His Holiness Leo XIII. in an audience which he recently granted to the Bishop of Orleans said: "You know what confidence I have always had in the Blessed Virgin. In two years I hope to have the joy of celebrating the jubilee of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception." The dogma, it will be remembered, was defined by Pope Pius IX. on December 8, 1854.

Before the blessing of the great bronze cross which is to crown the summit of the campanile of the new Westminster Cathedral, a relic of the true cross was inserted in a cavity of the central section by his Eminence Cardinal Vaughan.

The Very Rev. Canon Oshill, P. P., V. G., one of the best known priests of the Archdiocese of Cashel and Emly, passed away on Saturday at the age of eighty-three, after a life of great usefulness. While parish priest of Tipperary he spent over £5,000 in the improvement and decoration of the parochial church.

It has been announced that the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences and Relics recently met under the presidency of Cardinal Cretoni in order to investigate the evidence in favor of the authenticity of the holy winding sheet which is preserved in the Turin Cathedral, and that the verdict had been unfavorable. "I have made it my business to inquire whether this was true," says the Rome correspondent of the "London Catholic Times," "and am in a position to state that the Congregation of Indulgences and Relics has not given any decision on the subject, nor is it likely that it will do so in the near future, as the matter is not even under discussion."

The Irish Book Company, of Dublin, has issued the Gospel in Irish, translated by Father Peter O'Leary, P. P., of Cork. It sells at sixpence.

Great preparations are already on foot for the solemnization of the ninth centenary of the Greek abbey at Grotto Ferita (near Rome) founded by S. Nilus in 1004. It may not be generally known that this wonderful abbey (under the care of the Basilian monks) possesses the privilege of reserving the Blessed Sacrament under the species of wine, which is kept in a silver receptacle in the form of a dove, suspended by silver chains above the altar. The abbey itself is most interesting, both on account of its great antiquity and of the many religious and artistic treasures it contains. Pope Julius II. caused it to be strongly walled and fortified, so that its exterior presents the appearance rather of a warlike fortress than of a peaceful monastery.

The Paris correspondent of "London Truth" writing of the Crown Princess of Saxony, who eloped with a French tutor says: "The common people of Saxony adore her. They are Protestant and the court is Catholic. Her Catholicism ran wide of dogmatism, and she leaned towards a philosophical deism that seemed Protestant to simple-minded Lutherans. Her refusal to confess to a Jesuit father had got out at the time of her marriage and enhanced her popularity." It sadly happens with Catholics whose Catholicism "runs wide of dogmatism" that they themselves run wide of the Ten Commandments and of every other precept, either of religion or honor, which would restrain corrupt humanity from unlawful indulgence. The Crown Princess has herself removed false impressions created by sensational journals in which her husband was represented as unjust and unfaithful to her. In an interview with a member of the staff of the "Zeitung" of Vienna, she acknowledged that her husband had not ill-treated her. On the contrary, he had always been kind to her. He was an honest and good man, and he loved her and was attentive to her wishes. Her only excuse for her flight apparently is that their dispositions were not well adapted to each other and that the strictness of the regulations which govern life at the court did not suit her. It is an excuse which would scarcely be accepted as a justification outside an American divorce court.

The Naples correspondent of the "Unita Cattolica" gives particulars of a terrific crime perpetrated the other day at Gragnano, Italy. Burglars broke into the house of the parish priest, Don Lismura. Raabing the servant's room without having aroused her from sleep, they immediately strangled her. Then, entering the parish priest's room, they strangled him also, after having first attempted to smother him with pillows. Though they carried off valu-

How Macaroni is Made.

Macaroni originated in Italy. It is a national food of great importance. The Italians manufacture it of a special flour made from hard wheat that contains the most gluten. Such flour they call "Semolina," but in France and Germany the makers of macaroni are not particular about securing the "semolina." So they use any ordinary flour and add some gluten to give it the proper consistency for coming out of the mould and hanging to the bottom.

If too solid dough be used, they break out at the bottom. All of the macaroni made in San Francisco is manufactured by Italians. There are nearly 100 men in the business. San Francisco has a population of about 6,000 people who were born in Italy, and a large number of the same race born in this country. That very Italian population tends to make this a macaroni center.

The men who specially mix the flour and water and watch it ground or crushed or kneaded under the mammoth marble wheel are the only experts required in the business. They are mixers by trade, just as bakers are mixers of dough for the oven. Any one can be a mixer after six months' practice. It takes an hour and three-quarters to mix up a batch and run it through the mould and have it come out finished macaroni. That is, for the first batch. But after the start has been made in the morning, macaroni and the other forms of the paste can be regularly produced and completed in an hour. As the snaky paste worms gradually out of the bottom of the big hollow cylinder a man squats close by and at intervals carves off the strips in lengths to suit and lets them recline upon a long wooden tray that catches the product. Then while the macaroni is still plastic, it is put on trays and taken upstairs to the drying room and shelved and left to dry. Several days are required for a thorough drying. Then the stuff is boxed ready for store trade and shipment.

