The morning after the party, when they were admitted at the cheerful breakfast table, Mr. Archer inquired of Mary how she enjoyed the evening.

"Oh, extremely well," was the smiling reply.

"And therefore repeat your next query."

The boy went that was pouring the coffee, vivacious as ever, to send the rich and fragrant stream over the saucer chalice. Mary's face and neck were suddenly blanched by blushing, pale, of the consciousness of the awkward accident, but she replied with much composure. "I liked him much, he appeared to be a man of sound common sense."

"He will go quite an acquisition to the society in which he is intelligent, refined and society," remarked Mrs. Archer.

"Well, we all that and more too," said Mary, with an earnestness which caused her the blushing.

The boy turned negligently towards his master.

"I saw her smile there, or you, who are so good a judge of character, Mary," would not have been in his favor.

But little was said, and during the morning Mr. Archer rode over to Hazel Lodge. When he returned, Mary was in the library, which was a favorite haunt, and her heart beat a quick tattoo as she heard his well known step accosting us the means of gratifying and amusing the public on exciting a subject.

"My dear, do you know I am delighted with this Mr. Ashton?" said the boy.

"I am, and I am sure he is a man of much worth, and I am greatly interested in the young man's success."

"Well, I hope it shall like this young man," said Mrs. Archer.

"I am away with you and Mary," said Mr. Archer with a smile.

"Well, I hope it shall like this young man," said Mrs. Archer.

"A woman's natural propensity," remarked Mr.

Archer with affected seriousness, "a man would never consider it a sufficient argument.

The following day Mr. Archer sat reading in the veranda, and was interrupted by the sound of horses' hoofs clattering up the avenue. It was the neighbour of Hazel Lodge, who dismounted from his steed, and grasped the extended hand of his host in a firm grip, and led him into the parlour, and presented Ashton to Mr. Archer.

"She is at once noticed the sympathy of her eyes to those of her lamented son," said Ashton.

"She grasped—tattered—and sank back in her chair."

"It is nothing—nothing—but a momentary faintness," said she, swallowing the water which Mary had instantly brought, and she was soon much better. She could not bear her eyes from the face of the guest, and critically surveyed his character, and then turned her head to the window.

"John! John! you not again have your child?" said Ashton, pleadingly.

"I have given birth to a healthy baby," said Ashton.

"A woman's secret," she added.

"John! John! you not again have your child?" said Ashton.

"I have given birth to a healthy baby," said Ashton.
