this side of the house but with those on the other side as well. But may I say that in my opinion it is wrong for the government to take the opposite view on every suggestion made by a member of parliament. It is always surprising to us when we are told "it is impossible" before we have an opportunity to say what we want done. Sometimes it would be a good thing for them to listen.

I could say many other things; I will say only one. It is that in my humble view the position of Minister of National Defence is a full-time job; I presume you will agree with me on that. He is even supposed to have a parliamentary secretary within a short time. Therefore I cannot conceive how at the same time the Minister of National Defence can be the perpetual acting Minister of Finance, as the Minister of Finance himself stated last year.

Nine years ago, sir, at Windsor, Ontario, the member for Témiscouata delivered a lecture on the anniversary of the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. At that time I quoted a few words that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had uttered in concluding a speech before a group of young men at London, Ontario, as follows:

Banish doubt and hate from your life. Let your souls be ever open to the promptings of faith and the gentle influence of brotherly love. Be adamant against the haughty; be gentle and kind to the weak. Let your aim and purpose, in good report or ill, in victory or defeat, be so to live, so to strive, so to serve as to do your part to ever raise higher the standard of life and living.

In those few words there is a programme for every man in public life. It should not be the programme of the Liberal party only; it should be also the programme of all those who have a desire to see the greatest possible number of their fellow citizens happy and contented, living like brothers. I need not mention the numerous campaigns that have been carried on during general elections and by-elections, the articles that have been written, the editorials that have been published in Liberal newspapers or other articles that have been mimeographed and sent to the members for distribution during several electoral campaigns. But I have always tried to see all citizens who think alike grouped together for the welfare of this country. I have supported the Prime Minister for a long time; I hope I shall be in a position to do so in the future. I do not know what the future will bring. Everything will depend upon the legislation that will come before us. But now, sir, my concluding word will be this, that this time I shall show good will by abstaining from voting on the address.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GRAYDON: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Carried on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. ROY: Five of us are standing, Mr. Speaker, to call for a recorded vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only four members were on their feet when the motion was declared carried.

Main motion (Mr. Harris—Grey-Bruce) agreed to on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Under standing order 57 the immediate business of the house, after the address has been agreed to, is to appoint the two committees of the whole house, the committee of supply, which controls the public expenditure, and the committee of ways and means, which provides the public income by way of taxation.

I therefore move:

That this house will to-day resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will to-day resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. JOSEPH ARTHUR BRADETTE, MEMBER FOR COCHRANE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house will have observed that during the period of the long adjournment of the last session the then Deputy Speaker of the house, the Hon. Thomas Vien, was appointed to the senate, and that Colonel Vien has since been appointed Speaker of that chamber. Colonel Vien's resignation has created a vacancy in the position of Deputy Speaker of this house. I should like to read to the house the rule which governs in respect of the appointment of Deputy Speaker or Chairman of Committees when the house meets at its first session of a new parliament or when a vacancy subsequently occurs. Standing order 56 reads:

(1) A Chairman of Committees of the house, who shall also be Deputy Speaker of the house shall be elected . . . as soon as an address has been agreed on in answer to His Excellency's speech; and the member so elected shall, if in his place in the house, take the chair of all committees of the whole, including the committees of supply and ways and means, in accordance with the rules and usages which regulate the duties of a similar officer, generally designated the chairman of the committees of ways and means, in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

(2) The member elected to serve as Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the language which is not that of the Speaker for the time being.

(3) The member so elected Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees shall continue to act in that capacity until the end of the parliament for which he is elected, and in the case of a vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, the house shall proceed forthwith to elect a successor.

Hon. members will see from the reading of the order that the office of Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker of the house is a very high and honourable office, and requires, in the one to fill it, a member possessing many attainments and qualities, attainments and qualities very similar to those expected of His Honour the Speaker. The hon. member chosen for the position, inasmuch as he has to preside over the committees of the whole house and at times fill the chair of the Speaker, has to be a member who is familiar with the procedure of the house, possessed of a full knowledge of the rules, of judicial temperment, conciliatory and yet firm, one who has qualities of discernment, judgment and quick decision, also one who, because of his courtesy and fairness, is, as nearly as it is possible to find such a one, generally acceptable to hon. members of the house as a whole. He is required in addition to possess a knowledge of the language other than that which His Honour the Speaker himself possesses. His Honour the Speaker being English—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Scotch.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —Scotch, which is even better, it is necessary that the choice should fall upon one who is possessed of a knowledge of the French language.

I am happy to say that on our side of the house we have had little difficulty in discovering a gentleman who I believe all members of the house will be prepared to agree is not only a master of the French language but has mastered the English language as well—with a shade of a Scotch accent.

I would affirm, Mr. Speaker, that we have in the person of Mr. Joseph Arthur Bradette, member of parliament for Cochrane, a gentleman who, from the reception just given the mention of his name, certainly is most acceptable to members on both sides of the house. Mr. Bradette has been a member of this House of Commons for seventeen years—or rather is now in his seventeenth year as a member—having been elected to parliament in 1926, and returned at each subsequent general election. I doubt if any other member of parliament in that period of time has been more faithful in his attendance on the proceedings of the house. During the time he has been a member he has frequently been called upon to preside over the committees of the house and has also at different times filled the chair of His Honour the Speaker. We know that at all times he performed these duties in a most creditable manner, a manner which has met with general acceptance on the part of all members of the house.

The hon. member was born in Quebec, and lived in that province for some time. Subsequently he moved to northern Ontario, where he has since resided. He has been an example to all of us in that during his period of residence in Ontario he has so completely mastered the English language that to-day he is able to speak in both French and English with a degree of fluency which few other hon. members in the house possess.

I have to add only that at an earlier stage of our discussions an hon. member belonging to the party sitting immediately opposite stated that when the government was called upon to make a choice of Deputy Speaker he hoped we might select the hon. member for Cochrane. I was pleased to learn in advance that the choice of the hon. member who had already been decided upon for the position of Deputy Speaker would be so acceptable to the opposition. I believe the choice will be as acceptable to the other groups in the house as it is to all hon. members on this side.

It is therefore with great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I move, seconded by my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar):

That Joseph Arthur Bradette, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cochrane, be appointed chairman of committees of the whole house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have listened with more than the usual degree of interest to the selection just announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the important position of Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole.

One point which strikes me at once, in connection with the recipient of this very important honour, is that he is one of our Canadian citizens who has come up the hard way of life. It is my belief that if we are going to pay tribute to men in public life we ought not to lose sight of the fact that a great many of our citizens have perhaps commenced their lives under circumstances such as those which surrounded the present recipient of this honour, and we should pay special tribute to those men who have come up the hard way, like the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), and have made a success of their lives.

I believe those of us who did not have the advantage of being born with silver spoons in our mouths appreciate more keenly the honour now conferred upon a member who has made his way up by dint of hard work, by industry, by integrity, by honesty, and by a close application to the objectives he had in mind. Not only has the hon. member for Cochrane had a number of occupations but, in addition to that, within the last few years I believe he has been called to the bar in Ontario. That perhaps, in the estimation of many hon. members, is the only thing that could be said against him.

There was a time before I entered the house when the leader who sat opposite my present seat was unmarried. At the same time there was a leader of the opposition who found himself in much the same plight, and also a leader of one of the third parties who was in that unfortunate position. At the beginning of this session the Prime Minister was good enough to make some reference to the growth of certain customs and practices which he hoped would not continue. I am hopeful that his choice of this bachelor member from Cochrane will not prove to be the beginning of the growth of a custom of which the Prime Minister himself is a devoted follower.

In paying this tribute this afternoon may I congratulate the Prime Minister upon having accepted, when making this appointment, the suggestion of a member in His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I believe it is the first time since the beginning of the session that he has not made a decision based entirely upon something brought up at the Winnipeg convention. Whether from His Honour the Speaker or from the Deputy Speaker, hon. members in His Majesty's Loyal Opposition ask only for justice, fairness and a square deal. If in a public way in his new post the hon. member for Cochrane carries on in the same way as he has while a private member in the chamber, we have reason to believe that we shall have nothing to fear from this appointment.

I congratulate the hon. member, and also the Prime Minister upon having accepted our selection upon this occasion. I hope this will not be the last occasion upon which he may be prompted to follow that procedure.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there is not much left to be said. I congratulate the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), and would add that we, too, are pleased with the appointment made this afternoon. Those of us who have been associated in various ways with the hon. member for Cochrane have grown to like him and to admire his many qualities. I am sure we shall have in our Chairman of Committees one who will follow your own example, if I may say so, and be fair at all times to all members of the house, wherever they may sit. I say to the hon. member that he has our good wishes and our heartiest congratulations.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, our group is well pleased with the selection which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made. Since first entering the house I have been impressed by the sincerity of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I have been impressed, too, by his earnestness, his industry and his desire to be fair. In the new position to which he has been appointed I believe he will show all of those qualities. I congratulate him, and extend to him from this group a hearty welcome, as he assumes the new responsibility placed upon him.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join the hon. members who have congratulated the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) on his appointment as Deputy Speaker of this house. My satisfaction is enhanced by the fact that I represent here the native constituency of the hon. member for Cochrane, for I believe he was born in St. Urbain, county of Charlevoix.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has with him the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year. Although no item appears on the order paper under which their reference to the committee might be made, if the house is agreeable the minister is prepared to table the estimates now and to have them immediately referred to the committee of supply which has just been constituted.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1943-44

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1944, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. ILSLEY moved that the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the total of the estimates this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know the answer at the moment. They are not at all comparable with those of last year on account of the addition of large sums for interest and payments to the provinces. I think the total is approximately $610,000,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any specific increase apart from those two or three items?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; decreases.

Motion agreed to.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved:

That a select committee of the house be appointed to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war, and all questions pertaining thereto; with power to such select committee to appoint, from among the members of the committee, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary, to deal with specific phases of the problems aforementioned, with power to said select committee and to such subcommittees as may be formed therefrom, to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and for such select committee to report from time to time to the house; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Authier, Bertrand (Prescott), Black (Cumberland), Brunelle, Castleden, Dupuis, Eudes, Ferron, Fraser (Northumberland), Gershaw, Gillis, Gray, Harris (Danforth), Hill, Jean, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacNicol, McDonald (Pontiac), McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), McNiven, Marshall, Martin, Matthews, Maybank, Mitchell, Nielsen (Mrs.), Poirier, Purdy, Quelch, Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Stirling, Turgeon, Tustin, White, and that the provisions of standing order 65, limiting the number of members on special committees, be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, outside matters having to do with the carrying on of the war, the appointment of this committee is the most important matter that can come before us at this session of parliament. The business of providing for the war effort itself and the work of preparing plans for the post-war period are simply two parts of the same problem. The committee which sat last year has not, as far as I can learn, made any recommendations to parliament. I believe that was a disappointment to the people throughout the country because they expected that the committee would bring in important recommendations which would help us to plan our economic and social life when this war is over. They were looking for something better than we had between the end of the last war and the beginning of this one.

My purpose in speaking this afternoon is not to criticize the minister under whose auspices this motion is made and this work comes; rather it is, if I can, to assist him by impressing upon the members of this house the importance of the work indicated in the motion before us. There are people who believe that all plannings of this kind should be left until the war is over; indeed there are two schools of thought in the country in regard to it.

One school is composed of those who say, "Let us get on with the war; let us defeat Hitler; nothing matters now but victory." I have no doubt that many such people have tried to get the ear of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). Members of parliament are receiving booklets and pronouncements along this line from many sources. However, there is as I say another school of thought which believes that the preparation of comprehensive plans for post-war problems now would be a help rather than a hindrance to our war effort. Such plans are bound to improve the morale of our people. On the other hand, the absence of such plans is certain to be a damper on the morale of our people. This second school also believes that there are other things besides victory that matter; that is, that a military victory is not enough.

The first school is not large but it is influential. It is composed of those in comfortable positions, those to whom the present system has been kind. Such people look backward, not forward. They are in deathly fear of any change because they believe that any change can be only detrimental to them. They are in mortal fear of social changes, and in a large measure it was this fear of social change that led us unwittingly into the present war. This school is satisfied with things as they are. They think that the proper thing to do when the war is over is to go back to the pre-war status quo as quickly as possible.

The second school of thought includes all forward-looking people, people who realize that the pre-war status quo does not exist, that it would be quite impossible to go back to it even if we wished. They are the people who see in this war something more than a war; they see it as a world-wide social revolution. I believe that in this group can be included the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), if I heard aright the statement he made during his speech on the address. In the same group we can include the President of the United States, who is insistent that the consideration and preparation of post-war plans should be a part of our work to-day. In his address at the opening of congress this year, President Roosevelt said:

> I have been told this is no time to speak of a better America after the war. I am told it is a great error on my part. I dissent. If this becomes a matter of national debate the people will know where I stand.

Nothing, I think, could show clearer than this statement where President Roosevelt stands on post-war planning.

As I said, people who believe that we should start planning now are the people who recognize that a military victory is not enough. They remember that we had a military victory in 1918. They also remember the few years of ruthless exploitation and world-wide speculation that followed the last war, and they also remember the years of hunger, of misery and of want. They do not want at the end of the present war to find us as unprepared as we were at the end of the last war. As a matter of fact, they are convinced, as I am convinced, that all that the common people got out of the last war is this war.

I want to tell the minister and hon. members that a great psychological change has taken place in the minds of our people since this war began. I may be asked what has caused that change. I think I can state the reasons as they appear to me very briefly.

First, the people see that money in abundance can be found for war, and they are asking, if money can be found for war, for destruction, why cannot money be found just as easily for the creation of wealth and the creation of health and comfort?

Second, they see that to-day, although we have in the armed forces approximately 700,000 men and women who are not producing at all, and in war industries some 900,000 who are producing but are not producing consumers' goods, not producing wealth, nevertheless the people of Canada are at the present time better fed and better clothed than they were at any time between 1929 and 1939. They are asking why this should be. They are asking why it is that we are fearful of what may happen when peace comes, when to-day, with 1,600,000 men and women taken out of active production, our people are enjoying a better standard of living than perhaps they ever enjoyed before.

Third, the people of Canada have been tremendously impressed, as have the people of the whole world, by the military achievements of the Soviet Union. They had been told by all of the best people that a planned economy could not work. Yet they have seen a practical demonstration of the fact that a planned economy does work. They may not see all its implications, any more than you or I, Mr. Speaker, can see them all; nevertheless the fact remains that a planned economy does work, and our men and women will demand that they do not come back to the anarchy in production that they left when they went into the armed forces. The men and women in the armed forces expect that Canada will have a new deal ready for them when they come back. And not only do the men and women in the armed forces expect that. The workers in our war industries, the workers in our forests, the workers in our mines, the workers in our fisheries, the workers on our farms, expect that Canada will have a new deal, a new plan ready for them when this war is over.

If we do not begin now to prepare those plans, if we do not show the people that we are doing something now; if we do not give them tangible evidence of our sincerity in the matter, then there can be only one result. They will grow hopeless; they will become cynical; they will become defeatists; and when people get into that state, their minds become a fertile soil for every sort of screwball idea that may be offered to them.

A few days ago it was said in this chamber that the fall of France was caused by the multiplicity of the political parties which had grown up in that country. But that is a very superficial view of the situation in France in 1940. What caused the multiplicity of political parties? France fell so easily as a result of the greed of a few at the top, and the hopelessness and cynicism, and lack of faith of the masses of the people in their own ability to do anything. What the government of this country must do is not just to prepare plans but to take the people of Canada into its confidence and with their cooperation begin to make plans for the manifold problems which will confront us when this war is over. I suggest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health that he hurry the preparation of such plans with all possible speed.

I quote a short paragraph from a speech made by a great statesman, General Jan Christian Smuts, on June 28, 1919, at the signing of the treaty of Versailles.

> Our allied peoples must remember that God gave them overwhelming victory, victory far beyond their greatest dreams, not for small, selfish ends, not for financial or economic advantages, but for the attainment of the great human ideals for which our heroes gave their lives, and which are the real factors in this war of ideals.

We should begin now to prepare plans which will indicate to the men and women in our armed forces that we appreciate the ideals for which they are prepared to give their lives, and that we shall not allow the victory which they will win for us on the military front to be debased to selfish ends.

As I mentioned before, the servants of privilege are already busy planning. Anything which the government of Canada will do will be done openly; everybody will know that we are doing it. But the plans of big business are generally formulated in secret. I have in my hands a page from the Financial Post of December 26, 1942. In it is an article by Horace T. Hunter, President of the Maclean Publishing Company Limited. In regard to post-war planning he has this to say:

> The war has given private enterprise what may be its last chance to prove itself.
> If private enterprise fails when the crisis comes—and that will be after the war—it will be replaced.

Replaced by what? Nobody knows. Bureaucracy, governmental control and ownership, confusion and chaos seem likely answers.

Horace T. Hunter of course assumes that private enterprise has not already failed. If private enterprise did not fail between 1929 and 1939, what was it that failed? He goes on:

> Realization that this crisis lies ahead is driving the leading businesses of the United States into a brand new field of economics—post-war planning.
> So important do these corporations regard the field of post-war planning that some of them are assigning vice-presidents and other officials to research on this task as a full-time job.
> The researchers are faced with stupendous problems. They must get business away from its too individualistic past. They must prepare to assume leadership and coordination of effort on major questions. They must see to it that private enterprise has a broader conception of its duty to the community. They know that they cannot dream of returning to the thirty or forty per cent production which pertained in the 1930's.

Mr. Hunter did not tell us why thirty to forty per cent production obtained in the 'thirties. He stated a fact without giving reasons, but the same reasons will apply in the 'forties, if we are lucky enough to finish the war during that period; it will apply at any time under the present system. Thirty and forty per cent production was inevitable because private enterprise, if you want to call it that—it is not that to-day; it is corporate enterprise—is not interested in industry as the means of producing the largest possible quantity of consumers' goods; it is interested in profit; and production was limited to thirty and forty per cent in order to reduce the amount of goods available and to maintain prices.

An hon. member undertook to tell the house the other day why Roosevelt's new deal policies failed. He said it was because the President, not satisfied with promoting public works and that sort of thing, went into various kinds of private business. But the hon. gentleman who told us that did not tell us that Roosevelt did not take office until March, 1933. He did not tell us that between 1929 and 1933 the whole economy of the United States had come to a standstill and business men were praying for someone to come along and start the wheels of industry going. Oh, yes, if you interfere with business you will destroy confidence! In one October day in 1929 on the New York stock exchange fourteen billion dollars, it is said, were lost. What destroyed confidence then? Private business never had such a free hand. But that is the inevitable result of anarchy.

I want to bring the house a little nearer home. There came into my hands a few days ago the report of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines on business in the first year of operation. This report appeared in the Montreal Gazette of January 2, and is by L. B. Unwin, President of Canadian Pacific Air Lines. He mentions that in 1942, the first year of operation, Canadian Pacific Air Lines flew approximately six million scheduled aeroplane miles. Air cargo reached, he says, the record total of close to ten million pounds, and consisted largely of military and air defence shipments; in fact, ninety per cent of the total traffic handled by Canadian Pacific Air Lines was in connection with the war effort. Then he says:

In addition to its transport operations the company is the largest single civilian organization connected with the British commonwealth air training plan and operates, on a non-profit basis, six of a total of nine air observer schools, and one elementary flying training school.

This is significant, because for a year or more after the beginning of the war Canadian Pacific Air Lines was not in the air travel business at all and was not operating any schools, either observer or flying schools. He goes on.

It also manages five engine overhaul and aircraft repair plants under contract to the Department of Munitions and Supply for the overhaul and repair of R.C.A.F. equipment. These establishments are spread across Canada and combined with the air transport services, are providing the nation with indispensable air facilities so necessary for the prosecution of a successful war effort.

I will now read the last paragraph of this significant report:

While the airplane to-day is an integral part of our war-time mechanism, it should not be overlooked that commercial aviation is destined to play a major role in reshaping a post-war world. In this regard the Canadian Pacific, as a long-established world-wide transport system, will undoubtedly through the extension of its air operations take its natural place in the development of world trade and travel routes to meet the almost unpredictable demands of the coming air age.

Here is a private company that has obtained control of a business that developed solely out of the country's war effort; and after the war we shall have this additional vested interest in our transport system with which to deal, just as we had another vested interest that prevented a solution of our transportation problems previously.

I want to say a few words in regard to this "private enterprise" about which we hear so much. No doubt those people who are so much afraid of government interference will approach the minister and, as I said before, try to get him to go slow with anything in the way of national planning by the federal government. I would advise him not to listen to any blandishments of that kind. If he will read the speech delivered by his leader, Canada's Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to the American Federation of Labor on October 9, 1941, I think he will find plenty of justification for going ahead with preparations of plans that will prevent chaos at the end of the war. I should like to quote two or three short paragraphs from the Prime Minister's speech. If hon. gentlemen opposite have not read it, I would suggest that they do so. If they have read it already, I would suggest that they read it again. The right hon. gentleman said:

I believe the war is teaching us that the obstacles to full employment were not real obstacles; that a partnership of management, of workers and of the community can make useful work available, in time of peace no less than in time of war, for all who need or want to work.

I should like to call attention to the words, " not real obstacles," and to the statement that the obstacles to full employment were not real. If they were not real obstacles they were phoney obstacles, and by his own words the Prime Minister has convicted himself of allowing phoney obstacles to stand in the way of full employment in this country at least from 1936 up to the beginning of the war. Then he went on:

But the work of repairing and restoring the ravages of war will not be enough. Fortunately, we are also learning that the only limit to our productive capacity is the limit of our resources, and our will and skill to use them to satisfy human need instead of human greed.

I should like to ask hon. members opposite if they think private enterprise, operating to make profits for shareholders, will have in mind "that the only limit to productive capacity is the limit of our resources, and our skill and will to use them to satisfy human need instead of human greed?" If you are going to leave the economy of this country on the old basis, which do you think will come first—human need or private greed? There is no doubt at all about the answer to that question. The answer has always been the same and will continue to be the same.

I have just one other quotation from the Prime Minister's speech. I am going to all this trouble because I am not sure that my hon. friends opposite have read it:

The war has shown us that the way of monopoly, of unrestricted power, is a way that leads to destruction, desolation and death. The only path of prosperity and of peace is, I believe, the path of equality, of cooperation, and of human brotherhood.

Well, do you think you can get equality, cooperation and human brotherhood from the people who are using the newspapers so freely to advertise differences between themselves and their employees; from people who vilify persons and groups who attempt to organize the workers; from people who under no circumstances will allow their employees a voice, not in the management of the industry, but even in determining the conditions under which they will sell their labour?

I want to quote a few short paragraphs from one of the most widely reviewed books on economics that has come to my notice for a long time. The book is entitled, "Conditions of Peace," and the author is Edward Hallett Carr, professor of international politics in the university college of Wales. I understand he is also an editorial writer on the London Times. In the two or three quotations that I am going to give he deals with the question of individualism and collectivism. He shows clearly that if ever there was any such thing as private enterprise it no longer exists. On page 71 he says:

> The classical economists presupposed a society of independent, fully enlightened and completely mobile individuals, each acting for himself, possessed of equal bargaining power, and equally interested in the economic system as producers and consumers. This hypothesis was never even approximately realized.

He continues:

> The hypothesis of a vast society of equal, independent and mobile individuals was falsified to an ever-increasing extent. The individual counted less and less. The forces which dominated production and distribution and exercised a preponderant influence in the economic "society" were a few highly organized interest-groups, growing ever larger and more powerful. What is commonly referred to "individual enterprise" has been destroyed not, as its advocates sometimes pretend, by "socialism" or by the interference of grandmotherly governments but by the innate trend of competitive capitalism towards monopoly.

What have the advocates of private enterprise to say to that? One more quotation:

> The issue miscalled individualism v. collectivism is not really the question whether economic enterprise should be controlled by the federal government or by men like Mr. Ford, but whether it should be controlled by a corporation responsible to the federal government or by some other equally collective, but not responsible, organization such as General Motors, Bethlehem Steel or Southern Utilities. "The choice . . . is not between competition and monopoly, but between a monopoly which is irresponsible and private and a monopoly which is responsible and public."

That is the alternative, not only for this government but for every government in every democratic country in the world. So-called private enterprise no longer exists. We have corporate enterprise, which is an altogether different thing, controlling ever larger and larger aggregates of capital, so that ultimately they control governments. With these facts before us may we not at this time go ahead in earnest to prepare the plans that are necessary to meet those problems which will confront us after the war?

Before taking my seat I should like to quote one more short paragraph from this book. Mr. Carr ends his book with this:

> The old world is dead. The future lies with those who can resolutely turn their back on it and face the new world with understanding, courage and imagination.

Now, just a last word to the minister and to those who will be with him on the committee. When this war is over either we shall be ready with a plan, some sort of a planned economy, or we shall have turmoil, planned and unplanned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow in the vein of the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis) who preceded me. During all the days of my working manhood I was associated with that devoted portion of our population known as the working class. I was glad to belong to them. I am happy indeed that after perhaps twenty years as a worker in industry I can say I never in that time came in contact with the type of employer to which the hon. member referred. The men with whom I came in contact were Christian gentlemen who spent their lives in trying to build up this country. I knew many of them who, year in and year out, did not receive a dollar on the investments they had; and I knew many more who delighted beyond measure in foregoing their profits, so that the companies with which they were associated could increase their size and thereby give more jobs. All my working life I have been one of those who have been firmly devoted to doing what I could to provide men with employment. I am one who believes that God intended that men and women born to this life should, in the days in which they were able to work, have an opportunity to do so, and that they should have that opportunity at a remuneration sufficient not only to take care of themselves and their families but to provide a competence for their older days. I am convinced of that.

So that to-night, while I rise to support the motion of the minister, what I have to say will be in reference to giving jobs. The resolution goes some distance in that direction, but whether or not it is all-embracing is not for me to say. I am convinced it is the minister's intention to have it all-embracing, and I am convinced the minister intends that when the war is over, soldiers not remaining in the army, and munitions workers released from their employment shall have jobs.

Being convinced of that, I am going to try briefly—because it is not my intention to speak at length—to state why I believe jobs can be given. What will be the problems with which the government will be faced? Almost overnight—because I was through it, and I know—the first problem will develop. I saw it in 1918, and I must say I cannot see any picture when this war closes different from that which followed in 1918, as far as industrial plants are concerned.

First, let us consider the government's own huge plants. Does anyone in the house think for a moment that the gun plants will continue to make guns; that the shell plants will continue to make shells; that the shell factories in which the shells are filled with powder will continue in operation? I do not think so; I cannot see why they should. But I can see why those employed in the plants should be given some other place to go.

The same applies to the soldiers. They will not all come home at once. I remember very well that in the winter following the armistice of 1918, and during the following spring, troops were coming home to Toronto. They are not all going to be dismissed immediately. Some of them may be kept overseas to maintain order in countries where there may be possibilities of disturbances.

But the problem of the soldier is not as immediate as that of the munition worker and other industrialists. Those in any way associated with industry, or the provision of products used in industry, will be the first to require being taken care of. After that will come the heroes, when they arrive home. That is the problem.

How will that problem be met? I have heard people say that we cannot lift ourselves by our boot-straps. I have heard others say the government cannot provide jobs. I shall not say anything about lifting ourselves by our boot-straps, but I do say the government can and should provide jobs to take up the slack, until normalcy returns. I do not mean by that that men should be set at digging post-holes into which posts will never be placed, or moving sand piles from this side of the road to the other side. I do not believe in anything like that. No; I believe in a sound, economic employment, and I am sure there is ample and full opportunity for all in Canada.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I shall touch on only a few—a very few—of what I believe are sound economic jobs. In last night's Evening Telegram, published in Toronto, I find pictures depicting the overflow of the Etobicoke river, which flows through the riding of my house leader, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). That overflow developed from melted snow and ice. I have seen severe floods on that little river, but it has never had a real flood yet. However the time is coming when not only the Etobicoke but every other river in Canada subject to flood may have a real flood.

We do not know much about floods in Canada, although I believe in Quebec, along the Chaudière, there has been some loss of life and property, and that may have occurred along some other rivers in that province. There may have been some loss, too, in Ontario and in western Canada. But no place in Canada as yet has had a flood such as that which is likely to come. I have in mind one flood that almost wiped out the city of Dayton, Ohio, a beautiful city known to many hon. members. There had been floods on the Miami river in Ohio all through the years, from the time of the earliest settlers. In 1905 they had a severe flood, but the loss of life was insignificant and property damage amounted to only a million or two of dollars. They had further floods prior to 1913. God gave them ample warning that there might come a time when they would have real floods. That time came, and they had a frightful flood in 1913.

What happened? Four hundred and sixteen people were drowned in the city of Dayton, Ohio, and property to the value of $100,000,000 was destroyed. When one is told that in that city water thirty feet deep was running down the main street it makes him stop to think what can happen. The watershed of the Miami is not a great deal larger than that of the Thames in Ontario. But everything synchronized in 1913. They had a fall of rain over the whole watershed which lasted for four days, the greatest rainfall in their history, and a total of from five to six inches of rain fell. The Miami river valley was never intended to carry off a flood like that; it could not and did not. The result was that it carried 416 people to their graves and did, as I say, $100,000,000 damage. This woke up the state of Ohio and the government of the United States and they flood-proofed the Miami river. Since that time there has been no flood on that river to cause any damage, although there have been two or three occasions when the rainfall was just as heavy as it was at the time of the great 1913 flood. While it cost $30,000,000, in my judgment that was a self-liquidating project. Look at what they have saved since then. They have saved probably half a billion dollars in possible damages and perhaps a thousand lives.

So that I say to the minister that any programme of flood-proofing our rivers should be proceeded with without any hesitancy because such jobs liquidate themselves. They cost nothing. They have had other floods in the United States. They had a great flood on the Muskingum river in Ohio. I have been all over these rivers and have surveyed the flood control works. Tremendous damage was done at Zanesville, Ohio, and I believe nearly 1,000 lives were lost. But there cannot be a repetition of that damage to-day on the Muskingum river. There have been many great rains since that time, but no damage has occurred because the river is flood-proofed. In other words, they have more than saved the cost of doing this work, not to mention the saving in human life.

The pictures in the Toronto Telegram are of a small river in Ontario, but small rivers can rise to tremendous heights in a short time and cause considerable damage. I visited Fond du Lac, at the south end of lake Winnebago in Wisconsin. The watershed of the little river running through the town into the lake covers only 210 square miles. The people in the community did not accept the warning that God sent them that the day would come when there would be a real flood. Fond du Lac itself covers a little less than seven square miles; I think about 6·7 square miles. A cloudburst occurred; there were great rains for several days and the whole watershed was covered with water to the extent of 2·75 inches. Hon. members can compute the number of cubic feet this would mean. The result was that that little town had to provide an outlet into the lake for 1,342,000,000 cubic feet of water. Of course, there was no place for the water to go, and the result was the town was submerged to the extent of seven feet. They got busy and prepared plans, but I have not been there since to see how those plans have been carried out. I understand the cost of the works would be about $300,000, but it would be money well spent; it would be a self-liquidating project.

I do not want to take up too much time on this matter because it is not necessary. The government has in its possession the figures on the cost of flood-proofing rivers because it was a party to the flood-proofing of the Grand river in western Ontario. In fact I brought up that matter in this house long before it was brought up anywhere else. I never looked for any credit for doing that. I was invited to the opening of the dam but I did not go. I like to assist in having a thing done, but I look for no glory. There is no glory in this world worth going after, but while we are here we should try to do our best to make this a better place for others to live in. As I say, the government has the figures on the flood-proofing of the Grand river.

I believe this government paid 37½ per cent of the cost of the Shand dam, a magnificent structure located a few miles north of the town of Fergus. I noticed yesterday that they had let the water out of that dam in preparation for any possible flooding that might occur. If one dam will flood-proof that whole area, the Shand dam should do it. Then the Ontario government also paid 37½ per cent of the cost, and the municipalities paid the remaining 25 per cent. I think that is a fair division, although it is not the division they used in the United States. I have not the figures before me for the Ohio project, but I understand that the federal government paid 63 per cent while the municipalities paid 11 per cent of the cost, and the state government and the utility companies, such as the telephone, electric light and railway companies, paid the remainder.

This country has had a warning of what may happen on the Thames river. I have made an exhaustive survey of this river on more than one occasion. There are some fine towns on its different branches. There are Woodstock, Ingersoll and other communities on the south branch. On the north branches there are Stratford and St. Mary's. In 1937 a number of these communities were almost wiped out. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Sanderson) will remember what happened in Stratford when the beautiful park was almost wiped off the map and everything sent down the river. I do not know whether any lives were lost at that time, but I believe there were some lost at Ingersoll where a train was taken off the tracks, lock, stock and barrel, wheels, caboose and everything else, and thrown in the river. I have forgotten how many lives were lost but I believe there were a number. That should not be permitted to occur in these days, particularly when we are trying to find means whereby men can be put to work immediately after the war. This could be done at really no cost at all to the country, because the expenditure that was made would be saved by the prevention of losses in further floods.

The Thames river has risen to colossal heights west of London. It has overflowed its banks to a height of forty feet. It has flowed all over adjacent land in the county of Kent and right up on to the main streets of Chatham and Thamesville. That occurred in 1937. But mark you, Mr. Speaker, in the flood of 1937 the crests of the floods on the north and south branches of the river did not synchronize. The south branch of the river rose to the colossal flow of 43·03 cubic feet per second per square mile of watershed, and it overflowed the whole course of that branch of the river. Had the crest on the north branch of the river synchronized with the crest on the south branch, the whole of south London might have been wiped out. As it was, the whole of south London was under several feet of water. I do know how many people, if any, were drowned in that flood; but I do know that every farm, every village and every hamlet west of London along the river suffered grievously. Had the crests of the floods on the two branches of the river synchronized, it would have made a flood of 47·033 cubic feet per second flowing through south London, and space is not there to take care of that volume of water. Why should the minister not have his engineers commence making surveys at once and a programme outlined for flood-proofing the Thames river which flows through a very rich and thickly settled country? That is one project which I recommend. Whether the committee will be able to recommend specific projects I do not know. I hope the minister will see that the committee is given the power to make specific concrete recommendations of projects at which men can be put to work. The Thames flood-proofing could be done at a cost of $1,600,000 and would provide four months work for three thousand men. That would be a very nice start at least, and would help to take up the slack. That is only one river. There are many others where flood-proofing and improvement work could be done.

I will mention one other little river, the Ganaraska river, in the county of Durham. It has a pretty small watershed of ninety square miles, but a tremendous amount of water can flow over that area. I have seen the Ganaraska overflow right up to the St. Lawrence hotel on the main street in the town of Port Hope, and that is quite a distance. It flowed over the whole lower end of the town of Port Hope and caused a vast amount of damage. The same with the Etobicoke in the riding of my hon. friend the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). In his riding is the substantial town of Brampton, than which there is no more beautiful town in the whole province. But that fine town stands in jeopardy every day of the spring through the possible overflowing of the Etobicoke river. I have seen that river, as my hon. friend has, flow down the main street of Brampton. The overflowing hitherto has been caused by the melting of snow and ice. They have never yet had a cloudburst there. If they had one the damage would be colossal. The watershed north of Brampton has an area of twenty-five square miles that could produce over 160,000,000 cubic feet of water in a flood like that which took place at Fond du Lac, and there is no place in the river bed at Brampton for that volume of water to pass through.

I will leave with the minister for his consideration the suggestions I have made for a programme of flood-proofing the rivers that flow through our fine towns and cities. It would be a means of providing a large amount of employment, and it would be self-liquidating work. All the figures with respect to the Grand river, for instance, could be readily obtained by the minister through the responsible department, and they could tell at once how many men were employed in improving the Grand watershed.

I want to make another suggestion. I was away up on the Slave river, and at Fort Fitzgerald we were invited to get out of the boat and make a portage of eighteen miles to Fort Smith. Canada has possessed that area ever since 1870. What have we done for it since 1870? As far as I can see, not a single, solitary mortal thing as to improved navigation. There is quite a considerable amount of traffic down that river, up to 50,000 tons during the summer months, and if the river were cleaned out and the traffic speeded up, there is no reason why the tonnage would not increase materially. That is one place where we could build a marine railway. The same applies to the Peace river at Vermilion chutes. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons) goes there every summer to see his constituents and he is well aware of what I am speaking. From Hudson Hope on the Peace river to Vermilion chutes is about 600 miles, and from there to where the river flows into the Slave river is another 300 miles. There are 900 miles of a magnificent river flowing through the riding of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), the riding of the hon. member for Peace River and on to the Slave. The only obstruction in that whole distance of 900 miles is that little bit of obstruction at Vermilion chutes, which is not over four miles long, counting in the falls and the rapids. Why could men not be sent to canal around that obstruction? It is a job that has waited ever since 1870. If this work were done and a canal on the Slave were constructed, boats could sail from Hudson Hope right down to Aklavik, a distance of nearly 3000 miles. Here is a chance to do something which in the end would cost this country nothing, because it would open up that great country which is filled to overflowing with incomparable resources the like of which is to be found nowhere else in the world.

One further thought and I will close. I said a moment ago that I have been through the riding of my hon. friend the member for Cariboo. I went as far west last summer as Hudson Hope and a little bit further. I hope that he will urge as strongly as he can, and I will support him, that a roadway be built on the north side of the Peace river right through his riding so that traffic can pass on the north side of the Peace river all the way through to connect with the roadway to Prince Rupert. That would require the opening of a road from Fort St. John to Hudson Hope, to Bullhead mountain, where the great coal mine is, and past Goldbar to Manson Creek. I hope the chairman of the committee will be able to persuade the committee to recommend the construction of these and similar projects which will provide work for quite a large number of men and will not cost the country anything because they will be self-liquidating projects. That is only one road.

I do not want to prolong my remarks. But flood proofing, the building of roads, and, perhaps, assistance to navigation can all be done as government works, and all, in my judgment, are self-liquidating. All would require a great deal of labour and would employ men with various kinds of training—engineers, concrete mixers, builders, carpenters, drivers, truck drivers, those who make cement, those who make the steel which enters into construction, etcetera. The ramifications are almost endless. That in my judgment would be a plan to follow.

I have tried to lift the debate a little by presenting something concrete. I am here for only one purpose, to try to help this country, and for nothing else. There is nothing in it for me personally. But while I am here I want to lift my voice at all times on behalf of projects which will provide jobs for the multitude to whom I belong, the working class. Consideration for them comes first with me, because I have been with them, worked with them, and know them. I have shared their joys and their sorrows; and there are no finer people in the world.

I offer these few thoughts as suggestions to the minister. If he views them favourably I should appreciate it very much if he would instruct the chairman of the committee—and we have a good chairman—to bring in concrete, definite proposals. That is the only thing in the resolution which I am not sure has been made clear, and if there is any doubt I should like to have it clarified. I want definite directions to the chairman to bring in concrete proposals, so that when the war ceases, plans will be ready to send five hundred men here, a thousand men there, and to notify this contractor and that producer to have this and that ready.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I am glad that the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment has been appointed in the early days of the session, because I am of opinion that our plans for post-war reconstruction should be pushed at this time with the utmost vigour. If the united nations can convince the peoples of occupied Europe of our sincerity as regards a new order and a new world, this may help materially to shorten the war. Our reason for pushing forward plans at this time should be two-fold: first, to reassure the people of Europe that we are sincere when we talk of a new world; and, second, that we may be ready at the end of the war to move from a war-time to a peace-time economy as smoothly as possible.

I hope that it may be possible at this session for the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment to come to grips with the real problems which confront us. In the past this committee has dealt with a number of very interesting points. We dealt, for instance, with the question of nutrition, and we were told by Dr. Thomson of McGill university that if the people of this country were given a balanced diet it would be possible greatly to increase the consumption of agricultural products; I think he said we could double the consumption of many of them. An interesting point in that regard is that we were perfectly well aware in the years from 1935 to 1939 that if the Canadian people were to have a balanced diet it would be necessary to increase their consumption of agricultural products. We have the agricultural products, but we did not take steps at that time to make that balanced diet available to the people; and in the committee we did not discuss ways and means by which that balanced diet might be made available, whereby it might be possible for the people of Canada to secure those products. For it is not merely the unemployed who are in that position; there are great numbers of people in this country in the low income brackets who are suffering from a low standard of living.

We also discussed at some length the development of the resources of this country:

it was a very interesting subject. To me the main point of interest is, what will you do with your increased production resulting from the increased development of your resources? How will you market the increased production from the increased development of those resources? That has been the problem of the past and that, undoubtedly, will be the main problem of the future.

We knew in the past—we knew in the depression years—that Canada possesses great resources which could be developed. We had the unemployed available, but we did not develop those resources. Why? Because we knew very well that, if we did, we would not be able to sell the resulting production.

In my opinion it is nonsense to talk about full employment unless at the same time ways and means are found to market the increased production resulting from that increased employment. No industry can continue to expand its production unless at the same time it can expand its markets. That has been the problem of the past. That was the main problem of all industrialized nations up to the beginning of this war. It was especially the problem of Canada from the last war up to the beginning of the present one, especially from 1930 to 1939. During that period we had industries running at only a small percentage of their capacity. There were hundreds of thousands of unemployed; yet industry could not sell its limited production. At the same time over a million people were on relief, and in that million we had a great potential market. They represented a physical demand, but a physical demand cannot absorb goods unless it is backed up by money. In other words, that demand was not an effective demand and therefore industry was not in a position to expand its production.

That problem, I think everyone will agree, was national and internal. Unfortunately the government refused to recognize it as such and tried to internationalize it by dumping it on the doorstep of other nations. I say that for this reason. From 1935 to 1939 this country maintained on an average a favourable balance of payments amounting to $218,000,000 annually, the idea being no doubt that the money paid out in the production of that wealth which was exported abroad and for which we accepted no imports in return would help to maintain an effective demand against the production of the country which was left, internally.

My greatest condemnation of a policy of this kind is that there can be no justification for exporting more wealth out of the country than you import at the same time that you have hundreds of thousands of people in your country in a state of destitution, as we had from 1935 to 1939, when a million were on relief.

I should like to quote from a statement made by the London chamber of commerce in this regard. I have here a copy of the report put out by the chamber on "General Principles of a Post-War Economy." It is dated May 12, 1942. The London chamber of commerce has a direct membership of nine thousand firms and an approximate affiliated membership of fifty thousand; it is probably the greatest organization of its kind to be found anywhere in the world. This is what they have to say regarding the practice of maintaining a favourable balance of trade in payments. I want to quote sections 19 to 21, which read:

> 19. If some nations have "favourable" balances it necessarily follows that others have "unfavourable" ones. The successful nations get others into unpayable debt. The reward of success being power over other nations, and the penalty for failure economic servitude, the struggle for a "favourable" balance has largely obscured, in the eyes of the nations, the real purpose of international trade. It has accordingly degenerated into a desperate financial war.
> 20. It is an obvious absurdity that nations should regard it as necessary to export their real wealth, not for the purpose of paying for imports, but in order to solve their domestic unemployment problem by passing it on to other countries. Exports with this end in view are nothing more nor less than an excuse for distributing wages to people who otherwise would be unemployed. This purpose would be equally well served if the goods were to be thrown into the sea or if the people were to be employed to dig holes and to fill them up again.
> 21. When, however, it is remembered that even wealthy nations have a large percentage of their population under-fed, ill-clothed and ill-housed, it is clear that these would be the best recipients of this alleged surplus wealth. What is necessary is to improve the technique for the internal provision of money, so as to convert this human demand into effective demand.

That used to be England's policy prior to the last great war, and it was Canada's policy prior to the present war. In the foreword to this report it is interesting to note that consideration that was given to the framework within which the work of reconstruction should be carried on. I think the committee of this house might very well take this matter into consideration also. The foreword reads:

> A special committee was appointed by the council of the London chamber of commerce, on the 10th March, 1942, to consider and report on post-war reconstruction. That special committee took the view that it could not usefully consider the many secondary problems which would arise, both in the period of transition from war to peace and in the subsequent period, without first ascertaining the view of the council upon the framework within which the future economic system should be built. The special committee therefore submitted the enclosed preliminary report dealing with these questions of major policy.

The report was received and adopted by the council at its meeting on the 12th May, 1942, and the special committee was congratulated and requested to make a further report on the assumption that the detailed problems which will face the nation at the end of hostilities will call for solution within the framework here envisaged.

Just what is the framework within which our committee will work? For instance, does anyone really believe that this new social order can be built on the foundation of a debt-creating capitalistic system? If anyone believes there is any possible chance of building a new world on that basis I think it might be well for him to remember the words of the general manager of the bank of Montreal back in 1938. This is what Mr. Spinney said at that time:

Canada's debt burden is gradually lowering the general standard of living.

Since the beginning of the war the rate of growth of our debt has been greatly accelerated, and by the end of the war our debt will be very much greater than it was at the time Mr. Spinney made that statement. The burden of the debt in 1938 was such as to lower the standard of living of the Canadian people. How much greater will be the danger of our debt lowering the standard of living after the war, when our debt will have reached a far greater figure. The danger will be that at the end of the war expenditures will be restricted to meet debt charges, at the very time when expenditures should be made in order to meet the needs of post-war reconstruction. I was very much interested in a dispatch which appeared in the press to-day concerning a discussion that took place in the House of Lords, where the Beveridge report was being discussed. One of the lords, a former Canadian, opposed the Beveridge report on the ground that at the end of this war England's debt in all probability will have reached the sum of one hundred billion dollars, and that the first charge against the wealth of England would be the interest charged on that debt. That is something which we might well keep in mind in this country, because there will be plenty of people, even right in this house, who will talk about the sacredness of the written contract and will suggest that the first charge against our production at the end of the war must be the interest charged on the debt we are accumulating to-day.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that if we are going to build a new world order it must be upon a firmer foundation than a debt-creating system such as we have had in the past, which is putting us under a burden of unpayable debt, which in turn will bring forth retorts such as the one I have just mentioned. Consequently I believe, as the London chamber of commerce states, that before you can sit down and give any serious consideration to a problem like post-war reconstruction, you must know the framework within which you are operating. That is why several times in the committee last year I said I felt that we were floundering, that we were travelling a road which went we knew not where, and that we did not know how we were going to travel it. In my opinion, first of all we should decide upon our objective; then we should decide upon the main obstacles to achieving that objective, and finally we should decide upon the ways and means of removing those obstacles. That was the way in which we always dealt with problems in the army in the last war, and I suppose that is the way in which problems are dealt with in the army in this war, but no doubt that is altogether too direct an approach for this government to take.

What is our objective? Many people say that our objective to-day is full employment; yet the same people will disagree as to the purpose of that full employment. I see the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) is in his seat. I do not doubt for one moment that he would say the purpose of full employment is to put everyone at work and guarantee them a subsistence allowance. Supposing we had a steam shovel, requiring six men to operate it, and in the same vicinity we had another twenty men who were idle. I do not doubt that the hon. member for Brant would advocate that we should set the steam shovel to one side and put the twenty-six men at work with picks and shovels and wheelbarrows in order to give them employment, and pay them a subsistence allowance. I say I do not doubt the hon. member for Brant would agree to that, because that was the attitude he adopted toward the agricultural problem two years ago. He criticized the farmers for operating tractors and said they should go back to horses. We could put everyone at work if we scrapped modern machinery; if they did too much work with shovels we could give them teaspoons instead, and certainly then we could put everyone to work. But I say that is a nonsensical approach and one which must be entirely discredited. Any time you start to put aside the advances of science in the form of great machines, you begin to lower the standard of living of the people. We want to use all the machines we have and all our man-power to run those machines, for the express purpose of giving everyone an optimum standard of living. Therefore I would say that full employment must be for the purpose of providing an optimum standard of living for the people. If our objective is optimum production rather than full employment then we shall have to use modern machines, and not do as we did during the depression. On many occasions I saw from twenty to forty men cutting down hillsides when steam shovels were available in the vicinity. I have seen men put at digging ditches just in order to put the men to work when a digging machine was there to do the work. That is why I am so bitterly opposed to anyone saying that our objective is to put everyone to work. That is not our objective at all; the objective is to provide everyone in the country with the highest possible standard of living.

What are the main obstacles in the way of achieving that objective? On account of certain practices inherent in the capitalistic system industry does not and cannot maintain an effective demand for its own production, except in times of abnormal capital goods construction such as in war time, such as we have to-day. In proof of that, although I need not give any proof, I quote from a national survey of potential production of the United States, 1934-35, under the Hoover administration, under the chairmanship of Doctor Harold Loeb. He wrote a book entitled "A Chart of Plenty", dealing with this report. At page 71 there appears this statement:

> The total national monetary income in 1929 did not equal the total price asked for the goods which could have been produced by the plant then existing. But instead of dropping prices until monetary income was able to command full production (which is the classical answer to this situation), prices were maintained and production was restricted. Consequently, national monetary income did not in 1929, nor does it to-day, command the full production of our industrial plant. Which is another way of saying that the national income was not what it should have been. In fact, since 1929, the national monetary income has been commanding an ever-decreasing volume of consumer goods and the actual national income has become but a fraction of the possible national income.

Then on page 78 he says:

> The whole problem really comes down to the first proposal—in other words, to buying power. At present, production is curtailed to meet a grossly inadequate buying-power. An efficiently managed society would consciously and scientifically adjust its economic mechanisms so that buying power would always command full desirable production.

I do not want to spend much time in dealing with the cause of that situation. In passing, I might say it is quite obvious that since the machine has displaced men the wages that used to be paid to the men are now being paid to the owners of the machine, and the incomes of the machine owners have become so great that they cannot spend their total incomes. Also the practice of charging profits into prices without distributing the wherewithal to pay it and the practice of paying old debts out of current income—all these things cause lack of purchasing power. I do not want to take time to go into those matters in detail. But I say that as a result of that there has not been maintained in this country or in any of the capitalistic nations an effective demand against the production of the country; and unless you have an effective demand against the production you are bound to curtail production.

I wish to discuss for a few minutes ways and means by which that obstacle can be overcome. If we are prepared to admit that our main objective is optimum production, and that the main obstacle to achieving that objective is lack of effective demand, then obviously the solution is in equating demand to supply instead of, as in the past, trying to reduce supply to demand. Doctor Loeb puts it quite simply on page 161 of his report when he states:

> It would seem that a simple and obvious way out, that of giving buying power adequate to procure desired goods and services to the limit of our ability to produce them might well be tried. It is simple in principle but has not been attempted.

The London chamber of commerce in the report to which I have already referred also deals with this problem in sections 24 and 25:

> 24. After the last war there was more skilled labour in the world, more capital equipment, and more developed sources of raw material than at the beginning. The world was therefore potentially richer. Instead, however, of equating effective demand with supply—even using it to stimulate supply—capital equipment was scrapped, the output of raw material limited or destroyed, and millions of men were prevented from producing; in some cases they were paid not to produce.
> 25. Instead of trying to equate supply with effective demand, the chamber advocates that, in future, effective demand should be equated with supply. There can be no such thing as general over-production, of which complaint was made after the last war, although of course there can be over-production of a particular commodity in relation to others. The real trouble is under-consumption.

With a view to preparing plans for the post-war period a conference was held at Edmonton last December. At that conference the following resolution was passed dealing with the subject to which I have just referred.

Mr. MARTIN: A conference of what?

Mr. QUELCH: On post-war reconstruction.

Mr. MARTIN: But who were they?

Mr. QUELCH: A general meeting was called, everyone being invited to it; people from different classes, farmer and labour organizations etcetera were invited. This is a resolution passed at that conference:

1. That a complete survey should be made forthwith to ascertain the nature and volume of the products of industry which will be required by the Canadian people following the war to rehabilitate themselves, and to raise their standard of living to the level which our natural resources can consistently maintain.

2. That a complete survey of Canadian war industries be made to determine the adaptability of each to the production of those peace-time requirements, and to plan and prepare the steps necessary to bring about that conversion in each case at the end of the war.

3. That a survey be made of the possible foreign markets which may be available at the end of the war, and the part which Canadian industry should play in the rehabilitation of those countries whose industries have been destroyed or disorganized as a result of the war.

I suggest that surveys of that kind should be conducted in a very similar way to the way in which the national survey of the potential product capacity of the United States was conducted under the Hoover administration. Because that survey disclosed two things; it showed not only what the production of the country could be, but also what the consumption of the country would in all probability be if the needs of the people were satisfied. Let me read the reference in that regard. On page 11 it is stated:

By such working back and forth we finally arrive at a close approximation of the quantity of goods and services (the budget) which the people of the United States might expect if production were directed towards the satisfaction of their needs and reasonable desires, and if production were limited only by physical factors and the "product capacity" of the existing plant.

But also, surprising as it may seem, the budget lists with fair accuracy the goods and services which the American people would consume if their desires were satisfied! In other words, the budget is not only an estimate of possible production but also of possible consumption—excluding the assumption of a radical alteration in habits, such as would result if the practice of aeroplane joy-riding became general or if television sets came into popular use.

Accordingly I am of opinion that before we can handle this question of post-war reconstruction in a really intelligent manner we should have surveys of that kind, and have that information made available to us.

The United States in dealing with this took into consideration only physical factors. They did not take into consideration any form of financial restriction. One might say that has been the proclaimed policy of this government during this war, namely, that no financial restriction shall be allowed to impede our war effort.

I think the committee on post-war reconstruction should also receive a declaration from the government as to what its financial policy is in regard to peace. Is the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) prepared to say that no financial restriction of any kind shall be allowed to impede our peace effort? When this survey was made in the United States, that was taken for granted. They took into consideration only physical obstacles, and did not take into account any monetary ones. This is what the committee found could be done in the United States:

After almost a year of research by sixty technicians financed by the federal government, the national survey of potential product capacity has released its findings. The results are briefly stated. If the existing plant and man-power in the United States were fully employed in the production of honest goods and services for the consumer the total output, valued in 1929 dollars would not be less than $135,000,000,000 or an average per family of approximately $4,400.

That was in 1935. Since that time the productive plant of the United States has been considerably increased. Therefore if it was possible in 1935 to provide for a family in the United States a standard of living of $4,400, how much greater could the standing of living be after this war? Consequently I would say that at the end of the war our first problem will be to expand production of consumer goods as rapidly as possible, to satisfy the needs of the people, and then after that a definite relationship will have to be maintained between production of capital goods and production of consumer goods, so that the money paid out in capital goods industries is sufficient to make up any deficiency which may occur as between the total prices of the consumer goods and the effective demand against them.

When I refer to capital goods industries I use the expression in its widest term, so as to include various national projects. To-day during the war we have an abnormal expansion of capital goods and, of course, the result is inflationary. From 1930 to 1939 the production of capital goods in Canada was away down below normal and, as we know, during that period we had a deflationary condition. Therefore it is necessary for the government to assume full responsibility at all times for maintaining the correct relationship between the production of capital goods and the production of consumer goods.

In my opinion one of the most essential projects after the war will be a large-scale housing scheme. I do not mean a housing scheme such as we have had in the past, because under such schemes the people who were most in need of houses were unable to afford them. I should like to see a nation-wide housing scheme which would make possible to people in the lowest income brackets the acquisition of decent housing. A scheme of that kind would have to be financed by the Bank of Canada and, in so far as interest is concerned, it should be at the actual cost of servicing the accounts. Money should be repaid only at the rate of depreciation of the houses. That is to say, if a loan were made to a man to build a house estimated to last thirty years, such loan should be repaid in thirty annual instalments, so that when the house had completely depreciated the loan would be paid off. In this way a person would be able to build a house for much less than he could rent one, because the interest, apart from the actual cost of handling the accounts, would be cut off.

I believe this would be especially desirable at the end of the war. Soldiers needing houses will be returning. Workers will be moving from the cities to the more decentralized portions of the country, and they, too, will be needing houses. Generally speaking, those people will not be in a position to afford houses under housing schemes such as we have had in the past.

Before concluding my remarks I should like to refer to one or two other aspects of post-war reconstruction. For instance, there is the vexed problem of international trade. So long as we maintain an effective demand against our production, international trade will be simply an exchange of goods as between nations. There will be no incentive to maintain a favourable balance of trade, as we have in the past because, as the London chamber of commerce has pointed out, that has been brought about by a lack of effective demand within the country.

So far as our share of helping to take care of the blitzed areas is concerned, I believe Canada must be prepared to make her contribution along with other nations, and to make that contribution in the form of a gift. Of course to that extent the standard of living of the people would be reduced. But as soon as the nations of the world become rehabilitated and are able to stand on their own feet we must be prepared to trade with them on an even basis, exchanging goods for goods.

I believe the suggestion put forward by the London chamber of commerce with respect to foreign trade is a good one. We should be willing to exchange our goods for the goods of other countries on an even basis; and if any nation refuses to accept goods in payment of its exports, then over a period of time its credit should be cancelled. All a debtor nation can do is to offer its goods in payment for its imports. If the creditor nation will not accept those goods, then the only thing to do is to cancel the debt, rather than to allow the debtor nation to be forced into unpayable debts. Such a programme of course would entail definite control of industry, and in my opinion would necessitate the nationalization of the whole banking system.

On the other hand, of course, if the government is going to insist upon carrying on under the financial policy it has followed before, then I believe that the work of the committee to a great extent will be in vain.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the committee to be appointed will have before it a great task, and I wish the government of the day and those hon. members on the committee every success in their work. In the first place, the war is still far from being won. We are at the darkest hour. The allies—they are called the united nations; one seldom hears the name of Britain any more, although she is one of the pioneer nations—are now called the united nations, and they have just begun to take the initiative in Africa. Mr. Churchill says we are at the end of the beginning.

The whole of Europe is still dark. No one knows how long the war will last. Reconstruction and planning are international, national and domestic in scope. It is also linked with the war. The whole matter is inter-related. The first and second resolutions on the order paper are complementary, and might have been dealt with together. As a matter of fact they were considered together in the British House of Commons. Sir William Jowitt, paymaster-general, who has charge of this particular branch of legislation in the British government, presented legislation causing a twelve-day debate on the address in the British House of Commons, before the committee was appointed. They considered the war aspect, the international aspect, the empire and domestic sides of the question and empire trade. And what did they show? Well, I am sorry the Prime Minister did not accept my suggestion offered a few days ago, namely, that we should have a separate debate of one day at least to chart out a similar course, because if we had I believe these two resolutions might have been taken together, and we might have saved time.

In the British House of Commons men took part who were home from the front. In the list were admirals, airmen, generals in the army, and men who had a great deal to do with the last war, and now serve at the front in this one. They attempted to chart the course which they thought should be followed. There was a debate in the British House of Commons on reconstruction, rehabilitation and social security. The result was that when the Beveridge report was considered it was found to be a little too utopian for the mother country and I doubt if it ever will be adopted over there. It is not a practical report for this country because we have a different system. Our municipalities constitute a branch of government; there are the provincial governments constituting a duplicate municipal system, and there is also the federal government. Under our constitution the Beveridge report could not be adopted.

One of the main things is to win the war. We can plan until doomsday, but we must first win the war. I think I had probably as much to do with reconstruction after the last war as any hon. member. There were a million and a quarter people in our district, and we provided for reconstruction with little or no aid from the federal government and little or no aid from the provincial authorities. The municipality of Toronto had to handle this work. A total of 58,000 soldiers returned to the district, and for a while the situation was intolerable. However, matters were straightened out through the activities of the local municipality.

The old city of Toronto extended from the waterfront as far as St. Clair avenue. A private company owned the street railway franchise, but the city took that over. They also bought all the radial railways entering the city and in 1921 started the Toronto transportation commission system, and under the so-called clean-up deal which entailed an expenditure of $33,000,000 for the companies power and transportation facilities were provided and power in the clean-up deal from the Niagara district. The harbour improvements and the work along the waterfront were carried out, a new station and viaduct started, and the new city had to be provided with schools, sewers, roadways and municipal institutions of all kinds. The result was that the provision of this reconstruction work aided in preventing a great unemployment disaster from occurring to that city.

There is bound to be a period of dislocation after every war. Neither victory nor any kind of planning can bring about the millenium. The same thing happened in the days of the Roman empire and the old Grecian empire. A description of those days will be found in Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire". Great things were to be done for the Roman soldiers, almost similar to what is proposed to-day. But after those wars all they had were circuses and doles and all that kind of thing, and the empire was almost destroyed.

We had the Napoleonic wars, the Crimean war, the South African war, the great war, and then this particular war. In spite of all the planning that was done after the last war this country did not become a land fit for heroes to live in. After the last war the soldiers were forgotten three months after they came home. Apart from the city I have mentioned, notwithstanding all the planning that was done, the soldiers received little or no consideration. The result is that to-day many from the last war are suffering untold hardships.

As Mr. Churchill said about this war, we have just reached the end of the beginning. No one knows how long it is going to last and we do not know to whom the country will belong. The Germans still control the whole of Europe. We have not got inside their defences, and with the exception of part of Russia they are in full control of that continent. I do not object to this planning; I wish the committee good luck, but I think we are putting the cart before the horse. We should first chart out the course we are going to pursue.

For example, what are we going to do about empire trade and about the mother country? I think the government should lay down its policy in this regard. The mother country has been our best customer and she has spent a fortune developing the colonial empire. Britain's colonial empire is, in many ways, an example of world reconstruction. One has only to read the speech of Lord Cranborne to realize what has been done in building up this colonial empire. The word "imperialism" is much misunderstood and much misinterpreted in this house. Our allies Russia and the United States are imperialistic; they may not be imperialistic in the sense of grabbing territory, although that remains to be seen when the peace terms are known. They are imperialistic in that they want a larger share in world affairs and will want to dominate the peace terms.

Our fine ally the United States with their great president will want to have a larger share in world affairs and reconstruction. In considering the reconstruction of the new world we shall have to decide one thing. All the planning in the world will not mean anything unless this is decided. What is to be our relationship with the mother country and the empire in empire trade, food and raw materials? The mother country saved civilization after Dunkirk. Only for her we would have been forced to make peace with the axis. Yesterday I referred to Poland where virtually a million of the population have been taken to abattoirs to be killed by the gestapo. Notwithstanding what has been said elsewhere, I believe that after the war the United States will become an isolationist country. We must consider the international feature of this matter.

We come now to the domestic and national feature of this work. Since the war started, everybody has become a socialist or a planner. While we members of the House of Commons belong to different parties, there has been a fine spirit of sportsmanship shown in this chamber during the debates, and I have found the House of Commons to be a place of much kindness, with the possible exception of one or two cases. But everyone is proposing some sort of planning for the post-war period and the spending of our post-war incomes. I do not know whether we are going to have much in the way of post-war income. As I say, all the planning in the world will not bring about better days. With the billions of dollars that are being spent we may be a desperately poor nation after the war. We have been squandering our resources at a great pace; we have been spending money like water. One thing that must be settled is what is to be done with our soldiers when they come home. Do not forget that five or six hundred thousand soldiers will not, on their return, act merely as viewers of all this planning. We can plan until doomsday, but our soldiers who have gone overseas to fight for us, and have gone over there voluntarily and suffered three or four years of isolation in Britain, doing almost the work of labour battalions, will, on their return, have something to say about all this planning. The able minister is a returned soldier himself and has for years taken a great deal of interest in the soldiers and reconstruction. I submit to him and to the government that there should be a system of national insurance of our soldiers just as there is in the United States. A soldier's bill has passed both houses of congress protecting the soldier and his family and his property for three years after the war, and reestablishing him. It is a national system of insurance, which I have urged here since this war began.

Further, I believe that this committee might well consider many of the resolutions on the order paper dealing with reconstruction and rehabilitation problems. The official opposition and some of my hon. friends to my left have motions of that kind on the order paper, and this committee which is to deal with reconstruction might well have these resolutions referred to them. After all is said and done, we wasted almost four months last year on the plebiscite and Bill No. 80, to amend the mobilization act, and we had no time left to consider resolutions of hon. gentlemen to my left and of the official opposition and some good motions by private members on the government side. I suggest that these resolutions be referred to the committee.

One thing I should like to see Canada adopt is a national coal supply. This country is famished for coal at the present time, and conditions will get worse as the war goes on. I urged this policy before the house from 1923 on, for seven or eight years, and you, Mr. Speaker, when you first entered the house, coming as you do from the west and knowing well the conditions in the mining districts and in the municipalities which you have so long and faithfully represented in this house, took a great deal of interest in this policy of a national fuel supply. We have coal in Nova Scotia, Alberta and other parts of this country, and we could develop our resources so that we could provide ourselves with our own fuel.

We should also have a national policy of hydro development, and an oil development policy, involving the construction of pipelines. That policy was before the house in 1923 or 1924. We have a potential water-power supply of 43,000,000 horse-power, of which only one-seventh, or about 7,000,000 horse-power has so far been developed. The last time I was in British Columbia, in 1927, I was surprised that with the great natural resources of that province there was no hydro development. It is the same story on the prairies. My hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has taken a great interest in the water powers of this country and has visited many potential sites. Of that 7,000,000 horse-power which is developed at the present time, a considerable part is a seasonal development only. There has been an additional development since the war began, and I should like to see a further expansion. I think that is one matter which the committee might well consider.

I come to agriculture. There can be no proper agriculture without proper housing, and we are behind the times in housing. Housing is a suburban, urban and rural matter, and we have done little or nothing to develop a housing policy for Canada. In the Toronto district from which I come there will be no houses for the soldiers when they come back from the war unless action is taken. Some soldiers' families are now living in cellars. There is a great scarcity of adequate accommodation, and that is a matter which should be looked into by the committee. Urban, suburban and rural housing, reconstruction, and health and education legislation should also be considered.

The provision of raw materials is both a national and an international question. The mother country has to import twenty-five out of twenty-seven raw materials which she needs. She has coal and half her needs in iron, but the rest she has to import. Without an import and an export trade the mother country would become a second-class power. She would become a second Denmark and just an outpost at the edge of Europe for America. I believe in Mr. Churchill's policy which he announced in London, that he is not going to see this empire sold down the river, or go by default, but that Britain is going to hold what she has. It is our duty to work with our best customer, and to help her after the war, for we owe everything to her for having saved our shores from the enemy. Every country of the world has received raw materials from the colonial empire, because that has always been Britain's policy. Millions of dollars have been spent on the development of this colonial empire by Great Britain, and she has never asked for a dollar from them in return. She has made the raw materials of that colonial empire available to the whole world. As a publication of the League of Nations says, the colonial empire has given more in the way of raw materials to foreign countries than to the mother country which was responsible for the development of that empire, and has given the colonial empire preferences in her markets.

There is also the question of the development of civil aviation. In the last war the Royal Air Force had some eighteen thousand young men trained in military aeronautics in the city of Toronto. There was no Royal Canadian Air Force then. Montreal was considered by the government, but Toronto was finally chosen as the headquarters for the development of the Royal Air Force, and there eighteen thousand cadets and air mechanics were trained. Some two thousand United States students were among them. They came from various universities in the United States. After the war what happened? Colonel Barker, V.C., Collishaw, Bishop and others tried to persuade the government and the city of Toronto to take up civil aviation after the last war. But nothing was done. The result was that many of these young men who had been trained in military aeronautics here went to the United States after the war, and there a few of them got a nearly ninety million dollar contract in California from the Chamberlain government in the early days of rearmament. If Canada and the other dominions are not alert, the development of civil aviation will fall into the hands of other countries after the war.

We hear a great deal these days about reconstruction. But the first thing this government will have to reestablish is private enterprise, as they are doing in England. There a resolution was moved by a former labour representative in the Churchill cabinet. The British parliament has passed an act known as the "Pre-War Trade Practices Act", to put back after the war the retail and wholesale trade where it was before the war. When the troops come home they will not have anybody like Mr. Donald Gordon here dominating them. They will have something to say about these bureaucrats. I have fought against these bureaucrats since the time of their appointment, and I was nearly all alone, except for the support, last session or two, of my hon. friend the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury). In Great Britain, within six months or a year after the war is over, they will go back to private enterprise and the old way of doing things. If we had had no bureaucrats, there would have been no scarcity of food and no rationing. I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is quite right. I pointed out two years ago that we should have a food ministry. The food ministry in Britain under Lord Woolton has done magnificent work. Food supplies have been planned; the food is available to everyone, it is fresh, it is well handled, and there have been practically no complaints. A minister of the British government, Sir William Jowitt, paymaster general, referred to reconstruction plans which have already been prepared with relation to the food problem in the mother country. Britain has been the best customer of our farmers, not least of the grain growers of the prairies. Let us not lose her after the war. I believe that this dominion should immediately, through this committee, work with Mr. Churchill and his government along the lines I have suggested.

Consider the position of the mining industry. I do not believe the men in the mines have received a fair deal—far from it. I referred to this particular matter in 1923 and 1924 on my motion for a national coal supply. I believe in labour and have been a consistent supporter of labour since first entering the city council of Toronto. One of the things I value most highly is that, notwithstanding a life of much stress and strain in many spheres of activity, including municipal work, which is closer to the people than any other branch of government, I have always managed to retain the respect and support of the overwhelming majority of labour in the city I represent. With Sir Adam Beck, my former colleague, and Sir James Whitney, I went all over Ontario preaching the gospel of cheap light and power for the urban, suburban and rural workers. In the days before and during the great war we were attacked by some of our own newspapers in Ontario and called amateur anarchists, because we tried to restore the people of the province their heritage of cheap power and light, a policy which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, supported in the great district of new Ontario. I believe that before the war is over, notwithstanding much of this talk about planning, the larger part of the work will devolve upon the municipalities.

Recently there was a long debate in the British House of Commons on this general subject, when empire trade, international affairs and other great issues were discussed. Here is what Admiral Southby said about post-war planning. He is a sincere friend of labour; he is a man of vision; he has predicted almost everything that has happened in the war:

> It seems to me that the people who talk loudest about post-war equality are those who deny the right of anyone who disagrees with them to share in the planning of the new world, but I am certain of one thing, and it gives me great hope and courage. If the little man, who is the embodiment of British common sense and sanity, is capable, as he is, of destroying Hitler and Mussolini and all their works, he is quite capable, when the war is over, of destroying bureaucracy. He says in effect, in the words of Geoffrey Dobb:
> We who in the ashes dwell
> Want no planned and ordered hell;
> Fight no war to be policed
> When the bombs and fires have ceased.
> Life's too precious far to give
> For any freedom but to live.

That is exactly what the soldiers will want when they come home. The "little man", immortalized by Strube, who saved England, will know, when the war is over, how to plan for the future of the empire and of world trade, in the same way as he did to beat Hitler and Mussolini in the war.

I have almost finished. I will merely add that there was planning as long ago as the aftermath of the Napoleonic war. We all know the condition of the working classes after that great war, that women and children were working in the mines of the mother country in a living tomb below ground. Read the "History of England" by T. H. Green; note the condition of the mass of the working people after the war with Napoleon. The state of the workers at that time was disgraceful. Then came the industrial revolution, the union of coal and steel. What did it do? As Lord Perry has said:

> The industrial revolution made it possible for any man to work his own way from poverty and illiteracy to a commanding position in both industry and the state. Richard Cobden is an outstanding example—the son of a Sussex farm labourer who became a great Lancashire manufacturer and a great statesman. William Cobbett is another example. In fact, industry and commerce during the nineteenth century produced such men not by the hundreds but by the thousands—careful, frugal men, hard of head and often hard of heart, but notable for two qualities above all others, diligence and self-reliance.
> These men were self-trained into habits of clear commercial thinking, quick and bold decisions, personal responsibility and individual initiative. It was no easy school. Those who lacked the necessary application or the necessary drive had short shrift. The age was kindly only to those who satisfied its needs.

I believe that the first thing to do after the war is to encourage private initiative and free enterprise. True it is that this will have to be brought up to date. I believe that when the soldiers come home they will want the rights that men enjoyed in the days of Macdonald and Laurier, when everybody owned some property—it might be a cow; it might be a small mill, or a country store, or a horse and wagon, but property of some kind. We have been slow to see that, with the right of acquiring private property denied to them, the people of Canada became proletarian. Their liberty passed away; it will have to be restored.

I believe in private initiative. I believe that the right to possess private property is derived from nature and not from man and that the state has no business to abolish it but only to regulate its use. And that, I believe, will be the view of our soldiers when they return.

At present the war is not won, and the war is the main issue to-day; all these other problems are secondary and will have to wait until the victory is ours. I do not object to planning; you can do all you like of it as long as it is not done at the exepnse of the war effort. But I plead with the government and with the committee not to forget that victory is our main purpose, and that without victory all the planning will amount to very little.

I thank the house for having listened so attentively. I have had some experience in matters of reconstruction and planning; it is not confined to my friends on the left, who of course are entitled to their views. And from practical experience I tell them that we shall have to go back, as they are doing in England, to supporting by legislation the retail man and the wholesaler. This was done in some degree in the pre-war trade practices act passed there to restore private enterprise. Give these people a chance to do their own business, wholesale and retail, in a business-like way, and remove the barriers which have been erected in restraint of trade and have made it impossible for them to carry on in the past number of years.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I do not intend to inflict another speech on the house, but as a member of the committee last year I have a few remarks to make with respect to the machinery which is being put up for the purpose of working out our reconstruction plans. The reason why I am not going to impose another speech on the house is that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made quite a lengthy statement this afternoon and set out fairly clearly the views of this group on reconstruction plans in general, and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has just now given us an enlightening discourse on the matter, so that it will not be necessary for me to go into those details.

What I am interested in bringing to the attention of the minister who has been directing the work of this committee is the machinery which is being set up. My conception of the work done last year by the parliamentary committee is that it did all it could with the machinery provided for it, but that it merely scratched the surface and received some reports.

My objection to the whole set-up, and I think I voiced it to some extent last year both in the committee and in the house, is that I see the questions of reconstruction and rehabilitation as one problem, and I believe there are too many committees handling the research and other details without any clear understanding as to which committee will put these plans into final form, bring them back to this house and accept responsibility for them. The committee being set up under this resolution is the responsible committee to which the general public is looking for some comprehensive plans in connection with reconstruction and rehabilitation; and if we are to have any success the numerous committees dealing with the matter will have to have their authority and powers well defined.

For example, last session the canteen committee handled a phase of rehabilitation as applied to the soldier, and in my opinion a very important phase, but I did not consider it a function of that committee, regardless of the fact that most of the committee members were ex-service men. We are now running into difficulties in connection with the legislation based upon the work of that committee, which was designed to protect the boy who left his job and went into the army by forcing the employer to see to it that the boy on his return was given the employment which he left when he enlisted. I have recently received numerous complaints from men who never had jobs, who are coming back to sections where trade unions that have seniority clauses written into their agreements are functioning. A boy in such a position cannot get a job without great difficulty. If he does succeed in getting one and a lay-off comes along—for there are lay-offs now—because he has no seniority in the plant he loses the job. Therefore we have really not provided, as far as that legislation is concerned, any security for the boys who come back.

Then there was the James committee, which sat for some fifteen months and which was divided into subcommittees. The chairman of that committee came before the reconstruction committee and presented a fine report, but in my view it was mostly words, with no concrete suggestions as to what should be done in the field of reconstruction. That committee did some very good research work, but it merely brought back a report to the parliamentary committee. Some of the subcommittees of the James committee did not function at all, or at least did not report to the parliamentary committee. For instance, the committee on education and employment, one of the most important subcommittees, which was headed by Mr. Tom Moore, did not make a report. The explanation was that Mr. Moore was ill. That was quite true, but someone should have been appointed to take his place.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has been done; Mr. Bengough has been appointed.

Mr. GILLIS: That is good. We now find an economic advisory committee being set up, which in my opinion will practically usurp the powers of the James committee. The advisory committee is composed largely of deputy ministers; it is nothing more or less than an interdepartmental committee of the government doing research which in my opinion should be done by independent people reporting directly to the parliamentary committee to enable it to form and bring back to the house an independent report. I understand that in the Department of Pensions and National Health there is a departmental committee carrying on research and bringing in certain legislation by order in council with respect to soldiers returning from overseas. Therefore, when the minister makes his statement I think he should clearly state which committee is senior, and which committee will bring a report into the house. Will that committee be privileged to take advantage of all the research being done by the other committees and put it into a final report which will be brought to this house? If the parliamentary committee is to function in that way, then in my opinion it will have to be provided with a secretariat and the necessary machinery to carry on that work. That should be their function, since they are the elected members of the house and the public will look upon them as the responsible committee.

I should like to make just a few observations as to what I think are the basic problems with which we should start now and about which we should do something. Speech-making will not solve the problem. As a member of the committee last year I think one of the first problems we shall have to tackle is that of the soldier returning from overseas. If the war should end to-morrow I would not want to see our army demobilized with the machinery we have at present for looking after them. When I think of that army overseas I try to place myself in the position of one of the soldiers for a few moments. Large numbers of the boys now in England never had jobs. They have been in the army now for three years, but to date no one in this country has told them that they will have jobs on their return. We know that the Canadian army will be the spearhead when the time comes to cross the channel, and I do not think any of our men have any illusions as to what that job will mean. Consequently it is only natural for a boy in that position to stop and think what he is facing certain death for. If we want to build up the morale of that army and of the Canadian people, we must do two things. We must guarantee those boys that if the war should terminate suddenly and they should return to Canada, they will not have to wrestle in the ranks of the unemployed or eke out an existence on $9 a week, as is provided by the regulations at present. They should be told that the Canadian people are prepared to keep them in uniform on full pay and allowances, to give them vocational training and to route them into some gainful employment with a decent standard of living before they are finally taken off the Canadian pay-roll. That would guarantee to those boys that when they came back, whether to-morrow or next year, the Canadian people would be prepared to recognize their responsibility at least to the extent of making sure that they would not have to go into the lines of the unemployed or those on relief. I am sure that would be good for the morale of our boys overseas.

In addition, I think this government should enact the New Zealand old age pension plan. I do not need to elaborate on that, for I am sure the minister is even more familiar with it than I am. Many of our boys overseas have fathers and mothers at home who are too young to qualify under the present regulations for the old age pension, but who are too old to work, who have broken down after years of heavy work and the worry of the last ten years of depression.

The only income in most of those homes is an assignment of pay and allowances granted by the government. Such a boy is in the position that if he goes under, fighting for democracy and freedom, he not only loses his life but throws his father and mother back on the relief rolls. That is no exaggeration; it is an actual fact; I have handled cases of that kind. A large percentage of our people are in that position. And that gesture of keeping him on the payroll, the enactment immediately of an old age pension that guarantees his father and mother means of existence, builds his morale to the point that at least the war has brought about something, a guarantee that there will be no more relief roll for his father and mother and a recognition by us that he is entitled to something when he comes back and is not taking a chance of going on relief. Those two things should be done by the reconstruction committee as one of its first responsibilities.

Another matter we should immediately consider and make a pronouncement upon is this. There are thousands and thousands of employees in war industries, crown organizations carrying on war work only. If the war were suddenly to terminate, thousands of these people would face the street, and they realize it. If you go around among them you will find that that is what they are discussing. What are we going to do with respect to these crown emanations, these war industry plants, when the war is over? What plans are we making to convert them to peace-time pursuits?

These are three matters about which we should immediately do something. It would tend to build up the morale of the soldiers overseas and of the Canadian people. These are basic problems of urgent importance and matters upon which the committee should make a pronouncement at once. There is no research necessary into these matters, except as to the conversion of war industries. The government is in a position with respect to most of these industries to say something about them; the other questions are merely matters of common sense and something should be done about them immediately.

One thing we must realize is that we are not in a position similar to that of the last war. We are dealing to-day with a generation that has already gone through a war; that has seen the aftermath of war and that is not going through the same thing again. If our hon. friends on this side and those on the government side are not prepared to bring about changes in a sensible and logical way through the medium of the constitution that we have to-day, those changes will be brought about in some other way, a way we do not like. Let us not make any mistake about that or try to fool ourselves, because we shall be only fooling ourselves if we think in those terms.

I do not want to make a long speech. I wish to leave just those three points with the committee and to ask the minister for a clarification of the machinery we are providing in the field of reconstruction. In my own province thousands of men have left the basic industry there, coal mining. There has been quite a shrinkage in that industry since the outbreak of the war. I have some figures; I shall not bother the house with them now, but will bring them before the reconstruction committee. I know that if the men who have enlisted from that industry came back to-morrow or next year there is no employment for them as far as I can see. Hundreds of boys left that section of the country who never had a job, and there is now no job for them there. There is only one way to ease the minds of these people. They know it; I receive many letters from overseas; they write to me on that point; they have no illusions about it. Without a pronouncement now that we are making provision for them against their return, until we can reorganize society and turn it back to peace-time pursuits, I would be afraid to see them come back. The reconstruction committee will go into that situation as far as that industry is concerned. The chairman was good enough to allow us to bring that whole situation to the attention of the committee last session. When we get under way again the operators should be summoned to meet that committee, to put their plans on the table face up and to let us know what the future holds with respect to that industry and potential employment for men returning from overseas.

I merely wanted to bring these matters to the attention of the minister so that he might say something about them when he closes the debate.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): First I wish to say a word as to the high note that has been sounded to-day in the debate that has so far taken place on the motion of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) that this reconstruction and reestablishment committee should be set up. I am not a bit surprised at the high tone of the speeches that have been made, not only because I know the great interest that is in the minds of all hon. members in the subject under discussion, but because, looking back to the conduct of that committee during last session, I am filled with a deep sense of appreciation of the friendliness and courtesy extended to me, who happened to be chairman of that committee, by all its members. We see to-night what the minister has recognized, because he attended faithfully the meetings of that committee during last session, namely, that every member of it is in dead earnest in the work which he has undertaken as a representative of the people.

Several points have been brought out so far in the debate. There is the question of what is generally called full-time employment and there is the question of full production. May I put on Hansard, for although it is on the record of the committee it has not yet been put upon Hansard, a resolution that was moved in that committee on June 30 last and was accepted by the committee. I happened to be the mover. That motion reads:

> Whereas the most immediate reconstruction problem confronting Canada to-day is the creation of employment for and the settlement of returned soldiers and workers from war industry, and,
> Whereas the proper development of our natural resources can provide both employment and settlement opportunities through irrigation, flood control, reforestation, the development of water power for industrial and other uses, the exploration of mineral and oil deposits, and the provision of transportation where required by settlers or by industry:
> Therefore be it resolved that this committee on reconstruction and reestablishment study the best means to bring about the proper utilization of the natural resources of Canada in such manner as will make it possible for the government of Canada, in cooperation with provinces and municipalities, to avail itself of every opportunity to create employment for, and arrange the permanent and satisfactory settlement of, men and women discharged from our armed forces and from the merchant navy, and workers released from industry.

I read that motion not only for the purpose of putting it upon the record of this house, but also because I think it is the foundation for a good deal of the work that must be done by the committee which is being set up. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the fact that following that motion we went into a study of the development of the coal resources in Nova Scotia, and he hopes, as I hope, that when the committee is again at work that particular study will be continued. I believe that if we as a committee study the existing operation and utilization of our natural resources we shall be in a better position to judge the nature of the utilization and development of our natural resources that we as a committee on reconstruction should recommend to this house and through the house to the people of Canada.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that this resolution points out that we do these things, or some of them, in cooperation with the provinces and the municipalities. In a country with so complex a constitution as that of Canada, in a country whose national entity was, after all, created by resolutions of the provinces themselves, it is absolutely essential that we should convey to the people our desire to work in conjunction with the provinces.

As a matter of fact, following that particular resolution, much work of a highly preparatory nature has been done by some of the provinces. During last session, as chairman of the committee I received many commendations from people in several provinces on the fact that our committee wanted to cooperate with them. If I may be permitted to speak for a moment about my own province of British Columbia I would call attention to the fact that the legislature of that province at its last session set up a post-war rehabilitation council consisting of members of all political parties. And apparently without thought of party advantage, that committee has carried on a positive work of preparation for the days of reconstruction. They have prepared a voluminous report, one which it seems to me is absolutely constructive. I am very happy to-night to pay one word of tribute, because the chairman of that committee, the Hon. Mr. Perry, provincial minister of education, is one of my constituents. The constituency of Fort George which he represents in the legislature is the centre of the federal constituency of Cariboo which I represent in this house. This booklet which I have in my hand happens to be the report, and I can say it is full of good meat, having to do with reconstruction.

Naturally, when one speaks of reconstruction there come to his mind two sets of thoughts, one relating to world structure and international undertakings, and the other to the new structure affecting the people of Canada themselves. It is not my intention to-night to say anything about world-wide structure, except to throw out this thought, that I agree—and I speak as a member of the House of Commons and a member of the reconstruction committee—with the suggestion of Vice-President Wallace of the United States, that when war is over we must have a system of collective security which will guarantee to the people of every nation the same application of the rule of law in international affairs as we now enjoy within our own country in domestic affairs.

Our own continued process of armament and preparation for war and the process followed by each individual nation will to a large extent depend upon the nature and the condition of that collective security which can be given to every people by the combination of nations. So far as the preparation for reconstruction is concerned, I agree and always have agreed with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, namely, that the first great task confronting us as the House of Commons and as a people is the conduct of the war itself. It is not necessary for me to say to any hon. member that it is useless for us to prepare for reconstruction, if in doing so we do not continue to make certain that by every possible means we conduct our war effort properly; because if we lose the war the reconstruction period will be developed not by us but by those nations which defeat us in the war. And if we are not successful; if we do not win the war by a proper invasion of axis countries, by the annihilation of their military strength and by the total subjugation of their military caste, but have to arrange a peace through negotiation, then the terms of reconstruction will not be made by us, because conditions will obtain over which we shall not be masters.

The only real reason, then, for thinking of reconstruction is to think of it in such terms whereby what we are doing and what we are saying will of themselves aid in the prosecution of the war.

I take kindly to the suggestion made to-night, namely, that we as a parliamentary committee should take steps to let our boys and women know overseas what we are trying to do.

Mention was made of what will happen when the offensive takes place, an offensive of which, as has been said before, the Canadian soldier will be the spearhead. We cannot blind ourselves to the fact that while the men and women who are there are anxious to play their full part for Canada, they know that a good many of them will not return to their families. It is our duty to let them know that we, the members of the House of Commons, intend by every possible means to see that what takes place after this war will not be in line with what was permitted to take place during the last one.

Here I wish to say a word of commendation respecting the Minister of Pensions and National Health. We can look back over the last two or three years and see things done for enlisted men, men who offered to give everything they have, including their lives. We can see a vast difference in the life being planned for them and that which was permitted to apply to the soldiers and their dependents who survived the last war. I say that in commendation of the present minister.

I leave that phase of the matter with the thought that between the two great wars, in what we were pleased to call the days of peace —and I say this without criticism of any political party or any minister—in those days of fabricated peace we as public men, and those who were then public men, thought more of money and taxation than we did of human values. A government was judged successful, not by the things it did or arranged to do for human welfare, but by the small amount of money it expended, and the manner in which it kept the rate of taxation down. That was the judgment not only of men in public life, but of most people in Canada. We the people of Canada failed in that, just as we failed to prepare for a war that some of us—all of us—should have seen was coming upon us.

Having said that, I wish to say a few words about the northwestern section of Canada. I know I shall be forgiven if it happens that the part of the country to which I intend to refer comes within the constituency of Cariboo. I make this reference not only because my very good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) spoke so eloquently respecting that country and urged the minister to make certain preparations for the future by the development of the natural resources within that great terrain, but because I want to speak of more than the development of natural resources and what they might mean in employment and production. We have to-day the greatest co-operation between two nations that perhaps the history of the world has ever seen. I am speaking of that which exists between Canada and the United States. When Mr. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and the Prime Minister of Canada met at Ogdensburg in August, 1940, to arrange for the setting up of a joint defence commission, many people thought that would apply only to the defence of North America. But it has developed pace by pace until to-day we see the realization of what has been described lately in this city as the realization of the age-long dream of the northwest passage.

Mention has been made to-night of the air lanes. How many people in Canada realize that the new air lanes now in operation across Canada and fed from the United States which head directly toward Japan—if I may digress for a moment may I say that I hope they will prove to be a channel of offensive action against Japan—mean that the distance from Chicago or Montreal to Tokyo and Shanghai is over 2,000 miles less than the old route through San Francisco which was in operation up to the time of this war. Any distance of over 2,000 miles means a great deal even when one is thinking of aeroplanes and the great speed which they have reached.

There have been expenditures of huge sums of United States money in the Yukon and British Columbia. We have United States soldiers in the Yukon and British Columbia, and there are Canadian soldiers in Alaska. They are all operating together. A joint commission has been appointed to study the proper means of dealing with the facilities which have been created for war purposes in British Columbia, the Yukon and Alaska and the proper joint utilization and development of the natural resources of those lands. I wish I could presume upon the patience of the house to deal at greater length with some of the matters mentioned to-night by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I am tempted to do so because what he said relates so keenly to my own constituency, to that of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) and to that of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons). I cannot take the time of the house for this. I want, however, to leave in your mind, Mr. Speaker, the thought that not only have we opened up a northwest passage to Japan, China and the other oriental countries, but we have created a great international cooperative movement between Canada and our great neighbour, the United States.

As was pointed out to-night, in addition to thinking in terms of general reconstruction problems we must also be concrete. The resolution adopted by the committee last session is in itself a concrete foundation upon which a great structure can be built. There is on the order paper a resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) which asks this house to pass legislation enlarging the scope of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Members of the committee will remember that during the hearings last session I asked the committee to sit in camera because I did not want too much press publicity. I then suggested that the committee should study the advisability of recommending to the house that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be extended in its general scope and operation. It deals now only with the three prairie provinces, and in my opinion the committee should recommend that it deal with all Canada and that its general scope be enlarged. The hon. member for Medicine Hat is a member of the committee, and I suggest that he lay this matter before the committee when it meets again. Some means must be suggested by which there can be a proper utilization and development of our natural resources. I believe the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been fairly successful on the prairies and I believe its extension to cover all Canada would also be successful.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the numerous committees on reconstruction which have been in operation, I agree with him that the committee of the house, which is built upon the representation of the people of Canada themselves, is the main committee. But I agree also with the minister that it has been essential for other committees to be at work. The committee which has been described to-night and which has been working under the auspices of the Minister of Pensions and National Health had a secretariat, research advisers and research counsel. These men have been working all the time; they have been able to make studies and possibly are in a position to recommend conclusions to a greater extent than could the House of Commons committee.

We secured from that committee and from the minister some excellent statements covering not only the things that have been done by the government but the matters under study by the committee and by departmental officers. I feel certain that when our committee is ready to start its work again the minister will see to it that we have the benefit of all the studies whch have been made by his departmental officials and by members of that committee. I do not know if I am permitted to say this or not, but I understand that the other house is also setting up a committee on reconstruction. As a member of our committee I welcome that, and I feel sure that we shall be able to cooperate with each other.

Mention was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to the statement made to the American Federation of Labor convention by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I want to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for the nature of the address he gave to this house. He quoted the Prime Minister as follows:

> I believe the war is teaching us that the obstacles to full employment were not real obstacles; that a partnership of management, of workers and of the community can make useful work available, in time of peace no less than in time of war, for all who need or want to work.

I am afraid the hon. member took a wrong meaning from the Prime Minister's statement. As I interpret his speech, he meant what everybody in this house thinks he meant. There is not any question that during the terrible and long years after the war which were known as the depression we let ourselves sink to depths of shame which only the courage, heroism and sacrifices of the men and women who are fighting for us overseas can wipe out. What the Prime Minister was saying to himself as well as to the men and women whom he was actually addressing was that the experiences of the war—and surely we must learn from the experiences of the war—have taught us that we, business men as well as the government, permitted certain things to be obstacles to full employment in the days of peace, when, had we only known it, those things were not real obstacles.

Something was said to-night about the necessity for a declaration. The declaration is there. The obstacle is declared to be an imaginary obstacle, and we realize it now. If there is any man in this house to-day who thinks we can ever have a similar depression in Canada, let me say to him that we have all across Canada a farming population which from its pioneering days has been imbued with courage and with experience. During the last three years of war our industrialists, management and labour, have shown what they can do when there is a real objective before them, and we have a realization to-day that never again will it be necessary for the people of Canada to be in want.

Mr. MacINNIS: It never was necessary.

Mr. TURGEON: I am not saying that it was. I am saying that what we allowed to be obstacles were false obstacles.

Let me say to some who I am afraid are thinking not of the material problems as much as of great principles, and I say this so that every member of the house will know where I stand, that I for my part am a believer in free enterprise. You may call it capitalism, if you like; I am a believer in it. I say as a member of this house and as a member of the committee, but I say this to the industrialists and to the business men and to every man and woman in Canada who are believers in free enterprise, that in my interpretation of systems as well as of terms, free enterprise does not pertain only to those who are in big business. The right of free enterprise pertains to every man and to every woman, to the farmer and to the labourer, to the small business man as well as to the big business man.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let them exercise it.

Mr. TURGEON: All right. We are talking now of the reconstruction committee, and I say that I approve more than I can say the announcement in the speech from the throne of the setting up of another committee to deal with social security. That is necessary. I agree with many of the provisions of the Beveridge report, but again speaking as a member of parliament I say that that is not enough. I have just pointed out that I am a believer in free enterprise, but I say that in addition to social security measures we must have fundamental changes. Those fundamental changes must be of such a nature as to give to government at least a motivating influence, if not a directive influence. We must have fundamental changes which will permit the farmer and the labouring man to have the benefit of free enterprise, and which will make a connecting link between agriculture and industry, between industry and government, and between government and agriculture. When I speak of industry I do not mean only capital and management; I mean industry as composed of capital and management and labour. I for my part am ready to state that in my opinion it is against sound public policy to permit plants employing large numbers of men to operate without provision for collective bargaining by the employees. That is, I think labour in its organized form must be a substantive part of the industry itself, and from the days of the end of the war onwards, when we speak of industry, we must mean labour in its organized form as well as industry itself. I hope we can have a condition here in Canada where social security as it relates to the men and women who are employed in industry will be taken care of by industry itself, but I do not think we can secure that at the moment. I consider, however, that that is the proper place to begin with social and economic security for the men and women who are employed in industry. But we cannot reach that condition unless we—and by "we" I mean parliament and government, provincial as well as dominion —recognize that organized labour is an actual part of industry itself. We must realize and recognize that the foundation of our whole economy rests with the farmers of the land, because industry, even considered as management and labour, cannot operate properly unless agriculture is on a sound basis. It therefore becomes, in my opinion, the duty of the reconstruction committee to take every possible step, in addition to what I have said about industry and labour, to put farming on a proper basis. If we do that, and if we bring about the developments of which the hon. member for Davenport has spoken so eloquently to-night, we can look forward to the post-war period without fear if, in addition, we let our fighting men who are overseas know what we are trying to do.

I have spoken of the unbearable conditions under which the men who fought in the last war and their dependents were living before this war commenced. We forgot the human values. We realized that as a result of that war Canada had taken a higher place than before in the galaxy of the nations of the world. But we forgot that our place in the world rested upon a foundation of broken hearts, shattered men, and our immortal dead. When this war is over I hope we shall realize that the glory that then will be ours in still greater measure will rest upon the same three things—the broken hearts of the women and children left behind, the shattered lives of the men who come back from the brink of the grave, and the immortal dead in such large numbers who will never see their homes again.

I say, in conclusion, that when this war is over and our men return to us from the graves of Europe or of Asia or of other lands where many of their comrades will lie forever, I hope that with the aid of the returned soldier organizations, the churches of the land, ministers of governments and members of parliament we shall never again be permitted to forget that our national glory will rest upon the sacrifices that have been made by our soldiers.

I want to express through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and through him to the government my appreciation as a public man of what has been done in the last two years and of what is to be done in the future, and to express the hope that, when the war is over and we have won it properly, our post-war problems will not actually prove to be as acute as now we think they may be.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): It gives me very great pleasure to speak on this resolution to set up this committee which obviously has such general support from all parts of the house.

There is just one suggestion I should like to make to the minister before I proceed, namely, that a considerable amount of work on reconstruction has already been done, and a certain amount of the job necessary to do is now known. I suggest to the minister that before the committee brings down its report he should act on the suggestions which have already been put before him by the James committee and the other committee on reconstruction. In this connection I particularly want to recommend to his attention the findings of the Guelph conference on soil erosion in old Ontario.

Nobody appreciates more than I do the necessity of having blueprints ready before the need to build is apparent. At the Guelph conference the situation existing in Ontario was carefully gone into, but it was brought out by all the experts who spoke and presented papers that very little actual survey work had been done. Only King township and the Ganaraska valley had been at all adequately surveyed; that is, not more than two hundred square miles out of seventy-five thousand which needed to be surveyed. The rest of that territory must be surveyed before any comprehensive plan of soil conservation and reforestation can be undertaken. That is not a job which can be done in a minute; it is a job for expert scientists, for men who are trained to do that work. I realize that at the moment such men are extremely difficult to get, and I would suggest to the minister that as many as possible of these survey parties be sent into the rest of that part of Ontario during the coming summer, not waiting until after the report has been brought down. It is estimated by the Guelph conference, and particularly by Professor Coventry, who was one of the speakers at the conference, that it would require about two hundred survey parties adequately to cover those seventy-five thousand square miles of Ontario and that the survey alone would occupy three years. The necessity of that work is well known. We must do something about it; otherwise that part of Ontario will become a desert. I would suggest with the utmost emphasis that these survey parties be started and put at work this summer season.

There is one other matter as to which, I think, immediate work could be undertaken.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that this is in any way the total or even a major part of the work of the committee. I consider this committee to be one of the most if not the most important of the committees set up in this house. But there is work which we know already has to be done. In the metropolitan district of Toronto, which includes all of York county and probably the adjoining counties, the architectural association has estimated that to provide a comprehensive plan of re-housing that area will take as long as two years, and it will cost in the neighbourhood of $100,000. I mention these figures merely to emphasize the size of the job which lies ahead of us.

These are things which I suggest we should be doing. A start—making the blueprints, providing the plans—should be made at once. We cannot risk being unprepared at the end of the war. We cannot take the chance of our army coming back from Europe and our war industries suddenly shutting off and leaving our men in the street. We must have those plans, and in my opinion there is not a moment to lose. I agree with everything that has been said in this chamber concerning the seriousness of the war situation. I realize—nobody, probably, better—what a tough job lies ahead of us to win the war. But because I do that, I also realize what a difficult, long and complicated job the reconstruction committee has in front of it, and it is because I do not wish to see any time wasted that I make these suggestions to the minister.

In the coming years of reconstruction in Canada, I believe we shall discover that the findings in England of the Uthwatt report will affect us far more than the Beveridge report. The way in which in England they have conserved their land, and now—this is the finding of Mr. Justice Uthwatt—are growing between two-thirds and three-quarters of the food necessary for that island, whereas at one time they grew only one-third of their requirements, is an indication of how far we can go in the matter of land through proper land use. Nobody has been more prodigal of the land than we in Canada. One would think in some places we had deliberately set out to destroy the farms and the land. In some places in King township they found that the land had been lumbered, the timber taken off it; that it had been farmed and it had become waste land, within one generation. The first settler within one generation cut the trees, farmed the land, and was so careless of the land that it is now abandoned.

This is one of the most serious things facing Canada to-day. I shall not go into details, but I will say this, that unless we take immediate steps to see to it that forest cover is put back on the land, that erosion is stopped, that streams like the Etobicoke, the Ganaraska and the Grand river do not lose sixty or seventy per cent of their water in a spring freshet of two or three days, we are in very grave danger of having our land turn into a desert. It is because this has been so deeply impressed upon me that I make the plea that the minister waste no time in setting up these extra surveys in order to tackle this one specific job.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the discussion on this subject, and I am wondering whether most of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have not missed the real implications of the resolution now before the house. Much and, in fact, all that has been said has been sound and helpful, but we are not here dealing with a resolution having in view the reconstruction of a county or even a nation. At the conclusion of hostilities we shall face a world that will have been seriously bruised, and the fact is that interdependence will stare us in the face even more intensely after the conflict is over than at any time during the last three decades.

The approach to this problem of reconstruction must be, not in terms of adequate measures of public works, and that sort of thing, but in terms of the kind of world, let alone the kind of country, in which we shall live. That, I think, is the basic consideration in this discussion.

Let me say at the outset that I share the view expressed by those who have thus far spoken, that one need make no apology for this resolution or this debate. It is true that in some quarters it is suggested that this is no time to deal with the post-war period, that all our energies should be concentrated on the one problem of winning the war. With that, of course, we shall all agree; but winning the war will require the use of various instruments. No one now in the light of history will say that when Wilson introduced his fourteen points the programme which he offered did not have a definite relation to the victory which ultimately came about. It was a means of encouraging nations that were seriously disturbed as to whether they should give their support. To-day, if we have an adequate programme, as Mr. Morrison said yesterday when speaking in the United Kingdom, because of that very programme we may save much bloodshed and perhaps shorten the war. For there are many people in various parts of the world, in Europe and particularly in Asia, who are not convinced that the united nations offer the best solution in the post-war period. The man who was born and brought up in the east has learned in many respects to suspect the white man and his rule, and there are nations in Europe that feel, perhaps less tensely but none the less surely, a somewhat similar motivation. Therefore, in the prosecution of this war it is up to us at the same time to arrive at some approaches—perhaps they can be no more than approaches—which will convince the conquered nations of Europe and those of the east now dominated by the enemy that because of our history and civilization and because of our programme, we may offer them much more in connection with their personal and national rehabilitation.

I noticed one vein running through the speeches of hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The other day in the excellent speech of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) there was expressed the thought that we must clearly define our aims, that otherwise the energy which was being put into the fight might be unavailing. The hon. member seemed to suggest that there was a definite connection between the reasons which brought us into the fight and the sort of world which many of us would set up afterwards. I suggest that the hon. gentleman is wrong, that in his mind there was a confusion between the provocation of the war and our peace aims. There can be no doubt as to why we engaged in this tremendous struggle. We did so simply because there were in existence certain forces that were prepared to bring to an end our type of civilization; men who were ready to stop at nothing to achieve great power and great expansion in empire at the expense of decency and civilization itself. That is the reason and the only reason why we engaged in this conflict; and to suggest that we did so in order to build a better world is unintentionally to give Hitler an assumption which he does not deserve. Surely we would have gone on with these plans of reform whether or not the war had come. It may be that the war has brought about a more ready realization of their implications, but surely these plans would have been contemplated by people throughout the world whether or not Hitler had risen to power. Therefore we are fighting, not to build a better world, but to rid the world of a force, a cancer, which prevents the realization of these better things.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would not both our allies and the conquered peoples be greatly encouraged if they knew that when we had rid the world of this force we were going to bring about something better?

Mr. MARTIN: I quite agree, and that is our justification for considering these problems at this time. The committee on reconstruction of which I have the privilege of being a member has a great job to do, and I must say that several of the suggestions advanced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) meet with my approval. In the first place it seems to me that a committee so important requires assistance which the membership of this house alone cannot give. We have the James committee and other non-parliamentary committees composed of various deputy ministers and the like; we have the group in the Department of External Affairs, who are cooperating with many other official agencies of the United Nations. It seems to me the work of the committee would be greatly assisted by the setting up of some efficient, though not necessarily a large personnel research committee or secretariat which could follow up many of the threads which the members of the committees are not equipped or have not time to deal with. There is, however, one thing I believe the committee must not overlook, and it is this. The broad aspect of this problem will not be solved merely by considering palliatives of the sort we had to consider under the shadows of the New Deal both in this country and in other countries, particularly the United States.

The problem is much deeper and broader than that. There is the whole political aspect of the problem Here we have a United Nations scheme, a machinery of action by which on the political side we are trying to offset the strategy, political and military, of the enemy. I am not satisfied that the United Nations scheme for the purpose of carrying on the war is as strong as I should like. I should prefer to see greater emphasis on the United Nations aspect during the conflict than we now have. I could not help agreeing with many of the things which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), speaking in the debate the other day, said when he referred to Casablanca with its advantages, yet with its apparent disadvantages. There was not full expression there of the voice of the United Nations. But if, when the war is over, the machinery of the United Nations is not functioning to the extent that we should like to see it function, think of the dangers we shall fall into at the conclusion, when there will be a tendency towards divergence on the part of the United Nations rather than of convergence. That is extremely important.

This committee therefore will have to consider the political implications of its work. Mr. Morrison yesterday, quite properly I think, because he is a member of a government, one of the important governments in the United Nations group, nevertheless taking the cue from Mr. Welles and Mr. Hull, spoke of the kind of association that must prevail if at the conclusion of hostilities and during the period of liquidation and demobilization when we shall deal with refugee problems and the like, there is to be some order. Then, dealing with the long term, he spoke of the necessity of providing agencies by which the nations will act in concert and not on a competitive basis. Will our committee ignore this problem? Thus far in the deliberations of our committee we have dealt, quite properly but almost exclusively, with problems which in turn depend for their solution upon the settlement of the bigger problems. Must we not take into account that it comes within our ambit to consider whether the old agencies of collective security shall be maintained, or whether we are to build on the old foundation, whether we shall have regional organizations or whether these regional organizations will be simply economic structures? Those are considerations which I trust this committee will not hesitate to deal with fully.

The hon. member for Vancouver East to-day referred to that well-known book, "Conditions of Peace," by Edward Hallett Carr. That book has been widely circularized, more perhaps than many other books. I want to suggest this to the hon. member—perhaps in making this statement one will be accused of a certain amount of generality, but I make it nevertheless, for the same reason that Mr. Carr makes it; it is the underlying assumption of his book. The hon. member for Vancouver East to-day spoke about the necessity of bringing about economic and social reform. I do not quarrel with him on that. I do not wish to get into a discussion now as to whether I am in favour of a system of free enterprise or one of collectivism. I think in the future these labels will have little value, that we are likely to have a combination of both forms. But what I say and what Mr. Carr says is this:

> The essential nature of the crisis through which we are now living is neither military, nor political, nor economic, but moral. A new faith in a new moral purpose is required to reanimate our political and economic system.

It is not simply a question of dollars and cents, it is not simply of economic security, although those things are important; it is a question of a rededication of what democracy really means, a rededication of the generally accepted religious conception and convictions of civilized men that must be at the base of the economic and social system which we are going to set up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this. This problem of the kind of world we shall have may engage the philosopher. Our job is simply to realize that we have certain common objectives to attain. First, the immediate job will be to provide that the man who has borne the primary responsibility for carrying on the war, the man who offered his life on the field of battle, shall be able when he returns to come back to a position where he will be able to compete at least equally with the civilian who was not called upon to bear that kind of sacrifice. I believe that the government, through the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), has a programme, not perfect, but a programme that should commend itself to this house generally, a programme based upon inquiry and an honest approach on the part of various committees of this house.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 26, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REPORT OF DETENTIONS FOR THE PERIOD JANUARY 29, 1943 TO FEBRUARY 26, 1943

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I wish to lay on the table the return which I am required to make every four weeks while the house is in session under paragraph 3 of regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations with respect to the application of these regulations. There have been no persons detained during the period from January 29, 1943, to February 26, 1943, under orders made pursuant to the regulations, and there have been no cases in which the Minister of Justice has declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $3,890,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1944, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $3,890,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to re-expend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

REQUEST FOR TOTAL ESTIMATED EXPENDITURE BY DEPARTMENTS WITH DETAILED BREAK-DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): In order to enable us to scrutinize more closely and in greater detail the various governmental expenditures under the proposed war appropriation bill, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if when he makes his statement to the house on the resolution he will give not only the total estimated expenditures of each department of the government but also a complete detailed break-down of the estimates of each such department.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall give consideration to that request. The practice last year was that each of the defence ministers gave the details of the proposed expenditures in his department and I gave the details of the proposed expenditures in all other departments. There is no particular reason so far as I know why the request of the leader of the opposition should not be complied with, but I should like to consult with the defence ministers to see what course they approve this year. Some of them in any event will give details at a very early stage.

Mr. GRAYDON: My object in making the request at this time is to point out to the minister what we think was a failure in the practice adopted previously in connection with this matter. We are anxious to give the closest scrutiny to the war expenditures this year and it would very much help those of us who will have that responsibility to have laid before the house at an earlier stage than usual the detailed expenditures by departments. In the past, as the minister well knows, not until he had given his statement in the committee were these details actually known to those of us who wish to scrutinize them carefully and direct questions accordingly. If the minister could carry out the suggestion I have made this afternoon the position so far as we are concerned would be similar to that with respect to ordinary civil estimates. The expenditures under the war appropriation bill are by far the most important of our expenditures, and for that reason I should like the minister to give careful consideration to the suggestion I have made.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I cannot speak for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), but I think perhaps he would be in agreement if we were to table a break-down on Wednesday or Thursday—that would give us time to consult with the Minister of National Defence, who is away at the moment. I hardly think we shall get to the discussion on appropriations for defence until Wednesday. In any case if a break-down were tabled as soon as possible and printed in the Votes and Proceedings, would that be satisfactory?

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to ask impossibilities. I rather fancy from what the minister says that his suggestion might meet our requirements. We are anxious to have the whole break-down available either at the time the finance minister makes his statement or very soon afterwards.

Mr. POWER: Last year a break-down was put on Hansard covering all three departments, and I rather think that before we got through discussing the items of the different departments, the break-down on Hansard had been entirely lost sight of. If we give a break-down, under primaries, on Wednesday or Thursday—

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the minister mean by primaries?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. POWER: The different items in the estimates. They call them primaries; I do not know just why, except that they are primary requirements, functional requirements, such as pay and allowances, civil government and so on, more or less as they appear in the ordinary book of estimates in peace time. If such a break-down were given, perhaps my hon. friend would be satisfied.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR SECRET SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been adopted, will he suggest an early date when this house can meet in closed session to discuss matters relating to Canada's part in the war?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to oblige the house. It is entirely a matter of what is likely best to fulfil the wishes of hon. members and best to further public business. The plan on which the government was proceeding was to bring down as soon as possible our financial measures in toto. The estimates are already down. A resolution with respect to the war appropriation has just been advanced a stage from government notices of motion, and will hereafter appear under orders of the day. There is also now upon the order paper a resolution respecting the making of war supplies available for the united nations. In this way we have sought to give the house a complete picture of the sums which the government will ask to have appropriated. The budget will be brought down on Tuesday of next week.

A request has been made that we should establish the standing and select committees as rapidly as possible. Until all the committees are set up and until the house has had the preliminary statements with regard to total expenditures, with the sort of break-down that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has asked for, so that hon. members may be able to study the details, I do not think we should interrupt the proceedings in order to hold a secret session. If the situation were so pressing that a secret session to discuss other matters would be regarded as more important than proceeding with the government's financial measures for the war, in the manner I have indicated, I would say that we would fix a day for a secret session forthwith; but if there is no situation that is being embarrassed by not having a secret session at once I think the house would be in a better position to discuss in secret session matters pertaining to the war after it has had before it a complete picture of the financial situation. It is a matter of balancing. I should be glad to talk it over with my hon. friend and other leaders, if they so desire, and see if we cannot perhaps agree on a time that would be best.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the Prime Minister will pardon me, I should like to add that what prompted me to ask this question to-day was the fact that there has been a great deal of discussion in the British house, where Sir James Grigg, the minister for war, stated yesterday that the Canadian troops would probably soon be engaged. In view of the discussions which have taken place in the British house regarding equipment, and so on, I think it would satisfy some members of the house if a secret session could be held as soon as possible in order that we may make inquiry regarding certain matters which have come to our attention.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES—DEBATE ON THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before proceeding with the orders of the day, in order to continue what I said concerning the proceedings of the house, it may be of assistance to hon. members if I make the matter a little clearer. The Minister of Finance intends to introduce his budget on Tuesday evening. That means that for the remainder of to-day, on Monday, and until the evening of Tuesday, the time of the house will be taken up with other matters. I have felt that it would be furthering the wishes which have been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite if we devoted that time to endeavouring to get the few remaining committees appointed. Fifteen committees have already been appointed. There remain the five of which notices are already on the order paper, one of which was under discussion yesterday and will continue to be discussed to-day. So that between now and Tuesday evening the first order of business will be the discussion of the setting-up of these different committees. The Minister of Finance proposes to proceed on Wednesday with the motion respecting the war appropriation for the ensuing year, and would like to have the house continue with discussion on that measure unless there are some other matters that it may be necessary to take up in the interval. The minister hopes to be able to make headway with the war appropriation discussion from the time that he proceeds with the resolution in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will there be no opportunity of criticism with respect to the budget?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be opportunity, at great length if necessary, but not immediately after its introduction. The minister does not propose to go on with the discussion of the budget for some little time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the Prime Minister gives us some idea as to what he means by "some little time"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Finance will have to answer that.

Mr. CRERAR: How long will it take to discuss the war appropriation?

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand that there will be no reply with respect to the budget until the war appropriation has gone through its stages?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no; the Minister of Finance would be in a better position to say at what particular time the debate on the budget ought to be continued. I understand from him that he would like the remainder of the week to be devoted to the war appropriation measure. He feels it would accommodate hon. gentlemen opposite for him to wait until Monday for the debate on the budget to begin.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

AMENDMENT OF ACT CREATING DEPARTMENT—CHART OF DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspe): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply in connection with bill No. 7. As this bill is voluminous, would the minister be good enough to supply the members with a chart showing how his department is now organized?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be very glad to have a chart showing the department's organization printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

RURAL MAIL

REPRESENTATIONS OF COURIERS AS TO PERMANENCY, SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES, AND COST OF LIVING BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). He is not in the house at the moment but perhaps he would answer on Monday. I understand that representations have been made to the government by the rural mail couriers' organization, relating to permanency of employment, basic salaries and allowances, as well as cost of living bonuses. Will the Postmaster General be good enough to make a statement to the house indicating what consideration has been given to the representations of the rural mail couriers and what decision has been arrived at with respect to the matter?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Acting Postmaster General): The Postmaster General is out of the city to-day, but I shall be glad to bring the question to his attention.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER IN 1942 AS TO SENDING RECRUITS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In closing the debate on bill No. 80 on July 7, 1942, the Prime Minister declared, as reported at page 4014 and following of Hansard of 1942, that before enforcing the decision of the administration to send recruits overseas, he intended to give hon. members an opportunity of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the government. I would like to know from him if since that time anything has occurred which in his mind would relieve him of his responsibility to parliament before enforcing the cabinet's decision upon this very important question.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of which notice should be given.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member asks if anything has occurred to cause me to change my mind with respect to an important statement I made last year to the house. I would answer at once that nothing has.