Macaroni made from common flour can not support its own weight if left hanging limply over little wooden rods to dry. But real macaroni, made from the "semolina" flour rich in gluten, regularly dries that way and dries quickly, while the imitation macaroni has to be laid on trays and given a longer time to dry. Of course, the smaller shapes can not be hung up and left to dry. But you can always tell real macaroni by the indentation of the edges of the stick over which it hung at the end midway of its length. If you do not see that mark of the rod, showing that it was hung up to dry, you may suspect that you are not getting real macaroni made from the proper sort of gluten flour. Macaroni made of ordinary flour tends to crack while drying and does not sustain its weight when hung up to dry.

True macaroni has a soft yellowish color, is rough on the surface, and elastic, and it breaks with a smooth, glassy edge. When boiled in cooking, it swells to twice its former size, but never loses its shape. Macaroni is a nutritious food, and because of its peculiar properties and composition will keep indefinitely in almost any climate.

The mysterious thing about the manufacture of macaroni and the various other shapes of the same paste substance is the manner in which the curious forms are produced. It is simple enough to understand how a little round solid strip like vermicelli comes slowly coming out through little orifices in the steel bottom of the press. It is easy enough to understand how the ribbon-like solid strips come out. But how do you suppose the tubes are formed? And how are the little barley-grain sized made? And how are the little initial letters pushed out by that same steady, silent, tremendous force pressing down on top of the dough in the chamber? The macaroni tubes come out through holes that are funnel-shaped inside with the big end up, and have a small piston projecting down into the smallest part of the orifice. Then as the dough is forced from above, it squeezes down and down and steals out all around the pistons in the funnel-shaped openings in perfect macaroni tubes, with nice, smooth, hollow interiors. The little letters and disks are made in much the same way, except that as they come out they are continuously shaved off by an arrangement of revolving knives. Exchange.

Tourists in Mexico.

In last Tuesday's Herald Mr. Gaurnsey, the special Mexican correspondent of that paper, had some excellent fun at the expense of the sportulous American tourists with whom we are over-run. He tells about meeting a Young Thing recently who at once tried to impress him with the extent of her knowledge of foreign lands, of literature, of science and of everything else under the sun. This Young Thing was presented to Mr. Gaurnsey, he says, by a wandering college professor who should have been kept at home obtained to a reference-book desk in the Boston Public Library. Among the superior speeches made by the Young Thing Mr. Gaurnsey chronicles this:—

"Of course the Mexican women, I mean the ladies of the upper class, are not highly educated; they stay at home and never read, and their lives are narrow, for they must be very much like the Moorish women or the upper class Egyptian ladies—just contented, you know, in a dull and aimless way."

What happened then Mr. Gaurnsey tells as follows:—

"Then I explained, I hope without unduly irritating her, that in tropical lands people generally avoided strenuous thinking, that they kept their eyes sound and bright by refraining from books, and they found peace and contentment in their homes and did not usually go gadding over all lands to learn that which is easier to be acquired at home; that the Moorish ideal certainly made for mental tranquility, and that if the club ladies could be looked up in harems and fed on dates and perfumed confectionery, their husbands, brothers and male relatives generally would emit a sigh of relief that would echo over all the lands of modern civilization."

"Why what barbaric sentiments!" cried the Young Thing.

"Then I told her that there were ladies living in the very houses, country houses of upper class Mexicans, on either side of the car-track, who had lived for years at a time in Paris, spoke good French, subscribed for the best periodicals of the 'villu lumiere,' and had even sojourned at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York."

"Really?" gasped the Young Thing.

"The college professor, who spoke French as it is taught in your high school, put in his cultivated ear."

"But surely they can not follow us our women do, the trend of modern thought."

"Then I had to explain that the trend of modern thought was a tremendous bore, that a woman who made her home a place of daily joy and peace, who was loved like a sister by her children, who could make 100 kinds of delicious 'dainties' or preserves, and manage a troop of servants so that there were always some of them on hand to get the dinner, was worth all of old man Ibsen's talkative ladies."

"But they are bound in superstition, and under the domination of the priests, objected the bespectacled man of thought."

"That always has to come. One is ever ready for it. The Pullman car porters have got it on the tip of their glib tongues. Every fourth-six sociologists who arrives in Mexico repeats it, and is a part of the tourist creed."

Much more the Young Thing and the Professor said that amused the Herald's correspondent, which we would like to print if we had space, but as an offset to their remarks about the "superstition" of Mexicans, we will simply reproduce the following comments by Mr. Gaurnsey, who has been in Mexico for years, and usually knows what he is talking about:—

"A group of humble women passed us on their way across the square to the great church. They would soon be saying their prayers in that temple of superstition; they would find there the God the agnostics say of; the unknownable would be known to them, these unlearned, sweet-minded, loving women. Life to them is not a problem, but a slowly gliding romance of the heart, an inspiration bestowed, a time for faith and hope."