FINDING OF CHIEF CORONER AT INQUEST IN CASE OF DEATH OF PRIVATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) based upon a report in the Toronto Daily Star of February 25, 1943, in connection with the inquest conducted in the case of the death of a private in the Canadian army. Chief coroner Dr. Smirle Lawson is reported to have said:

Private John Heeney Somerville came to his death on January 29, 1943, in Stanley Barracks from lobar pneumonia and we place the blame on the medical officers in charge, who did not examine the patient sufficiently to determine the serious illness.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that this question should not be answered on the orders of the day. It should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is a serious matter.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I interject a remark with respect to that? I realize that it may not be possible for Your Honour to allow a great multiplicity of questions at the opening hour of each session, but it does seem to me that not enough leniency is allowed to some private members with respect to questions of this kind. This is a matter of considerable importance to the central part of Canada, indeed to all of Canada. I think Your Honour might extend a little indulgence in respect of questions of this nature.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should be very glad to allow leniency where there is a degree of urgency in a question to which a reply may be required within an hour or so. But the question the hon. member is asking would involve at least some research on the part of the department concerned, and the department should be given an opportunity of full inquiry before making reply. I would ask the house to realize that with respect to any question which has a degree of urgency, making an immediate reply necessary, on the orders of the day I shall always be prepared to extend considerable leniency; but where a question involves research and a full reply it should certainly be placed on the order paper. The question now under discussion, so far as I heard it from the hon. gentleman, is not one to which an answer to-day is essential for the hon. member's purpose: it should be placed on the order paper and he will get his answer in due course and in sufficient time.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a good deal of feeling among some hon. members with respect to the issue I have just raised. Many of these questions and these answers are buried in Hansard or as orders for returns, and it is very difficult to get to the public the matters which are so important and which our duties as members require us to bring up. I do not think there should be any objection at least to the hon. member reading his question; it could then stand as a notice to the minister whose department is involved, and who in any event is not in his seat this afternoon, and it can be answered afterwards.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would just point out that the remarks of the leader of the opposition bear out what I have just said. As the minister is not in his place the answer cannot be given to-day. The same publicity is obtained by giving notice of motion or having the question placed on the order paper.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I complete the question, so that it may stand as notice?

Mr. SPEAKER: Since the hon. member has gone so far, he might as well complete the question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will the minister or someone on his behalf advise the house if the matter has been investigated by his department, and what steps have been taken or will be taken to stop this type of neglect in the Canadian army?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): The only objection I would make is that there is an assertion in the hon. member's question that there was neglect, and I am afraid I cannot tell my hon. friend whether or not there was neglect.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The coroner's report is here.

Mr. POWER: I should be quite willing to take it as notice of a question, but if the question was formulated for the purpose of making an assertion that there was neglect on the part of the Minister of National Defence, I think I should object to the question.

BUTTER

APPEAL OF TORONTO GROCERS FOR RESTORATION OF HALF-POUND RATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. A British United Press dispatch appearing in the Ottawa Journal, under date-line of the 25th of February, states that Toronto grocers, with their shelves groaning with butter, yesterday appealed to Ottawa to restore the half-pound ration on March 1 instead of March 15. The secretary of the Toronto Retail Grocers' Association said the grocers feared that butter stocks would spoil on the shelves. "Toronto stores are simply loaded with butter," he added. Will the Minister of Finance indicate to the house what consideration has been given to that appeal?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not aware until my hon. friend gave me notice of the question that any such appeal had been made, and therefore I will have to make inquiries about it.

JEWS IN NORTH AFRICA

REPORT IN "CANADIAN JEWISH REVIEW" AS TO ALLEGED MISTREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in my hand a clipping from the latest issue of the "Canadian Jewish Review" which contains a startling article about the treatment of Jews in North Africa. Will the Prime Minister give an assurance to the house that Jewish people in North Africa are to be quickly freed from such persecution as characterized the Vichy regime in France?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know what my hon. friend's estimate of my powers of prevision may be but the last thing in the world I would attempt to give this house is an assurance with respect to anything which relates to North Africa.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DEVELOPMENT OF 1943 FARM LABOUR PROGRAMME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) asked a question yesterday with respect to the policy of the government as to labour supply for agriculture for the forthcoming season. I wish to make a statement to the house on the development of the government's 1943 farm labour programme.

National farm labour policy, 1943. The national farm labour policy of 1943 calls for the closest coordination of the federal and provincial departments of agriculture, other federal and provincial departments, national and local farm organizations and the cooperation of citizens in general.

1. Stabilizing employment in agriculture. The following measures have recently been taken to strengthen the established policy of the government to stabilize employment in agriculture; in other words, to keep essential labour on the farms.

(a) Under P.C. 246, January 19, 1943, no person employed in agriculture shall accept other employment except for:

(1) Active service in the armed forces.

(2) He may take temporary employment not exceeding sixty days in any calendar year outside an urban municipality with a population over 5,000 but not for a longer time unless he has obtained a permit from an employment and selective service office. All employment offices have been instructed that permits should not be given to those who are essential to agriculture. Provision has been made to allow for the seasonal employment of agricultural workers in logging, lumbering, mining and fishing, when they can be spared from the farms.

(b) Under the mobilization regulations farmers and farm workers applying for postponement of military service shall be granted such postponement until further notice unless it is established to the satisfaction of the board that they are not essential to agriculture.

(c) An interpretative letter was sent on February 1 to the chairman of each mobilization board to ensure greater uniformity in the application of the mobilization regulations and to emphasize the importance of retaining man-power in agriculture. This letter stressed that postponements be granted until further notice to essential agricultural workers.

The letter has been recorded at page 270 of Hansard of February 9, 1943, and I will not take time to read it now. It has clarified the situation. Some suggestions have been made that mobilization boards will not follow the procedure outlined. I have not had any such intimation from a single member of any board in Canada.

My personal contact with the mobilization boards, as members know, has been since December 1 only; however, I am confident I can depend upon full cooperation from them and on compliance with the regulations by them.

2. Dominion-provincial cooperative farm labour activity. For the past three years a very successful activity was carried on in Ontario on a dollar for dollar basis jointly by the dominion and the province whereby workers consisting of men and women and students from urban centres were recruited for farm work.

Last year a number of other provinces entered into a similar agreement. The salient features of these agreements, in which the federal Department of Labour shared the expenditures equally with the provinces concerned, were as follows:

In Ontario, the financial assistance was used to expand the activities of the farm service force. This force was made up of high school students, university students, schoolteachers and townspeople during vacation and spare hours. Under this arrangement over 50,000 placements were made on farms during the 1942 season. Fifty thousand persons were made available for farmers who otherwise would not have gone near a farm.

In Nova Scotia, assistance in fruit picking operations in the Annapolis valley was provided. Agreements were made with each of the three prairie provinces to provide financial assistance for the recruiting, transporting and placement of emergency help for harvesting operations.

In British Columbia, the financial assistance was used in carrying out special measures to meet the labour requirements for fruit picking.

This dominion-provincial cooperative plan will be expanded and further developed this year in all provinces. Already conferences to this end have been conducted. Suggestions have been made that we develop a woman's land army—well, you see we have had three years of successful experience with a much broader scheme in Ontario and to a lesser degree in other provinces.

This year we will exceed our 50,000 individuals of 1942 in Ontario and do equally well in other provinces.

3. Return of workers to agriculture from seasonal employment. Arrangements through the employment and selective service offices are planned and will go into effect to ensure that farmers and farm workers engaged in seasonal employment in logging, lumbering and other seasonal work return to agriculture in time for spring work. These men were encouraged to leave agriculture during the winter, when they could be spared on the understanding that they would go back to the farms in the spring.

There are some 175,000 men who were moved from farms for winter work who must return to agriculture, otherwise they will lose their rights to postponement under the mobilization regulations.

The employment offices will not issue permits to them for work in any other industry.

Positive assurance therefore exists that this large body of men will be available for 1943 farm work.

4. Existing pools of man-power to be tapped. There are several sources from which we will recruit farm labour a few of which are:

(a) Prisoners of war. The labour department will explore the possible use of prisoners of war on farms and will assume the responsibility for this activity.

(b) Japanese in Canada. Already representatives of the sugar beet growers of Alberta and Ontario have representatives in the Japanese towns in British Columbia negotiating for Japanese labour. We used these men successfully in Alberta, Manitoba and to a lesser degree, in Ontario last year. In 1943 we expect still greater success.

(c) Indians on reserves. Treaty Indians from the reserves will be used on farms. This was tried out last fall and proved satisfactory and will be further developed this year.

(d) Other sources. Other sources of potential farm man-power will be explored. These include recruitment and training of women for driving farm equipment; use of civilian internees; use of men discharged from the armed forces and numerous others.

5. Drawing from industries. A survey will be made, and based on same, industries which can do so without impairing the war effort will be required to release men and women suitable for farm work. This may mean that during the rush seasons some industries may be closed temporarily.

6. Direction to agriculture of persons unfit for military service. The authority provided under national selective service regulations will be used to direct to agriculture unmarried men who are called for military service and are found to be unfit and who in the opinion of the national selective service officer are suitable for farm work. These men will be directed to productive farms where labour is needed. The government will pay transportation and if found necessary will make an initial allowance for work clothing. Furthermore, the department will see to it that the man is paid promptly.

7. Mobility of labour. To provide absolute mobility of farm labour so that man-power may be moved from areas where work is completed to other areas where needed, the dominion government will provide transportation when the movement is from one province to another and will share expenditures within the province with the provincial governments. This will permit of organization of farm labour excursions and similar arrangements.

8. Local agricultural war committees. Local agricultural war committees in counties, townships, parishes and municipalities have already been established by several of the provinces to promote organized effort in local communities to meet 1943 farm production goals. Other provinces have this same plan under consideration. Such committees can assist greatly in carrying out the details of the farm labour programme. The committees would be asked to perform the following functions:

(a) To encourage within the local area the best use of existing farm man-power through the efficient planning and management of farm operations, farmers working together where practical, the sharing of labour, and the cooperative use of farm machinery.

(b) To determine seasonal and full-time farm labour requirements in the community.

(c) To encourage the transfer of labour from low to high productive farms and to work with provincial agricultural representatives, other provincial field men, and local employment and selective service officers in facilitating the placement of the most productive farms of workers brought in from other sources.

(d) To assist provincial field men and employment officers in recruiting farmers and farm workers who can be spared from agriculture during the slack seasons for work in other essential primary industries.

(e) Supplying information regarding the essentiality, or otherwise, of farm workers whose cases are under consideration by the mobilization boards when requested to do so. The local committees could be of assistance by reporting the facts regarding men who have not made themselves essential to agriculture by increasing production on the farm where they are working or by moving to a farm where their services are required. They could also report men who are unwilling to undertake essential seasonal work elsewhere when they can be spared from agriculture. Such reports will be made available to national selective officials, the representatives of national defence and agriculture, appearing before the mobilization board and taken in conjunction with reports received from recruiting committees and other sources will enable the board to reach a decision based on the facts.

9. Movement of workers from low productive farms. Encouragement will be given to those at present on low productive farms to move to more productive farms. Each province will be requested to explore this possibility and to develop detailed plans which will best fit the local necessities.

10. Experienced farmers will be used to advise:

(a) Appointment of regional national selective service officials with farm experience. Qualified men with agricultural experience will be appointed to the employment staff of each region and where necessary within individual provinces.

(b) Agricultural division of the labour supply branch. An agricultural division of the labour supply branch has been established. On its staff are men experienced in agriculture.

(c) Close liaison with federal Department of Agriculture. A close contact will be maintained between this agricultural division and the federal and provincial departments of agriculture.

(d) Representation of agriculture on National Selective Service advisory board. An outstanding farmer who is a member of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has been added to the National Selective Service advisory board.

11. Discussion of programme with provincial authorities. This programme will be sent at once to each provincial department of agriculture and labour to be followed by detailed discussions in each province between their respective officials and representatives of the Department of Labour immediately.

Mr. REID: Has the minister given consideration to the utilization of the hundreds of conscientious objectors who are employed in forestry camps and who could be given work of a more pressing nature?

Mr. MITCHELL: This matter is at this moment receiving the attention of the Department of Labour. We expect to make an announcement within the next few days.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not note in the minister's statement any reference to whether the government had made a nation-wide survey to find out exactly how many men and women will be required to meet the needs of the production programme on the farms.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have many surveys; I should be glad to show them to my hon. friend. After all it is only a guess. The figure you get to-day is dead to-morrow; in fact sometimes it is dead a long time before it reaches me, owing to the constant changes in the agricultural situation in a seasonal country. But if my hon. friend would like to see the best thing we have I shall be glad to give it to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not particularly for my own purposes that I am asking the question; I am only anxious to find out whether the government is approaching the matter from one point of view or the other. The government ought to know what is required before it decides on the policy to fill the requirement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With reference to the letter addressed by the deputy minister, Mr. MacNamara, to the mobilization boards, will the minister say how many answers have been received, and will he lay them on the table? I happen to know of one from a member of the mobilization board in New Brunswick. It was a most constructive letter; I wish it could go on Hansard. It gave the considered opinion of a man who is doing a fine piece of work. I may add that he is not the chairman of the board, either. It would be most instructive if those letters could either be read into Hansard or printed in Votes and Proceedings. I ask the minister in any event to lay them on the table so that we may see what is the reaction of the members of these boards to the suggestion of the deputy minister of labour as set forth in that letter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the Minister of Labour think that any instructions or suggestions have issued from any other department of the government to the boards, which might have a bearing upon the decisions they would make in the cases of those who might otherwise be granted postponement because they are essential to agriculture? Cases are being reported to me of men who so far as the ordinary human intelligence can see ought to be granted postponement by reason of their being essential to agriculture; but for some reason the boards are not granting postponement. It gives rise to the question whether orders are going out from the government countermanding orders from the minister's department.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the hon. member can rest assured that no orders have gone out from the government contrary to those of the Department of Labour.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are not quotas sent out by the Department of National Defence to the boards asking them to secure a certain number of recruits each month? Does the Department of Labour get that direct from defence headquarters here?

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF NAVAL OFFICER AS TO ENEMY SUBMARINE OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): May

I have a moment to make a statement on a matter brought before the house yesterday by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling)? I was not able to get this information yesterday because Admiral Brodeur was on his way to Washington, and at the time I had not seen the Quebec newspapers. The statement I should like to make is as follows:

A Canadian Press dispatch appearing in newspapers of February 25 states that Rear-Admiral Brodeur of the Canadian Navy had declared in an interview in Quebec "that the Germans may concentrate as many as 500 or 600 submarines around Halifax and Newfoundland next summer to harass allied convoys."

I am advised that no representative of the Canadian Press was present at the interview; that the only reporters present were one from the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph and one from L'Action Catholique, which is published in Quebec. Sub-Lieutenant Jacques Trepanier, of the Department of Naval Information, was also present at the interview.

The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph report contains the following item:

He (Admiral Brodeur) maintained that if the enemy puts out from 500 to 600 submarines this year, in which case the Germans would probably place many around Halifax and off Newfoundland . . ."

L'Action Catholique news story contains no reference to specific numbers of submarines.

We telegraphed Rear-Admiral Brodeur and his reply is as follows:

I wish to state that at no time during press interview or during address did I state 500 or 600 submarines would be off Canadian coast nor was the closing of St. Lawrence ever mentioned. Lieutenant Trepanier was present on all occasions and should be able to verify my statement. During interview and speech it was mentioned—

The word is doubtful in the cypher used in the telegram; it is either "mentioned" or "suggested". I think the correct word is "mentioned".

—that the enemy might have 500 to 600 submarines for operations in Atlantic ocean.

Sub-Lieutenant Trepanier confirms the view that Rear-Admiral Brodeur did not say that 500 to 600 submarines would be concentrated off Halifax or Newfoundland. It would therefore seem that the Canadian press report appearing in certain newspapers on February 25 has not quoted Rear-Admiral Brodeur correctly in this regard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister notified the rear-admiral that he should not talk at all?

72537—47½

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, it is difficult for naval officers or officers of any of the forces, besieged as they often are by reporters, to say nothing. Often they are in a position where silence could be construed as a statement. I do not think these men want to talk, but I think they are really on occasions compelled to say something.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Even with the best interpretation put upon the statement made by the minister this afternoon it seems to me that a good deal is left to be desired with respect to the whole matter in connection with the safety of our country at this time. Civilians all over Canada are asked to seal their lips with respect to all matters concerning safety measures, and I think we should at least expect those in higher positions of authority to set us an example. I hope the minister will take appropriate steps to see that that is done in his department and among those who are in the navy.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) for the appointment of a select committee to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): When I adjourned the debate last night I had commented on the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in respect of the treatment of men who return after fighting in the present war. I concurred generally in what he had to say. I am sure he would be the first to want to impress on the country what has been done by the government, the Department of Pensions and National Health and the various committees of this house who have dealt with this very problem.

It might be helpful at this time if we were to review some of the endeavours and achievements in that regard. First of all, there is the Pension Act, which was revised in 1941; a committee of this house presented a long series of recommendations, most of which were adopted by the government within six months of being recommended. The regulations with regard to medical assistance and treatment have been revised in various instances, and while I do not suppose they satisfy all hon. members nevertheless some real progress has been made. Then we would not want to forget the provisions concerning out-of-work benefits, vocational training, physical reconditioning, assistance to returned men who propose to engage in agriculture and who require credit, continued education, and the fixing of the proper status of the returned man under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then there is the Compulsory Reinstatement In Industry Act passed in 1942; the Vocational Training Coordination Act of 1942; the extension of the principle of civil service preference to returned soldiers; the preference supposed to be given to returned men in respect of defence contracts; the setting up of representatives in government employment offices throughout the nation to look after the returned men, and the setting up of the various citizens' committees. One might also mention the work in regard to hospitalization, with the expansion of the number of beds from some 2,000, I believe, to about 8,000.

This record is not complete, but I am sure hon. members will agree that the problem has engaged the attention not only of the administration but of this house, and that what has been done reflects the determination of the membership of this house to do everything possible to ensure that those who have the primary responsibility in carrying on this fight will not suffer when they return to this country. Therefore, as was done last year by hon. members on the other side of the house, I think it is only fair to commend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for the leadership he has given in this endeavour.

Last night, too, I sought to indicate that in my opinion the general purpose would be best served in this debate by considering the general principles of the problems involved, leaving the working out of details to the committee. Perhaps I should preface what I have to say in that connection by agreeing with the observations of Doctor George Luxton, now with the Department of Labour, who in a recent number of Public Affairs said:

> It is idle for us at the present time to draw up detailed blueprints to show how the employment gap will be closed. So much depends both on Canadians possessing the same unity of purpose as they have had in war time, and on an international atmosphere of mutual cooperation. But we can fruitfully consider the major determinants of the solution.

Is that not really as far as we can properly go? We must be prepared with our ideas and our plans, but in no circumstances must these be regarded as final, because they will depend for their ultimate determination on circumstances and contingencies which are not now before us.

Mr. MacINNIS: Nothing is final.

Mr. MARTIN: No; but I think it is important for use to realize that, because sometimes when hon. gentlemen speak one has the impression that they have in mind a solution, a formula by the mere exercise of which these problems may be readily solved. I agree that it is not enough merely to state the four freedoms. I agree that it is not enough merely to confine oneself to general observations. Public opinion in this country and all over the world will demand a translation of those general observations into practical measures, so that the masses of our people will be secure in employment which will enable them to provide properly for their dependents, which will permit them to be properly housed, with adequate nutrition, adequate health standards, adequate educational opportunities and so on. Certainly these will be the minimum requirements; and bearing in mind that we are now giving of our property and our treasure to an extent to which we are not prepared to place any limit, I subscribe to the view that we should approach the problem of social readjustment in the same light. If we can spend our money and our energy on the prosecution of a war which was not of our making, every member of this house knows that as a public man he will be called upon to meet the public demand and see to it that we fight all the social and economic evils with the same energy and to the same extent that we are prepared to fight this war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member would permit a question, what form would he expect that demand to take?

Mr. MARTIN: I have only a short time left, and I want to state my point of view, but I will not overlook that matter.

Last evening I quoted from the book by Professor Carr which was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), to indicate that there was a moral crisis and that one should not overlook this fact in considering the problems of the day. I did not mean to have that statement detached and to serve as an apologia for our omissions. I merely said, and repeat, that an affirmation of this kind is an expression of belief in the destiny of humanity itself, based upon common religious acceptances, which is fundamental to any economic or social programme that may be contemplated.

Reference has been made to the planning technique, and I support the suggestion that has been offered. Of course one must plan, in the sense that one must prepare; but I say that by planning or by suggesting the planning technique we must not assume for one moment that as a result we shall have a dogma or a formula which in itself will be capable of dealing with any problem. Planning in the sense of preparation must be done, of course; and I readily admit that heretofore there has not been enough planning. In a moment I shall indicate the sort of planning I envisage, but I suggest that one must take great care in the setting up of the planning technique not to fall into the mistake of creating rigidities which will reduce men to the form and the position to which they have been reduced where planning techniques with false motives have been applied, particularly in the totalitarian countries. Right in our own country, during the emergency of war, we have set up a planning technique. What has been the result? There has been a very serious diminution of human liberty, a suspension which we are prepared to accept, having in mind the victory we all want and for which we are all striving. But I say this, and it may apply to the present situation as well as to the future. The planning technique as well as the system of administrative controls which must inevitably linger must be constantly abutted by legislative supervision and legislative scrutiny if we are not to have a situation in which these requirements are dealt with at the expense of human liberty, if we are not to have to return to the very sort of thing from which for centuries man has striven to extricate himself.

What I meant last night when I said that we had to look at this problem from the broad perspective was that these effects will be of no avail unless the whole thing is done on a collective basis with the participation of all nations. Our country which looks to the markets of the world for the source of its major income is in a special position in that respect. Consequently the kind of planning that I would envisage would be one where the key commodities available to all nations would be distributed through properly controlled non-privileged international pools, where production and distribution would be controlled by international cartels, again not based upon legal or special privilege. The trend of the future must certainly be toward more extensive international control over raw materials, foreign exchange, markets and credit by some, let us call it a supranational agency along the lines designated this morning by Mr. Sumner Welles and yesterday in the United Kingdom by Mr. Morrison.

This in turn will call for the creation of some mechanism by which this can be brought about, and I would hope to think that the committee will formulate a plan and subscribe to the idea of the creation of an international bank, the control of production and distribution of the major foodstuffs and materials, a rationalized system of immigration and migration, the control of employment and the promotion of health and social welfare measures. All these things can be done only by collective effort. That is where I want to leave the emphasis. That is the impression I wish to leave, if I leave no other.

We have now the United Nations set-up. There are some who would create a new paper organization for the world, but I am not one of those. While I think the United Nations organization as now constituted could be perfected, I still should like to see its continuance. The present set-up between this country and the United States in the form of corporate bodies, the governmental agencies which have been set up between the United States and the United Kingdom and now between Russia and China—these ad hoc corporations and committees must continue. It is by such a movement, and by such a movement alone that we shall bring about some stabilization in the problems that will face us in the period of liquidation as well as in the period of the long term. If that does not happen we can expect only a recurrence of the incidents which brought about the situation that made it possible for unruly, evil men to try to gain control of the world as well as of their own continent.

It seems to me that we should have a programme of this kind set up, and I make the suggestion to the house somewhat along the lines of that made by Mr. Percy Corbett. We should have a trade commission instructed to secure the removal of quotas and other direct restrictions on trade and the reduction of tariffs. There should be a central bank developed out of the present bank of international settlements and having authority to fix funds and to maintain exchange rates. There should be a development commission having at its disposal substantial funds for financing public works of an international character and industrial installations, with the double object of raising the standard of living in undeveloped areas of the world and furnishing new outlets for the productive capacity of existing industrial countries. There should be a migration and settlement commission.

We may find ourselves at the end of hostilities faced with the situation we were faced with after the last war. A powerful creditor nation group or possibly a powerful creditor nation may find itself in competition with other countries of the world that want to improve their immediate position and that find themselves obliged to compete in the markets of the world with that nation. If we are to have once again nationalistic monopolies; if we are to have private monopoly based on privilege, then we may as well give up. Great and gigantic as this task is, I have every confidence that we shall all be able to agree on the formula and the programme. It is by emphasizing these general principles that I think this committee and this government can make its ultimate contribution in helping us to get somewhere. The emphasis in the future must not be on the acquisitive side; it must be on the contributive side. The endeavour of men and all nations it seems to me should be not what they can get out of it but what they can make by way of contribution. We should strive to eliminate the two extremes which should not exist, particularly in a country like Canada, namely, the extreme of poverty on the one hand and the extreme of richness on the other.

It seems to me that these general observations should serve as lines of approach by this committee. I am not unaware of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in this house on March 25, 1942, as reported on page 1628 of Hansard. He said:

> The war has to be won before there can be any thought of reconstruction; and if the winning of the war is to include as we hope it must the restoration of freedom to those parts of the world from which freedom has been taken away by aggressor nations there is yet a vast task that lies ahead of the free nations of the world. I stress this because I should like to remove altogether any impression that in constituting a committee of this house to study the problems of reconstruction, the government or any one on this side of the house—or for that matter I hope I may say anyone in this House of Commons—entertains the illusion that at the present time we are anywhere within sight of the termination of the present war, or by any means certain as to its course at least for the immediate present.

I think we shall all concur in that. We do not want to give a false impression; we do not want to have emphasis made where emphasis is not intended; we simply mean that part of the job of winning this war is to cultivate confidence in the minds and hearts of those who are now in the territories occupied by the enemy. Let them know that we, too, are thinking of a programme for the improvement of the lot of man from the point of view of economic and social welfare. Let them know that when the time comes we shall be prepared to deal with the tremendous problems which will face us.

We made a great mistake at the close of hostilities in the last war. We built a utopia.

[Mr. Martin.]

I was one of those. We thought that by putting formulae on paper we could bring about the millennium. We did not take into account the tremendous forces that the war had created. This time we must try to keep our feet on the ground. This time let us have a realistic approach, not forgetting the ideal but ever having in mind the practical difficulties. There is a challenge to our generation in this period of revolution, and that is what it is. Whether that challenge be managerial; whether it be collectivist; whether it be the functions of free enterprise or collectivism, there is a challenge to our society. It seems to me that the well-intentioned man in the good society should not fear this challenge; rather he should look upon it as affording an opportunity for constructive action.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in order to bring to the attention of the committee which is to deal with these matters, of the house and of the country a problem which I consider will be one of the most important and most difficult of those we shall have to solve in the years to come. It is in a way a problem special to the air force, but it does in a degree concern the other two armed services. It arises out of the hope, the desire and even the necessity which falls upon the people of Canada to deal effectively with the rehabilitation of the young men whom we have enlisted as aircrew and sent overseas. The problem differs to some extent from that which arose after the last war, and I say that with some knowledge because for the past twenty-five years I have been actively interested in the rehabilitation of the veterans of the last war.

My interest is also attracted by the fact that the most difficult cases we had to settle, and which I feel we were not able to settle satisfactorily with all the machinery and all the planning we undertook following the last war, were those of the teen-age boys who had enlisted before they reached their twenties. In this war, perhaps not a majority but still a very large proportion of the young men who are now in our fighter and bomber squadrons in the middle east and all over the world, are young men who have hardly reached the age of twenty. They have been taken from their high schools, or colleges and universities, and in some cases their education was not complete. They have not as yet established themselves in any vocation, in any trade, in any industry. We took them at the threshold of their lives and we have placed them in one of the most hazardous of all occupations. These young men have no job to go back to. They have no career in life. They may have had their hopes; they may have had their ambitions; they may have had their minds directed to one or other of the various occupations, that would be open to them in this country, but I submit to this house that the experiences which they are undergoing at the present time have in all probability diverted their minds from their peace-time thinking on these matters.

What shall we do with these men? We take them away from their schools and put them through the joint empire training plan. We teach them to fly, and they work up to the time when they first get into an aeroplane and experience the thrill of flying. There is the excitement, the hurly-burly of bringing themselves up to the point when they want to get into an aeroplane; after they have got into it and had the necessary training there is the thrill of their first solo flight; later, the thrill of moving into a faster aircraft and still later to a twin-engined bomber. Then they go overseas and are put through an operational training unit, where they learn to handle and to fight in a machine in which they are going into combat with the enemy. Then they are posted to an operational squadron, let us say a bomber squadron. They are sent on flights, varying from ten to twenty hours in duration, mostly at night in the darkness and in all kinds of weather; and ever present in their minds, no matter how brave they may be, there is the possibility of some mechanical defect in their engine. Always there is the danger of a lurking enemy night fighter. Then they find themselves right over the centre of the object which has to be attacked. They are surrounded by anti-aircraft fire. Sometimes their machine is almost torn asunder by flak explosions. They drop their bombs and begin the long trip home.

All this requires courage of a different kind from the courage which was required of the soldiers in the last war. The soldiers in the trenches needed nerve to sit there under bombardment day after day, in the wet and the dirt and the muck of the trenches. The airman requires a different kind of courage from that of the man who goes over the top to attack the enemy fortifications, and from that of the man who took part in the old-fashioned glorious cavalry charge. It is a different kind of courage that keeps the airman's nerve from wearing out under constant wracking hour after hour and day after day until such time as his operational tour is completed. As a result of these experiences these men will come back to Canada, not wounded—that is not the problem, because the doctors can look after any functional disability. What we have to look after is the disability of the mind. We have thwarted that young man's ambitions and his hopes. We have violently and abruptly taken him away from the career which he might have hoped for and might have had in this country, and when he comes back here there is a let-down from all the thrills and excitement of the months of his training and the months of his operations. When the period of let-down comes, that young man, no matter who he may be, becomes a problem not only for the air force—it is their problem first, I admit—but after that, a problem for the whole country and a problem for every one of us to consider seriously. He has become nerve weary. He is suffering from mind fatigue. As I said before, I do not care how brave or courageous he may be; something must happen to him when he goes out time after time on those hazardous journeys, waiting for the worst to happen.

How to treat him is a very difficult question. We have plans. We are proposing to send some of them to convalescent homes, but there are those who when they reach Canada do not want to hear any more about the war. They do not want to see a uniform again. They do not want to hear the sound of a motor. They ought to be sent away somewhere. Convalescent homes may suit them, but I do not know that convalescent homes where they would meet others of their own kind would be suitable, because they might be continually talking or thinking of the horrors they had undergone. We can and will arrange for their rehabilitation and the completion of their education at colleges and universities. We can arrange for their vocational training. We can endeavour to find them jobs in the air force while they are still with us, and then outside, after they have decided to leave. But I fear that the finding of jobs in the air force will not be so easy. It looked easy. I have been giving this matter consideration almost ever since I took on this ministry. But I know the experience I had in the last war. I have talked with every one with whom I could speak on this subject. I have discussed it with chaplains, who are nearest perhaps to the innermost thoughts of these boys. I have discussed it with the auxiliary services, and talked it over with psychologists and psychiatrists. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, although we have all these plans, I think it is a matter almost of dealing with each individual man as an individual case. It is almost impossible to lay down a formula.

It was easy enough for us to think: Well, we have any number of ground jobs here in Canada, any number of positions which could be made available by transfer or transposition. Frankly I thought we could bring back many hundreds of these men when they got through with operations and send others overseas to take their places; that they could carry on administrative work or even act as instructors in the place of the instructors here. Our experience up to the present has been too short for me to give any definite statement of opinion on it, but I have found that many of these lads will not stay here and will not take ground jobs. Some may come back with a certain amount of feeling against those who have jobs here in Canada, an unreasonable and unjustifiable feeling, but many of these returned men have not been here six months before they are begging and praying to go back to another tour of operational work. They do not seem to want to remain here.

I have in mind now four or five of the finest of our young fellows, all of whom have been decorated, and two of whom, I know, were offered and accepted command of fighter squadrons in Canada. But they would not remain here; they wanted to go back. It is a real problem to find something for them to do. Ground positions—administrative positions, equipment officer appointments, such jobs are open to them; the Lord knows they can have them so far as we are concerned and we will take all the time required to train them, because all of them had not the necessary training in high schools prior to enlistment, and they have had less opportunity for such training since they joined the air force. They were busy training for fighting or actually in operations. As I say, we will take all the time necessary to train and to acclimatize them to Canadian conditions; but I fear that unless we handle them somewhat differently and give the best thought of the country to this problem, we may not make a success of it.

The other point I wish to bring out is the importance of dealing adequately with this matter; because do not forget that these young men are the men on whom Canada's destiny is to be built. They are physically of the highest standard of Canadian youth. They are picked men educationally and mentally. They are the men who normally ten years hence would have been sitting in this House of Commons and fifteen or twenty years hence would have been occupying these treasury benches or the benches opposite.

[Mr. Power.]

I speak with feeling, because I believe this is one of the most important problems with which we have to deal. As I said, we have plans and have been giving them thought. I am not sure that our plans will succeed. It may be, as I have said, that we shall have to deal individually with each case. Even to-day, when they come back, and while they are still in the air force and under discipline, I am not sure whether we should have them under extremely severe discipline or under the least discipline possible. I am not sure which is best for them.

We are in the position that it is very difficult to place them under the command of men who saw service in the last war, even if those men won medals and decorations in that conflict. They are not at all interested in the old men of 1914-18, and the young men of their own generation who have seen service in this war are perhaps not old enough to take charge of a job which needs the wisdom of a serpent, the patience of the Madonna, knowledge of psychiatry and psychology and the equipment of a doctor of philosophy.

Frankly, therefore, we are faced with a difficult problem. I ask the house to give it the best consideration; above all, to have patience with those who are trying to do a job of work with it. I ask each hon. member individually to think over something in this regard, and I can assure the house that we will give every consideration possible to ideas from any quarter with regard to any one of these boys who come back.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure that I can contribute very much of value to this discussion, but before I embark on a consideration of the material which I had prepared I wish to tell the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) that I am glad he brought up the particular problem to which he has referred. The position of these young men who have returned after months of trying activity in the most hazardous of all occupations so far during this war is a special and real problem of itself. But it is not the only problem relating to the returned man.

Mr. POWER: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not by any means. Perhaps, as a matter of magnitude and intensity, having regard to the fact that the air forces have been in action so much, and will continue to be until the very end, it will be more difficult to treat than that of members of other branches of the armed forces.

But there are other problems with regard to these men to which grave attention will have to be paid. I am not sure that we are grappling with the problem of the returned men to-day. I had a rather shocking experience on a train, coming here last Monday. I am referring to it only in passing; it arose from the discussion raised by the minister. I met two men on that train, one a discharged soldier from the Dieppe commando. He had enlisted in the city of Hamilton; he had gone overseas with his unit; he had volunteered to go to Dieppe; he had fortunately returned, but he had eleven shrapnel wounds in one of his legs. He returned to England, was placed in hospital for several weeks and then assigned to a unit at Aldershot. He told me that while he was there, an explosion of a gas main occurred in the camp. He volunteered with nine others to help fix the leak, and while he was so engaged he was severely gassed, taken again to hospital, and sent back to Canada to military district No. 5, in which he was born but in which he had not lived for many years. He was discharged in February of this year; and I saw his discharge. As the train bustled along I made this notation—I am not going to mention his name; I have written to the army about him. This is what is on his discharge sheet: "His services no longer required. Unsuitable for the army."

What do hon. members suppose was done to that boy? He was given a ticket costing $2.35 to the place where he was going, but he was refused a ticket to Hamilton at which point he said he could get his old position back. I am going to test the truth of that statement. It is of course an ex parte statement, and I do not know yet as to its correctness. But if the minister and other members of the government could have heard the curses that that young man heaped upon the Canadian army authorities he would have cause to stop, ponder and think. May I say, further, that at the beginning of the conversation that young man did not know who I was, although subsequently he did learn.

Another young man had come from the neighbouring county of Charlotte. He had been in the army for two years, but had not been sent out of Canada. Upon enlistment he was rated as category A. He was born and brought up in a farming community, and had never learned a trade. Although he had attended barber school for six weeks he had never worked at barbering. Upon entering the army he was given a trade course as an acetylene welder. This course affected his health, with the result that he could not go on. His physical condition deteriorated to a point where, after spending two years in Canada and after the government spending a good deal of money on his training, he was discharged as category E. He applied for a trade course to become a barber, and was refused on the ground that when he enlisted he had told the army authorities he was a barber. Why he did so, I do not know.

If those two men could be here to-day and the minister could hear what they had to say about army authorities I am sure he would stop, ponder and think. I do not say that these stories are true, but I am trying to investigate them. They indicate, however, the magnitude of this problem of rehabilitation. I shall not say anything further with regard to these two cases, because I do not wish to judge them on the basis of ex parte statements. However, they appealed so strongly to me that I undertook to investigate them and, to the best of my ability, I am doing so.

The minister has raised the special case respecting airmen, and I believe he has done a service in bringing that matter to the attention of the house. I am afraid I cannot help him very much. I believe each case will have to be solved on its own merits, and some sort of remedy will have to be applied in individual cases where men do not, of their own volition and through the exercise of their own will-power settle down to civilian life. I say, however, that this may be one of the gravest problems with which the country will have to deal in days to come.

I listened with a good deal of attention to the speech of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I have no intention of following him through the philosophical disquisitions he placed upon the record so eloquently, but I suggest to him we must be a bit more realistic about this question of reconstruction. It will be a question of jobs, not theories. Only jobs will put contentment into the hearts of these returned men, and the others who will be transferred from war to civilian employment. You can talk about your League of Nations; you can talk about collective action with respect to the world set-up to be; you can say what you like about the mistakes made following the last war; but may I remind the house most respectfully that we won the last war, and we have not won this one yet. Let us not lose sight of fundamentals. The fundamental thing upon which this nation to-day should focus its attention is the winning of the war. In the statement my hon. friend read near the conclusion of his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself emphasized that matter fully. Do not let us lose sight of the principal thing which should hold our attention to-day. This war is not yet won, and 1943 promises to be a pretty tough year. I think it will be the turning point in the war.

The terms of reference of the resolution practically reduce the committee to a study club. I am not objecting to that, but I must point out that that is really all the resolution is. I am sorry that in moving it the minister did not give a lead to parliament as to what was in the minds of the administration. It is the duty of the minister charged with the administration of soldier civil reestablishment and civil rehabilitation to give a lead to the country, when he proceeds to set up a committee under a motion of this kind. The government ought to have a policy which it is prepared to lay before the committee and before parliament. For aught I know, the minister has, but his very silence in not making any statement with respect to the matter when moving this substantive motion indicates to me that the government has no policy. He ought to make that position abundantly clear before the resolution passes.

Where does the government stand on this question, or is it going to leave this huge problem to the membership of the committee, and of the house generally? Not one of the members of the committee is an expert—and I say that with great respect and all due deference. I look over the names of these hon. gentlemen, all of whom are intent on trying to do their very best with respect to the study of this problem, but none of whom is capable of solving these problems.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some of them know a great deal about giving jobs, though.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am coming to that later. I shall tell the membership of the house, if I have time before I take my seat, that there are three agencies which will solve ninety per cent of the problems in connection with rehabilitation. Those three agencies are private enterprise, coordinated with labour and capital. I am dealing with our own country. Those three agencies will largely solve the problem of rehabilitation, if they are given encouragement by the government, government support and wise legislation. My hon. friend's interjection has prompted me to say this before I had intended to do so.

Coming back to my original thesis, namely, that the war is not yet won, that that is fundamental, and that 1943 is to be a tough year, I say we must take the position that until the war is won any discussion of post-war conditions and post-war problems is merely academic. On that point I find myself in agreement with the Prime Minister. Conditions may change from day to day, and any hard and fast decisions which may be reached in advance of victory, or in advance of a victorious peace, may well prove to be wholly illusory. Therefore I say with all the earnestness and sincerity at my command: let us keep our eyes and our minds on fundamentals; let us keep our eye on the ball.

My approach to the consideration of these matters is not based on any philosophical theories as expounded so eloquently by the hon. member for Essex East, or any other economic theories. He stated yesterday that the approach to this problem must not be in terms of public works and that sort of thing. With that I am also more or less in agreement. But it should be in terms of the kind of world and the kind of country in which we shall live in the post-war years. That, he said, was the basic consideration for this discussion. I do not follow him there. I think what the people of this country are concerned about, what the men and women who are in war industry in Canada to-day, who may lose their jobs at the termination of hostilities and who should be absorbed into peace-time activities, are thinking about is work and jobs.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what I said; that is the basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The returned men will want work and jobs, but will not want the dole, even in any such form as unemployment insurance. I suggest that the fundamental thing for all is proper planning on the part of all parties and interests so that work may be found for all at remunerative rates, so as to provide a good standard of living. As I listened to my hon. friend and read his remarks of last night I was wondering if he could tell us what kind of world the post-war period will bring. Do any of us really know what kind of world we shall have?

Mr. MARTIN: I said I did not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With some of the objectives outlined in my hon. friend's speech I am in agreement; with others I am not. I have, however, not the time even if I had the desire for an academic discussion of the various topics to which he has referred, except to say that we are at war for a definite purpose. We are at war to put down and defeat forces which seek to put an end to our present type of civilization. That is the one definite object of this war. I agree with the hon. member for Essex East in his statement, I think in reply to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) last evening, that to suggest that we are at war to build a better world, as is sometimes stated, is to give to Hitler and those who think and act as he does, an admission that our present type of civilization is lacking in essentials and fundamentals. That I deny. We can improve it, but it is not lacking in fundamental essentials. In that respect I am in agreement with the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: You are for the status quo.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I am not a Tory; I am for orderly progress; so is this party. I am not for revolution, if that is what the hon. gentleman means. I am neither a reactionary nor a revolutionist. The hon. gentleman can be which of the two he likes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is unfair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury:) It is not. I am leaving him a free choice in a free country. But the gibe was intended to indicate that I was a reactionary seeking to preserve the status quo. We must move forward in this world, but let us do it in the way of orderly progress, not by revolution.

Most if not all of the discussion so far on this resolution, as far as I can observe, and in a degree I will except the hon. member for Essex East, has centred around the theory and the postulate that the state is to do most if not all of the planning and execution of post-war rehabilitation. I say, as a practical citizen of this country, that this theory is unsound. The state cannot plan for me and all of us. The state can and undoubtedly will be obliged to do a great deal, especially during the transition period from war-time to peace-time activity, but fundamentally I submit it is reasonable to assume that post-war conditions will not differ greatly from those obtaining in peace time, and that the type of civilization which we enjoyed prior to 1939 will not be greatly changed in the immediate future. Whatever change there may be I hope will be in the way of orderly progress and evolution. I am in agreement with advance and progress. Undoubtedly at the end of the present hostilities very grave problems will confront us as a nation in common with the rest of the belligerent world, and it is incumbent on every serious and thinking citizen to make a determined and serious effort to anticipate those problems and to explore every avenue for their solution. That I think is the main reason for the setting up of this committee, and with that I am in accord.

Democracy, the democratic nations, somewhat slowly if you will but nevertheless surely, have been able to organize and mobilize their resources to fight the greatest war in history. And that war will be won. I suggest that it should be the business of democracy to organize the resources of this nation and of all democratic nations, each within its own ambit, capital and labour, industry, natural resources of forest, field and mine, in such a way that it cannot be said that while we won the war we lost the peace. If we can organize for war we can organize for peace. I suggest to the minister, to the membership of this committee, and to the membership of this house, that the agency best equipped to attain that great objective is private enterprise in conjunction and in coordination and cooperation with organized labour and our financial resources. These three groups together have the means to do it; they have the experience, and I have no doubt they have the will to do it. These agencies working hand in hand, with good-will and a single purpose, aided by wise legislation and parliamentary action, can do the trick. Among the first essentials to bring about that coordination and cooperation is the greatest measure of good-will on the part of all three. Those who are in charge of all three ought to be urged to have that outlook in approaching these problems.

I do suggest—and I hope this reaches a little wider constituency than the membership of this house—that private enterprise, in cooperation with organized labour and our financial institutions, should now show the way, take the initiative and give the government a lead, instead of waiting for the government itself to produce plans for the rehabilitation of our people after this war is over. I believe that private initiative, backed by and in conjunction with the other agencies I have mentioned, will give that lead; in fact I believe that movement is under way at this very moment. With intelligent direction, mutual understanding and good-will, and by wise legislative policies these three, better than any others, can do more than all the government plans, government spending and regimentation could ever visualize or accomplish.

Private enterprise, aided by the other agencies to which I have referred and in conjunction with them, to-day is taking the initiative in respect of this matter right here in Canada. It may be of interest to the members of this house to learn that recently the heavy industries of this country set up a post-war planning committee, and that other committees have been set up, to consist of representatives of all the institutes and associations concerned with the solution of the post-war problems of the heavy and durable goods industries. The primary objective is to make a determined effort to devise ways and means of providing the maximum amount of employment and as much as possible to avoid unemployment. With the good-will of the nation behind it, and with government aid and direction, this committee will make progress. Other committees are being set up along the same lines, and if they get together and work in cooperation, intelligently encouraged by the citizenship of this country and by governments, they can accomplish a great deal in that connection. Recently I had a conversation with a representative of this committee; and as a basis for preliminary investigation and study he listed nineteen objectives which I should like to place on the record but which I fear I have not time to read to-day. Instead I will hand them to the chairman of the committee. They are objectives which will give new forms of employment, because in many instances they deal with new projects. They are not all governmental; for the most part they are to be undertaken by private enterprise, some by municipal authorities, some by provincial authorities, some by the federal authority and some by these authorities working in cooperation. The list is by no means exhaustive, but it covers a number of concrete topics which I am sure will provide this committee with ample food for thought and exploration.

I do not expect any miracle to be produced as a result of the deliberations of the committee, but I would hope that under the intelligent guidance of an intelligent chairman, such as the committee had last year and, I assume, will have this year, the deliberations of the committee will be constructive and with a single purpose in view. I do not damn it with faint praise; I am rather glad to see the study undertaken, but I am not sure that it will produce a report upon which the nation can act. I hope it will; and if I could be of any assistance I would be only too glad, though I do not feel competent to add anything of any great value to the deliberations of the committee. But I would hope that out of the welter of discussion, out of the examination of experts, out of the exchange of ideas, constructive suggestions might come which later on would give a lead to the government and to the nation. I warn the house, however, that if all is to be left to governments and governmental agencies, as some people would have it, that will not do the trick. You cannot load problems like this on governments and expect to accomplish very much. This is the work of all the people, of the people best qualified to perform these functions. We cannot produce full employment in this country if we leave it all to the state. Indeed this party holds the view that we must avoid the danger of leaning on the state too much. In this connection I commend to this house the philosophy underlying what I consider to be a very able editorial in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday, which states in part:

> It is the duty of the state to try to provide every man with opportunity to earn a livelihood. It definitely is not the duty of the state to care for people who will not take advantage of opportunities to earn their livelihood.

And again, speaking of the terms "equality" and "liberty" which are used so glibly by many people in this country, and so very loosely, the editorial adds:

> It might be a good thing if we could hear something about justice. There is no justice in penalizing industry and thrift for the gain of laziness and extravagance.

I submit that these are wise philosophies. Again I would commend to the membership of this house, and particularly to my hon. friends to the left—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which ones?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the left centre, I will say. I commend to them and to the people of Canada the eight points enumerated in a recent issue of the San Francisco Argonaut, quoted in the editorial to which I have already referred. I was greatly struck when I read these eight points, and I am going to place them on record.

> 1. You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift.

It seems to me that is very sound. Thrift is an old-fashioned virtue which is practised altogether too seldom in this country, but it was a virtue practised by our fathers and mothers, and as a result we, their descendants, have made progress in this country. I know that without the thrift practised by my parents I would have been nowhere. I commend the second point also to my hon. friends in the left centre.

> 2. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong.

No policy of tearing down will build up and strengthen this nation. The only policy that will get us anywhere is to strengthen people, not to tear down.

> 3. You cannot help small men by tearing down big men.

I know it is not fashionable to champion big men, but without big men where would this country have been? I have in mind at the moment some of the pioneers who built up Canada, some of the pioneers who built up my own province of New Brunswick. The pioneers are gone; I look around and wonder who is to take the place of those big men who did things in the days gone by.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: They were not big in the sense in which that word is used to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to enter into a controversy with my hon. friend. I know I could not convince him and I am quite certain he could not convince me, so what would be the use. This is the next point:

4. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich.

Let us try to make the poor richer. Let us have a better distribution of wealth if you will, but the fact remains that you cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. The next is:

5. You cannot lift the wage-earner by pulling down the wage-payer.

No one knows that better than the trade unions. They want their business to go on. If the member of the trade union is the type of man I believe he is, he wants to see his employer prosper because, as the employer prospers, so does he. Under the present industrial set-up in this country there is no position in industry to which a man starting at the bottom of the ladder cannot hope to achieve by getting to the top in that industry. One of the greatest attributes of democracy is that it is possible for that sort of thing to happen. Then the next reads:

6. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money.

I remember the days of the NRA in the United States, those hectic days after the bank holiday in 1933. I used to marvel at the government of a country not far from our shores trying to borrow the nation out of adversity into prosperity. That cannot be done by a nation any more than it can be done by an individual. That is not sound philosophy.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Can a government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that is true, having regard to the experience of the United States in the recent depression. The next is:

7. You cannot build character and courage by taking away a man's initiative and independence.

That is what regimentation does. Initiative and independence are priceless in the eyes of a free man. Let us not destroy them. The next is:

8. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves.

I commend these to the consideration of this house and this country.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, if I had sufficient time I should like to follow and analyse the speech just delivered by the former leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Hanson), but I have not. However, I should like to make just one remark. Without the little fellows in Canada we could not have the big fellows who are so ably upheld to-day and were upheld in the past by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. That applies not only to Canada but to any other country in the world. Just as soon as you take away the little fellow, the big fellow must disappear also.

There are a number of things that might be said in connection with this rehabilitation committee. I am glad to see that at the head of this programme we have a gentleman as healthy and as free from malnutrition as is the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I remember one day two or three years ago when I was coming from the west I was taking a walk along a station platform one cold wintry day. The minister came along and stopped to speak to me and as I looked up at him I began to feel very small indeed. I believe I have had as many of the good things of this world as the average man, but I think the minister has had a little extra share. I hope that in his capacity of Minister of Pensions and National Health, as head of the department that is looking after the welfare of the people, he will see that some of the things which he has enjoyed are passed along to the rest of us in Canada. To those of us who have reached maturity it may not seem quite so important, but there are a number of underfed and underprivileged people in Canada. We do not see many of them around this chamber, but you do not have to go very far from the House of Commons to find the underprivileged and even the undernourished. Let us hope that before this committee finishes its work provisions will be made to right many of the wrongs that exist to-day and give to those who are undernourished some of the surpluses we are so well able to provide in Canada.

It would seem to be my task to-day to speak for agriculture. There are a number of gentleman farmers in the house, but very few of them have had to make their living from the soil. By a gentleman farmer I mean the man who has sufficient culture to go to a state dinner and know exactly how and when to use the proper knife and spoon, but when he goes into a stable he does not know the first thing about what to do with a fork. I have a few figures I should like to give to the house. There are not very many because I realize that the house gets tired of figures very quickly. In quoting these figures I do not want it to be thought that I am critical of those who are receiving certain amounts, I simply want to show that the farmer is and has been on the short end of the receiving proposition right along.

In 1929, according to the figures I have, labour received 31·4 per cent of the national income. The farmers, comprising approximately 33 per cent of the population, received 14·7 per cent of the national income. In other words, a large percentage, possibly up to 90 per cent of the Canadian people, received about 46 per cent of the national income in that year. That does not look just right to me. In 1932, labour received 64·6 per cent of the national income and we find that the farmers received only 5 per cent. I want to impress that particularly upon hon. members. Thirty-three per cent of the Canadian people who work on the farm received 5 per cent of the national income. In 1938, labour received 102 per cent of the 1926 national income while the farmers received 57·8 per cent. I am not opposed to labour receiving everything that is coming to them, I only wish that the farmers of Canada were sufficiently well organized to stand up and fight for what properly belongs to them.

I think the house will remember that at that time there was no freezing of debts or freezing of interest rates or freezing of many other things. While they were having to accept only 5 per cent of the national income, farmers in all parts of Canada, western Canada particularly, were paying anywhere from seven to twelve per cent interest on mortgages and agreements for sale. I may be challenged when I say twelve per cent, but if anyone wants me to prove that I can do it quite easily. Right close to where I live on a farm in Paradise valley one of the large mortgage companies of Canada wanted a rate of twelve per cent on a mortgage, and in order to get that, one mortgage for the actual amount of the loan was given at a certain rate of interest and another at a lower rate to make up the difference between seven and twelve per cent. That is how it was worked, and of course, two farmers have gone off that place since the agreement was entered into.

I remember during that year, 1932, hundreds of farmers selling an average grade of wheat at twelve cents a bushel. It cost them eleven cents a bushel to thresh it, so that all they got was one cent a bushel. The government, and nobody else, stepped in to see that something was done to stabilize prices and guarantee the cost of production at least. In the same year the average grade of oats was selling at three cents a bushel at the elevator. You had to do all the necessary work on the crop and thresh and haul the grain to the elevator, and all you got was three cents a bushel. If your grade of oats was low, the elevator would not even take it at all. I know that farmers shipped carloads of grain to Fort William and the price was so low that they had to pay money to the elevator company to settle the freight bill. The railways collected their full freight rates. Those were the conditions that existed at that time. The grain exchange, which a number of us have tried to put out of business for many years, also collected its full commission on sales, and nothing was done about that. Farm machinery prices increased, and nothing was done about that. I remember four-legged hogs being taken to the stockyards and sold to two-legged hogs for two cents a pound, if they were prime grade; if they were not of prime grade the price was cut down. If you did not have good cattle, and wanted to ship them, you could not even give them away. If they were in good shape and fit for butchering you could sell them. Cattle which to-day are selling for about one hundred dollars brought only five dollars a head then. Those are the conditions that existed.

Eggs which sell to-day for forty to sixty cents a dozen were selling in western Canada then for as low as three cents a dozen, and that was the price for the very best eggs that our hens could lay. For a lower-grade egg you took a lower price. Butter fat was selling for as low as eight cents a pound. I do not know just what would have been done if other industries had been working under those conditions, but I believe something drastic would have been done because other industries seem to have their representatives here who get the ear of the government much better than the farming industry can.

Although conditions were as I have described them at that time, we are now being asked to pay up our debts. A number of mortgage companies and others are foreclosing. I saw a report recently that said that a thousand foreclosure actions had been started in Alberta alone. Instead of having some debt protection, we find that our protective laws are ruled out by the governor in council here or by the courts of this country or by the privy council. Nothing is being done so far as I know by this government to stop creditors from putting the farmers out of business.

Another difficulty we have at the present time is that our farm labour is being drafted into the army. Many other men because of the poor wages on the farm are going into the munitions factories. The result is that the farmer and his wife, with one or two daughters in some cases, are left to run the farm. One thing I object to, Mr. Speaker, is that the farmers' wives and daughters should have to work outside in the field to make a living. I do not know of any other industry where the operator, business man or industrialist, has to have his wife and daughter working in the industry for him without pay. That is exactly what is happening on the farm. A number of cases of sickness have occurred amongst the women on the farm due to this heavy work which they have had to do. Farming conditions should be made such that it will not be necessary for the farmers' wives and daughters to go out and do heavy work that breaks down their health.

Serious conditions exist on the farms to-day. When I spoke in this house on the third of this month I stated that approximately forty per cent of the crop in Alberta was still in the stook. A few days ago I got a copy of the Chauvin Chronicle which is published twenty-five miles from my home. It says that the municipality of Wainwright, which comprises forty townships, sent out a questionnaire to the farmers in the municipality so that when the questionnaire was completed the municipality could make provision for help and other matters. The questionnaire contained twelve questions, and as they will be of interest to the house I shall read them. They will show that what I have been saying is as near right as it could be. I stated that approximately forty per cent of the crop in Alberta was still in the stook. This particular district is just a little better off, because the reply to the first question shows that they have 36 per cent of the crop still unthreshed. Here are the twelve questions and the answers:

1. Q. What percentage of the crop is unthreshed?
A. 36 per cent.

2. Q. What percentage of the unthreshed acreage is expected to be seeded in 1943?
A. 54½ per cent.

3. Q. The percentage of similar acreage to be summer-fallowed?
A. 33½ to 45½ per cent.

4. Q. Do you anticipate difficulty in the crop being threshed, and if so, why?
A. 22 yes (shortage of help); 4 no.

5. Q. How many extra men (if any) will be needed, (a) to complete threshing?
(b) to put in the crop?
A. (a) 385 men.
(b) 152 men.

6. Q. Will there be any farms in your polling district untilled through lack of help in 1943?
A. 14 no; 9 yes; 3 uncertain.

7. Q. Are the farmers increasing or decreasing the number of (a) hogs?
A. 18 increase; 5 stationary; 3 decrease.

In connection with hogs, the four-legged kind, let me say that the farms of Alberta last year turned out 22 hogs per farm on the average, and we are now leading every other province in Canada in the number of hogs produced per farm and the total hog production. Question 7 continues:

7. Q. (b) Dairy cattle?
A. 4 increase; 15 stationary; 7 decrease.
Q. (c) Beef cattle?
A. 6 increase; 14 stationary; 6 decrease.

8. Q. Will there be storage room for spring threshed grain on the farms?
A. 18 yes; 6 no; 2 doubtful.

9. Q. Are farmers having difficulty in financing?
A. 22 yes; 4 uncertain.

10. If so, in what way are they overcoming it?
A. Better prices 1; deferring paying debts 7; selling stock 3; denying themselves 2.

11. Q. Are the farmers making seed tests for germination purposes?
A. 15 yes; 6 no.

12. Q. Will there be much need (if any) of importing oats or barley for seed? If so, to what extent?
A. 9 yes; 16 no; 1 doubtful.

With conditions as I have described them in the district immediately south and west of where I live—and so far as I am aware conditions are no better in other districts in the constituency—we are asked to produce this year in excess of what we have ever produced before.

I am satisfied that the farmers, their wives and daughters will do everything humanly possible to accede to the request of the government. Farmers want to win the war. We have never gone on a sit-down strike; we do not intend to; if we were in the same class as some other people in Canada we would have been on a sit-down strike possibly seventy-five years ago, because during that time we have not received that to which we are entitled. We are asked to produce at below the cost of production. I ask, how many industries in Canada can carry on without getting the cost of production, and does any government expect industry to carry on upon that basis? It cannot be done; and, because agriculture is the basic industry in Canada, we cannot have a prosperous or a satisfied population until the wrongs of agriculture are set right. We are asked to produce large quantities of several farm products. We are asked, as I stated before, to pay our debts with interest. This again is an impossibility, because the restrictions placed upon farmers by the government will not allow us to deliver that which we produce, so how are we going to pay up? And although we cannot deliver, we have to continue paying interest. This does not look like sound business.

Again, we have been and are still compelled to pay excessive prices for the things we have to buy. On February 3, in a previous speech, I stated that on a tractor valued at seventeen or eighteen hundred dollars we are compelled to pay approximately $85 more than we would have had to pay a little over a year ago. I do not know what Mr. Gordon and his officials are doing about that. There seems to be no objection to increases in the price of farm machinery, or of lumber, nails and other hardware needed to provide storage facilities for grains on the farms.

Another injustice of which we complain is that implement companies are allowed to go out and seize machinery while the farmer's crop is still in the field under the snow. The farmer has done everything possible; he has his crop to the stage where it is in the stook ready for the threshing machine, but because of weather conditions and shortage of help the threshers have not been able to carry out their work as they should, and the farmer is penalized to the extent that his implements are taken away from him. I wonder if the government intends to do anything about this question. If not, I fear that numbers of other farmers will be on relief in the very near future, because farmers, like others, have to eat, and if their machinery and farms are taken away they will have to do something else.

About a year ago, on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I dealt with the question of education and the teachers. I am not satisfied that we are getting the best we can out of our educational system. It is entirely on a provincial basis, and there is a considerable variation in the amounts spent on education in the different provinces. Before we can have a prosperous Canada we must have an educated and enlightened people; for until people begin to think for themselves they will not get along as they should. Experience has taught us that when we allow the other fellow to do our thinking for us he does it in his own interests and not in ours. I have here the figures of amounts expended on education in the Canadian provinces in the year 1935:

Province	Amount per year per pupil
British Columbia	$69 70
Ontario	60 48
Alberta	55 58
Manitoba	48 08
Quebec	46 05
Nova Scotia	36 43
Saskatchewan	34 64
Prince Edward Island	31 55
New Brunswick	29 86

[Mr. Fair.]

Compare these figures with those of the United States. The highest expenditure per pupil is paid in New York State, with $124.32, and the lowest is Mississippi, with $18.93. Only nine states were below the New Brunswick average of $29.86. The Canadian average, including night schools and so forth, is $57.92, and that of the United States $74.22. If therefore we want a lead so far as education is concerned, and go across the line, as we have done in other cases, we shall find a very good lead in the direction of spending more on education. I am not suggesting that we should place additional taxes on the farmers, because already they are paying more than they can stand. Taxes at the present time are based on the assessed value rather than the production value, and unless some drastic change is made in our taxation system we shall not achieve the best results, or those which we should seek.

A number of people want to reduce the salaries of teachers. On the other hand, for a number of years I have advocated better qualified teachers and a higher rate of salary. Teachers are not nearly as well paid as are even labourers in industry, although they are compelled to dress well and to spend considerable time and money in securing the qualifications necessary to teaching. There are some who fail to see the importance of the teacher in the every-day life of our children, whom we entrust to them for five days a week.

I have here a table which shows the salaries of 14,259 of our male teachers in 1938, the latest period for which I have been able to obtain returns.

Number of teachers	Salary range
6	Less than $300
75	$ 300 to $ 400
666	400 to 500
1,181	500 to 600
1,404	600 to 700
1,255	700 to 800
1,240	800 to 900
736	900 to 1,000
661	1,000 to 1,100
491	1,100 to 1,200

I pause to say that 7,715 of our male teachers, or more than fifty per cent, received less than $100 per month. Under our present system of taxation I fear that we cannot do very much better; but I advocate a change of system which will give us better teachers and provide them with better pay and living conditions. The table continues:

Number of teachers	Salary range
522	$1,200 to $1,300
369	1,300 to 1,400
375	1,400 to 1,500
361	1,500 to 1,600
369	1,600 to 1,700
341	1,700 to 1,800
391	1,800 to 1,900
329	1,900 to 2,000

We find that in all of Canada we have 3,487 teachers receiving more than $2,000. This, I believe, is not good enough. There are far too many in the low-income brackets, and we cannot expect to get the best in the teaching profession under those conditions. A few months ago Saskatchewan was short to the extent of 145 teachers. In Alberta we are also short, after bringing back to the profession a number who had been out of it for a number of years. This is not helping, and is not adding to the betterment of our system of education. I understand teachers are leaving the profession every day and going into munitions factories or other government work, because of the better pay and something better to look forward to.

Of the teachers in the higher income brackets we find the division as follows:

Province	Number of teachers
Ontario	2,346
British Columbia	475
Alberta	261
Manitoba	163
Saskatchewan	117
New Brunswick	59
Nova Scotia	66
Prince Edward Island	0

Let us take the number I spoke about before, namely 7,715, and find out how they live. We will consider the man who has just been married, and my figures will be based on 1938 prices. To-day prices of things we buy are much higher, and the newlyweds would have to live on a much smaller and slimmer ration. This is the table of expenditures which would have been required in 1938:

Food	$ 268 00
Clothes	104 50
Shelter, light, fuel	503 00
Medical	30 00
Recreation	42 50
Insurance	120 00
	$1,068 00

Looking through this table one might assume, from the comparatively small amount for clothing, that the man and his wife must have had an ample supply of clothing before their marriage. The recreation item is small, and it would seem that they might depend upon their neighbours to furnish conveyances to take them around. Perhaps, too, they would rely upon their neighbours to take them to the Follies, or to other types of amusement. This total sum of $1,068 leaves approximately $132 as savings for the year.

This is not good enough. Something should be done to put our education on a different footing, a different basis. If we are going to have better conditions we must have better education and a more nearly even distribution of education costs. As I have already said, at the present time most of the cost is levied directly on the farms. Sometimes we find that merchants in small towns and cities claim they are paying a higher percentage of taxation than are the farmers. But when that statement is made I ask this question: Where do you get your revenues from which you pay that higher percentage? I find almost every time the taxation can be traced to the farmer. Those taxes are borne by the farmer either directly or indirectly.

As my time has almost expired I shall not say much more on this occasion. I hope to discuss other matters in more detail on a later occasion. Last night I listened with keen interest to the chairman of the committee of last year, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), and took particular interest in the part of his speech I am about to read:

> There is not any question that during the terrible and long years after the war which were known as the depression we let ourselves sink to depths of shame which only the courage, heroism and sacrifices of the men and women who are fighting for us overseas can wipe out. What the Prime Minister was saying to himself as well as to the men and women whom he was actually addressing was that the experiences of the war—and surely we must learn from the experiences of the war—have taught us that we, business men as well as the government, permitted certain things to be obstacles to full employment in the days of peace, when, had we only known it, those things were not real obstacles.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member say that. There may be some shifting of responsibility from Mr. Speaker's right to his left. But if that argument should arise I would say that those who are now to his right were to his left at one time, and vice versa. So that those who have been and those who are in office must accept full responsibility. Now that they know that the factors which held them back in the past were only imaginary, I hope something definite and far-reaching will be done to rectify those things.

We seem just a little slow to move unless somebody else takes the lead. In yesterday's evening Journal I noticed this brief article, which I shall read. Under date of London, February 25, it is headed "Britain Plans Vast Post-war Programme", and reads as follows:

Vast government plans for post-war building and town planning in Britain were outlined in a white paper published to-day.

The plans spread over 10 or 12 years and include the recruiting of 1,250,000 workers for rapid but orderly expansion of the building industry.

It is planned to establish conditions of work which will eliminate casual engagement of workers which formerly was the most unsatisfactory characteristic of the building industry.

The large deficiency in the labour force will be met by special training of adults by the state and it is estimated 200,000 could be trained during the first three or four years.

With a lead like that from Great Britain I feel quite satisfied we should be on our way; we should not wait until the war is over. It has been admitted on different occasions that obstacles in the past were only imaginary. Now let us see that those who have found that out convince their comrades in parliament that they should not stop, but should proceed at once to make things better. In order to do that, on behalf of agriculture I suggest that first of all an adjustment of our debt situation be made. Nice words are passed on to the farmers, but we still find creditors right on the farmers' shoulders. They will not get off, and until they do and thereby lighten the load, the farmers cannot make headway.

Because farms have been stripped of labour, and because, as has been pointed out here in the past few days, we have in the west unlimited sources of electricity, I suggest the electrification of agriculture. This does not apply only to my own province, although I understand they are proceeding with something along that line this year. But it should apply, and I believe in the very near future will apply, all across Canada. The power is there; all we have to do is to harness it and take the drudgery out of farming. Then we have large irrigation projects that could be put into effect. I will name just one, the William Pearce, which I understand can be put into operation for some $23,000,000. During the relief period when people were not given all the relief they should have had, something like $10,000,000 was spent in that dried-out territory.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the hon. member how many acres the William Pearce plan is expected to irrigate?

Mr. FAIR: I have not the details of that. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who is familiar with it, says about half a million acres in Alberta alone. If this irrigation project were put into effect we would be able to grow enough sugar to release a number of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board for more useful work and possibly save Mr. Gordon some sleepless nights, if he is experiencing such at the present time. It is far more in accord with common sense to spend money on something of that kind.

We should have an agricultural policy announced, not after the war but now, that would guarantee parity prices for the products of agriculture. We have in the past produced at far less than cost of production; why not start even now, years after it should have been done, to give us cost of production with a reasonable profit?

For income tax purposes one year should not be taken alone, because one year we may have a good crop and the next four or five years have crop failures. In some districts we have had crop failures for more years than that. The average income over a period of at least five years should be the basis.

For our pioneers, spoken of by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) we should have an increase in the old age pensions and a lower starting age. I see you are going to call time on me, Mr. Speaker; I should like with the indulgence of the house to have just a couple of minutes to finish.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. FAIR: I would also ask that old age pensioners be allowed to receive $500 a year, instead of the $365 they are allowed at the present time, without having their pension cut down. We should adjust soldier settlers' debts in accordance with the proposal I made when I spoke here on February 3. A resolution to that effect is now on the order paper. And for the boys and girls fighting the present war we should give them a square deal right from the start, not twenty years after they come back, but immediately they come back. I believe my colleague the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall) has on the order paper a resolution dealing with that.

The question is bound to come up, where will you find the money? I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to tell us where he is finding the money at the present time for the war. If he is unable to get an answer to the question among his officials and advisers, I would like him to come across to the left centre group pointed out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and we can tell him how to get it.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): I hesitate to follow the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) in his remarks any further than the last he made in connection with old age pensions. I would suggest to him that if he or any of his friends wants an old age pension, provision already is made. Since 1908 we have had government annuities under which by contributing to them at any time after five years of age one can have any kind of old age pension he wants. There is nothing to prevent anyone from having an old age pension even at twenty-one years of age if he pays for it.

In its approach to this important question of reconstruction I am satisfied that this parliament has before it one of the most difficult tasks that has ever faced any parliament, namely, to devise some programme whereby it can create a condition of affairs to carry us successfully through the post-war period. I rather take the view of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and also of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the winning of the war is the primary object. Whatever we do in the future will be more or less dependent on how this war is won and on the terms of the peace. No country to-day can live to itself; it will be dependent on the economic and other conditions that exist in other countries, because we shall have to dovetail our own economic life in a measure into their desires. Another thing that we should keep in mind is that while we are anxious to raise our standard of living we must not allow it to rise in excess of those of other countries because, if our standard of living is much higher than theirs it will be difficult for us to secure world trade and a proper world balance, inasmuch as we shall not be able to compete with them. That must be kept in mind. I know there are those who take the view that "as long as I get what I want I do not need to worry about the other fellow." But that philosophy is wrong; it cannot exist in this time; it could only lead to a repetition of the same disaster again. Furthermore, I say, as the Prime Minister said, that if the new order is not here and now we shall never have a new order.

I am prepared to say that the conduct of this war by this administration is making a great contribution to the post-war period in Canada. The conduct of this war, wise or otherwise, will leave an aftermath of difficulty and debt and disaster which, if not foreseen and avoided, will have to be paid for in the post-war period when the boys are returning. I would say that the wisdom of this government in introducing foreign exchange control, the excess profits tax and the regimenting more or less of industry in regard to price control, has had a great influence in maintaining an economy that will keep things on an even keel so that we shall not create loans which will only create disaster and depression afterwards. I believe that the contribution which this government is making will be very helpful in the post-war reconstruction period.

Unfortunately a great deal of pressure is being brought to bear by labour and even by our farmers to break this control system. While we do have to suffer some disabilities in consequence of control we should bear in mind that as consumers we enjoy the benefit of the holding down of our cost of living, and to that extent we should at least be fair enough to bring that side of the question to the attention of the public.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) last evening, in the course of which he stated that the depression of 1930 was caused by the selfishness of the great financial interests. I should like to approach that question from another point of view. I believe the depression of 1930 was caused more by the unusual prosperity that was enjoyed by a certain group of mediocre-minded people who had saved some money and who wanted to copy some of the richer people. They went into the stock market and took away control of many industries by bidding more for the stock than its earning power justified. As a result, a good deal of our industry got into the hands of men who did not know how to run it. They may have been good labour men but they were not capable of administering industry. Therefore I warn the committee, the house and the country that we must not permit any situation to exist under which people will administer affairs which they are not capable of administering. It seems to me that if we develop a nationalized industry there will be great danger of another depression, because the same element of society might obtain control of any government which would have the responsibility of nationalizing industry, and this would lead only to a repetition of the depression of 1930.

The hon. member for Vancouver East also had something to say about the accomplishments of our great ally Russia. I should like to direct attention to the fact that a great deal of the success Russia has achieved has been as a result of the help of the capitalistic, democratic countries, and that Russia is enjoying her present position because the capitalistic countries shared the knowledge and improvements that had been brought about under the system of free enterprise.

In these days we are subjected to many catch-phrases designed to have people believe that on account of the mercenary motives of some people, many in this country do not receive their fair share of the national income. It has been said that in 1942 we produced $9,000,000,000 worth of goods, of which we have marketed about $7,500,000,000 worth. Who got that money? Well, labour got over $4,000,000,000; the farmers got over $1,000,000,000, and those who had their money invested in industry got only $318,000,000. To those who believe that labour is not getting its share I ask, if you took the $318,000,000 and added it to the $4,000,000,000, do you think that would satisfy labour? I yield to no man in my desire to serve labour, but I know that the sober-minded labour man realizes that he must have industry as a place where he can sell his labour, and that he would not be doing labour any kindness by draining off all the profits so that there would be nothing left to plough back into more factories and equipment to create more employment. I only hope and trust that this reconstruction committee will keep some of these fundamentals in mind, and not be carried away by those catch-phrases which are intended only to divert the attention of the people from the really important matters in order that those who wish to fool the people may gratify their own desires.

Then I hope the committee will give some consideration to our agricultural problems. In spite of all that has been said about farming I believe that, after all, the farm is a fairly good place to settle a large part of the population of Canada. In spite of all its disadvantages; in spite of all the hard work involved, I believe the farm offers a security that can be found nowhere else. If a man owns a farm he has a security which it would cost another man thousands of dollars of invested capital to obtain. If I may be allowed a personal word, the other day I sat down at my table on my own farm and enjoyed a meal cooked by my good wife. The only things on that table that were not grown on my farm were the pepper, salt, sugar and tea. Everything else was produced on my own land.

Mr. McIVOR: And grown well.

Mr. WOOD: It was certainly well cooked. Where else could a man get security to compare with that? I have reached the point where I deplore the practice of some who call themselves dirt farmers but who seem to talk about only the unfavourable aspects of farming. They have more or less discouraged our youth from wanting to go on the land, and now they wonder why they are short of help. If agriculture is to have its proper place in the national life of Canada we must give it some self-respect. I have no intention of shutting my eyes to its weaknesses, but at least I can be honest enough to give it the credit it deserves.

[Mr. Wood.]

On motion of Mr. Wood the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at six o'clock.

Monday, March 1, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

AMENDMENT OF ACT CREATING DEPARTMENT—TABLING OF CHART OF DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I desire to lay on the table the chart of organization of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and for the convenience of members when discussing the departmental bill I would ask that the chart be published in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I might be permitted, Mr. Speaker, the chart is on a substantial scale and if it is incorporated in Votes and Proceedings it would have to appear on a very small scale. Could the minister have photostatic copies made so that each member might receive a copy on a separate sheet?

Mr. HOWE: On a previous occasion the chart was published in Votes and Proceedings as a folder. I presume the printing bureau did exactly what my hon. friend now suggests.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be more convenient to have it on a separate sheet.

Mr. HOWE: I can bring in the desired number of sheets in that form, if my hon. friend so wishes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. ESLING:

1. Since the operation of the soldier settlement board in 1919, down to December 31, 1942, what sums of money have been placed at the disposal of the soldier settlement board for the purchase of lands?

2. How many separate parcels of land were purchased during that period?

3. To how many parcels of land does the board now retain title?

4. How many parcels of land are actually occupied and producing returns to the board?

5. What sum, on account of such parcels, was returned to the board in 1942?

6. Since the operation of the act, what is the total amount written off for (a) revaluation, (b) reduction under Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, (c) bonuses?

7. From 1918 to December 31, 1942, what is the total received from settlers by way of principal payments?

8. What is the total sum received by way of interest?

9. Since the operation of the board what is the aggregate sum paid in salaries for administration and what is the total amount incurred for expenses other than salaries?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. The sum of $61,205,617.92 has been disbursed for the purchase of lands.

2 and 3. Records are not maintained in a manner to answer these questions in the specific form asked. From 1918 to 1924—the active loaning period of soldier settlement operations—17,456 loans were made to purchase properties; 2,463 loans were made on security of first mortgage; 4,229 loans were made to settlers on dominion lands, the security being a first charge on such lands. As at December 31, 1942, there were 14,429 active loans of all classes, as follows: 6,824 soldier settlers; 6.338 civilian purchasers; 1,142 British family settlers; 125 New Brunswick family scheme settlers. There were 1,528 properties on hand for resale.

4. As at December 31, 1942, there were 15,742 active loans and properties leased. 215 properties were unoccupied.

5. The total repayments in 1942 were $2,595,366.29.

6. Since the operation of the Act the following total amounts have been written off to December 31, 1942:

(a) Revaluation, $7,479,344.75; (b) Reduction under Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, $13,233,393.13; (c) Bonuses, $5,321,414.98.

7. The total received by way of principal payments to December 31, 1942, was $43,-264,734.84.

8. The total sum received by way of interest to December 31, 1942, was $24,056,711.45.

9. Since the operation of the Board the aggregate sum paid in salaries for administration was—

Salaries, $20,325,246.85 to December 31/42; Expenses other than salaries, $10,243,534.48 to December 31/42. Total, $30,568,781.33.

GENERAL ENGINEERING COMPANY

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Are land, buildings and equipment of the fuse filling plant at Scarboro, Ontario, owned by the government?

2. If so, does it operate on a cost-plus basis?

3. Who supplied the land, and at what cost?

4. Who supplied the buildings, and at what cost?

5. Who supplied the machinery?

6. Who operates the cafeteria?

7. What salaries are paid in this plant at or in excess of $3,000 per annum, and to whom are they paid?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. This plant is operated by the General Engineering Company (Canada) Ltd. on a management-fee basis.

3. The land was acquired by expropriation on January 27th, 1941, April 1st, 1941, and additional land on December 17th, 1941, totalling 272 acres. It was acquired from seven proprietors, as follows:

	Total Price
A. S. Crichton	$27,000
E. A. Burke Estate	11,000
L. G. Hough	2,500
W. C. Hough	6,500
Hough Estate	10,000
Harris Estate	23,180

Settlement on a small parcel of about 8½ acres is still pending.

4. The British government supplied the buildings at a cost of $4,462,692.35 for new buildings.

5. The machinery was procured through Citadel Merchandizing Company from various machine tool contractors with funds supplied jointly by Canadian and British governments.

6. The government through its project management contractors, the General Engineering Company (Canada) Ltd.

7. No information.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—ENFORCEMENT DIVISION

Mr. BENCE.

1. What are the names of the administrators and other officials of the enforcement division of the wartime prices and trade board situated in the city of Ottawa?

2. What were the addresses and occupations of such administrators and officials immediately prior to their appointments to this branch?

3. What is the salary and other remuneration of the said administrators and officials?

Mr. ILSLEY: F. A. McGregor, enforcement administrator, permanent official of the Department of Labour, Ottawa, no additional remuneration; H. M. Brown, deputy enforcement administrator, permanent official of the Department of Labour, Ottawa, no additional remuneration; P. J. Macdonald, enforcement counsel, Ottawa Region, formerly in private legal practice, Ottawa, salary $3,300 per annum.

POSTAL SERVICE—"LONDON ECHO"

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. On what date and under what authority and regulations did the periodical known as the London Echo qualify as a newspaper for the postal rate of one cent per four ounces?

2. On what date and to whom was a copy of this periodical submitted for inspection, as required by section 47 of the Canada Official Postal Guide?

3. Is this periodical being addressed to local subscribers as required by section 40 of the Canada Official Postal Guide?

4. What is the annual subscription rate of this newspaper?

5. Is this newspaper being delivered by letter carriers to subscribers only or is it being delivered to householders on the carriers' route?

6. What extra weight does the delivery of this newspaper by letter carrier add, on the average, to the burden each letter carrier is required to deliver?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. In 1879. Section 22 of the Post Office Act of 1875. Records destroyed many years ago.

2. 1879. Postmaster General. Exact date not available. Case reviewed in 1937, by the then Postmaster General, who decided that the Echo should be considered a bona fide newspaper under the provisions of the Post Office Act.

3. Owing to the depleted Post Office staffs and the difficulty of finding replacements, it is considered undesirable to insist on the technical requirements of individual addressing. The absence of addresses greatly facilitates Post Office handling by eliminating entirely, the time ordinarily occupied in reading addresses in the usual process of sortation. This saves time and work for sortation clerks and letter carriers. Copies for delivery in the city of London not addressed to local subscribers are distributed to non subscribers and postage charged thereon at the rate applicable to such copies.

4. $1.

5. Householders. See answer to No. 3.

6. Approximately 85⅔ pounds spread over two and sometimes three deliveries. To reduce weight to be taken out by the carriers, papers are put up in several bundles which are distributed by truck to strategic points, where they are picked up by letter carriers in the course of delivery.

ST. HYACINTHE, QUE., NAVY BUILDINGS CONTRACT

Mr. BENCE:

1. Have contracts been awarded for navy buildings at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec?

2. If so, what is or will be the total cost thereof?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

3. When was construction commenced?

4. If construction has not been completed when is it anticipated that it will be?

5. Why was St. Hyacinthe selected for the erection of such building?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. Yes. A contract for part of the proposed establishment at St. Hyacinthe has been let.

2. The contract let is in the amount of $612,514, and the total cost of the construction will be $2,624,000 (estimated).

3. Construction was commenced on the initial contract on January 5, 1943.

4. It is expected that the construction on the initial contract will be completed June 30, 1943. Plans and specifications for the remaining programme are now in the course of preparation, and tenders are expected about May 1, with the completion of this remaining programme on January 31, 1943.

5. The Naval signal school was moved from Halifax to St. Hyacinthe in October 1941 because buildings under the jurisdiction of the army were available in St. Hyacinthe and no other suitable accommodation could be found in eastern Canada. It is necessary to increase the capacity of the school from 800 to 2,600 and it is more economical to add to the existing plant than to build afresh in a new place.

RADIO BROADCASTING—"OUR CANADA"

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. Is the dominion government responsible for or author of the sketch "Our Canada" broadcast over the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. Is the same sketch broadcast in the other provinces over the English network, and if so, what is its title?

3. On what day is the English version broadcast?

4. If the government is not responsible for the sketch what is the name of the author?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. "Our Canada" is a programme of the national war finance committee broadcast over a French network.

2. Similar programmes under the title "Nazi Eyes on Canada" were broadcast over an English network, but have been replaced by another programme.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. The basis of the programme is a translation of the book by Colin Ross.

VETERANS' LAND SETTLEMENT ACT

Mr. LEADER:

1. What action is the government taking towards setting up a working arrangement with the municipalities in selecting lands for the reestablishment of our returned soldiers under the Veterans' Land Settlement Act?

2. How many veterans have made application for settlement under the Veterans' Land Settlement Act?

3. What number in each of the several provinces?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. The Veterans' Land Act 1942 and regulations made thereunder provide for the appointment of regional advisory committees in all provinces to advise the director in such matters as the selection of lands and the qualification of veterans. There will be several regional committees in each of the larger provinces. These committees will establish working contacts with municipalities and other agencies. In addition, each province has been invited to set up a small committee headed by its minister of agriculture to serve as a working contact with the director and his officers in such matters as areas suitable for veteran settlement.

2. 668.

3. British Columbia, 92; Alberta, 64; Saskatchewan, 41; Manitoba, 22; Ontario, 243; Quebec, 120; New Brunswick, 39; Nova Scotia, 42; Prince Edward Island, 5.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—RADIO TECHNICIANS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence for Air formulated any plans for the recognition, by way of promotion for merit, of radio technicians of the R.C.A.F. who are serving overseas?

2. If so, when will they be put into force?

Mr. MARSHALL: In view of the explanation made a day or so ago by the minister, I ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

RATION BOOKS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action has the government taken with regard to new rationing books so as to secure an improvement in the complex system now in vogue?

2. Has the government consulted or secured advice from experts of public utilities or large industrial heads as to adopting a system of books to cover all rationing?

3. What is the estimated cost of mailing the new books as formerly, instead of having them picked up, and how are they now to be distributed?

4. What, if any, practical experience in the food industry have those who prepare these orders ever had?

5. What has been the practical experience, if any, in the food business, of those who prepare these orders?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The wartime prices and trade board is continually working towards the simplification of its rationing machinery. The new ration book embodies certain changes but only of minor character, as ration book 1 was essentially about as simple as any ration book could be.

2. The ration administration has been continually in touch with the trades who deal in rationed commodities. It has consulted not only the heads of these trades but also various technical men engaged in them as well as practical men who come into actual contact with the rationing machinery. Discussions and views respecting rationing are urged and sought from the various trade organizations and large and small units in the various industries.

3. The estimated cost of distributing the new ration books (approximately 13 million) by mail is $500,000 on the basis of one cent for the postcard and three cents for the book. Local ration boards now functioning in approximately 500 key communities across Canada have set up thousands of distribution centres where people may call for their ration book No. 2.

4 and 5. The ration administration is in continual close contact with representatives of the food industry and their advice is sought in the preparation of ration orders. These orders are prepared under the supervision of the senior solicitor of the wartime prices and trade board who consults with representatives from the Department of Agriculture. These representatives are thoroughly trained in the problems of the food industry.

DISPOSITION OF NAVAL OFFICERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What percentage of naval officers are, (a) at sea, (b) at headquarters, Ottawa, (c) on shore duty at Halifax, (d) on shore duty at Esquimalt, (e) on shore duty at training divisions?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. (a) 38 per cent wholly employed at sea; (b) 9 per cent at N.S.H.Q.; (c) 22 per cent are based at Halifax, many of whom have both sea and shore duty; (d) 8 per cent are based at Esquimalt, many of whom have both sea and shore duty; (e) 6 per cent training divisions. The remaining 17 per cent of officer personnel are based at other shore points. Many of these have both sea and shore duties.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS—REQUESTS FOR INCREASE OF MONTHLY PAYMENTS

Mr. REID:

1. Have any representations been made by any of the provinces in regard to increasing the amount of twenty dollars per month under the provisions of the Old Age Pension Act?

2. If so, what province or provinces have made such request or representation during the year 1942, and to date in the present year?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Ontario. (Alberta 1941).

MINESWEEPERS

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. How many minesweepers have been built?
2. How many are now under construction?
3. How many are now in commission?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): A somewhat similar question was put the other day by another hon. member and I agreed to give him the information privately. I can do that in this case, if it will be satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. O'BRIEN: That will be quite satisfactory. I would ask that this question and the next one be dropped.

Question dropped.

CORVETTES

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. How many corvettes have been built in Canada?
2. How many are now under construction?
3. How many are now in commission?

Question dropped.

OIL TANKERS

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. Have any oil tankers been built in Canada?
2. If so, how many?
3. What was the capacity of each?

Mr. HOWE:

1. One 10,000-ton cargo vessel, built under the supervision of Wartime Merchant Shipping Limited, was converted into an oil tanker and delivered in August, 1942. Four more 10,000-ton vessels are now in process of being converted.

Contracts have recently been awarded for three 3,700-ton oil tankers.

Eight or more vessels have been built or converted as oil tankers by private companies since 1939.

2 and 3. Answered by 1.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

CARGO SHIPS

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. How many cargo ships and of what capacity have been delivered to the government, giving dates of delivery?
2. How many are now in commission?
3. How many cargo ships are now under construction in Canada?
4. What is the gross tonnage in each case?
5. What is the net tonnage or cargo carrying capacities of each?

Mr. HOWE:

1. 97 cargo ships of 10,350 tons deadweight carrying capacity each have been delivered to the government, the dates of deliveries being as follows:—

1. SS. Fort Ville Marie, December 21, 1941.
2. SS. Fort St. James, January 29, 1942.
3. SS. Fort Churchill, February 21, 1942.
4. SS. Fort Qu'Appelle, March 21, 1942.
5. SS. Fort Nipigon, April 8, 1942.
6. SS. Fort George, April 9, 1942.
7. SS. Fort Tadoussac, April 18, 1942.
8. SS. Fort Fraser, April 25, 1942.
9. SS. Fort Louisburg, April 27, 1942.
10. SS. Fort Chambly, April 28, 1942.
11. SS. Fort Good Hope, May 9, 1942.
12. SS. Fort McLoughlin, May 20, 1942.
13. SS. Fort La Maune, May 25, 1942.
14. SS. Fort Abitibi, May 26, 1942.
15. SS. Fort Alexandria, May 27, 1942.
16. SS. Fort Camosun, June 2, 1942.
17. SS. Fort Ellice, June 4, 1942.
18. SS. Fort Chilcotin, June 6, 1942.
19. SS. Fort Augustus, June 13, 1942.
20. SS. Fort Lac la Ronge, June 18, 1942.
21. SS. Fort Babine, June 26, 1942.
22. SS. Fort McLeod, June 30, 1942.
23. SS. Prince Albert Park, June 30, 1942.
24. SS. Fort La Reine, July 8, 1942.
25. SS. Fort Chipewyan, July 9, 1942.
26. SS. Fort Bourbon, July 15, 1942.
27. SS. Fort Pine, July 19, 1942.
28. SS. Gatineau Park, July 22, 1942.
29. SS. Fort Confidence, July 27, 1942.
30. SS. Fort Pitt, July 28, 1942.
31. SS. Fort Battle River, July 29, 1942.

88. SS. Fort Rampart, January 23, 1943.
89. SS. Fort Meductic, January 30, 1943.
90. SS. Fort Walsh, January 31, 1943.
91. SS. Fort Frobisher, February 3, 1943.
92. SS. Fort Nashwaak, February 7, 1943.
93. SS. Fort Remy, February 15, 1943.
94. SS. Fort Charnisay, February 16, 1943.
95. SS. Fort Stager, February 17, 1943.
96. SS. Fort Grahame, February 19, 1943.
97. SS. Fort Buckingham, February 23, 1943.

One cargo ship of 4,700 tons deadweight carrying capacity was delivered to the government on February 15, 1943, as follows: SS. Rockwood Park, delivered February 15, 1943.

2. All ships mentioned in No. 1 are in commission, with the exception of those which have been lost at sea.

3. There are now in various stages of construction in Canada 58 ships of 10,350 tons deadweight each and 12 ships of 4,700 tons deadweight each.

4 and 5. A ship of 10,350 tons deadweight measures 7,134 tons gross; 4,243 tons net.

A ship of 4,700 tons deadweight measures 2,877 tons gross; 1,655 tons net.

The total deadweight tonnage of the ships delivered is 1,008,650 tons, and the total deadweight tonnage of the ships under construction is 656,700 tons.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is the estimated total of hydro-electric power available in Canada?

2. How much, by provinces, is developed so far, (a) for all the year around use, (b) for seasonal use?

3. What action has been taken by the government to inaugurate a national hydro-electric policy for Canada since the debate on the Calgary bill of 1941 and the debates of 1923 and since on this matter?

4. How much direct current is now available in each province of Canada from developed hydro-electric power, (a) under public ownership, (b) under private ownership?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. The total water-power resources of Canada are estimated at 25,439,000 horse-power under conditions of ordinary minimum flow or 39,511,000 horse-power at flows ordinarily available for six months of the year. Based upon past practice these resources would support a total installed turbine capacity of approximately 51,350,000 horse-power.

2. (a), (b). The latest completed census of the central electric station industry in Canada, for the calendar year 1941, shows the installed capacity of hydro-electric stations by provinces as follows:

Province	Installed h.p.
British Columbia and Y.T.	637,837
Alberta	68,180
Saskatchewan	87,500
Manitoba	420,800
Ontario	2,284,389
Quebec	4,076,552
New Brunswick	105,760
Nova Scotia	102,990
Prince Edward Island	392
Canada	7,784,400

No definite statistics are available of the extent to which the foregoing installations are utilized (a) for all the year around use, (b) for seasonal use. This varies with seasonal and yearly stream flow and also in accordance with changing power demands.

3. The ownership, control and administration of the water power resources, except in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory and in national parks, belongs to the provinces. The dominion is continuing its policy of cooperation with the provinces in securing the basic water power records which are fundamentally necessary in the planning, development and operation of water power projects throughout Canada.

4. (a), (b).

For the calendar year 1941

Province	Under public ownership		Under private ownership

CANADIAN NAVY—OFFICERS AND RATINGS

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What are the percentages of R.C.N., R.C.N.R., and R.C.N.V.R. officers and ratings presently in the navy?

2. Is it the intention of the navy board to grant these reserve officers and ratings representation by appointing one of their officers to the navy board?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. The percentages of officers and ratings in the navy as of the 15th February, 1943, are as follows (W.R.C.N.S. not included):

R.C.N.—officers 10 per cent—ratings 7 per cent.

R.C.N.R.—officers 16 per cent—ratings 10 per cent.

R.C.N.V.R.—officers 74 per cent—ratings 83 per cent.

2. The secretary, naval board is an officer of the R.C.N.V.R.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—INCOME TAX

Mr. ISNOR:

Are merchant seamen subject to income tax, (a) when in port, (b) when acting in conjunction with convoys and ships carrying supplies to or through a theatre of war area?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. GIBSON: (a) yes; (b) yes.

TRANSPORT CONTROL—SKI TRAINS

Mr. STOKES:

1. How many ski trains have been operated by the railways since January 1, 1943?

2. Is authority for the operation of such trains secured from the transport controller?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No special ski trains have been operated by the railways since January 1, 1943.

2. No permits have been issued for any such trains by the transport controller.

PAN-AMERICAN UNION

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has Canada been asked to join the pan-American union? If so, when?

2. What country or countries have asked Canada to join?

3. Are there any negotiations under way between Canada and any other country or countries regarding the pan-American union?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1

3. No.

DOMINION INDUSTRIES LIMITED—TRANSCONA CORDITE PLANT

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the government approved the paying of cash awards to employees of the Transcona cordite plant of Dominion Industries Limited, who make suggestions the adoption of which may result in the reduction of operating expenses?

2. If so, has the government ruled as to what ranks are entitled to receive such awards?

3. If such a ruling has been made, what ranks are so entitled?

4. How is the amount of such cash awards determined?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Canadian government approval has not been given to the paying of cash awards to employees in war industries who make suggestions which may result in lower operating costs, but the Department of Munitions and Supply have approved of a plan to award war savings certificates or victory bonds to such employees.

2. Under the government plan, all employees are eligible for such reward except those whose regular duties fall in the line of creative work such as engineering, processing, tool designing, production planning and supervision. Such ideas for improvement have always been considered part of their regular duties.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Suggestions on which labour savings are affected are rewarded as follows:

(a) 1/16th of the annual savings on the employee's own job plus 1/12 of the annual savings on other jobs, subject to a maximum award of $750 (purchase value).

(b) Suggestions resulting in improving the quality of production or matters not directly concerned with a productive operation; a direct award, determined by the committee according to its judgment in each individual case, ranging from $5 to $25 in war savings certificates (maturity value).

AIR-CONDITIONING OF TANKS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

Is there any provision made to air-condition any of our tanks for use in hot climates?

Mr. RALSTON: The fabrication of tanks, including air-conditioning for use in any climate, is under continuous study by the proper technical officers. but details of the methods in use would be of value to the enemy and cannot be disclosed.

TAX ON BEER AND SPIRITS

Mr. FAIR:

1. What is the amount of tax levied and collected in the calendar year 1942 on (a) beer, (b) hard liquors?

2. What amount was spent in 1942 on (a) beer, (b) hard liquors?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Excise duty collected on malt used in beer produced and on matured spirits, during the calendar year 1942:

(a) Malt in beer $33,372,828.40 — dutiable beer $561,278.09.

(b) Matured spirits $32,610,964.80.

2. No information.

TAX ON CIGARS, CIGARETTES AND TOBACCO

Mr. FAIR:

1. What is the total amount of tax levied and collected on (a) cigars, (b) cigarettes, (c) smoking tobacco, during the year 1942?

2. What is the amount of tax levied and collected on account of additional tax levied on June 23 last, from date of levy to December 31, 1942, on (a) cigars, (b) cigarettes, (c) smoking tobacco?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Excise duty collected on cigars, cigarettes and manufactured tobacco during the year 1942:

(a) Cigars	$ 604,625.11
(b) Cigarettes	61,842,971.89
(c) Manufactured tobacco	10,033,362.66

2. Excise taxes collected on cigars, cigarettes and manufactured tobacco, from June 23 to December 31, 1942:

(a) Cigars	$ 221,400.57
(b) Cigarettes	12,350,440.32
(c) Manufactured tobacco	3,371,844.99

GLENCOE, N.S., IRON ORE DEPOSITS

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Did the Department of Munitions and Supply make an investigation into the possibility of developing the iron ore deposits at Glencoe, Inverness county, Nova Scotia? If so, what were the results?

2. How did the ore found there compare with the ore being brought from Newfoundland?

3. What steps are being taken to develop this field?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Department of Munitions and Supply requested the Department of Mines and Resources to have this deposit investigated and the reports showed that there is no proven tonnage of ore of commercial interest. From the information available, and from previous exploration and development work, and from the geological associations of the ore, the probability of proving any attractive tonnage of commercial ore appears poor.

2. Thus far the exploration made does not indicate an ore body as chemically suitable as Newfoundland ore for the production of iron, nor in quantities which would be reliable and economic as a source of supply.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

OPENING OF COAL MINE IN INVERNESS COUNTY, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Is the government making a grant to a prospective coal operator, to open a coal mine in Inverness county, Nova Scotia? If so, what is the name of the operator?

2. What is the amount of the grant?

3. What agreement, if any, is there between those proposing to open this mine and the government?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

*LABRADOR

Mr. ROY:

1. Does the government consider the advisability of inviting the British government, in compensation for merchandise supplied by Canada, to secure the return to the dominion of that portion of Labrador which was awarded to Newfoundland by the decision of the privy council?

2. If so, (a) what action has been taken in that direction; (b) upon what date were the first representations made; (c) what progress has been made in the negotiations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the first part of this question, the answer of course would be that the matter is one of government policy which would be disclosed in due course. I rise not to answer the question in any way, but rather to say to my hon. friend that I am inclined to believe the citizens of Newfoundland rather resent the idea that Labrador belongs to the British government; they regard Labrador as belonging to Newfoundland. Should it come to a question of our dominion seeking at any time to secure Labrador, I am sure the people of Newfoundland would expect that the negotiations in the first instance would be with their government rather than with the British government. I mention this because quite a little in the way of editorial comment and opinion expressed in the papers of Newfoundland has been brought to my attention.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

*UNITED STATES AIR FORCE ON SOUTH SHORE OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. ROY:

1. Is there a detachment of the United States air force stationed on the south shore of the river St. Lawrence?

2. If so, (a) what are the concessions, privileges, obligations and conventions under which the arrangements were made between the two governments in this matter; (b) in this connection has Canada granted to the United States any of its territories, and if so, in what form and under what conditions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are on the order paper two consecutive questions by the hon. member which, I submit, should neither be answered nor should they have appeared on the order paper, because even if unanswered they might be interpreted as disclosing information which it would certainly be in the interests of the enemy to have and which would be against our national security.

The first question is, "Is there a detachment of the United States Air Force stationed on the south shore of the river St. Lawrence? The first part of the next question is, "Has the government of the United States constructed certain establishments or bases on the shores of the Saguenay?" There are other questions which arise out of these two, but I think my hon. friend will see that, were I to answer either question in the affirmative, assuming it was correct so to do, I would be disclosing information which should not be disclosed.

However, to relieve the minds of hon. members I shall make the following statement in regard to what the hon. member has in mind.

As a matter of fact there is no detachment of the United States Air Force stationed on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, but from time to time and as occasion requires detachments of United States aircraft and personnel operate at various points in Canada with the consent and cooperation of the Canadian government. The Canadian authorities have cooperated in making Canadian air facilities available to such United States detachments, as part of the agreed arrangements for our own defence. In a number of instances lands have been acquired by the Canadian government for the development of air fields by the United States government for military use under war conditions. In no case has any territory been ceded under any form or under any conditions. The text of our agreement with the United States government for the return at the close of hostilities of facilities in Canada which have been acquired or constructed by the United States during the prosecution of the war was tabled in the House of Commons on February 1 and may be found in the Votes and Proceedings for that date.

UNITED STATES ESTABLISHMENTS OR BASES ON SAGUENAY RIVER

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government of the United States constructed certain establishments or bases on the shores of the Saguenay?

2. If so, (a) what conventions were agreed to prior to the arrangement under which the American government commenced the works, (b) has Canada ceded any of its territory; in what form, and under what conditions?

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered by the reply to the previous question.

WABANA IRON ORE WORKS

Mr. McGARRY:

Has it come to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply that the Wabana Iron Ore Works has closed down, and will this closure be investigated?

Mr. HOWE: Answered by the minister February 22, 1943, Hansard, page 575.

*PRODUCTION OF MILITARY VEHICLES AND EQUIPMENT IN RELATION TO SHIPBUILDING

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Have plans been made for slowing down production of military vehicles, tanks, guns and other fighting equipment coincidental with the expansion of production of ships?

2. If so, when does this go into effect?

3. Will it result in releasing man-power for other work?

4. If so, how much?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can answer this verbally. The question implies that one programme is being slowed down to release man-power for another programme. That is not the case. Certain programmes are being slowed down, for the reason that initial equipment has been provided and the demands are less than formerly. Each programme is being dealt with separately from any other programme. Therefore the answer is:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

R.C.A.F.—NON-FLYING LIST COMMISSIONS

Mr. HOBLITZELL:

1. How many categories of non-flying list commissions are there in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

2. What are these categories?

Mr. POWER:

1. Twenty-three.

2. Accountant Officer, Administrative Officer, Aeronautical Engineer, Armament Officer, Chaplain Officer, Educational Officer, Equipment Officer, Provost and Security Service Officer, Marine Craft Officer, Medical Officer, Non-pilot Air Navigation Instructor, Nursing Sister, Photographic Officer, Signals Officer, Works and Buildings Officer, Link Trainer Instructor, Regional Control Officer, Aerodrome Control Officer, Intelligence Officer, Radio Officer, P.T. and Drill Officer, Equipment Messing Officer, Auxiliary Services Officer.

IMMIGRANTS FROM EUROPE SINCE 1938

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many Europeans who were residents in or citizens of any of the following countries, namely, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria or Poland, have been admitted to Canada since January 1, 1938, as immigrants?

2. What were their respective races?

3. What were their respective religions?

4. What were their sexes?

5. How many of them were over twenty-one years of age?

6. How many of them were under such age?

Mr. CRERAR:

*1 and 2. Immigration to Canada, from April 1, 1937, to March 31, 1942, showing German, Czechoslovakian, Austrian and Polish nationality by racial origin:

INTERNMENTS—CAMILLIEN HOUDE

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the Minister of Justice ordered under certain circumstances, the liberation of any individuals detained under the defence of Canada regulations in internment camps or common jails, without such persons having presented a petition to an advisory committee competent to deal with such requests?

2. If so, who were the persons so liberated?

3. What is the maximum penalty under the defence of Canada regulations, which may be imposed by the tribunals having jurisdiction in such cases?

4. How many years and months has Mr. Camillien Houde, former mayor of Montreal, and member of the legislature of Quebec, been interned under the defence of Canada regulations?

[Mr. Winkler.]

5. Does the period of internment of Mr. Houde conform with the terms fixed by the regulations for the defence of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Not since December, 1940. Prior to that date there were seven cases in which the Minister of Justice made an order for release, in urgent circumstances, before an objection to detention was made to an advisory committee.

2. It is not considered to be in the public interest to disclose the names of the seven persons referred to in the answer to question 1.

3. Under regulation 63 of the Defence of Canada regulations, every person who has contravened any of these regulations is liable on summary conviction of having been guilty of such contravention to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment. Or if such person is prosecuted upon indictment and convicted, such person is liable to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to both fine and imprisonment. Under regulation 21 of the said regulations, if the Minister of Justice is satisfied that with a view to preventing any particular person from acting in the future in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state it is necessary so to do, he may direct that such person be detained in such place and under such conditions as the Minister of Justice may from time to time determine.

4. Since August 5th, 1940.

5. Yes.

CENSORS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. How many censors are employed at each of the following places, (a) Halifax, (b) Montreal, (c) Toronto, (d) Winnipeg, (e) Vancouver?

2. What is the number of working hours in effect at each of the above places?

3. Has each of the above places a chief censor? If so, give name, age and salary?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1.

	Postal Censorship	Telegraph Censorship	Censorship of Publications
Halifax ..	31	15	1
Montreal .	14	27	2
Toronto ..	11	8	2
Winnipeg .	3	1	0
Vancouver	60	8	2

2. Postal censorship: 7½ hours per day.

Telegraph censorship: These offices (except Winnipeg) operate 24 hours a day and 7 days a week. The working hours per week vary slightly with the intensity of the particular day and the change-over of shift from week to week. They range from 40-48 hours per week. Senior censors are on call over much longer periods in addition to regular hours at the office.

Censorship of publications: Regional offices are staffed from 12 to 15 hours a day depending on newspaper and news service requirements, but censors are required to hold themselves available for telephone calls at any time in the 24 hours.

3. Postal censorship: No. General supervision exercised by district director of postal services.

Telegraph censorship: No. The only chief cable or telegraph censor is located in Ottawa.

Censorship of publications: No. Chief censors are stationed in Ottawa.

ROOT AND VEGETABLE SEED

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What was the total amount of money paid to the various provinces under P.C. 1/4937 for the production of root and vegetable seed?

2. Were grants made to individual growers and to seed houses?

3. If so, to whom, for what amounts, and for what varieties of seeds?

4. What is the proposed distribution by provinces of the grant under P.C. 1/1050?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The following amounts were paid to the growers of root and vegetable seeds in the various provinces; British Columbia, $296.60; Ontario $223.24; Quebec $95.18.

2. No.

3. See answer to No. 2.

4. No money is paid as grants under these orders in council. Under the authority of the orders, growers grow seeds of specified kinds under contract at a guaranteed price which is below current market price. Growers sell this contract seed in Canada through usual commercial channels, and any surplus not sold in this way is purchased by the government. The object is to assure that sufficient seed of the kinds likely to be in short supply is grown. Comparatively small quantities of seed have had to be purchased by the government to date.

*NATIONALIZATION OF BREWERIES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is it the intention of the government to nationalize the breweries of Canada?

2. If so, what are the reasons to justify the government in adopting such a course?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question concerns a matter of policy which will be made known in due course.

INTERNMENT—ERNST HANFSTAENGL

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

At whose request, by whose authority and under what conditions, was Ernst Hanfstaengl released from a Canadian civil internment camp and transferred to the custody of the United States, and was the assent of the British government obtained before this prisoner was transferred?

Mr. RALSTON: I would point out to my hon. friend that other allied governments are interested in this matter. It has been carefully considered and the conclusion has been come to that it is not in the public interest, at least at the present time, to give the information asked for.

YARROW SHIPYARDS—FRIGATES

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Are the "frigates" under construction in the Yarrow shipbuilding yards at Victoria being built on the cost-plus contract system?
2. Is work on the said "frigates" hindered by shortages of material?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The contract was placed on a cost basis with a bonus covering reduction of costs under a target estimate on direct labour and material, and also on a time bonus for quick delivery, the total not to exceed a fixed amount per vessel.

2. There has been no hold-up in the work of the shipyard due to shortages of material. The schedule of work was arranged to conform to the delivery of components to the shipyard.

R.C.A.F.—NON-FLYING LIST COMMISSIONS

[Mr. Power.]

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS

Mr. GREEN:

1. What public holidays have been cancelled by the government since the outbreak of the present war?

2. What were the respective dates of the cancellation of each of these holidays and on what authority were they cancelled?

3. What public holidays are recognized by the government at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By order in council P.C. 8682 of September 25, 1942, passed under authority of the War Measures Act, it was provided that the following statutory holidays and these holidays only should be observed by employers and employees during the present war, namely: (a) New Year's day; (b) Good Friday; (c) the first Monday in July; (d) Labour day; (e) Christmas day; (f) Thanksgiving day.

The order in council does not specifically cancel other statutory holidays by name, but has the effect of limiting observance to those specified in the order.

An additional order in council, P.C. 1181, of February 15, 1943, was passed, amending the Bills of Exchange Act, to make the observance of statutory holidays under that Act correspond as nearly as possible with that authorized in the order in council P.C. 8682.

* ST. HYACINTHE, QUE., NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. McGREGOR:

In connection with the naval establishment at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, (a) is the hon. Minister for Highways in the province of Quebec (Mr. Damien Bouchard) in any way connected with the contractors who are erecting these buildings; (b) was Damien Bouchard or his associates owner of this property at any time?

Mr. HOWE: The government has no information on this subject. The best information we have is that the answer is No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RADIO BROADCASTING—SPEECHES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What members of the houses of parliament have been given free time on the radio by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from January 1, 1935, to the end of January, 1942, for what purposes and by whose authority, or under what rules or regulations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

[Mr. Casselman.]

5. How many students are there in each of the Canadian universities taking arts courses? How many of these are 18 years of age or over?

6. Do students enrolled in these courses receive instructions which enable them to give greater assistance in the war effort?

7. Are such students subject to call under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and if so, are they granted postponement?

8. In cases where such postponement is given, for what period is deferment granted?

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with this question, which should be made an order for return, I want to point out that some of the information is not in the hands of the government; and of course the order for return will be subject to this, that only information officially in the hands of the government will be produced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A previous question, relating to Salvation Army chaplains, has been made an order for return, and it has to do with only one department.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say "one department"; my hon. friend misunderstood me. I point out that one question is, "How many students are there in each of the Canadian universities taking arts courses? How many of these are eighteen years of age or over?" These are not matters which are within the knowledge of the government or the departments. The same applies to paragraph 6. I was reserving on these questions and on any other question in respect of which the government has not information the right to decline to furnish that information even though the order passes.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES EXPERIMENTAL STATION

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Is there a branch of the fisheries department located in Halifax known as the Atlantic fisheries experimental station? If so, state, (a) location, (b) when built, (c) cost of construction, (d) cost of the equipment, (e) the purpose for which it was constructed, (f) how long has it been in operation, (g) is it considered essential to the development of the fishing industry of the Atlantic coast?

2. Has the Department of National Defence under consideration plans to take over this building? If so, for what purpose?

3. Has the Department of National Defence property and buildings on, (a) the south side adjacent to the fisheries building, (b) on the north side old unused buildings and vacant land?

4. What steps have been taken towards using the vacant lands and buildings north of the experimental station instead of taking over the fisheries property?

5. Has permission been requested by the Department of National Defence from the Department of Fisheries to use the beforementioned experimental station's property? If so, has the fisheries department given approval and authority?

NAVAL SERVICES—MEDICAL SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Is it obligatory for naval men while in port requiring medical service to obtain same from the port doctor?
2. Are men of the naval service directed to such special doctor and, if so, by whom?
3. Who appoints such port doctor or person to give medical treatment to men in the naval service?
4. Why are the other doctors residing and practising in such ports not permitted to share in this medical wartime work?
5. Does the port doctor who provides medical service for men in the naval service receive a salary or is he paid fees, stating the amount and basis of payment?
6. From what fund or appropriation are such payments made for account of, (a) Canadian naval service, (b) British naval service, (c) United States naval service?

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many (i) single men or widowers without children, (ii) married men or widowers with children, between the ages of 18 and 45 are there in, (a) each province, (b) each military district, (c) each national services administrative division?
2. How many men by provinces, military districts and/or administrative divisions have been, (a) called up for service under the National Resources Mobilization Act; (b) found unfit after medical examination; (c) applied for postponement of military training; (d) granted postponement of military training; (e) actually accepted for service at basic training centres; (f) how many notices for medical examination have been sent out; (g) how many have been returned uncalled for; (h) how many notices of call have been sent out; (i) how many have been returned uncalled for?
3. (a) How many prosecutions have been laid in each administrative division for infractions of the regulations of the National Resources Mobilization Act; (b) how many convictions have taken place?
4. What is the number of transfers registered with the different registrars of the administrative divisions?

Mr. MITCHELL: I ask that this question stand as an order for return. I think my hon. friend will agree that the ramifications of the question are such that it would entail a great deal of work to have it answered. He can rest assured that it will be completed as quickly as is humanly possible to prepare the return.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would point out that the question was answered last year, covering the period up to June 1. There is no reason why this information should not be available.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not objecting.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the meantime, stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It ought to be answered.

Mr. HOWE: Order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why an order for return?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Because we want it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not according to the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did the minister say "order for return"?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order for return.

OCEAN-GOING VESSELS—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Do men employed on ocean-going vessels come under the workmen's compensation laws of the province in which the vessel is registered?
2. Regardless of nationality, are these employees entitled to such benefits, if any?
3. Who pays for their hospitalization in case of marine accident?
4. In cases of accident, is there any provision for dependents?
5. Would unemployment insurance take the place of pension in case of incapacity from marine accident?

PURCHASE OF VESSELS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. How many privately owned merchant and other vessels have been purchased by the government since the outbreak of war?
2. What was the price paid in each case and from whom were the vessels purchased?

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many farmers paid income tax each year since 1930 to date?
2. What is the amount of such tax paid each year during the above period?
3. How many farmers operated at a loss during the period 1930 to 1942?
4. How many farmers were forced to leave their farms during the above years?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many soldier settlers under the soldier settlement board scheme have signed quit claim deeds during the years 1930 to 1942, inclusive?
2. How many parcels of land are held for sale or rent at the present time by the soldier settlement board?
3. How many soldier settlers acquired title to their farms during the period 1930 to 1942 inclusive?
4. What is the amount of, (a) principal, (b) interest paid by soldier settlers during the above period?

5. What is the cost of administration of the board during each of the years referred to above?

Mr. CRERAR: This question cannot be answered without taking some little time to get the data together. I would remind the house again that the soldier settlement board is working to-day under considerable pressure. I cannot tell my hon. friend when the information will be brought down, but it will be brought down in due course.

Mr. FAIR: I am asking for this information because, as I think the minister understands, the soldier settlers have been working under pressure for a considerable number of years and I think we ought to do something to relieve that pressure.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—SNOW CLEANING

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Were men of his majesty's forces ordered to assist in the clearing of snow from the yards of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the city of Winnipeg, in the early part of February, 1943?

2. If so, by whose authority?

3. What amount, if any, was paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Department of National Defence for the services thus rendered?

4. On what basis was this amount, if any, determined?

5. Was additional remuneration given to the men who did this work and, if so, on what basis was it determined?

6. Have men of his majesty's forces been ordered on any other occasion to assist private companies at particular tasks?

7. What is the policy of the Department of National Defence in this matter?

RATION OFFICES—SALARIES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

What are the salaries of the men and women in each ration office in Canada?

SOLDIERS STATIONED AT CANADIAN LEGATION IN WASHINGTON

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Are there any soldiers stationed at the Canadian legation in Washington?

2. If so, how many are there and what are their ranks?

3. What are their duties?

4. Do they receive any remuneration in addition to their pay of rank?

5. If so, how much do they receive?

6. Are there any deductions made from the extra remuneration? If so, what for?

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a number of questions have been allowed to stand to-day as orders for returns. For instance, the first question, which has to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, strikes me as one which should not have been passed as an order for return. It is a simple question, the answer to which could have appeared in Hansard in a form which would be readable. Others that have been answered to-day seem to me to come under an entirely different category. A question having to do with the investments monthly in war savings stamps and certificates was passed as an order for return. In all fairness to us in the opposition we ought to have on Hansard the answers to questions which are not of the type which obviously would be subject to the restricted limitations of Hansard, or which must be answered by several departments. I ask the government to reconsider the whole matter of orders for returns, because at the moment much of this information is being given in that form and is therefore buried in an office here, so that it is sometimes difficult to get the information.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not think there is any intention on the part of the government to answer questions in a manner which will result in the information being buried before it reaches the questioner. The government must decide itself in what form it wishes to answer a question. It is, of course, open to criticism if it uses a form which it cannot defend, but as to answering a question by an immediate answer or by an order for return, that is entirely within the discretion of the government and always has been. There are occasions when a question should be answered immediately rather than have it stand as an order for return. There is one question on the order paper to-day concerning which I made inquiry as to why it could not be answered at the moment. I found that the reply related to two different departments of the government. Each department had a separate order in council to consider before the answer could be made. If the information is not available at once, the choice lies between leaving a question on the order paper, or having it made as an order for return, the information to be brought down at the earliest opportunity.

Perhaps if hon. members would frame their questions a little differently it would be possible to have more information placed upon Hansard than is sometimes the case. Where a question covers nearly a page of Hansard it is natural that the government would wish to have a careful survey made of the matters that have to be looked into before the question can be answered. So far as the government is concerned it is usually a matter of employing the method which is regarded as being the more expeditious. That is what has governed thus far.

My attention has been drawn to one question to which my hon. friend referred, which reads:

1. How much have the people of Canada invested monthly in war savings stamps and certificates since February 28, 1942?
2. What amount have the citizens of each province so invested?
3. What amount of war savings certificates have been redeemed monthly since February 28, 1942?
4. What amount of unredeemed war savings stamps are in the hands of the public?

Calculations have to be made to answer a question of this kind. All I wish to say at the moment is that while there may be reasons why hon. gentlemen opposite wish to have replies made immediately rather than later in the form of orders for return, if they will take care to have their questions so framed as to permit of an immediate answer, the answer will probably be given in that form.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some of these questions which we think might properly be passed as orders for returns are answered in the usual way, while others which we felt could be answered at once and go into Hansard are passed as orders for returns. There does not seem to be much reason why the question as to war savings stamps and certificates should not stand so that the department would have opportunity of answering and the answer could appear in Hansard, because it would come much more quickly than on an order for return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not at all sure that the questions asked there are not questions which should be asked when the committee on radio broadcasting meets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is no reason why it should not be asked here. We are not all on the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the information can be brought out before the committee appointed to inquire into the affairs of a corporation which is a separate organization and not a part of a government department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it or is it not a government organization?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out that one of the ministers who appeared to know something about the corporation stated last year in committee that it was an emanation of the crown, and being an emanation of the crown I do not think the Prime Minister's argument in this respect is on very solid ground.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TIMBER CONTROLLER—A. S. NICHOLSON

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence between Mr. A. S. Nicholson, who recently retired as timber controller, and the Prime Minister, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, Minister of Finance, deputy timber controller or his successors as timber controller, during the years 1941 and 1942.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out that correspondence between Mr. Nicholson and the minister and his officers during the period in which he was an officer of the Department of Munitions and Supply is obviously privileged. He may have written a letter to the minister after he resigned from the department. As to correspondence with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, there is none that we can find. I suggest that this motion should not pass.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before it is dropped may I ask the minister whether there was any correspondence between Mr. Nicholson and himself subsequent to or at the time of his resignation?

Mr. HOWE: There was one letter, I think. I shall be glad to bring that letter down, if the order can pass with the reservation that anything which is privileged will not be brought down.

MARKETING AND HANDLING OF 1942-43 AND 1943-44 GRAIN CROPS

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of any agreements entered into by the Canadian wheat board with (a) elevator companies, interior or terminal, (b) mills, (c) pools, (d) exporters, (e) brokers, with respect to the marketing and handling of the 1942-1943 and 1943-1944 crops.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Return tabled.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PERMANENT HOUSES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of specifications and plans of the proposed permanent houses to be built by Wartime Housing Limited at Hamilton, Ontario.

Mr. HOWE: These plans and specifications are documents of the department. The houses were not built and will not be built so far as present plans go, and I think these are hardly documents to be brought down in the House of Commons. The same remarks apply to the next motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the taxpayers' money is spent preparing these plans I see no reason why members of the house should not have a chance to examine them.

Mr. HOWE: The fact that the taxpayers' money was spent preparing plans does not make them available to any individual who may apply for them. They are the property of the federal government, prepared for the government's use.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Parliament is entitled to see them.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt it very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister takes that stand I think there will be trouble. The minister denies access to a public document?

Mr. HOWE: As a consulting engineer in past years, I have prepared plans for this government that I consider my property, as well as the property of the government. If they had been given to any member of the house who applied for them I would have had legitimate ground for protest.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion please say "aye".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion negatived.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—ST. CATHARINES WOMEN'S HOSTEL

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of plans, specifications, and all other documents in possession of Wartime Housing Limited in connection with the erection of the proposed women's hostel at St. Catharines.

Mr. HOWE: Dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the position that the minister is taking in connection with both these matters mean that the house is to be denied the right to see the plans and specifications of any building erected by Wartime Housing Limited?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is putting foward quite a different situation. Neither of these buildings was erected or will be erected. The plans are the property of the government. Of course they can be seen by anyone who wishes to see them in the office where they were prepared, but I see no reason why they should be made a public document, so that anyone can use them for a building. They are prepared for the purposes of the government, not the purposes of members of parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister raises the point that these plans are the property of the government. If they are the property of the government a member has the right to ask that they be tabled in this house. If they are not the property of the government, the situation is different. I should like to be clear on that.

Mr. HOWE: They are the property of the government; nevertheless I hardly think they can be taken out in this house and possibly copied. They are something that cost a good deal of money, and they can be easily copied. Let them stay in the government vaults. My hon. friend has been many times to the office of Wartime Housing Limited; he can see them there.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I see no reason why a member of the house should be put to the expense of travelling to Toronto to examine plans and specifications paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. The men who prepared them are on the payroll of Wartime Housing Limited and we are going to pay for them.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is a principle involved.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Nicholson) which was negatived on the following division:

WAINWRIGHT, ALTA., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. FAIR:

For a copy of all applications, letters, telegrams, references and any other correspondence or documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, the civil service commission, or any other department of government dated from January, 1941, to the present, in connection with the appointment of postmaster at Wainwright, Alberta.

SASKATCHEWAN STOCK WATERING AND IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of recent reports or surveys made with regard to, (a) the William Pearce stock watering project or any modification thereof, (b) the raising of the level of Buffalo lake, (c) a dam site in connection with either of the above projects on the Red Deer river.

MOBILIZATION ACT INTERPRETATIVE LETTER NO. 1

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, and other documents received by the Minister of Labour or by Mr. MacNamara in answer to mobilization act interpretative letter No. 1, dated February, 1943.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is understood that the material will be tabled with the exception of correspondence or documents that are privileged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What would they be? What privilege could possibly attach to answers to that letter? The minister placed the original letter on record. I happen to have seen a copy of one of the replies, which was most constructive, and I cannot see that there is any privilege attaching to this at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: If there is not, then of course they will all come down.

Motion agreed to.

PLANT LABOUR-MANAGEMENT COMMITTEES

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a statement showing the names and locations of all plants in which labour-management committees are functioning in Canada to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend is aware, these committees are on a voluntary basis. Since there are over a hundred thousand firms in Canada, he will appreciate the difficulty of getting the information he desires. Recently I had a check made of the number of committees of this kind functioning to-day, and there would be some difficulty, I should imagine, in getting all the information he would like, and I would like, in this connection. He can rest assured, however, that I will do the best I can.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister was good enough a few days ago to give the number of such committees. I thought it would be a simple matter for him also to give the names, even if the locations were not given. That is all I wish.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall try to get it.

Motion agreed to.

BUTTER

APPEAL OF TORONTO GROCERS FOR RESTORATION OF HALF-POUND RATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance will recall that on Friday I made an inquiry with respect to a press dispatch appearing in the Ottawa Journal under date of February 25, stating that Toronto grocers had on the previous day appealed to Ottawa in connection with a butter surplus. I asked the minister to make a statement at that time, and he was good enough to indicate that he would do so a little later.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I had a statement I intended to bring to the house, but I did not bring it. Would to-morrow be all right?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, unless the minister would like to speak from memory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not send for it?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is several paragraphs in length, and I am afraid I do not remember all that is in it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister would be good enough to get it to-day some time. I do not wish to press him, though, because I know he has been busy with his budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall get it before six o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement to which reference was made earlier in the day. Last Friday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked a question on the orders of the day relating to certain appeals from grocers in the city of Toronto to restore the butter ration to one-half pound per week on March 1 instead of March 15.

I would call the attention of members of the house to a press announcement of the same day by the wartime prices and trade board regarding butter rationing, in which the current supply situation was dealt with at some length. In view of that announcement I do not think it is necessary for me to give more than a brief statement.

It is true that over the last week or ten days, stocks of butter in retailers' hands in Toronto, as in other markets, were being replenished or built up to meet coupon No. 9, good for one-half pound, which becomes valid to-day, March 1. Retail stocks, however, form a relatively small part of total butter stocks at any time, or in any market, being normally about one week's consumption. On the other hand, stocks in wholesalers' hands to-day in Toronto being prepared for distribution to the retail trade amount to considerably less than one-half the quantity held at this time last year. A similar situation prevails in all the large markets throughout Canada.

In view of this situation the wartime prices and trade board decided that it would be impossible to restore the full ration as from March 1, but another coupon, the first in the new ration book, has been made valid for March 10, and a further coupon, the second in the new book, for March 20, after which date it is planned that coupons, each good for eight ounces, will become valid each Saturday until such time as supplies reach a point where two coupons can be made valid at the same time to facilitate buying.

MADAM CHIANG KAI-SHEK

PROPOSED VISIT TO CANADA—POSSIBILITY OF ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I must apologize for not having put my question in writing, but my stenographer is away to-day and no one else can read my writing. I am particularly interested in this matter, and I believe it is urgent. Could the Prime Minister give us any information as to whether Madam Chiang Kai-Shek will address this house?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member is most courteous. No apology is required for his question. I must however apologize to him for not being able to answer it in exact terms. It is our hope and expectation that Madam Chiang Kai-Shek will visit Canada before she returns to China. If she visits Canada it will be, I think, toward the end of this month or the early part of April. An effort is being made to persuade Madam Chiang Kai-Shek to make not only the one address I understand she has promised to give in Canada, but also if possible to address the members of both houses of parliament when she visits this city. Whether or not Madam Chiang Kai-Shek will be able to meet the latter request, I cannot say. I very much hope she may be able to do so.

RATIONING

ADDITIONAL CHARGE BY PUBLIC CATERERS FOR TEA, COFFEE OR MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. I have in my hand a clipping taken last week from the Ottawa Journal, which reads:

> A prices board spokesman said last night a recent board order permits public caterers to charge five cents extra for cups of tea or coffee or glasses of milk where these beverages are ordered with meals.

Will the minister inform the house what purpose this order is intended to serve?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall try to do so to-morrow or next day.

FOOD

SUBSIDIES TO MAINTAIN SUPPLY—REPORT AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SUBSIDIES OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, based on a report in the Regina Leader-Post of February 24. It bears the heading, in large type, "Farm Subsidy Coming Soon", and is as follows:

Ottawa, February 24, creation of subsidy machinery to serve the farmers of Canada and maintain the nation's war programme on the food front is actually under way and soon will be completed, officials of the federal Department of Agriculture said Tuesday.

It says further:

Departmental sources stated that a subsidies officer would probably be named within the agricultural department to supervise all agricultural aid. The possibility of the appointment to this post of Dean A. M. Shaw, head of the agricultural supplies board, was suggested.

And further:

It was further stated that the recent Washington conference of Canadian and United States agricultural officials had succeeded in fully integrating the 1943 food programme of both nations.

Why was this policy announced by officials in the minister's department rather than by the minister himself to members of the House of Commons? Further, when will the minister make a statement to the house with respect to this very important new programme?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be making a statement in due course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not good enough.

Mr. PERLEY: Why did an official in the minister's department make the announcement, rather than the minister?

Mr. GARDINER: I would want to make inquiries first, and find out whether it was made.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the minister no confidence in the Leader-Post press report? It is the mouthpiece of this government in Saskatchewan.

NEWSPRINT

PARTICIPATION BY INDEPENDENT PRIMARY PRODUCERS IN INCREASED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. O'BRIEN (Northumberland, N.B.): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of the announcement in to-day's press by the wartime prices and trade board that an increase of $4 per ton has been allowed on newsprint, will the minister state what provision, if any, has been made so that the independent primary producers of pulpwood may be permitted to participate, covering wood held by the mills as inventory?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY: (Minister of Finance): I suggest that a question such as this should be placed upon the order paper.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

FINDING OF CHIEF CORONER AT INQUEST IN CASE OF DEATH OF PRIVATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): On Friday a question was asked by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) with respect to the findings of the coroner's jury which inquired into the death on January 29, 1943, of Private John H. Somerville. This unfortunate happening took place when I was away from my office, and was dealt with in my absence. Immediately after the death, the chief coroner of Ontario was notified and on the same day an autopsy was performed by Doctor Erb, pathologist, at the coroner's direction.

A court of inquiry was convened on February 5, at which eighteen witnesses gave evidence, including Doctor Erb, whose evidence before the coroner's jury is quoted in the newspaper, and including also the medical officers who attended the deceased. A copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry was sent to the attorney general of Ontario. The attorney general directed an inquest, which was held; and the finding referred to by the hon. member was made on February 25. Copy of this finding was forwarded to me by the premier and attorney general of Ontario. The validity or otherwise of these findings cannot of course be appraised without a full examination of the evidence, the relevant circumstances, and competent opinion regarding appropriate treatment in the case referred to.

I immediately gave instructions to obtain a copy of the evidence taken before the coroner's jury. It is reported to me however that this evidence will not be transcribed by the court reporter until probably next Thursday. Meantime I had the director-general of medical services communicate personally with the chief coroner of Ontario, and the latter is co-operating by furnishing, as quickly as it is transcribed, a copy of the evidence taken before the coroner's jury, and also a copy of the report of the autopsy.

Just as soon as this material is received, the matter will have the most complete and thorough examination, with a view to whatever action may be found to be called for.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

The house resumed, from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) for the appointment of a select committee to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, we have yet to win this war in which we are now engaged. I agree with the hon. members for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) when they say that our first duty should be to the members of our armed forces now overseas. It has been said, and we must realize, that many of those gallant people will not return to their civilian lives after the fray. Therefore the government should now be in a position to assure those in the armed forces that their dependents will be properly cared for in the future. Those who will come back should be now assured that every opportunity will be provided to make certain that they and their dependents will have a respectable standard of living in this country. If this is done it will do much to develop and maintain the morale of the armed forces and of people in Canada in these critical times.

I was deeply impressed on Friday, I believe it was, by the speech of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I know something about the conditions which confronted many ex-service men after the last war. As the minister said, how different for the boys of the air force to-day, many of them still in their teens experiencing all the thrills of actual air combat. Many of these boys did not know what an occupation was when they left for overseas. How vastly different and more difficult it will be to find places for them, with their fine academic training, when this war is over. I trust that the speech which was made on this subject by the Minister of National Defence for Air will be distributed by the wartime information board. It will do a great deal more good than much of the propaganda that has come from that board for circulation amongst the people.

I have never been one of those who think that the state owes a man or a woman a living whether he or she is prepared to work for it or not. But I have always considered that the state owes every man and every woman an opportunity to work for a respectable standard of living. Given that opportunity, coupled with certain social legislation respecting health and old age, I think that we should have a contented and prosperous people in a land so rich in resources as Canada is.

A great deal has been accomplished in reconstruction for agriculture during the past few years under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. This act was set up in 1935 by the late Hon. Robert Weir, and I am happy to say it has been carried on up to the present by successive governments. Under this act a great deal has been accomplished in water conservation, community pastures, regrassing, reclamation and reforestation, and matters of the kind. The possibilities for reforestation in many parts of Canada are immense. The operations which have been carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act have made possible a greater diversified production in many sections of western Canada, which could not have been accomplished without the benefit of this act. I should like to quote from an article appearing in the magazine Canadian Business. It states:

> Things have been looking up lately for the western farmer, with good crops, good weather and a more diversified production. Cash income from sale of farm products in the four western provinces in 1941 was $418,700,000, the highest since 1929. If the various government bonuses are added, this means, according to a recent bulletin of the Country Guide, a cash income per farm of $1,447 or $255 more than the average for all Canada. Ontario had the highest income per farm, followed by Alberta, then Manitoba. But western Canada, with 44 per cent of the farms of the dominion, received over 51 per cent of the total farm income.
> The picture is so much brighter in the west partly because of more diversified production. In the 20's, wheat represented over 70 per cent of the prairie farmers' cash income; last year it was only 43 per cent. Major factor is the increased interest in raising hogs, live stock and poultry, and no longer does the west consist only of acres of wheat fields. These provinces now have 51 per cent of the hogs in the dominion and 45 per cent of all the cattle. These are 1941 figures, but by June 1942 the percentage increase in the number of hogs was 41 per cent in Manitoba, 40 per cent in Saskatchewan, 23 per cent in Alberta. Eastern Canada in 1941 had an average of 7·6 hogs per farm; western Canada 10·1. Average number of cattle per farm was 11·6 in eastern Canada and 11·8 in western Canada. Hog and cattle production has been aided by a huge reserve of feed grains and the only limiting factor is lack of farm labour.

May I digress for a moment to say that the statement on farm labour made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) on February 26 is far from satisfactory to the farmers. It just proves the lack of governmental coordination and continued muddling in our man-power policy, with agriculture taking what is left. We had during the fall of 1942 a movement of university students from eastern Canada to the west to assist with the harvest. This was far from satisfactory; yet according to a return brought down on February 15 last this undertaking cost the taxpayers approximately one-quarter of a million dollars—to be exact $235,521.99. This was the amount paid by the federal government to the railway companies in connection with the movement of students to the west. I quote further from the same article:

> What about sheep and poultry production? In the raising of sheep, the west is definitely a leader; with 44 per cent of the total farms in Canada, it has 50 per cent of the sheep production, with an average of 5 per farm. In the east, the figure is 3 per farm. Bulk of sheep raising is done in Alberta (8·7 per farm), followed by British Columbia (5·7) and Quebec and Nova Scotia (3·2). Value of wool production in the four western provinces in 1941 was $1,563,000.

The article goes on to mention other branches of agriculture:

> Poultry raising is another important industry, and sale of poultry and eggs brought to the western farmer $29,673,000 in 1941. Forty-seven per cent of total poultry in the dominion is in the west—71·3 is the average number of poultry per farm in the west, and 63 in the east. British Columbia leads in this branch of farming, with 82·9 per farm, followed by Ontario, 80·1.
> Other sources of income in 1941 were grains and hay, $200,864,000, and vegetables $4,900,000. Production of oats, barley and flax is still on the increase, as wheat acreage is more and more reduced.

This development has been made possible in many sections of the country solely through the work that was done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Canada has been prodigal of its agricultural resources, as has been pointed out by officials in charge of administering that act, and this is no less true of Ontario than it is of the prairies. In many parts of the east, ruthless cutting of timber from the watersheds of small streams has created conditions most serious to stable agriculture. Spring floods, it is also pointed out, have caused a serious problem in soil erosion

I quote from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of February 24, 1943:

> In the west, P.F.R.A. has done a splendid job within the limits of its resources. Its restoration of grasslands, the construction of small dams and the few small irrigation projects it has undertaken have all paid dividends in better agriculture. But more important still, it has begun a real programme of soil conservation which must be a continuing campaign if this country is to maintain a prosperous agriculture.

Many other projects are possible under that act. I trust that the reconstruction committee will make a study of what has already been accomplished under the act and of its much wider application to agriculture throughout the dominion.

In the province of Manitoba we have an abundance of cheap electrical power. Over a year ago, I am happy to be able to say, the provincial government appointed a commission to investigate the possibility and feasibility of rural farm electrification throughout Manitoba. Since then the commission have issued their report recommending that immediately after the war, in cooperation with the federal authorities, this electrification be proceeded with.

Last year this house passed the Veterans' Land Act, which is a great improvement on the old soldier settlement acts. But before any veterans' land settlement undertaking or reconstruction scheme can be a success, we must all be in agreement on one point—that parity prices must be established and maintained for all products and services essential to the welfare of the human family.

May I quote just a sentence or two from the Commercial Intelligence Journal of February 27, 1943, which in an article headed "Agriculture" says:

> The year 1942 is generally regarded as a good one for the agricultural community. This was due in no small degree to the increased dependence of the country as a whole on domestic output of various raw materials and foodstuffs. The government took numerous steps to encourage improved production of grains and other foods, such as the provision of seed, the issue of loans for the purchase of implements and fertilizers, the guaranteeing of minimum prices, and the outright purchase of certain crops. Prices of agricultural produce did not in general keep in pace with those of many consumer goods, and the farmer has suffered some loss in income.

It is estimated that the farmers of Canada, who compose 33 per cent of the population, will have received about 15 per cent of the national income for 1942. They received 30 per cent of the national income in the years 1915 to 1919. During the present war, farm prices in Canada have been substantially below prices obtaining in practically every one of the warring nations. Thus we have approximately one-third of the people of Canada actually engaged in farming and receiving under one-sixth of the national income. Agricultural foodstuffs are now recognized by everyone as essential munitions of war, yet at present the lot of the farmer is not a particularly happy one. I suggest to the reconstruction committee that the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission report be given careful and detailed study. Not only will many of the recommendations mean a great deal to the future of the provinces, but if put in operation they will affect in detail the future welfare and lives of many of the citizens of the dominion. I trust that the report will receive the serious consideration of the committee, and that it will be favourably recommended in their report to this house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Will he tell us whether he believes that the implementation of the recommendations of the Sirois report would aid the provinces?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, I believe in many respects they would. I am not saying I agree entirely with all the recommendations in that report, but I ask that the committee study it in detail and that such recommendations as are considered to be of assistance to the provinces and to the citizens in general be commended to the house. I agree wholeheartedly with many of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend mind telling us with which ones he agrees, and—?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not intend to go at the present time into a detailed discussion such as the hon. member for Lethbridge proposes. I shall be glad to do so on some other occasion. There are many recommendations in that report which, he knows as well as I do, would be of distinct benefit to the citizens of this country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that any of them would do any good to the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not think that the views expressed by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) are any argument why the committee should not give favourable consideration to the report, and if they decide to recommend certain of its proposals, I trust that they will be implemented in the statutes of Canada.

Before those in the armed forces and those engaged in war industry are released, adequate training and suitable work must be provided for them. In doing this, we must keep uppermost in our minds at all times the fact that anything we decide upon must be based upon parity prices for all products and services. I have already pointed out that this is essential to the welfare of the human family, and if we follow that principle we shall not go very far astray.

I shall have more to say on the subject of reconstruction as it applies under the resolution for social security and health insurance, and with particular reference also to agriculture throughout the dominion, but I do not think I should take up more of the time of the house at this stage.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I wish to give, for the use of the minister and his committee when they get down to work, a few facts about the head of the lakes which I think they should have and which may be helpful in the reconstruction period.

The first fact is that at the head of the lakes we have hundreds of square miles of virgin timber, good for lumber, firewood, pulp and shipbuilding. I found out the other day that we have in the Thunder bay district the western white spruce picea glauca. Its existence there was not known until recently, because nobody had explored the full extent of our timber. A tree is of little value until it is cut down. I have not very much patience with those who want to revert to such primitive processes as the burning of peat, when we have all kinds of good coal and wood. So that the first point which should be borne in mind by the committee is that we have timber in abundance.

In the second place we are rich in mines. We have gold, silver, copper, zinc, chromium, and also iron in abundance, ready to be mined and put on the market. If the Department of Mines and Resources can make money out of the socialization of their muskrats, they can turn loose some of their experts in the Thunder bay district, and soon the rest of Canada will hum as a result of what we have in that section.

Remember also that we have an excellent harbour. It is well protected; it is needed for shipbuilding; when the minister and his committee make as an outstanding factor in reconstruction the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, the dream of so many people at the head of the lakes will come true, and the head of the lakes will become the Chicago of the west. We shall have there a great distributing centre, which will mean much to the whole of Canada.

But the best thing to be found at the head of the lakes, and something which is perhaps not very well known, is our farming area. Some people think we have no farms, and thereby show their lack of knowledge. We have in the Port Arthur and Fort William districts 25,000 acres of farm land, of which 12,784 acres are assessed. This is a greater area than will be found round the city of Hamilton, which has only 9,694 acres, or Windsor, with 8,251 acres, or Sudbury, with 1,522 acres; and anyone who has gone through these districts and knows anything about soils and what they can produce will admit that ours is the coming farming district, not even second to Manitoba.

What are these farms capable of producing? All kinds of grain, apples and other fruits; in fact the best strawberries with the finest flavour of which I have any knowledge are grown in our district. This is on account of the cool atmosphere during the summer; they are not subject to frost as in some other places. The climate is damp and cool in summer because of our proximity to a great cold fresh-water lake. This, too, is favourable to the growth of abundant grass, and the lakehead during the past years has become a feeding centre for fat cattle. The soil has been tested by the chamber of commerce and by our experts at the experimental farm substation, and has been found to be capable of producing sugar beet of a very high grade.

Our district is also distinguished by its ability to produce poultry and eggs. There are those who say that our hens can lay more and bigger eggs than any others. The climate is cool and the hens do not have to sweat at their job to the same extent as elsewhere. During the past week our poultry association passed a resolution asking that eggs from the head of the lakes be marked accordingly to show that they are better eggs and have more flavour.

We are also known for our fisheries. Lake Superior trout is known all over Canada and in some places in the United States. The only trouble is that there is not enough to go around. Fresh herring is just beginning to come into its own.

The municipal air field was taken over by the Department of National Defence when the war broke out. Originally this field was intended to be on a feeder line to the Trans-Canada Air Lines but it will now be on the Trans-Canada Air Lines when the war is over.

We have power at the head of the lakes. We do not have to depend upon Niagara falls because we have the Cameron falls ninety miles from Fort William. We also have the Kakabeka falls which are known for their beauty and usefulness. We have a water system second to none. Loch Lomond is situated 400 feet above the level of the lake. All that needed to be done was to put in a pipe and the water flowed down sweet and clean. In order to have the right type of development, we must have the right kind of laws. We must have progressive laws. There are men and women who want to use the talents that God has given to them and not hide them under the earth.

This committee should see to it that the right of free enterprise and the right of the worker to cooperate are continued. I have a legal adviser who sometimes comes to my room to give me some free advice. His advice is good, and he says that it would be a good thing if we could look down at the world from above, see ourselves as the good Lord sees us. That of course caused my mind to go back into the realm of the queen of sciences, namely, theology. There are two phases that are used a good deal in connection with the new social order. One is, "the banishment of fear" and the other is, "the banishment of poverty." I think of fear as one of the great blessings of mankind. There are men in this house who are afraid of their own conduct, afraid of their own speeches. Fear is often protective. It is a blessing to us from the time we first got burned by touching something we should not have touched.

There are those who will say that we should banish fear, but there is only one way to cure fear. Work cannot cure fear. Success is no cure for fear. Quite often the man who has the most money has the greatest fear that he will lose it or that someone will get the better of a deal with him. The only cure for fear must come from that great Teacher, who said:

> But perfect love casteth out fear.

If you have not love of the right thing, then you are not going to get rid of fear. Poverty is a relative term. There are people on relief in Ottawa who in the days of King Tut would have been considered as living most luxuriously. But there will always be people at the bottom of the human way of living, people who will be called poor. Again I hear the Master Workman coming out with this clear statement:

> For ye have the poor always with you.

He was one to whom the future was an open book.

This committee should obtain brief statements from the different reconstruction committees which have been set up across Canada. I can give the name of Alderman Fryer, who is head of our committee, to the minister. I am sure that Alderman Fryer will be able to provide some useful information because at the head of the lakes we have resources which, if put to proper use, would be a blessing to mankind.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this debate on post-war problems to voice my views and those of my electors on the financial burden which is being laid upon the wage-earners of this country and the effects of which will necessarily be felt after the war.

In this connection I desire to offer to the government a suggestion for the better apportionment of the taxes necessitated by our participation in the present world war, a participation which takes into account neither our population nor the limit of our possibilities. I feel that in the financing of our war effort, capital should be called upon to supply a substantial share of the required funds. Since the outbreak of this war, many wealthy people in this country have undoubtedly invested their money in securities or real estate so as to put their capital outside the reach of the government.

In many cases, such investments produce no income, but the capital is protected for the future. The men who risk their lives on land, at sea and in the air are also fighting for the protection of those investors' property.

Here is what I would suggest for compelling those people to assume a greater share of our war effort. The government should decide to force them to lend the money needed by this country, even though they might say that they have none available. The government might thus say to those investors: "You own securities or real estate unmortgaged in a definite proportion. An act of parliament will compel you to file an application with the Bank of Canada, which will lend you the funds needed by the government for the war effort." They would give to the Bank of Canada, or to the latter's agents, a mortgage on their securities or real estate, and would file with those banks guarantees for the amount loaned, and they would lend to the dominion government the money thus obtained from the bank. In return they would receive a dominion bond which would be deposited with the Bank of Canada or its agents. After the war, the dominion government would, at a certain date fixed by them according to the development, the resources and the income of the country, say within about thirty years, redeem those bonds, the holders then paying back the banks.

Such a plan would enable the government to obtain billions of dollars for our war effort.

In order to protect modest fortunes, which will never be too numerous in this country since they ensure a better distribution of public wealth, only the owners of securities or real estate worth more than $25,000 would be called upon to lend money to the government according to the above plan.

The plan would not apply to properties used for religious, charitable or educational or hospitalization purposes. I may point out, Mr. Speaker, that this plan would not mean confiscation. For our war expenditures of 1943, 10 per cent of the value of all securities or real estate in Canada could be loaned, and should the war be still going on in 1944, another loan of 10 per cent might be required. Through such a plan the government could considerably reduce the income tax now being paid by the people in the lower and medium salary brackets, because the latter have no capital other than their salary, and it would enable us to honour their obligations, which they cannot do at the present time.

It should not be forgotten that the greater part of the revenue derived by the Canadian government from income tax is levied on the lower or medium salary brackets, as few people draw large salaries and the income tax on salaries is much higher here than in the United States. To my mind, it is not fair that a single generation should have to pay the whole cost of this war, because the benefits of peace will be enjoyed as much by future generations as by ourselves.

Our soldiers make great sacrifices and wealthy people have no right to elude the financial sacrifices that are necessary. The guarantee they would receive from the government is certainly greater than that given to the army as regards the opportunity of finding employment after the war. Such a plan would make billions of dollars available to the dominion treasury. One can imagine the meaning of a 10 per cent levy on all securities or real estate in Canada. One cause for strikes lies in the fact that so much money is now taken from the small wage earners because they find it difficult to make both ends meet and to cope with the cost of living, which notwithstanding what is said, shows a considerable increase.

Moreover, the banks would not take the slightest risk for it must not be forgotten that they have lent up to 75 per cent of the value of stock exchange securities which were certainly not worth as much as the guarantees to which I am referring.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, capitalists take advantage of the difficulties which beset the small land owner, to confiscate his properties. Here is an example. Lieutenant-Colonel Jack

Price, of Quebec, has been a prisoner of war in Japan since the fall of Hong Kong. He was the owner of a property that cost him $75,000. His wife had to sell it for the amount of the mortgage, $13,000, because she did not have the money necessary to meet her obligations. So, while some of our men are making the supreme sacrifice on the battlefields of Africa, Europe or Asia, these greedy capitalists take advantage of this fact to confiscate properties, even though they be non-revenue bearing, so that, after the war, their capital will remain intact even if our dollar becomes devalorized. Every one knows, of course, that in the event of such a devalorization, the price of commodities and properties would increase in proportion to the decrease in value of the dollar. Mr. Speaker, I point out to the government that they are at present discriminating against the great majority of wage-earners. They force them to loan part of their salary without interest, while the capitalists who subscribe to a loan make sure that they will draw interest on their investment.

Often, the capitalist's subscription to a Victory Loan is nothing but a publicity stunt; as soon as the contribution has been publicly announced, he repairs to the bank to sell his bonds and buy more and more property. At the present time we are witnessing the monopolizing of real estate by the trusts and, at the close of hostilities, we shall be a country of unevenly distributed wealth, a condition favourable to the development of subversive ideas inviting communism.

It may be claimed that a reduction of taxes on salaries might very well provoke inflation, by virtue of the consequent increase in the purchasing power of the public. My answer is that the government has the necessary means of preventing this increased purchasing power. Indeed, they have, at the present time, let us not forget it, all the necessary power to control both prices and wages and the additional power to freeze at the 1942 level all production deemed as non-essential to the war effort, thereby preventing the purchasing power from exceeding that of 1942. The government is empowered to set a ceiling at the 1942 level, on the amount of goods obtainable by both retailers and wholesalers, at the same time preventing the consumer from buying more than he could buy in 1942. Thus, no increase in the purchasing power could provoke inflation by an increased demand for goods as a consequence of an increased supply of money. The exercise of the above powers by the government would necessarily compel the wage-earner to save money for the post-war period, for, let us not forget it, after the war, this class will not have the same opportunities as the capitalists, their only capital, in most cases, being their salary.

The adoption of such a policy will prevent the worker from becoming a public liability. It is imperative, by a reduction of taxes on the small and medium salaries, to compel their recipients to accumulate savings for the post-war period and thus lighten the burden of the administration when the time comes for them to face this problem. The harder the wage-earner finds it to spend his earnings the lighter will be the burden of the government after the war.

We must not overlook the fact that, for 25 years, the capitalist has been in the position of increasing his holdings, because our soldiers gave their lives for him from 1914 to 1918, and that, in the course of most of these 25 years, the workers and a considerable proportion of the wage-earners have been unemployed, through the depression which we all remember, and that, only since the beginning of the war have they been able to afford the luxury of life insurance to protect their families and insure some degree of future social security for their children.

I have discussed this plan with a number of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, and some have suggested that, by striking at capital I would alienate the Anglo-Canadian element of the population for, they said, they own most of the capital, the French Canadians making up the greater portion of the wage-earning class of our country.

My answer to them, Mr. Speaker, is that we, French Canadians, are not to blame for the fact that a certain group of English-speaking Canadians, especially those known as the "Two Hundred," in Toronto, have raised imperialism to the dignity of a dogma It is much more important that the same fair treatment be meted out to every one and the financial burden of the war be evenly distributed. Furthermore, let those who subscribe to the dogma of imperialism pay for the expensive consequences of their opinions to the benefit of the large class of wage-earners.

I know that, at the present time, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is seriously considering this plan. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to express the fond hope that it will be implemented, for we must remember that our professional and labouring classes are the main props of our nation and that their whole capital is the salary they draw every week or every month.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I hesitate to prolong this debate which has already run into the second or third day.

There is, however, one subject pertaining to reconstruction that I think deserves more attention than it has received to date, namely, the subject of education, and I shall confine my remarks this afternoon to the importance of education as part of our reconstruction programme. So far only one hon. member in this debate, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has made any reference to the importance of that subject.

First I should like to congratulate the government upon the Vocational Training Act that was passed in this house last year. In my opinion it is the most progressive piece of legislation in the field of education that has ever been passed in this house. It is far-reaching in its effect. I wish to congratulate the minister also. It is not very often that I have the opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) but I want to take this opportunity of congratulating him upon the committee that he has set up to advise him under the authority of last year's act.

That act, however, is limited in its scope to vocational training. It provides for the education of those who are being trained in our war emergency classes for some place in the armed forces, for the education of our men who return from overseas, and it makes possible cooperation with the provincial governments for education on the secondary school level after the war is over. I suggest that the special committee appoint a subcommittee, not for labour and education as was done last year, but to study the importance of education and its bearing on our post-war problems; and in the few moments at my disposal I should like to suggest four definite subjects which I think might very well come up for study by the committee.

In the first place I consider that there is need for a vocational guidance committee in the federal field. Under the Department of Labour we have employment offices and placement officers in all the important centres across this country. We have heard some criticism of these employment offices. It may be true that they are staffed with personnel who have had little training for their jobs, but if they could be staffed with well trained personnel, when the war is over these offices should be very important in preventing an employment muddle. At the same time we have tens of thousands of our boys and girls being trained in vocational schools, and I am satisfied that in view of the nature of employment, in view of the fact that employment and trade and commerce are national in their scope, only a committee which can view this field from a national point of view can adequately advise our young people on the courses to study and provide them with guidance in securing employment. In England such offices were set up thirty years ago, and there is a place for the guidance of young people in the labour set-up there. The employment offices are staffed with trained personnel. Juvenile vocational councils have been established. Officers from those councils do not wait for boys and girls to come to them for guidance; they go into the schools and advise the young people on the courses they should follow, and assist the parents in placing these young people in employment after they have left school. One thing I fear we are likely to get in Canada after the war is a federal office of education superimposed upon and working independently of the present nine provincial departments of education. I believe it is important that some federal bureau or committee be set up which will coordinate or correlate the work being done in the educational field by the federal authorities with what is being done in the schools of the provinces, particularly in the field of vocational guidance.

A second matter which I think might well come before the committee—and I am passing over these points rapidly this afternoon in the hope that there may be an opportunity of discussing them in further detail with the committee—is the setting up of a federal bureau of education. In the United States, where education is a state matter as in Canada it is a provincial matter, a federal bureau of education has functioned since 1887, and never once during all those years has any question been raised as to its infringement upon the rights of the states. That bureau serves to coordinate all the educational research work being done throughout the nation. It serves as a clearing-house for information, and is regarded by educationists of that country as being of immense value. We have in Canada, under the bureau of statistics, an educational office which educational authorities across this country consider has done a remarkably good job. Almost every educational association and authority in this country has recommended from year to year that the services of this bureau should be extended. We now have an opportunity of extending the work being done by that office until it becomes something similar to the bureau of education which functions in the United States. There is no intention that such a committee or bureau should in any way usurp the authority of the provincial departments of education. Its function should be, as it is now, to correlate all the research work being done, to give some leadership in directing research work along educational lines, and to serve as a clearing-house for the dissemination of such research as has been carried out. We talk a great deal about Canadian unity, and its lack. Anything we can do through a central bureau that will enable the boys and girls of one province to become better acquainted with those in the schools of the other provinces; anything we can do that will enable the work being done in the schools of one province to be made known to the authorities of the other provinces—all will help in building Canadian instead of provincial citizenship.

A third field to which the committee should give some consideration is that of providing federal bursaries and scholarships at both secondary school and university levels. To-day it is a fact that the educational opportunities accorded our young people are to a large extent determined by the economic status of the family. Recent research in the United States covering many hundreds of thousands of students has shown that more than fifty per cent of boys and girls who leave the secondary schools before completing their courses do so on account of economic reasons. They leave because their families cannot afford to keep them at school until they have finished. That is taking place continually in our Canadian schools. In a survey made a few years ago in Toronto and suburban areas it was found that more than fifty per cent of the brightest boys and girls in the schools in that section were forced out of school before completing their matriculation, or before graduating from secondary schools, as a result of lack of finances to keep them in school. It is a well known fact that a boy's opportunity of attending university to-day is to a large extent dependent upon the financial ability of his family to assist him. As a consequence we are losing in Canada some of the brightest of our young people. Thousands of them who could best profit by education have no opportunity of acquiring it. This incidentally is no innovation. In Great Britain and in other parts of the British empire scholarships such as I have mentioned are provided, at both secondary school and university levels, for capable but indigent pupils.

As a fourth matter for the study of the committee I would sugest a subject bristling with difficulty, namely, federal financial support to the provinces for primary and secondary education in the schools of the province. I suggest furthermore that such federal assistance must of necessity be given on the basis of provincial needs. Any assistance which has heretofore been given in the field of education to the provinces has been given on a basis of population, or on a basis whereby the province contributed fifty per cent and the dominion the other 50 per cent. As a result, with regard to grants made for technical education in past years, only the wealthiest provinces were able to make adequate use of those grants within the time specified by the act. And even in those provinces only the larger urban centres could take advantage of the grants. The result is that to-day we have fairly adequate vocational education opportunities in our larger centres, but throughout the rural areas and in the smaller towns and villages we find inadequate opportunity for anything in the nature of vocational training.

Whatever else the Rowell-Sirois report revealed, it did reveal the great differences in the ability of the several provinces to bear their share, or to bear an adequate share of the cost of education and other social programmes. For instance, if Prince Edward Island were to provide from the provincial treasury an adequate system of education it would require the expenditure of nearly eighty per cent of the income of that provincial government. There are provinces which can provide out of provincial revenue an adequate educational programme, but there are others—and I have in mind the situation in Saskatchewan a few years ago—which find it simply impossible. So that if effective federal aid is to be given in respect of education, and if that aid is to serve the purpose for which it is given, it should be allocated on a basis of provincial need.

Speaking for the moment with regard to the need for federal support, may I remind hon. members that in Canada we began to finance education by a tax on real estate levied by small municipalities. We did that because in those days there was nothing else to tax. We have continued from that day to this to ask real estate in local communities to bear about 80 per cent of the cost of education in Canada. We are the only part of the British empire where education is supported by a tax on municipal real estate. In every other part of the empire the cost of education is borne by governments corresponding with our provincial and federal governments. In every other instance throughout the empire not less than 50 per cent of the cost of education is borne by the central government.

Let us for a moment ask ourselves the result of our present method of financing education. The type of school a boy attends, the nature of equipment provided, the library facilities available, the qualifications of the teacher and in many instances even the length of time the school is open are determined to a great extent by the value of real estate assessment in a local municipality. The result is that a boy living on one side of a street, in one municipality, in many instances has an opportunity of gaining a much superior education than can be gained by another boy who may live on the opposite side of the same street, but who lives in another muncipality or another school section.

Surely the time has come in Canada when we must realize that education is a matter of vital national importance, and, being so, surely some means should be taken whereby the provinces and the federal government working in cooperation could be made to bear the major share of the cost. Granted, I know, that by the British North America Act education is a matter of provincial concern, there is no reason whatever why the federal government should interfere in any way with the programme of a provincial department of education, because the assistance would be by way of financial support.

The one great need from the federal point of view is to see to it that no boy or girl in Canada is deprived of an educational opportunity because his or her parents are poor. Under present conditions many boys and girls lack that opportunity, and that is a situation which should be remedied.

Subject to your approval, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) the following amendment:

That this motion be amended by inserting after the word "committees" in line 6 the following words: "including a subcommittee on education".

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the reconstruction committee of the house last year, I should like to make a few constructive observations. There are two or three fields in which I believe that committee failed to make sufficient progress. If reports and words would reconstruct Canada I feel as a result of the experience of that committee that the job would be pretty well done by now.

The purpose of the James committee and the work of the reconstruction committee and of its subcommittees has been to study problems which face Canada under the present set-up. It seemed to me that one of the first things we should have done was to make a study of why it was that Canada had not provided that life which she was capable of providing in the years prior to the war But we were told rather bluntly in the committee that no such study was being made. We wanted to find out what had been wrong with our national set-up. Then possibly we could have found some basis from which to effect a cure. We have not, it seems, clarified our aims. We are pretty much in the position of a physician who has been called upon to administer treatment to a sick man, and who is unwilling to make a diagnosis in order to find out what is wrong with him. Very often I felt that we were trying to administer some sort of temporary palliative instead of getting down to the root of the evil and finding out what was really wrong. Canada in the past few decades has not made much progress. We have sunk to what I think could properly be termed a C 3 nation. Our living standards, our health and housing standards, our educational standards in most of the dominion have been low, and unemployment and insecurity have been our lot.

I believe that the committee would do well first to make a survey of the things which our twelve million people approximately, and we hope twenty million within a few years, require. Then it should make a survey of the resources and the materials we have in the dominion in the way of natural resources, machinery of production, labour, brains and ability, to provide our people with these things which they need. After we have made those two surveys our big problem will be to bring the two together. In other words, how can we so arrange our national economy that our people who need those things, and are willing to make their contribution in the way of effort toward obtaining them, shall have them? Frankly, I find in the reports of the committee which have so far been submitted much which causes me to feel that we have not touched the real problem of making these services and goods available to the people.

One of the particular fields which I wish to discuss is agriculture. To-day agriculture is the forgotten industry in this land. It seems to be looked upon as the legitimate prey of business. We find that the grain exchanges are carrying on their gambling operations.

We find millers and packers waxing wealthy on the farmers' products, and we find money lenders who have loaned the farmers into debt. We find machinery companies and others charging what they like for what the farmer has to buy, and the prices he receives for his products bear no relation to the cost of production. The only attempt at freezing those prices has been to freeze them down at a level which can ultimately lead only to a sort of pauperized peasantry. The farmer now finds himself regulated almost to death.

The subcommittee set out to study something in the field of agriculture, and their studies led them into the field of trying to ascertain a proper balance between agricultural and industrial populations. They proposed to investigate the whole field of the industrial use of agricultural products, internal trade within Canada, and external trade between Canada and other parts of the world. A study of the external trade should include a careful gauging of the requirements of foreign markets and a planning of Canadian agriculture so that the surpluses we have can best be disposed of. We believe that the national marketing boards should to a certain extent take the place of grain exchanges and food exchanges, and through these boards there should be set up machinery for establishing a proper parity price within the dominion, and for effecting a proper exchange of goods within the various parts of the dominion.

In the foreign field we should be finding out what things Canada will require and how we can best provide the things which other nations will require and which we can offer in exchange. In both these fields we believe that the committee has failed to study properly the place for wholesale and retail cooperative organizations. In the internal economy of Canada there are many things which must startle us as we look at them. There is the fact that we in the west have such boundless abundance of grains and foodstuffs which seem to be lacking in other parts of the dominion.

I am glad that the committee is studying the field of nutrition. I have often considered, when thinking of the large wheat surpluses of western Canada, that it was shameful the way in which that grain with all its nutritive qualities had been changed in its manufacture until all the good was taken out of it and these nutritive properties were not made available to the people who should have them. Again, there is an abundance of fruit growing as in the Okanagan valley, but the children on the western prairies are unable to get fruit as a part of their necessary nutritive supply.

Another problem which is a part of the agricultural problem is that of debt. Agriculture cannot expect to be restored until there is a proper attack on this debt problem throughout the whole dominion. There can be no security until the people on the land are placed in a position of solvency and given an opportunity to provide themselves with security. I should like to recommend for the committee's study the work of the farm security administration in the United States. Under the circumstances which exist in Canada to-day, the agricultural burden of debt deprives about eighty-five per cent of those engaged in agriculture of a decent livelihood, of health and of hope. We believe that the foundation of any good national life is the agricultural industry. In Canada that foundation is failing, as is evidenced by the movement of so many people in recent years from the farms into the cities. This is not just a war-time phenomenon; it has existed during the past forty years, being accelerated by the difficulties placed in the way of those who try to make a living by toiling on the land, so that to-day less than thirty-three per cent of our population is engaged in agriculture. That is not a healthy condition in any national economy.

The other field in which we are failing is that of education. On this subject I have the honour to second the amendment which is at present before the house. Sir William Beveridge in his report says, at page 6, that there are five giants to be overcome on the road to reconstruction. Want is only one of those; the others are disease, ignorance, squalour and idleness. Education is the first and the natural attack on that giant of ignorance. The attack on ignorance is the basis, we believe, for solving most of the other problems; and this amendment provides for a special subcommittee to devote its time to that vital phase of reconstruction.

We are of opinion that knowledge should be socialized across the whole of the dominion. We mean that it must be made available to everyone. The committee would be required to study education from the national viewpoint. We believe that education should be a national concern.

Mr. MacNICOL: The British North America Act states that it belongs to the provinces.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If Canada had had a national educational policy, properly carried out, we would not have suffered from the degeneration which had been our lot for the past twenty years. We would not now be a C3 nation; we might have been able to make a greater contribution in the battle for freedom in which we are now engaged. We must be prepared to equal the social improvements which have been established in our sister dominion of New Zealand. Unless we have a national programme of training and education we cannot hope to make Canada one of the first nations of the world. I am doubtful whether we are likely to overtake some of the nations which are now leading the world in this direction, and which look upon the brains of the young people as being the greatest natural resource they have.

The committee could make a complete investigation of the educational needs of Canada, surveying the possibilities of federal assistance to provincial departments of education. I do not believe there is any necessity for interfering with the powers or authority of the provincial education departments. We propose merely to give federal assistance to those provinces which, on account of their economic condition, are unable to maintain a decently high and minimum standard of education. We believe that a federal educational programme assisting the provinces to maintain that minimum standard in respect of primary, secondary and adult education would benefit the whole dominion, and that we as a nation can no longer afford to neglect this problem. I cannot imagine a proposal of this kind being opposed excepting by those who fear real social reform.

In closing, I would just say that we believe Canadians must be trained in leadership so that they can develop confidence in themselves and be enabled to make their contribution in a society with a cooperative outlook, while maintaining that sturdy independence which is so essentially a part of the common man.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment which has been moved is not in accordance with the established rule as set out in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, paragraph 422, and in May, 13th edition, page 473. This committee has already the power to set up subcommittees as it may decide; and this is a specialized instruction from this house to a committee of this house not yet formed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered the amendment which is moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden):

> That this motion be amended by inserting after the word "committees" in line 6 the following words: "including a subcommittee on education".

The house will realize that the motion is:

> That a select committee of the house be appointed to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war, and all questions pertaining thereto; with power to such select committee to appoint, from among the members of the committee, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary, to deal with specific phases of the problems aforementioned, with power to said select committee and to such subcommittees as may be formed therefrom, to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath . . .

[Mr. Castleden.]

In the first place, the proposition as stated in the motion is general in its terms, and there is no power for the house to instruct a committee which has not yet been formed. It is only after the committee is formed that instructions can be given to a committee to deal with some matter which the house thinks ought to be included in the terms of reference to the committee.

In the second place, it seems to me that the inclusion of the amendment is only giving such powers as the committee shall have when the motion is adopted by the house. They will have the general power to study and report upon problems of reconstruction and reestablishment, and also the power to appoint subcommittees to deal with any specific matters which are included or could be considered as included within the general terms of "reconstruction and reestablishment." For that reason, if any hon. member wished, and the amendment was relevant, he could propose a subcommittee on agriculture, or a subcommittee on any other phase of our activities, and the house would then be directing the committee on matters which are already included and governed by the general terms of the motion which is before the house. Further, if in the committee some effort is made to have included within it a subcommittee on education, that is certainly a matter which can be raised within the committee, and if the committee so decide the subcommittee can then be appointed. If the hon. members of the committee are not satisfied or there is refusal of a request to appoint a subcommittee, there is nothing to prevent hon. members of the committee from bringing the matter back to the house, and then instructions might be given by the house to include among the subcommittees a subcommittee on education.

For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. NEIL (Comox-Alberni): May I say a word? It is customary, Mr. Speaker, before you give your decision to ask members of the house if they wish to express their opinion. Your Honour did not follow that practice in this case. May I suggest that a few days ago the house was permitted to do something entirely similar to that to which objection is now being taken. At that time the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) moved an amendment, almost identical with what has been moved to-day, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) accepted it.

At that time the hon. member wished to add to the matters which a committee would be permitted to go into and the government accepted his suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is perfectly correct in what he states with regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South, but the house will also remember that I took exception from the Chair to that amendment. I did not think it was relevant to the matter then before the house, and I stated that I must not be bound by what the house did, and that it should not be considered as a precedent. The house agreed to it unanimously, but I am now faced with this amendment which involves the same principle that was contained in the amendment of several days ago. I am now asked to give my ruling, and I think if I had been called upon for a ruling at that time I would certainly have ruled it out of order, as I am doing in connection with this particular amendment.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for rising at this time to speak on rehabilitation, although I realize it is not the unanimous opinion of the people of Canada that when we are in the throes of a struggle, the outcome of which no one can definitely foretell, is the time to talk of rehabilitation. However, I do not think time can be divided into compartments of war and peace. In peacetime we should try to plan for war, and in war we should plan for peace. If we had made adequate plans for peace and for the development of this country during the last war, we would not have been in the position we are in to-day. I think in all probability this war might have been postponed. Had we during the twenty years between the end of the last war and the beginning of this one planned for this war, fewer of our men and ships would now be at the bottom of the Atlantic.

I think we should plan for peace at the present time even though we are in the midst of the desperate struggle which I mentioned. Hope is about the only antidote for fear that we have. Unless we can plan for peace as earnestly and as sincerely as we are planning for war, unless we can assure those who are fighting our battles that they can look forward to something fairly definite when they come home, or to something fairly definite for their families should they not come home, I think we shall be making a great mistake.

I am glad the government is assuming this role. I am glad to be associated with a government that is ready to put forth a programme which I consider necessary for Canada at the present time. I thought that the minister from British Columbia would be the man to head up this rehabilitation programme because he started it, but I understand now that it is to be a matter for the whole cabinet. I think that is a mistake. If we are to rebuild Canada as we want to rebuild it, this plan will require a driving force greater than has ever been presented to the government before.

This programme will not be completed by the building of a few public buildings here and there, although the building of such buildings may form part of the programme. It will not be sufficient to say that we will build some roads here and there, even though we complete the long dreamed of main highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That is necessary, but of itself it is only a means to an end. We must clear the slums from our cities; we must rebuild the homes on the prairies which are now quite inadequate and which I am sure make us all feel most uncomfortable when we pass through the prairies these cold wintry days. These things are necessary, but of themselves they are only items in the programme.

We shall need the construction of power dams, the creating of power from the Fraser river, the Thompson, the Mackenzie, the Saskatchewan, the Ottawa, the St. Lawrence and the Saguenay; these are all necessary, they may form part of the total plan, but they are not the total plan. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) refer to the need of power in the west. We may be able to put electric lights into the homes and make power available to everyone in Canada at cheap rates, but that will be only part of the plan. The electrification of our railways to use the power of which there is no end instead of oil which must be brought from the United States, should be another feature in this plan. The creation of a merchant marine will not be sufficient in itself, nor will the providing of adequate air transport. A proper foreign policy is also necessary, as well as an immigration policy. These undertakings constitute a programme which is a challenge to the people of Canada and to this government, a challenge which I hope they will be able to meet.

I have no intention of dealing with each of these items individually and telling the government what should be done. I was glad to hear the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) speak of education. I think that, too, has to come in on our general plan. The little red schoolhouse was red at one time; to-day we do not know what colour it is because they have not had enough money to give it a coat of paint. Unattractive schoolyards, poorly-paid teachers, all have to come in. The youth of this country is the rock on which the country will be built solidly, or it will perish. We must pay proper attention to the education of our children.

But there are four things that I rose specially to mention to-day. I mention these because they relate to war time as well as peace. One is our merchant marine. During peace time Canada had no merchant marine worthy of the name. Are we to have one when this war is over? I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) should announce to the house before this session is over whether it is the policy of the government to have a merchant marine in Canada or not. I should like to ask him whether the present boats we are building are adequate to compete in marine service when this war is over, if our eight- or ten-knot boats will fill the bill, or if we shall need larger and faster boats to compete with other countries. Yesterday I picked up a little book published by the Swedish Traffic Association in which I find this statement:

> At the turn of the century Sweden was still to a great extent dependent on intermediaries abroad for her foreign trade and regular Swedish shipping lines extended only to the Baltic, the North sea and down to the Mediterranean.
> Conditions have changed with amazing rapidity. Nowadays about 45 per cent of the direct shipping between Sweden and other countries, which in 1937 comprised 47·4 million net tons (incoming and outgoing vessels), is accounted for by Swedish tonnage, and of the total tonnage of the Swedish mercantile marine about half is employed on transoceanic routes. There are now direct Swedish routes to all parts of the world, with regular sailings several times a month, and the extension of these shipping lines has led to the opening up of valuable new markets for Swedish wares. So the truth of the maxim "Trade follows the flag" has been confirmed once again by experience.

I wonder whether Canada's trade will follow Canada's flag or follow the flag of some other country. Are we to let this service be given to us by outside people or to conserve it for the boys who are risking their lives to get our goods to the other nations of the world? Before this session is over, the minister should announce some policy as to our merchant marine.

Another matter I would speak about is air transport. Here again I could quote from the same book telling what has been done in the way of air transport in the little country of Sweden. In 1937 they put us to shame. Here are we in Canada at the top of the world, the one place where we should be giving every consideration to air transport. In peace days we were running our ships, the fastest we had, from the far east to connect with the fastest trains in Canada and pushing them across to the Atlantic to farther east, the shortest and fastest route. Are we to lose that trade, hand it over to someone else to develop, or to develop it for Canada and for the boys who are to-day learning to fly and defending us? This government should now appoint a committee to go into the whole matter of air transport and where we stand in connection with transport for the world.

I say the same thing about our navy. These things should be declared now, for the benefit and the encouragement of our young men. Are we to have a Canadian navy, and in what proportions? The boys serving in our navy to-day want to know whether it is to be their life work. They do not want to feel that when the war is over we are going to have a few skiffs on the east coast and a few on the west coast. No matter what the size of it, the policy should be announced now by the government as to whether there is to be a Canadian navy or whether we are still to be sheltered under the Monroe doctrine or by Great Britain. Canadians want to stand on their own feet and they have a right to do so. Out of our strength we should help the others. If we want to be a good neighbour to our two closest neighbours then Canada must be developed with the greatest possible optimism and energy. I would not want to be the hon. member who spoke just before me. I cannot understand a man who is young and looks so full of energy and strength being so pessimistic about Canada as I know it and see it. There never was a time in my life when I could not see fifty jobs to do for every time I had one to do. For any man to rise in his place here and say that we have not this, or we have not that, I cannot understand it. What is more, we shall never have it without cooperation, no matter who is heading up our programme.

The same announcement of policy should be made as far as our air force is concerned. Are we to have an air force in Canada? Our policy should be announced this year, to encourage the boys who want to stay in this kind of work. To those who say we should wait until the war is over before deciding these things, I say now is the time for us to decide on these policies. I know our foreign trade is something we have to develop, but Canadians have a good reputation for honest dealing, for good merchandise; we have something to build on. We can cultivate that spirit and go ahead building on it. I see only two obstacles in our way. The first obstacle to the development of our foreign policy is the growth of hatred between all nations.

I cannot see a world at peace for very long unless we can build on the foundation that all men are brothers. I cannot envision a world peace that will last very long if even to-day we are afraid to include our enemies. St. Paul said, "Feed thine enemies" and I think there is a good lesson in economics in that statement. I do not mean to say that we should do the foolish things we did after the last war, that we should give our enemies money hoping they will spend it on butter and allowing them to spend it on guns, but we can give to them out of the surpluses which we are sure to have, and see to it that they use it for butter and not for ammunition. The other obstacle in our way is perhaps our political prejudice in that we will not follow a lead when it is presented to us in all sincerity. The development of Canada should be our objective.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my hearty support of the purpose behind the appointment of this select committee which we are discussing now and which we discussed on Friday afternoon. He would be a poor politician and an unworthy citizen who would want to throw any obstacle in the way of discussing anything that would improve economic and financial conditions in the post-war period. Many of the speeches that have been made have been highly constructive, sensible and valuable. Perhaps some hon. members fell into the habit, inevitably, of picturing a utopia without telling us how to arrive at it. We all put forward our ideas of what the post-war world should be like, but we are all rather vague in describing the method of reaching that objective. I suppose it will be the purpose of the committee to endeavour to reconcile these divergent views as to what may be best for the future.

I should like to present a couple of ideas which I think may be useful to the committee, but before doing so I wish to voice a mild protest at the hide-bound party political machinery that is used, and has been used of late years, in the appointment of select committees. Perhaps for the benefit of any new members I might explain the difference between the standing committees of the house and these select committees. Ever since confederation, I suppose, there have been standing committees of the house appointed for the purpose of considering relevant matters which may be referred to them by the house. Those committees have been struck for this year, and they may be found set out at page 407 of Hansard. They number thirteen. I need not mention them all, but they include the banking and commerce committee, the public accounts committee, the committee on industrial and international relations, the committee on agriculture, the committee on marine and fisheries, the committee on mines and so on. That indicates the idea of the thing, does it not; and the procedure was that when specific matters came up in the house which should be discussed at greater length than was possible in this chamber, they were referred to the appropriate committees. Any hon. member who so demands may be placed upon one or more of these standing committees appointed under the rules of the house. In 1922, when I first came here, I had myself appointed to two committees; and since they dealt with various subjects I have been able through the years, I hope, to contribute some useful effort to the benefit of the district which I represent. But this has been changed by the government, not suddenly and violently, which would give one an opportunity to protest, but subtly and quietly. Of the thirteen standing committees of the house I think six or seven did not sit at all last year. Of the two to which I belong, one has not sat for four years and the other has not met for seven years. Standing committees, forsooth! They have just died a sort of natural death, or perhaps it could not be called natural; perhaps it was an inspired death. It was not that occasion did not arise from time to time when subjects came up which should have been sent to the appropriate committees. Not at all; the government simply did not refer matters to these committees, but began this system of select committees. I think that is a nice, appropriate word, too; they were selected by the various parties in this house, particularly the larger ones. What the idea is, I do not know; but if one wanted to be cynical—of course I would not—one might suggest that when a subject came up in the house which the government felt could not be safely entrusted to the proper standing committee, that committee was sidetracked and a special, hand-picked select committee was appointed solely by those on the government benches and desiring to stay there, and by those on this side of the house equally willing to take up the reins of office. But the common herd, to which I shall refer presently, did not come into the picture at all.

Look at the order paper. It contains five resolutions to appoint select committees to consider matters all of which could and should have been sent to standing committees. Take the first resolution on the order paper, dealing with social insurance. Could that not have gone and should it not have gone to the committee on industrial and international relations? Would it not have gone there ten years ago? That is the committee which always has dealt with anything of this kind. I remember spending weeks in that committee dealing with old age pensions, and later we considered the matter of family allowances in the province of Quebec, which was brought up by someone coming from that province. That was the appropriate place for a discussion of that kind; but that is not the case any more; this subject is to be sent to a special, hand-picked select committee. What about the public accounts committee? Should that not have been the place to send matters in connection with the expenditures of the government? It always used to be. What about the radio investigation? Should that not have gone to the banking and commerce committee?

In my own case—and I am using this as an illustration only for the moment, because presently I want to give the broader application—in twenty-one years I have never had an opportunity of serving on any of those select committees; and since the standing committees of which I was a member have not been meeting, I have been prohibited from serving in that way at all. It may be asked why I did not complain. Well, I remember that a president of the United States said something about being too proud to fight, and it might be that I was too proud to beg as a favour that which I could not demand as a right. Any hon. member can demand to be placed on a standing committee, but it is an entirely different story in connection with these select committees. To get on them you must have party pull.

Mr. MacNICOL: Being Scotch you would not beg.

Mr. NEILL: In any event it was only one man's grievance, and I was willing to pay that as part of the price for not being attached to any party; perhaps it was worth it. But now the situation is different; it is open to objection on broader lines. I want to refer to the aggregation of members—I cannot call them a group or a party—in the southeast corner; they are not all here now but perhaps they will read my remarks in Hansard. I do not speak for them, for I have no authority to do so; I have not consulted them nor have they instructed me to put forward their case, but since their case happens to be mine, since regrettably they find themselves in same situation, I will speak of them. They are being neglected in this matter for the same reason, that they are not affiliated with any of the larger parties. My sympathies do not extend to the political doctrines of those gentlemen. I think one or two call themselves independent, while the others have given themselves titles more descriptive of their political views, but they are all independent in the sense that they are not attached to any of the larger parties. A great statesman once said to his opponent, I abhor your sentiments but I will fight to the death that you may have the privilege of expressing them. I do not abhor the sentiments of hon. gentlemen in the corner, though I do not agree with them; but I think they should be allowed to express their views and given an opportunity to share in the life of parliament. There has grown up in that corner what I might call a cave of Adullam.

To those hon. members who were not brought up on the Scotch shorter catechism I might mention that the cave of Adullam is a place to which David, when he was out of luck, retired. It was a dirty old cave, and of it the Scriptures say:

> And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men.

In case it might be thought that I am reflecting upon that group I might remind them that David lived to be a very great king, the greatest of his times, and one who will always be remembered and respected as long as the Christian religion is taught. So that it is in no sense a reflection upon them if I refer to them as being a bunch of Adullamites; and if they will allow me I will include myself with them.

They number nine members in the house, a group about as large as that of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, or the Social Credit party. On the committee on social insurance to which I referred a moment ago there are two members of the Social Credit party, and two from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Together those two groups number nineteen, but there are four of them on the committee, or twenty-one per cent. We Adullamites also number nine, but we have no representation on that committee. And we never shall have, for the reason I have already given.

After all, we were elected by the people. We are responsible only to them for the wisdom of our action, and to our God for the integrity of our motives. I do not think we should be held responsible to any political party with which we are not amalgamated, or to which we do not wish to be attached.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Adullamites have no leaders.

Mr. NEILL: Did the British North America Act, when it formed Canadian confederation seventy years ago, contemplate that? Was that the idea of the democracy about which we talk so much? I do not believe it was. There would be no danger to the government if they put one or two of these Adullamites on a committee, because the government always keeps a huge majority—and quite properly. If they form a committee of twenty-five they would have eighteen members from the government side of the house. So that it would do no harm if they did recognize occasionally—and only occasionally, perhaps—the right of members of parliament to be members of parliament, and not just to be automatic recorders of the views of a party in office, or of another party which would very much like to be in office. The very fact that we have no hope of or aspiration to office suggests that it might be a good thing to have some of us on that committee, with the assurance that we at least would not be governed by party considerations.

It is notorious in committees of the house that politics is played. If there is an investigation of some alleged action by the government, government followers try to develop a clear record, and members of the opposition try to do the opposite. Of course they play politics. And when a report comes to be written one can see the political complexion of a committee. If that is not so, then why does the government insist upon having a majority on committees? So that if one or two of these political Adullamites who are not committed to any party were put on, it would not hamper the work of the committee. It might even have a good effect upon it; it might even prove beneficial. There are some good men in the group in the corner. One of them is new, and I am informed he is an able man. How is he to demonstrate his ability or gain experience if he is not allowed to sit on a committee? I suggest that the government should be more tolerant in dealing with those who are not attached to one of the larger parties.

I would advise those hon. members sitting in the corner seats to insist upon their rights; and to insist upon them now because—and I speak from experience—they will find, as time goes on, it is a great deal easier to lose a privilege in the house than to regain one.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I now turn to the work of the reconstruction committee and I hope to make a couple of suggestions that may be worthy of their consideration.

I want to support strongly those members who have advocated that the government or the committee should consider and put into effect an increase in the old age pension and a reduction in the age limit. I need not reiterate the reasons for that because they have been often given to the house and are so obvious. The feeling seems to be almost unanimous both in this chamber and in the country in favour of an increased old age pension and a reduced age limit. The minister told us to-day that representations had been received from five of the provinces, through their legislatures, I presume, begging for action in connection with this increase. I am surprised that the government does not realize the force of public opinion. It has become a positive demand for this legislation. I notice that in Great Britain the government is far more responsive to public feeling than it is here. Apparently here we need an impending general election or a vital defeat or something of that kind before the government of the day—I mean any government—realizes and responds to public feeling.

There is one angle that has not yet been touched upon which makes it important that this action should be taken and taken quickly. Several members have emphasized the point that this committee should take action quickly, recommend measures and have parliament pass them—pass them, they emphasized—in order that our soldiers at the front might see definitely in front of them some evidence that we were really in earnest, that we were not simply contenting ourselves with talking and making promises. They stressed that we should present our soldiers with an accomplished fact.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) said the other night that it would be difficult for us to go very far with any post-war rehabilitation plans until peace was declared because we would not know into what scheme of general things we would have to fit our proposals. There is a great deal in that. Peace certainly will not be signed before six months and probably eighteen months after the armistice, and eighteen months is quite a long time. Also the peace treaty, when formulated and signed, will purely be a peace treaty. It will consist of an ultimatum laid down by the victorious allies telling the defeated nations what they have to do, and it will not go much beyond that. There might be some proposal of a general character for maintaining an international allied police force. But that treaty will not go into details of economic or social reform. So that this committee, if it is to wait until peace comes, will have to wait still longer before we can adopt any forward-looking policy. A great deal of the policy we must adopt after the war will depend upon the treaties that will have to be made between us and other nations or possibly other groups of nations. It is upon the progress we make with them that our own changes in organization will depend. That will take a long time, and the boys at the front—they are not boys, they are men now—will be looking with very suspicious eyes upon any delays and saying, "What is this? Is it all talk?"

The question of the tariff, for instance, is a very large one. The government of the day is traditionally free trade in its outlook on the tariff, and when I say "free trade" I mean not bigotedly so. The Progressive Conservative party on this side have recently announced their very strong trend toward free trade, and I presume that they would go as far as they have announced. Many people believe in free trade, but many people believe that free trade would be fatal if it were not universal. Suppose that Canada went all-out for free trade and announced that she would throw down her tariff barriers, trade with the whole world and allow any imports to come in. Suppose our two big customers, Britain and the United States, decided in favour of the closed-door, putting up their barriers and keeping our goods out. It would be impossible in that event for us to adopt a policy of complete free trade. These things will not be expressed in the terms of a peace treaty. We shall have to make these treaties after the war with the different nations, and that again will take time. It is partly for that reason, and partly for the political advantage that would obviously accrue, that I would anticipate that the present government, when it goes to the country, as it will do this fall or next spring, would rather adopt the policy of dangling before the electors a pleasing platform of promised reforms, instead of putting them into legislative effect and presenting them as a fait accompli to the people. That is always more dangerous than to talk nicely in connection with promised reforms at election time. Will the men at the front accept such a course? Will they not say in regard to your promises, "Oh, heck; we have heard that before. Why don't you do something?". They will ask us to deliver the goods. These men are used to the grim realities of life, of sorrow and of death, and I am afraid they will be at least impatient of measures that are only dangled before their eyes. They will be impatient of any talk that we shall do such and so when we can get around to it.

I know an action which can be taken, and it can be taken now. The expression has been used in connection with national debt of making a token payment. Suppose we take a token action now, and not attempt to carry out the whole policy of rehabilitation at once because that would be impossible now. But let us give the men at the front a token of our good faith. Here is something that will not require to be embodied in the terms of the peace treaty. Here is something that is not dependent upon other nations. Other nations have gone far ahead of us in this regard. Here is something we can do now, and therefore I say, let us pass legislation now, increasing the amount of the old age pension and lowering the age limit. If we did that now, the soldiers would say, "They have done what they could. They have given us an earnest of their good faith. It looks as though we could trust them." And they will trust us. But if we continue to try to beguile or cajole them with pleasing-looking programmes, they will lose faith in constitutional parliament and might go to lengths—for want of having any other place to go—that would be disastrous for Canada.

It is a notorious fact that any government that I have seen in these halls is ruled by expediency. First and last, expediency is the deciding factor. Very often it is expediency that has the final word in the decision as to what policy shall be carried out. But here is a case where justice, fairness and expediency would all go together. It certainly would be most expedient to give the men a guarantee that this thing is being done for the aged people about whom so much has been said, and would also be just and fair. Therefore I urge this committee to recommend this to the government—and that the government should implement the recommendation this session—an adjustment in the amount of the old age pension and in the age limit.

I have time to speak on one more subject, one on which I have discoursed so often in the last twenty years. I refer to the Jap situation, and I note that everything I have predicted has come true. What I suggest now—unlike the old age pension—must be written into the peace terms or it will not take place at all. I refer to the deportation of the Japs and a guarantee that there will be a total refusal to allow any more oriental immigration into Canada. I say it must be embodied in the terms of peace, for this reason. Do not believe when you are told —I have been told already, and I do not believe it—"Oh, well, this is a matter for after the war; win the war first and then we will deal with this question; we will be glad to take it up with you." It cannot be done after the war because it will then be too late. These people whom we want to deport are, or many of them are, British subjects ostensibly, and you cannot deport British subjects after the war. You can do so before the war is over or as part of the terms of peace.

No matter how slim the allegiance of these Japanese-British subjects may be to the British crown; no matter how obvious the fraudulence of their dual nationality—because they may be good British subjects and at the same time loyal Japanese subjects; that is their creed and custom and what they adhere to—no matter how designedly they were sent here—for it was not casual immigration; they were sent here by the Japanese government to start a system of infiltration into the most desirable province of Canada, from both climatic and geographical considerations, and as being useful for the purposes of aggression later on—yet they are ostensibly British subjects and cannot be deported. Therefore, if there is any deportation to be done it should be done as part of the terms of peace.

But we are told that big business interests, the big business men of whom it is said with bated breath that they are the spawn of the devil, or very near it, want these men because they want cheap labour. I have seen no evidence in recent years of anything of the kind so far as big business is concerned, and we must assume that big business is fairly shrewd or it would not maintain itself in these days of keen competition. And big business has seen within the last year that when cheap labour—if it was cheap labour—or labour of any kind was most needed, we lost it all because we had to take it away from the British Columbia coast for our own security. When we needed labour the most we lost it, and spent five million dollars in taking care of it; and before we have finished repairing boats, building houses, and paying for keeping these people idle, the cost will be twice as much. Call it anything you like, but do not call that cheap labour which disappears as soon as you need it, in case of war.

I have in my hand a copy of a bargain—or rather it was not a bargain, it was a benediction—made by the British Columbia security commission with the province of Alberta, under which they agreed to put a number of Japanese on farms in Alberta, under very stringent, named conditions. We talk about the Jews being the favoured people of God; they could never have had a look-in with the Japs, in so far as the British Columbia security commission is concerned. The commission heaped favours on them. It guaranteed them transportation; it guaranteed that they would never go on relief; it guaranteed them medical services galore, even dental service; hospitalization, education, housing. Each house had to have a garden, and it had to be guaranteed that if the man went out of work temporarily he should not be disturbed in the possession of his house and his garden plot. This was much better than was done for our unemployed during the depression. I will quote section 10 of this remarkable document:

> The commission agrees to remove or to have removed from the province, upon the termination of the state of war . . . the Japanese temporarily placed or maintained within the province pursuant to the terms of this agreement, as requested so to do by the province.

What about these people being British subjects? You cannot deport British subjects after the war is over; you cannot even move them from one province to another. The "British subject" status seems to have disappeared when it comes to the matter of their continuance in residence. I am no lawyer, but I should like to know if any government can delegate its sovereign powers to an outfit calling itself a security commission. It may delegate the commission to do certain things under its jurisdiction. But the commission apparently considers itself an independent state; it assumes it can take the Japs back or do anything it likes of that kind. I should like to see this question investigated. In addition, similar deals were made with Manitoba and Ontario before the Japs were allowed to go there, and they have all to go back to British Columbia. After the war we shall have twenty-four thousand Japanese unloaded on the people of British Columbia, who do not want one of them, any more than you do in Ontario, or anywhere else.

It may be, Mr. Speaker—it is no use my disguising facts—that in British Columbia there are a few who, from ignorance, or hopes of votes, or hopes of campaign funds, champion their "little brown brothers." Oh, they are very, very few, I can assure you. These enemies have to be given work when they come back, have they not, either by government authority, which is compulsion, or by a system of undercutting the white man—and they can easily do it, because their standard of living is much lower—and these jobs will either be given to or obtained by them in the manner I have indicated, at the expense of returned men. By that time our men or what is left of them will have drifted back from the Pacific and from the orient, and they will be telling tales—true tales, I am afraid—of what was done to our women and men, how they were treated by these sons of—sons of Belial, Mr. Speaker, although I might have used a coarser and more appropriately descriptive word, and we shall be expected to receive them with open arms and brotherly love. It is apt to make one spit when one hears people use these fulsome terms of hypocritical affection toward these "brown brothers." No wonder that a member of the local house, the member for the west coast of Vancouver island, where my home is, used this language the other day in the legislature:

"There will be serious trouble on the west coast of Vancouver island after the war if any attempt is made to permit the Japanese to return to their former occupations there," declared James Mowat, M.L.A., Alberni. "I have received many letters", he said, "from returned men's organizations, fishermen's associations and workers in the lumber business on our coast stating that if the Japanese are allowed to come back to this coast it will start a civil war."

I will not go as far as that, for we are a law-abiding people, but that gives at least an idea of the sentiments which are prevalent there.

By the way, it has been suggested by the Japanese—and do not take it that the Japs are a dull, sodden people who want to be only hewers of wood and drawers of water; they are smart people and want to dominate this country—that they should take another course; shrewdly enough, they have turned the whole thing around. They realize how unpopular they are in British Columbia and that they will never get the vote in that province. They say this openly in their press—for they maintain a press—"There are a few thousands of us in Ontario, a few thousands in Manitoba, and so on. Stay there. You will hardly be noticed. Keep quiet. By and by you will commence down there to put forward a plea for the vote." And by that time, they expect, some sucker will be prepared to give them the vote in the dominion; the combined pressure of these people will ultimately compel, they believe, the government of British Columbia to give them the vote; and then good-bye to British Columbia, for it will be wholly in the camp of the Philistines. Once that comes to pass, the immediate consequence will be to do away with all restrictions—restrictions on fishing, restrictions on entrance to every occupation, and above all, restrictions on immigration, as I will tell you presently. When that comes about, good-bye to British Columbia.

[Mr. Neill.]

Remember this, if it had not been for pressure put on between 1921 and 1929 the whole fishing of the Pacific coast would be in the hands of these Japanese. Off my own bat, I think I can say, I got a reduction in 1922 of forty per cent of the Jap licences; a year after that, fifteen per cent, and the year after that, ten per cent. That quota in the existing licences was cut down to that extent and has been maintained ever since. I also had the immigration quota cut down from 1,700 a year to 150, and that still stands. What would the result be if it had not been for that? Instead of having 24,000 Japs, we would have had 50,000. This is only a conjecture, but I think it is reasonable to say that had there been 50,000 trained Japanese soldiers or their dependents in British Columbia, that fact might have been the major deciding factor in the Japanese deciding to invade Canada.

There are people who call them "little brown brothers," but they do not seem to think of such things as Pearl Harbor. When Hitler was about to invade a neutral and friendly country, he always said that he was doing it to protect them from the British. We did not hear that the British were going to seize Pearl Harbor, and I do not suppose that has ever been suggested. It was just an example of their ruthlessness. Let these 24,000 Japs come back to British Columbia; give them the vote as they are demanding, and in twenty years all the country west of the Rockies will be controlled economically, financially and in a business way by these Japanese, just the same as they have done in Hawaii.

It is not often that an individual, still less a nation, has a chance to turn back the pages of history and correct the errors of the past. What would the United States not have given a few years ago, or perhaps even now, not to have made the mistake they did when they established the black man in that country? At that time it was considered cheap labour, but what a terrible price they have paid! We shall pay a terrible price if we do not take advantage of this oppportunity.

This chance is before us. The war has brought untold suffering and pain. We have lost thousands of our young men, and I am afraid that thousands more will yet go. There have been huge losses of property, which matters less, and we have upon us a huge debt which will hang over us for all time to come. Let us at least take advantage of this one opportunity to correct our error and make for all time a white British Columbia and a civilized, Christian Canada. I use the word "Christian" advisedly. There are a number of ministers of the gospel in this house, and I appeal to them. I do not appeal to them very often. They have pledged themselves to promote the cause of Christ. Missionaries have been sent out to the far Pacific to convert these people. Are my hon. friends going to lift their voices in this house in favour of establishing a heathen civilization in this country?

Do not have any doubts about it. These people are not the dying remnants of a burned-out heathenism. A number of years ago the Japanese government sat down to consider whether it was better to abandon the heathenism they had carried on up to that time and adopt Christianity, or whether they should continue as heathens. It was a question of which was the better bet, which was the best business bargain. They decided, with the best knowledge they had, to continue with their heathenism. They are heathen now. This is the fixed policy of that government, and the government is the whole thing there.

Are we to establish in Ontario and Manitoba and Alberta nucleus groups of 5,000 or 6,000 Japanese, groups that will be ever growing? Do not forget that they breed about three to one as compared with the white population. Are we to establish these heathens right in Canada? All this is only a sort of interjection, but surely the day has gone past when we should encourage the starting of these heathen groups in our midst. We should think well before taking this action.

We must consider whether we want a white Christian Canada in the future for our children. We shall never have another chance to correct the mistake that was made. This opportunity has been given us by a series of unforeseen events, so that I say, let us, for God's sake, take advantage of this opportunity when we have the chance.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Neill) who has just spoken. Something must be done at once. Theories are all right for the long-range plan, but we must act immediately. I am not sure that I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, but I believe he said that some suckers in Ontario might give the Japanese the vote. There are no suckers in Ontario because we shall not give them the vote. This afternoon the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) said that the people of Canada were sick and tired of being regimented. Since the hon. gentleman belongs to the socialist party, I am glad to hear him say that. If they ever get a chance, there will be nothing but regimentation in this country.

I rise to support the resolution. I was interested in the remarks made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). He gave the public of Canada a real idea of the problems that will have to be faced when our boys come back to Canada. We shall have to be careful what is done with and for them. They deserve the best because we owe a great deal to them for what they have done in defence of the British isles. We can never repay them for that. Make no mistake about it; when they were defending the British isles they were defending Canada as well. However, I think there are many opportunities for them in this country. Much of Canada is still undiscovered. The spirit of enterprise shown by these young men will be the spirit that can be used to discover those great parts of Canada which have not yet been discovered.

The war is just beginning to be won. We must not relax one minute in the prosecution of the war. We must do everything we can to win this war, and we must not let talks of peace, talks of reconstruction and all that sort of thing take our thoughts away from the winning of this war. However, it is our duty to think of the future, to think of the period immediately after the war. These men expect us to be doing something like that. They expect that something will be ready for them when they are demobilized. My opinion is that it will take some little time to demobilize our forces. We should not let them go until we have something for them to go to. We shall have to have a gradual relaxation of the controls now exercised.

There is great hope for Canada. I am a believer in the future of Canada. For some time we have had an agricultural, an industrial and a scientific revolution going on in this country. The war has been responsible for the spurring on of this movement. Not only has there been a scientific revolution in agriculture and industry; it has occurred in the domestic field as well. Many new materials have been coming out. Science must not be overlooked in connection with reconstruction and planning for the future. In that connection I recommend a booklet containing a paper by J. K. Robertson on that very subject, read before the Royal Society of Canada. On page 10 he says:

> According to the fourth clause in the Atlantic charter, the United States and the British commonwealth "will endeavour . . . to further enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor and vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity."

We certainly shall have to put a great deal of money into research and the scientific development of this country. Think of what is happening in Canada, new materials being developed from time to time in connection with the war, replacing old ones which were uneconomic. Increased use of forests and coal can be looked forward to; we shall have nylon and similar products made from coal, air and water; rayon and plastics replacing metals, plastic automobiles. To-day we have need for the plastic plumber, the installation of plastic pipes. All these things are new; why can we not develop new sources of raw materials to be used, for instance, to produce aluminum instead of importing material from British Guinea? Science will enter into the reduction of costs of production by scientific methods instead of by sweated labour. New methods, new materials will reduce the actual time necessary just to live, giving a more balanced day between work, study, recreation and sleep. All these things are possible. Science will influence the future prosperity of Canada more than anything else. Many times as much money will have to be diverted to research in conjunction with the industries of this country than has ever been spent before. That is where we have fallen down so badly in the past. When we think of what the national research council has already done in conjunction with industry, and in the prosecution of the war, we can easily see the need to increase this marvellous work of research in the future.

The post-war problem of Canada is not beyond solution, but all classes in the community must work together. Enlightened leaders of industry and intelligent labour leaders will have to cooperate in the solution of their problems. In the days to come I am sure that industrial leaders will welcome the organization of labour unions. It will be to their advantage to do that. It is only when people work together in organized fashion that they can bring to bear their potential strength most effectively on the solution of any problem. Our problem is so to gear our productive machinery and plan our national economy that we create and utilize our capacity to labour for the enrichment and enjoyment of our way of life. Many people look askance at the expression "planned economy", but I would point out that the oldest planned economy in the world was that of Egypt. Joseph was the first minister of agriculture in a capitalist country; he planned in the seven good years for the seven bad years. Every big corporation, every extensive enterprise makes its plans and plans its campaigns months and even years ahead. Perhaps in the past there has not been enough of this planning in conjunction with the state. A planned economy does not mean regimentation or submission to bureaucracy; it is a way to give individual enterprise greater freedom of action and incentive for the exercise of its ingenuity and industry. Organized industry and organized labour, each recognizing the rights and prerogatives of the other, should give leadership, guaranteeing freedom from want for all. They should encourage the government to assure at least a minimum of security for all. If the citizens of the country are strong, independent and secure, what follows is a strong but flexible government, strong enough to protect the people but not so powerful as to dominate them. The government does not own and drive every machine, but its function should be to regulate the flow of industry so as to avoid snarls and collisions. Free enterprise without constraint and without pressure will invite labour to take counsel with it in planning work so that there will be employment at all times and a decent level of income for all. But it is going to be a long time before plans can be put into effect, and "the best-laid schemes o' mice an' men gang aft a-gley". The impact of the termination of the war may be sudden and great. Now is the time to plan for the day when the war ceases.

There is a solution in part as far as my own city is concerned. Many problems are facing it. A tremendous increase has taken place in the productive capacity of the city and in the population. Not only that, but the day-time population has increased very largely, and with that the problem of public services has become exceedingly acute. The question of sewage disposal is serious; the present plant was built with a capacity for less than two-thirds of the present population, and there is already a real danger to the health of the citizens and also to the other cities bordering on lake Ontario. Something will have to be done. It cannot be done very well while the war is on, although if the war lasts years more something will have to be done. At the present time raw sewage is going into the lake; the plant is not big enough to treat it. Water is being well filtered and treated; there is a fine system, but any breakdown in that system would be very serious for the citizens of greater Toronto and of the other cities bordering on lake Ontario. The problem of supplying water is difficult at the present time, and the problem of transporting the people has also to be met. I must say that the Toronto transportation commission is doing a very good job, and if the service is not everything that might be wished it is no fault of that organization. The city must provide still more fire protection and police protection, more health services and so on. Again, at the present time we need two thousand houses; we could use that number in Toronto without any difficulty. To-day people living in Toronto are working in such places as Leaside, East York, Malton, New Toronto, Weston and other municipalities bordering on Toronto. Facilities other than public services are also severely taxed and private enterprise is doing its best to maintain such facilities.

The point I am coming to is this. How does this problem fit into the picture? Will our industries in Toronto be converted to the production of peace-time goods, and how quickly will that be done? Large investments in plant and equipment are involved, which no one wants to throw away; and if those plants are to be converted, as many will be, undoubtedly there will be many projects in connection with the services to which I have been referring which will have to be completed very quickly in order to bring those services up to reasonable requirements. Already the city of Toronto is planning for a rapid transit subway, and certain research work in that connection is being carried on at the present time. There are questions of new sewers, new streets, slum clearance, a new disposal plant, public and private housing, all of which will have to be constructed if these industries are to remain in the city of Toronto, for if we do not have the proper accommodation they will not remain.

All this will provide a great deal of work which will help take up the slack in whatever readjustment period may be necessary. The trouble is that in Toronto the tax rate is already so high that it is out of all proportion, and the assessment is high as well. These services will be required not only for Toronto; they will be required by those living in the metropolitan area and even further away. How do these projects fit into the picture of reconstruction? Well, these are matters that can be planned now. Certainly they will give employment to men at present in the army. Every class of worker will be required when these projects are carried out. Men would be given work in the manufacture of the equipment necessary for these undertakings as well as in the actual undertakings themselves. Almost every class of material, and no doubt new materials as well, will be required. The employment will be far-reaching, but then comes the question of financing. Funds will have to be provided on an equitable basis by the dominion government, the provincial government, the city of Toronto and the municipalities in the metropolitan area, all of which will benefit. They are all interested, in many ways.

My suggestion is that this is a problem in connection with which we can make plans now, so that it may be started almost as soon as the materials can be made available. All these people should get together at once and lay plans which could be put into operation without delay when the war is over. It would be time and money well spent. I believe the question of financing is the only thing that stands in the way, and it is my opinion that the dominion government must give some assurance to the people of Toronto and district that it will be prepared to do a certain amount of financing in connection with that work, which certainly will provide a great deal of employment.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, one cannot approach the subject of rehabilitation and reconstruction without reflecting upon the fact that last year we had a committee of this house charged with the responsibility of looking into the various aspects of this subject. I was not so fortunate as to be a member of that committee, but I am informed that it held approximately sixteen meetings. From time to time interim reports were submitted to this house, but I am under the impression that all in all very little was accomplished by that committee. In fact I rather fancy, putting it in my own way, that our good ship reconstruction and rehabilitation, after passing through very stormy weather, foundered somewhere near the isle of nutrition. I was rather disappointed in that connection, but I trust that I shall not be disappointed with the result of the deliberations of the committee this year.

Before proceeding further may I say in all fairness that I have been impressed to some extent by the attitude of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie during this debate. He has not spoken, it is true, but he has been very patient. Whether or not he has absorbed what has been said we have no way of determining, but it is encouraging to see the apparent interest which he shows. I believe our plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction are predicated upon the assumption of an allied victory; there can be no question about that fact. Therefore I am inclined to the belief that any person who feels that we should not be discussing this subject at the present time has not very much faith in the outcome of the war. When we have achieved that victory we shall do honour to the men of our army, our navy—including the men of the merchant marine—and our air force; but I wonder if it is going to be more than lip-service, which is pleasant to hear but hardly adequate to meet the situation. We who are at home are expected to make Canada worthy of the high democratic ideals for which our boys are fighting, and any plan for rehabilitation must be determined in the light of their heroic achievements.

I am satisfied that we shall be chastised for devoting to this subject the time we are taking. A certain cross-section of the press has chastised us, and I know, too, that many others across this country consider that we have no business whatsoever in devoting our energies toward this subject at the present time. But I am not worried, and I believe hon. members will not be worried about the things which may be said about us for doing what we know to be right, and doing it at this time.

History records one very important fact, namely that the enormous expenditures entailed in the financing of a war invariably lead to business recession, industrial stagnation and general unemployment. History has proven that fact. Those conditions have been accepted in the past as being the inevitable outcome of these huge expenditures. But I say that under the present system, while they may be inevitable, the time has arrived when we, the Canadian people, must declare that we must remove those things which have made this condition inevitable. And when I speak of business recession or depression or panic, I am obliged to refer to a copy of a newspaper I have before me, in which I find this definition. It says:

> A recession is a period in which you tighten up your belt. A depression is a time in which you have not a belt to tighten. When you have no pants to hold up it is a panic.

So that we want no recession, no depression and no panic.

Another point upon which I should like to lay emphasis is this: I have been appalled to have some of our men in uniform actually say to me that they hope the war will not end soon. There can be only one reason for any young man making an assertion of that kind, namely, that he fears the conditions which may prevail following the cessation of hostilities. That is not good morale, and I say it is our duty to do everything possible to stimulate the high degree of national morale essential for total war. Our boys in the fighting forces and our citizens engaged in producing the tools of war must be imbued with confidence regarding the democratic post-war order. That is essential. Any such proposal must reflect the will of the Canadian people, and not the will of someone or some group of people far removed from this fair dominion. I say, furthermore, that our plans for the post-war period must embody the desires of those fighting forces. We must lay the basis for a truly reconstructed democracy. If in establishing the basis for what some people believe may be a reconstructed democracy we infringe upon the democratic rights of our people, then I say we shall have failed, and failed most miserably.

For a moment or two I wish to deal with some of the suggestions which have been advanced during the debate by various hon. members. I was rather disappointed to-day when the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) had finished speaking, because during the course of his speech he stated that all of these local projects which have been enumerated by various members are fine, but that they are only part of a great scheme. But he left me in the air, because he did not tell us what the great scheme is that he has in mind.

Then just a few days ago the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who, I am forced to conclude, is a faithful disciple of Clarence Streit, who advocates federal union, indicated his belief that we should establish a world police force. In fact he recommended, in my judgment, that Canada and this parliament be deprived of the sovereignty they now possess. I cannot tolerate that type of philosophy. Are we in Canada making the sacrifices we are making only to find, after the war, that some other government, somewhere, is dictating what we the Canadian people shall do in our own country? If that is the purpose of the war we might just as well quit to-day, because Adolf Hitler has a similar proposal in the back of his mind.

We then listened to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) who is always a delightful speaker. I enjoy listening to him. However he made an admission to the effect that we, and we alone, are responsible for the deplorable conditions which prevailed during the depression. I am putting what he said in my own words, as I understood him. We agree. Social Crediters have been telling the house that ever since the first session they attended, in 1936. It was not new at all, namely, that we the Canadian people are responsible for the conditions which prevailed in Canada during that time. Unfortunately, however, the hon. member for Cariboo, who happens to be the chairman of the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation, did not go far enough to indicate how we who are responsible might change our course of action so as to remove the shame which necessarily rests upon our shoulders, and not upon the shoulders of others.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) advanced some rich philosophy—and I use the word "rich" advisedly, coming from a farming community. As I interpreted it, the hon. member for Brant indicated that the million unemployed in Canada and the hundreds of thousands who secured wages enough only to meet the bare necessities might have had their whole condition corrected had they purchased annuities. Out of what, Mr. Speaker? Then he advanced a theory which was slightly more preposterous, namely, that if we remained in our own little bivouacs and produced sufficient for our own needs all the troubles which have confronted the Canadian people would automatically disappear.

I now move on to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), the former leader of the Conservative party, and a member, I understand of the Progressive Conservative party. But he did not show himself to be very progressive the other day. He said, Yes, I am in favour of reform, as long as you do not divorce yourselves from the status quo, and as long as you use as your course of instruction grandma's old book of etiquette.

That is all it amounts to. I want to retain everything, he intimated, and yet I want to change everything. But he will change nothing. That is the inevitable outcome of such a philosophy as he harbours.

There were others in the Progressive Conservative party who spoke who devoted a great deal of their time to local projects. All fine, I grant you, sir, but not one of those local projects will reconstruct Canada or rehabilitate the men who are coming back from overseas or are discharged from the armed services here in Canada.

I want to refer to a suggestion that was made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I must confess that I am not completely in agreement with the hon. member inasmuch as I am thoroughly convinced that government monopoly can easily become much more vicious than private monopoly. Under a system of government ownership of the productive industries of the country I rather fancy that the government of the day might be motivated by political considerations unless, of course, opposition is eliminated. It is true that monopoly has developed during recent years; it is true that special privilege has developed; it is true that abuses have developed; but I blame the government which permitted these things to come about far more than I blame those who are guilty of such vile practices. I say, further, that I am definitely opposed to a few, whether in this country or in any other, fattening themselves upon the poverty of a community. I do not believe that the individual has become utterly incapable of managing his own affairs; I do not believe that he has become utterly dishonest. I say, however, that we must eliminate the abuses that have been responsible for so much condemnation having been heaped upon the heads of those who are engaged in private enterprise.

I come now to the speech by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I make this assertion, that he is the only speaker in this debate so far who has advanced a broad proposal to meet the whole situation as it will be faced by the committee. On reading over his speech I notice that he pointed to the tremendous increase in the productive capacity of Canada. I am told that our productive capacity has reached the staggering total of about $9,000,000,000. Furthermore, he asserted that it is not at all unreasonable to conclude that if we could produce nine billion dollars worth of real wealth in this country per year, much of which will be destroyed during the progress of war, it should also be quite possible to produce even nine billion dollars worth of consumers' goods. I think that is sound argument. He also laid stress upon the disastrous results that will ensue if industrial collapse is not prevented through the systematic conversion of our war industries to peace industries. He enumerated three definite facts that might be used as a foundation upon which this committee could begin its work. I would suggest that the committee start all over again this year, forgetting what was done last year. I hope you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I read those three facts because I wish to add to them a fourth which will make the picture absolutely complete. The hon. member for Acadia asserted at page 715, February 25, 1943:

> 1. That a complete survey should be made forthwith to ascertain the nature and volume of the products of industry which will be required by the Canadian people following the war to rehabilitate themselves, and to raise their standard of living to the level which our natural resources can consistently maintain.
> 2. That a complete survey of Canadian war industries be made to determine the adaptability of each to the production of those peace-time requirements, and to plan and prepare the steps necessary to bring about that conversion in each case at the end of the war.
> 3. That a survey be made of the possible foreign markets which may be available at the end of the war, and the part which Canadian industry should play in the rehabilitation of those countries whose industries have been destroyed or disorganized as a result of the war.

I will add a fourth, and the fourth in my estimation is important because the other three depend directly upon it. This is it:

4. That as a step essential to the satisfactory establishment of Canadian war industry on a peace-time basis the control of money and credit be removed from the present private monopoly and restored to parliament, and that parliament so order the financial policy of Canada as to make available sufficient debt-free money for the public financing of post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction, and to assure the consuming public of sufficient purchasing power to enable them to enjoy a standard of living limited only by the productive capacity of industry and the natural resources of the country instead of by a man-made scarcity of money.

There are a great many members in this house who would agree that a survey of our natural resources is proper, and that a survey of our war industries is proper. They would no doubt go so far as to agree that we should also investigate possible foreign markets. But when it comes to the fourth proposal which I have just made, that there should be some adjustment in the financial set-up of this country, we see men arch their backs and shoot forth sparks of prejudice in a way that reminds one of an angry tomcat. I do not know how it is, but there has developed in this country a belief that there is something sacred about the subject of finance, that we are not supposed to know anything about it. To me that is just fantastic. If we are intelligent enough to know a few things about these other factors, why should we not be considered sufficiently intelligent to understand at least a little bit about that mysterious thing known as money? So much depends upon it, both nationally and internationally. I propose to quote a paragraph from a book entitled "Economic Tribulation" by Vincent C. Vickers. One may sneer at me for making a statement of this kind, but do not forget that Vincent Vickers was deputy lieutenant of the city of London. He was a director of Vickers Limited for twenty-two years, and a director of the London Assurance Company, from which he resigned in January, 1939. In 1910 he was made governor of the Bank of England, and resigned this appointment in 1919. First, he states this: I quote from page 28 of this book:

It is important to bear in mind that our monetary policy of the last several years has not, as heretofore, been a Bank of England policy but the policy of His Majesty's treasury, initiated by a chancellor of the exchequer who apparently realized that what had been permanently and definitely wrong with the nation's economic development was a monetary system controlled by the professional moneylenders and the professional creators of credit—controlled that is to say, by financiers imbued with the theory that, because money and credit were obviously essential to the interchange of goods and commodities, therefore it was equally obvious and essential that those who controlled money and the issue of credit should control trade and should determine and regulate (under their own highly profitable system) those economic processes which enable production to find a market.

Then I commend the following to the attention of the house:

This, of course, means that financiers in reality took upon themselves, perhaps not the responsibility, but certainly the power, of controlling the markets of the world and therefore the numerous relationships between one nation and another, involving international friendships or mistrusts.

To anyone who doubts the correctness of that passage let me say that all he has to do, if he wishes to gain an insight into one of the practices indulged in by those who occupy the position of having a monopoly of the nation's finances, is to read a report which appeared in the Ottawa Journal just a few days ago with respect to the exportation of money from France to north Africa and of the handsome profits which accumulated. Even when the house of representatives of the United States, the parliament of Canada and the parliament of Great Britain knew not that an invasion of north Africa was about to take place, the financiers of France, or better still of Vichy, knew it and took advantage of the situation to make millions of francs.

I should like to quote one further paragraph from Mr. Vicker's book, at page 27. This, he states, is the present attitude toward finance, an attitude which he asserts should be changed, and changed at once. This is the old-school idea:

Without money, nothing can be bought and nothing sold. Therefore nothing matters but money. No matter what the cost to the nation and its industries, no matter how it affects our volume of trade and unemployment and the trade of the world, under no circumstances must we allow anything to affect the smooth working of the money system. Obviously, the productive industries and their output must be regulated and organized; for if left to manage their own affairs producers would tend to produce more than the markets could consume. This applies also to our trade with foreign countries. Otherwise one class of producer, or one section of industry, or one trading country, would be obtaining more than its fair share of the strictly limited amount of money that we can render available for trade and commerce generally, for the markets, and for the purchasing power of the people which, above all, enables markets to absorb a greater or less volume of the output of producers, in accordance with the amount of money spent and with the price of the products.

It would do every member of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee good to purchase a copy of that book and read it thoroughly before attending the first meeting of the committee.

We have asserted upon more than one occasion that the government of this country, a government which upon innumerable occasions has promised us monetary reform, and even claims at times that it has given it to us, should forthwith set up in this dominion a national finance commission responsible to parliament and operating through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Such a commission could serve two purposes. First, it could control the issue and the withdrawal of all money in circulation, including both currency and credit, in accordance with the nation's need; and, second, it could administer the monetary system in accordance with the principles of true democracy. If it is not sensible to establish a national finance commission in this country I should like someone to rise in his place in this chamber and advance sound arguments against the proposal.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, these are our proposals which were drafted at the reconstruction conference held in Edmonton in December. The second is:

> Chartered banks should cease to create, issue and withdraw financial credit, except as agents for the national finance commission, and they should be required to hold currency or credit certificates, issued by the national finance commission through the Bank of Canada, against their total deposits.

Another sound proposal. I come to No. 3:

> The money required to finance Canada's war effort or other normal expenditures should not be obtained by loans (except for the purchase of war supplies from outside the country, settlement of which is made by exports); but rather should be made available by the Bank of Canada and "surplus purchasing power" should automatically be withdrawn by taxation—

—thus ensuring, not a perfectly fantastic system of trying to control inflation, but a perfectly sound system for the control of inflation.

We contend as a fourth point that after we have set up that national finance commission we should have an effective system of price regulation to ensure that prices will not be inflated unwarrantably and primarily for the purpose of profit taking, but that goods of which there is a scarcity should be apportioned for the period of war on an equitable basis.

I would say further that we might very well take care of the national and provincial debts of this country by a systematic process of liquidation. We might make all the securities issued by the dominion and the provinces redeemable at any time without bonus or premium, and require the banks to retain against all deposits an equivalent amount in cash or credit certificates issued by the national finance commission, such credit certificates to be issued to the banks in exchange for securities held by the banks and against such loans as may be authorized by the said commission, such securities to be redeemed as opportunities are afforded for investment in the capital development of industry.

I assert that unless we give proper consideration to these financial proposals we shall see, as we are seeing to-day, a staggering growth in the national debt of this country, a debt so enormous and with interest so terrifically high that we shall not be able under the present system to finance any scheme of post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction. Lord Bennett believed that, and I do not know to what extent the Progressive Conservatives agree with him. He said that the national debt of Britain will be likely £20,000,000,000 after the war, and that the Beveridge report, and in fact any other scheme of social security, shall not have first claim against the income of the country, but rather that the interest on that national debt will be the first claim because, as he asserted, we must at all times maintain the credit of our country. I do not know whether they agree with their former leader or not.

It is stated that should this war last another three years, the national debt of this country will be $12,000,000,000, upon which we shall have a yearly interest charge of about $340,000,000, which is equivalent to approximately the total government income for the year preceding the outbreak of the war. The outcome is obvious. If we are to try to finance this scheme of rehabilitation we shall have to increase taxes tremendously. The figures I have given are not my own; they were quoted in the Financial Post last spring. I have not the copy with me, but I read it in that paper at that time. I hear certain under-toned comments from my Progressive Conservative friends, but since I cannot tell what they are saying, I suppose they are expressing their approval.

Is it not time that we became honest, not only with ourselves but with the people of this country? I assert that there is not as much discredit due or dishonesty to be attached to evil practices as there is dishonesty attachable to those who, knowing such practices to be dishonest, continue to support them. When this war is over we shall still have the productive capacity of Canada. We shall no more than scratch the resources of this country even though we give Britain a billion dollars worth of goods, even though we blast billions of dollars worth of goods into eternity. The resources of this dominion are almost limitless. We are not going outside Canada to get the finances with which to finance this war. All the financing in existence came into existence here. It will still be here when the war is over because we do not shoot money at the enemy nor do we export our bills or our credit.

When this war is over, our boys will ask to be given an opportunity to have security with freedom. I lay emphasis on the words "with freedom." If we fail to grant them that which we are capable of granting, then I fear the outcome. Bloody revolutions are born out of such conditions, and I am not saying that I would ever want to see the day when we shall have revolution of a bloody nature in order to get a revolution of a purely democratic nature.

Not only that, but out of the vast abundance which we are capable of producing we shall have to export billions of dollars worth of our real wealth to help reestablish other countries in the world. We shall have to give them these goods. I should like to quote an article which appeared in the Journal this evening entitled "No gold or goods". It reads:

> The house of representatives foreign affairs committee, recalling the international debt problems arising from the first great war, cautioned the country Saturday against expecting repayment in gold or goods when the time arrives for a post-war settlement of lend-lease aid.

There are only two ways of paying debts as between nations. One is by the exportation of goods and the other is by the exportation of gold. That committee recommended that neither practice be adopted, which would leave only one alternative—give your goods to the countries which require them and which must be rehabilitated. We must recognize that principle, and I hope we recognize it before it is too late.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Deputy Speaker, my first word in rising to take part in this debate must of necessity be to congratulate you upon your appointment to the office of Deputy Speaker. It is only fitting that one who is so fluent in both languages, one who is so experienced in parliamentary procedure, one who is so free from religious bigotry and racial prejudices, should occupy this high office. I am sure you will discharge the duties of your high office with honour to yourself and credit to this house.

It seems to me that a discussion of this motion for the setting up of a committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation cannot be divorced from the question of the setting up of a committee to discuss social security. In many of the speeches which have been made much stress has been laid on private industry. I am in accord with private industry up to a certain extent, but when we have private industry that cannot pay wages which will provide a decent standard of living, then I say we have carried private industry too far. To-day when we are discussing wages, one of the considerations is whether the industry can afford to pay. I do not think that should be the influencing factor.

There are many things that could be done immediately that we are not doing. For instance, we have not allowed the cost of living bonus to all those who labour. There is no reason why, when we pay the full cost of living bonus to the highest paid labour, this bonus should not be paid to all who labour. At present some do not receive a bonus at all, and others receive only sixty cents a week. Many of these inequalities must be eliminated now, not only after the war.

To-day we are told not to ride on the railways, because they want to conserve power for the handling of necessary freight. That is all to the good. We were asked not to ride on the trains until February 18; then the time was extended to the end of February, and now it is extended indefinitely. But we are hauling hundreds of thousands of carloads of steel from the middle of Ontario to British Columbia, and we are hauling hundreds of carloads of coal from Alberta to British Columbia. Yet there are untold millions of tons of coal to be mined in British Columbia. We have everything in British Columbia that is required for the establishment of steel mills and iron works. Surely we do not believe that when this war is over we shall continue along with a population of ten or twelve million people. Everyone within sound of my voice remembers General Hornby coming to this country and his appeal to have British settlers brought here. The province from which I come is one of the finest in Canada, if not the finest, in climatic conditions and with natural resources capable of providing as high a standard of living as exists anywhere in Canada to-day, for a population ten or twelve times our present population. Why are we not making some provision for these people while we still have a voice as to who they shall be?

We should be setting up industry in British Columbia; why not now? We talk about all the things we are going to do after the war, but we are not attempting to do anything to-day. These things are crying out to be done at once. There are thousands of acres of land in British Columbia that will produce anything that can be grown anywhere else in Canada; all that is required is water. Water is there in abundance, but we must have power to get that water on the land for irrigation. The rivers—the Thompson, the Fraser, the Clearwater, the Adams and the Columbia—are capable of producing power in unlimited amounts which would make those acres that are now just range country the most productive gardens in North America. That can be done now. There is no reason why those things cannot be done. If you wish people to believe in your sincerity of purpose when you talk about setting up these different committees, you should be prepared to do some things now that you could do so easily.

For instance, why cannot we pay our old people a decent standard of living? Why do we keep them trying to exist on twenty dollars a month? When we provided the cost-of-living bonus we recognized that that was necessary in order to keep up with the increase in the cost of living. We gave that to men and women making anything from $150 to $300 a month. But our old people are told that they must continue to live on $20 a month; they cannot have even that small increase. No old people in this country should have to attempt to live on less than a dollar a day, and no one should be forced to work after sixty-five years of age. Industry says, you cannot work after sixty-five; they lay you off at sixty-five. But the government say that they will not pay the old age pension until you are seventy. Who is going to take up the slack between sixty-five and seventy? No provision is made. The old people of this country should be pensioned at sixty-five and should not be asked to live on less than a dollar a day.

Then in my province we have some of the last great west; some of the greatest stock farms in Canada are in British Columbia. Those stock farms could be made very much more productive if there were some system of storing water. The winter snow runs off with a great rush in the spring. If there were storage dams to collect and conserve and control that run-off, the range could be made a hundred times more productive than it is for feeding large herds of stock. These are things that can be done now. But we are not making any provision at all for them.

I do not think there is much more that I can add to the present debate at this time, but I would urge this committee that instead of talking all the time about what is to be done after the war they give some thought to these things that can be done and should be done now.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before this debate closes I should like to say something about the committee which is to be set up. I have been looking over the minutes and proceedings of the special joint meeting which was held in Ottawa on December 4, under the chairmanship of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). It included representatives of the provinces, the committee on reconstruction, the subcommittees of that committee, the research investigators. Looking over those minutes and seeing as I thought certain trends, I considered it might be wise to say something, not so much in a controversial spirit as to express a point of view to the minister and the committee which is about to be set up.

But before doing so, I should like to endorse what has just been said by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill). I think our honesty of purpose will be very largely judged by what we do now, whether we are able and willing during this war period to improve the condition of those whose condition needs improving. I have in my hand a letter which came to me this afternoon. I am placing it before the committee not in any criticism of the minister, because I am well aware that when I send this letter, as I shall to-morrow, to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, this case will receive his personal attention. But from time to time cases come to us which indicate that perhaps we are willing to do what we can as far as this house is concerned, but that somehow or another in the far hospitals and departments, where the eye of the minister and the house is not directly upon the people responsible, things are happening which I believe neither the house nor the minister would wish to have happen. It is because I feel that there should be a backing for the committee in regard to these matters that I bring this letter to the attention of the minister and the house to-night.

This letter is written from Wetaskiwin, Alberta, and reads in part as follows:

> I was in England for two years and eight months and returned to Canada September 9, 1942. I was discharged from the army for medical reasons and have been treated like an old worn-out tire, no more use, so have been discarded.

I was admitted to the university hospital on September 25, 1942, and kept there till October 30, 1942. I was told that if I would consider an operation it would help my health. After waiting five weeks I had my operation and was discharged from hospital November 20, 1942. I was in worse condition than when I entered hospital. After being home a week I wrote the pension board to see if I could be returned to hospital. On December 14 I was admitted to hospital again. I left and come home for two weeks at Christmas and was admitted again on January 4, 1943. I was discharged again January 27, 1943. I am still quite unable to work. A pamphlet which was given to me at the time of my discharge promising the ex-soldiers lots of things for rehabilitation does not seem to connect with the way I have been treated. I was truly given the $35 for clothes, one month's pay and allowances, but when I was discharged from hospital my wife's allowance was cut off and from the 21st November to the 21st December I received nothing, and then I was put on this welfare scheme of $13 a week. I have notice that my operation—

I presume he means his injury.

—was caused in a theatre of actual war but was not serious enough for a pension.

Now if I am able to do any sort of work in the near future I am in no way financially able to get work clothes. What I want to know is how or where is the rehabilitation when I had to use the month's pay to live on after coming from hospital and if they treat the men who now come home like this, how will they ever take care of them when they all come back, and there will be plenty of them?

I read this letter because it is one of a few, fortunately as yet very few, such letters that I have received; and it seems to me that the sincerity of what we do in the future will be judged largely by what we do now. As the hon. member for Kamloops has just said, I suppose there is not a member of this house who has not files of letters in his office from old age pensioners, the contents of some of which, because we have had an unusually severe winter, would almost make one weep.

With regard to the committee to be set up, I notice of course that there has been a change in the status of the James committee, if I may call it that. Apparently now this is to be an advisory committee which will report directly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The committee consisting of the senior officials of the Department of Finance, and so on, will be actually the committee charged with the responsibility of devising ways and means of dealing with the post-war problem.

The point I particularly want to make tonight is this. I have noticed that through the papers submitted on December 4, which I have read with some care, there seemed to run the considered, unanimous opinion that what should be done was to wait until the war ends to see to what extent private industry could cope with the situation in which we shall then find ourselves; and that if private industry were unable to cope with those conditions, then the government should adopt plans and devise schemes to supplement what industry might be able to do. If I may pay it this tribute, the committee, however, seemed to have an appreciation of the problem. I notice that Principal James stated:

The single central problem which the committee on reconstruction has faced from the day of its first meeting is that of attaining full employment of our population—of those able to work and desirous of working—at as high a standard of living as is possible in the light of our available resources and the optimum rate at which we can utilize them.

Then he went on to say that this was the central key to everything else in the picture. I would agree with that summary as to the target at which this reconstruction committee, this parliament and the government should aim at this particular time. The problem of finance, which was discussed a few moments ago by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), was dismissed by Principal James in a few sentences. He said that in due course they would be called upon to propose to the cabinet certain suggestions regarding a fiscal and monetary policy designed to correct business depression, proposals that involved definite government expenditures at certain periods in a trade cycle. Evidently he was contemplating periods of prosperity and depression, periods of peaks and depressions, to which we have been accustomed in the past, and was referring to policies involving a definite and careful interrelationship of central banking policy, a taxation policy and a borrowing policy so that there might be developed in the community in all periods, through a combination of private and public expenditure, a demand for goods and services which would be adequate to maintain full employment. In other words, the committee apparently as yet has not given any serious consideration to the financial problem which is involved in the programme of rehabilitation which many of us believe will be necessary. He went on to say that the problem has been discussed in general terms but is a long way from being solved. Then he went on to add this, which I thought was interesting:

. . . we are not yet sufficiently far advanced in our practical studies of financial systems and our theoretical studies of monetary and fiscal policy to be able to lay down a definite prescription and swear that this is exactly the method that must be followed in a particular country.

In other words, the advisory committee seems to be as much at sea as ever in regard to the manner in which the programme, when it is instituted, can be financed. Yet the same document shows that the committee did have an appreciation of the tremendous problem which will face this country when the war ends. In the course of his remarks Doctor James sketched in a very few words the problem which will face Canada immediately after the war. He said:

> There are approximately 600,000 men and women in the armed forces, and some 900,000 men and women in war industries, a total of a million and a half—

And I think this is important.

> —which is roughly fifty per cent of the total number of people gainfully employed in Canada before this war began, or one-third of the total gainfully employed population in Canada at the present moment.