"In a neighboring village mellow church bells were ringing out. In poor, backward, barbaric Mexico there is faith, and a belief, deep and sure, in Christianity."—S. H. REVIEWS.

"Libraries are all very well," says the New Century, writing of Mr. Carnegie's hobby for giving such institutions, "but nearly every city worthy of the name will sooner or later provide itself with hospitals, free hospitals, and homes for old persons, who would rather die than proclaim themselves paupers, are much more needed than libraries filled not wholly with the intellectual wealth of the ages, but with much undigested trash. If Mr. Carnegie and St. Vincent de Paul could only communicate with each other!"

Pains in the Back

Are symptoms of a weak, torpid or stagnant condition of the kidneys or liver, and are a warning that it is extremely hazardous to neglect, so important is a healthy condition of these organs.

They are commonly attended by loss of energy, lack of courage, and sometimes by gloomy foreboding and despondency.

"It was taken ill with kidney trouble, and became so weak I could scarcely get around. I took medicine without benefit, and finally decided to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. After the first bottle I felt so much better that I continued its use, and six bottles made me a new woman. When my little girl was a baby, she could not keep anything on her stomach, and we gave her Hood's Sarsaparilla which cured her." Mrs. Thomas L. H. Wallingford, Ont.

It was the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of Father John's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Angus McDonald, of Piquet. CHAPTER XXXIII.—Continued.

He took it eagerly. I noticed that his hand shook, and his countenance fell.

"Has any one except Wade seen this draft?" he inquired.

"Only Queen Mary's secretaries," I replied.

"Nan and Curie will not give me much trouble, and Wade is one of Mary's bitterest enemies," my uncle rejoined. "Besides, after all, a rough draft proves nothing; it may easily have been altered afterwards."

"I know that this was not," I exclaimed triumphantly. "Here is deciphered the copy of the letter which I wrote from Philippe's dictation at the Green Dragon; it is word for word the same. Now is the falsification proved or no?"

"Fool that you are!" exclaimed Walsingham, unable to control his anger. "Would you betray your uncle, and put him to public shame, and ruin your country, which cannot be at peace while that woman lives? See here, I will make short work of your incontrovertible proofs."

I will not recall our mutual recriminations. They ended in my being placed in custody in my uncle's house, to consider whether, within forty-eight hours, I would swear to preserve secrecy, and beg pardon on my knees, or be consigned to the Tower for siding and abetting Windsor's escape.

At the end of that time Walsingham came to me and asked if I would come to a better mind, and would comply with his wishes. I told him my resolution was unchanged, and I begged him not to stain his conscience with the blood of an innocent person.

He would not listen to a word, but said: "A truce to your entreaties! However, before I send you to the Tower—whence, be it remembered, death will be your only release—you shall have a trial of what imprisonment on bread and water is, here in this house. I will give you a month's probation; if you still persist in your obstinacy, in the middle of September you shall be transferred to a living grave. I answered nothing and he left me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The time has now come, as my husband reminds me, to let St. Barbe rest, while I continue our narrative, and acquaint the gentle reader with the incidents connected with my flight from England.

white-haired old man, as well as the Father Rector, lifted up their hands in joyful wonder, and would not listen to a word Miss Cecil said, when with tears she entreated to forgive the part her father had acted in shedding the blood of Campion and other martyrs.

Meanwhile the lay-brothers had prepared a repast for us in one of the parlours, to which my little brother Frith did great credit, for he was in high spirits; the Rector having consented to take him into the College.

And when, on the sound of a bell, merry voices were heard in the courtyard below, and Frith looking out the window, saw a number of boys playing at football, nothing would do but he must join at once his future comrades.

To this the Fathers had no objection, the Rector went down to introduce him to his play-fellows, and the boy was in such a hurry that he would hardly wait to bid us good-bye.

Thus for the present Frith was provided for. About uncle Robert we had no cause for anxiety. He intended, after he had seen us safely homeward in Paris, to take service under Parma in the Netherlands, for he was still in the prime of life, and well trained in the use of arms.

But what was to become of us two girls? We timidly asked the Fathers: There was no difficulty about that they said; a messenger had already been sent to the Benedictine nuns in Montmartre, who would willingly take us in. There upon I thought myself obliged to say I had no wish to become a nun; on the contrary I was engaged to be married.

I could not help coloring as I said that; but Father Provincial answered smilingly, he would not compel, or even persuade us to embrace the religious life, for to enter a convent without a vocation, was to ensure misery for oneself and for others.

We were only to be the nuns' guests for two or three days, until a home could be found for us in the house of some persons of quality. While we were still at table, a note of kind invitation came from the lady-abbess for the English ladies, and we immediately proceeded to the Convent, after taking grateful leave of the good Fathers. Uncle Robert remained behind, as he was to stay under their hospitable roof for a few days.

At the door of the convent we were met by the Abbess, an aged and venerable lady, who welcomed us with motherly kindness, and knew how to set us at our ease at once. Taking us by the hand, she conducted us through the long, cool corridors into the garden, bright with summer flowers, and shaded by spreading yew trees.