That gives us some indication of the tremendous problem which will face this country when the war ends, and which ought to be constantly before any reconstruction committee we set up now. Then the committee saw something else, in regard to putting these people into jobs when the war over. Doctor James said:

> We cannot rely for this purpose on the immediate reorganization of industry with a view to producing peace-time consumers' goods. With the best will in the world, it takes considerable time for an industry to switch over from war-time to peace-time activity.

That is something which the committee should keep in mind. There are those who believe that the moment this war is over, there will be such a backlog of purchasing power and of needs that there will be such an upturn in business as will take care of the men and women dismissed from war industries and those who are gradually and progressively demobilized from the armed forces. But here we have the considered opinion of the advisory committee dealing with post-war reconstruction, to the effect that we cannot rely upon that.

Someone said the other day that we were preaching depression after the war. That is not true. Personally I do not believe that a depression after this war is necessary, if we take the essential steps to plan our industrial and economic life so that when this war ends we shall be able to carry forward with great projects both in industry and in the development of our resources. But there are those, and I share the view, who believe that unless we do something of that sort we shall face a very serious situation indeed. And the committee which is advising on reconstruction definitely also shares that view.

I was struck with this sentence in that connection used by Doctor James and found on page 12.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that the James' report from which the hon. member is reading, or the evidence of Doctor James?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; I am not reading from either. I am reading from the official proceedings of a meeting held on December 4, and I am giving some extracts from the papers presented at that meeting. At the moment I have Doctor James' comments before me. At page 12 of the proceedings Doctor James says:

> During the period immediately after the conclusion of hostilities, a period that may last for months, or for years, we must face the problem of finding jobs for a million and a half men and women demobilized from the armed forces and munitions industries. And we shall have to find these jobs at the very moment when the process of retooling will tend to reduce the demands of private industry for workers. This problem of the immediate post-war period must be met partly by social legislation, and partly by publicly financed construction projects.

To what extent one or the other will have to be used will have to be decided before this war ends. But I am convinced that this committee—and now I refer to the James committee—is too prone, as I shall attempt to show in a moment, to rely upon the ability of private industry to undertake the major reemployment problem when the war ends. He said this:

> The activities of the committee on reconstruction that attempt to develop practical measures for the attainment of full employment, or the attempt to guarantee full employment, in the immediate post-war period are, first of all, the excellent work that the committee on employment opportunities, under Tom Moore, has been carrying on in regard to the training and recruitment of labour, and the work of the dominion employment service, which I mention briefly because you will have a fuller report on that this afternoon, as well as an opportunity to discuss it. Secondly, an attempt is being made to develop a programme of construction projects privately and publicly financed by the municipal, provincial and dominion governments.

The reason I refer to that statement in the report is that I am glad to note that on account of the illness of Mr. Tom Moore the government has appointed his successor to take his place. I refer to Mr. Bengough. Throughout this report I find that except in one or two isolated instances, of which this is one, the cooperation of labour and of the farmer has been overlooked by the committee, and by the government which set up the committee. I noted this in the report, and I hope that more attention will be given to the representations of labour and the farming community, the two greatest producing groups in our country.

Something else we should like to emphasize is this, that Doctor James said that in the few words he had been able to put together that afternoon he had tried to sketch the committee's report on the immediate post-war problems of Canada. And then he used the expression. "which is concentrated and which is urgent", and added this significant sentence, "There is no possibility of delay in the tackling of this problem".

But as I said earlier, the committee has apparently come to the conclusion that it must rely largely on private industry to meet the needs of the situation, for he says this:

> By and large however it is the unanimous opinion of the committee on reconstruction that the initial planning of industrial rehabilitation is a matter for industry itself rather than for any governmental committee.

I believe that statement is based upon quite a mistaken understanding of what the post-war condition is likely to be. To suggest that initial planning is the responsibility of private industry is wrong. We as a nation must undertake the planning of our industrial and economic effort when the war ends, if we are going to meet the needs of the situation which will develop. And Doctor James' own statement, the unanimous view of this committee, is discounted almost immediately in the words which follow in this report, when Doctor James states that up to the present time he knew of only two industrial groups that are actively at work in post-war planning. He knew of only two, and he gave the names. One of them is the pulp and paper industry. He goes on to point out that this has been undertaken not only by persons in the industry, but by the war-time controllers of the industry as well. The second group interested in post-war planning are the life insurance companies. The life insurance companies are not industries. Moreover, in Great Britain we have witnessed lately the opposition of the great life insurance companies to the social security plans embodied in the Beveridge report. And we may find that the same vested interests in our own country will oppose health insurance and other social service measures.

My belief is that in Great Britain the government will ultimately be compelled to take over at least the great industrial life insurance companies, and make them a part of the entire social security set-up of that country. The probability is that we shall have to do the same thing.

I thought that Doctor Wallace, president of Queen's university, who also contributed a paper at this meeting of the committee, brought a realistic view to the committee's attention. He pointed out that if we were to deal successfully with our post-war problems we ought to be dealing with our fundamental natural resources, and their developments. He omitted agriculture, because that was the subject of a special paper. But he placed the other fundamental resources as being mining, forestry, power and fisheries. But even President Wallace overlooked the necessity of bringing into this picture the cooperation of labour. He referred to:

> . . . conferences that represent the administration in the provinces, the industry, the bodies of a public nature that are concerned with these resources professionally, conservationally and otherwise, and private individuals who have a special interest in such resources.

It may be that in his opinion labour was covered by one of these other groups. But in my opinion we are overlooking the cooperation of the great producing masses which we sometimes separate into two groups, labour and farmers.

A word of warning to those who think that by the development of our natural resources we can meet the needs of the post-war period. President Wallace said:

> I think it would be a mistake to base too much optimism on what we can do in our resources for the immediate employment of men returning from overseas, but there can be a much larger number than most people would expect possible before looking into the picture.

While assistance can be given through the development of our resources, it is not sufficient to meet in any big way the needs of our post-war requirements and the criticism which President Wallace makes of our former policies in regard to the exploitation of our natural resources should give us all food for thought. He says:

> We have to a considerable measure neglected our resources as cropable assets. That applies more particularly to forestry, one of our great primary resources in Canada. . . . There are surveys needed in Canada, very much more extensive than anything that we are aware of, both with regard to forestry lands and also to our mining prospects. We find that in all our resources, and particularly forestry, we have an extraordinarily inadequate knowledge of the situation, and without the knowledge we cannot do very much in sound conservational procedure.

To my mind, in our post-war rehabilitation plans, we should pay a great deal of attention to forest conservation, reforestation, and the care of trees that grow naturally in great areas in this country. President Wallace pointed out that this neglect of our resources applies also in other fields, in mining and the geological and topographical surveys. He says:

There, too, far more is needed than we yet have, in order soundly to develop our resources.

If I may say so, as many of us perhaps know, President Wallace is an outstanding man in the universities of Canada in this particular field. I hope that what he said in this regard, namely, that we are becoming conservation-conscious, is true. He said:

We are becoming conservation-conscious. We are recognizing that we are losing our resources very sadly in many places. Any one who keeps his eyes open can see it, and the end is disaster, unless we act, and at once. The time has come to begin to build up again. That applies to deforested land that is wasting away because it is not protected any longer.

I think those of us who have been to Vancouver island in particular and to other regions on the Pacific coast realize the truth of that statement. He criticizes, not this government, but all the governments of Canada, for, after all, much of this applies, of course, to the provincial governments as well:

Speaking from a government standpoint, I think we have done very little for our forests of Canada.

We have allowed these great resources to be exploited, denuded, and to a very large extent wasted.

A few days ago we had an interesting discussion in the house on the importance of water conservation. This, too, was emphasized by the committee, and if I might lend my voice to others that have been raised in this house, I believe that the waters of our prairie rivers may yet prove to be a source of great wealth to this country. Several years ago I undertook to give an address in this house on an irrigation scheme for the dried-out areas of Saskatchewan. When we spoke of thirty or forty or fifty million dollars in those days for schemes of that kind or four hundred million dollars for the grandiose scheme that was spoken of at that time, there was a gasp almost of horror at the thought of spending such huge sums of money. But when this war is over, it strikes me that if we want to put a large area of western Canada on a really self-supporting basis we shall have to consider great irrigation projects, and in the great waters of the north and south branches of the Saskatchewan river we have the ways and means to do more perhaps than most of us have thought possible.

I was, however, very much disappointed in the paper dealing with agriculture. It was submitted by a former minister of agriculture in the Bracken government of Manitoba, Mr. Donald G. McKenzie. He pointed out that the problem was a large one. He drew to the attention of the committee, and I wish to draw to the attention of this house something which I believe is quite true.

There are now perhaps upwards of 200,000 men and women drawn from agriculture to the armed forces and war industry who normally, one would assume, would return to this occupation.

A very large percentage of the people who have been drawn from agriculture into the armed forces and into the war industries have come from the prairie provinces, and if I may interject this thought, I believe that the other provinces of Canada would be doing an injustice to the prairie regions, where war industries have not been established, but whose people have been drawn into the armed forces and into industry to a much larger percentage of our population than elsewhere, if the representation of the prairie provinces in this house were not kept as it is now for the next ten years. I think all fair-minded members of this house will agree with me.

Mr. McKenzie could see in the problem of agriculture apparently only two basic problems—the problem of markets and the problem of agricultural credits. True, these are two of the problems, but to my mind they are not the two fundamental problems. The fundamental problems go much deeper than the finding of markets and the provision of credits. They go into the whole basis of the land tenure and mortgage system of western Canada, and the manner in which the producers on the farm have been compelled to pay, through years past, higher prices on account of artificial conditions in the country in which we live and to receive unduly low prices for their products. So that we must look to more than two broad principles if we are going to find a remedy for the farm problem.

One other point that I noted in his paper was this, a fear that we cannot increase the consumption of agricultural products in our own domestic market. True, we must find export markets, but in my opinion we can increase the consumption of agricultural products in our own country. When we compare the prewar years and the per capita consumption of meat, for example, in Canada, with the per capita consumption in a much warmer country, Australia, where meat is not required in such large quantities, we find that our per capita consumption of meat is very much below that of Australia or New Zealand.

Then there is the possibility of widening the uses for our agricultural products. I hope the government will pay a good deal of attention to the scientific experiments now being carried on looking toward the utilization of agricultural products in other industries.

Mr. REID: Would you increase the growing of wheat?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would answer, of course, that our Canadian people cannot consume much more wheat than they are doing now, but I believe that when this war ends, every kernel of wheat we have stored will be useful to assist in feeding the starving people of the war-torn countries, and for a considerable time every cereal we can grow will be needed either in Europe or in Asia. I am not apprehensive about the amount of wheat we have; my only fear is that the farmers will not be able to carry it, unaided —largely—as they have to do to-day.

Problems of electrification, soil erosion, soil conservation ought to be considered by the committee as a part of a large general rehabilitation and reconstruction programme, not only because these would give work but because they would assist generally the country in the future. I was amazed to find in the statement presented by Mr. MacKenzie this suggestion: I am not going to paraphrase it; I will read his words. He says:

> If those folks are to be persuaded to go back to the farm, some means or other have to be found to persuade them to take a little lower income than they are now getting. So we are looking at the problem and wondering if something could not be done that would provide a modest little home on the farm for a married couple, who would make their home there, perhaps with the use of half an acre of land and, say, with a cow or two to supply their needs, and who would educate their children and settle more permanently on the land than is now the case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is he another schoolteacher?

An hon. MEMBER: A lawyer?

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I would imagine that if we tried to put a family, with a couple of cows, on half an acre of land in the prairie provinces, we would have not only dead cows but the funeral of the man, his wife and the family in a very short time, because over a very large area of our country half an acre would not begin to keep half a cow.

Mr. GARDINER: He must have meant half a section.

Mr. COLDWELL: He must have meant half a section? Well, he says, "half an acre." As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows, although half a section is not quite so bad, there are places where it would not be sufficient.

I do not propose to refer more to this particular document, but I was interested in the trend of thought to be found—it runs through the other papers as well—that we must wait and see. We must wait and see if industry can undertake the job, and if industry cannot undertake the job then we must supplement it. I think we should have sufficient knowledge of what is going on in the world to-day to realize that industry will not be able to undertake this job, that the thing we must do is to decide on the plans we can formulate now so that we can provide the means of life for this large number of people to whom this report refers. Industry will have to assume some of the job, and in my opinion will be able to do so. Of course it will be said that we believe in taking all industry out of private hands. I have often said that this is not so. We believe that when industry becomes a monopolistic affair it is high time to take it out of private hands so that it shall not exploit the people. But, contrary to what most people think and say, we should like to see more Canadian people owning more homes and owning more property which they themselves and their families can use and enjoy. The only kind of property we do not want to see privately owned is that which is used to exploit other people. In other words, we want less public property privately owned and more personal property privately and personally owned, and the more that this ideal is kept before this house and the committee, the more likely are we to arrive at a plan to meet the post-war period.

I have spoken rather longer than I intended, but I wished to place a point of view before the house on this occasion and to deal specifically with the trends I found in the discussion as reported in the proceedings of the meeting on December 4. I believe that we are on the threshold of great changes. We must win this war, it is true. That is fundamental. We could not do any of these things if we did not win the war. I agree with that fundamental position. But we shall have lost what we are fighting for if we do not prepare, before this war ends, to organize our economy and our social life so that the men and the women who have fought and sacrificed, who have produced the goods in our war industries, who have produced the foods back on our farms, who have given of service to this nation and to the united nations in the time of need, shall have the kind of life to which they look forward and for which they fight.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): The war has now lasted three years, and if it lasts another three years and we do not do anything more in the next three years to prepare for the peace that we are going to win than we have done in the last three years, we shall not be ready for the peace.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is pretty hard on the government!

Mr. CLAXTON: The government has been occupied with something else more important, which comes first; namely, the winning of the war. But now a beginning has been made of that, and we can turn our attention more to the post-war period. Hon. members in all parts of the house have emphasized in this debate the importance of that subject, and equally they have recognized—every one of them, quite properly—that we have to win the war first, that we must put it first in our thoughts and that we must put it first in the national effort. But even in winning the war it will help us to think of the post-war period. That was expressed exceedingly well in one of the reports made in the United Kingdom, the Uthwatt report, in which it was said:

> It is our firm belief that a vital incentive to the war effort is the presentation of a clear picture of a better world which lies ahead and which, if plans are drawn up and the essential preparations made in advance, can be achieved after this struggle is over. To delay planning and the legislation to carry the plans into effect until the time for action is upon us—at the end of the war—we believe to be a fatal error.

Already we have seen some of the signs of the first glimmer of victory over the eastern sky. No sooner had the 8th army begun to make some advance and the allies begun to operate together in north Africa than we saw some reactions in Canada to this first glimmer of victory. On one side there began to be a public clamour against government control. It was as though business felt that the war was beginning to be won, and that it had better prepare itself for the post-war period. On the other side there was agitation of a new character by various labour organizations. In both instances there was the unconscious feeling that the time had come when they should begin to look to the preparation of their own post-war position. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) warned this house and the country, not once but three times, that we had to win the war first. I think every hon. member agrees with him.

But that does not mean that we must leave all consideration of the post-war period to some other time. We can deal with both matters together. One thing that is important is that we should put ourselves in the place of industry and try to realize what is in their minds to-day. If you have been in conference with those engaged in business and industry to-day you will realize that many of them are wondering what is going to happen after the war. If you are meeting labour groups; if you have been involved in labour disputes, you will find out that this is also in the back of their minds. I suggest that the more assurance we can give now of what will happen after the war, the better it will be for both those groups and for everyone else. If we cannot give an instalment of the post-war conditions to-day, at least we can give an earnest of it by indicating our seriousness by thinking and planning ahead and trying to anticipate and see just what will happen, trying to dovetail the various parts of this nation's effort, so that at the end of the war they will make a fighting team together to fight and win the victory of peace in the same way as they are making a fighting team to win the war.

It is easy enough to look ahead and see what labour wants. Labour does not want handouts; labour wants an opportunity to work. Agriculture wants an opportunity of selling its products at fair prices. Industry wants a chance to make a fair profit. It is that kind of thing we should have in our minds to-day. We should be trying to think of the conditions under which these three great elements in the country can work together so that we can make an attempt at the end of the war to face the problems of reconstruction. May I suggest that if we plan and put into this effort something of the spirit and the concentration of will and united purpose that we are putting into the war, we can look forward to the future with confidence. Speaking about the new order, the Prime Minister said at Toronto on March 24, 1941:

> If that new order is not already on its way before the war is over, we may look for it in vain.

Of course he is right. The war is not going to come to a sudden end and then the millenium come in at the zero hour of victory. When peace does come we may find ourselves in somewhat the same position as that of the boy who has attained his twenty-first birthday; we shall be just one day older. In a large measure we are making our peace now. We are setting to-day the conditions that will make the conditions under which we shall have to work in peace. The kind of people who are in charge of our economy and our affairs will be the same people who will be in charge of our affairs then, or so many of us expect and hope. A year or two ago some people thought that there would be a millenium after we had won the victory. That is not likely.

People have become more realistic. We know now that conditions will not be very much different except that the emphases will be changed and the purpose of all our activities will be changed. But there will be some differences. One difference will be the fact that there will be 2,000,000 people for whom work will have to be found. Another is the fact that something will have to be found to take the place of the $4,000,000,000 or more which the government has put into the Canadian economy for purposes of the war. Our economy may go back to the 1939 level unless that is done. We have those two challenges ahead of us—to find employment for something like 2,000,000 people and to get our economy at a level where, instead of a national income of something in the neighbourhood of $4,000,000,000, as it was in 1938, we shall have a national income of something like $8,000,000,000, as it probably is this year.

That cannot be done by private enterprise or private industry alone, nor can it be done by the government alone. It can be done only by the two getting together and working out plans in considerable detail in advance. Industry, labour and farmers; government, both dominion and provincial; engineers, lawyers, members of parliament; all the people who go to make up this nation must realize that unless they keep together, unless they work together at that time with the same united purpose as that which they have shown during the war, they can look forward only to a short-lived boom followed by a long and unpleasant depression. This point of view was put forth very well in the annual report of the Bank of Canada which was issued this month, when Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the bank, said:

> —the experience of the last four years has shown that government war expenditure on a sufficient scale can produce full employment.

He continued:

> The government's willingness to spend the large amounts of money involved in the war programme has been a necessary and important feature but even more important has been the unity of national purpose which has produced such remarkable economic results over the past four years.
> After the war is over, the present driving stimulus to maximum employment and production will be removed. If we are to maintain full employment in peace time, we must substitute other objectives for the current will to win the war. Broadly speaking our goals should be to provide a rising standard of living and to contribute to the establishment of a world economy which will remove the threat of war.

Notice what he said—the two-fold incentive that is necessary, the two-fold goal "to provide a rising standard of living and to contribute to the establishment of a world economy which will remove the threat of war." He ends with these words:

> If we are to achieve success, I feel that we must have the same broad measure of public support behind those objectives that is now back of our efforts to win the war.

Therefore it comes down to this: are the people of Canada willing to work and fight for the fruits of their victory, to fight for their best interests after the war with the united purpose they have shown during the war? Are we to do that, or are we to let the devil take the hindmost, stick our noses in the trough, and go back in a wild flight to normalcy, similar to that which we saw in 1919 after the end of the last war? That is the challenge which faces Canada. That is the challenge which faces all the civilized world.

All the countries in the world are thinking about it, and many of them have been thinking about it for a long time. In the United Kingdom, as I think hon. members know, they have not only the Beveridge but the Uthwatt and the Scott committees' reports. They have dozens of government agencies set up to study the post-war situation, and all the activities are coordinated under the general direction of the paymaster-general, Sir William Jowett. On December 1 and 2 they had two days debate on the subject of reconstruction when the work then under way was surveyed.

In Australia, which is in some ways similar to our own country in having a federal system and an economy that is largely dependent on exports and in being a great British dominion, they have already faced one part of the problem by calling together a constitutional convention in which the federal government sought for a term substantial powers from the states in order to carry out the purposes of the national government after the war. It was interesting to note that in putting this forward the attorney general of the commonwealth of Australia said that Australia was committed to a course of action under the Atlantic charter which she could not fulfil under the existing constitution. I think that should lead us to consider in Canada if it is possible for us to fulfil our obligations under the Atlantic charter and to the Canadian people under our existing constitution. The Atlantic charter to-day constitutes a treaty for Canada. It was signed on August 14, 1941, by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, and paragraphs 4 and 5 read:

> (4) They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

The internal situation is dealt with in paragraph 5:

(5) They desire to bring about fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field, with the object of securing for all improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.

Of course, by the declaration of the united nations signed at Washington, January 1, 1942, Canada agreed to its preamble which said, "Having subscribed to a common programme of purposes and principles . . ." So that we see in the Atlantic charter a description in broad terms of the purposes to which our own government and, I am sure, all the Canadian people have subscribed. The question is, are we doing enough to-day in the internal sphere to get going the kind of machinery to study and plan for what is envisaged here and what is needed to turn our economy from a war basis to a peace-time basis; and in the second place, have we contributed as much as we can to set up the international machinery to bring that about between nations? My suggestion is that though Canada has done much we can still do a great deal more. Hence we all keenly support the resolution to set up this committee in order that it may get on with its work in close collaboration with all other government agencies.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) said there was a great deal we could do to-day to deal with this post-war situation. I have one thing that I should like to bring before the reconstruction committee for its consideration which I do not think has yet been mentioned in the house or before the committee. It concerns the one Canadian industry which does not require re-tooling, which almost inevitably is due for a tremendous boom immediately after the war, and which can count on a steady period of growth and development indefinitely after the war if we only think about it to-day. That is an industry which has been all too infrequently mentioned in this house. I refer to the tourist industry.

Immediately after the war there will be in the United States millions of people demobilized from war services and industry with savings in their pockets. The strain of the war will be over; they will want to go on a holiday and to go some place. They will not be able to go abroad because the ships of the world will be engaged in carrying food and supplies to the devastated areas and in bringing troops home. We may see in North America in the immediate post-war period the greatest boom in the travel business that the world has ever seen. Canada may well expect to get a very considerable part of that business.

Hon. members may not realize what this means to Canada. In 1941 we had 13,968,088 Americans coming to Canada, and they spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000 here. They brought into Canada in that year more dollars than any other single industry brought, with the possible exception of gold mining. Here is something which can be considered as a post-war activity and on which we can work now. The kind of work I have in mind is well illustrated by the activities of the wartime prices and trade board. One might not expect it to be building to-day for our post-war reconstruction, but that is precisely what it did indirectly. When sugar rationing was introduced the official of the wartime prices and trade board in charge of rationing discussed with an officer of the foreign exchange control board how it should be introduced. This officer of the foreign exchange control board was interested in the tourist business on account of the United States dollars it had brought to Canada. He said, "Have you thought of the problem of rationing American householders in Canada?" The official of the prices board said, "I did not know there were very many; how many are there?" The foreign exchange control officer replied, "There are nine thousand. Instead of forcing these Americans to line up at Canadian offices to get their sugar ration cards after they come to Canada we should write every one of them an individual letter offering to send him by mail his ration card before he comes to Canada." Therefore a letter was sent addressed "Dear Neighbour." I suppose the letters must have cost easily $50 in postage and mimeographing and paper. They brought back thousands of replies. I have seen a number of them. One from East Orange says:

Thank you again for your courtesy in telling us how to take care of this matter. It is one more evidence of the unfailing courtesy and kindliness I have found each of the twelve summers I have spent in Canada.

Here is one from Toledo:

I am delighted beyond words with the thoughtfulness and courtesy of your circular letter. . . . It will give me great pleasure to turn it over to one of our newspaper columns and believe it will receive some favourable publicity. I feel the entire United States admires Canada and the wonderful effort it is putting forth on behalf of us all.

One from Detroit:

I certainly appreciate the spirit of your letter. In fact it gave me quite a shock to find a government organization so far-sighted as to anticipate future requirements.

When I learned of this by accident it gave me quite a shock to find how far-sighted our officials had been. Later I went to the United States, and after speaking to audiences in Chicago, Cleveland and even in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, people came to me from the audience saying they had received such letters and expressed their appreciation. Then I felt that this was one of the most far-sighted, courteous acts I had ever heard of a public official doing, and I thought I would take the first available opportunity to mention it to the house in order that it might receive the commendation which I feel every hon. member would wish to express.

What I have just mentioned has a very definite post-war implication. It is building for the post-war period in the most practical way. It is creating good-will. It is leading our United States friends who own houses in Canada to look forward to the time when they may return to Canada. It is making every one of them an ambassador of good-will for us. I suggest that there are dozens of ways in which other agencies of various kinds, governmental and otherwise, can pave the way for this tourist business that we may have after the war. We should make sure that when tourists come to Canada after the war, they meet with good reception and carry back a good report. The first wave of tourists returning from Canada to the United States after the war will do more good or harm than all the publicity we could possibly buy. If they meet with a good reception, then this highly important Canadian industry will be placed on a sound footing for years ahead. If they carry back a bad report, then all the publicity we can buy will do no good. The tourist business may seem out of the way, but it is the sort of thing which people with imagination, who are thinking ahead, can work on as a way to help make Canada's situation better after the war.

If it is possible to do this in connection with something so remote as the tourist business, there must be dozens of ways which our committee and all the interdepartmental committees and the members of this house and business associations can think of which will give them an opportunity to apply their brains and their industry when that effort is needed after the war. That is the sort of planning we need, so that we, a small nation, by the use of intelligence may make the most of our resources, and it does not take a great deal of intelligence to think of these things. All it requires is continuous attention, someone whose business it is to apply his mind to that sort of thing.

It is quite obvious that what we do in Canada in regard to the post-war situation will affect us here very greatly. We can make conditions difficult for industry, for agriculture and for labour more than anything else by being uncertain, by preventing them from feeling any security as to their future. What they want above everything else is to know where they stand, to know what they can do, to know what they can plan for; and of course one of the things that should be indicated fairly soon is the kind of controls that will be necessary after the war ends, because we should remember that some controls will be required. Today we are short of certain food products, for instance milk products. I should think that immediately after the war we would be much shorter of milk products, because there will be a far greater number of people in the world who will need those products much more than we shall, and I should think the cry of suffering humanity would be responded to by Canadians. So that we may see a continuation of the rationing of certain milk products. Shipping will be short; there will have to be shipping control, and so on. Therefore I suggest that the sort of controls which will be needed for the kind of economy that will follow the war should be studied and worked out now and made popular, so that we shall not have a great clamour against every sort of control and against government bureaucracy, which will make it exceedingly difficult to get the public confidence so necessary to carry out what must be done at that time.

But when we have done everything in Canada that we can do, we must remember that we are part of the world. The result of what we do in Canada will depend in very large measure upon what happens outside Canada. We can plan and work in Canada, but unless after the war we get the kind of peace settlement, the kind of peace conditions, which will enable us to sell our wheat and other products abroad at fair prices, then we may be in for hard times. Every one of us in Canada, in the east as well as in the west, lawyers as well as farmers, should be concerned about the kind of peace settlement we have after the war. The sort of peace we get will depend a good deal upon the sort of war we fight. If we fight the war as united nations; if we develop instruments to carry out our united will; if we develop machinery and habits of co-operation during the war, then we may expect that cooperation to continue after the war. If on the other hand we do not develop those agencies and instruments and habits and that machinery during the war, then it would be expecting a miracle to hope that after the war they could be developed, when we would have lost the main thing holding us together, namely, the desire to beat the enemy.

Accordingly I suggest that we in Canada as individuals, and I hope as a government, can support the moves that are going on around the world to strengthen the united nations, to make their union real, and gradually to evolve the agencies, the instruments and the machinery of cooperation so that the nations will get into the habit of working together, a habit which will survive the peace.

In conclusion, may I just say that I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) that almost everything can be done to-day that will help us in the post-war period, and what cannot be done to-day must be planned to-day. Think of housing. Most of us, I believe, look forward to a great series of housing projects in Canada; yet our experience in the past with similar projects would indicate how technically difficult they are to work out, since they involve the cooperation of the municipalities, the provinces, the dominion and other agencies. We have discovered that if you want to get a housing project started a year from now, you must begin planning a year in advance. That is the sort of thing we can do to-day.

In connection with the committee I have only a word to say, namely, that in a matter of this importance the committee surely should be given every possible assistance by members of this house, by the public, by public bodies and especially by the government, which should not only make available to it the work done by other government agencies but make available research assistance of its own so that it could carry on its own work as well as listening to what other people are doing. Even to coordinate the results of the work of other people or to draw up any sort of well rounded report, it is necessary that the committee should have some full-time assistance. During the last three years of war it has been my privilege to attend perhaps five or six international conferences. I believe every one of those had a number of secretaries who spent weeks, months or perhaps even years preparing for those meetings which were unofficial and off the record. Not long ago I attended one such conference which lasted some ten days, to which some governments thought it worth while to send delegates some tens of thousands of miles by air. That conference was planned during two years. Perhaps more than twenty secretaries worked on that occasion in planning the conference. Yet we have a committee of this house which has no secretary who can devote a full day's work to the committee. It is high time that we gave parliamentary committees of that kind and of that importance some technical assistance. It would not require very many — a full-time secretary, an economist and probably one or two other experts to consider representations, to organize the work, to prepare submissions and to draft reports. In this way the committee can do a job which will be far more useful than it could otherwise do.

Nothing comes without work. This is the most important work upon which any one of us could be engaged, apart from the actual winning of the war itself. Unfortunately most of us cannot take part in that; we are not physically fit, or we are too old or something of that kind. But here is one thing we can do, namely, to give the boys returning from overseas a fair chance for a useful life. That is all they want.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the fine discussion which has been carried on since it was proposed to set up this committee. I have been really disappointed, though, by the extent to which every hon. member who has participated in the debate, from the three other groups in the house, has studiously avoided telling us about how all their fine dreams are to be achieved.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) gave us a good speech. He, however, told us there were two million people to put to work, but he did not give us an iota of evidence as to how that is to be done. He told us that we should have to distribute in Canada the equivalent of four billion dollars, in order to keep our people up to a standard where they would have their present national income of eight billion dollars. Apparently he did not consider it important to suggest how that would be done, where the money was to come from, or how it was to be distributed.

That is the major flaw, the major deficiency in the whole debate, and in all the thinking going on to-day in the various nations which call themselves the united nations. Unless that problem is solved, all the discussion in this house and in other houses, all the efforts of this and other committees are going to be completely futile, a delusion and a snare. Let us get that in mind. I will challenge anybody to gainsay what I have said.

The emphasis of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George seemed to be that we should have an international organization to settle this matter. I ask hon. members: What sort of international arrangement could have removed the unemployment situation which existed in 1935, when the United States, one of the united nations, had 23,500,000 people on relief; when Canada, another of the united nations, had about a million and half on relief; when Great Britain, another of the united nations, had a corresponding number on relief, and when a similar deplorable relief situation existed in every single one of those united nations? I ask this question: How could the binding of these nations together possibly have removed the unemployment which existed? Let us by all means in the house begin to face the facts. Let us not talk idle foolishness. There must be a device by which improvements can be achieved. Let us find that device, and discuss it.

In passing, I should like to deal with the various speeches which have come from the Liberal side of the house. It seems to me there has been a well-organized debating team performing before us from the Liberal benches, the object being to give us the impression that the Liberal party apparently wishes us to get. I wish to indicate how it seems to me they have endeavoured to convey the impression.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) told us about the great changes which are to take place. But he took care not to indicate in the slightest degree the nature of those changes, how they were to be brought about, or whether the changes would make us better or worse.

Then the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) talked about changes, and indicated that one change Canada had to make was to bind herself hand and foot so that she would be utterly unable to do anything by herself, so that she would have to get the permission of Timbuktu in order to determine, for instance, what credit she would advance in northern Saskatchewan. If I have been unfair to the hon. member for Essex East I will appreciate his coming into the house tomorrow and asking me questions, and I promise him that when he asks me questions I will answer them. I will not do what he did when I asked him questions the other night. I will not say that I have no time to answer.

Both these hon. members spoke about free enterprise. They neglected utterly to tell us why it was that free enterprise failed us in 1929 and 1930. We had free enterprise then. Why did it fail us? What was the reason? There was a reason; why not seek it out, and prescribe the remedy? I am not condemning free enterprise; I am saying there was something wrong either with it or with the environment in which free enterprise operated.

May I leave the Liberal side of the house now, and reflect for a moment or two on the proposals of my neighbours who sit next to me in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I believe I have not yet a correct interpretation of their stand. I once thought it meant government ownership, but after listening to-night to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I do not know just what they stand for.

I will just say this, that if the government took over industries from private enterprise, it would be faced with the all-important problem of selling its goods. It would be no easier for a government-owned shoe factory to sell its goods, than for a privately-owned factory. Let us bear that in mind.

The first great problem is to sell the goods. If we can establish in this Dominion of Canada a set-up under which private industry can sell its goods, private industry will carry on very successfully, provided we put a few regulations around it, so that it may not exploit us. If the government owned all the industries and the government were unable to sell its goods, will someone tell me how the government could employ men to work in those industries?

Mr. MacNICOL: They could not employ them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly, and you would think that any one with common sense could see that. Our problem is the problem of discovering where to sell the goods.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put.

Tuesday, March 2, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

POST-WAR ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

PRESS REPORT AS TO PRELIMINARY CONFERENCE OF UNITED NATIONS AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): An Associated Press dispatch from Washington, under date-line of March 1, states that Acting Secretary of States Sumner Welles said that all the united nations will be asked soon to send representatives to a preliminary conference on post-war economic problems. Will the Prime Minister be good enough to indicate to the house under what auspices the preliminary conference will be called, and whether or not any approach has been made to the Canadian government in connection therewith?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have been aware that the matter was one which has been under consideration at Washington, but thus far no formal communication has been made to the Canadian government concerning the matter. All I know of it thus far is what has appeared in the statement to which my hon. friend has referred and a somewhat similar statement made before the convocation at the University of Toronto on Friday last by Mr. Sumner Welles.

Mr. GRAYDON: Apparently it is to be called, if called at all, by the United States government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would assume so, but I cannot say definitely. I would not like to have it inferred that this has been settled. I assume that there will be exchanges of views between certain of the powers in the first instance to decide the particular auspices under which the conference will be called.

Mr. GRAYDON: Evidently the initiative was taken by the United States government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It looks that way at the moment.

CONNAUGHT RANGES

PROSPECTIVE ALTERATIONS—QUESTION AS TO SANITARY CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the Ottawa Journal of February 24 there was an article headed, "Arrange Dates for Connaught Ranges." It goes on to say:

Plans are already under way for extensive alterations to the big camp....

Will these alterations include the elimination of the unsanitary conditions which existed in the Connaught camp last year and which caused most men attending the camp to have dysentery?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend knows that the matter of the unsanitary conditions was dealt with last year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Only partly.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, I am so advised. I had a report on it at the time, and action was immediately taken. If there is any necessity for further improvement in that respect, it will be made.

WHEAT

REPORTED CHANGE OF 1943 MARKETING POLICY BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I directed one yesterday to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who was somewhat evasive—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY:—but the Minister of Trade and Commerce is very magnanimous and is always anxious to give information with respect to any important matters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: The question is based on a report in the Regina Leader-Post, which carries the head-line, "Wheat Selling Quotas Ended."

The report is from Washington, of February 24, and reads as follows:

Agriculture Secretary Claude Wickard suspended marketing quotas on wheat in the United States Tuesday in a move he said is designed to ensure adequate wartime supplies of the cereal for human food and livestock feed.

The report continues:

Wheat from 1942 crops sold, used for feed from excess acreages was subject to a penalty tax of 54 cents a bushel....

The action on marketing quotas releases for sale or use without penalty excess wheat from the 1942 crop which farmers may now be holding in storage.

Was this matter discussed at the recent Washington conference of Canadian and United States agriculture officials, and did the minister know that this change in policy on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States was coming? Also did he know of this change when he decided on the 1943 marketing policy? If he is not prepared to make a statement now, will he make one to-morrow? We should like to know the facts before the discussion takes place.

Mr. SPEAKER: Evidently this is a question that cannot be answered on the orders of the day.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like the minister to answer it to-morrow if he would. The question could not very well be put on the order paper.

STEEL AND MINE WORKERS

NOVA SCOTIA—INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS FROM PAY OF ENLISTED WORKERS—FOOD SHORTAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, there are two questions I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance. The first arises out of a telegram I have received from the secretary of local 1064, steel workers, Sydney, Nova Scotia, setting out that men employed by the steel company and owing 1941 income tax who have volunteered for service in the armed forces were informed on applying for their wages, totalling $67, that income tax laws compelled the company to keep all their wages, since they owed more than this amount on the 1941 tax. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether this is in accordance with government instructions to the employers?

The second question arises out of a telegram received from the president of district No. 26, United Mine Workers of America, setting out that a serious shortage of essential foodstuffs in the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia is now interfering and will in the future seriously interfere with production. Can the minister inform the house whether the wartime prices and trade board are considering this matter, and if so, what steps are being taken to improve the situation?

Mr. SPEAKER: The first question has some degree of urgency and might be asked on the orders of the day, but the second question was certainly not in that category. If the minister wishes to reply he may do so, but I submit that it is not a question that should be asked on the orders of the day.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his first question. While I have not had time to secure details of the cases to which he referred, I would say that under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act, when a taxpayer is indebted to the crown, a notice may be served on any person who is indebted to that taxpayer requiring him to withhold the whole or part of the debt owing to the taxpayer and pay it over to the Receiver General of Canada. If the taxpayer wishes to have the order withdrawn he can apply to the local inspector of income tax and make arrangements to pay either by instalments or some other basis satisfactory to both the taxpayer and the department. The income tax department is always willing and anxious to cooperate with taxpayers and to have outstanding taxes settled on some mutually satisfactory basis of payment.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): With regard to the inquiry of the hon. member about a food shortage in the mining districts of Cape Breton, apparently a few days ago there was a temporary shortage but the matter was taken in hand last Thursday by the wartime prices and trade board. The prices and supply representative of the board in Nova Scotia has been in touch with the president of the mine workers in that district and there has been a substantial movement into that district of the foods of which there was a shortage. That movement is still taking place.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" RESPECTING PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. On the editorial page of the Ottawa Journal of February 27, there was an editorial entitled "Ten vacant jobs for M.P.'s", concerning the possible appointment of parliamentary assistants, and which contained the two following paragraphs:

> What hopes this must stir in ambitious breasts; and what vistas it must open up of prestige and authority, and patronage influence, and nice offices with private secretaries and stenographers, and soft rugs under foot, and letters written on embossed stationery! Almost we can see Monsieur Jean-François Pouliot in one of these roles: liking it so much that he would consent even to be "parliamentary assistant" to Colonel Ralston.
> It is a happy prospect; even though, alas, there can be only ten, with ten times that number for whom there will be only the bitterness of disappointment. If only there were more ministers!

I deeply resent the Journal's insinuation that I would run after such a job. At the start of the war the lamented Mr. Norman Rogers offered me a more glamorous position which I could not accept—not that I would shirk a duty but simply because I have not the means to be a dollar-a-year man. I shall not keep the house any longer by giving proof of what I am saying, but I am ready to show it to anyone who comes to my office to see it. After all, why should the pleasures of soft rugs under foot and embossed stationery be only for the Journal tycoons?

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $130,406.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not sure that this is the occasion on which to bring up the item that I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. I would have asked the question before the orders of the day were called, while Mr. Speaker was in the chair, but I felt that some objection might be raised on the ground that the question was not of sufficient urgency. I think it comes under the head of agriculture, for this reason, that since the Debt Adjustment Act in Alberta has been declared beyond the powers of the legislature, the position of farmer debtors in the western provinces is worse than it has been at any other time during the last eight or ten years. For the last few days in Saskatoon a conference on debt adjustment has been in session with a view to arriving at some plan by which bona fide farmers in the western provinces who are unable to pay their debts may receive a measure of protection.

Under the present quota system the western farmers are unable to sell sufficient wheat or to market sufficient of their products to enable them to meet their expenses and at the same time pay their creditors. The result is that on every hand there has been an acceleration of foreclosures and cancellation proceedings. The matter should receive immediate attention, and I bring it up now to ascertain whether or not the government will at once introduce some measure of temporary protection for bona fide farmers who are desirous of paying their debts but are unable to do so by reason of the present legislation which prevents them from marketing their wheat. Something should be done by the Department of Justice to assure them of protection until such time as the quotas are increased or as legislation may be passed by this parliament.

It is not a question of the farmers wishing to evade their responsibilities. It is, however, a matter of great concern to them that at a time when they are being asked by the Department of Agriculture to expand production, foreclosures are being proceeded with. The matter particularly concerns the Minister of Agriculture, because of his desire to secure increased production in the western provinces. At the present rate of foreclosures and cancellations unless something is done to protect bona fide farmers against actions which are the consequence of the fact that protection is no longer available, many farmers will be driven off the land before spring. I am asking the government, and particularly the Minister of Justice, whether the government will not do something at this time to put an end to what I think is a most unfair course, to stop foreclosures and cancellations against farmer debtors who are unable to pay because under the present agricultural policy they are able to market only up to a certain quota.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): While I acknowledge the importance of the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, it is not in any way associated with the votes of the Department of Agriculture. It is a matter which is dealt with in the Department of Finance, and, so far as it means legislation, will be dealt with by the Department of Justice. I therefore suggest that while the question is an important one, it is one that should be discussed at that time rather than on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a dilatory plea on the part of the minister. If the situation is such as the hon. member for Lake Centre has indicated, then it is deplorable that the ministry is not facing up to it.

Mr. GARDINER: I rise to a point of order. Are we going to allow discussion under an item in the agriculture estimates on a matter which really comes properly under either the Department of Justice or the Department of Finance? I am not suggesting that the government is not prepared to face the issue—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It has already done so.

Mr. GARDINER: —or has not already, at least in part, done so. I am simply suggesting that this is not the proper time to discuss it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The rules of this house should be construed liberally. If a matter of urgent public importance cannot be brought up otherwise, then the only time that an hon. member can discuss a grievance is on motion to go into supply. I suggest that we can discuss any grievance on a motion to go into supply. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): But my hon. friend did not do it when the Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I suggest that the speaker put the motion rather too quickly before we got into supply. If the ministry is going to take advantage of a technicality, it will have to be held to the rules hereafter. No one wants to stage a full-dress debate at this time, but the matter is of sufficient urgency, in substance and in point of time, that we could well spend a few minutes this afternoon in asking the government for some statement of policy, and I am prepared to discuss it.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the point of order, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was anxious to raise this very matter on going into supply today, but I thought it was understood by the gentlemen who met the Prime Minister last night that items would be called to-day without discussion and that the government would facilitate discussion of these matters within the next week by granting opportunity to air any grievance. If we had known that this discussion was to be precipitated we certainly would have raised the whole question under the proper procedure on going into supply. I am anxious to see the matter discussed. It is of supreme importance to many on the prairies. If we are to have discussion we are prepared to participate in it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to confirm what my friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has just said. I did meet yesterday afternoon with the different leaders to talk over matters with a view to facilitating the business of this week and the weeks following. It was understood that to-day the government would ask to have two items called simply for the sake of getting two departments before the committee of the whole so that any matters related to them might be taken up later in the latter part of any week if so desired. That was the sole purpose of calling an item to-day. This intention I think was mentioned at the conclusion of yesterday's sitting. It is also correct that when I came into the house this afternoon, I was told that the hon. member for Weyburn had intended to bring up a question on the orders of the day, which I understand is the question that has since come up; but having been informed by his leader that the purpose with respect to the house being moved into supply to-day was simply one of procedure and that it was desired to get on with the reconstruction committee debate so that if possible it would be concluded to-day, the hon. member postponed raising the question, on the understanding that opportunity would be afforded by a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply which would be made within the coming week. That is the position as I think my hon. friend who has just spoken also understands it.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems to me that we are dealing with technicalities in regard to this matter perhaps more than we should. Obviously the motion to go into supply was the point at which the hon. member for Lake Centre might properly have raised his objection to the farm adjustment act; but now that the point has been raised, since the Speaker left the Chair so very quickly, and since the hon. member was on his feet for some considerable time before even I noticed him, it seems to me that we might readily abandon any small technicalities that may exist and permit a discussion at this point. It was not my understanding that any objection would be taken to a point of this kind being raised at any time on going into supply, though perhaps I may have been confused in that respect. I did not anticipate that there would be a discussion on the first item of the estimates to be called; I naturally expected that the government would ask to have the item stand, but certainly it was not clear to me that there would be any objection to the hon. member for Lake Centre raising this question at any time on the motion to go into supply. Perhaps in that regard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the Prime Minister and myself did not reach a common understanding. I should like it to be distinctly understood, however, that since the point has now been raised, and there could have been no objection on the part of the government to its being raised on going into supply, I do not think the rules should be used to prevent further discussion of the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are two objections to proceeding further at the moment. The first is that this is an item under agriculture, and to discuss to-day some subject which does not relate to the item before the committee would establish a precedent which would be cited continuously during the session with respect to other items.

Mr. GRAYDON: My understanding always has been that on the item covering departmental administration one could run the whole gamut of agriculture. That has been done year after year, to my knowledge; it has been the generally understood arrangement in the house. So that when the hon. member for Lake Centre raises this question, which is perhaps of greater concern to agriculture than almost any other single matter that he could have brought up, I do not think the objection of the Prime Minister should be sustained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to debate the point indefinitely, but let me answer in this way. I do not think that even my hon. friend the leader of the opposition understood there would be any discussion on any item under which all the affairs of the department could be discussed. I think my hon. friend understood that the item was simply being called—

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought I made that clear, but I did not want a technicality to interfere with the discussion of the matter when the hon. member for Lake Centre could have brought it up quite properly on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I brought up the matter because it is of importance to every farmer in western Canada. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said it was also the intention of the hon. member for Weyburn to bring up the matter but I had no knowledge of that. Anyone representing a western constituency knows that with conditions as they are there should be a declaration of policy by the government now in order to give some hope to the western farmer. I was in no way bound by any arrangement that had been made, because I had no knowledge of it. In view of the rulings of the Speaker on questions asked before the orders of to-day are called I decided that there was no other way I could bring up this matter, which is of importance to many thousands of farmers in western Canada. I would ask now that a statement be made by the government as to what will be done to meet the debt situation, or, alternatively, that the matter be not now further discussed but that when another department goes into supply, as I anticipate there will be another department going in to-day, I have the opportunity to raise the question before Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house is in committee of supply now, and the next item will be called without the chairman making any report to the Speaker in the interval. This is a purely formal procedure to enable the business of the house to be properly carried on.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the government wants to facilitate the business of the house but does not want a full discussion of this question now, would it not ease the situation if the government would now undertake to have the responsible minister make a statement within the next few days on the whole question of farm debt, or indicate to the whips of the different parties when next a motion to go into supply will be made so that a general arrangement may be made between the parties in order that a full debate may be permitted, and especially in order that a statement may be made by the government with reference to this question of farm debt, particularly as it affects western Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that this is a pressing matter. It is not a question that calls for a great deal of debate; it is something that requires a statement by the government, and the people of the west want such a statement quickly. If the government would give that undertaking there would be no need of any lengthy debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might give an undertaking that on Monday next there will be an opportunity to discuss this matter, either before or after the leader of the opposition makes his address in the budget debate. The government will undertake, if so desired, to move to go into committee of supply. I may add with regard to this matter, which the government has recognized as being important, that the Minister of Justice has not wished to take up the time of the Minister of Finance which would be necessary in discussing the matter until after the Minister of Finance had made the statement which he intends to make to-night. That is one reason why neither the Minister of Justice nor the Minister of Finance desired to make a statement to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if he would reconsider the date when that opportunity will be afforded. The hon. member for Danforth, who will be offering our criticism with respect to the budget, will be speaking on Monday, and we hope that the budget debate will proceed from then on without interruption. I would rather hope that the Prime Minister might arrange to have this statement made on Friday next, before we get into the budget debate, because this discussion may go on for some time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not said anything during this discussion because I had hoped that we would not have this matter brought up on the first item. I believe a discussion of this matter, once we start it, will go on for some time, because it is one of the most difficult questions with which the government is called upon to deal. A conference was held at Saskatoon on February 26, and as a result a delegation has been appointed to come to Ottawa and make certain representations.

Further, the Department of Justice received only on February 25 or 26 the text of the opinion of the judicial committee of the privy council, and since then there has not been an opportunity to decide upon any legislation, nor will there be an opportunity to do so at least until after we have heard the representations of the delegation that is coming here from western Canada. Whether or not we should precipitate a debate on this matter next Monday is a matter to be considered, having in mind that I believe the debate will be lengthy. I do not know whether or not it should be done.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: For the information of hon. members I may add that the copy of that opinion which was mailed to us from London has not arrived here as yet. The copy we have was obtained from the office of the attorney general of Alberta. I received it, I think, on February 25 or 26, and immediately brought it to the attention of the Minister of Finance. There has been no opportunity since that time, in view of the statement the Minister of Finance is to make to-night, to go into the matter. I do not know what explains the fact that the copy of the reasons, mailed to us presumably just as quickly as the other copy was mailed to the attorney general of Alberta, has not arrived. The attorney general in that province got his, and was kind enough to send me at once by air mail a transcript of the copy he had received.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me we are now discussing two questions. The first is whether or not we shall have an open discussion, and the second seems to have something to do with what the government's action will be. The understanding I had from our meeting last night was in accordance with that expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I understood that the items were to be brought in merely to facilitate the business of the house, so that we might be in a position to discuss the items on Friday, or on other days we might choose. It was my understanding that at this time there was to be a minimum of discussion, and I had the impression that all three contracting parties agreed. If one party opens a discussion when the others are not prepared, it does not seem quite fair.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know my hon. friend would not attribute to me any unfairness with respect to the arrangement made yesterday. After all, this whole matter has arisen perhaps through a misunderstanding, and because Mr. Speaker left the Chair so quickly. I wish to point out only this, in closing the matter, that I am not a bit impressed by the explanations either of the Minister of Justice or of the Minister of Finance with respect to the reasons for judgment. We know what the privy council did in this matter. But surely under the War Measures Act, the government if it so desired could take action to prevent wholesale foreclosures and cancellations in western Canada, pending some decision being made.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The information we have is that no wholesale foreclosures are taking place in the western provinces at the present time. That is the information I have received from reliable sources in those provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, the explanation given by the minister, that the ministry has not had an opportunity of examining the text of the judgment of the privy council, is not satisfactory. In July of 1942 the Supreme Court of Canada declared the debt adjustment legislation in Alberta beyond the powers of the legislature. At that time I raised the question in the house and asked the Minister of Justice whether consideration had been given to bringing in some temporary relief under the War Measures Act, the minister said consideration was being given the matter. Ever since that time foreclosures have been continuing at a rate not equalled in the past ten years. They are continuing, and the condition is causing unrest. The answer by the minister, that the government intends to wait until next week or the week after, or that it did not receive the text of the privy council's decision, will not satisfy those who find themselves to-day in grave danger of litigation, and unable to pay their debts because of quotas fixed by government policy.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

The house resumed from Monday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) for the appointment of a select committee to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, last night a few minutes before the house adjourned I began to discuss to some extent the speeches which had been delivered by hon. members in various parties. For a short time, if I may, I should like to continue along that line.

All hon. members of the Liberal and Progressive Conservative groups who spoke agreed that we should have free enterprise in the post-war period. My group would also agree, although I am not sure that we would accept without qualification the word "free". But we surely do believe in individual enterprise. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) pointed out that we had two million people to put to work in the post-war period, and four billion dollars to find and to distribute throughout Canada in order to maintain the standard of national income of eight billion dollars which we enjoy at the present time.

The questions naturally arise, how are we to find work for two million people, and how are we to find the four billion dollars to spend. No word was uttered by anyone, either Liberal or Progressive Conservative, as to how those two questions might be answered. I am sorry the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation speakers also ignored the point.

Mr. COLDWELL: We will deal with it at the proper time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should have been glad to have them tell me how they would find the money.

Mr. COLDWELL: We will do it at the proper time and in the proper place.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And we will be listening at the proper time. My question is, how? It seems to me if the house could agree upon defining the issues and finding where the clash arises among the schools of opinion in the house, and if we could agree to discuss that clash of opinions, we should really get a great deal farther.

I believe all of us agree—all members throughout the house—that we ought to use Canada's natural resources to the limit. Where is the Liberal, the Progressive Conservative, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member, the social crediter, the united reformer, or any other member in the house who does not say we ought to use the resources of Canada? Why not grant that? Why discuss it at all? Surely we want the facts. Where is the Progressive Conservative who does not believe we should have reforestation in Canada? There is not one in the house. Why discuss it, then? Where is the individual who would not agree that we should have irrigation in Canada from coast to coast, wherever irrigation schemes are feasible? Anyone would agree to that. Then why spend time discussing it? Where is the person who would not agree that we should have electrification on our farms from coast to coast? No one would dissent from that view. Where is the individual who would oppose the carrying out of health schemes throughout Canada? No one would question the idea of free hospitalization and state medicine and every other kind of assistance to the people that would raise their standard of health. Not a soul would question that. There would be some who would ask, as soon as the question was raised, "Where is the money coming from?" But granted that the money is available, no one would doubt that we should have all desirable health measures. Then why argue about them?

I think everyone agrees that housing schemes are desirable. There is not a member in this house, granted that the money is available from a suitable source, who would not advocate that everyone in Canada should live in a comfortable home. No one would question that every one of our aged people should have a more munificent allowance than $20 per month. No member in the Liberal ranks, and I am sure no one in the Progressive Conservative or in any other rank, does not feel aggrieved that our aged people are condemned to the meagre allowance they now have. No one would not gladly give the old age pension at sixty-five years of age provided he knew where the money was coming from. Why spend our time discussing such matters?

I believe that there should be federal aid for education. Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) set forth the inequities in our educational system in Canada, and I believe we all heartily agree with what he said. The question that immediately comes to the mind of many is, "Where is the money to come from?" Then why not spend our time discussing the question which represents a clash of opinion—where is the money coming from?

Suppose I spend a little time on that question. In addition to the question where the money is coming from is the question where markets are to be found. At the present time we are short 2,000,000 of our best effectives in Canada, and yet we are able to produce all the goods with which to supply the remainder of the Canadian people with a reasonably good standard of living in war time. We are also able to maintain these 2,000,000 at a good standard of living. At the same time we are devoting a great deal of our energies to the manufacture of munitions to be wasted. We are to be faced with the real difficulty of setting these 2,000,000 to work when they come to produce consumer goods, and of disposing of the goods which they will enable us to produce. I should think that that problem will be a real problem for anyone, no matter what his economic ideas may be.

So far as the Liberals are concerned, with the ideas that they express, it will be a hopeless problem. With the ideas that the Progressive Conservatives have expressed, I say again it will be a hopeless problem. What success the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation could achieve is an open question. It seems to me that they have always been rather shifty about what they think. There is a distinct difference between their statements and ours. We set forth in clear and unmistakable terms, which our friends may or may not understand, exactly what we propose.

Suppose Canada were going to use socialization as a means of solving the two problems, first, that of markets and, second, that of putting people to work. Let us suppose that socialization means government ownership. Take for example a shoe factory. A shoe factory is limited in its output by the number of shoes it can sell. At the present time there is probably a scarcity of labour, but, generally speaking, the only limit to the output would be the number of shoes that could be sold. The Canadian National Railways, which is government owned, has just as much difficulty selling tickets as the Canadian Pacific railway, which is privately owned. The mere fact that a government owns a factory, or that the people own a factory, or that a municipality owns a factory, will not enable that factory to sell its goods.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the people were getting enough in prices they could buy the shoes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will grant that the whole question is, how are they to get enough wages and prices? Will the mere fact that the government owns an institution grant the people that additional wage?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the fact that the Canadian government own the Canadian National Railways give the Canadian National workmen more in wages than the Canadian Pacific workmen receive?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is only one item of government ownership in the whole field.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This question must be asked and this question must be answered before we can judge the efficiency of the Cooperative Commonwealth proposals to solve the problem before us.

Mr. COLDWELL: You were going to tell us how you were going to solve them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One must first clear away the rubbish from his building site before he starts to build his new house. As I have said, the two problems are, first, the selling of goods and, next, the providing of work. The next question is that of getting enough money to spend in the country in order to keep the people's standard of living high, according to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). I hinted last night that the Liberal speakers have suggested proposals which are rather different from what they are doing at the present time and also different from what the Cooperative Commonwealth proposes to do. They are certainly as far away from the social credit proposals as the north pole is from the south.

I gathered from the words of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that they favour internationalism. I spent a little time last night on the question of internationalism. Hon. members will remember that I referred to the fact that the United States had 23,500,000 people on relief in 1935; that Canada had about a million and a half on relief; Great Britain as well as every other one of the united nations had a corresponding number. Will anyone tell me how the problem could have been solved by tying the whole lot of them together; how internationalism can solve the problem of unemployment? I think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the hon. member for Essex East would have made a greater contribution to the debate had they devoted at least a small part of their time to an elucidation of the answer to that question. The hon. member for Essex East spoke of a supranational government as a possibility.

Mr. MARTIN: When was that said?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall read the quotation shortly. Before I deal with the efficacy of internationalism as a solution, I should like to raise this question. The building up of an international government, especially a supranational government, will destroy the British empire and destroy the British commonwealth. How in the world could Canada listen to the advice and follow the direction of a supranational government, consisting probably of a group of financiers with headquarters at Basle, and at the same time devote the necessary attention to co-operating with the other members of the British commonwealth in order to achieve the aims and objectives which the British people may deem it desirable to achieve? Once a supranational government is established the British commonwealth of nations will be destroyed. Let us face that issue squarely.

I shall now deal with some of the remarks of the two gentlemen to whom I have referred. First I shall give some attention to the hon. member for Essex East and quote from his remarks as reported on page 741 of Hansard. He said:

> What I meant last night when I said that we had to look at this problem from the broad perspective was that these effects will be of no avail unless the whole thing is done on a collective basis with the participation of all nations.

May I just interrupt to say that that is sheer nonsense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, it is nonsense. Our forefathers went into the wilds of this country and made things go and had a finer standard of living for the whole people, considering food, clothing, shelter and comfort, before ever we got into this age of plenty. They did not have the dangers of unemployment and insecurity which we have to-day. Where was the internationalism then to help them out? I proceed:

> Our country which looks to the markets of the world for the source of its income is in a special position in that respect. Consequently the kind of planning that I would envisage would be one where the key commodities available to all nations would be distributed through properly controlled non-privileged international pools, where production and distribution would be controlled by international cartels, again not based upon legal or special privilege. The trend of the future must certainly be toward more extensive international control over raw materials, foreign exchange, markets and credit by some, let us call it a supranational agency—

Mr. MARTIN: Oh yes, but not a government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, it is control. What can you call it but a government? What is a government but that which controls?

Mr. SLAGHT: Whose remark is that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The language is that of the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Parry Sound will find it at page 741; and I conceive that, being constituted as he is, it will give a sort of shock to him. I continue:

> —along the lines designated this morning by Mr. Sumner Welles and yesterday in the United Kingdom by Mr. Morrison.
> This in turn will call for the creation of some mechanism by which this can be brought about, and I would hope to think that the committee will formulate a plan and subscribe to the idea of the creation of an international bank—

Heaven help us!

> —the control of production and distribution of the major foodstuffs and materials, a rationalized system of immigration and migration, the control of employment and the promotion of health and social welfare measures.

Notice this particularly luscious bit:

> All these things can be done only by collective effort.

In other words, in Canada, granted that we have the doctors and the medicine and the hospitals and the means of operating, we are unable to cure a case of appendicitis without getting the consent of Iceland. One of the most absurd propositions a man ever conceived of. I proceed:

> That is where I want to leave the emphasis.

Nothing can be done except by international control with respect to the matters mentioned, and apparently the international control is to be the means whereby these good objects are to be achieved. I continue:

> That is the impression I wish to leave, if I leave no other.

Mr. KUHL: That is the impression the hon. member did leave.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, this is simply drivel. If this were talked by anyone but a Liberal and anyone but a member of parliament, a person hearing him would be justified in having him arrested for high treason.

Mr. MARTIN: Why not do that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I will leave someone else to fight with that particular dragon. But the men who are talking this kind of thing glibly in this country and in the United States and elsewhere are talking nothing short of high treason to the British empire, the British commonwealth of nations and the Dominion of Canada. They are talking about the destruction of the sovereign power of this government—which is undoubtedly treason or sedition.

May I turn now to the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton)? I may return after a while to the hon. member for Essex East. At page 813 of Hansard I find these statements by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George:

It is easy enough to look ahead and see what labour wants. Labour does not want handouts; labour wants an opportunity to work. Agriculture wants an opportunity of selling its products at fair prices. Industry wants a chance to make a fair profit. It is that kind of thing we should have in our minds to-day.

With every one of these sentiments every hon. member will agree. It is the method of achieving the objectives concerning which we shall disagree; and apparently the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George thinks we shall be able to solve all these problems if he ties enough other nations tight up to us so we cannot move. I turn to another page. He read from the Bank of Canada report a statement with which I think no one would disagree. I read from his quotation:

"If we are to maintain full employment in peace time, we must substitute other objectives for the current will to win the war. Broadly speaking our goals should be to provide a rising standard of living and to contribute to the establishment of a world economy which will remove the threat of war."

I think we all agree. Once more, it is the method of attaining that objective which we are interested in. May I read now a third excerpt? He was referring, apparently with a great deal of sympathy, to what Australia did. He says:

. . . they have already faced one part of the problem by calling together a constitutional convention in which the federal government sought for a term substantial powers from the states in order to carry out the purposes of the national government after the war. It was interesting to note that in putting this forward the attorney general of the commonwealth of Australia said that Australia was committed to a course of action under the Atlantic charter which she could not fulfil under the existing constitution. I think that should lead us to consider in Canada if it is possible for us to fulfil our obligations under the Atlantic charter and to the Canadian people under our existing constitution.

May I break in to raise this question: What can that statement possibly mean other than that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is envisaging a change of the British North America Act which will take away the powers which were conferred upon the provinces by that act? I read on:

The Atlantic charter to-day constitutes a treaty for Canada. It was signed on August 14, 1941, by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, and paragraphs 4 and 5 read—

I will omit the reading of these two paragraphs. Apparently this gentleman is in favour of using the Atlantic charter as a lever to force the Canadian people to swallow the idea of destroying the British North America Act.

May I say right here that there are two constitutions in the world which are proof against the contrivings of a group of gangsters who are trying to bring this thing about—this "united nations," this destruction of the British empire, this general enslavement of mankind. There are two constitutions which are proof against their machinations. One of them is the British North America Act, and the other is the constitution of Australia. And the gangsters have been at work industriously for several years, trying by one means and another, by fair means and foul, by all sorts of specious reasoning and persuasion and high power propaganda, to get the peoples of Canada and Australia to give up their constitutions. Apparently the hon. member has become imbued, let us say unconsciously, with the sentiments of the gentlemen who are seeking to destroy the constitutions of this dominion and of Australia—two of the greatest democratic constitutions on earth.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it not true that there is no government in Canada that has passed more legislation destructive of the British North America Act than the government of Alberta which my hon. friend supports?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder whether the hon. member would answer a question for me. Does he consider that the British North America Act gives the provinces control over property and civil rights?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then will he tell me how any government can control property and civil rights unless it can also control the credit of the country?

Mr. EDWARDS: In other words, the hon. member and the party which he supports want to be the interpreter of the British North America Act instead of leaving it to the constituted authority which was set up to interpret the act. The party which the hon. member supports, I submit, has been outstanding in its violation of the British North America Act.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All that the social credit government of Alberta has done has been to assert the autonomy of the province of Alberta in order to put itself in a position where it can live under the British North America Act.

Mr. EDWARDS: True, but has it not attempted to destroy the very act we are trying to uphold?

Mr. BLACKMORE: How is it possible for a province to control property and civil rights when a bank can lend money one year and refuse to lend it the next, thereby destroying entirely the economic stability of the province? The thing is impossible. I shall be glad to debate this matter at any length with the hon. member when we get into committee. I am not afraid of him, with all his intelligence and legal skill.

Mr. EDWARDS: I thank the hon. member for the compliment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think I have dealt fully enough with the hon. member's questions, and I have submitted to his speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: You have not convinced him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is impossible to convince a man against his will. May I read further from the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He said at page 815 of Hansard:

> . . . and in the second place, have we contributed as much as we can to setting up the internal machinery to bring that about between nations? My suggestion is that though Canada has done much we can still do a great deal more.

I take that as another veiled reference to the destruction of provincial power within this country. No government that has ever sat in Ottawa has done so much to weaken and destroy provincial power as the government now sitting in Ottawa. The Sirois report was designed purely for that purpose —purely. What I want to know is this: If the British North America Act were destroyed, how could that possibly help us to find four billion dollars to spend in this country? How could it possibly help us to put two million people to work in this country? It could not possibly help us. So that all the efforts of those who are trying to attain these two objectives, the destruction of the British North America Act to centralize power in Ottawa, and the destruction of the British empire by putting controlling power into the hands of some international government, will in no way help to solve the problems we have before us. They are utterly beside the point.

I should have liked to discuss the tourist trade. I commend the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for advocating an increased tourist trade. There are difficulties in the way, but I have not time to deal with them now because I have had to spend so much time in answering the questions of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards). If it were possible to solve our problems by those two devices which the Liberals are advocating, it would be quite a different matter; but it is impossible to solve them by those means, and to attempt to do so would only mean that we should lose our birthright without even getting a mess of pottage in return. The Liberals will wake up ten years from now to see what a monstrous thing they have done when somebody else is suffering the consequences.

An. hon. MEMBER: What about the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would be as bad as the Liberals or worse. They supported the Sirois report. That was clear evidence that they did not know what it was all about.

I turn now to the question whether the problem can be solved without resorting to these two most undesirable means of centralization. The London chamber of commerce, to which the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) referred the other night, has issued a statement called "Report of the London Chamber of Commerce on General Principles of a Post-War Economy." It refers in this report to a booklet called "A Twentieth Century Economic System." I have not time to go into that booklet or into the report itself, but I commend these two publications to all hon. members. In these two booklets, the London chamber of commerce, which is one of the greatest organizations in the world, one of the most hard-headed and fact-facing bodies, states that it is not necessary to destroy national sovereignty in any sense of the term in order to solve the problems which confront us. May I just quote a statement from the London chamber of commerce Journal, printed in the Ottawa Citizen of January 11, 1943, page 18. It is not contained in either of the two booklets I mentioned, but it bears upon the question whether or not in order to cure unemployment and poverty a nation must lose its sovereignty. The article says:

> There is, moreover, an effective solution in exactly the opposite direction.

They had been discussing proposals such as the hon. members were trying to indoctrinate us with. The statement goes on:

It is the creation by each nation of the means for its people to consume the goods they produce or the goods they can obtain in exchange from other nations.

Here is another quotation from the same London chamber of commerce Journal:

Currency and credit are the master keys to the economic and social life of any community, and for a nation to be asked to hand those keys to a clique of international bankers is calculated to strike terror into the hearts of millions who are facing death to preserve their right to manage their own affairs.

May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that in his speech the hon. member for Essex East actually advocated that the control of Canada's credit should be put into the hands of international bankers.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot give the hon. member understanding.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has not proved very conclusively to the house that he has understanding himself.

Mr. MARTIN: That is agreed.

Mr. KNOWLES: You were going to tell us how you would do it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: By the issue of currency and credit—through increased purchasing power.

Mr. KNOWLES: What do you mean by that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my hon. friend takes a course of study in it he will understand it.

In closing I wish to point out that leaders are making grave errors in all of Anglo-Saxondom. Men in the United States, in Britain, Canada and elsewhere are subscribing day by day to the defeatist gospel which the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George were conveying to this house. It is not necessary to destroy the democracy which exists in Canada by depriving the provinces of their autonomy. It is not necessary to deprive any of the nations of the British commonwealth, or the United States, of their sovereignty. The all-important question is to manage the economy of Canada, for example, in such a way that the Canadian people will be given the purchasing power which will enable them to consume the goods which they can produce. That purchasing power can be provided by a wise and intelligent management of Canada's credit.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): First I wish to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) on the speech he made on Friday last. In that speech he showed that he thoroughly understood the position of men in the air force who return to Canada or are discharged. He also included the other two branches of the armed services, but he emphasized for the most part the rehabilitation of men of the air force. The other two branches of the armed forces of course have to be included; they are all in this.

This motion is to set up a reconstruction and reestablishment committee. The committee should do everything in its power to find out just how the men who are being discharged from our armed forces, or who have been discharged in the past, can be rehabilitated. Some of these men have been discharged because they were wounded, some because, through no fault of their own, they have become physically unfit to continue. When they are discharged they may not be able to get a job in industry because their discharge paper says they are physically unfit for further active service. In many cases they cannot do a full day's work; they can do only a few hours' work a day. Employers in Canada do not want—at least some employers—to take on men who can work only a few hours a day. I do not know whether it is entirely the fault of the employers, or whether the blame should be put on the selective service. In Britain thousands of men are working only an hour a day, or two or three hours; and women also. Selective service in Canada should see to it that these men and women are employed for a few hours a day, if that is all they are able to do.

Of course there is a chance that some of these men may not fit into some jobs. If that is so, schools to teach and train them should be set up so that they will have a job not only at the present time but in the years to come after the war. I know that many of these men have received pensions. Speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I mentioned the case of a man who had a pension of forty dollars a month, but who was unsatisfied with life because he could not get anything to do. These men simply have to have something to do to occupy their minds and help them reestablish themselves in civil life. Therefore I wish to point out to the members of the committee and to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) that the first duty of the committee is the reestablishment and rehabilitation of these men by fitting them to do something to occupy themselves.

These men have given all they can for us; surely we can do something for them. We should be willing to give all we have to them; and God help Canada if we cannot look after those men now, because if we cannot, what will happen when the war is over and thousands upon thousands of them return to Canada? I have here a letter, dated February 19, which I should like to read:

Dear Gordon,

No doubt you get many sob stories through your daily mail, and here is another one. I feel that it is probably useless in writing on the matter, but I have been approached to do so, and you will pardon any intrusion.

A young lady in town whom you probably know was married in England nearly three years ago to a chap in the Canadian army. This boy served overseas for three years as quartermaster sergeant and his unit took part in the Dieppe incident. Prior to this the boys were given a rigid physical examination and he was found to be in a diabetic condition and sent home to Montreal.

He is getting a pension of $60 a month, but is most despondent, which, of course, is part of the disease, as he is unable to secure employment owing to the fact that he is unable to work full time. He has had good care in Montreal, but a full time job is definitely out.

I will say for the Minister of Pensions and National Health that he has been very generous in giving pensions to these boys. But that is not enough. Of course they have to have money, but money will not bring happiness to them; they simply have to have something to do if they are to be reestablished in active life. Many of these boys, and women also, are only in the 'teen ages. They all have to be looked after, because they have many years ahead. They should be trained in different professions and callings. We are short of doctors, nurses, scientists. I do not see why they cannot be trained in those callings.

No doubt hon. members have noticed in the press in the last few months that county councils throughout the country and other municipal councils have been discussing reconstruction and reestablishment after the war. I have here a letter from the warden of Peterborough county which I should like to read:

At the January session of Peterborough county council a rehabilitation committee was set up with these thoughts in mind:

Better roads and bridges.
Development of roads to water for tourists.
More rural hydro.
Reforestation.
Rural housing on farms for hired help.
Better rural schools.

This is intended to create work for our returned men. What has dominion government in mind?

Will money be available for this work?
From whom can I get information?

Yours sincerely,
Peter J. Mather,
Warden, Peterborough county.

He mentions roads and bridges, also roads leading to lakes; I take it he means roads that will be used by tourists coming to Canada after the war. Every hon. member will agree that after this war is over we shall simply have to start at scratch to rebuild our tourist trade, because nearly all the advertising that was done before the war is completely lost. To get these tourists to Canada we must have good roads, good accommodations, good fishing, and attractions to offer. The tourist business is very important to Canada and to the people in every section of Canada, because in many cases it means their livelihood. And this of course will help the men who return after the war. It will mean work for our people, a greater national income, and foreign exchange which we certainly need.

Last night the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) said that when this war is over the tourist business will boom. I do not agree with the hon. member. The tourist business will not boom unless we go after it. I do not think more than a very little of the tourist business we had before the war will come back to us. We shall have to go out after new prospects. Our advertising will have to cover the whole of the United States, central America and South America, and I know that when I say this, Mr. Leo Dolan, who is director of the Dominion of Canada travel service, will agree. Central and South American countries are bidding for the tourist trade of the United States, and now that the connecting links are being finished on what is called the all-American highway running from Alaska to South America, over fifteen thousand miles in all, the tourists of the United States will travel on that highway, which has been so well advertised. We in Canada must do our own advertising, and we must make the Alcan highway attractive to United States tourists. In Colombia and I believe also in Mexico the governments have built inns and hotels at various points along the highway, half a day or a day's auto-run apart, and put them in charge of managers who are appointed on the understanding that if they do a good job, at the end of ten years the hotels will be turned over to them. The Alcan highway is some 1,650 miles long, I believe, and if we are to get any share of the tourist trade from the United States we must build inns and hotels on the Alcan highway and trans-Canada highway, on the same basis as they have been built in Colombia and Mexico.

The countries of central and South America, including Mexico, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Colombia, Peru, the Argentine, Chile and all the rest of them, are doing everything possible, spending many dollars, to advertise their tourist attractions. There is also a pan-American congress which meets every year to discuss the tourist business. They have much to offer, much with which to attract tourists. In Guatemala, for instance, the road is 12,500 feet in the clouds; in Chile, down below Santiago, the capital, there is an all-year highway through the lake district. They have wonderful routes and splendid scenery; in Mexico they have pyramids, ancient cities and all the rest of it, and we in this country must do something to offset those attractions. They get out booklets describing the twenty-one nations belonging to that union, with stamps showing different views in the various countries. I have been in all those countries, and I have an idea what they are going to do in an endeavour to take away our tourist trade. Therefore I urge as strongly as I can that this committee set up a tourist subcommittee to bid for the American tourist trade. We simply must have it; our country cannot live without it. I make that statement because I represent what I claim to be the best and most beautiful tourist district on the whole continent, the Kawartha lakes region, and I know what the tourist business means to our people. I know also what advertising means if you wish to get tourists, because I have been on tourist committees since 1920, and was a member of the first executive to be set up by the Ontario Tourist Association.

In my opinion the Alaska highway should be beautified, and so should our transcontinental highway. Both these routes also should be controlled, because we cannot allow them to become billboard highways, as many of our other highways have become. When you start allowing billboards to be erected along your highway, you find that they block out the very best views; therefore I sincerely hope something will be done to control billboard advertising along these roads.

In his letter the warden also mentioned the need for more rural hydro, meaning of course electric appliances in every farm home, with consequent better health. In electrifying our farms we would be helping the workers in the cities, because every electrified farm means an electric iron, an electric refrigerator, an electric washing machine, an electric milking machine and so on, all of which would mean employment to the factory worker. We must look at every angle of this question so that when our boys come home they will not have to ride the rods again as they did after the last war. We cannot allow that now. If it is possible for us to spend five and a half billion dollars—or for all I know it may be six billions when the minister speaks tonight—for the prosecution of the war, God help us if we cannot spend at least two and a half or three billion dollars in peace time. I know it will hurt our pockets, but if we have a happier country that will not matter.

In his letter the warden also mentioned the lack of farm housing for hired help, and I feel that he should have added better homes for the working men in our cities. I hope the committee will also consider the advisability of tearing down or moving many of the war-time houses when the war is over, because most of these houses are nothing but eyesores of the worst kind. The warden also mentions the need for better rural schools. Only yesterday I received a letter from a farmer in my riding who asked what he could do to get his two children to school, because the school, which was four and a half miles away from his farm, had been closed because there were not enough children in the district to keep it open. He felt that he might have to buy a farm near one of the other schools in order that his children might continue their education. In many rural districts you can find bright boys and girls whose education has been held back because of the fact that their fathers and mothers have not had the money to send them to high school and college. Therefore some provision should be made which would enable these boys and girls to go to collegiates and universities. This is something which has been advocated by other hon. members, and I think we should keep hammering at it until the government does something about it.

In his letter I believe the warden covered the most essential angles of reconstruction so far as the counties are concerned. The government should let the municipal bodies know what it will do in regard to funds, and give that information as soon as possible so that county councils and municipal bodies generally may make their arrangements now to set aside certain works, or, as we sometimes say, "put them in the bank" until after the war. I know these municipal bodies will see to it that for every dollar spent Canada will receive back a dollar in value.

This war is being fought for the common people. We hope the peace will be for the common people; in other words, one for all and all for one. When this war is won we must not allow the men and women of our forces to return to an unhappy Canada, a Canada in which there is no work for them. We must see that all are clothed, housed and cared for. We must have jobs for all who are able to work. It is the very least we can do; it is our duty and, may I say, our privilege.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, other hon. members who have spoken have discussed the greater matters which will be considered by the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment. I should like to present a few of the smaller matters which, it seems to me, are of importance.

I believe that the brave new world which we hope to reach some day will be brought about by smaller things, that we shall arrive at our goal step by step. Therefore I offer just a few matters which the committee might consider when it deliberates in the coming weeks. We realize there is a new factor which will confront Canada and all other nations in the post-war period, in that hundreds of thousands of women will be demobilized from industry and from the armed forces at the close of the war. They are women who, to a great extent, had no previous employment beyond their own home circles. Many of them had not finished their education. Much of what the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) said last Friday with respect to the boys in the Royal Canadian Air Force applies with equal force to the girls in all branches of the armed services. They will come back, possibly not to jobs but rather to fit in some way into a civilian life.

We must have a great deal of sympathy with both the men and the girls who will come back to things much different from what they are now experiencing. They will have difficult adjustments to make. We can give them sympathy, and we may do something for them through legislation. The girls may welcome getting back to the four walls of their homes, because those home walls do not limit them now in the way in which they did a few generations ago. A woman with the ability and the desire may go far beyond those four walls, into many other spheres of activity. While they have had a greater degree of regimentation in the armed forces, yet perhaps they have also had greater independence. They have had control of their own money, little though it may be. They have had the exhilaration of being part of a great crusade. They have drunk of the heady wine of adventure, just as the boys have. So that if they have difficulty in making adjustments when they come back, we shall have to assist them in that regard. We who are older realize that their reestablishment is of great importance, both for the individual and for the nation, because no one makes a greater contribution to the life of the nation than does the woman whose career is in the home. She must have some of the noblest qualities if she is to do her work with 100 per cent efficiency. She has to bring up her children so that they may be tolerant, broad-minded, mentally alert, so that they may have a respect for the rights of others and may be good citizens in a democratic country. She must preserve the balance between freedom and discipline. Not only must she build character in our young people, but it must be built so that that character will be maintained in the adults. Moreover, I do not think the father's place in the home is of any less importance than the mother's. Our nation's grandest qualities are built in our homes.

I believe we must consider at the present time some system of children's allowances. That would be one of the definite recommendations I would make to the committee. That is one of the provisions which should be made for the returned men and women. There is now a provision whereby for a short time after his or her discharge a member of the armed forces receives military pay. I would suggest that in post-war years that might be a longer or a more flexible period. At present the period allowed by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) may be sufficient, but during the years of adjustment after the war it might be more flexible if it were long enough to provide time for adjustment and short enough to prevent malingering—because there will be some who will take advantage of it, if they can. I believe that group, however, will be small in number when compared with the thousands who will play fair.

This would help the morale of the nation, something which will be of great importance if we are to make progress along democratic lines. We realize that morale is a decisive factor now on the home front, and at every point where our armed services are sharing in the struggle against despotism.

Another point which might be considered by the committee is that of discharge papers for both the men and the women who will leave the army. I am wondering if we could not work out something of which they might be proud in days to come, something which would indicate what they have accomplished through their willingness to make the supreme sacrifice, if necessary. When they volunteered to enter the armed services they showed they were willing to do what their country called upon them to do. Perhaps discharge papers should express some measure of their country's thanks, so that they may have something in which they may take pride, and which their children may cherish.

The committee will consider the larger problems, and properly so. They will no doubt discuss housing, conservation, and the use of our natural resources. I have no doubt they will discuss national parks and playgrounds, and when that subject is under consideration I wonder if they would keep in mind smaller playgrounds which would be within the daily reach of children in crowded areas in our cities. So many children have only the streets and lanes in which to play. It would be worth while to tear down some of the old decrepit buildings, or fill up the vacant lots by providing playground accommodation to which children could have easy access every day of their lives. I know that matter comes under municipal jurisdiction, but it seems to me that the recommendations which will be made by the reconstruction committee will have some weight with the municipalities and they may agree to provide playgrounds for our children which will help to build character.

I consider that play is simply a younger sister of education, to which a number of hon. members have referred. If we have playgrounds it means that we must have supervision because, just as in the international field, there will be bullies and aggressors who will try to push others aside. Most youth organizations and those dealing with such matters find that training is necessary for supervisors. The Y.M.C.A., the Canadian girls in training, the boy scouts and many church organizations have tried to train people to take charge of children's groups. I suggest that we consider such training as part of the vocational training now being provided under the auspices of the dominion and the provinces in order that there may be a greater number of trained and efficient supervisors who could help these young people along. Such work might be made available for some of those discharged from the armed forces.

The children learn in the playgrounds to have respect for the rights of others while standing on their own rights. That is what we want in the international field. Perhaps this comes into federal jurisdiction because those who receive character training are less likely to become delinquents. At the present time there is a great increase in juvenile delinquency with so many fathers away, and if something could be done now to help to prevent delinquency I think we would find a great improvement. Perhaps that is in the provincial field, but many of these delinquents come back as second and third offenders when they must be dealt with under the federal system. We would be helping the nation as well as helping these young people if we could do something along these lines.

I know these are small matters in comparison with the large questions that will be before the committee, but I think they should be kept in mind. In the olden days children were taught in the home; they came under the influence of the home, the school and the church. Nowadays there is a whole battery of influences, such as the movies, the radio, the comics and so on. If we plan deliberately through our reconstruction and rehabilitation schemes to build better character in our young people, I know it will be to the advantage of the nation as a whole, both now and later.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, there seem to be two prevalent views with regard to the problem of post-war reconstruction. There are those who believe that everything will work out all right, and that all that we shall have to do will be to trust in the government of the day and we shall receive the bountiful fruits which our plans of to-day will bring forth. There are others who are not so optimistic, who look at these post-war problems in a more realistic, and at times I might say even a pessimistic way. I am inclined to agree with some hon. members that the government should at least attempt to solve some of the problems which are facing us to-day. We should then have reason to believe that we might be able to cope with other problems when they come upon us.

I have in my hand a copy of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1944, I notice that there is a decrease of $126,000 in the item for old age pensions. Looking over other items I see that there is an increase of $54,296,231.19 provided for the payment of interest on our national debt. The total interest that must be paid in the coming year on the national debt is $198,628,033.33. In view of this, anyone who wants to convince me of the government's sincerity with regard to post-war plans will have to do more explaining than has been done, especially since they have failed to solve the problem of our aged people.

Some time ago the president of the university of New Brunswick spoke to two hundred Y.M.C.A. delegates from the maritimes and British Columbia. The report of his speech appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 12, 1941, and it reads:

> Speaking of the post-war world, Professor MacKenzie said there would be "disorganization and debts and poverty and suffering, but that is the price we pay for the luxury of war. Industry and finance and commerce and government will operate much as they have in the period just past.
> Taxation will continue at high levels, but that in itself need not alarm us, for taxation is merely a method of transferring wealth and of making accumulations of it available for large-scale use."

Of course that gentleman is looking at the whole problem of post-war reconstruction in an extremely pessimistic way, and I am not inclined to agree with him any more than I agree with those who have expounded the view that we shall have a paradise if only we continue carrying on under the old system.

Again, here is a pamphlet which I am sure other hon. members have received also. This pamphlet contains an address delivered by Mr. Walter P. Zeller, and is entitled, "Post-War Freedom." I believe this is an address delivered before some club in Canada, although it is not stated in the pamphlet just what club it was. I should like to draw the attention of the house to what I believe to be the most important point raised in his speech. It must be remembered that Mr. Zeller is one of the leading business men in Canada; he is regarded by many industrialists as one of the leading lights in the business world. A speech made by him on post-war reconstruction should be widely read; it should also be scrutinized to see whether he has anything worth while to put before us. Discussing the post-war freedom, which we all want, Mr. Zeller, I believe, makes out a good case. None of us want any more regimentation than is absolutely necessary. But when Mr. Zeller comes to the question of finding money to finance the post-war reconstruction, this is what he says:

> It is natural that people should ask why it is that government can find all the resources needed to wage war but cannot do the same in the interests of peace.

That is a good question. Let us listen to the answer.

> The answer, of course, is that the problems of peace-time economics are as different from the problems of war-time economics as peace is different from war.

What an answer! The whole problem of post-war reconstruction is involved in this question, and that is the best Mr. Zeller has to say in this regard. He goes on:

> In the first place, the government does not find all the money it needs to pay for the war. We are by no means on a pay-as-we-go basis. Notwithstanding the present high taxation, income is only about 50 per cent of the cost. The balance must be borrowed. The record of war-time finance is outstanding and most highly commendable, but it is based on an assumption that peace will not be too long delayed.

That statement coming from Mr. Zeller, one of our leading business men, should cause us to ponder. We have now arrived at the point where is must be the responsibility of business men as well to face some of these matters realistically, and to answer so fundamental a question in this manner is by no means reassuring evidence that our business men are thinking seriously of how to retain private enterprise. I am a believer in private enterprise, but I do not believe in abuses, and if Canadian business men want to save the system of private enterprise they had better analyse more seriously the problems which are now facing us, and which will confont us after the war.

I am inclined to agree with the remark of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) that if the government is seriously desirous of tackling the problems of post-war reconstruction it would be well advised to begin doing so now. For example, it should take in hand at once the solution of the old age pension problem, the problem of private debt, and other problems which have faced this country for years. All the government has done hitherto has been to postpone action from day to day and from year to year, while farmers have lost their equity in their lands and today find themselves deprived of everything.

I wish to take this opportunity to ask members of the government to answer a few questions which have puzzled me for some time. How will our national debt be paid off? It has increased steadily for years and is still on the upgrade. Here are the figures per capita for the last seven years:

1936	$371
1937	369
1938	372
1939	382
1940	387
1941	413
1942	445

And it is still going up. If we are to give our people security with freedom the government must first explain how it intends to pay off the debt of the country and where it will get the money. Then it will have to inform us where it intends to find the money to pay old age pensions, institute housing schemes, and finance other projects which will be needed after the war.

Our problem is neither one of production or one of consumption. Our people are willing to consume more than they have had an opportunity of consuming. The problem is one of distribution, and I am unable to see how any hon. member can confuse this internal question with something which is international. As a matter of fact a number of hon. members have endeavoured to place the blame on someone outside Canada for our own failure to distribute the goods and services which we have within our country.

I believe that both the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) have shown their desire to tackle this problem sincerely, but wishful thinking cannot solve our problems. Both these hon. gentlemen will have to do what the hon. gentleman who holds the purse-strings will tell them to do. We shall have to get the assurance from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that no financial restrictions shall be allowed to interfere with the solution of our post-war problems. Without such an assurance all talk of post-war reconstruction is useless; it is futile and nonsensical because it can never be realized. What is the use of talking about parks and playgrounds, about our tourist trade from the United States and what they have to say about us, if we cannot tackle the fundamental problems of our life, those of providing our people with bread, clothing, shelter and health services? Why soar into the air to discuss secondary things when we cannot tackle problems which are immediate and fundamental and must be attended to now?

It seems to me that the sponsors of post-war reconstruction plans would do better if they took a little advice from the people, instead of trying to force on them the plans which they themselves have hatched. Why not go to the farmers of this country and say: "You constitute one-third of our total population; we want a brief from you. What do you want after this war? Place your problems before us and we will see what we can do." Why not go to our working people in every factory across this country and say to them: "Get together; call a conference to discuss your problems, and then formulate your demands into a brief and present it to us." Why not go to the business men and say: "We want you to get together. Prepare a brief setting out your views and present them to us." Go to the professional men and say the same thing to them, go to our young people—and I want to stress particularly the role which our young people should play after the war—and say: "What opportunities do you want? Present us with a brief." Then, after having gathered all these briefs and studied them you would have a point of view representative of every class and every group of people in Canada. I believe that that would really be a democratic approach to some of these problems. As it is, agriculture has absolutely nothing to say about post-war reconstruction, and I say that with all due respect to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is an able debater. But our farmers expect more than words.

I wish to quote a few words to show what conditions have existed in this country. Here is a clipping from an editorial which appeared in the Calgary Albertan of August 5, 1938. It says:

A friend of the Albertan's who for obvious reasons, we believe, does not wish to be named, showed us yesterday a list of debtors and their debts that he had extracted from the records of the organization of which he is accountant. Suffice it to say that each of the farmers mentioned in that list now owes after eight to twenty years, from as much as the value of the original loan to two or three times the sum and that the accumulated interest ranges from twenty-two to two hundred and thirty-eight times the face value of the loan. The figures are almost unbelievable, but there they are.

The editorial goes on:

Unless this business of farmers' debts is tackled courageously, it is quite evident that market values, commodity prices and all the factors that are usually supposed to make for prosperity will not mean a thing worth speaking of.

That was in 1938. Yet when this question was brought up to-day by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the minister said that they had not had the time to consider the problem. I say, Mr. Speaker, that one-third of our population in Canada deserve a better break than that. As a matter of fact, if things continue as they have for a number of years now, we shall have repeated in Canada what has taken place in the United States. I have here a clipping from a United States paper dated December 9, 1936, which says: "Janitor winner in ballot race; mayor is angry." The janitor beat the mayor in the race for office. It will not be long before some of our janitors in Canada get wise to the trick and beat some of our professional politicians out of their positions.

I believe that some of these problems must be tackled now. We cannot wait. The debt problem, the problem of old age pensions and many others must be faced now, and if the government is seriously concerned it will put the necessary legislation into effect. Let me quote from an election leaflet issued in my constituency by the candidate of the Liberal party before the last election. These are some of his planks: "Agriculture—parity prices for farm products—wheat, hogs, dairy products. Pool the freight on wheat." Have we that? I quote further from the same leaflet: "Reconsider the whole freight rate structure. Lower the cost of agricultural machinery. Keep down living costs. No man to lose his equity in his land. Settle old debts fairly but finally," and so on and so forth.

I have now been a member of this house for three years, and I think it is high time that some of these things were done. It would make a good beginning to post-war reconstruction. We cannot continue as we have in the past. We must begin to solve some of these problems and get them out of the way, and the sooner the better. Of course the government in office will get the credit that is coming to it. It is not enough to wait until public opinion forces the government to move, but that is usually the speed of most governments.

I have another clipping here from the Edmonton Journal of April 23, 1939. It is a dispatch from Clarkson, Ontario, and it reads:

"Something has to be done", Councillor Mitchell said, in calling attention to conditions in his municipality. "All we are doing is creating an army of bums. We have had about 80,000 graduated from our high schools in Ontario during the past four or five years. We send them to school to acquire that education and then they have it, what good is it?

"Year after year students graduate. Perhaps a member of parliament hands them some taffy at commencement and gives them a diploma. The day after, they have nothing. I would rather have the babies knocked on the head at birth than see them turned out to wander after teaching them to feel and suffer," he stated.

That sort of thing was happening in cities all over Canada for many years. Let me read another clipping from the Edmonton Journal of February 15, 1934, at the time our Conservative friends were holding office in this country. This was the Ottawa scale: A family of two received 7·4 cents per meal; a family of four, 5·3 cents per meal; a family of six, 4·8 cents a meal; a family of eight, 4·3 cents a meal. That is something that our Conservative friends can put in their album, because those are things that have not yet been solved, or properly tackled.

Here is something about the old age pension. This is taken from the Winnipeg Tribune of April 25, 1942:

Old Samuel couldn't stretch his $20 old age pension quite far enough this month. When he went to make some purchases at a grocery store Friday he put three items in his pocket for which he hadn't the cash.

At the paying counter the clerks noticed that his pockets bulged suspiciously. They investigated, found he had hidden a pound of butter, a tin of condensed milk, a tin of cooked meat, total value 63 cents.

At 72 Samuel is almost stone deaf, and when he was haled into court this morning couldn't hear either the theft charge read out by . . . the clerk of the court or the questions asked by the magistrate.

At length, by means of exchange of written messages, Samuel was let off on suspended sentence.

If he commits the same offence within the next two years he'll be sentenced for the old as well as the new theft. Apparently Samuel doesn't intend to do any such thing, for he left the courtroom smiling.

That is the fate of our aged people. We must tackle these problems realistically and try to get rid of some of them now, because if we do not they will pile up upon us and it may be impossible to solve all of them at the same time.

We also talk about the Beveridge report. It surprises me that hon. members spend so much time on a report prepared for Britain. Why can we not get down to business and prepare a plan of our own? Why should we always be imitators? Why not consider the problem and figure out our own solution? If we know our objective it should not be very hard for us to reach it. We have all the material resources that we need and more. All we have to do is to apply a little intelligence and get these things over to our people for their use.

We have seen in this country a creeping tendency toward dictatorial bureaucracy. Instead of the government asking the different provinces to cooperate and coordinate all our affairs and with a view to arriving at a solution, we see a strong tendency on the part of the federal government to move into provincial fields and thus reduce the provincial powers to something very local. That is a dangerous trend. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) bring out this point so clearly. The Canadian people, if they intend to wait for this government and for various other groups to make up a plan for a democratic future for them, then they had better not wait because these individuals will not plan the future for the people of Canada. They will plan the future for themselves, to serve their own interests.

Our young people are sacrificing more than anybody else in this war. When a young man reaches eighteen years of age he may be called for military service, and when he is nineteen or twenty the same regulations apply. If these young men are intelligent enough to fight the war for us, surely they are intelligent enough to cast a vote in an election. The age qualification in our election act should be changed, so that the young boys and girls between eighteen and twenty-one years of age may be included in the voters' lists, because the future of Canada will belong to the young people. In the past some have been afraid that youth might not stand for a lot of this nonsense that we have been handing out to them. It was felt that perhaps the young people would be too impulsive and would be hard to keep under control. But, if we place our problems squarely before them and tell them "these are your problems; you are a part of this nation; let us tackle them together," they will, I am sure, cooperate in a sincere attempt to find a solution.

Our young people will have to take a lead in post-war reconstruction. I have all the respect for ripe minds and ripe age, but I am doubtful about some of these ripe things, because, no matter what it is, if it is too ripe there is danger that it may not be the very best.

I should like to bring out one or two other observations at this time, and perhaps touch upon some matters that have not been dealt with as yet. The people of Canada at this time are interested more in the fruits which they will get than in the plans that are advanced by various groups. We must judge every government by the results which it gives to the people, and not by the machinery set up. The machinery of government, if it does not bring the required results, is useless, no matter how well it may look on the surface. What we want in Canada, as the hon. member for Lethbridge has so ably pointed out, better than anyone else in this house, is security with freedom. One without the other is not enough. Why should we not have both? If we continue to get results we do not want, our freedom will be endangered. If we continue to give the people of Canada the results against which they are fighting then they will take it that democracy is failing. We do not want our people even to think that, let alone be convinced of it. We want our people to believe that democracy is the only system for Canada, that democracy must be the system in Canada. But this democracy must give our people better results. There is no other way out. We cannot afford to let our people say, "If these are the results we have achieved under democracy, then we want none of it." We shall then find ourselves in a really dangerous situation. We must give our people the results they want.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house for three years, and during that time I have followed the proceedings with great interest. In the course of the debates I have listened to and understood the philosophies and policies outlined by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, though I have not agreed with them. The same applies to the policies of the new Progressive Conservative party, and also to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), but for three solid years I have tried to understand what the New Democracy party is trying to drive at, and I have not found out yet. I listened with the most rapt attention to the two hon. members who this afternoon expounded the theories of that party. I refer to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), who has just taken his seat. We hear all that is wrong with Canada, but we are given only a few nebulous suggestions which, when tested, just do not hold water. We hear that we have piled up a tremendous debt during this war. It is true that we have piled up a tremendous debt, but we have done a tremendous job, and I do not know how that job could have been accomplished by any country in the world without piling up a great debt. It is all very well to expound these fancy panaceas, but it is quite a different matter when one tries to put them into practice, as Premier Aberhart of Alberta discovered much to his dismay. However, it is not my intention to criticize those who have spoken this afternoon except to ask how Canada can expect to progress after this war unless it takes its proper place among the nations of the world. How much respect will our allies of the united nations have for us if such isolationism as we have heard from those two hon. members this afternoon is preached generally in this country?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The word "isolation" was never mentioned.

Mr. FULFORD: The hon. members spoke of trading among ourselves and living to ourselves. I wonder if they have not heard of the aeroplane and how it has altered all our old ideas in regard to time and distance. I say that the future of the world is dependent upon the cooperation of all nations, and Canada can be no exception. If we do not cooperate we are doomed to failure.

This afternoon the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) offered some very good suggestions with regard to the tourist trade. I am sure the hon. member was not serious when he said his was the finest tourist district in Canada, for everyone knows that this honour belongs to the county of Leeds. I was particularly interested last evening when the subject of the tourist trade was introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). I had not realized that one of our departments had the wisdom and foresight to write Americans and anticipate their needs before they came to Canada. I refer, of course, to what was done by the wartime prices and trade board in regard to our sugar, tea and coffee ration books. I was very much impressed by the letters read by the hon. member, which had been received by the wartime prices and trade board, in appreciation of its offer to furnish these ration books to our United States friends before they came here for their visits. There is one point, however, in which I think we are rather remiss. I refer to the amount of gasoline that is allowed Americans who come to Canada for fairly long periods of time, especially those who are property owners and consequently taxpayers in this dominion. I know of several older people in my own riding who are almost obliged to take recreation in the summer time, but who will be unable to come to Canada this summer unless these restrictions are lifted to some extent. I know of one family in particular who very much resent the fact that they can get gasoline for their outboard motor, to run around the lake, but cannot get gasoline for their car. I would respectfully draw this point to the attention of both the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the oil controller. When a Canadian goes to the United States he is given an A ration coupon book which entitles him to twelve American gallons a month. I certainly think Americans who for a great many years have been in the habit of coming to Canada and who are property owners here should be given an equal amount in Canadian gallons. That will go a long way toward counteracting the bad effect the severe rationing of last summer has had upon these tourists, and I believe it would bring to Canada a great many people who now fear that if they came here they might find themselves stranded.

Now for a moment I shall be most unoriginal. I agree with millions of other Canadians and go on record as stating that I believe entirely in free enterprise. I believe that free enterprise will help to rehabilitate Canada after the war, just as free enterprise has built Canada to her present state of civilization. But in order to succeed, this free enterprise must be unshackled; the fetters of bureaucracy must be removed. By this I do not mean that I would advocate reverting to the policy of laissez-faire of the last century. Industry must be policed, just as the individual must be policed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Policed, but not handcuffed.

Mr. FULFORD: But so far as definite government planning is concerned, for every move industry is to make, I am sure it would fall down. On the other hand, if allowed to advance, as it has throughout this country, to its present state, it will not let us down. One thing we cannot do is to let our men and women down when they return from active service after the war. I cannot visualize those men and women returning to a country swayed by the panaceas, if you like, conceived by certain theorists, or influenced by the untried policies of political opportunists.

Above all, after the war Canada will have to keep its head. We will stand to come out on the very top, if things are managed and governed correctly after the peace. On the other hand, we stand to lose everything if we attempt to experiment during the vital period of reconstruction.

I believe in free enterprise, because it is through free enterprise the British commonwealth of nations, as we know it, has developed. I believe in free enterprise, because it is upon such free enterprise that Canada was built. I believe in free enterprise because it has given the United States the highest standard of living, the highest real wages any country has ever known. Surely we shall not throw overboard something which has meant as much to humanity as this system developed through the centuries.

During the debate we have heard a great deal that has been constructive, and especially suggestions for a definite and proper program of public works after the war. We have heard about water conservation; we have heard about irrigation; we have heard about a certain measure of reforestation. I wish to bring to the attention of the house a subject which was much in the public eye before Pearl Harbor, but about which we have not heard since that time. I refer to the development of one of the greatest national resources God ever gave a continent, namely, the development of the deep waterways on the St. Lawrence river. Had it not been for Pearl Harbor I believe that waterway might have been under construction now. However as a result of the emergencies of the war it has had to be put aside for the time being—but I trust only for the time being.

Living as I do on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and watching 240,000 cubic feet per second pass my door, I cannot help thinking of the waste of power, and the waste of navigable resources. Between the United States and Canada a deep waterway has been built from the head of lake Superior to Prescott. Then there is a bottleneck for about 130 miles. At great expense the government of Canada has made the port of Montreal one of the greatest seaports in the world. Yet we have this bottleneck of only 130 miles separating our great fresh water inland seas from the commerce of the world. At the present time the largest boats which sail the great lakes go to Prescott and unload their grain. That grain must be transhipped from the elevator at Prescott, and through the 14-foot canal. It is either transhipped in Montreal, or again put in storage from the small canal boats. Or, in some instances, the small canal boats will take it down from the head of the lakes. This is a most uneconomical and unreasonable situation.

If such a water system existed in Europe as exists on this North American continent it would have been developed many years ago. Even to-day countries in Europe are considering further development of their waterways. Germany recently completed the Danube-Rhine system, thereby connecting the North sea with the Black sea. Some years ago Russia built the canal which passes up the Volga river from the Caspian sea, thence over to the Don river and thence into the sea of Azov and the Black sea. But none of these canals can be compared in importance with the St. Lawrence system which, with the exception of the 14-foot canal, remains undeveloped. One of the most costly sections, I should add, has been built by the Beauharnois Power Company, but the power has been only partly developed.

The canal has been built, and all that is necessary now to connect lake St. Francis with lake St. Louis is to erect locks adjacent to the power house. Really what remains for us to do here in Canada is to reconstruct the Lachine canal which connects the harbour of Montreal with lake St. Francis and the stretch from Cornwall to Prescott.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not with lake St. Francis, but with lake St. Louis.

Mr. FULFORD: Yes, with lake St. Louis. This great natural resource should not be wasted. This work would mean that many thousands of men could be employed during the period of rehabilitation, and it would mean a power development even greater than that at Boulder dam or the recent development on the Saguenay river.

With all seriousness and earnestness I ask this committee to give the fullest consideration to the development of what is the continent's greatest natural resource, the St. Lawrence deep waterway.

On motion of Mrs. Nielsen the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the financial and economic requirements of war become greater, and more exacting as the scope and thoroughness of our plans grow. This fifth war-time budget will exceed all previous standards and make provision for expenditures on a scale which it is sometimes difficult for any of us to appreciate.

The task of preparing this budget has been cheered by the growing evidence that we have seized the offensive, and the power of the united nations is already striking deep into the enemy's defences. There is, too, the expectation that our own land forces will soon match the blows which our air force and navy have struck against the aggressor. But if the valour of our men and of our allies is now translating our economic and financial programme into telling blows against the axis powers, there is every reason for pressing that programme forward and none for relaxing it.

As I have said frequently, financial measures are but one of the means through which we link the whole war programme together. They are instruments and not ends in themselves. They are instruments which must be used wisely lest we frustrate our efforts now and sow the seeds of intolerable conditions later. Financial measures are one of the means through which each person has his share in this war. Taxes and loans are not exactions from the people by a government. They are weapons which the people through their elected representatives and the free methods of democracy have fashioned for their own use and their common purpose. We cannot all man guns and planes and ships; we cannot all build guns and planes and ships, but the Canadian people have shown by the reception which has been given to each succeeding war-time budget that they are ready to wield these weapons, each according to his strength and all against the people's enemies. They are ready to accept their share in each increase in the effective organization for war of which the budget is but the financial counterpart.

It is by the single purpose of the people of this country and her allies that this war will be brought to the desired end. It is by the sober, tenacious purpose of the men and women of this and other countries that a just and durable peace will be written. The proposals which I shall lay before the house tonight are the recommendations which the government makes to the elected representatives of the people of this country for improving the financial means by which each of us may throw his whole weight into this struggle—and help to make possible a world more worthy of our better selves.

I

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL REVIEW

The current fiscal year has been marked by the coming to fruition of all our major production programmes, and yet, as we approach our full capacity, the increase in over-all production is less marked than last year.

Industrial production in Canada rose from an index figure of 208 in December, 1941, to 251 in December, 1942. Such over-all figures however, conceal what has been taking place. While detailed production figures are not disclosed, the increases of 20 to 75 per cent in the numbers employed in the production of such things as chemicals, electrical equipment, iron and steel, and motor vehicles, and of more than 100 per cent in the case of those engaged in shipbuilding, tell their own story of war production. A number of other industries, partly war and partly civilian, have just maintained the level of employment. But there is a lengthening list of industries, producing, in the main, less essential goods, which show over the past year definitely reduced employment. It is the shifts in production rather than the over-all increase which tell the significant story. We have, in recent months, been definitely in the period when substantial increase in war production can be achieved only at some loss of less essential production and in which we must be prepared to shift men and resources from one kind of production to another, as changing needs dictate.

We have been confronted with our inability to satisfy fully both war requirements and the high levels to which unrestricted war-time consumption has gone. It has been necessary, therefore, to restrict consumption and use in a growing number of instances in order that supplies for the armed forces should be fully assured, and the goods and services available distributed in an orderly and equitable manner. The problems raised by this situation are difficult and often extremely vexatious, but their emergence is a clear indication that we are reaching the stage in our war programme which it was the desire of every Canadian that we should reach, namely, the stage when we would be producing not merely what we could produce comfortably but all that we could possibly produce from the resources and manpower at our disposal. If we had no shortages, no vexatious restrictions, no farm labour problem none of the problems and difficulties which have been debated in this house in recent weeks, we could be certain that we were falling far short of a full-out war effort.

In a war of such extent and movement, in which technical improvements have already played so large a part, it was not to be expected that shortages would emerge in a well ordered and easily forseen pattern. The mounting of the allied offensives and the unlimited submarine warfare have made the limitations of ocean shipping particularly severe. Facilities for land transport have been heavily taxed, and the severity of the weather has introduced unusual difficulties in making the fullest use of the facilities available. The offensive phase which the war has entered has necessarily imposed changes in the direction and emphasis of our war programme. As the experience of battle redefines the needs of the armed forces, we can expect to be faced with increasingly difficult problems of controlling the production, distribution and use of goods and services.

There are sufficiently frequent occasions for discussing before the house the government's policy of controlling prices, wages and salaries, that it is neither necessary nor desirable to say more here than that it continues to be an integral part of the war-time fiscal and economic policy, and that without it that policy could not be carried out effectively. Though there are plenty of critics of particular applications of this programme of control, there is none who advocates its abandonment. By the payment of consumer subsidies to offset a substantial part of the increase in the cost of living, which it was not possible to avoid, the government, after a year's experience, has reaffirmed its determination to adhere to this programme and to continue to reserve to parliament the right to distribute the financial and economic sacrifices of the war by its taxation measures rather than to have them distributed by the haphazard forces of changing prices and incomes.

As explained in the budget speech of last year, our exchange problems have now become pretty well merged with general fiscal problems. The shortage of United States dollars has ceased to be a major problem and the decisive position which it held in our early budgets has been overshadowed by the limitations imposed upon us by shortages of shipping and resources and man-power. It has already been announced that a measure will be introduced to provide, out of such war production as can be made available, for the needs of those united nations whose supplies of Canadian dollars are inadequate to permit them to purchase such equipment and materials as they need.

The estimates of revenue and expenditure and other relevant information are set out in full in the white paper which I shall table before I resume my seat. I wish, however, to report briefly on the probable results of the year and on the financing which has been carried out. The house will bear in mind that the fiscal year does not close until March 31 and that the figures which I quote are, therefore, estimates only.

It is estimated that all revenues, including the refundable portion of income and excess profits taxes estimated at $100 million, will total $2,309 million, over 55 per cent above the revenues for 1941-42.

Total tax revenues are forecast at $2,136 million including the $100 million of refundable taxes. This compares with $1,361 million for the previous year and is very close to the forecast given at the time of the last budget. Direct taxes on incomes and profits are now overwhelmingly the largest sources of tax revenues, yielding nearly two-thirds of the total. The graduated tax on personal incomes, the special tax on income from dividends and interest and the national defence tax which was in operation for only five months of the fiscal year, are expected to yield $568 million, an increase of $244 million. The corporation income tax and the excess profits tax will, it is anticipated, yield $805 million in contrast with $321 million for the previous year. It will be recalled that some part of this increase was the result of introducing payment by monthly instalments and will be non-recurring.

Excise taxes, at $477 million, will show an over-all increase of $24 million despite conspicuous reductions in the yield of some individual taxes. The largest item in this group, the sales tax, at $230 million net, will show a decrease of $6 million from the previous year's yield.

Thanks to the substantial increases in rates imposed by the budget legislation of 1942, excise duties are expected to reach $142 million as compared with $110 million in the previous year. Customs duties, having reached their recent peak in 1941-42, are likely to decline to $118 million from $142 million for the previous year.

Non-tax revenues, of which the largest source is the Post Office, are expected to reach $114 million. Special receipts and credits will be about $59 million, the largest contribution being the $25 million operating surplus of the Canadian National Railways.

On the other side of the account, we estimate that total ordinary expenditure for 1942-43 will be approximately $566 million, or $121 million above that of the previous year. Toward this increase, interest on the public debt contributed $30 million; compensation to the provinces in respect of income, corporation and gasoline taxes, $74 million; the Unemployment Insurance Act, $7 million; and the Post Office, $4 million. Miscellaneous increases account for the remaining $6 million. Capital expenditures, at $3,862,000, will be slightly higher than those of the previous year. So-called special expenditures are likely to be about $31 million, less than half the expenditures under this category in 1941-42.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The western grain crop was such that it was not necessary to make payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; wheat acreage reduction payments were somewhat less than in the previous year; and the reserve set up to meet deficits arising out of the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of the 1939 and 1940 crops has proved to be more than ample, resulting in a credit adjustment of $6,600,000.

Government-owned enterprises, specifically, the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and the National Harbours Board, will require about the same expenditures as in the previous year, $1,263,000.

In the budget speech of June 23, 1942, I intimated to the house that, although the War Appropriation Act and the United Kingdom Financing Act made provision for expenditures of $3,000 million, the actual war expenditures were likely to be considerably in excess of that figure. It now appears that they will reach $3,803 million, including an item of $200 million for the purchase of the British interest in Canadian war plants.

Miscellaneous other charges of $66 million involve mostly items of a bookkeeping nature, including the addition of another $25 million to our reserve to meet possible losses on realization of active assets, and the charging of $36 million to a non-active account (the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock) as the contra-item to the taking into revenues of the operating surplus and certain capital gains of the Canadian National Railways.

Including all these categories of expenditure, the aggregate expenditures for 1942-43 as now estimated will be $4,470 million, as compared with an estimate of $3,900 million given at the time of the last budget. Deducting total revenues for the year of $2,209 million after excluding refundable taxes, we arrive at a probable over-all deficit or increase in direct net debt of approximately $2,261 million. The proportion of expenditures paid out of revenue, namely 49·4 per cent will thus fall slightly short of the estimate of 52 per cent which I gave last year.

Total borrowings during the year (exclusive of some $33 million of school lands debentures reissued to the western provinces) are estimated at $2,423 million. Of this, $1,070 million, including $77 million from the sale of war savings certificates and stamps and $1,825,000 from non-interest bearing certificates, will have been borrowed from the public. An amount of $90 million was borrowed in New York for refunding purposes. Borrowings from the Bank of Canada amounted to $443 million, including the renewal of a loan of $250 million. By the end of the year, it is estimated, $790 million net will have been borrowed from the chartered banks. During the current year, in order to obtain funds needed in the intervals between public loans, we introduced the practice of borrowing directly from the chartered banks on deposit certificates, a six month security bearing interest at ¾ of 1 per cent per annum. The amount outstanding at the end of the fiscal year will be substantially reduced when the next victory loan is issued.

Direct obligations of approximately $429 million (excluding school lands debentures) were redeemed during 1942-43, leaving net borrowings for the year of $1,994 million to which must be added an estimated $100 million of refundable taxes. This amount of $2,094 million, together with a decline of approximately $642 million in cash and other current assets and the amount of various advances repaid was used to meet the overall deficit of $2,261 million and to make loans and investments of $517 million net, after allowing for amounts repaid on various outstanding advances. The largest of the new investments were the loan of $700 million to the United Kingdom under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act and an advance of $131 million to the Canadian National Railways, chiefly for the redemption of railway securities.

It is estimated that on March 31, 1943, the outstanding unmatured funded debt (including treasury bills) will amount to $7,861 million on which the annual charges will be $205 million or 2.6 per cent as compared with 2.9 per cent a year previously. In addition, there will be outstanding obligations guaranteed by the government of Canada to the amount of $716 million, a decrease of about $102 million during the year.

Perhaps this is a convenient point at which to remind the house that the financial work of the government has not been completed when the budget has been discussed and legislation passed. In carrying out the approved policy, we depend on two extensive, competent, and hard-worked organizations. It is the task of the Department of National Revenue to collect the taxes enacted by parliament. The department is represented by its own Minister in the house and it is not for me to say more than that the financial programme of the war has, to a degree not generally appreciated, laid heavy and exacting duties on the very loyal and able officials of that department.

The other side of the financial programme, borrowing from the public, is carried on through the National War Finance Committee which was established by the government in January, 1942, under the able chairmanship of Mr. George W. Spinney. Formation of this committee marked the creation of the first single nation-wide organization, responsible to the government, charged with the dual task of planning, organizing and administering arrangements for the maximum public sales of government securities, and of promoting maximum voluntary savings by all classes of Canadian individuals and corporations.

In effect, the committee represented a merger between the war savings committee,—which had been operating continuously since May 1940,—and the Victory Loan Committee —which had been set up as a temporary organization to arrange and conduct the first victory loan campaign in June, 1941.

Since its creation, the National War Finance Committee has welded together the previously existing war savings and victory loan organizations. At the present time, the permanent paid staff of the committee, located in Ottawa and throughout Canada, numbers only about 275 persons. This staff operates in conjunction with three main bodies of workers.

First, there are the voluntary workers attached to the local units in each province. These patriotic men and women are drawn from every group in the community. While, individually, most of these people are on a part time basis, collectively they form the largest group of workers associated with committee activities, both during and between large scale drive operations. This form of service on the home front is of vital importance, and I hope it will be possible to enlist the aid of more and more persons in this phase of our war programme. I should be most remiss if I did not take this opportunity of acknowledging the valuable work being done by these voluntary workers, and to express to them the thanks of the government and their fellow-Canadians.

The next body of workers are the salesmen on commission, and other temporary paid workers employed by the committee at the time of victory loan campaigns. These salesmen do much of the hard work of selling victory loan bonds, in small amounts, to individual investors, by house to house canvass in urban and rural areas. The salesmen who receive commission generally give up their regular jobs during the period of the loan. The money they receive as commission replaces the money they otherwise would make at their regular work, although, in many cases, the amount they receive as commission is less than their regular income. I should perhaps add that commissions are paid only on relatively small individual subscriptions, where the canvassing work is comparatively difficult. Commissions are not paid on orders from larger investors, such as business firms and corporations, nor on bonds sold to employees in medium and large size business organizations.

The third group of workers associated with the National War Finance Committee are the investment dealers and brokers, and persons from the regular staff employed by dealers and brokers. This body of professional workers is closely associated with committee operations at all times. Maximum participation is reached in the period of organization preceding victory loan drives, and during the period of public offering of the loans. In general, investment dealers and brokers do the organizational work, and, during loan campaigns, carry out the canvass of large corporate and individual investors. Investment dealers and brokers are paid for their participation in committee activities, a reasonable remuneration based on the number and nature of the staff made available and the previous record of the firm in the distribution of dominion government securities.

I have made these explanations in regard to payments to salesmen on commission, and to investment dealers and brokers, because of some public misunderstandings on these subjects. It is to me and to those familiar with money-raising campaigns a rather remarkable fact that the over-all cost of these intensive and extensive victory loan campaigns, including the cost of engraving the bonds and of all publicity activities, can be kept as low as 1 per cent of the amount of money raised.

At the time of the third victory loan, in October-November 1942, temporary paid staff, including salesmen on commission, numbered about 15,500, and voluntary workers, many additional thousands. For organizational purposes, Canada is divided into local unit areas, each of which is under a local voluntary war finance committee. These local unit committees in each province are under the control and direction of the National War Finance Committee for that province. The operations of the provincial organizations are coordinated by the central committee for the dominion which has its headquarters in Ottawa.

Our financial programme for the year has been carried out with a high degree of success. To finance expenditures of nearly $4,500 million is in itself an achievement of which we have no reason to be ashamed. It is the financial counterpart of still more notable achievements of organization and production. But I would like to add some frank words of warning on four points:

[Mr. Ilsley.]

My first point is this: On occasion, comparisons have been made of our taxes with the taxes of other countries to show that Canadians are contributing a higher proportion of their incomes in taxes than the citizens of other countries. The financial burden of the war on this country is not measured by the amount of taxes levied. It is measured by the amount of expenditures which are financed. Borrowing does not lessen the cost of the war to this generation. The taxation and borrowing policy merely decides how the burden shall be distributed among the people of the country. The only ways in which we can postpone some of the costs of the war are by borrowing abroad, (if by so doing we can obtain additional supplies of goods abroad) and by using up the physical equipment and inventories of the country and leaving the post-war population to repair the wastage. To some degree, we are relieving the present by the second of these ways. The first is not only undesirable but also would provide only slight relief because of the virtual impossibility of getting additional supplies from abroad. Since the main cost has to be carried during the war, it is the policy of this government to distribute that burden as far as practicable according to the incomes which people enjoy during the war, that is to say, by taxes levied according to ability to pay. The equity of that policy cannot, I think, be challenged successfully.

Secondly, it has been suggested that Canadians are being asked to contribute too much in proportion to our national income. I shall not attempt to elucidate to the house the intricacies of national income estimates. My knowledge extends just far enough to warn me that the most accomplished statisticians find it extremely difficult to make valid comparisons between countries and that, when they have made them, the layman is almost certain to misconstrue them. But there is a much simpler comparison which is more convincing. After we have met our war requirements, what is left for consumption by the civilian population? Is it higher than the pre-war standard of consumption or is it lower? Do we work longer hours or apply ourselves more intensively than other nations? The evidence of both statistics and common observation is pretty clear that all we have experienced so far on the average is some moderate decline from the peak of war-time consumption, and some increase in the inconveniences of shopping and travelling. Let no one so misinterpret statistics as to assert that these approach the economic sacrifices of countries nearer to the theatres of war than Canada.

In the third place, we have now passed the point where we can in a short time increase our total output by any large amount. What one group may gain by pressing its advantages of the moment, other groups lose. The conflicts thus started will paralyse our striking power just at the time when it must be at its height. What, broadly speaking, have been the changes in incomes during the war? Corporations and other businesses have experienced large increases in profits which have been reduced by taxation and compulsory saving to a level not higher than 70 per cent of the pre-war standard profits. This is the most severe and rigid ceiling in force in this country. Personal incomes of the middle and higher income groups have borne the brunt of war-time taxation to the point where very definite reductions in customary standards of living have been forced. Receipts from the sale of farm products are reported to have reached a higher level in 1942 than in any year in the past two decades. Receipts from the sale of farm products are not equivalent to farm income. Farm costs have also risen but there is every evidence that farm incomes are at more remunerative levels than in any but the record years. Average weekly earnings of employed persons are at higher levels than they have been since the inflation boom following the war of 1914-18. Thus there has been a far-reaching and important change in the distribution of income in the country. On the whole, the directions of the change have been desirable and the government has welcomed and facilitated it. The increases, by and large, have gone to those who needed them most. But we have reached the point when the demands of some labour representatives and of some farm representatives cannot both be satisfied. Ability to resolve group differences is the decisive test of democracy. Nothing will frustrate our striking force so much as internecine strife over economic and financial advantage. Nothing would so belittle us in the eyes of those other Canadians who offer as a contribution to victory neither economic nor financial sacrifice but life itself.

Finally, on the year's financial results themselves. The plain fact is that this year we have had to depend too much on bank borrowing. I was able to say last year that "aside from the increase in treasury bills, there was no new direct borrowing from the Bank of Canada or the chartered banks during the year." During the current fiscal year, we shall have borrowed direct from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks a net amount of $983 million. That is not all dangerous borrowing for the public has desired to hold considerable savings in cash. But most of it is borrowing which I would rather not have done. If the government borrows from individuals, the government spends the money and the individual does not. If the government borrows from the banks the government spends the money, but the spending of others is not reduced. We borrowed from the banks because we were unable to borrow as much as we needed from personal savings.

I tabled recently in the house a statement showing the sources of subscriptions to the three victory loans. They were divided between individuals and non-individuals. Non-individuals included broadly corporation investors. Individuals included individual persons, small non-profit enterprises and some small businesses. While the total subscribed by individuals increased with each loan, the proportion to the total fell off somewhat in the third victory loan.

I estimate that sales of war savings certificates and stamps will approximate $77 million, although I should add that redemptions have been heavier than they should have been. This compares with $85 million sold in 1941-42. Non-interest bearing certificates, which were made available to meet a special demand, showed a net decline during the year, redemptions exceeding new sales.

These are sobering facts because to the degree that the government has had to borrow from the banks rather than directly from personal savings, to the degree that the spending power of the government has been increased and the spending power of the public has not been reduced by an equal amount, we have contributed to the pressure on prices and on supplies of necessary products. The evidence is clear that we, as a people, must bend our efforts with renewed and persistent strength to the task of increasing savings and placing them in the service of the nation.

II

BUDGET FORECAST 1943-44 AND PROPOSALS

I have reviewed the financial events and operations of the year which is drawing to an end. I turn now to the year ahead and the measures which we propose.

The estimates for the coming year are already before the house. For non-war expenditures $610 million is required. The war estimates stand at $3,890 million as compared with estimated expenditures of $2,803 million under the war appropriation in the current year. The amount to be included in the Mutual Aid bill is $1,000 million, the same as was provided in the current year under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act. The estimated expenditures thus reach the great total of $5,500 million, an amount which is the dollar measure of our financial task for the year and of the national achievement in organizing for war.

To meet these requirements, it is estimated that, under the present tax laws total ordinary revenues for the fiscal year 1943-44 will be $2,561 million or after allowing $210 million for refundable taxes $2,351 million in net ordinary revenue. I shall place on Hansard a statement showing the details of the estimate and comparing it with the expected yields for 1942-43.

	1943-44 (millions)	1942-43 (millions)
Customs duties	$ 100	$ 118
Excise duties	130	142
Sales tax	225	230
War exchange tax	85	94
Other excise taxes	165	153
Income taxes—
Personal	825	460
National defence tax	—	81
Corporate	300	350
Interest and dividends	26	27
Excess profits tax	550	455
Succession duties	18	14
Miscellaneous	7	12
	2,431	2,136
Non-tax revenue	130	114
Total ordinary revenue	2,561	2,250
Special receipts	40	59
Total revenue	2,601	2,309
Less refundable taxes	210	100
Net total revenue	2,391	2,209

The table shows that, assuming no tax changes, we anticipate declines in revenue from customs duties, excise duties, sales tax and the war exchange tax. On all these items, shortage of goods and difficulties of transportation will affect revenues adversely. Excise taxes other than the sales tax are expected to yield slightly larger revenues when the higher rates and new taxes enacted at the last session apply to a full year.

It is anticipated that the yield of the personal income tax will be $284 million higher because the higher rates of tax collection will be in effect for the full year and because of increasing incomes. The yield of the corporation income tax will probably decline somewhat as in the current fiscal year we moved forward the time of payment and consequently received somewhat more than one year's taxes. The yield of the excess profits tax is expected to be substantially higher, both because the higher rates enacted last year will be in effect for a full year and because profits before tax are apparently continuing to rise.

Expenditures of $5,500 million and gross revenues of $2,601 million will leave a deficit of $2,899 million to be met by new taxes and by borrowing other than by refundable taxes. The comparable estimated deficit for the current year is $2,162 million.

The objects to be achieved by our financial programme for the coming year are clear enough. I have set out the decisive facts with which that programme must grapple. What are the salient economic facts? First of all, we have reached a state of full employment, aside from local situations. Supplies that will be available to meet consumer demands in the coming year not only cannot be expanded but must be decreased. Imports will be harder to get and more expensive when we get them. Costs are pressing upward against the price ceiling, causing many producers to find it difficult to work beneath those ceilings. Demands continue to be made for increased wages, and labour costs have a tendency to rise despite all efforts to stabilize them. The purchasing power in the hands of the public is already excessive in relation to what there is available to buy and appears likely to grow more excessive. In short, we find that the forces making for inflation are present on a large scale. The pressure is held in check only by the rigour of our existing taxation, by the willingness of Canadians to save on an unprecedented scale, and by our price control and wage control.

These are the economic facts. The cardinal financial fact is that the proposed expenditures are a billion dollars in excess of those of the current year. Our expenditures will, apparently, amount to more than one-half our gross national production. Revenues, on the other hand, without new taxes, will amount, it is true, to substantially more than ever before in our history, but they will still fall far short of our expenditures, leaving a deficit in the absence of tax changes of $2,899 million.

How much of this deficit should we seek to cover by new taxation or higher rates? How much from increased personal savings lent to the nation?

There are important considerations to be taken into account. Already our tax rates are heavy. They are heavy in absolute terms. They are heavy even by comparison with other countries at war to-day. They are very heavy by comparison with all our pre-war standards except in the case of the sales tax and customs duties, where we have deliberately avoided increases. Moreover, there is an automatic increase in the income tax deductions at the source which must occur under present legislation as soon as we change from deductions in respect of 1942 incomes to those in respect of 1943 incomes. This arises from the credit given in the 1942 rates of deduction for national defence tax payments in the first eight months of that year. Consequently, our day to day rates of tax deductions will increase without adding anything to our tax legislation. Already, taxation has forced some groups to readjust radically their whole scale of living. The new scale of deductions will require changes in the position of others.

There are upper limits to what can be equitably obtained by an income tax, as I have endeavoured to explain a number of times in the past. A man's income and the number of his dependents are not alone a perfect measure of ability to pay. Many other circumstances enter into a complete assessment of his position. The higher we force our taxation, the more necessary it is that we take these other circumstances into account. It was for this reason that last year, when tax rates were raised steeply, we provided allowances for medical expenses and certain savings commitments. The extent to which we can make special provision for additional varying circumstances of this sort, however, is strictly limited. We cannot make our tax so complicated that the ordinary man cannot understand it. It must be simple if it to be clear to the vast majority who are subject to it. Furthermore, every additional complication, every additional allowance that we make, increases the difficulty of administration and the risk of arbitrariness in administration. Already, we have thrust huge burdens on officials of the income tax division. Faced as they are with the difficulty of obtaining experienced and trained personnel, it is remarkable that they have been able to carry through all the radical changes we have already thrust upon them. To ask them to assume administratively hopeless tasks would be to risk a breakdown in our whole income tax system. Consequently, there are now very serious barriers both in equity and in administration to substantial increase in the income tax at this time.

There are serious arguments to-day in favour of a very substantial purchase tax on all but the most essential goods and services. Such a tax would mop up a considerable amount of excess purchasing power, and would assist in securing the orderly distribution of scarce supplies. It would make those who will spend on non-essentials pay dearly for the privilege. Such expenditure in itself is evidence of ability to pay. However, there are several serious objections to such a plan. In the first place, there are not going to be enough really non-essential goods and services to provide much revenue unless either we apply such a tax also to what are fairly essential goods, or put a tax on at exceedingly high rates. Probably, we would have to do both if we were to get enough revenue to meet any large proportion of our prospective deficit. I do not feel prepared to do this. I don't believe there are many goods to-day which should in effect be reserved for those with the longest purses. That would be the result of putting very heavy taxes on such articles.

The financial programme for the coming year will be the government's programme only in the sense that the government has the responsibility of recommending it. In fact, it must be achieved by the willing and combined efforts of all the people of this country. In view of this fact and balancing the considerations I have outlined, I have reached the decision that the proper measures for achieving the financial results which must be achieved are: some improvements and alterations in the personal income tax to make more effective changes which were made last year, a plan for bringing our income tax collections up to date and, at the same time, increasing the current revenue, a number of increases in commodity taxes, and a renewed and extended programme for increasing personal savings. I shall also have a number of less important changes and modifications to propose.

The first and most important measure I wish to propose is that foreshadowed in the speech from the throne—the placing of our personal income tax on a pay-as-we-earn basis. In this way we will complete the transformation in our income tax begun with the enactment of the national defence tax in 1941 and carried last year to an advanced stage both in collecting a graduated tax at the source and in collecting as early as possible after the income is received on which the tax is assessed. I am proposing that beginning this year, 1943, the income tax currently collected at the source or paid in quarterly instalments, shall apply in respect of the tax to be assessed on the income of this current year, 1943. If parliament sees fit to put this proposal into effect, we shall then be on a fully current income tax basis. No one, speaking generally, will then be liable for large amounts of income tax on income he has earned in the past—except to the extent that adjustments in tentative tax deductions or payments must be made after the year's income is finally determined with accuracy.

The advantages of a system of current payment of tax such as I propose are now well known, so I need only remind the house of them. Under this plan, when a man's income falls off, his tax falls off with it; when his income rises, his tax rises with it. It enables us to avoid the lag in the payment of tax under our present system—a lag which now amounts to about eight months, substantially less than it was several years ago, but still a problem to those suffering or expecting to suffer a reduction in income. The difficulties in the present system are most serious in the case of those whose incomes cease or decline severely because they enter the armed forces, lose their jobs, retire or die. Advocates of such a plan have made most people very much aware of the personal problems created in such situations by income tax debt. With taxes at present levels, such problems are now very difficult ones for any who have not made provision in advance for their taxes.

For example, a young married man who has earned $40 a week during 1942 who wished to join the air force at the beginning of this year had to face the necessity of paying income tax of $282 on his civilian income of last year out of his much lower service pay this year. Again, if a professional man earning, say, $5,000 a year, should die and leave behind a wife and two children, they would be liable for perhaps $831 of income taxes, whether or not there was any estate. The wage earner who loses his job would in many cases have anything up to several hundred dollars of income taxes to pay during the succeeding six months or year — taxes on income he had probably spent while he was earning it. Anyone who looks forward to early retirement on a pension considerably lower than his current earnings faces an almost insuperable barrier. We do not wish such persons either to exhaust what savings they have set aside or to be forced to break the law.

There are other substantial advantages of a pay-as-we-earn plan. It enables us to make more effective use of collection at the source from earnings and to avoid many refunds and adjustments that would otherwise be necessary. Secondly, it will make it possible in future to adjust our income tax rates and collections more promptly when changes in economic or other circumstances make such adjustments desirable. In this way it will make the income tax a better instrument of fiscal policy in helping to maintain full employment.

It is to overcome the various types of difficulty which I have described, and to obtain the other advantages of having our taxes on a sound current basis that the government is proposing now to complete the transformation of our income tax system to a full pay-as-we-earn plan.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Under this new plan, all the deductions of tax made at the source during 1943 will apply in respect of the tax on 1943 incomes. Those who pay in quarterly instalments will pay such instalments in March, June, September and December of this year in respect of this year's income. These instalment payments will be based upon an estimated income and tax for this year, with safeguards to be provided against underestimates. In both cases, the correct amount of income will be determined at the end of the year and a final return will be filed on or before March 31, 1944, together with any amount required to make up the difference between the total deductions or instalment payments and the actual tax. If the taxpayer finds he has had too much deducted or has paid too much, he will claim a refund on his tax return. In making tax deductions at the source from salaries and wages, we shall aim at collecting up to 95 per cent of the total tax liability, rather than 90 per cent as we did in the deduction tables for last year. This will cut down the amount to be paid at the end of the year in filing the return.

I wish to make it quite clear that the new plan will require us to bring into effect as soon as possible the higher rates of tax deductions which would have gone into effect next September. The reason for this is relatively simple and I want it to be understood. During 1942, we collected national defence tax for eight months. This counted towards the total tax on the income of 1942. The tax deductions that we put into effect last September, and which are in effect now, were, therefore, made high enough to collect only the remainder of 90 per cent of the tax for 1942, that is, 90 per cent of the total tax less the amount already paid as national defence tax. Now it is proposed to collect the 1943 tax on which we have paid nothing by means of national defence tax in the past. Consequently, our deductions must be somewhat higher even though the tax rates themselves have not been altered. Let me assure all taxpayers, however, that they will receive full credit against 1942 taxes for what they paid as national defence tax in 1942. It will be no longer reflected in lower deductions from pay, but it will be credited toward the 1942 tax—and in some cases there will be some left over to be refunded or carried as a credit against future taxes. The new rates of deduction will go into effect for the first payroll period commencing after March 31.

These new deductions will also be slightly higher because we shall aim, as I have said, at collecting 95 rather than 90 per cent of the total tax by this method.

It will be difficult to put farmers on a pay-as-we-earn basis because it is so very hard for them to estimate their income in advance. We are proposing to give them as much latitude as possible by simply requiring them to pay two-thirds of their tax any time up to December 31—on the basis of a rough guess or calculation—and the balance when they file their final return in March of the following year. Higher agricultural incomes have now brought many farmers into the taxable income ranges, and I am glad to know that the Department of National Revenue is making special efforts to assist the farmer in reckoning his income and calculating his tax. After some careful consideration of the special problems faced by farmers in regard to income tax, I am proposing another special measure to assist them in overcoming the extreme variation in income to which they are frequently subject because of weather and other changes. Last year, the house approved a change in the income tax law enabling any business to carry forward a loss suffered in 1942 or any later year as a charge against profits in the following year. We propose now to enable a loss to be carried forward two years in the case of farmers—so that if a farmer suffered loss during 1942 he can charge that against the income from his farm during either 1943 or 1944.

In order to make the change to a complete pay-as-we-earn system of taxation on the income of 1943 and subsequent years, it is necessary to make some adjustments of the tax on 1942 income. If this is not done, we should have to pay a large part of the 1942 tax as well as the 1943 tax during this year 1943. If tax rates were substantially lower than they are, this overlapping would not be serious. With rates at their present high levels, we must avoid piling the unpaid portion of the 1942 tax liability on top of the current collections for 1943. This is the difficult problem of the transition to the pay-as-we-earn system. Nearly everyone has recognized the virtues of being on the pay-as-we-earn system. There has been far less agreement about the means of making the transition to this plan.

Fortunately we are in a better position to make this transition in respect of 1942 incomes in Canada than we would be in respect of any other year. We had already collected during 1942 eight months of national defence tax deductions from salaries and wages and four months of deductions on the new scale introduced last September. As a consequence, those whose 1942 income consisted of salaries and wages had already paid a substantial part of their total tax by the end of the year. This proportion varies from about 33 per cent in case of fairly high incomes up to more than 100 per cent in the case of some lower incomes. The proportion paid in any particular case depends on the income, the number of dependents, and whether or not the taxpayer had savings commitments to set against the refundable part of his tax. In general, the higher the income the smaller the proportion of tax collected by the end of 1942, and the less of the refundable part of the tax that is covered by outside savings commitments, the smaller the proportion of the total tax already collected.

It should be remembered in considering this matter that our deduction plan was only intended to collect up to 90 per cent of the full tax, leaving 10 per cent to be settled by the taxpayer himself at the end of the year, against which any allowances for charitable contributions, special medical expenses, etcetera, could be made. This was also intended to leave a margin of safety to prevent over-deduction for those whose earnings varied or changed during the year.

Let me give the house a few examples to show where various types of persons stood at the end of 1942 in regard to the payment of their tax. A single person earning $30 a week through the year will have had $2.10 a week of national defence tax deducted for each of 35 weeks—and then $5.37 a week for the remaining 17 weeks, assuming that he was not able to offset the refundable portion of his tax against other specified savings commitments during 1942. Consequently, he had paid during 1942 a total of $164.79 against his total tax liability of $391.20. That is to say, he was 42 per cent paid up. A married man with two children earning $200 a month will have had 8 months national defence tax deduction of $6.66 deducted. In the last four months he will have had four monthly deductions of $24.87, if he is liable for the refundable portion of the tax. Consequently, he will have paid a total of $152.76 out of his total 1942 tax of $390.80, that is, 39 per cent. If this man had paid, say, life insurance premiums of more than $195.40 during 1942, his monthly tax deductions from September to December would have been $10.21, and consequently he would have paid a total for the year of $94.12. This would be 48 per cent of the tax for which he is liable on his 1942 income—bearing in mind that he is not required to pay the refundable portion. In the same way, it could be shown that a married man with two children and having a salary of $500 a month would have paid 38 per cent of his tax by the end of the year, assuming he had the savings portion of his tax covered by other savings commitments.

The case is somewhat different for those whose incomes are not made up very largely of wages and salaries. They are required to pay their tax in four quarterly instalments, based upon an estimate of their income for 1942. The first of these instalments was payable on or before October 15 and the second on or before January 15 of this year. Consequently, such persons had paid roughly half their taxes by the middle of January except to the extent that they underestimated their income and tax.

In summary then, it appears that most people had paid about half their tax or more by the beginning of this year; the remainder had paid between a third and a half of their tax, depending on circumstances.

In order to put the pay-as-we-earn plan into effect, we wish to have all tax deductions made during 1943 and all quarterly tax payments subsequent to that of January 15, 1943, apply in payment of 1943 taxes alone. We wish to avoid, so far as it is practicable, overlapping the payment of 1942 taxes with the current payment of 1943 taxes. Some overlapping for many people was to be expected in any case because we aimed at collecting only 90 per cent of the tax by deductions at the source, and the balance was to be paid at September 30—at the time deductions for 1943 taxes were to be taking place.

To put tax payments on a full pay-as-we-earn basis and avoid unreasonable overlapping of two years' taxes, the government has decided to propose that only one-half the full tax liability in respect of 1942 income shall now be payable. The tax liability will be reduced by one half in the case of earned incomes. For investment incomes half the 1942 liability will be deferred until the death of the taxpayer. Investment income of not more than $3,000 will be treated in the same way as earned income.

There is good reason to distinguish between earned income and investment income in making this adjustment to the pay-as-we-earn plan. The reasons for making the change arise almost entirely from the side of earned income. We wish to overcome the tax difficulties of those whose earnings cease or are reduced because they retire or die, or because they enter the armed forces or lose their jobs. In these circumstances there are much lower earnings or no earnings out of which to pay the tax due on past earnings. In the case of investment income there is almost always capital out of which such remaining taxes can be paid following the death of the taxpayer—or in other circumstances. Moreover most investment incomes are not so likely to decline rapidly or to cease, as are earned incomes. There is not such great need, therefore, to tax investment income on a current basis. Indeed the question of a change would never have arisen, I feel sure, if only investment income were concerned. It is not practical, however, to put one type of income on a current basis and not the other. Therefore we must make the shift in the collection of tax on investment income even though it is not required on its own merits. In doing so, however, we do not need to relieve the taxpayer, or his estate, of a tax which he or the estate is quite able to meet out of capital if not out of income. The course of action proposed is well in accord with the principle of taxing on the basis of ability to pay.

What we are proposing to do in respect of investment income is in effect to take the whole series of future tax payments to which it will be subject and bring them forward for earlier payment, including the unknown income tax that would be due on the death of the taxpayer, and to take the first such payment—50 per cent of the 1942 tax—and put it at the other end. Thus we substitute a definite and known liability at the time of death for an unknown and uncertain one. It is something which a man may, if he wishes, prepare for and even insure against. We are not adding to the burden on investment income—we are simply rearranging it. We are also withholding from investment income, which does not need it, the relief which we propose to give in the case of earned income and which takes effect at the time such income ceases or declines.

It is proposed to treat investment incomes up to $3,000 in the same way as earned income—forgiving 50 per cent of the tax instead of deferring it. This will enable us to avoid having to keep track over a long period of a large number of small accounts. It will afford a measure of relief in the future to those whose investment income really represents the fruits of earlier earnings or the protection against want which a man has provided for his dependents. It will also enable us to avoid what would otherwise be discrimination between those who have provided for their own old age by savings in the form of modest annuities and those whose employers have provided for them by pensions or superannuation payments which are included in earned incomes. Larger annuities are comparable with other forms of investment income, rather than with pensions, and will be left in the same position as at present except insofar as they benefit from the adjustment in respect of the first $3,000.

To illustrate the effects of the proposed means of dealing with the tax on 1942 incomes, I would like, with the permission of the house, to place on Hansard at this point two tables of figures, one showing the situation in respect of earned incomes of various amounts and the other showing that in respect of investment incomes. These the house and the public can examine at length.

* This amount is one-half the unadjusted total liability. The quarterly instalments paid in respect of this income in Oct. 1942 and Jan. 1943, together with deductions at the source, will presumably already have covered most of this liability. The residual, if any, must be paid during 1943.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

I will also give the house a few examples now to illustrate how the proposals work out. As a first example, let us recall the case I mentioned a few moments ago of the single man or woman earning $30 a week during 1942 and without credits to offset his refundable tax. Out of a total liability of $391.20, he had paid $164.79 by the end of the year. Cutting his liability in half leaves him with $30.81 still to pay. Of his reduced total liability of $195.60, $62.40 is to be refunded after the war and the balance, $133.20, is the net tax. If this man in question had been paying life insurance premiums or other types of contractual savings relieving him of the liability for refundable tax, he would only have about $5 left to pay when he files his return. Our second example was a married man with two children, earning $200 a month. He had paid, you will recall, $152.76 out of a total tax of $390.80, if he was liable for the refundable portion of the tax. Now that his liability is cut in two, he will only have $42.64 left to pay. If he had insurance premiums which looked after the refundable portion of his tax, he would only have $3.58 left to pay. Going higher up the scale, and assuming for these higher incomes that the refundable portion of the tax is covered by other savings commitments, we find that a married man with two children earning a salary of $5,000 had a total liability in respect of 1942 taxes of $1,062, of which $412 had been deducted at the source. When his liability is cut in half, this will leave him $119 of tax remaining to be paid. Similarly a $10,000 a year man will have paid $1,208 out of a total liability of $3,346, and when the liability is adjusted, he will have $465 to pay.

In the case of investment income we may reasonably assume, I think, that the two quarterly instalments together with deductions at the source have accounted for most of the 50 per cent liability that must be paid immediately. This is the end of the matter so far as investment incomes of less than $3,000 are concerned. For those of more than $3,000 we must take half of that proportion of the tax which corresponds to the proportion of income constituted by investment income in excess of $3,000. This amount is deferred and will be due at the death of the taxpayer. In the case of a $10,000 investment income the additional deferred payments will amount to $1,908; in the case of a $20,000 investment income they will be $5,342; for a $100,000 investment income they will be $39,933; and for those very few who enjoy investment incomes of more than this amount, they will be correspondingly greater. The figures I have quoted as examples are those for a single person having no savings credits—in all other cases the amounts will be lower.

It will be observed that the amounts remaining to be paid this year in respect of 1942 tax liabilities are relatively small. For the majority of taxpayers they will be substantially less than the 10 per cent of the tax which it had been anticipated would be payable next September. In a great many cases, those with relatively small incomes will be entitled to a refund of some of the tax which has already been deducted at the source. The amount of these refunds will be very small in most cases, rarely exceeding $15, and I would hope that most of the taxpayers will see fit to leave these amounts as credits toward any amount owing on their 1943 tax at the end of the year. Those with incomes in the middle brackets, let us say from $2,000 to $5,000 per year, will find the amounts remaining to be paid relatively small if they have savings commitments that look after the refundable portion of their tax. If they must pay the refundable portion of their tax, the amount remaining will be somewhat more than the 10 per cent they were expecting to pay in September and consequently they will need to make an increased effort to provide this additional amount of forced saving, at the same time that they are paying their 1943 tax. In order to enable them to make these payments, it is proposed to require only one-third of the remaining outstanding amount to be paid at the time the return is filed, which will be June 30th, and the balance may be paid any time during the remaining six months of the year. For those with salaries in excess of $5,000 or $10,000 a year, the amounts remaining to be paid of the 1942 tax will in all cases, I believe, exceed the 10 per cent which it was expected would be due in September. I believe, however, that it is not unreasonable to leave this relatively slight extra burden on such persons at this time, bearing in mind that we are not making any increase in the rates of tax.

The adoption of the pay-as-we-earn plan, together with the other changes associated with it, will increase our revenues in the next fiscal year and in subsequent years. It may seem strange at first sight that a rearrangement which involves cancelling some tax liabilities and making no increase in tax rates could somehow increase our tax revenues. The reason is that we replace the cancelled liabilities by bringing forward the taxes to be paid in all future years.

The effects of these changes upon revenue in the new fiscal year, 1943-44, will be an increase of about $115 million in our receipts from personal income taxes, of which roughly $15 million will be refundable after the war.

Some of this increase will arise from the fact that the higher scale of deductions from earnings will go into effect in April instead of September. Another part will result from the fact that 1943 incomes will be higher than those in 1942. There will be some increase due to the payment of the remaining liability in respect of 1942 incomes in the same year that 1943 taxes are paid. I should add that several minor adjustments in income tax which I will mention shortly will mean the loss of some revenue, perhaps $10 million in all, and, consequently, the net increase in our income tax revenue in this new fiscal year is estimated at about $105 million in all, of which $15 million will be refundable.

The next proposal which I wish to mention is designed to clear up an anomaly which is certain to be vexatious to those affected and might lead to further undesirable results. It may be recalled that there is a provision in the law that the tax shall not reduce the income of a single person below $660 per year, nor that of a married person below $1,200 per year. The effect is that the tax, for example, on $1,200 of income for a married person is nothing, while that on $1,300 is $100, of which $50 will be refunded after the war. Thus there are ranges both above the $660 exemption and the $1,200 exemption over which in effect the tax, including the refundable portion absorbs every extra dollar added to income. This range extends from $660 per year to $733 per year in the case of single persons and from $1,200 per year to $1,362 per year in the case of married persons with no dependents. This high rate of tax on additional earnings over these ranges has not been effective this year in the deductions made from wages and salaries because at these levels of income the adjustments arising from the national defence tax have been substantial. Hence, it has not, up to date, so far as I know, been the cause of much difficulty or complaint nor has it been noted by many persons. However, the new table of deductions which must be put into effect in April would reflect fully this anomaly and the removal of incentive in these income ranges might have substantial and undesirable results. In order to maintain incentives at a time when it is desired to ensure so far as possible that everyone will stay at work and put his whole effort into work, I am proposing that we change this border-line provision. The new formula I am suggesting is that the tax in the ranges affected shall not be greater than two-thirds of the amount by which the income exceeds $660 in the case of single persons and $1,200 in the case of married persons. Under this arrangement, any additional dollar of income in this border-line range will go one-third in cash to the recipient, one-third in tax and one-third in refundable tax. This makes the incentive much greater than it is under the present formula, particularly for those who mistakenly attach little importance to the refund feature. This mistaken attitude may be based on the fact that they have not as yet received any form of security representing the taxes refundable to them. However, I have repeatedly stated and now wish to reiterate that within a reasonable time after the tax liability for 1942 is established and discharged, the taxpayer will receive a receipt or certificate covering the refundable portion of the tax which will be just as binding an obligation of the dominion as a victory bond or a war savings certificate. I would like to take this opportunity to emphasize that the refunding of this tax to those entitled to it is one of the most certain acts of any post-war government that I can imagine. Not only does the whole credit of the dominion stand behind this undertaking to repay but it would be political suicide for any government, however radical or however reactionary, to default on an obligation due to the mass of the wage-earners of the country.

I have two minor additions to propose to the list of those savings commitments which are recognized as alternative to the payment of the refundable portion of the tax. The first addition is principal payments on a mortgage on the home of the taxpayer when the property is held in the name of the wife or husband of the taxpayer. Last year, we discussed this situation and I was not prepared to include such payments as I believed that such arrangements of family property were artificial and were very frequently intended to relieve the head of the household of financial responsibilities which he should be prepared to carry in his own name. Since then, I have had my attention drawn to a great many types of cases where there were other good reasons for having the property in the name of the wife of the taxpayer and I do not now believe that there is any serious objection to recognizing such arrangements. It has also been found that quite a number of people have transferred property or transferred the mortgage from the wife's name to the taxpayer's name in order to bring them within the law. These transfers are relatively expensive in many cases and in the province of Quebec they are not possible. Since no important purpose is served by encouraging such transfers during the years in which our refundable tax is in effect and since it is inequitable to have a tax which can be escaped in one part of the country but not in another

I am suggesting that we now recognize these principal payments on a mortgage when title to the property is held in the name of the consort of the taxpayer as well as when title is in the name of the taxpayer himself.

The second addition to the list of recognized savings commitments concerns Dominion annuities. Last year, there was considerable discussion as to whether or not Dominion annuities should be included. I did not believe they should be included because they did not fall within the general definition of those types of contractual savings which we wished to recognize. The principle on which we were working was that we should include only savings contracts which could not be altered without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer. In the case of Dominion annuities, the payments can be postponed at relatively small cost, since all that is involved is the difference in interest rates on the annuity and on the refundable portion of the tax. During the past eight months in which the law has been in effect, I have found that a great many of those having annuity payments to make have found it exceedingly difficult to understand this important principle on which we have been operating. However there is a degree of loss or forfeiture which becomes important for those whose annuities are about to mature. In view of this, and the difficulty of making the principle clear to the large number of small annuity holders I am recommending that contractual annual payments for the purchase of Dominion government annuities shall not be excluded from the list of recognized offsets against the refundable portion of the tax.

I have a number of relatively minor amendments to the income tax which I shall mention only briefly. One such amendment is intended to clarify the position of Canadian employees of Canadian companies who are temporarily engaged abroad on war work. There is some doubt as to the residential status of these employees, particularly single men, under the act as at present drawn up and it is intended to make it clear that they are taxable. There will be other changes in the wording of several sections of the act which will be made clear in the bill and which are intended to strengthen the law against possible evasion. Another provision will extend the time allowed to corporations in filing their income tax return from four months to six months after the close of their fiscal year. They are now allowed six months to pay their tax and in view of the shortage of accountants at present, it is considered desirable to permit an additional two months for the complicated work of making up the tax returns of corporations. I shall have several other minor changes to propose in regard to the making of returns and the penalties involved for those failing to make complete returns.

There is an important amendment to be made in regard to the provisions for special depreciation allowances granted for war purposes. It will be recalled that these special depreciation allowances have been permitted in the case of capital invested for essential war purposes either in cases approved by the war contracts depreciation board or in those approved by the governor in council under the terms of the War Exchange Conservation Act. Where these special depreciation allowances have been granted it has been generally understood by all the parties concerned that the plant and equipment to be depreciated in this way will have very little market value at the close of the war. It is desirable to safeguard the crown in the occasional case which may arise where such property proves to have an unexpected market value after the war. It is therefore proposed that when immovable assets have been depreciated in this way and later sold for more than their depreciated value any excess of such sales value over the depreciated value shall be applied to reduce the special depreciation already taken in respect of such assets. As a further safeguard against fictitious sales or sales between related corporations, it is proposed that when assets which have been written down by means of either special or ordinary depreciation are sold by a company, for example, to another company in which the first has an interest, then the second or purchasing company will be restricted in depreciating such assets further. This is a complicated matter to try to put briefly in a budget speech, and I refer any person desiring further information to the resolution dealing with this measure which I shall table before resuming my seat.

The members of the house will recall the difficult problems which have arisen in regard to the exemptions from taxation that have been granted to various classes of members of the armed services. Considerable study has been given to this question since the last session of parliament in the hope that a way could be found to remove the various anomalies which were still present even after the improvements which we effected last year. The problem created by the exemption from taxation of officers as well as men who are overseas while officers in Canada (except under certain circumstances) are taxable has proved to be such a fundamental difficulty that no simple solution is possible. We cannot overcome this distinction between officers at home and abroad unless we are prepared either to place a substantial tax on those abroad or relieve those at home from income taxes which they should bear just as well as civilians. I believe that the house will see objections to either of these courses. Consequently, I am not proposing that we change the tax status of officers overseas nor that of officers at home, except to the extent that I shall mention in a moment. I am proposing, however, that we shall recognize a middle group, constituted of those serving in the western hemisphere outside of Canada. Officers serving in this area will be liable to one-half the rate of tax in respect of their remuneration, excluding subsistence allowances. Heretofore they have been exempt, as they have been considered as serving abroad, but because of the way in which the war has developed I think it is reasonable to make a distinction between those who are in the United Kingdom or elsewhere across the ocean and those who are in Newfoundland, the West Indies, Labrador or Alaska.

Last year, it was provided that the tax payable by commissioned officers in the armed services, apart from the refundable portion of the tax, should not be greater than the excess of their pay over $1,600 in the case of single men, nor the excess of pay and allowances over $1,600 plus the similar allowances appropriate in the case of a warrant officer for married men. This provision was intended to overcome the anomalies created by the fact that commissioned officers were taxable, while senior non-commissioned officers were not, and the tax frequently had the result of reducing the net income of a senior man below that paid to his junior. This provision overcame most of the problem but it has been by no means perfect. It still leaves the compulsory savings portion of the tax effective in reducing an officer's retained cash income below that of a warrant officer in certain cases. Moreover it reduces substantially the difference between the net income of the junior commissioned officers and those immediately above them in rank, leaving no benefit to be gained or very little from promotions in this range. We have worked out now an improved method of making adjustments of this character which is free from the objections in the present measure. The new proposal involves a change in the form of the provision from a limitation on the tax to that of a credit against the tax. It is proposed as well that the line between taxable and non-taxable members of the forces will be drawn on a basis of income rather than on the basis of commissioned rank.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Under the new arrangement, those members of the forces receiving pay in excess of $1,600 a year will be liable for tax, whether commissioned officers or warrant officers, unless they are exempt because serving abroad, or because their duties are normally performed in aircraft or afloat. They will receive, however, a credit toward their tax equal to the tax payable on an income of $1,600 for single persons, or on $1,600 plus the appropriate dependents' allowance for those with dependents. This tax credit will be reduced, however, by the proportion which the excess of the service income of the officer above $1,600 (or above $1,600 plus allowances in the case of officers with dependents) bears to $1,600 (or $1,600 plus allowances). This will result in the tax credit being limited to those within the pay range of $1,600 to $3,200. Let me give an example to show how this works—taking the case of a single man for the sake of simplicity. A single lieutenant receives pay of $1,825. The tax paid by a single man on an income of $1,600 is approximately $407. For the lieutenant's case we must reduce this by the fraction formed by $1,825 less $1,600—that is, $225—over $1,600. That reduces the credit by 14 per cent, leaving an effective credit of $350. His tax before the application of this credit would be $522 but the credit will reduce it to $172, of which $86 will be savings. Under the present arrangement this lieutenant would pay a tax of $371, of which $146 is savings. It can be seen that this provision will chiefly benefit junior officers and officers with several dependents. It will bring into the taxable category a few warrant officers whose pay, including trades pay, exceeds $1,600. The proposal has the great advantage of providing a gradual application of the tax in such a way as not to disturb unreasonably the pay differential between various ranks.

The new arrangement for taxing at half rates those in the western hemisphere outside of Canada will help to remove some of the anomalous comparisons between persons serving in certain areas of Canada and paying tax and those serving across the boundary line or the Strait of Belle Isle and being exempt from tax. There is another anomaly which can be removed without exempting all administrative and training officers at home, or taxing officers abroad. This is the sudden reduction in income faced by an officer brought home from service abroad, which occurs because he thereby becomes liable to tax. It is proposed that such an officer returning to Canada after having served on the strength of a unit overseas shall be exempt from tax for a period of six months, or a period equal to the time he served overseas if that was less than six months. This will give returning officers an opportunity to adjust themselves to the new circumstances.

Included in the income tax proposals are a number intended to encourage the search for new sources of oil in Canada during the next two years. The government recognizes the urgent necessity under present emergency conditions of expanding our oil production and, if possible, of discovering new oil-producing areas in various parts of Canada. Success in the search for oil depends upon a combination of experience, skill and good judgment, as well as capital and good luck; it is essential therefore to bring into the search all we can of those with the necessary skill and experience. We desire to remove so far as possible any barriers which taxation may impose in the way of this search for oil. Several of the proposed measures can be put into effect by regulation but I wish to inform parliament and the public at once of our intention to apply them. We propose to revise the schedule under which pre-production expenses of any oil well may be written off against the income from it. The new schedule will be 40 per cent in the first year, 30 per cent in the second, 20 per cent in the third, and the remaining 10 per cent in the fourth. It will not be necessary to take all of these amounts in the years specified, and any amounts not used may be carried forward. In the case of wells commenced—"spudded in" I believe is the correct term—between January 1 of this year and March 31 of 1945, pre-production expenses may be written off as rapidly as the operator desires. The third change to be made by regulation is an increase from 15 per cent to 25 per cent in the depreciation rate to be applied to all depreciable assets used in oil production, including oil drilling equipment. Fourthly, it is proposed that a special wartime depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent instead of the present 20 per cent be permitted in respect of royalty payments received by investors from wells spudded in in the period January 1, 1943, to March 31, 1945.

There are two other proposals to encourage oil production that will require legislation. It is proposed that companies formed for the purpose of exploration and drilling for oil will be allowed to accumulate exploration costs incurred during the period January 1, 1943, to March 31, 1945, and to write off such expenses against the income produced from any well which they may find. Secondly, it is proposed that all exploration costs, including geological and geophysical expenses incurred during the period from January 1, 1943, to March 31, 1945, and all off-property drilling expenses of dry wells which had been spudded in during this period shall be allowed as an expense or deduction against the current income of companies whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or its products. The tax saving so obtained will be limited to 40 per cent of the expenditures involved.

In addition to oil, the government wishes to encourage the search for new base metal and strategic mineral deposits, which continue to be urgently required for war purposes. It is therefore proposed to renew the present provision of the law, enacted last year, regarding amounts invested by individuals in prospecting syndicates searching for base metals and strategic minerals. Instead of renewing the corresponding provision in respect of mining companies sending out their own parties, it is now proposed to allow companies engaged in the mining of metalliferous and strategic minerals to write off exploration and prospecting expenses incurred in prospecting anywhere in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals. In this case, as in the case of oil, the saving in tax will be limited to 40 per cent of the expenditure.

As I have already indicated, the proposed changes in commodity taxes are not numerous and are such as are dictated not only by the need for revenue but also by the facts in respect of particular trades and revenues.

In order to make clear the proposals I have to make relating to imposts on liquor, it will first be necessary for me to give the house some background in regard to certain representations received from provincial governments in regard to their revenues from liquor sales. The dominion's liquor restriction programme was announced on December 16 last and provided, inter alia, for reductions of 30, 20 and 10 per cent in the quantity of spirits, wines and beer, respectively, available for sale during the twelve months beginning November 1, 1942, as compared with the quantity made available during the preceding twelve months. On December 17 I issued a statement expressing the hope that the new regulations would not financially embarrass the provinces, particularly as certain measures of adjustment were open to them. However, requests were received from certain provincial governments for a conference in order to discuss the effect of the restrictions on provincial revenues. This conference was held on January 28 and resulted in requests from representatives of most of the provincial governments that the dominion should make up to them any loss in revenue from liquor sales and also from motor vehicle licences which they might suffer in future as compared with their receipts from these sources in some base year. Varying base years were suggested by different provinces—the fiscal year 1941-42, the calendar year 1942, the year ending October 31, 1942, and the fiscal year 1942-43. The provinces were asked to submit their representations in writing and, while these submissions have not as yet been received from all provinces, we have given very careful consideration to such as have been received as well as to other pertinent data and are prepared to recommend a programme which we believe should accord with the equities of the situation as a whole and meet the reasonable needs of the provinces.

I am not so optimistic as to assume that it will fully satisfy all provincial governments, but we who are charged with responsibility for financing war expenditures of the colossal magnitude which I have described must never forget that there is but one tax-paying public in Canada, which pays taxes both to the dominion and to the provinces, and that, particularly under present conditions, there is an overriding obligation on all governments to avoid extracting from the pockets of the people any funds that are not absolutely necessary. What we propose, therefore, is (1) to levy an additional excise duty of $2 per proof gallon on spirits, with a corresponding increase in the duty on imported spirits to which I shall refer later, and (2) to guarantee to any province the revenues it received from all alcoholic beverages during the twelve months ending June 30, 1942, provided it is willing to increase the retail price of the spirits it sells by an amount at least sufficient to absorb our extra levy of $2 per proof gallon and an additional amount equivalent to $2 per proof gallon for the benefit of the province itself.

Let me explain the reasons for the main aspects of this proposal so that its full significance may be clear to the house. Obviously we believe that spirits can stand an additional levy of $4 per gallon; only 70 per cent of the quantity sold in the basic twelve months will be available for sale in any future 12-month period and that quantity will be sold almost as readily with the $4 increase as without. Indeed, the higher price should definitely ease the difficulties experienced by the provinces in rationing the smaller available supply. If all the available supply can be sold at the higher price and if the provinces thus have it in their power to offset their possible loss of revenue by a price adjustment, it would be unthinkable that this reasonable and appropriate solution of the problem should be overlooked and, instead, the dominion should be forced to accept an additional burden on behalf of the taxpayers of the country as a whole.

It will also be noted that the guarantee we propose to give will be based on provincial liquor revenues for the twelve months ending June 30, 1942. Had we not also been making a proposal, which I shall explain a little later on, to change the basis of levying customs duty on imported spirits, it might have been appropriate to consider applying a guarantee to revenues for the twelve months ending October 31 last. However, this other proposal, coupled with the reduction in the strength of spirits to not more than 30 underproof, will increase the revenues of the provinces in two ways, first, by reducing the amount of customs duty payable on imported spirits, and secondly, by increasing the number of bottles per proof gallon available for sale. We believe that the increased revenues obtainable in these two ways will be sufficient to compensate the provinces for having their liquor revenues guaranteed on the basis of the period ending on June 30, 1942, rather than the period ending on October 31, 1942.

As a result of this suggested programme, the provinces will be assured of a minimum revenue equal to, or nearly equal to, the highest annual revenue they have ever obtained from liquor sales, and, in addition, will have the possibility of enjoying an increase in that revenue as a result of higher retail prices and the savings in customs duties on imported spirits. I am hopeful that the guarantee should not cost the dominion anything and, if this proves to be the case, it will be as it should be, as I am sure the house and the country would wish it to be.

We gave very careful consideration to whether we should guarantee provincial revenues from motor vehicle licences. The provinces had requested this on the ground that such revenue was likely to fall off substantially because of dominion restrictions on gasoline and rubber tires and also because the new liquor control regulations were likely to cause a substantial falling off in their most expansible source of revenue. However, it is the war, and not the dominion government, which is responsible for the restrictions on gasoline and rubber, and the provinces cannot expect to be protected against every contingency to which the war may give rise. Furthermore, the programme I have suggested in regard to liquor should prevent a further falling off in liquor receipts and ensure the provinces very high continuing revenue from this source. Examination of the published accounts of the various provinces will show a very substantial increase in their ordinary revenues since the outbreak of war, which is of course due, directly or indirectly, to our own huge expenditures for war purposes. For the first time in many years, all provinces have been showing surpluses on ordinary account, some of them very substantial indeed, and others calculated after setting aside sizeable reserves of one kind or another. We are glad to see that the war has made it possible for the provinces to achieve a material strengthening in their financial positions. The war, however, has made the financial task of the Dominion infinitely more difficult. Because of that, because of the picture which I have had to present in this budget, I believe the house and the country will regard as fully justified the decision which we have reached to reject the provincial request for a guarantee of revenues from motor vehicle licences and to subject our proposed guarantee of provincial liquor revenues to the conditions which I have described.

Increasingly large sums are being spent by the public on cigarettes and tobacco and I propose to increase the revenue derived from this source. It will be recommended that the tax on cigarettes under the Special War Revenue Act be increased by one cent for each five cigarettes or fraction of five, making the total tax under this act two cents for each five cigarettes in addition to the excise duty of $6 per thousand. This change should produce an increase of $22,000,000 in revenue. In conformity with this change, it is proposed to raise the excise taxes on cigarette papers and tubes from six to eight cents and from twelve to fourteen cents per hundred respectively. We hope to derive $2,000,000 extra revenue from this source.

Similarly, it is proposed to increase the tax under the Special War Revenue Act on manufactured tobacco from one to two cents per ounce. The excise duty of 35 cents a pound will remain unchanged. An excise tax on raw leaf tobacco of one-half cent per ounce is recommended to bring the total excise tax and duty to 28 cents a pound. The increases on raw and manufactured tobacco are expected to contribute $6,700,000 in additional revenue.

It is recommended that the tax on cigars under the Special War Revenue Act should be raised by $5 per thousand in the first price category and by appropriate increases in the higher price categories.

The amount of expenditures by the public in night clubs and similar places of entertainment seems to me to warrant an increase in the tax on such expenditures and I shall recommend that the rate be raised from 20 per cent to 25 per cent. It will be recalled that the tax applies to the amount of every charge made to a patron of such place of entertainment and is paid in the first instance by the patron to the operator. An increase in revenue to the extent of $500,000 is anticipated to result from this change.

Thus far in the war no change has been made in the postal rates. The need for revenue is now so great that a change can no longer be delayed. It is proposed to levy an additional tax, under the Special War Revenue Act, effective April 1, of one cent per ounce or fraction thereof on certain categories of mail, viz., on first-class office to office mail, (not including postcards, nor letters addressed to members of the armed forces overseas), and on so-called "drop" letters, i.e., letters collected by and distributed from the same office. The total rates will be four cents for out of town letters, and three cents for "drop" letters. The increased revenue expected from these changes is $8 million.

The customs tariff has fallen from the high position it has previously held as an instrument of fiscal and economic policy. Under the circumstances of war, the tariff has little effect except as a producer of revenue. The scope and direction of trade are now governed by the consideration of supply, transportation and enemy action and not by the tariff. Under these circumstances, changes in the customs tariff are of no effect in expanding or curtailing trade. I do not propose, therefore, to recommend changes in the tariff other than a few modifications chiefly for the purpose of amending tariff items which have become outdated.

There will again, however, be a time when the tariff will be an important instrument of trade policy and when this country will have to decide whether it will play its part with other countries which are prepared to help in freeing the world's trade, in enlarging markets, and in promoting the full and effective use of the world's resources.

The government has already, by an exchange of notes with the United States on November 30 last, undertaken to enter into conversations with that country, and with other countries, for the purpose of formulating programmes of agreed action directed to the expansion, after the war, of production, employment, and the exchange and consumption of goods, to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers.

Committed to these objects and having in mind particularly the vital concern of this country in access to the selling and buying markets of the world, the government is prepared to discuss with the government of the United States, the government of the United Kingdom, or the governments of other countries with which we trade, reciprocal trade arrangements wider in scope and longer in duration than have hitherto been made, provided always that the advantages of such arrangements shall be open to other countries willing to adhere to the same terms.

We believe that questions of post-war commercial policy must be tackled broadly and boldly; we believe that world trade must have a more liberal and dependable charter than it has had in the past two decades; and that countries, such as Canada, for which world trade is the very blood stream, should be prepared, not merely to accept desirable arrangements but to take the initiative in working out a plan mutually of benefit to ourselves and to other countries. We believe that countries which have had long experience of friendly relations should associate themselves with that initiative and furnish to others examples of concrete accomplishment in the distribution of the world's products for the mutual welfare of all people.

The most important of the tariff changes proposed relates to the customs duty on imported spirits. The additional duty on spirits is being increased from $5 per proof gallon to $7 per proof gallon in order to equalize the increase being made in the Excise Act making the total duty on imported spirits $12. For many years, it has been the practice to make no allowance below fifteen per cent in computing the quantity for duty purposes of imported spirits of a lesser strength than fifteen per cent under proof. Since it is not lawful now to sell spirits of greater strength than thirty per cent under proof, it is proposed that customs duty shall be collected on the actual strength of proof. The other changes proposed in the customs tariff provide for a number of tariff reductions and amend the wording of several items to facilitate administration. The duty free item covering nickel alloys is widened in scope. The other changes relate to certain articles for the manufacture, maintenance and repair of buoys and beacons, cigarette paper in sheets, bolting cloth, glue and fresh, frozen or dried peel.

This completes the tax changes which I am recommending and I shall, with the permission of the house, put on Hansard two tables, one showing the increases in revenue expected from the tax changes recommended, and the other the full revenue estimates for the coming fiscal year after giving effect to the changes in tax rates and time of payment.

CONCLUSION

On the basis of these estimates of the yields of the increase in tax rates, the total revenue for 1943-44 (including the refundable portions of the personal income and excess profits taxes) should be approximately $2,752 million. With expenditures of $5,500 million, we will have a budgetary deficit of $2,748 million to be covered by borrowing as compared to the similarly estimated deficit in the current year of $2,161 million.

The programme which I recommend to the house and to the people of Canada is briefly and simply this, that each man and woman in this country should limit personal and business expenditures so that provision can be made of $5,500 million for the purposes of war and the ordinary conduct of government; that we should contribute $2,752 million through the taxes now in force and the additional rates which I have recommended and that we should lend an additional $2,748 million. As far as simple formal standards will permit and careful scrutiny by the house will ensure, the tax contributions will be adjusted to the ability of each receiver of income to pay. But beyond this, all of us, individually and as people united in a common purpose, must determine our own ability to lend out of savings in accordance with the common objective and so manage our spending that we can achieve our share of the great task that is ahead of us in 1943-44.

The carrying out, and to some degree the organization, of the borrowing programme is in the hands of the people themselves. It will be directed by the National War Finance Committee to whom I have four requests to make.

(1) to continue and expand the programme of increasing the public understanding of the critical need for greatly increased savings;

(2) to multiply the sale of war savings certificates and stamps;

(3) to organize and carry out in the next twelve months two victory loan campaigns directed particularly to the mobilization for war of the personal savings of the people on a vastly enlarged scale;

(4) to promote by every means the retention by purchasers to the end of the war of the bonds and certificates which they buy.

Let me emphasize two points. The only way to accomplish this financial and economic programme is through increased personal savings, spending less and lending more. Some of the people's savings are mobilized and lent to the government through the insurance companies and other financial institutions. Businesses can contribute savings out of retained profits, unexpended depreciation and maintenance funds and unnecessary working capital. Large subscriptions to loans representing but a temporary shifting of assets will not do what must be done.

My second point is this: After the close of each victory loan campaign, many thousands of subscribers dispose of the bonds they bought during the campaign period. Further, many thousands of people are presenting their war savings certificates for redemption. I should like to make it clear that victory loan bonds and war savings certificates are the property of their individual owners who have the right to turn them into cash at any time they may desire. No restrictions on the sale of bonds or on the redemption of the certificates after six months are under consideration, and no restrictions have been under contemplation at any time in the past. When a person buys a victory bond or a war savings certificate, that person is making it possible for this country to get the men and material needed for war use, and is helping to fight the home-front battle against inflation. When people sell their bonds or present their certificates for redemption, they are withdrawing this help.

Emergency needs for cash are legitimate reasons for selling bonds or redeeming certificates, provided the person has no other forms of savings which can be used, or provided the person cannot obtain a temporary loan, to be repaid out of future income, to meet the immediate need for cash. Sales or redemptions to get dollars to buy things that are not essential have not legitimate reason. We must not only increase our voluntary savings and lend them to our country through the purchase of victory loan bonds and war savings certificates; we must also continue to hold these securities at least until after the war, unless we need money for real emergency use. I repeat what I said in the budget last year, "Let us compete with our neighbours, in saving, not spending."

The National War Finance Committee is performing a task of the first importance in our war programme. The responsibilities of each person in this organization are very great, and I have now made them greater.

Let no one be misled because I have considered it wise in the interest of the total objective to improve and simplify the collection of taxes rather than, to any great degree, to increase rates and add new complications. The need is so great that it must be understood clearly and each person must see clearly his own part in meeting that need.

I shall not conceal from the house nor from the people that the programme which I have set out is a huge one and will be difficult of achievement. It is not a financial programme; it is only the financial aspect of our war programme. The basic facts are that industrial workers who are making shells and tanks and planes cannot at the same time make food, and clothing and shelter. Farmers cannot produce food for home consumption in the time spent on producing cheese and bacon for countries on shorter rations than we. Ships carrying ore to make aluminum to make planes, or oil and gasoline for air operations, cannot carry sugar and gasoline for the rest of us.

The Canadian people can shoulder this task so that they can bring this year their war programme to its highest effectiveness and in addition assure to themselves and to the men returning from the fighting fronts resources for a more prosperous and ordered world after the war. I have confidence in the strength, the discipline and the united purpose of the people of Canada.

We do not know when victory will be achieved. No one knows. Anyone who professes knowledge is an irresponsible deceiver. And in my judgment those who are airily predicting victory in 1943 as if they did know are contributing to a premature relaxation of our war effort and in this way doing a great deal of harm. Most of those who believe that the war will be finished in 1943 and that we should be careful lest we put forth too great an effort are the same persons who thought it had finished and that we had lost in 1940.

We know two things and two things only. We know that we are in a position to strike hard, perhaps crushing blows in 1943 against those peoples who have made good their evil threat to bathe the world in blood. We know that the time to relax our efforts in a war with desperate and cunning adversaries is when they have given up their arms and surrendered unconditionally.

We do not need to tell these things to the men of the army undergoing ever more intensive battle training for the moment when they strike. We do not need to tell them to the men of the navy driving through biting wind and perilous sea to find the lurking submarine. We do not need to tell them to the airmen winging their way over Germany and Italy. We in this house and the people of this country need to tell them to ourselves.

Our soldiers, our sailors, our airmen will do their part. They are well trained; they are well equipped; they are well led; their courage and devotion are beyond praise. But what they achieve, they cannot achieve alone. It must be shared by the farmer at his work, the mechanic in the shop, the housewife in her home—in short, by every Canadian. Their achievements will be shared by each Canadian who, this year, and to the end of the war, carries out unswervingly, skilfully, relentlessly the watchwords of this budget: work and save.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

EXCISE ACT, 1934

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the schedule to the Excise Act, 1934, and to provide:

1. That the duty of excise on spirits distilled in Canada be increased from nine dollars to eleven dollars per proof gallon, provided that duty paid spirits owned by any distiller at the close of business on the second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three shall be subject to the following additional duty of excise on every gallon of the strength of proof two dollars and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

2. That the duty of excise on Canadian brandy be increased from seven dollars to nine dollars per proof gallon, provided that duty paid Canadian brandy owned by any distiller at the close of business on the second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three, shall be subject to the following additional duty of excise on every gallon of the strength of proof two dollars and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

3. That any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolution shall come into force on the third day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:

1. That the excise tax on each letter transmitted by post be increased from one to two cents.

2. That the excise tax on cigarettes be increased from one cent to two cents for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package of cigarettes manufactured in or imported into Canada.

3. That the excise tax on manufactured tobacco be increased from one to two cents per ounce actual weight or fraction thereof on manufactured tobacco of all descriptions, except cigars or cigarettes, manufactured in or imported into Canada.

4. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of one-half cent per ounce actual weight or fraction thereof on Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette paper be increased from six cents for each one hundred leaves or fraction thereof to eight cents.

6. That the excise tax on cigarette paper tubes be increased from twelve cents for each one hundred cigarette paper tubes or fraction thereof to fourteen cents.

7. That the excise tax on the price of admission to certain places of entertainment be increased from twenty to twenty-five per cent.

8. That subsections (a), (b) (c), (d) and (e) of section 1 of schedule II to this Act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

1. Cigars:—

(a) valued at not more than forty dollars per thousand, per thousand, six dollars and twenty-five cents;

(b) valued at more than forty dollars per thousand and not more than one hundred and ten dollars per thousand, per thousand, thirteen dollars and fifty cents;

(c) valued at more than one hundred and ten dollars per thousand and not more than one hundred and fifty dollars per thousand, per thousand, twenty-five dollars;

(d) valued at more than one hundred and fifty dollars per thousand and not more than two hundred dollars per thousand, per thousand, thirty-five dollars;

(e) valued at more than two hundred dollars per thousand, per thousand, fifty-five dollars.

9. That any enactment founded on paragraph one of these resolutions shall come into force on the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three.

10. That any enactment founded on paragraphs two to eight, inclusive, of these resolutions shall come into force on the third day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended, is further amended by striking thereout tariff items 105a, 156, 156a, 197c, 232, 355, 440i, 563, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

2. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended, be further amended by deleting from the Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, as amended by chapter twenty-nine of the statutes of 1940, chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1941 and chapter twenty-three of the statutes of 1942, the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whisky, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in customs tariff items 156, 156a, and 156b: $5 per gallon of the strength of proof.

and by substituting therefor the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whisky, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in customs tariff items 156, and 156b: $7 per gallon of the strength of proof.

3. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the third day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-three, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That in respect of the taxation year 1942 the income tax liability, of taxpayers other than corporations, under subsection 1 of section 9 of the Income War Tax Act, in respect of earned income and in respect of investment income up to $3,000 shall be one-half of the amount calculated according to the schedules therein specified;

2. That in respect of the taxation year 1942 one-half the liability of taxpayers, other than corporations, under subsection 1 of section 9 of the Income War Tax Act, in respect of investment income in excess of $3,000, shall be deferred and shall not be due until the date of death of the taxpayer;

3. That the returns of income in respect of the 1942 taxation year for taxpayers other than corporations shall be due on the 30th June, 1943, together with payment of one-third of the taxpayer's unpaid income tax liability not otherwise provided for herein, the remaining two-thirds to be due and payable on the 31st December, 1943;

4. That the date of filing annual returns of income by taxpayers other than corporations shall be the 31st day of March in the year following the receipt of the income;

5. That the date of filing annual returns of income by corporations shall be six months after the close of the corporation's fiscal period.

6. That in respect of the taxation year 1943 and for each year thereafter sole proprietors (other than farmers) and taxpayers whose income from sources other than salary and wages exceeds 25 per cent of their total income, shall pay by quarterly instalments as follows:

20 per cent on the 31st March,
25 per cent on the 30th June,
25 per cent on the 30th September, and
30 per cent on the 31st December.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

7. That taxpayers whose chief business is that of farming shall in respect of the year 1943 and for each year thereafter pay two-thirds of their income tax liability for the current year on or before the 31st day of December and the remaining one-third on the following 31st March;

8. That taxpayers whose chief occupation is that of farming may be allowed to carry forward for two years any farm losses, incurred by them in 1942 or any subsequent year;

9. That in the case of a single person or person with equivalent status whose taxable income is less than $820, the tax payable shall not exceed two-thirds of the amount by which such taxpayer's taxable income exceeds $660.

10. That in the case of a married person or any person granted an equivalent status under the act whose income is less than $1,570, the tax payable shall not exceed two-thirds of the amount by which such taxpayer's taxable income exceeds $1,200;

11. That where a sale of assets takes place between persons with common interests, the total depreciation which has been and may be allowed on such assets in the hands of the transferor and the transferee together shall not exceed 100 per cent of the original cost of the assets before such sale took place;

12. That where immovable assets (not including equipment or machinery) in respect of which special or accelerated depreciation has been allowed, are subsequently sold at a price in excess of the residual undepreciated value, such excess shall be applied to reduce proportionately in each year the special or accelerated depreciation previously allowed to the transferor; provided, however, that such taxpayer shall not be deprived of ordinary depreciation which but for the special depreciation would have been allowed as a deduction from income;

13. That all employees, whether single or married, of Canadian companies, sent outside of Canada temporarily to perform services on behalf of such companies, shall be liable to pay income tax while so engaged outside of Canada;

14. That the tax payable by a corporation shall be paid by twelve monthly instalments commencing in the sixth month prior to the close of its fiscal period

(a) as to the first eleven months, one-twelfth of the estimated tax, having regard to the previous or anticipated current year's income, applying the current year's rates, and

(b) as to the twelfth month, the balance of the tax payable, having regard to the income and applying the rates of the taxation year;

provided, however, that should any instalment paid in each month of the seventh to eleventh month, both inclusive, be less than one-twelfth of the tax actually found to have been due, such deficiency shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the close of the company's fiscal period;

15. That principal payments made by a taxpayer in respect of a mortgage or agreement for sale on or with respect to one residential property, which mortgage or agreement for sale was registered or in effect prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942, but was an obligation of such taxpayer's spouse, shall nevertheless be eligible as an offset against the refundable portion of the income tax payable;

16. That all drilling costs on wells spudded-in during the period January 1, 1943 and March 31, 1945, and abandoned within six months after completion of drilling and all exploration costs including all general geological and geophysical expenses incurred between the said dates may be allowed as a deduction against current income of companies whose principal business is the production and/or refining and/or marketing of petroleum and/or petroleum products; provided, however, that the tax saving hereunder shall be limited to 40 per cent of such expenditures;

17. That exploration expenses incurred during the period January 1, 1943 to March 31, 1945, by companies formed for the exploration and drilling for oil may be accumulated and allowed as an expense against the income from any well found hereafter by such company;

18. That payments of oil royalties shall be subject to a deduction at the source at the rate of 7 per cent;

19. That all companies mining metalliferous and strategic minerals shall be allowed a deduction of their exploration expenses incurred in searching for base metals and strategic minerals in respect of expenses incurred during the period January 1, 1943, to March 31, 1945; provided, however, that such tax savings shall not exceed 40 per cent of the expenses so incurred;

20. That contractual payments made in respect of any dominion government annuity contract shall be permitted as a deduction against the refundable portion of the income tax payable;

21. That the taxes payable and paid to a municipality pursuant to the provisions of subsections 6, 9 and 11 of section 39 of the Assessment Act (Ontario) R.S.O. 1937, chapter 272 which are deemed to be taxes on real property, may be allowed as a deduction from the income of any mining company; provided that the said Assessment Act is so amended as to provide that in assessing the said taxes payable to the municipality, taxes payable by a mining company under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act are not allowed as a deduction;

22. That the service pay and allowances of the Canadian naval, military and air forces while in the Canadian active service forces in the western hemisphere other than in Canada shall be subject to income tax at one-half the effective rate applicable to each individual taxpayer, such rate to be determined by calculating the total tax on each taxpayer's total income, determining the effective rate which the tax bears to such total income and allowing a credit against the tax payable of one-half of the effective rate on such service pay and allowances; provided, however, that no tax shall be payable in respect of the service pay and allowances of any such member of the Canadian naval, military and air forces whose total service pay does not exceed the sum of $1,600 (or in the case of female members of the said services such lower appropriate amount as shall be determined by the Governor in Council) and provided further that no tax shall be payable on service pay and allowances by members of the said forces whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft;

23. That the service pay and allowances of any member of the Canadian naval, military and air forces who is in the Canadian active service forces and who has been overseas on the strength of an overseas unit outside of the western hemisphere and whose service pay is in excess of $1,600 shall be exempt from taxation on the first six months' service pay and allowances received by him after his return to Canada; provided, however, that the period of such exemption shall not exceed the length of the period which has been served on the strength of an overseas unit outside of the western hemisphere; provided that in the case of female members of the said forces the figure of $1,600 shall be replaced by such appropriate lesser amount as may be determined by the Governor in Council;

24. That members of the Canadian naval, military and air forces in the Canadian active service forces and in receipt of service pay and allowances in excess of $1,600 shall be allowed a credit from the tax otherwise payable equal to the tax payable on $1,600 (increased by dependents' allowances in the case of married persons but not including any allowance for more than six children) provided that on incomes over $1,600 (or appropriately increased by dependents' allowances) the tax credit shall be reduced in the same proportion that such income exceeds $1,600 (or appropriately increased by dependents' allowances); provided that in the case of female members of the said forces the figure of $1,600 shall be replaced by such appropriate lesser amount as may be determined by the Governor in Council;

25. That any enactments founded on

(a) Resolutions 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 14, 18, 22, 23 and 24 shall be applicable to the income of the 1943 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(b) Resolution 12 shall be applicable in respect of any sale made after March 2, 1943;

(c) Resolutions 13, 15 and 20 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(d) Resolution 21 shall be brought into force on proclamation by the Governor in Council and be applicable to the fiscal period therein designated and to all subsequent periods.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide:

1. That the definition of "standard profits" be amended to provide that the "standard profits" of wholly-owned subsidiary companies incorporated in 1942 or thereafter shall not in the aggregate exceed $5,000 when the sum of the capital employed by the parent and such subsidiary companies taken together is not substantially greater than the capital employed by the parent company prior to the incorporation of such wholly-owned subsidiary companies.

2. That where an upward adjustment of the standard profits has been made by the minister because of an increase in capital employed during the "standard period" then an adjustment downward shall be made for subsequent decreases in capital employed which have not been accompanied by an equivalent reduction in capital stock, but not to an extent greater than the said upward adjustment.

3. That any amendment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the said act.

Comparative Summary Statement of Revenues and Expenditures

1. Because of the early date at which the budget is being brought down and of the added difficulty in forecasting war expenditures and receipts from taxes imposed to meet outlays for war purposes, it must be recognized that the figures which are presented for the current fiscal year ending March 31st next are approximations only, and that when the books of the year are finally closed there may be considerable variations from the figures shown herein.

2. The following tables show, by main categories and in detail, estimated revenues, estimated expenditures and the estimated increase in net debt for the fiscal year 1942-43, together with comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

REVENUES, 1942-43

3. When the books for the fiscal year 1942-43 are finally closed, total gross receipts will reach, it is estimated, a new high record of $2,308,400,000. This represents an increase over the preceding fiscal year of $819,864,000, or approximately 55 per cent. Compared with the fiscal year immediately preceding the war, namely, 1938-39, the increase in total receipts for 1942-43 is estimated at $1,806,229,000. In terms of percentage, this increase over total receipts for 1938-39 of $502,171,000 represents approximately 360 per cent. The above total of $2,308,400,000 is the total gross receipts, and includes an estimate of the refundable portion of income and excess profits taxes which are repayable after the war. It is not expected that the exact amount of these refundables will be determined before the books for the year are closed, and accordingly provision is being made to set up a liability of an estimated amount of $100,000,000, to meet these obligations. Of this amount it is estimated $75,000,000 will be applicable to income taxes pertaining to individuals, and $25,000,000 to the excess profits tax.

4. The increase in gross revenues, more fully dealt with in subsequent paragraphs, was obtained chiefly from the higher rates of tax and the new taxes imposed by the budget of June 23, 1942. A part of the increase in income taxes was due to taxes on 1941 income, paid on or after March 31, 1942, and taken into the revenues for 1942-43. An additional factor which affected income tax receipts, was the change-over from the voluntary instalment plans of payment to a compulsory instalment plan effective from July, 1942, in the case of corporations and from September, 1942, in the case of individuals. No estimate can be made as to what portion of the increase is attributable to each of these factors. In addition, there were substantial increases in revenue from succession duties, the tax on insurance companies, return on investments and also in the operating surplus of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1942.

5. The 5-year table of revenues shown on page 871 is in the same form as was used last year. This table is divided to show tax revenues under appropriate headings with subheadings for excise duties, excise taxes and income taxes. The non-tax revenue section is broken down under five main headings.

6. Total revenue from taxes for 1942-43, including refundable taxes, is estimated to reach $2,135,875,000 compared with $1,360,913,000 collected during 1941-42. This total represents approximately 92·5 per cent of the total revenues. An examination of the 5-year table shows that direct taxes on incomes and profits, including the refundable portion realized $1,372,500,000 compared with $645,412,000 during the previous year. In the pre-war year of 1938-39, the percentage of direct taxes on incomes and profits to total revenues was 28·3 per cent while in 1942-43 it is estimated that this ratio will be increased to 59·5. This comparison illustrates the increased reliance which has been placed upon the direct taxation of incomes including the tax on excess profits. The excess profits tax, imposed in 1940 and revised in 1941, was materially changed in its rate structure by the 1942 budget, effective from July 1, 1942. As a result, it is estimated that this item of revenue alone will account for no less an amount than $455,000,000, including an estimated amount of $25,000,000 refundable after the war. This item shows an increase over 1941-42 of $319,832,000. A portion of this increase was due to a change in timing of payments, consequent upon the introduction of the monthly instalment plan.

7. The amount expected to be obtained in the fiscal year 1942-43 under the provisions of the Dominion Succession Duties Act, passed in 1941 is estimated at $14,000,000. In 1941-42 the amount realized from the same source was $6,957,000.

8. The total revenue from the 8 per cent sales tax, less refunds, is estimated at $230,000,000, a decrease of $6,183,000 as compared with the previous year. It will be seen from the 5-year table that gross sales tax is estimated to be less than last fiscal year by only $1,553,000, while the amount of refunds is increased by $4,630,000. The increase in refunds is due largely to remission of taxes on materials and plant equipment imported or purchased in Canada for war purposes by the United Kingdom and allied governments or for certain other activities associated with the war.

9. The War Exchange Tax is expected to realize a total of $94,000,000, compared with $100,874,000 received during the previous year. There was no change in the structure of this tax and the decline is due to a falling off of certain imports not essential for war purposes.

10. Other excise taxes are estimated to produce $153,395,000, an increase over the previous year of $37,027,000. The 5-year table gives details of the increases and decreases in the various items. The main decreases totalling $26,959,000 are recorded in the taxes on the following articles:

(1) Automobiles, rubber tires and tubes, $13,992,000.
(2) Sugar, $8,000,000.
(3) Electric and gas appliances, $3,270,000.
(4) Phonographs, radios and tubes, $1,161,000.

These reductions reflect the restricted use or consumption of certain articles. In the case of sugar, a reduction in the excise tax from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound was enacted as a result of the last budget. The increases in other excise taxes together with new taxes imposed by the last budget aggregating $63,986,000 relate to the taxes on the following articles:

(1) Cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, $21,667,000.
(2) Candy and chewing gum, $7,400,000.
(3) Beverages, $7,753,000.
(4) Trunks, bags, etc., $2,100,000.
(5) Furs, $2,500,000.
(6) Amusements, $3,008,000.
(7) Transportation and communication, $8,344,000.
(8) Stamps, etc., including payment of taxes on jewellery, chinaware, cabaret attendance, etc., $7,505,000.
(9) Sundry, $3,709,000.

11. Revenues from customs import duties for the current year are estimated at $118,000,000 compared with $142,392,000 received during 1941-42, a decrease of $24,392,000. This decrease is due in part to remission of customs duties and drawbacks payable on materials, equipment and supplies imported for war purposes by the United Kingdom and allied governments or for other activities associated with the war. A second factor which brought about this reduction was the decline in importations for civilian use of certain goods and commodities not entirely essential to the war effort.

12. Receipts from excise duties mainly on liquor and tobacco are expected to reach $142,090,000, an increase of about $32,000,000 over 1941-42. Excise duties on liquors and tobaccos were substantially increased in the June, 1942, budget.

13. The tax on insurance companies for 1942-43 is expected to realize $10,500,000 compared with $1,148,000 received during the previous year. The increase in revenue from this source is not due alone to the increased rates imposed by the 1942 budget, but, because of arrangements made under the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreements, it so happens that the increased tax levied by the last budget applied to the calendar year 1941, during which year the provincial insurance taxes were not levied, as well as to 1942. The estimated amount of $10,500,000 therefore represents collections covering two calendar years.

14. Total non-tax revenues are estimated at $113,750,000, an increase of $10,839,000 over 1941-42. Receipts from the Post Office are expected to total $49,000,000, an increase of slightly more than $3,000,000 as compared with the preceding fiscal year. The receipts from the Post Office will, it is estimated, exceed the cost of operations by $3,561,000. As mentioned in previous years, the post office accounts do not include the rental value and other costs of premises occupied, and equipment used, nor do they include any credit to the Post Office for services rendered to other departments for the free use of the mails. Return on Investments is expected to realize $41,500,000, an increase of $15,674,000 over last year. The larger items making up this total are: interest on advances to Canadian National Railways, $13,338,000; Bank of Canada profits, $7,985,000; interest on loans to Foreign Exchange Control Board, $4,633,000; loans to National Harbours Board, $2,600,000; loans to provinces, $2,802,000; and interest on advances made by the Department of Munitions and Supply to commodity companies, $3,500,000. The premium, discount and exchange account will, it is expected, show a debit of $1,500,000, compared with the credit for the last fiscal year of $11,855,000.

15. The total amount estimated for 1942-43 under Special Receipts and Credits is $58,775,000. The main items making up this total are: refunds of previous years' war expenditures, $11,000,000; operating surplus of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1942, $25,000,000; and the capital gain on repatriation of Canadian National Railways Securities, $11,000,000. These last two items increase the book valuation of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Capital Stock, and accordingly are offset by contra amounts appearing on the expenditure side under the heading "Other Charges".

Another book-keeping item which is recorded under the heading of Special Receipts and Credits is an amount of $6,660,000, representing a reduction in the Reserve Account established to meet the operating deficits of the Canadian Wheat Board. This adjustment is occasioned by an improvement in the board's balance sheet in the period ended July 31, 1942, with respect to the 1939 and 1940 crop accounts. Last year it was necessary on the basis of calculations made as at July 31, 1941, to provide on the expenditure side for an increase in the reserve account of $12,570,828. This year the Reserve Account is being reduced by the amount of $6,660,000 on the basis of calculations made as at July 31, 1942.

16. The table below gives a summary of the forecasts made at the time of the last budget of the probable receipts from the various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1942-43, and a comparison of these forecasts with present estimates of receipts which will be received during the fiscal year. The general observations which preface a similar table in last year's budget as to the dfficulty in forecasting revenues, particularly in time of war, are still true and are strengthened by reason of the budget being brought down at this early date. With respect to taxation revenues, and the amounts expected to be received by reason of increased rates and new imposts, it will be quite apparent that even a small percentage of error in calculation may represent a substantial amount in dollars.

While there are some substantial variations in the individual amounts now estimated for the fiscal year 1942-43, compared with estimates made in the last budget, the total increase over the amount forecast, after taking into account $58,775,000 expected to be received from Special Receipts and Credits which was not included in the estimate, represents only 4·9 per cent. As was stated last year care was used to err on the side of conservatism rather than of undue optimism.

EXPENDITURES, 1942-43

17. The comments which follow will deal with expenditures classified by the usual main categories: (1) Ordinary Expenditures; (2) Capital Expenditures; (3) War Expenditures; (4) Special Expenditures; (5) Operating deficits of, and Non-Active Advances to, Government-owned Enterprises; and (6) Other Charges. All disbursements under these headings with the exception of active loans and investments chargeable to War Appropriation Acts, are included as expenditures in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in net debt.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

18. Ordinary expenditures for the year, it is estimated, will total $565,762,000 of which a few of the larger contractual and uncontrollable items such as interest and other charges on the public debt, pensions, unemployment insurance, post office, subsidies and payments to provinces under the Dominion-Provincial taxation agreements will aggregate $442,813,000 or approximately 78·3 per cent.

The above estimated total of $565,762,000 is greater than the actual amount of ordinary expenditures during the previous fiscal year by $120,984,000. Some of the larger items making up this increase are:

Increased interest and charges on Public Debt	$ 27,162,000
Increased compensation to Provinces under the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreements	73,780,000
Increase in Unemployment Insurance	7,369,000
Increase in Post Office Expenditures	3,937,000
Premium, Discount and Exchange Account	1,500,000
Increase in administrative cost of Department of National Revenue including Income Tax	2,017,000
Increase in cost of Chief Electoral Office re plebiscite	1,191,000
Increase in National Defence, sundry services	1,493,000
Increase in Maritime Freight Rates Act	982,000
	$ 119,431,000

Less important increases as well as decreases effected during the year are readily ascertained by referring to the five-year table.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

19. Total expenditures charged to capital are estimated at $3,862,000 compared with $3,430,000 in the previous year. The main items in this category are expenditures arising out of dredging the St. Lawrence Ship Channel and other construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities in connection with civil airways and airports.

WAR EXPENDITURES

20. Total outlays under the various War Appropriation Acts for the year 1942-43 are now estimated at $4,558,000,000. This estimate, it will be realized, is difficult to make with any close degree of accuracy because of the magnitude of our war programme and the many factors that may not now be foreseen or are difficult to appraise. The total of $4,558,000,000 includes the gift of one billion dollars to the government of the United Kingdom under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942. It also includes the loan of $700,000,000 made to the Government of the United Kingdom under authority of the same act in order to liquidate sterling balances accumulated by the Government of Canada prior to March 31, 1942, and also $55,235,000 of loans and advances to commodity corporations and other loans made under the authority of the War Appropriation Act, 1942. Deducting these last two amounts, which are treated as active assets in the Dominion's accounts, we have a net total charged to war expenditure of $3,802,765,000. This represents an increase of $2,463,091,000 over the corresponding figure for the preceding fiscal year.

The rapid expansion of Canada's war programme is shown in the following table:

Fiscal Year	Charged to Active Assets	War Expenditures	Total war Outlays
1939–40	9,092,742	118,291,022	127,383,764
1940–41	26,379,066	752,045,326	778,424,392
1941–42	42,816,676	1,339,674,152	1,382,490,828
1942–43 (estimated)	755,235,000	3,802,765,000	4,558,000,000
	833,523,484	6,012,775,500	6,846,298,984

During the first world war Canada's total expenditures, including demobilization charged direct to war account, aggregated $1,695,958,570.

21. The following table gives a summary of war expenditures, together with details of the $755,235,000 loans and advances charged to active assets all as now estimated:

Total war chargeable to Active Assets		$ 755,235,000
Grand Total chargeable to War Appropriations		$ 4,558,000,000

22. The foregoing total outlay of $4,558,000,000 chargeable to war appropriations does not take into account advances made or to be made during 1942-43 under authority of section 3 of the War Appropriation Act, which advances are recoverable from the Government of the United Kingdom or from other allied governments. These recoverable advances which are estimated at $232,610,000 as at the close of the fiscal year, will be substantially offset by amounts payable by Canada with respect to accounts and commitments remaining unpaid or unadjusted when the books of the Dominion for the fiscal year 1942-43 are closed.

23. The recoverable advances to allied governments, totalling $232,610,000, are divided as follows:

Agriculture (Food), United Kingdom	$ 4,615,000
Munitions and Supply, War Supplies, Ltd	60,000,000
National Defence—
Army	1,731,000
Internment Operations	2,750,000
Navy	11,404,000
Air	8,566,000
R.A.F., Special Schools	38,052,000

Combined Training Organization—Australia's share	16,917,000
	$ 232,610,000

24. The main provisions of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, were: (1) the granting of a billion dollar gift to the Government of the United Kingdom to finance the purchase in Canada of foodstuffs, raw materials and munitions of war and to defray other expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes; (2) the granting of authority to repatriate all Dominion of Canada direct and guaranteed securities and other Canadian National Railways securities held by British investors; and (3) the conversion of sterling balances accumulated to the credit of the Government of Canada to an amount equivalent to $700 million (at the exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound sterling) into a Canadian dollar obligation which is not to bear interest until after the termination of the war.

25. Under the second of the above provisions, a substantial volume of Dominion and Canadian National Railways securities were repatriated before the close of the preceding fiscal year. In addition there were repatriated during the fiscal year 1942-43 securities valued on the basis of the prices at which they were vested by the Government of the United Kingdom, less interest included therein, at $70,022,000. The securities so purchased by the Dominion Government were classified as follows:

Dominion of Canada obligations		$ 9,514,000
Canadian National Railways Securities—
Dominion Guaranteed	$ 24,844,000
Unguaranteed	35,503,000
		60,347,000
Other Dominion Guaranteed Securities		161,000
		$ 70,022,000

In accordance with the terms of the act, Canadian National Railways securities to an estimated value of $61,820,000 (including amounts purchased in 1941-42, not previously transferred) will be turned over during 1942-43 to the Railway Company, and temporary loans for this amount are made to the company to enable it to acquire them. In accordance with Section 3 of the Act, expenditure of $76,429,000 incurred in acquiring surplus sterling accumulated during March, 1942, was charged to the billion dollar appropriation.

26. The following table gives a detailed itemization of estimated direct war expenditures under the War Appropriation Acts, 1942-43, totalling $2,802,765,000 classified by departments and services:

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

27. Expenditures classified as Special Expenditures for the fiscal year 1942-43 are estimated to total $30,673,000 compared with $63,976,000 for last fiscal year. The largest single item in this category is an amount of $23,045,000 covering payments of awards to farmers under the wheat acreage reduction plan. The estimated amount of administration costs of the wheat acreage reduction plan is $1,060,000. Advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund and the costs of administration under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are estimated at $700,000 and $212,000 respectively. The balance of $5,656,000 represents expenditures for Dominion relief projects, $4,822,000, and the Dominion share of government Dominion-Provincial relief projects, $834,000. The reduction of special expenditures over last year was accounted for by decreases in the following items: (1) Unemployment Relief, $2,844,000, (2) Prairie Farm Assistance Act, $11,359,000, (3) Wheat Acreage Reduction Plan, $6,529,000, and (4) Provision for reserve to meet deficits resulting from the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board, $12,571,000.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

GOVERNMENT-OWNED ENTERPRISES

This classification of expenditures comprises the losses of and the non-active advances to Government-Owned Enterprises, which were established before the war and are operated as separate corporations.

Canadian National Railways

28. An examination of the five-year Revenue and Expenditure tables for the first three years shown therein, namely 1938-39, 1939-40 and 1940-41, shows deficits of the Canadian National Railways System amounting to $54,314,000, $40,095,000 and $16,965,000, respectively. These deficits are shown in the expenditure table. In the revenue table will be found amounts of $4,016,000 and $25,000,000 representing operating surplus of the system for the calendar years 1941 and 1942 respectively. These have been or will be applied to repayments of temporary loans from the Government. The annual report of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1942 is not yet available and it is, therefore, not possible to give details of the operating revenues and expenses for that year.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals during 1942 is estimated at $591,000 compared with $424,000 in 1941.

Canadian National Steamships

29. The operations of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1942 will, it is estimated, result in a cash surplus of $997,000 compared with $1,205,657 for 1941. This operating surplus will be paid to the Government as interest on advances (current and arrears).

National Harbours Board

30. The annual report of the operations of the National Harbours Board for 1942 is not yet available and it is not possible to give the operating income for that year. Interest on Government advances to the Board will, it is estimated, be received this fiscal year to the amount of $2,600,000, and this has been taken into account in arriving at the total of revenue under the heading "Return on Investments".

Financial assistance provided by the Government to the National Harbours Board and charged to Dominion expenditure, it is estimated, will total $672,000. This amount is made up as follows: $380,000 for non-active advances in respect of the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal; $22,000 for reconstruction and capital expenditures of the Halifax Harbour Commission; $170,000 for reconstruction and capital expenditures, and $96,000 for the redemption of debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission; and the remaining $4,000 for miscellaneous capital expenditures at various ports.

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during 1942 and it is estimated that $250,000 from these sources will be credited to Ordinary Revenue.

OTHER CHARGES

31. The total of Other Charges, the final main category of expenditures, is estimated at $65,633,000.

Included in this total is $25,000,000 which has been added to the reserve to meet possible losses on ultimate realization of assets treated as "active" in the Dominion's balance sheet. This is the same amount as was provided for in the Public Accounts for the last two fiscal years and the total now provided to meet such possible losses is therefore $75,000,000. The usual annual write-off from active assets of Soldier and General Land Settlement Loans is estimated at $75,000, and cancellation of Canadian Farm Loan Board Capital Stock is estimated at $8,000. These two write-offs, and the provision for the further reserve of $25,000,000, result in a proportionate increase in the net debt of the Dominion.

32. The estimated total write-off from non-active assets, includes two items: (a) $4,500,000 to be written off from the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock representing line abandonments for the calendar year, 1942; and (b) $50,000 representing the estimated yearly established losses on Seed Grain and Relief Accounts administered by the Department of Mines and Resources. As both of these items are non-active assets and are therefore already included in the net debt of Canada, they are offset by similar amounts on the Revenue side under "Other Receipts and Credits".

33. The remaining debit items, classified as Other Charges, and totalling $36,000,000, relate to the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock. The amount of this stock which represents the Dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways is expected to be increased by $25,000,000 due to the surplus earnings of the System for 1942 and also by $11,000,000 due to the estimated capital gain in respect of Canadian National Railways sterling securities redeemed during the year at a price below par in Canadian funds. The Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock is carried in the Dominion's books as a non-active asset, and as the two items just mentioned necessarily appear as credits under the heading Special Receipts and Credits, the net debt of Canada is not thereby changed.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

34. The grand total of expenditure for the fiscal year, 1942-43, under the various categories enumerated, namely Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, War Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises, and Other Charges, is estimated at $4,469,958,000.

35. The following table shows the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures for a number of important items. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources, after deducting the $100,000,000 of income and excess profits taxes estimated as refundable after the war, are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The purpose of this table is to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury by the war and the main services or obligations of government.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

36. As total net revenues for the fiscal year 1942-43 have been estimated at $2,208,400,000 and total expenditures at $4,469,958,000, the estimated over-all deficit (or increase in net debt) for the year is $2,261,558,000.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

Active Assets

37. In addition to the estimated expenditures for the year, as already outlined, disbursements are made for the acquisition of investments which are treated as active assets in the Public Accounts. The active assets are deducted from the total direct debt in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in active loans and investments for 1942-43 is estimated at $516,808,000 as compared with $640,805,000 in 1941-42. This increase is fully itemized in the table in section 54.

Loans to Provinces

38. As was shown in the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, loans made to the Western Provinces under authority of relief legislation and outstanding at the close of that year totalled $157,275,021.49. No loans have since been made, and during the current year repayments to January 31, 1943, were received from the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in the amounts of $288,674.09; $50,986.87 and $38,500 respectively. The repayments left the net amount outstanding at $156,896,860.53, divided by Provinces as follows:

Manitoba	$ 24,928,540 09
Saskatchewan	71,290,433 08
Alberta	25,933,500 00
British Columbia	34,744,387 36
	$156,896,860 53

39. During the current fiscal year, the Province of Prince Edward Island paid in full the outstanding balance of $23,500 on housing loans made at the close of the last war (1914-18). The Province of Nova Scotia reduced its indebtedness on the same account by $70,000. The only loan now outstanding with respect to these advances is one of $37,000 due by the Province of Nova Scotia and maturing in April, 1943.

40. Subsidy overpayment to the Province of Alberta secured by a Treasury Bill of the Government of Alberta was reduced during the year by a payment by the Province of $68,750, thereby reducing this indebtedness to $400,000.

Canadian National Railways

41. It is estimated that the Government will have made during the fiscal year net advances to the Canadian National Railways in the amount of $130,938,995, classified as follows:

Advances—
Under Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1938—for retirement of maturing issues	$ 59,315,908
Under Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act, 1940—Purchase of Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada 4 per cent Perpetual Consolidated Debenture Stock	472,116

Under the authority of The War Appropriation Act, 1942, it is estimated that at March 31, 1943, the total amount of railway equipment purchased by the Dominion and leased to the Canadian National Railways, will reach $16,964,000. The Railway Company repaid instalments aggregating $1,509,141 under the terms of hire-purchase agreements relating to equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal years 1935-36 and 1936-37; 1939-40 and 1940-41.

Canadian Pacific Railway Company

42. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company paid in advance all outstanding instalments of principal, amounting to $3,526,154, on account of a hire-purchase agreement relating to certain equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37 and 1937-38, and in the amount of $9,288,057 relating to certain equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal year 1939-40 and 1940-41.

Advances to Commodity and Other Companies

43. Advances to Commodity Corporations and other companies made by the Department of Munitions and Supply, and referred to in Section 21, are estimated at $15,371,000 for 1942-43. The following table gives net advances outstanding March 31, 1942; net advances during 1942-43, and net advances outstanding as of March 31, 1943, with respect to each Company:

44. In addition to advances to corporations as shown in the foregoing table, advances were made to The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, The Canadian Wool Board Limited, and Wartime Salvage Limited. The amounts shown as advances to these corporations which have been taken in to the accounts as Active Assets represent the estimated cash and inventory holdings of the corporations as at March 31, 1943. The balance of advances made are included as war expenditures. The assets with respect to each corporation as of March 31, 1943, are estimated to be:

The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation	$ 5,000,000
The Canadian Wool Board	10,800,000
Wartime Salvage, Limited	700,000

Other Loans and Investments

45. The indebtedness of the Foreign Exchange Control Board to the Dominion may, unless certain repayments occur before March 31, 1943, reach $400,000,000 and this amount is shown as an active asset in the preliminary balance sheet of the Dominion for the current fiscal year.

46. Under authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, sterling balances in an amount equivalent to $700,000,000 (at the exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound), were converted into a Canadian dollar obligation of the Government of the United Kingdom, which, under the provisions of the act, is non-interest-bearing until after the termination of the war.

47. Pursuant to an agreement between Canada and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, it is estimated that by March 31, 1943, Canada will have advanced $6,000,000 on a credit for the purchase by Russia of Canadian wheat and flour. This advance bears interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

48. The Canadian Farm Loan Board, it is estimated, will have repurchased during the fiscal year from the Government out of surplus funds, $1,800,000 of its 3½ per cent Bonds, due January 2, 1960, thereby reducing the amount of its bonds held by the Government to $27,400,000. Capital stock to be written off is estimated at $8,000.

49. In the period April 1, 1942, to January 31, 1943, 494 loans were approved under the National Housing Act for an amount of $1,457,235, bringing the total approvals to January 31, 1943, to $78,241,380. In this period the Dominion advanced $1,175,936, and borrower's repayments amounted to $961,523, making net advances for the period of $214,413. The net amount of loans under the authority of the National Housing Act and the Dominion Housing Act, estimated to be outstanding on the books of the Dominion at March 31, 1943, is $16,500,000. Loans under the authority of the National Housing Act are made jointly by the Government and approved lending institutions, and are secured by first mortgage or hypothec, running jointly to the Government and an approved lending institution. Previous to December 8, 1942, loans were normally made not in excess of 80 per cent of the cost or appraised value of the completed property whichever was the lesser. In the case of owner-occupied houses, where the lending value did not exceed $2,500, a loan might be made up to 90 per cent of the said lending value. On December 8, 1942, an Order in Council was passed enabling loans to be made up to 90 per cent of the lending value for any house where the lending value does not exceed $3,200, and on a sliding scale down to 80 per cent when the lending value does not exceed $4,000. Since January 1, 1940, new applications for loans are received only in respect of the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000. Under Vote No. 452 of the Appropriation Act, No. 5, 1942, an amount of $1,000,000 was appropriated to provide for advances under the National Housing Act, not exceeding (with the advance made jointly by the approved lending institution) $3,200 in respect of any one house, for the construction of houses where the Minister is satisfied that permanent houses can be constructed to relieve a serious housing shortage without threatening to create a post-war surplus.

50. Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, no further loans were approved during the current fiscal year. From the inception of the Act, total loans approved, less amounts not required to complete projects, aggregated $7,052,000. For the current fiscal year it is estimated that the amount of repayments will exceed advances by $376,000, and that the net investment as of March 31, 1943, will be $5,600,000. These loans bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and are amortized over a period not longer than the estimated useful life of the project. The province in which the municipality is situated guarantees the payments for interest on and amortization of each loan.

51. For the current year it is estimated that advances to the National Harbours Board for capital construction purposes at the ports of Montreal and Vancouver will total $422,000. Payments of loans made in previous years amount to $679,000, leaving a net credit for the year of $257,000.

52. Loans for Soldier and General Land Settlement. it is estimated, will be reduced by payments of $1,333,000, and in addition it is estimated $75,000 will be written off and charged to Consolidated Fund.

53. The indebtedness of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the Dominion on account of loans as at March 31, 1942, was $503,398.77. This amount has been paid in full with interest during the current year.

54. The following statement shows in summary form the net estimated changes in active investments for the current year, together with comparable figures for the four preceding years:

LOAN FLOTATIONS

55. During the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, it is estimated that the Government will issue obligations in the amount of $2,456,449,471 (including an increase of $30,000,000 in Treasury Bills outstanding but not the amount of recurring issues of Treasury Bills made to refund outstanding Treasury Bills and only including the net amount of Deposit Certificates issued during the year). With the exception of one $90,000,000 issue sold in New York to provide in part for the redemption prior to maturity of $100,000,000 Five Per Cent Bonds, all issues were sold in the Canadian market. During the fiscal year it is estimated that Dominion obligations in the amount of $462,168,089 will be paid out of the proceeds of the new issues. The remainder of the proceeds of the new issues namely, $1,994,281,382 less cost of flotation, will provide for direct and indirect war expenditures.

56. The following table gives details of the estimated amounts and terms of the new issues, including the prices at which they were sold:

(x) Final costs of Third Victory Loan not yet available.

57. The Third Victory Loan was sold during the fiscal year under review. This loan was the largest loan ever issued for cash in Canada. It was issued in the amount of $991,500,000 and was sold to 2,041,610 subscribers.

58. The Dominion instituted the sale of Deposit Certificates to the Canadian chartered banks in July, 1942. These Deposit Certificates bear interest at the rate of ¾ of 1 per cent per annum and mature twenty-six weeks after date of issue. It is estimated that these Certificates will be sold to a total amount of $995,000,000, of which $205,000,000 have been redeemed out of the proceeds of the Third Victory Loan, leaving $790,000,000 estimated to be outstanding at the close of the fiscal year.

(3) Yield to investor if held to maturity seven and one-half years after issue date.

60. The fortnightly issue of three months Treasury Bills was continued during the fiscal year. The latest issue (February 26, 1943), was sold at a discount of 0·501 per cent. The estimated amount of these Treasury Bills outstanding at the close of the fiscal year is $300,000,000, an increase of $30,000,000 during the year.

61. It is estimated that the average rate of interest on the Dominion's direct funded debt (including Treasury Bills) outstanding as at March 31, 1943, will be about 2·60 per cent. This compares with 2·90 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the preceding fiscal year and is undoubtedly the lowest average rate in the Dominion's history.

NATIONAL DEBT

62. It is estimated that the gross unmatured funded debt (including Treasury Bills) of the Dominion outstanding at the close of the current fiscal year, will amount to $7,861,196,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of Annuities, Superannuation and Insurance Funds, Post Office Savings Bank deposits, and various trust and contingent funds outstanding as at the same date are estimated at $1,031,944,000. The gross liabilities of the Dominion therefore are expected to total $8,893,140,000 as at March 31, 1943. On the other side of the balance sheet will be found active assets estimated at $2,586,361,000, consisting of cash and various active loans and investments, less a reserve of $75,000,000 to provide against ultimate loss on their realization. If, therefore, we deduct the amount of the net active assets from the amount of the gross liabilities, we arrive at a figure of $6,306,779,000 representing the estimated net debt of the Dominion as at March 31, 1943. This net debt shows an increase over the corresponding figure for the close of the preceding fiscal year of $2,261,558,000, which of course is the estimated amount of the over-all deficit for the fiscal year 1942-43.

63. The following is a preliminary statement or balance sheet showing the liabilities and assets of the Dominion at March 31, 1943, as estimated:

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

65. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the Dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public are estimated to total $716,348,777 as of March 31, 1943, a decrease of $102,492,940 during the fiscal year under review. This decrease is accounted for mainly by the purchase of Canadian National Railway Company securities from the Government of the United Kingdom, as provided for under The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, and the redemption of guaranteed railway securities by means of loans from the Government.

66. There will also be outstanding at the close of the fiscal year other contingent liabilities assumed under Relief, Seed Grain and other legislation.

67. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated July 10, 1942, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a Government-owned Corporation, was authorized to guarantee certain advances and interest thereon obtained by any person from a chartered bank in order to purchase coal, coke or briquettes in the summer of 1942. The liability of the Corporation is limited to twenty per cent of the aggregate amount of advances made by each bank, but not exceeding in the aggregate $5,000,000. The amount of these advances outstanding on January 31, 1943, was $622,828, and the contingent liability of the Corporation was $124,566.

68. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated October 9, 1942, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to guarantee certain advances, obtained by any person engaged in the production of logs or lumber, from a chartered bank. The liability of the Corporation is limited to fifteen per cent of the aggregate amount of advances made by each bank, but not exceeding in the aggregate $2,500,000. The amount of these advances outstanding on January 31, 1943, was $238,288, and the contingent liability of the Corporation was $35,743.

69. Guaranteed bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board outstanding as at February 13, 1943, on account of wheat amounted to $91,880,239. This amount constitutes the Board's gross liability to the banks and is related mainly to the purchase of wheat of the 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops. The guarantee of the Dominion to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited referred to in previous budget speeches is still outstanding. However, no liability accrues from day to day in connection with this guarantee as margin deposits are made to the Clearing Association.

70. By Order in Council passed in 1942 the Canadian Wheat Board was empowered to deal in flaxseed, soybeans, oats and barley. In order to finance these operations, guaranteed bank advances were obtained from certain chartered banks. The amount of these guaranteed advances outstanding on February 13, 1943, was flaxseed $7,444,191; soybeans $1,032 and oats and barley $227,257.

71. Before operations under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were discontinued (October 1, 1940), 125,724 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this Act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans estimated to be outstanding on March 31, 1943, will have been reduced to $3,000,000, the contingent liability of the Government is limited to this amount. Up to January 31, 1943, 1,047 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $361,503 had been paid. In terms of total losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only ·724 of one per cent.

72. Under the provisions of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, the Home Extension Plan was created. It provided for loans not exceeding $2,000,000 by banks under regulations similar to those of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act for the purpose of financing the creation of additional self-contained housing units by alterations or additions to a building used solely or partially as a dwelling at the time application is made for the loan. The general public are now beginning to take advantage of the Plan and twenty-six loans have been made. The total amount of these loans to February 15, 1943, is $55,385. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by the banks or $8,307. There have been no claims for loss made by the banks.

73. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, the Government has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities. The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be borne by the Dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The general principle is that the Dominion bears two-thirds of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the Dominion. In the case of small loans (for amounts not in excess of $4,000 in the case of a single family dwelling place or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling), the share of the loss to be borne by the Dominion is not more than 80 per cent, and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. The above provisions apply to loans made under the National Housing Act and its predecessor the Dominion Housing Act. Under the National Housing Act, a new provision has been added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts or other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the Dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by the lending institution.

Order in Council of December 5, 1939, provided that after January 1, 1940, applications would be received only for loans for construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

Under Vote No. 452 of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, an amount of $1,000,000 was appropriated to provide for advances under the National Housing Act, not exceeding with the advance made jointly by the approved lending institution, $3,200 in respect of any one house, for the construction of houses where the Minister is satisfied that permanent houses can be constructed to relieve a serious housing shortage without threatening to create a post-war surplus. Loans to the number of 19,015 have been approved at January 31, 1943, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, in the amount of $78,241,380. Losses recorded and paid to January 31, 1943, amounted to $2,209, covering the Dominion's proportion of the loss on four loans. This amount represents total losses to date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part I of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $428 realized by the sale of ten properties. The net loss to January 31, 1943, is therefore only $1,781.

74. The following is a statement of bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the Dominion, estimated to be outstanding on March 31, 1943:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, let me at once congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his presentation and upon the cold clarity with which he set out our present position in Canada, finishing up with fire which some of us did not think was in him. To my mind it is necessary to carry through his injunctions until such time as we in this chamber are privileged to emphasize the last few words of what the minister had to say. It will be my privilege to approach this problem one week hence. In the meantime I say: Let the words of the minister sink into the minds and hearts of our Canadian people. In my opinion he perhaps did not go far enough when he exhorted the people of Canada to face this financial burden which they must bear—they should also face the necessity of more production.

I am not in accord with the idea enunciated in the first paragraphs of his speech, namely, that we have almost reached the utmost in our production. Give us a kind Providence for another season in agriculture such as we had last year. Inspire men in industry of every kind, inspire all our people with a recognition of what we are facing. I am satisfied that we have not reached an all-out production in Canada.

When the force of the taxation sinks in; when the extra cent postage stamp reminds our people of their responsibility, that will help. But it is not enough. This chamber is charged with the responsibility of telling our people the position. It will not do to wait for some disaster overseas. Therefore, in approaching this problem, I say to the Canadian people that the fiery eloquence of the Minister of Finance in the last few paragraphs of his speech should be read and pondered and sink in so that we shall all be ready and anxious to play our full part.

The reasoning in parts was, of course, a little confounding; and to my mind the logic was elementary most of the way through. At the same time we must face up to the facts of the situation. I hope that while this matter is being thought over during the next six or seven days there will not be any tendency on the part of our people, ourselves, or the fourth estate to leave the impression that everything is going all right. Let us resolve to apply ourselves to the task. If we do, the words of the minister to-night will come to fruition in deeds, more production and greater war effort by the Canadian people.

On motion of Mr. Harris (Danforth) the debate was adjourned.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) for the appointment of a select committee to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I have but a few general remarks to make this evening before the minister closes the debate upon the motion to set up a committee of this house to inquire into the problems of rehabilitation and reconstruction in the post-war period.

Without any shadow of doubt, the people of this nation will feel that it is their right to decide their own future after the winning of the victory. To-day thousands of them are fighting in every field; they are engaged in a life and death struggle, first of all, for their existence as a nation, and second, for their right to be assured of democratic progress in the future.

The democratic progress of any nation depends to a very great degree upon the will of the people for progress. It depends to a great degree upon the people's understanding of the direction which has to be taken before progress can be achieved. Canadians during the last ten years have learned much. To-day they have both the will and the understanding to go on. Personally I am of opinion that when we as a nation are rapidly approaching the great crisis when we shall be called upon to exert every effort to win the final victory, it would be well to have had committees of this house set up—even now, at this stage in the war's progress—to try to determine some of our more immediate problems. I should like to have seen a committee of this house draw up a bill of rights for labour, for there is yet much by way of contribution which labour must make before the final victory is won. I should like to have seen the committee take upon itself the function of determining further ways and means of strengthening the relations between government and management and labour. Also, a committee could have delved into the difficulties which still face agriculture, and might have drawn up a programme commensurate with the needs of our agricultural people. And these committees should recommend legislation to write on the statute books of this country what is necessary to ensure a permanent foundation which will stand us in good stead when the days of peace follow.

Our ability to go on after this war to security, to social and economic reestablish-ment, depends to a large degree upon what we as a nation accomplish now. The foundations of our national life must be laid now if the future is to have stability. Those of us who look back over this last period of years, know that the world is moving with great rapidity, moving over a course which I hope it will never have to re-travel. To be realistic we must acknowledge that as a nation we shall emerge from this conflict as a strong capitalist state; yet I would dare to say that as such we shall emerge from this war very much different from the nation we were in 1939.

To win this war the government has seen fit to impose upon private enterprise certain controls, and for the time being private enterprise has seen fit, on account of war emergency, to accept those controls. The question which faces any committee on post-war reconstruction is one of the degree of control which shall be considered necessary in the future. The question which comes before any committee of this kind is, whether in the general interests of the nation these mild controls necessary to our war-time endeavour shall continue so that it shall be possible to raise the levels of living and security for all our people, or whether private enterprise and corporate interests in Canada will be strong enough after the winning of this war to turn back the clock, to destroy all we have built during these years of war for national unity. If they do that there will be, according to all the laws of economics, but one course for us to follow—the road backward, a road upon which we shall travel toward an era of wide and unrestricted competition, resulting in another period of chaos such as we went through in the 'thirties.

A committee on reconstruction has to consider this question of controls before it can embark upon any ideas of spacious living for the future. In my opinion one of the greatest bulwarks of strength upon which we can rely as a nation is the determinations set forth by the Atlantic charter and the hope that we have with the other united nations of collaboration with them in the post-war period to bring not only cultural but economic and social advancement to the peoples of all the united nations. In a post-war reconstruction era we, as a nation, must strive for the maximum of peaceful orderly development. That, Mr. Speaker, is the goal for which we must strive. During the war the government of this country has not been afraid to embark upon new ways of doing things. It has not been afraid to try new measures. We face, after this war is over, a new world with new conditions, conditions greatly of our own making. We must not then cling to old ways just because they are familiar to us. In times of reconstruction after the war this government must face problems in as realistic a manner as it has done in the war period and not be averse to trying new ways and new things to do.

Canada, of course, was the first nation to try price control for the curbing of inflation and did so with a great measure of success. It will be a wonderful thing in the history of these coming years if the government of Canada could be one of the first to introduce new controls to ensure the gainful employment of her own people as the first requisite for post-war reconstruction. Ways can be found.

The Atlantic charter which pledges to the peoples of the united nations continued cooperation and collaboration between them was born of war emergency. In my opinion the future trade and peace relations of this nation with others depend upon the continuation of collaboration and cooperation between the united nations. Any proposals brought forward by the committee on reconstruction must be built upon the realistic and solid implementation of the Atlantic charter and all that it stands for.

I would say again, Mr. Speaker, that whatever is brought forward by way of suggestions for post-war reconstruction by the committee must be made known at the earliest possible moment to the Canadian people. I am one of those who believe that no proposals of any committee can have life and health in them unless they have the will and the cooperation of the people of this nation behind them. For this reason I would advocate that any suggestions of this committee be brought before the people of Canada so that wide public discussion may take place upon the issues which face us. Only in that way can recommendations from the various groups in this country be brought before the committee and be embodied in its proposals.

I wonder if the majority of the people today realize how much of our thinking in pre-war days was dominated by the propaganda of our enemy. One of the great aims of Hitler during the pre-war years was to foist upon the people of the world the lie that the peoples of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics and their leaders were the enemy of the people of the world. To the degree that it was possible Hitler endeavoured to isolate the people of the U.S.S.R. from the rest of the world, and to a great degree he was successful. But it would be too bad if, after the experience of these war years, we, as a nation, were to slip back into some of our pre-war thinking. It would be too bad if, after winning the military victory which we all believe will be possible for us, we should allow Hitler to win an ideological victory by continuing to destroy the faith and the confidence which have been established among the united nations during the war.

To-day the people of the U.S.S.R. and the people of Britain have a pact of collective security for the maintenance of peaceful relations for twenty years into the future. I hope very much that this nation will adhere to that pact and do everything possible to make it become a reality. To my mind it is one of the greatest guarantees for the advancement of social and economic progress in this country and all the other countries working with us.

I should like to suggest that this committee on reconstruction beware of the outcry which is likely to be raised from certain elements within this country and perhaps elsewhere against all measures of reform which will be labelled as socialist or red in their content. A situation already exists and is possibly known to members of this house where disruptive elements are tending to destroy the confidence which the united nations have between each other. Editorials are already appearing in our newspapers trying to bring to the forefront of the minds of our people fear and apprehensions as to what will be done by the U.S.S.R. after the war is over, as to what she will desire to have as her share of war spoils and what she will try to dictate in the post-war world. Such slanderous attacks as these must be guarded against and against them such a committee as we are setting up must be warned. Not only that, but within the very boundaries of this nation slanderous attacks are already being made upon labour and upon people's organizations. These are being made by the voices of appeasement which in years gone by strove to cause disunity among us and to spell defeat before we had even attempted to gather our forces and fight. They will now try to turn the clock back by labelling every reform as revolutionary. We must guard against this and see to it that every reform which is possible within the boundaries of a capitalist nation is brought forward for the people of this country who are planning and working for it. The voices of appeasement must be stilled, now and forever.

A marvellous opportunity lies before the people of Canada. We can emerge from this war stronger; we can rise as a nation to greater heights than we have ever reached before, remembering, of course, always that the true prosperity of a nation must be judged by the living standards of its people. Their education, their culture, their health, their security and the political and economic freedom which they enjoy—those are the things and those alone which spell the greatness of a nation. It is not the profits of its industry, it is not the assets of its banks, which spell the prosperity and greatness of a nation.

The committee must see to it that those new Canadians who are born to us in the coming years are born into homes where they are greeted with happy expectancy. Members of this committee must see to it that the children of this nation are regarded by our people as its most cherished and precious possession. They must see to it that the children of all our people have an equal opportunity to develop their talent and use it for the national good. They must see to it that our young people are happy in the knowledge that society has a place for them and for their creative efforts. And they must see to it that all our people have the assurance of security to establish homes and have children as is their natural right. Our returned men and women must be made to feel the tangible and concrete gratitude of this nation; the maimed and the sick and the blind and the aged and the widowed must be cared for and live as honoured citizens.

These things can be done by a nation which has the will to do them. The poet Browning has said that a man's reach should exceed his grasp. In the matter of reconstruction I say, let us reach out for the stars. Nothing short of that must satisfy us. Let us build a Canada, not where selfish interests are allowed to work for "me and mine," but one in which all the people of Canada walk forward together as one nation, confident that they are working for "us and ours".

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): With the stirring review of the nation's finances by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) ringing in our ears, I scarcely think it would be fair to the house, and possibly not fair to myself, that I should indulge at this time in any extended or comprehensive review of this debate. I rose for one purpose, namely to extend my own thanks to the members of the house, and especially to the hon. members who took part in this debate, for some of the most constructive contributions that I have heard during twenty-three years of parliamentary life. There was hardly a partisan note or tinge in the whole debate. I am sure that what was said here will be of immeasurable benefit to the committee when it is constituted.

Just a word to recall the history of these various committees. On December 2, 1939, or only about a month after the war broke out, the first cabinet committee on demobilization and rehabilitation was formed. Shortly afterwards, in February, 1941, the terms of reference of that committee were extended to appoint a committee on reconstruction, and the actual personnel of that committee was formed on September 2, 1941. As a result of the formation of the cabinet committee there was appointed a general advisory committee on demobilization and rehabilitation, and that committee with ten subcommittees has been very largely responsible for all the work that has been done in the last two or three years in preparing for the reestablishment of our fighting men, when they return. Someone said last night, unknowingly, that very little had been done in three years. I wonder if that hon. member had forgotten that the pensions committee sat in this house in 1941 and that as a result of their deliberations there was enacted by this parliament what I believe to be with all its flaws—there are some flaws—the finest piece of pension legislation in any country in the world to-day.

Last year there were passed in this house three pieces of legislation—and not by order in council: the Vocational Training Coordination Act, the Compulsory Reinstatement Act, and as a result of eighteen months' deliberation by one of these committees, the Veterans' Land Act, which I think is one of the finest acts that we have on the statute books of Canada. Although the work of many of these committees has been temporarily concluded, we are still working on the question of priorities in demobilization, still working on the question of an improved scheme of returned soldiers' allowances, and administration is being improved as fast as we can from day to day. That is touching on the angle of reestablishment.

Touching on the angle of reconstruction I wish to pay my tribute to the excellent work done by those six distinguished Canadians who not only have been studying with about one hundred assistants and consultants all the problems of our national economy in Canada, but have touched upon every single problem that has been mentioned in this debate: soil erosion; rural electrification; the Ganaraska watershed, and other waters in Manitoba and flowing into the St. Lawrence and all over Canada; agriculture, with the cooperation and excellent advice of my distinguished colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); mines and resources with the assistance of my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar); public works under the direction of the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works; employment boards under the distinguished leadership of Mr. Tom Moore, whose services unfortunately we were not able to retain for the last few months, but we have another excellent gentleman from Vancouver whom I know well, Mr. Percy Bengough, who will carry on and do all he can to see that labour is protected. Someone on the opposite side said the other evening that labour might be forgotten. Labour will have its proper and adequate representation. So will agriculture. We are trying to represent the interests of all the people of Canada. That work is going on. We now have a subcommittee of the economic advisory committee coordinating the efforts of the various committees, and they are all reporting to my distinguished and right hon. leader the president of the privy council of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). Thus it will be seen that we have now a coordinated effort in regard to the problems of reconstruction.

Reconstruction is not the same as social security. Reconstruction is the positive side of the question. Reconstruction is a challenge to government to develop positive policies, to ensure that gainful employment, or if you like, optimum employment, is available for those who are able and willing to work. Social security comes in only for the very young or the very old or those who are sick or hurt or maimed or invalided. That is a challenge to government; and that is why the Beveridge report, brilliant and able as it is, is no complete solution to the problems of the nation. The Beveridge report comes only in as a safeguard of social security when positive measures of reconstruction have to a certain extent failed. Complete cooperation between both reconstruction and social security policies is requisite, and that is what the government is now seeking to obtain through the efforts of committees of this parliament—and they are supreme over any committees outside. Their recommendations will have a tremendous influence with the government. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked the other evening as to the status of this committee. I say that when this committee makes recommendations to the government they will receive the most earnest and careful attention of the government. This committee on reconstruction will do exactly what the pensions committee did two years ago; it will call in officials of the reconstruction committee, officials of the economic advisory committee, people from other parts of Canada and outside, from the provinces if you like, and will make careful recommendations to the government. The government will be then possessed of the facts and will determine its policies. It is ridiculous to ask any government at the present time to declare policies in regard to reconstruction. All any government can do at this stage is to have ideals and objectives, and that I think we all have in this house.

Free enterprise was condemned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and commended by others. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my position is halfway between the two schools of thought. I think free enterprise has gone in the history of this world. I think controlled enterprise must be the guiding maxim for future governments of mankind. We must never let capital run rampant again, and we must never again have the exploitation of natural and human resources that we sometimes had in days gone by. Therefore this is a programme of preparedness.

Once again I thank the house for the support it has given this resolution, and I thank hon. members for the kindly comments which many of them were good enough to extend to its sponsor.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of standing committees of the house, be amended by adding to the standing committees of the house for the present session a standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines for the present session, for consideration and report to the house; provided, however, that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply; and that the said committee consist of: Messrs. Donnelly, Dubuc, Durocher, Emmerson. Ferland, Gray, Hanson (Skeena), Harris (Danforth), Hazen, Howden, Howe, Jackman, Lockhart, McCulloch, Maybank, Nicholson, Parent, Pouliot, Roebuck, Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Shaw, Sissons.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take two or three minutes to deal with this motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declared the motion carried, but perhaps the hon. gentleman did not hear me.

Mr. CHURCH: I think before this committee is appointed the minister should say a word as to the procedure which will be followed. When this committee was first appointed, in the days of the late Mr. Graham, who took a great deal of interest in this work, it was made a rule that any private member of the house interested in the rialway question could attend the meetings of the committee and ask questions. That practice was followed for four or five years. I understand, however, that this rule has now been abrogated, with the result that members of this house have little opportunity of offering suggestions or constructive criticism in connection with our great public utility. We are at present conducting a war. From the beginning of the war to the end of 1940, according to a return tabled for me they received from the government for war work for 16 months, a period of a year and four months, the Canadian Pacific Railway $2,750,000, and the Canadian National $2,500,000, or more than they received in the four years of the last war. With all due respect I contend that this committee should consider suggestions and even resolutions presented by private members. For instance, I believe the government would be well advised to consider whether soldiers cannot be given better treatment. The transport officer issued an order cutting down certain train services during February, which order I understand is to be extended to cover this month as well. No doubt that is quite proper in view of the heavy winter we have experienced, but why should extra trains be provided at week-ends for civilians and not for soldiers? I understand that some of our boys in Camp Borden have not left that camp since Christmas. Many of those soldiers are family men. I know of one whose wife had a child the other day, and he was not able to be with her.

Then I think there should be some provision for considering special cases of soldiers. For example, many of the trains I have seen occupied by soldiers, at Brockville and many other points, are most unsatisfactory. But while soldiers are prohibited from travelling, we see in the newspapers almost every other day where some young Canadian athlete is transferred from Hamilton to Victoria to take part in games; then he shows up back in Hamilton again, and finally he goes to Halifax. During all this time the soldiers are not allowed to travel at all.

I do not wish to hold up this resolution at any length, but this public utility has cost the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money and we are never given an opportunity to discuss the affairs of this system except perhaps two or three days before the session closes, when we may have an hour or so devoted to the committee's report. In view of all the money the railways are making I think the public are entitled to some reduction in fares. Soldiers are not permitted to hitchhike; they may not go more than fifty miles on a bus, and as a result soldiers going to Camp Borden are dumped off at a point about twelve miles from Barrie and left to cover the remainder of the distance as best they can. I think the railways should be able to afford to carry soldiers and their families free over weekends. As it is now, it costs a soldier $2.25 to go home to Toronto from Camp Borden for a weekend, and if he wants to visit his family during his last leave it takes almost a week's pay. Then what is the government going to do about this Almonte disaster? Have we two bodies regulating our railways—the railway commission and the transport officer? What are the functions of these bodies?

Then there is the merchant marine, and I think we should do something about that. We have boats running from Toronto to Port Dalhousie, and one of those boats is not suitable at all. I am afraid something will happen to it, because it has been on the lake for many years. It was not good enough for Northumberland strait and therefore they sent it to the run between Port Dalhousie and Toronto, while they provided a large car ferry for Northumberland strait. I do not object to that; we were glad to see them get it, but apparently any old boat is good enough for lake Ontario. It is a wonder there has not been an accident before this, and newspaper articles show that there have been close calls. I contend that not enough information about this system is given to the public, who after all are the trustees, the owners of it. What are we doing about the tourist trade? We never have any opportunity of discussing these matters, and as a supporter of public ownership in this country I urge that the taxpayer, who has paid all these capital charges and who in addition must pay high transportation costs, should be given better service.

[Mr. Church.]

Another question is the suburban steam service. Every large city such as New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Baltimore and so on, has a steam suburban service, which has built up the districts surrounding those cities. Let us consider the suburban service the city of Montreal has, and I would point out that under the Railway Act every other municipality is entitled to the same opportunity, upon application to the board of transport commissioners. The fact is, however, that Montreal is about the only city that has that service.

I plead with the minister to give proper consideration to steam suburban service for the larger cities, and I believe, if that service were given, it would do much to relieve the housing situation. Around Toronto we have a system of radials and buses, now owned by the city. Those systems have built up the outlying districts, so that North York, East York and West York are to a great extent inside suburban constituencies. Rural ridings have become urban ridings. When there is money for capital and maintenance of the Canadian National Railways I ask that something be done so that we may have a more modern system to take care of that problem after the war.

I have attended one or two meetings of the committee, and I have been very much disappointed. All the members seemed to be smoking cigars, and there was much humour at times in evidence. One would think he was attending a vaudeville show, because everyone was in such good humour. They would take up this item and that item, but they were given very little information. I have read the daily reports of the committee and all I have to say is that if that is the way in which we are to investigate public utilities, then we need some other system. The Canadian Pacific Railway would not conduct its affairs without further inquiries.

Another matter which should be considered is that of auditing. Although we have our own auditor general I do not think he has any check at all, because the railways have auditors of their own. Before the committee they present hotel accounts, maintenance accounts, capital accounts, answers and questions, and that is about the end of it. Then, near the close of the session the committee brings its report to the house. I contend that if the committee system is going to be a success—and this is one case in which it has never been successful—it must change its tactics. There is not enough detailed knowledge in what is contained in the report to parliament.

I do not wish to prevent the passage of the motion, but I hope the new minister will consider these matters. I should like to know if private members will be permitted to attend the committee, although they may not be members of it officially.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies may I reiterate, by way of emphasis, what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). There is a great deal of curiosity throughout the country with respect to the delineation of authority between the transit controller and the board of transport commissioners. I rise at this time only to ask the minister to give that matter consideration when he replies, and to indicate just where the power and authority of the transit controller begin and end, and how they affect or fit in with the power and authority of the board of transport commissioners. He might also indicate whether there has so far been any conflict between these two controls.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, we have very little opportunity to discuss matters pertaining to our railways. This is the first one I can recall in some time. I should like to support the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in his request that greater consideration be given to the matter of suburban services. I have repeatedly placed that subject, as it affects the city of Halifax, before the vice-president of the Atlantic region, the general manager of the Atlantic region and the newly appointed Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud). With the prevailing situation in Halifax, from the point of view of a population greatly increased by the large influx of people, a great many are obliged to live in the suburbs. And as a result of the restrictions on bus travel they are finding it exceedingly difficult to get to and from work during weekdays.

I do not wish to make a lengthy speech, but I would urge that the minister give this matter serious consideration. I am glad the hon. member for Broadview has raised it, and I hope the minister will consider the representations placed before him, with a view to seeing if he can do something to improve suburban services in so far as they affect Halifax, with its overcrowded and greatly increased population.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, before the motion carries may I assure hon. members who have spoken, and who have claimed the privilege of appearing before the committee that, so far as I am concerned, in so far as the rules of the house permit they will be given every opportunity to appear and to make their suggestions. I am sure they will take advantage of the opportunity offered them. I would request the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) to appear before the committee and lay before the officials of the railways and the different transportation companies which come under the purview of the committee any representations they may have. Let them attend every sitting and take part in the discussions. I am sure they will be given every opportunity to voice their views. They will be given a hearing, and we shall be pleased to have their suggestions for the betterment of transportation services in Canada.

At the present time our facilities are limited, not by money or capital but by materials. Those materials are limited through priorities. Our railways—and I speak of the Canadian National Railways, but it is equally true of the Canadian Pacific Railway —are taxed to the limit. They have to transport war materials and great numbers of passengers. We feel that in certain sections and at certain times priority must be given to the transportation of war materials. This necessitates the curtailment of passenger train service, and sacrifices on the part of the travelling public. For the present, until further notice, the policy is that we request the travelling public to travel as little as possible, in order that the movement of war materials and troops may be facilitated.

Second, our facilities are limited on account of rolling stock. Since the beginning of the war our rolling stock has been taxed to more than capacity, and has been used until it is almost exhausted. We have had to make way for more important war materials, which have priority over railway rolling stock. As a result of this we have not been able to get renewals of rolling stock, as we might have hoped.

Then, may I point out that the auditors of the Canadian National Railways are appointed by act of parliament every year, and it is the duty of parliament to decide whether or not their work is satisfactory. The best way to find out is to appear before the committee when the railway accounts are being considered, and then question railway officials who will be at the disposal of the committee.

With regard to the question asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) as to the different functions and duties of the board of transport commissioners, and the transit controller, may I point out that there are two officials, namely, the transit controller and the transport controller. The transit controller has nothing to do with transport by railroad, but the transport controller has been appointed as a war official to organize and establish priorities in connection with the transport of different war materials and as between war materials and passenger service. He acts as the controller of war-time transport services, while the board of transport commissioners is a peace-time organization created under the Railway Act. There is no conflict of authority or in the jurisdiction between the two; the one completes the functions of the other.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the transport controller any authority over any other type of transportation than the railways?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. He attempts to correlate transport as between the railways and the water services.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why would it not be better to leave that under the board of transport commissioners? Why superimpose on the board of transport commissioners another controller? There are enough controllers now without adding another one. You have control now over your railways through the board of transport commissioners. Why could that board not be given the authority given to this controller? They are familiar with the whole business of transportation.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is a matter of opinion. There is no conflict of jurisdiction. The transport controller is simply a complement to the board of transport commissioners which is a peace-time organization and which has certain functions to exercise under the Railway Act. The transport controller must exercise extraordinary functions made necessary by war conditions and his duties are established by the War Measures Act. The transport controller has been functioning for some time and his services have been found to be most useful. He has succeeded in establishing some priorities and in bringing about order in the different branches of railroad transportation.

Every opportunity will be given to hon. members to come before the committee in order to obtain information or to make suggestions in connection with the betterment of the transport facilities for goods and people. I hope that when the report of the committee is brought down, valuable suggestions will be made to meet the requirements suggested by the hon. member for Broadview and the senior hon. member for Halifax.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. McCANN: Does the transport controller act under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport or of the Department of Munitions and Supply?

Mr. MICHAUD: The transport controller comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is an additional reason why he should not be there.

Motion (Mr. Michaud) agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 3, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—NORTH VANCOUVER

Mr. REID:

1. How many houses have been constructed by Wartime Housing Limited, in north Vancouver, B.C., including staff houses?

2. What has been the total cost of these houses, including cost of land, supervision and office overhead?

3. How many of these houses are rented and what amount of rent is being charged for the various types of houses and rooms?

Mr. HOWE:

1. In North Vancouver, B.C., Wartime Housing Limited, as of February 28, 1943, completed 546 houses, two staff houses and one commissary. The complete programme provides for 750 houses, two staff houses and one commissary.

2. The project being incomplete, it is impossible to give exact figures showing the detail asked for. Total payments as of January 31, 1943, are $1,869,904.29. This sum, of course, includes payment for some uncompleted work.

3. There were 519 houses rented as of February 28, 1943. There were 162 beds occupied in the two staff houses.

Rentals are: for houses H-1 and H-2, $20 per month; for houses H-21 and H-22, $22 per month; for houses H-41 and H-42, $27 per month.

The rates in the staff houses are $4 per week for a single room and $3.25 per week each for double occupancy rooms.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PURCHASE OF LAND IN NEW GLASGOW, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Did Wartime Housing Limited purchase land in New Glasgow from A. D. McCormack? If so, what price was paid?

2. Did Wartime Housing Limited erect staff houses or other buildings on such land or in New Glasgow?

3. If so, were tenders called giving name and amount of each tender?

4. To whom was contract let stating what sums have been paid contractors and total sums they claim to have earned?

5. What is the cost of grading and other improvements to property?

6. What is the cost of equipment and furnishings?

7. What is the total estimated cost of the project completed and equipped?

8. How many lodgers will the buildings accommodate?

9. How many lodgers were in residence on February 1, 1943?

10. How many persons were on the operating staff on February 1, 1943?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes. 2·14 acres were expropriated under date of July 15, 1942, and settlement was made with the former owner Mr. A. D. McCormack for the sum of $1,861.85.

2. Yes. On the McCormack property mentioned in 1, Wartime Housing Limited erected three staff houses and one commissary. On other property in New Glasgow Wartime Housing Limited erected 136 houses.

3. Wartime Housing Limited attempted to secure but could not obtain tenders on this work other than from the contractor, Eastern Woodworkers, New Glasgow, Nova Scotia.

4. The contract was let to Eastern Woodworkers, New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. As of January 31, 1943, the amount paid to Eastern Woodworkers amounted to $506,555.64.

5. In New Glasgow for the construction of 136 houses, 3 staff houses and 1 commissary, Wartime Housing Limited paid for grading and other improvements to property including sewer, water, roads, etc., $69,328.57.

6. The cost of equipment and furnishings for all our construction in New Glasgow is $31,991.68.

7. The total estimated cost of completing 136 houses, 3 staff houses and 1 commissary in New Glasgow as of January 31, 1943, is the sum of $568,762.

8. The 3 staff houses will house 88 men each, or 264 in all.

9. On February 1, 1943, there were only 10 beds occupied in the 3 staff houses. The first one was only completed on January 15, 1943. The second was completed on February 13. The third one is still incomplete. The commissary was completed as of January 12.

10. Wartime Housing Limited had on its payroll in New Glasgow for an operating staff for the 136 houses, the 3 staff houses and the one commissary a total of 15 people, as of February 1, 1943.

NATIONAL DEFENCE TAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What amount was collected through the national defence tax during the period from July 1, 1941, to December 31, 1941?

2. What amount was collected through the national defence tax during the period January 1, 1942, to July 31, 1942?

3. What amount was collected through income tax from those in the income bracket of $3,000 and less per year during the years (a) 1939, (b) 1940, (c) 1941?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. $57,135,942.92.

2. $87,686,629.10.

3. (a) 1938-39, $2,594,387.
(b) 1939-40, $2,650,404.98.
(c) 1940-41, $3,142,823.45.

FIRES AT JOHN INGLIS PLANT, TORONTO

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Has the government knowledge of the occurrence of two fires recently at the plant of the John Inglis Company, Limited, Toronto, about the 18th of February?

2. If so, has it caused any investigation to be made?

3. Has any investigation been held?

4. What was the result of the investigation?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. There were two small fires on the premises of the John Inglis Company Limited, Toronto, during the month of February, one in a contractor's shack caused from an overheated stove; the other in a new building in which the contractors were working. In the latter case salamanders were used to dry out the building and a tarpaulin blown by a strong wind caught fire from a salamander. Both fires were termed as accidents by fire chief Moody of the John Inglis Company Limited and the damage does not exceed $150.

INCOME TAX—REQUESTS FOR REMISSION

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. During the last five months of 1942, in each of the nine provinces, how many income taxpayers have requested a remission of all or part of their income tax on the plea that payment of the full income tax assessed against them would seriously impair their ability to meet their unavoidable financial commitments?

2. In the cases of how many of those taxpayers was the request granted?

3. In the cases of those whose requests were denied, how many were refused because the collector completely established that the applicant was able to pay the impost without seriously impairing his ability to meet his unavoidable financial commitments?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Information not available.

2. None.

3. Information not available.

*CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Has it been found necessary in England to adopt a special flag for the Canadian army to distinguish it from that of England and the sister dominions?

2. Will the Canadian flag adopted in England be the one used in Canada after the war? If not, what will then be the Canadian flag?

Mr. RALSTON: I can answer that verbally, Mr. Speaker. The answer is no. It may be that the hon. member has in mind a pennant which was presented to General McNaughton when he was general officer commanding the first Canadian division. That banner has no official status as a flag.

*TRANSPORT CONTROL—LEAVE FOR TROOPS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has leave for troops in training been cancelled by order of the transit controller?

2. If so, how long will such regulation continue?

3. Is any weekend leave granted such persons at present? If so, on what basis?

Mr. RALSTON: The answer is no. It was cancelled for the month of February at the request of the transport controller. The cancellation was on account of bad weather and to enable a very heavy freight congestion to be handled. As to how long the regulation will continue, there is no such regulation; and the cancellation was for February. To the third question, as to weekend leave, the answer is yes; weekend leave has been resumed to the extent to which railway facilities are available.

Mr. CHURCH: Civilians can travel, why not soldiers? Why cannot soldiers have the ordinary leave?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PURCHASE OF MARKETORIUM PROPERTY, WINDSOR, ONT.

Mr. BENCE:

1. Has the government purchased a property in the city of Windsor, known as the Marketorium?

2. If so, for what purpose has this property been acquired?

3. From whom was the property acquired?

4. On what date was the property acquired?

5. What was the total purchase price of the property?

6. Was an agent employed in connection with this purchase?

7. If so, what was the name of the agent; and what amount was paid to him by way of remuneration?

8. Are alterations required on this property to make it suitable for the purpose for which it was purchased?

9. If so, what is the estimated cost of such alterations?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—OFFICERS IN SERVICE SINCE 1939

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What are the names of all persons who were serving as officers with the Royal Canadian Navy on September 1, 1939, and what rank did they hold at that time?

2. What was the total pay and allowances received by each such officer at that time?

3. What is the present rank of each such person?

4. What is the total pay and allowance received by each such person at the present time?

MEDICAL PROCUREMENT BOARD

Mr. SHAW:

1. When was the medical procurement board established?

2. Who are the members of this board?

3. What powers were vested in the board?

4. Has the medical procurement board undertaken a nation-wide survey to ascertain a correct picture of the situation with respect to the number and distribution of medical men?

5. If not, is any other agency carrying out such a survey?

6. Will the result of such a survey be made known to the public?

7. Has any plan been adopted for the freezing of doctors in their present locations and for the transfer of others to centres without doctors?

8. Has the government given consideration to the carrying out of a survey to determine the number and distribution of dentists?

9. Have any plans been adopted to meet the shortage of dentists in certain Canadian centres?

CONDENSED MILK

Mr. SHAW:

1. What was the total production of condensed milk in Canada during 1942?

2. What portion of Canada's 1942 production of condensed milk was purchased by the Canadian government or any department thereof for use by, (a) the armed forces, (b) others than the armed forces?

3. Was any part of Canada's production of condensed milk exported to the United States during 1942? If so, what quantity?

4. Has the government taken any steps to encourage the increased production of condensed milk in Canada? If so, what was the nature of the action taken?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NORTHWEST FIELD FORCE, 1885—PENSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government, dated during the past three years, relating to the granting of a pension to the surviving members of the Northwest field force (1885); also a copy of any reports and proceedings of any committee in relation to this matter.

RESTRICTIONS ON CONSUMPTION OF BEER, WINES AND SPIRITS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence received by ministers of the government from individuals or firms engaged in the manufacture of beer, wines and spirits, regarding liquor restrictions, since the broadcast of the Prime Minister on December 16, 1942.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the house is to have the correspondence from individuals and firms engaged in the manufacture of beer, wines and spirits, it would I should think also wish and ought to have the correspondence from individuals and firms other than those engaged in the manufacture of beer, wines and spirits. I suggest that if the motion is to carry it should carry with an amendment which would cause it to read:

For a copy of all correspondence received by ministers of the government from individuals or firms regarding liquor restrictions, since the broadcast of the Prime Minister on December 16, 1942.

That would mean striking out the words which restrict the return simply to the communications from manufacturers. I will say further to my hon. friend that I doubt if he can begin to realize the extent of the correspondence. Some of it is very illuminating, some not quite so enlightening or edifying. But I should think it might be advisable to have the entire correspondence brought together in the office of the Secretary of State and my hon. friend given opportunity to look it over and see what if anything there is in it that he would like to have brought forward.

Mr. HOMUTH: He would probably want it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he did he might have to wait a long time for it, because it is a very considerable correspondence. What I wish to bring to the attention of the house is that to copy all that correspondence and have it produced means considerable expense, the employment of a stenographic staff for some little time. At this time of war public money might be spent to better advantage. I suggest to my hon. friend that the correspondence might all be brought together and that he might look it through and then if there is any particular correspondence he wishes brought down it can be brought down. If at all possible I think it advisable to avoid copying the whole of this correspondence.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My question was limited for the very reason given by the Prime Minister. However, I shall be glad to comply with his request and examine the correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member accept the suggestion of the Prime Minister? Question dropped?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No; the Prime Minister's suggestion was that the correspondence would be brought together. I should like the motion to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, does the hon. member reject my suggestion?—I have undertaken to have the correspondence brought together in the office of the Secretary of State where he can look it over—surely my word as Prime Minister should be accepted in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the Prime Minister misunderstood my colleague. I do not think he doubted the word of the Prime Minister, but he wished the question to stand—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He can restore the motion later if he is not satisfied. I do not see why this motion should be carried from day to day and week to week on the order paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF ONTARIO TEMPERANCE FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in regard to a dispatch published yesterday in the press dated at London, Ontario, March 1:

Rev. John Coburn, chairman of the executive committee of the Ontario Temperance Federation, told the United Church ministerial association—

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend has given me no notice of this question. If he wishes to advertise himself, all right, but I submit that he should at least have had the courtesy to submit his question.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, this question is simply in regard to an item appearing in the press, and I wished to inquire as to its accuracy.

RATIONING

ADDITIONAL CHARGE BY PUBLIC CATERERS FOR TEA, COFFEE OR MILK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to give an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) on Monday, March 1. I should have taken the point of order that this question ought to have been placed on the order paper, but I did not do so. I would have done so if I had had time to give adequate consideration to it. However, this is the answer:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

On Monday last the hon. member for St. John-Albert quoted a press dispatch respecting a recent order of the wartime prices and trade board permitting public caterers to charge five cents extra for non-alcoholic beverages served with meals, and asked me to inform the house what purpose this order is intended to serve.

Public caterers purvey nothing but foods, and since the basic period have borne the "squeeze" incident to the higher cost of foods, with respect to some of which there is no ceiling. The business is highly competitive and has never been regarded as a highly profitable one. The situation had become almost impossible for many of the smaller restaurants, and the board, after full investigation, decided that some relief would have to be given in order to maintain the essential service which is provided. It was felt that the situation was not one in which a subsidy could be recommended. The solution found avoided an over-all increase in the price of restaurant meals and gives the customer a chance to decide whether or not he wishes to add to the cost of his meal, or to give up the beverage on which the price increase has been granted.

An additional consideration was, of course, that the order should have the effect of conserving tea and coffee, for which ration coupons are not demanded from the consumer in restaurants.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO SITUATION IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), in regard to the grave housing situation in the city of Toronto. The minister promised to make a statement a few days before the house closed last August and again this session. Will the minister make a statement by next Monday as to the situation regarding both peace-time and war-time housing?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not think I will. The Minister of Munitions and Supply is in charge of War-time Housing Limited, which is the only agency carrying on government housing. So far as I know it is not proposed to carry on government housing in the city of Toronto. I do not know that there is anything I can add to that statement.

Mr. CHURCH: Last Saturday the Toronto members were requested to meet the mayor and the board of control with the provincial members. We were not given any information, because the Department of Munitions and Supply turned the whole situation over to the real estate administrator. I have a letter here from the president of Wartime Housing Limited—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —saying that further discussion in regard to housing in Toronto will have to be carried on with the administrator of real property.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member will put exactly what he wants to know on the order paper I will try to see that an answer is given, in so far as the real estate administrator has jurisdiction over the matter.

Mr. CHURCH: It is a dreadful state of affairs, one of Canada's worst scandals, and nothing is being done.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $3,890,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1944, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $3,890,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution asks for authority to introduce a bill which is designed to provide the appropriation we shall require for war expenditures during the fiscal year 1943-44. The bill will be in exactly the same form as the main war appropriation of last year except for the amount of the vote to be asked for.

The magnitude of this vote and the fact that it is to provide for our direct war financial programme for the new year makes this by far the most important measure with which the house will have to deal during the present session. It will provide an opportunity for discussing and appraising not only the war programme which we are proposing for next year, but also the record of war activities and expenditures during the fiscal year now drawing to a close. In view of the courtesy of the house in refraining from extended debate on the supplementary war appropriation which was voted a week or ten days ago, every opportunity will be given to hon. members to make such inquiries and comments as they may wish to make in regard to the expenditures of the current year.

To facilitate such inquiries and debate, I will now place on Hansard a break-down by the main categories of expenditure, in more detailed form than previously, of the estimated expenditure of $3,890,000,000 for 1943-44. I would also call the attention of the house to the fact that the comparable amounts of estimated expenditure on the various items during the current fiscal year will be found on pages 17-24 of the white paper which I tabled in connection with the budget last evening.

The table showing the break-down of the estimated war expenditure for 1943-44 is too long to read, and if the house will permit me, I will merely place it on Hansard and then direct attention to some of the major items. The table is as follows:

Grand total chargeable to war appropriation			$3,890,000,000

It will be noted that, in round numbers, the aggregate expenditures of the three defence services are estimated at $3,320,000,000 for 1943-44 as compared with an estimated $1,913,000,000 for the current fiscal year. Breaking down these totals, we find that army services account for $1,764,000,000 in 1943-44 as compared with $1,061,000,000 in 1942-43; air services, $1,129,000,000 as compared with $627,000,000; naval services, $489,000,000 as compared with $208,000,000; and sundry services, $22,500,000 as compared with $17,600,000.

The substantial increase for the air services reflects not only the expansion of the air training plan and the increased air force activities on both coasts of Canada but also the acceptance by Canada of full responsibility for maintaining and equipping thirty-eight Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons overseas and for the pay of all R.C.A.F. personnel overseas. In the naval estimates we see the effect not only of gradual expansion of our navy but also of the increased naval shipbuilding programme. The estimated increase in the expenditures of the army is accounted for not only by expanding programmes but by the substantial increase in deliveries of finished equipment and war supplies now coming from Canadian war plants and the probability of more active operations overseas. However, it would not be appropriate at this time, and I will not attempt to give detailed explanations for any of the increases or for the programme as a whole, because when the bill is before the house detailed estimates of the proposed expenditures by various departments and functions will be given by the ministers who are individually responsible.

In the case of the Department of Munitions and Supply the estimated net expenditure for 1943-44 is $166 million. This compares with an estimated expenditure for the current year of about $689 million. The latter figure, however, included $200 million for the purchase of the British interest in Canadian war plants and provided for an expansion of plant and equipment much larger than will be required during the coming year. For the war activities carried on by all other departments or agencies of government the estimate for 1943-44 is $254 million as compared with an estimated expenditure during the present year of $200 million. In this connection I may point out for the information of the house that the largest single item in this category is $120,000,000 to provide for subsidies under the Commodity Prices Stabilization corporation. In view of the recent clarification of functions in regard to subsidy payments as between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture, part of this requirement will be assigned to the Department of Agriculture, but it is not at the moment practical to make the allocation. The remaining $65 million requested by the appropriation is an estimate of the amount required to cover cash outlays charged to active assets rather than to expenditure, and for contingencies.

I shall not now say more about the details of these estimates by departments and functions. That would be needlessly confusing to the house, before it has had time to study and digest the salient features of the table which I have placed on Hansard. Nor do I think it is necessary to attempt at great length to consider these proposed war expenditures in the light of our over-all financial picture. I had an opportunity of doing that only last evening in the budget address. Let me touch very briefly on a few salient points and then examine in more detail one or two general points which have been raised in the house during the last few weeks.

In the first place, I wish to enphasize that Canada's war expenditure for 1943-44 is not covered by this war appropriation of $3,890,000,000. To that should be added the billion dollar appropriation to be requested in the mutual aid bill. It is the sum of these two appropriations which represents the estimated cost of our war programme for the new fiscal year. That sum is $4,890,000,000, which, hon. members will note, is almost eighty-nine per cent of the dominion's estimated aggregate expenditure for 1943-44. It may be added that it is also nearly three times the estimated total cost of Canada's war effort during the great war 1914-18.

In the second place, I want to say that the total represents a very careful estimate of the cash outlays involved by the war effort which we believe we can accomplish during the twelve months beginning April 1 next. As I said last evening, it is not a financial programme but merely the financial counterpart of the physical or economic programme, the measure in dollar terms of the amount of man-power and resources which we believe we can throw into the war effort as our contribution to victory during the coming year. In the early years of the war the estimates of war expenditures in this country as in other countries tended to run ahead of actual accomplishments because everybody tended to underestimate the time it takes to get plants built, production under way on a large scale, and organization completed. Even last year, as the house will remember, I asked for a war appropriation substantially less than the departments estimated they could spend, but I warned the house that I would probably have to come back before the end of the year for additional funds for our direct war expenditure as well as for additional funds to enable the United Kingdom to continue her purchases of foodstuffs, raw materials and munitions in this country. Actually the departments were able to spend all they estimated and, indeed, somewhat more in some instances. Our programme was expanded in accordance with changing conditions, and early this year we decided that it would be wiser for us to meet Britain's needs for dollars during the remainder of this year not by a further gift but by purchasing outright her interest in Canadian war plants and thus getting title and full control of these plants in the name of Canada. These things, therefore, are the explanation of the supplementary war appropriation of $858 million, and not as one hon. member has said, the lack of careful planning by the government with respect to war financial expenditures.

As time goes on, the tendency to which I have referred, of expenditures to lag behind estimates, disappears and a very substantial proportion of the increased expenditures for the new year estimated by the three defence services are based on the expectation of receiving largely expanded deliveries of mechanized equipment, munitions and supplies which mark the fruition of the able and aggressive planning of production by my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and the capacity for achievement of Canadian business management and Canadian labour. As I have said, I think we can spend during the year all of the huge sums for which we are now asking, because I believe we can achieve the production of war goods and the diversion of manpower to the armed services which our programme calls for. I am asking for all I think we can spend, but I must add this, that if before the end of the year it should prove that we shall need something additional that will be because we have actually been able to divert more of our resources to the war effort.

There are some who think that we are trying to do too much, or even already doing too much, and that we are going to bankrupt the country. Well, I want to say that we cannot do too much; that nothing which the Canadian people can do is too much to throw into this struggle for the right to survive in freedom and decency; that the way to wreck this country and bankrupt civilization is for Canada and her partners to do just a little less than enough to win. Unless I am gravely mistaken, that truth is plainly evident to the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what we have advocated from the beginning.

Mr. ILSLEY: In this connection let me turn to a statement made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) on February 15, which to be found on pages 407 and 408 of Hansard.

> The minister expressed amazement that the people of Canada could sustain the weight of a war expenditure of the size and scope they are being asked to sustain. The answer is that this government is asking the people of Canada to bear a greater ratio of load in proportion to the national income than is the case in either of the other two large belligerent nations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right.

Mr. ILSLEY:

> I have before me a review contained in a federal reserve publication issued just prior to January 15 which reveals that the proportion of the national income devoted to war purposes is considerably less in the United States than it is in either Great Britain or Canada. This bulletin shows that the war effort in the three countries is absorbing the national income according to the following percentages: United States, 24·5 per cent; Great Britain, 36·8 per cent, and Canada, 39·1 per cent. If these figures mean anything, and if I correctly interpret them, they show that the Canadian people are being asked by this government to contribute to the war effort a greater proportion of the national income than either our rich neighbours to the south or our very hard-pressed blood brothers overseas.

These figures do not show anything of the kind. There was a grave error in quotation of the publication.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not by me.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. I have looked up that issue of the federal reserve bulletin, and I find that the article cited by the hon. member refers to taxes rather than to the amount of effort devoted to war purposes. I am surprised that the hon. member did not make this clear, because it is an important distinction and one that is sufficiently understandable that there should be no need for confusion.

I would not undertake to vouch for the accuracy of the figures quoted in respect of the United Kingdom and the United States. The publication in which they appear is a reliable one and the figures are carefully described and qualified. However, it would appear that in the case of Canada the figures for taxation and for national income are probably both a little on the low side, although the relationship between the two does not appear to be seriously in error, and although, furthermore, we cannot speak with any great assurance in regard to our own statistics of national income. I understand that efforts are being made to bring about substantial improvements in our own national income figures, and I hope that before long we can make comparisons of this kind with much more assurance.

However, the essential point is that the table throws no light at all on the relative proportions of their national incomes which the three countries are devoting to the war effort. They were talking about taxes; they were not talking about the relative parts of their production that they were devoting to the war effort. If the table has any significance it is as to the light which it throws on the financial policy of the three countries. In Canada, as the house knows full well, we have endeavoured to carry the "pay-as-we-go policy" as far as practicable, and in this I believe we have had a greater measure of success than most other countries. That is a reason for pride and rejoicing rather than a point to censure. Canadians will have many occasions in future years to look back on this record with satisfaction.

What is relevant for the point which the hon. member for York-Sunbury had in mind is a comparison of national incomes with total war expenditures rather than merely with the amount financed through taxation. Particularly in view of the state of our national income statistics, I would not wish to compare the three countries on this basis, even if we had such reliable figures, and I am not referring to statistics kept by any particular department, because several agencies of government are keeping national income statistics. In fact, it is extremely difficult to get an estimate which is accurate, and I think it is found that way in other countries, as well as in Canada. Even if we had such reliable figures, the subject is one which bristles with technical difficulties, and it is by no means easy to be certain that we are comparing like with like. Many qualifications would be required before we could get a proper basis of comparison. Let me give only one example. The rates of pay for the armed forces in the United Kingdom and in other European countries are substantially lower than our rates of pay. Consequently the expenditure upon pay and allowances for the armed forces of these countries is made to appear less in proportion than it is for us here in North America, although in fact the proportion of man-power and of real economic resources may be higher. Hence war expenditures are by no means a reliable guide in themselves when one is making a comparison between different nations.

However, we do not need to attempt such complicated statistical comparisons to get at the real truth of the matter. As I pointed out in the budget, we do not need to go beyond very elementary statistics or even common observation to realize that we on the home front in Canada are still away behind the people of Britain in the degree to which we have cut down our civilian consumption for the sake of the war effort. It is fantastic to say that the moderate decline we have suffered from the peak of war-time consumption, and the increase in the inconveniences we have suffered in shopping and travelling, compare with the belt-tightening and the personal sacrifices and hardships of the British people. Furthermore, we should want to make this type of comparison rather than compare what we have done with what has been achieved in the United States which was a neutral country prior to December 7, 1941. That country has been mobilizing with tremendous speed; it has pointed its sights very high indeed, and if it is able to translate into action the $108 billion budget for which the President has asked, we may have cause for envy rather than for self-complacency.

We are doing our utmost to avoid waste or extravagance and to get as much as we can for each dollar of expenditure. I realize that in an undertaking as vast as our war programme we cannot achieve perfection in this regard, but I feel that within the inevitable human limitations we are getting good value for our money. We have put into effect a great variety of controls over expenditure, and wherever we see, or someone tells us, that one of the human cogs in a huge machine has slipped, we do our best to correct the mistake and safeguard against its recurrence. I try to avail myself of every opportunity for criticism of any expenditure that appears to be unessential or unnecessarily large, and I trust the house will do likewise. It is only by such self-criticism and such constant vigilance that we can secure economy and efficiency in any democratic, cooperative effort.

If, therefore, it be true that we are getting reasonable value for our money, it follows that those who argue that our war expenditures are drawn on too large a scale really mean that we are attempting to devote too much effort to the war. Apparently they want us to go slow, to limit our war effort, to cut down on man-power and materials. They want us to have a war effort under which we can all be comfortable rather than one which would stretch our energies and our resourcefulness to the limit. In this way they would seek to solve problems of shortages of butter and beef, and restaurant seats, and pullman cars. I for one do not believe that to be the wish of the Canadian people. That is not the type of war effort which would enable the Canadian people to hold their heads high in the family of nations. That is not the policy to which the government and this country have committed themselves.

Finally, I turn more specifically to the question: are we bankrupting the country? The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) appeared to build up a bogey of the country somehow running out of money, of our coming to the end of our financial resources. That is a situation which might confront one individual, or a group within the community, or even a nation in regard to its resources of foreign exchange; it is not a situation which confronts a nation in regard to its own production and internal financing. We do not pay for the war out of some hoard of money that we have accumulated in the past. We pay for it out of the taxes and savings that we obtain from the current income of the whole nation. We shall not run short of money. Indeed, our danger is the very reverse of that, namely, that we may pile up too much money in the pockets and bank accounts of Canadians, unless we strive with every effort to promote the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates.

If we are bankrupting the nation, is it not indeed a strange type of bankruptcy? How can we use such a term to describe the process under which this country has doubled its national income in three years, has wiped out unemployment, has multiplied its production of many things and learned many types of new skills, has expanded and diversified its production equipment, has multiplied its governmental revenues by more than four times, has enabled millions of its citizens to acquire a nest-egg for the future, has mobilized its full strength as a producing machine, and has developed a sense of productive achievement not hitherto known? No country goes bankrupt in this way; no country goes bankrupt by increasing its production and devoting part or all, or more than all of that increase to a supreme cause.

Of course our huge war expenditures do pose difficult financial problems during the war, and as I have often stated they make careful economic and financial management imperative. They involve a very large increase in our national debt, but it is a debt which we owe to ourselves, and it will be well within our capacity to manage if we follow sound policies. They make high taxes necessary if we are to share the financial burdens and the real burdens fairly and effectively. But these taxes are essentially just a reflection in financial terms of the inevitable sacrifices of goods and services which we must make if we are to wage war on the scale that is necessary to defeat the enemy, and defeat him with the least possible loss of life. Given the scale of our national war effort in terms of men and materials, lower taxes would mean only that we would have a less equitable distribution of the burden, more danger of inflation, more danger of a break-down in our economic controls. Willingness to accept high taxes and other controls; willingness to deny ourselves now in order to avoid greater self-denial tomorrow is not really a test of the strength of our war spirit or the size of our war effort, but rather a test of our intelligence and foresight in allocating the burden of the cost of war.

Let those of us who are inclined to fear the economic consequences of our war expenditures remember that these expenditures have developed and brought to light an enormous increase in our Canadian capacity to produce—an increase greater than any of us had ever before suspected. Let them think of the future in terms of maintaining and still further developing that enlarged capacity, that potential of a greater national income. We can and must make use of that increased capacity after the war. We must develop that potential to the maximum. If we do, we can develop a far higher standard of living for the average Canadian than he has ever known before, and with these higher incomes we can readily carry any debt, any debt to ourselves, that we shall accumulate during the war. Our war expenditures are both a great medium of national achievement and a great investment in our own freedom and future. To suggest that they will bankrupt Canada is to suggest that Canadians lack ability and good sense to make intelligent use of their own future. I am not so lacking in faith in the mental and moral qualities of our own people.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before moving the adjournment of the debate I wonder if I could inquire to what extent the minister is bringing down detailed break-downs of the various departments involved?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is hard to describe; I shall send a copy across to my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the meantime I shall move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SOCIAL INSURANCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee of this house be appointed to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada, and, to that end,

To examine and study the existing social insurance legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures; social insurance policies of other countries; the most practicable measures of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan; the constitutional and financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security; and other related matters.

That the said committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary to deal with specific phases of the problems aforesaid, and call for persons, papers, and records, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the house; that the said committee report to the house from time to time; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messieurs Adamson, Blanchette, Bourget, Breithaupt, Bruce, Casselman (Mrs.) (Edmonton East), Claxton, Cleaver, Coté, Diefenbaker, Donnelly, Fauteux, Gershaw, Gregory, Hatfield, Howden, Hurtubise, Johnston (Bow River), Kinley, Lalonde, Leclerc, Lockhart, MacInnis, MacKenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacKinnon (Kootenay East), Macmillan, McCann, McGarry, McGregor, McIlraith, Mayhew, Mitchell, Picard, Shaw, Slaght, Telford, Veniot, Warren, Wood, Wright, and that the provisions of standing order 65, limiting the number of members on special committees, be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the session my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), expressed the hope that the government would establish the various committees as early in the session as possible. On a subsequent day my hon. friend made particular reference to the committee on social security. He will agree I think that his wishes have been met as far as it was possible for the government to meet them. All standing and special committees of the house have now been established with the exception of this one and two others, notices of which appear on the order paper.

I should like to point out that in respect to the establishment of committees a new custom seems to be growing up in the house—I do not think it existed to any extent in previous parliaments—of having a lengthy debate at the time the resolution is moved. The custom in the past has been, unless strong exception were taken for some reason or other to a committee being appointed, to have the committees appointed practically without discussion. I am not taking exception to the tendency to debate at length resolutions for the appointment of committees but wish to make it clear that it is a departure, and also that it does take up a very considerable amount of the time of the house. The discussion of the subject referred to a committee usually takes place when the committee has made its report. I realize that in some sessions the reports have been late in coming down and probably hon. members have had that in mind in wishing to discuss some of these subjects at an earlier stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Many of the reports are never discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been cases where that has happened. However, this year the committees will have been established at an early stage of the session and I hope will be able to report in plenty of time for such discussion as hon. members may wish to have.

I have a second reason for not wishing to discuss this resolution at any length at this stage. It is that hon. members have already devoted a very considerable time to the resolution dealing with reestablishment and reconstruction. I believe all hon. members are interested in matters pertaining to post-war conditions and to a better social order and have felt that they would wish to place on Hansard their views with respect to some of the features of the new social order and some of the reforms which they feel should be speedily introduced. That has been done, I believe, by hon. members in the debate on the motion respecting reestablishment and reconstruction. If we start a debate on social security at this stage it will I think lead to a repetition of much that has already been said in debate on the other committee. Reconstruction and reestablishment are of course not identical with social security but all three are part of a larger whole which relates to the social order—to social conditions as they exist at the present time and methods of improving them. Of the three, reconstruction and reestablishment cover a wider range and to that extent there would be the less necessity for discussing social security at any length at the moment.

I have also another reason, which is that I think members of the house generally are agreed upon the necessity of improving upon our measures of social security, increasing, enlarging and coordinating them. I do not think there is any difference of opinion among the members of the different groups in the house as to the objective to be aimed at. I believe we are all of one mind in that particular. There will inevitably be differences with respect to the means to be used to achieve those ends, but the question of the means to be adopted is a matter which is to be referred particularly to the committee and might therefore better be discussed when the committee has made its report. To start a debate at the present time might only serve to prejudice the larger objective by permitting a discussion that might develop into political controversy. I would hope that in this all-important matter of social security this House of Commons might be able to give a lead to other representative institutions by being as nearly unanimous as possible with respect to the measures which it may feel should be put into force.

There is, of course, the further point I have mentioned at different times, the importance of not taking up too much of the time of this particular part of the session with a discussion of measures other than those that relate immediately to the all-important war measures which have to be discussed. Were it otherwise, I am sure the impression in the country would be that parliament was devoting too much of its time at this stage to post-war matters rather than to the immediate questions of the war itself.

The resolution, as hon. members will see, is an implementation of one of the undertakings set forth in the speech from the throne, the undertaking being:

> . . . a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance should be worked out at once which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada.

The government accordingly proposes to recommend the early appointment of a select committee to examine and report on the most practicable measures of social insurance, and the steps which will be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan. Among matters which will be referred to this committee for study and consideration will be the establishment of a national system of health insurance.

I might say to hon. members that the speech from the throne in its references to social insurance and to reconstruction and reestablishment seeks to set forth the place and significance of those problems in relation to the larger question of the existing social order and the means by which that particular order may be improved. I should like to refer more particularly to the paragraphs in the speech from the throne which have this objective in view. The speech seeks to put the significance of these measures in their true light, first of all by making clear the magnitude of the question itself, and in the second place its complexity. It seeks to follow a logical sequence in setting forth the matters which have to be considered in relation to any plan of social security. Here may I point out that these social problems are first of all in the nature of world problems and that they are also all in the nature of human problems. I emphasize these two aspects because to lose sight of either is to lose sight of what is involved in trying to reach a solution of the problems themselves or how best to improve conditions.

The speech makes reference first of all to what to-day must be the first and immediate objective of any scheme which seeks to free the world from the evils of either fear or want. Obviously the first objective is to end the fear of war.

The immediate object of the united nations—

I am quoting from the speech from the throne:

—is the defeat of the axis powers. Joint planning of operations on a world scale has accompanied preparations for intensive warfare. The united nations also aim at rendering aggression impossible in the future. Their governments, in addition to planning jointly for the prosecution of the war, have already entered into consultation regarding post-war problems. Achievement of their aims requires the establishment of conditions under which all peoples may enjoy equality of opportunity and a sense of security.

In other words, no solution of the question of social security can be effectively carried out so long as the axis powers continue to wage war against the free countries of the world. Until the axis powers are defeated all other tasks must necessarily be secondary.

But there is not only the task of defeating the axis powers; there is the further task of seeing that aggression is rendered impossible in the future. Surely we have realized as the result of two world wars in the last quarter-century that all reforms may be set pretty much at naught so long as there remains the danger of aggression on the part of great powers. If aggression is to be rendered impossible in the future it is necessary that all countries join together in carrying out some policy which will make for more in the way of cooperation between the different nations and more in the way of equality of opportunity between the peoples of the different nations. It is necessary therefore that, as a background of social effort related to national purposes, there should exist a world policy which will have the effect of maintaining good and friendly relations between the many countries of the world.

When the governments of the different countries have done what lies within their power to bring about a larger measure of cooperation between nations as a whole, there will remain the problem within the individual nations themselves. It will then soon be seen that the problem of any one nation is bound up in a very close way with the position of other nations as well. If low standards of living exist in many parts of the world and high standards in a few parts, international competition, unless regulated effectively, will soon bring the high standards down to the level of the lower standards. That is why in any post-war period an effort must be made on the part of all nations that are seeking to improve their own conditions to realize that the countries of the world are members one of another, and that cooperation and mutual aid between nations will have to replace the system whereby relations between them are governed by force.

Obviously, before undertaking new measures of social security in Canada to be made applicable to all classes, our first thought must be particularly of the men who are fighting Canada's battles and the battles of freedom at the front. That is why the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment was set up at an earlier stage in this parliament than the committee on social security which is being set up at this time, and why it is proper that the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment should demand prior interest on the part of hon. members of the house. That is why in the paragraph following the one I have just read, the speech from the throne contains this statement:

Every effort must be made to ensure, after the close of hostilities, the establishment, in useful and remunerative employment, of the men and women in our armed forces and in war industries. My ministers have already begun to explore the international agreements and domestic measures which will help to secure adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment after the war. With your approval, the select committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, appointed at the last session, will be reconstituted.

In the course of the debate on the address some comment was made on the wording of that section. The question was asked, why seek adequate incomes for primary producers and full employment for the period after the war? It is apparent I think that during this war period there is a scale of employment such as has not existed in Canada at any previous time. Also, with respect to the incomes of primary producers, that they are being dealt with in several ways under the war measures of the government. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) indicated in his speech the other day the different agreements that were being entered into at this time of war which helped to ensure markets abroad for the farmers of the country and demand for their products. But what tomorrow will be seen to have been necessary above all else is that to-day we should seek to prepare the way for ensuring a continuance of markets abroad and also a continuation of full employment once the special war conditions have passed away.

The next paragraph is as follows:

It is in the general interest that freedom from fear and from want should be the assured possession of all. A nation-wide plan which would provide insurance against the inevitable consequences of major, economic and social hazards is essential if this objective is to be attained.

I have noticed that that paragraph has been referred to, not so much in this house but in the press of some parts of our country, as being mere platitude, that to speak of freedom from fear and from want being the assured possession of all is just talking generalities so vague as to be of no value whatever. But that is not what the clause in the speech from the throne which I have quoted really means. It sets forth what I submit is obviously in the general interest. It is the general interest that freedom from fear and from want should be the assured possession of all. That may be an ideal; it is an ideal, but it is one to be aimed at; and no one, I think, can dispute the point that if we wish to have freedom from war in the future, if we wish to have a social order whereby the men and women of our country are going to have equality of opportunity in larger measure, the assurance of employment, and the like, then all parts of the world that are in competition with each other must also more or less be free from fear and from want.

Coming from the international aspect down to the national aspect, coming from a consideration of world conditions down to particular conditions in individual countries, the one set of hazards that is inevitable through life is, those hazards which arise out of economic and social conditions whereby individuals and families in countless numbers throughout the nation may at any time be reduced to a position, if not of destitution, at least of want, and certainly be held continuously in fear alike of both destitution and want. There are certain hazards which do exist under the industrial organization of society as it has come to be in our time, and which exists not through any fault of employers, not through any fault of employees, but simply from the condition in which organized society finds itself at the present time. There may be in a highly industrial organized state such as ours is, a situation where a financial crisis in another country may bring about industrial depression over a long period in our own. We all know how that fact has been verified by experience between the period of the last war and the present time. It cannot be put down to the fault of employers or of employees that thousands of men and women in our country are thrown out of work in periods of depression, when the depression arises not from conditions as they exist in our particular country but from conditions as they exist in other parts of the world. For many years past it has been recognized that a cotton famine for example in the southern United States can throw large numbers of workers out of work in the cotton textile industries in Britain. That is but an example of what in our day takes place in all parts of the world at all times. The competition of foreign labour, some new invention, high tariffs suddenly imposed, all these and many other things may affect the lives of countless men and women and leave them in a position not only of fear but very soon in a position of want and destitution.

Society having created—I put it in that particular way—conditions which permit of that sort of thing, society has to find some way to remedy it. I use the word "society" instead of "the state" because I want it to be seen that what I am saying relates to the social organization of human beings in the different countries of the globe, under an industrial system such as we have to-day. What social insurance seeks to do is to find a means whereby these inevitable hazards will be met in some part at least through the action of the state and through action prescribed by the state.

These hazards are well known. The most common of course is unemployment. Other hazards are those arising out of old age, blindness, sickness and invalidity, the death of the breadwinner, birth and burial, where the funds to meet the obligations that arise out of these cannot be provided for in advance. Unemployment may come at any time, on a small or large scale, through no fault of their own on the part of those affected.

Any constructive system of social security is based on the theory that all industry is, or ought to be, in the nature of social service; that industry is not merely a means whereby capitalists may increase profits, or workers find the means of gaining a livelihood through wages; but that there exists also the right of the community, which makes possible the carrying on of industry, to expect that the interests and well-being of the community and its members will also be considered in the rewards of industry. In other words, industry exists to serve a social end, as well as to serve the needs of individuals. Under that view men and women are the great asset of the state. The well-being of all the human resources, the men and women, who supply the labour, the thought and skill essential for planning and carrying on industry ought to be the first concern of the state. And where the state makes possible the carrying on of industry, they are entitled to have the state see that they are protected against inevitable hazards.

May I pause to say a word as to the part the state plays in permitting industry to be carried on. Have in mind any of the large manufacturing industries, and ask ourselves the question: could these industries be carried on at all except for what organized society in the state does to make their existence possible? In the first place the state maintains law and order, without which no industry could exist for any length of time. Law and order are maintained at the expense of the taxpayers of the community. The state makes possible trade and the maintenance of foreign markets through its diplomatic and consular services, its subsidies to transportation companies, through the permission it gives transportation companies to construct their ways across the territory of the nation. The state controls inventions and patents. One could go on indicating many things to show that the carrying on of industry is made possible through the fact that the state is organized as we know it to be.

But above and beyond all that, the material resources of a country exist within the confines of the country and it is only by the implied expressed permission of the state that the institution of private property can exist. The justification of private property lies in the fact that it has been thought that because of what private property ensures of initiative, self reliance and the like, the good of the greatest number will thereby best be served. But if as a result of the institution of private property, whether it be the ownership of land or of capital, a social condition may develop which is inimical to the community as a whole, that institution has either to be modified in some particulars, controlled in some directions, or make way for some other system.

Social security does not seek necessarily, or, at all, in some cases, to abolish the institution of private property. It seeks rather to ensure that the benefits of private property will be secured to the community at large, and that through an inequitable distribution of wealth the institution of private property shall not be made a means whereby a very few may become increasingly rich and a great many suffer because of the inequalities that exist. Everywhere there are vast inequalities of circumstances and of opportunities. There is no doubt that society as it is organized to-day does enable those who are economically strong to become stronger, and at the same time does have the effect of causing the economically weak in many of the great struggles of life to become weaker while the wealth of the world has vastly increased, its distribution has become increasingly disproportionate. Community considerations afford opportunities to some, and impose handicaps on others. We see everywhere evidences of the fact that those that have large abundance find it possible to survive all the existing hazards, find it possible to go on increasing their wealth; while those who possess very little of this world's goods are the first to go completely to the wall when a condition arises such as has arisen from time to time through depressions and extensive unemployment.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is because they did not save when they had the opportunity!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware, all depends on how much chance there is to save. Great care has to be taken in any scheme of social insurance not to discourage saving, and I think social insurance plans will have that carefully in view. But I wish to re-emphasize that in the order of things as they are to-day emphasis is put in very large part upon position rather than on human personality; is put upon wealth rather than upon life; and that under any scheme of social security it is life and personality which it is intended should be the first consideration of the state and of those who are exercising authority in the carrying on of its affairs. Industrial policy must be founded upon recognition of human personality and upon recognition of community well-being.

I should like now to say a word as to the procedure set forth in the resolution. It is suggested that a committee should be appointed to consider the whole question of social security and to consider it in different aspects. Some one may repeat, as has already been said I think in the course of the debate on the address, that the government should not have to have a committee to advise, or rather to give it a policy; that the government ought to have a policy of its own. Well, the government has a policy, a very definite policy, which is set forth in the speech from the throne, and which I have already read. The government's policy is to bring into being a comprehensive national scheme of social insurance.

Why has the government deemed a reference of the matter to a select committee the most essential first step in seeking to deal with so large a measure of social security? The reason is that already in Canada we have a large number of social security measures which have grown up in a more or less haphazard manner. They have to be correlated and coordinated in one plan if progress is to be made on a national scale. They have not been introduced one in relation to the other; they have not been introduced in the one assembly. They have been introduced at one time in this parliament, at other times in provincial parliaments, but they have never been coordinated into one scheme. It is obvious that where there are social measures of that character, each having the same objective, unless they are correlated there is bound to be a great deal of overlapping and a great deal of additional cost in administration, and certain to be a great deal of confusion. It would seem, therefore, that the first step in moving further in the direction of social security would be to study carefully the existing measures of our own country and then study carefully the existing measures in other countries and the proposals that have been put forth by those who have given special study to the question of social security.

Had it wished to do so the government might have appointed a royal commission to undertake this task of surveying conditions here and presenting a national scheme. It might have called in experts and been advised by them, but it was felt that this, together with reconstruction and reestablishment, is the largest question the country is likely to have before it for our generation, and that it would be in the public interest, and particularly in the interests of members of parliament themselves, that they should have an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the various factors bearing on this all-important question. And it was felt that this could be best effected by having a select committee of the house to study the whole matter. I should think it would be advisable for this committee to retain experts. Speaking for the government I may say that it will afford whatever in the way of facilities for effective study and research the committee itself may deem necessary and essential.

The resolution suggests that there should be subcommittees as well as the one main committee; that is because of the extent of the study that will have to be made. It will be noticed that special reference is made to health insurance. It was felt there was need to make perfectly clear some aspects of social security which perhaps were deserving of more immediate consideration than some other aspects. It has seemed to the government that the question of health insurance was in that position. That is so for this reason, that already we have on our statute book a plan of unemployment insurance and a system of old age pensions, both established by the federal parliament; we have a system of government annuities, also established by the federal parliament; we have pensions to veterans, pensions to the blind and other forms of pensions, also established by this federal government. Then in the provinces they have a series of different social measures, some of them related to accidents and others to sickness, hospitalization, widows' and mothers' allowances, maternity benefits and so on, all of which are in the nature of social security measures but which differ greatly as between the several provinces. They are not correlated in one great national scheme, and if Canada is to make progress in this field the first step now is to have the whole field surveyed and in some way as far as may be possible, a national scheme outlined.

In stating to the British people what he had found necessary in the way of study for his report Sir William Beveridge said he had been closely following all social legislation for a period of something like thirty years. Happily the committee will have the benefit of the thirty years' experience of Sir William Beveridge. I mention this simply because Sir William felt it necessary to draw the attention of the British people to the careful study he had given the question before making his report.

I wish to draw attention to an attitude toward social security measures that has been taken in some quarters since the government's policy was announced in the speech from the throne. When the Atlantic charter was proclaimed it met with universal acceptance in this country. I have yet to find a newspaper in Canada which had not a good word to say for the Atlantic charter. One of the things most prominently proclaimed in connection with the Atlantic charter was the fact that among other things it did aim to bring about an increased measure of social security in the post-war period. I have been looking at the journals of this country, and I find that to-day some are inclined to belittle, at least, the idea of social security, as being something vague and general, something that will involve outlays greater than any country may be able to meet. Sir William Beveridge has said that he regarded social insurance as the first step to be taken toward meeting the main objectives of the Atlantic charter in so far as it had to do with social conditions. It is, I think, from that point of view that we should view questions that relate to social security.

The committee has been asked not only to give the study which I have suggested, but to report to the house on the most practicable measures of social insurance, the steps which will be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan. Let it not be said that the committee is simply to make a study and do nothing else. If this resolution carries, the committee will have a very definite instruction from this house to do something positive, as set out in these words: to report on the most practicable measures of social insurance and the steps which will be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan. I need not emphasize the importance of what will be involved in effecting that particular end. There are questions of finance that will have to be very carefully considered. It is not going to help any scheme of social insurance for the government to bring forward a measure that in the end may not prove practicable. So that what may be possible will have to be studied in relation to the obligations that already exist in several directions and what it is felt can be carried on in conjunction with other obligations.

Questions of jurisdiction will arise, questions between the provinces and the dominion as to whether in a national scheme the dominion should attempt to carry out all social security measures, or whether those measures in part should be under the jurisdiction of the dominion and in part under that of the several provinces. So far as administration is concerned there are some measures which, at least for a time, the provinces will I believe wish to retain. There may be others they will be prepared to hand over to the federal government.

Then there will arise immediately the question as to the source from which revenue is to be derived to carry out the different measures. That is something which will require careful consideration. The purpose of the government in this whole matter is, as quickly as may be possible, to reach an immediate improvement in and enlargement of social security measures in our country. But we realize that that cannot be done effectively until the whole position or field receives careful study.

The only other feature I might mention is the size of the committee. It is a large committee, consisting of forty-one members, to be exact. That, again, has been thought advisable for the reasons I have already indicated. So long as those of us who are in this chamber to-day continue to have any part in public affairs we shall find, as a main interest in our lives and in the life of our country, this problem of social security. The more hon. members can familiarize themselves in an intimate way with this question in all its bearings, the better it will be not only for hon. members themselves in rendering the kind of service they would hope to render to the state, but the better it will also be for the state itself. Members of this parliament have an exceptional opportunity to render a great service to their own and future generations.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in attempting to speak in connection with the setting up and constitution of this important committee, one which will deal with the whole subject of social insurance and social security, I should like to say that with some parts of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mackenzie King) address I am in agreement.

The House of Commons must realize that the winning of the war is the first, the major consideration of our deliberations. We must not at any time allow any other issues to interfere with our winning of the war, nor must we permit other considerations to come first. But inextricably woven into our whole war effort is the undeniable fact that there are scores of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of men and women who to-day, both overseas and in Canada, are fighting our battle of freedom, and who are anxious to know that while they are fighting and are indicating their willingness to give life and limb we, here, shall be doing something to prepare for that better world for which they fight.

As far as social security and our whole scheme for a better world order are concerned, it seems to me it is not possible entirely to separate our plans for peace from our actual movements in the field of war itself. I believe almost every hon. member who has talked to younger men enlisted in his majesty's forces must have heard a statement which, on many occasions, I have heard. They must have heard it from our war workers, and the challenge it presents cannot be escaped. During the years of depression through which every nation in the world had the misfortune to pass, during those terrible years of privation and suffering with which, for some reason or another our society and our system were not able to cope successfully; during those years when we were not able to operate with full employment for our people, certain thoughts developed in the minds of our people. The result is that to-day our young men—yes, and young women, too—are considering this thought: When it comes to a war of destruction, we find the money to fight it, but when a few years ago we were faced with a war for better conditions for our people somehow or another we were not able to put our people to work. And that, let us remember, was a condition which was not confined to any one country, but was found in every nation. Perhaps at times this thought is exaggerated, and some may think too great emphasis is placed upon it; but it is a view which parliament must not lightly toss aside.

The House of Commons cannot overlook this challenge. It is a challenge to which we must give every consideration because, linked with our whole problem of social security and post-war conditions, is the thought that somehow, by some system, we must find jobs, work and wages for our people. That is the first objective toward which we must move.

There are different views as to how this can best be accomplished. Perhaps none of us in these changing days can be so dogmatic as to say that our solution—and I believe each individual has one; certainly almost every hon. member seems to have one—without the help of others will solve the problem. But the pooling of the best thought, thought which reflects the anxious minds and the most sincere desires of our people, will in my opinion eventually solve our problem and meet the challenge.

May I point out, however, that there is a feeling throughout Canada, one which will show itself in any movements which lie ahead, that when the war is over we shall have a higher sense of human values and shall give lesser emphasis to material things than we have done heretofore. If we fail in this it is my belief that we shall not win the peace for which we have longed in these years of war. The days of reaction have gone and I hope they have gone for keeps. There is no room for reactionary ideas in a world that is moving perhaps more quickly than most of us realize.

In keeping abreast of that moving world, let us not forget that we as members of this parliament must take our stand in the forefront of aggressive and progressive reform. Not only must we keep abreast; we must give leadership to that movement. In connection with this further post-Winnipeg reform which the Prime Minister brought down in the speech from the throne I should like to congratulate him upon being perhaps a converted reader of the programme and the policy laid down by the Progressive Conservative party on that occasion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): You got the idea from the Prime Minister and you should thank him for it, not congratulate him.

Mr. GRAYDON: I only wanted to congratulate the Prime Minister; I hope the hon. member for Brantford City will not think I am doing anything other than that. I wish to say that in so far as our programme is concerned, it was a result which came from a great movement emanating from all parts of this dominion and leading toward a reformation of our economic and social structure.

Referring to the remarks made by the Prime Minister in connection with this motion I should like to point out to him that it will not be enough for the people of Canada simply to have the government set out in a speech from the throne the objectives to which they are moving. We all know the objectives to which they are moving, or toward which they should move, but we are entitled to more than that in a speech from the throne; we are entitled to be told the policy of this government. With great deference to the Prime Minister I must say that I do not think he made a very good job this afternoon of explaining the difference between the objectives of his party and the policy which the government of that party adopts. I hope in all earnestness that the report of this committee will not be brought down so close to the end of the session that there will not be time to bring in legislation which may be founded upon the recommendations of the committee. Canada will not be satisfied with just a report of a committee with respect to the whole matter of social security. Canada will be satisfied only with, first, the bringing down of a report by the committee and then the introduction of legislation dealing with the recommendations contained in the report.

As far as health insurance is concerned, it seems to me that we should have had the health insurance bill in this house before any such legislation is considered by the social security committee. That is not going to be done, and I do not intend to deal further with that at the moment. Our unemployment insurance law forms one of the great parts of our social security scheme, but there are many things still to be desired with respect to that law. I point this out in order that this committee may consider how we can improve the whole system of unemployment insurance.

One question is being asked by the working people of this country, and it should be answered. I am sure this question is being asked of other hon. members who must have the support of labour to retain their seats. The labouring man likes the principle of the act, and we all have endorsed that principle. Here is what he is saying: If I am fired I do not get the benefits; if I quit I do not get the benefits; if I am sick I do not get the benefits—when do I get the benefits?—Of course the answer is obvious, but on the other hand I think the committee should consider this particular aspect of unemployment insurance.

There was a point I raised in the unemployment insurance committee which I raise again. I do not think any act can be perfect, but it is our job to make these acts as perfect as human brains can make them. Our working men should be assured that when they are out of employment, when they are ill or incapacitated, some benefits will be made available to them. This is what the working man is asking for to-day, and I think it is one of the subjects that should be dealt with by the committee.

When the report of the unemployment insurance committee was brought down it was pointed out that this legislation was only a step toward an objective, and the house was cautioned at the time not to expect too much from the Unemployment Insurance Act. Up to the present we have not needed the benefits available under this act to the extent that perhaps the act contemplated, but at the best it can constitute only a token piece of security for the working man and his family. We must do better than that for him.

When a working man becomes sick and loses his job there is no machinery under the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide him with benefits because he cannot meet the test of availability for employment. Where is his security? That man may be anywhere between the ages of forty and seventy years, and he must depend largely upon the charity of his friends or those who will come to his rescue. This is another matter that should be considered by the committee.

I was interested in what the Prime Minister said about not having forgotten the old virtues of thrift and saving. We must not forget those. The character of the people of this country is such that they are imbued with the idea of saving for a rainy day. However, there are many people who through no fault of their own are not able to provide the necessary umbrella for the rainy day of sickness and old age and incapacity. I refer more particularly to the necessity for improvement in our old age pension scheme. In Canada we adopted the principle of old age pensions, and I find that throughout the dominion there is very little criticism of that principle. It is a principle which the people of Canada believe in, that of securing to our older people a better deal for their old age, and once having adopted that principle we must carry it out in practice in such a way as to meet the conditions under which our older people find themselves from time to time. I am hopeful that the committee in dealing with old age pensions will first of all consider a reduction in the present age limit. There are many reasons for that, but I emphasize it largely on account of our experience since the act first came into operation. People for one reason or another seem to be burning out at an earlier age. Perhaps it is the speed at which our modern life is conducted. It seems to me that the age of seventy is now outworn as the standard age for granting the old age pension, and I should like to see the committee give serious consideration to reducing the present age limit.

Furthermore, I should like to see the committee do something else which is almost just as important as reducing the age limit. I should like them to give consideration to the many increases that have taken place in the cost of living and to readjust the amount of the old age pension so that our older people will feel that their security has been protected as not only in principle but also in actual practice as far as parliament is concerned.

I do not want to labour the point, but I believe that our older people in Canada also deserve a word of encouragement from this parliament. These men and women through the years have borne the burden and heat of the day and the toil of the years. We owe them a great deal more than sometimes we are prone to admit. I should like to see these men and women in the evening of their life not subjected to the petty investigations that are sometimes made by all kinds of organizations, governmental if you like, and carried to the point where many of our older people are almost afraid to apply for an old age pension because of the many inquiries that are made into their circumstances from time to time. I should like the committee to give serious consideration to this whole question of the means test for old age pensioners and to the question of what I fear are sometimes unnecessary petty investigations into their circumstances generally.

Another matter correlated to old age pensions is pensions for the blind. I remember well when Mr. Dunning, then Minister of Finance, brought in his bill for pensions for the blind in one of the years following 1936. The House of Commons on that occasion lived up to its highest traditions in endorsing unanimously this measure for relieving the sufferings of those who had become incapacitated through blindness. It appealed not only to the minds but to the hearts of hon. members. But there again an age limit was fixed for pensions for the blind. I hope that the committee will give serious consideration to reducing that age limit. There may have to be some age limit, but it seems to me that a man who, at thirty years of age, is incapacitated by blindness from earning a living is in the same position, as far as incapacity goes, as a man who is incapacitated by blindness at forty.

But blindness is only one form of incapacity. I should like to see the committee make a special effort to bring into our great social security scheme another group of men and women in Canada who are too often forgotten by governments and by our people generally. I refer to those men and women who for other reasons than blindness, it may be paralysis or other causes into which I could go in greater detail had I the time, are wholly incapacitated from earning a living and unable to take their place in the social and economic world of to-day. Let us not as a nation overlook those men and women. Their plight has been brought before the house on a previous occasion, and I am bringing it before the house again to-day in the hope that the committee which will deal with the whole broad matter of social security will not forget the plight of those men and women because, if we are subscribing to the new order as we should be doing, we must never forget that the new order comprises a great many classes and that this is one of them.

May I say a word on health insurance. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is prone, as are other members of the government, to refer from time to time to a draft bill as a memorandum. In dealing with the question of health insurance the minister called the draft bill on health insurance a memorandum. The minister is not in his seat at the moment; otherwise I might pursue the matter further. Suffice it to say that the rumour has been rife throughout Canada that for a considerable time there has been in the minister's department a draft bill or several draft bills on health insurance. After the many consultations there have been with men who have made a study of this subject, I believe this country expected that the Minister of Pensions and National Health would have brought down legislation on the subject at the beginning of this session. Instead, however, we find that a different policy has been adopted, whereby this and the other matters in the social security programme have been lumped together to be dealt with by the social security committee. I fail to see why the government did not bring down health insurance legislation at once. When it had been dealt with by the house and had gone through its various stages here it could if necessary, have been remitted to the social security committee, but I think this house ought to have had legislation on health insurance brought down before it had to run the gamut of the social security committee. The reasons for this, in my opinion, are fairly obvious. As far as I know, all the other matters which will be dealt with by the social security committee are the subjects of acts which are already on the statute books of the provinces or the dominion. But with regard to health insurance, although it will constitute probably the most important and far-reaching of all the enactments to be dealt with by the committee, a bill has not been brought down to the house. That angle should not be overlooked, and I draw it to the attention of the government.

The problem of health insurance is an appalling one for the citizens of Canada. It is also one which will not be entirely devoid of danger; and I think that, since the committee is to deal with it before legislation is brought in, any standardized or dominion-wide scheme should give special attention and the most exacting care to the problems of localities—municipalities and the lesser units of our dominion legislative jurisdiction—so that when the health insurance measure comes in, it will be found to be workable having regard to the various localities in which it will have to operate. In this country we have wide divergencies, occupational, geographical, and other, among our people. For that reason care must be exercised in the general scheme so that our health insurance act shall have sufficient elasticity to be workable. Anything less will not meet the situation.

Throughout Canada there is an insistent demand for action on this matter. For many years we have had this spectre in our midst. Men who do not make a lot of money, people in the low income brackets, have a fear not only of unemployment but of the ravages, dangers and cost of sickness and ill health. Who among us has not had that fear from time to time? One may be able—some are—to prepare for the day when he is out of work; he may provide for many other eventualities and contingencies. But the great fear which haunts many people and has haunted them for a long time, particularly those who are not able to put away much for a rainy day, is the apprehension that they or their families will be subject to a long and serious illness and that they will not be able to meet the doctors', nurses', hospital and other medical bills which accumulate by virtue thereof. How many people within our own knowledge have been financially ruined almost for life through that very condition? Therefore, it seems to me, this health measure is probably long overdue, and this government and this parliament, if they can do something to alleviate the existing conditions and assure our people in the lower income brackets of some freedom from fears of sickness and of long periods of unemployment as a result of such conditions, will do something for the country in general which will be thoroughly worth while.

I hope that when a general health scheme is embodied in the form of legislation we shall not forget that some emphasis, perhaps the major emphasis, should be placed upon preventive medicine. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Those simple words, which have been used many times during the last scores of years, contain as important a truth and carry as much weight as they ever did. The health of our people is one of the most valuable of our national assets, and in preserving it we not only avoid sickness but escape the additional cost which inevitably follows if earlier preventive steps have not been taken. As far as is humanly possible we should have social conditions in which every child and adult will be able to develop a sound mind and a sound body. I know this is not fully possible, but it ought to be one of our objectives, one to which the committee should give its constant, energetic and earnest attention. Health must be no longer regarded as a wholly private responsibility. Being, as it is, essential to our national development, there must be public responsibility as well. In this regard I say to the minister in charge of the committee that we shall expect legislation which will meet with the approval of the people and will prove workable from the point of view which we are endeavouring to attain.

In connection with the social security committee I would say this to the Prime Minister. He mentioned bringing experts in to guide and advise the committee in its work. Probably that will be necessary. Perhaps, when he speaks of having in mind a comparison of schemes of social security in other parts of the world, he is thinking of bringing to Canada authorities from elsewhere who can give advice on that point. But in the newspapers last week there appeared this rather interesting item, dated from London on February 25. It said:

> Sir William Beveridge, whose recent "cradle-to-the-grave" social security plan created a wide rift of opinion in parliament, will visit the United States and perhaps Canada on a non-government mission, he disclosed to-day. He revealed he intends to make a private survey of the causes and remedies for unemployment.

I suggest that the government should, if it has not already done so, avail itself of the services and the advice of Sir William Beveridge. If he is in this part of the continent and can find it convenient to attend a meeting of the committee, I suggest that he be invited to give his advice with respect to the problem which he has been studying in the old land. I realize that the Beveridge report can be only a guide in a certain way with regard to our problems here. On the other hand it may well be, as I think the Prime Minister or someone else pointed out in the debate on the address, that conditions in the old land and conditions here are not entirely comparable. Whether or not that is the situation, the general principles for which both countries are working and the objectives at which they are aiming make it important that if possible this committee should have the benefit of the advice of one who has made a study not merely of the British system, and has been responsible for this much talked of report, and that he should be available as far as our committee is concerned. Therefore, in closing, I wish to indicate to the Prime Minister, in case he has not given as close study to it as the speech from the throne would rather indicate he had, the stand of the Progressive Conservative party with respect to one or two items in connection with our whole social security programme which I think are of importance at this time. This is what is said in that platform:

A social security programme, the adoption of which we advocate, would include in a unified system:

(a) Unemployment insurance;

(b) Adequate payments for the maintenance of unemployables;

(c) Retirement insurance.

To which I should like to see the committee give serious consideration.

(d) The payment of increased old age pensions, at a reduced age, until such time as the retirement insurance scheme becomes fully operative;

(e) Adequate pensions for the blind;

(f) Adequate mothers' and widows' allowance.

This in general sums up the feeling of those many men and women who attended that great convention:

We recognize the obligation of government to make available to every citizen adequate medical, dental, nursing, hospital and pre-natal care, and to further advance public health and nutritional principles so that health may be safeguarded and preserved. This programme is to be financed under a contributory system supplemented by government assistance.

May I close with these words: The adoption of a widespread and comprehensive system of social security in Canada will to my way of thinking be a definite step toward the objective of a new world order and a new order for the Canadian people jointly. It has been well pointed out that at this stage of international affairs we cannot, with respect to our own domestic problems, rely entirely upon what other nations do. One of the best jobs we can do in putting the whole world in order is to see to it that our own house is put in order, as well as the others. I do not think our job is first of all to put everyone's house in order, nor do I think it is our job to have everyone come here and put our house in order. The best job we can do, at least in a preliminary way, is to see to it that our house in Canada is put in such shape that we can fit into a broad international picture which will ensure peace, good-will and the brotherhood of man in the years that lie ahead.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to speak on this motion because of its great importance, and because I feel that the people whom I have the honour to represent would want me to take part in this debate. I say that despite the admonition given to us a short time ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to curtail if possible this discussion. As a new member in this house I confess I have been disturbed by the frequency with which it is suggested to private members that discussion should be boiled down to a minimum. That is not my conception of my duty as a member of this house, particularly when an important matter such as this is before us; and in view of the fact that some of us are not on the committee I feel it is our duty to make our contribution to the work of this committee when it is being set up.

The motion that is before us arises out of a deep conviction on the part of a great majority of our Canadian people, and indeed of the people of all the united nations, that the time has come to rid this world not only of fascism but also of want and of fear. That our people want us to do this is beyond all argument. Our job is to get down to brass tacks and do something about it.

Another point about which there should be no argument is that social insurance is one means of defence against want and fear. In a moment or two I want to emphasize the fact that because social insurance is a second line of defence we must pay some attention to the front line as well. But first of all I want to make perfectly clear the attitude of this group towards the Prime Minister's motion. It calls for the setting up of a select committee "to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance". To propose anything less at this stage of our history would be unthinkable. We shall support the motion. But we urge the government to go further and to bring down during this session legislation that will provide for the immediate establishment in Canada of social security at least to the extent that is now being enjoyed in our sister dominion of New Zealand, as it was so well outlined in Ottawa last May by Hon. Walter Nash.

I shall not dwell on the political consequences of failure on the part of the present government to bring down such legislation without delay; that can be left to the electorate. But I should like to emphasize the fact—I know it has been said time and again in this house, but it can be underlined—that our people are putting everything they have into the present conflict. Its cost in human life, in sacrifice, in all kinds of changes in our standards and ways of life, is immeasurable. If after this conflict is over, after all these sacrifices, we find ourselves with no adequate defences against want and fear, this government if it has failed to provide those defences will have betrayed the people of Canada in a most critical period of their history, and in particular they will have betrayed those in our armed forces. To say at that time that back in 1943 a select committee was set up will not suffice. The government must face its responsibility to introduce legislation now. Pious language about a "charter of social security for the whole of Canada" will not do. It is not good enough for hon. members opposite to say, as many said in the course of the debate on setting up the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, that they agree with many of our ideas for post-war security. The Liberal party is in power now. It is its responsibility, not to tell us what it will do five or ten years hence, but to bring down legislation now that will protect the people of this country against want and fear in the post-war world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without lessening in any way my insistence that the government should bring down legislation during this session along the lines I have suggested, I want to urge upon the house a realization of the fact that social insurance at best is only a second line of defence against economic hazards, and that in the long run it will fail unless it is established in its proper place in our economy. I refer again to the statements along this line made by Sir William Beveridge in his report. At page 6 he says:

> Organization of social insurance should be treated as one part only of a comprehensive policy of social progress.

Earlier on the same page he makes this significant statement:

> A revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching.

On page 163 Sir William Beveridge makes some statements which have been made in this house already but which I feel warrant repetition. He is discussing, as a necessary condition to the workability of his own plans, the necessity of maintaining employment. He gives five reasons for his contention, of which I am going to quote the last two:

> Fourth, and most important, income security which is all that can be given by social insurance is so inadequate a provision for human happiness that to put it forward by itself as a sole or principal measure of reconstruction hardly seems worth doing. It should be accompanied by an announced determination to use the powers of the state to whatever extent may prove necessary to ensure for all, not indeed absolute continuity of work, but a reasonable chance of productive employment.
> Fifth, though it should be within the power of the community to bear the cost of the whole plan for social security, the cost is heavy and, if to the necessary cost waste is added, it may become insupportable. Unemployment, both through increasing expenditure on benefit and through reducing the income to bear those costs, is the worst form of waste.

So, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that the first and all-important line of defence against the hazards with which we are concerned is the ordering of our economy so that it will provide employment for all, together with the production of the goods and services necessary to provide a high standard of living, and the distribution of those goods among our people according to need. As I understand it, the purpose of social insurance, and of certain forms of social security which are on other than an insurance basis, is to provide protection when and where the economic system fails. But if the economic system is so full of contradictions that it is certain to break down time and again, resulting in mass unemployment with all of its hazards, it is impossible to devise a scheme of social insurance that will protect our people.

With reference to health insurance I should like to point out that if our economic system condemns millions of our people to malnutrition, to living in slums and substandard houses, in city and country alike, it is economically impossible to work out a health insurance scheme that will take care of the ill health of our people under those conditions. So that if we in this house mean what we say when we set out to devise a "charter of social security for the whole of Canada," I insist that we must give our attention to the setting up of an economic order in which social security can be maintained and in which so-called social insurance schemes will work. Social security will be a fact only when the total economy is one of security. Social insurance will work over a long period of time only when the need for its benefits is incidental and not wholesale. This means, as I see it, that our primary task is to establish an economic order which will make possible the production of an abundance of goods and services, which will distribute the nation's necessary work among our people according to ability and capacity, and which in turn will distribute the abundance that we produce amongst our people according to need. It is true that even in that kind of economy there will be certain cases of need, and properly speaking that is where social insurance should come in; those are the conditions under which social insurance can be expected to work. In other words, when social insurance functions as it should, as a second line of defence against want and fear, it can be set up in such a way as to meet the demands that are made upon it. But when social insurance is the community's only line of defence against economic hazards, it collapses all too soon and with dire results.

So I say that we in this group will give our support to the Prime Minister's motion; but our interest in social security, which prompts us to support his motion, compels us to emphasize our advocacy of the all-important task of building a new economic order under which the people of Canada will be permitted to produce an abundance of goods and services and forthwith to share in that abundance. The idea that the people of Canada, through parliament or their government, should intervene in the economic life of the country; that the people should step in, as it were, and insist that the economy function in accordance with the interests and needs of the people, surely is not new. Certainly it ought not to sound strange in this house the day after hearing the budget speech, which was presented last evening. Despite the unwillingness of both the old parties to recognize it as a peace-time principle, this is what has happened under the stress and strain of the present war. It has been recognized that the people of Canada want the maximum production of war materials of all kinds. In order to achieve this end the government has rudely invaded the economy of this country, and what has been the result? Speaking earlier this session on matters of this kind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told the house he was amazed at the immensity of Canada's production, and I believe he said he had not thought it possible that we could reach the volume of production that has been attained. To make this possible the people of Canada through their government had to step into the economic system, and assert their demands. The people, through their government, are spending jointly eight, nine or ten times as much as we were spending in the years just before the war. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has reminded us, rightly, that these figures are simply in the nature of an index. They do not mean that we are spending untold sums of money that we do not possess, as though it would have to be paid back later. It is simply that we have mobilized our productive capacity to an extent undreamed of before the war. In passing I may say that we of this group regret that our productive capacity has not been similarly mobilized with respect to peace-time needs. We protest also the inequality in the distribution of the burdens, and we regard it as tragic that the control of our stepped-up economy has been put into the hands of those whose first concern, when the war is over, is to scuttle it all, in favour of an economy based on the idea of producing only when profit is to be made, rather than to supply the needs of our people.

My point is that when this war is over, after the way in which our production has been stepped up, after the way in which people have been given employment and real work to do, given the sense of participating in this great struggle, any government which has at heart the interests of the people, any government in fact that has any political wisdom, will have to move in the direction of the programme which we advocate. It will have to step into our economic system and assume ownership and control of our banks and our major industries, and insist on the continuing of our present volume of production.

I believe our present volume of production amounts to something in the neighbourhood of nine billions of dollars. Just now the bulk of that is being directed to the needs of war; for that is the major interest of our people. When peace comes the bulk of our national production should similarly be directed to meet the needs of our people. Private enterprise based on production for profit cannot and will not do this. It calls for cooperative effort by the people, through a people's government, who will see to it that our productive capacity is used to meet such needs as building houses. And when I say building houses I mean the rehousing of at least twenty-five or thirty per cent of the people of this country. It calls also for the building of hospitals and rest homes, and the provision of medical care on a really adequate scale. There is also the matter of rural electrification. Then, as has already been pointed out by the previous speaker, there is the absolute necessity, if we are a civilized country, of doing something a great deal better than we have thus far done for our old people, our blind, and our people who are incapacitated in one way or another.

Of course there are some who will say—in fact I overheard certain comments by someone in the group to my right while the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) was speaking along this line, that all of this would cost money, and that we would not have any money left once the war is ended.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who made that statement?

Mr. KNOWLES: The suggestion was made by someone sitting close to me, that the leader of his group was asking for all kinds of things for everybody, as though no one would have to work, and as though no one would have to pay for them.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member should say who made the statement. He has charged this whole group, and the doctrine he is announcing is not that of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry I cannot say who made the statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member should not repeat it, then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. KNOWLES: If that transcends the rules of the house, I will withdraw the statement. Nevertheless the statement is made in many quarters that any programme such as we are suggesting costs money, and because it will cost money it cannot be considered, particularly in view of the large amount we are spending just now. It is said that our war programme will leave us brankrupt at the end of the war. I am sure the Minister of Finance will agree with me when I say that such a statement is sheer nonsense, and that after all the spending of money even on the scale we are proposing to spend it during the forthcoming fiscal year is only an index.

The reality of the present situation is that we have increased our production tremendously, and that we are waging war out of our current production. Similarly we can build a million new homes after the war ends, and we can feed and clothe our people, out of our then current production, if only we will produce according to our capacity, and not within absurd financial and profit-making limitations. If we try to go back to the old order of unrestricted exploitation, the best we can look for from any form of social insurance set up within such an order is the "rationed poverty" which has been mentioned of late by certain political leaders in the country. But I insist we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are right in maintaining that neither "rationed poverty" nor "pockets of unemployment" are good enough for the people of Canada in the post-war world. If we can produce materials to the value of nine billions of dollars a year, while the war is on, we can do likewise in peace time, and thus provide a good life for our people.

I wish to say further in connection with this matter of cost that sometimes we who hold the views I am presenting are accused of wanting the people of Canada, and particularly the farmers and the workers for whom we speak, to be given something for nothing. This charge is levelled at us particularly when we ask for certain social services and benefits such as a larger old-age pension at an earlier age, adequate provision for war veterans, and for widows of war veterans; for a national plan for the care of our health, including preventive measures, and for a national housing programme. Let me make it clear that in our view none of these things can be had for nothing. We are not asking that they be provided out of thin air. These things call for expenditures. They cost. But, Mr. Speaker, what is it that they cost? They cost the human effort of our people, applied to raw materials. Our workers, farmers and fishermen, including our scientists, technicians and white-collar workers of all kinds, in their daily toil, are paying the real cost of our present national production, so far as human beings are concerned.

I say again that our nine-billion-dollar level of national production has been achieved because the necessary expenditure of human effort is being made by the citizens of our country. What we ask is that this volume of production, the cost of which is being met by the labour and toil of our people, be distributed among our people according to equity and need. At the present time a large portion of our national production, which represents an expenditure of effort on the part of our people, is being applied as our people want it applied, namely, in their interest, in the defence of our country, and of freedom itself. All right; we ask that when peace comes the same principle be carried out, and that a similarly large portion of our national production, the cost of which our people as a whole will gladly pay through their daily toil on the farm, in the factory, in the office, in the schoolroom and laboratory, be channelled into the things that will provide security and a good life for all our people.

Someone asks where a million new houses will come from. They will come out of our then current production in the same way that our vast war supplies are coming out of to-day's current production. When we ask for old age pensions of at least $30 a month—and I see no reason why the figure should not be $40 or $50 a month—starting at the age of sixty-five, or even younger, someone will want to know where the money will come from. It will come out of our then current production in the same way that we are maintaining our armed forces, 700,000 strong, out of to-day's current production.

We ask that the men and women in our armed forces be kept on regular pay and allowances until they are adequately reestablished after the war, and that medical care be made available to them for life, thus avoiding the difficulties in this connection encountered by the veterans of the last war. The question then arises in some quarters, where will the money come from? It will come out of our then current production, just as we are providing pay and allowances and medical care out of to-day's current production.

All of this will depend upon our maintaining our present volume of production, which I understand is nine billions of dollars to-day. Ten years ago I believe it was less than three billions of dollars. If we have any intention of going back to unrestricted exploitation which produces only for the sake of profit; if we have any intention of going back to an annual production of five, four, or three billions of dollars, then there will not be the slightest chance of any social insurance scheme that we may devise being of any value.

Social security calls first and foremost for the maintenance of a high level of production and for the distribution of that production, or shall I say the channelling of it into the things that will provide a good life for all our people. This good life, as I see it, should include other things, but at least it must include homes to live in, adequate food and clothing, care of health and a fair measure of life's luxuries for everyone, with dignified security in old age. Nothing less than such a programme is good enough for the Canadian people when the war is over.

I was interested in some of the comments made to-day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I endeavoured to jot down one sentence in particular with which I thoroughly agreed. I believe Hansard will bear out the sense of what I have jotted down. He said that no country goes bankrupt by increasing its production and devoting a large portion of that production to a supreme cause. We are doing that to-day, to the supreme cause of the present struggle. We ask that the same thing be done to-morrow, to the supreme cause of establishing and making possible a good life for the Canadian people.

There was a day when the vested interests through their newspapers and in other ways could treat the farmers and workers of this country a though they were a class apart, as though they should be grateful for the crumbs given to them from Canada's economic table. That situation does not hold any longer. Our young men for whom a few years ago there was no place in our life are to-day in positions of defence vital to our national existence and freedom. I sometimes think when I see these young men going away with "Canada" on their shoulders that in a very real sense they are Canada. They are full participants in the great struggle in which we are engaged. When these young men come back it is not going to be possible to shove them out into the cold to wait until something comes along. They are participants in this great struggle, and they deserve to be full participants in our economic life after the war is over. That means that they deserve to have jobs and to receive income sufficient to make it possible for them to share in the wealth which we hope they will be producing.

I sometimes wonder if hon. members have realized the change that has taken place in the thinking of our people. During the course of this war we have had to learn to pool our resources and work together, to think in terms of the larger community of which we are a part. That has been true both on the home front and on the battlefront. The result is that our people expect that after the war they will all be able to participate in whatever life it is possible to establish in this country. As I see it, that is what the people look for now when they envision social security.

There might have been a day twenty or thirty years ago when unemployment insurance, the providing of a few incidental benefits and a few dollars a week, would have been acceptable as social security. But that day is gone. As the previous speaker, the leader of the opposition, pointed out, our people to-day agree with the principle of unemployment insurance, but when you tell them that this legislation will provide only a few dollars a week under certain conditions, that to them is not social security. It may have been a form of social security twenty or thirty years ago, but to-day social security involves the establishment of a national economy of a high order, full production, and the provision that everyone who is willing and capable of working shall share in that production. Those who through no fault of their own are not able to share in the work are entitled, as human beings in a civilized society, to share in the goods and services that are produced. Social security is much more than the incidental schemes the government has suggested. I feel it is even more than the comprehensive scheme of social insurance to which the immediately preceding speaker referred. It calls for comprehensive changes in the whole nature of our economy, and that is what we in this group are advocating.

The people of this country are apprehensive about the future. The forces of reaction are already getting arrayed for a show-down after the war is over. The people realize that private enterprise, in spite of all the excess profits taxes that are being paid, is to-day being given control of Canadian industry, with its greatly increased plant and equipment, to a far greater extent than before the war. Newspapers, such as the famous one in the city from which I come, the Winnipeg Free Press, are doing their best to confuse the issue by idealizing the old order and using abusive language to describe the kind of economy which we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation advocate, a Canadian economy which the people will own and control so that there will be for all an income to enable every worker and every farmer to own his own home and to have for his very own the necessities of a good life.

The people are no longer disturbed or deceived by the old argument that socialism interferes with personal living and initiative and freedom. Socialism in fact is the only possible basis for full employment, for adequate incomes, for homes for everyone, for care of our health and real security in our old age. These things spell real freedom. These things make life worth living. These things inspire people to creative effort. These things draw out initiative. You cannot turn people away from their desire for these things by trying to tell them in this day and age that that is socialism. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, these things are what democracy ought to be seeking to achieve. As I sit in this house and hear hon. members suggest that government should not interfere with the economic life of our country, I wonder what they were sent here for. I feel that I was sent here by the constituents I represent to work on their behalf, and definitely to seek in the name of the people to control and direct the economy of this country in such a way as to make possible good homes and a good life for the people of Winnipeg North Centre and of this entire country. I think it is our duty as members of this house to give our concern and deep thought to this whole question of controlling the economy of this country in the interests of the people that they may enjoy a good life.

I have urged upon the house the desirability of this committee giving its attention to our whole economy if it is going to establish a measure of social security that will be worth while. If I have hoped for too much, I hope that the committee will at least recommend the bringing down of legislation this session to increase old age pensions, to take care of our veterans and war widows, and put into effect a national programme for the health of our people. These things would give to our people a measure of confidence that when this war is over we are really going to have a better day.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the predecessor of the last speaker (Mr. Knowles) representing Winnipeg North Centre occupied this seat when I first entered the house. I think we both entered on the same day. In those days we both had a resolution for social insurance, unemployment insurance and health insurance. Those resolutions went to a committee, just as it is proposed to send this question of social insurance, and what was the result? It was found, in the first place, that owing to the constitution of Canada, dominion, provincial and municipal jurisdictions, such a scheme could not then be carried out; second, that the government of Canada, or any government, had no funds except what it raised from the taxpayers, and that to put such a scheme into effect the dominion would have to come to the taxpayers to get the necessary funds, and the provinces would have to do the same thing and the municipalities the same.

We have come through two wars, and the taxpayer to-day has already pretty heavy burdens. The Beveridge report has been often referred to in this house; I have read it half a dozen times. Sir William Beveridge was a professor, a teacher at Oxford university. I do not see how it came about that the government of Great Britain took the action they did; for it is well known that a teacher or a professor is a theorist, not a practical man.

I have been a pioneer in this work for many years, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that the government of the day here is taking the wrong stand. We should have, as they had in England, a two or three days' debate in the house on this subject to survey and chart a course of action. Recently I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to have a one day debate so that we might chart a course of what should be done about social security. In the first place there can be no security without, first of all, the returned soldiers having some security when they return. The first duty of parliament in any national scheme of insurance is to insure our soldiers, to take care of them and their dependents for three years after the war. I have long advocated that, since the war began, by a resolution on the order paper, but nothing has been done about it. Nor can there be any security without an adequate housing scheme. In England the debate centred on housing. But nothing has been done to house our soldiers when they come home, or to house their dependents now. The armed forces can occupy mansion houses in the city from which I come, the old Flavelle property and one on Crescent road, for instance, while the soldiers' dependents have to live in cellars and all that kind of thing. Some cannot find a house. If this question of social security is referred to a committee of this house I believe that that will be the end of the whole question for this session.

As I shall require about ten or fifteen minutes more to finish, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 4, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS LEADERS

MESSAGES TO MR. CHURCHILL ON RECOVERY FROM ILLNESS AND MR. ROOSEVELT ON TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST INAUGURATION AS PRESIDENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, on the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Red Army in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics I was happy to pay a tribute to the unparalleled successes of Russian arms in the unrelenting campaign of driving the German invaders from Russian soil. News of more recent days has shown the weight and the telling effect of the sustained offensive which has been undertaken by the united nations in combat areas alike in Europe and in the far east.

One has but to mention the recent air assaults against Germany, in which Canadian bomber squadrons had a large share, and the more recent annihilation of a large Japanese convoy by the air forces operating under United States command, to realize the might of this growing offensive.

As to the air offensive against Germany, it is now estimated that during the month of February alone more than ten thousand tons of bombs were dropped on bombing objectives in German-occupied Europe; two and a half times the average for any month in 1942.

As to the successes in the Pacific, it is evident from the details so far reported that the sinking of twenty-two Japanese ships by air attack represents a most signal success, the most remarkable of the air arm in that theatre of war to date. The fact that both achievements, although many thousands of miles apart, were virtually simultaneous, is most significant. It foreshadows ultimate victory over the axis partners.

Throughout these momentous days, two in particular among the leaders of the united nations have been much in our thoughts. Both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt have been indisposed, without doubt as a result of fatigue reactions consequent upon the strain of their recent momentous journeys. Hon. members will have observed with pleasure that Mr. Churchill was able yesterday to resume his place as chairman of the war cabinet of the United Kingdom, and that Mr. Roosevelt has also been restored to health. They will recall with equal satisfaction that to-day marks the tenth anniversary of Mr. Roosevelt's inauguration as President of the United States.

I have felt that it would be in keeping with the wishes of all hon. members were I to associate with a recognition of the latest achievements of the air forces of the united nations, alike over land and sea, messages of greeting to the British Prime Minister and to the President. With the permission of the house I shall read copies of the telegrams which I dispatched earlier to-day:

Ottawa, March 4, 1943.

Right Hon. Winston Churchill,
Prime Minister of the United Kingdom:

I should like you to know with what pleasure members of the parliament of Canada have learned that yesterday you were able again to preside at the meeting of the war cabinet. Nothing I am sure could be more encouraging at the moment of your recovery from your recent indisposition than the reports of the effects of the heavy and sustained bombing of Germany within the last few days. The latest assaults by the R.A.F., the R.C.A.F., and other allied forces in the air offensive against occupied Europe have come at a moment when the successes of the Red Army on land, and of the air forces under United States command in the Pacific have demonstrated the might of the general offensive now undertaken by the united nations. Viewed together they are prophetic of the ultimate defeat of the enemies of freedom.

It is the fervent hope of all Canadians that you may continue to gain the strength and encouragement so greatly needed in the tremendous tasks which lie ahead. Kindest personal remembrances.

W. L. Mackenzie King

Ottawa, March 4, 1943.

Franklin D. Roosevelt,
President of the United States of America:

On this tenth anniversary of your initial inauguration as President of the United States I should like to send to you on behalf of the members of the parliament of Canada and all your good neighbours in Canada, warmest greetings and every good wish.

I am sure that on this anniversary nothing could be more welcome to you, and to the people of the United States, than the news of the magnificent successes of the air and naval forces under United States command in the continuing offensive against Japan in the Pacific area. Combined with the onward march of the Red Army in Europe and the sustained assault by the allied forces against Germany, these signal achievements are indeed prophetic of the ultimate defeat of the axis powers. In this growing offensive of all the united nations, let me assure you of our heartfelt wishes for your health and strength as the labours and sacrifices of free peoples throughout the world bring us all nearer the day of final victory. Kindest personal regards.

W. L. Mackenzie King

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a singularly happy occasion. Our party in this house welcomes the opportunity of associating ourselves with the well chosen words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his messages to the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States. The Prime Minister's reference to the successes of the arms of the united nations on land, on sea and in the air I think is most appropriate at this time.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honourable Winston Spencer Churchill, took office in the United Kingdom at what may be regarded as one of the darkest hours in the whole history of the British empire, and by his words, his example and his tremendous courage inspired the people of Britain to heights which perhaps they had never before attained, at the same time extending his influence to every part of the democratic world. He came to power at a critical time; and at least it can be said to the credit of democracy that when critical situations arise men with the ability and capacity to meet them are brought to the fore. To Mr. Churchill democracy owes a debt it will never be able to repay. His restoration to health is a great relief to the people of Canada and to all those fighting in the cause of freedom and righteousness the world over.

The President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, came to power also at a critical time, not during a war but at perhaps the most trying period that democracy has ever experienced in time of peace, and what is applicable to Mr. Churchill in time of war may be applied in equal measure to the President of the United States with regard to the difficulties which he surmounted in days of peace. I am sure all hon. members of this house who have been following the life of the President of the United States will remember that in addition to his wartime achievements, which have been magnificent, he has proved to be a great friend of the little man in the country which he serves so well. His work, in close association with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the leaders of the other allied nations, I think is understood and appreciated more than words can express, and on this tenth anniversary of his first inauguration I as leader of the Progressive Conservative party in this house want to add my words to those which have been uttered by the Prime Minister. This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we in this house are unanimous in greeting the two great champions of democracy.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we should like to associate ourselves with what has just been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Graydon). It is peculiarly fitting that at this time Canada should express herself in this manner, because we are in a particular way a friend of both countries represented by these two great leaders. As part of the British commonwealth of nations we are in close association with the country led by Prime Minister Churchill, and we are also closely associated with the great republic to the south; so that we appreciate the efforts not only of these two leaders but as well of the people who support them. We are glad that they have been restored to health following their recent indisposition.

We are glad also to note that during the past few weeks the armed forces of the united nations have made great progress toward the end we all desire. But may I suggest that in offering our congratulations and in our rejoicings we should not forget that these victories do not mean that the end of the war is in sight. I think that is something we should emphasize, because, as the Prime Minister said, here and there throughout the country there is a feeling that perhaps the tide has turned and that within a short time we shall see the end of the war. This, I take it, is but the beginning.

I assure the Prime Minister that we are pleased indeed that he has sent these messages to President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, and we hope that all the peoples associated as the united nations may in due course find victory and peace.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, to-day is a day of buoyant rejoicing from one end to the other of the Anglo-Saxon world. I think it is fitting, too, that this day we should offer solemn thanksgiving to the divine Providence that guided us during the dark days through which we have passed, and which saw fit to place at the head of our affairs during this crisis these two great and good men. I think also it would be becoming that in most sincere humility we should pray to that great divine Leader to bring us through the darker days that perhaps lie ahead, that we may arrive safely; and that when we shall have arrived we may prove ourselves in every way worthy of the victory which I feel sure will be ours.

AIR TRANSPORT SERVICES

TABLING OF NOTES RENEWING SUPPLEMENTARY ARRANGEMENT OF 1940

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table copies in English and French of the exchange of notes constituting an agreement between the Canadian and United States governments to renew the supplementary air transport arrangement of 1940. The notes were exchanged to-day between the Canadian minister in Washington and the Acting Secretary of State of the United States. These notes, which are brief, might be printed in to-day's Votes and Proceedings.

The substance of the notes is as follows. In August, 1939, Canada and the United States entered into an agreement relating to air transport services. Under the provisions of this arrangement both countries recognized the principle of reciprocity in the granting of operating rights to air carrier enterprises of the other country for the operation of air services between the two countries. The details of the application of this principle of reciprocity were to be adjusted later between the competent aeronautical authorities of the two countries. Those authorities met in Ottawa in September, 1940, and as a result of their deliberations Canada and the United States, in December, 1940, entered into an agreement under which the various air routes between Canada and the United States were divided between Canadian and United States air carriers. It is this agreement of December, 1940, which has been renewed to-day.

The 1940 agreement thus supplements the 1939 agreement. The 1939 agreement is now terminable on six months' notice. Under the terms of the new exchange of notes, the 1940 agreement is also made terminable on six months' notice and expires without notice at the end of the war. After the termination of the war a conference will be held between the two governments to review the situation which may then exist. This is in accordance with the general policy of the government, which is that pending a decision by the government on post-war policy no commitments respecting international civil aviation should be made which would tie the government's hands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BUTTER AND BUTTERFAT BONUS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What action, if any, has been taken by the government to bring the price of dairy butter in line with butter made in creameries?

2. What consideration has been given to increase the capacity of creameries in the maritime provinces, also transportation of cream to said creameries and the supply of cans so that more farmers can take advantage of the bonus given on butterfat processed by creameries?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The price schedules of board order No. 237 of the wartime prices and trade board provide that, effective March 1, 1943 the maximum prices of dairy butter throughout Canada shall be substantially the same as the maximum prices for first grade creamery butter.

2. All requests for permits for expansion of the capacity of creameries in the maritime provinces have been approved. The administrator of metal containers has been in direct communication with the Deputy Minister of Agriculture and the dairy commissioner of New Brunswick, and with the president of the Dairymen's Association of New Brunswick, and has made arrangements for shipments of milk and cream cans to the province of New Brunswick.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—RELEASE OF MAN-POWER FROM NON-ESSENTIAL INDUSTRIES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has a plan been prepared under the direction of the wartime prices and trade board for the release of man-power from non-essential industries?

2. If so, when was it completed?

3. How many workers would be affected?

4. Why has it not been put into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Ever since the introduction of the price ceiling on December 1, 1941, the wartime prices and trade board has had a programme for the standardization of products, simplification of manufacturing methods and economy in marketing and distribution practices. In part, this programme has for its objective the curtailment of costs so that the price ceiling can be maintained. As various steps are taken, however, release of man-power becomes effective. The programme is a continuing one and the nature of the man-power and numbers affected cannot be precisely determined.

In addition, through its administrators and industry advisory committees the board has made a survey of the possibilities of more drastic steps in curtailment or elimination of products and services which might be employed to bring about diversions of man-power, or to meet the difficulties of developing shortages of man-power or materials. It is not possible, however, to consider this survey as a "plan" because steps to be taken require to be considered in light of conditions as they exist from time to time.

The wartime prices and trade board issued a statement of administrative principles in this connection which was published in The Canada Gazette of October 21, 1942.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

What is the number of Japanese located in and around Port Arthur, Sandon, New Denver and Bridge River, British Columbia?

Mr. MITCHELL: 2,935.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—HULL, QUE.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What was the per unit price of each of the 100 houses built by Wartime Housing Limited in Hull?

2. What was the per unit price of the group of 50 houses built in Hull?

3. What was the average cost of providing sewers, service, etc., for each of the houses built in Hull?

4. According to present agreements, what disposition is to be made of these houses after the war?

5. Will any compensation be made to the federal government for installation of sewers, streets, etc.?

6. Was it necessary to re-lay some of the sewers in connection with the Hull project?

7. If so, what was the cost, and by whom was it paid?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. $2,939.87.

2. $2,941.10.

3. Average cost per house for providing sewers, watermains, roads and walks was $760.66.

4. The agreement does not set forth anything relative to the disposition of these houses after the war. The agreement does contemplate that if any of the houses are sold or disposed of, they shall immediately become subject to the ordinary municipal by-laws.

5. No.

6. Yes.

7. No cost was involved for the re-laying of sewers. The work improperly done is being charged back against funds owing to the contractor under his contract with Wartime Housing Limited.

WESTERN FUEL CORPORATION LIMITED

Mr. O'NEILL:

1. Is any monetary assistance being given to Western Fuel Corporation Limited?

2. If so, on what basis and what amount has been paid to this company?

3. Is this company a subsidiary of Canadian Collieries Limited?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

FLAX PRODUCTION AND PROCESSING

Mr. BENCE:

1. What is the total capacity of the flax processing plants situated in Canada and the United States of America?

2. What was the total estimated number of bushels of flax produced in Canada and the United States of America in the year 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answers to these questions are as follows:

1. Approximate Canadian crushing capacity 6,395,000 bushels. Capacity of flax processing plants in United States estimated at 72,000,000 bushels, but competent authorities agree practical capacity 52,000,000 bushels. Total Canadian and United States crushing capacity 58,395,000 bushels.

2. Approximately 55·7 million bushels.

I should like to make it clear, however, that the government cannot take any responsibility for figures relating to capacity for flax production in the United States.

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

Mr. GREEN:

1. How many persons in each province are in receipt of a monthly salary for the sale of war savings certificates?

2. Are such persons engaged on a full time basis or are they at liberty to carry on some additional business or occupation?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Since formation of the national war finance committee, the promotion and sale of war savings certificates, war savings stamps and victory loan bonds are now the responsibility of the National War Finance committee and no persons have been employed solely for the sale of war savings certificates.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WARTIME HOUSING—WRIGHTVILLE, QUE.

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. How many buildings of the various types have been constructed to date in Wrightville, Quebec, by Wartime Housing?

2. What is the total expenditure to date on the said project?

3. Has the work of landscaping the project been awarded? If so, to whom, and by what financial arrangement?

4. Has additional work on the street allowances in regard to sewer and water services been necessary? If so, what is the cost of the same?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Type H1 and 2—25 houses; type H11 and 12—100 houses; type H21 and 22—25 houses.

2. The total expenditure as of January 31, 1943 is $577,604.06.

3. The landscaping for the second project of 50 houses has been arranged at a cost of $2,400, the work being done by the federal district commission of Ottawa. The balance of the landscaping will be done this spring by the commission.

4. $7,570.28 has been expended on repairs of sewers and waterworks. This is not an expense to Wartime Housing Limited, it being chargeable to funds of the contractor in Wartime Housing Limited's possession.

Mr. LOCKHART:

In the construction of buildings by Wartime Housing at Wrightville, Quebec, what is the cost to date of, (a) acquisition of land, (b) installation and improvements or alterations of any sewers and water services, (c) grading, paving or surfacing street allowances, (d) construction per unit of dwellings, (e) improving or landscaping the street allowances, (f) installation of electricity on the street allowances and on rights-of-way, (g) connecting of electricity to dwellings per unit.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. (a) Land acquisition, $2,197.50; (b) Installation and improvements to sewers and water services, $90,560.01; (c) Grading, paving or surfacing streets, $19,079.21; (d) Construction costs per unit: Hull No. 1, $2,939.87; Hull No. 2, $2,941.10; (e) Landscaping, $2,372.49; (f) Installation of electricity on the street allowances and right-of-way, $1,485.52; (g) Connecting of electricity to dwellings per unit, $9.90.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

HARVEST EXCURSIONS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What was the total cost of the harvest excursions which were run from eastern Canada during the 1942 harvest season?

2. What proportion of this cost was paid by (a) dominion government, (b) provincial governments?

3. How many men were taken on these excursions?

4. How many were returned to eastern Canada before the first date set for their return?

5. How many, if any, had to receive additional financial assistance to return?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. $241,312.11.

2. All dominion.

3. 5,886.

4. No information available.

5. 7.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

R.C.N.V.R. RECRUITING ESTABLISHMENTS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What is the location of each of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve training recruiting establishments?

2. What is the total number of enlistments for each such establishment since the commencement of the war?

3. What is the total amount of contracts awarded in connection with each of the said establishments with respect to the following, (a) for purchase of land and buildings, (b) for construction of new buildings, (c) for alterations to existing buildings?

4. What are the amounts with respect to each establishment which have been expended for such purposes in addition to amounts of such contracts?

5. What additional expenditures for such purposes are planned giving particulars of the establishments involved?

NAVAL SERVICE—CRESCENT ROAD, TORONTO, PROPERTY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the navy taken over a home on Crescent road, Toronto?

2. If so, for what purpose and at what cost?

3. How many officers and ratings are housed therein?

4. What are the terms of the lease and what is the cost of repairs and maintenance for the first year?

5. What fuel is used, from whom was it purchased, and were tenders called?

6. Who negotiated the use of this site?

7. What staff is there and how many of them have served in this war at sea?

8. How many are pay officers, what are their ages and navy service?

POST OFFICES—REPAIRS AND IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. MARSHALL:

What amounts were spent during the year 1942 on post offices either by way of repairs or other improvements, by the Department of Public Works?

HON. J. G. TAGGART

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What is the total amount which has been paid to Hon. J. G. Taggart by the federal government as, (a) salary, (b) travelling expenses, (c) living allowances?

WOMEN IN THE FORCES AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. DORION:

1. How many females are engaged in war service, (a) in the army, (b) in the navy, (c) in the air force?

2. How many are, (a) married, (b) spinsters?

3. What number of females in each province are employed in war factories and how many are, (a) married, (b) single?

4. What number of females in each province has been engaged by the civil service commission since 1939 to December 31, 1942?

DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN—SUBSISTENCE AND TRAVEL ALLOWANCES

Mr. ROY:

1. Does the government pay to those generally designated as "dollar-a-year men" subsistence or travel allowances on a daily basis or otherwise?

2. If so, (a) what are the minimum and maximum allowances, (b) are they subject to taxation and since when?

TIME REQUIRED FOR ANSWERING QUESTIONS—PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the next order of business is called there are two matters in connection with questions that I did not raise as we went along, but which I believe should be mentioned now.

The first question on to-day's order paper, in which the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) asks the number of prosecutions instituted by the wartime prices and trade board from the district headquarters at Brockville, was placed on the order paper on February 9. Could the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) expedite the answer? This seems an extraordinarily long period between the time of placing it on the order paper and the answer being given. To-day it was still permitted to stand.

The other question has reference to the question which is No. 27 on to-day's order paper. I should like to know why this question, which is a very simple one, and would take up very little space, should stand as an order for return.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Answering the latter part of my hon. friend's question, I would say the only reason the question to which he refers was made an order for return is that it involves two departments, namely, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance through the wartime prices and trade board. Returns will have to be received from each.

Mr. GRAYDON: That did not seem apparent from the question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISMISSAL OF DOCTOR DAVID SHUGAR BY RESEARCH ENTERPRISES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I have just received a letter from the national chairman of the association of technical employees, which is affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, to the effect that the national secretary of that association has been summarily dismissed without notice by a government corporation known as Research Enterprises Limited. The association regard this action as a clear case of union discrimination. I should like to ask that the minister investigate this matter at once.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition was good enough to advise me of his intention to ask this question, which has to do with the case of Doctor David Shugar. The complaint is, as stated, that he was dismissed for union activities. I received a report earlier in the week and immediately an industrial relations officer, as is customary in these cases, was dispatched to the company. I expect to have a report within the next few days, and I shall be glad to show it to my hon. friend.

WAR REFUGEES

REFERENCE TO SUGGESTED CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the government been consulted regarding the proposal of the United States to hold a conference in Ottawa to consider ways and means of alleviating the sufferings of refugees who fled or escaped from nazi and fascist persecution? Will the Prime Minister make a statement outlining Canada's opinion regarding this proposal, and the problem involved?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was advised that a question such as has been asked would be asked this afternoon either by my hon. friend or by some other member of his party. With that in mind I have prepared a reply, which I shall give to the house.

I have now seen the communication from the United States government to the United Kingdom government on the subject of a refugee conference, which was given to the press in Washington last night. A copy of this statement was shown to the Canadian Legation in Washington yesterday afternoon. I am informed that the document communicated by the United States Secretary of State to the British Ambassador in Washington on February 25 was in the form of a working memorandum, which in the ordinary course of events would not have been published without further communication with the governments which it concerned.

The United Kingdom government, which has taken the initiative in raising anew the question of what further measures might be taken in concert by the governments of the united nations to relieve the position of refugees from axis occupied territories, has been in communication with the Canadian government on this subject. The Canadian government has been giving consideration to a number of suggestions put forward by the United Kingdom government and will, in due course, be glad to examine any suggestions which the United States government may wish to put forward as a contribution to the alleviation of a grave and distressing problem.

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an explanation I should like to make and supplement it with a slight apology. In replying to my hon. friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) I said that I was advised that a question such as had been asked would be asked this afternoon, and I thought it would be by one of his group. The hon. member who was kind enough to send me notice of his intention to ask the question was the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I should therefore like to see that he gets full credit for the reply that was made.

Mr. COLDWELL: For a moment I was afraid that the usual cooperation in our party had not been maintained.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. BRUCE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY, MARCH 3

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, when addressing a question yesterday to the Prime Minister I had not proceeded very far before I was interrupted by the Prime Minister. The ensuing noise prevented my hearing exactly what was said by him. I have now the text of his remarks, which will be found on page 918 of Hansard. He is reported as follows:

> My hon. friend has given me no notice of this question. If he wishes to advertise himself, all right,—

I submit that that is offensive language and language which imputes a motive. This is dealt with in standing order 41, which reads as follows:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRUCE: I am just reading the complete text. Perhaps I had better skip down to the relevant passage, because it seems to be disturbing some of my hon. friends opposite. It reads:

> —nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

Paragraph 297 states that the imputation of bad motives against a member is contrary to the rules of this house. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister to withdraw his remarks.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that when he rose yesterday I had very much in mind the fact that for some years he had represented His Majesty the King as his representative in the province of Ontario, and I was surprised that one who through a portion of his life had accustomed himself to the courtesies that go with such an office should have attempted to do what he was seeking to do yesterday. If I have offended the hon. member in any way I am sorry for that, and if I have used any language which is unparliamentary, I am quite prepared to withdraw it. I said just what came to my mind at the moment.

Mr. BRUCE: I should only like to add that I wished no discourtesy to the Prime Minister; I would not wish to do anything that would be discourteous to any other member of this house. This item had been published in the press throughout Canada the day before and I thought it was well known. I thought probably the Prime Minister himself had read it.

I believe I was justified in thinking that he had read it, because I had proceeded only with a few words before he stopped my reading further. He must have known what was coming.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I certainly knew what was coming, and I realized that my hon. friend was reading the article for that purpose. But I also knew, what I thought he himself would have recognized, that what was stated in the article was something in the nature of what had been a confidential conversation, not between myself and others but among a few persons at a meeting at which a reporter was present but at which the request was made and an assurance given that no communication would go from the meeting to the public. I have been so informed by the gentleman whose name was mentioned yesterday in the attempted reading of the article. I think my hon. friend ought to have been the first, if he had intended to seek to give publicity to something over which I had no control whatever and which was in the nature of confidential discussion on the part of others, to have spoken to me about it in advance of bringing it up in this house.

FOOD

PRODUCTION PROGRAMME FOR 1943—AGRICULTURAL FOOD BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As I do not expect to have an opportunity to reply to the question asked me the other day by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) before it will be necessary to act upon the decision which has been made, I think I should give the house the information I have at the moment. A statement was made earlier in the session by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) dealing with the division of authority between the food board and the Department of Agriculture on matters of production.

The food production programme for 1943 will be directed by an agricultural food board which has been set up by order in council which names four members of the staff of the Department of Agriculture as the board. This was done after consultation with the Canadian farm federation. An advisory committee of twelve will be set up. The president of the farm federation will be the chairman of that committee, one member will be nominated by each of the nine provinces and the other two members will be nominated by the farm federation. The orders in council authorizing that committee and the board have been passed, and just as soon as copies are available, I shall table them in the house.

SOCIAL SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SOCIAL INSURANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a select committee to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): At five minutes to six last night I had risen to discuss the objectives of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) now before the house. As I look over the resolution I cannot help but feel that planning is first and social security and the conduct of the war a secondary consideration. Notwithstanding the fact that the war, up to the campaign in North Africa, had been going very badly, we are paying more attention to planning our post-war economy. So far as the war is concerned, we have never been in a more precarious state and danger than we are at the present time. One would think that the generals who won the great victories in North Africa had been forgotten in Canada as there seems to be only one general remaining here, General Beveridge, and his social planning scheme for the mother country.

As I have said before, in the maelstrom of planning talk the war seems to have been forgotten. Last year we wasted four months of the time of the house which were taken up with politics in a referendum. That is what happened notwithstanding the fact that we had not won a victory on land or sea, that we were still on the defensive. With Bill No. 80 and the referendum four months of the time of this house was wasted. It seems that we are entering another political year at this time.

While we have not been promised anything, I believe an election is coming. Before the vote of five billion dollars is passed I think it is the duty of the opposition to ask the government what are their objectives regarding the conduct of this war and as to a wartime election a second time for political reasons. Is this social planning all you are doing to win the war? I have received a great many letters from our men in England and other parts of the world who are serving their country on the land and sea and in the air and they ask what we are doing here to urge on the government that something should be done to achieve a total war effort, and prepare for the return of the men of the forces. Not only is the government on trial at the present time but the House of Commons is also on trial before the bar of public opinion in this country for its war efforts, and for what it is doing about after the war conditions. This house has surrendered to a whole lot of bureaucratic boards and controls and subcontrols and planners and modellers who control practically the whole business of the country, so much so that the House of Commons is the forgotten agency of government to-day. At times I have protested against this almost alone for the last three years, but at last the people are beginning to wake up and see the dangers that confront them.

I admit that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has done a great deal of work in his day in studying labour conditions and social problems. I have known him longer I think than any other member of the house. I remember when he was a university student and a young reporter on the Toronto Globe, and when he was reporting the proceedings in the courts. I remember that Colonel Denison then predicted a very bright career for him. But I say to him to-day that not only is his government on trial but so is this House of Commons.

Coming to the text of the resolution, I must say that one of the most important matters that should be taken up by the committee seems to have been forgotten, and that is the question of providing employment. We speak of freedom from want. What does that mean? To rid the masses of fear you must provide them wtih work, but the resolution makes no mention of that. I should like to have a little order, Mr. Speaker, because this is an important matter I am discussing. I do not interrupt anybody else when he is speaking and I am entitled as a private member to order when I am addressing the house.

I was saying that the question of providing employment for soldiers seems to have been forgotten by the government in proposing this resolution. The government seems to have two principles for curing unemployment. One is the ambassador cure for unemployment, sending ambassadors all over the seven seas, some of whom talk in a way that does great damage to the war effort and to this country. The other principle is the senate cure for unemployment, the appointing to the senate of young men who should be at the war. I would for national reasons suggest the return of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen to the senate, and that we have appointed to the senate some representatives of the press.

I should like to refer for a moment to the British war victims fund, and to what one newspaper in Toronto, the Evening Telegram, has done in promoting that fund for the people of Great Britain who have had their houses and their homes destroyed and have suffered great losses in this war. Through the British war victims fund there has been brought home to the young people in the schools and colleges of Toronto and Ontario a realization amongst the younger generation of what they owe to the mother country in this war. Through this fund organized by the Toronto Evening Telegram there has been collected already about $2,000,000. Frequently the Telegram will publish pictures of little children in Toronto and in the province who have taken part in organized efforts to secure money for this fund, and other children will go out on the street corners and collect small sums from five to ten or twenty cents for this fund to help rebuild the mother country. I appreciate what has been done in that regard and the good work done by the late founder of the Telegram, John Ross Robertson, and the late editor, John R. Robinson, who has been succeeded by Mr. C. O. Knowles, who is continuing so well this good work. I think we all know of the good work that has been done for the Sick Children's Hospital by its founder, and what has been done in connection with health and welfare matters. I think one of the men who should be appointed to the senate is Mr. C. O. Knowles, editor of the Evening Telegram, for his British war victims fund.

Planning, Mr. Speaker, is the new name for socialism. Everybody is a socialist these days, everybody is a planner, and the war seems to have been forgotten as the matter of primary importance. The allies have just begun to take the initiative after more than three years of war. As Mr. Churchill has said, we are at the end of the beginning, and yet there is more talk about planning than about the conduct of the war on the land, on the sea and in the air. I have no objection to planning so long as we do not forget that the most important thing is the winning of the war.

But look at the text of this resolution. The committee is just to make a study and report, and it is a committee of this House of Commons. The Beveridge report was prepared by an interdepartmental committee on social insurance, under the control of a minister of the crown, Mr. Greenwood. But the work here is going to be done by a committee of the house. This committee is not, as I see it, being given any objectives by the government in the matter. The plan is only half-baked. It is too complicated and uneconomic, in my opinion. Timber, for instance, to rehabilitate the whole of Britain is badly needed and will be needed for reconstruction purposes after the war. Great Britain imports sixty-five million pounds' worth of timber a year, but there is no mention made in the resolution of that trade. Sometimes I think we would get better results in the way of social security and all along the line if instead of having so many professors and high-brows on some of these control boards and commissions, while other brave men are fighting our battles overseas, we had some practical men at work on the problems that lie ahead of us. Those problems are too big for any one political party.

We are proposing to make the most serious leap in the dark which this country has ever undertaken. We are faced with the greatest problems that have ever been faced by the world, and we in this country are the first to start to take a leap into the unknown world that will follow after the war. I believe that we should get men of practical experience to guide us. We should not forget those who were our best customers before the war, the people of Great Britain, upon whom we have had to rely for a market for our products. They should be taken care of. I believe that what should be done after the war is to go back to what we had before, free enterprise; try to build up free enterprise so that means for employment will be created by empire trade as before. In that way you will remove the unemployed from the unemployment seats on to the employment seats. Our raw materials should be made available to the empire and to other nations of the world on an equal basis as far as possible and every nation be given the opportunity of living in a state of freedom.

What caused the war was simply intolerance. I believe that all parties in this house and out of it should be guided by wisdom, restraint, and tolerance, and should not show a lack of ordinary Christian charity towards their opponents with whom they may happen to disagree. As I have said before in this house, it is the little man of England personified by Strube, who is the reflection of the average man who saved the mother country which has suffered so much in this war. These little men who were strong enough to beat off Hitler and Mussolini will be able to plan the right conditions for the mother country and the empire after the war. As Admiral Southby said in the House of Commons the other day:

> There are people who seem to think that the war is being waged in order to destroy a social and economic system with which they do not entirely agree.

Admiral Southby said:

> Nothing could be further from the truth than that. We are fighting the war for our bare existence, for the right to live at all.

Then he suggests, speaking of the "little" man:

> His victory . . . will have been in vain if, when the war is over, he is obliterated by the state which he fought to preserve. The essence of the evil nazi creed is that the state is greater than any individual. The essence of democracy, as I see it, is that the state is the servant of the individual and not his master. Therefore, let us at all costs, when we are starting to rebuild the world and to improve it, not impose what is not the less a dictatorship because it masquerades under the name of something which is politely called "democratic planning." A great man, who left us not long ago and a friend of most of us in the house, Lord Tweedsmuir, better known to us as plain John Buchan, once made a speech on Abraham Lincoln, in which he said, "The powers of moderation are slow to kindle, but once they are lit they do not go out until they have burnt up much rubbish and opened a path for the advance of mankind to a better world."

I hope and believe that we are willing to advance the progress of mankind to a better world, but if it is to be a success it must be, in my opinion, a world in which there is a square deal. That means a square deal for everybody, not solely for the small man and the sick and suffering and those out of employment, but for those who have maybe a little more substance than some others have. Much of the talk of planning after the war partakes of a plan for robbing Peter to pay Paul. Well, almost everything that Peter has is being taken away from him by two wars and a long depression, with the result that when the war is over Peter will have little or nothing left.

One of the speakers in this chamber yesterday suggested, referring to the Beveridge report, that Sir William Beveridge should be invited here. I think we have enough planners right in the house and out of it without the necessity of bringing Sir William Beveridge over to Canada to tell us what to do. While I am not a Scotsman, I was surprised to hear my good friend the Minister of Pensions speak as though incentive as we had it from capital will probably have disappeared after the war. He referred to "regulated incentive."

That is all right if there is not too much regulation. But if we intend to pursue a course in opposition to what made the mother country and this country great, namely, private enterprise and free retail and wholesale business—I mean the system of free enterprise—we shall be trying to do something which the men who come home after the war will, I think, not tolerate. They are not fighting, nor are they willing to fight, for social planning from the cradle to the grave; they are fighting for the right of the people of this country to live; the right to possess private property which is derived from nature, not from man, and the state has no right to abolish it, but only to regulate its use. The position of the wholesale and the retail merchant should be restored to what it was before the war, if we are to create the maximum opportunities of employment. In Great Britain they passed the pre-war trade practices act to put free enterprise and the small retailer and wholesaler back in possession of the rights they held as citizens and business men before the war; and that is the way to build up this country, and release them from some controls.

Reference is made in the report to birth, maternity, old age and burial insurance. Well, after many of the taxpayers have done with the last few budgets I am afraid public insurance will be needed to pay their burial expenses. I can tell you that even some of the members of this house know of citizens who need that aid, and I have known of a few members of this house who left so little that aid was needed to bury them. Hon. members may laugh, but that is the fact. I know some of the undertakers in our city, and they are splendid citizens and men of real public spirit and do a great public health work. It has been my lot, I may say, to attend several funerals in the past two or three weeks, and I know in that city how the people are suffering.

We hear much talk about social planning and this new utopia and paradise which we are to live in. I can tell some of our planners that the new paradise, or part of the health and hospital social service, of which they speak so much started in the city hall of Toronto, with its modern health department. One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), was a senior surgeon of the Toronto General hospital, and our city was a pioneer in this social legislation. The late lamented Doctor Hastings built up the most modern health department in North America. He and the gentlemen who supported him, the men I mentioned a few minutes ago, had to fight with the aid of the Evening Telegram a campaign for health reform and to reorganize the health department and the works department. By their civic efforts an outstanding programme of social legislation was achieved, including a first-class water supply, a modern sewage system, and a modern health and works department. Other newspapers gave aid later.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has for some time been, what I can call in a sporting sense, "barnstorming" all over the province of Ontario—I believe he used to play baseball, so that I do not think he will object to the term. But let me tell him that it was the planners of the city of Toronto who gave those services to the constituency he represents; it was the Conservatives of Ontario, Whitney and Beck, at Queen's Park, and the city council of Toronto and officials, who brought in the legislation which supplied cheap light and power to the homes of the province, which provided the services they now enjoy, which initiated the workmen's compensation act and many other social and health and hospital advantages. And what did the city of Toronto do? It was the pioneer of health legislation in its grants to hospitals, in instituting dental and medical inspection of school children, the eight-hour day, the improvement of the waterfront, the buying out of the street railway, the radials, the linking up of the railways and the buses, the facilitating of transportation to enable market gardeners to reach the cities and aiding by transportation the housing situation. These are some achievements of the city and the city council of Toronto. I am proud that we have always had such a splendid city council. We have always been fortunate in having a council which has done a great deal for the people of that city. Shortly before I started as a controller and as a police commissioner, in 1909 the police had only one day a month off; then they got one day a week off; and then the eight-hour day, as did the firemen, and the platoon system was put into effect and soldiers given the preference in jobs. All the services I have mentioned are municipal and have been given to the taxpayer of Toronto without the aid of one cent from the federal government, showing that this social security came largely from the municipalities, not from federal authority.

Here let me mention that the province of Ontario and the city of Toronto were attacked the other day by the Rev. Doctor J. R. Mutchmor, social secretary of the United church. I have great respect for that church and for him, but I would point out that when Doctor Mutchmor, with Mr. Fogg, made a Cook's tour of Canada from Regina to Halifax, he seems to have been in a fog night, noon and morning. He criticizes the province of Ontario. He said last Saturday in the Toronto papers:

> The banner province of Ontario is in danger of being regarded as the spoiled child of confederation.

If he knew a little more about Toronto and Ontario, a little more about our social legislation and what has been done by the city and that province for the hospitals, the sick poor, and others, I do not believe he would have made these criticisms; and I resent them. Let me say that Ontario is the milch cow of confederation. I do not like to comment in this fashion because I have always contended for the principle of confederation, in line with the old Cornish battle-cry, "Each for all and all for each." With regard to my hon. friends below the gangway, of the five or six of them I see only the young hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) here now; he made a good speech the other day. They had a good deal to say about a certain pastor. Well, I have referred to-day to another pastor. I did not vote for church union, because I believed that, like union government, it would lead to more disunion than union. I object to remarks of Rev. Doctor Mutchmor, or Pastor Mutchmor, as reflecting on the province of Ontario, which is paying 42 per cent of the cash taxes of the dominion, and which is the forgotten province of confederation.

Doctor Mutchmor goes on to give figures about enlistments in the maritimes, compares them with Ontario, and in the name of social reform criticizes a province which has been the leader for many years past in progressive planning, hospital work, and social services of all kinds. I do not wish to say anything further about the reverend gentleman, who I understand is a very popular man in his church, except that, will all due respect, it seems to me that pastors such as the one to whom I have referred to-day should state facts and exhibit a little more wisdom, tolerance and restraint in their statements in war time in interviews given newspapers, like this interview with regard to the soldier province of Ontario, which has sent more men to the war than any other, and is now expected to provide one-half of the ten million dollars which is asked for in the Red Cross appeal. I might point out that the reverend gentleman's figures with regard to enlistments are misleading, because soldiers from Ontario are to be found all across Canada from Vancouver to Halifax; they went to all the military districts to answer the call, and I challenge his figures and remarks as to Ontario. I see here to-day my friend the head of the Canadian hospital association, the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann). The doctors and hospitals of Canada are having a very hard time. The Toronto General Hospital was built for to-morrow. I remember when the per diem grant was fifty cents. That would not be a drop in the bucket for this parliament to contribute towards hospital service and relief of the poor and suffering and for per diem patients. There should be a grant for free insulin for those in necessitous circumstances. Without it many people who are doing useful work would be in their graves. The same applies to tuberculosis. This government will have to do much more than it has done both for education and hospitals, because the first duty of a government is to look after the health, happiness and prosperity of its citizens.

In 1935 and succeeding years we were given blueprints by our friends to my left about the war. What did they say? Not a dollar for the army; disarmament on land and sea. Knowing what vision they showed at that time what faith can we have in their vision and blueprints now?

Cheap light and power; that is what the Conservatives gave Ontario in 1905 when Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck were in power; they brought cheap hydro power to the artisans and the kitchens and farms of Ontario.

Malnutrition; I remember when food was not inspected, when the milk supply of Toronto was not inspected. The city provided all these services without a cent of help from the dominion government, for all this social planning. So do other municipalities. Federal aid is needed for education and hospital work.

The last thing I want to mention is housing. The resolution does not mention that. When our soldiers come home there will be no housing for them. I have asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) about it on several occasions. An order for return was passed last June or July, but the return has not yet been brought down. An order for return was passed on February 22; I asked about it the other day—nothing done, and I can find no statement in the budget. Where are these soldiers to be housed? As my friend the hon. member for Parkdale or any good medical man, such as the late Doctor Hastings, will tell you, bad housing is one of the most prolific agencies for the spread of disease and ill health. Hon. members opposite cannot solve the housing problem in Ottawa, let alone all Canada. Many soldiers' families are living in cellars. The government has a big mansion on Crescent road, taken for the navy; a property in Queen's park was taken, also the old Flavelle property. In the British parliament housing was discussed on the debate on social security and insurance. It was the most popular topic of all these. Sir William Jowitt was the minister, and the main features of the debate was a policy in regard to housing for soldiers when they come home and for their dependents and the civilian population. But nothing yet is done in Canada except talk about it. Are these people to live out on the street? The government has taken over in Toronto for war purposes many large private houses and given them to the forces; big buildings on the waterfront in Toronto and in Ottawa and other cities. Where are the houses for civilians to come from?

The Minister of Finance told me yesterday if I would put what I want on the order paper I might get an answer from a rental commissioner I never heard of, but I have been here too long to be led astray by any such play as that. The government is spending five billion dollars, but I could point out items amounting to twenty-four per cent not for the war at all, and they have not a cent for houses. I looked all through the budget speech for it. The Toronto members were requested last Saturday to attend a meeting with the board of control of that city and the city council that has done so much for hospital and health services for the public. Starting at fifty cents a day the rate went to $1.75 a day for city patients, and yet they had the same operations for nothing as the wealthy man would pay in some cases up to $1,000 for. The hon. member for Parkdale was chief surgeon when I was on the board for seventeen years with Mr. P. C. Larkin and Sir Joseph Flavelle. But bad housing causes more disease than any other agency. Toronto has not been treated right by this parliament. There is no bigotry or intolerance in that city; its principle and that of its citizens is equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Our city has not had much federal aid for years. The province of Ontario which pays so much in taxes has not been dealt with generously or fairly here or by the interprovincial report. The Minster of Finance is not going to get away with the housing failure or his controls any longer; there is no use in telling me to put something on the order paper, and I will not do it any longer. Housing is forgotten in Canada. The families of some soldiers overseas have been evicted by the bailiff.

I have asked for a national system of insurance for the soldiers; I hope the committee will look into it. The first thing is to take care of the soldiers and their dependents for three years after the war and keep them from being evicted from their homes so they will not be worried. A national life insurance sytem for all soldiers should be set up, to include provision for their dependents for three years after the war. If we are to be left at the mercy of a real estate board and a rent board, no wonder there is no housing. There is no incentive to anyone to build a home with this farcical rent control. Houses are wanted, not talk. We were twenty-five thousand houses behind when the select committee on housing was appointed in 1935; we made our report, and the new government came in and spent nearly $80,000,000 on small houses, yet to-day not a cent of the five billions for war expenditures is for that work.

I have a large industry in my riding, Lever Brothers. I have never been in the plant. They have published a monthly pamphlet on the problem of unemployment in which they say:

> It has been easy and cheap and popular to get on the social security bandwagon. In some form or other social security apparently is here to stay as a perpetual political promise leading eventually to good or bad performance. But it has been discouraging in Canada to see how enthusiastically many members of parliament and other public men have leaped forward to embrace large plans of social security without apparently having an adequate idea or asking how they are to be paid for out of increased production, or what the cost in taxation will be.

Then there is a reference to the social reconstruction plan of the James committee and the civil service committee for providing employment in the post-war period. All that is not mentioned at all in the report. It goes on to say:

> . . . it studies and states the parts which governments and industry can play in the elimination of mass unemployment; and it bases those conclusions on a study of what causes unemployment and of what monetary and budgetary policies by governments would most contribute to the productive capacity of each nation being used continuously and increasing steadily without restrictions being imposed either from the side of manufacturers or of labour. That is indispensable to eliminating distressing totals of unemployment.

The government should consider what should be done regarding trade with the mother country and the empire. Britain cannot exist without export and import trade, which will create employment here in providing these goods. In the city from which I come sixty-five per cent of the working people own their own homes, but what incentive is there to any working man to own his own home to-day? We have had two wars and a long depression in a generation; all the small savings of these people have been eaten up, and now the government will call upon them to make even further sacrifices for 1943. There has been quite a reaction among the working classes, I believe, and I do not think they will wish to give generously to other schemes which are only half-baked, on reconstruction, and social planning, with their taxes already a burden.

We have had planning before, but the planning of the past remains as a warning to us now. It has been all based upon the principle of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and now the process has been completed because Peter has nothing left. I remember when Mr. Sydney Webb proposed that the coal mines in England be nationalized, and he even went so far as to publish a book entitled "How To Pay For the War." In that book he stated his confirmed opinion that coal could be delivered to the household cellar at a total cost of a shilling a hundredweight or a pound a ton. Out of this price, on paper, he satisfied all the demands of the miners and in addition provided money with which to pay for the war. Yet sensible people are still prepared to listen with patience to nonsense about planning. I am not objecting to all the planning in the world, as long as we do not forget the war until it is won; but when housing is left out of the planning and when the municipalities are not given consideration, any scheme is bound to fail. No doubt planning is necessary, but it should be reasonable and proper. I have every respect for the views of others, but I believe the time must come when we will have to consider whether the appointment of this committee is the best way to deal with this question. Would it not have been better to have a day's debate to chart our course and declare what is to be our policy particularly toward the British empire, which has been our best customer, and with regard to all those other matters which should be thought out first? In my view no amount of planning, and not even victory, can bring about the millenium, nor can any planning ever change the law of supply and demand. I believe there will be nations as long as the world lasts, and there will be trade barriers, and quotas and trade agreements, as resolutions like the one placed on the order paper the other day by the Minister of Finance show. The party in Ontario to which I belong has had a glorious past in labour and social legislation, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as long as I have known the Conservative party it has always taken a forward view with regard to the working classes in that province. It had no utopian ideas; it did not dwell in the clouds; it provided reforms in Ontario; it got down to brass tacks and did all the things I have mentioned. It encouraged and aided municipalities to go forward in a concerted plan of social work for the good of all the people of the country. It believes that any planning should be done for all the people, not just for some of the people.

I believe the government would do well to pay heed to the handwriting on the wall. We have been through two wars and a long depression, and if it had not been for the mother country we would not be planning to-day. Hitler after Dunkirk would be in the United States and in Canada, and we would have to make peace with the Axis powers.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow the arguments that have been advanced by the last speaker (Mr. Church). He referred to the city of Toronto as the forgotten city. The only comment I would make is that as long as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) occupies a seat in this house there is not very much chance of the city of Toronto being forgotten.

I refrained from taking part in the debate on reconstruction and reestablishment in connection with the resolution introduced by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), because I realized that anything I might have to say in that regard could very well be said in connection with the resolution now under discussion. The one is closely connected and interlocked with the other; and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) so ably presented the reasons for setting up this committee, the general scheme behind it, its functions and purposes, I felt that the one committee naturally would have to work very closely with the other. One is to deal with matters of reconstruction and reestablishment as they will arise at the termination of this war, while the other deals with the study of existing social insurance legislation of this parliament and the provincial legislatures; the social insurance measures of other countries; the most practical measures of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and what may be necessary in order to have them included in a national plan; the financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security, and other related matters.

As I listened to the Prime Minister speak of our industrial expansion I decided to take part in the debate, because I represent a constituency on the extreme eastern coast of Canada. I wondered what effect any measures which might result from the work of this committee would have on my section of Canada, and I think what applies to the eastern coast applies equally to the west.

I propose this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, to confine my remarks as closely as possible to the resolution moved by the Prime Minister. He dealt with many of the matters that must be studied by this committee if it is to achieve the desired result. He outlined certain social measures coming under federal jurisdiction, such as unemployment insurance, pensions for war veterans, pensions for war widows, war veterans' allowances, pensions for the blind, and old age pensions. All these, as the Prime Minister said, are matters coming directly under federal jurisdiction, though it is true old age pensions are administered by the various provinces. But in addition to these, measures of a provincial nature which I shall mention in a moment at some time or other must come under the direct jurisdiction of the federal government. We have provincial governments dealing with mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation benefits, including sickness and accident. These workmen's compensation benefits are enjoyed in all parts of Canada, but the benefits enjoyed by one province should be enjoyed by another to the same extent, and for that reason all measures of this nature must come under the jurisdiction of this government at the conclusion of the war.

The Prime Minister mentioned yesterday the great expansion which has taken place in Canada since the outbreak of war. When one reads of that development and realizes just what Canada has done in such a short period of time, starting out with practically no large industrial plants before the war, we begin to understand just what Canada's war effort means. When we note the large numbers of men employed in our war plants—20,000 in one, 30,000 in another, 50,000 in another, 120,000 in another—it makes us wonder where these men and women came from, and whether they are going to continue to live in the centres in which they are now located. In such event, what effect will that have on the districts from which they came? I would impress upon the committee the importance of this problem. I know that the committee is an able one, and I am sure it will consider carefully every question that comes before it.

The committee must consider, too, the great expansion which has taken place in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the effect it will have on the eastern and western sections of Canada. This accumulation of industrial interests, opportunities for employment and gathering together of wealth will be of much benefit to central Canada, but it will drain other portions of the country which as a result will be working under a distinct handicap. When considering this problem the committee must provide for some measure of relief for those who live outside the central part of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The decentralization of industry.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know whether I am altogether a believer in the decentralization of industry. I am inclined to think we can get mighty good supervision from one central point, but we should not centralize our activities to such an extent as to sap the best from other parts of our country.

While I must pay tribute to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) for the wonderful results he has achieved in the development of war-time industries, from an economic standpoint I would point out to him, as I do to other hon. members, that great care must be taken not to make our economic structure top-heavy, or to sap the eastern and western sections for the benefit of the central districts.

There have been great shifts of population to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and this presents another problem for the consideration of the committee. It will have to decide whether this shifted population will remain in central Canada or will have to be sent back to the farms or the industrial centres whence they came, and there be given gainful occupations. We know that many farmers left their farms for the advantages offered by industry in Ontario and Quebec, and that the large wages paid in war-time industries have brought about a shortage of farm help. In this connection I have in mind particularly the condition of fishermen, who have been unable to take advantage to the same extent as the farmer of the higher wages paid in industry. At a later point in my observations I shall have a suggestion with regard to the treatment of fishermen.

The resolution clearly outlines the objectives of the committee. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said there were no objectives, but I believe anyone reading the resolution cannot help feeling that there are definite aims covering a wide scope. I hope every angle and aspect of the subject matter of the resolution will be surveyed and every possible investigation made so that in the post-war period those who return from overseas after serving in the armed forces, as well as those who have remained in Canada, will be given employment which will obviate any condition such as that which prevailed following the last war.

Much has been said about the danger of inflation. We have taken definite steps to control inflation, but if we are to avoid another depression we must also make plans to prevent deflation. One is as dangerous as the other. If the committee does not consider measures for the control of deflation, as no doubt it will with respect to inflation, we shall again be faced with a period of depression. Worth-while measures have been taken not only to control prices but also to control wages, and the general set-up provided by the government will go a long way toward preventing inflation. It is for this reason that I urge the committee to consider measures to deal with deflation.

May I at this point offer some definite suggestions for the consideration of the committee? In my opinion it should obtain the advice of the very best authorities in connection with social service measures. We should have a survey of social measures in both the provincial and the federal field. Old age pensions should be reviewed, with the object of ascertaining whether the present scale of payments achieves the purpose intended, whether the age bracket is correct or should be lowered, and whether the amount now paid is sufficient to meet the present cost of living or should be increased so as to conform with the cost-of-living index. It might be considered wise to have payments regulated from time to time as the index increases or decreases.

There should be a complete check-up of our present employment situation, with a view to placing men and women in industries or trades for which they are best suited. The process in this respect would be the same as that in the armed forces, where an endeavour is made to select men for certain types of work.

Almost all hon. members who spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and in the debate on the resolution for the appointment of the committee on reconstruction, referred to the question of housing. I think we are all in accord with the suggestion which has been made by practically all members that Canada must undertake a housing scheme in the very near future. The question is, which is the best plan. We are not satisfied with the war-time housing scheme now in operation, nor are we entirely satisfied with the national housing scheme. It did not go far enough to meet the requirements of those earning small wages, nor do I think the present war-time housing scheme meets our needs in a full sense.

I realize that the war-time housing scheme is an emergency measure, but these houses should have been erected to provide a greater value in the post-war period when we will be demobilizing our forces. There is no reason why these houses could not be put to greater use than is planned at the present time. I was surprised to learn in the committee on rehabilitation that the estimated salvage value of these war-time houses is from $150 to $300. Surely when we invest from $2,200 to $2,500 in a house it should give a greater return than is proposed at the present time. I am sure that if the committee gives this matter serious attention we will derive greater benefit from these houses than is now anticipated. I shall not enlarge further on this, but I pass it along to the committee for their consideration and suggest that they go into the matter fully.

When the Hon. Charles Dunning was minister of finance I suggested before he introduced the scheme for national housing that a commission or board of some kind be set up to which wage earners could apply the same as they apply now for insurance. I realize that the weakness in such a plan is that at some time a large number of houses might be thrown back on the hands of the government, but with such a plan we would be building better citizens. Our people would have a stake in the community and we would have less trouble with individuals shifting from one section of the country to the other. There would not be so much moving about if these men owned their own houses. We should do everything possible to encourage the building of homes and thus create a larger group of home owners.

This committee should deal also in a broad way with health matters. There is a large representation of the medical profession on the committee, and no doubt this matter will be intelligently discussed. Ordinarily the urban districts are well supplied with medical men, while the rural districts are finding it exceedingly difficult to procure the medical attention the people require. It is not uncommon in the fishing districts—no doubt the same applies to the farming districts—for a man with an income of from $500 to $600 a year to be obliged to pay from $15 to $25 to have a doctor call in the case of illness. That is not good enough for a country like Canada. We should set up health measures that will provide more medical services for the rural districts.

Education should be considered nationally rather than be left entirely to the provinces. I realize that under the British North America Act education is a provincial matter, but the committee could study this question and make recommendations which would provide that the educational standards in all provinces shall be the same. It has also been suggested from more than one quarter that the committee should deal with the question of recreation. This would be closely connected with any health programme. We should also make greater use of our natural resources, but as this matter has been enlarged upon to some extent I shall not pursue it further.

The committee would be well advised to take up that almost forgotten document, the Sirois report, and consider the recommendations contained therein. This report seems to have been laid aside, because I have not heard it mentioned during the past year. I suggest that the committee also consider a report prepared by the late William F. O'Connor, law officer of the senate, dealing with the benefits of the British North America Act and their relationship to the different provinces. There is a great deal of valuable information in that report.

The question of trade relations was mentioned the other day. While Canada because of its size may not be able to claim a very important place in international trade, it would be within the jurisdiction of this committee to investigate the possibilities of international trade. A number of new industries have been organized in Ontario and Quebec and we should endeavour to procure more trade with other countries.

Like the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) I shall deal briefly with this matter from a local standpoint. I come from Nova Scotia—specifically from the great eastern port of Halifax—and I remember, as no doubt you do, sir, the important part played by Halifax in the last great war. I realize, as you do, the important part that Halifax is playing at the present time in the assembling of ships to carry supplies overseas. I wonder if immediately following this war Halifax is again to become the forgotten port on the Atlantic coast. If trade relations are entered into with other countries and we make use of the vast industrial expansion which has taken place in Ontario and Quebec, I hope that the committee will be able to suggest definite measures to the government whereby our Canadian ports on the east and west coasts will be utilized to the full, instead of allowing large shipments which could go through our Atlantic ports to continue to go through the ports of the United States. I do not propose to labour that because I know the importance of maintaining the friendly relations which now exist between our two countries; nevertheless for our own protection we must deal with this matter in such a way that we shall enjoy the opportunities to which we are entitled.

I have already mentioned the fishing industry. The western farmer is well looked after. By that I mean that the farmers are represented by great and powerful organizations able to present a strong case for the farmers, and nearly always the result has been that the farmers have received assistance. But the fishermen are not so well organized, and it is my hope that the committee will recommend measures of assistance to our fishermen. I believe the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand, Laurier) is in sympathy with that idea and will welcome any recommendations from the committee that will be helpful to him in strengthening this great natural industry which we have on our east and west coasts. I suggest to the minister and the committee that assistance be given to the fishermen in purchasing equipment, and by instructing them in the catching, curing and marketing of fish. These are definite proposals, and I hope the committee and the minister will take them into consideration with a view to assisting our fishermen on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

I had intended to speak on the control of our finances, but I may have an opportunity in the budget debate to express my views upon the financial position of the country and the financial measures which are proposed. I consider that this is a part of the committee's work. The committee should look into our finances with a view to providing aid not alone for large industrial concerns but for the smaller farmer and the smaller fisherman so that as a country we may enjoy the increased wealth that comes from the labours of these two groups.

In conclusion, I would leave with the committee this thought of the poet Longfellow, and if they do their work in this spirit they may deserve the reward the poet speaks of:

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And, departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), may I be permitted to congratulate the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Isnor) on the fine contribution he has made to the subject before this house.

I listened yesterday to the speech of the Prime Minister, with a large portion of which I entirely agree. Generally speaking, so far as the aims and ideals of this committee are concerned, I think all of us, regardless of party considerations, believe that the time has come to prepare for the post-war period, without neglecting the problem that is immediately before us, namely, that of assuring victory for the united nations. All over the world, and particularly among the united nations, men and women to-day are more socially conscious than they have ever been before at any time within the present generation. They believe that the responsibility rests upon the parliaments of the united nations to assure that conditions such as prevailed after the last war shall not exist after this war. I think this whole situation, so far as the problem itself is concerned, was set out in an address given by the Prime Minister on October 9 last. After speaking of the new order he went on to say:

> The new order must be based on human rights; not on the rights of property, privilege, or position.

Then he says this:

> It is necessary that social security and human welfare should be expressed in definite terms. It is, however, not my purpose to attempt to give a blueprint of the new order. Of the kind of objectives I have in mind, I would merely mention the following as a national minimum: useful employment for all who are willing to work; standard of nutrition and housing, adequate to ensure the health of the whole population; social insurance against privation resulting from unemployment, from accident, from the death of the bread-winner, from ill health, and from old age.

Those are noble sentiments and that was a very eloquent speech; but what is being done to ensure the implementation of the promise then given? There should be no necessity to-day to apologize for dealing with a subject such as this during war time. In the parliament of the United Kingdom the representatives of the people spent several days in discussing the report of Sir William Beveridge, and in giving their attention to social security they were but carrying out the principles enunciated in a letter, to which I shall only make reference to-day, which appeared in the London Times in December, 1940, signed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, by Cardinal Hinsley and by the Moderator of the Free Churches, which set forth the attitude of the Christian church to the new world. All over the world men and women say that conditions such as existed after the last war shall not be permitted to exist after this war. The Atlantic charter epitomizes that. It advocates national and international freedom from fear and want through security measures everywhere in the world.

I would point this out, that too often there are some members of political parties who would have the people believe that they have a monopoly of the desire to serve the people of Canada as a whole. The principles enunciated in Sir William Beveridge's report can be carried into effect only under a system of free initiative where men and women still enjoy freedom to engage in enterprise. That is something that must not be lost sight of. The aim of the report is to assure security. By security it means that every able-bodied man shall have the security of a job; that those who through infirmity or invalidity cannot work shall have security without work; that there shall be security for men while they are in employment and when they are unemployed; that there shall be the security of medical and hospital assistance; security of the family against the invalidity or death of the bread winner, and above all security for the men who serve the nation in the armed forces—security both for them and for their dependents. All these things can be secured under the system which has built up this country—the system of free initiative—and if they cannot be secured under this system there is something radically wrong with our thinking and our teaching.

I am not one of those who believe that when the war is over, there will be immediate and widespread unemployment. I believe that through the instrumentality of a system of public works and great power projects men will be employed, that through the transition period from war to peace, if the government will utilize the instruments which it has at hand, namely, the many scores of factories which have received assistance from the government, employment can be secured for many of our men in the necessary production of consumer goods, the need of which will be greater than ever before. Agriculture, too, should enjoy a period of prosperity when hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat become necessary to be distributed in all parts of the world, in order to restore order and to relieve people from famine. That phase of the post-war will be dealt with by the reconstruction committee.

The Sir William Beveridge plan sets out that it is necessary to insure people from the five evils of want, disease, ignorance, squalor and idleness. Security for all is a great principle, a great ideal, but unless something more is done than the setting up of a committee to investigate, with no assurance as to what is going to be done after the investigation, or when it is going to be done, it is not sufficient.

As I listened to the address of the Prime Minister the other day and to the speech which he delivered in October last, I looked back a period of years to 1919, when, at a convention of the Liberal party, certain principles were enunciated, the very same principles which are being enunciated to-day for the after-war period of this war; and I naturally asked myself this question, why have they not been implemented during the intervening period of years? I wish to refer to a few of them. They represent "the terms of the labour convention and the general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace," and are as follows:

1. The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

2. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

3. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

The matter of minimum wages is one of provincial legislation.

4. The adoption of an 8-hour day or a 48-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

That was implemented in 1935 by the Bennett administration, and subsequently the legislation was set aside by the courts.

5. The adoption of a weekly rest of at least 24 hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

This, again, was implemented by the Bennett government, and also set aside by the courts.

The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

In all the years, what has been done to ensure the implementation of that great principle?

The standard set by the law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Another great principle.

That in so far as may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, (widows' pensions) and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

That was over twenty-three years ago, and as we look at the Liberal party promises of 1919 and note the similarity to the promises of to-day, I ask this: Why should it be necessary, after the length of time that the Prime Minister has been in power, to submit the matter of social security to a committee of parliament:

. . . to examine and report on . . . the most practicable measures of social insurance . . . and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan . . .

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Why the necessity after all these years?

Now, something more. What is the committee going to do? The committee is—

To examine and study the existing social insurance legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures; social insurance policies of other countries; the most practicable measures of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan; the constitutional and financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security. . . .

Well, now, everybody knows what it is necessary to do in order to secure the necessary jurisdiction to enact health insurance. Either there must be amendment of the British North America Act in order to permit health insurance to be placed upon the statute books by this parliament, or there must be consultations with the various provinces in order to secure their consent to the carrying into effect of a federal social insurance scheme. Surely this committee is not going to be asked to shadow-box with the problem, to go through the motions of leading the people of Canada to believe that there will in fact be something done; for the Prime Minister, possibly not intentionally, has failed to state what will be done when the committee reports, whether anything will be done, and when anything will be done.

In connection with unemployment insurance, for a period of about sixteen years the general attitude taken by the government was that such legislation could not be introduced because of provincial rights under the British North America Act. In 1935 legislation setting up an unemployment insurance act—and also, I point out, a health insurance act, sections 39 to 41 of the Employment and Social Insurance Act—was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and by way of appeal to the privy council by the government of the day which for many years had stated that they believed in the principle, and was declared to be beyond the powers of the parliament of Canada.

In 1940 the matter again came up, and I remember very well the then Minister of Justice pointing out the difficulties in connection with the situation. He introduced a resolution of parliament asking the imperial parliament to amend the British North America Act by adding to section 91 the power to put into effect "unemployment insurance". And the minister pointed out that otherwise all the provinces would have to be consulted or be persuaded to submit to its being administered by a body which was not responsible to them.

When the Prime Minister speaks again in this debate I think we as members of this committee that is to be set up, and, if not we, this parliament, and certainly the people of Canada, have a right to know whether the provinces have been consulted, which provinces have been consulted, and what have been their answers. Are they willing to give up their powers under the British North America Act respecting health insurance?

When the Prime Minister was speaking yesterday he referred to this, and this is what he said, as reported at page 937 of Hansard:

> Questions of jurisdiction will arise, questions between the provinces and the dominion as to whether in a national scheme the dominion should attempt to carry out all social security measures, or whether those measures in part should be under the jurisdiction of the dominion and in part under that of the several provinces.

Why have we not been told whether the provinces have been consulted? Surely the committee will not be required to communicate with the various provincial governments of Canada and ascertain from them what they are prepared to do. If we are to wait until the provincial governments would answer the committee as to whether or not they are going to release their powers I think the committee would wait quite a long time.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> So far as administration is concerned there are some measures which, at least for a time, the provinces will I believe wish to retain.

What are the measures the provinces wish to retain? Is it the matter of health insurance? Is it the matter of other insurance to which reference has been made? What provinces have indicated their willingness to cooperate? These are questions I ask the Prime Minister to answer. Then he says:

> There may be others they will be prepared to hand over to the federal government.

That is too indefinite. A committee is to be set up by this parliament to look into the question of assuring the men and women of this dominion that after this war there will be security against invalidity and against unemployment or while unemployed—we already have that—and security against disease as far as that is practicable. Yet we have no assurance that when we get through with our work all the provinces will agree to this parliament passing the necessary legislation, or that any of the provinces will give up their jurisdictional rights as far as health insurance is concerned. All those things should have been done earlier. The Prime Minister and the government should give the people of Canada the assurance now that when this committee works, as I know from the personnel it will, and arrives at final conclusions, its recommendations will be brought into effect; that this parliament has the power to bring them into effect; that the provinces have agreed thereto, or that the necessary amendment of the British North America Act will be applied for to enable parliament to pass a health insurance act.

In 1940 the government knew that health insurance and many of these things that were advocated in 1919 could not be carried into effect without an amendment of the constitution. Then why was it, with the realization how necessary health insurance was, that when the imperial government was approached in 1940 the application for amendment of the British North America Act was restricted to just one thing, namely, unemployment insurance? I think in large measure what accounts for the fact that our social legislation is behind that of most of the other democratic nations of the world is that there has been divided responsibility, divided jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial governments. It has held Canada back from being able to take the position that Great Britain has in social legislation. She has had workmen's compensation since 1897, old age pensions since 1908, and by way of contribution some years later, unemployment insurance since 1912 and compulsory health insurance since 1912. Canada has been hedged in by constitutional difficulties in the enactment of social legislation. Surely the committee will not be doing anything effective if all that it does is to consider what social legislation has been passed in other countries, without the assurance that something will be done to carry its recommendations into effect.

It is a singular fact, as was pointed out yesterday in the very careful summary in respect of social legislation given by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that we had to wait until after the Winnipeg convention before social legislation was made so large a part of the programme of this government. That may account for the fact that, the convention being over only six or seven weeks ago, sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the government to communicate with the various provincial governments on these matters. I believe that the time has come, if we wish to build up in Canada equality in social legislation, that the provinces must give up some of their rights to the central authority. We have one law in regard to minimum wages in one province, and a different law in another; we have different provisions for mothers' allowances, maternity grants and so on in the different provinces. Great strides have been made by the provinces, but there is no uniformity in social legislation. The result is that in one province the deathrate in childbirth is very much greater than in other provinces, and in saying that I have no particular province in mind. The fact is that there are not uniform social services; and if we are in earnest about doing something for the men who will return after the war; if we are to have the social consciousness of the ordinary man on the street carried into legislative effect, then I believe the time has come when the field of social legislation should be taken over by the dominion government. I believe there would be very little difficulty if representations were made to the provincial governments. In his speech the Prime Minister indicated that there might be some difficulty, but he also indicated that in regard to many matters he believed the provinces would be prepared to permit the federal government to put such legislation into effect.

We in his majesty's opposition have certain definite ideas in reference to this problem. We believe that the state's share of the cost of all social security measures should be borne by the dominion, and the time has come when this should be put into effect. In the next place we believe that it is the obligation of the government to make available to every citizen adequate medical, dental, nursing, hospital and prenatal care, with further advanced public health and nutritional principles so that health may be safeguarded and preserved; that the time has come to put into effect legislation to assure adequate payment for the maintenance of unemployables; retirement insurance, and the payment of increased old age pensions at an earlier age than seventy years. I am going to pause there for a moment, Mr. Speaker, and suggest that there could be no better way to assure the morale of Canada as a whole than for the government immediately to bring into effect cost-of-living allowances for old age pensioners. Let us forget the difficulties of financing as far as old age pensions are concerned, as between the federal government and the provinces. Old age pensions for the period of the war should be immediately increased to a point much higher than the present destitution level. If that could be done it would meet with approval all over Canada; it would not require the approval of the provinces if the dominion government were prepared to pay the extra cost, and by paying that extra amount we would bring new hope to those people, many of whom to-day, by reason of the small allowance, are living under circumstances very little better than destitution.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Finally, if ever there was a problem to challenge the imagination it is the after-war problem, the problem of the new world of which the Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt have spoken so often. Just in that connection I thought it was particularly appropriate that the messages read earlier to-day should have been sent to the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States. It was appropriate on account of the fact that they have dominated the world situation; they have given hope to the democracies; they have built up a determination in their nations that know no word but victory. Both have been leaders in social reform, and to-day the social security legislation of Great Britain is far ahead of ours, while across the line in the United States President Roosevelt in the last ten years has brought in social legislation designed to improve the lot of the common man to a degree never before equalled on the continent of North America. We believe this matter of social security is so important that the government should now appoint a minister of social security and reconstruction, to be charged with the administration of social security measures. That is what we advocate in our platform. We believe that with the load of responsibility at present being carried by the Prime Minister and the other members of the cabinet, with the division of responsibility among departments as far as social legislation is concerned, this problem, which now looms larger than ever before, is worthy of a minister to head a department which will administer social security laws for the uniform benefit of all parts of Canada.

I come back once more to the resolution setting up the committee. If read cursorily, this resolution gives promise that something will be done; but if read carefully, it says only that a select committee will be set up; that the committee will investigate; that it will study systems in Canada and elsewhere. There is no suggestion in the resolution that any action will be taken. That may be perfectly proper, but what is significant is that when the Prime Minister, whose interest in social legislation has always been very keen, delivered his speech yesterday he left no hope with those who heard him that the recommendations of the committee would be carried into effect in whole or in part. I think the people of Canada have a right to be assured now by the Prime Minister that jurisdictional difficulties with the provinces will be removed. Let him frankly inform the house of the attitude taken by each of the provinces if they have been consulted, and, finally, whether or not it is the intention of the government to bring in a resolution to amend the British North America Act. The setting up of the committee will build up fond hopes; and if no action is taken on its recommendations there will be a feeling of resentment among the people if, when all the nations are building for the new world, this parliament intends only to set up a committee but does not intend to carry its recommendations into legislation.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, last year I was a member of two very important committees, one the committee on reconstruction and the other set up to investigate canteen funds. To a certain extent the work of those two committees clashed. Feeling I could not do justice to both I made an agreement with my colleague, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) that he should take one committee and I the other. He devoted his time entirely to the work of the reconstruction committee, and I went on with the work of the canteen funds committee. That accounts for the fact that I was unable to give as much time to the committee on reconstruction as I should have liked.

My remarks this afternoon perhaps should have been given on the resolution sponsored by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I intended to speak on that resolution, but on account of the lateness of the hour, and the desire of the minister to close the discussion I considered it would be unfair to hold up the formation of the committee any longer, because had I spoken it would have meant carrying the debate into another day. Therefore I waved my right on that occasion, with the result that the remarks I intended to make then I shall make now.

Speaking in the debate to set up the committee on reconstruction, the hon. member for Acadia placed his finger on the cancer which has been eating at the heart of the economic life of Canada.

I have been prompted to enter this debate by reason of a trend of thought I felt I sensed throughout a number of the speeches on the resolution to set up the committee on reconstruction, and in some of the speeches on the resolution at present under discussion. Under the guise of social security measures there seems to be a tendency to centralize power in a central authority, thereby taking away some of the rights and privileges of lesser governments. Not only is that taking place in single nations, but there is the trend to tie all nations of the world together, place them under one central authority, the enforcement of law in that central body being placed in the hands of an international police force.

The type of individual who desires such conditions is to my mind a dangerous one. We are setting up bureaucracies which I believe will be very difficult to do away with at the close of the war. It would be interesting to know the source from which this trend of thought emanates. I believe the idea of the world planner or bureaucrat originated in an institution in Great Britain known as the London school of economics. This institution was set up a number of years ago by an influential and rich man named Sir Ernest Cassel. He endowed it with an immense amount of money, and its avowed purpose, in his own words was—and still is—that of training bureaucrats for future socialist states.

One of the research committees operating under this school of economics issues a publication known as "PEP," the three letters standing for the three words Political and Economic Planning. Early in the war there appeared in this publication an article from which I should like to quote one sentence, because I believe it reveals the tactics being followed at the present time:

> Only in war or under the threat of war will a British government embark on large-scale planning.

I suggest to the house that this is a most subtle utterance. Herein I believe lies the reason for the undue haste, shall I say, of trying to saddle upon the shoulders of the Canadian people, who at this time are most anxious about the prosecution of the war, schemes and plans which could not possibly be saddled upon them in peace time.

Let me first of all deal with world planning. There are those who believe that success can be achieved to-day only by tying all the nations together under a central authority. They believe that international trade is a solution of the problem. They believe that the amalgamation rather than the cooperation of countries is one of the factors tending toward a new day. I believe those good people are misguided. They seem to hold that what is national is inherently bad, but what is international is positively good. They wish to establish once again institutions which have been more or less discredited in the past. I refer to the institutions of the Bank of International Settlements, and the League of Nations. The Bank of International Settlements is a pro-axis organization. The chief shareholder in that bank is Germany, and the majority of the shares are controlled by axis countries. If anyone cares to have proof of that he has only to read the British Hansard of the last few months of 1942. It will be found that that institution was the subject of many questions as well as discussion.

Then we have the League of Nations, that brain-child of a United States college professor which was dumped on the doorstep of Great Britain and her allies at the close of the last war and then was disowned by its creator. Both of those institutions were, and still are free from national bias. Their policy is to get every nation into debt with equal impartiality. One in particular is working secretly and guards its workings most jealously from prying minds. The League of Nations was the international instrument by which reconstruction loans at usurious rates of interest were fastened upon many of the small nations of Europe. One example is the League of Nations loan to Austria. This allowed for a premium on redemption and yielded a rate of approximately eight and a half per cent per annum although it was soundly secured and internationally guaranteed. The second instance is the League of Nations loan to Hungary which carried a rate of nearly 9½ per cent per annum. The objective of the loans was to keep those countries under an orthodox economy, to keep them permanently enslaved under a debt system. Similar loans were made to Greece and Bulgaria.

For a few moments I should like to turn my attention nearer home. As I have said, these world planners are endeavouring to take powers away from the local governments and centralize them in one central authority. They work on the premise that nine wrongs make a right. They believe that if one man the worse of liquor is not able to reach his home safely, then nine men the worse of liquor will be able to get home all right provided they are tied together. They believe that if you take the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the others, all of which are loaded heavily with debt, and bring them under the control of a central government in Ottawa, all their worries will be at an end and their debt problems will be solved. These planners forget that the central government in Ottawa has balanced its budget only fifteen times in seventy-five years. Debt has been piled up in sixty years out of the seventy-five to the stage where it now threatens to engulf us.

I am not convinced, therefore, that the way to solve any problem is to make it larger. There are certain definite limits beyond which one's faith cannot go.

What is the strategy of these bureaucrats? First of all, this government set up the Sirois commission which brought in a report that, had it been adopted, would have centralized all authority in Ottawa. Fortunately for the people of Canada that report was rejected, not by the people themselves, it is true, but by their elected representatives. It is "only in times of war or under threat of war that the Canadian government will embark upon large-scale planning."

The first step taken in Canada during the war was to saddle the Canadian people with an unemployment insurance scheme. This scheme was pronounced economically sound by one expert actuary, but it was declared to be economically unsound by another. The bill was passed in 1941, a war year. I contend that that bill would never have been put upon the statute books during years of peace. Unemployment insurance flourishes in times of war and in years of prosperity, but it bogs down in times of peace and in years of depression. That has been the experience in Great Britain, and that is why a commission was appointed to find out what could be done to tie together all the various schemes in order to make them work. That was the first step in this programme of centralization.

We come now to the next step. We are asked to adopt a national health scheme. In the last speech I made in this house on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I prophesied that a plan of social security had already been formulated and that it would be brought out and presented for approval at the proper time. I was not surprised, therefore, to read in the Financial Post of February 27, 1943, right on the front page, under the heading "Social security report ready" the following:

> Canada's first attempt at a pre-Beveridge report—the study on social security for Canada in terms of post-war planning—is now in the Prime Minister's hands, the Financial Post is informed.
> The report covers some 150 pages and will presumably be available to the newly-formed parliamentary committee on social security and the parliamentary committee on reconstruction.
>
> Prepared in less than two months, it has been turned out under the direction of the James committee on post-war reconstruction.
> The report is intended as an educational document showing the background and present position of social security legislation and planning in Canada, and to indicate what would be required in respect of a comprehensive social security programme for Canada.

What is the use of setting up a committee if the plans are already cut-and-dried? All that we shall be asked to do is to give our approval to them and then they will be turned over to the publicity boys to sell them to the general public. This government, prodded by bureaucracy, appears to be determined to preserve the old order even though it means centralization and regimentation.

I should like now to direct the attention of members of the house and of members of the two committees which have been set up, to a resolution standing on the order paper in my name, and which I am sponsoring on behalf of the Social Credit group with which I have the honour to be associated. The resolution reads:

Whereas the men of our fighting forces are very properly looking to the people at home to see that when they return it will be to a country worthy of their magnificent courage, their unstinting sacrifices and the ideals for which they are fighting;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the minimum measures for the rehabilitation of the men of our fighting forces and their dependents shall be:

1. (a) On demobilization, persons who have served in the Canadian armed forces or merchant marine shall, while domiciled in Canada, receive a monthly income equivalent to not less than the full pay and all allowances including subsistence, for a private in the army, for a period of not less than three years, to enable the individual to become established in the economic life of the country, (b) thereafter they shall receive a monthly income (irrespective of any earned income) sufficient to ensure adequate basic economic security for the family against loss of income through any cause whatever.

2. Dependents of persons who have been killed in action and of persons who have died while serving in the armed forces and merchant marine shall be provided with a pension equivalent to not less than the full benefits under clause 1 (a) during the life time of the mother or widow and, in the case of children until they become 18 years of age, when they shall be eligible for a special allowance to complete their education.

I commend this resolution to the earnest consideration of the members of the house and the members of the two committees. The resolution proposes to give the men and women of our fighting forces and their dependents individual security with freedom. If you give the people of this country financial independence, that will make these schemes we hear so much about entirely unnecessary. The individuals then will be free to choose their own doctors and nurses and hospitals. The old bogey, of course, of where will all the money come from to do these things cannot be trotted out any more because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) himself has said that what is physically possible can be made financially possible. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) used similar words. It requires only the willingness of the government to put this plan into effect.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not like the move of the government toward state bureaucracy. I realize that some of it is necessary in war time, but not in such large doses as are being fed to us to-day. That is not Liberalism, at least not the Liberalism that I have always known in past years.

Reforms must come. Suffering, destitution, sickness and all other evils that afflict mankind must go. We are all agreed on that. But to institute unemployment insurance and a national health scheme are simply palliatives and will not cure the disease which afflicts us. All reforms must wait on monetary reform. The greatest monopoly of all is the money monopoly, and until that problem is tackled and solved there is no hope for the people from any of these palliatives. No new Canada can be built upon a rotten foundation, and I am not yet convinced that this government desires to clear away any of the rottenness. I think these palliatives and these plans can well wait and I suggest that they wait until the Beurlings and the Merritts return to help us make blueprints of a better Canada. Let us not fool ourselves. The same old gang who lost the last peace and who admitted, as Sir William Beveridge has done, that want could have been abolished are bestirring themselves and want to write a charter of a better Canada. But the youths who ride the sky lanes over Germany, Italy, Burma and north Africa, the youths who are standing to in Great Britain awaiting the "go" sign to march to Berlin, the youths who daily brave the biting gales of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—they are the men who, in my opinion, should write the blueprint of a new Canada. But if these youths allow the politicians of to-day and yesteryear to plan for them, they are bigger fools than I take them to be. I do not think it is likely that these young men who have donned battle-dress to win the war will meekly agree to don overalls to lose the peace.

One Englishman writing under the pen name of "Excalibur," penned a short poem which describes more pungently the situation than I could possibly describe it, and I think provides a complete answer to all world planners. The poem is as follows:

Youth Replies to Planners

We should be touched by your consideration
Of problems that affect our generation
But frankly we are not. It may disgust you
To learn it but we simply do not trust you.
We fear the gifts with which you would present us,
They hide a cunning scheme to regiment us,
Curl up, old busybodies, on your shelves
And go to sleep and—leave us to ourselves.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who is the author?

Mr. MARSHALL: "Excalibur." He writes under a pen-name. I do not know him; I should very much like to, but I have never been able to find out who he is.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where does he write? In what paper?

Mr. MARSHALL: I could not tell the hon. member.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is writing about the Liberal cabinet!

Mr. MARSHALL: Youth fights to win this war; the world planners fight to lose the peace. I prefer to leave the planners, the politicians, and above all the peace, to Canadian youth.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall) who spoke just before the dinner recess will not expect me to follow him, because after all there is a place where international affairs can be discussed more appropriately than on this resolution. When the proper time comes no doubt we shall be able to discuss the points he raised this afternoon.

I am glad to note that the government is recommending to this house the appointment of a committee to study social security measures. But that is not enough. The government will be judged not by the problem it presents to a committee but by what it does now to impress upon the country the assurance that it is in earnest in bringing about some improvement in our social and economic conditions. I should have preferred very much had this resolution been preceded by some mention in the speech from the throne of some provision to be in the budget for an improvement in the condition of the old age pensioners, the blind, the dependents of our soldiers and the men who are being discharged now from the armed forces in the present war.

This afternoon the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) delved into history and referred to the Liberal programme of 1919. I have been doing the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Doubtless.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have done it before, and I have no doubt, if the government continues the pace in regard to social legislation that it has adopted in the last twenty-three years, someone will be doing it twenty-three years hence, and with no better result than I have been able to find. It was a wonderfully attractive programme at the time. The first resolution adopted read:

> Whereas the great war and the greater epidemic have taken an appalling toll of Canadian life; and
> Whereas human life and physical efficiency are the nation's greatest assets; and
>
> Whereas conservation and improvement thereof should be the country's first care;
>
> Therefore this gathering of Liberals in convention assembled pledges itself to a vigorous prosecution of the measures best calculated to conserve the life and improve the physical standard of our Canadian citizenship.

That was adopted on August 5, 1919.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was only a chart.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; that I believe was the last national convention of the Liberal party in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: We have always had our leader.

Mr. COLDWELL: If we progress no more rapidly than we have in the last twenty-three years we shall be a long time indeed before we achieve any real measures of social security.

A little further on is a resolution saying:

> That the introduction into the government of industry or principles of representation whereby labour and the community, as well as capital, may be represented in industrial control and their interests safeguarded and promoted in the shaping of industrial policies.

I am not going to comment on that, for every hon. member knows how well or how badly that particular paragraph has been put into effect. Then we go on:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

Here we are to-day in 1943 with the jurisdictional difficulty still facing us, in spite of the fact that we had the Rowell-Sirois commission sitting prior to the war and bringing these problems before us in a very striking manner in 1940.

Another paragraph read:

> That the system of retraining the soldiers unfitted for their past work because of physical injuries be extended to disabled workers in industry.

I venture to say that the soldiers are not adequately provided for and that workers in industry have never received any real benefit under this particular resolution.

I am not going to discuss the other clauses in that section.

Let me read the paragraph regarding insurance:

That provision should be made whereby any increased cost of insurance in favour of the dependents of the soldier should be borne by the state where such increase arises from disability incurred during the war.

And then:

That such pensions or allowances be granted as shall enable soldiers or their dependents as the case may be to maintain a liberal standard of living sufficient to guarantee health, education and all the necessities, comforts and amenities which go to make up a standard of living worthy of Canadian citizenship.

That policy was adopted a year after the close of the last war. To-day we are engaged in another great war, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the men who to-day are being discharged are receiving an amount sufficient to provide them with a reasonable standard of health, education and the amenities which go with the standard of living which we enjoy normally in the country in which we live. The answer must be in the negative. Therefore I say that when the people of Canada look at the resolution to set up this committee they will not take the resolution as seriously as some would wish them to do because they know the past record of the government which is recommending it to this house at the present time.

May I say to my hon. friends to my right that when we look into their record in the years between 1930 and 1935 we can find no indication whatsoever that they would do any better, in spite of their new programme, if they were occupying the government benches instead of those of the official opposition. I remember perfectly well those dreadful years 1930 to 1935. I remember being on delegations meeting the government of the province in which I live and the premier telling us that we could not get programmes of public works because the dominion government, then the Conservative party, believed it was cheaper to keep people on the low level of relief at which they were kept than to enter upon a public works programme, which would involve expenditures for material as well as for wages. Nor can I forget, as few hon. members will forget, seeing the hundreds of young men moving across this country seeking work, some of them arriving in my own city one June afternoon, as decent a bunch of boys as one would find anywhere in Canada. They may have had some leaders who were not of the best type, but on the whole they were well behaved, and during their stay in our city of Regina there was raised for them the largest amount of money that was ever raised on a single tag day in that city. In the end there was a riot, during which blood was spilled. Therefore, I say that actions speak louder than words, and we need from the government, from the opposition and from all parties in this house more in the way of action and less in the way of words.

As far as we in this group are concerned, we have tried to promote throughout the country a consciousness of the need for social service measures. I do not think any hon. member sitting anywhere in this house will gainsay the fact that ever since we came into existence as a party in 1933 we have endeavoured to keep before the Canadian public the need for social security legislation. I have in my hand a copy of the manifesto that was adopted at Regina in 1933 when the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was first placed upon a strong foundation, and I will put it on the record. At that time, as at the present time, we had this plank in the platform: publicly organized health, hospital and medical services. We went on to say:

With the advance of medical science the maintenance of a healthy population has become a function for which every civilized community should undertake responsibility. Health services should be made at least as freely available as are educational services to-day. But under a system which is still mainly one of private enterprise the costs of proper medical care, such as the wealthier members of society can easily afford, are at present prohibitive for great masses of the people. A properly organized system of public health services including medical and dental care, which would stress the prevention rather than the cure of illness, should be extended to all our people in both rural and urban areas. This is an enterprise in which dominion, provincial and municipal authorities, as well as the medical and dental professions, can cooperate.

When we look back over the last few years in our own country, the record in connection with disease and death is certainly appalling. I do not intend to give a long list of figures; I simply state that according to official records in 1941 tuberculosis took more than six thousand lives in this country. In Ontario the incidence was 29·2 per hundred thousand of population; in Quebec it was 80·8 per hundred thousand. In 1940 infant mortality per thousand of living births was 29 in Vancouver and 113 in Quebec city; and even 29 was too high. Some 3,964 mothers died in childbirth in 1939. The Verdun district of Montreal had four times the number of deaths of mothers in childbirth as the city of Regina, and even at that Regina does not stand at the top of the list of the cities of western Canada. I recall that the former Minister of National War Services, Hon. Mr. Thorson, in 1941, said that up to October 2 of that year, 44 per cent of the 217,588 volunteers examined had been rejected from class A as being unfit, class A of course being the top class. Since the outbreak of war I am informed that more than 60,000 men have been discharged or have deserted from the armed forces, which I submit is an appalling indictment of conditions in our country.

Conditions are not growing better. Last year I had occasion to refer to the shocking conditions that existed in Halifax, and I should like to draw attention to the fact that conditions in that city have grown worse during the past year. Recently the Rockefeller foundation sent two of its physicians, Doctor D. Bruce Wilson and Doctor W. A. McIntosh, to make a survey of conditions in Halifax, at the request of the provincial minister of health, Doctor F. R. Davis. What does their report show? The deathrate in Halifax has risen from 14·5 in 1937 to 17·2 in 1941, and is almost 45 per cent higher than anywhere else in Nova Scotia. Yet in order that they may do their duty and defend our country in this time of war we are sending literally thousands of our young men and some young women to Halifax, or through Halifax to other points. It seems to me that the condition of this great Canadian city affects not only the citizens of Halifax and the people of Nova Scotia, but the people of this country as a whole. Conditions in that city ought to be a dominion responsibility. Tuberculosis, one of that city's major health problems, is not even reported as it occurs, though these doctors state that an early report by medical men would cut down the incidence of that disease very considerably. Another appalling fact is that two and a half times as many new cases of syphilis were reported in 1941 as in 1939, and the extent of the social diseases problem is unknown because provision for treatment and control is entirely inadequate. In their report these medical men state that some of the doctors in Halifax are not even reporting these cases and that the committee which was established in that city to look after this particular social disease has not been meeting. They go on to tell us of the disgraceful manner in which the food of that city is handled. They tell us of the filth around the market place, the filthy lavatory accommodation and the wretched and entirely inadequate milk supply. Yet, as I say, we are sending thousands of our young men and women through that city. I am not going to quote further from that exceedingly gloomy report, but to my mind it is a disgrace not only to the city of Halifax, not only to the province of Nova Scotia, but to the entire Dominion of Canada.

I raised this question last year after I had seen the terrible slum conditions in Halifax, but apparently very little has been done to meet the situation there. The report of these two medical men states that the slum population of Halifax is out of all proportion to the size of the city itself. I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has obtained or is about to obtain a copy of the report to which I have referred, and no doubt he will give it his attention; at least I hope he will do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I may inform my hon. friend that we passed an order in council yesterday providing a substantial contribution toward the betterment of health conditions in Halifax.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am pleased to hear that, and may I say that I trust the minister will supervise the expenditure of the financial aid in order that it may do the job I am sure the government hopes will be done in that city. In line with this plea for the prevention rather than the cure of the disease—for such, to my way of thinking, is the real purpose of any health scheme we may adopt or support in this country—we have to consider allied nutritional problems.

I have seen a good many reports on the nutrition of the Canadian people, a people with a comparatively high standard of living. Yet it is surprising how many people in Canada are insufficiently and inadequately nourished. To a large degree that is due to inadequate incomes, but not altogether, for one sometimes finds malnutrition in families where the wrong kind of food is eaten, but who have enough money to get the right kind of food.

Those of us who visited Great Britain a year ago had the privilege of seeing some of the great community kitchens established in that country; and we learned there, with a good deal of satisfaction, that in spite of the fact that many kinds of food are scarce, and some unobtainable, and in spite of the fact that they have had to cut down very largely on the foods to which the British people were used in normal times, yet government supervision of feeding in Great Britain, even on the lower levels, so far as types of food are concerned, had improved the health of the people to the point where, we were told, the British people to-day, taken as a nation, are probably better nourished than they were in the days before the war. Therefore I say that we should be giving attention to the problem of nutrition.

I mentioned the incidence of the venereal disease, but when I was doing so I omitted to say that I hoped adequate provision would be made this year to deal with that problem. I do not know just what is in the appropriation for that work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is $175,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe that is a smaller amount than was appropriated shortly after the last war, when there was an appropriation of $200,000, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was the maximum year.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; $200,000 was the maximum. We should be spending the maximum now. May I say again that I thought it was most unfortunate that when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister of this country the appropriation was so drastically cut, to the point where actually the stamping out of the disease was made exceedingly difficult. I am glad, therefore, to know that something is being done in this connection, and I can assure the minister that any appropriation he sets aside for purposes of this description will receive the hearty support of my colleagues and myself.

In the short time remaining to me I should like to offer some suggestions regarding the work of the committee. I am glad to know that the reference is broad enough that the committee may examine health schemes in other countries. There are two countries in which, I think, health has been placed in the forefront of the aims of the nation. No matter what we may think of the methods used to establish the present government in Russia; no matter what we may think of what is called communism—and I suppose there is no one in this chamber who dislikes communist party methods more than I do—yet I want to say this, that if there is one thing which has been done in Russia which we should study, and one thing that should be a challenge to all democratic nations, it is the manner in which Russia has dealt with health problems. That is the one great contribution, if they have made no others, that they have made to the welfare of the human race. The manner in which they care for mothers before children are born, for children after they are born, and the manner in which they use preventive medicine right through to life's end is something we should study. In Russia that is a service accessible and free to all.

The other country I have in mind is New Zealand. I realize that New Zealand has one advantage we have not at this time, namely, the ability to institute a nation-wide health scheme because it has a unitary parliament, or one parliament governing the whole country. That is not easily possible in a confederation such as ours. But I believe that if we approach the constitutional problem in the manner in which it should be approached, and in the right spirit, we should be able to straighten out this constitutional difficulty. I believe that the basis of confederation, as written into the British North America Act, and upon which the unity of this country depends, is the recognition of certain rights, rights not only of minorities but of majorities as well. We often speak of the rights of minorities, but let us not forget that the majority also has rights. If we accept the point of view that both these rights are the fundamental basis of confederation, then it seems to me we can approach this matter in the spirit in which we ought to approach it.

I believe an attempt should be made to obtain from the several provinces an agreement with the dominion—call it a bill of rights, if you like—and into this agreement there should be written the basis of confederation. Remove the question of constitutional rights from the realm of partisan discussion, so that we may then agree as to what new powers are needed by the dominion in order to bring about the kind of social structure we desire. As I say, in that respect New Zealand has the advantage of being able to do what it wishes, because it is a unified country with a single parliament. But somehow or another we must devise ways and means of meeting this difficulty under which we labour. After all, national health and social security are not provincial problems. I often hear my hon. friends to my immediate left talking about the danger of interfering with the rights of local communities —in their case, provincial rights. Yet I often pay this tribute to Alberta: I do not know any province in Canada which in recent years has done more for its education system than has Alberta. How did they do it? Did they do it by recognizing the inherent rights of every little local school board, every little local community? Indeed, no. What they did was to adopt a larger unit of administration, and take from the local community in spite of considerable opposition, the right to control its own local schools. In that respect they found that the larger unit was more efficient; and I ask them to apply to the wider problems which confront this nation and indeed the world, the same logic as was applied by their government in relation to their local school districts.

There are certain problems which cannot be dealt with by municipalities, localities or provinces, but which must be dealt with by nations. By the same token there are certain problems, such as the elimination of war and the establishment of collective security for the world, which can be dealt with only by the cooperative effort of all the nations willing to cooperate.

I hope the committee will study the New Zealand scheme. I am quite sure it would have no difficulty in obtaining the appearance before it of a man like the Hon. Walter Nash, who is now located at Washington and who, to a large extent, was responsible for the building of their social security system. I have no doubt that in studying social security conditions in other nations, the committee can find much first-class and first-hand evidence if it will, for example, consult officials of the international labour office in Montreal. I think some hon. members know that in the international labour office in that city there is one of the leading authorities on social security, a gentleman who was invited to go to England to appear before the Beveridge committee and who has been to South America to assist some of the countries there in devising social security systems in recent years.

Mr. MARTIN: Stein?

Mr. COLDWELL: Doctor Stein. What have they in the Dominion of New Zealand that we might study? Their plan is on a national scale, and all the residents of New Zealand, no matter what their station and condition in life, are included. The plan covers almost every kind of risk such as unemployment and complete care for all residents. They pay a sickness cash benefit if the breadwinner is sick. They pay workmen's compensation, and this compensation is unaffected by the sickness benefits. They pay permanent disability pensions, old age benefits and widows' and orphans' benefits. We sometimes misname our mothers' pension in this country by calling it a widow's pension. In some of our provinces, certainly in Saskatchewan, the mother receives a small pension as long as the children are under sixteen years of age. However, as soon as the children reach that age, the pension ceases and the mother is left without any pension whatsoever. New Zealand also pays child allowances and family allowances. In addition there are discretionary emergency benefits for exceptional cases of distress. Those are the main outlines.

They cover at least one of the four freedoms, the freedom from fear, fear of old age, fear of sickness, fear of disability and so on. The nutritional programme which they are trying to put into effect, and which we ought to study, will give a measure of freedom from want. There is no means test of the type we have. An aged couple can get their sixty shillings a week while owning their own home unencumbered by the caveat which is often placed against the little pieces of property in our country and which discourages the principle of thrift of which we hear a great deal. They may have £500, or $2,500, in the bank without having their pension affected. In addition they may have an income of $5 a week to enable them to get the small comforts that aged couples require in addition to the minimum provided.

I say to the government that the people of Canada will judge the sincerity of the government, will judge the sincerity of this parliament, not by the promises—as has been pointed out, the Liberal party made promises in 1919 and they remain unfulfilled in 1943—but by the performance. To-day in the midst of this war, it seems to me that we could not do better than to increase the benefits of those in this dominion who need the assistance of the state.

I urge the committee to get down to work and to place before this house at this session a scheme which will be a challenge to us to go forward and to remove the blots to which I have referred to-night. There are those who tell us that this is not the time to do these things. Many of the things I have mentioned as being in effect in the Dominion of New Zealand have been done since the war began. Benefits have been steadily increased and expanded since the beginning of the war, and who is there in this house or anywhere else who will say that the increase of those benefits has interfered in any way with the contribution of New Zealand toward the prosecution of this war. Indeed it is often said that considering its resources and man-power and everything else, New Zealand has probably made the greatest contribution of any one of the nations in the British commonwealth of nations outside of the British isles.

I happened to note a few days ago a letter which had been written by a man who was deservedly lauded this afternoon as a great leader, the President of the United States. Does he think it is too early to begin planning for post-war reconstruction? I have a letter which I clipped from the New York Times of February 20. This letter was addressed by Mr. Roosevelt to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and it reads in part:

> I want to take this opportunity to commend the St. Louis Post-Dispatch for its interest in publishing a series of articles which discuss the aims and objectives for which the United States and the united nations are fighting. There cannot be too much discussion of this kind, and there could not be a better time for it.

No better time for a discussion of the things for which we are fighting. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this nation are fighting this war expecting that out of it will come something better than what they have known in the past. The time to lay the foundations for that better deal is not after the war; it is now, in order that our people may understand that we really are in earnest when we say that the world will be remade on a better pattern.

My time has expired and I do not wish to transgress further upon the courtesy of the house. But I want to say again that if we are to impress the people of Canada with our sincerity; if we are to convince them that we are indeed in earnest about doing the things that we believe should be done in the realm of social security, then we should not wait. I think the Prime Minister once said that one way of getting rid of an awkward question was to refer it to a committee. I hope that this is not just getting rid of an awkward question. If it is, I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Canada will hold them to strict accountability.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I listened attentively yesterday to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speaking on this resolution that a select committee of this house be set up to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada. In the past twenty-three years the right hon. gentleman has been Prime Minister for some sixteen years and leader of the opposition for the remaining seven. On August 14, 1937, with the concurrence of the then Minister of Finance and the then Minister of Justice, he had set up what was known first as the Rowell commission and later as the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations, recommending to that commission first, that it was expedient to provide for a reexamination of the economic and financial basis of confederation and of the distribution of legislative powers in the light of economic and social developments of the last seventy years. That commission, as most hon. members will remember, made an exhaustive and detailed study of prevailing conditions throughout this dominion and submitted a lengthy and comprehensive report to the present Prime Minister on May 3, 1940.

This afternoon my colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made reference to a speech delivered in Toronto last October by the Prime Minister to a gathering of labour people and to the very fine sentiments he expressed at that meeting. The hon. member also referred to those principles of social security which were enunciated by the Prime Minister in 1919 when he accepted the leadership of the Liberal party, and the speaker who preceded me, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), quoted at some length from that chart of the Prime Minister's which was set forth in 1919.

I should have thought, in view of all these circumstances, that the Prime Minister would present to the house at this time a bill on social security and health insurance setting forth the government's policy, instead of presenting simply the resolution now under discussion.

The report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations accentuates the need for some central authority to obviate the dangers of fluctuating provincial incomes during depression periods. The report shows us the urgent needs of the provinces prior to the war and their inability to carry on the necessary social and health services. It goes without saying that the situation of the provinces is even more desperate now that the war has made it necessary to invade provincial fields of taxation.

The need for a collective attack is clearly shown by the evidence brought forward by the various provinces in their submissions to the Rowell-Sirois commission. In brief, here is the picture. I quote:

Costs of medical services are increasing, but the ability of their people to pay is not increasing.

The high incidence of preventable disease and death.

Inadequacies of hospital facilities, especially in rural areas.

Inadequate accommodation in mental hospitals.

The expenditures on behalf of the mentally diseased and mentally defective have increased more rapidly than the general population rate.

The problems of cancer, mental illness, venereal diseases and tuberculosis, which ignore provincial boundaries, can best be attacked by unity, rather than by nine more or less sporadic provincial attacks.

Early diagnostic and preventive measures are needed all down the line.

The urgent need for properly organized services in the field of maternal and child health.

The increase in the costs of dependency because of illness and premature death.

The crying need for federal responsibility and financial aid—in fact, some system of national health insurance—if the problem is to be solved.

They acknowledge their provincial lacks, but state that they are unable to finance the health services they should be giving to their people.

I quote further from this pamphlet on Canadian nutrition surveys which have been made. It says:

In Canada, nutrition surveys at different income levels have been made in cities across the country; and they show that Canada has a serious nutrition problem. Dr. L. B. Pett, director of nutrition services, in the Department of Pensions and National Health at Ottawa (and also secretary of the Canadian Council on Nutrition) is conducting a wide-spread campaign to develop interest in nutrition on a community basis.

He says: "What people are we trying to reach? The answer is—everyone. . . . The Canadian dietary surveys indicated that while a higher income tends to assure the family of better nutrition, it is no guarantee. Furthermore, these surveys showed serious dietary deficiencies among families of an annual income less than $1,500. I am informed that this comprises more than half the families in Canada, so that there is a widespread nutrition problem. . . . Therefore, in analysing the meaning of this word "everyone" it is advisable to be clear that it is not just a case of relief families, or low-income families, because surveys show that even where apparently large amounts of money are being spent on food, yet there may be malnutrition."

If there was any doubt or misunderstanding as to the report of the Sirois commission, this war has certainly proved to us the great need for the improved care of health throughout this country. In a three months period last year, of 50,000 young men who tried to enlist, 20,000 were rejected as physically unfit. To date over 70,000 men have been discharged from the armed forces during this war, many of them—I do not know just what percentage—as physically unfit.

Among the twenty-six leading countries of the world, only four have a record of maternal deaths worse than Canada's. In four years, 1932 to 1935, Canada lost 70,000 infants under one year of age and lost another 33,000 mothers and still-born infants.

A government investigation of Canadian children has shown that half a million are undernourished, one-quarter of a million have impaired hearing, 77,000 have weak or damaged hearts, 35,000 suffer from tuberculosis. On the basis of these figures, Mr. Allan Ross, who takes care of rations for the Canadian troops, labelled Canada as a C3 nation.

The Hon. J. T. Thorson, as Minister of National War Services, stated in this house on November 11, 1941, that a total of 209,000 single men between the ages of twenty to twenty-four had been called and that 44 per cent of them had been rejected on medical inspection.

Therefore I do not think there is any doubt as to the need of some system of health insurance in this country, and this need has existed for a long time past. In social security and health legislation Canada lags far behind many other democratic countries. The magazine Health in its autumn issue in 1942 points out that:

> Under the social security act of 1938 medical care was provided in New Zealand for all. The service included free general practitioner's service, free hospital and sanitarium service for all and other benefits.
> In other words, in a large proportion of the English-speaking part of the British empire the problem of medical care has resulted in legislative action which we still lack in Canada.
> In order to estimate the type of national health programme which may be evolved in Canada and indeed which is likely to be evolved, it is perhaps desirable to make some additional comparisons between Canada and the United States. Conditions in the two countries are similar so plans for the remedying of defects in public health machinery may well be similar.

In the United States for constitutional reasons it should be more difficult to initiate federal action in the field of health. Yet one finds that the efficiency of federal machinery is infinitely greater than in Canada, as expenditures on national health are greater.

I should mention the importance of full-time health service and the failure of our parliament to set aside any funds whatever for this purpose. On the other hand, in the United States under the social security act of 1935, $8,000,000 was made available annually for this purpose. In 1939 this appropriation was increased to $11,000,000.

It is more than interesting to note the remarkable increase in state and local expenditures as the result of the stimulus of federal subsidy. The total amount of money available from all sources in those health jurisdictions where federal funds were budgeted was $83,790,782 for the fiscal year 1940, an increase of $32,714,421 over the previous year. While because of some confusing factors this may not give an entirely accurate picture, it is obvious that the increase and improvement in local and state health machinery in the United States is much greater in proportion to federal grants than one could reasonably expect.

But if the two items of federal expenditure give one some idea of the direction in which we might go, they give little idea of the scope and magnitude of plans for national health under consideration in the United States.

The article goes on to cite details of expenditures in the United States, and then says:

> Our own dominion expenditures on health, as I have said, are about one million dollars annually, of which $50,000 only goes to the provinces in the form of subsidy.

I know personally of a community in western Canada where a group of doctors got together and organized the area, establishing a small hospital and clinic and a contributory scheme of health insurance for the people of the area. Under this scheme the head of a family paid $25 a year, a single person $15 a year, and each local municipality paid $300 a year to take care of the health of its indigents. This has worked very satisfactorily, and if it be possible I should like to see the country zoned and organized on some such basis as I have just referred to with respect to health insurance, the scheme to be supplemented by government assistance. These people could be given proper help in the matter of dental care and other parts of a proper scheme of health insurance.

In the past, speaking in this chamber, I have repeatedly asked that the old age pension be increased. I believe also that seventy years is too high a minimum; we might well consider reducing it. And certainly, in these difficult times, pensioners are entitled to more than the meagre twenty dollars a month which they are allowed.

I have already indicated, when speaking on the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, that if social security legislation is to function properly, the British North America Act should be amended. If that is not done, the dominion and the provinces must get together and agree on certain matters—which to date they have not done. In the programme of the Progressive Conservative party as laid down in Winnipeg last December we recognized the obligation of government to make available to every citizen adequate medical, dental, nursing, hospital and prenatal care, and to further advance public health and nutritional principles so that health may be safeguarded and preserved throughout this country; this programme to be financed under a contributory system supplemented by government assistance.

It has been pointed out that Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt are not only two great figures of our democratic world today but are great leaders in social reform. We may very well at this time take a leaf out of their book.

In closing, I should like to associate myself with the appeal of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon, in advocating the appointment of a minister of social security and reconstruction, to be charged with the administration of social security and health measures in this country. This measure is advocated in our platform which is now before the public.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): The necessity or otherwise of the social legislation envisaged in the resolution before us is, I believe, entirely dependent upon the nature of the economic order which we wish to obtain in the post-war period. Personally I can conceive of an economic order in which the necessity of such legislation is entirely eliminated. My colleague the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall), in speaking this afternoon, stated that if the proper economic adjustments were made, much of this social legislation would be unnecessary. I agree entirely with his statement. I believe that many of these special problems which we are considering, including insufficient old age pensions, the need of pensions for the blind, and inadequate health facilities, are part of a major and fundamental problem affecting the whole economic body, and that if the disease which is common to that whole economic body is eliminated, many of these problems which are regarded as special will take care of themselves.

It seems to me that our approach to this whole post-war question is analogous to that of the construction of a house. It would be foolish, of course, for a builder to consider where he was going to put the chimney, or to begin to place the chimney, or to arrange the walls or any part of the superstructure, before he built the foundation. We are proposing to erect the national edifice which is to be a fit habitation for our nation's heroes. In listening to most of the debate which took place on the resolution pertaining to post-war rehabilitation, as well as to what has already been said in the present debate, I had the impression that for the most part it has centred round the superstructure, whereas I believe that the first duty of the membership of this house as well as of the committees which have been set up is to determine the fundamentals which are to operate in our economic system. We must first fix our objectives and then govern ourselves accordingly. I do not believe that thus far this has been done. There has been very little discussion of the objectives which we are to pursue in the post-war world. But discussion of these objectives is extremely appropriate and pertinent at this time.

I wish to occupy a few minutes this evening in endeavouring to indicate what I consider are the objectives toward which we ought to strive in our economic life. The only fundamental objective which I have been able to discover in any of the addresses made thus far by hon. members is that of full employment. I cannot agree or disagree with that objective unless I know what meaning hon. members attach to it. From every side we have heard the words "full employment" as expressing an objective. But what constitutes full employment? What do those who have used the term have in their minds as to what it means? We ought to have a clear definition of the terms we use. One writer tells us that definition is the breath of science and that fruitful discussion in any field presupposes and begins with a common definition. I cannot see that we can make any progress with any discussion we undertake unless, to begin with, we define our terms.

If hon. members who have thus far employed the expression "full employment" agree with my definition of it, perhaps I can concede that full employment is a fundamental and legitimate objective. I shall endeavour if I can to clear the air a little with respect to this question of full employment and work. Generally speaking, all work may be divided into two classes. There is forced labour, and there is voluntary, self-chosen, self-initiated activity. Forced labour in turn may be divided into two classes. There is forced labour imposed by nature, the kind of work which God referred to when He told Adam that outside of paradise nature would yield bread only by the sweat of his brow. Then there is the labour that is forced on man by other men, such as slave owners and bankers, who declare from their high position that men shall not eat—not without nature's consent, but without their consent.

Work which is imposed on us by nature is necessary, natural and dignified. On the other hand, labour which is forced on man by other men is unnecessary, unnatural, artificial and degrading. One thing that many members of this house, as well as orthodox thinkers outside, refuse to recognize, or have done thus far, is that the condition of unemployment is the consequence of the tremendous advancement of technology. We have yet to hear from these orthodox thinkers that it is the substitution of solar energy for human energy that has brought about the condition of unemployment. Also the orthodox thinkers refuse to acknowledge that because the machine has taken the place of manual labour it also takes away a man's job as well as his income. They refuse to recognize that, as a consequence of this, man is suffering, not from unemployment but from "unempayment", which is a vastly different thing. I hope to elaborate that point later. Just now I should like to give a few statistics indicating the extent to which solar energy has been substituted for human energy, as a reason for the condition of unemployment that prevailed before the war and that certainly will prevail after the war unless changes are made. On previous occasions in speaking on this question in the house I have submitted quite elaborate statistics indicating the extent to which machinery has displaced human labour. I do not intend to go to the length I have gone in the past, but I wish to submit a few figures to substantiate my argument. Most of the figures I am submitting were given by the president of the United States chamber of commerce several years ago.

In the shoemaking industry one machine operated by two men can produce a thousand pairs of shoes in one day. I would ask hon. members who suggest that the duty of industry is to provide jobs, how they are going to find jobs in industry for all those who desire to make shoes when two men with one machine can make a thousand pairs of shoes a day. It has been estimated that sufficient shoes for a whole year for every man, woman and child in the whole United States could be manufactured in sixteen days. What are the workers to do for the rest of the year if they are obliged to earn their living by being employed?

Again one man with one bottle-making machine displaces fifty-four men. Two men with one coal-conveyer displace fifty men. One man with one window-glass making machine replaces twenty men. One machine produces 525 light bulbs per minute.

Here is an interesting item on the question of public works. We have heard again and again suggestions on the part of hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), that public works is one way in which the unemployed can be and should be absorbed. In digging the Suez canal four thousand men dug a quantity of ground. Many years later in the construction of the Welland canal five men did the same amount of work, or five men doing as much work as four thousand did before. If we are to take advantage of technological advance and use machinery, which certainly should be a blessing instead of a curse, where shall we find jobs for all those who will be without jobs?

The same thing applies to agriculture. Here is one item. In 1820 fifty-seven man-hours of work were required to produce twenty bushels per acre; to-day it requires only eight man-hours. Where are the people going to find employment on the farms at that rate? Again, one planting machine sets twelve thousand plants an hour.

The substitution of solar energy for human energy has taken place not only in the agricultural world and the manufacturing world; it is also true in the white-collar occupations. One girl with one machine is able to deal with sixty thousand ledger entries in one hour, displacing sixty clerks. Where are the jobs coming from under those circumstances?

We have some interesting statistics that have arisen during the war, indicating the reduction in man-hours per unit of production. Here are some with reference to the production of guns. I quote from the Financial Post. The first two-pounder anti-tank gun required 1,219 man-hours of work; it now requires only 350. The first 6-pounder anti-tank gun required 930 hours of work; it now requires only 375. The first 40 mm. Bofors gun barrel required 186 man-hours of work; it now requires only 45. The constant trend is to the reduction of the number of man-hours required per unit of production.

An interesting item appeared in the February 27 issue of the Financial Post in reference to motor-car production. It stated that before the war the motor-car industry produced automobiles to the extent of one for every eight Canadians. After the war, it indicated, the industry would be able to produce one for every four Canadians. This tremendous production, with a comparatively small number of man-hours of labour, is made possible largely through the development of electrical energy. The hon. member for Davenport has given us many interesting and profitable talks dealing with the erection of power plants and similar enterprises, but has it not occurred to him that every time a power plant is built, each new horse-power provides the equivalent of the work of ten men.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member mean ten new jobs?

Mr. KUHL: No, I do not mean ten new jobs.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be more like a thousand new jobs.

Mr. KUHL: Every horse-power of electrical energy developed creates mechanical men, to the equivalent of ten per horse-power. Up to the present time, according to statistics, our development of water-power has reached the point where approximately ten million horse-power are provided. On a twenty-four hour basis that is equivalent to 300,000,000 man-power. When that much mechanical power is added to our production I should like to be told where in the world all the jobs are going to come from in the post-war period, if our objective is to be the obtaining of jobs. If those who have suggested that full employment is our objective mean that men will be required only to do that work which machines cannot do, then I think I would agree with them. But if they mean that men must work eight hours or more, while at the same time machines must stand idle and rust, then certainly I will not agree with them. I submit that when a government, or for that matter any group of people, compels people to work when machines could do that work, it is imposing a condition of slavery upon the people. I submit further that when machines are available and governments or other groups compel men to work, they are usurping a prerogative which belongs to the Almighty alone. It is not work, as such, that men dislike; it is being compelled to work that men object to, and particularly being compelled to perform monotonus tasks which destroy all individualism. Compulsion, I submit, is the basis for slavery, and I understand that one of the great reasons for which we are fighting this war is to drive from the earth the philosophy of compulsion. Therefore I submit that if after the war we are to have a work state, a state in which men will be compelled to work while machines stand idle, then we shall have fought the war in vain.

I assert that what we want in the post-war period is a world in which we are absolutely free from man-forced labour and as completely free from nature-forced labour as we can possibly make ourselves. I submit that the reason why we have this vast accumulation of machines, devices, power and mass production methods is because man is constantly endeavouring to free himself from nature-forced labour in order that he may have not only an abundance of wealth—and by wealth I mean goods—but also leisure. I consider that the striving on the part of men to free themselves from nature-forced labour is a legitimate objective which should be encouraged to the maximum. I suggest that by the time this war is concluded, the tremendous advances technology had made prior to the beginning of the war and the advances it certainly has made during the war will make leisure possible for all classes of people in the post-war world, not only for the white-collared workers but for the farmers, miners, lumbermen, factory workers and fishermen. If all the machinery, power and mass-production methods that have been developed and improved upon during this war are used in the post-war world it will mean that the necessary hours of work can be reduced very substantially. Why should a man be obliged to stay at a desk for eight hours a day when a machine can reduce those hours to seven or six or five or even four? And that applies all the way through our economy.

I consider that a legitimate and desirable objective. This subject of leisure is to me very intriguing. We all strive to obtain as much leisure as we can, but the objectionable feature with which I have always been confronted in any discussion of leisure is that most people are anxious for leisure for themselves but are not anxious to see their fellow men enjoy that privilege. Oh, yes, they say; leisure would not demoralize me, but my fellow man would become a loafer and a bum if he had too much leisure. I have encountered that attitude quite frequently. As I stated in a previous speech, leisure is not a loafer's paradise. It is an opportunity, the greatest opportunity a man can have, for the expression of his creative desires.

Man cannot live a complete life unless he obtains the opportunity to express the creative instincts which were given him at the time of his creation. With regard to the use of leisure time one writer has said that in their ample leisure men and women will do any of those things for which their long education has prepared them; they will paint pictures, explore jungles, carry out scientific research in public laboratories open to all qualified students, cultivate their gardens, write books, join in the acting of plays, invent new types of aeroplanes, learn to fly, weave rugs and learn languages.

That is a brief summary of the many, many things people would do if they had the leisure time. We all have hobbies. We all have those little things we like to do for the sheer joy of doing them—gardening, sports, and a thousand and one other things which satisfy our creative instincts. One, I believe, upon which far more emphasis ought to be placed is the matter of music. We have much too little music in our nation—much too little good music. If advantage were taken of the technological advancement in our country, and if people had ample leisure, we would have far more symphony orchestras, and far more grand operas and good music than we have at present.

Personally I cannot see how anyone can object to these objectives as being legitimate and proper. I suggest, therefore, that in the post-war world our objective is not to put people to work, but rather to arrange our economy in such a way that people will put themselves to work—and that is a vastly different thing. There is as much difference between those two states of mind as there is between freedom and slavery.

In the past the work of man has been largely for self-preservation. In the future the work of man should be mainly for self-expression. I believe, therefore, that the legitimate problem of the committee we are about to set up, and the committee on post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation, is the provision of an economic arrangement whereby there will be the most equitable distribution of the superabundance of goods which can be produced by the machine, the leisure which will be produced by the machine and the small number of necessary man-hours of nature-forced work which will remain. I believe that is a legitimate problem the committee must undertake and study.

When the problem of the distribution of goods, leisure and necessary work is tackled and solved, then I am satisfied that the need for the social legislation contemplated by the resolution under consideration to-night will largely, if not completely, disappear.

In a few words, in conclusion, I would suggest what I would consider a fair and equitable distribution of necessary hours of work, hours of leisure and the superabundance of goods which the machines can produce. I am sure all will be obliged to concede, by the time the war is concluded, that the necessary man-hours of work will be an absolute minimum. The people of Canada, all the way from sixteen to sixty, will not be required to put in eight hours a day to produce the standard of living they desire. There have been many statistics compiled as to what might be a possible division of these three elements. One which has come to me and which I think is one of the most reasonable is this. It was suggested that the necessary man-hours of work should be done by those most capable and able to do it, those possibly between the ages of twenty-five and forty-five years. Their working day would probably be reduced to six, five or four hours a day, depending only and entirely upon the extent to which solar energy is substituted for human energy. What would that mean? It would mean that those who would be most capable of doing the necessary work would not be so fagged out by the end of a day's work that they could not appreciate their leisure. They would still be in a physical and mental condition to appreciate either the creation or the rendering of some good music; or they would still be in the frame of mind to be able to indulge in any cultural pursuit of their choice. It would mean that those up to the age of twenty-five years, or thereabouts, would spend the first twenty-five years of their lives in obtaining the most complete training they could possibly secure not only for their life work but for their leisure.

The reason why leisure has been a burden on people in the past is that, in addition to its being unpaid leisure, they have not had the training to satisfy their musical, artistic and other desires. Under the plan I suggest, once an individual reached the age of forty-five years or more he could retire. I believe this presents a most attractive division of the hours of labour and leisure.

The question which remains is this: How are goods to be distributed? What is to be the most equitable distribution of goods? It has been stated again and again that our production to-day is around nine billions of dollars. That includes to a great extent capital goods for the prosecution of the war. But in peace time it is no reason why we cannot step up our production of consumable goods to nine billions, and more, the extent depending only upon the willingness of the people to apply themselves to the machinery available. If our production were stepped up to a value of ten billions of consumable goods, that would be equivalent to $1,000 per man, woman or child for a population of ten million people, or for a family of four it would mean consumable goods to the value of $4,000.

That is what would be possible by way of production of goods in Canada. As I have indicated previously, if we are to insist that people must derive their income by reason of being employed and if we are to take advantage of machinery and power production we are demanding two things, one of which is a contradiction of the other. The only manner in which these goods can be distributed is through consumer purchasing power.

This raises another fundamental question into which my time will not permit me to go. This is a question which is the subject of much controversy and economic thinking, and it has been mentioned before by several of my colleagues. I refer to the relationship of national income to national production. It has been our constant contention in this group that national production and national income are not one and the same thing, that national income is always less than national production. Ten billion dollars worth of goods in the post-war period will not be represented automatically by ten billion dollars of purchasing power. The monetary income of the people will probably be around five or six billion dollars. There will be a shortage, a deficiency, a discrepancy, between total income and total prices.

The only manner in which this gap can be bridged is by the issuance of national money sufficient to balance income with production. It will not do any good to raise wages because immediately wages are raised, prices go up and there is no more purchasing power. Again I see absolutely no advantage in the government taking over a factory, operating it and trying to bring about distribution. If the government owned a factory it would be confronted with the same problem of the displacement of man-power by machines as confronts the private owner. The only argument I can see for government ownership of industry is in connection with administration, and personally I have yet to see any evidence which convinces me that the government can run an enterprise more efficiently than a private individual.

Once more I say that I do not believe that the operating of business is a government function. I believe that the government exists for the purpose of doing for the people what they cannot do for themselves. The people can manage their own business; they can produce the wealth of the nation, and it is the duty of the government, by the creation of proper laws, to enable the people to do this. I believe the conducting of business is the duty and obligation of the private individual.

As I say, the only way I can see to balance consumption with production is the issuance of national money to an amount equal to the difference between national production and consumption. That would not be adding water to the milk as some hon. members have suggested. It would be no different from the case of an owner of a theatre with 1,000 seats who had printed only 750 tickets. It would not do any good to redistribute the 750 tickets in order to take in 250 more customers. The printing of another 250 tickets to take in another 250 customers would not constitute watering the milk. The same thing holds true in regard to raising the national income until it equals national production.

This represents the cultural heritage of the Canadian people to which they are entitled by reason of being citizens of this modern generation. It belongs to them by reason of being the fortunate recipients of the vast heritage of discovery and invention, of culture and learning, of organization, whether social, political or industrial, of education and religion, of aspirations and ideals which have been handed down and developed generation after generation from the dim beginnings of the race.

The national dividend is something to which the citizens of Canada are entitled by reason of being citizens of this modern generation. It is their heritage and just right. When the national dividend is distributed among the people their incomes will be sufficient to buy back as much of the national production as they desire. When they are able to do that they will have security. They will then be secure at all times, in old age as well as in youth. Consequently I assert that many of the problems that we now regard as special problems, such as old age pensions, pensions for the blind, lack of health facilities and so on, will disappear when the people have sufficient purchasing power to enable them to buy as much of the national production as they desire. In conclusion, I say that I believe it is the duty of this committee as well as the committee on post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation to confine their attention to fundamentals, to the foundation of the economic system which we desire to see obtain in this country. When that is done, then I am satisfied that the need for much of the debate and the discussion and the legislation that is contemplated will disappear entirely.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who has just taken his seat for his kindly references to myself, but I cannot find in the resolution anything pertaining to the operation of machines, to how much they will produce, to the purchasing power of the people or to many of the other matters mentioned by him. I will try to confine my remarks to the resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: That will be a novelty.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be a greater novelty if my hon. friend knew at any time anything about what he was speaking. Any sound economic bill which may be founded upon the report of this committee on social security and which is returned to this house through the government to carry out the objectives of the resolution will have my unstinted support. Like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for as long as I have known him, ever since I have been in the house I have been a persistent advocate of national health insurance. Others in the house have likewise been persistent advocates of it. The late leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the present hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and others I have known have never let an opportunity pass to advocate national health insurance. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), both while he was in the Ontario legislature and out of the Ontario legislature, has always been a persistent advocate of national health insurance. I intend to confine my remarks to a portion of the words of the resolution. It states:

. . . the most practicable measures of social insurance for Canada—

I suppose that means beneficial changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I continue to quote:

—including health insurance and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan.

The Prime Minister must feel a good deal of satisfaction at seeing crystallized even in resolution form his own advocacy of national health insurance. But I would much rather have seen the Prime Minister sponsor a bill at this session because I am persuaded that he knows all about the subject. He has studied it long enough, knows what should be done, and is just as familiar as I am with similar acts in all those countries in which national health insurance is in operation. While I endorse this resolution I would much sooner be rising to support a bill introduced by the Prime Minister, who for so long has been a persistent advocate of this boon. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering why we have not a bill before us. When this matter came up during the administration of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, or before when there was talk about it, I made a trip to Europe and made as thorough a survey as I could of the health insurance acts in operation in Belgium, Holland, Germany, and particularly in Great Britain. The British act is, in my judgment, by far the best, and I am not saying that in disparagement of the legislation of any other country. That the British act is by far the best is only to be expected because it has been in operation ever since 1911, together with several amendments made in the intervening years. When I first heard of the government's proposal I hoped that the government would bring down a bill this session, and I can assure them that any bill that is comparable with the British act will have my support. The British legislation might not be adapted to all our conditions in Canada. Great Britain is in the happy position of having only one government which legislates for all its people. Here we are handicapped—perhaps I should not say handicapped; maybe I should say benefited—in that we have nine provincial governments and one federal government. But I have confidence that the Prime Minister could overcome that handicap just as he overcame it in the matter of unemployment insurance, and I still hope that at the earliest possible moment he will bring in a bill for national health insurance—and perhaps much earlier than any of us expect.

As I said, I made a trip to Europe to make my own observations of the operation of national health insurance. Germany had long had such legislation, their first legislation on the subject being enacted in 1883. Great Britain did not enact its legislation until 1911, but the British bill has accomplished infinitely more than the German bill. On the other hand, the British government had the great advantage of all the experience which the great labour unions of Great Britain had had. Those labour unions were the pioneers in this whole matter of health insurance or, as they called it, sick benefits. The experience of those great unions dated back to 1831, and when the British government took over the operation of national health insurance they founded their legislation very largely upon the operation of the splendid regulations which the great labour unions of Great Britain had found satisfactory in operation over a long period of years. I am a staunch supporter of the British act. It was my pleasure to visit many of the labour offices in Great Britain and to observe the administration of the act. I visited the labour offices in London, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, Birmingham, Glasgow, Edinburgh and Belfast. It was a pleasure to watch the officials there administering the national health insurance scheme and all the other social legislation, for all these social measures are administered through the same offices. This government has set up unemployment insurance offices all across Canada which could within a very short time be turned into offices to administer the national health insurance legislation. All these social measures go hand in hand. I was struck by the courtesy and gentlemanliness of the officials at the labour offices in their dealings with those who came up to the desk. I never saw anywhere either in business or out of business such courtesy between man and man as I saw in those labour offices in Great Britain. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) nods his head. Very likely he has had experience of them years ago and has visited them many times since. I have no doubt that in due course our own labour offices, once they have had a chance to get experience, will show the same courtesy. I am not by any means suggesting that they are discourteous, but we could not expect them to rise all at once to the standards in the old country. Undoubtedly, however, they will, because Canadians can adapt themselves as well as any other people.

The British have amended their act many times. I believe the last amendments were made in 1936. There may have been later amendments, but I have not seen them. Their scheme started off with low contributions by the employer and by the employee, and the state absorbed the difference in order to put the act into operation. The contributions in the old country have been stepped up on several occasions. I believe that to-day a man contributes twenty-two cents a week and a woman twenty-one cents a week, depending upon age and other conditions. That is not a large amount when one considers what they get in return.

At this point I would suggest to the government that when they have enacted a national health insurance act they take the opportunity to educate the great masses of the people by means of the radio, the press and public speakers, as to the benefits of health insurance. It is the great mass of the people that it will benefit, the class I am proud to belong to myself, the labouring class, for everyone that labours is a labouring man, and I certainly was of that class in big industry. The people should be educated to the fact that they will receive more in return than any twenty-two cents a week or whatever it may be which might be deducted from their pay cheques. Quite a number of deductions are being made from pay cheques to-day, and it is causing a certain amount of murmuring because the people have not, in my judgment, been educated sufficiently as to the reason for these deductions and the benefits resulting therefrom; for instance, the deduction which will be returned to them after the war. I am a very strong supporter of that provision, which was enacted last year, whereby so much is deducted and will be returned after the war.

As regards unemployment insurance, so far, on account of the great demand for labour not many of our people have had to apply at the labour offices for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act; but the time may come—I hope it is far distant—when many will have to go to the labour offices, turn in their cards and receive compensation during unemployment, and they will be glad of this provision, as many of their brothers in England have been glad of a similar provision up and down the years. I know this, because I have talked to many of them.

For a moment or two I wish to speak of national health insurance. What do they get in the old country in return for what they pay in? While unemployed through sickness, a man will receive eighteen shillings a week and a woman thirteen shillings a week. I have not been able to understand just why there is this big difference between the allowance to men and that to women. In addition, they get medical attention. If there is one thing which the great mass of working people in Canada deserve and have long deserved it is adequate medical attention. That they have been deprived of it is no fault of the doctors. I am one of those who believe that the class of people who walk nearest in the steps of Our Master is the medical profession; I have a very high regard for them. But the average working man cannot pay for medical attention, and therefore he goes without it. As one who has worked with hundreds of men year in and year out, I have seen times without number men almost drag themselves to their machines and remain there until, unable to work any longer, they collapsed—simply because they could not afford to call in a doctor. What a boon this measure would be to working-men! The Prime Minister has been a fervent advocate of social legislation of this kind. I beg of him to give the Canadian worker at the earliest possible moment this great boon of national health insurance.

In the course of my investigations in the old country I went into a store at Southsea. On that trip I had been to the labour offices and spent quite a time there. I talked to everybody—to the worker on the street-cars, the waitresses and waiters in restaurants and hotels, the clerks in the stores. To everyone whom I could get in contact with I put the question, "How do you like national health insurance and"—at that time—"unemployment insurance?" I was in this store at Southsea the day when Their Majesties the King and Queen went to Portsmouth to review the fleet. I went there too; it was a wonderful demonstration. In this small store I came in contact first hand with the benefits which flow from a national health insurance act. The operator of the store is the brother of a Mr. W. Butler, a very fine citizen who lives in my riding. He had in his store on that day four clerks; he was doing a real business. While I was chatting with him a young man came in, and Mr. Butler said to him, "Hello, Jack, I am glad to see you around again. When will you be able to come back?" I have forgotten whether the day of the week was Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday; in any event the young man replied, "I will be in on Monday." I said to him, "What has been wrong with you?" He said, "I have been sick three weeks." I said, "Well, how could you live?" I had not thought of a young man like that being in receipt of benefits under the national health insurance act. "Oh," he said, "I got along fine. I had my medical attention; it was paid. If I had had to go to hospital—which I didn't —that would have been paid. My doctor waited on me, and he was paid by the state, too; and while I have been off I have been getting eighteen shillings a week." That made a great appeal to me on account of my long association with thousands of working men, whose interests are always closer to my heart than any other interests, because they are or have been the least able to get their just dues. They cannot set their price unless they go on strike, which none of them want to do. They have been the least able to protect themselves. The case of this young man is an example of over twenty million workers in England who are under the benefits of this act. Is it not marvellous? And they have piled up tremendous resources which will take care of withdrawals for sickness for years to come, because nothing piles up faster than contributions to national health insurance paid by a whole population en masse. It may be beside the question for the Prime Minister to deal with it, but I venture to say that if he would take time, when he replies, to look up the figures relating to unemployment insurance, he would find that Canada has laid up a substantial number of millions of dollars in unemployment insurance payments. The same holds good with regard to national health insurance; we have nothing whatever to fear and the people have a great deal to gain.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The example I gave of the young man in Butler's store at Southsea is only one of several I could mention, because I came across the same thing in many places. I am strong for this, as I was for unemployment insurance, because I believe that after this war we shall have to have a sound system of immigration. I have been over many thousand unoccupied square miles of this country, and I do not believe that we as Canadians can hold very much longer this vast area locked up between the forty-ninth parallel, the Arctic, the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans, without letting others in to help in its development. After the war we shall have to have immigration to build up the country. I look back to the years around 1907, when the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with whom I was personally acquainted, established a great immigration policy which helped to build up this country. I believe, whatever anybody else says, that this country would never have won the glory which it won from 1914 to 1918 but for that immigration policy which brought in that new blood from the old land. We want more of that blood. I should like to see a million enter Canada after the war. But we cannot get working men here from Britain unless they know that they are coming to a country which provides the same boons and benefits that they enjoy over there—national health insurance and other acts of that kind. We need these people; they will return to this country everything which we lay out to bring them here; but they will not come here unless they can come to the same social conditions which they enjoy in the old land.

I will go one step further and suggest this to the Prime Minister for consideration when he frames his bill, that if and when people come from the old country after the war to settle, who have been paying into unemployment insurance and national health insurance there, we make a reciprocal arrangement with the old country government that they will pay to us for their nationals who may come here the money that has been paid on their behalf, so that we shall be able to take care of them from the time they arrive here. I think we shall have to have something of that kind.

Last summer I met with a number of incidents which convinced me that the medical profession were cooperating with the government in the consideration of the framing of a national health insurance bill. I cannot say I read of labour unions being called in. Perhaps they were; I think the government would not overlook them. If they were not, I recommend that in the framing of the bill the labour unions and those who have a knowledge of labour and the rights of the great mass of the Canadian people, the ninety-five per cent for whom the bill is to be framed—it is not going to be for the wealthy people, or the professional men—should be represented if the bill is to be for their benefit. Let the bill be framed with the best advice possible from all those classes.

I do not know that there is anything further I can add. I did not intend to speak for more than ten minutes, and I see I have gone a minute or two over that. I say in conclusion to the Prime Minister that any national health insurance bill comparable with the British measure, improved if possible to suit our Canadian conditions, will benefit the great mass of Canadians, not only the workers in the factories but the farmers in the outlying parts, among whom I saw too frequently during my trips great distress and the impossibility of getting medical attention. I am convinced that the Prime Minister has it in his heart to bring in the best bill possible. I say, do so, and he will have my support.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): My participation in this debate at this time is not designed to delay the passing of the resolution. However, I should like to make one or two observations.

It was apparent that the announcement of the proposal to set up a forty-one man committee to examine into all phases of social security aroused widespread interest in this country and a great deal of editorial comment. In connection with the editorial comment I should like to refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, as reported at page 937 of Hansard. He said:

> When the Atlantic charter was proclaimed it met with universal acceptance in this country. I have yet to find a newspaper in Canada which had not a good word to say for the Atlantic charter.

Further on he said:

> I find that to-day some are inclined to belittle, at least, the idea of social security, as being something vague and general, something that will involve outlays greater than any country can meet, and the like.

This is the point I wish to make in that connection. I can agree with the Prime Minister that the declaration known as the Atlantic charter did meet with widespread approval. But when we agree with the aims and objects laid down in the Atlantic charter that does not necessarily mean that we are obliged to accept all measures or suggestions designed to attain the objects laid down in the charter, advanced by this or any other government. While we agree on objectives we must retain at all times the right to criticize any proposal advanced by anyone which is designed or stated to accomplish the results that we desire.

In this connection may I say it is strange how quickly people make up their minds respecting certain matters without having given complete consideration to them. I recall that when the Beveridge report was announced the press took sides immediately, without reading it, without examining it. I am not criticizing them for doing so more than I am criticizing members of this house for having done the same. Ten minutes after the press and the radio announced that his report had been submitted to the British government, we found people across this country ready to fight if you criticized it and others ready to fight if you supported it. Was that not also true when the Sirois report was made known in this country? I know that boards of trade, town and city councils, held meetings and voted unanimously to support the Sirois recommendations, when in certain instances not a member had ever seen a copy of it. I know from personal experience in my part of the country that they sent to Edmonton or Calgary for a Liberal politician to come and tell them what the Sirois report recommended. I got into communication with some members of these boards of trade, carrying the printed document under my arm, three red books, and asked these gentlemen and others if they had seen those books. In no case could I find anyone who recognized them from the back, and very few who recognized them when I turned them around.

Let me deal with the plebiscite in the same connection. We found people in this country inspired by certain politicians who immediately, without having first given the matter proper consideration, formed a decision as to whether they would or would not support the plebiscite. They were encouraged by politicians to do that. I know of one politician who, meeting someone, would say, Are you going to vote "yes" on the plebiscite or are you going to be subversive and vote "no"? I think it is time that we should make a declaration as to whether this is a democracy; whether I have a right to think as I see fit; whether I have a right to speak as I see fit, of course having due regard for the rights of others and the safety of the state; whether I have a right to act as I please, within the same limitations. But there is a vicious type of propaganda which is going around this country at the present time, and which has been going around since the outbreak of the war, leading the average man to believe that unless he agrees with the government he is subversive. That is a most dangerous situation. For example, at the time of the last plebiscite who dared stand on a street corner and say, "Vote 'No'." Yet any man had a perfect right to do that if he saw fit.

I mention these matters for this reason. I do not believe the members of this committee on social security should enter into their deliberations with preconceived ideas in respect of certain measures or steps that should be adopted, without having based their conclusions upon a comprehensive knowledge of the proposals in question. The committee, as I have said already, is to be made up of forty-one members, consisting of thirty Liberals, seven Progressive Conservatives, two Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and two members from this group. I have no doubt this is based upon the representation in this house, but I trust that when the committee begins its deliberations we shall not discover that the thirty Liberals who constitute a substantial majority have already arrived at conclusions with respect to what the committee shall or shall not do. I believe we should keep the political aspect of the whole matter as far removed as possible.

There is a tremendous amount of work confronting the committee. As I examine the terms of reference I am obliged to assert that its job will not be completed in a week, a month, six months or a year. I feel that if we endeavour to rush in order to reach a conclusion by a given time, we may risk the danger of failing to do that which we have been charged to do. Speaking as one who has been proposed as a member of the committee, if this resolution passes we shall be called upon to study the social insurance schemes of the various provinces; to study the social insurance schemes of other countries; to discuss the most practical methods for social insurance in Canada, including health insurance, and the steps required to effect their inclusion in a national scheme; to look into the constitution and the financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security, and other related matters. I wonder just how many of us realize the assignment we shall have to undertake, and I use the word "have" advisedly because we all have a responsibility in this regard. I feel that one of the most important things we shall have to consider is the constitutional adjustments which may be necessary to put into effect any proposed scheme.

To-night I listened while the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke in very complimentary terms about the educational system of the province of Alberta, which I believe he said was the finest in Canada. He spoke of the enlarged school divisions which he said proved the fact that we would have to deprive smaller communities of their rights. Let me make it abundantly clear that while I agree with the statement that we have the finest educational system in Canada, the school areas were enlarged because of the fact that under the existing financial system it was becoming utterly impossible for the small areas to get along. I do not believe anyone in this house is better acquainted with that fact than I, because I have had plenty of experience in those rural schools. We found that in order to reduce the overhead, in order to provide the type of education the children of that province required, under the existing financial system it was necessary to enlarge our school areas and to cut down administrative costs so as to make available for other things the money which could thus be saved. But the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar neglected to give other reasons for the splendid school system in our province. One of them is that we brought about a drastic change in our course of studies, and a change in our methods of teaching. But probably most important of all is the fact that we have the finest departments of education and the finest minister of education in Canada. That is the complete picture with respect to the matter referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

In connection with the matter at present under discussion I believe we shall have to make a decision as between one of two things. The first is, are we suffering from conditions over which we have no control, or are we suffering from conditions of our own invention and creation? I say that the approach to the problem cannot be determined without first coming to a conclusion as to which situation has created the conditions with which we have been confronted from time to time. If the booms and depressions which have been our lot in years gone by are inevitable, then I can well see where certain insurance schemes will fit into the picture, and if such were the situation I would suggest that the first thing should be to proceed with such schemes. On the other hand, if we come to the conclusion that the conditions which have made life so difficult for us in the past are of our own creation and invention, then I believe we should attack the problem from the point of view of endeavouring to eliminate those conditions. The committee, as was stated in a certain newspaper editorial, can be the architects of an enduring and beneficent reform, or the authors of tragic failure. I thought those words were significant when I read them, and I still think so. Let us hope that out of the deliberations of the committee shall come enduring and beneficent reforms, and nothing that resembles failure in any way, shape or form.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, at the present time we are discussing an unknown quantity, and it is pretty hard for anyone to tell what the post-war period will be. The government of the country is at present in the hands of a few individuals—or of a large number of individuals—who have no direct mandate from the people, but who have been assigned certain duties by a committee of parliament which is commonly known as the government of this country. Those people have been delegated certain powers by the government, and in virtue of that situation parliament is not fulfilling its functions. What we have to do now is to try to find ways and means of correcting the situation I have described.

I hope I have made myself clear enough. I am wondering how a member of parliament or any group of members can decide upon a remedy to what will be wrong in the post-war period. In the first place, when will it come? No one knows. What will it be? No one knows. During that time will Canada still be a part of the British empire? It is very possible, but no one knows. Will Canada be part of the United States of America? It is possible; no one knows. Will Canada be an independent country? No one knows. It seems to me that in order to express any opinion respecting the future one must be better informed on the present situation.

A friend of mine suggested to me this evening that members of parliament are fulfilling the duties of an economic council. We are trying to act as the antidote to the poison which is distilled by the bureaucracy we now have in Ottawa. We shall be the antidote. Shall we succeed? It is hard to tell. I do not believe any remedy of social conditions should be artificial. Sometimes the best cure of social evils is as simple as some cures for human ailments. Sometimes the most simple cure is the most effective.

We have heard about health conditions, and about employment and unemployment in the post-war period. This is a very grave problem. What will happen to all the boys who enlisted in the army and who are doing so well? We are all proud of them. At times I have to complain about the brass hats; but no one is more proud than I of the Canadian army. If they need our support now, then they will need our support—intelligent support—when the war is over. Who believes that all those fine men who are now in the three branches of the armed services will come back to Canada to do pick-and-shovel work? Who thinks that those brilliant students who interrupted their studies to enter the armed services, either as volunteers or as trainees, will be ready to accept nothing but the dredging of the St. Lawrence waterways? Will they be ready to accept the dole? Will those fine young men who have been flying over the continents, taking a bird's-eye view of the universe, be ready to renounce all those dreams which are legitimate and which youth holds precious? Will they be prepared to start at the bottom of the ladder as common labourers? I have great respect for the common labourer. I believe sincerely the late Reverend Father Vaughan, the great English Jesuit Father, was right when he said that there is no honest work which reflects shame on the person who performs it. On the other hand, those who are fighting for the liberation of the world from certain doctrines denounced by all the democracies have every reason to think of their own future. No one has a right to assume for a single moment that a young man who goes into the army is committing suicide. I have said before, and I repeat, that my deep belief is that it is a great mistake to bring before those young men who are ready to do anything to save this country only the idea of sacrifice.

It tires me to listen to the kind of talk that is heard in this dominion. The idea that should be brought before the eyes of our youth is that of victory over any foe. Not only that; the idea of victory carries with it the idea of superiority. That is a noble feeling; it is a feeling that should be in the hearts of all the citizens of this country who are well born, who are worthy of the liberties that are given to them. I say, let us put aside this idea of inviting our young men to come into the army only with the idea of making a sacrifice. Let us give them an opportunity to do all they can, not only for us but for their own personal benefit.

I am sure that even if the history of Dieppe is repeated, the great majority of the young men, the men of middle age and the older men who are in the army in any theatre of war—I insist upon those words—will come back to this country. They know what happened in the past, and they do not want to be accorded the same treatment given to the veterans of the last war by the Borden or union government. They will not be satisfied with that. Some time before the war a former leader of the opposition who belonged to the Conservative party stated publicly that he feared a revolution. There was no war at the time. Think of the bitter disappointment these well gifted young men will have if nothing decent is offered to them when they come back to this country!

It shows one thing. Those who objected to the uprooting of the best elements in this country had a hard and painstaking task, but the fact remains that the more that remain at home, the less the government will have to do in reconstruction work. There are plants that do not live after they are uprooted, that cannot live when they are transplanted. There are also trees that never bear fruit after they are transplanted. This may be all right for some, but it is bad for others. Let me remind the house that when we were fighting for the spirit as well as the new letter of the selective service system—by new letter I mean that we fought for the spirit before the letter was printed—we thought it was vital that certain classes essential for the public welfare should not be disorganized. If the farmers do not belong to that class, I do not know who does.

I remember distinctly at the start of the war that I had the support of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when I submitted certain cases to him. I had some trouble, and I wrote to my lamented friend, the former Minister of Justice, in fact I wrote to nearly all the ministers to tell them exactly what I am telling the house now. We are carrying on a fine war effort; everybody appreciates it, but that is not the only thing. It is easy to start to think of the future, but when we were working for the farmers we were thinking of the future. We were thinking of the trouble we now find ourselves in. We want this country to survive, not for just a short period after the war but for all time. We want the citizens of this country to be as prosperous as they deserve to be. I listened to some statistics which were given by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) in connection with different parts of Canada including the province of Quebec. I have not all his statistics at hand, but he said, if I am not mistaken, that in 1940 infant mortality in Quebec city was 130. I have here the "Canada Year Book" of 1942 where, at page 137, under the heading "Infantile mortality", I find this:

> The Quebec rate continues to show steady improvement, having decreased from 100 in 1937 to 83, 78 and 70, respectively, for the following three years.

There is progress. The health units are doing exceptionally well in the province of Quebec, and my native province now compares favourably with any other part of Canada in regard to health improvement and sanitary conditions generally.

So many things have been said in this debate, Mr. Speaker, that it is hard to summarize them all, but there are a couple of things I desire to mention now. First, there is this idea of centralization. I am against it. In my humble view one of the guiding principles of Liberalism is that of decentralization; and if my grandfather, with many Ontario reformers, voted against confederation when he was a member of the legislative assembly, it was precisely because he feared the dangers of centralization in one government. Health is purely a local matter, and the tribute that was paid by my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar to Alberta is evidence that the provinces do these things very well. I should like him to come and visit my constituency. I should be very glad to take him around and show him the health units so that he could see for himself the progress that has been made in that regard.

There are, however, different ways of working for the betterment of health amongst our fellow citizens. One of them is to try to lessen unemployment in this country. That is the view which the member for Témiscouata had in mind when he made a special study of unemployment in this country and also made a survey of the cattle and horses and other live stock which the settlers in his district possessed.

But there was more to it. I know very well that there are other things, clothes especially, which can be very useful to the poor and help to keep them in good health. My hon. friend the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche) must remember that before the war, when he was the deputy minister of national defence—and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) must remember it too—I went to both of them and asked for some old army clothing to give to the settlers. I got some until the end of the year 1940; then, after a committee of the house had gone into the matter, it was impossible for me to get any more. How was that? What use was made of those clothes? Of course, Mr. Speaker, the health of our Canadian citizens should be looked after from the time a child is born, and even before that because care should be taken of the mother; that is done in all civilized countries. When a child is born it is a very delicate little thing and needs great care and warm clothes.

I do not forget that some of our most eminent citizens have come from very poor families. There in my constituency were poor settlers. They were settled on rocks, and were very poor. I shall not insist upon the unpleasant scenes that occurred when my party was in opposition and when I mentioned these people. I shall not mention them to-night because the debate is on such a high level that we must not bring into it any political partisanship. But let me tell you, sir, what was done with those old clothes. Many of these settlers had been transplanted from the cities into rural sections which were not fit for colonization, and they found themselves in very hard circumstances, so much so that their little ones had no warm clothing to put on in the winter time. The consequence was that they had to stay indoors, which was prejudicial to their health. When I was able to get for them those long military coats, some of them worn out, but still able to provide warmth, the mothers would cut them down and tailor them to fit their young children, so that they could go out in the winter time and play in the sun and breathe the fresh air. Then a committee of this house sat which did not know these facts, and after that it was impossible for us to get any more of those old clothes for the children of the settlers. I got in touch with the officer in charge of the matter in the Department of Finance. Mind you, sir, he was a very nice man, and he told me that he would be pleased to do it, but he said that his authority for doing it had been taken away from him and that the thing simply could not be done. When I went to the Department of National Defence to beg for some of those old clothes for the poor children of my county, they said, "We cannot do it. The committee of the house has decided against it."

We should not wait until these little children are all dead or have suffered from the cold before we decide to look after them. There is no plan of social security or social insurance which will resuscitate them after they are dead or after they contract an illness like tuberculosis or anything which will be for them a predisposition to death. We complain that so many young men are unfit for military service. That was the complaint of the Minister of National War Services, whose excellent speech about it in London, Ontario, had wide publicity in the press. We complain about it and some think that we shall cure all that with paper and with insurance policies. We cannot wait until after the deliberations of the committee; it must be done right away. These people have not the opportunities of the children of members of the House of Commons to be well fed, well clothed, and so on; they need help at once. It is not a pleasure; it is a humiliation to go to anyone to beg for clothes, and if the thing is done it is on account of the supreme duty which Canadian citizens have, which men have, to help each other.

The Prime Minister and some of his colleagues are listening to me now. I thank them and all hon. members for listening to me, but I tell them that there is something more important than any plan which is concocted by a doctor of economics or of political science from Queen's university, the university of Toronto or anywhere else. What is important now is to visualize what is going on, to recognize the immediate needs of the nation and to provide the remedy and the cure. We cannot wait while these people suffer from the carelessness of all with regard to them. We must open our eyes and see what is going on.

I hope that this war is the last that not only ourselves but even future generations will see. We do not know about the future, but whether we have war or peace it is essential that our fellow citizens shall enjoy the best possible health; and I do not see why old clothes which may be sold to the Jews as rags would not be put to better use if they were given to the mothers of little children to clothe them and enable them to go out in the winter time and breathe fresh air. Distribution should be made alike to needy Jews and Gentiles; there should be neither Jew nor Gentile in such a distribution; it should be to all Canadians who need it. As far as I am concerned I would pay freight, and I know every hon. member would be ready to do the same thing.

This is not an affair of propaganda of any kind; it is a matter of helping our people with the "left-overs"; it is the best possible recuperation, better than any plan of social reorganization in this country. As I said to a former chairman of the committee of the whole when he was speaking of patriotism, "If all Canadians are dead, to whom will you preach patriotism?" This is the time to see to it. I do not believe much in all the plans for the future if we do not make the present safe for our own people.

On motion of Mr. Hlynka the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 5, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if at an early day he will be willing to move that the auditor general's report be referred to the public accounts committee. This committee has not met since the war began, and while perhaps the whole house must to some extent share responsibility for this situation, I believe the Prime Minister and all hon. members will agree that in view of the huge increases in governmental expenditures the country will expect the fullest possible scrutiny of these outlays, in the public interest. In my opinion the reference of the auditor general's report to the public accounts committee should be an annual automatic procedure in the same fashion that the annual report and accounts of the Canadian National Railways are referred each year to the railway committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My impression had been that every year the auditor general's report has been referred to the public accounts committee. No motion in that regard has been made thus far, but I shall undertake to see that the report tabled this year is referred to the committee.

OFFICE ECONOMIES CONTROL

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENTS OF COLONEL JOHN THOMPSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a press report appearing in last evening's Ottawa Journal, in which Colonel John Thompson, director of government office economy control, is reported to have said that he found it increasingly impossible to cope with all the crazy waste and extravagance, and that evasion, subterfuge and outright trickery are being used to nullify his work. When the public accounts committee is convened I would ask that Colonel Thompson be summoned as a witness.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The words quoted by my hon. friend make it appear as though he were seeking to give information rather than obtain it. However I shall leave it to my colleague the Minister of National War Services to reply to his question.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I may tell my hon. friend that I did not hear of the subject matter of the newspaper article in question until late yesterday afternoon, when I immediately instituted inquiries. When I did so I had in mind that it would not be fair to take for granted everything stated in the article. The director of economies has already informed me that he does not give statements to the press. I also had in mind that members of the public service of Canada generally would feel that they had been condemned publicly without being given the opportunity to state their side of the case to the responsible officials, or to the ministers of the several departments of government in question.

I also had in mind that the best, if not indeed the only method of effecting economies is to explain new and cheaper methods of administration and to try for cooperation which, in my opinion, is always forthcoming when a reasonable and timely appeal is made to our loyal and patriotic service, known as the civil service body.

It also came to my mind that the government itself, in desiring to practise economy, had been responsible for setting up the directorate in question. I also remembered having offered to give my support to the director to the end of helping him to make a success of what is indeed a very difficult task, due to the very great variety of questions and problems which must be, and are, brought to his attention. It was also borne in upon me that should there be any evasion, subterfuge or trickery the Minister of National War Services should be the first person to hear of it. I also realized that the heavy work of the war-time departments cannot be done without the necessary tools. Modern administrative practice demands certain information, office appliances, equipment, plans, and means of communicating rapidly sometimes, and sometimes to large numbers of persons concerned.

I think the proper objective is to help in such way that the work can be done well, smoothly and at a minimum of cost. I believe I may add that it is well known to the director of economies that if he needs additional staff he has but to ask for it, when I will immediately take up the need with the civil service commission.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National War Services in connection with the statement made by Colonel Thompson, the government economies director. I read this for the purpose of asking the minister whether the rather astounding allegation made is in accordance with the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has dealt with that already.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has not been dealt with and that is the reason I am bringing it up. It is the question of setting up the committee of public accounts that was dealt with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This reads:

Thousands of dollars had been spent on office supplies, furniture and equipment, he charged, without the requisitions ever having been submitted to him for approval.

I think the house and the country should know from the minister whether those allegations are in accordance with the facts and, secondly, whether or not a complaint, either verbal or in writing, was ever made to the minister by Colonel Thompson against unapproved or unauthorized expenditures being made.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman was not in the house when I made my statement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I say that I have already given an answer to the first question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think I did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, you just travelled all over the lot.

Mr. LaFLECHE: In regard to the second question, the answer is, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In other words, he covered the ground.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

STATEMENT IN QUEBEC LEGISLATURE RESPECTING SINKINGS IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the acting Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. I have already placed in his hand a press dispatch covering a debate which took place yesterday in the legislative assembly of Quebec, in which the premier and others took a prominent part. Is the minister prepared to make a statement in connection with the points then raised?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I looked up the statement, which my hon. friend was good enough to send me. Apparently the matter arose out of something which was said by my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) in Quebec, and the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Gagnon was dealing with the statement of the minister. I have therefore thought it would be more appropriate for my colleague to deal with it, since he will be here on Monday. In the meantime, however, so that there may be no misapprehension, I wish to say I am advised that the statement the Hon. Mr. Gagnon made is definitely not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that apply to the premier as well?

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking of Mr. Gagnon.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that apply to the premier of the province as well?

Mr. RALSTON: I did not refer to him.

Mr. ROWE: He made the same statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: He made another statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I am dealing with Mr. Gagnon's statement.

HEALTH

PRESS REPORT AS TO ANNUAL FEDERAL GRANT TO THE CITY OF HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). Is he correctly reported in to-day's press, in which it is stated that the sum of money allotted by order in council to improve conditions in Halifax is $30,000? Is this relatively small sum the substantial amount to which he referred last night?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The sum which will be granted for the purposes specified will be $30,000 a year during each year of the war, and continued one year thereafter. But for the first year the sum will be $45,000, and for the second year $15,000 to assist in the construction of a hospital for tuberculosis.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

PRESS REPORT AS TO PROPOSAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF ROAD FROM PRINCE GEORGE TO WHITE HORSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). A press dispatch from Washington published to-day states that Secretary of the Interior Ickes has written a letter to the chairman of the house of representatives committee on roads, recommending the enactment of a bill authorizing the construction of a $25,000,000 highway to Alaska. Apparently this is to be a second Alaska highway, to start at Prince George, and to join the present Alcan highway at White Horse, in the Yukon territory. Would the Prime Minister make a statement to the house concerning this matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of his question, and in reply may I say I am informed that the bill to which the report alludes was introduced in the last session of congress, and was reintroduced in the present session, in January. In each case the bill was introduced by interested members, and there is no indication that it has been looked upon as an administration measure. In each case it was referred to the appropriate congressional committees.

The Canadian government has received no intimation that the United States government is anxious that the proposed road should be constructed at this time. I cannot of course say what the policy of the United States is with regard to such matters, but I assume it is the same as the policy of the Canadian government. That policy is to build such roads as are required for the successful prosecution of the war, but not to divert a single man or a single machine to the construction of highways that are not required for this purpose.

There has been no indication either through the defence board or through diplomatic channels that the United States government considers the construction of a road from Prince George to White Horse necessary for the prosecution of the war.

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY

DISCUSSIONS OF FINANCIAL PROBLEMS IN LONDON —QUESTION AS TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) arising out of a Canadian Press dispatch dated March 3, as follows:

> Important conferences on post-war currency and other financial problems "of common interest" are proceeding in London, a treasury announcement said to-day. The statement said one conference has "just been held". It was attended by finance ministers of allied countries with headquarters in London and representatives of the United States, Russia, China, the Dominions and the Fighting French.

[Mr. Green.]

I would ask this question: Was Canada represented and, secondly, if so who was the representative?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A day or two ago the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) asked me a question with regard to a similar report, and I replied as follows:

> The information I am in a position to give is that there has been no exchange of correspondence. Informal discussions on post-war economic and financial questions have taken place from time to time between Canadian officials and experts from the United Kingdom and the United States, and these discussions will doubtless continue. No commitments have been made by the Canadian government, and no commitments are likely to be made in the near future.

I notice that in the communication my hon. friend quoted the word used is "conference". I am inclined to think that some of these terms are used without attaching to them the significance which may be attached in the minds of others. There have been discussions, but so far as I know there has been nothing in the nature of what one would call a formal conference.

The high commissioner in London, I believe, has discussed informally some of these matters with representatives of other countries. One or two officials have gone from Canada to the United Kingdom and have, I believe, on occasions discussed informally financial questions. But there has been no formal conference, nor am I aware of our having received any official communication which would indicate that anything in the nature of a conference in these matters had been or was being held.

My hon. friend will understand and the house will no doubt appreciate the fact that there are frequent informal discussions on all matters pertaining to the war, and to post-war conditions, among officials of different governments of the united nations. But they are exploratory and informal, and not to be construed as in any way binding the governments concerned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SOCIAL INSURANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a select committee to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the people of Canada will welcome the long overdue decision of the government to set up a special committee of the house to study the problem of social security. In my opinion this committee should be called the parliamentary social security research committee because its primary task will be research. The government should be congratulated upon having recognized the need for taking this step in the right direction. I only hope that this mountain of plans does not give birth to a mouse. I shall therefore leave any further commendation and congratulations until the results start coming in.

If I understand it correctly, the purpose of the committee is to explore all fields with a view to formulating a plan to free our people from want. This freedom from want appears to me to be the most ambiguous of the four freedoms enunciated by the President of the United States, particularly in view of the fact that this problem of want exists in the midst of plenty. To my mind that is something which is really phenomenal. Is it not strange, when science has progressed so far in every field of endeavour that the people of the world can hardly keep up with its inventions and benefits, to find that the science of government is lagging behind everything else? The people themselves must wake up to the fact that they must do their part if they want democracy to function properly. The people of this country must realize that unless they force—I use the word "force" advisedly—the governments, provincial and federal, to bring about the results which the people want, then they themselves will have to take the blame.

I see no earthly reason why the people of Canada should have to exist—they are existing, not living, because they are living a life the people of this rich land should not have to live—for a number of years under the poverty line. There is no physical reason for that situation in a country such as Canada. The motto of this group is that what is physically possible must be made financially possible, and I think that is a valuable motto to follow. We notice that the government has been concerned greatly over the various ceilings that have been in force during war time. That is rightly so because many of those ceilings are essential. But when we are discussing the setting up of a committee to study post-war reconstruction, we must see to it that one of the recommendations to be brought in by that committee shall be the providing of a floor which will protect our citizens who are climbing up the ladder of life so that they will not fall into the basement of poverty, degradation and other evils which no human being should have to face. Let us build a hole-proof floor, accommodated with springs, which will help to raise our people to the level they should be on in order that they may live as human beings. Let us build a floor upon which the poorest and the humblest may stand in dignity, leaving to them the sky as the limit for their advancement and initiative.

In my opinion there are five main requisites or requirements which we must guarantee to our people in peace time if we want this nation to advance among the nations of the world. In any social security measure which the committee recommends after it has studied the whole field, provision should first be made that no person in Canada shall go hungry. Food is something we have too much of in Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not at present.

Mr. HLYNKA: Even at the present time we have more food than we need, and more than any other nation in the world. The first requirement, I say, is that no person in Canada shall go hungry, and the problem we must solve is to distribute the food we have.

The next requirement is clothing. There is no reason in the world why our people should go around shabby and shivering in the cold weather when we have all kinds of clothing rotting in the stores right across Canada. There is no reason in the world why our people should not have the clothing that is proper for any man who wants to preserve his dignity.

The next requirement is shelter, and here I want to quote from an item which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of May 5, 1942. I should like hon. members to note that what I am going to read happened in Ottawa, the capital city of Canada. This is what the Journal says:

> Eleven more homeless children found shelter with the Children's Aid Society late Monday as bailiffs, executing delayed eviction orders, dispossessed additional low-income group families.
> For one family, the situation was desperate. Bailiffs arrived at one dilapidated tenement to enforce an eviction order, and were reported to have found that the father of a family of five had barricaded the door. Behind it he stood armed with an axe, ready to use it, he warned them. They retired with their eviction order which a welfare agency reported had been issued so that the dwelling could be demolished.
>
> Within were five children and his wife, who was being confined for childbirth. The woman was removed to hospital and neighbours took in the five youngsters.
> Welfare agency officials said heads of the dispossessed families were either soldiers on active service, veterans or men with extremely low-paid jobs.

Those conditions are typical of conditions which have existed and still exist in certain parts of Canada. There is no physical reason and no justification whatever for our people having had to live under the housing conditions which they were forced to endure for at least the last two decades. We had, during peace time at least, all the raw materials to provide the housing our people needed. We had all the bricks, all the lumber, and all the labour that was required, and yet our people were forced to live in one-roomed huts in a country like Canada. That certainly was no compliment to any government that held office during that period.

I come to the fourth requirement which is necessary for any adequate social security measure, namely, medical care. We all know that for at least ten years in Canada many doctors were on relief, while at the same time our people were dying because they had no money to provide themselves with the remedies for all sorts of ailments which arose because they had to live below the level of subsistence. There is no physical reason whatsoever why our people should not have all the medical care they need.

The fifth and last requirement is education. I have not heard any hon. member include education in the field of social security, but I would certainly include it. There is no reason why every citizen of Canada should not be given all the education that we can possibly give him. All education should, in my opinion, be absolutely free. If a young man or a young woman wants to go on through a university, that opportunity should be provided. We must educate our people so that they may enjoy the life to which they are entitled and develop themselves along the lines for which their aptitudes fit them. We must, therefore, see to it that all the people of Canada are provided with an adequate education. In passing, let me say that about a year ago I noticed pictures in the newspapers glorifying the idea that at last Canada was providing an education even for its adult people, and of course it was free. When I saw those pictures in the newspapers I felt ashamed that we should endeavour to pull the wool over the eyes of our people by attempting to prove that we were so progressive because we gave adults an education to which they were really entitled in their teens. That was the time they should have received their education, and that was the time we failed. Now we attempt to cover that up. Certainly we should not advertise it. As a matter of fact, we were priding ourselves on giving adults of forty and fifty years of age an education that they should have had long ago. I trust that education will receive the serious consideration of the committee.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

I come now to the problem of the aged people. I intend to discuss this matter when the old age pensions estimates are brought down. Even though I wish to devote only a few minutes to the discussion of this problem at the present time, I feel that I cannot do too much to bring it to the attention of the committee which is to be set up.

This is the story of any one hundred young Canadians who, at the age of twenty-five, are strong, healthy and hopeful. Forty years later thirty-six of them are dead; one—only one—is well-to-do; four live comfortably; five are gainfully employed, and fifty-four are entirely dependent upon relatives and friends. In other words, the statistical information which I have been able to obtain shows that over half of every hundred men we have in this country will eventually land in the undignified position of having to beg. That illustrates clearly the fate of many of our men. Let me read at this stage from an editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin of March 12, 1942. The Bulletin, one of our Alberta dailies, is one of the most progressive if not the most progressive newspaper in our province, and at all times it has been a champion of the cause of the aged people. Here are a few sentences from this particular editorial:

> Canada has neglected the one object which requires more generous treatment than any other.
> Canadians lag behind every member of the British commonwealth of nations and behind the United States in providing social security and social justice for our own aged, distressed and worthy pioneers.

It goes on:

> At this session of parliament—

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that this was written early in the last session.

> —we must add to our present unemployment insurance those further measures of health insurance and an adequate retirement allowance which will give at least thirty dollars a month to our aged people at the age of sixty, without the present cruel and unjust regulations.

The concluding paragraph states:

> There is no question of money involved because the old methods of orthodox finance have disappeared in the necessities of war, and properly so.

I believe that we should provide a pension for every man who has reached the age of sixty and whose income is not sufficient to maintain him at a proper standard of living. In addition it is my conviction that our women, the mothers of Canada, should be granted a pension at the age of fifty-five.

The reason why I favour the mothers is that any woman who has gone through fifty-five years of her life and has brought up a family deserves a compensation from the country; she deserves to share in the heritage which we all should have, a part of which we all should enjoy. Unless our mothers are taken care of, there will be a repetition of the condition which was depicted in this house last night, when it was pointed out that in the four years 1932-35, 33,000 mothers died in childbirth and 70,000 children died under one year of age. During the last war Canada lost 60,000 men in four years, but during the four-year period 1932-35 103,000 infants and mothers perished. That is a fact we should consider and take to heart.

Let me read an extract from a letter which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin of January 12, 1942. It is written by an elderly man expressing his sentiments on this subject:

> I am sixty-two and not able to get a job owing to my general health and age. I am within eight years of the age now, but by the time I am seventy years old I won't need the pension. I often wonder where my next meal will come from and to go and ask for relief is like signing a death sentence to get anything.

He goes on:

> How many are there that live to be seventy that ever enjoy his or her old age pension? . . . So if we get the age pension at sixty we may enjoy a little of it.
> I came here in 1900 and before Edmonton was very much of a town I helped build up the country and now it is hard to get a living out of it.

That man is only sixty-two, but he feels that by the time he would be entitled to the old age pension he will not be here. Of course that is the prospect of most of the older people. Imagine, they have to wait until they are seventy before they get what is coming to them! Our old age pension regulations are not a gesture of kindness; they are a gesture of inhumanity. Why could we not include the people who are physically incapacitated?

Right in this city of Ottawa, when I got off the train on one occasion, I saw an old man playing a violin near the Chateau Laurier hotel when the temperature was about ten degrees below zero. Surely that poor old man could not have produced a melody had he been paid a thousand dollars for it, because he was too old, and his hands were cold. He had an old cap that someone had thrown away and that he had probably picked up out of a garbage can. The poor man had to play the violin so that someone would throw him a penny. I appeal to every hon. member this afternoon to see to it that we take these people off the streets and give them a pension. Let them be medically examined, and if they are found to be totally incapacitated they should be given a pension whether they are thirty, forty or fifty years of age. In almost every Canadian city we find men who are minus both legs sitting on a cement pavement with the temperature at forty degrees below zero and trying to beg for their living. I suggest that these men who are given certificates to be allowed to beg should be taken off the streets and given proper care and food and clothing, and at least some of them might be able to do a little for this country. I want to emphasize that particular problem. I feel ashamed when I see these men minus their legs sitting on a cement sidewalk in front of a building when the temperature is forty degrees below zero. That sort of thing should not exist in Canada. This man should not be playing the violin in order to beg, when the temperature is below zero. Let us not be a nation of beggars, let us try to solve some of these problems. It reminds me of an incident when one poor man who had lost both legs was sitting in front of a big department store in Edmonton holding out two hats. A chap going by said, "What's the idea, holding out two hats instead of one?" Well, the poor fellow was miserable, he thought he might collect more by stretching out both hands. He said, "Well, business is so good I am branching out!"

Let us tackle these problems properly and solve them. There is no excuse for not looking after our aged people, the pioneers of this country. I know scores of people in western Canada who went there and cleared the land of stones, cultivated it and made it almost a garden, and what have they to-day? The mortgage companies came in and foreclosed and those people were thrown out. If they apply for old age pensions, some clerks who do not even understand what life is all about will order these old pioneers away, these men who should be treated with courtesy, to whom we should extend a helping hand and say, This is your share of our heritage, something which you deserve. But they are cut off the old age pension if it is found that they have a dollar or have someone to whom they can go and perhaps sleep in the basement.

While I am on this subject let me make a plea to the committee to be set up, also to the government and particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There is one thing that has been overlooked for many years. I believe there are not many hon. members who see it in the light that I see it. We have in western Canada many of these pioneers who settled in blocks. This is not the situation in the cities, but these pioneers who come from Ukrainian or Polish or perhaps German stock have settled together in certain blocks. They had no opportunity to learn the English language. When they apply for citizenship or naturalization certificates they are refused because they have no knowledge of English. It is not their fault. We must realize that they had no opportunity to learn. They have lived in this country for ten or fifteen or twenty years and their sons and daughters are Canadian born. Surely the mother of a son who is perhaps serving this country in the army should be compensated and able to apply for a pension. To-day I have in my office scores of letters from such mothers. They are appealing to me to do something for them. One old mother about seventy-five years of age had one son. This son is married and his assigned pay had to go to his wife and children, so that he could not help his mother. The mother had to go on relief, and the municipality gives her $5 a month. What can one do with $5 a month? She cannot apply for an old age pension because she is not a citizen of Canada even though she has lived here for forty-two years. This is something that should be solved.

I am told I have only five minutes left, so I hasten on to mention some of the matters that have been in my mind for quite a while. I hope in all seriousness that the purpose of setting up this committee is not in order to draft a charter for an election. I should like to see it a charter for social security, but so many of these measures that are framed appear to be devoid of everything but perhaps a catch for another election. I say to the government, that it has all the freedom it wants, let us see that this problem is tackled in a proper manner, forgetting about elections. If they have to come they will come; if not, so much the better for the country during war time. This measure must not be a charter for a new election; if it is, the people of Canada will resent it.

In conclusion, I would suggest a method by which we may approach this problem of social security. I spoke of food; why not take the same provision which is now made for our men in the armed forces and say that this shall be used to supply our old people and those who are in need of food. Immediately after the war substitute one for the other. We talk about clothing; why not say that the item which now appears in our budget for uniforms and clothing for our people in the armed services will be used in peace time to provide clothes for those of our people who have not the proper kind of clothing? We are manufacturing aeroplanes, guns and all sorts of materials for war purposes. Why not say that we are going to continue to use the appropriations we have devoted to these purposes in order to meet the needs of our people in regard to education, health and so on. All that is necessary after the war is to select a few of these things and substitute the new demands that will come upon us.

In my opinion neither this nor any other government should look for any commendation or congratulation for having attempted to deal with this problem. I think this action is long overdue; and, if I may say so, if this government did not wish to take this step of its own volition, it would be forced to do so by public opinion, for this question of social security is now very much in the air. Let us then face this problem squarely and deal with it on a humanitarian basis so that we may hold up our heads in dignity, instead of doing as some hon. members would have us do, promise too much and then of course be unable to carry out our promises.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate merely because of the urgency of certain matters which I believe should be brought to the attention of the house to be dealt with now instead of waiting until this committee presents a lengthy report. In the eyes of many people the appointment of a committee has come to be synonymous with an attempt to stall. We have had committees set up which sat for a long time and brought in reports which were implemented only in part if at all. I refer in particular to the reconstruction committee of last year, whose report was not implemented; and I refer also to the Sirois commission of some years ago, on whose report no action whatever was taken. I mention these committees and commissions because many people have come to think that the setting up of a committee means an attempt to find a way out from under, and I want to emphasize that if the government looks upon this committee as a way out from under, Canada will face a most serious situation.

I believe that instead of setting up this committee the government should have created a ministry of reconstruction, headed by a minister who would have charge of all matters of social security, reconstruction and rehabilitation. Australia now has such a minister and Australia is still liable to attack by the Japanese. This was brought home to us very clearly only yesterday by the sinking of that huge convoy of Japanese transports which was definitely trying to establish a jumping-off place for an attack on the Australian mainland. If Australia, while in peril of attack, can go ahead and establish a ministry of reconstruction, how much more should we in Canada, where invasion is a remote possibility, be able to set up a department. The advantages of having a minister of reconstruction, as against this committee, are that a minister is a concrete, definite thing. He has a department; he is there every day; the problems that come up can be discussed with him and he can deal with them as they arise, instead of waiting, waiting, waiting for the report of a committee. There are enough matters of pressing urgency to justify the establishment of a minister of reconstruction, and that is why I am speaking to-day.

I will mention two matters which I consider to be of immediate and almost imperative urgency. The first is the question of the children of Canada. In England after the blitz they found that the school system as they knew it broke down to a certain extent. Children were evacuated; both parents were working in war industries or in many cases the father was overseas with the army, and they found that the children were not being adequately supervised at home. This became a matter of very pressing emergency. What did they do? In the first place they set up a series of crèches. Then they set up nursery schools where children could be taken at a very early age. There they were housed, fed, kept clean, looked after and supervised for the entire day. They were not allowed to fend for themselves on the streets; they were well looked after. The result of the establishment of these kindergarten schools has been that in England to-day there is actually less child delinquency than there was, and, what is far more important, the health of the children is better than it was before the war. The organized care and supervision of older children also is vital in the prevention of juvenile delinquency. These are problems which face us to-day. We cannot wait. We cannot wait even until the end of the session. I know good work is being done in certain sections. Certain municipalities have these things already, but it should be a nation-wide system. It is essential that in the poorest and most congested sections these schools be established.

I have one other point in mind, and that is the health of the nation. Many medical doctors have been called into the armed services, with the result that members of the medical profession who remain in Canada are tremendously overworked. Particularly is this so in districts in which we have large war industries. Doctors are working fifteen or sixteen hours a day, trying to cope with the increased number of patients. Not only do we find that there are fewer doctors to go round, but the doctors left have infinitely more to do.

I suggest that we must face the possibility of epidemics. Perhaps I might just mention the influenza epidemic of the last war. Nearly all epidemics can be checked before they get properly started, if wise prophylaxis is employed. I suggest that the war workers in large war industries be given an opportunity to have a complete check-up every three months, so that the health chart of the nation can be known precisely, and so that there may be no tendency toward growth of tuberculosis in congested areas. In a similar fashion the growth of other epidemics could be checked before they were too far advanced. In England I believe such a check-up is compulsory, but in Canada it might be done on a voluntary basis. I suggest to the minister that the two things I have mentioned be undertaken now. Few people doubt the necessity for them. Let us undertake them now, before we find ourselves with a problem on our hands.

We have one problem already, namely that of the children. Let us see to it that we do not have to face epidemics. We can solve the problem with respect to the children—at least the English have solved it, and they have also solved the problem of epidemics. Let us see to it that we meet and overcome both these dangers.

I am glad to be a member of the committee. Service on committees of this sort is one of our greatest and proudest duties. We know that the individual human being is the most important thing in our civilization. That is where we differ from all other types of government. This is the committee which will set out to look after the interests of that individual. No other work can possibly be as important.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it is a long time since I last addressed the house, and on this occasion I do not intend to make a speech. I shall try rather to make only a few random remarks.

First of all I should like to pay humble tribute to all those who have made and are making their contribution to Canada's great and splendid war effort—the armed forces, the merchant marine, their wives, mothers and sweethearts, the fishermen, the war workers in industry, and, last but not least, the farmers of Canada, to whose natural hazards have been added the handicaps of shortages of labour and materials. Theirs was a voluntary effort. With the rest of the empire Canada did not wait for the invader's boot, because it did not need the spur of invasion.

The other day an hon. member sitting opposite said in the course of his remarks that he could understand what the Conservatives and the Progressive Conservatives were talking about; he could understand what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were talking about; he could understand what hon. members to my left were talking about, but he utterly failed to understand what members of this group mean, and what they discuss. I am not going to say that that hon. member was speaking for all members of his party; I happen to know he does not. I believe however that there is a large element of truth in what he said, and to me the reason is fairly obvious, because all other parties believe more or less in the same thing, and, I may say, their objectives are more or less the same. For instance I believe most members of other groups in the house, except this one, would agree that they believe in the creation of employment for all. They would agree on a planned production. I believe they agree on centralization. I have heard several hon. members sitting opposite speak favourably of internationalism, an international bank and an international police force. I think most hon. members, with the exception of those in this group, are in favour of more and more taxation, and most of them seem to believe in the removal of tariffs.

I think that situation is more or less crystallized in Alberta; for in that province you see two parties to-day, namely the Social Credit party and the so-called Independents. The Independents are made up of Liberals, Conservatives—that is, Progressive and otherwise—and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Mr. JAQUES: They sit in opposition.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are in opposition but you are not in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. JAQUES: They are in agreement in their criticism.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, no, they are not.

Mr. JAQUES: The leader of the independents was a former Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member of this house.

Mr. MacINNIS: He is no longer the leader.

Mr. JAQUES: He was. Instead of the creation of employment, we believe in the creation of leisure. We believe in a planned consumption rather than a planned production. We believe in decentralization. We believe in nationalism rather than in internationalism. We believe in the abolition of taxation. We believe that the fundamental remedy which will have to be applied is the distribution internally of the purchasing power necessary to consume the whole of our production so that we may consume all imports which are exchanged for our exports.

Finally, I think the majority of the members of all the other groups in the house agree with the Beveridge plan, but this group does not and I think I can say that social crediters all over the world do not agree with it. They agree with the idea of security, but they do not agree with this method of obtaining security.

The first I heard of the Beveridge plan was over the radio, over the red network, or perhaps I should say the CBC. The announcer told us that the author of this plan, Sir William Beveridge, admitted that it would involve a trip half-way to Moscow. Therefore I was not surprised when I received the book to find that its cover was mostly red. After skimming through the contents I came to the conclusion that the red cover was the only novelty. It is simply an old scheme of national insurance; in fact it was adopted in England long before the last war when it was copied from Germany. The Germans initiated it, and possibly that is what Sir William meant when he said he was going half-way to Moscow to find the solution. I have been down below in the storeroom looking at the old government handbooks dating back almost to the times of confederation and the only colour I could see was blue. I have heard of blue books and white papers, and we now have a red book, or at least half red. As the author says, it is half-way to Moscow.

I should like to say a few words about the birthplace of this idea, the London school of economics. This school was founded by a Fabian socialist before the last war and was financed by Sir Ernest Cassel, a German Jew international financier who I believe endowed it with a million pounds sterling. The admitted purpose of the school was to train a bureaucracy for the future world socialist state. Sir William Beveridge, I understand, is a director of the London school of economics. Another member of its alumni is our own chairman of the post-war reconstruction committee, Doctor James. Doctor James believes in and is working for the establishment of the gold standard. The other day, while addressing the Montreal chamber of commerce, he said this:

We realize—

I am not sure who "we" is.

. . . that the world of to-morrow will not be identical with the pleasant and familiar scene which lay before our eyes in 1939.

I infer from this that he looks to see a world considerably different, a less pleasant place after the war than it was before. I remember during the last war they said that all we had to do was to hang the kaiser and we would have a world fit for heroes to live in. They did not actually hang the kaiser, but they put him out of business and all I can say is that the world was a much less happy place without the kaiser than it had been with him. According to Doctor James, the world is going to be a less pleasant place without Herr Hitler than it was with him. Those are the words of Doctor James, not mine.

According to his book, Sir William proposes to give £4 or $20 for a birth, and £20 for a funeral. Apparently a person will be worth more dead than he is alive. Then Sir William says:

Freedom from idleness is far more important than freedom from want.

It will be seen that he has added a fifth freedom to the four freedoms, namely, freedom from idleness. Another distinguished member of the London school of economics is Professor Laski, who is professor of political history at the school. He is internationally known as a communist, and a few years ago he published an essay in the United States entitled "Recovery through Revolution", from which I quote as follows:

The communist hypothesis . . . insists that no socialist government can attempt seriously to put its principles into practice without encountering determined resistance which will issue in civil war. To maintain socialist principles, in short, socialists will be driven to become communists or to betray their socialism. If they become communists they will find themselves involved in the grim logic of Leninism—the dictatorship of the proletariat, the drastic suppression of counter-revolution, the confiscation of the essential instruments of production, the building of the state, in a word, upon the principles of martial law until the security of the new order is firmly established. The transformation of capitalism into socialism means revolution, and that implies an experience akin to that through which Russia has passed.

Well, we are going half-way to Russia.

The fundamental idea of social insurance is really nothing but compulsory saving. And is not compulsory saving the very remedy adopted by the government at the present time to kill effective demand, or, in other words, to kill prosperity? I am not complaining of that. I believe that the present government is making a very successful and praiseworthy effort in preventing any kind of inflation and in keeping prices down. But my point is this, that one of the main ways of doing it is through compulsory saving. Taxation is, of course, really compulsory saving. The main idea that underlies the Beveridge report is compulsory saving, and does it not stand to reason that it will have the same effect after the war that compulsory saving has during the war, namely, to kill prosperity?

Again, the Beveridge scheme, as I understand it, does not come into full effect for twenty-five years. If there is any merit in the scheme, why wait for twenty-five years? What are they waiting for? I understand that they have to wait until they have accumulated a sufficient fund before they can say: Now we can pay it out to one another. In reality they do not propose to save anything. They do not save any food, they do not save any clothes or anything of that kind. They are simply saving figures. You cannot eat figures; you cannot wear them. Suppose that when the war started this government had said, Sure, we must provide so many hundreds of millions of dollars worth of munitions of all kinds, but we cannot go to work on that yet because it will take us twenty-five years to accumulate the necessary funds, the figures. The same argument holds. If it is a good idea, why should we wait twenty-five years to put it into effect? Why not put it into effect immediately? Why not give assistance at once to those who are unemployed and those who are sick and need pensions or relief of any kind? If we did that, it would provide a great deal of employment for those who will need it.

At the present time, as one of my colleagues reminds me, we are paying the Germans every year a dividend of so many billions of dollars, amounting to well over half our national production, and we do not get anything in exchange for it. In fact, that is the last thing we want. We make a present of the whole thing to the enemy. I remember when members of the house and people outside used to laugh at the social credit idea of paying ourselves a dividend. The thing appeared fantastic to them. Where would you get the money, they asked? It would be impossible, they said. But now we are doing it; only we are paying the dividend to the axis powers, a dividend that amounts to billions of dollars a year, and it seems to me that we are extremely prosperous while we are doing it. We are so prosperous that I imagine the main headache of the government is to kill that prosperity. Can one imagine what our prosperity would have been if, instead of making a present of all this wealth to the enemy, we had turned around and paid it to ourselves? Is there any limit to the prosperity we might have had? There would be no unemployment except of those who were incapacitated.

Since I have mentioned pensions I should like to make a plea in that regard. Whether or not we wait for twenty-five years to implement the Beveridge report or something similar, I would make a plea that we should not wait, I was going to say for twenty-five minutes, but certainly we should not wait for one day to augment the pensions that we are paying to the aged and the infirm and the war widows. They do not even have the cost of living bonus. They are living, many of them, on from ten to fifteen dollars a month. Then we talk about the new order we are going to have. I say, in conclusion, that if we cannot look after the aged and the infirm at the present time I do not think there is much hope for a new and better world after the war.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of participating in this debate but in order to keep the record clear, I think that in view of the attitude I took earlier in relation to unemployment insurance I should make a few observations.

Members may recall that on March 24, 1941, I brought in a bill, No. 21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I explained on that occasion that the purpose of the bill was to provide that the unemployment insurance commission created by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, should cooperate with other authorities in the dominion and the provinces for the purpose of collecting information concerning any plans for providing medical care or compensation in cases of ill health. I should like to read just one paragraph from part V of my bill, under the heading "National Health":

> The duties and powers of the commission under this part of this act shall be exercised, so far as may be found practicable and expedient, in cooperation with any department or departments of the government of Canada, with the Dominion Council of Health, with any province or any number of provinces collectively, or with any municipality or any number of municipalities collectively, or with associations or corporations.
> It shall be the duty of the commission
>
> (a) to assemble reports, publications, information and data concerning any scheme or plan, whether a state, community or other scheme or plan for any group or class of persons, and whether in operation or proposed, in Canada or elsewhere, of providing, on a collective or on a cooperative basis by means of insurance or otherwise, for
> (i) medical, dental and surgical care, including medicines, drugs, appliances, or hospitalization, or
> (ii) compensation for loss of earnings arising out of ill health, accident or disease;

I shall not trouble to read the rest of the proposed amendment but, because there has been some misconception on the part of certain members of the house, it is only right to state at this time that I understand the department of national health has undertaken what I proposed, namely, the gathering of information upon which they purpose drafting a bill. I must agree with that, and am pleased to agree that they have taken, in my judgment, the best possible course to ensure that the bill, when it does emerge from the committee, will not only represent the judgment of the members of the committee and the members of this house, but will receive the support and cooperation of the members of the medical profession.

I might recall to hon. members that when a similar bill was introduced in the legislature of British Columbia some few years ago, it was not done after cooperation and agreement with the members of the medical profession; and as a consequence, although it became the law of that province, it has never become operative. It will be clear to all, I think, that to make any scheme of health insurance operative the most important people to be considered, who will have the responsibility of carrying out such scheme are members of the medical profession; in fact it cannot function at all unless they assist in making it function. The method which has been adopted of gathering information during the last year or so from all interests concerned, particularly the medical and dental professions, will put us in a position to know what their judgment is in regard to the various phases of the bill which it is proposed should emerge as a consequence of the sittings of this select committee.

Before that committee, I take it, all interests may be represented and will be heard and consideration will be given to any presentations which they make. I hope that, after that has taken place, at a very early day a measure will emerge and be placed on the statute book. It is long overdue. I hope it will be possible for the government to bring forward legislation and have it passed before this session concludes.

I might just add, to make the record complete, that being only a private member my bill did not get very far. We have no private members' days, so that it disappeared when we went home for the recess. It was suggested to me that I might make progress if I had it brought forward in another place. As a consequence I had it submitted as Bill

E-3 in the other place, where it had its first reading on May 27, 1941. It did a little better over there than here, because it got through its second reading, but was then defeated. I then submitted it again, on November 6, 1941, and it disappeared with the closing of the session. On February 2, 1942, I reintroduced it and it had its first reading. It will be clear from all this that I favour some such legislation as is proposed at the present time.

It has been mentioned here that this bill requires an amendment of the British North America Act. I wish to refer for a moment to something which has interested me for a number of years. We have in Canada ten departments of health, all doing or trying to do the same job. My belief is that there should be only one department of health and that that should be the department of health of the national government; and in each of the provinces we could very well have branches of the federal department of health which would carry out the decisions of the national body. This in my opinion would save a great deal of duplication of services which are costly, and in a small country such as ours we should always consider the question of cost. Great Britain gets on very well with one department of health, and that country has a population four times as great as ours. You may say that Canada is larger geographically than Great Britain. That is true, but the problems of health are exactly the same. Communicable diseases do not confine themselves to provincial boundaries. Take, for example, influenza; if it starts in British Columbia it will soon be heard of in Ontario and spread speedily to the Atlantic coast. So that what measures of health are necessary in one province are necessary in other provinces. Some local conditions may vary in the different provinces, but these can be dealt with and adjusted effectively, in my judgment, by a federal department of health operating through a branch in the province. So that if it becomes necessary to have an amendment of the British North America Act, I suggest to the government that it take into consideration obtaining authority to develop a national department of health for the whole of Canada instead of the system which prevails at the present moment.

I mentioned a moment ago that this is a question of social security which is long overdue, and I am glad to be able to tell the house that I believe a majority of the medical profession throughout Canada will support a measure of health insurance.

I should like to make a distinction, for the assistance of the members, between health insurance and what is spoken of as state medicine. The fact that the profession approves the principle of health insurance does not mean that it approves state medicine. By "state medicine" is meant a system of medicine which is entirely under the state: the state would bear the full cost, and all doctors, nurses and others giving their care would be on salary provided by the state. The hospitals would become state owned. This is entirely different from what we mean by state health insurance, which means a cooperative plan of contributory insurance operating with state assistance and under state supervision, which provides for its members certain benefits in case of illness. We believe that such a plan should provide the highest standard of health service for all the people.

I do not think that at this time it is desirable or necessary to discuss any phases of the bill which may emerge, because we shall have plenty of opportunity of doing that in the committee. I therefore look forward to the meetings of this committee in the anticipation that the work which has been carried on over a period of months will bear fruit and that ultimately there will be put in the statute books a health insurance bill acceptable and advantageous to all our people.

I want to make just a reference to the question of venereal disease. I believe it is a fact that venereal disease is about twice as prevalent amongst our Canadian forces as amongst the white forces in the United States. If this be true it is desirable that something very radical be undertaken at an early day to improve a deplorable situation.

Mr. MANLEY J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): I have listened with the utmost attention to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bruce). What he said appealed to me most strongly, because I know that he is a man of outstanding ability and attainment in his profession. He has approached the subject from the point of view of the medical practitioner. Being a member of the legal profession I naturally look at the resolution from the point of view of its legal aspects and connotations. Quite frankly, sir, I have many doubts and misgivings as to the tangible results in the immediate future, of the proceedings and deliberations of this committee, because of the constitutional difficulties involved in implementing any charter or resolution such as is contemplated by this resolution.

Let me say at the outset that I am wholly in accord with the spirit, the thought and the ideal which bring this resolution before us at this time. Knowing the humanitarian ideals of charity and Christian brotherhood which he entertains in his heart I for one hope that the vision which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has entertained in this regard might, like the Unemployment Insurance Act which he envisaged twenty years ago, be realized by him at this session or in this parliament, or at least in his lifetime. I am disturbed in this regard, because it took twenty years of effort on the part of not only the present Prime Minister but the leader of the Conservative party, not forgetting my predecessor from West Calgary, Mr. Bennett, to overcome the constitutional difficulties and barriers raised by the provinces to the establishment of a national unemployment insurance act. In this respect I am reminded that the last province to give its consent to a national unemployment insurance act was Alberta. Hon. members during this brief debate may have followed the remarks of the hon. members who come from Alberta and represent the Social Credit party. If the Social Credit members truly reflect the considered opinion and wishes of the government of Alberta, then the fine objectives which are set before us in this resolution and which I think are universally held by the other groups in this house will go unfulfilled because of the constitutional difficulty involved in the British North America Act. One need only read the provisions of the British North America Act, our charter of confederation, to see that the respective fields of provincial and federal legislation are limited. It is not sufficient merely to read the words of the act to appreciate fully the difficulty involved; one must have recourse to the judgments of the various courts which have been called upon to interpret and apply the terms of that act to particular constitutional problems which have arisen in the short life of this country. I hope it will not take twenty years more before this country has at least a national health insurance act, but let no one assume that the Beveridge plan can be readily transferred or transposed to and made applicable in this country.

In common with many others in this house I am concerned lest the people's mind be diverted from the immediate and paramount problem which confronts us all, namely, that of winning this war.

I do not think we should be unduly concerned about our safety or security here at home when the best of our manhood and womanhood are throwing security to the winds. Security is the last thought that enters their minds in their struggle with the enemy and their fight to defend the one thing that we in Canada value most highly—individual freedom and liberty. In common with many others I have doubts and misgivings lest the so-called planners and economists may in fact destroy individuality, the one thing that we as Canadian citizens prize most highly. The thing that distinguishes us is our individuality. The good Lord made no two of us alike. There never was one like you before; there is not now and never will be another you. I think the most significant fact about life and living itself is not that we are here to make a living but that "we are", and we are here to develop and make manifest that thing which I call me and which you call you, to make of them the best of which they are capable. Life has no significance for me aside from the fact of individuality, and I am much afraid that this resolution may fail of its objective by reason of that very characteristic of Canada and Canadians individually, provincially and sectionally.

Nevertheless I believe this is something upon which we may be able to find common ground in the interest and for the sake of those individuals who are less fortunate than we are, who through no fault of their own find themselves unable to keep pace with their fellow men, so that they may be provided with the essentials of that decent standard of living which should characterize our people from coast to coast. But let us not think and let us not give the impression that this is the beginning of easy days, that life in Canada will be easy or that it will not be necessary in any field of endeavour, be it physical, mental or spiritual, to do other than work hard to make the most of this fair land of ours and to make the most of our individual and collective selves. In other words, let us not do what the people of Germany did, willingly or otherwise, namely, surrender our individuality for the sake of security. It is quite true that in a time of depression the people of Germany were not as vocal and were not allowed to magnify their differences. Why? Because they had sold their right to liberty and individuality for the so-called safety and security ordered by the state. Mr. Hitler capitalized on that, and as a result there came into existence what I hope we shall never see in this country, the age of bureaucracy and dictatorship.

The men and women who built this country, whom we delight to honour in this house and throughout the length and breadth of our land, the individuals who have made the finest contributions to our commonwealth, have been those who were least secure and who on account of that very fact put forth their best of muscle, mind and spirit. To their sterling work and their example we owe the characteristics which we are proud to believe distinguish us as a nation. Independence and self-reliance are the things we must encourage; free enterprise, in consonance with the rights of others, is what we should be thinking of. We delight to honour the brave lads who are flying over Germany, over conquered, fallen France and elsewhere throughout the world to-day because they have cast security to the winds. They do not ask for security; they are the daring spirits. All they ask, and the only thing on the lips of our boys to-day, whether they are here in Canada or in Britain, is that they be given an opportunity to display their skill and to match their wits with the best the axis forces can put against them. In a recent issue of the Times-Herald of Moose Jaw the editor sets forth views with which I am in hearty accord, and which I think we should keep in mind when considering this problem. In part he says:

> The Printed Word defines security as "a condition of freedom from danger," and says: Armed forces of the united nations are expected to eliminate the danger from the gangster powers, but economic security which is being promised so glibly apparently is something which can be obtained by legislation. As well say that money will win the war.
> Security must be paid for. It can't be paid for by casting votes or issuing cheques on a bank, even a state bank. Someone, somehow, must produce useful goods. Back of all usable wealth is work of individuals, even though individual production is greatly enhanced and multiplied by machines, by the practical application of scientific knowledge. Nature helps, but even windfalls must be gathered before they can be put into a pie. When an honest, able-bodied man says he wants security, does he not mean rather that he wants a steady job? He wants wages that will meet his current requirements and enough left over for contingencies. He would strive to have something for his wife and dependent children in event of his early death, and if he is thoughtful would like to think he would not have to accept public or private aid when his earning days are done.
>
> That is not security in the sense of to-day's political speeches. It is rather self-respecting independence. The people who are entitled to security without working for it are children and others who because of physical or mental infirmity, are incapable of contributing to production. The problem of post-war prosperity will not be solved by paying people for not working, paying for not producing. It will be solved, however, if in a postwar world every able-bodied and mentally competent person has an opportunity to produce goods and services that are useful.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the machine for? What about the machine?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have but one concluding thought along this line. Economics are unavoidably and inextricably bound up in this matter. I had one suggestion to make which might more properly have been expressed under the preceding resolution. I suggest, however, that in our post-war planning the committee might very well regard Canada from the point of view of economic units rather than from the political or geographic point of view.

I am not unmindful of, and I should like here and now to pay tribute to the present government in Alberta, who have sensed what is a very acute problem, in so far as Alberta, and at least the western part, if not all, of Saskatchewan is concerned. We are an economic unit, far removed from that section which finds its centre Ontario, and those districts which are contiguous to the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river. In order that we may go forward, I believe there must be developed and encouraged an economic unit embracing Alberta and Saskatchewan with a measure of industrialization we have not heretofore had. Fortunately or perhaps providentially—no credit to us—we have in Alberta a wealth of coal unexcelled, as far as quantity is concerned, in any other similar area on the earth's surface. We have flowing down from the mountains powerful but undeveloped streams, all of which are potential generators of electricity. We have in Alberta the second largest—and potentially the largest—oil field in the British empire, if not in the world. But we have no industrial production; and perforce our goods must find their way all the way across the mountains, or across a continent.

I believe there must arise somewhere in those foothills an industrial development to take advantage of the natural resources found there or, if Canada is to continue to develop with its industrial centre in the east, ways and means must be found for bringing us closer together—closer together economically, not geographically.

As I have looked at the map of Canada in the railways committee room certain thoughts have occurred to me. I hear about the scarcity of agricultural products in the east; and when I realize the dearth of manufactured articles and the high prices we must pay for them in the west on account of the high cost of transportation, it seems to be taken for granted by all parties that that is a necessary evil which we must continue to endure for all time to come. Is this so? The early pioneers in Canada were not satisfied with portages around the waterfalls and rapids; they constructed a canal system which now enables some of the largest, if not the largest ocean-going vessels to go from the ocean to the head of the lakes there to load our produce and take it to the markets of the world. This was made possible as a result of a canal system built by the Canadian people. I am informed that all vessels pass through those canals without charge or expense, and that no additional freight charges are added to the cost of the goods handled in that way. Looking at the map I have wondered if it would not be possible to bring Manitoba and Ontario together by eliminating that thousand-mile stretch of competing railways running through what is now a barren and unproductive land, by nationalizing, taking over and making a national railroad canal do what is done by our water canals when they circumvent Niagara falls, and use the water highway from Montreal and Quebec to Port Arthur.

Let the government take over and operate that railway canal at public expense. Make it serve as do the canals on our waterways. Let the people of Canada assume the expense of operation. Eliminate the charges for that part of the haul from the cost of goods from western Canada to the east, and from eastern Canada to the west. This is a thought which I believe is worthy of earnest consideration. If we are to keep our people united, let us think in terms of economic rather than geographic consideration and those means which can bring us closer together.

One other thought, and I shall have finished. The economic security of our western plains is being menaced. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is a much-travelled man, and one who is certainly aware of most physical and geographical problems confronting our country. Everyone appreciates his interest and his recognition of the necessity of developing the natural resources of western Canada.

I should like to direct the attention of the house to something that has happened as a result of the transfer of the natural resources of Alberta and Saskatchewan to those provinces. If you will look at a map of Canada you will observe that the great rivers which water our plains have their origin on the east slope of the Rocky mountains. Prior to the transfer of the resources the dominion government carried on an excellent and extensive programme for the preservation and protection of the forests on the east slope of the Rockies. As I say, it is on this slope that the Saskatchewan, both North and South, the Red Deer, the Bow and numerous other rivers have their source. On account of financial reasons Alberta has not been able to maintain the same organization for the preservation of these forests, and the result has been that in the intervening years thousands of square miles of forest growth have been burned. These slopes are being denuded by recurring forest fires, and the flow in these rivers, instead of being a blessing, is becoming a menace. I am advised that each year the water-table under these great plains is becoming lower and lower. I earnestly recommend to the committee on reconstruction and post-war problems that they consider the advisability of having the government enter into some arrangement mutually agreeable to Alberta whereby this government may again obtain control of the east slope of the Rocky mountains. We would thereby ensure that the forest growth which acts as a reservoir for these rivers will be maintained as an economic measure to make sure as far as possible that our western plains will not become in fact a dust-bowl.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I intend to restrict my remarks as much as I can because I think if it is at all possible we should complete the work of setting up this committee this afternoon. I do not propose to reiterate any more of the remarks that have been made in this debate, except to say that the work of the committee on reconstruction is inextricably interwoven with the work of this committee. I agree with other members who have said that full employment across the whole of this country is a necessary premise to any effective system of health insurance or other security measures.

I have no fear, as far as employment in this country is concerned, with respect to the period immediately after the war, especially in those parts of the country which have been highly industrialized. It must be obvious to all that within a very short time after the war these districts will be working at a high peak in order to meet the requirements for consumer goods which will be in effect at that time. But there are other parts of the country which will not have the advantage of supplying the badly required consumer goods, and it is in connection with that problem that I wish to say a few words. It seems to me that unless we first establish proper conditions under which we can provide employment for all who are able to work, we shall not be able to have an effective social security system. I discussed this matter at considerable length during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I shall not go into the facts and figures I presented to the house at that time.

In my opinion the greatest obstacle to the setting up of a balanced economy and the bringing of prosperity, not only to Canada but to the nations of the world, is the lack of goodwill and understanding between the people of this country and the peoples of other countries. If we are to implement the spirit of the Atlantic charter we must commence now to do something about developing a feeling of goodwill. It is all very well for President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill to formulate the Atlantic charter, but if the spirit of that charter is not engendered in the hearts and minds of the peoples of the countries of which these men are the leaders, then we cannot have very much hope of implementing it in the future. Great men as they are, they will soon pass from the scene, and unless they leave behind them leaders and people who have the same spirit, then we have no hope of bringing about the aims and objectives set forth in that charter.

The same thing applies in connection with our internal problems. It is essential that the people of Canada develop a spirit of goodwill and mutual helpfulness toward each other before we can hope to bring about that measure of prosperity which we all believe is the due of the Canadian people. After all, we are not only citizens of Ontario or Saskatchewan; we are citizens of Canada. I am sure that when we sit down to consider the matter we shall realize that simply because we happen to live in Ontario, where the resources are vast and where they have been developed, we are not entitled to a greater share of the goods and the prosperity of this country than we would be if we lived in another part of the country which has not been so highly developed. As has been said in this and other debates, eastern Canada cannot long be prosperous, cannot long be happy unless the other parts of the country are in a similar state.

The greatest obstacle to bringing about an equal sharing of opportunities by the people of this dominion is a lack of understanding. One of the first things we should do is to undertake the development of goodwill among our people. If we can persuade all of our people to regard this matter from the viewpoint of the application of the golden rule, then I have no doubt we shall be able to establish in Canada a state of which we shall all be proud.

Something that concerns me greatly is the attitude of mind which has been evidenced in the United States of recent days, particularly since the globaloney speech of representative Luce a short time ago. I am concerned also over that type of mind which endeavours to convey the impression that one province is the milch cow for the rest of Canada. It is that attitude of mind that we must try to eradicate in this and other countries if we are to bring about a feeling of goodwill and understanding. Unless we develop that feeling of goodwill and understanding we cannot hope to have anything but distress, ill-feeling and resentment on the part of those people who are not obtaining a fair and reasonable share of prosperity.

I take the stand that whether we come from this province or from the maritimes or the prairies—and I am proud to represent a constituency in Saskatchewan—we should feel with respect to each other that it is necessary to bring about a state of mutual aid. I suggest to the people from the more settled and more highly industrialized parts of Canada that their part of the country was built up in the days of our forefathers when people in the central and eastern provinces had the advantage of having industries set up, very often with government help, which government help reacted to the detriment of the part of the country from which I come. Apparently, however, it was necessary to use this means to establish those industries there and to build up prosperity in that part of Canada. But when persons coming from one particular part of the country speak of that part as being entitled as of right to whatever they happen now to have, I would remind them that after all many departed from that particular part in order to pioneer and develop other parts of Canada. Unless this state of mutual aid and mutual understanding is brought about, the people in the other parts of Canada will almost inevitably return to these older parts, and if we sit down and consider the matter carefully I am sure we would not want that state of affairs to be brought about. The pioneers went out from Ontario, for example, and established their homes in western Canada, and if they should return to their old homes in Ontario they would become Ontario citizens and be just as much entitled to share with other Ontario citizens in the prosperity in this part of the country.

I suggest most earnestly that it is a matter of urgent necessity that this administration take immediate advantage of the opportunity, which is presented to-day on account of the fact that we are at war and have such a tremendous volume of employment in Canada, to ensure a balanced economy so that when the post-war period arrives we can put into effect a proper scheme of social security which I am sure no one in this house will deny is absolutely imperative if we are to bring about the new order for which we all hope. I wish to give an example of what I have in mind.

I think this happens from mere thoughtlessness rather than anything else. I do not believe there is any intention on the part of individuals in any section of Canada to be selfish about the country's economic outlook. I think it arises from the fact that they have not all travelled throughout the country and do not understand the problems that exist in other sections. I ran into this example. It is only a small one, but it shows an attitude of mind. An officer in one of the services was canvassing the possibility of setting up in a particular city a service establishment. It had to do with storage and that kind of thing. He and some of his fellow officers suggested various cities, Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, Ottawa, Windsor. One individual who happened to come from western Canada spoke up, "Did you ever think of Winnipeg, or Edmonton, or Saskatoon?" The officer in charge replied, "No; as a matter of fact I did not." It finally turned out that they established their base in a city in western Canada. But it had never occurred to them before that such an establishment might be set up out there.

I have another example of the sort of thing which develops ill-feeling, quite unintentionally, I am sure. There may be a perfectly good explanation for it, but I point this out as an example of how there can be brought about misunderstanding which, with a little forethought and planning, could be avoided. There have been a great many construction projects in this country in the last few months. An extensive naval establishment is being erected in the province of Quebec at the present time. According to an answer that was made the other day in reply to a question I had put, this establishment at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, will cost $2,624,000. Another large naval establishment is to be constructed in the city of Hamilton, but I have not the exact figures on that. So far as I know both these establishments are perfectly proper and may be required in those places. At the same time, we in the city of Saskatoon are proud of the fact that we have there a very able and effective recruiting establishment of the R.C.N.V.R. They carry on effective training and develop fine sailors.

May I digress for a moment to pay tribute to Lieutenant Commander Frank Campbell, the commander of the Canadian corvette that was destroyed in the Mediterranean a short while ago, who went down with his ship. He is a native of Saskatoon. I went to school with him and have known him for many years. He took all his naval training in Saskatoon, except for certain periods when he was allowed to go out to the coast. We have had many other outstanding gallant sailors who have come from our city. At the present time we badly require a new naval establishment, which will cost approximately $100,000.

We were told in December by Captain E. R. Brock, who is in charge of the reserve divisions of the R.C.N.V.R., that on account of shortages of material and labour, there was no hope of anyone getting new construction. I give this as an example of the type of misunderstanding that may arise. Then we read in the newspapers of large sums of money, many times the comparatively small amount required for our establishment, being spent on constructions in other parts of the country, and we cannot understand why there is a lack of materials and labour for our part, while all this work is being carried on in other parts. I point that out only as an example. It does seem to me, and I offer this as a suggestion to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that in order to make our reconstruction and social security measures work it is necessary to take advantage of the situation which has arisen to see to it that the war effort is spread across this country in such a way that we can have a balanced economy, and thus put the country in a proper position to carry out the necessary measures of reconstruction after the war is over.

I conclude by saying that I am convinced that the administration does not by any means discharge its full responsibility with respect to either reconstruction or social security simply by the setting up of these committees. The government of Canada was elected by the people of Canada to assume the responsibility of putting certain things into effect which the administration felt were for the good of the country, and it seems to me that the administration should do something positive as quickly as possible with respect to reconstruction and social security. I urge the government as strongly and as earnestly as I can to take advantage of the situation which has arisen to ensure that we have a balanced economy across Canada.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed greatly the remarks made by the various members who have contributed to this debate. I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to express my appreciation of his having in his introductory remarks left the field open for a wide discussion of the whole subject matter, an opportunity of which hon. members have availed themselves with, I believe, good results. I think we have had no debate more profitable than this one. People have had a chance to express their views.

Before going on with what I had thought to say with respect to the Prime Minister's suggestions, I will refer briefly to the words of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards). I have a great deal of admiration for this splendid young man from Alberta. I would under no circumstances endeavour to find fault with anything he says if I could possibly avoid it. I just want to point out to him, with respect to the possibilities of putting people to work after the war, that, according to figures given by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) the other evening, two million of the best effectives Canada has will be available for reemployment in productive industry when the war is over. It will be necessary, according to the hon. member's figures, to spend $4 billions in Canada to enable the people of Canada to buy the $4 billions of extra consumer goods which the present producers of Canada must produce if they transfer their efforts from war production to peace-time production. Let the hon. member do a little arithmetical figuring and determine, if he can, how much of that $4 billions will have to be spent by every family in Canada in order to enable them to consume the $4 billion worth of goods. It seems to me that so much of the talking of hon. members utterly misses the point of these two essential facts. If there is to be $4 billions' worth of production brought about merely by the use of the people who are now at work in Canada, how many more billions of dollars worth of goods does the hon. member suppose will be produced in Canada when the extra ten millions of effectives go into action producing consumer goods?

It may be argued that we shall sell these goods abroad. But let it be borne in mind that, except for payment of debts and things of that sort, every bit of goods we sell abroad must be paid for with goods which come in. So that the balanced effect of it all will be that the $4 billion of goods will be here in Canada to be consumed; if they are to be consumed the families of Canada must consume them, and if the families of Canada are to consume them they must have a considerable income to enable them to do so. Where are they to get that income, and if they do get it, how are they to be in poverty? Let every man just face that set of facts.

May I turn for a short time to the remarks of the Prime Minister. He is reported to have said—Hansard, page 934:

> What social insurance seeks to do is to find a means whereby these inevitable hazards will be met in some part at least through the action of the state and through action prescribed by the state.

These words are completely true. Let me make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that there is no disagreement between the members of our Social Credit group and the rest of the house, including the Prime Minister, on that essential fact. What we all want to know is the device or the technique by which this result is to be achieved. As I said the other night, the astounding thing to me is that during the whole of this debate the only hon. members who have undertaken to give even a hint of what that technique may be are members of my own group. Others have talked about ills; for instance, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave us a beautiful speech last night setting forth the ills and the evils from which the country from end to end is suffering. Everybody agrees with that. But when it came to the method of solving the problem, he was discreetly quiet. We shall never solve problems in this house, and we shall never give this committee one hint which is worth talking about, if we do that sort of thing. We must find some device for distributing this tremendous amount of production which is to be brought into existence in Canada in the post-war years. If we are unable to consume the production, we shall be unable to put the men to work. This should be completely clear.

May I now turn in some detail to the remarks of the Prime Minister. I may be, I am going to be, frankly critical; I trust I can be courteous, as he always is considerate. But there are some things which have to be said, and said very pointedly and straightforwardly so that there shall be no question of the meaning. The Prime Minister made this remark, "We must render aggression impossible after the war."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Seek to."

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; we must seek to. That remark is being made all over the Anglo-Saxon world. Why not go about the problem this way: "We will seek to render aggression unnecessary after the war"? How it can be that two hundred and forty-five members in this House of Commons can so successfully delude themselves as to the cause of this war, and continue prattling away, as some hon. members do, as to what seems to be the cause of this war, quite neglecting the real cause of war, it passes my comprehension to understand.

Mr. MacINNIS: All the two hundred and forty-five members do not delude themselves, surely.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope they do not. In this respect the Prime Minister has fallen into the error I pointed out to him the other night. When he was talking about the formation of new parties he undertook to blame the fall of France on the formation of new parties. Now, the formation of new parties in that country was owing to a cause which existed in France which ultimately resulted in the fall of France. If we can cooperate so as to render aggression unnecessary we shall have no difficulty with aggression. If we were not in war I should talk a great deal more plainly, with a great many more facts; for I could give them.

The Prime Minister very wisely and benevolently spoke of international cooperation. That is right. I agree with international cooperation. But what he has in mind when he speaks of international cooperation is not by any means clear. Could you get finer international cooperation than we are having at the present time among the united nations in the conduct of this war? Yet there is no great powerful committee or governing body or supranational authority which can coerce the members of the united nations into cooperating. They are voluntarily doing it. Why? Because they are in pursuit of a great objective. They will do what is necessary of their own accord if they know it is the right thing to do. May I suggest that gifts from the various nations which are possessed of rich resources, gifts into a great pool from which can be drawn assistance for the less fortunate nations, would be a form of cooperation which could be voluntary and which would be very effective? I fail to see why it is that so few people seem to have noticed the fact that gifts can be made. During the last thirty years there have been great numbers of vast loans to various countries on the part of Britain, the United States and other nations. Most of those loans have never been repaid; they were practically gifts. Canada's gift of a billion dollars to Britain illustrates the kind of gift which under a sound economic system could become characteristic of our ordinary behaviour. What I am saying may sound strange; but let us bear in mind that we are in a new world and things that seem new and strange to us must be listened to and given consideration and understood if we are to be worthy of the trust reposed in us in these critical times. The idea of gifts must be recognized as a possibility of international cooperation.

The Prime Minister spoke of a serious cotton famine causing an international situation of difficulty. I readily grant that; we all do. What confounds me is the fact that an abundance of cotton has caused that kind of thing. If the world had a cotton crop failure we could understand that all those engaged in the manufacture and transportation of cotton would be thrown out of employment; but imagine the same sort of thing happening when we have more cotton than we know what to do with. It is that situation, which is completely outside the orbit of the Prime Minister's suggestion, which must be faced by this generation.

We are in an age of abundance, when the nations of the world collectively can produce more goods than all the people of the world can possibly consume. Especially is this true in view of the marvellous discoveries which have been made since the outbreak of this war. That is the situation we must face.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend goes on to his next point, would he allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Gladly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that there are to be no further speakers this afternoon except myself. I close the debate. It is, I think, the wish of this house to get through with the establishment of the committee on social security this week and not to have the debate go over for another week. If I am correct in that I would ask hon. members if they would grant permission to have the house sit for a short time after six o'clock. I think I can promise that what I may have to say will not take long. Not adjourning at six would enable us to get through with the appointment of this committee to-day.

I might point out that it is quite within the power of the government to have the house continue to sit at eight o'clock to-night. There is no rule requiring the house not to sit on Friday evenings. It is by mutual consent that we adjourn at six o'clock on Fridays. I assume hon. members will be content to continue if we do not sit too long.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the right hon. gentleman assure the house that this is the last speech?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is any other speaker, if he will rise, I would be able to say in a moment what we may expect.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was my intention to say something. I do not want to prolong the debate. Most of what has been said on it should not have been said at all, but I am getting tired of being lectured at the end of every debate, and I think I might reply.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What do I understand? That we shall close at six o'clock and go on at eight, or that I continue a certain length of time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is the wish of the house that we should sit beyond six o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I turn now to the Prime Minister's statement that the government has a policy, as set forth in the speech from the throne. I point out that the expression of that policy is nothing more than a vague meaningless platitude such as is altogether too much the custom nowadays and can mean almost anything. I am going to ask this question pointedly of the Prime Minister: Will the government permit the committee to study fully and impartially the social credit proposals for the establishment of a new order? The ministers of the crown are supposed to look into all possibilities. Up to the present time every committee I have had contact with either directly or indirectly has steered clear of social credit as though it were poison. If this committee is not prepared to examine impartially and in detail the proposals of social credit, then the committee is simply not sincere.

May I just refer to one passage in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the other night—a most appropriate passage in this connection. As reported on page 931 of Hansard the Minister of Finance said:

> No country goes bankrupt in this way; no country goes bankrupt by increasing its production and devoting part or all, or more than all of that increase to a supreme cause.

Without knowing it the Minister of Finance expressed the social credit concept almost perfectly. If we in Canada can devote our ability to the production of all the goods that Canada can produce for the people of Canada and will devote that production to raising the standard of living in Canada, there is hardly any limit to the degree to which we can raise the standard of living, and that means the standard of everybody.

Will somebody tell me how that can be achieved without giving everybody more than a dividend of $25 a month? I do not propose to discuss that. But I am going to ask one or two things regarding the minister's statement. I am going to ask hon. members, if they believe that the production of Canada can be stimulated as the minister said it could and as the war has proved it can, and devoted to the cause of raising the standard of living in Canada, can that be done by taxation only? Can it be done by decreasing the purchasing power of the people? But that is the proposal at the basis of the Beveridge report. When hon. members answer that question they will be on their way. The government is now buying the goods we are sending across to Germany to the extent of billions of dollars, and giving them away. Yet when we propose, as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) did a short time ago, that some goods be given away to the Canadian people, we are regarded as the champion simpletons. Men have to do a great deal of serious thinking along new lines.

A question has been raised with regard to provincial jurisdiction. I do not propose to deal with that question at any great length, but it is about time the members of this house ceased casting reflections on Canadians who are called upon to form his majesty's governments in the various provinces of this dominion, by insinuating or suggesting or stating that they are not willing to govern this country properly. If the correct policies are adopted by Ottawa every province will fall in line. If Ottawa discovers a system whereby it can put in financial form that tremendous production which it is possible for us to have; if it can discover a medium of distribution to the provinces, every province will fall in line. There will be no need of spoiling the British North America Act. Can you imagine any province refusing to accept from this dominion five million dollars a year, for example, to be expended on health? Can you conceive for a moment that any province of this dominion would refuse two million dollars a year to be expended on education? Why, two million and five million a year would be small change in the light of four billion dollars.

The British North America Act gave the dominion government power to create money. It gave this government absolute authority over banking and currency, and in giving this government control over currency it gave it the greatest single power that could possibly be conferred upon any government. What has the government done with that power? Has it used it? Never once in the long history of this dominion has it consistently done so; anything but that. Strangely enough, since he made those speeches out in western Canada about currency and credit in terms of public need, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has never even skated near that danger spot. Yet there lies the secret of obtaining maximum cooperation from all the provinces of this dominion. There is no need to change the British North America Act; there was no need to change it for the introduction of unemployment insurance. Why did Alberta stand out against the change need for unemployment insurance? Because Alberta suspected a power which has done everything possible to crush the strength of the province of Alberta in its heroic struggle against the old system, a struggle for the assertion of the new. Alberta has cooperated; in this house minister after minister has risen in his place and testified to that fact. There is no province in this dominion more ready to cooperate in the attainment of any good end; but somewhere, someone in this dominion must stand up for the new order, someone who understands what the new order is and how it is to be brought about, someone who is willing to sacrifice. Apparently Alberta is the province that has been called upon to do so, and the officials of the province of Alberta intend to be true to their trust.

Where are the sources of revenue? They are all available to Ottawa, while none of the real major sources are available to the provinces. And the object of the Sirois report, which I have condemned as iniquitous and pernicious in every respect, was to take away from the provinces still more of the variable sources of income such as the corporation tax, the income tax, the succession duty and so on, in order to render the province unable to increase its revenues no matter how much it developed its industry and its wealth. The sources of revenue are, as I say, with the dominion; if they are exercised by the dominion it will find no difficulty with the provinces. But the major source of income available to the dominion, which has been used only on rare occasions and then fitfully and fearfully, is the power over currency, the power to monetize the wealth of the nation; to take four billion dollars worth of goods, for example, and represent them by media of exchange which can be used as media of distributing those goods. Such media of exchange can be distributed equitably among the provinces of this dominion, greatly to improve the standard of living everywhere in this country. If the Prime Minister wants a means of gaining unity in Canada, there is a means right at hand.

Now I am going to say a word about the Beveridge report. The members of this group are not opposed to increased social security. If we could find nothing better than the Beveridge report of course we should accept that report; but we maintain that to accept the Beveridge report is like accepting crumbs when you are entitled to a square meal. The Prime Minister made a fine statement when he said that society, having created a condition which permits of that sort of thing—referring to the irregularities, the national hazards and so on—society has to find some way of remedying it. That is true, but he must be careful to see that the remedy will improve conditions and not make them worse. All the policies which are being advocated to-day in the dominion by those in authority are going to make the situation worse. The remedy must be real.

Obviously the solution of the difficulty is in some sort of mechanism of distribution, which I discussed about a month ago. Every thoughtful person who knows anything at all about it will agree that the problem confronting us is that of distribution. Well, let us find a system of distribution. The medium of distribution is money, so of course it becomes perfectly clear that the secret of the trouble lies somewhere in connection with money. We have already discussed the fact that Canada is producing eight billion dollars worth of goods to-day. Canada could have produced eight billion dollars worth of goods in 1930 if we had set ourselves with right good will to the attainment of that objective. Certainly Canada could have produced those goods in 1935 had she been organized for the task. Yet what was done? Well, let us forget the doleful, dismal, pathetic story. Canada had the capacity. Canada could have produced the goods. The only difficulty was that Canada did not know how to find markets for the goods; in other words Canada did not know how to distribute them. The Prime Minister has sat in the seats of the mighty in this country since 1935, yet he has done nothing toward finding a solution of the problem of distribution.

The answer which no doubt will come into his mind is this, that he has sought foreign markets. I will grant that, but foreign markets just have not been successful in meeting the difficulty. Foreign markets have not been able adequately to distribute. Let no one assume that I am opposed to foreign trade or foreign markets at all. Markets have their place; foreign trade has its place, but foreign trade has signally failed as a mechanism of distribution in this country. We were using foreign trade all through the terrible thirties. Where did it get us? The answer will be, "Well, we were tied up with a lot of other nations." I will have more to say about that.

With respect to foreign trade; let us examine for a short time the mechanism of foreign trade. Foreign trade cannot adequately distribute. Here is the reason: Any nation, under the present system, in order to succeed in foreign trade must sell more than it buys. That is true, is it not? Very well, then. If foreign trade is to succeed in respect of ten nations, every single one of them must sell more than it buys—which is an absurdity. It is an impossibility, and a fact which lies right near the basic cause of this war. Is it not possible for ordinary members of the Liberal party to get that idea into their heads?

Now, if any nation fails to have a favourable balance of trade, what happens to that nation? It goes into debt, and it has to pay the debt off with gold. It will be unable to get the gold unless it finds some nation which will trade gold for goods. If it is unable to find such a nation, it continues in debt. Let members of this house tell us what a nation like that can do in circumstances of the kind. It is a victim of the break-down in the mechanism of international trade. What can it do? It must raise trade barriers, because when it gets into debt it incurs adverse exchange on its money, which makes the situation worse. It has to pay interest on the debt, which again makes the situation worse.

Will somebody tell me how in the world nations would get along if they had a supranational authority which said to the nation, when it wished to put up a trade barrier to protect itself, "You must not do that"? What would the nation do? If the Prime Minister by any stretch of the imagination can call that international cooperation, then he certainly has a unique definition of those words. It is an impossibility for every nation to export more than it imports.

For years Canada has had a favourable trade balance. Has that fact enabled her to distribute? Not nearly successfully enough.

Then the question of free trade arises. What would happen under free trade? Canada would immediately at least buy as many extra goods from outside as she would sell outside. In other words her trade balance would hardly be affected at all in her favour. But if it were affected at all it would probably aggravate her difficulty. Where for example would western Canada buy her butter, if not from New Zealand? Where would western Canada buy her mutton, if not from New Zealand? That is a mere illustration of what would happen if we had complete free trade.

My argument is that the trade mechanism simply will not solve our distribution problems. The considerations I have mentioned must render anyone suspicious of the adequacy of foreign trade alone as a mechanism of distribution. I have another illustration for those who are anxious to find out about this matter. Has free trade worked where it has been applied? We have one fine example of free trade right here in Canada, where we have nine nations—provinces—with utterly free trade. And what good has it done them? In the United States they have forty-eight fine sovereign states, free to trade, and able among them to produce practically everything they want. Where has it got them? I will tell you where it got them in 1935; it got 23,500,000 people on relief. A country such as the United States, able to produce enough goods to give every family $4,400 worth of goods and services, was able to give the bare necessities of life to only twenty-one out of every hundred. That is where it got them. That is free trade in the United States. There they have forty-eight nations, absolutely free to trade. And if a supranational government would do any good, then surely they had a supranational government in Washington, just as we have a supranational government in Ottawa, and getting more "supra" every day. Let us face the facts. It is time the Prime Minister sought a new mechanism of distribution. That is my point.

I find that my time, with the exception of two minutes, has expired. In the time at my disposal I am going to refer to or hint at a very important work, one which I commend to the Prime Minister, all the members of his cabinet, and all his supporters, as one which should be read over and over again. I hold in my hand a report of the London Chamber of Commerce on the general principles of post-war economy. If there is any group throughout the world which has faced realities, and which knows what's what about trade, and practically everything else pertaining to economics, then one certainly would expect this group of people to know. It consists of 9,000 firms and companies and 39 industrial and commercial associations, with a membership of 50,000, all of whom are represented on the committee which drew up this report.

I have not time to read the important points in the report, but if I had I would go through it and read quotations from it. But the report accepts as sound a little work entitled "A Twentieth Century Economic System". If the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and the committee, will take those two documents, read them through, over and over again, and digest them, they will have an idea that will beat in a hundred ways the silly proposals they are advocating now. They will not need any Beveridge report after that. I shall read one quotation to show the line along which the report starts. On the first page it says:

The chamber submits that constantly raised tariffs—

The Prime Minister has said much about the horrors of economic nationalism and the wickedness of tariffs.

—the imposition of quotas and prohibitions, and other signs of growing economic belligerency between the nations in the interwar period, were not the result of stupidity nor ill will but were, on the contrary, imposed for most compelling reasons. They represented attempts by the nations to defend themselves against very real and pressing dangers.

The Prime Minister and the united nations authorities must remove this danger before they talk for a moment about removing trade barriers. I read on:

The chamber is convinced that until those dangers are recognized and removed, a direct attack upon trade barriers can serve no useful purpose but will, on the contrary, merely increase fear.

I do not feel I have the right to impose upon the house any further, but I will say that when hon. members read those two pamphlets through, and digest them, they will find that the policies advocated therein conform exactly to social credit—without any deviation at all. The expression "social credit" is not used, but they conform exactly to its proposals. They point out how purchasing media should be created by the state to be spent into circulation and to distribute the surplus of goods which the state can produce. They point out the way in which prices can be controlled by exercising the power of creating purchasing media. They point out how the underprivileged people, about whom we are having all this discussion, can be taken care of by the use of some of the purchasing media which the state is able to produce in abundance. I commend these to the committee and to the government as a first step toward the solution of our problems, the only solution which will give hope to mankind.

As these people point out, this device can be applied by one nation alone. That is one of the admirable things about it. Perhaps I can take the time to read one statement in the last part of the report. I quote from page 12, as follows:

These proposals also have the merit that
(a) whilst revolutionary in effect, they involve, so far as industry and commerce are concerned, little change in practice;

No government ownership, no government regimentation, no socialism, no disruptive change; just the exercising of the government's prerogative to create a purchasing medium. I continue:

(b) they require the minimum of agreement between nations;

No united nations and no taking away of the sovereignty of any nation! I continue:

(c) they can be put into effect even though some nations withhold agreement.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to read the pamphlet the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has suggested we should read. Anything that proposes to change things and then leave them as they are, will just not change things. That is exactly what he has read from that pamphlet. Any scheme that will leave the ownership and control of the means of life in the hands of the people who own them now and expect that by some sort of witchcraft the underprivileged will be looked after by the people who never looked after them before does not appeal to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But they are going to be looked after; that is the important thing.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what will not be be done. The underprivileged will continue to be underprivileged until they own and control the means by which they live. That is the philosophy of the group to which I belong. We welcome the motion introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the setting up of this committee, because it recognizes, even at this late date, the obligation of the community, or, if you like, the obligation of the state to make provision for the underprivileged within the state. The motion is quite simple, and I suppose it will constitute the terms of reference for the committee. It reads:

To examine and study the existing social insurance legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures; social insurance policies of other countries; the most practicable measures of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan; the constitutional and financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security; and other related matters.

That puts the case as I see it very clearly. I am glad that the group to which I belong has chosen the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and myself to be their representatives on the committee. We hope the committee will be able in the course of time to formulate a plan of social insurance for the people of Canada. We are not, however, deluding ourselves by believing that any scheme of social insurance will eliminate poverty. Poverty in the Dominion of Canada can be eliminated only when we release the means of production within the country from the restrictions imposed upon them by the profit motive. After we have done that it will be quite easy to find the means to distribute the wealth of the country among the people of the country according to need. There is nothing difficult or hard to understand about that. But there is one thing certain, namely, that the adoption of such a system will not leave things as they are. It will not leave the control of the means of life in the hands of people who control them now. It will vest the control of the means of life in the people to be organized socially for the common good.

As I said, we welcome the opportunity to sit with this parliamentary committee to try to formulate a scheme of social security based on social insurance that will provide for many of the hazards that beset us.

There is just one other thing I should like to say. We have been told on numerous occasions that the government has taken away the functions of parliament. Here is a motion introduced by the Prime Minister himself which has put in the lap of parliament, if I may use that term, the question of working out a social security through a social insurance scheme for Canada. If the members of this house will bring in a comprehensive scheme and see to it that it is forced through the house, then there can no longer be any claim made that the government has usurped the functions of parliament. Here is an opportunity for parliament, and I hope the members of parliament will show that they are equal to the occasion and use it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like my first word to be one of appreciation of the contributions which hon. members have made to the debate. It is, I think, true that the discussion has shown that there is general agreement among all parties in the house as to the importance of the questions to be referred to the committee, as well as of the magnitude of the problem involved. What has been said has served to indicate to hon. members the many-sidedness of these social problems and the necessity for a careful and wide study in approaching them in the hope of making a practical and immediate contribution.

Listening to the debate has impressed me more and more with the fact that the government has taken the right course in suggesting at this stage that we should have in Canada a national system of social insurance and also that the government has adopted the right course in appointing a committee to consider all aspects of a national insurance scheme before bringing forward any particular measure which is to be part of any further legislation along social security lines.

I doubt if anything could illustrate better the wisdom of the course which the government has adopted than an item which appeared in the press this morning. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Morning Citizen of March 5 entitled, "Health insurance plan for Quebec favoured in report". The item reads as follows:

> Quebec, March 4.—Enactment of a health insurance system by the Quebec legislature was recommended in a report made to the government by a hospital investigation commission, it was announced to-day.
> The commission was set up by the government in 1940 to study the financial situation of hospitals and of insane asylums and to study the working conditions of employees in the institutions.
> Members of the commission recommend that the province, the employer and the insured contribute to the cost of a health insurance system and that a special commission be named to administer the system once it was established. The recommendation urged that the premium be calculated to cover the family and not the individual.

We have been criticized, Mr. Speaker, for not having brought in a concrete measure relating to health insurance. May I say that I have been long enough in public life to realize that no matter what an administration does, it is pretty certain to meet with criticism. We have been criticized for deciding to have this matter carefully studied by a committee of the house before bringing forward further legislation. Had we taken the opposite course and come forward with a concrete measure of health insurance, I am sure the first criticism that would have been made would have been that the government had not given consideration to what the provinces might be doing or wish to do in this matter before attempting to override them with legislation of its own. We would certainly have had cited as evidence of this, perhaps not yesterday because it was only announced through the press to-day, but certainly to-day, reference to the commission that had been appointed in the province of Quebec and to the recommendations which it had made to the provincial government. Both would have been cited as an evidence of the fact that instead of trying to work out something in the nature of a cooperative nation-wide plan between the provinces and the dominion we had only succeeded, by rushing ahead with our legislation, in raising unnecessary difficulties between the dominion and the provinces. That must be perfectly apparent from what I have just read.

More than that, listening to what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said when he was speaking, I think he would have come forward and said that we had dealt with just one aspect of the question, that we had said nothing about giving more benefits in the way of insurance to the unemployed or increasing the amount of benefit they should be given for their contributions. In fact, he said in his remarks that we should have done that, that there should be more in the way of reward so that those who are contributing to an insurance scheme will get something more in the way of benefit out of their contributions, if not in one direction at least in another, so that they will get back whatever in the way of contributions they may have made. I think he also would have said that we should have reduced the age limit for old age pensioners, that that was more important than what we were proposing to do, and that we should have done a little more for those who were paralysed, for permanent invalids, and others. There would have been criticism of the government all along the line for everything that had not been included. It is advisable that the committee should realize how vast is the scope of social insurance measures and how many measures have to be considered when a government, whether it be provincial or dominion, undertakes to add another piece of social legislation to what already exists.

What has been brought out very clearly in this discussion is the fact that there has grown up in Canada, without relation one to the other, a large number of social security measures, and that as a consequence of there having been no general plan to which the different parts should relate, there is to-day a great amount of overlapping as between the dominion and the provinces with respect to these security measures, with the consequence there is much more inefficiency in administration and great waste. The necessity of linking together, however it may be done, the measures that relate to security in this country must surely be seen to be one of the imperative needs at the present time. The fact that we have already so much social legislation—and it is evident that we are going to have more—makes it clear that at this time we should seek to have a plan that from now on can be followed by the provinces and the dominion alike. That is a great undertaking I think for members of parliament. It is a work that can be accomplished by members of parliament, and a work which will be in the nature of a national service of the highest kind.

I was impressed by what the hon. member who spoke on health a little earlier in the afternoon said, that we have now health departments in all the different provinces and a dominion health department as well. Surely the time has come when if we are going to add further legislation which relates to health, in the nature of insurance legislation against sickness and ill-health in its different forms, some survey ought to be made to see whether we are to have the provinces and the dominion handle health matters separately and independently or whether some arrangement cannot be arrived at whereby there will not be a duplication of functions on the part of all.

I do not think that a national plan implies that the government would in any way seek to have everything centralized at Ottawa, any more than I think that a national plan would necessitate having identical legislation in the different provinces and all the provinces operating together in accordance with a uniform plan. But I do think it means the careful study of how social security measures can best be effected through cooperation between the provinces and the dominion, and that in relation to all other social security measures. That I believe can be worked out by a committee in a manner which will make a contribution not only to the work of this parliament but to that of the provincial legislatures as well.

I had not thought of saying anything in particular about political aspects of the discussion which has taken place. I was careful in my introductory remarks not to make any reference to the sources of inspiration of passages in the speech from the throne. But my hon. friend the leader of the opposition found it impossible not to make a reference to the Winnipeg convention, and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) felt it important to draw attention to what was set forth in the platform of the National Liberal convention which was held in this city as long ago as 1919. He sought, I think, to create the impression that the Liberal party which was responsible for the platform of 1919 was taking a long time to implement its policies. I must thank hon. gentlemen opposite for giving me a reasonable excuse for quoting just one plank from the platform of the National Liberal convention and indicating to hon. members what, as a matter of fact, has been accomplished in the carrying out of a programme of social security. I hope this will dispose of the idea that what is suggested in the speech from the throne owes its origin to the Beveridge report or to the Progressive-Conservative Winnipeg convention, or to the Canadian Commonwealth Federation conference at Regina, or to anything other than continuing the policy laid down at the Liberal convention which was held in this city in 1919.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought my right hon. friend said that it originated in "Industry and Humanity."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Industry and Humanity" was published in 1918. I shall give my hon. friend a quotation from that work in a moment. I mention the policy respecting social security laid down at the Liberal convention of 1919 because I think hon. members will recognize at once that there is to be found the first formal statement, as a part of its programme, made by any political party in Canada with respect to social security. It will also be seen that the Liberal party, in setting forth that programme, was very, very much ahead of the times, and that it has proceeded in the implementing of the pledges it made at that time in a manner which I think must be a surprise to those who know anything about social problems and the difficulties there are in making the adjustments necessary to meet them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is almost twenty-four years ago, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That only shows how much more in the way of vision the Liberal party possessed than the parties who have just this year wakened up to the fact that there is such a thing as social security.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Those were promises, were they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will see if he will just be patient. Probably he has not read the platform, and obviously he does not know what has been accomplished in this country in the last twenty-one years, or he would not ask the question he does. I am going to answer as to whether these things have been accomplished or not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I read them the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I am not betraying a secret when I tell the house that I myself drafted this paragraph at the time of the Liberal convention, and it went into the platform of the party just as it came from my own hand at the time the platform was drafted.

Mr. GRAYDON: A committee of one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; there was a large committee—very much like the Port Hope conference and very much like the Winnipeg convention. We all had a hand. Some worked out one clause and some another.

I say to my hon. friends that I have been impressed, in reading the proceedings of the Winnipeg convention, with evidence of the meticulous care with which the friends of my hon. friend and he himself have gone over all the Liberal platform and important speeches and picked out here and there the things which they thought would make most appeal to a democratic country.

Mr. GRAYDON: We picked out the progressive parts, of course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes: that is no doubt how my hon. friend came to feel he had a Progressive Conservative party.

I shall read the clause which relates to the question of social insurance:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, (widows' pensions) and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

Now if, after reading that passage, the gentlemen who have referred to it had paused for a moment to point out to the house just how much of it had been implemented, I think hon. members would have been greatly impressed. I am going to do that myself.

First of all: a measure which is mentioned there as one of considerable importance is that of insurance against dependence in old age, which means of course old age pensions. May I point out that a government of which I had the honour to be the head was the government that introduced in parliament and carried through legislation with respect to old age pensions—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under pressure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and the old age pensions which are to-day existing in Canada have existed in this country since 1926 as a result of legislation brought in by a government of which I was the head.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You would not say that it gives old age independence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of social security legislation which was set forth and promised, and am indicating the extent to which promises have been implemented.

Let me come to the next clause, which is an equally important one:

> . . . an adequate system of insurance against unemployment,

There, again, the government of which I have the honour to be the head was the government which introduced in this parliament and put through the legislation which is on the statutes to-day establishing in Canada national unemployment insurance plan. These are two of the most important social insurance measures which could possibly be enacted.

Hon. members will notice further that there is mention in the statement of policy of the legislation being enacted in part by the provinces and in part by the dominion. Most of the social security legislation existing in the provinces of this country to-day has been put on the statute books by Liberal governments. Consider the matter of workmen's compensation, mothers' allowances, maternity benefits, health measures and the like; go through the different provinces of this dominion and you will find that most of the social security measures in Canada have been enacted by Liberal governments since this Liberal platform was adopted.

What are we doing now? To-day we are seeking to carry this whole programme a step further. We are now face to face with so much in the way of social security legislation in Canada that we feel it is necessary, if there is to be an avoidance of waste and extravagance, to have the whole system coordinated. We realize that the matter of health insurance, all that relates to sickness and invalidity, is becoming increasingly important. We feel that at this stage there should be, before there is a further enactment on social security lines, a clear understanding of the place all health measures should hold in a complete national plan.

I could enlarge on that, but I think I have said enough to make it clear that, so far as the Liberal party in Canada is concerned, it laid down, for the first time in this country, a comprehensive programme of social security. It outlined that policy from beginning to close. It did not expect to carry it out in the first year or two—we knew its fulfilment would necessarily run over a series of years—but we have already implemented that programme in large part, and we will continue to do so so long as we have the opportunity.

A paragraph which is of importance, it will come up in connection with other measures, is this:

> . . . on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

Well, have we succeeded in that?

In regard to the question of pensions, we had to consider the matter of jurisdiction as between the provinces and ourselves. We met that question by a cooperative arrangement whereby the dominion undertook on conditions which ensured a common practice to pay so much and the provinces to make a contribution of so much, and we allowed the administration of pensions then to be carried out further by the provincial governments. We met the difficulty by conferences. When we came to unemployment insurance we were again faced with the question of jurisdiction. We felt there should be a national scheme of unemployment insurance, but the government of the day had no authority so to legislate. The British North America Act had left property and civil rights in the control of the provinces, and that included unemployment insurance. After carefully discussing the matter with the provinces, after having a committee of this house carefully explore the situation, we were convinced that the wise thing with regard to unemployment insurance was to have a national insurance scheme, not a provincial scheme. Having agreed to that, the next step was to get the British North America Act amended.

There has been much said in this debate about the obstacle of the British North America Act. I do not think that the amending of that act is a matter we need to be in the least concerned about, once we decide that we want it amended in any particular way. I recall very well what was done in connection with the unemployment insurance measure. After this house had agreed upon an unemployment insurance measure, an address was presented from this parliament to the British parliament, requesting that the British North America Act should be amended so as to put "unemployment insurance" into section 91 of the British North America Act, thereby giving the federal government the power to enact a national measure of unemployment insurance.

Mr. HAZEN: With the consent of the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes, I say that it was done with their consent. The consent practically of all. That is important in these social insurance matters. Any government in this country that ignores the provinces and tries to ride roughshod over them is not going to aid in settling any questions of social security, it will only make an existing situation worse. But approach matters in the right way, in the spirit and method in which I believe this committee will, as a great national problem affecting provinces as well as the dominion, and I believe it will be possible to get agreement between all. It is as much in the interest of the provinces as in our interest to save unnecessary expenditure and secure the course which is most effective.

I was about to say that when the address of our two houses was presented to the British parliament it was less than a fortnight before this house was informed that the British parliament had amended the British North America Act in accordance with our request. It might have been done in an even shorter time but for the wording of the amendment which was made in the first instance and which did not meet with the wishes of the government. A delay of a few days was occasioned in having the original amendment changed. But if this committee is able to work out a national plan and agree as to the wisdom of adopting it, and if the plan requires for any particular reason an amendment of the British North America Act, as far as the British government is concerned that amendment hon. members may be assured will be granted on an address from both our houses without difficulty or delay. And may I add in regard to unemployment insurance, the counsel who was instructed with respect to the matter in Britain was told that we were anxious to have the amendment made in short order so that we could put through the enactment before that session of parliament was over. The bill was passed at that same session.

It has been said in the course of the debate that our social legislation in Canada is not as up to date as that in Great Britain and the United States. Figures have been quoted to show how much has been spent in Britain and in the United States, as though the amount that had to be spent under social insurance measures was a fair index of the condition of the industrial population of the country. To my mind the best index of the prosperity of a country and its people does not lie in the amount of money which a government has to spend for relief, or unemployment or invalidity, rather does it lie in the opposite, the extent to which conditions in the country are such as to render unnecessary the payment of large sums for such purposes.

It is there that I think some hon. members in this debate have touched what is a very important point, namely that the study of social security measures may lead to an even more necessary and profound study of the causes which underlie the situation which necessitates insurance against these inevitable economic hazards.

There was a certain confusion in the course of the discussion between social security and social insurance. Some hon. members used the terms more or less interchangeably. Social security is the object to be attained, social insurance is a means whereby that object can be attained, but only one means, a means related to only one class of industrial and social hazards, namely those which are inevitable, as said by Sir William Beveridge, "from the cradle to the grave"; hazards which arise regardless of the circumstances in which people may live, which come to the rich and poor alike. Inasmuch as the well-to-do are in a position to meet them out of their own incomes there comes the necessity, if we are considering the worth of human individuals rather than their possessions, whereby those not in a position to meet these inevitable hazards should be enabled to do so by the aid of the state. I believe it is true that as respects conditions in Canada there is no country anywhere, taking everything by and large, where the mass of the people are better off than they are in our country. And it would be strange if it were not so. This is not due to the government of the day, or to any government; we are a new country, we still have resources more or less untouched, we have large areas in which people can settle; the worst conditions of older countries have not developed as yet, we are seeking to avoid their development—a condition where you have great slums, overcrowded areas, industrial diseases such as exist in the great cities of the old world and as they unfortunately have developed even in some of the large cities of the United States. It is important it should be clearly recognized that in seeking this social security legislation we are not thereby declaring that our country is in a more unfortunate condition than others, but rather that we intend to keep up and improve upon the standards we have to-day.

I shall conclude by a brief reference to a view which has been expressed and will continue to be expressed in some quarters, namely, that social insurance in some way will lead to the lessening of effort on the part of individuals. In other words that social security legislation means perpetuating the weak at the expense of the strong. That is a view that many people have and it has been given expression to in this house to-day—the view that state aid is likely to cause people to cease to work, that because of it people will come to look to the state for a living, and that instead of really helping society along and improving the lives of individuals and the well-being of the community as a whole it will prove to be a weakening thing, because men should not have to lean on the state but should be able to take care of themselves. I have given a good deal of thought to that aspect of the matter, and if I believed that any such consequence would arise as a result of measures of social security properly framed and administered I should be the first to oppose them. But I believe that on closer examination it will be seen that what security measures in the nature of social insurance do is to enable those who have their own lives to care for, to preserve their health and strength so that they can be real assets to the community instead of being crushed under conditions of society such as we have to-day, and becoming liabilities.

My friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) referred to a book I wrote some years ago, entitled "Industry and Humanity", a study in the principles underlying industrial reconstruction. If the house will allow me I think I can best condense what I should like most to say by quoting a passage or two from what I wrote at that time on this aspect of the question. I think it is one of the most important of all the considerations of which account has to be taken. I have given the reasons why I believe social security measures are necessary and the real purpose that unemployment insurance, old age pensions, insurance against sickness, invalidity and the like are intended to serve. What appears here was not written for the purpose of any election or political campaign, it was written when I was not in parliament, when I was employing my time in other ways, among them seeking to make some contribution to the solution of post-war problems. This volume was published in 1918. What I wish to quote will be found on page 346 of the first editions. There has since been a new and abridged edition of the book which came out in 1935; in that edition the passage I am quoting will be found on page 176:

> Insurance against unemployment recognizes that an isolated human being, not less than a machine, must be cared for when idle. It recognizes also that nothing is so dangerous to the standard of life, or so destructive of minimum conditions of healthy existence, as widespread or continued unemployment. Where idleness is the fault of the social order, rather than of the individual concerned, it places the onus on the state to safeguard its own assets, not more in the interest of the individual than in the interest of social well-being.
> Workmen's compensation, sickness and invalidity insurance, widows' pensions, maternity and infant benefits, recognize wherein personal relationships in industry have changed, and where as a consequence of new conditions permanent handicaps arise. The social legislation of which these measures are an expression rejects, as unworthy, the thought that men and women voluntarily incur accident, sickness, disease, enfeebled health, or dependence in distress, any more than they willingly seek enslavement of any kind. It recognizes the difficulty of differentiating between industrial accident and occupational disease; and between disease occasioned by occupation or its environments and illness otherwise contracted; also the impossibility of dissociating from economic conditions the social waste caused by excessive and preventable illness. It sees that debt binds health as it binds freedom, that sickness represents the most frequent factor of individual destitution, and that it is in painful crises that handicaps for the whole of life are oftenest imposed. To save the spirit of men from being crushed is quite as important as to prevent their bodies from being broken or infected. Many a man's spirit fails when, through no fault of his own, or of his family, efficiency is permanently impaired through accident, or savings become exhausted by unemployment or sickness, or where a new life in the home suggests an additional burden instead of a joy. Much invalidity and penury is due to lack of character and thrift; but much also is evidence of want of effective social control. What society fails effectively to prevent, society is in some measure under obligation to mend.
> Old age pensions are similar. They are based, not on the theory that the state owes every man a living, but rather on the fact that the provision of an assured competence for old age is an easy matter for some, whilst, for others, it is most difficult, if not wholly impossible. After all allowance has been made for superior thrift, intelligence, and integrity, it must be admitted that to the man who has capital to begin with, or whom society permits to own and control vast natural resources, there are opportunities of saving not possible to the worker who possesses no capital, and who has to face uncertainties of employment and contend, unaided, against all kinds of vicissitudes. It is obvious that existing forces of world competition operate to rob advanced years of opportunities of employment, which, under the less strenuous regime of earlier times, were available to the close of life. There is need for society to assist in the protection of its members against a condition which simultaneously places burdens upon the worker whose day's work is done, and on the worker whose day's work is just beginning. If the young are to be given a fair start in life, the care of the aged should not be their first responsibility. If life-long public service in industry is to receive its fitting reward, years that are denied opportunity of employment should not be subjected to the humiliation of dependence or charity.

May I conclude with just this further quotation:

> It is the elimination of fears with respect to these fundamental requisites of health that labour speaks of as a national minimum standard of life. . . .
> The doctrine of social justice, whereby the economically strong share the burdens of the economically weak, and on which the principle of the national minimum is based, is the antithesis of the doctrine of force. It is founded on a conception of right in contrast to a belief in might. It signifies brotherhood, not fratricide. It does not proceed upon the theory that the economically strong are necessarily the fittest to survive, or that the economically weak are necessarily the unfit. In estimating fitness, it looks to character and personality, not to possessions. It considers human need rather than human greed. It recognizes that, without the many who comprise the economically weak, the economically strong would cease to have a superior position, or, indeed, any position. Social justice would not deprive position of its advantage, but it would require of advantageous position, a wider measure of social service.

When the committee begin their studies they will find that what is needed if social security measures are to be effective is not only a national minimum for industrial workers in any one country, but an international minimum which will help to preserve higher standards not in one country only but in all parts of the world.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FARM DEBT—MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS WITH GOVERNMENT ON MARCH 15

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Earlier in the week there was some discussion on the question of farm debt. I indicated that an opportunity might be given for a discussion of that subject perhaps early in the coming week, and that a statement on the matter would be made by the government very soon. The day I made that statement I had no knowledge of a letter since received which had been mailed at Edmonton on March 1 by Mr. Lucien Maynard, the chairman of the interprovincial debt conference and addressed to myself. In the letter Mr. Maynard states that there had been a conference of farm organizations and the governments of the prairie provinces at which it was decided to request an interview with myself and members of the government on the question of obtaining adequate debt legislation. Later he goes on to say that as chairman of the interprovincial conference, which I think was the one held at Saskatoon—

—I was asked to communicate with you and arrange an appointment for the purpose of enabling representatives of the governments and the farm organizations to make further representations. . . . We are therefore prepared to meet you at your convenience. We would greatly appreciate an appointment for Monday, March the 15th, but if this date is not suitable we are prepared to meet you at your convenience on any subsequent date that would be suitable during the week of the 15th.

Upon receipt of that communication I replied that the government would be pleased to receive the delegation on the earliest date mentioned, March 15. The government has felt that any statement to be made should be reserved until after we have heard the representations of this delegation. I think hon. members will agree that it is obviously right that this should be so. For this reason the statement by the government on farm debt matters will not be made until after the government has received the further representations that this delegation may wish to make.

In regard to Monday's proceedings it has been intimated already that the debate on the budget would be continued. I believe it will be an economy of time, as well as perhaps of a more concentrated debate, if we continue with the debate on the budget until we dispose of it. If we begin discussion on other measures it is going to mean a great deal of repetition in what is said. From the conference I have had with the leaders of the different groups I think I can say that we are all of the view that while we must not make too rigid a decision, we should nevertheless aim at getting through the debate on the budget before taking up other matters. There is this one exception, that there are two committees still to be appointed, one to deal with radio and the other on war expenditures. I will confer with the leaders of the parties as to a date for the discussion of those matters, but the proposal now is to go ahead with the budget debate on Monday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 7.10 p.m.

END OF VOLUME I
